Actually, I think of our mindfulness practice—at least a significant chunk of it—as, in a way, a cultivation of compassion through the avenue of wisdom and mindfulness. Because so much of what we meet in our mindfulness practice is our own suffering. We are exploring what it means to meet those hindrances, those fears and confusions and desires and aversions. What does it mean to meet those with a heart that is not pushing them away and not holding on? In this way we can see that wisdom and compassion are interwoven. The heart of wisdom, as it meets suffering, naturally responds with compassion. And so the practice of mindfulness strengthens this openness of heart, and the practice of compassion can strengthen this quality of wisdom—the capacity to explore meeting suffering without constriction.

We explore compassion from many directions on this retreat. Tonight we will explore a little bit of the formal compassion practice. It has a form similar to the metta practice, where we call up or imagine a being or beings, including ourselves at times, and offer the wish of compassion, much as we offer the wishes of metta.

The compassion practice typically uses a very simple wish. The traditional phrase, or the translation of the traditional phrase, is "May you be free from suffering"—dukkha muchantu in the Pali. May you be free from suffering. This is the phrase we express in our hearts as the intention, the wish, as we call to mind beings and consciously orient to the ways in which those beings may be struggling.

Since compassion is a response to meeting suffering, part of this practice is actively calling up ways in which we are suffering, ways in which our families and friends are suffering, and exploring meeting that suffering with an open heart, expressing the wish: May you be free from this suffering.

Sometimes, depending on the situation and circumstances, that wish can feel impossible, or there's a little bit of a rub in the mind about expressing it. If, for instance, you have a loved one who is at the end of a terminal illness, expressing the wish "May you be free from this suffering" somehow feels not quite congruent with where you are, or feels like you're wishing for something impossible.

Two reflections on this. One: the wish of compassion is the wish for freedom from suffering. It's the wish that we're connecting to, not the demand that the wish be fulfilled. Sometimes I find myself in a situation like that, and I wish, you know, may war spontaneously cease—not that I think it's going to happen, but if that were possible, that is my wish. Can we connect to the wish itself? That's one way to explore the wish of compassion.

Another avenue, one that in some ways brings in the wisdom side of the situation, is to change the phrase, perhaps to: May you be at ease with these conditions. Because that brings in the understanding, the wisdom, that suffering is a response to conditions, and that perhaps an ease with conditions is in the realm of possibility for all of us.

Classically, with compassion practice, as with metta practice, we begin where it seems easiest. The easiest is said to be someone you know but perhaps not that well, who you are aware is suffering. That would be where classically we might begin the compassion practice.

But this evening I'd like to explore it a little differently and see what it might mean for us to wish compassion for ourselves—to be at ease with the conditions of our life, connecting to and recognizing how we may be struggling or suffering. Remember, with compassion we consciously connect to how we are suffering.

The way I'm going to suggest we do this is as follows. As you sit here, allow your body to be as at ease as is possible in this moment. Relax the physical body and let the attention rest in the area of the heart. Just see how it is right now for you. How are you in this moment? However it is, is fine. Perhaps have a sense of breathing through the heart center.

Allow yourself to be surrounded, in your imagination, with beings that you know love you, care for you. As you recognize for yourself a way in which you may be struggling, allow yourself to receive from your family, friends, and loved ones their wish for you to be free from suffering—their wish for you to be at ease with the conditions of your life.

Receiving that wish: May you be free from suffering. May you have ease with these conditions.

And if for you, in your situation, whatever it may be, it feels like your family and friends share this situation, you might explore expressing it as a collective: May we be free from this suffering. May we have ease with these conditions. Recognizing that this wish of the open heart, the wish of compassion, actually doesn't have any boundaries, and so expressing it for one, another can also receive it. May we be at ease with these conditions.

Take some time to explore that. If the heart gets constricted, see if there can be an allowing of the constriction also—that's a condition too. May I be at ease with this condition. May there be ease with this.

For myself, I find it helpful to keep the attention in the area of the heart, perhaps having the sense that each phrase is a wind through the heart.

And explore: how is the heart, having made that wish? Or having received the wishes of your friends and family?

The heart can stretch to all the conditions of the world. If sometimes it feels like the experience is overwhelming, connecting with the suffering, sometimes it can be helpful to, rather than trying to stay with the compassion phrases, explore mindfulness of the feelings. Use your skills, your tools for working with the arising of challenging emotions. Or if it feels simpler for you, reconnecting with the practice of metta—remembering a dear friend, a benefactor, and connecting with the wish for well-being for your friend or benefactor.

And as it feels appropriate to you, staying connected or reconnecting with the compassion practice for yourself, for your friends and family. As though at this point you're sitting in the middle of a sphere of that wish for compassion. Envisioning that sphere of wishing freedom from suffering to expand to those sitting near you.

Recognizing that as human beings, we all share even just the simple struggles of being human. We all have loss. We all know separation from that which is loved. We all know aging, illness. We are all subject to death. This human body experiences dukkha. This human mind experiences dukkha. And so connecting with the humanity of those near you, allowing your wish for freedom from suffering or ease with the conditions to spread.

You can allow it to spread as far as it wants. You don't have to try to push it.

And then perhaps envisioning that all of those spheres join together. They may make one big sphere of compassion, all of us together. This room filled with the wish for freedom from suffering. And allowing that wish to spread outwards from this room to other beings nearby—your wish for compassion joined with others.

As we explore the possibility of expanding outwards to other beings beyond this room, it's fine to let yourself visualize or imagine specific beings that you may know. See if you can connect to their humanity and wish them freedom from suffering.

And remembering too that you are in the center of this field. As if we are wishing: may all of us be free from suffering. May we all be free from suffering.

And perhaps even envisioning the planet cloaked with this wish. And any beings beyond this planet—may all beings be free from suffering. May all beings know ease with their conditions. And remembering that you are one of all beings in that wish.

And now bringing the compassion practice back to yourself. May I be free from suffering. May I know ease with these conditions. And recognizing that is not a selfish wish, because this heart of compassion is a gift to the world.

May the benefits of our compassion practice be shared with all beings everywhere.

CHAPTER 123

Core Truths and Core Wishes

Andrea Fella · 53 min

In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines the Buddha's central teaching that dukkha is not something that happens to us from the outside, but rather arises from our reactive relationship to experience through greed, aversion, and delusion. She explores how wisdom transforms our response to suffering, allowing the brahmavihārās—love, compassion, joy, and equanimity—to naturally arise as the emotional terrain of an awakened heart.

Fella introduces a powerful framework for understanding our struggles: the collision between "core truths" (impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable) and "core wishes" (happiness, safety, well-being). She suggests that our wish for well-being is deeply connected to mettā, and that suffering often contains threads of both love and truth that become obscured by reactivity. Through a moving personal account of experiencing fear during the aftermath of September 11th, she illustrates how fear and the wish for safety are flip sides of the same coin, and how mettā practice can reveal this connection.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with difficulty through patient, allowing awareness rather than trying to surgically remove suffering. Fella shares her experience of watching depression transform into vast mettā when met with non-demanding curiosity, illustrating how our struggles, like ice melting into water, can reveal the love and wisdom already present within them. This teaching encourages practitioners to honor their suffering as a doorway to understanding, belonging to themselves fully through loving awareness.

So much of our practice is around exploring this experience of dukkha, of suffering. We found the right practice because that was the Buddha's own journey from the beginning of his spiritual quest. Is it possible to find a way to be free from suffering? As he explored this question and found an understanding of suffering, he decided to teach, and he famously said, "What I teach is only suffering and its end." All of his teachings are oriented around this question: how to more fully understand suffering—not so that we can fix it, but so that understanding will free us, will liberate the mind from the ways it suffers.

This exploration, the Buddha's definition and recognition around suffering, is radically different from our usual perspective. I think a lot of us—at least I know for myself before I came to this practice—thought of suffering as something that happened to us.

Kind of like I was just a leaf in the wind, buffeted around by the conditions of the world, with very little say over when I was happy and when I was unhappy. From an ordinary perspective, or maybe from a pre-Dharma perspective, we think of suffering as something that happens to us. Stuff out there makes us suffer.

And yet what the Buddha teaches us is that while there are things that happen in the world that are unpleasant, things that create unpleasant experience, things that are unjust, there's nothing inherently in what happens in the world that can make us suffer in this particular way—having the mind become constricted, frozen, unable to respond skillfully. The Buddha's teaching is that dukkha itself is not so much the unpleasant experience but rather our reaction to it: our fears, our aversions, our desires, our confusions. The wisdom that grows around understanding suffering allows us to be responsive to the world. As Rebecca said last night, we can be responsive rather than reactive. Our reactivity is based in greed, aversion, and delusion. Wisdom joins with compassion and love to support a completely different response to suffering in the world, to injustice, to unpleasant experience—a response of love, compassion, wisdom, and generosity.

We could call these the emotions of wisdom. The emotional terrain, the emotional map of the heart that has opened to wisdom is really the map of the Brahmaviharas: love, compassion, joy, and equanimity. These emotions are not passive. Love acts in this world. Compassion acts in this world.

I think we misunderstand the motivation. Sometimes we feel that if we just settle back and accept things as they are, why would we do anything? Why would we act? That perspective comes from this familiar frame of reference—we tend to be motivated by greed, aversion, and delusion. We tend to act out of those states, and from their perspective, we cannot fathom any other way to act. We envision that if we were free of greed, aversion, and delusion, we would just sit there. But that's not what happens. The heart opens, connects, and breaks with that connection to suffering. It wants to respond, wants to act.

This dukkha that the Buddha asked us to explore is not about getting rid of injustice in the world, but about beginning to free our hearts from greed, aversion, and delusion, and beginning to act in the world from these beautiful emotions of love and wisdom. The Buddha's teaching around dukkha is that greed, aversion, and delusion in our own minds creates what we call dukkha—that there's a possibility of a different way to relate to experience.

As we begin to touch into that, we begin to really understand what dukkha is. We understand its nature. In small ways perhaps, we might see how reactivity, an aversion to physical pain for example, creates a whole complex of experience around that physical pain. And when the mind lets go of that aversion, it doesn't even feel like pain anymore. It's not what we would call pain. It's an unpleasant experience, but vastly different from when we are fighting it.

This teaching of the Buddha—that suffering results from craving and craving happens in our minds—is good news. If it were the case that we were at the whims of the world, that our suffering was just a response, like somebody pushing a button on us, we would be helpless. It sometimes feels like we have buttons and that other people have the power to push them. But we actually offer our buttons to be pushed, in some ways. With this teaching about dukkha, we begin to recognize that transformation is possible.

a whole host of what we call suffering. And not all of what we call suffering at the outset will we be free of, because at the outset we think unpleasant experience is suffering. But the mental pain and grief—that is what the Buddha said it is possible to be free of.

And so the suffering lies in our reactivity to experience, and it's possible to change our minds. This is the good news of this whole mechanism at work in our minds. We're not trapped by the conditions of the world. There's a way in which our response to those conditions can be cultivated to move in a different direction.

That different direction is not a change that makes us think injustice is okay. It's not a change that makes us think it's acceptable for unethical things to happen in the world. Quite the contrary. It is a change that allows us to fully acknowledge this is what is happening, and with a heart of compassion, to respond. Compassion naturally responds to suffering.

So this teaching of the Buddha—that dukkha is created in our minds, that it's a reaction to experience—when we feel into this, we begin to understand how aversion and wanting actually constrict the heart. We notice how it feels to be in a state of aversion, and we see the mind let go of it at times, recognizing how much more ease there is as the mind releases aversion and can actually come into alignment with what's going on, which may be a painful experience, or an uncontrollable experience, an unreliable experience.

And so we see this. We see how as the mind lets go of that aversion or that wanting, how much more ease and peace there is in the mind. And so the question comes up: why on earth does the mind keep doing this? I've seen it. I've seen it's not useful. But it keeps doing it.

I wanted to explore that question. Why do our minds keep doing this? What can we learn about this?

I think our human organism naturally wants to move in the direction of well-being, much as any creature of life wants to be in environments that support it and nourish it, and not be in environments that lead to its harm. A single-celled creature will move towards nourishment and away from a noxious environment. This is a very natural function of life—to move in this direction towards some degree of well-being.

In our human experience, we're vastly more complicated than a single-celled creature. And while we still do this same thing—we move towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant—there's an awful lot going on in between something pleasant and the decision to act, the decision to move towards pleasant.

What we tend to do as human beings, before we start to investigate this question of what is happiness and what leads to true happiness, is that our organism tends to take the quickest route to well-being. The most immediate thing that will make us feel a little bit better in this next moment—we tend to go in that direction. Towards the pleasant, away from the unpleasant, very like the single-celled organism.

I like to think that this movement towards well-being, at a deep level, is connected to metta. It's connected to the wish that when we express metta, we say: may I have ease of well-being, may I be happy, may I be healthy, may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you be safe. This is expressing that wish for well-being, which is a very natural movement of the human being.

And so this movement towards well-being and this movement of metta, I think, have a link deep in our system.

And yet, as I said, there are all of these processes at work in the mind around trying to find well-being, and our tendency, through habit, through having seen in our lives that when I get something I want I get a moment of well-being—that happens over and over again. We get a moment of well-being, a feeling of release perhaps from the wanting that was associated with that desire. We've talked about recognizing how the wanting itself is suffering. And so we get a little bit of release there, and we begin to believe, through repeated application of that principle, that that's the only way to happiness—that's the best way.

We see that those moments of getting what we want don't last very long, but some part of us thinks, well, what I really need to do in order to have happiness in this life is just string a whole bunch of those moments together. That's what happiness would be. If I can figure out a way to navigate this life so that I can string together more and more moments of pleasant and less and less moments of unpleasant, that's as good as it's going to get. That's kind of what we think about happiness.

And so there are all kinds of ideas in our minds, and those participate in this process of moving in the direction of getting what we want. For instance, we want perhaps somebody to think well of us. And our mind creates plans or ideas about how it's going to go about having somebody think well of us, and envisions what might happen when somebody does think well of us. All of these thoughts, all of these ideas in our mind—these plans, the idea of "I'm going to be able to have this person think well of me in the future"—all of these ideas, beliefs, opinions, in this particular case, tend to be pleasant.

We're kind of living in that world of pleasant thoughts of how great it's going to be in the future. And in this moment, as we're having those thoughts, we're experiencing pleasant right now because we've constructed a pleasant fantasy, basically.

Craving can enter in here—does enter in here. When we're not mindful, when we're not aware of this process going on, we get caught up in that fantasy and we're deceived in a way, believing that this is the direction toward happiness. We're confused, believing that this is the path.

And yet, perhaps if we could entirely live in our minds with pleasant fantasy construction, only experiencing the pleasant creations of our minds without reality actually impinging on us, that might be a good strategy. But reality does impinge on us. We don't have control over whether that person thinks well of us. We don't have control over whether what we like will continue or end.

When we meet this impermanent, unreliable, out-of-control nature of experience, we don't like it. We resist it. And we suffer. We somehow think that we've made a mistake or done something wrong because we haven't been able to make the world match our fantasy. But it's not a mistake. It's the nature of experience—to be impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. So much of our suffering comes from this meeting and resistance to just the nature of experience.

We've been saying this a lot in the last few days: the impermanent, unreliable, out-of-control nature of experience and our resistance to that is so much of why we suffer. Resistance being that craving, that clinging, that desire to make things different—the desire to get rid of unpleasant, the desire to hold on to pleasant.

At the same time, our suffering also seems deeply connected to this inner wish for well-being. We wish to be happy and safe and at ease. And given the nature of impermanent, unreliable, out of control, those wishes seem out of reach sometimes.

When we're suffering—and I'm not ready to say always, but often, at least in my own experience—there are two threads that we can open to. When we are suffering around something, when we're angry about something, often it's because there's a deep wish for well-being underneath that has been thwarted somehow. When we're afraid, there's a deep wish for safety connected to that fear. As we open to our suffering, we start to see this connection to the wish for well-being—the natural wish, the human wish, a core wish for well-being, happiness, ease, and safety that we share as human beings.

And those wishes meet reality. The wishes of well-being and safety meet the truth of unreliable, impermanent, out of control—and they collide.

So these two threads: the truth, which I'll call the core truths of life—impermanent, unreliable, out of control—and the core wishes for happiness, safety, health, well-being. It seems like it's not possible to have both. And the mind reacts to that. In almost equal part, it's reacting against the truth and holding on, trying to hold on to that wish.

This is, I think—you know, last night Rebecca said that her first movement with something was "No!" That's that movement. This truth, it cannot be true—because we so wish for the well-being. That movement from deep within us: we so wish for the well-being.

I've had some experiences that have really helped point me to this connection between my suffering, my reactivity, and this deep wish for well-being. Some startling recognitions.

At one point, it was September 2001. I was visiting my family during the September 11th attacks. They live in Tennessee; I live in California. I had flown to Tennessee, and then the planes were grounded. When I finally left, it was the day after the planes started flying again. They had been grounded for a couple of weeks, I think, and so there was some trepidation in getting on an airplane that day.

There was bad weather in Tennessee, and my plane was delayed. I had a connection to make in Houston, but I landed late, and the last flight to California had already left. So I needed to get a hotel. I checked into one at George Bush International Airport.

Sometime that evening, I was talking to a friend on the phone, making arrangements for my travel the next day, when the power went out. It was out for a while, and I finally decided to get up and look out the window. It was really dark—I couldn't see a thing. I resorted to using my Indiglo watch to find my way to the bathroom. And when I looked out the window, it wasn't just the hotel that had lost power. As far as I could tell, it was the city.

Power was out as far as I could see. My mind went to a terrorist attack. In my mind, George Bush International Airport was a perfect target for a terrorist attack. It just seemed like it made sense. And so my mind proliferated with fear. The fear was quite strong.

In that experience of the fear being so strong, my practice kicked in. I'm so grateful for the practice, how it seems to take care of me when suffering gets strong. The fear was arising, and the practice came in almost automatically—I started doing metta practice. May I be happy. May I be safe. As I expressed that wish, that one really landed. That wish, may I be safe, really landed. And then I expressed it outward: May all beings be safe. May all of us be safe. That one really, really landed. Yes, that is what I want—for all beings to be safe.

As I stayed with the metta, the fear disappeared. The feeling of connection and love and care and wish for safety for all beings was really strong. Then the mind would slip into its thoughts: This power is still out. Oh my gosh, if it's a terrorist attack, what are we going to do? I created images of all the people in the hotel lining up in the hallways. And then the mind kicked back into the metta, returning to that wish for well-being and safety.

That experience really showed me just how deeply connected fear and the wish for metta were. The flip side of that fear was a very deep, profound feeling of love and connection. Then the mind would slip into its habitual ways and the fear would explode again, but I could see there was a link. The wish for safety and the fear that safety was not possible—the uncontrollability, the recognition that I didn't have control over safety—that's where the fear came from. But the wish for well-being was a valid wish.

So when these core wishes meet these core truths, that collision, the seeming irreconcilability of these two, is often where suffering is born. We meet the truth of the uncontrollable and we say, "No, no, it's wrong. It shouldn't be uncontrollable." We meet the truth of impermanence and we think, "What have I done wrong?" Reactivity is born when we resist the truth. And yet that reactivity is also connected to this wish for well-being.

Through our practice, we may begin to orient toward the teaching of impermanent, unreliable, out of control, and recognize the vulnerability of experience—the impermanence, how we respond to the uncontrollable, that vulnerable feeling. We may explore that by bringing wisdom to the situation: "Oh, this is just the way it is. Things are uncontrollable. Vulnerability—it's the way it is." This can be helpful. Bringing wisdom in can help to balance our mind.

And yet I've seen in my own mind at times, and heard as I listen to retreatants and students report what's going on in their minds—I sometimes hear that orientation toward "Okay, it's impermanent, it's unreliable" as a subtle way of almost denying that wish for safety and well-being. We're trying to convince ourselves: impermanent, unreliable, out of control—that's the way it is, so that should be okay. Almost as if we have an unseen belief that since things are impermanent, unreliable, and out of control, the wish for safety, the wish for happiness, the wish for well-being is not valid, that it's not the right wish.

We can use an intellectual understanding of this teaching of things as they are to deny and repress those deep wholesome wishes. The wish for well-being and happiness is love, is compassion. And yet our relationship to those wholesome wishes often includes a craving or a belief that if I were doing things right, those wishes would be fulfilled. This is a paradox for us in a way. Part of our mind holds the belief that the wishes are only valid if they can be fulfilled in the way I would like them to be fulfilled—as opposed to connecting to the wish itself.

I mentioned this the other night in the compassion practice, that sometimes we struggle in wishing for freedom from suffering for someone or a situation that seems impossible to change. And yet we do wish for that freedom from suffering even though it's not always possible to change the conditions. The wish is what we are connecting with. As I said the other night, if my wish for war to spontaneously cease on this planet and for peace to be spread across this planet could be fulfilled—that is what I wish.

The connection to that deep wish is not invalid simply because the wish cannot be true in this moment. And so this is an exploration we make around our wishes as well.

The hidden demand for our wishes—the wish of love, of compassion—to be fulfilled in a certain way, that hidden demand creates anxiety and fear, confusion, frustration, anger, rage when those wishes are not met. Wisdom asks us to let go of the expectation, the hope, the craving for a particular outcome around these wishes. But it doesn't ask us to let go of the wishes themselves. In fact, I think wisdom asks us to embrace those wishes.

And so this is a paradox to hold—for our heart to stretch to hold both these wishes for well-being and the truth of uncontrollable, unreliable, impermanent. Our heart can stretch to hold both. And yet the way we do that is by noticing where it's not, where it's struggling.

We've talked about our suffering offering us the lessons we need, and this is partly why. Because when we are suffering, it's a pointer back to these two very crucial things: this truth of love and this truth of truth. And so the exploration around suffering is one of honoring, because the suffering itself contains those threads—the threads of love and compassion and the thread of truth.

In some of the early days of my practice, or not even just the early days, as I explored suffering I often had this really dive-in kind of approach. It was like, "Oh, suffering!" and I would get kind of into it. And yet I still believed at some level that this suffering was like some tumor, and what I needed to do was find the perfect scalpel that would just cut this out and take it away. That was my approach. I believed that the suffering, the anger for instance, was wholly bad.

And yet it's not wholly bad. There are misunderstandings in the anger—misunderstandings, misattributions around these wishes and these truths. And so a way to explore this is to honor our suffering, to allow it to reveal the love and the truth.

It's not that we can dive in and say, "Oh, where's the love in the middle of this anger?" In my own practice around this, it really has felt much more like an embrace of whatever struggle it is—wide arms holding it as softly as I can, with as much openheartedness as I can muster in this moment, to meet that struggle and let it reveal itself.

Our struggles, our reactivity, have so many layers. Underneath anger might be confusion, might be fear, might be vulnerability, might be a wish for safety. And yet we can't just dive into the middle and say, "Okay, well there's anger here, where's the love in the middle of it?" It has to be much more organic. Much more: "Okay, struggle. I'm willing to sit with you. Show me what you are. Show me the layers. Show me the thread of wisdom. Show me the thread of love"—but not demanding how it reveals itself. Patience in this exploration. Very soft, gentle.

I kind of settle back in my approach when it's possible—when I can meet reactivity and know it without it getting stronger, without it feeling like I'm getting swamped or pulled into the rabbit hole of that difficulty. Whenever I can meet it and hold it, that's my approach: "Okay, I get to see a little bit of this, how this thing is put together this time." And then maybe it lasts for a certain length of time and goes away and comes back later, and it's like, "Okay, I get to see a different perspective on it that time."

Over the course of one stretch of a few weeks at Shwe Oo Min, the monastery where Sayadaw U Tejaniya teaches, I was watching depression. Depression coming and going, just willing to meet it, noticing the conditions, noticing it arise, recognizing that sometimes it arose when I was really calm. That was kind of interesting. And so I just started getting interested in the pattern itself—not to get rid of it, but to understand it. Just to understand it.

Many of the tools that I've shared on working with difficulty have come from my own practice exploring. I've offered you several of the ones I used at that retreat. The exploration of, "Oh, there's depression. Okay, well, there's many other things happening. Let me just... there's depression and there's seeing and there's hearing"—broadening the container so it's not the dive-in kind of thing. Noticing when it's absent.

Recognizing, "Oh, it's not always here." Seeing when it arises. The conditions—wow, it comes out of calm. How does that happen? Just curiosity to explore it.

And then one day, as I was feeling into the depression, I was walking back to my room to do my meditation. I had been doing walking meditation, exploring a lot of this, and I went back to my room to do my sitting practice, which I was doing in the lying posture. And the heart felt—the depression felt very vast. Really big, but kind of diffuse. So it wasn't heavy-vast, but it was pretty vast.

As I sat down and began exploring the vastness of this depression, just feeling into that—I couldn't really point at it, but it was like being in a fog. And there it is. And at some point in that exploration, it just expanded. It got bigger and bigger. And at some moment it flipped and became metta.

That was not what I was expecting to find in the depression. I couldn't have really looked for it. And I feel that the power of the allowing was what gave the love the opportunity to show itself.

And then the next moment of my experience—the very next split second—as the mind was in this space... the depression had been very vast, and the metta was equally vast. This vast field of metta I was sitting in. The next moment my mind said, "This is stupid. This is sappy. This is corny." I smiled and laughed. It's like, "Ah, I see." A kind of understanding of the mind's relationship to that quality—creating a feeling of depression. There was an understanding of how the depression was put together, laid on top of this vast feeling of metta.

I tell that story to encourage a not-knowing in the exploration, a not-searching for anything, but a willingness to allow the struggle to reveal what's there. And it will reveal something.

This morning as I was reflecting on this topic, I came up with another analogy. I think I've heard it before, but I can't remember who said it, so I can't give credit, unfortunately. But it arose in my mind, so I'll share it.

The experience of these constrictions, these struggles—it's like ice. It's hard, it's solid, it's frozen. And we feel frozen sometimes with our struggles. And the mindfulness, the allowing, creates the conditions for the ice to melt. There's no change in any of the molecules of that water. It's a different state, but they're all still water molecules. It's kind of like our craving, our clinging, is the cold temperature that solidifies things. And it's not like we have to throw the ice cube away. We throw the ice cube away, we lose the water. The melting will reveal these threads back to love and truth.

To me, this quality of allowing in practice—cultivating an allowing attitude—is so helpful. We allow the fullness of our human experience. Allowing mindfulness, loving awareness, rejects nothing.

In so many ways, I think some of our struggles in life come from really wanting to be seen. Our wanting, our reaching, our feeling of something being off or wrong is a feeling of not being seen, not belonging. And in this practice of cultivating loving awareness and allowing attention, we can see ourselves more fully than anybody else ever could. And discover in that process that that full allowing, that full loving heart towards whatever is happening, may be the very thing we were looking for from someone else.

Through this practice we can belong to ourselves. And in that process, support a community of belonging in the world.

CHAPTER 124

Dependent Origination (Paṭicca Samuppāda)

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers a detailed and accessible exploration of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), one of the Buddha's most profound teachings. She presents it as an elaboration of the Second Noble Truth, explaining how craving leads to suffering through a chain of twelve interconnected conditions. The talk references the famous exchange between Ānanda and the Buddha about the depth of this teaching, emphasizing that true penetration of dependent origination is equivalent to full awakening.

Fella walks through the twelve links—from ignorance (avijjā) through mental formations (saṅkhāra), consciousness (viññāṇa), mind-and-body (nāmarūpa), the six sense bases (saḷāyatana), contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), clinging (upādāna), becoming (bhava), birth (jāti), to aging and death (jarāmaraṇa). She pays particular attention to how feeling tone conditions craving, and how this process operates largely outside our awareness when mindfulness is absent. Drawing on Bhikkhu Bodhi's analogy of a thief reaching for and grasping an object, she illuminates the subtle distinction between craving and clinging.

The practical heart of this teaching lies in understanding that this is not a deterministic process but a conditioned one that can be interrupted. Fella references the Sammādiṭṭhi Sutta (MN 9), which applies the Four Noble Truths framework to each link of dependent origination, demonstrating that awakening is possible wherever we find ourselves in this chain. Whether we're caught in screaming rage, depression, or subtle wanting, bringing mindfulness and wisdom to any experience can lead to freedom right here and now.

Tonight the topic is dependent origination. This is one of the foundational teachings of the Buddha, fundamental to understanding how suffering is created in our minds. I think of it as a detailed exposition of the second noble truth—the truth that craving is the cause, the origin of suffering.

I've been giving many talks on dukkha lately, and yet this is what continues to arise. The Buddha taught, as I mentioned last week, "What I teach is suffering and its end." There is something profound about this teaching as a description of how suffering arises. I don't think of it as a practice; we don't practice dependent origination. We don't practice the arising of suffering—suffering simply arises. And yet this description of how suffering comes to be can be tremendously supportive for us in our practice.

The teaching is quite complex and profound. There's a famous story of Ānanda expressing his appreciation for the Buddha's teaching and for dependent origination in particular. Ānanda says, "It is wonderful, it is marvelous how profound this dependent origination is, how profound it appears. And yet it appears to me as clear as clear." The Buddha responds, "Don't say that, Ānanda—that this teaching of dependent origination is profound and appears profound. It is through not understanding, not penetrating this doctrine that this generation has come to be like a tangled ball of string."

Essentially, the Buddha is pointing to Ānanda's confidence—"Oh, this is so clear to me"—and saying, "Well, there's probably more for you to understand there, Ānanda." The Buddha continues: "It is through not understanding, not penetrating this teaching that this generation has become like a ball of tangled string, unable to pass beyond states of woe." Here the Buddha is connecting the lack of understanding of dependent origination with being stuck—stuck on this cycle of struggle and suffering, caught by these patterns. Elsewhere, the Buddha seems to indicate that one who deeply penetrates dependent origination has fully seen the Dhamma, is fully awakened. It is a deep teaching, a profound teaching. We're probably not going to get it tonight.

And yet, in my own exploration, I find that meeting teachings works in a cyclical way. There may be some piece of a teaching that resonates with me, speaks to me. I practice with it, I understand a little bit of it. Then I might hear the teaching another time, and because there's been some level of understanding, the teaching goes a little deeper. We can hear these teachings over and over again, each time perhaps understanding something new, seeing something new in our experience.

I think it's helpful to explore this teaching of dependent origination, the teaching of how suffering comes to be. There are a couple of aspects of the overall picture I want to point to that have been supports for me. I do want to try to make this talk both practical and accessible. For me, this teaching has been a direct support for practice, and that's what I hope to convey, what I hope to transmit to you.

The first thing I want to point to about this teaching is that the Buddha described suffering coming into being as a process. It's a detailed description of how craving leads to suffering, and in this description he's pointing to processes that work in our minds—processes that we all share as human beings. As we start to investigate this teaching in more depth, as we look at what it says, we can begin to recognize some parts of this process at work in our own minds.

Instead of taking the process of creating suffering personally, instead of taking it as "poor me," thinking we're the only ones who ever suffer, we can recognize it as part of a human process that the Buddha articulated almost 2,600 years ago. We are not alone in how our minds do these things. The genius of the Buddha was his ability to articulate how these processes work with such clarity. We can start to see these processes and recognize, "Oh, this is what the Buddha was talking about. This is how it works"—not just in this mind, but in human minds. He's articulating a human process.

Another piece of this teaching is that it points to the arising of suffering—the arising of struggle, dissatisfaction, discontent, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair—as a conditioned process. It doesn't arise randomly. There are conditions that come into being, that create, that tend to head us in the direction of suffering. The chain of dependent origination contains twelve links, and we will briefly touch on all of them tonight. These twelve links describe conditions that support each other in the creation of suffering. It describes a conditioned process, and yet not a deterministic process.

This is how the Buddha taught dependent origination in brief. He said: "With ignorance as a condition, mental formations come to be. With mental formations as condition, consciousness comes to be. With consciousness as condition, mental and physical processes come to be. With mental and physical processes as condition, the six sense bases come to be. With the six sense bases as condition, contact comes to be. With contact, feeling. With feeling, craving. With craving, clinging. With clinging, becoming. With becoming, birth. With birth, aging and death. And thus is born the entire mass of suffering."

So it describes conditions that lead to the entire mass of suffering. And yet these are conditions, not determinism. Much of what leads us on in this conditioned direction is the lack of mindfulness and wisdom. The very root of the chain of dependent origination is ignorance—ignorance about suffering. Because of that ignorance, because we are caught and not mindful of what's happening, typically our habitual patterns or tendencies are tumbling on, and those habits and patterns basically lead us through this cycle over and over again.

And yet, if we introduce the conditions of mindfulness and wisdom, a very different process can unfold.

This chain, this description of "with this as condition, that comes to be," is laid out in twelve links as I described. It's interesting to notice that the last link—aging and death—is equated with suffering here. The Buddha says, "Thus arises the entire mass of suffering." It is also understood that suffering, when met with bewilderment rather than mindfulness and wisdom, tends to reinforce ignorance. And so this chain becomes a cycle: with the arising of suffering, when mindfulness and wisdom are not meeting that suffering, more ignorance is born and the cycle perpetuates itself.

Yet the hope, the possibility revealed in this understanding, is that while this cycle tends to perpetuate itself when mindfulness and wisdom are not present, the cultivation of mindfulness and wisdom can begin to shift the unfolding.

Still, it's useful to understand this chain, this cycle. The teachings in both the suttas—the words of the Buddha—and in the extensive commentaries that have built up around these teachings describe dependent origination in different ways. In one interpretation, dependent origination describes how suffering can arise based on conditions from the distant past, including former lives, and can propel into the distant future, including future lives. This understanding suggests that the ignorance being cultivated in this life may be perpetuated very far into the future and come from very far in the past.

There's also a description in the suttas and commentaries about this teaching being a moment-to-moment description of how suffering comes to be. This second perspective is the one I will speak to more this evening. It's the one I resonate with more fully. I don't have any direct experience with past lives; that's not part of my experience, and so I can't apply this teaching in that way in my own practice. Yet this teaching has provided profound support for me in my practice of looking at moment-to-moment suffering.

I think we can also understand that this teaching, whether or not you believe in past lives or future lives, points to the ways that ignorance and suffering are perpetuated over time as well as being created in a moment. We see this in our practice. We're sitting here, perhaps calmly with the breath, the mind fairly calm, and then for some reason we do not see—although it is conditioned—a memory of the past arises. Things that have happened in the past come into the present through thought. In this way, the conditions of the past contribute to and influence what's happening now.

This teaching of dependent origination has many layers, many feedback loops, many feed-forward loops. In the classical description, as I said, it begins with ignorance. Ignorance is the ground out of which the entire mass of suffering is born. If we see through ignorance, the whole thing falls apart.

Yet I've found in my own exploration of this teaching that it's helpful to start partway through in exploring what it means and how we can see it in our own practice. So I'm going to skip the first four links or so right now and jump directly to exploring the sense bases in our experience.

This is one of the links. The fact that we have mental and physical processes conditions the sense bases. We have these bodies, we have these minds, and therefore we have sense bases. We have eyes, ears, nose, tongue, skin, and the mind. Because we are conscious—because we're not corpses—these sense bases are receiving sense impressions.

With sense bases as condition, contact arises. Because we have sense bases, we experience sight, sound, smells, taste, touch, and things arising in our mind. This is sense bases conditioning contact. With contact as condition, feeling comes to be.

All of these contacts—we've talked about this—every single contact that we have, every sight, every sound, every smell, every taste, everything that arises in our mind is either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This is a universal factor of every moment's experience: it contains this flavor of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. With contact as condition, feeling tone comes to be. Very simple—just pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

Based on this feeling tone—and we've talked about this link quite a bit outside the context of dependent origination—based on pleasant feeling, we tend to want. We like that feeling; we want more of it. If unpleasant, we tend to not like it; we want to not have it. In this way, with feeling as condition, craving comes to be.

We discussed this especially as we explored mindfulness of feeling. As we begin to bring mindfulness to feeling tone itself, we might see the power of how mindfulness and wisdom can start to turn this chain in a different direction. When mindfulness simply sees pleasant experience—"Oh, this is a pleasant experience"—and many of you have seen this—"Oh, pleasant"—it doesn't lead onward to wanting, to leaning towards. It's just a pleasant experience. It arises, it passes.

When we are not mindful, when ignorance is present in the mind, that feeling tone tends to condition craving. It conditions wanting. This points back to that very beginning link. Ignorance is actually the link that conditions the entire unfolding of the chain. When ignorance is present, feeling leads to craving.

This is a lot of what we look at in our experience—the craving, the wanting. It's very simple, feels kind of automatic: something's pleasant, we want it, we move towards it; something's unpleasant, we move away from it. As we talked about, it's a kind of organic, amoeba-like response to pleasant and unpleasant. And yet in our own minds it's not hardwired. It is possible to simply notice pleasant without having a subsequent reactivity, without having that craving follow on from the feeling. Craving here represents both the leaning towards and the leaning against.

When ignorance is present, we kind of automatically want to act on that wanting—to do something, to get the thing, to get rid of the thing. We take some kind of action to hold on to the experience, to grasp an object, to push away an experience, to figure out how to control or fix or change an experience, or to push away an object. This is the movement in the direction of clinging. With craving as condition, clinging comes to be.

There's a gradation along the line of craving and clinging. It's almost like clinging is an intensification of craving. Bhikkhu Bodhi, the English translator of many of the suttas in the Pali Canon, described the act of wanting, the mental state of wanting, as being like a thief who has spied something they like and is reaching out to get it. The act of clinging is the picking it up. It's a kind of intensification, but there is a distinct congealing or grasping, a holding to, that happens with clinging.

Once we've clung to something, it sets in motion processes of mind that want to serve that clinging. I like this description by Thanissaro Bhikkhu.

He says that the next link in the chain, called becoming—clinging conditions becoming—is "the intentions and actions that rally in the service of clinging." It's the process of behavior that's generated in order to keep that thing, to hold something at bay or maintain our grip on it. The thief grasps the object, and then there's a whole set of processes involved to help them keep it—the sneaking out of the house, finding a safe place to store it. A whole sequence of activity unfolds in this process.

Essentially, I think of this becoming as the intentions that lead us to a place of feeling like we're in control of our destiny. We like becoming. It feels like we're in charge, like we know where we're headed and how we'll get there. We feel like we know how we're going to control something, fix it, change it, or keep it. So there's the act of grasping, and then there's this whole complex of mental processes trying to figure out: How can I keep this going? That's becoming.

Following from becoming is birth into some kind of identity. Things become "mine" or "me." This can take an obvious form of identification—"This is my cup. It's mine. It's got my name on it." Or it might be something along the lines of "I'm the kind of person who does things right"—a kind of owning. Like the person who thinks, "I am the one who can control things." Becoming is the movement in the direction of "I know how to do this," and birth is like "I am doing this." It's almost the same gradation we saw between wanting and clinging—the movement and direction, then the full taking birth into that identity. "I can control this. I can fix this. I can hold on to this. This is mine." Not "this is how I'm going to keep it," but "this is mine."

From here, the Buddha says suffering is inevitable. It might result from the obvious separation from something we consider ours, or it might arise in a subtler way. When we take birth into an identity—not just of owning something, but of being "a good yogi" or "the one who can fix things" or "the one who can control this"—we inhabit those identities. Then, as we've discussed, the truths of impermanence, unreliability, and lack of control manifest. We see that we don't always have control of our destiny. We cannot always be the good yogi. We cannot always be the one who controls the outcome of events.

When we see this, that identity is proven in some ways to be a myth. If we've clung tightly to it, we'll suffer. We may feel like a failure—"I did something wrong"—or we may feel the world is to blame, that others are responsible for this suffering.

This process of taking birth into identity quite often also comes with the birth of "other." Sometimes this process of becoming and birth is actually experienced more as creating other—"That person is to blame. That person is wrong. That person is something." There's this separation, and in that separation there is also a sense of self. So sometimes we can explore this process of becoming and birth by noticing when we're "othering"—when we're making somebody into other, projecting some identity onto them.

We sometimes suffer when others do this to us, putting identities onto us. There's enormous suffering in this world from this selfing and othering. Racism, sexism, homophobia, all forms of discrimination have this process at work. And so the exploration of birth is important. You might notice that sometimes a sense of birth has a clear feeling of "me here," and sometimes it has a sense of "you there"—them.

The other. So noticing both sides of this process—this separation, this congealing into identity—leads to so much suffering in our world.

This cycle we've gone through so far—from sense bases to contact, to feeling, to craving, to clinging, to becoming, to birth, to suffering—tends to perpetuate itself. It tends to reinforce itself. Because we don't understand suffering, because we don't understand how this whole process works, we are very much driven by this pattern, especially the deep pattern around feeling tone: pleasant leading us towards something, unpleasant wanting to push us away from something. We're really driven by that process at such a deep level.

This includes the cycle itself, this chain. Many of the links in this chain are mind states, are processes in our mind. Craving, clinging, becoming—all processes, all mental formations—and they come with a feeling tone. Wanting feels unpleasant. Have any of you noticed that? When you start to look at wanting, you see the feeling of wanting itself doesn't feel good.

Along with this process of there being something out there that we think we want, we're separated from that, and there's a little bit of unpleasantness about the separation from that thing or the wanting of that thing. But there's also this: when wanting springs up, there's immediately a feeling of offness. Wanting comes with unpleasant. The experience of wanting is unpleasant. And so because of that, there's also the drive to get rid of the wanting. There's not only the desire to have the thing we want; there's the desire to get rid of the wanting. So we've got this double process going on.

And then, if we act on that wanting—which is likely if we're not paying attention to what's happening—and we get the thing we want or get rid of the thing we don't want, we get the moment of some pleasure from having that thing. We also get the pleasure of becoming in that moment. When we've got it, we've got the control: "Yes, I've figured it out. I know how to get concentrated. I know how to do this." That becoming, that sense of feeling like we have control, feels really good.

So not only when we get what we want do we have the little bit of pleasant from having it, we get the pleasantness that comes from the wanting going away, and we get the pleasantness of feeling like we've figured it out. These cycles tend to reinforce themselves. Without mindfulness, it's very hard to break through this cycle of wanting, craving, clinging, becoming.

And there's more. Let's go back to the links we haven't talked about yet: ignorance conditions mental formations, conditions consciousness.

Because this chain describes a cyclic pattern, as I described, suffering tends to lead to more ignorance. We can think of this as almost the first link in the chain. Suffering tends to lead to ignorance. When mindfulness and wisdom are not present, suffering heads in that direction.

When suffering is met with mindfulness and wisdom, there's the possibility—actually, there's another chain that's described, the chain of transcendent dependent origination—where when suffering is met with understanding, suffering conditions the arising of faith. And faith conditions the arising of delight, joy, happiness, and concentration, moving in the direction of freedom.

So at this point in the chain, suffering without mindfulness and wisdom leads to more ignorance. With mindfulness and wisdom, we step onto a completely different path towards faith, towards freedom.

A main definition of ignorance is not understanding suffering, not understanding the Four Noble Truths. The Buddha says, "Not knowing about suffering, not knowing about the origin of suffering, not knowing about the cessation of suffering, not knowing about the way leading to the cessation of suffering—this is called ignorance."

With ignorance, in ignorance, we tend to think that cycle we've talked about—that deep pattern around getting what I want will bring me happiness, getting rid of what I don't want will make me happy—we tend to believe that is the way to happiness. That very belief keeps us caught on this cycle.

With ignorance as a condition, when we have this belief that getting what I want will bring me happiness, when we do not understand experience to be impermanent, unreliable, out of control, it conditions our mental formations. It conditions intentions, actions about how we decide to do things, how we behave.

Mental formations is a whole set of things that go on in our mind—everything from anger, frustration, confusion, irritation, pride, conceit, arrogance, to concentration, mindfulness, faith, wisdom. All of these are mental formations.

With ignorance as condition, certain mental formations tend to arise. When we have these beliefs about what will make us happy, if we think what will make us happy is getting what we want, we tend to condition the mind in that direction. Essentially, these mental formations are the whole set of our habits and patterns that we've been looking at—all of these patterns that we see arising in our minds.

We think that we're acting to alleviate our suffering when we engage in our habitual ways of trying to get rid of something unpleasant or hold on to something we think we want. We believe we're acting in our best interest, and yet we are seeing very clearly here that this is not a way to a deeper kind of happiness. Yes, it can create a kind of happiness in the moment—a short, momentary kind of happiness. And yet we're learning about a deeper kind of happiness that's possible here.

So with these habits, these patterns conditioned by our beliefs about what leads to happiness, the next link is: consciousness comes to be. I've spent some time reflecting on what this means—that with mental formations as condition, consciousness comes to be. The way I'm understanding it at this point is that because of the way we think, because of the habits and patterns of our mind, we have filters in our experience. We're seeing the world through certain lenses.

We see this a lot, I think. We notice certain patterns or habits, familiar ones particularly. Somebody the other day was talking about seeing the world through an angry filter—like looking through an angry lens. It didn't matter what the attention was turned to; anger resulted.

I've had this experience. Anger is one of my most familiar patterns. One time I was doing walking meditation in the lower walking room here, and I was noticing that anger was the state of the mind. I was working with it and exploring it and being with it, yet it was pretty predominant, so I was kind of stuck in it. I turned around at the end of my walking path, and at the other end was a pair of shoes. My mind landed on that pair of shoes and exploded in anger. Who put those shoes at the end of my walking path? This is the filter of anger.

With these filters—these mental formations, our agendas, views, ideas, beliefs, emotions—we tend to see things in the world in a certain way. What we take in, what consciousness connects with, is filtered based on our ideas, agendas, views, opinions, and emotions. We think that our senses are taking in experience as if our eyes were cameras, our ears were microphones. And yet that is not the way our minds work; that's not the way our senses work.

There are studies on this factor of mind in psychology; it's called selective attention. When we are focused on something, there are things we simply do not see. We can be asked to look at a video and do a certain task—focus on something, watch someone doing a magic trick. I just watched a TV program where they were playing with this selective perception, and they said, "See if you can figure out how I change this liquid into a bunny." So I was watching really closely. At the end, I thought I'd seen maybe where that switch had happened, but I was really focused on it. Then they ran the video back and said, "Well, did you see these other things that were happening at the same time? This very large bunny walking across the video?" No, I didn't see the very large bunny walking across.

The agenda to focus meant consciousness did not take in the bunny. This happens to us all the time. And yet we believe that we're seeing things clearly, that we are seeing things exactly as they are. Even something as simple as an agenda can screen certain things in and certain things out. Imagine what a whole history of a pattern can do in terms of taking in information about the world. We do not see things as they are. There's a famous quote: we don't see things as they are, we see things as we are. This to me is mental formations conditioning consciousness. Consciousness lands on things in a certain way—or may not land on things at all. Consciousness may not come to be. The bunny consciousness did not come to be.

With consciousness as condition, the next link is: mental and physical processes come to be. Based on these mental formations and what we're taking in, our minds and bodies are influenced. If we've got the angry lens on, our bodies are impacted—our face may become distorted, our body may be tense and tight. Mental formations and consciousness conditioning mental process, physical processes. Mental states of mind tend to condition more mental states of mind.

We tend to filter in or out certain things that agree with our perceptions and keep leading us on toward suffering. This cycle tends to reinforce itself. Our filters tend to reinforce our pre-existing perspectives.

So the cycle continues. We come back to this beginning point. We've looped all the way around now, back to the sense doors. When we first started talking about this, it seemed straightforward: there's a body, there's sight, I'm seeing things, there's pleasant and unpleasant. But now we see that we're not coming at this from a neutral place. We are already skewed, already influenced by mental formations, ideas, agendas, views, and beliefs that influence what we take in.

This cycle has a very strong tendency to condition and reinforce itself—reinforcing our views, our beliefs, our opinions, our patterns.

And yet it's not hopeless. It's not hopeless because mindfulness and wisdom can completely change the direction of this pattern. Again, dependent origination describes a chain of conditions with ignorance at the head of the list, leading to the entire unfolding of this pattern. When we bring mindfulness and wisdom to our experience, we are undermining ignorance.

There's often an emphasis on breaking the cycle of dependent origination at the feeling-craving link. It's a very powerful practice to explore feeling tone. The Buddha emphasizes exploring feeling tone over and over again in the suttas. He emphasizes it in the second foundation of mindfulness: when feeling arises, when pleasant sensation arises, know it's pleasant. Know unpleasant. As we open to this exploration of feeling tone with mindfulness and wisdom, we see the possibility for it not to lead on to craving. Bringing mindfulness and wisdom to feeling tone undermines the possibility for ignorance to be there, because we are noticing in the moment: this is just feeling tone.

And yet, while that's a very powerful place to break this chain—bringing mindfulness and wisdom to feeling tone—the Buddha describes that attention to any place we find ourselves, anything we wake up to, anywhere we are in this chain, can be liberating. Mindfulness arises in the midst of, let's say, screaming rage. We have not seen the feeling that led to that. Screaming rage is present, and mindfulness arises there. The Buddha says: right there, it's possible to understand that screaming rage. Screaming rage is a mental formation.

In one sutta, the Buddha describes how we can practice for freedom right in the midst of exploring every single link in the chain of dependent origination. If we look at mental formation—when one understands mental formations, when one understands screaming rage, the origin of screaming rage, the cessation of screaming rage, and the way leading to the cessation of screaming rage—in this way, one has arrived at right view and has arrived at the Dharma. In this way, one has freedom here and now.

The full quote reads: "When a noble disciple has understood craving, has understood the origin of craving, the cessation of craving, and the way leading to the cessation of craving, that one here and now makes an end to suffering." That same pattern—a pattern you probably recognize—is repeated over and over again: when one has understood clinging, understood the origin of clinging, the cessation of clinging, and the way leading to the cessation of clinging, one here and now makes an end to suffering.

At every link in this chain, the Buddha applies the pattern of the Four Noble Truths as an insight into that particular experience. It might be screaming rage. It might be depression. It might be confusion. It might be feeling tone. It might be love. We understand the state of mind. We understand the experience, the origin of the experience, the end of the experience, and the way leading to the ending of the experience. We here and now make an end to suffering.

Whatever is happening, no matter what is happening, the practice can in that very moment lead to freedom.

I talked about my belief that I had to get over or get beyond certain hindrances, especially around self-hatred—feeling like, okay, well, this is my self-hatred retreat, I guess I have to wait for enlightenment later. That kind of belief lived in my mind. I felt I had to wait for insight.

But when I finally surrendered to recognizing: this is self-hatred, this is how self-hatred arises, oh, this is how self-hatred ends—the mind understood in that moment something very deeply, right in the midst of exploring. I wasn't seeing feeling leading to whatever it was. I was just noticing the experience. I did notice that the experience of self-hatred was unpleasant, but right in the middle of whatever's arising.

To me, this is an inspiring part of this teaching. For those of you who like references, the sutta I'm quoting from—which applies the formation of the Four Noble Truths, this pattern of the Four Noble Truths, to all the links of dependent origination—is in the Majjhima Nikāya, number nine, called Right View.

I find that very inspiring because it keeps me coming back to waking up here and now. No need to create anything else. What's happening now we can meet, we can wake up to. It doesn't matter what we bring our attention to, what we are noticing in the present moment. It doesn't have to be something else. This experience—Alexis pointed to this in his talk the other night—everything is showing us the Dhamma. Everything. Even screaming rage can show us the Dhamma when we bring mindfulness and wisdom to bear on it.

Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 125

Wisdom at Work, Taste of Nibbāna

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this profound talk, Andrea Fella shifts focus from understanding suffering to exploring its cessation—Nibbāna. She examines the Four Noble Truths not merely as descriptions but as practices: understanding suffering, abandoning craving, realizing freedom, and cultivating the path. Drawing from suttas including the Saṃyutta Nikāya's poetic descriptions of Nibbāna as "the unfashioned, the end, peace, the deathless, bliss, refuge, the ultimate," she emphasizes that this freedom is "immediate, visible in this life"—not some transcendent state removed from everyday experience.

Fella offers practical guidance on recognizing "wisdom at work" in ordinary moments of practice. She describes how wisdom operates: putting the mind into neutral when recognizing anger as "just anger," seeing thoughts as simply present-moment phenomena, witnessing the conditioned nature of experience, and sometimes experiencing the rapid disappearance of defilements upon being clearly seen. She shares a pivotal personal insight involving anger, where seeing the mind's intention toward reactivity allowed it to simply let go.

Referencing Buddhadāsa's concept of "temporary Nibbāna" and the Buddha's analogy of the rotting rope—where daily practice imperceptibly wears away at greed, aversion, and delusion—she encourages practitioners to trust the gradual path. These small tastes of freedom, while not final liberation, serve as pointers confirming we're on the path, building confidence that freedom from mental suffering is genuinely possible in this very life.

As we've said a number of times, the Buddha said he teaches only suffering and the end of suffering. We've spent a lot of time talking about the suffering part—exploring how to work with it, how to open to it, how to meet it, how to understand it really. The first noble truth, the foundational teaching of the Buddha, encouraged us to understand suffering. Tonight I'd like to look at the other side a little bit: the possibility of the end of suffering.

In the context of the Four Noble Truths—the truth of suffering, the truth of the origin of suffering, the truth of the ending of suffering, and the truth of the path, the way leading to the ending of suffering—I sometimes think of the first two Noble Truths as being a description of our usual lives, how we get caught in the cycle of wanting and suffering. There's the truth of the origin of suffering, the cause, the craving, the wanting, and the suffering itself. In some ways we can look at the second noble truth as being the conditions for the first noble truth. It's sometimes said of the second noble truth that the arising of craving is the arising of suffering. That's the condition for suffering to arise. And so we see this dependency or conditionality between these two truths.

These two truths describe the dependent origination, which we explored a little bit last week, as a depiction of this cycle of wanting and suffering and wanting and suffering and how it perpetuates itself. In a way, these first two noble truths just toggle back and forth, indicating this cycle.

The third and fourth noble truths are a description of the possibility for ending this cycle. The fourth noble truth is that there is a path that leads to the ending of suffering, the third noble truth. So again, the fourth noble truth describes the conditions that create the possibility for the third noble truth, the freedom from suffering. We cultivate the path and it creates the conditions for freedom. This is the way out, the possibility for being released from the cycle described by the first two Noble Truths.

And yet there's another way of understanding these Four Noble Truths. The Buddha associated actions with each of these truths, turning them into practices really, instead of being descriptions of the conditions of our life and descriptions of how that pattern can change. They become actions, things that we explore directly.

As I said a few minutes ago, the action associated with the first noble truth is to understand suffering—understand in the way that we've been practicing for these last weeks and months. Exploring the experience, not thinking about it, not trying to figure out why it's happening in our usual way of thinking back about what I did and what that person did and what happened next. But more: What is the experience? What is the experience of frustration, of anger, of pride, of greed, of confusion? That's the understanding the Buddha enjoined us to undertake with respect to suffering.

The action associated with the second noble truth is abandoning the cause of suffering, abandoning the arising of suffering, abandoning the craving that leads to the arising of suffering. In my own experience around this abandoning, sometimes there are occasional times when I can recognize that the mind is headed in a certain direction and that's not helpful, so let me see if I can redirect or let go of that direction, that inclination, that movement. And yet what I see most of the time is that the letting go, the abandoning—we can think of the abandoning as being something that happens naturally when suffering has been understood. The deep connection with suffering leads to the understanding which creates the conditions for the mind to simply recognize this is not helpful. The mind abandons the craving. Wisdom has been cultivated and wisdom abandons the craving.

The definition of abandon, actually—I looked this up just to get some inspiration at one point when I was offering a talk on this second noble truth—indicated that abandoning is something that happens when you understand you're in a place of danger. For instance, the term "abandon ship" is to leave that ship because it's going down. It's not like you want to hold on to it, because holding on to it means being pulled under. And so abandoning comes about through understanding the consequences of holding on to something. This is not helpful. There's a kind of natural abandoning that happens around craving as we understand suffering.

The action associated with the third noble truth is to realize the freedom from suffering. And again, to me this follows very naturally from these first two noble truths. We understand suffering; through that understanding the mind lets go of the craving; and through that letting go, realizes the ending of suffering.

In some ways I feel like the Buddha laid out a path of practice for us in associating these actions with the noble truths and pointing out that most of our work is in the understanding of suffering, which is done through cultivating the fourth noble truth—the path, the Eightfold Path leading to the end of suffering. We can think of the Eightfold Path as being those tools: wise view, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration. These are the tools that allow us to understand suffering.

And so the Four Noble Truths have a kind of cycle in them. We cultivate the Fourth Noble Truth in order to understand suffering, leading to the release, leading to the letting go of craving, leading to the realization of freedom.

And so this release—nibbana, the term in Pāli for this ending of suffering—I understand means something like "to cool" or "to go out." I think the word in Pāli would have been used to describe a warm meal sitting on the table that is cooling as it sits there. It's nibbana-ing. So it's a kind of everyday word in Pāli. And yet we create these exalted words for it—"enlightenment." But really, it's a cooling, a release.

Primarily, nibbana is described in the suttas by what it is not: non-clinging, the ending of craving, the absence of greed, aversion, delusion. It's not described in terms of what we get, what we attain, what we accumulate. It's not described by what kind of person we become. There are some descriptions of a person who is free, but largely these descriptions again are in terms of what they don't do. They are not killing. They are not stealing. They are not holding on to things. They are not craving. And so the description of someone who's enlightened is a description of someone who has let go.

I'm going to read you some descriptions from the suttas about this. These are not from one sutta, but I like the way they flow together, so I'll read them as if they were one:

The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called nibbana. Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbana—immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise. And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done and nothing remains to be done. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so neither forms, nor sounds, nor odors, nor tastes, nor contact of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired, can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is the mind gained as deliverance. This is peace. This is exquisite—the resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana.

The Buddha also offers some similes for nibbana. Some of these give a sense of what's been released, what's been let go of—that it is a letting go and not a having of something. These similes can give the flavor too of the other side of how nibbana is described. Not as nothing, but as the great happiness. Mahāsukha, nibbana is sometimes called—the great happiness.

Here are some similes from the Saṃyutta Nikāya. I'm just going to read the similes, and they come together almost like a poem:

The unfashioned, the end, the effluent-less, the true, the beyond, the subtle, the very hard to see, the ageless, permanence, the undecaying, the featureless, non-differentiation, peace, the deathless, the exquisite, bliss, solace, the exhaustion of craving, the wonderful, the marvelous, the secure, security, nibbana, the unafflicted, the passionless, the pure, release, non-attachment, the island, shelter, harbor, refuge, the ultimate.

These descriptions of nibbana might seem almost irrelevant or hard to fathom. Some of them might even sound like, "Why would I want that?" I'd like to point back to two things that inspire me personally from what I read earlier. First: "This is nibbana—immediate, visible in this life." This possibility of freedom. And second: "experiences no mental pain and grief."

The description of the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion brings in the flavor of a possibility I can envision—walking around in my life, potentially not motivated by greed, aversion, and delusion. Having watched these forces a lot in my mind, having seen how they function, having tasted little moments of greed, aversion, and delusion ending, I can envision the possibility that this kind of freedom is visible in this very life. Visible in this life where I am driving a car and using a cell phone and talking to people and buying groceries. This possibility of freedom in this very life. And the description of no mental pain and grief—again, this is to me inspiring, that possibility.

It's not that this description of nibbana says you'll be removed from the world. It leaves open the possibility for so many different expressions of what it means. This is something I love about this teaching.

When I first heard about enlightenment, I thought it must be some big kablooey thing—some major mind-altering experience, not connected really to ordinary life. I envisioned it as something transcendent, not something in this life, in this world. And so this inspires me, this description of the possibility that it's visible in this life. Freedom from greed, freedom from aversion, freedom from delusion. I like keeping it simple in that way.

And I'd say in my own practice, most of the practice has unfolded in a really gradual way. Little tastes, little shifts, small releases. There have been a few larger aha moments. But the Buddha describes the path largely as a gradual path, a gradual awakening. We may have sudden moments that reveal something, or the mind shifts quickly, or sees something in a moment really differently—a kind of breakthrough moment, a sense that something has been revealed that was not seen before. We have some of those. And some are described in the suttas, where the Buddha gives a dharma talk and somebody becomes enlightened. I think Greg mentioned that the other day. But those poems he read—the poems of the nuns—and a lot of the other descriptions in the suttas are more like, "I've been practicing for twenty-five years. I'm doing everything the teacher tells me. And yet still the mind is caught." It's a gradual process, often imperceptible.

I talked about the chopping wood analogy a few weeks ago—that for chopping wood, we may not see the fibers of the wood weakening, but at some point there's a kind of dramatic breaking of the wood. Well, the Buddha gives a more gentle analogy actually. He talks about a rotting rope. Envisioning a shipwreck, he says the rope, the rigging of the ship, lies on the beach, and every day the sun, the sand, the wind, the water, the waves wash over the beach, wearing down the fibers of the rope. The wind, the sun, the waves, the sand—these are like our mindfulness practice. Each day if you go back to that beach and look at the rope and ask, "Is it different today?" it's not going to look any different day by day. It's a gradual process, a gradual wearing away. You don't notice the difference day to day, but a year later you come back, maybe try to pick up that rope and it falls apart in your hands—has worn through, through that gradual process. That's a lot of what we're doing here.

So often I find, and I definitely had this on retreat, and I'm hearing some of you report this in your meetings: the looking for something to prove I'm doing it right. Waiting for some insight. I spent so many retreats waiting for that insight to prove I wasn't a failure. And at this point I understand it's just every moment of practice wearing away at the greed, aversion, and delusion. And I don't know when a release will happen. I don't have control over that. We don't have a say over when insight happens. But the process of the wearing away, the commitment to wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration, leads to the conditions for that release.

And so through this gradual wearing away, there are some hints along the way, pointers along the way that help us to recognize these little shifts. They're not these big kablooey things—they're just little shifts of the mind saying, "Oh, it's just anger. I can be with anger right now." You see these little shifts, little moments when greed, aversion, and delusion weaken or fall apart for just moments. We often don't tend to notice these moments, at least through our lives—they're subtle. It was one of the similes the Buddha offered: the very hard to see, the subtle, this moment of greed, aversion, and delusion falling away. We are attuned to watch things coming into being. We are attuned to watch the creation of things and not the falling apart of things.

Buddhadasa wrote in a little pamphlet called Nibbana for Everyone—he wanted to make nibbana accessible to the people in his village, so he started just talking about nibbana. He said, "Anyone can see if states of greed, aversion, and delusion were with us all day and all night, every second without ceasing, living beings must either die or become insane. Let us consider that we survive because there are moments when the fires of greed, aversion, and delusion are not burning."

And so part of our training here in understanding the suffering is to begin to recognize these small moments, these little shifts. They're a pointer for us. They give us a taste, a tiny taste of that possibility of freedom in this very life. Maybe the flavor of no mental pain or grief. I'd like to describe some of the ways I've noticed this.

Wisdom at work. Really, it's wisdom that does this for us. It's wisdom that frees the mind. It's wisdom that releases greed, aversion, and delusion. It's wisdom that releases craving. And we have all been cultivating wisdom here, and you've all seen wisdom at work. It can operate in some very quiet ways.

At one point when I was in Shwe Oo Min, practicing with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, he said, "Notice when wisdom is at work." And I was confused by that instruction. Wisdom—I thought of it as some grand thing. But wisdom is a function in the mind that allows release.

And so I began holding that instruction. It was kind of like a koan for me. I held it in my mind: what does it mean to see wisdom at work? As I began, not trying to look for it but just holding the question—and this is part of the practice with Sayadaw U Tejaniya sometimes, just holding a question and then doing your practice, not trying to look for the answer, but somehow just holding the question begins to orient the mind to recognize things in relationship to that question—I began to notice many ways wisdom was at work. And actually, many ways I'd seen wisdom at work for years that I'd not noticed. Little moments.

You will recognize some of these flavors that I'm going to describe. You are recognizing wisdom at work. Already you're recognizing wisdom at work. And this seeing wisdom at work is a pointer to that release, a pointer to seeing those little moments of Nibbana—temporary Nibbana, which Buddhadasa called those moments. Not final Nibbana, not full Nibbana, not full release from delusion, but little tastes.

So one of the first ways we begin to see wisdom at work is just the recognition that we can meet some experience, like frustration or confusion, and know it. "Oh, this is just confusion." Just recognizing something as something that's arising in the moment. The pattern might continue, but the mind can know it. This is a huge difference.

The way wisdom is working here is that instead of our minds being caught into the state, believing the state in a way, there's a separation—a little bit of a separation in understanding. An independence. Sometimes the term "independent abiding" is used in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta: "One abides independently." I think of it as mindfulness being independent of whatever it is mindful of. So our minds take a step back and are freed from being hooked by a pattern and can just watch the pattern.

I think of this kind of wisdom as being akin to putting a car into neutral. If a car's going sixty miles an hour down the freeway, that momentum is kind of like a pattern in the mind—like anger or aversion. One way to deal with that fast momentum, maybe the safest thing to do on a freeway, if you discover something's wrong, isn't to slam on the brakes and have somebody plow into you from the rear, but to put the car into neutral and gently steer yourself to the side of the road. You put the car into neutral and the car will come to a stop, because you're no longer fueling it. You're no longer fueling the forward momentum.

Very similar with this kind of mindfulness. "Oh, this is just anger." It's like you put the mind into neutral. It's not feeding the pattern anymore. The pattern will come to a stop. We can watch that momentum unwind in a way. Sometimes it takes a while.

So that's one way we see wisdom at work. We understand, we see that shift from being caught by something, believing it, believing the story of that pattern, believing the anger, believing "I have to fix this, I have to do something about this"—to "Oh, wait a minute, I'm just sitting here. This is just anger." Huge difference in those two. Wisdom at work, right there, seeing that.

Related to this is recognizing something happening in our experience as just something happening in the present moment. We see a thought arising in the present moment and know it's a thought arising in the present moment. We see a thought arising and recognize that a response to that thought, an emotion, is also simply arising in the present moment. We might begin, through this kind of recognition, to see, for instance, if we're having a reaction—we see somebody, we notice seeing, and then we see a reaction to that person.

We may be able to see that the reaction is related to something else arising in the present moment—a thought, a view, a belief in our minds. Seeing this at work, recognizing that while the reaction has arisen, it's not based in reality; it's based in a belief, in an idea. So again, we're seeing just what's happening in the moment as something. A thought is just a thought happening in the present moment.

We see past and future not as past and future, but as a thought arising in the present moment about something that happened in the past, or a thought in the present moment about something that might or might not happen in the future. We see experience this way—seeing experience as something happening in the present moment. Wisdom is present to support us in that seeing. And that wisdom being present often creates a sense of release, relaxation around a reaction, for instance.

If we see that a reaction is simply something arising in the present moment and doesn't have... In this case, it's like on retreat sometimes we see somebody and we've got some story about them in our minds. I've had whole relationships unfold in my mind—a relationship where I fell in love with somebody, then met his brother, fell in love with the brother, broke up with the first person. This whole huge story, my relationship to that person, and I'd never even spoken to them. Seeing that happening and recognizing, "Oh, that relationship is a creation, a construction of the mind"—seeing that helps the mind to be more at ease around what's going on.

So again, the wisdom at work creates a kind of container in which the experience is held with more ease. And that ease, that peace around what is arising, is a taste in the direction of freedom. The feeling in the heart of softening or relaxation often comes with that, even as something is unfolding, even as a pattern is unfolding.

Sometimes we witness or see the conditioned nature of experience. We see how we go outside on a cold day, feel the cold wind, unpleasantness, and our mind creates the image of sitting inside with a warm cup of tea—and then, "Oh, it's time to go get a cup of tea." We see the conditioned nature of this unfolding. We see how one thing conditions another, and how the sense of self picks up on some part of this process. In this case, it picks up on "Ooh, being inside having a cup of tea, that sounds nice." We become that and then follow through on it, take birth into it.

So we watch this arising, and sometimes we can just watch it arise, recognize the becoming around "Ooh, having a nice cup of tea," feel that urge, see the urge as arising based on that image, and recognize, "Wow, who's deciding to do this anyway? This is all a conditioned unfolding." We see that. Again, wisdom sees the not-self nature of experience there and recognizes how that construction of a sense of self creates constriction, creates unease.

So we begin to see our experience as a process. We begin to notice when we attribute an "I" to that process. And we do this with insights too. Something happens, something unfolds, and "Oh, I did that. I figured that out." We begin to see how that creation of a sense of self constricts, and how the seeing of the natural unfolding creates more of a sense of ease. Seeing the conditioned nature of experience.

Sometimes this wisdom at work, the release of something, happens in a more dramatic way—a quick release of some defilement, some pattern of reactivity, upon being seen. We may see it arising. We may see the very beginnings of something putting itself together, and in the seeing of it, it just vanishes.

I remember the first time this happened to me where I recognized it. But I thought I'd done something wrong. I was in the welcome room—it was a yoga room at that point. I was doing some stretching, and it was between the two halves of a three-month course. I was feeling abandoned by my part one teachers and was feeling pretty sorry for myself, feeling a lot of loneliness, sadness, loss, grief—those kinds of things. I was watching them, noticing them, bringing compassion to them, practicing with these feelings.

At some point I got a little more curious. I was hanging out with them with the compassion, and I think in retrospect—as I said, I noticed that I'd seen wisdom a lot in retrospect, as I began to understand what it looks like to see wisdom at work. In retrospect I see that what happened was that wisdom got more interested in the emotion itself. It was like, "Huh, I wonder what this loneliness actually is."

And it vanished. It wasn't like the car went into neutral. It was like the car disappeared.

I was very confused. I actually had the belief that I was not very good at looking at emotions. And I had the belief somehow that I made it go away because I repressed it, or something. So I went and talked to my new teacher, who was Carol Wilson, and reported this to her. I described what happened, and I think I led in by saying, "I don't know how to observe emotions. I don't know how to watch emotions, because this is what happened—when I turned to look at it, it was gone. So help me learn how to watch emotion."

She said, "Did it feel like there was anything lingering there?"

I said, "No, it just felt like it was gone."

She said, "Trust your experience."

I was like, wow. Trust my experience.

So that kind of quick disappearance of something—really, the mindfulness just kind of comes close sometimes. Sometimes we have that quick disappearance. Now, we can make the mistake of thinking—and this happens a lot—once we've had those kinds of experiences, they're kind of mind-blowing at times, those quick, rapid disappearances of a defilement. We might believe that it means when it doesn't disappear, when I turn my mindfulness to it, that I'm doing it wrong. We might believe that.

But in my experience, sometimes the conditions are there for a quick disappearance and sometimes they're not. Sometimes our practice is putting the car into neutral. It's just the conditions at this moment. But that too, that quick disappearance of a defilement—the mind is seeing something and releasing, just releasing something it was holding on to.

Sometimes we recognize wisdom at work because defilements are not arising. The Buddha actually encourages us to notice this in the Satipatthana Sutta. He encourages us to notice the non-arising of greed, encourages us to notice the absence. When greed is not present, the instructions go something like: when greed is present in the mind, one notices greed is present; when greed is absent in the mind, one notices greed is absent. This is attuning to recognizing that certain of the defilements are not there at the moment.

This is a really useful thing to explore, particularly around patterns or habits that are very entrenched, ones that we really identify with. Recognize when it's not happening.

I thought I was a miserable person for much of my early adult life. And there were times I noticed that the misery wasn't there. This was before I started practicing. I noticed sometimes that I was happy. And yet when I noticed that I was happy, the mind didn't kind of take that in. It said something like, "Well yeah, I'm happy now, but what I really know is that I'm miserable"—attributing a kind of ongoing reality to the miserableness and not really taking in that in this moment, it was not there.

So noticing the non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion. Sometimes this happens more in reflection, more in recognizing, for instance, a pattern that we might have, a particular situation in which we might have been reactive in the past, that is not happening right now. "Gosh, I'm having this conversation with this person and I know habitually in the past I've gotten really charged about this. But it's not happening right now." Recognizing that that pattern is not arising.

Sometimes it happens through simply recognizing that a pattern isn't being activated. It's almost through reflection, more of a recognition than a direct experience in a way. It's not really noticing the direct experience of the absence so much, but it's more like a reflection: "Yeah, usually I'm reactive here."

There are also times when we can actually see the mind moving in the direction of a defilement, and then, seeing it's headed there, it lets go.

In my exploration around anger—I don't think I've told this part of this story—at one point, having spent quite a bit of time noticing anger directly, noticing the experience of suffering that comes when we're angry, noticing, "Wow, this hurts, it doesn't feel very good"—I got much more attuned to anger, got much more attuned to its arising, got much more of a sense of recognition when I was in a state of ease or peace. And then at one point—this was several months into my practice—this insight actually happened. It was one of the pivotal insights of my entire meditation practice, my entire practice, this moment.

It really was—I would say it's the moment that I knew I'm going to do this forever. I'm going to do this as long as I live. This is really useful.

I was cutting an apple. I wasn't even trying to be mindful, but I was in my kitchen cutting an apple, and I noticed a thought arise in my mind about a person I was angry with. I recognized that there was a connection between what I was doing—cutting the apple—and the thought, because the thought was about being with this person at a fruit stand. We were buying fruit in my memory. So I saw the conditioned nature of that thought in that moment.

And also in that moment—this all unfolded in about a split second—I saw the mind kind of reaching out, like, "Oh yeah, let's get angry at that person." I felt the mind headed in that direction, but I knew in that moment that I wasn't angry yet. I could see it was like the intention for anger—the mind headed there. Seeing that intention, and knowing where it was headed, which was suffering, the mind let it go.

It was kind of like if you reached out to touch a pot on the stove without a pot holder and your body just recoils from the heat. The mind said, "Hmm, not going to do that." It just let go of itself. This was wisdom at work—wisdom seeing that the mind's heading toward suffering, recognizing that doesn't make any sense, and releasing it. Poof! That kind of thing happens occasionally when we are witnessing our experience.

It was a profound moment for me, though it certainly was not the end of my anger. I will tell you that. It was not the end of years of looking at anger. But it gave me a sense of confidence in the power of the practice and the possibility for freedom, for wisdom to release.

Actually, I stood there in the kitchen with my knife in my hand waiting to get angry, because I hadn't had this person arise in my mind without anger arising. Within a few moments it hadn't arisen, and after a few more moments, something else arose—which was awe for the practice. Awe at the power of witnessing to free the mind.

These moments can bring confidence, trust. They help point us. They help us recognize that we're on the path. They give us a taste of that freedom—a small taste. They're a pointer.

There's a difference between these moments of release and Nibbāna. These moments of temporary freedom, these temporary releases—they probably still contain some layers of delusion. It's like we've broken through certain layers, freed the mind from certain layers, but deeper layers remain. In that moment of witnessing the non-arising of anger, I was still there. I recognized that I hadn't done that, that it was a process, but I kind of took ownership of some of it. Some delusion was right there.

And also, these small moments of freedom—we have to recognize and let go, because these insights too are impermanent, conditioned. As I said, I spent years watching anger after that moment, and that one insight allowed me to see the possibility and gave me the confidence and courage to keep witnessing it, keep watching it.

Sometimes when we move into states of wisdom or insight, when the mind has moments of clarity or even slightly longer times where it's really just settling back and watching experience arise and pass away—some of you have described this—it just seems so obvious. How can I not see this? And yet, it's not that obvious, because it doesn't take much for delusion to come back, for delusion to obscure what seemed so clear.

Yet we now have a new perspective from which to see our experience. In this way, we can begin to recognize delusion at work. Because having seen it gone, knowing the sense of something different, a different way of being—when our old patterns and habits come back, when there's a veil or filter in front of our experience, something blocking us, obscuring our sense of knowing clearly—we know that obscuration is there now. We can begin to recognize: oh yes, that's delusion at work.

That's anger at work.

Coming back to some of those other ways I mentioned that wisdom can work: we can remind ourselves, yes, this is just a thought. This is just frustration. We've seen the possibility of release from it. We can release from our filters, our distortions. We can more clearly know when they're working.

It's like before we saw it fall away—those distortions—we don't know them. They're so close to our minds that it's like the air we breathe; we don't really notice it's there. Or the fish swimming in water, not being aware of the water. It's always there, so how can we know what it means for it not to be there?

When we have those moments of freedom, we get a taste of what it's like for them not to be there, and then we can much more easily recognize them at work.

And so this practice has this spiral-like nature. We get little tastes, sometimes slightly bigger tastes of freedom. It's not a mistake. It's not like you failed when delusion comes back. It's the momentum of our habits, our patterns. And yet we can now see them more clearly.

And so we just continue.

Let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 126

The Story of Aṅgulimāla

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella retells the story of Aṅgulimāla from the Aṅgulimāla Sutta (MN 86), examining how this ancient tale illuminates the workings of our minds in contemporary times. The story traces how Ahiṃsaka, meaning 'harmless,' became the notorious Aṅgulimāla, 'finger garland,' through a chain of events beginning with jealous students spreading propaganda to his teacher—a pattern Fella connects to modern phenomena like fake news and confirmation bias.

The teaching explores several key themes: how propaganda and repeated misinformation sow seeds of doubt; how our minds filter evidence to match existing beliefs; the dangerous power dynamics between authority figures and those who follow them, illustrated by the Milgram experiments; and how ethical conduct serves as protection against delusion. Fella emphasizes that each person in the story had opportunities to stop the cascade of harm through ethical awareness and personal responsibility.

The talk culminates in Aṅgulimāla's transformation through his encounter with the Buddha, his struggles with meditation while haunted by memories of his victims, and his eventual awakening. Fella highlights how his heart gradually opened to empathetic connection—demonstrated when he felt compassion for a woman in difficult labor—showing that ethical conduct creates the ground for wholesome relationships. The teaching concludes with Aṅgulimāla's enlightenment verses, affirming that no one is irredeemable and that aligning with truth and non-harming leads to liberation.

So tonight I'd like to take my turn at telling a story, a story from the time of the Buddha.

Partly I'd like to offer this story and some teaching reflections about it because over the course of the last few months, given what's happening in our country, threads of this story kept arising in my mind. I realized there's quite a lot here that speaks to us in terms of what's happening in our country, in our cultures—not only here in the United States, but around the world. So I thought I'd offer it as a teaching parable that points to the ways our minds work, how we get caught and act out of greed, aversion, and delusion.

The story, which will probably be familiar to most of you, is the story of Aṅgulimāla, who was a mass murderer at the time of the Buddha and who met the Buddha and had his life—and the community around him—transformed by that meeting.

Some elements of this story seem to be possibly factual. There are indications that perhaps this was a person who actually lived at the time of the Buddha, who was committing murders during that period. There are stories in the Vinaya about Aṅgulimāla—the Vinaya being the teaching on the monastic ethical guidelines. Those stories often describe very human situations and how the Buddha worked with those situations in his community. This also indicates to me perhaps the non-mythical nature of this person. And yet there are elements of the story that do seem magical or mystical or mythological. Still, many parts of the story—which is a lot of what I'd like to look at—describe how our minds work, not only internally but in relationship.

This is where we're headed in our trajectory at this point in the transition of our retreat. We are moving more and more into relationship—just how much we influence each other in what we do, what we say, how we act, how we are.

The sources for this story: the main one is the Majjhima Nikāya. There's a whole sutta on Aṅgulimāla—it's Majjhima 86, for those of you interested in these references. Yet the story in the Majjhima starts basically from the point where the Buddha meets Aṅgulimāla. The commentaries actually give quite a backstory. Some of you may not be as familiar with the backstory around Aṅgulimāla—how he came to be, how he transitioned from being called Ahiṃsaka, meaning "harmless," to being called Aṅgulimāla, "finger garland," for the garland (māla) of finger bones he is said to have collected and worn around his neck from his victims.

So I'd like to start with the backstory.

Aṅgulimāla's father—let's call him Ahiṃsaka at this point—Ahiṃsaka's father was a chaplain in King Pasenadi's cabinet. One night his wife gave birth to a boy, and in his joy and delight, the father cast his horoscope. The horoscope had bad news in it. It is said that it showed the child was born under the robber constellation, meaning he was destined to become a thief, a robber.

The same night the child was born, the king—and actually all throughout the kingdom—the weapons began to glitter. The king woke up in the middle of the night and saw the glittering arms at the foot of his bed. He was terrified, thinking it was an evil omen, and wondered if he needed to somehow protect the kingdom.

The next day he told his minister, Ahiṃsaka's father, about these glittering weapons. Ahiṃsaka's father said, "I think it may be because of my son, who was born last night under this robber constellation." And so they debated in that moment about killing the child, saying that the omens were so poor, so bad around this young child that perhaps they should kill him to protect the kingdom.

But they decided instead to raise Ahiṃsaka with as much love and affection, with as much emphasis on ethical conduct and behavior, as they could. They gave him the name Ahiṃsaka, meaning "harmless," hoping that he would live up to his name. And so he became a model son, a dutiful son, loving and caring towards his parents. They felt they had done the right thing—that they had overcome the omens around his birth.

His father sent him off to the big college in India at the time, Taxila. There too, Ahiṃsaka was very dutiful, very studious, and did what his teacher asked. He became the teacher's favorite, in fact.

Because he became the favorite, the other students began to get jealous. They felt pushed aside by the teacher. They felt they weren't being respected in the way they had been in the past. They decided they needed to put a wedge between the teacher and Ahiṃsaka.

So what they decided to do was send a bad report of Ahiṃsaka to the teacher, in separate cohorts. Three separate groups of people, as if coming from different sources, went to the teacher saying, "We've heard that Ahiṃsaka is threatening to do bad things to you. He's threatening to take over. We believe Ahiṃsaka is plotting against you."

The teacher, having such great respect for Ahiṃsaka, said, "This is ridiculous."

A second time a group went, and a second time again, the response was the same: this is ridiculous. "I know my student, I know Ahimsaka, he's not plotting against me."

A third time the students added, "If our teacher does not trust us, he may examine the evidence for himself."

And so here we have human emotion—jealousy—inciting action, trying to divide people, trying to divide Ahimsaka from his teacher. In this case, they did it quite cleverly. This is how propaganda works. We hear something repeatedly, and it begins to sow a seed of doubt. We begin to hear something, and we begin to question our own perspective.

With that extra suggestion—that the teacher can check this for himself—a little seed of doubt was sown, and the teacher began looking for evidence. Having had this perspective planted in his mind, it is said he found the evidence, even though it was not true.

This also points to a way our minds work. We talked about this a few weeks ago—how when we have a particular view or perspective, we take in information that corroborates that view. In this case there was a little bit of doubt, and so in a way the teacher was looking for evidence to support that doubt. And he found it. What he thought was evidence. He found what he thought was evidence.

So this pattern right here—first of the propaganda and the way our minds are so easily swayed, and then how our minds, once holding a particular perspective, struggle to see things that are not in line with that perspective—these two pieces are very potent forces in our minds.

Right now, there was a news story a couple of days ago. Yes, we're going to talk about news. I feel since the retreat is coming to an end, I can bring in something very current. There was a news story about fake news. There is a kind of industry in fake news. It makes money, partly because of the way things work these days around the internet. Somebody can put a story out there, and if people click on that website, they will get money from the advertisers on that website. So there's this whole industry around creating fake news. And sometimes even news outlets pick up this fake news, don't corroborate the information, and then it becomes much more widely disseminated.

So this is essentially what these students were doing. They were putting out this information multiple times. We need to take care, I think especially right now, even with what we're taking in through the media, that we are not just taking it in at face value. It's sad to say, but we have to do our own research and not fall into the trap of the teacher—to try to look for evidence that supports what we've heard, but instead look on both sides. It's a challenging world that we live in, with information coming from so many different angles.

This pattern around the way our minds see things from a perspective—I talked about that a couple weeks ago when we discussed dependent origination and how even an agenda to look at something in a particular way might have us miss information. Or see things, not see things. That's one of the key things: looking from a particular perspective, we see certain things and we don't see other things. This happens all the time. It doesn't just happen around news stories and major misinformation. It happens in small ways too.

When I was a child, when I was in first grade, I had an art teacher who taught us how to draw fruit—draw apples and carrots and fruits and vegetables. Apples and carrots, those are the main ones I remember. But another piece I remember about the apples in particular is that whenever any of us would draw an apple that was lopsided, she would make us erase it and draw it perfectly round. And she said, "Apples don't grow lopsided." Even at five, we had seen apples that were really lopsided. And we were like, what is she talking about? But we would erase our circles and draw them the way she wanted.

One day, one of the other students brought in an apple that was really lopsided. She did not seem to even notice that it was lopsided. I was really puzzled by this for much of my life. I have no idea what was going on with her. But every now and then it would come up in my mind—what was that about? And one day—some of my insights happen around cutting apples; there's another one that happened around cutting an apple—one day I was in my kitchen and I cut an apple.

When I cut apples, I tend to cut them along their line of symmetry. Most apples have such a line, unless they are diseased or misshapen. You can find a place where the two halves will be mirror images. Even if an apple is quite lopsided, you can cut it along its line of symmetry.

As I cut that apple and watched it fall into two halves, appreciating the symmetry, this story came back to my mind. Again I wondered, what was going on there? And a plausible explanation occurred to me. Perhaps she had been told in some biology class that apples grow symmetrically, and she misunderstood what symmetrical meant. From then on, that perspective filtered out all evidence to the contrary.

It is rather stunning how something as obvious as a lopsided apple can be filtered out of our perception. We simply don't see it. This force—when we receive information, especially from a reputable source—makes us more likely to believe it, more likely to take it in a certain way, or perhaps misunderstand it in a particular manner.

This is a frightening aspect of our minds: so much of our experience can go unnoticed, and yet we believe we are seeing things reliably. This is one of the reasons why, personally, I do not feel that single eyewitness testimony should be used for sentencing someone for murder. I know from my own experience just how easily evidence coming through our senses can be skewed. It is a frightening aspect of how our minds work. And yet knowing that our minds work this way becomes a real support for us.

Coming back to the story of Ahimsaka and his teacher: this seed of doubt was sown, and the teacher found evidence—or what he believed was evidence—that made him think the students were telling the truth. The students, of course, knew they were lying. So this entire story actually springs from an unethical action by these students, the lie that planted the seed of doubt in the teacher's mind.

From what he believed was now corroborated evidence, the teacher decided he had to act. He felt threatened enough that he believed he needed either to kill Ahimsaka or be killed himself. For those of you interested in this backstory, it is written in a book called Great Disciples of the Buddha, which contains a whole chapter on Angulimala. From that chapter: "I must kill Angulimala or get him killed. It will not be easy to kill such a strong man," he reflected. "Besides, if he is slain while living here as my pupil, it will harm my reputation and students may no longer come to me. I must think of some other device to get rid of him as well as punish him."

Again, the teacher is acting out of what he believes to be truth, yet his actions are motivated first by delusion—because he is driven by a story that was false—and also by aversion and fear. These are prompting him to consider unethical action.

It happens that Ahimsaka is nearly finished with his studies and preparing to leave the university. His teacher says to him, "In order for your studies to bear fruit, you must offer a gift back to the teacher." Ahimsaka asks, "What gift should I offer you?" The teacher replies, "You must offer me the finger bones of the right hand small finger of a thousand human beings."

Presumably the teacher believed Ahimsaka would be killed in the process of attempting this. Ahimsaka said, "I cannot do that. My family has always been harmless. We have never harmed anyone. How can I do this?" His teacher replied, "You must either do this, or the teachings you have received will not bear fruit." And so Ahimsaka decides to do it.

There is some question here. Why didn't Ahimsaka push back harder on his teacher? Why didn't he refuse or question this more thoroughly? Several reflections have been offered. One involves the aspect of guru devotion—the teacher-student relationship may have involved an unswerving commitment to the teacher. Again, a kind of blinding of Ahimsaka to the implications of his own actions. It is also suggested that this situation touched upon or opened a karmic thread within Ahimsaka, the tendency that had caused him to be born under the robber constellation. This inclination toward becoming someone who harms may have run deep within him.

This piece too, I feel, is important for us to examine: the power dynamic between Ahimsaka and his teacher. It is only a story, and we might think we would not be swayed by such a situation. Yet power dynamics are truly potent. The dynamic of teacher and student, combined perhaps with an unswerving commitment of student to teacher, can play a very strong role in making choices that go against our own ethical inner compass.

After World War II, there were some studies done on this very topic. One famous study, the Milgram experiment—some of you may have heard of it—basically pointed out how this power dynamic might be played out. They had people come in to participate in an experiment in which the participants were offering electric shocks to somebody to support them in learning something. It was a kind of negative reinforcement experiment. The person who was receiving the shocks actually wasn't receiving any shocks—they were an actor. The person who was offering the shocks was the real subject of the experiment. How far would they go, even when the person being shocked started saying, "Whoa, that's really painful! Stop! Don't do that anymore"?

Surprisingly—I won't go through the entire details of the study—but surprisingly, two-thirds of the people gave the severest level of shock. Something that would have been very damaging to somebody had they really been receiving shocks. Possibly even fatal.

Milgram writes: "I set up a simple experiment at Yale University to test how much pain an ordinary citizen would inflict on another person simply because he or she was ordered to do so by an experimental scientist. Stark authority was pitted against the participant's strongest moral imperatives against hurting others. And with the participant's ears ringing with the screams of the victims, authority won out more often than not. The extreme willingness of adults to go to almost any lengths on the command of an authority constitutes the chief finding of the study and the fact most urgently demanding explanation."

There had been some thinking that somehow the conditions in World War II Germany were different. How did all these people end up doing these things under the Hitler regime? This experiment showed that all it took, really, was someone in a lab coat saying, "Please continue. The experiment requires that you continue."

They followed on to explore what variables around this experiment were the strongest ones. Those two were particularly powerful: the experimenter wearing a lab coat. If the lab coat was not on, if the experimenter was in normal clothes, compliance dropped way down. And if the participants were reminded at the beginning of the study that they were personally responsible for any harm that might happen during the study, compliance dropped to almost zero.

This, to me, is a strong pointing to the power of ethics and being reminded of our own ethical responsibility. The power dynamic is potent for us, but if we are reminding ourselves, "I'm responsible for the actions I commit. I'm responsible"—that reminder of our own ethical responsibility strengthens us in the face of that power dynamic.

And so ethics has really played a strong role in this story so far. We have the students motivated by jealousy lying about Ahimsaka's behavior, his conduct. We have the teacher motivated by fear wanting to kill Ahimsaka. We have Ahimsaka picking up the power dynamic and perhaps stepping back a little from responsibility: "This is required by my teacher." At any point in this, if people had looked at their own ethical responsibility, the story would have probably played out very differently.

This is a big piece of what I think is one of the messages of this story: how in our action in the world, committing to ethical conduct can be a great source of strength for us to overcome and combat delusion—in the world and in ourselves. This, to me, is a powerful message. I think that ethics can help to counter some of the deep forces of craving and ignorance in our minds. This is one of the reasons I think it's so firmly on the Eightfold Path.

And so the story doesn't go that way. It goes the way of murder and mayhem. Ahimsaka goes around finding ways to kill people so that he can get the little finger of their right hand, string it on a garland, and put it around his neck. This is now Ahimsaka becoming Angulimala.

The story says that he actually began to enjoy killing people. Perhaps at the beginning it was hard, but repeatedly doing it somehow seemed to harden his heart. Again, this is another piece around ethics. When we routinely engage in unethical conduct, it can shift our hearts. It breaks us off from the capacity to feel that empathetic connection with others. To me, ethics and connection are so closely intertwined that as we behave ethically, it connects us with others. It creates community.

So Angulimala now, terrorizing the neighborhood, hiding in the forest, and basically at first waiting for individuals to go by and killing them. That was pretty easy. After a while, people began avoiding that part of the woods.

People began avoiding that part of the woods, and so Angulimala had to go into towns, into people's homes when they were sleeping, and murder them in their beds. He was creating havoc and mayhem in the neighborhood. The people of the villages went to the king and said, "This is not okay. We cannot live in our villages. We are terrified of this person." And so the king decided to send out a party to find and kill Angulimala.

At that point, Angulimala's mother—her son not having come home from college—began to worry about him. She wondered if this person who was killing people all over the neighborhood might be her son. Believing it was, she decided to go and see if she could reason with him, to try to stop him.

By this time, Angulimala had killed 999 people. He had one more finger to get.

Also at this time, it is said that the Buddha, in his meditation, scanning the world, saw this scenario playing out. He saw Angulimala in his mind and recognized that they shared a deep karmic connection from many lives in the past. He saw that Angulimala, in spite of his behavior in this life, had a great deal of wholesome karma buried in his heart beneath his actions. The Buddha actually saw that Angulimala had the capacity to become completely liberated in this very lifetime.

And yet, in this psychic surveying of the universe that he could reportedly do, he noticed that Angulimala's mother was on her way to try to stop her son—and that Angulimala would kill his mother.

In Buddhist cosmology, killing a parent is one of the actions that makes it impossible to become free in this life. In this cosmology, no one is irredeemable for eternity. There is always the possibility of turning the course of our minds through meeting the Dharma and practicing the Eightfold Path, from any circumstances whatsoever. And yet in a particular lifetime, it is said that certain actions can prevent you from reaching freedom in this very life. Killing a parent is one of those. Killing a Buddha is another.

So the Buddha saw that Angulimala's mother was on her way, and he decided to intervene. He walked the thirty miles to where Angulimala was and put himself between Angulimala and his mother.

Angulimala, seeing this, recognized: here is a monk, probably slow, probably not very strong. This person would be much easier to kill, and then I don't have to kill my mother. So I'll kill this person instead.

I'm going to read from the sutta at this point:

So Angulimala took up his sword and shield and followed close behind the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One performed such a feat of supernormal power that the bandit Angulimala, though walking as fast as he could, could not catch up with the Blessed One who was walking at his normal pace.

Then the bandit Angulimala thought, "It is wonderful, it is marvelous. Formerly I could catch up even with a swift elephant and seize it. I could catch up with a swift horse and seize it. I could catch up with a swift deer. But now, though I am walking as fast as I can, I cannot catch up with this recluse who is walking at a normal pace."

He stopped and called out to the Blessed One, "Stop, recluse, stop!"

The Blessed One responded, "I have stopped, Angulimala. It is time for you to stop."

Then the bandit Angulimala thought, "These recluses speak truth, assert truth. But though this recluse is still walking, he says, 'I have stopped, Angulimala. You stop too.' Suppose I question this recluse."

Then the bandit Angulimala addressed the Blessed One: "While you are walking, recluse, you tell me you have stopped. But now when I have stopped, you say that I have not stopped. I ask you now, oh recluse, about the meaning. How is it that you have stopped and I have not?"

"Angulimala, I have stopped forever. I abstain from violence towards living beings. But you have no restraint towards things that live. That is why I have stopped and you have not."

In this part of the story, the stopping that the Buddha refers to points, to some extent, to ethical conduct—the stopping of unethical conduct, the stopping of harming. And possibly it also points to the stopping of ignorance in our minds. How easily, when we are motivated by ignorance, our perceptions, our views, our opinions, our beliefs can sway us to create harm.

The path in its fullness is about stopping that ignorance, creating the conditions of non-harming.

Through this encounter with the Buddha, Angulimala had a powerful change of heart. It is said in the story that he realized the Buddha had actually come to the forest in order to help him, and he was deeply moved by this. He asked for ordination. The Buddha, understanding through his capacity of mind to see deeply into human beings, recognized that this was not a surface change of heart but a profound transformation, a genuine wish to turn away from harming. And so he said to Angulimala, "Come, monk," in that way ordaining him.

It is said that Angulimala decided to keep his name as a reminder for himself of how he had been spending his life killing people.

For a time, Angulimala became the Buddha's attendant, and together with a group of monks they wandered back through the forest. In the meantime, the king was trying to find Angulimala in order to kill him. On his way out to the forest, the king passed by the place where the Buddha was staying and decided to stop and pay his respects.

The Buddha, seeing the king and all of his army gathered to go out and fight Angulimala, asked, "What's going on? Is there a war in the neighboring kingdom?"

The king replied, "No, there's a murdering bandit Angulimala in the neighborhood, and I'm going to put him down."

The Buddha, given that Angulimala was standing right next to him, fanning him as his attendant—the king not recognizing Angulimala, who had shaved his head and put on robes—said, "Great King, suppose you were to see that Angulimala had shaved off his hair and beard, put on the yellow robe, had gone forth from the home life into homelessness, that he was abstaining from killing living beings, from taking what is not given, and from false speech, that he was refraining from eating at night, ate only at one part of the day, was celibate, virtuous, of good character. If you were to see him thus, how would you treat him?"

"Venerable sir, we would pay homage to him. Offer him requisites. But he is such an immoral man, one of evil character. How could he ever have such virtue and restraint?"

The Buddha gestured. "This, great king, is Angulimala."

It is said that the hair on the back of the king's neck stood on end, so frightened and terrified was he to be in the presence of Angulimala.

The Buddha said, "Do not be afraid, great king. There is nothing for you to fear from him."

Here we have the Buddha essentially telling the king: trust me. There's a kind of counterpoint in this that I find interesting. The Buddha is asking the king to trust him, and the king, who reveres the Buddha, does trust him. In the earlier part of the story, the teacher said to Angulimala, trust me. What's the difference here? How does one know?

My sense, in reading this and reflecting on it, is that the Buddha, in asking the king to trust him—trust me, you have nothing to fear from him—is encouraging the king in the direction of non-harming. He's encouraging the king not to kill Angulimala. This is a trust that's in alignment with ethics.

I realize there may be times when the situation is not so clear. And yet I think this reflection on ethics is a very powerful resource for us in navigating our lives.

There are the kind of apocryphal stories people discuss. If you were in Nazi Germany and a Nazi came knocking on your door while you were hiding Jews, would you lie? A lie is a breach of ethics. And yet I hope I would have the courage to lie in that situation—knowing that if I couldn't come up with something else to say, some plausible response that wasn't a lie, in that act of lying I would be protecting the person I was hiding from being killed, and protecting the Nazi from doing the killing. So in another way, it aligns with ethics.

And yet this understanding around ethics and karma—in many ways I think the teaching on Angulimala is a teaching on karma, although that's not the thread I'm carrying through this particular version of the story tonight. The karma of telling a lie doesn't somehow vanish because it's in the service of non-harm. There's still going to be some kind of consequence. Perhaps even just in one's own mind—oh my gosh, I've told a lie to this person. Are they going to find out? Just in that agitation of mind, there is karmic repercussion.

And yet I hope I would have the courage to take those karmic consequences.

So, continuing this story, this first part has really been about relationship—about people in relationship with each other, how people influence each other, how people impact each other, especially along the lines of our behavior, ethically or non-ethically. So much of our interactions have this dimension to them.

The next part of the story really comes into Angulimala's inner life as a monk. He practiced meditation, he went on alms round, and he struggled as a monk. He had a hard time—probably had a harder time than most of you have had here, is my guess, having killed nine hundred and ninety-nine people. Just imagine. I mean, I can't even imagine what my mind would be like if I had killed someone and sat down and tried to meditate.

It is said that Angulimala had not been able to focus his mind on the basic meditation subject he had received, though he tried day and night. Before his mind's eye appeared the place in the jungle where he had slain so many people. He heard their plaintive voices imploring him, "Let me live. I'm a poor man and have many children." He saw the frantic movements of their arms and legs in fear of death. When faced with such memories, deep remorse gripped him and made him get up from his seat and leave.

So he struggled in meditation, having killed nine hundred and ninety-nine people. No big surprise. He struggled in community too. Going on alms round, people knew who he was. They knew he had killed their brothers and sons and wives and daughters. Husbands. So he would basically go on alms round and come back with an empty bowl. And worse at times—if I have a moment, I'll get to that in a bit.

In the community he didn't receive much support, his meditation was a challenge, and yet he kept going. He kept practicing.

And one day while he was on alms round, he hears a woman having a very difficult labor in childbirth. And his heart just opened with compassion. He said, "Oh, how beings are afflicted, how they suffer."

This really begins to point to the inner transformation Angulimala had undergone. He had killed so many people. The image he describes of people writhing and screaming, "Please don't kill me"—his heart had been closed to that empathetic connection with others. And now his heart is opening to that empathetic connection. That's a major shift. His heart is no longer so hardened.

And this, I think, points to one of the benefits of behaving ethically. I mentioned that connection earlier. Ethical conduct also creates the terrain for us to have that empathetic connection with others—a kind of ground out of which wholesome relationships can grow, that empathetic connection.

And so he went back and told the Buddha this story about this woman having difficulty giving birth and how painful it was for him to see that and feel that. And the Buddha said to him, "Go into Savatthi and say to that woman: 'Sister, since I was born, I have never purposely deprived a living being of life. By that truth, may you and the infant be safe.'"

And Angulimala said, "I can't say that. That's not a truth. I've deprived many hundreds of beings of life."

And the Buddha said, "Then say to that person: 'Sister, since I was born with the noble birth, I have never purposely deprived a living being of life. By this truth, may you and the infant be safe.'"

Angulimala reflected and said, "Yes, I can do that. Since I became a monk, I have never purposely deprived a being of life. I can say that."

And he went back into the village and said that statement of truth to the woman. And it is said that she had a successful childbirth and that both the child and the mother lived.

So this is to me one of the magical elements of the story—that a statement of truth would have this power. And yet, we can think about it mythologically perhaps too.

I mean, truth does free us from suffering. We see this in our own practice, in our own meditation. We see how when we align ourselves with the truth, when we recognize, "Oh right, this is what's happening," our hearts can relax. We see the way that truth, when we align with truth, the heart can relax.

The story in the commentaries points to the reason why the Buddha gave this, potentially gave this paired statement—the first saying to declare that you haven't killed any beings, and then the refinement: say that since you have taken birth as a monk, you haven't killed any beings. This was to point out to Angulimala his transformation around sila in his life, to support him in his meditation. That is part of the reason it's said—not so much actually to support the woman in giving birth, but more to help Angulimala reflect on his transformation around ethics.

And it is said that following this time, Angulimala's mind could settle in meditation, and that he became fully awakened.

So for us, struggling in meditation—sometimes we mention this in meetings—reflect on your goodness, reflect on your ethics, reflect on wholesome qualities that you're cultivating. It supports the mind to relax. Recalling the wholesomeness in practice is a supportive condition for us meeting our own minds.

I will end leaving aside a piece of the story—you can read it yourself. I'll end by reading some of the verses that Angulimala wrote. These are in that collection of enlightenment poems written by the monks. Greg mentioned some of the ones written by the nuns. This is the poem Angulimala wrote following his freedom:

Who once did live in recklessness and then is reckless nevermore,
That one shall illumine the world like the full moon unveiled by cloud.

Who checks with profitable deeds the evil kamma one has done,
That one shall illumine the world like the moon unveiled by a cloud.

Oh, let my enemies give ear from time to time—these enemies refer to people who threw things at him on alms rounds—Let my enemies give ear from time to time and hear the doctrine as told by men who preach forbearance, by those who speak as well in praise of peacefulness and suit the while their actions to their words. For sure such foes would not then wish to harm me, nor would they think of harming other beings.

So those who would protect all beings, frail or strong, let them attain the highest all-surpassing peace.

Conduit makers guide the water. Fletchers straighten out the arrow. Joiners straighten out the timber. Wise men seek to tame themselves. Wise ones seek to tame themselves.

"None-harmer" is the name I bear, who was a harmer in the past. The name I bear is true today. I hurt not anyone at all.

And though I once lived as a bandit with the name of Finger Garland, whom the great flood swept along, I went for refuge to the Buddha.

And though I was once bloody-handed with the name of Finger Garland, see the refuge I have found. What leads to rebirth is no more.

I stayed in forest, at the root of a tree, in mountain caves, but with an agitated heart. But now I rise and rest in happiness and happily spend my life. For now I am free of Mara's snares.

Oh, for the compassion shown me by the Master.

Let's sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 127

Exploring the Comings and Goings of Mindfulness (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a fresh perspective on the universal experience of mind-wandering by reframing it as an opportunity to study mindfulness itself. Rather than focusing on the wandering mind as a problem to fix, she invites practitioners to observe mindfulness as a phenomenon that naturally arises, persists, and ends—just like all mental processes. This shift in perspective helps dissolve the self-judgment that often accompanies distraction.

Fella distinguishes between mindfulness (satī) and attention, clarifying that attention operates continuously whether we're mindful or not, as illustrated by the familiar experience of arriving at a destination while lost in thought. She introduces the concepts of prompted mindfulness—when we consciously remind ourselves to be present—and unprompted mindfulness—the effortless return of awareness after distraction. The latter, she emphasizes, is particularly valuable to notice because it demonstrates that mindfulness can arise without effort.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with states where mindfulness habitually gets lost, including boredom, planning, sleepiness, and spaciness. Using the analogy of a steam-covered mirror, Fella challenges the assumption that certain mental states are inherently incompatible with mindfulness. She encourages practitioners to approach their experience with curiosity rather than agenda, recognizing that awareness can know any state—even fogginess or dullness—when we stop demanding that meditation feel a particular way. This exploration becomes what she calls 'Your Mind 101'—an ongoing education in understanding the patterns and processes of one's own mind.

We're all starting to settle into the rhythm of our retreat together, our time together. At least for me, I'm already feeling like the beginning, the first days of the retreat have receded, and we're entering into the middle phase of the retreat—the almost timeless phase where days just tumble on with the same pattern each day.

It can be a really beautiful time where the beginning of the retreat has receded and the end of the retreat is far enough away that we're not really even contemplating it. I appreciate this time both as a teacher and as a yogi, where we just begin to settle into this rhythm, start to watch our minds, start to get familiar with the patterns of our own minds.

There's a pattern that I know every single one of you has experienced in these last few days: the pattern of the mind wandering. Of course the mind wanders. We get caught in thought, lost in thought, and yet mindfulness returns.

I'd like to explore this pattern not so much from the side of thinking about the mind that wanders, but rather from the perspective of exploring mindfulness, because the mind doesn't actually wander anywhere. Mindfulness disappears for a time, and then mindfulness reappears. This exploration can be thought of as just watching or exploring what we can learn from the comings and goings of mindfulness, from the appearance and disappearance of mindfulness.

I think we often identify with being the one who's doing the practice and doing the mindfulness. But exploring it in this way is to watch it just as a process at work, just like all of the processes of our mind. Mindfulness is a phenomenon that arises, persists for a while, and ends. We can explore what conditions we can encourage for that process to continue, and some of that exploration comes around noticing what happens as mindfulness comes and goes.

Exploring it like this, at least for me, has taken some of the attachment out of the doing of the practice—taken some of the attachment out of being the one doing the mindfulness. We get to see a lot about our minds as we explore this. One of the main things we get to understand is what are the conditions that lead to losing mindfulness.

We're also reminded over and over again that our minds are out of control. This is not a mistake that our minds wander. It's conditions at work leading to the disappearance of mindfulness, conditions at work leading to the reappearance of mindfulness. So it's a reminder of the not-self nature of mindfulness.

I'd like to approach this exploration with curiosity rather than judgment. What can we learn about our minds by being curious about this phenomenon rather than judging ourselves about the fact that our minds do this? Anybody's mind not wander today? I didn't think so.

We begin to learn about mindfulness itself, begin to get familiar with the experience of mindfulness, which actually turns out to be pretty useful—to get familiar with what it's like, what it feels like, what the experience of being aware, of being mindful, actually is.

During this talk I will be using the terms mindfulness and awareness interchangeably. I don't mean something different when I say them. I like to clarify that because sometimes teachers use the term awareness to mean other things, but in this talk I'm just using it as another term for mindfulness. I like the term awareness partly because it's evocative. It points to that simple capacity for being with experience, being present.

Mindfulness can almost sound like a technical term. Awareness is more familiar or tangible. Are you aware? We can ask ourselves that question and get a hit of, "Yeah, I know I'm aware." I may not know exactly how I know I'm aware, but I know I'm aware.

Other ways to feel into this quality of mindfulness: being with, being present for, resting with experience. Abiding is a term used in the suttas—it's a translation of a term related to vihara, which in the brahma-viharas means "divine abode." The suttas use that term to talk about abiding, being the abode of mindfulness. When you think about that word "abide," what does that evoke?

Abiding with experience. It's not so much a doing or a trying to churn up anything—it's more of a resting back.

Mindfulness is related to the natural reflective capacity of our minds, the capacity that our minds have as human beings to know that we know. It's a very natural human possibility. In some ways, I think it's part of what makes us distinct as creatures, as animals—one of the qualities that really highlights a difference between us and many other animals, although I understand there are some other animals who have this self-reflective capacity. They can test it in some ways.

So mindfulness is related to this capacity to know that we know. And yet right mindfulness directs that capacity with a certain view—the right view that Carol was talking about—which I'll frame very simply right now as directing that capacity towards understanding what's happening in the present moment as something that's happening in the present moment.

Now that sounds like almost nothing, but it's very different from our usual relationship to knowing that we know. I think often when we know that we know something, we relate it to what it means about me or others. It's not simply recognizing, "Oh, this is what's happening in the present moment." It always seems to be filtered through some view of me, I, mine, or them, they, theirs.

And so we are exploring this capacity, cultivating this capacity to know that we know, being interested in phenomena that happen as phenomena in the present moment. Interest in what's happening as human experience, rather than personal experience.

The qualities of right mindfulness—there are many, actually. When the mind is really present and balanced, many qualities are cultivated there. But two in particular: it's a non-judgmental, non-reactive state that has more interest and curiosity about what's happening as a human phenomenon. "Oh, this is what anger feels like. This is what love feels like. This is what tingling in the body feels like."

There's a piece I'd like to also clarify around mindfulness. There are many functions in our mind that take care of us and do things. Mindfulness is one of those functions. As I said, it's related to that capacity to know that we know—that's its function. Mindfulness's function is to know that we know, to know what's happening as what's happening in the present moment.

There's another capacity of mind that's related to it and sometimes is confused or conflated with mindfulness, and that's the factor of attention. Our minds have this capacity to pick something out of the field of experience and attend to it. Right now I could ask you to check in and see what's the experience of your hands. Notice your hands. Notice the sensations of your feet. Notice the contact of your hips against the chair or cushion or bench. This is a way of directing attention. This is using that capacity we have to choose what we're paying attention to.

So this is one way that attention works sometimes. We can direct the attention; it's amenable to conscious control. We can choose what to pay attention to, and we use this a lot in our meditation practice. We choose, "Okay, I'm going to practice with seeing if I can stay with the breath." That's using the factor of attention to cultivate the mindfulness, to help support the mindfulness.

The factor of attention can also be receptive rather than directed. It's kind of like an analogy with the breath. We can choose, "Okay, I'm going to take a breath in now, and I'm going to take a breath out now." We can choose to regulate our breathing; we can control that with a conscious choice. And yet if we don't choose to do that, the breath will breathe itself. It does its own thing if we're not consciously directing the breathing in and breathing out.

Attention has a similar possibility. We can choose to direct the attention, but if we are not consciously directing the attention, processes in our mind—habits, patterns, conditioning—are choosing what to pay attention to. And I would call this, in a way, receptive, because we're not engaged with a conscious choice.

There is a choice being made about what to pay attention to, but it's not a conscious choice. It's not a sense of me saying, "I'm going to pay attention to the breath." If we settle back and relax and don't consciously direct the attention, attention will pick up on something or other. And so attention is functioning every single moment of our experience, whether we're choosing what to pay attention to or not. Attention is always happening. Attention happens whether we're mindful or not.

Here's an example to give you a sense of what it means that the mind is paying attention when we're not mindful. Many of us have had the experience of driving and being lost in thought, then suddenly arriving at our destination. It's like, "Oh, I'm here. Where have I been?" Mindfulness was lost. It wasn't paying attention. And yet something was paying attention, because you managed to drive and arrive at your destination safely. We can see that attention is working when mindfulness is not. There's a distinction between attention and mindfulness.

One of the ways that attention and mindfulness can get confused—at least in my own mind, especially early in my practice—was that I thought if I was not directing the attention, then it wasn't mindfulness. If I wasn't choosing what to pay attention to, then I must be doing something wrong. It can't be mindfulness. But mindfulness can know what's happening in the present moment receptively, whether it's attention doing its thing or whether we're directing the attention. Both possibilities are there.

We can settle back and be aware and mindful without choosing what to pay attention to. That's the beginning of exploring what we might call open awareness—or undirected awareness. I like to call it receptive awareness, because the feeling of it is settling back and letting experience come into awareness, just receiving what's already happening, not involving ourselves with choosing what to pay attention to.

Right now, are you aware? It's that simple check-in: Are you aware? And what's obvious? Not looking for anything in particular, but just knowing, "I'm aware," and maybe seeing is what's obvious, or hearing the sound of my voice. Just really simple.

We begin to explore what it means to be mindful, what it means to be aware. There are different ways that mindfulness comes about. A lot of how mindfulness arises is through what we're doing here. When we're mindful, it's like we're reminding ourselves to be mindful, either through connecting with a collecting or gathering experience like the breath, the body, or hearing. Essentially that is a kind of reminding ourselves: be mindful. So when we are mindful, we can remind ourselves to be mindful. This is one of the best ways to cultivate mindfulness. It does require that we're already mindful to do it, and this is often the way instructions are given. This is sometimes called prompted mindfulness—we prompt ourselves, we remind ourselves to be mindful.

We can do this in many ways, and we'll talk about this during the retreat. Simple ways of just staying connected to a particular experience, or just reminding yourself: Am I aware? Checking in: Am I aware? That's a kind of prompting, asking the question. You're probably not going to ask the question unless you're already aware, so it's a prompting, a reminding. Check in. What is it like to be aware?

That's one way mindfulness comes about—through prompting it, reminding ourselves to be mindful when we're already mindful. The other way mindfulness comes about, and fortunately this happens quite a lot, is what's sometimes called unprompted mindfulness. This is the mindfulness that happens every time you get lost in thought and come back.

That moment when mindfulness returns is like waking up—oh, I'm back. This is the other side of the wandering mind. The mind has wandered, lost in thought, and at some point it's as if the lights come on. We're back. Mindfulness has returned.

This experience of mindfulness returning happens far more than you're aware of. Often what happens when mindfulness returns—especially in our daily lives, but also here on retreat—if we're doing our yogi jobs or something and we notice we've been lost in thought, a little bit of mindfulness comes back, and then we start doing something with it. Instead of noticing, "Oh, mindfulness is back," we start doing something with it. We might say, "Oh, I'm back, let me come back to the breath." Or in daily life it might be that we just pick up what we've become mindful of and start thinking about it or planning what to do next. Because we're not really that interested in just noticing mindfulness itself.

And this is what I'd like to encourage. Cultivating the recognition of mindfulness returning after the mind has been wandering, noticing that moment when mindfulness returns, getting familiar with what it feels like for mindfulness to come back—this is powerful. At least in my experience, when I really started doing this practice of being curious about what it's like, something shifted. In fact, the question I explored was: what's the difference between not being mindful and being mindful? Joseph had given me that instruction, and I thought, how do I notice what it's like not to be mindful? I couldn't really, in a way, but I noticed that in the moment when mindfulness returned, there was a kind of distinction. I could notice almost like my mind remembered what it was like not to be mindful in that moment as mindfulness returned. There's a recognition of the fuzziness or haziness or stuckness to a thought, a kind of delusional process going on, versus the recognition of, "Oh, I'm back."

When I started doing this exploration of what it's like to recognize mindfulness returning, it cut through my judging mind about the mind wandering. It had a really powerful impact because I realized that what I was exploring was noticing the difference between being mindful and not being mindful. And so it doesn't matter how many times my mind wanders—every time that happens, I get another opportunity to notice that difference. Each time I was more interested in the return of mindfulness than in judging myself for the fact that I hadn't been mindful. That was really helpful.

The other piece that's really helpful is that it began to highlight for me, to point out, this experience of being mindful. Oh, this is what it feels like when mindfulness comes back. As we get attuned to that experience, as we feel into that moment—this is what it's like when mindfulness returns—the sensitization, the conscious recognition of that moment, begins to help us recognize it when it happens. Because, as I said, it's happening far more often than you are aware of. So just this simple process of being curious about that return of mindfulness basically helps us recognize the return of mindfulness more. A very simple kind of process.

Another great thing about that moment, about this unprompted mindfulness, is that you didn't have to do anything. It is effortless. Completely effortless. It's mindfulness without effort. Take that in. In that moment, that was another great learning for me. Oh, wow, here's mindfulness without really trying to turn it up. Here it is. So it's a pointer to that possibility of being aware with ease, of the simplicity of just being aware and knowing what's happening.

And so when you remember, in that moment of remembering, first simply recognize: awareness is back. What's that like? And again, it may not be so clear at first. It's okay if it doesn't seem really obvious to you what it means to be aware. Just take in: okay, aware. I know that I'm aware right now. And then it's often helpful to simply recognize what's obvious in this moment. There's awareness, and there's something that awareness is aware of in that moment. When awareness comes back, there's something it's already aware of. And so here it is—mindfulness has returned, and it's already aware of something. There's nothing that we have to do in that moment other than explore: what is this moment?

Often in that moment, particularly early in our retreat practice, we suggest that when mindfulness returns, come back to the breath. But I'd like to suggest you might explore hovering for even just a few moments in that place. See if you can take in the return of mindfulness. Notice what mindfulness is knowing in that moment. Then, if you're practicing with the return to the breath or return to a primary experience, that's fine—doing that, coming back to that experience.

We can also explore the possibility of recognizing: already aware. And now already aware of something else. And already aware of something else. At times—not always, but at times—we can rest back in that very simple awareness and receive experience. Instead of choosing to direct the attention at that point, we receive what the attention is knowing. We can explore mindfulness in that way. That is a form of mindfulness. It is a form of awareness.

Another useful piece about noticing what's already happening is this: if the mind has been wandering, if the mind has gotten lost in thought, it's gone off and been doing stuff—thinking about the past or the future, wandering around lunch or dinner, ruminating on something, or perhaps caught or lost in a state of mind as opposed to thoughts. In any case, when we return, the mind has been doing something else for a few moments or even minutes. And that something else has been conditioning our experience. It's been creating a new landscape while we weren't looking.

When mindfulness returns, it's often really useful to recognize: what's the landscape like now? Sometimes when the mind wanders, it wanders off into the past and gets involved in conversations with partners or friends or co-workers, and emotions arise. We can wake up and find—whew—there's a lot happening here. It's really useful to acknowledge that, to know exactly what we're waking up into. If we're not clearly aware of what we're waking up into, there could be a pull back out into the wandering mind. If we don't acknowledge that the mind is confused and frustrated, we miss something important. Let me know that.

The mind can also wander into wholesome states of mind. This is fantastic when this happens. I remember at one point I was seeing the mindfulness, and the mind kept wandering, kept wandering, and I kept waking up thinking about old friends from the Peace Corps. And I thought, okay, just come back to the breath or whatever—just trying to come back. But the mindfulness kept getting lost. The mind kept wandering into these thoughts about these friends. Finally I decided, well, let's see what's there when I come back. And what was there was mettā—a very connected feeling of love that I hadn't really touched into. But it had a very strong pull on the mind, and that's what kept my mind going back out to thinking about these friends. As soon as I recognized, oh, the landscape that's been created is mettā, I just stayed there. Mindfulness could be present for that.

So that's the side of looking at waking up from the wandering mind—getting curious about the awareness itself, what awareness is aware of, the landscape that's been created when the mind has wandered and mindfulness has gotten lost.

The other really useful side to explore is where the mind gets lost. Where does awareness get lost? There are many, many ways our awareness gets lost. Where does mindfulness get lost? I'd like to encourage a curiosity about this. At one point I was in a group and somebody said, "Well, either I'm mindful or I'm not. I just don't see how it's possible to see where the mindfulness goes." It is actually possible to get curious about mindfulness getting lost. It doesn't simply turn off like a switch. There's a process that happens, and we can get curious about that process.

This kind of curiosity is one of the great supports for the continuity of mindfulness. As we start to get curious about where mindfulness gets lost, it supports our recognizing the places and ways that mindfulness gets lost. Then we can add some interest to those times, those things that we get lost in.

This is not so much about trying to force ourselves to stay present. When we begin to notice that the mind gets lost under certain conditions or in certain places or times, what I'm going to encourage here is not doubling down to try to hold onto the mindfulness, but rather being curious. What happens in that situation?

We might lose awareness—we might notice going through our day that we tend to lose awareness doing specific activities. Maybe we notice we tend to lose awareness in our yogi jobs. Or maybe we lose awareness when we go back to our room and close the door. It's like, "Whew, don't have to be mindful now." Or maybe we lose awareness when we walk down the hall for lunch, or when we enter the dining room. Just begin to get curious.

When we wake up after a period of being lost, sometimes we can recognize or remember: "Oh yes, I lost it as soon as I stepped into that dining room and saw the table," or "I lost it as soon as I closed the door to my room." We can reflect a little, recognizing when we come back what we were doing, or what times of day, places, or events tend to be where we lose mindfulness.

And then, rather than doubling down and saying, "Okay, I am going to be mindful when I walk into that dining room—I'm going to hold on to that mindfulness"—I encourage curiosity instead. What happens? What happens there? What thoughts arise? What sights arise? What emotions arise that the mind is not seeing, that you're not noticing? Because when the mind wanders like that, there's something we're missing. The attention has picked up on something and our conscious mind didn't notice it. So this factor of attention was at work doing its thing—it was interested in something. We can be curious about that.

I did this exploration myself. At one point during a long retreat here at Spirit Rock—I think it was a two-month retreat—I noticed that I would wake up finding myself staring at myself in the mirror in the bathroom. I did not notice the intention to look at the mirror. Something about being in front of the mirror—I just got lost in that. So I started being curious about it. Again, not trying to double down. I was more curious about what was going on in there. Can we figure out what's going on? Why on earth am I looking at myself in the mirror, just gazing at myself?

So I just started getting curious. Each time I walked into the bathroom, I knew, "Oh, here's an opportunity." And I would miss it over and over again. I'd find myself staring. "Oh, I missed it again. Look at that. Wow, look at that."

At some point, when I was there in the bathroom, I noticed that while washing my hands, I just glanced up at the mirror. There was this kind of habit to look at myself—what's going on there? What do I look like? It wasn't some deep-seated need to be seen or reflected or anything. It was just a habit. But it was a powerful habit that had been unseen. And then, seeing the intention there, mindfulness just continued.

So sometimes when mindfulness gets lost in these areas, don't attribute a big story to it. It might not be any deep thing. It might just be a habit.

We can also find our mindfulness getting lost in states of body—pain, or really pleasant states in the body. Sometimes when we get concentrated, there's very pleasant bodily experience.

And we can just get lost in it. We can lose mindfulness—not because we're thinking, but because we get checked out or zoned out into the pleasantness. Beginning to be curious about that, we discover that when we get lost in pleasantness, we're actually not fully experiencing it.

We can also get lost in pain. Our minds often have strategies for dealing with pain—many of you have spoken about this in our meetings. When the mind gets stuck by pain, it wants to go off thinking about something pleasant. That's a strategy. I noticed this too: when my body was in pain, I would often find myself checked out into a spaciness. Not particularly thinking, but just zoned out. And when I woke up into that, I recognized that in that place where the mind was zoned out, the pain was not overwhelming.

So I recognized, well, that's a strategy the mind has figured out—how to not be overwhelmed by the pain. It was a non-mindful strategy for not being overwhelmed. But in that seeing, I could recognize: it is possible to have pain and not be all bent out of shape about it, not all aversive about it. So maybe I can know the pain and not be overwhelmed.

I played with that a little bit, just the possibility. It's like, okay, yeah, pain—you can be here. There's a lot of other stuff going on right now. It's like expanding the container. Yes, there's pain, but there's also seeing and hearing and pressure in the body and feet on the ground and temperature and thoughts and emotions. There's a lot going on in the present moment. Sometimes the experience of pain is kind of like a magnet, but expanding that container, we can see there's much more happening.

So I learned from seeing the strategy my mind used that there was a possibility of not being magnetized to the pain. But is there a way to do that mindfully? That became my next question. The mind knows how to do this—can I encourage it to do that mindfully?

We also often lose mindfulness in states of mind—familiar patterns or habits of mind where we tend to lose awareness. Boredom, depression, planning. What are our favorite thoughts, our favorite ways to get lost? As we wake up, that exploration I mentioned becomes valuable: notice the landscape that's there, what's been created over the last little while. This often helps us recognize the states of mind in which we get lost.

And in that moment of waking up—for instance, if the mind gets lost in boredom—there's the possibility of recognizing: awareness is here and the mind is bored. Boredom doesn't inherently mean non-mindfulness. Planning doesn't necessarily mean non-mindfulness. It's possible to be curious about these states of mind—the mind projecting into the future, or the mind feeling disconnected from experience.

So the moment when we wake up and recognize the landscape, that's a pointer to being able to be present for something we habitually aren't present for. In that moment of waking up, it's like, oh, this is what it's like to be present for planning. This is what it's like to be present for depression.

These habitual states that we get lost in can be very strong patterns or habits of mind—ones we've done a lot of, practiced a lot. Our minds have gone to them over and over again, and some of those patterns can be very strong. Some can be stronger than our capacity for mindfulness. So if we wake up and notice, oh, depression, it's almost like we just get pulled under again.

It's really useful to recognize whether a particular state is overwhelming, whether we feel like we're being pulled into a rabbit hole around these difficult states of mind. They're usually associated with the hindrances that Bonnie spoke about last night. Certain flavors of those can feel like they're pulling us under. That pattern is like a really strong wave, and mindfulness is like this little trickle.

When that happens, it's useful to explore some strategies. Often it's not so helpful to try to be mindful of something when it's an overwhelming pattern, when it feels like it's pulling us into a rabbit hole. Instead, try to redirect the attention or broaden the attention, as I mentioned earlier. There's a lot of other things going on right now. Sometimes we can redirect the attention.

It's like, "Yeah, okay, you can hang out in the room with me, but I need to pay attention to something else right now."

So this "not now" or setting aside isn't done with aversion, but with a very compassionate, kind attitude. It's like, "Okay, yeah, it's not helpful for me to try to pay attention to that very strong pattern right now, so I'm not going to try to stop you, but I'm going to put my attention on my feet and just walk right now." Just redirecting the attention onto something really simple. And often I find a neutral experience is helpful in that kind of situation.

Related to these states of mind in which mindfulness tends to get lost—familiar ones for each of us, like boredom or depression or planning where mindfulness tends to get lost—there can be some states of mind that more generally we think of as non-mindful. Habitually mindfulness gets lost in them, such as spacing out, sleepiness, dullness, fogginess. Some of these states of mind we may think of as inherently non-mindful. But it's not true. It is a state in which mindfulness is not habitually present, but it is not inherently impossible to be mindful of spaciness.

With certain of these states, there's an analogy I like to use. If you have a mirror, a mirror just reflects what's in front of it. It doesn't care what's in front of it—this is kind of the way mindfulness works. A mirror is a pretty good analogy for mindfulness in some ways. Mindfulness also doesn't care what it reflects. Its job is just to know, "Oh, this is what's happening in the present moment." Like that, that's the job of a mirror: it reflects what's happening in the room.

Now think about that mirror coated by steam. You're standing in front of the mirror, and you think, "The mirror's not doing its job. I need to clean it off. It's not doing its job." Well, the mirror doesn't care. It's actually doing its job perfectly. It is reflecting every drop of water on that mirror perfectly. It's just not doing the job we want it to do.

Likewise, often with states like sleepiness, dullness, spaciness, it's like that fog on the mirror. And often when we enter into those states, we fight them because we think, "I can't be mindful in this state." And so, while the mindfulness may be perfectly happy knowing, "Oh, this is what spaciness is like," we are not perfectly happy with that. We want the mind to be reflecting the clarity of every single little detail of the in-breath. Well, that's not what's happening.

It's possible to be curious about these states, these kinds of states of haziness or fogginess or fuzziness. A great thing to check there is—here's a little check: How many of you have had the thought, "I'm too sleepy to meditate"? Many of you. I'd like to propose to you: if you are aware of that thought, you have enough awareness to be aware of sleepiness. So just explore that. Usually when we have that kind of thought, it means we want to be aware of something other than sleepiness or dullness or fogginess or spaciness. Explore the possibility. It is actually possible to be mindful of that.

At one point I was exploring this—actually, I was exploring the opposite when I started. I was having a meal, and I noticed the mind kept spacing out. At that point my mind was saying, "Okay, being mindful means paying attention to the eating." So I had this agenda. And so I'd come back and I'd notice the lifting of the fork and the placing of the food in my mouth, the chewing, the tasting, and then the mind would space out again. Oh, come back. It spaced out again. It did this over and over again.

At some point, I began to realize, "Okay, well, hey, let's see if I can watch it space out." And I found that it was possible to be there while the mind spaced out. What I noticed in that moment, as I kind of hung out, was that it almost felt like the mind hovered up to the top of my head, a little to the right, hanging out up here with a little buzzy feeling. It was very restful, very easeful, kind of pleasant. And in that moment, the mind kind of relaxed.

It was as if the mind said, Oh, thank you for letting me rest. The mind had been looking for rest—it was tired, it wanted to take a break. I had been carrying this agenda: Do mindfulness, do mindfulness. And the mind was saying, I'm tired, let's rest. It was going to take its rest whether I wanted it to or not. Being aware of it, I could watch it rest. It rested for about thirty seconds, and then it was ready to be present for whatever came next. The spacing out dissipated, and then there was clarity—as if the fog had dispersed. Just from watching it.

There's a common belief, I think, that the mind needs to be in a certain state in order to meditate, or that meditation feels a certain way. Sometimes this comes with a familiarity we develop—we begin to get a taste of a certain experience, like really being able to touch into the detailed sensations as the breath arises, or being very stable while thoughts come and go and sensations come and go. We may have a sense of that, and it can be very clear sometimes—a taste of precise moments of knowing. And we think, Oh, that's what it's supposed to be like.

Well, that's one way. That's one way it can be. If we're always looking for that, or something in particular—looking for a certain state, a certain configuration of what we think it's supposed to be like—we'll miss other ways that it can be.

There are so many different experiences possible when the mind is present. Sometimes it feels like the attention is really focused right down on very specific experience. Sometimes it feels very broad, panoramic. Sometimes it feels like the mind is staying right with one thing and just hangs out there. Sometimes it feels like things are popping in, one thing after another—pop, pop, pop, pop. Sometimes it feels like many things are happening at the same time. Sometimes it feels like we're an observer, kind of separated from experience, like there's a clear difference between the observing and what's observed—almost a separation in that experience. Sometimes it feels like we're right in the middle of the experience.

And so this encouragement to be curious: How is it for you right now? There's so much to see. We can't even fathom how much there is to see. Sometimes experience might just feel completely ordinary. Like, Well, this can't be right. But wait—I'm aware. This is what it's like to be completely aware and have experience feel really ordinary.

My hope is to encourage you to be interested in exploring your experience—exploring what is here now, recognizing the mindfulness, the awareness. Aware, am I aware? And what's here? Because there's so much to see.

As we explore this, we definitely begin to recognize that this body and mind are just processes at work, tumbling on, out of control much of the time. Not me, not mine, not who I am. It also gives us a great education about what our minds are up to. We could call this retreat Your Mind 101. You're really going to get to know your mind. And I still feel like I'm taking Your Mind 101—just different levels of it.

This encourages us to move from judging our experience, thinking I need to figure out how to make it be a certain way, to simply: Oh, it's like this. This is how it is. However it is, there's the possibility of waking up to that.

So let's just sit for a moment.

So.

CHAPTER 128

Effort & Energy (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of wise effort (sammā vāyāma) and energy (vīriya) as essential elements in meditation practice. She begins by establishing that energy is a neutral quality—the same force that drives anger or greed can fuel love and generosity—and thus requires wisdom to direct it skillfully toward liberation.
> Fella unpacks the four kinds of wise effort from the Noble Eightfold Path: preventing unarisen unwholesome states, abandoning arisen unwholesome states, cultivating unarisen wholesome states, and maintaining arisen wholesome states. Rather than presenting these as separate practices requiring aggressive doing, she demonstrates how wise mindfulness naturally encompasses all four efforts simultaneously. When we mindfully observe anger, for instance, we are both letting go of the unwholesome state and cultivating the wholesome quality of mindfulness itself.
> The talk addresses practical concerns about balancing energy in meditation, using the Buddha's famous lute-tuning analogy. Too much effort creates restlessness; too little leads to dullness. Fella offers the insight that recognizing these states as 'high energy' or 'low energy' rather than labeling them as hindrances can reduce the subtle aversion that compounds our difficulties. She introduces the image of a kick scooter—light, repeated taps building momentum—as a model for sustainable effort that doesn't exhaust us. Drawing on the pāramīs, she notes that patience follows energy in the traditional sequence, reminding practitioners that wisdom ripens in its own time: 'When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree.'

One of my favorite parts of giving a dharma talk is sitting up here at the beginning, listening to all the sounds as people settle in—the rustles, the pops of chairs, the adjustments—and hearing it slowly settle. It brings a lot of delight to feel that settling happen.

Tonight the topic is effort and energy. In some ways this is connected to what we might call the art of meditation, because we all have to find our way to how we bring our effort and energy into the practice. The Buddha did offer us some guidelines and suggestions. In particular, he encouraged us to apply ourselves with wisdom and balance. So one of the things I'd like to explore at the beginning is: what is the wisdom that helps us in making effort?

In one of the Theravadan lists—the paramis, the ten perfections—we find a series of beautiful wholesome qualities that the Buddha is said to have cultivated in the many lives before he became the Buddha. In that sequence of ten beautiful qualities, wisdom and energy are positioned right in the middle. Wisdom directly precedes energy in that list, pointing to the way in which we need to have some kind of wisdom in how we use our energy in practice.

Energy itself is a neutral quality. It is the same kind of energy connected with anger, confusion, hatred, pride, greed, and irritation as it is with love, joy, kindness, and generosity. The Buddha really encouraged us to look at how we use that energy—to use it in ways that will help us become free.

Wisdom is really a foundation for us. It holds the first position in the Eightfold Path: wise view and wise intention. These first two factors highlight the importance of our perspective, of how we engage in the practice.

It's said that after his awakening, the Buddha reflected on the world and human beings and how they go about living their lives. He realized that while beings want to be happy and do things in order to find happiness, they are actually doing the very things that keep them stuck in struggle and suffering. Our usual worldview, in a simplified way, is something like: having things or being seen in a certain way will make me happy. And there is a measure of happiness when we get things we want, or people see us as we'd like, or we feel we can control what we're doing. But it is not reliable. Things are impermanent, and so having things is not a very reliable source of happiness.

We all know how our own minds change. Our views and opinions of other people are not very stable. To think that we can find our happiness in having other people's views and opinions be the way we want them to be—that's pretty unreliable. The Buddha recognized that the very way we go about our lives, we are placing our faith in things that are not reliable. We're trying to find happiness by placing our faith and trust in things that are impermanent, unreliable, and out of our control.

In his own awakening, his first teaching was connected to this understanding of suffering—recognizing that suffering is created or caused by craving and clinging in the mind, and that it is possible to be free from that craving, leading to a release from suffering. There is a path to cultivate this direction. An understanding of suffering, an understanding of what takes us toward suffering and what takes us away from it, is foundational to what the Buddha taught.

This is a piece of wisdom. There are many different ways that wisdom is pointed to in the Buddhist teaching, but here is the one I'd like to look at: certain qualities and states of mind tend to head us in the direction of suffering, while other qualities tend to lead us away from suffering.

The Buddha pointed to unskillful, unwholesome states as those based in greed, aversion, and delusion. These are all the states that lead to reactivity in our minds. Anger, hatred, confusion, pride, irritation, depression, boredom—so many different states, hundreds probably of different reactive emotions. But they all have this thread back to being connected with greed, aversion, and delusion.

The understanding is that when we act, and that intention toward action is connected with greed, aversion, and delusion, that's what tends to head us toward suffering. But when we act with intention connected to wholesome states—states based in non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—we tend to head in the direction of freedom. It takes us on a different path. This includes love, compassion, sympathetic joy, equanimity, concentration, mindfulness, generosity, wisdom, ethical conduct, and truthfulness—many wholesome qualities of mind. When we act from those qualities, we move toward liberation.

And so this understanding of what leads us to suffering and what leads us away from suffering is what the Buddha grounded his teaching on wise effort in. Wise effort really points to recognizing and cultivating those states that lead us away from suffering, and letting go of states that lead us towards suffering.

So let's start there in this reflection on effort and energy. The Eightfold Path includes wise effort as a whole path factor, and it has a very clear definition. I'll name it first: there are four kinds of wise effort. The effort towards the non-arising of unwholesome states that have not arisen. The effort towards the abandoning of unwholesome states that have arisen. The effort towards the arousing of wholesome states that have not arisen. And the effort towards the maintaining or sustaining of wholesome states that have arisen.

Now, these may sound a little convoluted, but they're actually not when we start to look at them. The first one—the effort towards the non-arising of unwholesome states that have not arisen—has three negatives in that sentence. How do we parse it? Basically, it's understanding, looking at our experience, using mindfulness, observing what happens, and recognizing causes and conditions that tend to lead us towards suffering and struggle—and avoiding those causes. Another way to frame this first kind of effort is as avoiding unwholesome states.

The use of "avoiding" here, however—I mean, we have associations with that word, a relationship to it. And if we apply our usual relationship to avoiding to this path factor, we may find ourselves engaging in aversion towards unwholesome states. So I want to tease this apart. This is not about aversion to unwholesome states.

For instance, suppose you notice that every time you see a particular person, you feel agitation and reactivity. On the surface of it, you might think that avoiding the causes—looking at this in the big picture of what you're noticing right now, where seeing that person creates the conditions for being reactive—would mean you should avoid that person. We might think that's what is instructed here. There may be times when that is useful and skillful, a skillful means for finding a way to begin exploring what's going on in the mind with this particular situation.

But a deeper look reveals something important: fortunately for us, other people do not have the power to do anything to our minds. Seeing another person that we come into reactivity around—it's not as if that person is doing anything to us. There's something going on in our own minds. And I think what this teaching around avoiding the causes and conditions points to is beginning to get really curious about what's actually happening. What's going on in the mind? It's not just about seeing somebody, as if seeing them pushes some button that creates reactivity. There's a whole series of events that happen. Can we get curious about that?

Maybe that person has a gesture that reminds you of somebody who actually did you some harm in the past, and that gesture is what's leading to the reactivity. That gesture and that memory connection is what's creating the response. So we can explore the deeper conditions and begin to be curious about them. In this exploration, we might recognize that there's a thought that arises, and we can begin to decouple it from that particular person. It's not so much about them specifically. We see that it's more about the memory we're reacting to.

In this exploration, we discover that avoiding the state isn't so much about avoiding the person, but more about understanding the deeper reactivity. As we begin to meet in our minds with mindfulness the agitation that comes up as a result of a memory, a deeper kind of letting go begins to happen.

Here's another example, perhaps simpler in a way. You might notice that when you stand in the lunch line, when there are a lot of people around, you see yourself judging a lot. You notice people taking a lot of food or different kinds of food or filling their plate in a different way, and there's judgment: "Wow, they do it really beautifully. Look at how beautiful that plate is." Or, "They're taking too much or too little or just right," or "I'm not taking the right amount." Judgments arise.

Again, we might think that this teaching of avoiding the conditions that lead to judgment might mean going late to the lunch line so we don't have to watch people put food on their plates. That would be one way to approach it. But we could bring more curiosity to what's going on there—just being curious about the judgment.

And also being curious about where the mind leaves, because when the mind goes into judging, the mind is leaving the present moment.

Joseph Goldstein noticed this. You're in good company if you find yourself judging when you walk into the dining room. As Joseph said, this was a major practice for him. And at some point he recognized that what he should do when he walked into the dining room is note "seeing." Because his mindfulness was going out the eye door. And when he started noting seeing, he just noticed movement. He noticed that he was present for the seeing as opposed to being caught by judging what he was seeing.

This is a really useful practice. This is a form of containing, of guarding the sense doors in a sense. So instead of guarding the sense doors by avoiding the line entirely, we guard the sense doors with mindfulness. That's a way to explore this—avoiding the arising of the reactivity.

The second effort is the effort to abandon or let go of unwholesome states that have arisen. The word "abandon" here has certain connotations for us. We think of abandoning often as actively putting aside, actively getting rid of. And there are times in our practice when a kind of active recognition is helpful—recognizing, "Wow, I'm really caught by this. It's not helpful to try to be with this right now." A kind of setting aside, a "not now" approach. A recognition that this is overwhelming. You can be here in the room with me, but I can't put attention on you right now, so I'm going to put attention on something else. That can be a skillful means. That's a way of decoupling from reactivity.

Or sometimes replacing reactivity. If we're noticing that we're reactive—judging someone or confused about something—the Buddha taught a tool: if we have some kind of reactivity going, we can pick up another thought, a wholesome thought, and replace it. Replace the unwholesome thought with a wholesome thought. So if there's anger, for instance, replacing it with a thought of mettā. If you see somebody and you have anger arising, a way to navigate that, to begin to let go or move away from it, might be to bring in a mettā thought. May you be happy. May you be at ease. These are ways to work with this form of wise effort to let go of unwholesome states that we're experiencing.

And yet another way of letting go has an association with a different definition of the word "abandon." I looked up the word at one point because the Buddha uses it in a couple of different places, and I thought—since it's translated as "abandoned," it's not what the Buddha actually used—but it's an interesting word. In some places it has what we might think of as a negative connotation, like abandoning a child, where we're doing something that's not so helpful. But in other places, like the phrase "abandon ship," there's a very natural movement of removing oneself from a place of danger. That's another use of that term—when we abandon ship, we're abandoning something that's dangerous.

That's the kind of sense I think the Buddha means when he says abandon unwholesome states. We begin to recognize the danger of these reactive states. Our mind and our mindfulness begins to recognize, "Oh, that hurts and it's not so helpful." And the mind begins to let it go, to abandon it because it understands the danger. This is wisdom that understands that danger. This kind of abandoning happens through our practice of mindfulness, as we explore what it means to be with, to let be, perhaps, reactive states of mind.

We're doing a lot of this in our practice. This is so much of our mindfulness practice. We notice the arising of confusion and hatred and boredom and craving, and we see what we can do to allow holding it in our mindfulness. This morning in the Q&A we talked about bowing to our difficulties—not being swept away by them, but opening to them, allowing them to be known with mindfulness.

That practice has a potency and a power. My understanding of how that works is that with mindfulness, as we're mindful of reactivity, as we're mindful of these unwholesome states, our mind gets an education. Often when we're caught by reactive states—if we're caught by greed for something, if we're caught by wanting something—our minds are projecting into the future. Our minds are saying, "It's going to be so great when I get that thing."

The mind gets caught in that fantasy of having something, and the fantasy itself is pleasant. So the mind is going for that idea of some future pleasant experience—it has created this pleasant fantasy. And in doing so, it basically misses the fact that the wanting itself, the craving itself, hurts.

When we turn with mindfulness to the craving, when we turn with mindfulness to the reactivity, we cannot avoid recognizing: wanting hurts. Anger hurts. This is dukkha. We recognize that. The mindfulness recognizes the suffering of it. And mindfulness and wisdom together begin to guide our minds in a different direction. Our minds have to get it that these reactive states are suffering. This is not a mistake—this is so much of how the practice unfolds.

Another beautiful line from Joseph, a great favorite of mine: we want insight into dukkha, into suffering, without experiencing suffering. And that isn't the way it works. The insight comes because we're willing to be with it, with wise effort, with wise mindfulness. And the understanding grows from that.

This kind of wise effort—the effort to abandon unwholesome states that have arisen—is a big part of our practice.

Then there is the effort to arouse or bring about wholesome states that have not yet arisen. We can do this in a couple of different ways. One is cultivating wholesome qualities through inclining the mind towards those qualities. We are doing that in the metta practice each day, in the brahma-vihara practice. That practice is a practice of cultivating wholesome mind states that have not yet arisen. It also serves the fourth wise effort of sustaining wholesome states that have arisen, because as the metta does begin to arise, the practice sustains it. We incline the mind through intention towards wholesome qualities.

Another way this effort works is by not engaging in actions or situations that directly oppose those wholesome qualities of mind. Refraining from unwholesome actions cultivates wholesome mind states. This is one of the ways that working with the precepts works. In fact, in the Buddha's teachings around the precepts, he links each one with a wholesome quality. He says that abstaining from killing living beings begins to cultivate compassion in the mind. Abstaining from taking what is not given begins to cultivate contentment. The action of avoiding unwholesome action begins to cultivate wholesome mind states.

This is also a way we can see the first wise effort of avoiding unwholesome states that have not arisen, because the precepts work there too. They are about avoiding actions that tend to lead to unwholesome states of mind—refraining from killing, refraining from taking what's not given. So the precepts are functional in that first wise effort. They're also, at the very same time, cultivating the wholesome. What a great thing.

We also explore cultivating mindfulness, which, as my teacher Sayadaw U Pandita said, is the most wholesome mind state. Wise mindfulness, he said, is the most wholesome mind state. And that's a lot of what we're doing here too—we are cultivating mindfulness.

The fourth wise effort is the effort to sustain wholesome states that have arisen. When I thought about this one for myself, I wondered: why would that take work? Why would it take work to sustain something that is wholesome? Then I began to recognize two tendencies in the mind. One is that when something delightful or a wholesome state is arising—like joy or bliss or concentration—we can have a tendency to indulge in it. We can get lost in it and lose mindfulness. And as we lose mindfulness of these wholesome states, we lose the conditions that support their arising.

And so mindfulness of these wholesome states is one of the key ways to encourage their growth. It not only encourages sustaining them, but it also encourages them to arise more in the future. So again, mindfulness functions both in arousing wholesome states that have not arisen and in sustaining wholesome states that have arisen.

Indulging is one side of what our minds can do with wholesome states. And to my surprise, I also sometimes found that when wholesome states were strong, they could be overwhelming. At one point I was sitting and having breakfast, and I was experiencing a lot of joy arising. I was just noticing the joy, and it was pretty strong, pretty intense. And I was kind of like, "Whoa, I can't handle this." There was some trying to tamp down on it—resistance to the joy because it was so intense.

And then a little bit of wisdom flitted through, which said, "It's okay, it's impermanent. It won't last." With that, the mind let go of trying to repress it. And it got really strong. It was kind of like a wave—it broke. And then tranquility came in. It was like a beautiful, peaceful joy that followed. So mindfulness there was also the medicine. Non-resistance.

Recognizing the beautiful qualities that are being cultivated as we practice is important. Sometimes people, in hearing about wise effort, notice that there are times when we actually take action, and these are skillful means. These tools of wise effort can be skillful means. There are definitely times when it's time to put something down, set it aside, say "not now." There are times when it's time to pick up the metta practice and actively cultivate it.

So the practice of wise effort can sound like a lot of doing. And yet what I want to also point to is that the practice of wise mindfulness—which is largely what we're exploring and cultivating here—is about inclining towards becoming present for what is arising. Sometimes people ask the question, "Well, we're practicing just looking at what's arising. How does that connect with wise effort? We're exploring settling back and just seeing what's coming." It can feel like there's a conflict there.

Well, as we practice wise mindfulness, wise mindfulness itself already contains the four wise efforts. Let's think through it for a moment. If you are exploring an unwholesome state—looking at the arising of anger, for instance, noticing anger, exploring mindfulness of that anger—that is that second kind of wise effort right there: the letting be, the exploring, the allowing wisdom to begin to support the letting go of an unwholesome state that has arisen.

And simultaneously, while that's happening, the mind is getting that education that "Wow, this anger hurts," which creates the conditions for anger to arise less in the future. That's the first kind of wise effort: cultivating the conditions for the non-arising of unwholesome states. As we open with mindfulness to our reactive states, it creates the conditions for them to weaken, for them to get less strong, for them to begin to appear less and less in our minds.

And then simultaneously with that, we're also cultivating mindfulness, which, as my teacher said, is the most wholesome mind state. So we're cultivating the arising of mindfulness—the third kind of wise effort. And at the same time, we are practicing sustaining mindfulness that has arisen—the fourth kind of wise effort.

So there is no conflict. As we practice noticing what's happening in our present moment experience with opening to it, we are already practicing the four wise efforts. And we find at times that we're not able to simply be with what's arising, and then it's useful to use some strategies, to bring in some other tools that help us let go of unwholesome states or cultivate wholesome states more actively.

This wise effort that we make—the Buddha connected it with a skillful energy. Often we equate energy and effort, and sometimes we speak about them as synonymous. The Buddha actually distinguished them a little bit. In one teaching he said that the faculty of energy—which is the faculty James talked about at the very beginning of the retreat, when he spoke about the five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—is the energy that supports our practice. It's the energy that guides us in the direction of continuing, of keeping on with the path. And the Buddha said that this spiritual faculty of energy is the energy that results from making wise effort. That's interesting. He says that energy results from effort.

We don't usually think of it that way. We normally think of needing to use energy to make effort. And we do have to have some measure of energy. We have energy, actually—the energy of life. There's energy in our bodies. Just because we're sitting here alive, that energy can be harnessed in the direction of wise effort. And then that wise effort begins to create this wholesome energy.

This is a beautiful thing, actually. The way we normally think about energy and effort is that making effort uses up energy—that when we make effort, we end up with less energy. And the Buddha says, no. When we make wise effort, we end up with wise energy. I told this to one of my daily life practice meetings, and somebody said, "It's green energy!" So wise effort leads to skillful energy.

There are some other supports for skillful energy that I'd like to briefly point to. Energy is actually in quite a few of the Buddhist lists. I mentioned the list that James talked about: faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, wisdom. In that list, faith precedes energy. So this is another pointer for wise effort or wise energy. When there's a sense of trust, of confidence, of faith, that can bring a lot of energy to our system. That's another support for skillful energy.

Sometimes we can tap into this by reflecting on the ways the practice has benefited us, reflecting on our appreciation for the Buddha, reflecting on our appreciation for our community. This kind of reflection on the Triple Gem—the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha—can support faith, which can bring some energy into our system that we can harness for our practice.

In another list, the Seven Factors of Awakening, what precedes energy is investigation. Another clue for us. And this one I like to reflect on. Investigation is akin to or connected with the quality of curiosity and interest. When we are interested in what's happening—and we've been encouraging this, to be curious about what's happening, to be interested in what's happening—when we can tap into interest and curiosity, there's a natural arising of energy there. Especially when that curiosity is like, "What's this? What's this human experience of whatever this thing is that's happening right now?" That leads to skillful energy and brings a kind of natural energy into our system.

So as energy develops in our practice, we can then reapply it back to the practice. And yet it's helpful in our exploration of energy to begin to look at whether it's balanced. This is another aspect of the teaching on applying energy and effort that the Buddha really pointed to—that the energy needs to be balanced.

He used the analogy of tuning a lute, a guitar-like instrument. He asked one of his followers, "Did you play the lute when you were a lay person?" And that follower said, "Yes, I did." And the Buddha said, "Well, what happened when the string on the lute was too loose? Did it make beautiful music?" "No." "Well, what if the string was too tight?" "Well, then the string broke." "So you need to tune that string just right to make the music." He said, likewise with our practice, the energy has to be balanced and tuned. Too much energy we can often recognize because there's often restlessness in our system. Too little energy often results in sloth and torpor, dullness, sleepiness, drowsiness.

Sometimes I found that when exploring energy, exploring these imbalanced states of energy, it was actually supportive for me to recognize it simply as an imbalance of energy.

For instance, during one long stretch of my practice—a couple of years—sloth and torpor were a huge part of my experience, and I just had to learn how to work with it. I really had to get to explore it. One thing I began recognizing was that I had so many attitudes and opinions about this dull mind. I would hear myself saying, "This mind is way too dull to pay attention." And yet, at some point, I noticed: "Oh, it's too dull"—wait, seeing is happening. Hearing is happening. Okay, I guess there's mindfulness going on.

What I recognized is that in the very acknowledging of that state as "dull," there was already an attitude of aversion. When I started acknowledging it differently, recognizing "Oh, this is a low energy state," it made the acknowledgment more neutral. This can be useful for us sometimes in exploring those states of high or low energy—rather than attributing the hindrance to them, which can have a slight flavor of aversion, as it did in my case. "Okay, this is a high energy state. Can I be with high energy right now? Yeah, I can do that."

Recognizing that high energy, one way to balance it is through mindfulness. One way to balance low energy is also through mindfulness. There are times, as we've talked about, when there are strategies—useful strategies—to bring up the energy when it's low or to bring down the energy when it's high. But I'd encourage you to explore the possibility of mindfulness first.

Before standing up or taking a brisk walk or opening your eyes: "Oh, low energy, that's what's happening. Can I know that?" Yeah, I actually can know that pretty clearly. Right there, that acknowledgment, that mindful recognition of low energy—it's like it dials up the energy just enough to meet that experience. That's a way of increasing energy. That's the curiosity of "What is this low energy?"

In exploring this balance of energy, one of the keys is how much effort we make. Wise effort leads to skillful energy, and so the way we make our effort supports a balanced energy. Often when we're making effort—for instance, when we sit down at the beginning of a sitting—we may have the idea, "Okay, I'm sitting down, it's a forty-five minute sitting, I am going to be mindful for the whole thing." I certainly did this. It's like I picked up the entire forty-five minutes in that first second and tried to muster the energy to be there for the whole sitting in that first moment. And it doesn't work that way.

Right now, how hard is it to know hearing is happening of my voice? How hard is it to know the sensation of your hands? Just check in with the sensations of your hands. How about the contact of your hips against the chair or cushion or bench? How about a breath? Usually that is not too hard. In a moment, when I mention each of those areas, often it's right there. It didn't actually take too much effort to do that.

A moment of mindfulness takes a very, very small amount of energy, of effort. What's harder is to sustain it over time, to keep going with it. And it's often helpful, rather than thinking about picking up the whole forty-five minutes at once, to do it in small chunks.

Right now, notice an in-breath. And how about an out-breath? Just enough effort. How about enough effort for another in-breath? And just enough effort for another out-breath. Another in-breath. Another out-breath.

Often there's not a feeling of that taking a lot of effort. And so—small, small efforts over and over and over. Often the "over and over and over" piece is where our mind picks up and goes, "Oh..." And if we can, just enough effort for this half a breath. Just enough effort in the walking, for instance.

I would do this in walking when my mind was really scattered. I'd be doing walking maybe outside and I'd pick something on the ground, a leaf that's just three feet away. Can I be mindful till I get to that leaf? Yeah, made it.

How about that crack? Okay, I made it. How about that? So just picking up a small amount to try to be mindful for, and then doing it again and again and again. The light touch over and over.

As we do that light touch of effort over and over, a momentum tends to build. We begin to get the sense of not needing to push so hard—we can maybe go out six feet or ten feet. It's like the mindfulness seems to carry us.

There's an analogy I like to use for this kind of effort. The little scooters that kids ride, the kick scooters—they have a platform that's low on the ground, two skinny wheels, and you have to balance on this little platform and tap the ground to get the scooter to go. At the beginning, you have to tap quite frequently. You don't have to tap really hard to get going, but just tap, tap, tap, tap, tap, tap. Momentum builds, and then you begin to get a sense of that momentum, and you're riding the scooter for a little while. You don't have to tap for a little while. You get a feeling for when the scooter begins to get a little wobbly. Put your foot down, tap again to balance it out. Then you ride some more.

Mindfulness is kind of like that. We do the little bit of effort, just like tap, tap, tap—just enough for half a breath, half a breath. And then we begin to get a sense of the momentum of the mindfulness, recognizing the mindfulness as we talked about a few days ago. We recognize that we don't have to remind ourselves as frequently. And then we begin to get familiar with what it feels like for that mindfulness to get wobbly, and we reconnect again, remind ourselves—right, two steps out, three steps out. A light touch over and over. This is the way effort can build momentum skillfully and not lead to contraction in the mind.

Sometimes I also ask myself—because if you tend to over-effort, this is a good question to ask yourself—how little effort do I need to be mindful right now? Just backing off. It's like, oh, I don't need to make that much. Okay, a little bit less. Oh wow, still mindful without trying so hard. How about a little bit less? Wow, still mindful. Oh, gone. Okay, maybe a little more than that. Just beginning to check in for how much effort is useful right now.

Over time, this momentum of effort, skillful energy, begins to build. The mindfulness goes along with that. And we have wise mindfulness with a kind of continuity that feels more effortless. It doesn't feel like we're having to do it so much anymore. My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya says this isn't that there's no effort being made, but it is the Dharma making the effort then. He distinguishes between Dharma effort, Dharma energy, and personal energy. When do we need to actually engage with our sense of making the effort? And when can we kind of settle back and the Dharma begins to make the effort? It feels effortless, but the wisdom and the Dharma are doing the work for us.

And so we cultivate the conditions for skillful effort, for recognizing our experience, for the continuity of mindfulness. Really, wise effort is a real support for this continuity of mindfulness. And that continuity of mindfulness creates the conditions for freedom, for release, for wisdom to grow.

And yet we have to let go of expecting our effort to yield results on our timetable. On one long retreat, I was listening to a talk by Kamala Masters, who was telling a story about an experience, a teaching she had from her teacher Munindraji. She was talking about her impatience for getting results. And his response was just, "When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree."

That image for me became a really beautiful reflection. An apple on a tree—it looks red perhaps, it looks ripe. And yet you tug on it and it's not coming off. It's not sweetened on the inside yet.

We cannot make that apple ripen. It ripens in its own time. We can support the tree by creating the conditions—nourishing it, giving it water and food and light, making sure the bugs don't eat it up. We can take care of the tree. We cannot make the fruit ripen. It has its own time. And even if it looks ripe, it's still got some sweetening to do on the inside.

Sometimes it feels like that in practice. Surely, surely there must be some release just moments away. But no. When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree.

So we make the effort, and we let go. In the list of pāramīs, I think it's interesting that patience follows energy.

Let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 129

Five Aggregates (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h03

> In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat at Spirit Rock, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā), one of the Buddha's essential frameworks for understanding experience. She explains that the Pāli term 'khandha' simply means heap or bundle—a way of categorizing all our experiences into five processes: form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa).
> Fella guides practitioners through each aggregate with practical examples. Form is explored through the four elements—earth (solidity, weight), air (movement, vibration), fire (temperature), and water (moisture, cohesion)—offering a guided investigation of these elemental sensations in the mouth. Feeling is examined as the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral tone accompanying every experience, with the striking illustration of how the same apple taste changes dramatically depending on conditions. Perception is revealed as a memory-matching process, useful yet prone to error, as in mistaking a stream for a fan. Mental formations (saṅkhāra) are shown to be the conditioning engine that shapes all other aggregates—how anger conditions body, feeling, perception, and consciousness simultaneously.
> Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's fourth foundation of mindfulness, Fella emphasizes that understanding these processes helps us see how clinging and selfing arise. Rather than prescribing a technique, she offers this teaching as information that naturally supports practice—helping us recognize that these aggregates are conditioned processes unfolding on their own, not controlled by a self, and that wisdom arising from this understanding is what allows freedom.

Tonight the topic is a teaching of the Buddha that really offers us a way to explore our experience—all of our experience. The name of this teaching is the Five Aggregates.

Many of you have probably heard a version of this teaching. But if you haven't heard this term before, the Five Aggregates, it can sound kind of technical. The word "aggregate" isn't a word that we use in English very much, and it sounds a little foreign and odd. The word that this is translating from the Pali is khandha. Apparently it was more of a common word, an ordinary word, an everyday word that means something like "heap" or "bundle."

This teaching on the five aggregates is a way the Buddha used to describe the various aspects of our experience. Processes is another way I like to think of the aggregates—they're processes of our experience. We could think of them as the five heaps, the five collections of experience, five different kinds of collections of experience.

The Buddha highlighted these five in particular. They are: form, basically our physical experience, the process of our physical body; feeling, the process of recognizing whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant; perception, the recognizing aspect of experience, how we recognize what's happening to us; mental formations, the volitional aspect of experience; and consciousness, the cognizing aspect of experience.

These aggregates in the teaching are understood as basically whatever's happening in our experience. Whatever experience we are having can be understood as fitting into one of these five heaps. It's a way of slicing up the pie of our experience. Whatever's happening right now, we could recognize: oh, that's an aspect of feeling, or that's an aspect of perception, or that's an aspect of form, of body.

The Buddha offered other ways of slicing up this experience, one other one in particular being the six sense spheres. We've talked about that—recognizing experience as being the five physical senses (sight, smell, sound, taste, touch) and then the sense door of the mind. Again, anything we experience can be understood as fitting into one of those six areas.

I think it's interesting that the Buddha offered these different frameworks. When I look at these two frameworks in counterpoint, the six sense spheres kind of emphasize a refinement of the physical realm. We've got the five physical senses and then the mind is one in the six sense spheres. In the exploration of the aggregates, there's one aggregate that is the body, and the other four talk about mental processes. So in a way, this teaching really begins to explore what's going on in the mind. What are the processes at work in our minds?

The understanding of the aggregates in the suttas is understood both as process—a process of feeling, a process of perceiving, a process of knowing, a process of intending, a process of having volition, and also a process of body—but the aggregates are defined both as the processes and as the results of that process.

For instance, around feeling, which we've talked a lot about: we can understand the aggregate of feeling as being the heap of experience that's pleasant, unpleasant, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant. There's a set of experiences that we have, and every experience has one of those qualities to it. We can notice the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality to our experience. But the aggregate is also understood to be the process of feeling—how it comes about, the aspect of our mind responsible for feelings.

These aggregates are talked about in both ways, and I'll touch upon this to some extent. But in general I'd say that the easiest way to begin to get familiar with the aggregates is through recognizing just the simplicity of the results of the processes. So we can understand each of these heaps as both a noun and a verb. The verb is the process of how it comes to be, and the noun is the experience that results.

From that standpoint, I think "aggregate" is actually a pretty good translation, because aggregate has both the meaning of being a verb—to aggregate, to collect together—and something is an aggregate if it is something that has been collected together. The most common use of that word that I knew before I came to the Buddhist teaching was in geology: an aggregate rock is a rock made of other rocks. We can understand the aggregates as being, as Sallī said once, stuff made of other stuff.

The Buddha divided up experience in these different ways not just randomly, but because he saw particular value in understanding or seeing these particular slices of the pie. With respect to the aggregates, they're an excellent framework for us beginning to understand the actuality of our experience—what's actually happening in our experience, not our concepts or views or ideas about the experience. They help us begin to point to the processes of the mind, what's going on in the mind in particular, and to see what's happening in there.

The Buddha was really brilliant in describing how the mind functions, how it works. This teaching of the aggregates really begins to explore these functions of the mind. Also in this teaching, the Buddha emphasized—many times when the Buddha speaks of these five aggregates, he calls them the five aggregates affected by clinging. He talks a lot about how clinging happens around these aggregates: how clinging happens around form, how clinging happens around feeling, how clinging happens around perception and consciousness and intending or willing.

We tend to congeal and identify with experience, the clinging leading to "selfing." And so the Buddha often described the process of selfing—of I-making and my-making—with respect to these aggregates. As we begin to understand these processes of body and mind at work, our mind begins to understand how the creation of self happens, where we are identifying.

At one point, Bhikkhu Anālayo spoke about this identification around the aggregates. We think of the body as being where I am. Feelings as how I am. Perception as what I am experiencing. Volitional formations as why I'm doing something. And consciousness—this one's a little odd in his framing—as whereby I am knowing experience. All of that has the "I" in it. We tend to locate ourselves with respect to these aggregates. And so studying these aggregates, getting familiar with them as processes, can help us begin to undermine the way our mind believes in the sense of self.

Tonight I'd mostly like to talk about what these processes are, what these experiences are, how we can get to know them. They are discussed in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, and I'm going to paraphrase what the Buddha suggests there. He encourages us to take this as a study of mindfulness. It's in the Fourth Foundation, and he says that the Fourth Foundation is the contemplation of dhammas—dhammānupassanā.

Dhamma has a number of translations. Small-d dhamma, when used with a lowercase letter, basically means experience. It's a really simple word—it just means experience that's happening. Capital-D Dhamma refers to the teachings of the Buddha, the truth, the understanding of the truth. In this sutta, it's small-d dhamma. And so, while it's often translated as "mind objects," I like to think of it as simply the awareness of experience.

In this Fourth Foundation, the Buddha encourages us to look at experience through different lenses of the Dharma. One teacher pointed out that this Fourth Foundation is studying dhamma—small d, studying experience—through the lens of Dhamma, capital D. There are five different lists in the Fourth Foundation, five Buddhist teachings that are explored through this foundation, with the aggregates being one of those lists.

For this particular teaching, the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta says, "How does one abide contemplating experience as experience?" I want to stop there for a moment, because this is something we've been talking about. We've discussed recognizing something that's happening in the present moment as something that's happening in the present moment—a very simple shift of perspective. It is not something our minds would normally do. We tend to impute meaning to what's happening in the present moment, believe there needs to be something done about it other than simply recognizing, "Oh, this is what's happening in the present moment." For our mindfulness practice, this is the essential perspective. We contemplate the body as body. We contemplate feelings as feelings. We contemplate experience as experience.

Then the sutta continues: How does one contemplate experience as experience in terms of the five aggregates affected by clinging? This brings in the framework of the five aggregates. Basically, how does one contemplate experience through this framework?

The instruction is really simple. One understands: such is form, such is its arising, such is its passing. Such is feeling, such is its arising, such is its passing. Such is perception, such is its arising, such is its passing. And so on for the remaining aggregates.

Pretty simple instruction—just encouraging us to get familiar with these aggregates in our experience. Tonight I'm going to explore mostly the "such" instruction.

What does it mean to begin to recognize each of these aggregates? There are different ways to approach an exploration of them. One way is to pick up each aggregate for a period of time. I did this when I was sitting with Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma. It wasn't something I deliberately decided to do—it began more to happen—but I started looking at experience through the perspective of perception. I picked up that lens and became curious about how perception was working in my experience. So we can look at one aggregate for a particular length of time, examining what's happening there, taking it as an area of exploration.

Or we can simply notice what's happening in our experience and begin to recognize, "Oh, this is what's happening right now." Maybe hearing is happening. And in hearing, that's impingement on the ear door, which is form. Such is form. Or perhaps we notice pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—this is feeling. We can approach it in different ways.

Mostly I'm interested this evening in offering descriptions of what these aggregates are, to support the possibility that you might begin to see them. I'm not especially saying that for the next three days you should look at these aggregates. Sometimes Sayadaw U Tejaniya would offer a teaching like this, and I'd go off and try to do it. I'd think, "Oh, I need to go look at this," and I'd come back trying to report on it. He'd say, "Don't try to do that. Nothing I say is something for you to do. It's just information. It will support your practice to hear this information." So I offer this in that way—you don't have to try to do this. That said, I'll offer a little bit of guidance here and there to help you begin to see some of these during this talk.

Form points to our bodily experience, the bodily processes at work. What we experience in the touch sense, in the realm of our physical sense, is understood through the lens of the four elements: earth, air, fire, and water. This is really just a way to explore the elemental nature of our experience. What are the component parts of our physical experience? Not the concepts of our experience—we talked about this distinction this morning, between the experience and the idea of the body.

We can feel the experience of hand through knowing a vibratory, pulsing, pressure quality—hardness, moisture, coolness, heat. We can know those sensations. Yet we often also have an image or an overlay of the concept of "hand" there. We often experience our physicality through the concept rather than the direct, actual felt experience. Beginning to get familiar with what we might call the language of the body—how the body communicates with us—is really helpful for touching into the actuality of our physical experience. It helps us begin to tease apart what is actually bodily experience and what are the mental processes that get conflated with it.

In the touch sense, these four areas of earth, air, fire, and water each have their character. The earth element consists of those aspects of the body that feel solid. Right now, in your experience, can you touch into a sense of solidity? These sensations include heaviness, hardness, softness, a sense of the body's weight sitting on earth. Perhaps a sense of the hardness of the bones. The language this element speaks to us through is hardness, solidity, weight, density.

The air element relates to sensations connected with movement. The breath, the movement of the breath right now—feeling into the expansion of the chest as the breath goes in, that movement is a manifestation of air element. The breath is directly connected to the intake of air, and then the release: the falling of the ribcage, the letting go. Physical movement is one of the most obvious manifestations of air element. When we move, when we walk, movement is understood as air element.

At a subtler level, air element communicates through sensations of vibration, pulsing, tingling. Right now, can you touch into this? Perhaps put your attention in your hand—it's often an easy place to feel these sensations: vibration, tingling, pulsing. Sometimes air element also manifests as a feeling of pulling or pushing, like the feeling of the chest as it expands. As the air goes in and there's pressure, that too is a manifestation of air element.

And then fire element is the temperature—heat and coolness all along that range. There's plenty of opportunity to feel this during the day as the temperature changes, as our bodies move indoors and outdoors. We feel that. Sometimes, if you put your hand on your cheek, that can highlight the temperature element. At least in my case, often there's quite a difference between the temperature of the hand and the cheek, and so that contrast becomes apparent. Warmth, coolness, heat.

Water element is the element that most obviously expresses in moisture. We might feel that with tears or in our mouth with saliva. There's a kind of fluidity or cohesion. Often I find the water element is most easily seen in dependence on some of the other elements. This is perhaps easy to see in the mouth.

So now we'll take a little exploration of these elements in the mouth. Take your tongue—Marcia Rose is the person I learned this from—take your tongue and push it against your teeth. See if you can notice in that the hardness of your teeth. And then shift to recognizing that a hardness is arising. We're knowing the hardness because of the pushing. We're pushing and feeling the hardness, but see if you can touch into the pushing itself. That's air element. You may or may not have a sense of temperature in your mouth.

Now take your tongue and run it across the surface of your teeth. Notice the kind of smoothness that you feel, perhaps. If your mouth is really dry, it may not feel so smooth. But the smoothness of the movement across the hardness—air and earth, the movement of the tongue across that hardness reveals a slipperiness, which is water element. And so we know these elements in dependence on each other.

I would encourage you not necessarily to try to figure out if an experience is water or air or earth, but to simply begin to get curious about this language of the body, how the body communicates with us.

In our other senses—sight, the basic elemental experience of sight is not what we typically perceive. As I sit here and look out, I see people, I see walls, I see tankas, I see candles, I see zabutans and zafus, but that's not elemental. That's the overlay of concept. The eye takes things in as form and color. The ear in pitch, tone, frequency. The tongue in sweet, salty, sour, pungent, savory. Smell in floral, woody, fruity. Apparently—I looked this up today, wondering what are the component parts of smell—it's got more texture than most of our senses, actually. It's got many different distinct things that we can smell, indicating perhaps the importance of that for our survival.

This exploration, particularly around getting familiar with the language of the body, how the body communicates with our mind, begins to help us distinguish and recognize the difference between what's physical and what's mental. This is actually much more easy to confuse than we might think. We might think, "Yes, I know the difference between body and mind." But we often confuse them, as in the example of seeing an image of our body and knowing our experience through that image. A mental perception of experience influencing our experience.

As we begin to get familiar with these very elemental experiences, it supports our beginning to recognize the mental processes at work. The first of those is feeling. We've talked a lot about feeling—Carol did a whole talk on it. This is the feeling tone of experience, whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. We've discussed the importance of this: as we begin to recognize the feeling tone of experience, we see whole processes at work that leap off of that—craving, clinging, becoming. Guy spoke of this last night, that beginning to recognize the little space that can happen when we just know feeling. The possibility of it not necessarily—when we just connect, "Oh, this is pleasant"—it can short-circuit that whole movement to craving and clinging and becoming.

Feeling tone is understood as a mental experience. That's perhaps easy for us to understand when we're looking at mind states. Happiness, for example, feels pleasant. Aversion often feels unpleasant.

We know that those are mental feelings. But the body is also a rich terrain of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. How do we understand feeling associated with bodily experience as mental? What does that mean?

Actually, I was rather surprised to learn at one point that neuroscience agrees with this—that the understanding of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral is formed in a very basic part of the brain, in the brainstem. If there's damage in that area, we can't feel pleasant or unpleasant anymore. So this feeling of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral is indeed created in the mind.

As an example of how to understand this as something mental, let me take you through a little thought experiment. Imagine yourself standing on a busy corner waiting for a friend. There are many people going by, and you're waiting there. Right at the appointed time, you feel a gentle touch on your shoulder. Because you're waiting for your friend, that touch may be experienced as pleasant. You turn and it's your friend—exactly what you were expecting. Your friend came up and touched you gently. So that experience may be felt as pleasant in that situation.

Now imagine yourself on the same kind of busy street corner, standing there waiting to cross the street. You're not waiting for a friend. Someone touches you in the same gentle way. That may be experienced as a startle. You may actually experience it as unpleasant, because you're not expecting it.

So one of the things to begin to be curious about with feeling is the fact that it's conditioned. Feeling in any moment is not inherent in the experience itself. It is highly conditioned based on our mind state, our expectations, our agendas, our views, our conditioning, and the conditions in the world.

On one long retreat, I had an example of this—simple but very powerful for having my understanding dive deeply into how feeling is conditioned. It undermined the idea that feeling is somehow "out there," that somebody can make me feel a certain way. It really illuminated how feeling is conditioned.

It happened over tea at IMS, the evening meal. It was a very simple meal that evening. I had an apple and some bean dip. I took a bite of the apple—this was fall in New England—and it burst in my mouth with tartness and sweetness. It was so pleasant, one of the most pleasant apple experiences I've ever had. Very delightful. The whole body was bubbling with delight.

Then I tasted the bean dip, which had a very different taste. It was not unpleasant, but it didn't have the same delightful quality. But then I took another bite of the apple after the bean dip, and it was even more pleasant. Something about the conditions of having put the savoriness of the bean dip on my tongue—maybe the oil in it—highlighted the tartness and sweetness of the apple. There was even more delight, more ripples of pleasure.

I began playing with this, noticing the pleasant aspect and the variations of feeling tone. I noticed that if I took multiple bites of apple, one after another, the pleasure diminished. Have a bite of bean dip, then another bite of apple—the pleasure was stronger. After some time of all this, it just got more normalized. It ceased being quite so phenomenal. Maybe a little bit of pleasant. Same apple, different conditions, different feeling tone.

That simple exploration led me to see—and this is another encouragement for continuity—that we can see in the most unexpected places how processes work. So this is some of the process of feeling: seeing its conditioned nature. How does feeling arise? This is part of the satipaṭṭhāna—seeing that feeling arises in dependence on conditions. Stronger pleasant after the bean dip.

Less pleasant after the tongue had experienced the flavor multiple times.

Also with feeling, we can begin to recognize—kind of in juxtaposition to body sensation—the difference between raw sensation and our felt relationship to it. Heat, coolness. You're standing out in the cold and you come inside, and perhaps the heat in the room feels pleasant. At another time, this particular temperature might feel unpleasant, depending on what the conditions are. So the heat, the coolness, are one thing. Our relationship to it through feeling is another.

All of our experience in the physical realm is like this, and we can begin to tease this apart. We can actually begin to recognize, in unpleasant physical sensation for instance, something quite interesting. At one point I was feeling a very powerful sensation of my ankle against the mat—strong pressure against the mat. What I might call pain, but it just felt like strong neutral experience.

A lot of what we call pain, and in turn unpleasant, is because we have the idea that it's painful. Check it out for yourself. The idea of pain, not necessarily the actual sensation of pressure or hardness—that actually might be neutral. But the idea of, "I've been sitting here a long time, that pressure feels strong, that's going to hurt, I'm going to have a bruise on my foot"—all of that is contributing to the experience of it being unpleasant.

So exploring this kind of dynamic between these aggregates is also a very interesting exploration.

Perception is the third of these aggregates. This is the process whereby we recognize what's happening. We talked about it a little bit—that it's a natural process. We couldn't function without it. We use it to navigate the world, recognizing that I look out here and see people and zabutans and hard floor and walls and doors. Really useful for me to know the difference between a wall and a door. This is perception at work.

It's a relationship that develops over time. We experience walls and doors when we're very young. We begin to understand that walls create a barrier—wouldn't want to run headlong into a wall. A door, on the other hand, you know that it gives. You can push through it.

This perceptual process happens because we come into contact with experience over and over again. Perception is related to memory. We've seen things over and over again. Now I've seen many zabutans in my twenty years as a meditator. I know what it is now. I didn't at first.

So the perceptual process, the recognition of experience, is how we know what something is based on our memory. It's almost like a memory lookup. We experience something—a sound—and our mind kind of searches for the nearest match in our memory banks and says, "Oh, it's that."

The other day in the hall, somebody mentioned this: the hearing of a sound and the mind attributing it to a fan. "Why is there such a loud fan in here?" And then recognizing, "Oh, it's not a fan, it's the stream outside." This is perception at work—we recognize what's happening, we do this memory matching. Really useful process for our survival, and yet really prone to error. It's not perfect by any means, as the example of the fan and the stream shows.

A kind of classic example of perception and misperception is the snake and rope misperception. You walk into a dim room and there's a coiled rope in the corner. You might misperceive it as a snake. This is a function of perhaps the dim light—coiled forms might be snakes—but the mind perceives it potentially as snake. A whole host of responses can arise based on that. Fear, for instance. Emotional reaction to, "Oh, there's a snake in the corner."

I walked up to a crack in the sidewalk at Spirit Rock some years ago, and it turned into a rattlesnake. When I walked up to it, there was no fear. As soon as it coiled, there was fear.

So perception influences our responses to the world. And misperception happens all the time.

We have to recognize that perception is useful and a natural function of our minds that helps us navigate the world. But what we tend to do is reify our perceptions. We take our perceptions to be the truth. This is in the realm of what Bonnie was talking about—the vipalas, the misperceptions of reality.

It's like somebody who walks into a room and sees a coiled rope in the corner and perceives it as a snake. Usually that kind of misperception can be easily corrected by turning the lights on and seeing that it's actually a rope. But our minds get hardened around our perceptions. Perhaps we've gone in there and seen that coiled form and believe it's a snake. We walk out of the room without ever confirming what it actually is, and we reify: "There's snakes in that room." We go tell everybody else there's snakes in that room. The belief gets hardened. We have everybody else being afraid to go into the room. This is a silly example, but this kind of thing creates a lot of suffering in our world—perceiving something in some way, reifying it, believing it.

As we start to see this process, one of the easiest ways, at least in my own practice, to really explore perception is in the realm of hearing. It's the first place where I could clearly see the difference between the experience of hearing and the perception. This happens all the time. We're sitting in the hall and some sound happens. We hear something and our mind recognizes and identifies it. Our mind says "bird," or perhaps we see an image of a bird sitting in a tree. If you're a bird watcher, you might even identify the kind of bird based on the sound. That's perception at work. Based on the hearing, we know that sounds we've heard like that have come from birds, and so we perceive it as a bird. Now, it may be that somebody's got one of those little bird things making that sound. We may be misperceiving again. But we believe it to be what we perceive it to be.

As we begin to see this process, we recognize perception at work. We can have some measure of recognition that this is happening. "Bird. Think it's a bird." But recognizing that perception is so prone to error, we can begin to undermine the reification of believing our perceptions to be what's actually happening. What we're perceiving, in my understanding, is a reflection of what's out there. It is related to what's out there. But what we perceive is entirely constructed by our minds. All we can know is what has been constructed by our minds. We're not trying to stop perception from happening—we couldn't function without it. But we can recognize it as a function rather than reality. If we could all understand that we are perceiving the world in different ways, I think there would be a lot more peace in this world.

Then there are mental formations. Mental formations encompass the many mental activities involving volition, choice, attention, and intention. These include all of our emotions—anger, fear, confusion, pride, desire, irritation, rage—the entire emotional realm is within mental formations. All of the wholesome states of mind that we've been discussing—peace, mindfulness, concentration, tranquility—these are also mental formations. And thoughts are mental formations too. It's a huge category, encompassing most of what we observe in our minds. Intention, which we talked about seeing—that's a mental formation. Noticing attention—that's a mental formation. Recognizing beliefs, agendas, views—all of these are mental formations.

Those are mental formations. So it's a vast category, and we spend a lot of time exploring this in our mindfulness practice. We've talked a great deal about how to meet all of these through the instructions offered during the first few weeks of the retreat.

The Pali term for mental formation is sankhara, and it carries a dual meaning. It refers both to that which has been put together—the actual experience of anger or fear or confusion or joy or peace or mindfulness or intention—and to the process of putting together itself. When we see these experiences, we're seeing the result of what has been assembled. But sankhara also means "to put together," pointing to the active, dynamic nature of these formations.

This second meaning is particularly interesting. There's a teaching in the suttas that illuminates this verb-like, process-oriented aspect of mental formations. I'll paraphrase it here: Volitional formations condition the conditioned. What do they condition? They condition form as conditioned form. They condition feeling as conditioned feeling. They condition perception as conditioned perception. They condition mental formations as conditioned formations. They condition consciousness as conditioned consciousness.

Essentially, mental formation is the engine that conditions all of the aggregates. When we experience the volitional formation of anger, for instance, it conditions our body—we feel pressure and heat, our face may become distorted with contortions. Anger conditioning form. It conditions feeling—when we are angry, we tend to experience things as unpleasant. It conditions perception—when we're angry, we tend to see how someone has wronged us, shaping how we take in information. It conditions more anger—when we're angry, it breeds further anger in our minds. And it conditions consciousness—our awareness becomes filtered through anger, taking in certain things while missing others because of this frame we're looking through.

Understanding the conditioning nature of our mental formations is tremendously important. There's a powerful force here, especially in beliefs and views, to shape our experience—often in ways we don't see. So much suffering comes from unseen beliefs conditioning how we respond to the world. All the "isms"—racism, sexism, ageism—and the phobias around differences in gender and sexuality are rooted in belief.

Consider the pervasive view in American culture that this country is the land of opportunity, that anyone who tries hard enough can fulfill their dreams. That belief can lead to a kind of blindness, an inability to see how certain aspects of our society grant some groups access to privileges that make this belief more attainable for them than for others. So much suffering emerges from this conditioning power of the sankharas.

Yet we can also use this power skillfully. What we're doing here in practice is bringing in new conditions—mindfulness and wisdom—reconditioning our minds through this very capacity of mental formations to shape experience. So it's not wholly problematic, but we need to understand how it works so that our minds can head in a different direction.

Then the last of the five aggregates: consciousness, or knowing.

We've talked about this actually quite a bit. I think I spoke about it some last night, and this morning the guided meditation was pointing to this—the field of knowing, the process of knowing. Every experience comes with the experience and the knowing of it. And it's possible in our mindfulness to see either side of that experience.

Often we orient towards the object. We orient towards the sight, the sound, the smell, the taste, the touch, the emotion, the thought, the feeling. And yet with every one of those comes a knowing. We can begin to be curious about that. Some of the guided meditation this morning offered one way to step back into that field of knowing. We can begin to distinguish when the attention steps back into that field of knowing and when it's touching into the object. The mind has the capacity to do either one.

That question came up this morning too. In my own experience, it's often useful to just watch which the mind is doing. Neither one is right or wrong. The mind has the capacity to do both. Sometimes one may be more helpful for us than another. But if we try to say, "Oh, I want to rest in the field of knowing," and we try to find that experience, I've given myself headaches trying to do that when it wasn't just naturally there. We really need to honor where our minds are exploring in this moment. So it's not so much something to do. We can begin to recognize when we're aware of the knowing, when we're aware of the object.

There are a few ways we can explore this, and some of these tools have come up. We talked about using phrases like "seeing is known." We can notice seeing is happening, which orients us more towards the object of seeing. If we explore "seeing is known," it may begin to point us back to the knowing a little bit more. And again, distinguishing between physical seeing and mental knowing. Seeing is known. Hearing is known.

We can also recognize the knowing of mental experience. This was a little more challenging for me. But I found a way into this recognition—it was easiest when I was experiencing something unpleasant. Aversion. I was experiencing aversion, and at one point, while I was experiencing this intense aversion attack, my mind shifted to, "Oh, and aversion is known right now." When the mind made that shift to "aversion is known," it was clear to me that the mind was seeing it in a different way. Because when the mind was knowing aversion, the experience was unpleasant. When the mind was knowing that it knew aversion, the experience was neutral. Because the attention was in the knowing, which is neutral. Knowing has a very neutral feeling, which is partly why it's harder to see. Neutral is a harder experience to touch into.

An exploration of these aggregates begins to clarify the difference between body and mind. It helps us see how mind conditions body, how body conditions mind, how mind conditions mind. As we start to tease these processes apart, we begin to see how they interact. They are constantly going on. These aggregates are—we're not doing them. They are taking care of themselves. Whether we're asleep or awake, whether we're mindful or not, these aggregates are doing their thing. Perception is perceiving. Knowing is knowing. Feeling is feeling. Our volitional formations are forming. And they're interacting. We have volitional formations that influence our feelings and our body. Our body, when we have certain experiences in the body, it influences our reactions, our responses in the mind. So they're all interweaving.

And we can begin to see this conditioned process at work, unfolding on its own. Not me in charge of it. Thank goodness we don't have to be in charge of it.

It helps us to see this, to see this conditioned nature. It begins to undermine our belief that I'm doing it. It helps us to see there isn't somebody here actually controlling. Nobody's in charge.

Through this seeing, wisdom grows. The understanding of how our minds work grows. And that wisdom begins to release this clinging. It begins to release the delusions that form around these aggregates, the confusions.

And that wisdom is what allows us to be free.

CHAPTER 130

Qualities that Support Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this dharma talk from the March Insight Meditation 1-Month Retreat, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of how to establish right mindfulness according to the Buddha's teachings in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). She examines the crucial distinction between ordinary awareness and sammā sati (right mindfulness), noting that even the Pāli Canon references wrong mindfulness—awareness used in service of greed or aversion rather than liberation.

Fella systematically unpacks the sutta's foundational phrase: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, mindful, fully aware, free from desires and discontent for the world." Each element receives careful attention: "abiding" evokes a relaxed, homecoming quality related to the brahmavihāras; "observing the body as a body" points to knowing experience as impersonal phenomena rather than through our concepts and views; "ardent" brings wholehearted engagement; and "clearly comprehending" (sampajañña) includes understanding the arising, persisting, and passing away of experience—seeing impermanence directly.

The talk emphasizes that this quality of attention is inherently kind and allowing, creating a container where all human experience can be met with loving awareness. Fella addresses practical challenges like being overwhelmed by powerful emotions, offering skillful approaches for working with what arises. She clarifies that right mindfulness doesn't mean passive non-action, citing the Buddha's own interventions in worldly affairs motivated by compassion rather than reactivity. The teaching illuminates how this practice naturally frees the mind from suffering through understanding rather than force.

We're a little further downstream in our merging rivers. Still, it probably feels like separate streams to some extent, and that's okay. This is a natural process, much as the blending of two rivers is a natural process. It will happen. The nature of it is to blend, just as the nature of our coming together will be to find our community together.

Tonight I'd like to talk about mindfulness and explore it from the perspective of what the Buddha had to say, what the suttas have to say about how we establish mindfulness.

To start, I want to come at it from a more ordinary perspective, because in my sense of this quality of mindfulness, it is based on a very ordinary capacity of our minds. Just an ordinary capacity for us basically to know that we know, to be aware, to have a sense of presence or witnessing our experience. Other words that may evoke the sense of what we mean by mindfulness when we say "I'm mindful" or "be mindful": connected with experience, being with experience, feeling into experience. This is, I think, what we basically mean when we come at this word mindfulness.

And yet it's interesting, because the more I begin to touch into and really get the sense of right mindfulness—what the Buddha taught of right mindfulness—there seem to be some depths and nuances to this experience of mindfulness that go deeper and beyond these words.

I think it was really brilliant of the Buddha to recognize this very ordinary quality as being a really useful quality when cultivated from a particular perspective or with a particular intention. He recognized that this quality of mindfulness is just an ordinary capacity of our minds, just a part of how our minds function. It's not often talked about, but there are some references in the Pali Canon to wrong mindfulness. Mindfulness, in the Pali Canon at least, is pointed to as a more neutral quality that is informed by what we do with it, how we engage, what our intention is as we meet it, what our view is.

This is very much, to me, why right mindfulness is embedded in the Eightfold Path. It's informed by wise view, right view, right intention, and the ethical components of wise speech, action, and livelihood. It has this framing around it. I don't think the Buddha actually anywhere just said, "Be mindful." He did say "meditate" at times. But when he pointed to being mindful, he framed it with other qualities and other intentions. This is how we should establish mindfulness, he said. Very much he talked about establishing this quality of mindfulness.

The Satipatthana Sutta, the sutta on what is often translated as the four foundations of mindfulness, contains the main meditation instructions we have from the Pali Canon about mindfulness from the Buddha, about meditation practice and mindfulness practice. That term Satipatthana—the sati means mindfulness, and the patthana piece means something like foundation, or something to stand on, or it could mean establishing. Bhikkhu Analayo really points to this translation of "the establishing of mindfulness" as what this sutta is pointing us to. How do we establish mindfulness? Meaning, how do we create the conditions for this state of right mindfulness to become established in our minds, stable, steady in our minds? That establishment of mindfulness creates the conditions for understanding—understanding how we struggle, how we suffer, how we get caught. That understanding creates the conditions for the mind to begin to let go of the ways that it suffers.

Sometimes people ask what wrong mindfulness might be. If we look at our simple definition of mindfulness—this knowing what's happening while it's happening, or being aware, being present—we can imagine a thief being very aware as they go through a house, taking care not to wake up the residents while they are stealing from that house. Very aware of every step, every move, how much noise they're making. In a way, present. Knowing what's happening while it's happening. And yet the intention behind that awareness is greed, or aversion if there's some motivation of anger or hostility towards the residents of the house. The motivation behind that presence of mind is not to understand suffering and its causes, but to get something. This is a very different effect or impact on the mind with a different motivation for this quality of knowing what's happening while it's happening.

One of my main teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, sometimes says, "Awareness alone is not enough." I think this is the kind of definition of awareness he's pointing to here—this just being aware of what's happening in the present moment while it's happening. That's not enough, because we need a framing, we need an intention, we need a direction, we need a purpose for that mindfulness. If we are trying to head in the direction of freedom, we need an aim, we need a compass, we need a direction.

And so the Buddha points out that we need to cultivate this mindfulness from a particular perspective. One way to frame this very simply is that we need to know, recognize experience that's happening in the present moment as experience that's happening in the present moment.

That sounds like nothing. It sounds like, "Well, duh—isn't that what we're doing?" But actually, no. Usually we are not aware of experience in the present moment as, "Oh, this is the arising of frustration," or anger, or love, or confusion, or pain, or pleasant, or unpleasant. We're not simply aware of experience as, "This is what's arising in this moment." We are usually motivated to do something with it—often to get rid of the unpleasant, to hold on to the pleasant, to try to construct our experience to be the way we would like it to be. And so this perspective is not our usual perspective.

For instance, around reactive emotions—anger, confusion, frustration, hatred, pride, greed, this vast range of reactive relationships to the world—often we are not just aware, "Oh, what's happening right now is there's anger arising." We are usually turned toward, attending to, trying to figure out: "What do I need to do about what's happening in the world that's making me angry, so that I can fix it or change it? How can I get somebody else to do something differently?"

This is essentially a turning. We can say that mindfulness is a turning from attending to the outer world to attending to this human experience. And there's an interface there. It's not that we ignore that we're seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching. Not that we ignore that there's a content of a thought arising that has a particular feeling to it. But instead of following those sights, sounds, smells, instead of thinking about that thought, we turn and explore: What's it like to be smelling right now? What's it like to be seeing right now? What's it like to be feeling that feeling right now? What is it like to be a human being having this experience? That's a really simple way to look at this perspective that will support us to establish right mindfulness.

I want to say here—because it's easy for this understanding or teaching of turning towards inner experience and not emphasizing the outer experience, it's easy to think that means we're not supposed to act. That if something is happening in the world, all I'm supposed to do is notice how I feel about it and not do anything. And yet, there are many examples in the suttas of the Buddha acting in the face of injustice. Acting when the place where he lived, the kingdom where he lived and the neighboring kingdom, were going to have a water war. He went and stood out in the middle of the battlefield to try to stop that war. So taking action, but not from greed or aversion—rather from understanding that these actions out there in the world are creating so much pain, so much suffering, and being motivated from compassion and wisdom to act. That's my understanding, and so I just want to say that right at the very beginning, because it's so easy to misunderstand what the Buddha was pointing to here.

The Satipatthana Sutta offers a phrase that basically summarizes this establishment of mindfulness. The Buddha repeats it four times, once for each of the four foundations. He says: How does one establish mindfulness? And with each one it's: How does one establish mindfulness of the body? How does one establish mindfulness of feelings, mindfulness of the mind, mindfulness of dhammas? He says, "One abides observing the body as a body, feelings as feelings, mind states as mind states, dhammas as dhammas"—and here dhammas we can understand as basically meaning phenomena, phenomena as phenomena. "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, mindful, fully aware, free from desires and discontent for the world."

This sentence, this phrase, offers us a number of different perspectives, different qualities that will support this establishment of mindfulness that frees the mind, that creates the conditions for wisdom, understanding, release, and peace to result. And so I wanted to explore the words of this phrase and see what they evoke for us.

The first part of the phrase: "one abides observing." Abide. How does that word land? Abide. If I just drop that word right now—just abide in your experience. The word "abide" is related to "abode," which means home. So to me it evokes a quality of coming home, resting, maybe relaxing, because when we're at home often we can relax. Dwelling, which has a sense of stability. Maybe even contentment.

I love that word. I love that it is a translation of the Pali word there, which is related to vihara, as in brahma vihara—divine abode. The mettā, karunā, muditā, upekkhā: loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity, those qualities that we'll be exploring in some of the afternoon sessions. So this abiding, maybe also resonating with those qualities of love.

And then "observing"—we know what observing means: to look at, to see.

The commentaries point to really connecting, repeatedly being with, a kind of being with experience. So it's perhaps a little more around continuity, but it's also around knowing what we are aware of. It's a connecting to what's present in our experience. Observing means knowing what's in the present moment.

These two together—one abides observing, abides observing the breath, abides observing the body as a body (that's the phrase that comes next)—this brings to me a sense of relaxed, receptive attention. Because "abides" has that relaxed quality, and yet it's also got this knowing what's there. So it's not just, "Oh yeah, I'm relaxed." It's not "the dude abides" here. That's not what we're talking about. There's this connection with what is happening in the present moment.

With each of the foundations, the Buddha points to observing the body as a body, feelings as feelings. Today I'm just going to explore "the body as a body," to give you a sense of perhaps what is being pointed to in this phrase.

My understanding of "observe the body as a body" is that the body is what we're exploring in this foundation. We're exploring physical contact, sight, sound, smells, touch also incorporated, included in body awareness. We're aware of the body, aware of the elements—the pressure, the hardness, the pulsing, the tingling. So we have this connection, we know, we're aware of the body.

And the encouragement: how are we aware of the body? We're aware of it as a body. Now this is pointing to what I talked about earlier—that we know present moment experience as present moment experience. This repetition of the phrase, "we recognize the body as a body"—not as my body, but a human body—brings in a little bit of wisdom here. We explore our experience of the body, and it brings in a kind of impersonal quality, the impersonal nature of the body. We know the body is simply a body. Not as me, as my body. Not through any identities around bodies that we might hold. Not through any views, opinions, or ideas we might have about the body. Just the actual experience of the body.

I think a lot of us carry some perspective around the body. We like certain parts of our body; we don't like other parts of our body, perhaps. But if we touch into and actually feel... so if there's some part of your body that you particularly like, that you like looking at, or that you think is something special—if you feel into that area right now, what the actual experience of that part of the body is, does it have anything really to like or not like about it?

Now, sometimes there may be painful experience or pleasant experience, and that's a different layer of liking and not liking. Often we like pleasant, don't like unpleasant—a layer of reactivity to pleasant and unpleasant. But if we just have some concept around a certain part of our body, like the way our nose looks... We like the way our nose looks. We don't like the way our chin looks, looking in the mirror. But when I feel into my nose, there's nothing to look at there. It's just the feeling. And the chin too—there's just sensation. Nothing to like or not like about it. It's just experience.

So this pointing of "abide observing the body as a body" begins to direct us underneath our concepts, our opinions, our views of our body. It encourages us into that direct experience—knowing the experience as experience. To me it also points to a quality we often associate with mindfulness. We often say that mindfulness is a non-judgmental awareness. I think this aspect of knowing the body as a body brings a little bit of that in. It's encouraging a non-interfering awareness—just what's here, what's the actual experience.

I think it also points to a kind of allowing attitude towards our experience. At least for me, it begins to head in that direction. If I'm not all caught up in my views and opinions and ideas about what I'm experiencing, or about my body, this image, this body image—if I'm not caught up in that, and it's just the experience—there's a kind of, "Oh, this is just... this can be allowed. This experience is allowed."

This is an important aspect of my understanding of mindfulness: this allowing attitude towards our experience. It's an expression of kindness to ourselves.

We could call this kind of awareness kind attention, loving attention, loving awareness—bringing the brahmaviharas right together with mindfulness. They don't have to be so separate.

And also it's a pointer to allowing and opening to all aspects of our human experience, this whole framing of seeing our experience as this. What's arising in this moment is what's arising in this moment. No part left out. Nothing excluded. Nothing that mindfulness cannot meet. And nothing right or wrong around what's arising. It's just this is what's arising. This too can be known. This too can be felt into with this loving awareness, this allowing.

Sometimes I think about the word love in my own understanding, of where my mind was coming from before I really met the practice and began to understand connectedness at a deeper level. I think a lot of us, when we want love, we want to be seen by somebody. We want to be witnessed by somebody. We want to be accepted for just who we are. And we want to belong. We want to feel like we belong.

What this kind of attention towards our experience begins to do for us is to see ourselves more completely than anybody else possibly could. To allow and accept ourselves more fully than anybody else ever could—because they can't even see all the way down the way we can in our own minds. See the depths of how a particular pattern is structured from so much conditioning. And in a way, it feels like we begin to belong to ourselves. A very deep sense of belonging can come from this kind of attention.

So it's not always possible to say to ourselves, "Oh, this really painful memory and complex of emotions that have come up, dragged up from the nether reaches of our consciousness—oh, I'll just allow that." That's not always possible. It doesn't feel like it's possible to just allow it. There's often a lot of feelings of "Ooh, I don't want to see that," or "Oh, that's too much, it's overwhelming," or resistance to seeing some of what's underneath some of our habits and patterns.

And so, rather than trying to change the resistance into non-resistance, what we might explore is seeing if we can broaden the container a little bit and say, "Can it be okay that resistance is here?" Maybe that can be allowed too. That's human experience too. This thing came up and I don't want to see it right now. Okay, not wanting to see. Not wanting to see, not wanting to feel—this is what's happening right now. Fear about seeing it is what's happening right now. Confusion about this messiness is what's happening right now. And maybe if we take a step back and have a little bit bigger container, there might be room in which we can allow it all. So there's some kind of reactivity, some kind of reaction to that, maybe some resistance to that. That whole big mess—that's what's happening. Can the whole mess of it be allowed, just as human experience? And that's bringing in that loving attention right there.

And sometimes we may at times also have to just recognize that what is arising is so powerful, so deeply conditioned, that it's like a huge wave, a tsunami of experience that's meeting a little trickle of mindfulness. And so the mindfulness is not quite able to really meet it without just being pulled into the whirlpool of it. I've had this happen in my experience many, many times.

And so at that point, what's loving and supportive for us is to see if we can find some way to—I call it change the channel—redirect the attention, pick something else. Just not repress it. Not say, "Hey, you can't be here." Sometimes I would have a conversation with myself and say, "Yeah, oh, I see you. Yeah, I see you're asking for attention. Wow, you are strong. Okay, I bow to you. You are so strong. And this is not the time. My mindfulness isn't strong enough yet. And so you can stay in the room with me."

But I'm going to put my attention on my feet right now. I'm going to take a walk right now. I'm going to go look at trees right now. Something to let the mind, help the mind come back into some balance after it's gotten swamped.

And these swamps, these waves, will arise. We all have our own particular versions of waves that will overwhelm us, and they will come. Sometimes they come as the mind settles, as the mindfulness gets stronger and the mind settles into deeper terrain. Sometimes these waves can come then, and so it's not a problem. It's not anything wrong. It's just what's arising. It's this human being experiencing overwhelm right now. And can that be held with some compassion, love, care?

So abide observing the body as a body. Relaxed, yet receptive. Attentive, allowing experience to be as it is. To me, this is the first part of this phrase.

The next word is ardent. To me, this brings in a quality of engagement. Ardency has a kind of heart quality to it. It's got an energetic quality, that word. It means some kind of connectedness—alert, diligent, engaged, wholehearted, heartfelt connection to experience. Those are the resonances for me with that word ardent.

So it brings in a kind of commitment, our intention, our commitment to the practice. It also brings in this sense of persistence—staying with the practice, this gentle staying, staying with. It brings in continuity to me. This is a piece of what's being pointed to here. To establish mindfulness, we need to be attentive to our experience in a persistent way.

This area of persistence, I think, is where we can tend to grab on. "I'm going to pay attention to that breath. I'm going to be with this." And yet what's important is for us to recognize that we can only be present for a moment. And that's how much effort we need to make. How much effort does it take right now for you to be aware of the sensations of your hands? Contact of your feet on the ground? Contact of your hips against the chair, cushion, or bench? Usually it doesn't take a lot of work. Often when I name those, it's like, "Oh yeah, there's some sensation there." And so in a moment, for a moment, it doesn't take a lot of effort to connect.

What's your breath right now? In-breath or out-breath? Can you know that? It's not so hard for a half a breath to know that.

What is more challenging for us is to remember to keep doing it. And that's where we tend to grab. We sit down at the beginning of a sitting and think, "I'm going to stay present for the whole forty-five minutes." It's like we pick up the whole forty-five minutes at the first second of the sitting and bring all the effort we need to stay present for forty-five minutes in that first second. But all we can do is be present for that first second, that first half a second, that first quarter of a second—this moment. Be present for this. And then do it again. That light touch of effort. Just that little bit of effort. And then do it again. And again. And again. And again.

Hearing "again and again and again and again," sometimes our minds wilt. It's like, "Oh right, I have to do it again and again for forty-five minutes. I can't do that." But we can only do this moment. And so that sense of just a light touch, just this moment, just this moment.

So our ardency, our persistence, has a kind of really delicate flavor to it.

The next words: "fully aware, clearly comprehending." In this context, there are multiple uses of the word clear comprehension. One of the most familiar to us often is this teaching in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness—in the mindfulness of body—of comprehending bodily activities, daily activities. So there's a teaching where one knows, or one engages, clearly comprehending. When one is walking, one is fully aware that one is walking. When one is sitting or standing, one is fully aware that one is sitting or standing. That's the main way people know this phrase.

But there's another place where this phrase, "clearly comprehending"—sampajañña in the Pali—is defined as being that experiences are understood as they arise, persist, and pass away. That is clearly comprehending experience. An experience is seen to arise, then persisting or remaining present.

There are different levels at which we see experience remaining present. So sometimes it might be a sound that arises, and then it lingers. When we hit the bell, you know, you hit the bell and it lingers for a while—arise, persist, pass away. But then as you start hearing into the bell, you see that actually there's a rising and passing happening every single moment of that sound. And so we learn, we see more and more clearly just how little there is that's stable in our experience. There's nothing stable in our experience. Everything is arising and vanishing. Even as we see it arising, it's already vanishing.

So this is a pointing—again, this is a pointing to how do we pay attention? How do we pay attention to our experience? The Buddha is pointing us to attend to impermanence here. Noticing that experience changes. That to me is part of what this phrase means: notice that experience is impermanent.

The commentaries also point to bringing in understanding the purpose for which you're doing something—another meaning of "clearly comprehending"—that we know the why, the intention behind our actions. So that's another way to look at this, that we understand why we're engaged in what we're doing. Again, bringing in some wisdom.

The purpose that Buddha pointed to for our practice is freeing the mind from suffering. Understanding suffering, the first noble truth: there is suffering. The encouragement in terms of acting on that truth is not "there's suffering, figure out how to get rid of it," but rather, "oh, there's suffering—understand it." The understanding will allow the suffering to release through the understanding. So we don't do the release. There's a kind of wisdom that is developed as we just explore: What is this experience? What is this body experience? Can I allow it? Can the mind be with this? Noticing its impermanence.

You see something unpleasant arise. Our first movement... And this was actually shocking to me at one point. I was noticing painful experience in my body, and it was pretty painful. I was recognizing there was some aversion to it and noticing the aversion. Every now and then the aversion would fall away, and there was just pain—just a painful experience. And I noticed that the pain was kind of flashing in and out. It was sharp on and sharp off. Sharp on and sharp off. And as the mind was attending to that, noticing the impermanence of that pain, every off—there was space.

There was ease. And the aversion was essentially locking the pain on—creating the conditions for the mind only to see the pain when it was present. When the aversion fell away, there was more of a recognition: this is on-off, on-off, on-off. And that allowed the mind to be at ease with that coming and going experience.

So that ease didn't come because I decided to have ease. It came because of the understanding of both the impermanent nature of the pain, the fluctuating quality of it, but also the relationship of aversion to the increase in intensity of pain—and the uselessness of the aversion. In fact, the harm the aversion was doing to my mind.

"One abides, observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, mindful." I spoke about mindfulness before, so I won't revisit that here. The last phrase is: "free from desires and discontent for the world."

When I read this, I wondered: how do I do that part? How do I just sit down and say, "I'm going to be free from desires and discontent for the world"? That didn't seem possible. It wasn't like I could flip a switch and become equanimous. I felt like that's what I was doing—practicing so that this could unfold.

One way of understanding this phrase, as Bhikkhu Anālayo points out, is that the Pali verb has an active quality to it: "freeing oneself from." In his first book on Satipaṭṭhāna, he explained that his understanding of this phrase is that it describes an activity happening simultaneously with the practice of mindfulness—essentially the result of the practice. As we abide, observing the body as a body, ardent, mindful, fully aware, this frees us from desires and discontent. It's the process of freeing us. That's the activity happening. Freeing from desires and discontent for the world is something that comes along with the practice.

And yet there are times when we can consciously recognize certain desires—perhaps wanting to go get that cup of tea—and set them aside. We can recognize that following them might not be useful. So I'm not saying conscious setting aside is never possible. At times we can say, "That's coming up... I don't need to go there right now."

Another perspective on this phrase comes from a retreat I recently taught with my colleague Gil Fronsdal. We used this phrase as the subject for the entire week, doing a talk each evening on each word. You're getting the condensed version tonight.

When it was his night to discuss "freeing oneself from desires and discontent," Gil suggested that perhaps the operative part of the phrase was actually "for the world." The word loka sometimes refers to the world of our experience—both our internal world and the world out there. Gil pointed to how this might describe a shift from our habitual orientation of looking outward when something arises. Who's doing what? What can I fix out there? "That person is making me frustrated—they need to stop doing that thing in order for me to be okay."

Instead of attending to the situation or person that seems to be creating the response, we turn toward the human experience itself. Perhaps that's what this phrase refers to: stepping back from our habitual orientation toward figuring out what's happening out there, and turning toward this—looking at what this experience is, in connection with what's happening out there. It's not cutting ourselves off from what's happening externally. It's more like: that's happening out there. How does it affect this? What's happening here?

And so there's this kind of edge of our practice where it's not that we say, "Oh, that's happening out there, turn in here and ignore that." There's this edge of, "Oh, that's happening out there—what's happening here that's connected to that?" How is this being impacted, affected by the world? That's another way to look at this.

One abides. Abide. Sometimes I can just stop there. Abide. Kind of as a shorthand. Abide. Observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, freeing oneself, setting aside desires and discontent for the world. This sentence is enough to practice with. And so this phrase offers us the direction towards establishing right mindfulness.

I want to say something about the use of "right" and "wrong" here—right mindfulness and wrong mindfulness. I understand right and wrong here, and the Pali is most accurately translated as right and wrong, though sometimes we say "wise and unwise," which seems more palatable for us. But in English we tend to give right and wrong an ethical dimension, like good and bad.

Let's think about another use of right and wrong—one that's simply in terms of directions. If somebody's giving you directions from point A to point B, and they've said turn right, turn left, turn right, turn left, and you turn right, turn right—you've made a wrong turn. There's nothing ethical about that. It's just not the direction you needed.

And so I think of wrong and right here as being based on the direction we are headed. What will help us get there is the right direction. The Buddha's saying go right, go left, go right, go left—whatever he's talking about—to get in that direction. And there are certain ways of being in this world that the Buddha said aren't going to get you there. In fact, they're going to take you into suffering. If you are acting from greed, aversion, and delusion, then greed, aversion, and delusion will be cultivated in your own experience. It will be cultivated in relationship to other people. When we are angry and put anger into the world, it tends to create anger in others, and then it rebounds. From the perspective of wanting to be free from anger, a different direction is useful. And so that's my understanding of why right and wrong.

Why is right mindfulness useful? I've talked about it, but I want to restate it. The way I understand this is that right mindfulness gives our minds an education about what leads to suffering, distress, unease, struggle—and what leads to happiness, ease, peace. As we explore that, our minds get more and more clear about this direction we're headed. It's a very natural feedback loop.

My sense is that as human beings we are pretty much designed to want to head towards well-being. And yet our minds have got many layers of confusion and delusion that are clouding the direction, clouding the clarity of what leads to happiness and what leads to suffering. Right mindfulness begins to clear that path, clear those clouds, that fog of delusion, and helps us to understand: oh yes, that leads to suffering. As the mind begins to understand what leads to suffering, because our system wants to head toward well-being, the mind begins to understand and reorient in a new direction.

My colleague Gil Fronsdal says that wise mindfulness helps us connect with a biological imperative towards freedom—that essentially our system wants to move in the direction of well-being. And yet we find ourselves caught over and over again doing the things that keep us away from it, because we're not in a situation of letting our mind fully understand itself. As we come into wise mindfulness, right mindfulness, our minds begin to fully understand themselves and will begin to reorient in the direction of peace, of freedom.

So let's just sit for a moment. Abide. Abide. Observing experience as experience. Ardent. Fully aware.

And mindful. Setting aside desires and discontent for the world.

CHAPTER 131

Exploring the Edges of the Wandering Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h03

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound reframing of the wandering mind—not as a problem to overcome, but as a doorway to understanding mindfulness itself. She explores the pattern we all share: the coming and going of awareness throughout each day. Rather than judging ourselves when attention drifts, she invites curiosity about these very moments of transition.
> Fella makes an important distinction between attention (vitakka) and mindfulness (sati), clarifying a common confusion in practice. Attention naturally picks out objects from our field of experience, while mindfulness is the quality of knowing that we know. She emphasizes that mindfulness is a saṅkhāra—a conditioned mental formation—arising and passing based on conditions, not subject to our control. This points directly to the truth of anattā (not-self): "If mindfulness were self, it would be possible to say of mindfulness, may my mindfulness be thus."
> Practical guidance is offered for exploring both edges of the wandering mind: the moment of waking up (when mindfulness spontaneously returns) and the moment of slipping away (where attention gets caught). Fella describes how we habitually lose awareness in certain activities, places, and mental states like boredom, depression, or spaciousness. She also addresses the natural cycle of purity and purification as practice deepens, and how shifts to subtler experience can initially feel like regression. Throughout, she encourages a light, curious touch rather than effortful control—trusting that this investigation itself cultivates the very mindfulness we seek.

As we practice looking at our experience, noticing what's arising and exploring what we find, it can be useful at times to begin recognizing patterns that happen—things that occur over and over again—and to become curious about those patterns. What can we learn from them?

There's one pattern that we all share. I'm quite sure this is one we all experience all day long, over and over again: the wandering mind. Mindfulness gets lost into something or other, and then we wake up.

At some point I began to explore and get interested in this pattern itself, not necessarily its particular manifestations, but just this phenomenon of the wandering mind. I found that I could reframe it for myself—not as wandering mind, but as basically the coming and going of mindfulness. The investigation around the wandering mind is really an investigation around mindfulness itself. Being curious about this quality of mindfulness: What is it? What is the experience of mindfulness? How can we recognize it? Can that recognition support us in cultivating the quality of mindfulness? How can we encourage its continuity? It seems to me there's a lot we can learn in this particular investigation.

One of the most obvious things we can learn, if we're simply curious about this, is that we may begin to recognize patterns within that pattern of wandering mind. We may begin to recognize particular ways we get caught, becoming familiar with our own versions of where we tend to really struggle.

Another aspect we can begin to recognize in exploring mindfulness itself is that we may have certain beliefs about mindfulness, certain beliefs about the practice that are actually getting in our way.

We also start to see a connection to some very deep truths—the deep truth of not-self evident in this pattern of wandering mind. We sit down determined: I'm going to pay attention. I'm going to be present. And yet the mind wanders. Did you decide to make it wander? Probably not. That's a manifestation of the uncontrollability of the mind, the not-self nature of the mind.

Mindfulness itself is a conditioned pattern. It arises based on conditions; it ceases based on conditions. It is not I, it is not me, it is not mine. One paraphrase of a text from the Buddha says something along the lines of: mindfulness is not self. Mindfulness is a mental formation, and this quote is about mental formations, so I'll put mindfulness in there. Mindfulness is not self. If mindfulness were self, it would be possible to say of mindfulness, "May my mindfulness be thus. May my mindfulness not be thus." But mindfulness is not self, so it is not possible to say of mindfulness, "May my mindfulness be thus." You don't have that control.

There are ways we can encourage and cultivate the conditions for mindfulness, support its increase, but we can't choose how long it will stay necessarily. And when it disappears, when it vanishes—in some ways even more amazing—the mind is off wandering, fantasizing, arguing, reflecting, remembering, and suddenly we're back. Who did that?

This exploration around the wandering mind begins to really dive in pretty deeply. We can also begin to learn about mindfulness itself, the experience of mindfulness. What is it like to be mindful? We know at times—I think the emphasis in many forms of meditation is to be interested in the objects, in what the experience is when we're mindful. So often we're more oriented towards the qualities of the experience itself: the hardness, the softness, the pulsing of the body; color and form in sight; pitch and tone in hearing; the qualities of our mind states.

And this is one of the ways in which we can begin to cultivate a stability of mindfulness—to be attentive to experience itself. But in that, we may be missing a possibility to be curious about mindfulness. Mindfulness is a quality of the mind and can be recognized. And so this is the part of the exploration I'd like to offer this evening.

The other night in introducing Right Mindfulness, I gave some simple definitions such as being present, being aware, knowing what's happening while it's happening. But Right Mindfulness is oriented in a particular direction with a particular perspective that is especially interested in understanding suffering. It is interested in human experience as human experience—just the simplicity of "this is what's arising." We talked about that the other day, this mindfulness that brings in a kind of non-judgmental, non-reactive aspect, an allowing, receptive quality to this ability to know that we know.

There's an aspect of our minds, a functioning of our minds, that in my own experience early on in my practice—maybe even for the first ten years or so—there was some confusion around. I confused the quality or factor of attention with the quality of mindfulness. These two got mixed up for me. And so this is one piece I want to start with before we move into this exploration around the wandering mind: to point to this quality of attention in our minds and to talk a little bit about how it's different from mindfulness.

For myself, early in my practice, I used to think that if I wasn't consciously choosing to pay attention to an object, if I wasn't in control of where the attention was, it meant I wasn't being mindful. That's a fundamental misunderstanding.

The factor of attention—and we can see this in everyday life, we can recognize it—attention is a factor of mind that picks experience out of the multiplicity of things that could be known. It picks something to attend to. Attention lands on some particular experience. So the factor of attention is this selecting of experience out of the field of possible experiences. There are millions of things probably that could come into our attention, that could be connected with in a moment. And some aspect of our conditioning points us to some particular experience to pay attention to.

Now that choosing, that attending to something in this very pure definition of attention, does not have to be something we're consciously doing. And we can see this in daily life—how attention functions—and can see that attention and mindfulness are different.

A simple example: perhaps there was a time when you recognized that you walked down the hill to go to the dining hall and got halfway through putting food on your plate, and then realized you'd been completely lost in thought. Unaware really of the walking down the hill or putting food on your plate until that moment when mindfulness returned. In that moment of mindfulness returning and the recognition that the mind had been lost, we can see that something was paying attention. Some part of our mind was attending to the walk down the hill, or we would have just been running into other people and falling off the edge of the path. We wouldn't have been able to put food on our plate without having some attention. And so attention can be there without mindfulness. And attention can be there without our choosing it.

There's this factor of attention—the mind can aim at something. And that factor of attention is amenable to what we could call, in familiar terms, conscious choice. We can, with a sense of agency, choose to pay attention. We can sit down and choose to pay attention to the breath for a certain period of time. We can't be there for the entire sitting probably, but we can direct, aim, our attention to an experience. So that's the factor of attention where we are choosing to pay attention.

And this is where I think mindfulness and attention get a little confused, at least in my experience. Because of the instructions—"pick something to pay attention to"—I felt like if I wasn't picking that thing to pay attention to, then I wasn't being mindful.

But then as I began to practice more and really began to explore open awareness, I became more curious about settling back, not consciously choosing what to pay attention to, but allowing the conditions of experience to choose what to pay attention to. This is one way to describe open awareness. We settle back. We've described it in a familiar way: settle back and receive experience. You don't have to pick an experience; you can just settle back and notice what comes to you. In that coming to you, that is essentially conditions from our past, our conditioning, aiming our attention in some way. And we are consciously not choosing what to pay attention to.

Sometimes in the open awareness practice, where we are stepped back and receiving and not aiming at a particular anchor, one way to describe it would be following the attention. The attention will shift from object to object, and we might be able to stay connected to where that attention shifts.

I described this experience of following the attention to my teacher, Sayadaw U Tejaniya. And he got very excited and said, "Oh yes, yes, it's just like walking a dog! You have a dog on a leash, and that dog will go off here and smell this thing and that thing, and it's just jumping all over the place. But you've got it on the leash, so it's not going to go too far. That's your job—just to hold on to the leash."

So it's kind of like surfing or riding where the attention goes.

Although it doesn't always necessarily feel smooth—it doesn't always feel like a smooth shift from thing to thing. Sometimes it can feel more jumpy, as attention pops from thing to thing. And so mindfulness can be aware of this shifting attention. This is an aspect that comes into play as we begin to explore the wandering mind, because essentially, when the mind wanders, the attention has picked up on something. The attention has gotten interested in something. Conditions have directed the attention to something, and we haven't noticed that. Mindfulness hasn't noticed that. The mind wanders.

So this framing around attention is just a piece I wanted to start with. The first aspect of the wandering mind that I'd like to explore—and really the easiest place to explore—is one of the most familiar meditation experiences we have: that of recognizing we've been lost. That moment when, "Oh, I was thinking" or planning or judging. All of those recognitions that Brian pointed to around thinking this morning. Often when we wake up—not always by any means, but often—thinking has been one of the main ways the mind has wandered.

In that moment, we're often oriented towards it in a particular way. We often have a relationship to that moment. Does anybody recognize that sense of exasperation or frustration or disappointment that the mind had wandered?

One alternative way to explore that moment is this: first of all, mindfulness has to return before you can even notice that you've been thinking. So mindfulness returns. And sometimes we can just get curious about that. What is it like for mindfulness to come back? What is that experience when mindfulness returns? It's so common, so familiar, but mostly what happens there is either we're oriented towards the thing we've been aware of—whatever we'd wandered to—or we're judging ourselves. And that judging will block the possibility of being aware of the experience of mindfulness in that moment.

So this being curious about the moment of waking up—it's an amazing moment. It's completely effortless mindfulness. You did not have anything to do with it. It just happened.

As I began exploring that moment and the effortless quality of it, it really began to give me a flavor of what it's like, what it means to be aware in an effortless way. Not trying to hold on to mindfulness. In that moment it's like a free gift of a moment of mindfulness. And if we're curious about that moment, rather than judging ourselves for not having been mindful the moment before—and that moment's already gone anyway—if we're curious about this moment of mindfulness returning and that effortless quality there, what I've seen happening is that getting familiar with this experience of mindfulness returning, it's like it begins to point itself out when it happens. It happens a lot. Way more than you probably think. And we can begin to really appreciate that here on retreat in particular.

As we get familiar with that kind of waking up, that experience of waking up, and as mindfulness returns, there's sometimes a way—not always, but sometimes—that we can see a kind of contrast between this moment when mindfulness is present and a lingering sense or flavor or taste or memory of what it was like a moment before when mindfulness was not there. That contrast between non-mindfulness and mindfulness begins to highlight for us that experience of the mindfulness returning, that effortless mindfulness returning. You begin to get attuned to it. It's like mindfulness begins to get attuned to itself through this exploration.

As mindfulness gets attuned to itself, or as the mind begins to get more familiar with that quality of the mindfulness returning, the mind recognizes it more often. And you may start to recognize that while you're walking down that hill, largely lost in thought, there are these little bursts, little pop-ins of mindfulness.

But often what happens is when mindfulness pops in, when mindfulness kind of surfaces, it will often connect to some experience through some kind of attention to something. And as it connects to that thing, the habit there is often to start thinking about that thing. We see the worms on the road. We start thinking about the worms. We see other people walking down the hill and we start judging or thinking about what they're doing. So often when that moment of mindfulness returns or begins to come to the surface, it gets pulled back under because we get interested in the thing we have woken up to.

As we can be curious about that moment, it begins to...

It's almost like those little bubble-ups of mindfulness begin to... the mind begins to recognize them sooner as they start to emerge. And so we see more of them. We get more moments of that effortless mindfulness. Free mindfulness. You don't have to work for it. Such a relief.

We usually cultivate mindfulness through something called prompted mindfulness, where when we are mindful, we basically remind ourselves to be mindful. And that's how a lot of our meditation works. We're mindful and we recognize, "Okay, be aware. Connect to this next breath, the in-breath. Can I do it the next breath?" We talked about that kind of "do it again." And again, this light touch—half a breath, this experience, this experience. That's prompting mindfulness because we are mindful and we're reminding ourselves, essentially reminding ourselves to be mindful.

The only way that's going to work is when mindfulness is already present. And so we have to have these spontaneous moments of mindfulness to even get the prompted mindfulness going. The more we can recognize these moments of spontaneous mindfulness, the more we have the opportunity to encourage that cultivation of mindfulness. And it is, at least in my experience, the recognition of that moment of mindfulness returning, the familiarizing with that, is a way of cultivating mindfulness too. Because again, we're getting more sensitive to it, and so we become aware of it more often.

For myself, as I did this exploration of noticing this—at one point on one three-month course at IMS, I kind of just set the intention to see if I could notice that moment of mindfulness returning. And so there was a lot of curiosity about that moment. How early can I see that moment happening? It's not something you can try to do, right? Because you're not in charge at that point. But sometimes we can set an intention and just be curious about it. And that curiosity may really support a reduction of judging mind around the waking up. It certainly did for me. It really cut through that tendency to think it was a problem that my mind had been wandering. Because every time the mind wandered, it was another opportunity—whenever the mind woke up—to experience that effortless mindfulness and be curious about it, to get to know that difference between being lost and being mindful.

And so in that moment when mindfulness returns, notice that you're aware in a very simple way. This is awareness. And what is obvious in that moment? There is this... the mindfulness is this knowing that we know, and the mindfulness knows something. So what is it that this mindfulness is already aware of as it's returning? Maybe it's the thought. Maybe it's interested in that quality of the brightening of the mind as mindfulness is returning. Maybe it's knowing a fear or a peace or an ease. What is there already in that moment of mindfulness returning? You are already mindful in that moment.

Often in these instructions, in the beginning when we're encouraging stabilizing the mind around the anchor of attention to cultivate some concentration, we often say, "When you notice that you've been thinking, note 'thinking' and then return to the breath." And in my beginning years, I thought that meant basically to come back to mindfulness, come back to directing the attention. And I had completely lost that I was already mindful. When mindfulness returns, we are already aware. What is there already in that moment when we know what's already present, what we're already aware of?

It may be that we are just curious about following the attention at that point, or we may choose to return to an anchor. But at that point we have some... because mindfulness is there and we can draw upon our wisdom, we can make a skillful choice. What's supportive in this moment?

And then we can explore from the other side of the wandering mind: Where does mindfulness get lost? This is sometimes a little more challenging because it's where the mindfulness is slipping out. And sometimes people feel, "Well, it's either here or it's gone, and I can't see it going." But actually we can. We can be curious about that. Sometimes we have to start being curious about that by basically noticing in retrospect when and where we got lost. But getting curious—again, I really want to encourage the sense of curiosity around this exploration.

Not a judgment. The mind is getting lost. And I'm also really wanting to encourage not a sense of doubling down to try to hold the attention to something. Because there's a lot to be learned by seeing, exploring the possibility of mindfulness kind of following where the mind is going as it slips out, as it gets lost. There's a lot that we can learn about that, and about the mind there. We can learn a lot about our minds.

So this exploration of where mindfulness gets lost—what I'm not encouraging here is to try to hold to some object, but rather to be curious. When you recognize certain patterns, when you notice where your mind gets lost, be curious in those times to see what happens there. How does it happen? What is being missed?

As I think I said earlier, when the mind wanders, there's something that the attention has picked up on that we have not seen. And that's where the mind slips out. Sometimes that thing the attention picks up on that we've not seen is some old habit that's just got so much momentum that that's why the mind wanders. But as the practice deepens, there are a lot of new experiences, subtle experiences, deepenings of the practice where the mind is slipping out partly because mindfulness is beginning to orient towards subtler experience. And we may not be quite able to recognize it.

I'll try to describe some of this, but I'll just go through a few places, a few ways we might lose awareness, simply to encourage some curiosity in these areas.

You might notice after the fact, for instance, that you're losing awareness in particular activities that you do, maybe places that you go. So check it out. Do you tend to lose your awareness when you go to the dining hall? Do you tend to lose your awareness while you're in the meal line and then get it back when you put your plate down on the table? Do you tend to lose mindfulness when you go into your room, close that door—yeah, whew, nobody looking, you don't have to be mindful now? Do you lose mindfulness when you go to the bathroom, or when you do your yogi job, or when you take a walk for exercise as opposed to doing formal practice? What are the activities in which you tend to lose mindfulness?

And you don't have to stop doing those things. I don't want you to stop going to the bathroom. I don't want you to stop going to your room or going to the dining hall. But be curious about what happens there. You go into those rooms—what happens?

It's likely that as you go through the day, you can be curious about this: Where are the holes in mindfulness? Where are the gaps? And then as you notice where the gaps are—if you notice that you tend to lose mindfulness when you go into your room or when you go into the dining hall—you can be curious. As you're approaching your room or approaching the dining hall, again, not doubling down or trying to hold to the mindfulness there, but curious: What happens? Maybe I'll be able to see it this time. Approaching the door, I'm mindful as I open the door. Okay, I'm here, I'm mindful, walking in the door. And then, three minutes later—what happened? I missed something.

And not to beat yourself up about that, not to judge yourself about that. This is normal. This is how we can learn about where our minds get caught. So just the next time you go into your room, be curious what happens.

Often with something like that it's some task. Tasks that we have to do are often places where the mind gets lost. We think of something that we have to do, and mindfulness gets lost. Now it's not necessary for mindfulness to get lost as we think of a task and start to do it. But it's kind of a habitual pattern. And so there's curiosity there, curiosity about that.

We can perhaps begin to learn something about intention here, because at least in my experience, in losing mindfulness in activities or things that I'm doing, it's often some intention to do something that is missed. The intention to look in the mirror when I'm washing my hands—missing that intention. At one point I was investigating and exploring, and I woke up over and over again staring at myself in the mirror, not seeing how that had happened. And it was simply not seeing the intention to look up.

It wasn't like some deep childhood thing of needing to be seen. It was just an intention, a habit almost, of looking at myself in the mirror. That's all it was. But in that habit there was a loss of mindfulness. So just curiosity about these different activities where you might lose mindfulness.

We might also lose mindfulness in states of mind, in familiar habits or patterns. I'm not going to be able to cover all the different ways I have in my notes here—I can see I'm not going to get through all of the different things I have for where we might lose awareness, so I'll just pick a few of them.

Losing awareness in states of mind. These will tend to be ones that we are habitually hooked to. And so again, we might notice in retrospect, waking up. When we notice the waking up, the moment of waking up, we may notice—as we recognize particular patterns of thinking, for example, planning or judging or remembering—those might point to states of mind that are associated with them. Anxiety or curiosity or fear or something that is happening. So when we wake up into those thoughts, sometimes in the moment of waking up, whatever we wake up into may be a state of mind that we habitually get lost in. And we may begin to recognize this for ourselves. Begin to recognize that we habitually get lost in boredom, or depression, or anger, or confusion. That these are states in which we tend to spiral into the quicksand and lose mindfulness.

And so in the returning, in the mindfulness waking up, the moment when mindfulness returns into something like boredom, something like depression—again, that's a pointing to, that's a moment of mindfulness of something where you habitually aren't mindful.

Another state of mind that we might habitually not be mindful in or get lost in is sleepiness or spaciness. These states that we basically attribute non-mindfulness to. We think perhaps that a spaced out mind is inherently non-mindful, or that a sleepy mind is inherently non-mindful. And that's simply not true. It is a state in which we are habitually not mindful. But it is possible to be mindful of spacing out. And the moment of waking up, the moment when the mind returns—this can become a doorway.

One day I was observing this happen over and over again. I was trying to be mindful of eating and kept noticing the mind spacing out. What I was doing initially was just come back to the eating, just pay attention to that eating, almost trying to double down and force myself to be with the eating because I thought, well, spacing out means not mindful. But at some point it happened enough, and in the moment of waking up there can be a sense of the quality of the mind in that spacing out. I got curious about that and got a little flavor of that mind. A sense of a floating mind. A mind that has stepped back from sense experience. And then at one point, I kind of saw the mind shift into that space, that floating space that was disconnected from sense experience. There wasn't a lot of sense experience, but the mind was completely aware of that state. Mindfulness of spacing out.

In that particular story, there's another kind of interesting learning I had with that experience. As I was exploring the mind losing awareness—noticing it get spaced out and coming back, spacing out, coming back, finally being able to watch it space out—wow, that was cool. Actually, it was really pleasant. It was so restful. The mind was completely relaxed and very mindful. And then the sense impressions came back and the mind was still very relaxed.

It was almost as if—the interpretation I gave to this, I can't really say this interpretation is true, but my sense was—that the mind was tired of having me drag it back to paying attention to the eating. It wanted to rest. And it was going to take its rest whether I let it or not. It took its rest. And after about thirty seconds of just hanging out there in that spacing out, it was like the mind said, "Oh, okay, yeah. Ready to be present again." And then there was the eating and knowing, the seeing and hearing, and it was effortless knowing.

This kind of exploration has been a real doorway for me towards less effortful practice.

Because I'm not trying to hold the mind still, but just being curious: Where does it go? Where does it slip out?

And again, in losing awareness in familiar states of mind—such as boredom or depression—you might begin to recognize that you tend to get lost in those states. Similar to noticing that you get lost in particular places or physical activities, you may recognize at certain points that boredom is here. And you may be able to recognize: "Oh, boredom. Yep, boredom. Mindful of boredom, aware of this, knowing it." The learning of "this is one I tend to get lost in" becomes significant. Something happens in boredom that the mind gets hooked in. So what is that? What happens there?

One exploration, if you start to begin to be present at the beginning of states of mind where you tend to get lost: you wake up into awareness of boredom as it begins to arise and you're knowing it, looking at other experience, and boredom is there. So you're not lost yet. In that early stage of boredom, before you get lost, there's a tool I find useful to help potentially expose some of the undercurrents where we might get caught. And that is to be curious about what kind of beliefs or views are happening. What's being believed right now? Just ask that question, drop that question in.

You don't have to try to figure out the answer. In fact, it's not helpful to try to figure out the answer. It's more just dropping that question in and seeing if it supports or evokes the recognition of some view or idea or opinion.

For myself around depression, for instance, I spent one long stretch of time in Burma looking at a low-grade depression that persisted over several weeks. It came and went, but I just noticed it and began at some point to recognize that the belief was that I thought it was a problem. Such a simple belief. But everything I had been doing—the investigation itself, the way I was paying attention to it—was all in the service of figuring out what was wrong, as opposed to simply: "Oh, this is depression. Not a problem. What's arising? Oh, it's passing. Okay. Oh, it's arising. It's passing. It's arising. It's passing."

When the mind began to recognize that view—"it's a problem"—the state itself became so fluid. Before I really noticed that I believed it was a problem, it was like that belief locked the depression into place, made it seem much more stable. As soon as I noticed that view, depression came and went and came and went and came and went. It was stunning how fast it happened.

So a way in which we can get hooked and lost in states of mind is because there's some view or belief operating that's not seen. That question can sometimes help us recognize a belief that's operating.

We also can lose awareness as our practice deepens. There are certain times in practice that this is part of what we have to learn to watch and be curious about. Sometimes we might notice that after a period when the mind seemed pretty stable, mindfulness pretty stable and continuous, suddenly it seems like—where did the mindfulness go? We sit down to meditate and the mind wanders. Or sometimes, after a period of stability, it seems like the hindrances just surge in.

One teacher, Michelle McDonald, described this pattern as a kind of practice cycle between purity and purification. Purity being where the mind is at ease, calm, seems like no problem, nothing wrong—just able to be with what's arising. The recognition of the absence of the hindrances, the recognition that reactivity isn't coming up around things we're used to reacting to. That place where the mind seems really stable, at ease and peace, wholesome qualities strengthening—and then suddenly we're flooded with hindrances.

This pattern happens to us over and over again. My understanding of it is that we see through certain kinds of clinging, and as we let go of certain habitual ways we've been reactive, it's like we've got layers and layers and layers of reactivity and clinging. We may let go of an outer layer—those really familiar ways we're reactive and hold on to things, those ways the hindrances come up. That layer may begin to weaken and drop away for stretches of time.

It can feel like we've really entered a new space, a new deepening of our practice. And as the mindfulness keeps going, it hits that next layer where there's yet more, deeper patterns of conditioning that can be revealed and seen. And so we cycle—purity, purification, purity, purification. This is not an uncommon thing to happen.

If you notice that after a period of a few days of real ease and peace, the mind has suddenly gotten very reactive, what I've seen in my own practice is instructive. In the early years of my practice, I spent a lot of time trying to figure out what I'd done wrong, beating myself up about the fact that I was now reactive again. I must have done something wrong to have lost that.

But what we can instead do, perhaps knowing this cycle—as I began to understand this cycle, that reactivity to the shift from purity to purification began to get much less. It's just like, "Oh, it's a new level of clinging here. Okay, curiosity about that." It's not easy to let go of that peace. But this is what's arising now, and it's not a mistake.

Another thing that can happen as the practice deepens is that the mindfulness is noticing experience—it's noticing the breath, for example—and it gets really familiar with particular qualities and sensations of the breath. It's like the object and the mindfulness are right in sync. Every breath, all of those sensations are right there, and you can just hang with that breath.

And then, because the mindfulness is strengthening and getting more continuous, my sense actually is that as the mindfulness gets more continuous, there's something—it's like it gets interested or drawn down to a subtler level of experience. There's some kind of orientation of the attention to subtler experience as the mindfulness gets more continuous. Only our agenda is to pay attention to this, because this is what we're familiar with—to pay attention to that familiar experience. And when there's a mismatch between what we think we should pay attention to and what the attention is naturally drawn to, the mind can get lost.

For myself in one sitting at IMS, there were a couple of days where the mindfulness just got right into the breath. I could sit down and the mind was with the breath for the whole sitting. It was effortless, it was easy. And then the next day—three days into this—next day I sit down, first sitting of the day, one breath and the mind's wandering. Another breath, the mind's wandering. It was like I had no control, no capacity to stay with the breath.

I had enough experience there not to beat myself up, but to begin to recognize—again, if you notice the mind starts to wander a lot after a period where there's been stability of mindfulness, it usually means there's a shift in the practice. Something new is being revealed. Something new is happening. And so I got curious: what's happening here? What new is happening?

What I began to recognize is that as I watched the breath, what I was familiar with—it was like as soon as I touched the breath, all the sensations disappeared. They were just vanishing, those sensations, and I didn't quite know how to meet that. At one point with one of my Burmese teachers, I described this and he said, "You just have to recognize there's no sensation." I was trying to find the sensations. He says, "Just know they're not there." Okay, I can do that.

Again, I was looking for something that I was familiar with to pay attention to, and he pointed me to the reduction of sensation, the disappearance of sensation.

Another experience that can happen as the practice deepens, that's useful to explore, is noticing when the mindfulness lets go of some experience. Maybe you're paying attention to hearing or there's something that the attention is connected with. This is noticing that the attention shifts to something else—really picking up on that shift of mindfulness moving to some other experience. Only this is not seeing that it's landing on something else. This is seeing the release from something that we're familiar with.

As an example, at one point, again doing breath meditation, I was paying attention to the breath and I began noticing that I could see the mindfulness weakening around the breath. It was like I could feel the mindfulness let go of the breath. At first, what I did with that was, "Oh, mindfulness is letting go. Just connect with the breath again." And then it would let go. It would just feel like this Kind of a releasing feeling, a release. The mindfulness would let go, and I'd come back to the breath. It would let go, I'd come back to the breath. Let go, come back to the breath.

And at some point, there was this wisdom that arose: "Well, it let go. I'm aware that it let go. Let's see where it's going."

That was an opening into a new kind of state I'd never consciously experienced before—a vast kind of space I had no name for. It felt like a new landscape.

Again, there's that kind of respect, especially as the practice deepens, for being with what the mind is doing. In this case, I had the agenda to hold attention to the breath. But there was something deeper acting, some deeper wisdom that was releasing from the breath and moving in the direction of that spacious, open awareness.

It takes trust to let go and not know where the attention will go. It almost feels like stepping off a cliff, to not know. There's a place for that trust at times. And we ultimately do have to trust that, because we don't know what freedom looks like. We have to allow freedom to be revealed—stepping into that unknown.

This exploration around the edges of the wandering mind, especially as the practice deepens and starts to shift into unfamiliar terrain—I look at that as practice for opening to freedom.

Let's sit for a minute.

One of the things about this kind of practice of watching where the attention goes: sometimes we can't quite do it. We can maybe set the intention for it, but the activity of trying to do it will get in the way. So just as you sit here, open to the possibility that you might notice these shifts of attention. But let go of any doing around it.

CHAPTER 132

The Cycle of Suffering: Paṭicca Samuppāda (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this comprehensive retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers an accessible exploration of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), the Buddha's profound teaching on how suffering comes to be. Rather than starting with the traditional first link of ignorance, she begins with the more immediately observable aspects of our experience—the six sense bases, contact, and vedanā (feeling tone)—before circling back to illuminate how ignorance and mental formations (saṅkhāra) shape our consciousness and perpetuate the cycle.
> Fella draws on the exchange between Ānanda and the Buddha, where despite Ānanda's claim that dependent origination appeared "as clear as clear," the Buddha cautioned that intellectual understanding differs from penetrative wisdom. She emphasizes that while conceptual knowledge of this teaching supports practice, it is the direct seeing of these processes at work that liberates the mind. The talk explores how feeling tone conditions craving (taṇhā), how craving leads to clinging (upādāna), and how the entire chain reinforces itself unless interrupted by mindfulness and wisdom.
> Particularly valuable is Fella's discussion of how mental formations include not only personal conditioning but collective cultural views—using the social construct of race as an example of how shared ignorance perpetuates suffering. Drawing from the Sammādiṭṭhi Sutta (MN 9), she offers the liberating insight that freedom is possible at every single link in the chain. Whether we notice craving, clinging, or the arising of self-identity, meeting any experience with mindful awareness opens a doorway to release.

As I was walking up the hill this evening, I was hearing the frogs and the crickets and seeing the clouds in the sky. There was a lot of happiness and contentment in that. Greg said the other day it seems like it would be better to just let the frogs give the Dharma talk. I feel that way this evening.

And yet the topic this evening is dependent origination. So buckle your seat belts.

This teaching is a very fundamental teaching in which the Buddha describes essentially how suffering comes to be—a very detailed description of the processes at work in our mind which lead to suffering. It's a really useful teaching. To me it's been so supportive to have this process just laid out, helping the mind to see things it might not notice or recognize. I'm in awe of the Buddha's mind that he could articulate these things so clearly. We are the recipients of his understanding and his ability to communicate that understanding.

In the time of the Buddha, Ānanda really appreciated this teaching. It is said he went to the Buddha and said, "It's wonderful, it's marvelous how profound this dependent origination is and how profound it appears. And yet to me it appears as clear as clear."

The Buddha, understanding and knowing that Ānanda was not fully awakened, responded, "Do not say that, Ānanda, do not say that." I think he was responding to the "clear as clear" part of what Ānanda said. "This dependent origination is profound and appears profound. It is through not understanding, not penetrating this teaching, that this generation has become like a tangled ball of string, unable to pass beyond states of woe, continuing to suffer."

To me, what the Buddha is pointing to here is that there may be an understanding at some level of the content of dependent origination, of the teaching itself. For me this is supportive—to have a sense of the framework that it lays out to help us understand how suffering comes to be. And yet intellectual understanding is different than penetrative understanding, which is essentially seeing this process at work in direct experience. The intellectual understanding may support us in being curious about experience, but it's the seeing of it happening that frees the mind.

It's a teaching that's simple at heart in that it basically points to the conditioned nature of experience. The simple version of this teaching is: When this is, that is. When this comes to be, that comes to be. When this isn't, that isn't. When this ceases, that ceases. And yet this explanation of how suffering arises dives in and points to how that process of conditioning creates the conditions for suffering to arise.

The teaching describes a pretty complex process in our minds that's often deeply under the surface, where it's not easy to see it at work. And yet hearing this teaching has been so helpful in my own practice, so I offer this evening in the hopes that some of it might be useful for your practice. I don't think of the teaching of dependent origination itself as a practice. Dependent origination describes the process by which suffering comes to be, and yet because it describes that, it may help us understand how we can practice to see this process unfolding.

The overarching understanding is basically this teaching describing the conditions that create suffering—a description of how suffering comes to be as a human pattern. The Buddha is describing something that applies to all of us. That to me is inspiring and helpful to recognize. The specifics of our suffering may seem very individual, but the pattern behind it we share. It's describing the human condition. It's not personal. For me it helps point to the impersonal nature of the arising of suffering—that it's just something that humans do when this being doesn't understand suffering, doesn't understand the cause of suffering, doesn't understand there's a possibility for suffering to release, doesn't understand that there's a way suffering can release.

This teaching can help us loosen the way we take our suffering personally, because we can see it's just following conditions, following habits and patterns that are common to all of us as human beings.

The other piece is that it points to the conditioned nature of suffering. There are twelve links in this teaching, this chain of dependent origination—twelve steps in this process by which suffering comes to be. This chain describes the conditioning for suffering to arise. It's important that we recognize it's describing conditions for suffering. And because it's describing conditions, it means that conditions can be changed. We are not locked into this process. The chain describes conditions that create the arising of suffering. Different conditions will lead us in a different direction.

And the main conditions that lead us in a different direction are hearing the Dharma and practicing in accordance with the Dharma—practicing with right view, right understanding, practicing the Eightfold Path, practicing mindfulness and wisdom. This changes the conditions and can take our experience in an entirely different direction, breaking into that cycle which habitually leads us to suffering and leading us to freedom instead.

So the links, just to start: ignorance conditions mental formations. Mental formations condition consciousness. Consciousness conditions our mind and body processes. Our mind and body processes condition the six sense bases. The six sense bases condition contact—contact with a sense door. Contact conditions feeling. Feeling tends to condition craving. Craving conditions clinging. Clinging conditions becoming. Becoming conditions birth. And birth conditions old age and death. As the Buddha often says at the end of this chain, "And thus the entire mass of suffering is created."

I'll go through each of these links of necessity fairly briefly, but there are a couple of pieces about the bigger picture here. Often this chain of the creation of suffering—beginning with ignorance, leading through our mind and body, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, old age, and death—is understood as a cycle where suffering at the end basically conditions further ignorance. We tend to stay caught in this cycle unless something new happens.

Greg pointed the other night to something new that can happen at the point of contact with suffering. If we hear the Dharma and engage with it, if faith arises in contact with that suffering, the condition of faith arises in dependence on suffering. When we hear the Dharma, when we connect with that understanding and have the inspiration to engage with it, it takes us in a completely different direction. And yet, much of the time we forget that. We have suffering and we feel like, "Oh, I'm struggling with this. What am I doing wrong? How can I fix this?" The whole process in which we engage when we meet suffering often takes us right back to ignorance, and the process just reinforces itself.

For this teaching this evening, I'm not going to start in the traditional place. The teaching starts with ignorance—ignorance leads to mental formations, leads to consciousness, leads to mind and body. All of those, in my own experience, were the last ones to really fall into place in terms of being able to understand them. So I'm going to start where it's a little easier to understand this cycle: with the fact that we have a body and a mind. We're conscious, and there's a body and mind here. Because of this body and mind, within it, we have these six sense bases: eyes, ears, nose, tongue, contact with the skin, and our minds.

Because we have these six sense bases and we're conscious, we experience contact with them. We experience seeing. There are sights. Sights contact the eye. Sounds contact the ear. Smells contact the nose. Thoughts, moods, and mind states contact the mind door—the sixth sense being the mind door. So the arising of sense experience includes the entire range of our experience, not just our physical senses.

We have these six sense bases, and because of that we experience contact with the world. Each of those contacts—every single contact, every sight, every sound, every smell, every taste, every touch, every arising in the mind—has a feeling tone associated with it. This aspect of our experience is vedanā, which Amana talked about the other night. Every sense contact has a feeling tone. It's either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

These feeling tones arise based on conditions. They're not inherent in the experience. They are conditioned based on many things: our own bodies, our own experience from the past, our ideas—a whole host of things will condition the feeling tone. A simple example of this: perhaps some of you like the taste of milk, especially following a cookie. The condition of drinking milk after having eaten a cookie—there's a pleasant feeling tone there. But now imagine having eaten a pickle and then having a drink of milk.

Even the idea of it, to me, is unpleasant. So the contact, the feeling, is not in the milk. There are conditions—in this body, choices that have been made—and the experience of that contact, of the taste on the tongue, will be different depending on the conditions.

And feeling tone, too, is simply feeling tone. It's not skillful or unskillful; it's just feeling. In fact, it is said that a fully enlightened being, an arahant, will experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. There's one teaching where it says an ordinary person experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral—and so does an arahant. What's the difference between them? I'll get to that later.

Based on feeling tone, there arises a habitual tendency, a habit of mind that's very human—again, not personal to any one of us individually, but almost built into being a human. We tend, when something is pleasant, to like it, want it, want to move towards it. When something's unpleasant, we don't like it; we want to push it away. We don't want that.

This may be built somewhat into our biology. Even single-celled creatures have this tendency to move towards things that will nourish their life and away from noxious chemicals—moving towards what could be called pleasant, away from unpleasant, for that single-celled creature. And yet in our system, this movement towards pleasant and away from unpleasant is not hardwired in us as human beings as it may be in some other beings. We have this capacity to look at our experience and notice, to make choices. There's an agency in our being; there can be choices made about how we engage with the world. So while there's a tendency to move immediately towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant, different choices can be made at times.

But generally, when we're not consciously aware of things being pleasant, we kind of automatically move towards them. This is the aspect of craving, this next link in the chain. It's like we're this simple machine that wants to maximize pleasant and minimize unpleasant. And habitually, we act out of that wanting.

What I'd say too is that our minds are a little bit short-sighted in that we act out of wanting to move towards pleasant and away from unpleasant at a range, at a sense of what's going to give me the next quick hit of something pleasant or get rid of something unpleasant. We might try to construct our lives to have these threads of getting pleasant and getting rid of unpleasant, and we might think that's as good as it gets. If I can construct my life to get what I want and get rid of what I don't want, that's as good as it would get.

And yet, as we begin to explore our minds and begin to recognize that that process actually just keeps us hooked to doing that—believing, thinking that that's what's going to do it for me, that if I get what I want I'll be happy—this whole process is based in that kind of belief that's embedded in wanting. Wanting itself has this view, this idea, this delusion embedded in it: that if I get that thing, I'll be happy. Aversion likewise has embedded in it this delusion: that if I get rid of that thing, I'll be happy.

And yet what we see as we drop more deeply is that the wanting itself has a kind of suffering in it already. It already has a tension and a tightness. The movement towards a different relationship with pleasant and unpleasant can create an understanding that there's a different kind of happiness that's possible.

This can be very interesting to explore in your experience when you notice wanting happening. Maybe explore a simple wanting—a wanting around wanting to get seconds, or go back for a second bit of dessert, or some special fruit that's offered. Maybe just notice that. Notice the wanting. Feel into the wanting.

Wanting, when we're caught by it, doesn't reveal to us, doesn't point out to us, how painful wanting itself is. Wanting itself actually is pretty unpleasant. It's already got this feeling that something's off or something's wrong in it. It's a feeling of lack. As soon as there's wanting that springs up, there's a feeling of lack.

And wanting, having this view that getting that thing is what's going to make me happy—caught by that view, that's its only option towards happiness, to get that thing. Wanting, when we're caught by wanting, is not going to tell us that if you hang out, wanting will go away and there will be no problem.

And so this release from wanting—this is one of the ways we can explore dependent origination: looking at these links, watching them, exploring them. Look at this experience of wanting. If you watch it, see it go away at some point.

I had an experience at one retreat where I was watching a repeated pattern of wanting. It was coming up regularly, a similar kind of pattern around wanting to look at people. And I watched it over and over again, and at some point I saw the wanting let go—just by watching it over and over again.

Actually, it let go the first time when, seeing through dependent origination essentially, I recognized that when the conditions leading to the wanting disappeared, the wanting disappeared. The condition was seeing somebody—somebody was in my field of vision, and that was a condition for wanting to look at them. When the person disappeared into the building, the condition for wanting to look at them disappeared. And the wanting disappeared. I never looked at them, but just saw that condition vanish. And the wanting vanished.

The release from that wanting felt like being released from a vice grip. The release, the ease that came with that, were way more in line with well-being than looking at a person to see who they were. Way more deeply satisfying—deep happiness, deep ease and peace from watching the wanting let go than from following through on the wanting.

Wanting tends to habitually lead to following through on that wanting—to look, to grasp, to fix, to change. We try to hold on to or cling to something that we want. We try to do something to get rid of something. The wanting, I'd say, is more the movement towards something pleasant, the movement away from something unpleasant. And the clinging is where we land on it. We either hold on to it to try to keep it, or in the case of aversion—as in my own experience—I notice many times being stuck to it, trying to push it away. Essentially clinging to it, trying to get rid of it. The mind clinging to it.

Once something is clung to, once there is that clinging, then essentially our system rallies. Once there's this sense of, "Oh, I've got this thing, and this thing is what's going to make me happy," it's like our system kind of mobilizes: What are the things I can do to make sure I keep this thing? Or what are the things I can do to make sure I can keep controlling the situation so that I don't have the unpleasant happening?

Thanissaro Bhikkhu points to this link as bhava, becoming. He says becoming is the intentions and actions that rally in the service of clinging. We've clung to something, and then whole views and ideas and intentions come into play: "Oh, I've got this thing. Okay, better make sure I keep it. How do I do that? How do I make sure I keep this thing? How do I make sure I'm not in contact with that unpleasant thing?"

This is becoming—this movement towards a goal. We know where we're headed. We know what we want to do. We like this feeling, actually. It's a pleasant feeling, this becoming. It's the sense that we know where we're going, we know it's going to make us happy, we've got our plan in mind, and we're headed there. That's becoming.

And from becoming follows birth into some kind of identity. Things may feel like they become mine; ownership happens. Or I feel somehow like I am the one who does things right. And suffering inevitably follows, because this sense of self, this sense of ownership—because of the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience—there's no way to maintain that. Things will fall apart.

In that falling apart, there's sometimes a sense of failure, sometimes a sense of loss. There can be grief, fear, confusion, anxiety—a whole host of relationships to the recognition that things fall apart. This is suffering.

And it will lead back to ignorance. We may believe, "I did something wrong that things fell apart," as opposed to recognizing that this is the nature of things—to fall apart. This is the way it is. That recognition might lead in the direction of truth. It leads in the direction of potentially faith and engagement, to recognize, "Oh, things fall apart. This is truth. It's not my fault that things fall apart. This is the way it is." And yet we don't often recognize that.

So an example of this part of the process from my own practice, from one of my first long retreats: I am hearing in the Dharma Hall about certain states of experiences that can happen in meditation. There's the contact, the hearing, and then from that there's this idea that's born in the mind of what that state might be. The description of these states, some of them, sounded pretty pleasant. And so the idea led to this notion that, oh, that would be really nice to have that, and this led to craving, wanting to experience the experiences that the teachers were talking about. There was clinging in there in that I felt like I needed to have these experiences. My happiness depended on having these experiences. And the becoming was the intentions that served that purpose of trying to have that experience—a lot of effort put towards having those experiences. That was the becoming.

And as I wasn't having those experiences, the birth, multiple times, was a feeling of not succeeding. The birth of being the one who can't do this. A feeling of being a failure. I'm not doing the practice right. Something must be wrong. I've not got the right teaching. I've not got the right teacher. If I had the right teacher, I'd get this right. All of this suffering. The birth itself was suffering. The birth itself was painful—the sense that I was doing something wrong.

So this happened a lot, this sense of not doing it right. I'm not getting these experiences. What am I doing wrong? How can I work harder? At some point I began looking at the suffering of that. I began being curious about it. And what I noticed actually was that I saw at some point that this pattern of suffering was born based on contact with an idea. And it wasn't the idea that I thought it was. Actually, I hadn't really clearly seen that there was this contact with this idea of a state. I knew that I was trying to get to these states, but I hadn't really clearly seen that contact and that feeling and that pull towards doing that.

But at some point I saw a thought arise in my mind, and that thought was: in an interview, telling my teacher that I'd had one of those experiences. And we were laughing and just so happy, and it was so great that this teacher saw that I was such a great yogi. This was a really pleasant thought. And I also saw it was really ludicrous—that what I really wanted was not the state, but to tell somebody I'd had the state. I had no idea what the state was because I hadn't experienced it. But that didn't mean I didn't want to be able to tell somebody I'd had it.

When I saw that, when that contact was seen, and just how silly it was, that pattern of suffering fell apart.

So that's a flavor of dependent origination, and yet there's a set of the links that we've not touched on yet, and those are the first ones. We've come from body and mind, from the six sense bases through to suffering, how that suffering is basically created based on feeling leading to craving. Basically, when feeling is not really clearly seen, the tendency will be to lead to craving, and that leads us on to suffering. And then the suffering reconditions or conditions ignorance.

As I mentioned earlier, that not understanding suffering, not seeing or not understanding that suffering is created by conditions and what those conditions are, will just tend to perpetuate the cycle. So the basic condition for suffering to lead to ignorance is that suffering is not understood. The First Noble Truth: there is suffering, and suffering should be understood. That actually is enough for a whole lifetime of practice. Suffering should be understood. You should understand how it's created. Suffering arises in dependence on craving.

So ignorance basically thinks that having what we want, getting rid of what we don't want, will lead to happiness. This ignorance is the ignorance that's embedded in wanting and aversion. When wanting arises, when aversion arises, ignorance is arising with it. So this first link of the chain really is the linchpin of the whole chain. Because when ignorance is arising, there is the belief in wanting. When ignorance is arising, wanting believes that getting what I want will bring me happiness. Having the pleasant will bring me happiness.

And so when there is ignorance in the mind and a feeling of pleasant arises, craving will follow. The work really is to understand this ignorance—these beliefs that I need certain things to make me happy, that I need to get rid of certain things to make me happy.

So with ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. Again, not understanding suffering, that lack of understanding is not simply a passive kind of experience. It's a very active process in our minds, this ignorance. When there is ignorance in our minds, it shapes us, it points us towards choosing certain ways to act, engaging in things based on our conditioned habits and patterns. We choose things, we decide things based on this misunderstanding about where happiness might come from—not understanding that wanting itself, aversion itself, is suffering. Not understanding the release, a deeper kind of happiness that's possible.

So with ignorance we're probably going to take the most obvious move to get the pleasant, get rid of the unpleasant. And we are reinforcing our habits and patterns. Mental formations essentially are these habits and patterns that keep this cycle going. Ignorance is this lack of understanding, and that creates or leads to choices based on that lack of understanding—choices to engage in the world in a certain way. We think we're trying to act to alleviate our suffering because we don't understand that we're actually reinforcing the very patterns, the very habits that keep us locked into this cycle.

Views, ideas, and opinions are also mental formations. And these mental formations that come about based on ignorance, they're not just coming about based on our own minds. We are embedded in a collective. We are embedded in relationships with people. We learn things from our families. We learn things from friends on the playground. We are embedded in our culture. A lot of what comes in as mental formations, a lot of what feeds our views comes from our own personal conditioning, but also from our culture.

Our culture also has this collective ignorance that creates collective mental formations. By collective mental formations, I mean mental formations that we teach each other—beliefs, ideas, views that we teach each other. And because so many people around us might share those views, beliefs, and ideas, we don't see them as beliefs or views. We just take them to be truth. This is ignorance. Taking a view to be truth is a fundamental kind of ignorance—not seeing a view as a perspective. And yet, because of the way our cultures work, because we tend to be surrounded by people who view things the same way we do, it's reinforced. These views get reinforced and it's hard to see them sometimes. It's hard to see them as views. The ignorance of the culture, of what we're taught, the mental formations—those reinforce themselves.

An example of this are mental formations related to the concept of race. Views, ideas, beliefs around something that is not—the concept of race, from what I understand with looking at our DNA, there is nothing in our genetics that has anything to do with what we call race, basically meaning color of skin. There's nothing. It's a concept.

It's purely a construct, a construct of our culture. And yet there are many, many mental formations—views, ideas, beliefs—around this concept. A concept, an idea in the mind glommed on with all these views and ideas and opinions—this creates suffering in the world. These things are no more than arisings in the mind, and yet they have a deep impact on the world. So much suffering in our world comes from this kind of ignorance and this kind of collective mental formation.

Not seeing it is a huge way that the suffering of racism, the suffering of so many kinds of discrimination, oppression, and privilege come from this kind of collective formation. We have the possibility through our practice to recognize and see through these deeply conditioned—not only internally, personally conditioned, but culturally conditioned—patterns that lead to suffering. Not only suffering in our being, but in our society.

come from the broader culture. With mental formations as condition, this shapes our consciousness. This is the next link.

Views, habits, patterns, choices, ideas condition what consciousness receives. What we end up experiencing, what we know, what we recognize, is filtered through these views and ideas. There's a quote, I think from Anaïs Nin: "We don't see things as they are, we see things as we are." And that is very true—those views, ideas, and beliefs shape what we actually meet.

For example, if we have a habitual pattern of responding with anger, then that habitual pattern might predispose us to look for things, to have things come into consciousness, to take things in that will make us angry. As an aversive person, as one with an aversive tendency, my mind has that kind of inclination. I began to notice at one point—my teacher said, "Just let your attention roam through your body. Just see what it lands on. What's the first thing? What comes into your consciousness? Don't choose. Just see. What does it land on?"

And I did that for a few minutes. He used the word "choiceless," I think. "Just don't choose. Let it be choiceless." When I had done it for a few minutes, I said, "Well, I wasn't choosing, but it surely couldn't have been completely choiceless, because every single thing my attention landed on was unpleasant."

What I began to understand over the course of my practice is that this tendency towards aversion predisposed me—it's like the mind was a search beacon for unpleasant. If I find the unpleasant things and get rid of them, that'll be okay. So it's like searching for the unpleasant in order to get rid of it. This is the conditioning power: mental formations condition what we take in, what we experience in consciousness.

And then consciousness conditions and shapes our mental and physical experience. How our consciousness is—perhaps predisposed towards anger—if consciousness is predisposed towards anger and anger is arising, that shapes our being. Our body, our face may become contracted or distorted with anger, an expression of anger. We may feel pressure and heat in our body. It has an effect on our body when consciousness is colored with one of these mental formations. This is mental formation coloring consciousness, and then that mental formation coloring consciousness affecting other mind and body processes.

It affects our body. It affects how we feel things. It tends to make things unpleasant. It affects how we perceive things, how we recognize things. And it tends to encourage more anger.

So now in this chain of dependent origination, we're back to where we started: we have a body and mind, there are things arising in body and mind, and there's contact. But we see now that this isn't like our eyes are cameras and our ears are microphones or receivers picking up sound. Our sense doors are already filtered, conditioned by ignorance, views, opinions. We don't simply receive things like a blank slate. We are receiving what we have been conditioned to receive. Our filters, our perspectives tend to reinforce our perspectives. And so the cycle reinforces itself.

What's the possibility of not being caught by this process? If we look at this as a chain of conditions describing how suffering is created, then perhaps if the conditions are changed, something else can happen. As I said earlier, the main condition that supports a different thing happening with this process is mindfulness and wisdom.

The teachings point to the link between feeling and craving as a very central place for mindfulness to support allowing this chain to fall apart. If we can bring curiosity and interest to feeling tone—because that's the link where feeling leads to craving. Craving in the second noble truth is understood to be the cause for suffering, but the Pali term actually makes it more translatable as something like "with the arising of craving is the arising of suffering"—the arising of craving is already suffering.

If the understanding of feeling can bring in some wisdom that helps to break through the ignorance around wanting and aversion, which is our habitual response to craving, then we can simply recognize, as the Satipatthana Sutta says: "When feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a pleasant feeling.'"

When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel an unpleasant feeling." When feeling a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling." Simple contact with feeling and understanding—this is what's arising. This kind of meeting of that experience is essentially, again, recognizing: oh, this is a human experience.

We talked about this really early in the retreat, in the beginning of the March retreat. We talked about recognizing experience as human experience and not necessarily as something to do something about, but just: oh, this is what's arising. When that can happen with feeling, it tends not to lead to craving. When feeling is felt as feeling and craving does not arise, clinging does not arise, becoming does not arise, birth into identity does not arise, and suffering does not arise.

This place of feeling is one of the places where the difference between the enlightened person, the arahant, and the ordinary person is described. That text I mentioned earlier asks: what is the difference? Someone who's awakened experiences pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Someone who is ordinary experiences pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. What's the difference between them?

The Buddha responded that when an ordinary person experiences a painful bodily feeling, they worry and grieve, lament, beat their breast, weep, and become distraught. They thus experience two kinds of feeling—a bodily one and a mental one. But the noble disciple, when touched by a painful feeling, will not worry nor grieve nor lament, will not beat their breast and weep, nor will they be distraught. It is one kind of feeling they experience—a bodily one, not a mental one.

We could say that a noble one, when touched by a painful bodily feeling, knows they're experiencing a painful bodily feeling. This kind of contact, this recognition, this meeting of feeling, can short-circuit that movement to craving, leading to release—a sense of the recognition of the non-arising of suffering.

Even seeing feeling at times, at least in my experience, sometimes I would notice: yep, that's unpleasant. Oh, I still don't want it. Still want to get rid of it. Sometimes we can know that things are unpleasant but still want to push it away. The momentum of the ignorance behind aversion and wanting can be stronger than our ability to meet that pleasant or unpleasant feeling.

And yet there's not hopeless for us. Because there's another—one of my most heart-connected teachings in the suttas—where the Buddha, or actually Shariputra in this case, points to something profound. For every single link in this chain of dependent origination, it says one can see that, one can understand. For instance, it says one can understand: if, in seeing the arising of clinging, one knows that clinging is there, one recognizes its arising, one sees the possibility of its ceasing, one understands how one practices to see its ceasing—right there, there can be freedom.

Every single link in this chain, no matter where you are in this process, whatever is arising, this teaching points to each as being a doorway to freedom. It's in the Majjhima Nikaya, called the Teaching on Right View, Majjhima 9. Every single link of the chain is pointed to as being a doorway to freedom.

It doesn't matter if we're experiencing hatred or self-hatred or rage or confusion or irritation—as we've been saying, it doesn't matter. With mindfulness and wisdom meeting anything, meeting whatever is arising, right there is the possibility for freedom. We don't have to somehow back up and find where the contact and unpleasant feeling was, or where the contact and pleasant feeling was that made me want this. Right here, if there's already wanting, we can see through the wanting. As in my description of seeing the wanting just release, the feeling of release there—that was a kind of freedom.

So seeing, understanding this process at work is helpful. Understanding how the process works, and anywhere we notice, anything we are noticing, wherever we're noticing in that cycle—freedom is possible. Our work is recognizing it as an arising. Clinging is arising. Sense of self is arising. Self-hatred is arising. Fear, confusion is arising. Freedom is possible in a moment.

And patience. Patience is necessary.

So let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 133

Perception and Papañca (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h00

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a detailed examination of perception (saññā) as a mental process and its relationship to papañca, the proliferating and objectifying tendency of the untrained mind. Drawing from the Buddha's teachings, she explains how perception functions as a useful shortcut for navigating the world—recognizing sounds, sights, and experiences based on memory and pattern-matching—yet becomes a source of delusion when we mistake these mental constructions for reality itself.

Fella explores the Buddha's analogy of perception as a mirage: like a desert mirage that reflects something real (the sky) but is mistaken for water, our perceptions reflect experience but are not the thing itself. She traces the progression from sense contact through feeling, perception, thinking, and finally papañca—variously translated as mental proliferation, objectification, or reification. This process, when unexamined, creates the division of experience into subject and object, self and other, leading not only to personal suffering but to the ideological conflicts and divisions that plague human society.

The talk includes the teaching story of the blind people and the elephant, illustrating how attachment to partial perceptions as complete truth leads to conflict. Fella emphasizes that the remedy lies not in eliminating perception—which is natural and necessary—but in recognizing it as a construction of mind. Through mindfulness practice, particularly in meditation with sounds, we can begin to witness the gap between bare sense contact and the mind's identification, loosening the grip of papañca and opening to direct experience free from reification.

It really is a privilege to have this opportunity to share the Dharma with you, to share in your unfolding of your practice.

Looking out at you, we're all here together. This is such a rare thing—that you would choose to do this, that eighty-some people come for this long to watch your minds. And I can share that happiness with you. There's not so many people that would understand why watching your mind is so good. So, thank you.

Last time I sat here in the evening, I offered a sharing on dependent origination. That teaching talks about conditioning—the conditioning of how our minds habitually are caught in the process that leads to suffering. The Buddha pointed to this process in different ways, offering different framings of how understanding conditioning can be useful for us in understanding our minds.

I'd like to explore one of those tonight too. It's also a process that talks about how we get caught by delusion. In the middle of this chain is a quality, a process of mind: the process of perception.

Perception is a natural functioning of mind. It's the process by which we recognize our experience. And yet when we don't understand it as a functioning of mind, when we don't understand it as something that's happening in our minds, it's very easy for delusion to come in and create a lot of misunderstanding. So I'll talk first a little bit about perception—how it works and how we might begin to explore it—and then about how it gets misunderstood and how confused this world becomes through that misunderstanding.

This process of perception is very simple in our minds. It's a natural process that helps us to navigate the world. I sit here and I look out and I see people, walls, tankas, lights, chairs, zafus, zabutons, candles, statues. All of that is the mind recognizing experience. This process of recognizing our experience is incredibly useful to us.

When we were first born, we didn't have much of this capacity to distinguish all of these things and have names for them. It's something we've learned. We've learned to give names to things, and this is a piece of the process of perception. Perception is actually broader than just naming things, broader than recognizing things through our language capacity, but this is one of the main ways I'll speak about it tonight.

It's very useful for us. If every time I came into a room like this I had to figure out, "Oh, those are people. Oh, those are lights. Oh, that's a wall—okay, don't walk into that"—if every time I walked into a new space all of that had to be figured out, it would be exhausting. We can think of perception, in some ways, as a shortcut that really helps us to navigate our lives.

In the Buddhist teaching, this process of perception is understood to be connected with memory. We begin to recognize experience because we've been taught: this is a person, this is a chair, this is a light. When we enter a space, our mind does a kind of search. It asks, "What is this?" and searches for the closest pattern match: "Oh, it must be that." Our minds do a really good job of this—a really, really good job.

As we go through the world, we contact the world through our senses, through our physical senses and the mind. Our eye sees sight, and there's that contact, and then from that contact there is this process of recognition that starts to happen. Shape and form. The eye sees color and form, and then the mind puts together what that color and form is.

Likewise with sound, smell, taste, touch—there's a kind of bare sense contact. When we bite into an orange, there's tartness and sweetness and the texture on the tongue of liquidity, and all of that together is understood as "orange" pretty quickly. And also because we've seen the orange. The senses play together to support perception.

But what's actually happening at the level of the sense door is different: bitterness, sweet, salty, sour at the tongue level; form and color at the eye.

And it's the mind that puts together what we recognize. We recognize it based on memory. Perception is a process that's very useful, and yet it is easily misinterpreted.

The Buddha offers a teaching by way of analogy that helps us recognize part of the way that perception can be misunderstood. He uses the analogy that perception is like a mirage.

Our usual understanding of a mirage is seeing something that's not there. But what a mirage actually is—and I'm pretty sure at the time of the Buddha they understood this—is something a bit different. The classic mirage is seeing water in a desert. What's happening there, apparently, is that with the heat rising from the sand, it creates a kind of reflective surface. And that reflection is basically reflecting the sky, so it looks like water. It's reflecting the sky, and it's also reflecting other things. I saw a picture—you can take pictures of mirages, which is very cool. There was a picture of a desert with mountains in the distance, and it looked like a body of water in front of those mountains, where the mountains were reflected in what looked like water, much as they would be if it were actual water.

So the reflection is happening because of the heat rising from the sand, and it's reflecting something that's there—it's reflecting the sky, reflecting the mountains. Because of our association with seeing that kind of reflection, that it means water, our minds perceive it to be water. It's reflecting something that's there, but it's not the thing.

This begins to point to the confusion that can happen around perception. When we perceive experience, all that we experience is our mind's reflection of it. Perception is like a reflection in the mind of the world. Our experience doesn't actually meet the world—it meets the perception. Perception is one of the bare bones of our experience. And because that perception is created by the mind, it's really easy for it to be distorted by views, beliefs, and interpretations, to be misunderstood for something that it's not.

This analogy points to the way our delusion takes that representation of reality to be reality. And we believe it is reality. It's really hard not to look out and see you and think I'm really seeing you. I know that all I know is constructed in the mind, but it's very difficult to recognize that. It's not just like a camera recording things here. It's not just like a microphone picking up sounds. We talked about this some the other night—how our views and ideas create a filter through which we see things. This also creates filters through which we perceive. We're not simply perceiving reality, and yet we think we are. This is a key place where delusion can enter into our mental processes.

It can be very helpful to explore perception, to begin to get familiar with this process. And we can. We can get familiar with perception at work as mindfulness gets stronger. We can begin to see that this is happening, that there's a difference between the contact with the sense door and how our mind recognizes something about it.

For me, in my own practice, the easiest place to do this has been in the terrain of sound, of hearing. As we listen, as we hear, there's that sound coming from outside that by now we all recognize as froggies. That's Greg's perception: froggies. But we can begin to notice, as mindfulness gets strengthened, that there's the sound, which is pitch and tone, and then there's something that goes on in the mind. It might be the word "frog" that comes up. Or it might be an image—if you've seen the frogs, it might be an image of a frog. I actually have not seen images of these frogs; I have no idea what they look like. But I've created something, a frog-like thing in my mind, and that's how it was perceived. Rather than my mind saying the word "frog," it created an image of a frog.

And so perception involves the hearing and then the identification of what is heard. That identification can happen as a form of thought—it's like a really rudimentary form of thought. And because it's a form of thought, it can happen like any other thought. It might come in as a visual image, it might come in as a word. I've even sometimes seen a perception as if I was reading the word: "Frog." So that's another way that perception can happen, or thoughts can happen—as if we're reading the sentences.

Sometimes thoughts can happen as a kind of kinesthetic sense. I used to be a dancer, and at times if I thought about my dance, I could feel it as if I was doing the dance. I didn't think about it in terms of words. I didn't think about it in terms of "this step and then that step." It was the feeling of doing it that was the thought. Thoughts can occur in many different ways.

For some people, maybe the perception of "frog" is connected to touching a frog. They touched a frog at one point and maybe that's what comes in. So this perceptual process, this rudimentary form of thought, can come in many different ways.

Sometimes, if it comes as a word, there's hearing something and then the mind labels: "golf cart" or "sneeze" or "rustling" or "chair squeaking." Your mind might recognize, perceive the sounds and name them. It can almost seem like labeling—if you've done any of the noting, the mental noting. Sometimes it can seem like this perceptual process, when we start to see it, is almost like labeling run amok.

But one thing I often say when I talk to people, if they say, "I just feel like I'm labeling everything"—I ask, "Well, is it something you're doing? Are you consciously trying to label 'frog' and 'chair'? Or is it just happening?" And many times people will say, "No, it's just happening. I'm not doing it."

Perception is not self. Perception is something that happens. It's a process that unfolds in our minds. And as I said before, it's a really useful process. It helps us navigate, helps us walk down the hill, helps us navigate our lives, helps us go through the lunch line, sit down and eat our food—this process of perception at work.

So we can begin to get curious about this process. And for me, as I said, hearing is one of the easiest ways to do it. When you're sitting in meditation, you may notice the sounds and then notice the mind identify them. That's perception at work. Noticing that identification, you can recognize, "Oh, perception. Perception's happening."

I would say that not recognizing perception happening is one of the leading causes of wandering mind. Because we're sitting here and we hear the turkey. And if we don't clearly notice that the mind has perceived "turkey," we may start thinking about turkey. And then start wondering how many of them there are out there. And then start thinking about that one we saw all by itself, running so fast—we've never seen a turkey run that fast. Oh, sitting.

So not noticing perception, very often, because it's so close to thinking—it's very easy if we don't notice that, or when we don't notice that, for it to slip into thinking.

Perception also affects other aspects of our experience. It's not the perception itself that has the impact, really, but it's all the associations that come with that perception that can affect us.

One day in meditation I was hearing this sound, and the mind flipped back and forth in terms of perception. This can be an interesting thing to notice. Sometimes if we don't quite know what something is, we can see our mind trying on different perceptions.

Oh, maybe it's that. Oh, maybe it's that. Well, in this case, what I was flipping between was thinking it was a bird or thinking it was a machine that was beeping. For a little while it would be, "Oh, it's a bird." Then, "No, it's too regular. Oh, it must be a machine." Then, "No, it sounds like a bird." This kind of flipping back and forth—I was never able to find out whether it was a bird or a machine. But one of the interesting things was that I could see there was a different impact it had on me when I thought it was a bird. "Oh, bird"—pleasant. "Oh, beeping machine"—unpleasant. The feeling tone of the experience was affected by the perception.

This happens a lot. The classic example of how perception affects us can really be highlighted when we do have a misperception—like that situation where I don't even know if it was a bird or a machine. Maybe it was something else entirely. But the classic example is walking into a room in dim light and seeing a coiled form in the corner and perceiving it to be a snake. That, of course, would create some emotional responses based on associations with snakes. And if somebody comes in and flips the light switch on and we see it's actually a rope, there's a very different response.

Another aspect of perception that I'll just mention, because at this point in the retreat this could be happening: our minds try to perceive whatever is going on. Whatever experience is happening—whatever sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, or whatever's arising in the mind—the process of perception tries to recognize it, tries to identify it in some way. And as we enter into unfamiliar states of meditation, our mind will still try to recognize them.

Sometimes our mind will attempt to recognize the experience—at least in my sense of what's happening. I don't really know what's going on, but I do have times when I'm experiencing something that maybe feels broad, vast, expansive, and an image comes into the mind like seeing the night sky or seeing an expanse of grass. Just the vastness of the mind—it's like the mind creates a perception of it through analogy. And so you might notice this at times. You might notice that sometimes while you're meditating, coming into or touching unfamiliar states of mind, the mind trying to make sense of that experience may perceive it, recognize it through an image that's kind of like an analogy.

At one point I was experiencing quite a bit of low energy, and the mind recognized the mind state with the thought, "The batteries are low." This was evocative of what the state was. So I just wanted to put that out there.

The texts—the Buddha, the teachings in the Pali Canon—offer teachings around perception that point to how it is tied up with deluding influences when we're not aware of what's happening. The analogy that I mentioned around the mirage is one of those teachings pointing to the deluding influence of perception.

There's a particular quality in the mind, a function of the mind, that has a very delusive capacity: the process of papañca. Some of the teachings on perception tie this teaching to papañca, pointing to a connection between perception and papañca when the mind is not clear. The texts don't really give a clear definition of papañca, but they do describe how it arises and a little bit about what happens to the mind when it arises. They also tie it to conflict in our world—they point to papañca being very intimately connected with conflict. This process of papañca.

So I'm going to read you a passage, or part of a passage, about papañca and perception. This is one little piece of it. In this passage it goes through each of the six sense bases and points to how perception works in the sense base and then how papañca leads forward. I'll just read this with respect to the eye and forms, but it is also repeated six times: with the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and tactile objects, and the mind and mind objects.

So this is just one way through this process: "Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises." This has a flavor very much like dependent origination, because it is conditions coming together that lead on to the next thing. Dependent on the eye and forms—forms being light striking the eye, bouncing off of objects in the world—eye consciousness arises. So basically that's seeing. "The meeting of the three—the meeting of the eye, forms, and eye consciousness—is contact." Something becomes seen. "With contact as condition, there is feeling"—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. "What one feels, that one perceives."

And so this adds in another piece that wasn't clearly called out in dependent origination. The understanding in the commentaries is that feeling and perception arise together. Feeling arises, perception arises right with it. We both feel it and perceive it at the same time.

What one perceives, that one thinks about. So we hear something—there is a feeling associated with that and a perception of turkey. And then there's a little bit of thinking about it. It's not just the bare perception. Maybe the perception was an image of turkey, and then we start: "Oh, that's a turkey. I wonder how many there are." There's just a thought about it.

What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates. This is the word for papañca that's translated here as "mental proliferation." In some ways, this mental proliferation has been talked about, and is still often talked about, in terms of proliferation of thought—that kind of description I gave before of, "Oh, I wonder how many turkeys there are. Maybe... hmm, I wonder about that one that got separated before." The mind just kind of goes off into thought. This is one understanding of what papañca is: the mind that's kind of run amok in thought, basically loss of mindfulness through lots of thinking. This is a very common way for perception to function in a mind that is not very mindful—we perceive something, we look at it, we recognize it, we think about it, and then we start thinking about how it relates to other things we've thought about and other views that we have, and we're off.

The rest of the section goes a little bit further into what happens to a mind that has papañca-ed: "With what one has mentally proliferated as the source, perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation beset one with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye."

This is, to me, a description of how when we think about something a lot, views are created, opinions are created, and then those views and opinions—which are born of this kind of mental proliferation—influence us, affect us. This is very much the same cycle that we saw in dependent origination, with ignorance conditioning mental formations and conditioning what we take in to consciousness. Here it's perception leading to views and opinions and ideas, and those views and opinions and ideas then affect how we take in information.

So that perception of... the sound, the beeping sound. If it's just beeping, maybe it's neutral. Maybe the first thing that hits the ear is just neutral—just the sound, beeping. And then the mind has another layer of perception. The first level of perception is kind of "beeping," and then there's another level of perception that happens, which is "bird" or "machine." That extra level of perception then influences the feeling.

This kind of influence happens a lot in our lives. For instance, seeing somebody that you don't know walking on the street—just seeing a person walking by—maybe that would be a relatively neutral perception, much of the time. And yet, what can happen is if that person has, perhaps, a body shape that's similar to someone who has abused you, that connection of perceiving somebody with that body type leads to associations with being abused. That kind of connection may lead you to, in that moment, experience fear when seeing this person that you don't know.

In this way, the past comes into our present. Our conditioning—not only our views and ideas, but what has happened to us, how we've engaged in the world, what the conditions of our life have been—those conditions will affect how we take in information, how we perceive something.

I got interested in this word papañca partly because other translators translated it differently than Bhikkhu Bodhi. The translation I read here was from Bhikkhu Bodhi. I think Thanissaro Bhikkhu uses a translation where papañca means "objectification." Other teachers also point to the fact that this word means something more than just a lot of thinking.

Because there are other places in the texts where this word appears—where it says freedom is for one without papañca. It's tied very closely to a mind that is free from papañca, a mind that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion. It's liberated.

Reading that text, I thought, this has got to be much deeper, much more profound than simply a lot of thought. Because you can have a mind free from thought, just very concentrated, and not be terribly free. And so I got a little curious about this and began to explore what it might mean if it does mean something more like objectification.

There's a teaching story that might help us understand something about this getting tied up around perception. It's actually in the Pali Canon, this teaching story—the story of the blind people and the elephant. Many of you have probably heard this story, so I'll just briefly recap it.

In a long-ago kingdom, the king asked his elephant trainer to bring an elephant and to gather the blind people who were in the village and show them the elephant. The elephant trainer did this, brought the elephant and the blind people together, and the king said, "Show the people the elephant." Some of the people were shown the leg—they touched the leg. Some touched the tail. Some touched the ear. Some touched the side of the elephant.

When the king then asked each one, "Tell me, what is an elephant? What is an elephant like?" each one had a different answer. Those who touched the legs said, "An elephant is like a post." Those who touched the tail said, "An elephant is like a broom." The ear—"It's like a winnowing basket." The side of the elephant—"It's like the wall of a storeroom." They each had different perceptions, naturally, very naturally had different perceptions of the elephant.

Where the story gets tied into our exploration of papañca is this: in the story, hearing each other describe, "Oh, an elephant's like this," they got into fights about it. They said, "No, you're wrong! I know from my direct experience—an elephant is like a post. It's not like a winnowing basket. You're wrong! An elephant is like this. An elephant is not like that." And they came to blows over this.

This happens in our world, basically. What's happening here is that the people are taking their perception to be the elephant. It's not just that they're saying, "Well, this is what I experienced. Huh, you experienced something else? That's interesting. Wow." There's a kind of reification—"This is what I experienced, and this is truth. This is the elephant." Coming back to our analogy, it's taking something to be real that's just based on experience, that's just the experience.

There are places in the teachings where the teachings point to this process of papañca leading to ideology, quarrels, war. This, he says, is the root of conflict.

So this process of perception—if we look at it a little more closely—this process of papañca, when we perceive something, one of the first things that happens, perhaps, is that the mind takes it to be reality. At a very basic level, we believe our perceptions to be what's out there, rather than understanding that the perception is a construction of the mind. Possibly this process of papañca has to do with this process of mind that creates the concept associated with the perception and takes that concept to be real, believes that conceptualization to be real.

We can't live without perception and concepts.

They have to happen. But what part of the process is problematic is not recognizing that it's a process, that it's a construction of our minds. We believe it's reality. We believe it's truth. And from that, divisions happen in our culture. Divisions happen in ideologies.

So if we look at this paragraph, I'm going to read it again using "objectifies." See if it has a slightly different flavor for you.

Dependent on the eye and forms, eye-consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact. With contact as condition, there is feeling. What one feels, that one perceives. What one perceives, that one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one objectifies. With what one has objectified as the source, perceptions and notions born of objectification beset one with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye.

So this process—"with what one has objectified as the source"—this is a thing. Views, opinions, ideas about that thing come into the mind. And based on those views, opinions, and ideas, we take in the rest of our world.

One thing I find interesting about objectification, this word objectification, is that you don't have an object without having a subject. This is another piece of the equation here with papañca. If the mind is objectifying something, creating it as a thing, it's simultaneously creating an "I" separate from that thing. The root of papañca in one text is said to be the thought "I am."

So this creation of subject and object happening in this moment—when we're not noticing perception as perception, not noticing the creation of concept as the creation of concept—this is the medicine for us: that we can recognize it, and in recognizing it, not be caught by this objectification.

One scholar, a Pali scholar, Professor Pali Hawadana, says this process of distorted perception—because that's what happens, papañca distorts perception—this process of placing every bare perception into a framework of emotions and beliefs that have come out of our past, our history, our conditioning, robs the freshness out of our experience. But we're not aware of this constant interference of the past. Because of this unawareness, which is our ignorance or our delusion, we see humanity fragmented as me and others. Us and them. And in various other stereotypes—skin color, ethnicity, language, ideology included.

And so this misunderstanding around perception leads to a great deal of suffering externally.

I think I have time for this. At the time of the Buddha, there were two Brahmins arguing with each other about what makes a true Brahmin. One said, "What makes a true Brahmin is the lineage of pure birth." The other said, "I think what makes a true Brahmin is how they are in the world, how they respond to the world." And tellingly, in this particular story it says that the one Brahmin could not convince the other Brahmin of his view, and the other Brahmin could not convince the first of his view. Sound familiar? This kind of cementing of our opinions, our views, based on our beliefs.

So they decided to go ask the Buddha, "What do you think about this? About what makes a Brahmin?"

And the Buddha starts by saying, "Well, let me tell you. I'll teach you, as they really are, the divisions of beings in the world. For there are many kinds of birth. Know first the grass and trees; though they lack self-awareness, their birth is their distinctive mark, for there are many kinds of birth. Next come the moths and the butterflies, and so on through the ants and the termites. Then know the kinds of quadrupeds of varied sorts, both large and small. Their birth is their distinctive mark, for there are many kinds of birth. Know those whose bellies are their feet, too, with the long-backed classes of snakes. Know, too, the water-dwelling fish that pasture in the liquid world. Next, know the birds that wing their way as they range in open skies. Their birth is their distinctive mark, for there are many kinds of birth.

"While in these births the differences of birth make their distinctive mark, with humans no differences of birth make a distinctive mark in them. Nor in the hairs, nor in the head, nor in the ears, nor the eyes, nor in the mouth, nor the nose, nor in the lips, nor the brows, nor in the shoulders or the neck, nor in the belly or the back, nor in the buttocks or the breast, nor in the genitals or in the ways of mating, nor in the hands nor the feet, the fingers or the nails, the knees nor the thighs, nor in their color or their voice."

Birth makes no distinctive mark as with other kinds of birth. In human bodies in themselves, nothing distinctive can be found. Distinctions among human beings are purely verbal designation.

Verbal designation is based on perception. We see differences in human beings. We perceive differences—tall, short, different hair color, different skin color, different genders. We see differences. What the Buddha is pointing to here is that there are no fundamental differences. It's verbal designation that creates these differences. And the reason he's pointing to this is around this question of Brahmins, because there was this belief by the one Brahmin that it's the lineage of birth that makes a difference—having pure lineage of having been Brahmin seven generations back, this makes one a Brahmin. The Buddha says it's action that makes one a Brahmin. What kind of birth you have has no bearing on that. One can become free, one can become liberated, no matter what.

And he goes on:

For name and clan are assigned as mere designations in the world, originating in convention. They are assigned here and there. For those who do not know this fact, wrong views have long underlain their hearts. Not knowing this, they declare to us one is a Brahmin by birth.

For those who do not know this fact, wrong views have long underlain their hearts. The belief that these distinctions are somehow important—in this case, in terms of being a Brahmin. When we create ideologies around these distinctions, strong views around these distinctions, this creates so much suffering externally in our world.

Now, the process of perception not only creates suffering externally. Perception and papañca. Perception itself doesn't create suffering. Perception is just perception. But it is this misunderstanding, this reification. Reification is another good word that could be used to translate papañca, I think. Reification meaning taking something to be concrete that is not.

All of our physical and mental experience is created by our minds. I do happen to think there is a world out there. I think you're out there. I believe that. I don't think I'm just sitting like a brain in a vat. So I think there is a reflection—this is a reflection of reality, what's being experienced. And I think it does a pretty good job; our brains do a pretty good job, our minds do a pretty good job of perceiving the world. And yet this mistake of believing it to be reality—delusion basically convinces perception to believe in the reality of perception. That we're experiencing something out there rather than what's actually happening, rather than it being constructed by our minds.

Everything that we experience without exception is constructed in our minds. And these constructions are so often influenced by views, ideas, opinions. This brings me back to what John said last night from Thich Nhat Hanh: for things to reveal themselves to us, we need to be ready to abandon our views about them. In other places the Buddha pointed to just meeting the bare experience. In the seen is only the seen. We take in this—no, this is what is seen, this is what's perceived.

Everything that we experience is created by our minds. The suffering comes partly because we believe. There's this reification, this picking it up as something. Oh, this is a something. Oh, this is a something. Oh, this is a something. And we have these somethings that we like, that we want more of. We have these somethings that we don't like, that we want to get rid of.

So suffering. We're back to suffering. Craving and clinging, this wanting things to be a certain way. Craving and clinging—I think we all are really familiar with now. This is something that happens in our mind.

Craving and clinging are constructs of the mind. Embedded within them is delusion—the belief that there is something to cling to, something to crave. But what we want, what that craving reaches for, what that clinging wants to hold onto, is actually nothing more than a construction of our own minds.

And so craving—these processes in our mind that contribute to suffering—what they want, what they crave, is nothing more than a blip in our minds as well. It's another construct of the mind.

When our mind starts to witness these processes at work, when it sees its own role in the creation of suffering, it begins to recognize: craving—that's the mind. What craving wants—that's the mind too.

When the mind begins to witness its own role in the creation of suffering, wisdom grows around that understanding. This wisdom helps the mind let go of those misunderstandings, helps the mind release these processes of delusion.

Now let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 134

Not Self and Selfing (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound exploration of the Buddha's teaching on anattā (not-self), one of the most central and often misunderstood aspects of the Dhamma. She begins by examining how the untrained mind habitually orients to experience through the lens of self, citing the Buddha's teaching on wise and unwise attention and the endless questions about self that lead to suffering.

Fella clarifies that anattā does not mean "there is no self"—which the Buddha explicitly called wrong view—but rather that what we take to be self is not what we think it is. Using the beautiful analogy of a rainbow appearing and disappearing based on conditions, she illustrates how the sense of self arises dependently, like a process rather than a fixed entity. Drawing from the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta (SN 22.59), the Buddha's second discourse, she examines how the five aggregates (khandhas)—form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness—cannot be self because they cannot be controlled and are impermanent and unreliable.

The talk offers practical guidance for investigating selfing in meditation, including the Buddha's twenty forms of identity view (sakkāya diṭṭhi) and common ways we construct self through thoughts of "I," "me," "mine," and even "they" and "them." Fella shares a powerful personal story of working with self-hatred, demonstrating how sustained mindful investigation can transform deeply rooted identity patterns. She emphasizes honoring our identities as survival strategies while seeing through their constructed nature to discover the love, compassion, and wisdom that underlie them.

In the Buddha's teachings, the texts we have inherited down through the generations, there are many stories of the Buddha speaking to people about how suffering happens, how we get caught, how we struggle.

I'm going to start with one of those teachings. Here he begins with how an ordinary person meets the world. How does an ordinary person navigate life? He says, "An ordinary person does not understand what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, they attend to those things unfit for attention and do not attend to those things fit for attention."

This is how they attend unwisely: "Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future?" Or else they are inwardly perplexed about the present: "Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where did this being come from? Where will it go?"

And so he points to the way that we orient to experience as an ordinary person without training, without hearing the teachings. We orient to the world through the perspective of self. Any of these sound familiar?

With that perspective, he says, we get caught in views of self. These views of self include "self exists in me" or "I am a self." Also included is "no self exists in me." So both attachment or belief in the view of self and the belief in no self—"there is no self"—the Buddha said that is wrong view. That is a view of self, to believe there is no self.

Another view he describes: "It is this self of mine that speaks and feels and experiences here and there the results of good and bad actions. But this self of mine is permanent, everlasting, and will endure as long as eternity."

He calls these views of self, pointing to the sense of self being a view—an idea, a belief. And he says, "This is called the thicket of views, the wilderness of views, the contortion of views, the vacillation of views, the fetter of views. Fettered by the fetter of views, the ordinary person is not freed from suffering."

So he points to looking at experience through this perspective of self as being a key reason why suffering happens.

In another teaching, again pointing to how easy it is for us to get caught by this view, there's a questioner talking to the Buddha. The Buddha is explaining about experience to this questioner, whose name is Pāguna. At a certain point in this conversation, the Buddha is talking about the experience of feeling—of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. The questioner says, "Venerable sir, who feels?"

The Buddha responds, "Not a valid question. I do not say one feels. If I said one feels, in that case this would be a valid question. But I do not speak thus. If one should ask me, 'Venerable sir, with what as condition does feeling come to be?' this would be a valid question. To this the valid answer is: with contact as condition, feeling comes to be. With feeling as condition, craving comes to be."

And so again, pointing to how easy it is for us to get caught in this belief—that there is one who feels, one who knows, one who craves, one who gets angry, one who gets confused. Instead, the Buddha points to this being as a process. This being is a process.

This teaching also points to how, when we have not understood the teaching of not-self, we misapprehend our experience. I appreciate the way Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates the term anattā. Often rendered as "no-self" or "not-self," I prefer "not-self" because the Buddha clearly stated that "there is no self" is wrong view—it is simply another view of self. To me, "not-self" evokes the understanding that what we think of as self is not what we think it is. It's not what we think it is. So it's not self.

What we often take to be self is this conditioned process. We attribute an enduring quality, a lasting nature, a sense of stability to something that is seeing, feeling, hearing, knowing, craving, being mindful. We attribute something to this process. We misunderstand this conditioned process as a stable, enduring reality.

This is one way we can begin to enter into this teaching of not-self—to understand what is meant by it. It's not that the Buddha is saying there's nothing there. He clearly points to this process nature of experience. There's this process unfolding, and conditions, lawful conditions, shaping that process. But there's nothing stable or enduring there. Nothing that we can pin down and say, "This, this is me. This is who I am."

When we try to do that, when we actually try to look—and we'll explore this a little more later in the talk—looking at what we actually think of as self, what is the experience we call "me"? What is the experience we say "I am"? What is that? When we start to look at it, we see it's really hard to actually point to. And it's hard to point to because there's nothing to point to. The process nature of experience doesn't lend itself to landing on something and saying, "Oh, that—that's what the self is."

I'd like to use an analogy to help us enter into understanding this process nature, this conditioned nature, the flux of experience that we sometimes mistake or misunderstand as a self.

If we think about a rainbow: I had the great fortune in January and early February to be on self-retreat. A friend let me use their cabin on the coast of Oregon, and the weather there is pretty wild in January. There were some days when the waves were enormous. I would take walks along the cliff there—the place I was staying was right on the ocean—and every day I would walk along the cliff. One day the waves were so high. The cliff I was on was about fifty to seventy feet above sea level, but the waves were so enormous they were crashing against the cliffs and shooting up into the air.

It happened to be a sunny day, and as I was walking along, in one place on that cliff I was looking out at the burst of the crash of the waves, and a rainbow appeared right in front of me. And then it vanished, of course. And then another wave came and it appeared again. There was a mist floating by, and the rainbow kind of appeared and disappeared as that mist floated past.

It looked very stable when it was there, and in fact it looked like it was being revealed—almost as if it was hanging in the air, just waiting to be revealed, like a curtain being drawn back. And yet, there isn't a rainbow hanging in the air there. If I had walked ten feet in one direction, I couldn't see the rainbow, because the orientation of the sun and the water wasn't right. That's a condition for the rainbow to appear.

Now, is the rainbow there if I'm not looking at it? I don't know. Same question as: is there sound if a tree falls in the forest and nobody's listening? In terms of my experience, the rainbow did not exist when I walked ten yards down the cliff. When the waves fell, there was no rainbow. If the sun had gone behind a cloud, there would be no rainbow. These conditions came together to produce this experience of rainbow—a conditioned process.

And yet, it's not that the rainbow doesn't exist. We can't say there's no rainbow. I mean, we can take a picture of a rainbow.

We can't say it's a thing either. It's dependent on conditions. So the sense of self is very like that. It comes into being in dependence on conditions. The sense of self comes into being in dependence on conditions.

The Buddha taught quite a bit about this understanding around anattā, not-self. The very second discourse the Buddha is said to have given is a teaching to the five friends. Susie talked about the five friends that he practiced with before he found his own way. After he understood his freedom and realized he could articulate it to people who had some depth of understanding, some depth of practice, he thought of his five friends. He went to find them and to give them some of his understanding.

The first teaching was the teaching on the Eightfold Path and the Four Noble Truths. The second one was said to be a teaching on not-self. In this text, he launches right in, framing an understanding of not-self around a way of understanding human experience through a teaching called the five aggregates.

We haven't explicitly done a five aggregate talk in this half of the retreat, so I'll just briefly overview it here. We've talked about various parts of this teaching. The five aggregates is a way of understanding human experience, much as the way the six sense bases are a way of understanding human experience that John talked about the other night. This is a way to divide up our human experience. We can understand our human experience as coming in through these six sense bases. Another way of dividing up human experience is to think about it in terms of these five processes.

The five processes are: a process of physical form, a process of physicality, and then four mental processes at work. The process of feeling, which Amana talked so beautifully about. The process of perception, which I spoke about. The process of mental formations, which is basically all of the stuff that goes on in our minds—thoughts and emotions and moods and mind states. All of those are mental formations. Sometimes this aggregate is called intentional or volitional formations, and so it is those mental activities that have intention associated with them. Somebody did talk about intention, and Susie brought it in last night in talking about karma. So we have touched on these. The fourth mental process is the process of knowing, of the simple recognition of experience.

So we have physical experience and mental experience, physical and mental experience interplaying, interweaving. Form, feeling, perceptions, intentional or volitional formations, and consciousness.

Many of the teachings the Buddha offered around not-self use this framework to help us basically understand that we've misperceived or misunderstood a sense of self. We've misattributed, created a view where there's nothing really to hang that view on.

In this teaching, the Buddha points to each of these five aggregates from different perspectives. The first perspective he points to is the perspective essentially of control. He says, can you control form? Do you have mastery over form? Can you say, "May my body be thus, may my body not be thus"? This is the language of the sutta. It goes through all of the five aggregates in this way:

"Form is not self. If form were self, the body would not lend itself to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of the body, 'Let my body be thus, let my body not be thus.' But because form is not self, body leads to affliction. It is not possible to say, 'Let my body be thus, let my body not be thus.'"

This points to one way that we tend to think of a sense of self—that a sense of self is something that has mastery or control over some parts of our experience. Here the Buddha is pointing out that the experience of body in effect can't be what we would call self because we cannot control it. We cannot ultimately control it. We cannot fully control it.

I'm going to read another one of these because it lends a different flavor to the teaching:

"Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were self, consciousness would not lend itself to affliction. And it would be possible to determine of consciousness, 'Let my consciousness be thus, let my consciousness not be thus.'"

But because consciousness is not self, consciousness leads to affliction. And it is not possible to say, "Let my consciousness be thus, let my consciousness not be thus."

The Buddha is actually pointing to what we know. We know we can't say, "Let my consciousness be thus." Wouldn't it be so wonderful if we could? That would be so great—we could just sit down and say, "May mindfulness arise and be steadily arising." But we don't have that kind of control. And he points to this very evident thing.

One way to look at this teaching is through the experience of the wandering mind. We know the mind wanders. We sit down, we try to pay attention to our breath, we try to stabilize our attention in the present moment, and what happens? The mind wanders. Who did that? You didn't decide, "I'm going to make my mind wander now." Mostly. Sometimes we do try to do that—"I'm going to let go of being mindful right now." But much of the time when the mind wanders, it simply wanders. Conditions arise such that the mind loses mindfulness. And then mindfulness returns. Who did that? You didn't do that. It just happened—that effortless mindfulness returning that we talked about early in March. It's just arising. No one in control of it arising. Just a process unfolding. And the Buddha points to this as evidence for not-self.

These are experiences we have all the time. It's interesting—we think there's a lot of evidence for self. But when we try to start looking at what the evidence for self actually is, it ends up being pretty vague and not easy to pin down. And we don't think that there's much evidence for not-self, but it's staring us in the face all the time. This lack of control is one of those pieces of evidence.

There is more evidence for not-self that the Buddha points to. This teaching, to some extent, refers to a definition of self that was common in his day. At that time, the aim of spiritual practice in certain circles was to merge with Atman—merge with the great Self. Atman, Atta, coming from the same root. And that Atman was thought to be permanent and blissful, unchangeable.

So the Buddha points to what we experience, direct experience, and says: look in your experience. Is any part of your experience permanent? Anything you experience? Anything you can say is lasting? And if you look at it—form, feeling, mental formations, perception, consciousness—all changing. None of it stable.

This becomes more and more clear the more continuous our mindfulness gets. This is one of those understandings that begins to point itself out to us. Yes, things are not permanent. Experience. There's nothing that can be found in experience that is permanent.

And because it's impermanent, the Buddha points out, because it's impermanent, there is the trying to find something on which to land, for there to be some place of reliable happiness. Nothing in our experience qualifies as a place where we could say, "Yes, that's where I can find reliable, unchangeable happiness." Because everything is impermanent. And so by corollary, it's also unreliable. Impermanent, unreliable experience.

This the Buddha points to as not worthy. He asks: is this worthy of being called self? And so this teaching also points a little bit to what do we call self?

How do we define a sense of self? And does it make sense to call it a self? Does it make sense in the way that we are interpreting it as self? This is a kind of looking at what is it, how do we feel into what a sense of self is. And how does our practice—how does the practice of mindfulness joined with wise intention, wise view—how does this practice help us to not just take this in as a concept? Sometimes even the concept is hard enough to take in. But how does it begin to let us actually understand this non-conceptually, through direct experience? How can this practice help us to understand the teaching of not-self?

One of the most direct doorways to this is through the exploration of what feels like a sense of self. What am I calling self? Study what you're calling self. There's a famous quote by the Zen master Dogen: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be enlightened by all things." This points to the exploration of what we are calling a sense of self. When a sense of self arises, what is that actually? What is that experience? Through that exploration, we begin to understand that what we are calling a sense of self is simply a process—that there isn't anything stable in there, isn't anything that we can call what we think of as a sense of self. So we're getting familiar with what we think of as self, experientially.

In brief, as we do that, as we explore a sense of self, there might be times—and some of you have described noticing this—when you're noticing some sense of self and it falls apart. You recognize, "Wow, that was not who I am. That was just an arising. It wasn't who I am." Sometimes as we explore in our experience the senses of self, we see one disintegrating, and we recognize, "Wow, nope. If that were me, it would still be here." This is one of the senses of self—a kind of sense of something that's stable and enduring. Looking at experience, anything we think is stable and enduring, we look at it long enough and we see it changes.

There are times too, as we're exploring our experience, when we see a sense of self arising, and again we see, "Wow, that came into being." There was a witnessing of seeing this experience coming into being, through causes and conditions. And we see, "Wow, that was a conditioned process that arose."

The Buddha was famous for his lists, as you know. He had a teaching of the twenty ways that we have identity view. Basically, for each of the five aggregates, there are four ways of attributing a sense of self—so that's five times four, twenty. I'm not going to try to go through these exhaustively, but I want to give you a flavor of these different ways the Buddha pointed to that we misattribute or create a view. He calls this identity view, sakkāya diṭṭhi in the Pali. Identity view, personality view. And it's seen as a view. The sense of self is understood to be basically a belief that is misunderstood as a thing.

This connects to that teaching I offered around perception and papañca—that with a concept, with perceiving or recognizing something, a concept comes into play, and then we believe that concept to have some kind of inherent existence. We do this with a sense of self. This is a process that happens in our minds, and it seems to be pretty human. It's a pretty deep process, potentially pretty useful.

The Buddha points to this view as having different flavors. One of the flavors is "I am something." I am body. I am the body. I am my emotions. I am angry, I am miserable, I am happy.

Or we may have an identity around roles—concepts, essentially. I'm a mother, I'm a parent, I'm a sibling, I'm a student. Basically an identification around a concept. Or we may have an identification around being the one that things happen to: I'm the one who feels, I'm the one who knows.

This is the first kind of view, and we can hear it almost in our minds at times. "I am so angry"—identity view in that form, attributing, equating our self with the feeling.

The second form of identity view is possessiveness. Something is mine. Things belong to me. I have a body. I have feelings. I have emotions. As opposed to being those things, it's like there's something bigger that has them. It's another way. And again, we use this language: "I have emotions. I have anger."

The third kind of identity view, the Buddha says, is "I am inside of something." This one is less familiar to me. The main way I feel this one is at times feeling like I'm inside the body—that somehow there's a me sitting somewhere behind my eyes or something. Potentially at times in certain states of meditation, there's been a sense of an expansive state and feeling like I'm in the state. Being inside of awareness. Something like that.

And the fourth way of holding, of creating this view of self, is that something is inside of me. Emotions are in me. This again, in language we might say—we might feel like we're holding in emotions. The emotions are inside. Holding it in. Consciousness is in me.

So those are ways the Buddha pointed to, and I think we can reflect on the language, or when our thoughts start doing their process, they often reveal how we are identifying. "I am so angry." "These feelings—I have to hold them in." Pointing to where it is, how it is that we're attributing a sense of self in each of those ways.

I have not experienced all twenty of those ways, and yet I find these useful reflections at times to again use those thoughts as pointers to how I might be holding a sense of self. The language in the mind can often point to when we do have a sense of self. The words "me," "I," "mine"—those are good clues that there's a sense of self going on.

The Buddha did use those words familiarly, colloquially. It's like, we don't have to say—if I'm going to walk across the room, I can say, "Oh, I'm going to go out the door." I don't have to say, "This process of mind and body is going to stand and intend to walk across the door." We can say, "I'm going to walk out the door." But often when our thoughts come up, it's a pointer. And when we see our thoughts—I don't know, some really large number of them are self-referential. At least ninety-nine percent seem to have something to do with me. Or they have something to do with me indirectly because they have something to do with others.

This, in my experience, is another way that we have a sense of self. It's a kind of indirect way, but if we are orienting toward "that person there, doing that thing"—them, they, their—there is a sense of self happening in being separated from. The "they-them-there" is creating an other, something external, and there will be a sense of self. It may not be as obvious. What we may be seeing or recognizing in those thoughts is the words "they," "them." "They shouldn't do that." "They're thinking this thing about me." All of those different thoughts about other. So that's another way that we have a sense of self.

So we can notice those kinds of thoughts as well.

There's a sense, I think, often with the sense of self, that there's a kind of solidity somehow. A sense of stability. Something continuous that has traveled through life. This is reinforced by memories, by conversations with family about what we did when we were kids. So there's this imputing of a stability of a being that has traveled through time. It's another way that we feel the sense of self. This is just more, in my experience, ways that I've seen it.

And then a big way that I find in my own experience around selfing is around being the one who chooses. I'm the one who decides things. That's a main kind of congealing of self.

This particular exploration—as we start to look at the sense of self here, when mindfulness gets stronger, when mindfulness gets more continuous—we start to see how decisions come to be. We can watch this process. You're sitting in the hall and feel a slight pressure in the bladder. Pressure gets stronger, stronger, stronger. Unpleasantness arises. There's the recognition of needing to relieve the bladder. With that, there's an intention to do that. Followed by a whole host of intentions to stand, get up, walk out the door, go to the restroom. We can see this unfolding and recognize it's almost like it's just a machine at work. It feels a little spooky sometimes. Like, who made that decision? It was just a process unfolding. And so the witnessing of how choice happens—we can begin to really, that can begin to undermine this identification around being the one who chooses, who decides.

At some point I really began to see this particularly around consciousness. I could see I'm not the one who decides what comes into consciousness. I thought I was. I thought I chose what to pay attention to. But then I began to see, no, some process does that. So I could see, wow, I'm not the one doing that. But it sure feels like it's happening to me—another form of selfing. I'm the one things happen to. So again, just watching this, seeing what is this sense of self arising, watching the processes around it.

As we watch these processes at work, we can see a lot of really interesting things. One of the things that I found so fascinating was that there's not a single thing that I call self. There's a lot of selves. A lot of different senses of selves. Many of these senses of selves have nothing to do with each other. Thinking a particular thought about a dear friend—the friend arises, the feelings associated with that friendship arise. It feels like me. A few minutes later, the thought of a parent, my parent, arises and a whole different set of feelings and experiences comes to be there, having nothing to do with this other one.

At some point I thought, wow, a sense of self is just simply a familiar set of contractions and thoughts and moods. That's what a sense of self feels like. Just familiar stuff happening. It has happened before, and I'm calling it a sense of self.

A lot of these identities—another word for selves, identities—a lot of these identities are conditioned. They are all conditioned, in fact, not a lot of them. They are all conditioned by experience, and so my friend-self, for instance, that's conditioned by that particular individual experience. They're also conditioned by culture. And so my experience of being a cisgendered female—a female that feels like a female in her own body and feels like a female—that experience is conditioned. Any identity around that female experience is conditioned a lot by culture. And I butted up against a lot of that—what I was told by culture that females could and couldn't do, were and weren't good at.

A lot of suffering there. A lot of fighting. "No, that's not me."

So these identities come into being not only in dependence on our own personal experience, but also in dependence on culture. And a lot of these senses of self are strategies for navigating our lives—strategies for navigating, in particular, the challenges of an impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable world. Strategies for safety.

When you reflect on familiar patterns and habits, ones that come up a lot—and I've heard this frequently in our meetings—when something keeps arising on retreat, I often ask, "Is this something you experience in your life?" And often it is, because these patterns repeat themselves. They are conditioned, and they're strategies for navigating the world. When we butt up against challenge in the retreat, we carry our habitual strategies from life to try to deal with them, and so we get to see our senses of self coming into how we engage in the practice. This isn't a mistake. It's actually helpful. It's not like we bring a different set of conditions in here than we have out there. We really get to see our conditioning in here.

Sometimes the sense of self is vague, hard to really point to and identify. Sometimes it's really, really clear. That may be the best time to begin looking at what it is I'm calling self. Certain kinds of experiences, certain kinds of habitual patterns, tend to evoke a strong identity. Self-righteousness is one of them—"I'm right. I'm right." There can be strong identities around certain emotions, strong identities around particular habitual patterns. Many of these are the ones we suffer over.

And this points to something I mentioned the other day: the teaching of dependent origination, which describes how suffering comes to be, also describes how these senses of self come to be. It's the same process. So when there is this churning of identity, there's also this clinging to something, holding on to something. Sometimes when the sense of self feels really clear, it's a good time to look at it.

I'm going to tell a story from my own practice around this—a particularly strong identity I had around being unworthy. Self-hatred was one of its main manifestations.

Actually, it took a while before I really saw it. I did not grow up feeling like I hated myself. I grew up feeling very competent, very in control and in charge, knowing what I wanted to do. When I started meditating, I began hearing and recognizing these voices in my head: "You're a failure. You're no good. You don't do that right. You're a terrible yogi." And there were also ones like, "You're the best yogi in the room. You're really good at this." Ryan talked the other night about these contrasting identities that we have, and I saw that in spades. I began to recognize that so much of my patterns of striving to succeed had been rooted in that sense of being a failure.

When I began to see that, it was really hard to feel it. Self-hatred is a very painful feeling. It feels like you're being annihilated. So it was a long process to explore this, to watch it, to have the courage to open to it as an arising, to know when I couldn't know it as an arising—when my mindfulness wasn't strong enough to really meet it and I was going to get sucked into it. There was a lot of work around this, a lot of practice.

During one particular three-month course, I look back on it and it was like my self-hatred retreat. I really got to see this pattern over and over and over again. I would have a few days in the middle where it wasn't there so much. And this points to one of the really useful tools around a pervasive sense of self: notice when it's not there.

This was something I did notice. There were days when self-hatred was not here. That begins to poke holes in the belief in the identity, in the solidification around this. "I am unworthy."

I am a failure. It pokes holes in that solidity, because we see it's not always there. This is a really powerful tool for working with those pervasive identities.

Sometimes I could be with the pattern as it arose, and sometimes I would get pulled under. I just kept practicing, kept practicing with it.

One evening, after a dharma talk, Joseph had given a teaching in the hall around pervasive patterns. He offered something which I will share with you because it was very helpful for me that evening. He said that if there's something that keeps coming up over and over again, it's really helpful to recognize when it arises, the very moment it arises. Know that as contact. The arising of that is contact. And then notice the feeling tone of that arising.

As I left the hall that evening—I was going out through the upper walking room at IMS, walking up the stairs—and the feeling of self-hatred just descended. There was this recognition: oh. And a feeling of heaviness. Then I caught this and thought, I'm just going to practice with this.

I went back to my room and used that teaching he had offered. As I was sitting there, I was noticing this fluctuation around the sense of self-hatred. It would not be there, and then it would come into being. I would say, "Contact. Unpleasant." I would note it. Just contact, unpleasant. Then it might weaken, then get stronger. Contact, unpleasant. I kept just doing that for a long time that evening.

I had a lot of real dedication to being with it. I wasn't afraid of it. That was itself a lot of work, you know—a lot of working through the fear of the feeling, a lot of dealing with some of the history of how it came to be. A lot of work preceded this evening. It was probably a couple of years of working with this pattern.

But this particular evening I just had a lot of confidence in the path and in the power of mindfulness. At some point, in seeing that contact, the mind understood: this is just a thought. "You're no good"—it is simply a thought. The sense of self was picking that thought up and doing a believing process with it. "Oh, I'm no good. Oh yeah, I believe that. Oh yeah, I believe that. Oh yeah. Oh, I really believe that." I could see it in that moment of its arising. It's just a thought.

And in that moment, the whole thing just fell apart.

I had a moment where I thought, "Oh, never again will I experience that self-hatred." And in the next moment there was wisdom. I thought, "No, these are the conditions right now. There are the conditions right now to see this." Then there was a kind of shift—what was so interesting in that moment was that there was a movement from self-hatred to bliss in just a split second. And then in seeing that—oh no, this is just the conditions now—that bliss shifted to just equanimity. In a moment, in a moment, in a moment.

That moment was extremely powerful. The pattern, I would say, still exists. But what seems to be gone is the belief in the thoughts. The thoughts come, but there's not the belief. So it's like, "Oh yeah, there's that thought. You're a failure. Yeah, there's that thought."

Very occasionally I find, in particular it seems to be in deeper states of meditation, sometimes the mind picks it up a little bit. Oh, there it is again. So I have a lot of respect for this pattern. It's like a big tree got uprooted that night, but the filaments are still there. So I really respect that pattern. See those thoughts. See them.

We can study our senses of self. We can get curious about them. This is very powerful understanding. What I described was a powerful insight into an identity that not only shifted that identity—it changed my life in that moment. It's one of perhaps a dozen or so moments of really clear insight in my practice that I can say, yes, that split second changed my life. A few of those in my practice. That moment really shifted my life. But it also gave me a deeper level of understanding about how the sense of self works. It was an understanding into that teaching of not-self.

I find it really important in exploring senses of self—much as we've been saying around suffering, opening to the entirety of our human experience, honoring experience, respecting our experience, respecting the suffering that arises, opening to it, witnessing it, being with it, holding it with allowing and love—the same thing goes with honoring our identities, honoring our senses of self.

They have their function, and often they have a very strong one. Sometimes we can just bow to those identities. Yeah, thank you for doing this, like keeping me alive until this point. Because some of our habits and patterns were strategies for how to get through our upbringing. And so it's like, yes, I see you and thank you for getting me here—and let's see, can we relate to things in a different way?

Honoring our identities, being aware of them, opening to them, is a form of honoring. It's a form of respect. That very word, respect, means to look again and again, to look again at what's there.

The honoring of these identities begins to help us understand. The other day I spoke to those threads that come into both suffering and into identities—the threads of the deep wish to be happy, healthy, safe, at ease, and those threads of truth: impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. Not only is our suffering a kind of knotting up of those threads, but so can our identities be. And so the mindfulness and the wisdom begin to help us understand. Seeing our identities points back to love, compassion, and truth. When we see through the tangle, the tangle of views, there's love and wisdom to be seen, to be experienced.

Let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 135

Recognizing Awareness

Andrea Fella · 56 min

> In this talk, Andrea Fella offers a contemplative exploration of mindfulness as an object of investigation itself, rather than focusing solely on what mindfulness observes. She encourages practitioners to become curious about the edges of awareness—those moments when mindfulness returns after the mind has wandered, and the conditions under which it slips away. This investigation reveals profound teachings about anattā (not-self), as we recognize that neither the losing nor the returning of mindfulness is something we consciously choose; both arise through conditions.
> Fella distinguishes between sammā sati (right mindfulness) and ordinary awareness, explaining that right mindfulness involves curiosity about experience as experience, rather than engaging with our usual agendas of getting or avoiding. She references the Abhidhamma concept of unprompted mindfulness—awareness that arises spontaneously without conscious intention—and suggests that becoming familiar with these moments can transform our relationship to practice. Rather than judging ourselves for losing mindfulness, we can celebrate each return as an opportunity to notice the effortless quality of awareness.
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing patterns in how mindfulness gets lost—whether in certain activities, habitual mind states, or during shifts of attention. Fella shares from her own experience how sustained curiosity about anger eventually allowed her to see it arising before it fully took hold. She also challenges common beliefs that certain states like sleepiness or low energy preclude mindfulness, suggesting that if we can notice the thought "I'm too tired to be mindful," we already have enough awareness to be present with whatever is happening.

Tonight I'd like to explore the topic of mindfulness itself—becoming familiar with the experience of mindfulness, the experience of awareness.

One way I've found interesting to explore this quality of mindfulness in my own practice is through seeing or noticing how mindfulness comes and goes. We often talk about this from the other side: we talk about the wandering mind, about mindfulness getting lost. But I like to explore the edges of that phenomenon. What does it mean to be curious about mindfulness itself through looking at the edges of this familiar, really familiar process of mindfulness getting lost? Noticing when it comes back, and also beginning to see something about how it gets lost.

So really we're investigating mindfulness itself, noticing it as a quality itself—not so interested in what mindfulness takes in, what mindfulness is aware of, although that matters too. In this talk, I'd like to emphasize the awareness side itself so that we can begin to get familiar with this experience of mindfulness. There's a lot we can learn looking at how mindfulness comes and goes.

We can see how our minds get caught. We can recognize the uncontrollability of the mind. When we sit down to practice, intending to be present, intending to be mindful, what happens? Mindfulness goes away. Not because we decided to have it go away, but because of conditions. We didn't choose to have that happen; it happened because of conditions.

And likewise—sometimes even more amazing, really, reflecting about it—mindfulness comes back. And who did that? We were off wandering around, thinking about something or other, and suddenly we become aware again. We didn't choose to do that either. This seeing of this simple phenomenon that we're so familiar with is a pointer to the teaching of not-self.

I've also found this kind of exploration around the edges of mindfulness getting lost helps to bring curiosity rather than judgment around the getting lost itself. When I turned the mind towards this curiosity of noticing the return of mindfulness, rather than emphasizing the fact that mindfulness had been lost—"Oh, mindfulness is back!"—no matter how many times the mind wandered in a sitting, it gave me an opportunity to notice that moment of mindfulness returning, to see the effortless quality of that mindfulness returning.

That is a great moment. We didn't have to do a thing to have that mindfulness return. It happened. We can begin to connect with that curiosity about mindfulness itself and the effortless quality of that mindfulness returning. It's a pointer to how effortless mindfulness can be, because we didn't have to do that moment of mindfulness.

We think we know what mindfulness is, perhaps. We have some words for it: being with experience, being present, being aware, knowing what's happening while it's happening. And yet in some ways it is a mysterious thing. Some of the things we think about what mindfulness is—like what I pointed to the other day, that I thought if I wasn't deciding what to be mindful of, it meant I wasn't mindful. This recognition that attention and mindfulness are separate things, that we don't have to consciously choose. There's just this knowing, this awareness of what's happening in the present moment while it's happening.

I think of mindfulness as related to this very simple, ordinary capacity of our human minds to know what's happening in the present moment while it's happening. And yet the mindfulness that the Buddha pointed us to was not just that simple knowing. He pointed us to right mindfulness, sammā sati. A simple way to understand it is that we know experience happening in the present moment and are interested in it as experience happening in the present moment.

Maybe that just sounds like repeating myself, but it's different than what our minds typically do. Typically, in becoming aware of something, in being present—especially before we've met the practice of mindfulness—when we become aware of what's happening in the present moment, we engage with our agendas around it. We engage with our thoughts about how it can be useful for me to do this or not do this, to get this thing or not get this thing, to act, to engage.

The mindfulness that is onward leading, right mindfulness, is a very simple kind of awareness that is curious about what's happening as a human experience. Frustration is arising in the present moment—what is the experience of a human being feeling frustration in the present moment? What is that like? That's very different than frustration arising in the present moment and trying to figure out what to do about that frustration.

The texts actually speak about wrong mindfulness as opposed to right mindfulness. Wrong mindfulness is defined as being part of the wrong eightfold path. Wrong mindfulness comes out of wrong view, wrong intention. When there's wrong view and wrong intention, the kind of mindfulness that would arise would not be the kind of mindfulness that is onward leading.

A classic example of wrong mindfulness is the possible mindfulness of a thief moving through a house to steal something. The thief might be very present, very aware of every step, every movement—particularly if someone is in the house while they're stealing. They're acutely aware, making themselves very quiet while moving through the house. And yet the motivation for that mindfulness is greed. It's not the curiosity of "What is it like to take a step? What is it like to touch? What is it like to be here in this moment?" There's an agenda behind it with a quality of unwholesome motivation.

This framing of wise mindfulness or right mindfulness—being curious about what this present moment experience is, being curious about what is leading to suffering and what is leading away from suffering—that points us in the direction of right mindfulness.

In terms of getting familiar with mindfulness itself, getting familiar with this experience of mindfulness (and in this talk I'll use the terms mindfulness and awareness synonymously), one of the places where it can begin to be clear what the experience of mindfulness actually is, is in the moment when mindfulness returns after it has been lost. After the mind has been off thinking about something, not mindful, and mindfulness returns—that moment. That moment of mindfulness returning.

This is sometimes called in the Abhidhamma, the Buddhist psychology, "unprompted mindfulness." It is a mindfulness that is not arising based on our own intention. It is simply arising based on conditions—some of those conditions being the cultivation of mindfulness in the past. It is not our conscious doing. This is my understanding of unprompted mindfulness.

That moment of mindfulness returning—if we can be curious about it, as I said this morning, "aware again, aware again," and be really interested in that experience, the awareness side of that experience. In the moment when mindfulness returns, it's like the moment before. Sometimes there's a little lag in actually noticing that mindfulness has returned. But we can be curious about this moment, interested in seeing it. And yet it's not something we can decide to do. By its very nature, we cannot say, "I'm going to know when mindfulness returns." It's more of an intention, a setting of curiosity. This is something I'm curious about.

So this curiosity about that moment may allow us to begin to see it more clearly, to begin to understand it as, "Oh, mindfulness is back. Aware again." And in that moment, as we see mindfulness returning, there is a little bit of difference. There's a quality in that moment as mindfulness comes back—a difference between what it feels like now that the mind is aware and what the experience was a moment before, when the mind was caught in something and mindfulness wasn't so available.

So there's a moment in that arising of mindfulness where we can see the difference between what it means for mindfulness to be here and for mindfulness not to be here. We can begin to notice that difference between being mindful and not being mindful in that moment as mindfulness returns. It's not exactly that we know what it's like in the moment to not be mindful, but there's a lingering flavor, a lingering understanding as mindfulness returns of what that moment before was like. Its flavor lingers a little bit, and we can have a sense of, "Oh, this is what it's like to be mindful. This is the experience of mindfulness. This is awareness. Awareness is here."

As we begin to be curious about that experience of the moment of mindfulness returning—a great moment because it's not something we have to do, it's completely effortless—and as we get familiar with it, the very familiarity with that experience creates the conditions for us to become more attuned to it. It creates the conditions for us to see that moment of mindfulness returning more easily. And it happens a lot, way more than you think.

This moment of mindfulness, this awareness of what's happening in the present moment—it happens. And often, very quickly, as mindfulness arises in our daily activities, when we're lost in something not particularly mindful and suddenly become aware of something, it may be that we've become aware and then immediately think, "What do I have to do to take care of that thing? What do I need to do about that?" Sometimes those moments of mindfulness arise, and if we're not attuned to recognizing them, they get submerged again really quickly. Yet as we get interested in that moment, as we explore curiosity about recognizing it, we become attuned to that experience and see it more and more.

This simple practice of attuning to that moment has the benefit of creating more moments—or rather, having us recognize more of those moments—which in turn creates the conditions for more of those moments to be noticed. So it's not the arising of it that requires effort; the arising is effortless. There's a subtle sense of recognizing, of landing with it, that requires perhaps a little bit of personal effort. Noticing it has arisen: "Oh yes, aware again."

That's the effort, that's the recognition. Aware again, awareness is back. What's that? What's that experience? And in that moment, we notice that experience of awareness, notice the awareness itself, and then our practice becomes: What's obvious? What's obvious in that moment?

And potentially, as I was speaking about this morning, if the mind has been caught in something—whether caught in thought or caught in an emotion or a mood or a mind state—when the mindfulness returns, it's likely that there will be some experience in the present moment. That's the landscape of experience we're waking up into, and it has been conditioned by the previous moments of thinking or being pulled into a particular mind state.

So when mindfulness returns, there's going to be some flavor connected to what had been happening. I often speak about it as waking up in—what is the landscape now, now that mindfulness has returned? What is the landscape you're waking up into? Depending on how long the mindfulness was lost, the landscape may be very different than it was before the mindfulness got lost. And so there's a curiosity about that: What's here now? What's obvious? What is here now?

Sometimes checking the attitude can also be useful, because an attitude can sometimes be constructed while mindfulness is lost. For instance, if mindfulness was lost and we were thinking about something that frustrated us, if we come back and notice, "Well, I'm aware," but we don't really take in that there had been this ripple of frustration informing the mind in the previous moments—if we don't notice that, then in just turning to what's here right now, we might observe, "Okay, there's body sensation, there's this, there's that," without really noticing that an attitude may have been created, an attitude of frustration. That attitude doesn't necessarily have anything to do with body sensation or what's happening in our current experience. It was constructed based on thinking about perhaps a memory. But if we don't notice in that moment when mindfulness returns that this flavor is there, it may become the attitude, and we may have frustration about whatever's happening because it wasn't clearly seen.

And so that moment—noticing, aware again—and what's the landscape you're waking up into? As I also mentioned this morning, the landscape might well be far more than I could have possibly thought it would be. It might be more calm or more ease than there was before mindfulness got lost. Sometimes the mind kind of finds its way in the getting lost. Sometimes it finds its way to a letting go. And so when mindfulness returns, what is the landscape? Not particularly looking for hindrances or greed, aversion, delusion there, but just what's there—because sometimes it can be beautiful qualities of mind that are present when mindfulness returns.

And so in that moment, the recognizing—aware again—and beginning to get a little bit familiar with the difference between the awareness and the not being aware in the moments before. Just getting familiar with that.

We can also begin to be curious. One thing I'll say as an overarching theme for this talk and many of the talks that at least I will give: it may sound at times like this is a suggestion of something to do, but as Sayadaw often mentions—and many times I've gone off trying to do something he's talked about and come back and reported something, and he said, "Well, were you trying to do that?" And I said, "Yes. Didn't you tell me to do that?" He said, "Nothing I say is anything for you to do. It's just information that may help orient the mind in a particular way while you're just noticing your experience."

And so sometimes we can think of these Dharma talks almost as Dharma rain—just gently falling information that can land on the earth and seep into the ground, and maybe the plants will grow based on that water, but not so much something to pick up as an activity. Sometimes it's hard not to speak that way. I try, and I almost always get caught in the language of, "Oh, you can pay attention to..." So what I'm talking about is things that can be noticed. These are more descriptions of things that might be able to be noticed than instructions about something to do.

Along these lines, something we can notice—or there can be a curiosity about—is what it feels like when mindfulness is already present. So that experience of the continuity of mindfulness: we can begin to get a flavor of that momentum of mindfulness also as the experience of mindfulness. And that is a place where we can prompt the mindfulness a little bit. I talked about unprompted and prompted mindfulness before. We can prompt the mindfulness a little bit, just reminding ourselves gently. When we are aware, we can remind ourselves to be aware. And yet I've already heard in some of the group meetings that sometimes there's a little bit—it sounds like a little bit of overdoing of that prompting.

Some of you have been describing the mind getting tired with this aspect of the practice. So this is a place where getting familiar with that prompting experience of mindfulness as it becomes more continuous becomes important—the feeling of just being present. That's a way to frame it potentially: it's simply the experience of being present.

As we get a flavor of that experience, we may start to recognize where the mindfulness gets a little bit loose. We may notice it becoming less stable. And that would be when to bring the reminders back in. The reminders are very simple. It might be as simple as "aware." Or maybe it's just recognizing "already aware"—noticing that, oh yes, already aware.

So there's the other side of this exploration of the comings and goings of mindfulness. We've talked about mindfulness returning. We can also get curious about that place where mindfulness begins to weaken, where it begins to get lost. Where does mindfulness get lost? Where does awareness get lost?

Initially this exploration happens in retrospect—when mindfulness returns, we notice that it has been lost, and we may know something about the conditions around which it got lost. Not that we have to do a lot there, but again, it's very simple: when we wake up, we may recognize that mindfulness got lost because we went into our room. We closed the door, and it's like, "Oh, don't have to be mindful, nobody's looking." So being curious about this—where does mindfulness get lost?

This begins to support continuity as we recognize what conditions mindfulness gets lost with. It's not about judging ourselves. And it's also not about doubling down when we notice certain areas or mind states in which we tend to lose mindfulness. Instead, being curious: when that happens, we've noticed a pattern. And the noticing of the pattern seems to happen naturally. Our minds are natural pattern recognizers. So if we're curious about what patterns surround the loss of mindfulness, we'll begin to notice them. It doesn't have to be a big project.

When we begin to notice that mindfulness gets lost in certain experiences or activities, rather than having the idea of something like, "Okay, I know that when I go into my room mindfulness gets lost, so I'm going to force myself to stay mindful—I'm going to know every single moment when I walk in that door and really make myself be mindful"—that's not what I'd like to propose here. Instead, I'd rather that you be curious about what happens when you go in your room. Get curious about what catches the mind. What does the mind get hooked to? What does it do?

There are many different places and areas we can explore like this. We can be curious in a broad sense about various times of day, various activities, where we recognize: "Yeah, not very mindful while I'm doing my dishes, while I'm doing my yogi job, while I'm walking around the loop, while I'm in the bathroom." We may notice these areas, these places where mindfulness kind of... it's like these little sinkholes of mindfulness.

As you notice a pattern like that—"Oh yeah, I tend to lose my mindfulness in my yogi job"—then when you're headed to your yogi job, you might be mindful. And again, not to say "I'm going to force myself to be mindful with all of that chopping," but just be curious what happens. It's an interesting thing. Carol talked the other day about letting the mindfulness just come along for the ride with what's happening. That's what I'm proposing here. Come along for the ride where you know mindfulness tends to get lost, and be curious about where it slips. What happens there?

We can begin to see that not by trying to see it, not by trying to force ourselves to stay present. If we're trying to force ourselves to stay present through the whole thing, we won't see where the mind gets caught, because we'll be preempting it by forcing mindfulness to stay. So it's really this almost willingness to let mindfulness slip in order to see what happens in that moment. When you notice areas like that, just see if you can bring some curiosity to it.

What goes on there? What goes on?

So we might lose awareness in specific activities. I talked the other day of another way that we can lose awareness—or may tend to lose awareness—when attention shifts and we don't notice that attention has shifted. That's another common way for mindfulness to get lost.

I mentioned the seeing, looking, hearing, listening—the attention shifts to something else. Again, if there's curiosity about that shift of attention... and I'm not saying you shouldn't let the attention shift, but just what is it that draws the attention? And knowing that, knowing that shift of attention, developing familiarity with that shift—again, not as something to do, not as a project. I'm just mentioning this as something that can be seen, which may help you be curious about it, and may help there to be some seeing of it.

The seeing, looking, hearing, listening is an easy place to begin that exploration. But it happens everywhere. Our attention is very frequently shifting from experience to experience, particularly in this receptive kind of practice. We're receiving what is happening, and the attention is picking up on new experience moment after moment.

At one point I described this experience of the attention picking up on all these different experiences, the shifting of attention, the feeling of the shift—but it's really just the arising of a new experience. And I mentioned that to Sayadaw, and he kind of got into that. He said, "Yeah, it's kind of like you're taking a dog for a walk. And that dog is into everything. It's sniffing this and looking at that and barking at that—it's all over the place. But our job is just to hold on to the leash. We just stay connected." And then wherever the attention goes, we can know that.

But very frequently when the attention shifts to something, if we're not aware that it has shifted, we'll start thinking about it. And then mindfulness will get lost.

We also tend to lose awareness in habitual states of mind, ones that we tend to be identified with—our kind of favorite flavors. You've all practiced so much; you probably know your favorite flavors of identification, the things that our mind tends to get stuck to and caught by. And those tend to be things that mindfulness gets lost with.

Often we tend to notice in retrospect that we have been caught by something—a mind state, a depression or frustration or anger, an aversion, a desire, a fear, a doubt, a confusion. We may not see the getting lost in it initially. And yet, with these very habitual states of mind, we probably will wake up into them. So when mindfulness returns, we will notice that the mind has returned.

At some points—not always, of course, as I mentioned earlier—sometimes when mindfulness returns it actually is more settled. But some chunk of the time when mindfulness returns, it will return and what will be happening is one of those habitual mind states. And so in that moment of mindfulness returning in that habitual mind state, really—oh, this is what's happening. Oh, here's that familiar mind state. Okay, what's this like?

Again, what's this landscape of this familiar habitual state of mind? And check the attitude. Can it be okay that this is happening? This is just an opportunity to learn about this habitual mind state. It's something that has probably been practiced for years. And here it is—an opportunity, while you're mindful, to get to know it, to get familiar with it, to learn something about it.

And so in that moment, as we really begin to get familiar with the quality of that state, what I've seen in my own practice is that as I've gotten curious about these habitual states—similar to what I described about the seeing of mindfulness returning, how as we get familiar with that it begins to kind of point itself out to us and we notice it more—as we get more attuned to the qualities of those habitual mind states, what it's like in the body, what the mind is like, the felt sense of that state, it begins to attune us to that state.

In my experience, as I've gotten curious about just waking up with some of these habitual states, noticing them, being curious, being present for them, what has happened is that over time the mindfulness seems to have gotten attuned to that state. It's almost like the state itself becomes a mindfulness bell. It begins to wake us up when it happens.

In my experience, that habitual pattern—in my case the first one I really explored was anger—began to point itself out. I noticed that I was waking up into anger, but it was not as deeply wound as it had been early on. So the practice of noticing it helped the mind to recognize it and wake up into it earlier. This created the conditions for seeing it before it got quite so sticky.

And then also, to my amazement, it began to create the conditions so that I could almost see it coming before it came. The mind began to get so familiar with that pattern that it began to recognize the scent of it approaching. And at that point, the mind could really be present with the arising of that habitual state and learn something very deep about it—and also potentially see the pull into wanting to go into it.

That was shocking to me, actually, when I saw this, especially around anger.

I saw this kind of inclining towards anger. Not angry in the moment, but just seeing the thought—it's like a freight train of "yeah, I really want to get angry here." Just feeling that movement towards it. It was remarkable: this is the momentum of that pattern. If I hadn't been mindful for that, the mindfulness would have gotten lost. But being present for it had a power to help me stay present in that moment and not get pulled into the pattern of the anger.

So again, we can be curious about what are the states of mind in which mindfulness gets lost, where mindfulness tends to not be available. And then aside from our kind of identified states, there are some familiar habits or familiar states of mind that many of us tend to almost equate with non-mindfulness: sleepiness, spaciness, zoning out, low energy.

At one point I had a long stretch, a couple of years, where the energy was so low. I had many, many moments where what the mind was saying and believing was, "I don't have enough energy to be mindful." I remember so clearly—I was actually doing walking meditation on the driveway in front of IMS—and I had that thought: "I'm just too low energy, I'm too exhausted to be mindful." And I noticed that thought, was aware of that thought. And then I noticed: but seeing is happening, I'm aware of seeing. Hearing is happening, aware of hearing. So there's mindfulness already happening.

In retrospect, what in that particular state of low energy I didn't have the capacity to do was to choose what to be mindful of. I couldn't direct the attention. The mind was pretty exhausted. But there was already mindfulness happening.

This can point us to the recognition that some of these states that we think are inherently non-mindful—maybe, just maybe, you can be mindful of the state itself. Dull mind. Sleepy mind. Maybe we can't be mindful in the way that we'd like to be mindful. We can't be mindful while potentially choosing what we'd like to be attending to. Not that we're trying to do that here anyway, but still there's the habit of believing "too sleepy to be mindful." If you have that thought—"I'm too sleepy to be mindful"—and you notice or can be aware of that thought, I'd like to propose that you have enough awareness to be mindful of the sleepiness.

We sometimes have the belief that mindfulness feels a certain way. And that's where this comes from, I think—that low energy, "there's not enough energy to be mindful"—it comes from a belief that when I'm mindful, it feels like there's energy. It feels like there's clarity in the mind.

We may have a kind of a sense, when we're noticing what it's like when we're mindful—and often when we first notice that, when we first really get a sense of familiarity with what it's like to be mindful—there's a particular quality of mindfulness that's happening in that moment. Often it has to do with clarity. We know that there's a lot of clarity of contact. We know exactly what the objects are. There's a brightness in the mind that often feels pleasant. And so we have this experience and we're interested in what it's like to be mindful. It's like, "Oh, this is mindfulness." And yes, there is the continuity of mindfulness there. That is the experience of mindfulness. But there's a lot of extra things there that we're also attributing to mindfulness—like that particular kind of clarity, like the pleasantness. The mindfulness is simply the being aware.

At one point I was practicing at Shwe Oo Min monastery with Sayadaw, and as I was shifting from walking meditation to sitting meditation, I noticed the mind trying to shift its state in order to put itself into a more "meditative" state. And noticing that, there was a kind of wisdom question: "Well, what's wrong with this state? Why does the mind think it has to change the state in order to meditate?"

If I ever notice at this point that I'm trying to change the state of my mind or think I can't be mindful while something is happening—that's just a thought. It's just a belief. It's just the mind believing something, believing that it can't be mindful. If it has enough energy or enough recognition that it's noticing the thing it thinks it can't be mindful of, it can be mindful of it.

So if you're seeing that, if you're seeing the mind trying to change the state because of some belief or view that it can't be mindful, try the mindfulness first, before doing something. Now, it may well be—and some of you have described in our meetings—that sometimes there's something strong that happens and there's a kind of feeling of being pulled into the sinkhole or the rabbit hole of a particular mind state.

There are times when a mind state is stronger than our capacity to be mindful of it. We need to be honest with ourselves about that and honor that the mindfulness isn't quite strong enough to meet some of those powerful states. And yet, give yourself the chance to see if there is mindfulness that can meet it. So often we have the belief that we can't be mindful of something because in the past it was hard to be mindful of it. Give yourself the opportunity to check: Can I be mindful of this? What's the attitude?

In the noticing of mindfulness itself—that sense of being present, that familiar quality we often go for of clarity, of knowing every single experience—there are different ways that mindfulness can feel. So trusting, or being curious about: Am I aware? That question—am I aware?—we may not know what we're aware of. There may not be any clarity around contact at all. You may have no clue what the object is, but we may know that we're aware. Trust that you know that you're aware.

Explore the discomfort. Usually that can come with some discomfort—often it can come with some discomfort when we're not clear about the object. So notice that. Discomfort's happening. Don't know the object, and discomfort's happening. Okay, that's what's going on.

There are different ways I've noticed the experience feeling. Sometimes the attention is very focused and the mindfulness can be very present and clear. Sometimes there can be a very broad experience of awareness, knowing many different experiences. Sometimes it feels like one experience is known after another and there's a lot of clarity—this thing, and then this thing, and then this thing. Other times it feels more vague, like a shifting landscape, without real clarity about where the attention is at any given moment.

Sometimes it feels like the mind knows many things all at once. Sometimes it feels more like popcorn—individual things being known, popping in and out of existence. Sometimes it can feel like there's a separation between the knowing and the known. It feels like there's a distance, or it's clearly apparent that there's a difference between what is known and the knowing. Sometimes it feels like there's an actual separation.

It can feel like there's a lot of space around the object. Often there's that quality of feeling like there's space around the experience. Sometimes people point to that kind of feeling of having space around the experience as being what it's like to be mindful—that's what I'm going for, that's the experience I'm looking for, that spacious feeling around what's happening. But sometimes it doesn't have that feeling of spaciousness or separation. It feels like the mindfulness is right in the middle of what's happening.

And so again, being curious: Is there awareness? That question, that simple question—aware—seems almost like a throwaway question. Because if we can ask the question, almost by definition... I have known people to just kind of repeat "aware, aware, aware, aware," not aware, having it become almost like a mantra they've gotten lost in. But if there's any recognition of that "aware," there is awareness.

And yet it seems like it might be just a throwaway question—if I can ask the question, why bother? If I think of even asking the question, why bother? But what it begins to do is point the mind to be curious about the awareness itself. Aware? And using that question when there's any sense of uncertainty—am I aware? Am I aware?—often that doubt is about a different experience of awareness that we're not familiar with. So trusting that: okay, aware, yeah, no idea what I'm aware of, but knowing that I'm aware.

Attitude

Andrea Fella · 37 min

> In this talk from the Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella offers a nuanced exploration of attitude as a gateway to understanding our relationship with experience. She distinguishes between direct attitudes arising in response to pleasant or unpleasant sensations, habitual patterns that color even neutral experiences, and the often-unexamined beliefs and agendas we bring to meditation itself—thoughts like "I need more clarity" or "this is the wrong experience."
> Fella emphasizes that attitude isn't something to figure out intellectually, but rather something to invite into awareness through gentle inquiry: "How am I with this?" She notes that balanced states—okayness, ease, loving attention—often go unrecognized because we assume "that's how it's supposed to be." Equally important is recognizing when delusion operates, often not as an emotional flavor but as unexamined belief. The question "What is being believed right now?" can illuminate these hidden assumptions.
> Practically, she suggests checking attitude during moments of struggle, when mindfulness returns after being lost, and notably when practice seems to be going well—as this may reveal subtle grasping or delusion. This exploration connects directly to the Buddha's definition of Nibbāna as the absence of greed (lobha), aversion (dosa), and delusion (moha). By becoming curious about these three unwholesome roots without trying to change them, we create conditions for their release and for wholesome states to arise more naturally.

This morning I'd like to offer some reflections about attitude—a little more exploration of that side of the practice.

Exploring attitude is a way of beginning to look at what our relationship is to experience. That's another word that could be used for attitude: relationship. What's the relationship to experience? Or maybe simply: How am I with this? There's what's happening, and there's how we are with it.

In terms of that relationship, there may be a very direct kind of connection. Something's happening in the present moment—a body sensation that's unpleasant, and a relationship of not liking. A sound or a sight that's pleasant, and a relationship of appreciation or enjoyment. That's probably the most direct kind of attitude: What's the experience, what's the object, and what's the relationship to that object?

And then there are attitudes that are more like habitual patterns. They may not be directly related to the experience but may in fact flavor the experience because of a kind of coloring that's already in the mind. In my own case, I had a very habitual, aversive mind, and when it was in that state, even very neutral experience—such as seeing somebody's sneakers at the end of my walking path—could have a very aversive relationship to that experience. So sometimes the attitude is much more of a habitual flavor. Some of those we carry around with us for quite a while.

Another way that attitude can show up is not so much directly about the experience or our habitual relationship to things, but more about our relationship to the meditation itself. This can be connected to our habitual relationships to other things, because we tend to carry our habits of mind into our meditation. Our relationship to the meditation might include agendas, beliefs: I need to pay attention in this way. Some other experience should be happening. This is the wrong experience. This is the right experience. I'm doing well. I'm failing. These thoughts, beliefs, and relationships to the meditation itself are also forms of attitude, forms of this relationship. If the unpleasant experience isn't going away, I must be doing it wrong. I need more clarity. So many of these kinds of thoughts and beliefs—because they are about the meditation—can sometimes be seen not as something to know. Oh, believing it needs to be more clear—that's what's happening right now.

And then of course there is the balanced relationship to experience: the okayness, the ease that whatever is happening is not a problem, that there's ease with whatever is happening. A flavor of allowing, a loving attention, a kind attention—all of those relationships to experience are also really useful to notice when they are happening. Again, that might go right by us, because "that's the way it's supposed to be in meditation." Almost that belief—that this is the way it's supposed to be—might prevent us from really seeing: Oh, this is what kind attention is like. This is the experience of kindness. This is the experience of allowing and okayness. No problem. That's what this is like.

And so we check the attitude from time to time. Sometimes when we check the attitude, ask that question—What's going on? What's the relationship?—something is very clear. And again, this isn't something to think about. It's not something to try to figure out, but much more to just invite an attitude to show itself, to come into conscious awareness. Sometimes it's very clear. When we ask, "How am I with this?" sometimes it's just right there. Most surprisingly, we haven't really clearly seen it. Oh yeah, that's what's happening. I don't like this. Okay, not liking—that's also happening.

And sometimes it's not so clear. We orient to exploring, opening to the attitude, and nothing particularly shows up. We've rung the doorbell and nobody seems to be answering the door. If that happens, don't go digging. Don't try to figure it out. Just continue.

What am I aware of? Am I aware? What's here?

Sometimes an attitude might not be so obvious because, while there's always some relationship present, it will either be some flavor of greed, aversion, or delusion, or some flavor of balance of mind. One of those will always be there. But sometimes they may not be so clear, perhaps because they're subtle. The attitudes can have a wide range. Sometimes it might be the subtlest form of leaning in—"Oh, what's that?" Or sometimes the attitude is more in the flavor of wise attitude, where some of those wise attitudes are a little subtle too. Calm. Okayness. We don't tend to recognize those kinds of experiences.

Sometimes an attitude might not be so clear because it's in the realm of delusion. Delusion is harder to know, harder to see by its very nature. Delusion can be expressed as disconnection from experience. It might be expressed or felt or known or experienced as confusion. But quite often, I would say, delusion expresses itself not in terms of an emotional flavor but more as a belief.

This can be a way in sometimes—a kind of deepening question around attitude: What is being believed right now? What is being believed? And if a belief is revealed, again, with all the experience of opening to attitude and recognizing something's here, that's what's happening. Believing is happening right now. We don't need to try to change a belief, and it's useful to recognize it as a belief.

Another question that can be supportive if it's not so clear what the attitude is—and again, it's not a problem if it's not clear, just continue—I've also found another broader question. It's even really more broad than checking the attitude: a broader question of "What else is happening right now?" Sometimes that can shake the mind from its habits of what it's inclined to look at, what it's used to looking at, what it's familiar with looking at. To kind of step back is almost like, "Oh, maybe something else. What else is here? What else is happening right now?"

There are some particularly useful times to check the attitude that I've found in my own practice. In general, as I've said, not to do this a lot—not to check the attitude every time we check our experience, "What's obvious? What's the attitude? And what's the attitude to that? And what's the attitude to that?" That gets really exhausting. So just from time to time.

And yet there are some good times to check the attitude. If it feels like there's any struggle in the meditation, check the attitude. If it feels like there's any kind of sense of a problem, or something's wrong, or this isn't right—that itself is revealing an attitude. So check the attitude there. And as I mentioned yesterday, when mindfulness returns after having been lost—mindfulness has disappeared and reappears—that can also be a good time to check the attitude, because an attitude could have shifted while we were lost.

And then, if it feels like it's going really well, check the attitude. That may reveal, when it's going really well, subtle beliefs of "This is right. This is the way it's supposed to be. I'm doing well. I want more of this." So it might reveal a subtle greed or some delusion around "supposed to be like this." But it also can help us to check in and see wise attitude when it's going well—help us to recognize what balanced mind is like, what that loving attention is like.

This aspect of exploring the attitude is how this practice leads to freedom. Because so much of the undercurrents of our mind are motivated by greed, aversion, and delusion. And unless we are curious about what's the motivation, what's underlying this, it may never be seen. We're so habitually oriented in ways that we don't tend to see what's habitual. And also, these relationships can be very subtle and very deep, very deeply conditioned.

And so this is very direct. We are opening to what's the relationship, curious about: Is greed, aversion, delusion here? Is there balance of mind here? The curiosity, the willingness to understand and explore what's here around the greed, aversion, delusion—this curiosity and willingness to understand the greed, aversion, delusion creates the conditions for its release.

When we see and recognize loving attention, balanced attention, that creates the conditions for those wholesome states to arise more frequently.

And so this exploration is particularly connected, very directly, to the Buddha's description of freedom. What is Nibbana? he said. The absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion. This indeed is Nibbana.

And the freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion happens as we explore and are curious about greed, aversion, and delusion.

Freedom. That's the possibility of this practice.

CHAPTER 137

Trust

Andrea Fella · 45 min

> In this contemplative talk from Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella addresses a common challenge practitioners face: doubting whether simple present-moment awareness is "enough." She points to how we often look for signs or guideposts to confirm we're practicing correctly, when in fact the capacity to be present and know experience as it unfolds is itself the path.
> Fella explores an unfamiliar kind of trust that the Buddha points toward—not the trust of holding on or clinging to something reliable, but rather a trust of release and letting go. This stands in contrast to our habitual tendency to trust our thoughts, beliefs, and ideas about where we should be. She reminds us that the content of any moment is impermanent and unreliable (anicca), yet our capacity to be present with whatever arises can be trusted.
> The practical instruction here is beautifully simple: relaxing supports the mind's natural capacity for presence and curiosity. Rather than searching for understanding and insight—which can itself become an obstacle—we can recognize that searching, sensation, sound, emotions, and thoughts are all simply experience happening right now, available to be known. As mindfulness (sati) becomes more established and stabilized, wisdom naturally grows through this trusting of the unfolding present moment.

Remembering how simple the practice is. Relaxing supports this capacity of our mind to be present and curious. Just recognizing that we're aware, what is here, what is obvious, what's already available, what's already being received—that is sufficient when the mind has a balance, an interest, a curiosity to recognize it as experience happening in the present moment, as human experience.

Sometimes the practice is so simple we can have doubt or have a sense: Is this working? Am I doing it right? We're looking for some kind of sign or guidepost to point the way or point out that we're doing it right somehow. And so we need to trust, because sometimes these signs don't happen, or we don't recognize that the simplicity of being able to be present in this moment for whatever is here—knowing it as experience in the present moment—that is our guide. That is the direction. What else would be our guide than being present here now?

We open, allowing awareness to connect to now, here. And this is all there is, all that can be experienced. The past is gone, the future not here. All there is, is this moment. Can we learn to trust that being available and present for this moment is our work?

We so often trust something else, some idea about where we should be. We trust our thoughts, our beliefs. As we begin to trust this moment and this moment and this moment—trust not the content but our capacity to be here with it. The content of this moment is impermanent, unreliable. We typically trust holding on to something, clinging to something. And yet the trust the Buddha points to is such an unfamiliar kind of trust: a trust of release, the trust of letting go. That understanding comes as the mindfulness is more established, stabilized. Here. Now. Very naturally.

We are so busy trying to find understanding and insight that we may miss it. Searching—the mind searching—can that be known? Searching. Searching is happening right now. Sensation happening right now. Sound happening right now. Emotions, thoughts, happening right now, known.

And so, exploring this possibility of trusting the simplicity: when the mind has a sense of being present, can be here in this moment, trusting that. Trusting that whatever is being known in this moment, whether it seems simple and ordinary or extraordinary, that is the experience of this moment. And wisdom naturally grows as we trust this unfolding.

Recognizing Delusion

Andrea Fella · 57 min

> In this comprehensive talk, Andrea Fella examines delusion (moha), the third of the three root kilesas alongside greed and aversion. While greed and aversion become relatively familiar through practice, delusion is harder to see by its very nature—yet not impossible to recognize.
> Fella identifies three levels of delusion: the obvious disconnection from experience when lost in thought or spacing out; personal and cultural delusion arising from conditioning, including views, beliefs, and biases that filter our perception; and the most fundamental human delusion that comes with being born—our tendency to perceive what is impermanent as permanent, what is unreliable as reliable, and what is not-self as self. Drawing on the Vipallāsa Sutta's teaching on distortions, she explains how these misperceptions move from simple perception to thought to deeply entrenched views that resist correction even in the face of contradicting evidence.
> Through vivid personal stories, including mistaking bat calls for a pig being slaughtered, Fella illustrates how thoroughly we relate to experience through concepts rather than direct perception. She emphasizes that we cannot simply choose non-delusion, but through mindful awareness of our relationship to experience—noticing beliefs as beliefs, recognizing when the mind is filtered—we create conditions for wisdom to grow. When we occasionally see through delusion, even briefly, we gain the capacity to recognize it when it returns, knowing 'this mind is not trustable right now.'

Tonight the topic is delusion, and this has come up a few times in the groups with questions about how to see it and how we can recognize it. We've talked about it some in the groups, but I thought I would explore it thoroughly this evening.

Delusion, as you all know, is one of the three root kilesas of which the Buddha said, if we can become free of greed, aversion, and delusion, that is freedom. Freedom from greed, freedom from aversion, freedom from delusion—this indeed is Nibbana.

While greed and aversion we get relatively familiar with in both their subtle and obvious forms, we start to recognize them especially as we check into the attitude in our mind. We may see subtle forms of greed, like just leaning into experience, or the obvious forms, like really wanting that second piece of chocolate. Likewise with aversion. We get pretty familiar with greed and aversion, and both Carol and I have spoken about that quite a bit.

Delusion is harder to see by its very nature, of course. Harder to see, but not impossible. Tonight I'd like to offer some information to hopefully lay the terrain around delusion so that you might begin to recognize it in your experience.

One of the main ways that delusion functions is as a filter on our experience—we're seeing through something that's not allowing us to see things as they are. Yatabhuta, as Carol was speaking about last week: things as they have come to be. When the mind is clear from greed, aversion, and delusion, we can see things clearly. But filters—I like to use that word—it's kind of like we have a lens on that colors our perception, how we take in experience. That is a form of delusion, when we don't recognize that there's a filter there of some sort.

Greed and aversion themselves can become filters on our experience. In one way, we can see that delusion can arise when greed and aversion are there. Some of you have reported this, described this in your experience—seeing how there's an aversive state, for instance, and then just recognizing, "Oh my gosh, there's this filter, this aversive filter. No matter where I turn and look, I look at the flowers and it's like, enough already." Just seeing that the filter is distorting how we take in experience. That distortion is a form of delusion.

Delusion can arise out of greed and aversion, but fundamentally delusion is more foundational. Greed and aversion themselves are really based on a misperception, a delusion, a misunderstanding, a kind of view or belief that underlies our mind.

For instance, wanting or desire—greed itself is that pull towards something, that sticky quality, that "ooh, yeah," that heading in that direction. Aversion itself is the quality of mind that wants to separate. But the delusion that underlies greed is the belief that getting that thing will make me happy. Greed wouldn't arise if that belief weren't there. Likewise with aversion: there's a belief in there that if I could somehow separate from that unpleasant thing, then I'd be happy. That's the delusion embedded in aversion.

Greed and aversion are founded on delusion, and we can begin to see in them the beliefs that are operating. We've been talking about looking at beliefs in the groups and some in the hall as well, almost as a way to check in—a different form of checking the attitude. Sometimes we can ask, "What's being believed right now?" That can begin to reveal some of these underlying delusions.

Now, beliefs are not always delusion. But when they are not seen as belief, there is some way that they're functioning as a filter. When we don't see a belief as a belief, we are taking it as truth, and there's a form of delusion in not recognizing it is a belief. This is a big way that delusion functions—through this aspect in our minds of views, beliefs, ideas, and opinions. That's some of what we'll explore this evening.

I'd like to explore different aspects of delusion. Many of them are based in these different kinds of views and beliefs, but the most obvious kind of delusion, the one that's maybe the easiest to see or the one we're most familiar with, is just basically a disconnection from experience. That's one aspect we'll talk about: this not being connected to experience.

The second form of delusion we'll look at is what I like to call personal or cultural delusion. It's based on our own conditioning—the conditioning of our families, the conditioning of our lives, the conditioning of our culture, the views, ideas, and beliefs that is what we're swimming in, in terms of what we take to be reality, what we take to be true. That level of beliefs and views is a big part of how we relate to the world. This is a kind of level of experience that we begin to see, and many of you have talked about seeing this: seeing patterns and habits of the mind wanting to do certain things, orienting towards familiarity, for instance, or orienting towards new experience. These are conditioned. These are patterns and habits conditioned in our own personal lives based on our families, our cultures, our conditioning.

Then a deeper level of delusion seems to be what I like to call human delusion.

These seem to come with being born as a human being. The Buddha describes some very fundamental forms of delusion that distort how we take in experience, that don't let us really see things as they have come to be, things as they are.

We'll try to cover all of these at some level. While I said I'm going to explore this topic in some depth, I spent one entire series at my center in Redwood City—eight weeks—covering delusion. So to some extent, this feels like just the tip of the iceberg. And yet, I think there will be enough here for you to begin to recognize it.

It's not so much—and again, I want to restate this—pointing to this topic and talking about delusion is not the instruction to go see if you can see delusion. This is a description of how delusion may be seen. The description may create the conditions for there to be a seeing of it. So you don't have to go do this. It's much more just information that may help you begin to recognize delusion when it's happening. Because it's happening all the time. Delusion happens a lot.

This first kind—this not connecting with experience, this being disconnected—basically, lack of awareness is a form of delusion. When we're not mindful, this can be a form of delusion. When we're not aware of what's going on, when we're lost in thought, when the mind has created its story and has taken up residence in its thought world. It's so amazing to see this happen.

Often we see it not so much when we are in it, because when we're in it, we're just in that world, believing it. But when we're curious about the moment of mindfulness returning, sometimes, as I've been pointing to, we get this contrast between what it's like to not be aware and what it's like to be aware. In the moment of mindfulness returning, we can get this sense of what the mind was doing—of being completely absorbed in the reality of a thought. It almost feels like a cartoon bubble that bursts.

When we are in that world, it's like we've fully taken up residence there, and we fully believe it in a way—fully believe its existence in that moment. We can see this as we come out of the world of thought. Sometimes we can get that flavor of how much we had invested, how much the mind had invested in those thoughts and in that experience. And then coming back, it's like, "Wow, that doesn't exist."

Sometimes, when mindfulness returns with a lot of clarity, there can be this sense of "Wow, that was so much delusion in that previous moment."

At one point I noticed my mind had woken up into a thought about being with an old partner—someone I hadn't been with in years, and had kind of worked through the reactivity around. In coming out of that thought world, there was this confusion. "What? I'm not in relationship with that person. What's going on?" The mind had so completely invested in it that for those moments, it believed that relationship was current. Coming out of it really startled the mind, to see how much it had believed that.

We can see this—see how much our minds believe things—through being lost in our thoughts. And so we can start to be curious about this kind of disconnection in the moment of returning, in the moment when mindfulness returns. We can become familiar with mindfulness, but also develop some familiarity with that quality of mind that is disconnected.

There are other flavors of this kind of disconnection: spacing out, dullness, sleepiness, even restlessness sometimes, where the mind can be disconnected from experience. We talked about this a little bit last week—that sometimes we can have a belief or view that we can't be mindful while spacing out is happening. A sense that certain states of mind are inherently non-mindful, spacing out being one of them perhaps. And yet, mindfulness can infuse spacing out as well.

I think I said last week, if there's the thought "I can't be mindful while X is happening"—"I can't be mindful while spacing out is happening"—when I have that kind of thought, I just don't believe it anymore. Let's see: how might it be possible to be mindful while that is happening? There's a curiosity about these states in which we are habitually not mindful.

This area of delusion where we're disconnected from experience is probably the most obvious way that we see delusion, or kind of recognize it after the fact. We don't so much often see it while it's happening, but we notice as we come out of it. We see how thoroughly the mind had been caught, and we may get a little flavor, in the waking up, of that quality of mind being stuck in that world, believing those thoughts.

So we may be able to see the mind heading in that direction. We talked about this last week with noticing where mindfulness gets lost. As we wake up into experience, it begins to familiarize the mind with those kinds of states. We can wake up into spacing out, and if instead of thinking, "Oh, spacing out, let me change the experience," we recognize, "Oh, spacing out—this is being aware of spacing out." This begins to help the mind connect with those states in which we're habitually not mindful. Curiosity is a real ally for us.

The second level of delusion—this personal delusion, cultural delusion, delusion based on societal conditioning, our own conditioning—this is really where these filters begin to come into play: the views, the ideas. As we're conditioned, as we go about our lives and live our lives, we are being conditioned in so many different ways.

A lot of our beliefs and views, part of the reason they're so deeply embedded and not even necessarily seen as beliefs, is because they don't tend to come in through language. We're not really taught these views—many of them. Some were taught explicitly, but many are just absorbed based on how we see interactions happening around us. They're kind of non-verbal beliefs in a way. What's right, what's wrong. Simple things, like culturally how close you stand to somebody you don't know, or how much eye contact you make. These are things we just absorb. There's a lot of this conditioning that happens that we just take to be, "Well, this is the way things are in human interactions."

It's not until we find ourselves in another culture that we're startled. I think this is one of the reasons I liked to travel so much—to be startled by these deeply embedded views and beliefs. "Oh, that's not the way it always works. That's the way it works in my life." When we can see discomfort in a situation, that may be a sign of some view being challenged.

When we're immersed in a view in that way, we don't see it as a view. We just take it to be truth—the way things are. Views are pretty active in our minds. They shape our minds. They shape how we take in experience. While we think we are these kind of neutral recorders of experience—almost like our eyes are cameras and our ears are microphones just picking up experience—there's much more active shaping of our experience that comes partly through our views, our beliefs, our agendas, how our culture has shaped us, how our families have shaped us. What we actually notice, some of that is shaped by our views.

There's been a lot of study about this in recent years. There's a term—confirmation bias—that when we have a view, our system tends to orient towards taking in information that confirms that view, and likewise not taking in information that disconfirms it. This is a form of delusion. It's not necessarily making us unaware of everything, but there are certain things we are not aware of. There is some lack of awareness because the view is like a filter with holes in it—it lets certain things in and not others.

Views really shape our lives. What are our views, our beliefs about who we are, what we're capable of? Our views and beliefs about others, who they are? These views and beliefs can prevent us from seeing other people as they really are. We box people in. We limit them based on our views about them. And we limit ourselves based on our views about ourselves, what we think we're capable of.

Then there are some pernicious cultural views that shape us too. Some of these cultural views are responsible for some of the biggest kinds of suffering in our world: racism, sexism, homophobia—the views and beliefs around skin color and gender and sexual orientation and gender identity. These views and beliefs shape how we relate to each other.

Certain cultural views just come in through osmosis in a way. One that seems so pervasive in the United States is the idea that this is the land of opportunity—anybody who works hard enough can achieve their dreams. This kind of comes in somehow. Believing this as truth, we may not be aware that there are limitations on opportunities.

Often, the color of our skin, our orientation, our gender identity can influence those opportunities. And so this kind of view can prevent—in particular, white people, white heterosexual people—from seeing the privilege that this carries, that the opportunities are available for certain people and not necessarily available equally. This can lead to the not seeing, the delusion around privilege. White privilege is basically a form of delusion, this not seeing.

These filters, what we take in and what we don't take in—it doesn't even have to be a view that we're holding deeply that has this filtering quality where we see certain things and not see other things. It can be as simple as an agenda, something that we pick up for a very short time: "I'm going to do this." That agenda orients us towards the task at hand. This is useful. It helps us filter out things that aren't relevant to the task at hand, kind of focuses us in. It's called selective attention—there's a psychological name for it. When we have an agenda to do something, our attention selects things that are relevant to that agenda, and we miss, we do not see things that are not relevant to that agenda.

Now again, this is a useful functioning of our minds. It actually can help us accomplish things. And yet there's the misunderstanding here—the belief that we're getting the full set of information. Even when we are engaged in a selective task, something we're told later might surprise us: "Did you see that happen?"

There was a study—many of you have probably heard about this—where people were given a task to watch on a video the number of times a basketball passed between players in white t-shirts. There were different colored t-shirts, and they had to count, so they had to do quite a bit of monitoring and tracking when the basketball was being passed from one person to another. That was the task. That was the agenda. So they watched. And most people could correctly say the right number of passes between the people in the white t-shirts. And a few people said, "Was there like a gorilla that walked through that video?" And some people were like, "No, there was no gorilla." But they actually played it back, and there was a gorilla—a person in a gorilla suit who had walked through the basketball court while this was going on. And a large number of people did not see the gorilla, just didn't see it at all.

That's selective attention at work. It's kind of stunning to see that video played back and say, "Wow, that's amazing how I could not have even seen that." It creates this awe at how the mind can actually not see something. It begins to help us recognize: my mind is not seeing what is there. It's seeing what it is expecting.

So the views, the shaping of our minds—this can be a learning from that. And yet I read in one review of this study that there were some number of people who, after the video was played back, said, "That cannot be the same video, because I would have seen the gorilla." Now that is really delusion—the inability to know that this is how our minds work. We need some respect for our minds. It's useful that it does this, but we also have to have some respect. This is one of the things that gives me great pause around single-witness identification. It's so easy for an agenda of even a moment to obscure information.

Knowing this is helpful. There are some other ways that views are formed personally, but I think I'm going to move on to the more human side of this, the deeper kinds of delusion. But again, just to orient, or to be curious about what are the views that are happening—when we can recognize the views, the beliefs that are happening, we don't have to tell ourselves not to believe that. We don't have to say, "It's a view, it's a belief, so I shouldn't believe it." But it's useful to know it is a view. It's useful to know that it's happening and maybe filtering our experience. Even recognizing, "Oh, this is what's being believed," is really helpful. We don't have to try to convert that belief into non-belief. It may be a useful belief, but still it's useful to notice it as belief.

So that can be a simple kind of version of checking the attitude, almost: What's being believed right now?

So the deeper kind of delusion—a more fundamental human form of delusion—is something we seem to share simply because we have our human minds and bodies and brains and the way things work in there. This is a more insidious form of delusion because not only do our family and friends share these delusions, but pretty much everybody on the planet shares them until we start having some teachings and some understanding around how our minds work.

One of the key aspects of the way human delusion works is that we tend to relate to experience through concept and believe that concept to be the reality. We have a perception of some kind and then we take that perception to be what's actually out there. There's a range of levels to this. It starts with simple perception—just seeing something and identifying it. That sound is the sound of a mourning dove. That sight, that lump on the road, is maybe a dead chipmunk. There's a perception there.

Then there's a deepening of the way delusion begins to work: we begin to think about that perception. The teaching I'm referring to here is the Vipallasa Sutta, which is basically about distortions. Vipallasa means distortion or inversion. It talks about three levels of this. There are distortions of perception, where we're taking our perceptions to be reality. There are distortions of thought, where we start thinking about the thing—like when I talked about taking birth into that world of thought. That's the distortion of thought. We take our thoughts to be reality. And then there are the views, the beliefs. That's the third level, the deepest level.

Some of you have heard this story a number of times. When I was in Burma practicing at Shwe Oo Min, my dorm was relatively close to the wall of the monastery, and the sounds of the village came over the wall—the loudspeakers, human noises, all kinds of things. Each evening I would hear this repeated sound, a kind of squealing. I identified it or perceived it as a pig squealing. That was what I had heard squealing before, so that was the perception: the sound perceived as a pig.

I heard this regularly each night, and at some point the mind created this idea. Here's where it shifts into thought. I created this idea that this squealing sound sounded kind of distressed, and I got the notion that there was a butcher on the other side of that wall, that each evening at that time the butcher was slaughtering a pig for the next day to sell at the market. There was a lot of emotional response to this—compassion for the pig, for the pain of that. So there was the sound, the perception, and then the belief, the thought that this pig was being slaughtered. Now, I knew this was an idea. I knew I didn't really know what was happening on the other side of the wall. But still, there was the belief and the emotional response to it. Perception creating that response.

Then one evening I was out walking at that time of day instead of sitting in my room. It was dusk, and I was walking up and down the quarter-mile road in the middle of the monastery. There were these swooping creatures flying by really close. I thought, "Oh, those are bats." And they were squealing. That was the sound I had been hearing.

While I had some idea that the notion of a pig being slaughtered was a view, it had not entered my mind that the belief that it was a pig at all was also a view. There's no need for compassion when it's not only not being slaughtered—it's not even a pig.

So again, this pattern: the mind tends to relate to experience not through actual experience but through our concepts, through our ideas, through our beliefs, at a very basic level. Looking at the flowers, looking at the trees, looking at people, hearing sounds—what we perceive, we take to be reality. We relate to experience through our perceptions, create thoughts and views about that. And largely this goes unnoticed until perception makes a mistake, until our—

It gets pointed out to us that our perceptions and our thoughts are wrong.

The thing that the Buddha points to—or actually I think it's more in the commentaries that it's pointed to—this kind of deepening entrenchment of delusion, is that it's relatively easy for the correct perception to unmask the incorrect perception. So as soon as I saw the bats and heard the squealing, it was clear: "Oh, that wasn't a pig." It wasn't like I held on to the idea. "No, no, it was really a pig. There really is a pig on the other side of that wall." It was so clear. That perception was seen through pretty quickly because it was just a misperception.

When it gets into the thought realm, it gets a little harder sometimes to break that delusion or belief. And when we get to views, it gets even harder. We can see this in how confirmation bias works.

I read a study about people who have differing views on a topic. I don't know whether it was political, but they were doing some work on trying to understand how views, whether views can come closer together, whether people can see things as views, how they get hardened into views. They did this study about two people with very different views on a topic, and each one was encouraged to try to convince the other person of their own view, to try to point out why their view was appropriate or correct. What seemed to happen in that situation is that the views got more entrenched. We tend to, because of confirmation bias, orient to things that confirm those views. We don't orient to things that disconfirm them—we actively discount them. When we get to the level of belief, it gets harder to take in information that disconfirms the view. We just don't go there. Even if we hear it, we somehow figure that's wrong, it's bad information.

This is going on so much in our country, in the United States right now, this kind of entrenchment in views. The commentaries pointed to this: when it gets to the level of belief, it's very much clung to. People will cling to beliefs even in the face of evidence to the contrary. This is one of the ways that delusion works in our mind—this entrenchment from perception to thought to belief.

Another very foundational teaching in this same text, the text on the distortions, is that the Buddha points to how we tend to take what's impermanent to be permanent, we tend to take what is unreliable as reliable, and we tend to take what is not self as self. You probably recognize these three: anicca, dukkha, anatta. Anicca—impermanent. Dukkha—unreliable, suffering. Anatta—not self. The distortion, the inversion, is that we tend to orient in the world as if things were permanent, as if things were reliable, as if things were self—turning on its head things as they actually are. This is the most fundamental form of delusion in a way, this kind of distortion.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya says of this kind of delusion: "Delusion doesn't mask the object, it masks the nature of the object." It masks the true nature of the object. So we see something, but we take it to be permanent. It's not that we're not knowing, not that we're not aware of something—but we are seeing it in a distorted way. We are seeing it as reliable, permanent, or self.

We can begin to be curious about these tendencies, the tendency to land on something as solid, to take something as being lasting. If anything feels solid or stable in your experience, be curious about it. Notice that feeling of solid and stable and investigate it. What does the mind take to be permanent?

It's interesting—in my sense, we create this kind of permanent impermanent. We know that things are not really forever at some level of our mind. We know that things are not forever. We know at some level that we will die. I actually saw this today as I was walking up the hill. I was thinking about being in here and reflecting on what I was going to say, thinking about sitting up here in front of the room, and I thought: in this moment, I'm believing that's going to happen. I'm taking myself as permanent. In this moment, I'm going to get there. And yet—it was really windy and I had seen some pretty big branches down on the road—who knows? I might get clobbered by some tree falling down and not make it.

Even for little moments, we take up residence in the belief or the view of permanence.

And it's belief in permanence in ourselves. There's a sense, a way almost, that we believe in our immortality.

The Buddha encouraged us to actually reflect on this regularly. There's a teaching on the five subjects for frequent recollection, and four of those subjects have to do with reflecting on impermanence: I am of the nature to age—I have not gone beyond aging. I am of the nature to sicken—I have not gone beyond sickness. I am of the nature to die—I have not gone beyond dying. All that I have, beloved and pleasing, will become otherwise, will become separated from me.

When we see, even in just little flashes or moments, how we project ourselves into the future—that kind of "oh, I will be there"—that's a moment of taking up residence in permanence and believing it. So we can just be curious about that. We can also be curious about what it is we're taking to be solid or stable. Is it really solid or stable? How long does it last?

And seeing what's unreliable as reliable—this is the perspective on which greed and aversion are based. We think there's something out there that's reliable as a source for happiness, something that brings pleasure. "That's going to make me happy." There's this form of taking what is unreliable as a source for lasting happiness, as being as good as it gets, being the place where we can land. This aspect of taking what is unreliable to be reliable is the ground out of which greed and aversion grow.

So again, beginning to be curious: Where are we looking for happiness? That searching. Several of you have talked about this, the searching, and some of you have pointed to a kind of pure sense of wanting—not even knowing what you want, but just wanting something. At certain points in our practice, the mind may just be like, "Yeah, there's got to be somewhere, somewhere I can land and find happiness." This is a very deeply conditioned belief. It's not hardwired—it is possible to see through it—but it's really deeply conditioned.

There have been times in my practice when I was seeing the mind just craving some place to land where it could rest, and I was aware of that. Just like I mentioned in one of the groups today: "Yep, I see you. You're not going to find anything, but search away. Have at it." Because this deep way in which delusion manifests—we're not going to be able to just say, "Oh, I'll stop doing that." If we could do that, that would be fantastic. But it's so deeply conditioned that often what we can simply do is know that it's happening.

Just watching the mind searching, searching, searching for some place to land and find happiness. Okay, that's what's happening. I let the mind do that. It was like, "Have at it. You won't find anything, but I can't stop you, so I'll just hang out with you while you do this." It was kind of sweet in a way—this part of my mind that just thought, "No, I've got to exhaust every single possibility." Okay, we'll let you try.

These delusions are embedded really deep. Sometimes all we can do is watch them unfold, watch our mind believing them, and know: this is the mind believing something. This is delusion.

The time is short, so I'm not going to go into not-self—maybe one of us will talk about that another time. But one piece I want to point to is that one of the ways we begin to really see delusion—and part of the reason I could see that searching as just a delusional mind—was because there had been, at some point, the mind recognizing at a very deep level the letting go of that searching, and a different kind of happiness becoming available. The seeing through of delusion can happen.

We can see through delusions at many different levels. There are various ways of pointing to delusion, and there are different levels and depths of it. We may see through it at some point, and when we do, it's quite stunning. Some of you have mentioned this sense of "Wow, this is so obvious. How could I not see this?" It becomes so clear that it doesn't make any sense to want something. We see through the delusion there.

But then, minutes later, maybe an hour later, sometime later, that state of understanding shifts. The seeing from that perspective, the wisdom of that seeing, has a life of its own, and our delusion comes back. Yet in that coming back, when we've seen through it and it returns, rather than having the sense of "What am I doing wrong that now I can't see that anymore?"—perhaps we can have the sense of "Oh, now I can see this as delusion."

Because once we've seen it, once we've had that kind of breaking through to recognize what it's like without that delusion, then when that delusion is functioning, we can know: this is delusion at work. This mind is not trustable. This mind is filtered by these views, these ideas, this perspective. It's not seeing things clearly. We can know that.

So delusion can be seen in this way. We can't choose non-delusion, but we can practice in this simple way: what's here in this moment, noticing our relationship to experience. This creates the conditions for the understanding, the seeing, for the wisdom to grow. It creates the conditions for wisdom to grow, and it's wisdom that sees through delusion. We don't do that. We don't make it happen.

CHAPTER 139

Awareness of Awareness

Andrea Fella · 43 min

> In this guided meditation, Andrea Fella invites practitioners to explore a subtle but profound shift in attention: from being aware of objects to recognizing awareness itself. While we typically orient our practice around knowing the specific qualities of experience—body sensations like vibration, pressure, or heat; sounds; and mind states such as calm or fear—we rarely turn our attention to the knowing faculty itself.
> Andrea offers a gentle approach to this exploration, suggesting it feels less like turning around to look at awareness directly and more like stepping back, broadening, or falling back. She notes that objects don't disappear in this process; rather, they simply cease to be the primary focus. The practice involves simply knowing that we are aware, without needing to understand precisely how we know. She guides practitioners to notice how awareness receives objects—whether attention feels like it's shifting and moving, or whether awareness feels still while objects appear within it. The experience might feel smooth and flowing, or jerky and popping; broad and diffuse, or focused and precise.
> Significantly, Andrea emphasizes that neither attending to objects nor attending to awareness itself is superior. The mind naturally moves between both orientations, and practice involves recognizing when the mind is curious about objects versus when it's interested in awareness itself. This balanced approach honors the mind's natural capacity to explore both dimensions of experience, offering practitioners a relaxed and receptive way to deepen their understanding of the nature of mind.

Are you aware? And what are you aware of?

Awareness of the objects of experience is often our most familiar way to practice and be with experience, to know that we're aware. It's our most familiar way to pay attention—to know the objects of experience. We recognize some specific qualities to the experience: body sensations like vibration, hardness, pulsing, tingling, coolness, heat, pressure, lightness. We recognize sound. We recognize mind states—happiness, perhaps having an uplifting quality; fear, a feeling of pulling back; calm, a settledness, a non-agitation of mind. And so we recognize the objects of experience.

Unless it's pointed out to us, much less often would we notice or be aware of awareness itself.

Are you aware?

We begin to recognize awareness not by trying to turn around and look at it directly, but more through recognizing how it experiences objects. It's not like trying to turn around and look at awareness. To me it feels more like a stepping back, a broadening, or even a falling back. And the objects don't disappear. They may not be particularly drawing the attention.

Are you aware?

The mind has the capacity to recognize awareness, though it is not something that has probably been cultivated much.

Are you aware?

We may know that we are aware without really knowing how we know. That's kind of the simplest way of recognizing it—just knowing that we are aware. It's okay not to know how we know we are aware. Explore the possibility of resting, just knowing that you're aware. Resting and aware.

We can become aware of how awareness receives objects. Not so much interested in the objects or the qualities of the objects, but in how awareness is knowing them. There may be objects appearing in awareness in succession, one after another. This might feel like attention is shifting or moving. Or it might feel like awareness is very still and objects are just appearing in that awareness. It may feel like there's a kind of flow, one object to the next, very smooth. Or it may feel kind of jerky or popping—an object appears and then disappears, another one appears and then disappears. It may feel like awareness knows many things at the same time. It may feel like awareness is broad and diffuse, exploring some very vague or non-specific experience. Or it may feel very focused and precise.

There's not a better way for this to be experienced, for the experience of awareness to be happening. How is it for you in this moment?

Relax. Are you aware? What is the experience of awareness right now? Not trying to look for it, but more stepping back or falling back. The mind can know the awareness itself.

Over time, as we may begin to get familiar with touching into the experience of awareness itself, we may start to try to find it, or to put our minds in that space. And while it can be interesting to explore from time to time, even that experience of awareness itself is not somehow better than being aware of objects. Sometimes the mind will be curious about objects, taking in their qualities. Sometimes the mind will be interested in awareness itself, curious about how it knows experience.

And so we can be aware, know when the mind is interested in attending to objects and when it's interested in attending to awareness. There's this capacity to do both. And very naturally, the mind will explore both sides. So just beginning to recognize: Are you aware?

Relax and receive experience however it is for you in this moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 140

A Simple Mind

Andrea Fella · 44 min

> Drawing from a teaching by Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Andrea Fella illuminates the essential quality of simplicity in meditation practice. She shares his insight that "only when the mind is simple can wisdom develop," pointing to how a complicated mind—one caught in thinking, planning, and expecting—blocks the arising of wisdom. The mind must be simple to be truly present and to see things as they actually are.
>
> Andrea offers a liberating reframe for practitioners: when complication arises, it need not be a problem. The meditating mind itself remains simple; if there's complication, it simply becomes an object of awareness. She particularly highlights expectations as a subtle form of complication that often goes unrecognized, masked by delusion. The phrase "should be" serves as a signpost—whether we think practice should be more concentrated, more continuous, more pleasant, or have fewer thoughts, these expectations obscure the simplicity that allows insight.
> This teaching invites practitioners to release ideas about how meditation is "supposed to be" and instead recognize that whatever is arising in this moment is simply how it is. Even ordinary experience can be known with wisdom. The talk encourages a profound relaxation around practice, suggesting that when we stop trying to make meditation into something special, we discover the simplicity that was always available.

A quote from Sayadaw Uttasania: "Only when the mind is simple can wisdom develop. A complicated mind, one that thinks, plans, expects, blocks off wisdom. The mind must be simple in order to be present and in order to see things just as they are."

Sometimes there can be this simple mind—not so much that we can do it, for almost by its nature, doing might obscure that simplicity. There can be this simple mind.

And yet when it's not simple, can there be a sense of simplicity about that? Complication is happening. The meditating mind is simple. If it's complicated, it's an object. If there's complication, it's just an object. What a relief.

Expectations are one of those complications sometimes not seen. Delusion often has that quality, as we talked about last night, of masking itself. And expectations about the meditation can often be masked. If you find yourself thinking about the practice in this way—it should be some way—that phrase, "should be," is often a signpost of expectation. Should be something: more concentrated, more continuous, more interesting, more pleasant, more insight, fewer thoughts, more clarity. Whatever that is, if it's simply known as a thought or recognized as an expectation, simplicity can arise again.

Expectations are often related to some idea or view of how practice is supposed to be. And we have no idea, really, of how practice is supposed to be. Actually, what is arising, this moment's experience—this is how it is. This is what has come to be. This experience can be known, whatever it is.

Maybe experience feels ordinary. That can't be right. It's supposed to be somehow special when I'm meditating properly. But ordinary experience can be known.

Only when the mind is simple can wisdom develop. A complicated mind, one that thinks, expects, and plans, blocks off wisdom. The mind must be simple in order to be present and in order to see things just as they are.

CHAPTER 141

Mental Formations: Constructing Our Lives

Andrea Fella · 48 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella offers a deep exploration of the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā) with particular emphasis on mental formations (saṅkhāra) and their role in constructing our lived experience. She explains how the aggregates—body (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—function both as processes and as the results of those processes, drawing on the Khandha-saṃyutta teachings.

Fella illuminates how mental formations are both constructed and constructive—they arise through conditions while simultaneously fabricating all aspects of our experience. Using anger as a detailed example, she demonstrates how a single mental state can fabricate bodily sensations, feelings, perceptions, further mental formations, and even what consciousness receives. She connects this to the Buddha's teaching on dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), showing how ignorance, craving, and clinging drive the construction of dukkha, while acknowledging that these patterns are often absorbed from cultural and familial conditioning rather than being purely personal.

The practical heart of the teaching reveals how the receptive practice being cultivated naturally transforms this constructing process. When mindfulness and wisdom meet reactive states, the reinforcing power of those states is neutralized—the rut is no longer being dug. Simultaneously, wholesome mental formations like the seven factors of awakening (satta bojjhaṅgā) are strengthened simply through mindful awareness. This understanding offers practitioners a way to witness the constructed nature of experience while trusting that the very act of curious observation leads naturally toward freedom.

Seeing into our experience. And just this very simple practice. I think the other day I mentioned Sayadaw's pointing that the meditating mind is simple, not complicated. And if it feels like the meditating mind is complicated, then that's just an object. And yet this very simple mind reveals an amazing, mind-blowing mind. The complexity of what that simple mind can see is quite astounding.

Quite literally, our minds construct our lives. Everything that we experience, everything that we can experience, is a creation of our minds. I have the view or the belief that that creation of mind is related to something that's actually out there. So I do think that you're all sitting out there, and that I'm not just giving this Dharma talk to a brain in a vat somewhere. I do think that there is something that the mind is working with, is processing, but what we experience—our experience—is constructed. And because it's constructed, there's a lot of room for mistake, a lot of room for confusion.

So tonight, this is the topic: this constructing nature of our minds. I'd like to explore it through the teaching on the five aggregates, a teaching the Buddha pointed to in terms of describing our experience. This phenomenological world of our experience can be understood through these processes of body and mind. The five aggregates can be understood as five processes of body and mind: body, feeling, perceptions, mental formations, and consciousness.

The word aggregate is kind of a funny word. It's not a word in English that we use very much. And that contrasts apparently to the Pali word khandha, which is a more ordinary word that means something like group or bundle or heap—heap of stuff. But in reflecting on the word aggregate, actually it's an interesting word to use for this particular teaching from the Buddha, because this teaching around the five aggregates is both a teaching around the processes of body and mind and the results of those processes.

There's a way in which body, feeling, perception, mental formation, and consciousness can be understood as the processes by which our world is put together, but also understood in each case as being the things that are experienced. So in the case of body, for example, the body is this physical form, the four elements. And yet it's also understood as being not only the experience of pressure, heat, coolness, tension, tightness, but the process that does that.

The word aggregate can be used in both noun and verb forms, much as with the khandhas. For instance, the feeling process is defined as feeling because it feels. So it's defined as a process, but it's also defined as the thing that feeling feels: pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It's both a verb and a noun. It's both the process by which we experience and the things experienced.

The word aggregate also has that quality. It can be used as a verb—to aggregate—which means to pull together, to draw together, to collect, to group. And it can be used as a noun. The main way I've heard it used as a noun is aggregate rock—a rock that is basically made of other rocks. This is a great description of what these khandhas are. Sally Armstrong sometimes says maybe we could just translate khandhas as "stuff made of other stuff." Let's take the technical out of it.

Briefly, I want to overview the five aggregates, but where I really want to explore this evening is the constructing, the aggregate of construction: mental formations.

The first aggregate is body—this process of the four elements: earth, air, fire, water. The sensations that are felt: coolness, heat, lightness, heaviness, pressure, tension, tightness, vibration, pulsing, tingling—this whole range of physical sensations, plus also sight, sound, smell, taste. This is the realm of the body.

One thing that is particularly useful about this list of our human experience, this set of processes that make up our human experience, is that in this case one of the aggregates is physical and the other four are mental. It really lends itself well to this exploration of the mind because it teases apart the processes of mind.

Feeling, the process of feeling—feeling what? Feeling pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This is a very simple mental process responsible for feeling and the simple feeling itself. We've talked about this in the groups and in some of the talks. You're all very familiar with this aspect of experience.

Then perception—the mental process responsible for recognizing experience, categorizing experience, naming experience. The recognition of concepts comes through this: recognizing what's out in the world as objects. This happens through the field of perception. So I look out into this room and see walls and windows and zabutans and people.

And it's a process of perception, of recognizing—it's connected to memory, this perceptual process. It's connected to having been exposed to zabutans and walls and windows and people, and the mind recognizes them. It's almost like a very simple pattern-matching mechanism in some ways, this part of perception. We hear a sound and recognize a mourning dove. That pattern matching—I talked in another talk about hearing a sound and identifying it, perceiving it as a pig, and then later discovering that it was a bat. This is the process of perception at work: a recognition based on prior experience, based on memory of what something is.

So perception includes this kind of naming of experience, but it also includes our recognition of space and time. That's also part of perception—that we have a sense of distance and location and time. It's perception at work creating that understanding.

At one point in Hawaii I was meditating, and there are lots of birds there, but the birds in Hawaii are kind of like—birds rule in Hawaii. It's amazing how many birds there are, and some of them are very loud. I was meditating in my room and it felt like this 360-degree bird zoo that I was in. I could sometimes experience this sense of the mind almost going out and locating the birds in space based on the sound. It was like a sense of floating in this space created by the mind through the perception of sound and through that perception, the location. This is perception at work.

And then volitional formations—the one I really want to hone in on tonight—but just briefly for now, it's more the volitional aspect of experience. The many kinds of volitional activities in the mind: emotions, thoughts, beliefs, agendas. This is a huge category of stuff.

And then the last mental aggregate is consciousness. This simple function of knowing. Every experience is known. Whether we are mindful or not, this knowing process is going on, knowing meeting experience. Sayadaw sometimes asks or says something like, "If you meet somebody that you've met in the past, maybe you weren't terribly mindful while you were meeting that person. But when you meet them again, you recognize them." And he says, "Why? Because perception and feeling and consciousness were doing their job." Whether we're mindful or not, we are perceiving, we are feeling, we are knowing. And mental formations kind of tumble along.

So these five aggregates function—they are the tumbling on of our experience. Every moment the five aggregates appearing in some variation.

The Buddha talked about this particular teaching a lot in relationship to the exploration of not-self. Carol talked about not-self last week, about exploring the self. Studying the self, we forget the self. Forgetting the self, we become awakened by the ten thousand things. And so in a way the five aggregates are a way that we can study this.

The Buddha described that clinging to these aggregates was responsible for the creation of the sense of self. And so the exploration around these five aggregates begins to be a kind of pointing to the not-self nature of experience. We begin to recognize, as we open to noticing what's arising in experience, that these five aggregates are just arising. That—thank goodness—a self doesn't have to figure out how to do these five aggregates, because the complexity there is amazing. What the mind can know, understand, meet, how it functions. And yet we cling to these aggregates and then attribute a sense of self to the experience.

We can cling to any of these five aggregates. There's a teaching where the Buddha enumerates twenty ways that identity views come to be—basically four different ways of clinging or identifying a sense of self around each of these five aggregates. He really sorted it apart. And I'm not going to go there—I'm not going to go through the twenty kinds of identity view. But what I have seen in my own experience is that this exploration of the aggregate of mental formations is a huge terrain of selfing. And the belief in the constructions that it makes as being I, me, mine—very sticky.

And so starting to explore the constructing nature of this volitional formation aggregate can begin. And this happens just through witnessing, being curious about volitional formations, which is what we're doing already, actually. We're already doing a lot of this, because volitional formations basically encompasses so many mental activities that we're already looking at.

Emotions, thoughts, states of mind, tranquility, mindfulness, anger, frustration, irritation, bliss, joy, peace, ease, calm, concentration—these are all mental formations. They have some aspect of intentionality in them, an aspect of the mind doing something, an intentional quality.

Other forms of mental formations include intention itself—this moment before we act, before an action of body, speech, or mind, there's this impulse that can be known as a mental phenomenon before the action happens. This too is a mental formation. Beliefs, agendas, views—these are also mental formations. It's a huge range of experience, which we have been opening to.

Yesterday morning I spoke about looking at the conditioned nature of our minds. Part of this exploration involves getting to know the job description of our experience, of our mind states—Carol also spoke about this—and exploring the states themselves.

The other piece around volitional formations is that there are two sides to this: they are constructed, and they construct.

They are constructed, and we see that they are constructed. We start to understand that our mind states are constructed by seeing them come to be. We witness, at times, a thought arise in the mind. Somebody described something like this in one of the groups—seeing a thought and then seeing how there's a tendency to believe that thought and then create a whole state of doubt or confusion or anger based on just the arising of the thought and the belief in it. We see how it's constructed, how the anger or the confusion arises based on this construction around a thought that has arisen. So we can start to see the constructed nature of our mental formations.

Some of you have also talked about the way those mental formations then construct, the way they influence our experience. Many of you have described seeing a kind of filter, or the arising of some reactive state of mind—anger, for instance, or frustration—and then seeing how that affects subsequent experience. The state itself is constructed, and then it tends to construct our experience.

This aspect of mental formations is really the engine of what our minds meet. It's the engine of the creation of our lives, this phenomenological world created through this engine of volitional formations.

Volitional formations are described as being these states of mind—frustration, anger, annoyance, love, joy, peace, ease, mindfulness—this whole range of beliefs, views, attitudes. But volitional formations are also described in one place as the verb, as the constructor.

I'll read this in Thanissaro Bhikkhu's translation. It does a relatively good job of capturing the play of words that happen in the Pali around the word that is translated as mental formation or volitional formation—saṅkhāra. In the Pali, there's a noun and a verb, and they're all based on this word saṅkhāra. Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates saṅkhāra as "fabrication." I kind of like what that evokes because it really captures this sense of the mind creating, constructing, fabricating—fabricating what we experience.

There's a point in the sutta where the Buddha goes through each of the five aggregates and asks, "So why do they call it feeling?" And he says, "Well, it feels. That's why we call it feeling. It feels pleasant. It feels unpleasant. It feels neutral." And perception: "Why is it called perception? Because it perceives." And he goes on to describe what it perceives.

For fabrications, he says: "Why are they called fabrications? They fabricate fabricated things. So they're called fabrications. What do they fabricate? They fabricate fabricated form as form. They fabricate fabricated feeling as feeling. They fabricate fabricated perception as perception. They fabricate fabricated fabrications as fabrications. They fabricate fabricated consciousness as consciousness."

This is why they're called fabrications.

In this particular passage from the suttas, you've probably noticed that basically the Buddha is pointing to this fabricating part of our mind—and showing how it fabricates all of experience. He points to it fabricating the other four aggregates. This is a pretty amazing pointing, offered in a very matter-of-fact way: these mental fabrications tumble along, creating form, feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness.

What these fabrications are has a huge effect on what is fabricated. If the fabrication is anger, what is it fabricating? It's fabricating a body through that fabrication. The experience in the body when anger is arising can be one of pressure and heat. The face itself can even become distorted. I touched on this yesterday—the mind state of anger affects the physical body. It fabricates experience in the physical body. This is my understanding of a way to approach this teaching. It may not be the only way, but it has been useful for me to explore it in this manner.

Anger constructs sensations in the body, fabricates sensations in the body. It fabricates feeling. When there's anger arising, there tends to be unpleasant feeling. Although to my surprise, on one retreat I was really getting to know anger quite well. There was an event that had happened during the retreat, and whenever the mind thought of that event, there would be the arising of anger. So I got to watch this process over and over again. One time, in watching, the mind saw the very beginnings of the growth of anger—the thought, and then this infusion of a sense of aliveness, a warmth and a kind of fullness that was really pleasant for about a split second before it turned to heat and pressure.

It was very interesting to see this, the constructing power of the mind. To me it was a revelation, because in that seeing of the fabrication—that initial, quick fabrication of pleasant in the anger—that understanding arose: there's the hook. That's why the mind likes this. That's why it goes there, that feeling. And very quickly it gets out of control. But there's a little hook there. So the fabrication of feeling.

The fabrication of perception. When we're angry, we tend to see things through a lens of anger. We perceive things—we may tend to perceive actions that other people are doing through that lens, believing that somebody is hostile to us because we have this perspective of anger. So perception is affected by this mental formation. This is true of all our mental formations. I'm walking through anger here just to give a flavor for what happens.

Anger tends to construct more anger. It's kind of its nature. The Buddha, in one of his very succinct teachings, said: whatever one frequently ponders becomes the inclination of the mind. If we're frequently engaging in anger, anger is what is reinforced. Anger is what is cultivated. Anger is strengthened. The mental formation of anger tends to create more anger—when we're not mindful of it. When we add mindfulness into the mix, something else can happen.

And consciousness is also affected by anger. I gave the example the other day of how consciousness can be affected by an agenda. Last week, in talking about delusion, I described how an agenda can actually have us be conscious of some things and not other things—that consciousness simply doesn't receive certain things when we have certain filters. We tend to take in experience that we are oriented towards. Consciousness of some things will arise and other things won't, given this filter, given this construct, given this fabrication.

And so, seeing this fabricated nature—

This is useful because we start to see that it's not personal. And we tend to take it so personally. We tend to identify with our volitional formations—it's a very strong place of identification. "I am this angry person. I am this miserable person." And when I'm not miserable, I know that really what I am is miserable. We create this identification and drag along the idea of an identity around a mental formation, constructing an idea of permanent miserableness.

But what we can see, if we start to get curious about our mental formations, is their impermanent nature. They come and they go. They're constructed based on conditions. We see that they're constructed based on conditions. And often we can start to see—it's almost like with the mindfulness taking in this constructing of experience—the mind begins to recognize something along the lines of, "Who did that? I didn't make that happen, it just happened." So we begin to understand the not-self nature of these constructions.

The mind constructs dukkha. It's quite amazing to see this. The Buddha spoke about this construction of dukkha in a teaching on dependent origination, which I'm not going to try to describe right now, but just to point to. In that teaching, he pointed to some key volitional formations that drive the creation of suffering: ignorance, craving, and clinging. When ignorance, craving, and clinging are in the mind, it leads to suffering. And again, these are conditioned, they're constructed based on what we've learned, our conditioning from our lives.

We talked about this some last week too—the way we are conditioned by our cultures, by our families. Many of our volitional formations are not just personal. Our volitional formations are absorbed through our cultural and familial experiences. This is very much a way our minds are influenced by the collective. Views, opinions, beliefs, ideas—most of those making up our fabrication are not arising just from our own experience. They're coming in from our training. We've accumulated views, beliefs, ideas, and agendas from our cultures. And many of the views that come in through our culture are reinforcing ignorance and craving and clinging.

I can't particularly remember the details of this ad, but there are many ads that send this message: craving is good, craving will make you happy. There was an ad of a man sitting on a Ford truck, surrounded by mounds of camping gear. He's sitting in a meditation posture, and the tagline says something like, "In order to be one with everything, you gotta have one of everything." And this is why this person likes their Ford Explorer. These are the messages we get from our culture. Craving and ignorance and clinging are reinforced. It's not personal.

When we can see it as impersonal, it gets much easier—much, much easier—to be curious about it and to watch it, witness it unfold. And again, when we bring mindfulness into the equation, when mindfulness is meeting experience, this is a wholesome mental construction, a wholesome mental formation. This is the way the mind can transcend and shift so that it's no longer in that cycle of creating dukkha out of ignorance and craving and clinging, cycling over and over again, creating suffering. With the insertion of mindfulness and wisdom, a whole different path can unfold.

We cultivate wholesome qualities—the seven factors of awakening: mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture or interest, tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. These are mental formations, and they construct more wholesome experience. So the five aggregates are the unfolding of our human experience, both the habitual and the reactive, and also the skillful and responsive. Love, compassion, wisdom, patience, generosity—these are mental formations that lead to the end of suffering. They create the conditions for the mind to understand, for wisdom to develop, and for wisdom to release the suffering.

There's another description of conditioned experience called transcendent dependent origination, which describes how when faith and wisdom come to bear on our experience, a whole different chain of experience unfolds—delight, joy, concentration, happiness, seeing things as they are. It's this different direction of the mind.

And so here, on this retreat, we are mostly exploring a very receptive kind of practice, not trying particularly to stop the reactive kilesa constructions, and also not trying particularly to construct the wholesome formations. So how does it work? What are we doing here?

This practice supports both the releasing of the unwholesome and the cultivation of the wholesome in some very natural ways. The perspective that we're bringing to our practice—wise view, this perspective of being curious about experience as human experience, being curious about what is suffering and what is lessening of suffering, what is creating the mind to be tense versus open, relaxed, receptive—with that perspective of mindfulness, we're bringing both mindfulness and wisdom together in how we are observing. And right there, we are encouraging those wholesome mental formations. Just the way in which we are paying attention to experience is encouraging wholesome mindfulness and wisdom. It's very simple, the way that grows.

As we explore any reactive states with mindfulness—a reactive state like frustration, for instance, or irritation—as we explore that with mindfulness and wisdom, something happens. Instead of that construction continuing, it seems to put the constructing power of that formation into neutral when we bring mindfulness and wisdom to it.

When there's strong mindfulness and wisdom, that reactive state is no longer digging its rut. It's no longer reinforcing the conditioning of that state. Something about the mindfulness and wisdom is stronger.

Some of you have mentioned the continuous mindfulness feeling like a great protection. It is a great protection. It protects you from unwholesome states. It's a refuge. As we open with mindfulness and wisdom to noticing those reactive states, it creates the conditions for those states not to strengthen. And actually sometimes we see them actually vanish. And in that vanishing, aversion may turn to non-aversion.

So this is weakening the reactive states and simultaneously strengthening the capacity, the qualities of mind—patience, kindness, that allowing attention we're exploring, mindfulness, wisdom, concentration as the stability of mindfulness is encouraged, tranquility of mind, not being so reactive. The practice that we're doing very naturally releases those unwholesome, unskillful states and increases the wholesome and skillful ones.

We also start to get curious, and some of you have talked about states in which there's not a lot of reactivity happening. What we can be aware of then is the calm, the equanimity, the joy, the delight. And in contrast to mindfulness being brought to unwholesome states, when we become mindful of delight and joy, it creates the conditions for them to strengthen, for them to arise more often.

It does take some trust to enter into this very receptive style of practice—to not be in charge of the doing of it and instead to be curious about what's being constructed right now and to witness it. While we're witnessing the constructions at play, we begin to understand something about impermanence. We begin to understand something about how this construction is just happening by itself. And so we see into these truths—not by trying to, not by saying, "I'm going to see not-self." That doesn't usually work out that well. But just through the curiosity, impermanent, unreliable, not-self are revealed. And that wisdom, that arising of wisdom, so powerfully releases and frees suffering.

Impermanence

Andrea Fella · 43 min

> In this contemplative talk from the Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella guides practitioners into a direct exploration of anicca (impermanence) as it manifests in meditation practice. Rather than treating impermanence as something to achieve or grasp, she invites a gentle curiosity about how change is already being experienced moment to moment.
> Fella illuminates the various ways impermanence can be noticed: through attention shifting from experience to experience, through changes within a single experience as sensations strengthen or weaken, or through interest in either the arising or passing away of phenomena. She references the Buddha's teaching on the arc of experience—how phenomena arise, persist, and vanish—noting that this can only be seen when there is continuity of mindfulness. The talk emphasizes that exploring impermanence isn't something to force; rather, it emerges naturally as mindfulness becomes established.
> This teaching offers practical wisdom for working with whatever arises in practice, whether pleasant or difficult. Fella reminds us that any experience—pressure, heat, emotion, confusion, or bliss—carries the nature of being impermanent and conditioned. There is no better experience than the one happening right now with which to understand the Dhamma. The talk invites practitioners to honor and receive their human experience as life living itself, recognizing the profound teaching available in each changing moment.

Are you aware? Aware that you are aware? Aware of what is obvious?

Each moment aware, as mindfulness is established, we can connect to being aware without having to try or remind ourselves as frequently. We can begin to notice not only the experience that we're having—sound or sight or mood, emotion, thought, feeling, pressure, coolness—this dynamic range of experience. But we also begin to naturally tune into, at times, the changing flow itself.

Mindfulness, when established, can begin to recognize the impermanent, changing nature of experience. At times the mind may be more interested in the change than in what the objects actually are. And so that's okay. You don't need to try to grab onto the objects. Just noticing this changing quality of experience.

There are different ways we can notice change. Sometimes we might notice the attention shifting from experience to experience. That is noticing the change around the factor of attention. Sometimes we might be noticing the change within an experience—sound becoming stronger or weaker, arising suddenly and vanishing, body sensation coming and going.

Sometimes the attention might be curious or interested in the beginnings of experience, noticing things just arise and arise and arise, almost like magic. We don't necessarily see them end because the mind is interested in the next arising. Sometimes the mind might be interested in the ending of experience, noticing that things are passing away. Almost as soon as it's noticed, we might recognize it's ending, it's vanishing, it's releasing. Just noticing.

If the mind is interested in being aware of change, how is it noticing it? Sometimes the attention, the mindfulness, might be more interested in the whole flow of arising, persisting, and passing away. The Buddha speaks about this arc of experience—noticing experience as it arises, persists, and vanishes. This can only be seen when there is continuity of mindfulness.

The exploration of impermanence isn't something to do exactly. That is, it's not so helpful to try to hold on to see impermanence. There can be a kind of question or curiosity: how is impermanence being experienced right now? But then, if the mind isn't interested in exploring that, not trying to make it do it. Sometimes the mind is more interested in the experience of pressure or heat or coolness or an emotional response. Honoring our experience, what is most naturally known.

Sometimes in being aware of change, there might be the experience of a sudden sense of stopping—a stopping of that flow somehow. And if that happens, this curiosity about that: stopping is happening. What's that like?

Whatever arises, whatever experience is here—whether sound or body sensation or the experience of frustration or confusion or love or bliss—whatever experience is arising has the nature of being impermanent, conditioned, and constructed by the mind. Any experience can lead to this understanding. There's no better experience than the one that's happening right now with which to understand the Dharma.

Honoring, receiving our human experience—the experience that makes this life, receiving the experience of life living itself.

CHAPTER 143

Not Knowing

Andrea Fella · 44 min

In this contemplative talk from the Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella examines the profound truth that emerges as mindfulness becomes continuous: while we can know what is present in this moment, we cannot know what the next moment will bring. This recognition is more of an understanding than a direct experience, since each arising moment is indeed known as it occurs.

Fella explores how this truth of not knowing manifests both in obvious ways—such as our uncertainty about when our last breath will come—and in subtler ways, where genuine presence brings an almost continual surprise as we encounter actual arisings rather than our concepts and beliefs about experience. She references the Buddha's teaching on conceiving: "In whatever way they conceive, the fact is ever other than that." Our sense that we know what will happen is itself a mental construction, a conceiving that obscures the ever-changing nature of reality.

The talk addresses the natural human tendency to gravitate toward the familiar and the sense of knowing, and how this very searching can prevent us from seeing what has never been seen before. Fella acknowledges that opening to not knowing can evoke feelings of confusion, fear, vulnerability, or insecurity. Rather than bypassing these responses, she encourages practitioners to recognize their relationship to these feelings as they arise. The practice ultimately requires deep trust—not something we can simply manufacture, but something that emerges as we notice what obstructs it. The invitation is to trust awareness itself, remaining available and receptive to each moment as it unfolds.

As mindfulness becomes established and there is more continuity moment to moment —each moment aware of what's here, aware of what's arising—we do at times become aware of a profound truth: while we can know what's here in this moment, we have no idea what the next moment will be. We can be available to receive each moment and know each moment.

This awareness of not knowing is, in a way, more of an understanding than an actual experience, because in each moment, each experience is known. The experience is known. Sometimes it's not so obvious what the object is, but there can be just this aware knowing that we're aware, even when we're not so clear about the object.

And yet the recognition or understanding that we have no idea what the next moment will bring—this is an understanding more than a direct experience. It can come in obvious ways, such as recognizing that we have no idea when our very last breath will be, our own mortality. We don't know when our life will end. And it can come in more subtle ways, in the recognition of just this very next arising.

When we are really present, there can be almost a continual surprise, partly through touching into actual arisings rather than our ideas, concepts, and beliefs about what's happening. This truth that we don't know the next thing that will happen can be obscured by our beliefs, our agendas, our delusions, our taking things to be permanent that are impermanent. And yet, when those beliefs, views, and ideas are seen as arisings, they too can simply be known as another surprising phenomenon.

We don't know what will happen in the very next moment. The sense that we think we do know is a concept, a conceiving. The Buddha pointed to this truth around conceiving. We conceive things we think we know. And he said, "In whatever way they conceive, the fact is ever other than that." We do not know. In fact, it's the nature of insight that we can't know what we think we're looking for.

And yet many of us tend to be drawn to the familiar, to knowing that we know. In a way, we can orient toward that, searching for the familiar. Yet this very act of looking can obscure something that has never been seen before. Can we simply be available and receptive, willing to not know?

Sometimes this recognition, this understanding around not knowing, can lead us to feel confused or fearful. There may be a relationship to that understanding—a relationship of fear or confusion or unsettledness, insecurity, vulnerability. It's really important to recognize that relationship. At certain points in the practice, there can be senses of confusion or fear or vulnerability about this deep truth.

It does require trust—such a deep trust to let go. And yet we can't just pick up that trust. Often our practice is noticing what's in the way of that trust. That feeling of vulnerability has an arising in this moment.

Are you aware? Are you already aware?

Trust the awareness.

CHAPTER 144

Teachings to Bāhiya

Andrea Fella · 48 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of one of the most profound and succinct teachings in the Buddhist canon: the Buddha's instruction to Bāhiya from the Bāhiya Sutta (Ud 1.10). She recounts the dramatic story of Bāhiya, an ascetic who traveled 1,200 miles to receive the Dhamma, only to be given a brief teaching that led to his immediate awakening—and his death shortly thereafter.

The core teaching—'in the seen, only the seen; in the heard, only the heard; in the sensed, only the sensed; in the cognized, only the cognized'—is examined through multiple lenses. Andrea draws on the Kāḷakārāma Sutta (AN 4.24) to illuminate what the Buddha's awakened mind actually experiences: not conceiving of visible things apart from sight, not conceiving of a seer, not conceiving of things worth seeing. She contrasts this with the Mūlapariyāya Sutta (MN 1), which describes how ordinary minds conceive of self in relation to experience through patterns of 'I am this,' 'I am in this,' 'I am apart from this,' and 'this is mine.'

Andrea emphasizes that this teaching is a training, not an immediate attainment. Our practice involves noticing what complicates the simplicity of bare experience—craving, views, beliefs, and identity constructions. She addresses the challenging territory of disenchantment that arises as we see through our usual ways of relating to experience, acknowledging that the mind may resist with dread, confusion, or boredom when it finds 'nowhere to land.' Yet this very deconstruction of clinging leads naturally to freedom, grain by grain, like a rope worn away by wind and waves.

Our practice here of receptive awareness is really just exploring the simplicity of being with experience and noticing what complicates that simplicity.

There's a very famous teaching in the suttas. Most of you have probably heard it many times, but that is what I'd like to explore this evening: the Buddha's teachings to Bāhiya. To me, this simple teaching is one of those succinct teachings where Bāhiya asks the Buddha, "Please tell me the teachings in brief so that I can practice." This particular succinct teaching feels very resonant with the way we practice in this style.

The backstory before Bāhiya meets the Buddha is that he's not one of the Buddha's followers, but rather an ascetic living at the time of the Buddha. He's practicing on the coast, about twelve hundred miles or so from where the Buddha lives. He doesn't know anything about the Buddha, but he's been practicing. Some of the stories say that he was living an ascetic life but not really doing that much practice. But I think, based on the story, he must have been doing some practice because the teachings of the Buddha landed really fast for Bāhiya. He must have been ready for it, at least.

So he was practicing, and the people in that area really admired him. He was such an ascetic, wearing bark for his clothes, doing some of the ascetic practices of the day. They were offering him alms and coming to him for advice. And he started wondering, "Gee, all these people think I'm so great. Maybe I am that great. Maybe I'm enlightened."

It's said that he was visited by a deva when he had that thought. This deva apparently was one of his relatives from either a previous life or from this life—it doesn't say. The deva had taken pity on Bāhiya for having this thought, "Maybe I'm enlightened," and said to him, "You know, you're not enlightened. And not only that, you're not even doing what might make you enlightened."

Bāhiya asked the deva, "Well, is there anybody that is doing this?"

The deva replied, "Yes, you should go see the Buddha. The Buddha lives about twelve hundred miles from here. Go find him. He's in Sāvatthī."

And so Bāhiya walked. I actually looked this up on Google today. I hit the walking icon and entered the place where Bāhiya was on the coast, which is near Mumbai, and then Sāvatthī, where the Buddha was. It said 303 hours of walking to get there. And it was a lot of elevation too—in one place it said there was something like 12,000 feet of elevation he'd have to go up and down to reach the Buddha by this route.

So he traveled, and he apparently traveled as quickly as he could. My guess is it probably took him some twenty to thirty days to get to the Buddha.

He arrived where the Buddha was practicing and found the monastery where the Buddha was staying. The monks in the monastery said, "The Buddha's not here right now. He's out on alms round."

So Bāhiya went to find the Buddha on alms round. He found the Buddha in the village and said to him, "Will you teach me the Dhamma so that it will be for my long-term welfare and benefit?"

The Buddha, with his alms bowl, walking into the village, said, "This isn't the time, Bāhiya. We're heading to the village for alms."

A second time Bāhiya asked the Buddha, this time adding a little plea: "Please teach me the Dhamma. We don't know how long you'll live or how long I will live. Please teach me the Dhamma."

And the Buddha again said, "This is not the time."

But then Bāhiya asked the magic third time, which in the suttas is—pretty much almost every time—not every time, but most times—if you ask the Buddha something three times, he did it.

So Bahiya asked again, and the Buddha stopped and gave him some teachings. Bahiya had asked for teachings in brief, and so he received teachings in brief. I'm going to read you the first part of the teachings that the Buddha gave to Bahiya. The result of the Buddha giving Bahiya this complete instruction—not just the portion I'm about to share, but the whole thing, which I'll give you in pieces—was that Bahiya became fully enlightened.

So listen well.

"You should train yourself thus: In reference to the seen, there will be only the seen. In reference to the heard, only the heard. In reference to the sensed, only the sensed. In reference to the cognized, only the cognized. That is how you should train yourself."

This is basically what we're doing here. We're exploring our experience—our sense experience, our mental experience. This teaching—you should train yourself thus, and the seen is only the seen, and the heard is only the heard, and the sensed is only the sensed, and the cognized is only the cognized—this is a short form for the six sense spaces. Seeing, hearing, and then sensing encompasses smelling, tasting, touching. And cognized is the mind.

Essentially, this is the injunction: recognize your sense experience as arising experience. That's one way to frame what the Buddha said.

But what do these words mean? What does this teaching mean—in the seen is only the seen? It can be understood as a training in what might be called bare attention: just receiving experience as it is, without judgment, without reactivity, without clinging.

And yet the text says it's a training. So what does that mean, to train ourselves to see thus? To train ourselves in "the seen is only the seen"?

To me this means partly that we're probably not going to be able to just pick up that instruction and have our experience be that pure, that unaffected by our thoughts or ideas or views or opinions. We're not going to be able to just flip a switch and have our experience be "in the seen is only the seen." We may think we're seeing things as they are, but as we've been exploring—especially around the conditioning, the constructing nature of the mind—the mental formations condition our perceptions, condition seeing, condition hearing. So when we're seeing, it's already not just "in the seen is only the seen."

What does this training mean, then? To me it's a pointing toward an important direction for us. We set our intention to explore experience with the understanding that it's valuable to see experience in this way. And the Buddha, in the subsequent part of the teachings, explains why it's valuable. I'll actually go ahead and read it now and then elaborate a little more on it later.

The training is what I said: in the seen is only the seen. We train in this way. And then the Buddha says:

"When for you this is the case—when for you there will be only the seen in reference to the seen, only the heard in reference to the heard, only the sensed in reference to the sensed, only the cognized in reference to the cognized—then, Bahiya, there is no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

He points to the purpose of this training. He doesn't just say, "Train this way, come back later." He says, "Train this way and this is the result." Freedom from suffering is the result—and that results from this understanding of not-self.

But this last part is the result of the training. It's not something to do. Rather, it sets our compass. It gives us inspiration to explore. What might it mean to see experience in this way?

There's a kind of setting of the intention to explore experience from the perspective of "in the seen is only the seen"—which to me basically points to a practice that explores what's in the way of the seen being only the seen.

What's in the way of in the heard is only the heard. And that's what we actually get to see. We start paying attention to our experience—this is so much of what we've been exploring. What's in the way of just knowing experience to be experience? Knowing seeing to be seeing, knowing hearing to be hearing, knowing cognizing to be cognizing?

And so we start by seeing what we add, looking at what we add to experience. This is what we've been observing. We see how craving is added to experience. We feel that it is added. Actually, as we explore experience in this way of receiving, just noticing what's happening, we're seeing the constructions. We're seeing the craving, the clinging, and we're feeling the suffering of that.

With this encouragement—that in this direction lies freedom from suffering—we may have some inspiration to observe. What else gets in the way? Views, beliefs, identity. We've talked about all of these areas. And guess what? All of this, everything that gets in the way, all of the stuff that gets in the way is in the realm of the cognized.

What's cognized? Craving is an arising in the mind. It's a cognition arising. And so the instruction "in the cognized is only the cognized"—can you notice craving is arising as a phenomenon? Can you notice clinging is arising as a phenomenon? When that's what's happening, that's the encouragement of this text.

So we explore "in the seen is only the seen" and we see craving. It's like, okay, craving. In craving is craving. Craving is arising. That can be known. In the cognized is only the cognized.

In another sutta, the Buddha describes in a way—at least this teaching to me—what it was like to be experiencing things. What's the state? He gives a description of his mind, what it's like to be experiencing things in the moment when in the seen is only the seen. He gives an elaboration of what that experience is. This is in the Aṅguttara Nikāya, the Kālakārāma Sutta, AN 4.24, for those of you who are interested in such things.

The Buddha thought it was valuable to describe this state to us. And when he refers to himself as a Tathāgata—meaning "one who's thus gone," "one who is such," something like that—he describes his experience:

A Tathāgata does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight, does not conceive of an unseen, does not conceive of a thing worth seeing, does not conceive of a seer. In the seen is only the seen.

A Tathāgata does not conceive of an audible thing apart from hearing, does not conceive of an unheard, does not conceive of a thing worth hearing, does not conceive of a hearer. In the heard is only the heard.

A Tathāgata does not conceive a thing to be sensed apart from sensation, does not conceive of an unsensed, does not conceive of a thing worth sensing, does not conceive of a sensor. In the sensed is only the sensed.

A Tathāgata does not conceive of a cognizable thing apart from cognition, does not conceive of an uncognized, does not conceive of a thing worth cognizing, does not conceive of a cognizer. In the cognized is only the cognized.

Let us start an exploration of what this might mean. I can only offer you some of my reflections on this. There are a few comments in some of the commentaries and suttas, but there's not a lot. A key word here is conceiving. Remember the other day I used that phrase, offered this phrase in one of the morning meditations: "In whatever way they conceive, the fact is ever other than that."

Conceiving is understood in many places in the suttas to be a kind of distorted way of experiencing that attributes to the experience things that are not actually in the experience but are instead, as Bhikkhu Bodhi said, derived from one's own subjective imaginings. And conceiving does seem to relate to this birth of subject and object—the birth of a thing to be seen, an object existing, something like that. When an object exists, a subject is born. They're born together, is my sense. So the conceiving piece—one of the distortions that seems to be present in it—is a subject-object distinction and a belief in that distinction.

I'm giving you a bit of a tour of some of the suttas tonight. One of my particular joys is sutta study, so I'm offering you a little taste of that.

There's another place in the suttas that's relevant here. We'll come back to this description of the Buddha's mind in a moment, but first I want to flip to the other side, which describes what an ordinary person's mind does with experience—with seeing, with hearing. Here's the description in the suttas:

One perceives the seen as the seen. Having perceived the seen as the seen, one conceives oneself as the seen. One conceives oneself in the seen. One conceives oneself apart from the seen. One conceives the seen to be mine. One delights in the seen. Why is this? Because it has not been fully understood.

This is from Majjhima Nikaya 1, for those of you who like that reference.

So there are four different ways of conceiving elaborated here. First, "I am whatever experience it is"—I am the seeing, I am the body, I am the emotion. It's got that kind of flavor to it. Second, "I'm in the experience"—I'm in the body, I'm in the physical experience. Maybe not so much "I'm in the seeing," but "I'm in the physical experience." Third, "I'm separate from the experience." Now, that one resonates for me with seeing. It's like, yes, I'm separate from that tree. Again, pointing to this subject-object distinction. And fourth, this flavor of "This experience is mine"—this hearing is mine, this body sensation is mine. This knee pain, that's mine. It's my knee pain, my body sensations.

These are different ways of conceiving ourselves in relationship to experience. Again, it's bringing in this notion of a self, this subject-object kind of distinction.

One translator of this particular text—the precursor to Bhikkhu Bodhi, Bhikkhu Ñāṇamoli—had a slightly different understanding that I noticed today for the first time in one of the notes to the sutta. It struck me as adding something to the picture in terms of understanding conceiving. It does make sense to me that conceiving is about this sense of subject and object coming into being. But Ñāṇamoli had a subtler perspective that I think I've seen in my own experience. There's something interesting there.

His alternative understanding is something like this: having perceived the seen, one takes that perception to be the seen. That's a pretty profound kind of confusion—one that I think we engage in a lot. We don't notice that we're perceiving "tree." We don't notice perception at all. We take the perception to be the thing.

It's a very profound misunderstanding—a misunderstanding of perception itself. To me, this was a very interesting way to think about conceiving: potentially as simply being misperceiving perception to be reality. Something like that. Almost even before any sense of self comes in. Just that mistake in the perception. We take it to be what's actually there, not seeing it as perception. Not seeing perception as perception. That would be "in the cognized is only the cognized"—oh, perception is happening.

So back to the Buddha's description of his mind: "A Tathagata does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight, does not conceive of an unseen, does not conceive of a thing worth seeing, does not conceive of a seer."

My reflections on this. "Does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight"—to me what this says is that the conceiving part is attributing or creating or conceiving of the idea of a thing that exists independently of the perception. This is kind of counterintuitive to the whole way we live our lives and walk around the world. To live in that space of so deeply understanding that we cannot know what is out there—even if there's anything out there. All we can know is the experience created by the mind. And so, not conceiving of anything that is out there. This is the Buddha's description of his experience: not conceiving of a visible thing apart from sight. That's kind of mind-blowing to me.

"Does not conceive of an unseen." This one I could find very little to support an interpretation or an understanding of. But just the way of hearing it, and also that it follows the previous one—does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight, does not conceive of an unseen—to me this might mean that we also don't conceive or create the idea or the notion, the imagining. And imagining is another translation for this word "conceiving." We don't imagine that there is nothing out there, that it is all mind, entirely constructed by the mind. So the mind of the Buddha doesn't conceive any kind of substantive reality about the world itself. That's my sense of the understanding of these two. The Buddha simply understands the experience of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, cognizing. I hope this is making sense.

"And does not conceive of a thing worth seeing." To me this points to craving. A thing worth seeing is something that we want, something we want to have. So that may be the flavor there.

"And does not conceive of a seer." That points back to belief—or rather, the absence of a belief in one who sees. Does not conceive of a seer. Does not conceive of one who sees.

The absence of all of these things—this again is kind of interesting to me. The Buddha describes his experience, this very subtle experience, not in terms of what's there, but in terms of what is not experienced. "A Tathagata does not conceive of a cognizable thing apart from cognition, does not conceive of an uncognized, does not conceive of a thing worth cognizing, does not conceive of a cognizer."

In a way this feels like it kind of pulls apart, or just falls apart, our whole usual way of navigating experience. It all falls apart. It feels untethered.

And so there might be—the other day Carol spoke about disenchantment. This perspective of seeing this way, not seeing a thing worth seeing. Just "in the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard, in the sensed is only the sensed, in the cognized is only the cognized." This creates the conditions for basically understanding there's nothing to cling to. There's no point in clinging.

And so this disenchantment—we have been enchanted by seeing. "Oh, it's a thing worth seeing! Oh, there's a seer!" Enchanted in that way, believing the constructs of our own mind. It's just a magic show in there—another beautiful analogy in the suttas. It's a magic show and we've been enchanted by that magic show, believing it's reality when it's just smoke and mirrors.

And yet, there's one description that Bhikkhu Bodhi uses for disenchantment—something like, "disenchantment is a serene withdrawal from the desire for clinging." And it's like, well, in my experience, it's not quite that serene.

You know, the mind goes kicking and screaming to disenchantment. We see there's not much to cling to. We begin to understand it's not worth clinging to. And yet the mind protests: "No, there's got to be something worth clinging to. This is not okay—to not have some place to land."

So there are mental arisings in response to this. As we begin to see in this way—as we begin to understand that in the seen there is only the seen, in the heard there is only the heard—the mind goes, "Well, really? There's nothing to cling to?" And that doesn't feel so good. It can feel like dread or confusion or terror. Sometimes boredom or depression: "Yeah, yeah, I get that it's not worth clinging to, so why do I keep being impinged on by seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching? Can it stop already?"

We have these relationships to these understandings. And those are arisings that need to be known. In the cognized there is only the cognized. That's just the next thing. Not liking nowhere to land—okay. It might be more than not liking. It might be dread or terror of nowhere to land. Okay, dread. That's what's arising. In the cognized there is only the cognized.

This deconstructs everything we could possibly cling to.

Our practice, at least one way to explore this—and the Buddha was quite concise in this teaching, he didn't offer much to Bāhiya—but to me it's a pointing to look at experience, particularly at the processes of mind that are constructing experience. The five aggregates I spoke about a couple weeks ago—body, feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness—these are what's arising moment to moment. And they keep arising.

My understanding is that the Buddha was still perceiving and feeling. There are descriptions in the suttas of enlightened beings perceiving and feeling. Enlightenment doesn't turn off these processes. But my sense of what the Buddha is describing is that they are understood for what they are—understood as processes. Feeling arising and being known. Perception arising and being known. Craving arising and being known. Love arising and being known. Releasing of craving experienced.

We can at least start there, exploring in our experience what's arising, what's being added, recognizing these processes at work as processes. Feeling feels. Perceiving perceives. Cognizing cognizes.

So back to the Bāhiya Sutta again, the ending: "When for you there will be only the seen in reference to the seen, only the heard in reference to the heard, only the sensed in reference to the sensed, only the cognized in reference to the cognized—then, Bāhiya, there is no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

There will be no you in terms of that. No you in terms of seeing. No you in terms of hearing. No conceiving of a seer apart from sight. No conceiving of a seer. No you there.

Feeling feels. Knowing knows. Cognizing cognizes. Perceiving perceives. Intending intends.

You are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering.

Freedom comes with this understanding.

To me this is inspiring—the pointing in this teaching of: here's the training, and it leads to freedom from suffering. But you don't have to believe that. When for you, in the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard, in the sensed is only the sensed, in the cognized is only the cognized—when the mind opens to that way of meeting experience, there's no need to do any kind of insight or understanding. That is the natural result. When for you this is the experience, when for you this is the way the mind is meeting experience, the mind is free.

So our basic instructions come back again just to the simplicity of knowing experience as experience arising in the present moment. Just what we're doing. Just simple. And to me it's like these successive layers of seeing—oh yes, another way of attributing a sense of self here. Another way of recognizing that, oh, clinging to that too? As we practice with this, the layers and layers and layers of delusion begin to fall away.

It doesn't seem to happen in one big bang explosion. In fact, the Buddha often talked about the gradual nature of this path—that it happens moment by moment, grain by grain. The analogy of the rope: I think I used that in the hall the other day. The rope that's left on the shore, day by day being worn away by the sun, the sand, the wind, the waves. At a particular moment, if you look at it, you're not going to see in the next moment what's worn away. But over time, that natural action wears away at the rope and it falls apart.

And likewise, in that analogy, the Buddha compares the mindfulness and the effort and the practice to the wind and the sun and the sand, wearing away at the fetters, wearing away at the delusion. This is a picture of a gradual practice, one where we may not even see day to day what has been released, what has been understood even. We may not know. And yet every moment of mindfulness—Gil Fronsdal sometimes says no moment of mindfulness is wasted. It is contributing to this direction of freedom.

So at the end of the sutta, almost immediately after hearing this teaching, it says that Bāhiya became fully awakened. And then within moments, he apparently came between a cow, a mother cow and her calf, and was killed by the cow protecting against a perceived threat to her calf.

And so this brings me back to how Bāhiya had enjoined the Buddha: please, we don't know how long we're going to live, teach me the Dharma. That urgency of practice. While it is a gradual practice, there's no time to waste. We don't know what the next moment will bring.

You should train yourself thus: In reference to the seen, there will be only the seen. In reference to the heard, only the heard. In reference to the sensed, only the sensed. In reference to the cognized, only the cognized. That is how you should train yourself. When for you there will be only the seen in reference to the seen, only the heard in reference to the heard, only the sensed in reference to the sensed, only the cognized in reference to the cognized, then, Bāhiya, there is no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering.

Spontaneous Vajra Song

Andrea Fella · 5 min

> In this contemplative talk, Andrea Fella shares the "Spontaneous Vajra Song" by Tibetan master Lama Gendun Rinpoche, a poem that has become a touchstone in many meditation communities. She recounts how, after hearing it countless times, phrases from the poem began arising spontaneously during retreat as natural practice instructions, leading her to memorize it as a form of guidance.
> The poem itself serves as a kind of guided meditation, pointing to the futility of striving for happiness through effort and willpower. Instead, it invites practitioners to recognize that peace is already present in open relaxation and letting go. With vivid imagery—rainbows that cannot be caught, a dog chasing its tail, an elephant already resting at home—the teaching illuminates how our very searching for awakening obscures what is already here. Whatever arises in body and mind has little ultimate reality; why identify with it or pass judgment?
> This offering resonates deeply with the Theravāda understanding of non-clinging and the recognition that phenomena arise and pass of their own accord. The instruction to "let the entire game happen on its own, springing up and falling back like waves" echoes the practice of bare awareness found in satipaṭṭhāna. For practitioners at any stage, this poem offers a profound reminder: nothing to do or undo, nothing to force, nothing missing—everything happens by itself.

This morning I'd like to share a poem by a Tibetan teacher, Lama Gendun Rinpoche. Many of you may be familiar with this poem. It's pretty well used in our tradition here. And yet the repetition can be helpful, at least for me. I had heard it so many times that during one particular retreat a few years ago, phrases from the poem started arising in the mind like instructions. And so I got a copy and memorized it. I don't still have it memorized, but for that retreat it became my practice instructions in a way.

I thought I'd read it and share it with you this morning. You can just let the words wash over you. You don't have to really think about them. It almost can be like a guided meditation.

Happiness cannot be found through great effort and willpower, but is already present in open relaxation and letting go.

Don't strain yourself. There's nothing to do or undo. Whatever momentarily arises in the body-mind has no real importance at all, has little reality whatsoever. Why identify with and become attached to it, passing judgment upon it and ourselves?

Far better to let the entire game happen on its own, springing up and falling back like waves, without changing or manipulating anything. And notice how everything vanishes and reappears magically, again and again, time without end.

Only our searching for happiness prevents us from seeing it. It's like a vivid rainbow which you pursue without ever catching, or a dog chasing its own tail.

Although peace and happiness do not exist as an actual thing or place, it is always available and accompanies you in every instant.

Don't believe in the reality of good and bad appearances. They are like today's ephemeral weather, like rainbows in the sky.

Wanting to grasp the ungraspable, you exhaust yourself in vain. As soon as you open and relax this tight fist of grasping, infinite space is there—open, inviting, comfortable.

Make use of this spaciousness, this freedom and natural ease. Don't search any further looking for the great awakened elephant who is already resting quietly at home in front of your own hearth.

Nothing to do or undo. Nothing to force. Nothing to want, and nothing missing.

How amazing. Everything happens by itself.

CHAPTER 146

From Why to What (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 55 min

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound reframing of how we approach difficulty in meditation practice. Drawing from the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), she contrasts the 'unwise attention' of an untaught person—constantly asking 'Why am I this way? What was I in the past?'—with the 'wise attention' of understanding experience through the lens of the Four Noble Truths: 'This is dukkha. This is the arising of dukkha.'
> Fella illuminates how suffering is constructed fresh in each present moment rather than being carried forward from the past. Through vivid personal examples—from discovering that nightly loneliness was triggered by setting an alarm clock, to recognizing depression as suppressed mettā, to mistaking rapture for anxiety—she demonstrates how simply being with 'what is happening' reveals the mind's hidden processes.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with complex, multi-layered emotional patterns. Rather than trying to analyze or dig into conditioning, Fella encourages a receptive approach: holding difficult experiences with 'wide arms,' letting what's obvious come to the surface, and asking 'What else is happening right now?' This patient, non-assuming presence allows the mind's own wisdom to understand how suffering is put together—and how to let it go. The practice is remarkably simple: just asking 'What is this?' again and again, while the insights that arise can be 'mind-bendingly elaborate.'

As human beings, we seem to be creatures of wanting to understand things. Often that expresses itself as trying to figure out why things happen. This happens to us in our practice as well. When we're meeting struggles of various kinds, there can be a temptation, a sense of "why is this happening?" This arises especially, it seems, after we've seen something a few times and begun to recognize it isn't so helpful, yet our mind keeps doing it. Why? Why does it keep doing this?

We may want to go back into our past and try to figure things out based on our history. There must be some very deep tendency in my family that makes me keep doing this. We feel like wanting to dig, wanting to understand what's going on based on our conditioning from the past.

Understanding conditioning is helpful and important. We talk about the conditioned nature of our experience and how valuable it is to understand that our experience is conditioned. Yet this kind of foray into the why—understanding the why of our experience—often involves thinking and trying to figure things out. It can involve our views, our ideas, our beliefs, our attitudes, the things that have shaped us.

This is something to recognize: when we are trying to understand something through the lens of our prior conditioning, our views and ideas and attitudes, we may well find what we're looking for. We'll find things that are shaped by those conditions. It can become a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy. We're looking for something, trying to find meaning, trying to understand why something's happening, but that very search is shaped by our conditioning and so tends to go in particular ways.

Our practice, instead of using this habit or familiar way of exploring why things are going on, encourages us to simply look at what is happening. What is happening right now in this present moment? This present moment is all that there is. It's all that we have access to in terms of understanding what is happening. So we explore what is actually happening right now, dropping below the ideas and views to simply ask: What is this? What is happening?

Last night Richard talked about one description of a difference between an enlightened person and an ordinary person. There's another sutta that has a similar contrast. In this one it says that an untaught ordinary person doesn't understand what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, they attend to those things unfit for attention and do not attend to those things fit for attention. This is how they attend unwisely:

"Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future?"

Or else they are inwardly perplexed about the present: "Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where will it go?"

In a way, these are all questions about the why. Where have I come from? Why am I here? Having been that in the past, why am I this now? This is that flavor of why, why, why—what's the meaning?

And then he goes on to say that a well-taught noble disciple understands what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, they do not attend to those things unfit for attention, and attend to those things fit for attention.

They attend wisely: "This is suffering." They attend wisely: "This is the arising of suffering." They attend wisely: "This is the ending of suffering." They attend wisely: "This is the way leading to the ending of suffering."

You probably recognize those statements as expressions of the Four Noble Truths. When I first read this, when I first began studying this teaching, I just kind of blew past this part and thought, "Well, that's just the Four Noble Truths. An enlightened person understands the Four Noble Truths." I'd heard that this was the insight the Buddha had—the insight into the Four Noble Truths—and so I just moved on.

But what it's pointing to here, the way it's phrased, is that one attends wisely. This—what is happening right now—has one of these four flavors. It will be either suffering, or suffering coming into being, or suffering ending, or it will be the cultivation of qualities on the path leading to the end of suffering. We can use this framework of the Four Noble Truths as a framework for understanding our experience. And the Buddha says this is the way a wise person meets experience.

One way to look at the difference between these two approaches is that the ordinary person attends to experience through the perspective and view of their sense of self—who they are, all those questions of "why am I?" The enlightened person understands suffering and its arising, its ending, and what leads to the ending of suffering. There's no orientation around the perspective of a sense of self in that. It's just around suffering or the end of suffering.

This looking at what's happening right now—we can look at what's going on with respect to whether it's suffering or the arising of suffering. And that's the part I'd mostly like to explore this evening: those two pieces. How can we explore that, or know that, or understand that through this investigation of what is happening? Because as we shift our perspective, our habit of exploring things from the question of "why" to "what's here, what's going on?"—this is what we begin to see. We begin to understand suffering. We begin to see the conditions that lead to its arising.

This form of suffering that the Buddha expressed as being possible to be completely free of—this kind of suffering is pointed to here as arising in the present moment. That's what this pointing says to me. This, right now, what's happening right now—this is suffering. It's pointing to the experience right here in this moment. What is the experience of suffering right here in this moment? And can we know that? Can we know it as suffering?

Actually, that is an insight—the recognition "this is suffering." We don't often think of it that way. We often think of it as a problem. But when we see it—"Oh, this is what's happening. Suffering is arising. The Buddha encouraged me to get to know this, to understand it"—and seeing it, suffering is arising here, now, in the present moment. This is the only place it can arise, and it's also the only place it can end.

We may think about or have the sense somehow that we've suffered in the past and that suffering is being carried along or dragged with us through our lives—that it's the same suffering we experienced months ago or years ago, and it's back, here to haunt us. Yet when we start to look at our experience, we see what happens in the present moment. We're not suffering the same suffering that happened in the past.

I saw this actually—I've seen this many times, but the first time it became so clear to me was on my first three-month course. A memory of a time when I got very embarrassed about something arose in my mind.

And that memory arose in my mind, and the feeling of embarrassment came along with it. At first it felt like this was the old embarrassment—the embarrassment that happened all those years ago when I was standing on stage in that play and forgot my line. That memory of standing there arose in my mind, and all of those feelings came up.

Over and over again this happened on that retreat, and I got to look at it over and over again. I began to recognize that the arising of the feelings of embarrassment were actually separate from the memory. I had thought at first they were interlocked, that it wasn't possible to have them be separate. But I could begin to see, just through noticing what's happening, that the memory arises, and then it's like the mind does something with that memory. It goes, "Oh yeah, that memory. Oh, I remember that. That was awful. It was terrible, and I was so embarrassed." And what happens? We become embarrassed in this moment. Our minds pick up the memory and all the things that happened there and reconstruct in this moment, right now—that suffering is being constructed. It's not the same suffering. It's being experienced now.

This happens a lot to us. We're sitting in meditation and a memory arises. Often, because thoughts are so powerful, memories are so powerful, many of the same feelings that we experienced at that time come into being in that moment. But they are now coming into being. They weren't there a few moments ago. This was a piece I didn't quite understand. I thought I was just tapping into some pool of embarrassment that was sitting there already. I didn't quite understand that it was actually being regenerated right in this moment.

Seeing that over and over again helped me to understand: this is suffering now. This is being created right now. Our suffering is created now based on conditions from the past, based on triggers that are associated with things that have happened to us, and based on how we relate to the entire thing right now. There are different threads that come into the creation of this suffering: our memories and thoughts, the habits and patterns of reactivity, and how the mind is right in this moment.

Just as an example, you've seen in your practice that sometimes something will arise that tends to be triggering for you, but you've had a good night of rest and the mindfulness is strong, and it's like it's there and it's seen and it goes. Barely any of that suffering arises because of the way the mind is in this moment. But other times maybe you didn't get a lot of sleep and you're hungry and it's been a rocky day of mindfulness, and that thing arises and a lot of suffering is created. There are many conditions that come into play for how suffering arises in the moment.

Everything we need to know about suffering—for its understanding, to be free from it, to release the suffering, for the mind to begin to understand how to let go of it—everything we need to know is happening in the present moment. That was actually a relief to me when I recognized that I don't have to figure out all the conditioning, all of that history, all of that "why" of family conditioning and conditioning in the schoolyard and all of those habits and patterns of mind that got shaped. It's a relief to recognize that everything we need to know to be free from suffering that's arising in this moment is available in this moment.

When we can see this way that suffering is put together in the moment—and this seeing happens by just being with what is happening in the present moment—as I said, everything that's needed is here in the present moment, so all we need to do is look at this present moment. Now, this doesn't mean we'll always be able to see it all in any present moment. But what we explore is the more we connect with now, connect with what's here, we begin to trust just that connection. It's enough to just connect with this. I don't need to think back through all of the whys. Sometimes even thinking we know the whys can get in the way or deceive us. It can send us down a wayward path.

This actually happened really early in my practice. I remember now—this was in the first few months of my practice. I was exploring emotions, doing this largely in daily life. I wasn't so interested in sitting down and doing sitting meditation when I first started practicing, but I was really interested in exploring and understanding my mind. And my mind was making me suffer. So I began looking at what was going on in my mind, and various threads were predominant at that time. One was anger. Another was loneliness. These were connected to a relationship that had ended in what I thought was a very unskillful way—the other person had ended it in a very unskillful way. So lots of anger, lots of loneliness, lots of grief.

I was feeling into all of this, and at one point I noticed that every night when I went to bed, I got really lonely.

This was not a surprise to me. I thought I understood why I was lonely. But I was interested in simply observing, so I just watched my mind. Each night I'd notice, "Yep, there's that loneliness again. Okay." It was really simple—a really, really simple mindfulness. Just, "Yep, there it is. Okay, I know I'm lonely. Loneliness is happening." It wasn't even a very detailed exploration of the body. It was just acknowledging, "That's what the mind is doing right now. It's lonely. There's loneliness happening." And I watched this pretty much every night as I went to bed.

Then one night—and I don't think I was particularly trying to be mindful that evening—something different happened. Maybe it was because I had become attuned to that quality of loneliness through getting familiar with it during that regular evening recognition: "Yep, there it is again. Okay." But this particular evening, I noticed that the loneliness turned on like somebody had flipped a switch—when I set my alarm clock. I picked up my alarm clock, set it, and the loneliness switched on. I thought, "What? What does setting an alarm clock have to do with loneliness?" I didn't know.

But I just kept watching each night. "Oh yeah, here it is. Here it is again when I set the alarm clock." I don't remember how many nights passed—probably not too many, maybe just one or two more. Then one night, when I set the alarm clock, I noticed a memory arise. I was with my ex-partner and we were in Disneyland together, looking up at a marquee in Tomorrowland that had a digital clock on it. I could see the connection between what I was doing in the present—setting a digital clock—and that memory, and how the memory was connected to the loneliness.

It was as if the mind was saying, "Oh yeah, I was so happy then, and I'm never going to be happy again." That particular memory was one of my cherished memories, and it felt like these memories had been destroyed or something. But that memory had flitted through my mind and it had been creating this loneliness. That was amazing to me—that I could see this. In that moment it was like, "Wow, I thought the loneliness was because I was going to bed alone. I didn't know it was about a memory of Disneyland."

So this was seeing more of the conditions of the present moment—the trigger, the thought, and the reaction to the thought. This is seeing the why of the present moment. Or we could say, perhaps, seeing how suffering is put together in the present moment.

The amazing thing was what happened next. The following night, as I went to bed, I clearly remembered the whole discovery from the night before. But the loneliness didn't come up. And in fact, that regular every-night-going-to-bed-lonely pattern stopped happening entirely. It was as if seeing how the suffering was put together had freed me from it.

The mind understood, in that moment—and this is my way of describing it after the fact—the mind understood its own participation in that suffering. And the mind understood how not to go there. I couldn't consciously say, "Oh yeah, I don't want to go there." But the mind, having seen that construction, having seen how it was put together and that its own processes were responsible, it was as if the mind said, "Yeah, I don't think so."

This was really amazing to me—to see how witnessing the why of the present moment, or how suffering was put together in the present moment at a clear level, had such power. It was seen very clearly in that moment. That was what mattered: seeing what happened in that moment, what was arising.

What was the mind doing with it, moment to moment? Seeing that created the conditions for the mind to let go of that suffering.

So this is the power of that "what" – of looking at the what. What is actually happening right now? It won't always be suffering. But so often when we're looking at what is happening right now, we are seeing it through our habits and our views and our beliefs and our attitudes. We may not be able to stop that, but we can be aware or curious about it. Yes, there are all of these ideas about what's happening, but can I actually be curious about what's actually happening here? What is actually happening? What's happening in the moment?

There are body sensations happening, and emotions and moods that are happening, and thoughts that are happening, and the other senses – the smells and sounds and sights. All of that is happening in the present moment. That's kind of the ground of our experience.

A thought arising in the present moment is just a thought arising in the present moment. That can be known as a what. But often our mind, when thoughts arise in the present moment, isn't simply recognizing, "Oh, there's a thought." We're jumping onto that thought and thinking about it and believing the views and ideas that it's expressing. But we can be aware: "Oh, there's a thought. There's a body sensation. This is what's happening. The body feels like this. The emotions feel like this. Frustration is arising. Confusion is happening. Delight is happening. Joy is happening." Whatever is happening, we can know that just as a happening, as an arising.

Another aspect of the what of our experience – there are a couple more pieces I want to point to – is that we can often have things hidden from our view or perspective of what's happening because of the habits of our mind, because of the ways that we tend to look at things. There can be perspectives in the back of our mind that we don't recognize because they're so familiar, or because that pattern is so familiar to us.

One way of touching into that, another way of seeing what's happening right now or opening to something more: there's a lot happening in the present moment, and there's a certain set of it that we're familiar with seeing and knowing and experiencing. A way to expand a little further is to check in with a simple question – and I think Kamala mentioned this morning – about what's the attitude, or what's the relationship to what's happening?

Often our relationship to what's happening can be a little behind the scenes. We can have habitual ways of relating and not really recognize that that's also a happening. Something unpleasant is happening and there's a sense of not liking it. Maybe that not liking is motivating a way of paying attention: "Well, if I look at this really carefully, maybe it'll go away. If I dive into that sensation or whatever, that unpleasantness, maybe it'll go away." Being motivated by a desire to get rid of it – that little bit of aversion – but not seen.

So checking in: What's happening? And what's the relationship? This is also something that's happening in the present moment. When we check into that, there's not much to do except notice that as a happening too. "Oh, this thing is happening and I don't like it." That's what's happening. Okay. Unpleasant and not liking. That's what's going on right now. That's the what of experience.

Sometimes there are other things hidden from view, or perspectives that are not within the realm of what we normally see. Another question that can be explored at times, which I've found is a little bit broader than "What is my relationship to the experience?" is something like: "Okay, this is stuff that's happening. I know this stuff that's happening. But what else is happening right now?"

At one point I was driving.

I noticed that my mind was leaping into the future in this frenzy of planning. I would call it restlessness and anxiety. That was the state of mind—churning, spinning, lots of thoughts and thinking. And I was like, "Whoa, wow, I'm driving. Let me come back." I would put my attention on my hands on the steering wheel and try to settle in. "Okay, seeing is happening. Hands on the steering wheel—what's happening?" And seconds later, I'd be back in that restless mind.

This happened enough times that I finally got a little curious. "Wow, something's really going on here. What else is happening right now?" When I stopped and just checked in with that—not looking for anything, but almost more like asking my system, "You tell me. I have no idea. You tell me what's going on here"—what arose in that moment, what I saw in the next moment, was that I was really, really happy. I had missed that entirely.

When I noticed that, I wondered what was going on with that happiness. As I saw over the course of my practice, I at one point reported to my teacher, "You know, I think I talk myself out of happiness." What was going on was that there was this feeling of happiness, but there was also this propelling into the future of, "Well, how can I make sure these conditions continue in some way that I can keep this happiness?" But I was missing it entirely. I was not even experiencing the happiness.

So that kind of opening of "what else is happening?"—that wouldn't have been met with "what's the attitude about this anxiety?" It wasn't the attitude there. It was something else that was going on, something that was simply missed until I was willing to step back and say, "Okay, yeah, show me." This is in that mode of receptivity that I spoke about the other day. Just kind of, "Okay, what else is there?" Settle back. Take a pause and let what arises arise. Let your system show you what's happening.

Sometimes our struggles are a little deeper, a little more multi-layered. There's emotions layered on emotions, layered on habits and views and beliefs, and it's just like a big mess—a very complex-seeming experience. We have a sense at times of the multi-layered nature of a lot of our deeper kinds of suffering. We may even have a sense that connected with anger, there's fear and resistance and vulnerability in the mix.

Having seen this, when anger comes up, we may think, "Okay, I know what this is about. There's vulnerability in there somewhere, so let me find it." But that mode of putting something under the microscope to pull it apart and figure it out—that is often not so helpful. That idea of thinking we know what's in the middle, thinking we know where we're going, why this thing is happening—maybe that's what's happening, but our minds do lots of things and do them in many different ways, and this particular flavor might be different. So be willing to see what is actually here right now, as opposed to thinking, "Oh, I know what this is, let me find this."

The movement of meeting experience, of being with the what of experience—I like the phrase "being with," actually. We sometimes talk about investigation, and that word often invokes in our minds this exploration of why something is happening. Instead, I like to explore just the simplicity of what we mean by investigation: meeting experience, being with experience. Just landing with experience and being with this big mess of stuff.

Sometimes I just think, "Okay, well, it's a big mess. Can I hold it with really wide arms?" Meet whatever is obvious about that big mess. It's a mutating mess that turns in and out and inside out, and various pieces will come to the surface and become obvious. We can settle back and hold it with wide arms, letting ourselves see what comes to the surface, what's obvious in any given moment, and just meeting it, being with it. A gentle connection. Patience with allowing it to reveal itself. Letting the what of the present moment reveal itself.

It's really helpful not to make assumptions about what might be in there, because those assumptions may or may not be true.

And if you notice that there are assumptions, just see if you can hold them lightly. See if it can be a kind of, "Yeah, okay, that may be the case, but let's see." Just see if you can recognize whatever's obvious in this moment.

Another experience from my own practice. I hope that sharing these experiences gives you both a sense of how this can work and a sense of the possibility of what happens when we're willing to finally surrender and say, "Yeah, this is what's happening. Can I meet this?"

Over and over again in my own practice, when I finally surrendered, when I was capable of it... I mean, there are times, as we've mentioned, when mindfulness isn't strong enough to meet a really challenging pattern, when trying to meet something with mindfulness kind of takes us down the rabbit hole of it. When that's the case, we need to do other things, as Richard talked about last night—finding something else to pay attention to, opening our eyes or taking a walk, doing something to ground ourselves. I encourage people to find a place and a way to ground themselves, to have a kind of go-to method to help stabilize when something is overwhelming.

But many times, much of what I was doing—a lot of the actual reactivity—was around thinking it was a problem to be experiencing this difficulty. I had this view that as long as I was experiencing self-hatred or depression or anger or whatever it was, because I had a lot of this unpleasant, painful stuff going on in my mind, the practice wasn't actually going anywhere. It's like I had to wait for the practice to start until those went away.

When I finally recognized that this actually is the practice—to meet this self-hatred, to recognize, "Oh, depression, that's what's arising right now"—I could just surrender and recognize, "Yeah, this is what's happening right now. That's the honest truth." Being honest with myself: this is what's happening. And when I'm able to meet it, just holding it in a simple, simple way—"Oh yeah, here's depression. Yep, that's what's happening"—noticing when it comes, when it goes, just being with it when it's there.

The story I was thinking about sharing involves assumptions—and setting them aside, actually—because I saw something around depression. I was practicing in Burma at Sayadaw U Tejaniya's monastery for an extended period of time. There it's not always a silent community, so while I was in silence much of the time, usually once a day I would take a walk with a friend and we would have a conversation. At other times of the day, I would see other people meeting up for walk-and-talks while I'd be by myself, and I would often notice this depression coming up when I'd see other people together.

Immediately my mind went to, "Oh, I know what this is about. This is about all those times on the playground when I was excluded." I saw that and thought, "Okay, well, maybe..." And I just kind of set that aside. There was a little bit of a view in there that this was where it came from. But I just kept watching, kept noticing, kept exploring over the course of several weeks—exploring this mild, low-grade depression that was there a lot.

Then one day I felt into it in a new way. Maybe because I had been able to meet it over time, I was more familiar with it, more comfortable with meeting it and being with it. It no longer felt so threatening. That day when I was sitting with it, it felt like it was just growing. I was sitting in my room and it felt like the feeling of depression was getting really big. I thought, "Wow, that's different. What is that about?" It was just like, "Okay, what does this feel like for it to get really, really, really big, this depression?"

At some point, as it got so big, it felt like it flipped inside out. And it became mettā. It was this really vast, open heart of mettā. The very next thought in my mind was—in the midst of feeling this beautiful quality of mettā—my mind said, "This is stupid, this is sappy."

That moment was like an "Ah!" This felt like a connection to that expansive mettā being pushed down as somehow not right, as stupid and sappy. There was a repression of that feeling that was connected to the depression. That was not what I thought was at the center of that depression. That was not what my understanding of it had been.

In seeing that, it was like, "Wow, there's work to do here. There's work to do about understanding that relationship with mettā." But as I remember it, the depression was no longer so much of an issue on that retreat. Though there was other stuff to look at.

So with these multi-layered patterns, these many-flavored, messy kinds of patterns, patience is helpful. In my own experience, I've gone through many of these kinds, and there's a long arc of practicing with them. I practiced with a pattern around anger for many years, this depression over several weeks, self-hatred for many years. Just gradually the mind began to understand pieces of it and began to shift and let go of some of the ways in which it clung.

And so patience is essential, because we can jump in and think, "Okay, I've been with the what of experience for five minutes—why am I not getting an insight?"

It can take a long time. And yet this is not meant to be depressing, because in my own experience, as I think it's said in the suttas, the Dharma is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end.

Even just the beginning, where we start to recognize, "Oh, anger is happening—that's what's going on"—the mind gets some space around it. It's not like the anger is dissolving and vanishing, but we have a completely different relationship to it than when we're caught in the anger. So this opening to being with experience—immediately we start to experience the benefits. The whole releasing of these patterns can take time, but the Dharma is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end.

Sometimes, as I've pointed to, our views and beliefs and ideas can shape what we're experiencing if we're not careful. We tend to look for meaning—the why of things. "Why is this happening?" It's a movement towards meaning. And as we look for particular meaning, we may find something connected with our views about that. So again, it can become a self-fulfilling prophecy. This overlay of views or concepts or ideas, beliefs, can happen in such a subtle way that we don't really recognize it—a kind of attribution of something happening.

Our bodies and minds have an intimate feedback loop. Sometimes things happen in our body and it affects our mind. Sometimes things happen in our mind and it affects our body. The emotional terrain is really in this mix. When a thought arises in the mind, it might move us towards an emotion and then physical sensations arise. Sometimes we can have physical sensations arise, and because they're similar to an emotion, the mind says, "Oh yeah, that must be what I'm feeling." Then that gets constructed because we're expecting it. So it's a two-way street.

We can just be curious when we're experiencing something, when we think we're experiencing certain sensations in the body. At times I've seen, "Oh, there's that kind of heaviness around the heart. Why am I feeling that way? I must be lonely." Well, maybe, maybe not. Maybe it's just a sensation.

On another retreat, I was waiting for an interview, and I'm sure many of you also experience a little bit of anxiety or agitation or restlessness of mind right before the interview. I certainly experienced that. "I'm getting ready—I haven't talked in three days and I'm getting ready to talk to my teacher. What is he going to think? Am I going to have something good to say? If I didn't write my report down, what am I going to do?" The mind doing its stuff.

This particular day, I was waiting for Joseph to finish his interview, and it went on a long time. So I got to sit there ten minutes feeling this feeling. I was like, "Okay, yep, I know—this is agitation, this is anxiety. Okay, anxiety. Yep, anxiety, anxiety, anxiety." Feeling all of these sensations and naming them anxiety.

By that point in the retreat, often the really being with an experience and meeting it clearly—there was something that happened, a shifting of the experience, maybe a settling, or something was revealed, or something new was seen. And that didn't happen. That very non-existence of something happening piqued my interest. What's going on? Kind of like that question I had when I was driving: What else is happening here?

I began realizing there was a lot of vibratory energy in the body, kind of like shaking all the way from my toes up my legs. It was intense. I started feeling it. And I stopped naming it as anxiety and just sat back and said, "What is this?"

And what I discovered in that moment was that it was rapture.

The sensations of rapture and the sensations of anxiety can be remarkably similar. In that moment, my mind had attributed anxiety to those sensations because of the situation—sitting there waiting for an interview. This is the kind of thing that happens: the views, the ideas, the beliefs we bring can shape our experience in the most amazing ways. It's quite something to start recognizing this.

Sometimes when we're observing emotions—and we haven't talked about this in the instructions yet, I think that's tomorrow—it can be useful, if you're noticing the physical experience associated with an emotion, to investigate more closely. Say you're noticing that fear is happening. What are the physical sensations? Well, there's tightness in the throat and a kind of quivering in the stomach. You might let go of the idea of fear and just connect with the physical. Because sometimes there's a lot of overlap in terms of the physicality of various emotions. And sometimes they're vastly different, as was the case for me between anxiety and rapture. It was quite startling.

Being with our experience in this way—asking what is happening, what is happening—takes some courage. It requires shaking up our habitual ways of being with experience, because there are so many habits. We think we know. We think we know what's happening. But to keep stepping in and asking, "What actually is going on here? Is there something else happening?"—this is really simple.

This can be very, very simple. What's revealed is mind-bendingly elaborate and complex. But the practice that reveals it is so simple: What is this? What is this? What is this? Whether it's self-hatred or bliss—what is this?

That kind of commitment to asking "what is this" begins to point out and reveal these misconceptions, these overlays of concept that we're seeing through and believing. It reveals them just through the commitment. Just this, just this. We don't have to try to figure it all out. Just that simplicity.

The power of the mind and of mindfulness to understand how this is all constructed and put together is phenomenal. But that's the power of the mind and mindfulness—that's not something we can actually pick up and do ourselves. Thank goodness I don't have to figure that out. I would not know where to begin. But just the simple practice: What's this? What's this? What's this?

So let's sit and just be with ourselves for a few moments.

CHAPTER 147

Day 6 Brahmavihāra - Mettā: Dear Friend (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 43 min

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella introduces the practice of extending mettā (loving-kindness) to a dear friend, the third category in the traditional commentarial approach to brahmavihāra practice. She explains how working with specific individuals—rather than abstract categories—allows us to touch into the particular challenges and "sticky places" in our relationships. The practice functions like a washing machine: the phrases act as soap that draws non-mettā qualities (irritation, frustration, attachment) to the surface of consciousness where they can be recognized and released.

Fella offers practical guidance for selecting a dear friend: someone with whom you have genuine connection, who is relatively happy in their current life, and to whom you're not sexually attracted. She suggests various ways to connect with the person during practice, including visualization, using their name, or simply sensing their presence as if they were sitting before you. The talk addresses both the near enemy of mettā (attached or conditional love) and the far enemy (anger, hatred), noting that both naturally arise during practice.

Particularly valuable is Fella's presentation of five skillful responses when difficulty arises: continuing with the practice while simply noting what's present; shifting to forgiveness practice; returning to an easier person; turning to vipassanā practice with the difficulty; or moving to compassion practice for oneself. The guided meditation that follows leads practitioners through cultivating mettā for self, easy being, and dear friend, culminating in imagining all three together sharing wishes for mutual well-being.

In the metta practice as passed down through the commentaries—which is where we're bringing this particular practice from—the Buddha offered in the suttas more of a radiating style of practice. And yet we appreciate the version of metta that's offered in the commentaries, because it really helps us to pick particular people in these various categories.

We've been doing easy being and self, and today we'll expand to dear friend, then in subsequent days to a neutral person and a difficult person. These categories—self, easy person or benefactor, dear friend, neutral person, difficult person—pretty much anybody in the world can fit into one of those categories.

And yet if we try to think about the general category of dear friend, for instance, we might just kind of generally think of people we like. But with bringing in a particular person, we touch into the specifics of relationship. That's really, I think, what's so brilliant about this form: we're touching into the different kinds of relationships we have through these categories, but looking at it through a particular specific relationship. And because we're looking at it through a particular specific relationship, we probably touch into some of the particular specific challenges of that relationship.

We might contemplate doing loving-kindness for all beings, and that might feel really lovely. But then if a particular person comes to mind, it's like, "Oh, well, but that person, hmm." So we go through these specifics in order to touch into and pull out some of the sticky places in our relationships. We go through these categories and pick particular people for each of them and work with that relationship.

Today we're going to be exploring the dear friend. We'll start in our practice together with the easy person and self, because one of the approaches with this kind of metta practice is that we tend to try to start where it's easiest and begin to cultivate the quality of the open heart, the connected heart, this quality of metta, of kindness, of caring. We start where it's easiest, where it may be more naturally arising for us.

The image that's offered is that with each of the easier beings, we have the opportunity for our heart to kind of fill up with this quality of metta, and then it can start to overflow. The image is offered of water filling a pool and then spilling over down to the next pool, then filling and spilling to the next pool. So we start where it's easiest and then shift to the next person as we feel like our heart has expanded a little more.

This also brings in a general tool: in exploring the metta as we go through these different categories through the days and weeks, if it gets difficult for you—I mean, we do work with difficulty and I'll talk a little bit about some of that today in the metta practice—but also, if it gets too challenging with a particular being, we can simply go back to where it's been easier. We can shift back to ourselves or to easier relationships.

With the dear friend, while I'm talking about qualities that may be useful in terms of considering a person, just be thinking in your mind of who you might want to choose. It should be someone that you have a good connection with, with whom it feels relatively easy to have that sense of caring. It's helpful if that person is pretty happy in their life right now, because we're going to be bringing this person into our mind. If they're struggling in their lives right now, it's not that you wouldn't want to wish them well, but it does shade more towards the compassion practice than the metta practice. So keeping it simpler that way—thinking about finding a person who's relatively happy in their lives right now, not going through a lot of struggle.

It's also helpful to choose someone to whom you're not sexually attracted. But it's okay if you want to play with it. I did a month of intensive metta practice, and I definitely picked someone for each of the categories that I wasn't sexually attracted to. But sometimes what happens in the metta is that we start feeling so much heart opening and care and love that it can feel kind of close to that kind of attraction. So it can be helpful to just be really clear about the difference—that this kind of open-hearted caring, that kind of connection, can be there when there's not the sexual attraction. It simplifies things, really. Choosing someone to whom you're not sexually attracted is a way of simplifying. But if you want to play with it and see what happens, you're welcome to.

I will say, if you're doing metta as a concentration practice—I know some of you here are doing metta intensively as a concentration practice—in that situation I would really strongly encourage not choosing someone to whom you're sexually attracted.

With a dear friend, in terms of offering the phrases, probably the other teachers mentioned different possibilities of connecting with the other being, of either just using their name or visualizing an image of them. Sometimes for me, visualization, active visualization, was a little of a challenge. It wasn't easy to call up an image necessarily of another being. What I found helpful is, kind of with my eyes closed, I imagined as if the other person was sitting in front of me. You might play with this right now. Just close your eyes and imagine one dear friend sitting in front of you, as if that person is with you. You don't even have to visualize it, but just as if that person was there. To me, that created a kind of field, as if I was with that person.

Now what I'd like to suggest is: pick somebody else to sit in front of you and see if the flavor of the field changes a little bit. That quality of using almost the kinesthetic sense of being with the person is available for some people.

That worked for me. So I also offer that as an option.

With a dear friend, there may be some kind of a little more ease with knowing what makes them happy. The phrases, the basic phrases that we use—may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you be safe, may you live with ease—you may know some things about how the person would be or what they would be doing in happiness. One friend I did this for was an artist, and I just envisioned her in her artist studio as a way of thinking about her being happy, and then wishing, may you be happy. So sometimes with a dear friend we can be creative with the images, connecting to kind of knowing how our friend feels safe and how our friend feels happy and healthy.

And then because they are a dear friend—in picking a dear friend, part of the way the metta works is that especially when we pick a specific person, as I was talking about getting the specifics of the relationship in the mix, bringing a dear friend to mind and wishing may they be happy, sometimes what our mind will produce is all of the things that they've done that have irritated us. And we'll feel that. We'll feel that annoyance, we'll feel that frustration. And this is the metta practice at work. It's designed to work this way. It draws to the surface what is not metta.

It's kind of like a washing machine. We have a washing machine and we have our clothes that have stains in them. And this is like our minds—we've got in there the well-wishing and we've also got some of the grinchiness in there. So there it is. We have all of this stuff in our minds, and it's kind of like the stained clothes. We put the clothes in the washing machine, we fill it up with water, and we put some soap in there. And the soap dissolves in the water and then pushes through the clothes. Because of the way the chemical nature of soap works, it attaches to the soil in the clothes and pulls it out into the water. And that's kind of how the metta works. The effort of saying the phrases is like massaging the soap through the clothes. It's massaging those wishes through our mind. And it kind of attracts everything that's not metta, binds to it, and then pulls it into consciousness—like the soap pulling the soil into the water so that it can be rinsed away.

So this is how the metta practice works. It's not a mistake when we're doing metta and suddenly we're having these thoughts of, well, why did they do that thing? It's like, oh good, the metta practice is working. So not fighting it and not feeling like you're doing something wrong. This is the way it works. It's helpful to have an allowing attitude with whatever is arising for you during the metta practice.

The metta, as with all the other brahma-viharas, comes with what we might call near enemy and far enemy. The near enemy is a kind of relationship that's similar to the quality of metta but has some clinging in it. For metta, that would be a kind of attached love, a conditional love—I'll love you if you love me, or that neediness around love. There are different flavors of this attached quality of love. And with the dear friend, this can begin to happen. As you're connecting to these phrases, there might be a little bit of that leaning towards and wanting something back from them. So that's just something to notice. And again, the metta is designed to pull whatever is not that unconditional quality of love into consciousness. So we'll see this. It's not a mistake to see this when it comes up.

The far enemy is a quality of mind that we're not going to mistake for metta—anger, hatred. And this also can come up during our metta practice. Working with this, particularly when the aversive reactions arise, there are different things we can do. The first approach would be simply to recognize, oh yeah, this is the metta doing its work, and keep going. It's just like, okay, there it is, it's out into consciousness, let it be rinsed away—that kind of quality. It can be a little bit of a relief for those of us who are the dive-in-and-look-at-everything kind of people. When I did that month of metta practice, there was a stretch of time I was doing the evening dishes after the late night dishes, so I was the only one in there doing dishes and putting things in.

And I was doing metta for all beings at that time, because I was doing metta nonstop all day. It was during one of the February retreats, and I was just doing metta around the clock—well, probably not literally around the clock because I was asleep a good chunk of the time. But when I was awake, I was really inclining back to that practice.

While I was doing the dishwashing, something would happen. The door would be a little hard to close, or the button wouldn't respond quite right when I pushed it. And the mind just exploded: "Who designed this stupid machine anyway?" Oh, there it is—that kind of anger. At that point it was just, "Oh, I don't have to do anything with this. I just go on." And the next phrase: "May all beings be healthy. May all beings be at ease." It was kind of a relief in some ways that I didn't have to stop, put the metta down, and investigate the aversion. It was just the metta doing its job. There was a little bit of relief, and it passed.

So we can play with it in that way, just letting these near and far enemies come up and continuing with the metta practice.

If it feels a little stickier than that—say you're working with somebody specific, a dear friend, and some particular story has gotten stuck in your mind—you could explore the forgiveness practice that James talked about yesterday with that person. You could shift and instead of doing metta practice, work with forgiveness practice.

Another approach would be, as I said earlier, if it feels really sticky, you could let go of working with that being and step back to self or an easy being. Give yourself a break from that challenge. You do not have to hold yourself in there.

And then, if it really feels appropriate—and you can discern this for yourself—there are times when something comes up strongly enough that it feels right to let go of the metta practice and turn to vipassana practice with whatever has arisen. Just, "Okay, this is anger arising, this is frustration arising. How does it feel in the body? What's happening around that? What's the attitude? What's the relationship to this?" That's also another strategy that can be helpful: put down the metta practice and bring in the mindfulness practice around a difficulty.

And then sometimes—it varies for different people—I found that doing the metta practice at all different stages, with the different beings, there were times when my mind felt so compressed and contracted. It felt physically painful at times to be trying to orient to metta. This mind has had a lot of the aversive nature in it, and so while metta is its antidote, it also creates a kind of challenge at times.

One of my metta teachers suggested that if it's really painful for yourself, switch to compassion practice for yourself. It's still in that terrain of the Brahmaviharas. And that I felt like I could do. Actually, at one point during a daylong metta retreat, by the middle of the afternoon I could not even remember the phrases because it just felt like I had this steel band wrapped around my chest. It was so painful. The teacher said, "Well, try doing compassion practice for yourself." That I could do, and I could remember: "May I be free from this suffering." That was very resonant with what was being experienced. There was that ability to connect—yes, there is this wish to be free from this kind of contraction.

So that's another option. Let me review them again. I know this is a lot, but here are different approaches if difficulty arises during metta. First, just notice that something's arising and keep going. You don't have to stop just because there's a difficulty arising. Second, shift to forgiveness practice. Third, shift back to an easier person—let go of doing metta for that person and shift to someone easier. Fourth, do mindfulness practice with the difficulty. And fifth, shift to compassion practice.

You're welcome to just play with how it works, how those tools support you in your metta practice.

So we'll practice this together, and we'll start again with self and benefactor, or self and easy being.

Finding a posture that feels comfortable. It's really helpful to have ease of posture in the metta practice.

Beginning with checking in to the area of your heart, just seeing how it is right now. What's happening in that area? Nothing right or wrong—just noticing what's happening there.

And then perhaps having the sense of even breathing through the heart center, with a sense of connection and care for yourself.

Beginning wherever it's easiest for you, either with yourself or with an easy being. Let yourself first connect with qualities you appreciate, either about yourself or about the easy person or being. It could be a pet, somebody really easy, some being very easy for you. Qualities you appreciate about yourself or that being. This recollecting of beautiful qualities is said to be the proximate cause for metta to arise. So connecting to that appreciation.

If it supports you, putting your hand on your heart—sometimes that can help connect you with this area.

Allowing an image to come to mind of either yourself or this person, or the felt sense, or the name of the person. Beginning to express, to offer the wishes of kindness:

May I or you be happy.
May I or you be healthy.
May I or you be safe.
May I or you live with ease.

Continuing for the next few minutes, offering these wishes of kindness.

It can be helpful to stay connected with this area of the heart and almost envision the heart as a pool of warm water, each phrase being like dropping a flower onto the surface of that water, ripples arising as the flower lands. What are the ripples in the heart as you make that wish? Staying connected with the felt sense of the heart with each wish.

Now, whether you've been working with self or easy being, allow there to arise a sense or an image of the two of you together. We'll take a transitional time here, exploring what it might feel like to allow that easy being, that benefactor, to send metta to you—that you're receiving the well wishes from that being. Envisioning them expressing to you:

May you be happy.
May you be healthy, safe, and at ease.

What does it feel like to receive those wishes?

And now shifting. If you did self before, shifting to easy being. If you did easy being before, shifting to self. Exploring well wishes for yourself, for the easy being, for a few minutes.

And now allowing your dear friend to come into your mind. Taking a few moments to reflect on qualities you appreciate about your friend. Ways they've supported you, cared for you. Things they've done, ways they've supported others that you appreciate. Allow yourself to appreciate your friend.

And begin offering the wishes of kindness to your friend:

May you be happy.

Again, taking the time with each phrase to check in on how it feels to make that wish. Noticing the ripples. Dropping that wish like a flower into the warm water.

May you be healthy.
May you be safe.
May you live with ease.

Continuing for the next few minutes, wishing kindness, thoughts of goodwill for your friend. Noticing how it affects the heart to do so.

For the last couple of minutes of the sitting, I'd like to invite you to imagine yourself, your easy being, and your dear friend together—the three of you together, perhaps facing each other. And imagining the three of you wishing together:

May we be happy.

Reminding ourselves that wishing happiness doesn't mean that we're denying it for ourselves. In fact, just the opposite.

May we be happy.

May we be healthy.

May we be safe.

May we live with ease.

CHAPTER 148

Exploring the Edges of the Wandering Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h06

> In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers a fresh perspective on the wandering mind—typically viewed as a meditation obstacle—reframing it as a valuable doorway to understanding the nature of awareness and not-self (anattā). Rather than combating mental wandering with judgment or force, she encourages practitioners to explore its edges with curiosity and kindness.
> Fella distinguishes between different types of wandering: the drifty daydream quality, active charging into past or future, mental storms, and even getting lost in pleasant states like calm. She references the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (khandhas), particularly mental formations (saṅkhārā), noting that the wandering mind serves as direct evidence for the uncontrollable, not-self nature of experience. As the Buddha taught, if mindfulness were truly self, we could simply command it to remain—yet clearly we cannot.
> The talk's practical heart lies in exploring two "edges" of wandering: the moment mindfulness returns and the moment it slips away. When mindfulness returns, Fella suggests noticing this effortless arising—we didn't make it happen, yet here it is. This moment offers a taste of awareness itself and reveals what landscape the mind has wandered into. When mindfulness departs, we can grow curious about the conditions: certain locations, activities, attention shifts, or habitual states like boredom or sleepiness. She shares personal examples, including discovering an unconscious habit of looking in mirrors, and emphasizes that even states we assume preclude mindfulness—spaciness, dullness, fog—can themselves become objects of awareness. As practice deepens, wandering may actually signal the mind attuning to subtler phenomena, requiring patience rather than forceful correction.

As we observe our minds, we start to see patterns, habits of mind that are familiar. We all have different habits of mind. Some of us may have more aversive habits. Some of us may have more wanting habits. But there's one habit of mind that we all share, and that is the habit of the mind wandering. I'd like to talk about getting curious about this habit of mind.

It's useful to get curious about any of our habits of mind and begin to investigate them, explore what's happening around them. What are the conditions that lead to their happening? What are the conditions that lead to their ending? The same is true around the wandering mind.

The wandering mind happens in different ways. What I mean by wandering mind is basically a state of low mindfulness or no mindfulness—mindfulness has disappeared. This experience while it's wandering can be very different, and when we come back there can be very different experiences given what has been happening in the wandering.

Sometimes the mind loses touch with experience and it might just be with a kind of drifting, almost a daydreamy quality. There's been a lot of this; I've heard many of you describing this in your meetings with us. As the mind settles and gets a little more concentrated, this happens. It's not like the mind is charging out and thinking about something we know about. Sometimes it's even images or thoughts about people we don't know, topics we don't care about. It's just drifting. That's one way this wandering mind happens.

Then there are the more active ways, where the mind charges out to take up the mantle of something that happened in our past or our future—strong thoughts of past or future. Then there are mind storms, where it just feels like you're swamped.

A lot of what I've described involves some form of thought. Often the wandering mind involves some form of thought, but not always, because sometimes the mind can drift into states where there's not much thought, but there's also not much mindfulness. Spacing out has this kind of quality. Sometimes the mind can get lost in pleasant states, like calm. We get really, really calm and tranquil and then the mindfulness just... there we are, somewhere in the universe.

We can't make ourselves come out of the wandering. We can't make the mindfulness come back. But it will come back at some point. This is one of the great things about mindfulness—it's a natural quality of mind, an ordinary quality of mind that happens in our lives. It functions to help us live, and so sometimes it gets lost, and then there are conditions that help it come back.

Now, this is distinguishing mindfulness from right mindfulness. Just being aware in the present moment doesn't necessarily mean that we are oriented with the perspective of wisdom, with the perspective of right view. But it's a simple perspective, and mostly when we use the word mindfulness, we mean right mindfulness. The simple perspective of mindfulness is: What is this? What is this human experience?

The quality of mindfulness being ordinary means it's a quality that naturally comes and goes. We don't have to be taught about it in order for mindfulness to arise, but we do need to be taught to use that mindfulness in a skillful way. This is what the Buddha taught us—this curiosity about what is this present moment experience as a human experience, and to also be curious about what is leading to struggle and suffering and what leads away from struggle and suffering. These are the aspects of right effort leading to right mindfulness.

We can't make mindfulness re-arise, any kind of mindfulness, but when mindfulness does re-arise, we have the opportunity to bring this perspective back—the perspective of curiosity, of kindness, of allowing, of that receptive interest in what's happening. And when we notice that the mind is waking up, we can get curious about that.

And this is one of the pieces that I really want to explore around the wandering mind.

Sally talked about working with thoughts the other day, and I don't want to go into that aspect so much. What I do want to do is really talk about exploring what I'll call the edges of the wandering mind—what happens in the mind when mindfulness returns, that edge of the wandering mind, and what happens as the mind is kind of letting go of paying attention and slipping out.

We can be curious about both sides, and there is a lot to learn about our minds by looking at this, by being curious about this part of our experience.

We often have a relationship with the wandering mind as being something of a problem. It's something we want to not do. And so we have a relationship with the fact that the mind has wandered, and that's often a judging relationship. That relationship—having a judging attitude when the mind is returning from being lost—we miss the opportunity to catch that edge, to catch that edge of mindfulness returning.

And likewise on the other edge, where mindfulness is kind of slipping out. Often we have this relationship of not wanting the mind to wander, so we might double down on trying to keep the mind here. And we might miss the opportunity to see something new as the mind lets go of what it's paying attention to and begins to orient to something else.

So I'll talk about both of these sides and what we can learn, how we might be curious about this. I've learned so much through this exploration, and I really just hope to convey some of my own delight and joy in watching this process going on in the mind—not trying to stop it necessarily, but being curious about it.

There's a lot we can learn. I want to start by giving an overview of some of the things we can discover by noticing these edges of the wandering mind.

Given that the wandering mind is often connected to the mind getting caught by something, there's much we can learn about that. When we return, we can learn something about the ways we get caught. Do we tend to get caught in planning or judging or fantasizing? We can begin to learn what makes us lose balance of mind, where we tend to get caught. We get familiar with our top patterns of mind, essentially, by noticing where we are when mindfulness returns.

Another important learning that's kind of staring us in the face—but we don't really take in often—is that the wandering mind is actually a pointer, a piece of evidence, for this truth of not-self.

We sit down to meditate. We think, "I'm sitting down to meditate." We pay attention to what's happening in the present moment; we connect with our breath, with sound, our body, a broader sense of experience. And how long does that last? The mind wanders. Who made the mind wander? We didn't do that. Some conditions came into play that made mindfulness disappear.

So we think we sit down to meditate, and then the mind gets lost. Why does that happen? Essentially, it's habits. It's conditions. It's habits of mind. We have very little control over the fact that the mind wanders out of the present moment. We have no control over how long it wanders and when we wake up.

And that's another amazing thing. We're lost in something or other—some memory or plan—and suddenly mindfulness returns. Who did that? Again, conditions. Conditions arose that allowed mindfulness to return in that moment.

And so this wandering mind, the fact of this wandering mind which we see hundreds if not thousands of times a day, is a pointer to a very deep truth: we don't have control over our minds.

The Buddha pointed to this in one of the discourses he gave about the five aggregates, or five aspects of our experience that make up the various functions of our minds and bodies. He said of all of these—and I'm not going to go into them in detail; we'll probably give a talk on the aggregates at some point—these five are form or body, feeling, perception, mental formations (which includes thoughts, emotions, and states of mind like mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom), and consciousness.

Of those five—form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness—mental formations contains a lot. It contains thoughts, mindfulness, and much more. And in one sutta, the Buddha took each of these five and gave a little discourse around its uncontrollability. He said, "Mental formations are not self."

Mindfulness is not self. If mindfulness were the self, it would not lend itself to dis-ease. It would be possible to say with regard to mindfulness, "Let my mindfulness be thus. Let my mindfulness not be thus." But precisely because mindfulness is not self, it lends itself to dis-ease. It is not possible to say, "Let my mindfulness be thus."

We can cultivate conditions that support mindfulness, but we don't have absolute control. Just as this example of the mind wandering shows us—mindfulness gets lost. Habits take the mindfulness away. It's not self that it does that.

And so, if we can let it in, the fact of the wandering mind can be, instead of some kind of affront to our practice, a reminder. Mental formations are not self. It's evidence for this process nature of our minds. And so that's another piece that we can learn about. To me it's almost more of an attitude associated with the wandering mind—that we're more curious about it instead of having a combative relationship with it. Just that curiosity: when is mindfulness? Wow, here it is again. Here it is, right there. Or feeling it kind of slipping out. What's happening? What conditions are arising that it's feeling like it's getting smothered? What's going on?

So that's a significant thing that we can explore—having a different relationship with the wandering mind that helps us to take in that truth, the uncontrollability of the mind.

Another piece that we can start to really see, learn about, and explore is this: the wandering mind is a really good place to get familiar with and get a taste of what the experience of awareness itself is like. Here in this talk I'm going to be using the words awareness and mindfulness synonymously. I actually prefer awareness to mindfulness. Mindfulness to me has a kind of mental quality, whereas awareness feels more diffuse, more pervading—rather than being located in the mind. For me it's more resonant, more evocative of the quality that I think we mean when we say mindfulness, or when we use the word sati, the Pali word that's usually translated as mindfulness.

So we can begin to learn something about mindfulness itself, about awareness itself, through seeing the wandering mind. Essentially, what we are exploring in this case is the coming and going of mindfulness. That's all the wandering mind is—the coming and going of mindfulness. And we can explore it from that perspective.

One of the easiest places to start this exploration around the edges of the wandering mind is when mindfulness returns. We've been lost, we're not present, and mindfulness comes back. What we usually do in that moment—or many of us have had at least a habit of—is maybe judging ourselves about that. Our mind has been wandering. As soon as mindfulness returns, there can be almost a feeling of yanking ourselves back to the breath, or pulling ourselves—it's like mindfulness has returned and we think, "Oh, I need to be back somewhere."

But in that moment when mindfulness has returned, we're already back. There's nowhere to come back to. Mindfulness has arisen.

And one of the great things to check into there is: what is the experience of becoming mindful again? It's a very distinct experience in the moment after we've been lost and mindfulness returns. It can be a very distinct experience as we catch it, as we get curious about this moment and catching the moment mindfulness returns.

At first we might catch it a little late. It's almost like sometimes the mindfulness returns behind our back. We don't see the mindfulness returning; suddenly it's like, "Oh, I think I was thinking a few minutes ago." So sometimes that happens, and then you're just there with what's happening in that moment.

But sometimes we can see the mindfulness returning. Sometimes it feels like it's kind of coming out of the mud. The more curious we get about this moment, the more we can begin to notice the moments right as mindfulness has re-arisen. There can be a kind of lingering memory, almost like a scent, of what it was like for the mind to not be mindful a few moments ago—kind of lost in a swamp or a swirl, or maybe a drifty quality.

And now, what is it like for mindfulness to be back?

Joseph gave this instruction at one point. He said, "Notice the difference between being lost and being present." And I went off and tried to explore that. I thought, hmm, I can't really know what it's like when I'm lost. But in that moment when mindfulness comes back, I have a kind of memory of what it was like to be lost. Because our mind keeps track of that, it kind of registers what preceded. So there's that recognition. And then there's this sense of, oh, awareness is here now.

As I started exploring this, I became curious about whether I could know as early as possible when mindfulness returns. And of course, you can't really do that—it's not something you can do because mindfulness just returns. But we can set the aspiration to catch it as soon as possible. And I found that this did have some effect.

There are great things about that moment. There's the beginning of seeing the quality of mindfulness itself. Because in that moment, the contrast between non-mindfulness and mindfulness can help us understand what the experience of being aware actually is.

The other great thing about that moment is that you didn't have to do anything to make it happen. You have become mindful completely effortlessly. That is a moment of mindfulness that you didn't have to work for. That was another piece I really cherished. It's like, ah, I didn't have to do anything for that—here is the mindfulness. And so it begins to point us toward a quality of easeful attention, this moment of mindfulness returning.

If we are not habitually beating ourselves up for having been lost in thought, we can catch something precious here. Because this moment of mindfulness returning is pretty quick—it doesn't last very long. And if we are habitually, as soon as mindfulness returns, thinking, "Oh, rats, I forgot to be mindful and I've got to come back to my breath," we've missed it.

But when Joseph gave that instruction to notice the difference, it was transformative. It did not matter how many times my mind wandered in a sitting. Anytime my mind wandered, it was just another opportunity to take in that effortless mindfulness when mindfulness re-arose. It cut through the judging mind so quickly for me to have that attitude around seeing mindfulness return. It was like, oh, I get to see effortless mindfulness here.

This also has a benefit: as we notice mindfulness returning and become familiar with it, we become familiar with what it feels like to be mindful. Maybe we start to get that flavor of what it feels like to be mindful. In my own practice, as I attuned to that moment of mindfulness returning, I began to notice something. It was like getting familiar with that moment caused it to point itself out to me. It became easier to see mindfulness returning because I had been curious about it.

So often when mindfulness returns, we kind of latch onto something and start thinking about it. But this moment of mindfulness returning happens all the time. It happens throughout our day, not just in meditation. We're walking down the hill and maybe thinking about something, and then suddenly we're mindful again. Or we're in the shower, kind of lost in the pleasantness of it, and suddenly awareness is back. This experience of awareness returning begins to get familiar, and that familiarity helps us see it more clearly. And so recognizing this moment of effortless mindfulness returning is itself a way of cultivating mindfulness.

That's one piece of working with the edge of the wandering mind—just that we get to see mindfulness returning. That's been such a joy to explore.

And then there is this: the moment of mindfulness returning is already aware of something. We don't have to look for an object, because when mindfulness arises, it is connected to an experience. So when mindfulness returns, there is something that it is aware of already. If we can tune into that, it's simply, okay, mindfulness is back—what is mindfulness knowing in this moment? What's here?

Probably, or possibly, what's here in this moment is flavored by what had been happening when your mind was wandering, because of causes and conditions. Our mind charges out into memories and plans.

When the mindfulness returns, there's probably going to be some of that charge present. That may be what is most obvious, in fact. And so this is another thing we can be curious about in that moment. One way I frame this sometimes is: okay, mindfulness is back. I know that I'm aware. And what has been the effect of the mind having been lost? It's kind of like the thinking process, or whatever has been going on, has been shaping the mind while we weren't looking.

So in the mindfulness returning, it's useful to connect with and be curious about what's here now—which means what has been shaped by the last few moments of mind wandering. This might be, if the mind has been lost in an argument or a plan, that when we come back there's probably going to be some lingering feelings, emotions, or tensions. The reverberations from those thoughts. And it's really helpful to take a moment to step into that and know that.

Because if we jump over it and just try to come back to the breath, or try to come back to some other experience—whatever we think we should be being mindful of rather than what's actually here right now—if we jump over what's really actually here right now, something can be constructed in that moment that might be relevant for us to understand. Sometimes after the mind has wandered, it has shaped attitudes and moods in our mind. And if we don't notice that—if our mind has gone off into an argument with a co-worker and we come back and just go, "Oh well, that's not important, I'll just come back to the breath"—that construct of the argument with the co-worker could have created in the mind an attitude of aversion and anger. And then that could be brought to the breath, brought to whatever we're paying attention to, without our being aware of it.

So it's really helpful to check in. Another phrase from Joseph Goldstein: What's the landscape that you're waking up into? The mind has gone off to some other planet when it's been wandering. Okay, what planet am I waking up on? What's the landscape of this planet? And no judgment about this—just curiosity.

I mentioned earlier there are different ways that the mind wanders. There's that kind of charging out. But there's also the drifting out, as I mentioned. Or there's a kind of getting lost in states of mind, spacing out or something like that. When mindfulness returns—and the more the mind settles and the further we get in our practice, just in general—sometimes when the mind wanders, it's not wandering into reactivity. It's wandering into love and compassion, or calm, or peace. And in the moment when mindfulness returns, again, that too will have shaped the mind.

When the mind wanders, sometimes it's not being pulled into something; it's more just a weakening of mindfulness. But sometimes the mind will wander into wholesomeness. The more we practice and the more our mind inclines in that direction, the more it might wander there without our participation. In fact, sometimes I think it's almost like the mind says, "Okay, I am sitting down and I am meditating and I'm going to pay attention to this. I'm going to be in charge." And at some point the mind just goes, "Hey, I know a better way. Let's relax. Let's find some calm." And my agenda to be here with this thing is like—the mind says, "Yeah, you do that. I'm going to go rest."

I've seen more often than I would have imagined that when I return from wandering, the mind is more settled than it was before I wandered. And if we are judging the wandering mind, we'll miss that. Because if we are judging or thinking it's a problem that the mind has wandered, that judgment will disrupt and ripple that quality of calm or wholesomeness that has been wandered into.

This is another carrot, hopefully, for being curious about that moment. Just: what's here? What planet am I on? Maybe I'm on the calm planet. And then we can begin to get familiar with that quality. Sometimes as the mind wanders into a state of calm or ease, it's finding its way to something quieter or subtler, and our mind doesn't quite know how to stay with it. But in the moment when mindfulness returns, that moment of being with—oh, here I am on the calm planet—it's like, oh, this is what it's like to be mindful of calm. And so that moment of returning, we may begin to touch into states of mind or qualities that are more ephemeral almost, more diffuse qualities that may be a little harder to stay with at times.

And then there's the other side of the equation—the mind wandering out, getting lost. This one is sometimes, especially early in practice, people say, "Well, there's no way to see that happening. It just happens." And yet, the more we get attuned to our mind, the more we can begin to be curious about the conditions in which we lose mindfulness. What happens? When does it happen? What are the states of mind, the familiar places, the things we're doing in which it happens?

Some of this happens by seeing where we wake up. If we wake up with the mind having been bored, it's like, "Well, maybe the mind gets lost in boredom." So we might begin, in recognizing where mindfulness returns, to be attuned to that state. "Oh, boredom's here. This is a place I tend to get lost." And it's kind of like we add just a little bit of interest to that. What happens here?

What I would not want to encourage in this exploration—this is a delicate place to explore—is that if we are trying to not have the mind wander, we won't see how the mind wanders. So for instance, around seeing something like boredom and noticing that you have a habit perhaps of the mind wandering in boredom, rather than feeling like, "Oh, boredom's here, let me double down and try to stay present, hold on to that mindfulness," it's more like curiosity. At least for me, there was a kind of curiosity: "Okay, what happens in boredom that the mindfulness lets go?"

That curiosity is what I'd like to encourage in all of these different ways. I'm going to go through several different ways that we might begin to explore places or ways that we lose awareness. Again, this is to support us to learn about our minds—not to judge ourselves. Because without exception, this is happening for everyone. You are not alone in your mind wandering.

One thing we can start to recognize is that the mind might lose awareness in particular activities or places. Locations. Maybe when we're washing our dishes, or doing our yogi job, or walking down to the meal, or going into our rooms. That's a great one. Sometimes we actively give it up there. It's like, "Whew, nobody can see." Shut the door.

Those are ones to explore. As you see, you might notice—what are the rabbit holes of mindfulness? What are the places it just goes away? These you'll often notice after the fact. You'll notice sometime later, "Oh yeah, here I am back again, and I know I was not mindful when I was in my room."

When we begin to recognize the places where we tend to be lost, often we might be aware as we're walking to our room, or heading to wash the dishes. Maybe we've been very present for our meal, but then something happens as we get up and go to the dishes. As you get familiar with the places that mindfulness gets lost, again, there can be added a little interest. What happens here? It's not, again, to try to force myself—stepping, stepping, stepping, stepping, opening the door, going in. It's not to try to force yourself. It's more about curiosity. What happens? What happens as I walk to the dish station?

What happens as I go into my room? Where does the mind get caught? What does it pick up on that it gets more interested in than being mindful?

What you might start to see is that whatever it is that the mind picks up on, we don't have to get lost in that. It's almost like we have habits of getting lost in certain places or things, and so we might just be curious about that.

On one retreat I was doing this kind of exploration, noticing where mindfulness got lost, and I kept noticing that I would wake up into mindfulness staring at myself in the mirror. I never had noticed that I intended to look in the mirror—I didn't know how I ended up looking in the mirror. And so I got curious about that. Again, I didn't double down and try to stay. I wanted to just see what happens. When is it that I look in the mirror, and what's going on there?

I missed it over and over and over again. I would find myself staring at myself in the mirror. And yet I just kept that intention alive. I knew that heading into my room where there was a mirror, or heading into the restroom where there was a mirror, I'd be like, "Okay, let's see what happens. Maybe I'll get to see it this time." That was the way I approached it—not "I am going to make myself see it," but rather, "Maybe I'll get to see it this time."

At some point through this—and it probably took several days before I began to see it—I was just washing my hands, and it was a habit to look up. It was so subtle as a habit that it was just something I did pretty much every time I was in the bathroom washing my hands or in front of my sink. I would just look up. It was not that there was some kind of deep need to be seen by myself or anything like that. It was really just as simple as a habit.

One of the main places that we lose attention is when mindfulness shifts to a new object, to a new experience. We're sitting here knowing the breath or body or something, and then there's a sound of the turkey. We may be very mindful of that, but sometimes what happens is that we are so committed to staying with the breath that part of our mind thinks it's staying with the breath while the attention has actually shifted to the sound of the turkey. This is one of the primary ways our mind wanders—attention shifts and we haven't consciously recognized that shift.

This is one of the reasons why, in that form of walking I offered early in the retreat, I encouraged noticing the shift from seeing to looking, from hearing to listening. This is getting familiar with that shift of attention—seeing when the mind kind of goes, "Ooh, that's interesting." It's very similar in sitting. It might be that the attention shifts to some unfamiliar body sensation, or a sudden sound, a sneeze or a cough.

If we have an agenda in our meditation to stay with something, we might have either a kind of willful ignoring of those shifts or a yanking ourselves back from them. But we can simply be mindful when the attention shifts, just noticing. Getting familiar with seeing to looking, hearing to listening can help us understand that quality of what it's like when attention shifts. And because it happens so much, as we get familiar with it, it begins to point itself out to us. We can see the attention moving from thing to thing to thing. Then, as we see that shift, we don't have to have a sense of "the attention has shifted, let me come back to anything." It's like, "Well, the attention has shifted and I can be mindful of that now."

On one retreat I was doing this with the breath, and I began noticing that while I was with the breath, there was almost a little sinking of the attention—breath and attention very close and connected, and then this feeling of just a little sinking, the mindfulness letting go of what I had been paying attention to. Initially I was doing breath meditation, so it was like, "Oh, welcome back to the breath." I'd feel it sink, and connect again, sink and connect again.

At some point the mind was just curious—and this wasn't something I really felt like I did—but there was this sinking, and then the mind realized, "Well, I'm aware of this sinking. What's the mind doing? Where's it going?" So rather than trying to bring it back, I just thought, "Okay, it's going somewhere. Where's it going?"

going to one of those more calm, expansive states, it spread into something that was just so completely different—something I had not consciously experienced before. And it was that willingness to follow the attention rather than controlling the attention that allowed it to unfold.

I mentioned a little earlier that we might get lost in states of mind like boredom, and we can tend to get lost in familiar habitual states of mind—states of mind in which we tend to be identified. This is also useful to understand. Whatever the habitual patterns or habits might be—for me, I've talked a bit about self-hatred; this was one that I would tend to get lost in—to be curious and to learn skillfully how to work with that, seeing how the mind begins to head there and what it's like when it wakes up into that. We begin to learn something about those patterns at the edges of being lost in them.

And then there's the getting lost in states in which the mindfulness habitually gets lost, but it's not necessary to get lost. States like dullness, sleepiness, spaciness, zoning out. We might think that spaciness is inherently non-mindful, but it is just a state of mind. I would say it's a state in which we are habitually checked out, habitually not mindful. But it is possible to be aware of that state.

Sleepiness, for instance—we might have the thought in our mind, "I'm too something to be mindful. I'm too sleepy to be mindful. I'm too spacey to be mindful. I have such low energy, I can't be mindful." If you have that thought, you have enough energy to be mindful of it. Because you are mindful of it. You know it's there. You've just told yourself it's there.

It's a different kind of mindfulness. Often in those places or states, we have some agenda for how we want to be mindful. We want to be mindful in the way we want our minds to be mindful. We want to have everything clear and precise and know exactly what it's landing on. But it's more like the world is full of fog. And when it's a really foggy day here, you look down the hill and maybe you can see vague outlines of the buildings. You can't see things very clearly, but you know your eye is working. It's not a problem there. You're not trying to see the clarity of the building. Your eye is perfectly seeing the fog. It's pretty happy seeing the fog.

Similarly, when there is a low energy state like this, or a spacing out state, often the mind is much more interested in that state itself. It's not interested in being precisely clear about all the various other experiences that are happening. It's interested in the fog. And it can know the fog.

I sometimes use the analogy of a mirror for mindfulness. A mirror just reflects what is in front of it. It doesn't care what it reflects, whether it's pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, beautiful, ugly. The mirror is unaffected by what it's reflecting. In a similar way, our mindfulness can be unaffected by pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It just can know that.

And then consider the mirror in the bathroom after we've had a hot shower and it's all steamy. The mirror is coated with steam and we're standing in front of it. Maybe we think we need to do something, wipe the mirror off. But the mirror is still doing its job perfectly. It is reflecting every single drop of water on the mirror perfectly. It is just not doing the job we want it to do. And that's often what happens for us in those states of mind. There's some agenda we have. We want our minds to be a certain way. We want to have clarity. And that's not what our mind is doing in that moment.

And so if we can be curious about, well, what is it like to have a foggy mind? What is it like to space out? I had a kind of exploration around spacing out one morning. I was having breakfast and I kept noticing that the mind kept spacing out. My idea, my agenda at that point was that I wanted to pay attention to the eating—chewing and swallowing and tasting. And so I kept coming back to that. I'd notice that I was spacing out and I'd keep thinking, "Oh, come back, be mindful."

At some point, it kept happening. At some point I thought, well, okay, let's see. Can I follow the mind into spacing out? And I found I could. I could be with that. It felt like the mind hovered somewhere up here, this kind of buzzy quality. It was really pleasant. It felt really restful. And in being mindful of it, that's what I recognized. Oh, the mind needs rest. Again, it's kind of like the mind was saying, "Hey, you're working too hard. Whether you come along or not, I'm going to take some rest." And finally I let the mindfulness go with it. And in that, really felt into the rest. Within thirty seconds or so the mind had taken its rest, and then I was just with the eating.

Anytime there's a sense of "can't be mindful while something is happening," don't believe that thought. It's possible to be mindful of anything—except maybe non-mindfulness. But any state of mind, it's possible to be mindful of.

I have one last piece to share, and I want to bring it in at about this point in the retreat because sometimes—I've been talking about different times and places where we lose awareness. We lose awareness in certain places when attention shifts. We can lose awareness habitually in certain states of mind. And sometimes we lose awareness as the practice deepens. There are different reasons why this might happen.

There's a cycle that Michelle McDonald has called a purity-purification cycle. On a long retreat like this, we see these cycles. It's not just continually more and more easeful. I think you all know that by now. We have cycles. Something settles for a few days, we're maybe in a place of calm and ease, and then something else happens and there's another storm.

Someone asked Sylvia Boorstein, "Why is it that the mind gets really calm and relaxed and then suddenly it's firing off all of these problems? Why does it do that?" And she said, "Well, it's kind of like in space there's all this space junk—satellites and things left over, the detritus from rockets we've sent up. There's a whole bunch of stuff circling the planet. And apparently when they fire a rocket, they need to be careful to make sure there's a good gap in the space junk." Those moments when it's really calm and easeful—it's kind of like sometimes some part of our mind says, "Oh, finally, there's space for me to come up."

As practice deepens, our minds begin to let go of their habits, and things that have been kept under pressure, things buried, begin to surface. So it's not a mistake when something challenging arises. It's that the conditions in this moment allow that to come up now. Sometimes that's what happens as practice deepens—something that has been submerged for a while just comes up. That's one way. Another way mindfulness can get lost as practice deepens—

And again, this has to do with something I mentioned earlier about the shift of attention. We're paying attention to a certain set of things that we're familiar with. Over time, we start to get familiar with what our bodies feel like inside, get familiar with the various sensations, and what our moods and emotions are like. So we're kind of familiar with a certain set of things. And at this level of experience, our mindfulness is attuned to that—we're familiar with looking at that stuff.

But what seems to happen, and this is my own take on it, is that as the mindfulness gets more continuous, it gets interested in subtler experience. And maybe it's experience, in fact, that we're not familiar with. So what can happen is we're familiar with this level of experience and mindfulness here, but as mindfulness becomes more continuous, it begins to gravitate toward something that we're not familiar with. And that's when mindfulness will slip out—because it's moving in the direction of experiences we can't even recognize necessarily.

So this can be an uncomfortable place in practice. It's like, I don't know what the mindfulness is paying attention to. It's paying attention to something. And so this is a place, again, where we may need to adjust. If you see, after a period of time where the mindfulness has been pretty stable and connected to experience, that suddenly the mind starts wandering, get curious about that. Don't double down and try to stay with what you're already familiar with. Because often in that place, as the mindfulness gets stronger, suddenly it seems like, wow, I was right there, and then it's just—what happened? The mindfulness got lost. And it feels a little confusing. We're right there, and then suddenly it's gone.

So if that starts happening, just be curious about this phenomenon. You might simply ask, what else is happening here? What's going on?

I explored this on one retreat where I noticed I was right with the breath, and it had been a few days on one three-month course that I was able to stay with the breath. I'd sit down and just be right there. It was so easy. It was very familiar—every breath was familiar, and it was just so easy to be with. And then one morning I sit down and my mind is just all over the place. I hadn't taken a break from mindfulness or done anything different.

So at this point I just started getting curious. What is going on? And what I began to see is that very quickly, within one breath, the sensations of the breath—I just kind of got, so here's a breath, and very quickly that breath just disappeared. Within a breath, there was no breath anymore. And the mind would just slip out.

That helped me to understand something. At one point on a retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita, I said, "The breath is disappearing, so I'm turning to more obvious experience." And he said, "You don't have to do that. You just have to know the breath is disappearing. Just know that it's quiet. Just know that it's subtle."

I was like, really? And it was true. When I went back and tried playing with it, as the breath kind of went quiet, it was like, oh, quiet breath. And I didn't have to know all the precise details. My mind, again, had some agenda to know all the precise details of what the breath was. And it was no longer able to track that. But it could know that it had just gotten really quiet. And it could stay with that.

So again, I think that sometimes in this terrain, when the mindfulness starts slipping away after a period of steady practice, it may be turning towards something unfamiliar—something we're not as accustomed to meeting or being with. It could be a state of calm or concentration. That place where I finally noticed the mind slip from the breath and then opened into something vast and spacious—that was completely unfamiliar. It was a little startling. But it gave me a sense of how the mind can be mindful of things I don't know, things I'm not familiar with.

My main purpose in offering this is to encourage you to have some curiosity around this wandering mind. I also want to point out that an increase in wandering doesn't necessarily mean you've lost concentration and mindfulness. It can mean that the mind is attuning to subtler phenomena. It can take time for our awareness to come down to the level that mindfulness is operating at—for us to get in sync with what the mindfulness is wanting to attune to. Some patience during this time is often helpful.

And boy, do we get an education about our minds in this process—an education not only about our personal habits, but also about the conditioned nature of mind itself. This understanding is one of the doorways into deep freedom: seeing that it's all just conditioned processes at work.

Let's sit for just a moment.

CHAPTER 149

Day 20 Muditā Practice (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 44 min

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of muditā, the brahmavihārā practice of sympathetic or empathetic joy. She beautifully illustrates the quality through the metaphor of sympathetic vibration in music—how one string's vibration naturally causes a nearby string to resonate. This captures how an open, soft heart can naturally resonate with the happiness of others.
> Fella addresses why muditā is considered the most challenging of the four brahmavihārās to develop, noting that it's often easier to feel compassion for strangers than joy for a dear friend's success. She candidly shares her own early struggles with a zero-sum view of happiness, and how direct experience of muditā during mindfulness practice—watching a friend walk mindfully—transformed her understanding. The Dalai Lama's insight that rejoicing in others' happiness increases our chances for joy "six billion to one" points to the liberating potential of this practice.
> The talk provides practical guidance for working with muditā across different categories of beings: starting with easy subjects like babies whose delight clearly doesn't diminish our own, then moving to self, benefactor, neutral person, and difficult person. Fella offers specific phrases such as "May your happiness continue" and "May your joys increase," emphasizing that we work with intention even when the feeling doesn't arise. She cautions against false muditā—wishing happiness for difficult people so they'll stop bothering us—and suggests that when practice feels too contracted, we can return to easier beings or shift to compassion practice.

Today we'll continue exploring the mudita practice, the practice of sympathetic or empathetic joy. I'll review a little bit of an overview of the quality and talk about the practice, probably reviewing some of what Sally said yesterday, and then talk a little about where the practice heads. Then we'll do a little bit of practice together.

I like the translation "sympathetic joy." Sometimes it's called empathetic joy, but sympathetic joy reminds me of the phrase "sympathetic vibration" in music. This refers to how if you have two strings close to each other on an instrument, when you pluck one of them, the vibration from that string will affect the string next to it. There will be some overtones, a resonance that happens in one string near the other as that vibration occurs. That's how I understand this exploration of sympathetic joy. When we experience or see or connect with the happiness or joy of another, when our heart is open and soft, it will resonate in sympathy with that and experience a kind of joy.

But it does take a heart that is soft. It takes a heart that is available to be resonated with. And that is part of the challenge with the mudita practice. It's said—I can't remember exactly where, I've heard this many times from teachers, but I think it's actually said in some of the texts, perhaps in the Visuddhimagga—that mudita is one of the most challenging of the Brahma Viharas to develop. They say it's easier to feel compassion for strangers than it is to feel joy for a dear friend, because of how our minds work around this quality.

As I started exploring the metta practice in my early years of practice, I began to understand that my mind had a particular view around happiness—happiness, delight, joy. If some of my friends were experiencing happiness, it meant there was less for me. It was like a zero-sum game: there's only so much happiness to go around. In actively wishing happiness for others, it felt like I was wishing the opposite for myself. This was part of my challenge in working with it.

But as I began to touch into the quality itself and to feel and connect with that resonance, I began to understand more of what the Dalai Lama said. It's a rather famous quote. A number of years ago he said, "It's good to take joy in the happiness of others, because then you increase your chances for happiness six billion to one." And that's more what it's actually like—when we can delight in the happiness of others, we have greater chances for happiness ourselves. When we're not feeling the far enemies of mudita—envy, jealousy—when our heart is not constricted around it, then we can experience this delight in the delight of others.

Sometimes, for myself at least, the formal practice of mudita was not the first place I felt mudita. I really felt it first in mindfulness practice, as I began to be more open to how I was in my experience. At one point I was on retreat with a dear friend, and I was doing walking meditation in the upper walking room here. I came to the window and looked out into the courtyard, just seeing people walk by. My friend walked by, and I could see that they were walking with real mindfulness, a lot of calmness and peace. I was just filled with joy. It's like, "Wow, that's what they mean by mudita. That is so cool." I told my friend at the end of the retreat, "You were my first experience of mudita." It was just so clear what it was.

So sometimes mindfulness can be our first doorway to experiencing this quality. For some it may come through the mudita practice itself. It's a beautiful emotion when we can touch into it, and it has no element of stinginess about it.

In choosing beings to practice with, one of the places I discovered for myself a very easy doorway for mudita is babies—just seeing their delight in small accomplishments. A toddler learning how to walk, navigating something a little rough on the playground. One of my friends described how her child, as a toddler, would try to walk over this little lump on the playground and fall over. She'd get up and try it again, and try it again. Finally she walked over it without falling down and just burst into peals of laughter. Just hearing that story made me feel mudita.

We can, I think, more easily recognize that the delight of babies does not take away from our own happiness. So this may be a good place to start, to connect with that quality.

Sally talked a little bit about the phrases, and we'll touch on that again. But I also want to mention that in the mudita practice, using the phrases, connecting with the being, and wishing for their happiness to continue—this is the orientation. In Brahma Vihara practice, when we're doing compassion practice, we orient to struggles. When we bring a friend to mind, we orient to the struggles in their life. With mudita, we orient differently.

we can explore how our heart responds in relationship to the suffering of another being. In compassion practice, we choose somebody and orient around whatever struggles they have. In mudita practice, we orient around their joys and delights, wishing that their happiness, their success, will continue, will grow, will not abate.

In this practice, there can be quite a bit of contraction. This is nothing to berate yourself about. I think I mentioned when I first talked about metta how the practice is like a washing machine—metta being like the soap that pulls the dirt out of the clothes into the water. It draws essentially its opposite to it. Another teacher described the metta practice, or the brahma-vihara practice, as being like running a magnet over our heart. A magnet pulls the opposite out and brings it into consciousness. So it's to be expected that we don't necessarily have an easy time of it.

Temple mentioned this morning that with the phrases, we orient to the intention, the wish. "May your happiness continue. May your success grow." We orient around that as a wish, as an intention. We may or may not feel that appreciative resonance at first. But first we orient around the phrase, we say the phrase, we understand its meaning and connect to just the wish, just this intention that this come to pass.

The Buddha talked about how wherever we incline the mind becomes its inclination. Whatever we ponder becomes the inclination of the mind. This includes all of the hindrances and all of our conditioned patterns, but it also includes when we incline the mind towards love and compassion and joy—it increases the possibility for those states to arise. So we are working with intention here in this practice, and we may not feel it at first. As I said, for me this was pretty dry in the formal practice, but I did begin touching into it in the mindfulness practice, which then helped inform the possibility of feeling it in the formal practice of mudita.

In this practice, as with the other brahma-viharas, we shift in categories. We start with a happy being, one for whom it's pretty easy, one who is experiencing happiness that we know we can connect with. I think babies are a great place to start. Then we shift to ourselves, to benefactor, neutral person, difficult person, just as with the other brahma-viharas. Today in the guided meditation we're going to keep it simple—we'll stay with an easy being, a happy being, and ourselves. But I want to speak a little about this so you can experiment over the next days, if you wish, making some forays into dear friend, neutral person, and difficult person.

With a dear friend, the challenge can be feelings of jealousy or resentment. When we connect to happiness that somebody close to us is experiencing, the question can arise: "Why not me? Why is that good thing not happening to me?" So that's a piece of the purification—noticing how the heart constricts or holds a view, a belief that somehow their happiness is excluding me.

With a neutral person, we may not know the specific nature of their happiness, but we can know that all beings share certain joys. We wish for them any happiness they're experiencing around connection and love and care, moments when their suffering falls away and they have a moment of delight, simple pleasures of being in nature. These are human delights and joys that we can imagine a neutral person engaging with. And if you're picking a neutral person from this retreat, you can appreciate that they have found the Dharma, that they are committed to cultivating those qualities of heart and mind. These are things we can appreciate about each other and about ourselves.

As Nyanaponica points out, in this wishing for joy and happiness, we're not wishing for somebody to be happy in harming other beings. If somebody thinks they are happy in harming others, we're not wishing for that kind of happiness to continue. We are wishing for a true happiness. Nyanaponica says, "Let us teach real joy. Many have unlearned it. Life, though full of woe, holds also sources of joy and happiness unknown to most. Let us teach people to seek and find real joy within themselves and to rejoice in the joy of others."

When doing mudita for ourselves, we can connect with that goodness, that beauty, and may find at times that taste Temple was talking about—just that contentment, perhaps a little bit of contentment with being with just this breath. Feeling that contentment, we can appreciate it. I think often in our mindfulness practice, we feel almost guilty about feeling good. Don't. Appreciate it. We can have appreciative joy for our own goodness and our own beautiful qualities as they arise.

The joy, the delight that arise in our practice.

And then the difficult person. As I said a few minutes ago, with a person who's difficult it can sometimes be hard to get past things that they've done to us. But again, we can potentially connect to, first of all, recognizing that the difficult things arising in a difficult relationship are about dukkha. Probably on both sides of the relationship there's some misunderstanding or some clinging happening.

So we can know that that person is potentially engaging in unskillful action. We see in our own minds how unskillful action arises as a result of conditions. And so we may be able to kind of set that aside. It's not that we're condoning anything anybody has done unskillfully. But we are acknowledging that we're all a bundle of both wholesome and unwholesome. We are not wishing for them to be happy based on cruelty or based on anything unskillful they're doing. We're wishing for a true joy, for the delights and joy to continue based on genuine happiness.

One challenge that can arise with the difficult person—and I'm mentioning this because we have a couple of days now where we're not going to have the Brahma Vihara practice in the hall, and as you practice over the next couple days you might want to explore mudita practice for the neutral and difficult person—is that sometimes, wishing them to be successful and happy, wishing for their happiness to continue, we may have the wish for them to be truly happy and have that kind of true joy so that they will stop bothering us. So that their mind will not be in that place where I'm in conflict with it. And that's not true mudita. That's the kind of mudita that wants something for me in return.

So just be on the lookout for that. It's like, "Oh yeah, I could wish that political leader to be very happy so that they stop doing these things." Well, maybe that's not true mudita practice.

In working with difficulty, as you come up against it, the first thing to do is just try to connect to the intention. Recognizing, again, we're not going to be able to feel this quality all the time. So just trying to connect with: Can I simply say the phrase and understand the meaning? That's all I need to do here.

I have seen at times in my own practice that even this is too hard. Saying the phrase, understanding the meaning, my heart just gets tighter and tighter. And so then it can make sense to drop back to an easier being, to another place. Go back to a child that makes it easy to evoke the quality. Or turn to compassion for yourself. Or turn to the vipassana practice to hold the challenge.

So let's practice for a little while. Again, the proximate cause is where we begin. Let's first start by settling in, finding a comfortable posture and checking into how your heart feels. How is the heart in this moment? However it is, is fine. How is the heart in this moment?

Letting yourself perhaps breathe through that area, seeing if there can be an inclination towards softening. Exploring the possibility of a soft heart.

And then beginning with whatever being is easiest for you to appreciate their success, their good fortune. Whatever phrase feels most connecting to you: "I'm happy that you're happy." Or if that feels like not quite an accurate reflection of what's actually going on: "May I be happy that you're happy." "May your happiness continue." "May your joys increase." "May you have happiness in abundance."

I also find it helpful in the mudita practice to give yourself time to feel into this, the way intention practice works. We express the intention and then we check in: How has that intention landed in the heart? It's like dropping a pebble into a smooth pond. There will be little ripples from the pebble, so think of dropping these phrases into our hearts. "May your happiness continue." And see how the heart ripples, resonates in sympathy, perhaps, with that phrase. Taking that time to feel into it. Connecting with the being. And if it's yourself you're working with, perhaps just your sense of yourself right now.

Connecting with the being, expressing this wish: May you enjoy happiness and abundance. How does that land in your heart to make that wish?

Continue for the next few minutes to wish joy, happiness, and abundance to this being. If it feels appropriate, you might switch to yourself if you haven't been doing that yet, or if you have been working with yourself, bring in another being for whom it's relatively easy to connect with their happiness, their success, and abundance.

Sometimes using imagination helps—imagining this being being happy can support a little spark of that quality. Or for yourself, remembering a time, if you're not in that place right in this moment, remembering an experience of joy can sometimes spark the quality.

Connecting to the being, saying the phrase, understanding its meaning, and checking in: How does that land as you drop that wish or phrase into your heart?

Now I'd like to invite you to, as we did last week, imagine yourself together with this being, with both of you wishing together: May we both enjoy happiness and abundance. May our joy continue. This is just a reminder that mudita is not exclusive.

How is it to feel that wishing together?

For the last minute or so, imagine the two of you together wishing abundance and happiness for all beings: May all beings without exception enjoy abundance and happiness.

CHAPTER 150

Not Knowing (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this profound retreat talk, Andrea Fella invites practitioners to examine the deep truth that we never truly know what the next moment will bring. Drawing from personal stories—including her Peace Corps journey and retreat experiences—she illustrates how our concepts, views, and beliefs create an illusion of predictability that obscures the dynamic, unknowable nature of reality.
> Fella offers the Buddha's teaching to Bāhiya as a central practice instruction: "In the seen should be only the seen, in the heard only the heard, in the sensed only the sensed, in the cognized only the cognized." This bare attention, she explains, creates conditions for insight into not-self to arise naturally, without forcing or searching for particular experiences. She shares Sayadaw U Tejaniya's teaching about how trying too hard to find something can prevent us from seeing it—sometimes we must stop looking to truly see.
> The talk distinguishes between the "not knowing" of ignorance (which clings to views of permanence and self) and the wise not knowing that emerges from direct contact with impermanent, unreliable experience. Fella acknowledges the fear and vulnerability that can arise when we touch this groundlessness, offering guidance on meeting these reactions with awareness. Using the story of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika debating with wanderers, she explains how the Buddha's teachings on impermanence and suffering are views designed to help us transcend all views. The talk concludes with an invitation to trust this falling, recognizing there was never any ground to land on.

The more we practice, the more we see that we have no idea what is going to happen next.

This is true at more obvious levels—like the delay of a start of a talk because of volume issues. At more obvious levels, every day people die who wake up in the morning and have no idea they're not going to make it to the end of the day. The change, the changing nature of life is so profound and unpredictable at our ordinary levels of life, but also at the more subtle levels of our practice experience.

In entering into just this moment, just landing right here, we start to really appreciate and see that we have no idea what the next moment will be. As we receive our experience—just what's happening, what's this, what's this, what's this—when we are really present, we can be very surprised by the next arising.

We seem to think we know what the next thing is going to be. And I think often perhaps we think that because it can be roughly in the category of right. Like probably a minute from now I'll still be here sitting giving this talk. But we don't know. This thinking that we do know what's going to happen tends to obscure this very deep truth that we don't know what is going to happen.

So many things that are added to our experience obscure this not knowing. They obscure this entering into the terrain of being fully open to the next moment without preconceived ideas, views, perspectives, beliefs. These habits of mind, these patterns of mind tend to obscure this truth that we don't know what's coming next.

We carry beliefs, ideas, views from the past into the present moment. Views about who we are, views about who other people are. And we think we know. We think we know who we are. We think we know how we're going to respond, what's next. We think we know who other people are. Maybe we can open to the possibility that we are not what we think we are, and that others are not what we think they are.

We project these views, these beliefs into the future. We create these worlds of thoughts about some future that we take up residence in and believe will happen.

It can be hard to see this. This evening as I was sitting in my room down in the teacher village, reflecting about this content and these ideas, I imagined myself up here giving this talk. Because of the weather there was a recognition that I was going to have to go through something to get here, and it was kind of unknown what that going through would be. So there was a connection with that—a recognition that it's really windy out there, trees can fall down, maybe the golf cart could flip over. There was this sense of not being sure if I'd get here. But then I realized that I had assumed I would get into the process of getting up the hill, and that was still two hours away. I had no idea what would happen in those intervening two hours. It's so quick for us to pick up these ideas and just assume we know what's going to happen.

I joined the Peace Corps in my mid-thirties. This was before I met the Dharma, before I met the practice, but there was quite a startling experience that I had as I was making my way across the ocean in the plane. I realized that I had no idea what was going to meet me on the other end of that plane ride. I could kind of envision what it would be like to be on the plane until it landed, but then there was no clue. In the way my mind worked at that point, there was almost this funny kind of belief that I wasn't going to get there because I couldn't envision it. I couldn't see what it would be. It almost felt like my life ended with that plane flight. But then the plane landed and each moment unfolded—the next moment, the next moment, the next moment. And it revealed itself. The experience revealed itself.

When we think we know what's going to happen, that's a view, it's an idea, it's thoughts, it's a world of thought that is created. And the way our minds work, sometimes this view or these thoughts can become self-fulfilling prophecies. Not always bad.

The image, for instance, of my coming up here to give a talk—that becoming a self-fulfilling prophecy by remembering it and following through on that. And this is hopefully helpful, that I showed up here tonight.

But we can also, through what I was saying earlier about views and ideas we have about ourselves or others, box ourselves in, box other people in, based on our senses of who we are, who they are. Views are a huge obscuration of this entering into the mystery of the moment and not knowing—really not knowing what the next moment will be.

And even in the present moment there are ways views enter in, but also concepts. I talked a little about concepts last week when I talked about delusion, and how we often live our lives through concept, and how easy it is for concept to be distorted by mistake or emotion. It's so easy for our ideas, what we think we are receiving as experience, to be distorted or altered through our views, our ideas, our opinions.

And so we don't just take in the world as it is. As I think it was Anaïs Nin who said, we don't see the world as it is—we see the world as we are. There's a deep truth to this that we begin to really recognize by looking at our minds.

Now concepts are useful. I think I talked about that some last week too, that we need concepts to navigate the world. But it's helpful both to recognize that we are experiencing the world through concept, and that everything we experience, all of our experience, is mediated through our mind. We are not really in touch with what's out in the world. We're in touch with an internal construction that does a pretty good job of representing the world.

The use of concepts stabilizes the world. It allows us to navigate. Concepts can be a kind of shortcut for us. If I had to figure out every time I walked into the dining hall what tables were and what forks and knives were, it would be exhausting. So this shortcut of concepts and perceptions helps us navigate the world. And yet what we mistake is that we think we are accurately perceiving things, rather than recognizing that we are perceiving things—that our mind is constructing what we are seeing.

This is a way of entering into this present moment more fully: to understand this constructed nature of mind, of what we are experiencing, the constructed nature of our experience. It is such a mystery, such a mind-blowing thing that we're living in.

We can understand that we are navigating the world through concepts and still know that that is how we are. We can navigate through concepts and still understand that we are navigating through concepts. It's not that hard actually, once we begin to touch into it. We can understand concept as concept and understand how error-prone concept can be.

I talked about the elephant—the blind people and the elephant—last time. And I talked about mistaking a rope for a snake. These are ways in which we solidify, reify, consolidate our experience around perceptions and take things to be. "This is the way it is"—that's a view, a concept. It's so pervasive. And one of the ways, again, even experiencing the world through concept, the stabilizing that happens through concept keeps us from really touching into that truth of not knowing. Because we've got our concepts, we think they're right, and we're experiencing things through that. We're not really open to the dynamic nature of what's happening.

And so entering into the present moment, entering into just being here in this moment, is a way of beginning to explore this truth of not knowing. Thoughts, concepts, views can be seen as just arising. We can know them as experience that's arising, as opposed to simply believing them. We can more fully open into this not knowing.

The very nature of what we are doing here, the very nature of awakening—even this word vipassanā, seeing clearly, sometimes translated as insight—the very nature of insight is that we have no idea what we're looking for.

We tend to be drawn to the familiar. We tend to be drawn to what we already know. That comes through views, through concepts, through ideas, beliefs. All of those things shape our mind through what we have learned in the past. We tend to be drawn to the familiar. It's comfortable. It feels navigable. And yet the very work that we're doing is helping us to see things that we've never seen before.

And if we're orienting to our experience through what's familiar, what we're already aware of, if we're orienting to the world in that way, we won't see what we're not looking for. As we look for something, the very act of looking can obscure understanding, can obscure the unfamiliar.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya tells a story about how sometimes it's easier to see something—especially something we don't know what it is—when we stop looking. He was teaching a retreat at Insight Meditation Society in New England, and one of the staff members was driving him around, taking him on a tour of the area. The driver said, "Sayadaw, there's a deer alarm on this car." There are so many deer in that area that he had put a deer alarm on his car—a kind of high-pitched sound that alerts deer to the approaching car so they'll stay away. The driver said, "You can hear it. It's not at a higher pitch than we can hear. Can you hear it?"

Sayadaw said he tried to hear it. "Can I hear that? Can I hear that?" And he couldn't hear it. But then when he stopped trying to hear it, he heard it. He didn't know what he was looking for. And when he relaxed and just took in experience more openly, without any idea about what he was looking for, there it was. It popped into sound.

We hear sometimes in dharma talks descriptions of various experiences. In some of my early retreats at IMS—maybe it was even my very first three-month course—I heard the teachers talking about an experience around impermanence, of just seeing things popping in and out. It sounded so cool. I really wanted to see it. And I suffered a lot around wanting to see it and trying to see it and imagining that I could see it.

At some point, while I was suffering over this, I realized that I was suffering. I kept thinking I was suffering because I wasn't having the experience I wanted to have. But what I discovered was that I was wanting to tell the teacher that I'd had the experience. I found myself waking up into this thought of telling the teacher about it, how great it was that I was having this experience. We were laughing and celebrating in the interview room. I was having this great fantasy about how wonderful it would be to tell the teacher I'd had this experience. And I had no idea—that was a real eye-opener for me—I had no idea what I was looking for. I had no idea what I wanted. What I wanted was for somebody to praise me. That was an eye-opener too.

So we really don't know. Often we don't know what we're looking for. And so this perspective of curiosity—what is this experience?—this opening to not knowing... Really, this moment, right now, we think we know what it is, but look at it. What's here?

This can be a way to enter into a real intimacy, that being with, an intimacy we talked about in terms of investigation, that can support us to be here, just meeting this experience without preconceived ideas. Or if we have preconceived ideas, to recognize: this is an idea that's arising right now. That's actually what's happening—an idea arising about what I'm seeing. That can be startling to recognize: I'm seeing experience through a concept.

And sometimes we can actually touch into just this experience. Just this. Without preconceived ideas. Sometimes what's called bare attention.

This reminds me of the Buddha's teaching to Bahiya. Many of you are probably familiar with this teaching.

A wanderer who was not one of the Buddha's followers, but had heard about the Buddha from a distance, had traveled a long way to see him. When he arrived where the Buddha was residing, he asked where he might find the Buddha, saying he wanted to ask him a question. They told him the Buddha had gone out for alms round over to the village. And so Bahiya followed and found the Buddha making his way through the village on alms round.

Bahiya said, "Please teach me the Dharma. I've traveled a long way." He introduced himself and told the Buddha his name. The Buddha said, "Bahiya, now is not the time. I'm going on alms round."

Bahiya asked again: "We don't know when you or I will die. Please teach me the Dharma. Please teach me the Dharma in brief, even." He just wanted a little short dharma talk. Again the Buddha said, "Not now, it's time for alms."

But Bahiya asked a third time, and in many of the stories in the texts, when somebody asks the Buddha something three times, he will do it. And so he stopped and gave Bahiya a teaching. Now I'll repeat this from memory—I don't have it in front of me. It is said that upon hearing these words, Bahiya became fully awakened.

So, listen. The Buddha said to Bahiya, "This is how you should train yourself: In the seen should be only the seen. In the heard should be only the heard. In the sensed, only the sensed. In the cognized, only the cognized."

That was the instruction. You should train yourself thus: In the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard, in the sensed is only the sensed, in the cognized is only the cognized.

This is essentially recognizing experience just for what it is. This includes recognizing that seeing is happening, and the concept—the cognition of what is seen—knowing that to be just something that's cognized. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching. "The sensed is only the sensed" refers to those other three senses. And "in the cognized is only the cognized."

Essentially he was offering a form of bare attention, of choiceless awareness. This question came up the other day: where is this found in the Satipatthana? This is one of the main places this teaching is found—in this teaching to Bahiya. Notice your experience just for what it is. Just this, just this, just this. The mystery of experience.

The Buddha went on to explain to Bahiya the value of doing this. He didn't just give him the instruction and say, "Go off and practice and see what you see." He gave him a pointer. He said, "When for you in the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard, in the sensed is only the sensed, in the cognized is only the cognized—when that's true for you, there will be no you in terms of that experience. When there is no you in terms of that experience, there is no you there. And when there is no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

And so he pointed to how this practice of entering into the present moment, entering into this—essentially this not knowing, just this, what's this—creates the conditions for the understanding and insight into not-self to arise. He didn't give Bahiya a particular teaching on not-self. He just said, "When you explore experience in this way, this is the result. There's no you in terms of that experience." You're not interpreting experience in terms of you. It's just experience. You're not interpreting experience in terms of I or me or mine.

This is the process that the Buddha called conceiving. We conceive ourselves in relation to other things, in relation to experience.

The Buddha had another pithy teaching about this—another one-line teaching, another one of these deep, penetrating sentences. He said, "In whatever way they conceive, the fact is ever other than that."

This again reminds me of the elephant story. The conceiving around "this is what an elephant is" and the attaching to that view because I had experienced it. Holding to that view and coming to blows with the other people who had different views. It's not wrong to say this part of the elephant is like this. But again, in whatever way they conceive, there's more to the picture.

And in fact, here what this is pointing to is that when there is conceiving happening, when experience is interpreted in terms of I, me, or mine, there is a lot that's not being seen. The fact is ever other than that.

And so this simple attention helps us to enter into—maybe stumble into—this way of... He didn't tell Bahiya what the experience of not-self would be like. He didn't say, "Here, look for this. This is what not-self will be like." He said, "Notice experience like this. In the seen is only the seen. When for you in the seen is only the seen, there will be no you in terms of that." A kind of pointer to: what is this experience? A pointer to this possibility of something unknowable, unfamiliar, that might be available to be known in experience.

This is some of what we do in our talks. We point to things, we speak to things. Sometimes we can hear them, and then later in our experience we see something differently because there's been a kind of pointing in a talk or in a meeting with a teacher. Our mind has been shaken away from its familiar things.

"There is no you in terms of that." When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. It's not that the you disappears. It's really recognizing the truth of how it's always been. Nikki pointed to that last night—it's the truth of how it's always been. It's just the seeing here. The understanding of something that's hard to see because we are so familiar with looking at things through the perspective of self.

Sometimes we even—I was talking a few minutes ago about seeing things that somebody talks about in a dharma talk, that the hearing of it, we don't really get it at the time, but then later it's like, "Oh, that's what they were talking about." Sometimes something can be so out of our range of experience that we can't even hear it when it's spoken.

I'm quite sure this happened to me on another three-month course when I was doing my practice and going to the talks and listening to what they said. Some insight arose in my experience—I don't even remember at this point what it was—but it felt very profound and very important. And I was almost frustrated at the teachers. "Why haven't they been telling us about this? This is important. They should be talking about this." So this was one of those things that I felt like I'd stumbled into by myself with nobody ever having spoken about it. And these things happen. We can see things at times that haven't been pointed to, if we are really just here and available to be here.

I almost wrote the teachers a note, but I decided not to. And in the next three dharma talks, I heard them say it. And so it was pretty obvious to me that they hadn't just magically picked up on my thoughts and started putting them into the dharma talks, but that they'd probably been saying it for weeks. And I had not consciously heard it. This too can happen because when something is that unfamiliar, sometimes it's hard to hear.

So these teachings to Bahiya to me really point to the simplicity of our practice. The instructions he gave to Bahiya were so simple. And then he pointed to the possibility of freedom that comes from that simplicity. Not from trying to look for not-self, but just knowing experience. In the seen is only the seen, and the heard is only the heard.

So what's the difference between this kind of not knowing that I'm talking about right now and the not knowing of ignorance, which we can think of also as a not knowing, a not understanding? The not knowing of ignorance is really a taking things, a looking at experience through views and beliefs. It's taking things to be permanent, reliable, self. It's interpreting experience through that perspective of "me."

And so the not knowing of ignorance is not understanding the truths of impermanence, unreliability, not-self. It comes from not connecting directly with experience. It's the habit of mind before we are introduced to this possibility of meeting the moment in a different way.

This deeper kind of not knowing is entered into by precisely connecting to the impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable nature of experience. It comes out of awareness and contacting experience directly. In the seen is only the seen. Entering into the present moment, letting go of views that create a rigid sense of what is happening, what will happen, who I am, what others will be or do, who they are, what's supposed to happen.

This entering into not knowing is a form of at least recognizing views for what they are—that they are views. I've talked about this in some of the meetings with you. It is so powerful to notice that we're holding a view. When we're not aware that we're holding a view, it is simply taken to be true. But we can become aware: "Oh, there's a view, there's a belief happening right now." And in that recognition that there's a belief happening, there's some space. We don't have to in that moment tell ourselves not to believe it, but at least to recognize: this is being believed. This particular belief may be connected to a relatively close reflection of reality, or it may be completely off. But the first step is really recognizing, "Oh, this is a belief, and it's being believed."

So if this entering into the present moment is partly about letting go of views, how does right view enter into the mix? Isn't that just another view that gets in the way?

The views that the Buddha offers as wise view are views that he articulated having come to an understanding of the nature of experience—the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. The understanding of how clinging creates suffering. This is the place where the views that the Buddha offers us land. Clinging creates suffering. Clinging creates suffering precisely because things are impermanent. Because they are impermanent, they are unreliable as a place to cling to for lasting happiness. They're all directly connected, these truths that the Buddha discovered and then articulated.

As Anisha said, the Buddha didn't make this up. It's more like discovering the law of gravity. He discovered these truths and then articulated them, like Newton discovered the law of gravity and then articulated equations that help us to navigate it. Although we were always navigating the law of gravity, even before Newton discovered it. We always knew that we couldn't place this glass in mid-air. We knew that. And at some level, maybe we also know the truth of not-self. We do, at some level, know the truth of impermanence.

But as the Mahabharata says in one place—this great Hindu epic poem, which is really kind of a play—one of the characters is asking another character, "What is the most wonderful thing in the world?" And this character responds, "This is what I think is most wonderful: that people seeing daily the truth that everyone dies, never once does it really enter that they too will die." Only the surface mind understands. The actual truth doesn't penetrate.

We know at some level these truths of impermanent, unreliable. But because we are orienting through concept, that stability of concept, we miss this truth. It's staring us in the face all the time.

And so the views that the Buddha pointed to are in alignment with these truths that he discovered. And we can frame it, perhaps, as it was done in one sutta. There's a sutta where the householder Anathapindika was talking with some people from other traditions, and they were asking him, "So, tell us what views the contemplative Gotama has." That was the name for the Buddha. And saying "the contemplative Gotama" was maybe slightly disrespectful. "So tell us what views the contemplative Gotama has."

And Anathapindika responded, "Venerable sirs, I don't know entirely what views the Blessed One has."

"Well, well," they said, "so you don't know the views of the contemplative Gautama. Then tell us what the views of the monks are."

And he says, "I can't tell you that either."

And they said, "Well, then tell us what your views are."

And Anathapindika was clever. He said, "Why don't you tell me your views first, and then I will tell you my views."

So they each—there were ten of them or so—described their views, and they all said something along the lines of, "The cosmos is eternal. Only this is true. Anything else is worthless. This is the sort of view I have." Then the next person would say something like, "The cosmos is not eternal. Only this is true. Anything else is worthless. This is the sort of view I have."

There were many of these views: the cosmos is finite, the cosmos is infinite, the soul and the body are the same, the soul and the body are different. All these different views directly contradicting each other, and each person believing that their view was the only true view.

Anathapindika said in response, "As for the one who says 'the cosmos is eternal, only this is true, anything else is worthless, this is the sort of view I have'—that person's view arises either from his own inappropriate attention or in dependence on the words of another. This view has been brought into being, is fabricated, willed, dependently originated. Whatever has been brought into being, is fabricated, willed, dependently originated—that is impermanent. Whatever is impermanent is unreliable. Whatever is unreliable is suffering. This one thus adheres to that stress, submits himself to that stress."

The very holding to the view—that is what Anathapindika was pointing to. Holding on to that view, you are suffering.

He went through all of the views that they had spoken. He said all of these views, held to in this way, are suffering. You are submitting yourself to suffering.

Then he said what his view was. "Here is the view I have: Whatever has been brought into being, is fabricated, willed, dependently originated—that is inconstant, impermanent. Whatever is impermanent is unreliable. Whatever is unreliable is suffering. Whatever is suffering is not me, is not what I am, is not myself. This is the sort of view I have."

The wanderers tried to put his own argument back on him, saying, "Well, you're just holding on to that view. You're suffering by holding on to that view."

And Anathapindika said, "When whatever has been brought into being is seen as suffering, right there I understand it is impermanent, it is unreliable, it is suffering—and there is the release from it in the seeing of it."

What Anathapindika was pointing to was that holding a view that clinging to views is suffering is itself onward leading. This is the sort of view that the Buddha held, that he offered to us. He offered views that help us to transcend views—to recognize that holding to any view, clinging to it and saying "only this is true, anything else is wrong," that this clinging is suffering.

When we notice that—when we notice that we're clinging to whatever, to sense experience, to concepts, to views—when we notice that clinging, the seeing of it brings understanding of the suffering of it. And the mind begins to release.

At first, the views that the Buddha offers are more of a conceptual wisdom, helping us recognize where the traps are in our minds. But the understanding that results from the seeing of that clinging, from the seeing of the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience—

That understanding is not a concept. It's a direct experience. It's a shift of understanding that allows us to be with things as they are—this entering into the mystery of experience. We don't know what the next thing will be, what the next experience, the next moment will bring. We have no idea.

It's useful to recognize that as we begin to touch into this truth—that we don't know what the next moment will bring—we have relationships to that. Often relationships of fear, a sense of vulnerability, maybe confusion, a feeling of insecurity. This too is something that needs to be seen and known and recognized. Not to try to convince ourselves, "I should just be with things, be with this not knowing," when what's arising, part of what's arising in this moment's experience, is fear. And that can be known as an arising. It's just, "Oh, this too is cognized." The cognized is only the cognized—fear is happening right now.

So there are different relationships we have to this not knowing, and it may be useful to unpack a little what's going on there. Sometimes the fear or insecurity, the vulnerability around this not knowing, is about a projection into the future. We're thinking, "I don't know what's going to happen. Maybe something bad will happen." And so we pick up some imagined future and then get afraid of that. In this not knowing place, our mind sometimes fills it in with something and then responds or reacts to that. In that case, it's not really the not knowing we're reacting to—it's the imagined scenario we're reacting to.

Another way we can react to the not knowing is to the very idea of not knowing. We might just sit here with this thought, "I don't know what's going to happen. Oh no. What do I do?" And it's more about the idea than the actual experience. The fear or insecurity there is related back to a sense of me that feels vulnerable, that feels like it's happening to me—it's me that this not knowing is happening to.

On one retreat I had an experience of this fear around just, "Wow, it's like..." I felt like I was going to step off the edge every single step. Just this really entering into having no idea what's going to happen next. A very disorienting kind of state. And so there was fear coming up, and my teachers, as we do, encouraged me to notice this fear.

So I was like, "Okay, I'm going to meet this fear. I'm going to meet this not knowing. What is this fear about anyway?" I was doing walking meditation as I was exploring this. And I would take a step. "Okay, where's the not knowing?" There is no not knowing right now. The step is known. And I'd take the next step and it's like, "Well, that step's known too." I could see that the mind was just slightly projecting—again, that sense of slightly projecting into the future: "I'm not going to know the next thing." But when I actually looked at this moment, the knowing was just revealing itself.

I felt like I was standing on the edge of an abyss, being asked to step into it. And as I took that step—just with trust, taking that step—the edge of the cliff grew out and there I was, standing on the edge of the abyss again. Every step was known. But the feeling of stepping into something unknown remained.

So it takes some kind of trust to meet this experience.

Even sometimes, in that experience, every step is known. I know what's happening there. There's the pressure and the pulsing and the tension. It's just so clear in that moment.

And yet sometimes, even being in the present moment, just the entering into the present moment, even that feels unknowable. Slippery. Streaming. Like there's nowhere to land. As soon as the mind touches any experience, it's already dissolving. It's just vanishing, vanishing, vanishing.

So sometimes even this feels very slippery. And yet this is a kind of entering into groundlessness. There is nowhere to land. The only problem is we think there should be somewhere to land. It's like our lives are an endless falling.

Joseph mentions an analogy of parachuting. First you jump out of an airplane—free falling can be kind of exhilarating, the feeling of falling. But then maybe you realize you forgot your parachute. Then there's terror. But in this practice, there's the understanding: there is no ground. There is no ground.

And so this takes trust. Letting go and trust to enter this moment.

Just this.

CHAPTER 151

Checking the Attitude (Online Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 39 min

> In this retreat guidance, Andrea Fella begins by reflecting on the interconnection between inner contemplative practice and outward engagement with the world, noting how the conditions of seclusion during challenging times can open the heart to recognize systemic suffering and the need for justice. She emphasizes that examining our internal conditioning directly supports how we engage with external conditions, as the views, attitudes, and unseen delusions within individual minds collectively shape societal patterns.
> The teaching then focuses on "checking the attitude"—a key aspect of Sayadaw U Tejaniya's approach to meditation. Fella explains how our awareness can be imbued with habitual tendencies of greed (wanting experience to continue), aversion (wanting experience to stop), and delusion (confusion, beliefs, identification). These attitudes are often hidden because they are so ingrained in how we engage with experience. By gently checking our relationship to what's arising—whether toward sensory experience or toward the meditation practice itself—we can bring these hidden patterns into awareness.
> Fella introduces the concept of "wise attitude" or "right attitude," characterized by an okayness with whatever is arising, which may manifest as interest, curiosity, compassion, or simple ease. She references the Buddha's teaching about crossing the flood "by neither tarrying nor hurrying," offering this as guidance for the light touch of effort needed in practice. When mindfulness returns after wandering, this becomes a precious moment to notice both the effortless quality of awareness and the effects that wandering has left on the mind—sometimes tension, sometimes unexpected calm.

Good morning, everyone.

I just want to start by saying a couple of words about our collective situation in our lives right now. We've had this interesting juxtaposition, this combination of events—the coronavirus and the shelter in place, everyone secluding themselves and turning inwards, a little more time away from our usual experiences and work and how we engage in the world. And then there are the protests that have come in the last few weeks, which really speak to a deep, very deep oppression of Black and brown people in our country. That external movement, the movement to engage, the movement to speak and act towards justice, towards change of conditions.

I think it's not an accident that these two things happened in a way together. The movement inwards, the seclusion, in some ways created the conditions for this connection outwards. The fact that people were in such a different place allowed them to be more available, to have the conditions—the videos, the situation of George Floyd's murder, Ahmaud Arbery's murder, the video with Amy Cooper—have those hit so deeply because we weren't engaged with all of our other things. I think that's a condition for the engagement, for the heart opening.

To me, this really speaks to the interplay, the dance between inward and outward, internal and external. The interplay between looking inward to what's happening inside and engagement outwards. I wanted to speak to this because we're taking this time this week, these days, to engage with an inward exploration, but it's not separate from looking outwards. Looking at the conditions in our own mind has an effect on how we engage outwardly. It's not separate. The conditions of the world are, I suppose we could say, a kind of combination of all of our internal mind states. The systemic oppression of Black and brown people originates in the views, the attitudes, the unseen delusions of people. Seeing those, taking the time to step back and see those, will support and move us all in the direction of more healthy relationships.

It has been resonating in my mind, this inner and outer—exploration inward at our own conditioning and also looking outward at the conditions in the world and seeing how they connect. I do think that this time on this retreat will be a valuable support for that in your own life and in the way in which our practice inevitably connects to how we engage in the world.

So just a few key points before the meditation, a few key points to follow on from Carol's instructions yesterday, Carol's guidance on the practice, the overview of this style of teaching. The instructions themselves are pretty simple. We relax the body and mind because that supports a very natural awareness. We don't try to make awareness happen. The relaxation of body and mind allows those processes, those natural human capacities, to do their job. So we relax the body and mind and then begin to recognize, notice the awareness itself. Am I aware? What is that experience of awareness? And then noticing what awareness is aware of. What is obvious? What's here in this moment? And the light touch of persistence—just enough effort in a moment to be with this moment, and then doing it again and again and again. Each moment: Are you aware? What's obvious? What's here?

From time to time also checking in: How am I in relationship to experience? Sayadaw calls this checking the attitude.

This checking the attitude is one of the pieces I want to explore a little bit more this morning. Checking the attitude is important because how we are paying attention, how we are noticing experience, may be embedded with or imbued with habitual tendencies—attitudes of greed, of aversion, of confusion. Our work is to begin to move in the direction of having an attitude where everything that arises is okay, and yet we don't try to deny when there's a not-okay perspective in the mind.

Often these perspectives, these attitudes, are kind of hidden from us because they're so habitual, because they're so embedded or ingrained in the way that we engage. We don't see them. And so the checking the attitude is a kind of noticing what's here. We notice what's here—oh, there's this happening right now: this experience, this thought, this mood, this body sensation, this sight, this sound. And how am I in relationship to that? Do I like it? Do I not like it? Do I want it to go away? Is there confusion about it? A belief, an identity in relationship to it? A sense of me and other, self and other?

These relationships often are not seen, but sometimes we can simply check in: How am I in relationship to this?

And then some of those hidden attitudes can come into the forefront, be revealed, be seen. And that helps the mind to begin to notice what's actually happening in the moment. When we do see an attitude, we see what's happening.

I also want to mention a fourth kind of attitude. I've just mentioned different attitudes connected to greed, aversion, and delusion. Wanting something to happen—that's a greedy attitude, a mind of greed. Wanting something to stop happening, not liking something, being irritated by something—those are attitudes of aversion. Confusion, spacing out, disconnection, beliefs or views, identification—these are connected with delusion.

And then there is another form of attitude that Sayadaw would call wise attitude, or right attitude. That's the attitude that is okay with what's arising in the moment. There's ease with whatever is happening. No problem.

So in this exploration of checking the attitude, being curious about how am I in relationship to what's happening, you might discover a relationship of greed, aversion, or delusion. You might see that in the mind. But you also might see this okayness, the mind that is not disturbed by what's happening.

That experience of okayness can take many different flavors. It might have the flavor of interest and curiosity. It might have the flavor of simply okay, it's not a problem. It might have the flavor of compassion or love. These flavors begin to point us to some of the wholesome qualities in the mind that develop as we practice.

Opening to the attitude is not just about opening to kilesa, to reactive states of mind, to defilement, but also beginning to open to the wholesome states when the mind is okay with what's here. There's this thing happening, and yes, this is okay. What is it like for the mind to be okay with that? What's it like for the mind to have that sense of no problem? It's a pretty subtle experience.

Seeing the attitude, seeing it as part of what's happening—we don't have to do too much with that as we notice it, as we check in and see, oh, there is a relationship happening here. Simply allow that to be part of the field of what we are aware of. We have become aware that there's this experience of maybe some physical discomfort, and then there's the not liking, the resistance, the aversion to it. Those are happening simultaneously—the body and mind in relationship. That can be known. This is what it's like for a human being to be experiencing pain and not liking it. Can there be okayness with that?

And so we get to wise attitude. Sayadaw often says this: we find our way to wise attitude by getting to know unwise attitude really well. Not by resisting it, not by trying to fight it, but by opening to it in a different way.

When those unwise attitudes—when the attitudes connected with greed, aversion, and delusion—are embedded or hidden in our mind, when we're not consciously aware of them, they are reinforcing themselves. They're kind of driving the show. We are acting out of them. But when we can become aware of them and hold them with this kind of curiosity—oh, what's it like to be a human being experiencing aversion to something unpleasant? That's what's happening—that's a whole different relationship to that experience. And that's where transformation can happen.

Seeing these relationships, seeing these unwise attitudes, is not a problem. It's actually how the practice deepens, how we begin to gain the wisdom that frees the mind.

Just a couple more pieces about attitude. These attitudes might be in relationship to some particular experience—the sight, the sound, the smell, whatever's happening in our experience. That's one big category of relationship that we might have. But another big category is attitudes that we have about the meditation itself—about what's supposed to be happening, about how we think we're doing. We could look at these as agendas for the meditation.

So this is another kind of relationship to be curious about: not only attitudes about what's happening in the experience, but also what's happening in relationship to what I'm doing here, which is meditation. Do I have any beliefs or ideas or views about what is supposed to be happening?

Through this exploration around attitude, we become aware of a filter or view through which we're paying attention, or perhaps we become aware of that okayness, that wise attitude.

So let's sit together, and I'll offer some reflections, a guided meditation. And again, remembering to keep it simple.

Starting with some relaxation. Relaxing the body. Consciously relaxing the body, perhaps checking in where there may be tension and allowing there to be a relaxation. Remembering how relaxation supports this natural capacity for awareness. Relaxing the body is a condition that supports a relaxed mind. And when the mind is relaxed, when it's not pulled into thoughts, worries, concerns about the past, the future, the present, it's very naturally aware of what's happening.

So relax the body. Allow the body to relax. Allow the mind to relax.

As the body and mind relax, notice: is there awareness? Are you aware? Taste, touch that quality of being aware—as Carol spoke about yesterday, that sense of just knowing. Aware. It may not be quite clear how you know that you're aware, but that's okay. After figuring it out, just: yes, I'm aware that that is happening.

And what does awareness receive? What is awareness aware of? What is obvious in this moment? Receiving experience rather than choosing or directing the attention. Maybe having a sense of what is coming to you.

Relax. What is obvious? Maybe something really simple, like this body sitting here. Or a breath. Or a sound—the sound of my voice perhaps, the silence between words. Moods, emotions.

A light touch of effort. Each moment, just enough effort to be with this, whatever this is. And then perhaps the attention shifts, picks up on something else. We're sitting here aware of a breath and then there's a sound that happens and we become aware of that. We don't have to fight that shift—just being aware. Oh, attention on this now. What's that like, to be receiving that? Just enough effort to be with this.

In one sutta, a teaching, a being came to the Buddha and asked, "How did you cross the flood?" The flood referring to the stream of greed, aversion, and delusion that arises in our minds. And the Buddha responded, "By neither tarrying nor hurrying, I crossed the flood."

That image—neither tarrying nor hurrying—has been very supportive for me in this light touch of effort. Each moment, what's arising in this moment? Not tarrying with it, not holding on to it, not sticking to it, just being with it for this moment. Also not rushing past it, not hurrying, not reaching for something else. Each moment, neither tarrying nor hurrying. Just this.

Remembering relaxation. Are you aware? What is obvious? This gentle persistence supports a stabilizing of mindfulness.

From time to time, check in: what is the connection, the relationship to what's happening? Do you want something to happen, to keep happening? Do you want something to stop happening? Is there confusion? A belief about what should be happening? Maybe it's okay. No problem.

If there is some relationship that is revealed, just allow that to be included in the field of awareness. What's now?

What's happening now? Being aware of this. Are you aware? What is obvious? Just this, this moment, this experience. Neither tarrying nor hurrying.

The mind will wander. This is a natural part of the conditions in our minds. But an equally natural part of the conditions is that mindfulness will return at some point. In that moment when mindfulness returns—that's actually a great moment. Mindfulness returned of its own nature, and you didn't have to do it. An effortless moment of mindfulness arose.

Can you take in that awareness is here in this moment? Aware again. It's a great moment to begin to really get that flavor of what it's like to be aware when awareness returns.

In that moment too, the mind will have been shaped by what had been happening when it was wandering. And so that's worth becoming aware of. How is the mind now, in this moment, having been wandering? What has been the effect of the wandering? How is that being experienced right now?

Sometimes after the mind wanders, it has wandered into habits and patterns familiar—arguing, wanting. And so maybe there's a flavor of that, of greed or tension or tightness. Maybe that's what's there. That's okay. Can that be known?

And sometimes, more than you might think, when the mind wanders it can wander into calm, into ease. That too might be the consequence of the mind wandering. Sometimes when we come back from wandering, we might notice there's actually more ease, more relaxation. If we're judging ourselves for the wandering, we will miss that this has happened.

Noticing the effect of what the wandering has created. And also noticing the possibility of the effortless quality in that moment of mindfulness's return.

Relax. Recognize awareness. Are you aware? What is obvious? Receiving experience.

CHAPTER 152

Aware of Awareness (Online Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 47 min

> In this guided meditation and reflection from an online retreat at Spirit Rock, Andrea Fella offers intimate guidance on one of the more subtle aspects of insight practice: becoming aware of awareness itself. Drawing from her own training with Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma, she shares both the instructions and the personal journey of discovering what it means to know that we are aware—not just knowing objects, but recognizing the awareness that knows them.
> Fella uses the analogy of wearing glasses to illuminate this teaching: just as glasses are the medium through which we see the world yet often go unnoticed, awareness is the medium through which all experience is known. She guides practitioners to explore the simple question "Am I aware?" not as something to figure out intellectually, but as a way to spark curiosity about the nature of knowing itself. The talk addresses how awareness receives experience in different ways—sometimes focused and precise, sometimes broad and diffuse—and emphasizes that there is no "right" way for awareness to work.
> Particularly valuable is Fella's honest account of her own practice mistakes, including giving herself a headache by trying to force awareness of awareness. Sayadaw's corrective instruction was simply to notice when it happens naturally rather than trying to manufacture the experience. She also addresses the sometimes disorienting experience of knowing we are aware without being able to identify the object of awareness, explaining how the mind can attune to diffuse experiences like exhaustion, joy, or interest that resist precise definition. This teaching offers both practical guidance for meditation and a deeper understanding of the knowing quality of mind.

Good afternoon, or evening for some perhaps, or maybe even morning, wherever you are in the world.

For this time, I thought of starting with a period of sitting together and offering some reflections in the sitting, then at the end having some time for further reflections and perhaps some questions.

Just continuing your practice, aware of experience, encouraging relaxation. Recognizing awareness. Is there awareness? What is obvious?

Awareness of the objects of experience—awareness of what's happening in our experience—is often our most familiar way of being aware, of knowing that we're aware. We know that we're aware because we know there are objects. We may recognize some specific qualities of those experiences, body sensations. We might recognize or know heat, pressure, coolness, vibration, movement, hardness or softness. We might recognize mind states, aware of emotions, thoughts.

Often in practicing, our attention more familiarly does seem to gravitate towards attending to the objects of experience. We're not as accustomed to noticing awareness itself.

At one point Sayadaw, in a group that I was in, said that he'd been reflecting on how to talk about being aware of awareness. He said, for those of you who wear glasses, this may be a kind of analogy that resonates more than for others perhaps. But if you wear glasses, the whole way that you see the world is through the glasses. The glasses let us see the objects in the world. But we don't often recognize that we are wearing glasses and that the glasses are the whole way that we're able to see the world. We can become aware of the glasses through recognizing that we are seeing the world more clearly.

Similarly, we know that we are aware partly through being aware that the mind is knowing experience. We know awareness is working through how it experiences objects.

Becoming aware of awareness doesn't mean that we turn back and look at awareness. Objects don't disappear. It's more of a stepping back, a sense of broadening or opening and being aware of the awareness that we are aware of.

Are you aware?

The mind has a capacity to recognize awareness. The simplest way is just knowing that you're aware. You may not quite know how you know you're aware, and that's okay. Just knowing, yes, there is awareness. If you're aware of objects, you can acknowledge to yourself: yes, there is awareness. This is awareness.

Is there awareness? This question—you can ask that question to yourself. Aware? But then you don't have to try to find the answer. Asking that question can spark the mind's interest, spark the curiosity of what is awareness anyway. But it's not something to do, to try to figure out. If you remember to ask the question, "Is there awareness?" you get to answer yes, you are aware. Just take in that experience. This is awareness.

And that awareness will be aware of something. So what is obvious?

Relax.

Again, this isn't something to try to do. Sometimes the mind is more interested or attuned to the objects of experience, and sometimes it can become more interested in the experience of being aware. The mind has the capacity to do both and also to be aware that we're aware and know the experience as well—knowing the awareness and the experience together.

Are you aware? Which is obvious.

You also might become aware, or there might be an interest in noticing how awareness receives experience. It's not always the same. Sometimes awareness might notice experience in succession—one object after another. It might feel like the attention is shifting from experience to experience, like the mind is moving from object to object. Or it might feel more like the awareness is still, and those experiences are coming into awareness.

It might be that the experience feels like a flow from one experience to another. Or it might feel more jumpy—one thing pops in and then another thing pops in. Just different ways that awareness can receive experience. It might be that awareness is receiving many experiences at the same time, more like the awareness is broad, knowing many things together. Sometimes awareness recognizes experiences that are diffuse, not very precise. And sometimes awareness is very precise, noticing a very clear, focused experience.

There's no right way for awareness to work. There are many ways. Just notice how it is for you in this moment. Are you aware? How is awareness receiving experience?

And from time to time, checking the relationship, the attitude. There can be attitudes about how awareness is working. Sometimes we like it, sometimes we don't like it. Sometimes it's confusing. Sometimes it's simply allowing just this.

Are you aware?

When I was practicing with Sayadaw in Burma, he talked about awareness a lot. At the beginning especially, I wasn't so clear about what it meant to be aware of awareness. And yet he kept talking about it, and I kept being with my experience and checking in: Am I aware? Yes, I am aware, but I have no idea how I know I'm aware.

That kind of curiosity, the encouragement to notice awareness—it's like the first thing we explore. Am I aware? That begins to encourage the mind to get curious about that experience. So we are aware, we know that we're aware, but we don't know how we know we're aware. There's not quite the felt sense of knowing that we're aware.

What I've seen in my own experience and in working with others is that this continued curiosity about "Am I aware?" begins to help the mind touch into that felt sense—that sense of a clarity of knowing that you're aware. We know that we know that we're aware. We may not be able to describe it, as my vague language speaks to. It's not easy to talk about what the experience of being aware of awareness is. But there can be a kind of sense of, "Yeah, I know that I'm aware," and there's that understanding. It's not just the knowing. There's a sense or a feeling that we have. We know that we're aware. There's no question about it anymore.

And what I found at some point—in Burma this happened—there was a kind of real recognition. At one point that clarity was like, "Oh, this is what he means to be aware of awareness. Oh, I get it. This is what that's like." It wasn't an unfamiliar experience, I think, because we do touch into this. This is something our minds have the capacity to know. It wasn't unfamiliar, but it wasn't clearly known in the same way. So there was a real recognition in that moment.

That was exciting, and it was very cool. That particular experience that felt so cool was the awareness of the awareness and the objects at the same time. I knew the awareness, and I knew the objects.

And I thought, "That's what I was supposed to be doing. I figured it out. This is what Sayadaw has been talking about. This is how I'm supposed to be practicing." And so I spent the next few hours trying to make it happen—and gave myself a huge headache.

So that's a warning. It's easy, as we first get the sense or flavor of what this is like, to think we're supposed to do that, to make it happen. I went back and reported to Sayadaw this experience of having given myself a headache trying to notice the awareness of awareness. And he said, "Well, don't try to do that." He said, "Just notice when it happens. Notice when awareness is aware of itself, when there's awareness of awareness, and when the awareness is more interested in the objects."

The attention will go back and forth. Sometimes it will be more interested in the texture of feelings or sensations or sounds—the sense of the objects may be where the interest is. And at other times it begins to gravitate toward interest in the awareness itself, in the quality of being aware. So he encouraged me to just notice that shift. And that was very helpful. That was really helpful.

Sometimes we can know that we're aware but not know what the object is—not have a sense of what awareness knows. That can be a little odd at first. In my experience from prior practice, if I didn't know what the object was, I thought it wasn't awareness. I wasn't being mindful. If I didn't know what the object was, then I wasn't practicing properly.

But this practice began to attune me to the awareness itself. And it's like, "Yeah, I know I'm aware, but I have no clue what the object is." I know there's seeing happening, but that doesn't really seem like what awareness is attuning to. So there can be these times where we know that we're aware, but there's not a lot of clarity about the object of awareness—and that's okay. You can sort of hover in that space of, "Well, I know I'm aware."

There is an object there. It's not that there's not an object. Sometimes what's happening in that kind of experience is that awareness is attuning to something we're not so familiar with. This can happen as the meditation goes on. As mindfulness becomes stronger, it may begin to gravitate toward objects that we know nothing about, that we can't articulate, that we're unfamiliar with. And so if we can trust that "I know I'm aware" and just hold the space, perhaps the experience or the object will slowly reveal itself—or not.

Sometimes in that kind of experience, the object may be what I might call diffuse. These aren't very specific or precise experiences. The first kinds of objects that we become really clear about are usually very defined: this contact with the body, this pressure, that sight, that sound. They're very clear. We can almost name them, identify them. It's almost like we can draw a circle around them. "Yes, that's what I'm aware of." They seem almost delimited. This pressure, that itch, the sound that arises, that smell. Even emotions can have this quality of, "Yeah, I know this is anger. I've felt this many times." Or, "Oh yeah, this is irritation." We know the texture and shape of even our emotions.

But there are other experiences that the mind can know that are not so precise, that are more vague. There are many experiences like this. Exhaustion is like this. Several of you have mentioned this in the past few days in our meetings.

You can't really put your finger on exhaustion. There are qualities within the experience that may be more precise, like a feeling of heaviness in the body. But the quality in the mind of exhaustion or low energy—that's much more diffuse. The quality of joy and delight is also diffuse in this way. The mind knows how to take in diffuse experience.

In all of our sense experience, actually—I'll give you an analogy. If you're out walking and it starts to rain, you might feel the drops of water on your skin. That's a pretty precise experience. You know that sense of the drops landing on your skin. That's one way objects can be received.

Another time you're out walking, you might notice the experience of humidity. Not a precise experience at all. How do you describe humidity? We know it, but it's more of a gestalt kind of experience. We know it based on—well, we say, "Feel the air." We just say, "Feel how the air feels." And we know what we're talking about. It's a broader kind of sense, that experience of humidity. It's not precise, but we know it.

The same kind of awareness around precise experience and diffuse experience can happen with mind states as well, with mental objects. Sometimes that place where we feel like we're aware but don't know what the awareness is aware of—it may be that the awareness is taking in a diffuse experience. Maybe that's what's happening.

At one point I was meditating and noticed this quality of, "Wow, I notice that I'm aware. I have no idea what the object is." But what I did know was that the mind was really interested. That's what I could know—interest was present. I didn't know what the mind was interested in, but there was awareness and there was interest. Interest is kind of a diffuse experience too at times, depending on what the interest is connecting to.

Retreat Opening Part Two

Andrea Fella · 57 min

> In this opening session of an online retreat, Andrea Fella introduces the foundational practices of receptive awareness meditation in the tradition of Sayadaw U Tejaniya. She explains how this form of practice differs from concentration-based approaches—rather than choosing what to pay attention to, practitioners learn to settle back like a naturalist studying nature, receiving whatever experience arises moment to moment. The key elements are relaxation of body and mind, recognizing that awareness is present, and noticing what is obvious without trying to control the flow of experience.
> Andrea explores the relationship between attention and mindfulness, clarifying that while attention can be consciously directed, it doesn't have to be. Using the analogy of being a passenger rather than a driver, she encourages practitioners to watch where attention naturally lands. She emphasizes checking one's relationship to experience—noticing when aversion, craving, or confusion are present, as well as recognizing moments of balance and ease. This 'wise attitude' allows practitioners to be at peace with whatever arises.
> The session also includes Anne's presentation of the three refuges (Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha) and the five precepts as ethical foundations for practice. The precepts are framed not as rigid rules but as guidelines for non-harming that support clarity of mind. Anne extends the fifth precept beyond intoxicants to include awareness of impulses toward distraction—the habitual tendency to avoid unpleasant experience through phones, television, or other escapes. Together, these teachings establish the container for intensive yet integrated practice within daily life.

We can think of ourselves as being in our meditation hall together.

This retreat, this form of retreat—a couple of you mentioned it was your first retreat online. Some of you, your first retreat altogether. This is I think the sixth or seventh online retreat that I've taught since April, and I'm beginning to appreciate and discover that it's a whole new form of practice.

It does have this possibility of blending the intensive retreat that we do when we seclude ourselves at a retreat center with daily life. And it's been very powerful for a lot of people to enter into this form in which the intention and the cultivation of the practice is infused right into your home environment, your daily lives, some of your more normal interactions—with family perhaps, or with neighbors, or going to the grocery store even. Some of you may be choosing to seclude yourselves a little more, and that's absolutely fine. As I said a little while ago, this practice carries between intensive, silent, formal practice and daily life practice.

But this form where we are practicing as a community, but in our own environments, has a power that I was not really prepared for. I wasn't really prepared for the depth of new kinds of learning that seemed to be happening for people in this form. And we are creating this form together. It is a little bit of an experiment, how these retreats work. But I like to think in this way: that our meditation hall has become enormous. We span the globe from California to Europe to China. It's kind of amazing that we have this huge meditation hall. And so maybe when you walk out your door, you might think of that being your meditation hall too.

Our practice, the reason we practice—I just like to remind us all of this at the beginning of a retreat—we practice so that we can understand our minds, understand how our minds habitually get caught in stress, in suffering, in confusion. And that understanding, the wisdom that comes through understanding: the natural consequences of that understanding are that the mind, our organism, our system begins to reorient, to let go of those patterns and habits that tend to take us to suffering, that tend to create stress, dissatisfaction, unhappiness in our lives. And the system moves in the direction of qualities of heart and mind, of action that supports happiness, that supports ease, peace in our lives.

And yet this is not an instantaneous kind of transformation. It is a gradual path. The Buddha speaks of the path as being a gradual path. And so it requires patience and trust also in watching our minds do the things that we do habitually. That's a lot of what we get to see when we open our attention to what's happening in our experience. We get to see the ways in which we're struggling, the ways in which we're caught. And just simply seeing it usually doesn't make it go away. The understanding that develops takes time. It takes time for that wisdom to grow.

And so part of what we get to do is to watch those habits and patterns. We watch them from the perspective of being curious about them. One analogy that I really love in connection to this practice is that what we're doing is really studying nature. Our systems are a form of nature. We are studying our hearts and our minds as nature, like a naturalist who goes out into the world, into the forest, to be curious about how the systems of the forest work. What kind of animals feed at these plants or where do they live? What kind of communities do they form? How do the plants and animals interact? A naturalist sits in nature and observes and learns. And that takes time. You don't sit down for one day or even two or three days and learn everything there is to be learned.

This is the kind of approach we are taking here. We are curious about our systems. How do our systems work? Where do they tend to get knotted up and constricted? How does that happen? And the seeing of that, the understanding that grows with that, begins to release those patterns in a skillful way.

And the key tool, the key tool in many ways to this being a naturalist, being an observer of our own system, is mindfulness. Awareness. Being aware of what's happening in the present moment. And as with a naturalist, if you're sitting out in nature and falling asleep while in nature, you're not going to learn very much. Awareness needs to be there. There needs to be an establishment of that mindfulness, establishment of awareness over time.

And this is our work. We explore how we can become aware moment after moment after moment.

Going to help the mind learn and understand, to shift the mind and heart away from stress and suffering—it is a kind of awareness that has a particular perspective. A perspective of curiosity about experience. A perspective of curiosity about what is this human system.

Like a naturalist who goes out simply to be curious about how these systems interact, what is this nature? The naturalist isn't going out to try to find those things that will make them rich, or to try to get rid of the things they don't like. It is simply to be curious. This is the form of mindfulness—this curious, balanced curiosity about what is this human experience. And so that's the kind of mindfulness we explore establishing.

Tonight I'm just going to take a few minutes to overview some of the tools that help this establishment of mindfulness. Then tomorrow morning, we'll go into a little more depth.

The first tool that is incredibly helpful—not only for this form of practice, which I would call receptive awareness—is relaxation. In receptive awareness, we are not necessarily choosing what we pay attention to. Instead, we are seeing what our system is up to. What is already happening? What's already going on? We settle back like the naturalist and just receive what's happening, not trying to control it.

Relaxation is a key support for this kind of receptive practice. Sayadaw U Tejaniya talked about relaxation a lot, and it finally got into my head how important it was for this form of practice. But subsequently, I've seen how valuable relaxation is for any form of meditation practice—whether you're doing loving-kindness practice, concentration practice, breath meditation, or receptive awareness practice. Relaxation is key.

Starting with relaxing the body, allowing the body to relax. You can play with this now while I speak about it. Just letting the body relax. Allowing the muscles of the body to relax. As the body relaxes, it helps our mind to relax a little bit.

The body and mind are very tightly connected, very tightly coupled. When the mind is tense, it reflects in the body, and the body tends to become tense. And likewise, that reflection goes two ways. When the body is tense, it also reflects on the mind, and the mind tends to become tense. It's a two-way street.

If you can relax the body—in particular, there are a few areas of the face. The face is such a reflection of what's going on in the mind. If the face can relax, that sometimes really helps the mind to relax. So letting the face relax, maybe the neck and shoulders and other parts of the body. And perhaps inside the body can relax—the throat, the heart, the stomach, the intestines. As the body relaxes, maybe you'll notice there's a little bit more relaxation of mind.

The body relaxing supports the mind to be more relaxed. A mind that is not relaxed, that is tense, tends to be caught up in past and future, wound up in thoughts, worries, concerns. When the mind relaxes those thoughts, those worries and concerns, what happens is that the mind tends to land in the present moment—being here, available to know what's happening.

Relaxation—relaxing the body, relaxing the mind—creates the conditions for a very natural awareness, for mindfulness to be present. With this relaxation, perhaps you notice that you're aware.

This is actually simple, although not something we tend to orient to. Mostly, when we are aware, we are curious about what we are aware of—body sensations, thoughts, emotions, sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch. But can you be curious about whether you are aware?

You may not quite know how you know you're aware. You don't have to figure that part out. But do you know that you're aware right now? If you're listening to me, you're not lost in thought or asleep in this moment. You are aware. Just knowing that you're aware, having that understanding—that's enough in this moment.

This aspect of recognizing that we are aware is a key support for this practice. Because if we can recognize that we are aware, it doesn't matter what we are aware of. The establishment of mindfulness, the continuity of mindfulness, is connected with just knowing that we're aware. This is how mindfulness is established in this practice—the recognition that we're aware.

And what happens in that is a flow of changing experiences. We don't have to try to stay with one object or experience, such as the breath.

Often we have practiced or cultivated meditation practices around being with the breath or being with one particular experience. That is a way, and a very helpful way, to cultivate mindfulness. This practice is slightly different. We're not choosing what to pay attention to, but rather anchoring or connecting with the experience of being aware, and then simply noticing what's here.

It doesn't matter moment to moment—just aware of a body sensation, then a thought, another body sensation, perhaps a sight, perhaps a breath, perhaps an emotion or a feeling. Moment after moment: are you aware? And what is happening? What is obvious?

This is the other piece of being mindful. There's the knowing that we're aware, and then: what is awareness aware of? Recognizing awareness, and what is obvious. What is the mind already paying attention to? We don't have to choose it. We don't have to choose what to pay attention to.

This was a shift for me. Early in my practice, I thought that if I was not choosing the object of meditation, if I didn't have control over what mindfulness was paying attention to, then it meant I wasn't being mindful. This more receptive practice helped me understand that mindfulness is a different function of mind than attention.

Attention is what pulls experience out of our environment to orient to. And there is a way that attention is subject to our conscious control. We can choose: I'm going to pay attention to my hands right now, I'm going to pay attention to a breath right now. So attention is amenable to conscious control; attention can be directed. But it doesn't have to be consciously directed.

If we are settled back like the naturalist, our attention may be drawn from one thing to another without our consciously choosing where it lands. We can watch, or be curious about, where attention goes—not being in charge of it.

Another analogy that might support this approach is to think about being the passenger in a car as opposed to the driver. When you're driving, you're making the choices. You're deciding where to go, which turns to take. You're in charge and having to navigate. As the passenger, you can just sit there and watch the scenery go by. You don't have to be concerned about making the choices. You don't have to check out and go to sleep either, though. You can be there, alert and curious about the environment passing by.

This is the form of practice we're exploring. Are you aware? And in each moment, what is obvious?

How about right now? Maybe something in the body—body sensations are often pretty obvious. It could be a breath. But how about now? Maybe it's hearing, attending to the sound of my voice. Or maybe it's a feeling, an emotion or a mood. Are you aware? What is obvious?

There will be times when we can't be with what is obvious—when what is obvious is too painful, too habitually sticky, and it pulls us out of awareness. I sometimes use the analogy from Alice in Wonderland of going into the rabbit hole. Sometimes our mind states that come, that naturally come, can pull us into them. It's like they're quicksand or a whirlpool. We get pulled under.

When that's happening, sometimes we can't simply be with what is obvious, and we may need to redirect our attention, to choose a place for attention for a time. Use some of your familiar tools—perhaps those of you who've practiced before know tools that help you regain your mindfulness. We'll talk more about working with difficulty, working with it when we can't just be with what's obvious.

And yet, very often, we have more capacity to just be with what's here than we give ourselves credit for.

Can you just know right now what's happening? Are you aware? And what is obvious?

If it feels like the mind is flailing, unable to simply take that stance of settling back in the car and watching things come through, then just start by picking something easy to connect with. Maybe it's the contact of your hips against the chair, cushion, bench, or couch. Maybe it's a breath. Maybe it's the sensations of your hands. Just let your attention land somewhere.

But then you don't have to hold on to that. Once you've let your attention land somewhere, it can stay there for as long as it wants to. But at some point, the attention will be pulled to something else. You'll be paying attention to your hands and then suddenly you'll notice that the attention is listening instead. Then you can just notice, "Oh, the attention has shifted to listening. Aware that listening is happening." And then maybe it shifts to a breath, and then maybe to an emotion—a kind of following where the attention goes.

Our effort in this practice is very light, very settled back. We simply receive what's here, what's here now. What's the next thing? Just enough effort to stay connected with this moment. Just enough to be with what's happening now. And then do it again, and again, and again. Just this light—the lightest touch of effort. A little bit of effort each moment.

The other piece of this practice, alongside relaxing, recognizing awareness, and noticing what's obvious: from time to time, it's useful to check your relationship with experience—how you are in relationship to experience. This is a place where, in the mind, we tend to get caught in stress, suffering, dissatisfaction, and aversion.

Something is happening, an unpleasant experience, and we don't like it. Sometimes that not-liking is hidden behind the scenes. We're not consciously aware. We're not recognizing that there's something unpleasant and that not-liking is part of what's happening. Instead, there's something unpleasant and we are not liking it, in a way trying to adjust or figure out how to get rid of that thing. We're not clearly aware of the not-liking. It's not an experience that we're knowing as another creature that's come out of the forest—"There's this unpleasant experience, and the not-liking creature has joined it."

That's the approach: exploring what the relationship is begins to reveal hidden creatures. And then we can simply become aware of them.

So notice, from time to time, how you are in relationship to experience. It might be a flavor of wanting something to happen, a flavor of greed. It might be a flavor of aversion, of wanting to get rid of something. It might be a flavor of confusion, uncertainty, not sure what to do—views or beliefs, a flavor of delusion at work in the mind. Or it might be the flavor of balance of mind: "This is okay, not a problem." The mind is calm, connected, with a feeling of compassion or kindness toward experience.

This is what Sayadaw U Tejaniya calls wise attitude or right attitude—a perspective that allows us to be at ease with whatever's happening in the present moment. It's useful to notice when that's happening, because when the mind is at ease, wholesome qualities are present in the mind. It's useful to recognize those wholesome qualities.

We'll talk about all of this more in the coming days. This is really just a basic overview of the teachings that Sayadaw U Tejaniya offers: Relax. Recognize the awareness. Recognize that you're aware.

That's so important. Are you aware? What is obvious? And then, from time to time, noticing how you are in relationship to experience.

So the instructions are pretty simple. And yet what they reveal in terms of the workings of our mind is amazingly complex. The practice itself, however, remains simple—a simple mind meeting experience. It's like the simplicity of the naturalist sitting there observing, while the vast complexity that is observed unfolds before them. But the naturalist's job is simple: just to observe. In that observing, our natural intelligence begins to put the understanding together. You don't have to do that part.

Another piece of the opening evening is an entry into the retreat container in the form of commitments, agreements that we make together to practice together. And so we'll talk about the refuges and the precepts.

A few words about what the refuges and the precepts are and why they are important to talk about at the beginning of retreats, as is usually done in this tradition on the opening evening. The five precepts are five ethical guidelines introduced by the Buddha, five ethical practice guidelines. In Finnish, we usually say viisi harjoitusohjetta.

If you're new to this practice or to this tradition, you might be surprised to hear that actually quite often when the Buddha taught meditation—or actually before he taught meditation—he taught ethics, taught about ethical behavior in the world as an important foundation for practicing meditation.

The essence of these precepts is to refrain from harming any living beings. In Finnish we would say, pidättäydytään vahingoittamasta eläviä olentoja. So refraining from harming the other yogis on the retreat, refraining from harming the managers or the teachers or anybody around here, your family members, friends, colleagues. Also including yourself—we so often forget about ourselves, and our attitude towards ourselves might be quite harsh and demanding and judgmental oftentimes. So this retreat could also be taken as an opportunity to really take care with your attitude towards everybody else and yourself, and then see if it could be about acceptance and kindness and compassion.

The first precept really encompasses all the others, but traditionally we chant these precepts. That's kind of challenging on Zoom, we have noticed. So I would actually like to invite you to pause for a moment, closing your eyes if you like, and just silently in your own mind, in your own words, take this first precept in your own way—to refrain from harming living beings for the duration of this retreat.

As I was already beginning to say, the first precept really encompasses all the others, but the Buddha chose to give us some more detail in the form of the four others.

The second precept is about refraining from taking that which is not given—refraining from taking the possessions of others. What we want to avoid is that our own happiness and well-being wouldn't come at the expense of others. And we might discover with practice that our well-being and happiness and contentment is actually much more about inner life and what happens inside rather than about our material possessions. So again, inviting you to pause for a moment and committing to this precept in your own way—refraining from taking that which is not given for the duration of this retreat.

The third precept asks us to refrain from harm through our sexuality. All kinds of impulses can arise and do arise in the human mind, and that's okay—we can allow all that. But what we are trying to do is to let go of any impulses that lead to harm, in this case, any harmful sexual impulses. So again, pausing for a moment, committing to the precept of refraining from harm through sexuality.

The fourth precept is about refraining from harmful speech. This one looks a bit different depending on your circumstances. As has been said before, some of you might be sitting this retreat in seclusion and silence, not meeting anybody the entire time. Some of you might be interacting with your family, even going to work. There's no right or wrong way of doing this retreat. Definitely, if there's any comparing mind, you can try to let go of that as best as you can. This practice and these precepts can be applied to any situation.

If you are in a situation where you're interacting with others, this is a really great and valuable place of practice. Really paying attention to how you speak to others—trying to do it in a way that's not harmful, saying things that are truthful, saying things that are useful, saying things when it's a good time to say them, saying things with a kind intention in a kind way. This is a practice that can really carry over till after the retreat, because harmful speech creates so much suffering in our lives. Something really valuable to practice if you have the opportunity.

So again, pausing, and in your mind, in your own words, committing to the precept of refraining from harmful speech.

The fifth and final precept is about refraining from taking intoxicants that cloud the mind. On this retreat, in this practice, we are trying to create conditions that best support clarity of mind, alertness of mind, to support the arising of wisdom. If we take that beer or that glass of wine, it's rather counterproductive. So perhaps not the thing to do here. However, if you're on medication prescribed by your doctor, please do continue taking that. It's very important that you don't quit your prescribed medication on retreat.

I like to extend this precept to a more general situation. Our mind has such a tendency to want to avoid the unpleasant, to not feel the unpleasant, to distract ourselves from the unpleasant. If you're in a home environment, you might get interested in impulses—impulses in the mind. When you meet something unpleasant in the body or in the mind, like an unpleasant emotion, perhaps there's an impulse to open that beer, or maybe there's an impulse to look at the phone, or maybe there's an impulse to turn on the TV, just to distract yourself or escape from that unpleasantness.

So perhaps we can expand this precept to mean refraining from distractions to the practice, distractions to awareness, distractions to presence as much as possible. Instead, we give ourselves a chance to actually feel what's going on, to turn towards what's going on, to allow what's going on. This can be a really healing thing to do, a wise thing to do. So again, in your own words, pausing to commit to this precept—to refrain from taking intoxicants that cloud the mind.

A few words about the three refuges. Refuge is a word that refers to a place of safety or a source of support. We all take refuge in something. We all need to take refuge in something in life. When things get difficult, we need some help and support when facing something challenging. Our refuges can be more or less skillful, and in the context of this tradition, we offer you three skillful refuges to take. These are the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha—the so-called Triple Gem.

Taking refuge in the Buddha doesn't mean anything like blind adoration of a statue or anything like that. Rather, it's about remembering that there was this real human being living in the area of Nepal and India about 2600 years ago, who was practicing and one day sat under the Bodhi tree and became awakened. He found freedom—full, complete freedom from suffering and distress and dissatisfaction and confusion. Remembering this reminds us that it's not just one special being or a few special beings who have this capacity to find freedom and awakening, but actually all human beings have that capacity, including you. So taking refuge in the Buddha means taking refuge in knowing that you have that seed of awakening inside you, that capacity yourself.

Taking refuge in the Dharma—Dharma is a word with many meanings. One of them is the teachings of the Buddha. Taking refuge in the Dharma could mean trusting that those teachings work. They are teachings about how the mind and heart get caught in suffering and distress and confusion, and teachings about how the heart and mind can be freed. Taking refuge in the Dharma means trusting that these teachings actually work and are enough to lead where you want to go.

Finally, taking refuge in the Sangha, the community of practitioners. The manager so beautifully spoke about this, how all of us are here to support each other, how the managers themselves find it so important to feel this connection and offer support, even feeling gratitude for being able to do that.

Perhaps at this point, taking a look at your screen, all these small tiles, really taking in everybody here, seeing all these people who are going to be here on this retreat with you for these five days. Most people feel that it's so much easier to practice in a group than alone. Imagine being just alone for four or five days without anybody—no yogis, no teachers, no managers. But you have all these people here in front of you who are going to sit with you and practice with you, go through challenging times with you and perhaps more joyful times with you.

This is your sangha for the retreat. Taking refuge in the support that everybody here is going to offer to everybody—the yogis, the managers, and the teachers. So inviting you one more time to pause for a moment, closing your eyes, and in your own way, in your own words, taking refuge in the Buddha, in the Dharma, and in the Sangha for the duration of this retreat.

When you're ready, at your own pace, coming back to your screen.

We have just a few minutes left together this evening. So let's sit together. Finding yourself a posture that feels relaxed and yet alert. Relaxation and alertness are not opposites. The body and mind can be very relaxed and very alert at the same time. Sometimes I find a way into this with a word or two: sitting with dignity. An expression of integrity. Relaxed dignity. Allowing the body to relax, the mind to relax.

Maybe taking a few moments to scan through the body. Just noticing if there are areas of tension and seeing if they can be softened, relaxed, released.

As you're relaxing the body, you are using awareness. Awareness is present. Aware while relaxing. Being aware while relaxing the body.

As the body relaxes, it supports the mind to relax. Maybe the mind can relax.

And checking in, curious about being aware. Are you aware? Starting with aware while relaxing, and then just shifting to aware. What are you aware of? What is obvious?

Settling back like that naturalist, curious perhaps of the feeling sense in the body and mind.

We often use language about looking at, seeing, observing for mindfulness. And yet some other language might serve us—perhaps feeling, being with, experiencing, receiving. It's receiving. It's already here.

In each moment this may change, and that's okay. You don't have to chase after experience. Let experience come to you. Relax. Recognize awareness and notice what is obvious.

It's the end of your day, and you've been on the computer for quite a while. You're welcome to turn off your computer, but I would encourage you—if you are planning to find your way to resting at this point—can you be aware? Exploring that possibility: aware while taking care of your shiftings to get towards bed. Being aware.

For some of you, you may still have some energy, perhaps to do some walking or another sitting. The hall is always open, and you're welcome to stay connected with people in this way as well.

But if it is time for your rest, please take your rest—and rest with awareness until you fall asleep.

See you in the morning.

CHAPTER 154

Retreat Opening Part One

Andrea Fella · 17 min

> In this opening session of an online retreat, Andrea Fella introduces herself and her teaching colleague Anna, setting the foundation for five days of practice in the tradition of Sayadaw U Tejaniya. Andrea shares her journey from initial skepticism about meditation during her Peace Corps days to becoming a dedicated retreat practitioner and teacher over more than two decades. She describes how meeting Sayadaw U Tejaniya in 2005 profoundly shaped her approach to practice, finding his teaching style deeply resonant with her own experience.
> Anna, based in Finland and a lead instructor at Nirodha, reflects on how her first vipassanā retreat sixteen years ago transformed her life priorities and led her to dedicated practice. Both teachers emphasize the distinctive qualities of Sayadaw U Tejaniya's approach—describing it as both easeful and relaxed while also powerful in cultivating awareness throughout daily life.
> The session covers practical retreat logistics including the schedule of guided meditations, teaching sessions, optional group meetings, and community sittings. Andrea touches briefly on the practice itself, encouraging participants to bring curiosity to all activities—whether formal sitting and walking meditation or daily tasks. She introduces the valuable exploration of noticing the urge to change postures, suggesting practitioners might let such urges arise and pass before acting on them. This opening establishes the retreat's emphasis on awareness in all moments rather than rigid adherence to form.

I've been teaching meditation retreats for about fourteen years now and been meditating—I can't even remember exactly—twenty-three, twenty-four years, something like that. I started meditating when I was in the Peace Corps and very quickly was drawn to long retreat practice. I loved the long retreat practice, which was a surprise to me because when I first started practicing, my entry into the practice was through daily life practice. I was not interested in meditating at all. In fact, the friend who sent me the book about meditation told me she had been attending a daylong retreat, and I thought she had joined some kind of cult and had gone off the deep end. And then I came back from the Peace Corps and immediately started attending long retreats, so I joined the group.

I met Sayadaw U Tejaniya in 2005 and very quickly felt that his style of practice, his style of teaching was so resonant for me. And so that is the kind of teaching that I'm sharing on this retreat.

I met Anna when I was teaching the 2010 IMS three-month course, I believe. So we've known each other for about ten years. We've worked together quite a bit on the long retreats at IMS and then started working together individually in the last six years or so. I nominated her for the Bodhi College Teacher Training Program, so she'll be assisting on this retreat. I have a lot of confidence in her. She'll be doing the groups and some guided meditations and also participating in some of the teaching sessions, offering some teachings. I think many of you already know Anna, but I'll give her a few minutes to say hello and introduce herself.

Anna speaking:

My name is Anna and I am located in Espoo, which is a city on the south coast of Finland, right next to Helsinki, for those of you who are not familiar with Finland. I'm one of the lead instructors of Nirodha, so I've been sharing the teachings here in Finland for some years now and will be doing that in the future too.

My first Vipassana retreat was almost exactly sixteen years ago. It was such an experience for me that it really changed my priorities in life. I became a dedicated practitioner right after my first Vipassana retreat.

I feel really honored that Andrea is here with us, our special guest, first time in Finland. She is such a popular teacher in the US that we had to actually invite her three years in advance so that she could find the time to come here. And now the time has finally arrived.

I've been hearing Andrea's teachings a lot, but I keep getting so much out of them. I can honestly say that Andrea sees the processes of the mind with so much clarity and is able to teach about them and describe them with so much clarity that it's really amazing to me. I think it's very rare amongst the teachers in this tradition. So this is a great chance for all of us to learn from her deep wisdom and all that clarity.

The managers of this retreat, Aini and Anu—I know both of them and I've worked with both of them before, and I have full confidence in them. I know that you will be in very good hands during these five days.

I've been practicing different styles of Vipassana, but for me, Sayadaw U Tejaniya's style is my favorite, and I feel it's a style I've benefited the most from. So it's especially great for me to be involved in this particular retreat with this style and with this teacher.

Andrea and I were teaching a retreat for the Swedish group a couple of weeks ago, because Andrea was supposed to visit both countries on her first visit to Northern Europe. I could really see the power of this practice in that group. People were really appreciative and grateful at the end. It's a very easeful and relaxed style of practice, but it's also a very powerful way of bringing a lot of awareness into your life. I find it a great combination, a powerful combination. I'm very glad to be here.

Andrea speaking:

Thank you, Anna. I've been pronouncing your name incorrectly for so many years. I think I might not pronounce your name correctly still.

Just a few logistical reinforcements to mention. The two teaching sessions that I'll be involved in are the morning instruction session at 6:30 in the morning and the evening session at 7:00 in the evening. The morning will primarily be a guided meditation instruction with a little bit of reflection at the end. The evening session will be...

a little more teaching, some more elaboration on the instructions, or perhaps what looks like a Dharma talk, followed by an opportunity for questions. These are the two sessions that I'm able to be involved in, given the timing and time difference, and these are the two sessions we ask you all to attend each day.

We know that there may be internet glitches and things like that, so the recordings for those sessions will be available hopefully not too long after the sessions themselves. The recordings will generally be posted in the morning time each day, your time. The hall needs to go down for a short time after the morning session in order for the talks to be uploaded.

Each day when I'm asleep, Anna will be offering group practice meetings—most days at 9:30, though the first day will be at 4:30 in the afternoon. These are optional groups, but they will be pre-assigned based on the form we sent out asking whether you wanted to participate. Those group meeting times will be posted and available for you to see.

Anna will offer a guided meditation at the two o'clock sitting in the afternoon. On that first day, this guided meditation will largely reinforce the instructions offered this evening and tomorrow morning, reviewing them in Finnish. On subsequent days, that guided meditation will be in English with an opportunity to ask questions at the end, where Anna is happy to translate questions asked in Finnish.

The community sittings are also optional. Largely the practice will be in your own rhythms, but we do have these structured sitting times to support your practice. I find this helpful in the online format—to have a little bit of a check-in, to be with the community. We don't have each other together to be inspired by each other's presence, so these times are there to support your practice.

The hall is open for the whole day but will go down for a short time each day so the talks can be uploaded, which will happen after the morning session. When the session goes down, you'll be briefly kicked out of the meeting, but you can log back in immediately following that.

During the evening sessions when there's an opportunity for questions and responses, there are a couple of different ways to submit questions. One is through the form—some of you have already found your way there and submitted questions or comments. That's one way to submit questions for that afternoon session, and you're welcome to submit them in Finnish; Anna will translate. If you can submit them in English, I would appreciate it, but if it's easier to ask in Finnish, that's fine. You can submit those questions in advance anytime, as the form is always available.

During the question session itself, we can take questions either through the chat or by raising the blue hand. If you click on the participants icon, you'll see a place where you can raise your hand. That's the easiest way for us to see that you've raised your hand with two screens. Sometimes if you're raising your physical hand within the camera and you're not on the screen we see, we may miss you, but we'll try to keep track of that as well.

For the sake of the recording, we'd like to start the Q&A sessions with questions through the form, then open it up to chat and live participation. We'll break the recording at that point so that the live question session can be available for you but would not be posted publicly on the Naroda website at the end of the retreat.

For the Q&A, you'll be able to unmute yourselves. And if you walk away from your computer at any time, especially if there are other people in your house, turn the camera and the mic off. We've had situations in previous retreats where people didn't turn their camera and mic off, and then members of their family walked into the room unaware that the camera was on. Who knows what can happen in that situation. So it's really useful to turn your camera and mic off when you walk away from the computer.

There was one question around what to do during the breaks in the schedule when there's no sitting marked—the possibility of doing walking meditation, or more sitting, or lying down, or standing, or just your daily chores, or interacting with your family if you're in that situation.

I'll talk more about that tomorrow morning. That's a good part of this practice—a kind of curiosity about why you would sit, why you would walk, why you would do anything, for that matter. Just to be curious, to be aware in all activities.

You are welcome, if it feels unfamiliar to have an unstructured schedule, to create your own schedule. If you're doing a more intensive, secluded kind of retreat, you're welcome to create your own: sit, walk, sit, walk, sit, meal, sit, walk, sit, walk, sit, meal. You're welcome to do that.

But it's also a valuable exploration to sit until the urge to stop sitting inspires you—and then look at that urge. Be curious about it. Maybe let it arise and pass once or twice, and then follow through on it.

Taking the Practice Home

Andrea Fella · 32 min

> This closing session from an online retreat addresses the crucial transition from intensive practice back to everyday life. Anna begins by acknowledging that retreat participants, especially those who have maintained silence and seclusion, may find themselves more sensitive and reactive than usual. She offers practical advice for a gentle transition: taking quiet time, avoiding immediate demands like clearing emails, and being selective about sharing deep experiences with those who may not understand.
>
> Andrea Fella then explores how to maintain the momentum of awareness in daily life, which she describes as "graduate level practice." She emphasizes that while the instructions remain the same—relaxation, awareness, noticing what's obvious, checking attitude—the quality of experience in daily life differs from formal practice. A key practice she highlights is simply noticing when mindfulness naturally returns throughout the day, even briefly, without trying to hold onto it. This recognition of effortless awareness builds momentum over time.
> The teaching introduces Sayadaw U Tejanīya's practice of "50-50 mindfulness"—maintaining half attention on the content of activities while half remains aware of how we are responding internally. This can be cultivated gradually, such as when reading news, first alternating between content and checking in, then developing the capacity to hold both simultaneously. Throughout, both teachers emphasize self-compassion about the difficulty of daily life practice and offer resources for continued support through saṅgha connections, online groups, and regular sitting practice.

For quite a number of you, this has been your first retreat, and some of you have been practicing this entire time in silence and seclusion. It's important for you to be aware that during this sort of time in silence, we might become more open and more sensitive than we might realize.

So when you leave this retreat container, you might find yourself reacting to things more strongly than usual, having stronger emotional reactions than usual. You might find that your ordinary life all of a sudden seems way too busy and fast and full—and life in general out there. You might find that you get agitated, or you might find that you get really tired and exhausted, or you might find that it keeps changing in the next couple of days. This is all a normal reaction to the changing conditions.

It's going to take a while to transition back to your ordinary life if you've been in seclusion, just as it took a while to transition to the silence of the retreat. For you and for everybody else as well, it's wonderful if you happen to have the opportunity to take good care of yourself in these next days—to have some more quiet alone time for yourself than usual to ensure a smooth and comfortable transition back to your life. If possible, avoid too many demands on yourself. It might not be the best idea to go check all your emails right after the closing session and try to reply to all of them tonight. You might try to spread that over a longer period of time. Perhaps the to-do list can wait a little bit too.

Also, if it's been your first retreat and you've had deep experiences, take care about who you share them with. Somebody who hasn't been on retreat themselves might not understand very much, and it might feel dismissive sharing with somebody like that. So maybe just share with people who seem to be genuinely interested in your experience, to avoid any hurt feelings.

When you go back to your ordinary life and the retreat ends, it's really wonderful if you're able to keep practicing. You might be feeling energized and inspired and motivated right now at the end of a retreat, but you know that everything changes—so that will change as well. As months go by, the memory of the retreat might fade and the memory of those experiences might fade. It's helpful to maintain connection to what's truly motivating you to practice. Maybe you had a significant experience that put you in touch with something deep within that you feel is important to you. If you have an experience like that, try to bring it to mind every now and then just to remember what's important in life and why you want to be doing this. Or perhaps regularly listen to inspiring Dharma talks or read inspiring Dharma books—just keep that flame of inner motivation burning.

It's also very helpful to have a regular practice going on. If you don't have a regular daily practice yet, right after a retreat is an excellent time to establish one in your life. There's this momentum of awareness going on, and motivation and energy. This is a really good time to establish daily practice. You might consider making a plan for the next month or so—something that seems realistic given your particular life conditions. How long to sit? What time to sit? Where to sit? For instance, making a plan that for the next month, it would seem wise and realistic to sit half an hour per day in the morning between brushing my teeth and having breakfast, in the corner of the living room where nobody disturbs me at that time of day. Then after a month, sit down to evaluate how it went and whether any changes need to be made.

When you get this practice going, when you get this habit built up, this regularity built up, it's going to start supporting you even more. When we have habits like brushing our teeth in the morning, we don't have to think about them every morning—whether we have the time and the energy to brush our teeth or not. We just do it. The same thing with practice. If you manage to build this kind of daily practice habit, it's going to be very helpful for you in the future.

Several things can support your practice and help you build up that routine. One is perhaps using meditation apps like the Insight Timer. You might want to listen to a guided meditation sometimes instead of doing silent meditation. There are also certain websites with helpful resources. There's a website called dharmaseed.org—there's enough to listen to there for the rest of your life, probably. There are tons of good books around as well. And of course, other people, a group of practitioners, a sangha, is a great support.

I'm going to mostly talk about practicing and how it feels a little different, perhaps, after the retreat ends. Some of you have been doing a more integrated practice in this form and have perhaps gotten more of a taste of what it's like to have that practice infuse regular activities. But what I would mostly say is that the container of the retreat itself is significant. Some of you have been doing just the morning and evening sessions while working during the day, and so maybe it feels like whatever momentum of mindfulness you've found will simply continue. But the container of those morning and evening sessions is a condition that really supports the momentum of mindfulness.

You'll probably experience some momentum continuing as you come out of the retreat—some elevated capacity and natural awareness happening. But it will change. It will not likely continue at that level. So I'm going to point to a few things, a few of the instructions that might support you.

As we said around sitting versus walking, or sitting versus daily activities, the instructions are the same. That's one great thing about this practice—there's no difference in the instructions. Allow there to be relaxation. Are you aware? What's obvious? What's the attitude? We can do this in our daily lives.

What is different, though—and for those of you who have been more secluded, this will be a bigger shift—is that in formal practice, the experience tends to be a little more internal, can get more subtle perhaps. We're noticing more about the subtlety of body sensations and thoughts in the formal practice. In daily life practice, the objects may be different. They may be just more ordinary—ordinary experience.

This is a place where recognizing the awareness is so important. Recognizing, "Yes, I'm aware of ordinary experience." It has a different quality. It's got that more panoramic quality, being aware of ordinary experience. To begin to recognize the awareness in the ordinary will support the continuity of mindfulness. And what I've seen is that as the continuity of mindfulness builds in the ordinary activities of daily life, then when you sit down to meditate, that momentum is more available. There's a kind of nice flow between sitting and daily life practice.

A couple of key pieces from the instructions to highlight: in the retreat form, we can notice the efforting potentially, although we've been encouraging a more relaxed and receptive approach. Still, the intention toward "Am I aware?"—the recognizing of awareness—has been your main focus this whole time. When we shift into ordinary life, into daily life, we have other things to do. Those of you doing the more integrated retreats know the shift that happens when we have to go to our jobs or our work. There are agendas we have to pick up and engage with. When we have those agendas in mind, holding two agendas—holding the agenda of writing this memo to my boss and being aware while doing it—can be quite challenging.

And so what I find in working with people in daily life, in terms of cultivating the momentum of awareness, is to not emphasize trying to do the mindfulness when you have a particular agenda that takes a lot of mental activity.

You can do it when you're doing things like being in the kitchen, perhaps. You've got the agenda for preparing a meal. We've been practicing that kind of awareness. And so in those times you could be trying to remember awareness. But when you have a particularly mental emphasis on the activity, trying to do the awareness is going to feel like it gets in the way. It's like, "Oh, I've got to think about what to say to this person. Oh, can I be aware? Think about what to say. Oh, can I be aware?" It just doesn't allow the natural flow of the mind following its train of focusing on that task.

And yet, we might think that this means we can't have mindfulness in that task, and that's not true. It is more that the momentum of mindfulness needs to build, and then that momentum can infuse that experience. The momentum of mindfulness builds over time.

One of the key ways for that to build, and I may have mentioned this earlier, is to notice the moments of mindfulness returning. It will return in many situations. And so that one practice—I would say that one practice in my daily life has been the key for building and inspiring and having the mindfulness begin to infuse everything.

Mindfulness will return even in the midst of a very intense activity. It will return even just for a moment, and just—oh, there it is. This is what it's like to be aware while focusing on writing an email. But then you don't have to try to keep doing it. Just take in that that is possible. Let it go and get on with your day. But notice those moments of mindfulness returning. It happens way more than you think. It happens a lot.

And yet we often don't notice it because when that moment of mindfulness returns, it's like, well, in some ways the attention shifts, and for a moment we know that the attention has shifted, but we're immediately picking up on what the attention has shifted to—and not aware that we recognized there was that shift of attention.

So noticing that shift of attention is another piece. Sometimes when the attention shifts, like we're sitting there doing something really intensive and then we get distracted, we hear a loud noise, there's a split second of being aware in that moment. But often we just leap immediately on annoyance for whatever made that loud noise. If we can attune ourselves to those moments of mindfulness returning, recognize the effortless nature of those, see that it's revealing something in that moment, but then just get on with your day—just get on with whatever you're doing. Not trying to hold on to the mindfulness there.

The other key piece, the practice tool that Sayadaw offers, is fifty-fifty mindfulness: fifty percent of the attention on the content of what we're doing, fifty percent of the attention on how we are. That's a great practice for daily life. And that can be used in many activities. The intensive focus, maybe not. But you can cultivate and practice with it.

For instance, if you're reading the news at some times, it's really great to practice this fifty-fifty awareness. You're essentially, in reading the news, taking in content, taking in information. It's kind of like you're receiving the contents of somebody else's mind there. So you're receiving information. And how are you while you're receiving that information? How does it land? How does it affect you?

In reading the news, you can slow it down a little bit so that you can practice this fifty-fifty awareness. At first it might feel like a going back and forth. You may like just look at the headlines at first. Okay, how did that land? Let yourself read the headlines, then take a moment and sit back, then read a couple paragraphs from an article. Okay, how did that land? How am I with this?

At first it can feel like a going back and forth, but over time we develop the skill to be able to read, to take in the content and know simultaneously, even as we're reading a word, how we're responding to that word. This fifty-fifty awareness can be used in so many different ways. And I really encourage exploration of that piece.

This is hard. Daily life practice is genuinely difficult. This is graduate-level practice, the advanced work of taking what we learn on retreat out into our ordinary lives. So please have some compassion for yourself about how challenging it is. Don't berate yourself when you find mindfulness getting lost more frequently, when the habits and patterns, the ways you typically respond to things, keep coming back or are just right there. If you're noticing them, that's great news. If you're noticing those habits and patterns, that itself is the practice working. So just hold some compassion for yourself around all of this.

There were a couple of questions I want to address before we shift the recording. One person mentioned that this has been helpful, that waking up consistently at six o'clock has been fantastic, and they're hoping to keep it up. They wondered if there might be some support for that, perhaps groups meeting at that time.

The schedule here has been 6:30 to 9:30 Greenwich Mean Time plus two, which I think is about Finnish time zone. I don't know of regular meetings that happen at that particular time. Anna and I were talking about it, and we think it would have to be groups further east in Europe, perhaps Russia, that zone of the world. Neither of us is aware of groups meeting at that time, but you can certainly look online.

There are many regular meetings available at times that do work for that time zone, usually in the later afternoon. In California, Gil Fronsdal is currently offering sessions at 7:30 a.m. Pacific time, which I think is about 5:30 p.m. Finnish time. Every morning he offers about an hour with a guided meditation and a short dharma talk. It involves quite a lot of guidance, but he does wonderful series working with various themes in practice. So that's available.

I'll be teaching as well. I have a regular group that meets at 9:30 a.m. my time, which would be about 7:30 p.m. Finnish time on Tuesdays. That's available most weeks, though if I'm teaching a retreat like this week, I don't hold it.

I'll also be offering another Daily Life Retreat online. In August, I offered the first one, which uses this form of practice with an emphasis on integrating it into daily life. If you were interested in that small taste I gave you, just those ten minutes on working with this in daily life, I do a whole week retreat on that theme. The format involves two sessions a day, with the most important one being the instruction session happening

7:30 to 9:30 a.m. California time, which again is about 5:30 p.m. Finnish time. Then there's a second session just for questions later in the day that would probably be overnight Finnish time, but that's recorded so you can listen on your own schedule. This will be happening in the February-March timeframe. I just taught it in August, and after about six months, I'll offer it again.

But there's so much happening online now. I think there's actually a resource I can find, an Excel spreadsheet listing groups around the world with their time zones and meeting times. Someone emailed it to me. I'll see if I can locate that and have it sent as a resource following the retreat.

Anna added a few more possibilities. She's also not aware of anything happening early in the day Finnish time, but Gaia House, the retreat center in the UK, offers an online Dharma Hall with five weekly sittings. Some take place in the morning UK time, which would be a bit later in the morning Finnish time. There's also a website called Sangha Live with many teachers from this tradition, and they sometimes have daily morning meditations that might work. They also offer weekly classes. Bodhi College is another source for weekly dharma teaching classes. So yes, there's plenty available online, and Neroda's website lists some of these resources.

And someone just posted that at 9 a.m. Swedish time, a Vipassana group holds daily online meditation sittings for an hour. So that's also available a little later in the morning for those in that time zone.

And then another question about practicing for longer periods—where that might be possible. Longer than one week, not possible in Finland at the moment, and feeling like this particular style feels right but not sure where to go. Clearly the pandemic is an issue.

The person asks about Gaia House or Shwe Oo Min, which is the monastery where Sayadaw U Tejaniya teaches. There's also the long retreats in the U.S. that are available. The three-month course at IMS is probably the first really intensive retreat that's been offered—for forty years now. Anna has been to that. I teach at that most years. That's not happening this year; it has been canceled. And so it will be a while before the long retreats come back.

I've not seen many teachers doing long retreats in the online form, although some are experimenting with that. Right now this month, Sally Armstrong and Guy Armstrong are doing a month following a week more intensive—and then one session each day for the rest of the month. So people are starting to experiment with long retreats online.

In terms of this practice, Carol Wilson and I are scheduled to teach a month-long in this style at the Forest Refuge in June 2021. I don't know if that will happen. It's possible because it's nine months from now. We'll see. That is a lottery; we just had it. So at this point, that's a waiting list.

But Shwe Oo Min is a good option. It is also at this point closed—no yogis allowed. But just keep an eye on that. And I would encourage you to practice in daily life because the momentum of that is valuable. Listen to Sayadaw's teaching. There's a lot that he's published online. I've got many talks online that support this style of practice. Carol Wilson and Alexis Santos are other teachers who teach in this style. Some of Steve Armstrong and Kamala Masters' talks teach in this style as well. So you can search out the teachings and support yourself in daily life in this way until the retreat centers open again.

I am working on creating a webpage for myself. At this point, my own teachings are hard to find because I don't have a way to collect them. I teach at five different centers, and that's where things are posted, so I haven't yet created something central. I hadn't felt a need to do that. But now in this time, it feels useful to have everything gathered together—where am I actually teaching? So that's in process; probably in the next month or so it will get posted. It's a bit harder to find right now, but I have some resources that I'll send to you in the email that will go out at the end, in terms of where my teachings are available.

CHAPTER 156

Working with the Dear Friend

Andrea Fella · 50 min

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers detailed guidance on the formal mettā (loving-kindness) practice, specifically focusing on extending well-wishes to a dear friend. She begins by addressing the historical roots of this practice, noting that while the phrases themselves appear in the Paṭisambhidāmagga (around second century CE) and the category system comes from the Visuddhimagga (fifth century CE), the practice may even predate the Buddha.

Fella introduces a powerful analogy of mettā as a washing machine: awareness is the water, the mind with its difficulties is the dirty clothes, and mettā is the soap. The agitation of repeating phrases massages the loving-kindness through our mental patterns, drawing out whatever obstructs genuine goodwill. When anger, frustration, or resistance arise during practice, this isn't failure—it's the mettā doing its purifying work. She shares a transformative personal experience from a month-long mettā retreat where, despite feeling miserable, she discovered that simply saying phrases while checking how each one landed in the heart gradually rekindled an ember of loving-kindness.

The talk offers practical tools for navigating difficulties: continuing to hold both the phrases and arising reactivity together when possible, returning to an easier being if reactions escalate, exploring forgiveness practice, or shifting to mindfulness. Fella concludes with a guided meditation that includes an innovative alternation practice—wishing oneself well, then the friend, then both together—specifically designed to address the belief that happiness is a zero-sum game.

Today we're going to continue the formal metta practice using the phrases and exploring in a little more depth the category of a dear friend.

I'd like to speak to begin with just a little bit about this form of practice that we're offering. The question came up yesterday about wondering if this is a more modern form of the practice. The form that we teach here, with using the phrases and using the categories—the phrases themselves are pretty old. The phrases are found in the Sutta Piṭaka, in the Pali Canon, the Sutta basket, in a text called the Paṭisambhidāmagga, which is not from the time of the Buddha. Most scholars think of it as being a little bit later, like second century common era. So it's not time of the Buddha, and the teachings, the Sutta teachings attributed to the Buddha, do offer a more expansive or pervading teaching of the loving-kindness. So the more specific form of practice was somewhat later, but certainly not what I would call modern—thousands and thousands of years old.

I did hear from one teacher—Gil Fronsdal, I believe—who said that this practice of metta may even predate the Buddha. I couldn't find any verification of this in the time that I was looking at this yesterday, but if so, it's a pretty ancient practice, this practice that we're doing here.

The categories that we use, the staging through first looking at self and then picking a particular person in a category, that's found in the Visuddhimagga, which is a commentary in the Theravada tradition that's about fifth century common era. So that's also fairly old, this going through the categories.

I appreciate the different options for exploring metta practice. I think there are different times where the different forms or styles of metta practice might be useful. For myself, the formal metta practice was challenging at the beginning. It was not something that allowed me to have ease in the mind. And that's really important in the metta practice—we do begin with that ease. For me, the way into metta was insight practice. As the insight practice softened my heart and mind, the allowing—"this is the way it is, it's okay that it's this way"—all that allowing practice that I did in insight practice took me to the place, after several years, where the metta practice was available again, and very powerful.

So there can be different approaches. Sometimes we can cultivate metta through the insight practice, through recognizing when metta arises, through cultivating that quality of love through being with experience, loving what's here. There are a lot of different ways into metta practice.

The form that we're teaching has some advantages and supports for us. One of the benefits of the phrases is that it uses a capacity of our minds—the intention, the aspect where we can put a thought into our minds. Thoughts have a very powerful shaping capacity in our mind. As the Buddha said, whatever one frequently ponders becomes the inclination of the mind. So if we frequently bring in thoughts of goodwill, that begins to shape the mind, even if the feeling of goodwill is not there. This is a powerful tool to support cultivating this quality of love, of kindness, of care—thinking thoughts, bringing thoughts of goodwill into the mind.

It's supportive in a way that we can do this practice even if we're not feeling the metta, if we're not feeling that sense of goodwill. For plenty of time when I was doing the metta practice, I was not feeling the feeling, but I could connect with the wish. May I be happy. May you be happy.

In fact, there was one experience I had. I did a month-long retreat at Spirit Rock one February, a month of entirely metta practice. I was in the dining hall one day, not feeling a lot of metta, feeling kind of miserable, feeling sorry for myself, a lot of pain in the body. I was like, "I cannot feel metta at all." But I was committed to doing it the whole time, so I just said, "Well, I can say the phrase and know what it means. I can bring that into my mind and I can know what it means. And with each phrase, I can check in: How does it land? How does it affect the heart to feel that, to make that wish?"

So I began wishing myself well. "May I be happy today." Say that, know what it means. And then feel in the heart this tiny little shift, hardly barely discernible, but just a tiny little shift. Then another: "May I be at ease. May I be healthy. May I be safe." With each phrase checking in: How did that one land?

And it was as if each phrase was like touching a little ember of metta in the heart. The expression of that wish, the expression of the metta, was like gently blowing on that ember—just a gentle breeze blowing on that ember. And within about twenty minutes, my mind was completely shifted. I was just so happy as I got up and walked up the hill from the dining hall. It was such a teaching for me, such an eye-opening revelation about the power of using this formal practice.

That said, there are many times in my practice where the phrases were not helping—where doing the phrases was making me more and more tight. And so we do have to honor where we are. We have to honor what is happening in our hearts and minds. I found in the formal metta practice this quality, and Dawn mentioned this the other day: saying a phrase and checking in to the heart. And for me it was not only heart but body, checking in—how does it land to make that wish? So that it's not just saying the phrase, it's saying the phrase and being aware of how that phrase impacts or affects your experience. And maybe it's not much of a shift, or maybe it's a subtle shift, or maybe it brings up the opposite. Maybe it brings up anger or frustration, and that's okay. That's part of the metta practice too.

As both Dawn and Bob mentioned, sometimes that's the function of the metta practice—to draw out everything that's in the way of the metta. I sometimes think about the metta practice as a purification practice. It's talked about as a purification practice, and the washing machine is an interesting analogy.

In the washing machine analogy for metta practice, I think of the water as our awareness. The clothes with dirt in them—that's the mind with all of its messy stuff. And the soap is the metta. So you put the soap in the water in a washing machine, and then you have some agitation. You have to agitate the machine, turn it on. And that massaging of the soap in the water through the clothes, it pushes the soapy water through. The way soap works, it latches onto the dirt and pulls it out into the water.

That's what the metta does. The metta is the soap, and the continuing of the phrases, the energy of the practice, is like that machine turning away. It will massage that metta through our minds, and it will latch onto anything that's not metta and pull it into consciousness. It's not a mistake when that happens. It's the metta doing its work. So sometimes that is what happens—we feel the opposite of metta when we're practicing it.

In the formal practice of metta, the way we've learned it from our teachers—Sharon learned it from Sayadaw U Pandita in Burma, and I learned it from my teachers here, plus my teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma—this way we've learned the practice, we generally start where it's easiest, as we've been doing the last couple of days, starting with an easy being. And then moving into beings with whom we perhaps have a little more complex relationship.

So today we're going to explore the possibility of offering these wishes of kindness to a dear friend. Now, we might think that it would be easy to offer metta for a dear friend, but as we rest with the friend in our mind, in our hearts, and begin to express, "May you be safe, may you be happy," sometimes what comes up—that soap of the metta going through our minds and the thoughts that come up with the relationship—is that they did that thing, they said that thing. How can I wish them well when they did that? And so it can get a little more complex sometimes with a dear friend.

This is actually part of why the use of these different categories is useful for us. Because if we are exploring the metta, and sometimes I've done this, touched into a kind of open-hearted quality that feels like, "Yes, may all beings be happy," and then a particular person comes into mind and their specifics come into mind—there's some constriction there.

The mind, in the "all beings" category, if we're just pervading metta, sometimes that pervading quality can be a little diluted. It can be not really taking in the specifics. And if we bring in a particular person, there may be that feeling like a wrench in the works. It feels like the washing machine gets stuck because we're connecting with particular things or actions, things they've done or said where we have some rub, where we have some challenge in opening our hearts. And so that's part of the reason for specifically turning to specific beings.

Each of the different categories involves picking a specific being to help us find the terrain of where that particular category challenges us.

For someone we're close to, we may have expectations that they wouldn't do something that would hurt us. And then when they do, there's a barrier. For someone who is doing things that are harmful or hurtful to us, we may feel like there's simply no way we could even feel that kind of well-wishing for them. So picking specific beings helps us find the ground-in dirt in our relationships.

In exploring the dear friend, we may find a little bit of this rub. And it's okay if that comes up. When there's difficulty in the mettā practice, sometimes we can just hold it and say, "Yes, this is the mettā working." That's fine.

At one point I was doing my yogi job during a retreat where I was doing mettā all the time. I was doing the dishwashing at Spirit Rock, and I was finding the machine a bit hard to work with. I was doing "may all beings" at this point—"may all beings be happy"—and the machine would get a little stuck. I'd think, "Who designed this stupid machine?" The anger would flare up in my mind, and then I'd notice, "Oh, there's the mettā. There's the anger. Okay." I didn't have to drop the mettā and look at the anger. I just noted, "Yes, that comes out into the wash," and kept going.

If we can keep going, noticing that kind of rub or grinchiness or reactivity coming out into the wash, that's fine. That's what happens in the washing machine—the dirt comes into the water, and then that water can be rinsed away. The reactivity can come into our consciousness and then be released. We can appreciate that the mettā is doing its job when that kind of reactivity happens.

So if we can keep going and hold the phrases, the well-wishing, and the reactivity all together, that's fine. Sometimes, however, the reactivity does get stronger. If that happens, it can be useful to let go of that particular being. If the reactivity feels like it's escalating, it can be useful to let go of that being and go back to where it's easier in the mettā practice—to yourself or to the easy being, wherever it feels more comfortable, more useful to practice.

There's an analogy with mettā that in starting where it's easy, it's like we're filling up a pool of water with that quality of mettā. As that pool fills up, it can overflow and begin to fill up the next pool. We may find that we can start with the easy being or with ourselves, and that creates a container for well-wishing. Then, bringing in another being where there may be a little more difficulty, the mettā from the prior work or practice can support us. But if that pool dries out completely, we may have to go back and nourish it again, returning to an easier being.

Another support—and I think this will come in tomorrow's session—is to shift to another practice in the flavor of the mettā practices: forgiveness practice, either forgiveness for ourselves or forgiveness for other beings. If it's too hard to wish well, sometimes we can explore the forgiveness practice. And it's okay also, if the reactivity is too strong, to let go of the mettā entirely and just work with mindfulness with the reactivity.

So these are tools for navigating difficulty. First, if difficulty comes up, stay—just keep going if possible and allow it, knowing that this is the mettā working well. Then, dropping back to an easier being, using forgiveness practice, or shifting back to mindfulness practice.

Let's explore the practice again together today.

Finding a posture that feels comfortable. Allowing a relaxation in the body. Perhaps taking some time to connect with relaxing the body and mind.

Then connecting with the area of the heart. Just allowing what's there to be there, completely okay. Whatever's there in this moment, allowing that to be as it is.

If it's supportive, sometimes it can be helpful to remember—as was suggested yesterday—that many, many beings have been offering mettā to all beings: all beings now, all beings to be born. We are the recipient of mettā. Somebody right now, somewhere on the planet, is offering mettā to all beings. You are one of them.

Opening your heart to the worthiness of yourself to receive that mettā.

Then allowing an easy being to come to your mind. That may be yourself, it may be a benefactor, maybe a pet, a child. Beginning by recollecting something that you appreciate about that being—something kind that they've done, or that you've done if you're exploring yourself in this moment. Things they've done, or qualities you appreciate about that being or about yourself.

This reflection on what you appreciate about a being is said to be the proximate cause for this quality of care and connection.

Holding this being in your mind in some way—it may be as an image. For yourself...

It may be your sense of yourself now, sitting here. Sometimes it might just be the sense of being with that person—not an image, but just as if they were sitting in front of you while you sit with your eyes closed, knowing they're there. Sometimes that can invoke that being. A connection. Exploring a connection with this being.

And beginning to offer or wish those phrases. May you be safe. With each wish, each offering, expressing that wish and understanding what it means to make it. But then coming back—how does it feel here to make that wish? Nothing needs to happen particularly. It's more of a checking in, in the area of the heart. May you be safe. How does it feel in the heart, in the body, for you to have expressed that wish? May you be happy. May you be healthy. May you live with ease.

I'm going to offer some silence now for you to explore this on your own—connecting with the being, saying the phrase, seeing how it lands. And you're welcome to be creative with the phrases, whatever phrases are resonant for you in this well-wishing. Taking your time and exploring a relaxed connection with the easy being, the phrases, and the response in your heart.

And now perhaps offering an inner bow to your easy being. In a way, saying goodbye to that being for now.

And allowing yourself to greet a dear friend. Imagining perhaps an image, or as if they were sitting in front of you. Sometimes using their name can be a way to evoke some sense of them in your mind. Creating some kind of connection with this friend. Reflecting for a few moments on what you appreciate about your dear friend—qualities that you appreciate, kind things that they may have done or said.

And if your mind is also including things that you don't appreciate, just kind of say, "Thank you for that opinion, but we're focusing on the things we appreciate right now."

Then whatever appreciation you may feel, that can be a support for offering the phrases. May you be safe. And then how does it land in your heart to make that wish? May you be happy.

You can be creative sometimes with the images or connection. Sometimes when I'm exploring connecting with a dear friend, I know what makes them feel happy. One friend I've offered metta to is an artist, so I envision her in her studio for that phrase. So you can be creative with the connection part if that feels easy and natural for you, keeping it relaxed. May you be healthy. May you live with ease.

Exploring for the next few minutes offering these wishes of kindness to your dear friend. If some kind of rub or something non-metta comes up in this process, that's just part of the process, part of the way metta works. But if it feels too challenging, you're welcome to drop back to the easy being. Refresh that quality of connection and care. And then after a few minutes, explore coming back to the dear friend.

Exploring your connection with your dear friend in this moment, I'm going to offer a revised way to practice with the dear friend. And that's an alternation between yourself and the dear friend. Envisioning yourselves together, you can envision both of you doing this together. With each phrase: May I be happy. May you be happy. May we be happy. May I be healthy. May you be healthy. May we both be healthy. May I be safe. May you be safe.

May we both be safe.

Continuing that exploration, if it seems supportive for you—this alternation of wishing yourself well, wishing your friend well, and wishing you both together the wishes of kindness.

For me, this is a way to address a particular belief in my own mind that somehow happiness is a zero-sum game. That wishing happiness for someone else means I'm getting less of it for myself. I discovered this pretty early on in doing my metta practice—this belief that wishing somebody else well triggers a response of, "Well, what about me?"

But it's not a zero-sum game, actually. When we wish somebody else well, it can nourish us as well. This kind of alternation was a way for me to acknowledge that wishing myself well and wishing somebody else well are not mutually exclusive. And then bringing the two together—"may we be happy"—explicitly acknowledges that it doesn't have to be a zero-sum game.

Exploring the Wandering Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella invites practitioners to transform their relationship with the wandering mind from one of frustration to one of curiosity and discovery. Rather than viewing mental wandering as an obstacle to meditation, she presents it as a gateway to understanding the nature of mindfulness itself and the profound teaching of anattā (not-self).

Drawing from the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta and her own practice experiences, Andrea explores how the comings and goings of mindfulness demonstrate that we don't have complete control over our minds—a direct pointer to not-self. She examines different flavors of wandering, from charged reactive thinking to surprisingly calm drifting, and offers practical guidance for exploring both edges of the wandering mind: the moment mindfulness returns and the subtle process of losing awareness.

The talk provides valuable insights into how attention shifts between focused and diffuse states, and how states we typically label as non-mindful—spaciness, drowsiness, zoning out—can actually be met with awareness. Andrea shares personal stories illustrating how following the mind's natural movements, rather than forcing attention, can reveal deeper layers of practice and new terrain of experience. This teaching encourages a receptive, curious approach that honors the lawful unfolding of conditions while supporting the cultivation of mindfulness.

It's nice to see you all in this form that we have, seeing all the tiles with your faces, scanning through and greeting you. It's really a privilege to be able to sit with you and to share the Dharma.

I think we're all in the teacher community appreciating the retreat. We meet each evening, and it's a lovely time for us as a community, as a teaching community, to check in. It's been a lovely retreat, so I'm appreciative of your practice and your commitment, your dedication to doing this.

This is not easy. You all know that it's not easy. We sit and we feel all kinds of stuff. Sometimes it's great. Sometimes we find concentration, we find some ease and some peace. And then the next sitting is completely different. Sometimes there's some stability of mind, more presence of mind. Sometimes the mind is wandering all over the place.

This is actually what I'd like to reflect with you about today: exploring curiosity about this phenomenon of the wandering mind.

The other day, Dawn said that things that seem like obstacles, that are in the way, can be a gateway to learning, to understanding, and to freedom. That includes all of our hindrances, our reactivity. We also often think of the wandering mind as being an obstacle. After all, what is the wandering mind but a loss of mindfulness? And that feels like an obstacle when mindfulness isn't here. But we can really get curious about this phenomenon of the wandering mind.

The other day somebody asked a question along the lines of, "Why does the mind do this?" It's a great question. There's not one answer. And I would say that this talk I'm going to offer is my own personal exploration of this question. It's a great question to let motivate you. Why does the mind wander? Check it out. See if you can learn something, rather than having a contentious relationship with the wandering mind—"Oh, the mind's been wandering," or "The mind feels like it's getting pulled to wandering." Instead, explore it. What is the wandering mind?

We use that phrase a lot, but there are different flavors of the wandering mind. Sometimes it just feels like the mind loses touch with the present moment and wanders out of it. Maybe that's why we call it wandering—it just kind of drifts. There's a drifting quality to it. Sometimes that drifting has a non-directed feeling, kind of floaty. Sometimes that experience is more like a charge out of the present moment. The mind picks up on some thought and just runs with it—active thinking, active reflection, a lot of charge in the content of the thinking. Sometimes the mind isn't so much thinking but is just pulled into a storm of emotional turmoil. This can include thinking, but doesn't necessarily have clear thinking to it. Sometimes that wandering can be kind of calm, actually. That's an interesting flavor.

But all of these flavors, when we call it wandering mind, have in common that they're a state of low or non-mindfulness. So really, what we're exploring when we explore the wandering mind is mindfulness itself. We're exploring the comings and goings of mindfulness. This is a useful exploration.

We can't make ourselves—I think Sally said this the other day—we can't make ourselves come out of the wandering. We can't make it stop. When we're not mindful, we can't make mindfulness come back. It will come back. It will spontaneously come back. It will re-arise at some point due to causes and conditions, but we can't make it come back. What we can do is notice that moment when the mind wakes up, when mindfulness returns.

What we often call the wandering mind is actually mindfulness returning and noticing that mindfulness wasn't there a few moments ago. This is one of the things we can be curious about in that moment—curious about what the experience of becoming mindful actually is, curious about the experience of mindfulness itself. There's so much we can learn by exploring this phenomenon.

And without question, I'm pretty sure—I wouldn't say 100% sure, but pretty sure—that every single one of us deals with this phenomenon regularly. It's a pattern, a habit that we all share. It can be really useful to explore patterns and habits that happen a lot, and wandering mind happens a lot.

Having some curiosity about it, rather than a sense that this is a problem I need to get rid of, helps the mind begin to understand the causes and conditions that lead to the mind wandering, as well as the supports for remaining present. There are other things we can learn as well. In seeing the habit of the wandering mind, one of the things we often get familiar with are the main or key habits of mind that tend to pull us out of the present moment. Jack Kornfield talks about this when exploring the thinking mind—get familiar with your top three tunes, your top three favorite kinds of thoughts to have, and see if you can find a way to relate to those in a light way.

We begin to learn what our familiar go-to strategies are, our familiar strategies for navigating life. When we sit down to meditate, we may think we're going to stay still and present, but our habits, our conditioning, have other ideas. What we see when we see these patterns unfolding—all of these patterns that we explore in our practice—is how the mind wanders, the kinds of emotions that arise frequently. We are seeing our conditioning unfolding. We are seeing how our mind has been shaped. We're learning about our minds.

One of the key gifts of exploring the wandering mind is that we really get to taste, if we're open to it, how out of control the mind is—that we don't have so much say over when the mind wanders. Habits and conditioning will take us out of the present moment. Mindfulness will re-arise in some moment, but we didn't do that one either. We didn't have control over that either.

Seeing the comings and goings of mindfulness, watching the mind wander and come back, is a teaching for us on the teaching of anattā, not-self. We sit down and plan to stay present. We have that idea or hope to be present in the moment. A few minutes later, we're off in thought. Who did that? Most likely you didn't actively decide to do that. It was habits, it was conditioning that led to that. And then mindfulness returns.

Who did that? Again, not-self. There's so much evidence for this understanding of not-self, but we tend to view our experience from the perspective of self: "I'm going to be meditating. My mind wandered. I woke up again. I did that. I'm so good. I came back."

We tend to have that perspective of self, and when we're viewing experience from that perspective, it's very hard to see evidence for not-self. It's like a kind of delusion—the view or belief, the framing or orientation, the filter through which we see experience, this sense of self—almost prevents us from taking in the evidence for not-self. So every time the mind wanders, when that mindfulness returns: not-self. Not-self.

The other day, Bob mentioned the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta, the discourse on the characteristic of not-self. I'd like to share a little section of that sutta with you. Bob mentioned the aspect of the uncontrollability of our minds, and this is the part I'm pointing to here—that we don't have complete control over our minds. He pointed to this with respect to various areas or aspects of our experience, beginning with the body. The body is not under our control.

If it were under our control, we'd be able to say, "May it be like this, may it not be like that." And the Buddha explored this with several different areas of experience. One of those areas he called mental formations or volitional formations.

Volitional formations are a huge category of experiences that include thoughts, emotions, as well as wholesome mind states. Concentration is a volitional formation. Mindfulness is a volitional formation. And so there's a little piece in this sutta that's repeated for each of these different areas of experience. I'll read the one for volitional formations, but I'm going to replace "volitional formations" with "mindfulness," since mindfulness is a volitional formation.

Mindfulness is not self. If mindfulness were the self, it would not lead to affliction. It would be possible to say with regard to mindfulness, "Let my mindfulness be this. Let my mindfulness not be this."

Wouldn't that be nice? Anybody able to do that all the time? But precisely because mindfulness is not self, it lends itself to affliction. It is not possible to say, "Let my mindfulness be this. Let my mindfulness not be this."

Now, that maybe sounds hopeless. If I don't have control over mindfulness, what do I do? How do I do anything? Conditions will support the arising of mindfulness. And one of the conditions that supports the arising of mindfulness is recognizing mindfulness. It's sometimes said that the proximate cause for mindfulness is mindfulness. The teaching, or the hearing about mindfulness being helpful, is a condition that supports our interest in what mindfulness is. We start to get familiar with the experience of mindfulness. That familiarity creates the conditions for more mindfulness. It's all unfolding lawfully.

You are fortunate enough to have heard about these teachings and been curious enough—curiosity was aroused through hearing that—and the practice began. It's all not-self. You're fortunate to be on this not-self path. We're all fortunate to have heard the Dharma and had the conditions that inspired us to engage.

So noticing this wandering mind—for me, this recognition that it's not my fault the mind wandered, this is conditions—and yet we take responsibility for our minds. Yes. Curiosity about this experience when mindfulness returns. This is a key way where mindfulness can be cultivated: recognizing that, noticing the return of mindfulness. This is one of the key areas of exploring the wandering mind.

We really can only explore the edges of the wandering mind, I'd say—the going, the coming out of it. We can notice the moment when mindfulness returns. That's like the edge of the wandering mind. We can see something about that moment. We can also see something about the going out of mindfulness. That one is a little more subtle, but it is possible. And so I'll talk about both sides, both edges of the wandering mind.

The easiest place to begin this exploration is that moment of remembering, the moment when mindfulness returns. We often have a conflicted relationship with this moment—a sense that I should have been doing it better. And again, that's picking up the belief that I had control. For me, that understanding of "this is not-self, it's coming and going, it's not-self"—that helped to frame the experience of the return of mindfulness with a little bit more allowing and acceptance. It's not my fault that it happened, but here I am, and the mindfulness is back. Awareness of that is supportive.

That moment when mindfulness returns—it is actually an amazing moment. It's got a quality that helps us begin to recognize what it's like to be mindful. If you're curious about it,

If you're beating yourself up about it, you miss the opportunity to get curious about mindfulness itself in that moment. When mindfulness re-arises, if you're simply curious about that experience of mindfulness re-arising, there's a kind of lingering memory, I'd say. It's like the mindfulness has re-arisen and there's the knowing: now I'm present. This experience is: I'm here. We have that understanding.

But there's also a lingering memory of what it was like a few moments before, when the mindfulness was not here. Perhaps there's a sense of the fuzz of being lost, or the wrapped-upness of the mind being caught in something, and the mind is kind of emerging from that. So there's a difference—a difference in the quality of the mind between what it was like a few moments ago and what it's like now. And it's not like you have to look back and think about it. It's almost right there in the moment of mindfulness returning. There's a sense of the difference. This is what it's like now, with mindfulness present.

So we get a taste or flavor of the experience of mindfulness there—what it's like to be aware. And that, as I said a few moments ago, mindfulness is the proximate cause for mindfulness. When we become familiar with the experience of mindfulness, it supports mindfulness in the future.

As we begin to get interested or curious about that moment of mindfulness returning, there was one point in my practice where I was just so curious: how early can I notice that mindfulness has returned? Sometimes it feels like the mind is coming out of the mud, or slowly waking up. And we're already a little ways into the waking up when we realize that we've kind of been mindful for the previous moments but weren't really aware that we were mindful. There can be a slow emergence from that.

But at one point I got really curious about how soon I could know that mindfulness had returned. And the more we get curious about that moment, the more it attunes us to that experience of mindfulness returning. The more we see it happening all the time—everywhere, not just in the sitting practice, but when we're walking across the street, or picking up a glass, or putting our hands in dishwater—suddenly there's this: here's mindfulness again.

Often we're not so attuned to that moment. We're more attuned to what we are aware of and what we have to do about it. But if we can be curious about the quality of awareness itself, that begins to help the mind attune or become sensitive to the returning of mindfulness. This creates more possibility for continuity to happen. We get more of these moments of mindfulness returning.

Another great thing about that moment of mindfulness returning is that it was effortless. You did not do that moment of mindfulness. It was completely effortless mindfulness. And that's a pointer to the possibility of what it's like to be present without working so hard. All of these things can be explored as mindfulness returns.

It's also useful not only to notice the mindfulness returning, but to be curious about what's going on in the mind. There's the mindfulness returning, and then there's something that mindfulness is attuned to. If the mind has wandered based on thoughts or emotions, if it has wandered out of the present moment based on some kind of reactivity, those thoughts have a very potent conditioning power on the mind. While the mind is wandering—especially when we're not aware of it—if some kind of hindrance or reactivity has taken hold, then without mindfulness, that has been shaping our experience.

When mindfulness returns, that experience is what we're waking up into—what has been shaped by that wandering. So rather than in the moment that mindfulness returns thinking, "Okay, I was using the breath as an anchor, let me come back to the breath as soon as possible," it can sometimes be really useful to be curious about what the mind has woken up into.

If you try to jump right back to the breath, and there has been some kind of reactivity shaped while the mind was wandering, that reactivity may get applied to how you're attending to the breath—if you're not consciously aware of it. So it's really useful to take a few moments when mindfulness returns. Notice that it has returned. Notice that experience. Oh, mindful again. And what's here? I sometimes use that question for myself, because sometimes when the mind wanders into whatever—it's wandering into some whole world. Sometimes I've had the experience of waking up and it's like, wow, this whole world or bubble had been created of experience. And it's like, where am I?

So sometimes I'll use this analogy: What planet am I on when the mindfulness returns? What is this place that I'm returning to? Just have some curiosity about that. Again, no judgment, but simply curiosity. What planet am I on? What has been the effect? The mind has been wandering—what has been the effect of that wandering on the present moment experience?

Now, you might think that often we would see great aversion, delusion, anger, frustration, irritation, annoyance that has been constructed while the mind was wandering. And sometimes we do. But the great thing about this particular curiosity of "what planet am I on" when the mindfulness returns is that the more we practice, the more experienced we become with the meditation, the more we settle into a retreat, sometimes we can find that when the mind wandered, it actually didn't wander into directed thought or some kind of reactivity. Sometimes our minds will wander into calm. We lose mindfulness, wandering into calm.

And when we come back, especially if we're not judging ourselves for having been lost, when the mindfulness returns we may ask: what planet am I waking up on? Sometimes it's planet calm. Sometimes there's more calmness, more ease after a wander than before.

When I discovered that, it was a great little carrot to being curious about what planet I was on when the mind returned from wandering. Because way more often than I would have expected, the mind did wander into more relaxation, more ease. It was almost like when the mind wandered, I was working really hard before—I was like, "I'm going to be present, I'm going to stay here, stay here." And the mind is going, "Yeah, you're working too hard. I'll show you how to relax. Let's relax." And it just does it for me. It just relaxed for me. And then the mindfulness returns, and it's like, oh yeah, that's a lot simpler, a lot more ease, a lot more relaxation. So sometimes when we return from a wander, it's not necessarily that the mind has gone somewhere problematic. What has been shaped might be calm, might be ease or peace.

So that's a little bit about the wandering out and coming back side of the wandering mind. The other side, the flip side, is getting curious about how and where we lose mindfulness.

Now, this kind of investigation is really light, a soft kind of investigation. Almost by definition, if you're trying to say, "Where's the mind wandering? Where's the mind wandering? How's it going to wander?"—you're kind of jumping on top of it. The activity of that doing, trying to see the mind wander, is either going to keep it from wandering or it's going to obscure what happens as the mind wanders. So this is a really light kind of interest or exploration.

Often what we do is notice what happens when the mindfulness returns. That is sometimes a clue to the kinds of things our mind wanders into. When we wake up, the planet we wake up on, that experience that we're having when mindfulness returns—that's sometimes a clue to the state of mind or the place or the experience that the mind gets hooked by and lost in.

So that curiosity around what planet am I waking up on is a real support for attuning to the experiences or states of mind that the mind can get caught by. As we see over and over again that the mind gets lost in a particular state—maybe it gets lost in frustration, or it gets lost in boredom, and you wake up with that sense of boredom—that waking up in boredom, checking into planet boredom, you get familiar with that experience. Then you might start to see planet boredom making itself before the mind wanders. And then you can be present with that.

There could be some choice points at that moment. At one point I noticed, while I was paying attention to the breath, a kind of going out, leaving the breath—like flattening or spreading or something like that.

The attention got drawn to something other than the breath. At that point, I was attending to the breath, and when I noticed that shift—the mind beginning to let go of the breath—I would bring the mind back. That's a choice. You can do that. It's possible. When you notice that kind of shift or a pull toward something, sometimes we can simply return to the primary object.

But at some point, this experience of the mind drifting out from the breath happened enough times. This was in one particular sitting. I'd seen it many times, and I came back, and I came back, and I came back. Then at some point, as the mind started to shift away from the breath again, there was this recognition: "Well, I'm mindful. I'm mindful of this—the mind letting go of the breath. Let's see where it wants to go. Let's see what happens." I let the mind follow that experience, and it opened into a kind of vast space of experience that I had not explicitly or consciously seen before. It was startling. It actually shocked me out of it. I thought, "What was that?"

So in familiarizing yourself with the construction of the planet, you could make the choice to return to something, or you could simply be curious. "Oh, planet boredom is arising. What's this about? What's that experience?"

This exploration around where we lose awareness can begin with a kind of inventory. What are the times of your day where mindfulness tends to disappear? Sometimes we lose awareness in particular activities, places, or things we're doing. That might be a curiosity worth exploring: What activities do I do where I tend to lose mindfulness? "Well, when I go into the kitchen to make dinner, that's where I lose it." Or, "When I take my walk for exercise, that's when mindfulness disappears." Be curious about it, not judging yourself, but simply noticing where those sinkholes or rabbit holes exist where mindfulness gets lost.

When you begin to notice those areas, I want to encourage curiosity. I've found that curiosity about this is the most powerful tool—not using that recognition of "my mind wanders when I go into the kitchen" to then grip tightly: "I'm going to hold my mind present when I go into the kitchen. I'm going to stay mindful for every single thing I do." That's an efforting way to approach it. You can do that. You can recognize this is an area where you tend to get lost and work hard to stay present. But often that hard work, that trying to stay present, obscures what is actually happening to make the mindfulness go away. And that's the invitation I'm offering here—curiosity about what has the mind wandering.

So as you walk into the kitchen or enter the activity, perhaps you're mindful. It's like, "Okay, I'm mindful now. I know I tend to get lost in the kitchen. Let's see if I can notice what hooks the mind." Maybe it's the first time something happens that you need to do quickly. Or maybe it's just habit—how you've always engaged in the kitchen. Maybe that's been a time when you've let your mind drift. So perhaps it's simply habit. Just be curious about what happens there, rather than forcing yourself to stay mindful. Be curious about what hooks the mind.

We also might lose awareness in particular habits of mind: boredom, depression, planning, remembering, anger. These can manifest as thoughts, as thinking, or simply as an energetic experience. Sometimes we get lost in the energetic experience as well as thoughts. But often with habitual states of mind, we get lost in the content of the thought. And that content has a stickiness to it.

It kind of pulls us into believing that we need to think about things from that perspective of the content.

So again, recognizing what we wake up into—what particular flavors of mind, whether boredom or fantasizing or judging or remembering—might give us a clue as to where the mind wandered. That familiarity with the experience as mindfulness returns may help us to notice the mind going into that state.

Another key way that the mind wanders, or that mindfulness gets hooked into something, is when there's a shift of attention. You're paying attention to the breath—that's where your conscious intention is, to notice the breath—and some sound arises. Maybe you kind of sort of notice the sound, but you're trying to stay with the breath, so you don't really acknowledge it. It's possible that shift of attention to the sound has more momentum or more energy to it than we're acknowledging or giving it credit for. And then the mind will wander.

The attention shifting without our consciously noticing that it has shifted—I would say that's one of the key reasons why the mind wanders. The attention shifts, and we haven't noticed it.

This is something we can start to get curious about. What is it like for the attention to shift? We can get familiar with that experience. And as we become familiar with what it's like for attention to shift, it's almost like that experience highlights itself for us. It will help us recognize when the attention shifts.

In the instructions for the practice we're exploring this week with the use of an anchor, this is actually part of the instruction. We stay with the anchor, but if attention is drawn to something else, we acknowledge it. We get curious about that shift. We recognize, "Oh, the attention has shifted." We take in what it shifted to, notice it, and then we have a choice. Once we've noticed that shift of attention, if it feels compelling, we may stay with it for a while. If it's not so compelling, we can simply return to the anchor. This noticing of the shift of attention begins to help the mind stay present.

There's another way attention shifts that I experienced this morning in the guided meditation. I hadn't quite articulated it this way before. I've noticed this experience many times but hadn't been able to articulate what was going on. This morning the articulation appeared, which was lovely, so now I can share it with you.

It's a kind of shift of attention, but often we think of a shift of attention as looking at one thing and then looking at another thing. We're paying attention to the breath, then there's a sound, and attention shifts from breath sensation to sound and hearing. But there's another way that attentional shift can happen—perhaps more like what was happening when I described paying attention to the breath and then the mind expanding, leaving the breath and wandering into this expansive space.

There's a shift from where attention is focused, attending to something in particular—the breath, a sound, a body sensation—to something else entirely. Attention is not just one-dimensional. Attention can have that focused quality, but it can also be wide-angle. Attention can be broad and vast, taking in diffuseness, taking in wide experience.

That shift from attending to something specific to opening out—that's a shift of attention too. It's an attentional shift to a different quality, attending to a different kind of object, essentially. A shift from noticing something very precise to being aware of something very expansive.

At this point, the feeling of that shift is a very familiar experience for me. It's one of the main ways I allow my mind to settle—feeling into being with something and then feeling that shift into expansiveness. Being present for that, allowing the mindfulness to track into that expanding experience. It feels like a dropping, a spreading, a kind of expanding of mindfulness.

It also feels remarkably like falling asleep. It's a very similar quality. And so if you're not curious about this experience—it's like a drop and spread, almost. That's what it is for me; it may have different flavors for each of you. A dropping and spreading experience.

The attention shifting from focused to broad. You might think that you're falling asleep, or that your mind is getting sleepy or drifty or daydreaming. But if you can track it into that, it's like, oh, expansive mind is happening. Calm mind, diffuse experience is happening.

So that shift—there can be a shift from focused attention to broad attention. That can be another way the mind wanders, when you shift from that focus to something diffuse. And if we're not familiar with this experience, or if we're not giving credit to the experience of diffuseness and think it's just spacing out, then we may have an agenda or thought that, "Well, that's not mindfulness. I'm not used to that." But there are so many different flavors of what it's like when mindfulness is present.

So this curiosity about what is the experience, and am I aware? We often base whether we think we're aware or not on what kinds of objects we are experiencing. And when objects of different flavors happen—especially these diffuse objects, spaciousness, that kind of object—we may not have familiarity with being with them. And then we'll just get lost in that spaciousness. That's kind of how the mind can wander into calm sometimes, wander into spaciousness. It's very pleasant. You can end up just—have you ever noticed that? Sometimes wandering mind where it's just really pleasant but not very mindful. It's not that it's an unwholesome state. It's that the mindfulness hasn't quite attuned to what it's actually like to be mindful in that state. It's possible.

I want to go into a little more depth with these diffuse states, because this is such a powerful place of practice. For myself, learning how to meet these diffuse states was one of the ways my practice really did begin to deepen into new terrain.

There are a whole bunch of states of mind that we might habitually get lost in—sleepiness, spacing out, zoning out, these kinds of states that we think of as non-mindful. But these states are not inherently non-mindful. They are more habitually non-mindful.

I'll give an example from my own practice. This was probably the first time I really clearly saw this. I was having breakfast and kept noticing while I was eating that I would space out. I was trying to be mindful while eating my breakfast, so I would bring my attention back to the breakfast—lifting the fork, lifting the food to my mouth, chewing—and I noticed the mind would space out again. So I just kept bringing it back.

But at some point, I thought, "Let's see if I can notice this mind moving away from focused attention to this spacing out." And it was possible. I had had enough practice with noticing diffuse states by that point. So instead of trying to stay with the breakfast eating, I thought, "Okay, so here's the spacing out." It kind of felt like the mind hovered somewhere up and to the right of my head. It was like this fuzzy, buzzing quality.

As I hung out there, I noticed I could be mindful of it. The mindfulness of that state let me recognize several things. One, there was a quality of pleasantness. There was a withdrawal from sense experience. And there was a deep resting that felt like it was happening.

That rest was the clue, actually. It was like, "Oh, the mind is so tired. It wants to rest." Well, okay, let me let it rest here. I'll be with it while it rests.

After about thirty seconds of resting, mindfully resting in that state—what I had been calling spacing out—after about thirty seconds of resting with that, letting the mind rest, it was like the fog cleared. That fuzzy, buzzing quality just dissipated.

And then there was a clarity of being with the body. The sense experience came back clearly. And as the sense experience came back clearly, it was like, "Oh, wow. The mind needed to take its rest, and it was going to take it whether I was on board or not."

That kind of seeing, recognizing that mindfulness could follow that state—there are so many states like this that we think we can't be mindful in. Fogginess, dullness, day-dreaming, drifting, spaciness. All of these have this quality of being diffuse. And so the kind of awareness that we cultivate in being with that is this broad awareness, rather than the precise knowing of "I know what this experience is—there's this sensation and that sound and that experience." There's a whole host of experience that's much less precise, and the mind can know it with this broader awareness.

So it's really worth exploring the edges of these states that we tend to think are not mindful, that we tend to think are inherently not mindful. Curiosity. Can I be with drowsiness? Can I be with spaciness? It's possible, actually. It's possible.

The last piece I'll mention—I don't have a lot of time for this, so I'll just drop it in there with a little encouragement to be curious. Sometimes we might start losing awareness as the practice deepens. When the mind suddenly seems less stable after a period of pretty stable mind, rather than thinking, "What did I do wrong?"—it often is an indication that something is shifting in the practice. There's something new happening, and the mindfulness is trying to find its way to meet a new experience. You're a little bit lagging behind, perhaps. Your agenda for what you're paying attention to may be lagging behind what the mindfulness is settling towards.

It is possible, after a period of time where the mind has been stable, for mindfulness to start really wandering. There are different reasons why that can happen. One of the reasons is that something old or deep, a kind of hidden old pattern or habit, is finally—it's like celebrating that there's enough space to be seen. It's like, "Oh, finally there's room for me. Okay, I'm going to explode." That can happen; that can definitely be one of the things that happens. But at the same time, well, okay—that pattern had to wait until there was a little more stability to actually come out. So some patience with that, practicing with that as we practice with difficulty.

But there's also the possibility of the mind orienting towards more quiet or more subtlety. At one point when I was practicing at Shwe Oo Min with Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma, I'd had a period of time where there'd been pretty consistent mindfulness, a lot of continuity of mindfulness. There'd been some intentionality to that mindfulness—the gentle reminding, this patient, gentle persistence of reminding myself to be aware. But it was pretty stable and pretty easeful. And then suddenly I started noticing, "Wow, the mind is all over the place."

That kind of shift, when there has been some stability and then suddenly the mind is all over the place—that's an interesting point. When that happens, pay attention. There's something, maybe something new happening. And so when I began looking at that, by this point it was kind of like, "Oh, okay. The mind is wandering. Let's see what's going on."

Rather than trying to track what I was aware of, it was more like a settling back in. "Well, what is the mind naturally aware of right now? What's it already aware of?" The slight agenda of staying present had kept the mind at a certain place, a certain level—yep, seeing, hearing, body sensations, vibratory energy, hearing—all of that the attention was tracking. But the agenda of tracking that was keeping the mind at a certain level, and mindfulness and wisdom were shifting to a subtler level of experience.

And that's what I noticed when I took away the agenda for the kinds of things I'm familiar with being aware of. Just asking, "Well, what is already here?"

Sometimes in that opening to what's already here, it may not be obvious. It may not be clear what's here. If you can just kind of hang in that space, that diffuseness, that non-specificness, maybe the mind will begin to recognize new kinds of experiences.

And that's what happened in this case. When I opened to what the mind is naturally aware of, it was a subtler kind of experience that the mind was naturally aware of. If I had been trying to effort my way through it—"Okay, I'm going to keep myself being mindful here"—it would have stayed at that same level, the things I'm already familiar with.

So there are often these shifts in practice where mindfulness will begin to orient toward experiences, toward states that we're not so familiar with. And that's a prime place where the mind can wander. So that kind of curiosity of "Well, what's here?"—it can be a little uncomfortable not to be familiar with our experience. It takes some trust.

Like that time I described following the mind where it wanders, and it went to this vast space I'd never experienced before. It kind of shocked me out of it. But the next times it happened, I was more ready, more available to meet a new kind of experience.

I hope this is mostly an encouragement to be curious about the wandering mind. Let go of judging it. What does it have to teach you?

There's a lot in what I described that may sound like I'm encouraging you to do something, but really what I'm encouraging is curiosity and a very receptive mindfulness—to see what the edges of the wandering mind are like in any given situation. "Oh, the mind has wandered. Let's see what's here." It's not so much a doing; it's more of a receiving. And curiosity, I'd say, is our greatest support for this.

Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 158

Mindfulness of Thoughts

Andrea Fella · 40 min

In this guided meditation talk, Andrea Fella offers practical instructions for working with thoughts and thinking in mindfulness practice. Building on previous teachings about the wandering mind, she explores how thoughts—while often pulling us away from presence—can themselves become objects of mindful awareness. The talk emphasizes an important distinction: rather than getting caught in the content of what we're thinking about, we can learn to recognize the process and fact of thinking itself.

Fella introduces several skillful approaches for relating to thoughts. When thinking has emotional charge, she suggests acknowledging the type of thinking (planning, remembering, judging, fantasizing) and checking in with underlying emotions. For less charged thoughts, she encourages curiosity about how thinking manifests through different sense modalities—as internal speech, visual images, or even kinesthetic sensations. She shares her personal experience as a dancer, where thinking could manifest as felt movement in the body.

The teaching culminates in exploring the conditioned nature of thought—how thoughts arise from and condition emotions, and how sense impressions generate thinking. This investigation reveals the impersonal, lawful quality of mental processes. Rather than trying to stop thoughts, practitioners are invited to know that thinking is happening, observe its arising and passing, and recognize the patterns of mind that unfold moment to moment. The session concludes with a meditation period allowing practitioners to explore these approaches directly.

This morning, for the instructions, I'd like to offer some reflections on working with thoughts and thinking.

Last night in talking about the wandering mind, I didn't really so much talk about working with thoughts themselves, but more about noticing the edges of the wandering mind—noticing when and how the mind returns from wandering and how it slips out into wandering.

With the wandering mind, thoughts are often a part of that experience of the mind going off. Not always. Sometimes the mind, as I said last night, can wander into states of calm or non-thought. But often thoughts are a part of the wandering mind and can pull us out of mindfulness.

But thoughts don't have to pull us out of mindfulness. They're just another object, just another experience. The eye sees, the ear hears, the mind thinks. We can be aware of seeing and hearing, and we can be aware of thinking. Yet we have a strong habit of not being aware of thinking. We have a strong habit of getting caught or pulled into the content of thinking, what we are thinking about, as opposed to recognizing that we are thinking. And so this is actually an important part of our learning in mindfulness practice—to learn how to become aware while thinking.

An important understanding or recognition around thinking is the distinction between the content of the thought, what we are thinking about, and the process, the fact of thinking, the experience of thinking.

It's often helpful in our meditation to acknowledge in a light way some aspect of the content of thinking, rather than the detail of the thinking. This is often an early instruction. I know you've probably all heard this instruction: when you notice that you're thinking, acknowledge the type of thinking—planning, remembering, judging, fantasizing. This is a way to begin to step us out of the detail of the content to just acknowledge the flavor of the content. It's like one step back from being in the content, where we can acknowledge, "Oh, this is the kind of thinking that's happening."

When our thoughts are really strong, there's often a strong emotional pull underneath. That emotional pull can take us into the content. The kind of dynamic between emotion and thought seems pretty habitual for us in our minds—when there's a strong emotion, we get pulled into thought about what the emotion is connected to, thinking or believing in a way that the thinking part of it is going to help us navigate the feelings. And so when there is strong thought, when we feel really strongly pulled into the content of the thought, it can be really helpful to check in: Is there an emotion connected with it? This is again a way to step back from the content of the thought, the words, the meaning, the story or narrative, and become aware of the emotions connected to the thought. So again, we're stepping back from the direct content of the thought here.

At times when we notice thinking, it may not feel like the content is particularly relevant. The thoughts seem random or maybe dreamlike images, or just some memory that flits through but there's not a particular charge to it. And there it can be really interesting to step more fully back from content and be curious about how the thinking is happening. This gets more into the process of thinking.

Thinking as a phenomenon can be experienced through many sense modalities. Often the most familiar way we first recognize thinking, for many of us, is as if we're talking to ourselves. So it's coming in through almost the hearing door—it's like an internal experience of hearing. Or we might experience thoughts as images. I didn't think I thought with images until I started meditating. Then I began clearly recognizing this. I think one of the first times this was really clear, I was sitting meditating and I saw this image of being in a place I was traveling, seeing the detail of this building, this place that I was at, and recognizing, "Oh, that's a thought. That image is a thought."

So thoughts actually can come in through any of our sense modalities. We can experience thinking through the avenue or inner sense of hearing or seeing, and sometimes even smelling. I've experienced that rarely, but it has happened. And there also can be a kinesthetic experience of thinking. This one I knew from being a dancer. I was a dancer when I was younger, and when I closed my eyes to envision the dance, I would feel it—as if the body were doing it. That's a kind of thinking.

Sometimes it can be useful or interesting to step back from the content of the thinking and recognize how the thinking is happening—what the sense modality is. For myself, I would acknowledge this with a light note. Instead of simply acknowledging it as "thinking," I would acknowledge it as "seeing" or "hearing." I knew I wasn't really seeing or hearing in the external sense, but it seemed helpful to recognize that this was thinking happening in a particular modality. So it's a recognition of thinking as process—how the mind is thinking rather than what the mind is thinking about.

To me, this particular way of acknowledging thinking seems most easy and most appropriate when there's not a lot of emotional content or stickiness to the thinking. Although sometimes it can actually help to diminish the stickiness if we acknowledge, "Yep, this is just the mind thinking through this, telling myself a story."

There's a particular kind of thinking that most meditators stumble into at some point, and that's the almost dreamlike experience. You're not asleep because you're not falling over, but the mind is in this kind of state where it's producing dreamlike images—random, almost nonsensical images. Those I find really useful to acknowledge with the recognition of seeing: "Seeing" or "Images are happening." And again, in the exploration of this as a process, we don't have to stop it. We can simply know that it's happening.

Last night I talked about beginning to recognize states that we habitually get lost in—spaciness, sleepiness, fogginess, dullness. This dreamlike state is one of those that the mind can be very relaxed and receptive to, but not quite present. The state itself is not inherently non-mindful. It's more of a habit of not being mindful. And so the gentle recognition of "Oh yeah, images are happening" can shift something. Then you may begin to be able to recognize or touch into the state of mind—the soft, relaxed state of mind that is happening in conjunction with those dreamlike images.

One last piece I want to share about thoughts in terms of exploring with curiosity, investigating thought: this is again part of exploring the process of thinking—to begin to recognize the conditioned nature of thinking.

One of the easiest ways to recognize this is to notice the pattern between emotions and thoughts. Thoughts arising in the mind can generate an effect in the experience of the body. The thought arises, and then there's how that thought lands. That's a really interesting exploration. Thinking's happening—how is the body responding to that? Noticing the conditioning nature of that process in the mind.

A thought arises. You're sitting, minding your own business, and a thought arises—not random, because thoughts are not random—perhaps about a friend or a partner. That particular image or memory is about a time where there was a charged experience between the two of you. What happens? That thought has arisen, and then often the body and emotional tone respond. Those emotions, that charge—again, the conditioned nature of thought.

And thought can also be conditioned by emotions. An emotion can arise, a feeling based perhaps on some experience of the body. A pain in the body can arise, and then there's a little bit of resistance, a little bit of aversion, and then the mind starts thinking about it. Again, the conditioned nature of thought.

Just noticing this as a pattern, independent of the content—this is how the thought-emotion-thought cycle happens.

Sometimes too we can notice that sense impressions will generate or condition thoughts. We hear something—the sound of a bird. We recognize it as a bird. Then we may notice that recognition itself is a subtle kind of thought. That perception, that recognition, can be understood as a subtle kind of thought. It may be seen as an image of a bird, or the mind may say "bird," may actually name it without your doing the naming. That's a thought arising. And then we might start thinking about the bird. What kind of bird is it? Is it that kind or that kind? So the arising of a sense impression can also be how the process of thinking unfolds.

Some curiosity around the process of thinking.

So let's settle in to the experience. Thoughts are going to happen most likely during the sitting at some point. I'm not going to lead or guide a particular meditation around exploring thought, but as you're practicing, as you're sitting, when you notice that thinking is happening...

Be curious about it in these ways that I've described. If there's a content or an emotional tone to it, notice the emotion that's connected with it. Perhaps notice the content, the flavor of the content, or maybe notice the modality—how the thinking is happening.

So connect to your experience and allow the body to relax. Maybe there's a sense of allowing the mind to relax. I often find it helpful to see if there can be a relaxation deeply, more deeply inside the body. Perhaps the inside of the throat can relax. Maybe the heart can relax. Maybe the stomach and the intestines can relax.

And if you are using an anchor for your attention, allow the experience of the anchor to come to you, settling back and receiving that home base experience—body, hearing, breath.

And when you notice, as you inevitably will at some point, that thinking is happening—or that you're waking up and thinking has been happening—bring some curiosity to noticing that experience of thinking.

CHAPTER 159

Practicing Compassion

Andrea Fella · 52 min

In this guided meditation and teaching from a retreat for experienced students, Andrea Fella offers an in-depth exploration of karuṇā, the brahmavihāra of compassion. She explains how compassion arises naturally when the caring, connected quality of mettā encounters suffering—the heart's flavor shifts from loving-kindness to compassion when we are present with another's struggle without resistance.

Fella describes the distinctive quality of compassion as a "quivering of the heart"—soft, open, and accompanied by a natural wish to act and alleviate suffering. She addresses the challenge of practicing compassion when action isn't possible, emphasizing that the simple act of being present with someone's suffering without resistance can itself be profoundly supportive. The talk explores how compassion practice educates the mind about wholesome motivation, showing us that action can arise from wisdom and care rather than solely from greed or aversion.

The formal practice is presented with practical guidance: beginning with someone experiencing struggle who isn't too close to us, then extending to ourselves and all beings. Fella discusses working with the phrase "may you be free from this suffering" and offers alternatives for challenging situations, such as terminal illness. She addresses the apparent contradiction between wishing for freedom from suffering and accepting impermanence, suggesting we can hold both truths simultaneously. Drawing from her personal experience of first recognizing self-compassion arising through mindfulness practice, she encourages practitioners to remain curious about their embodied experience rather than looking for a particular feeling.

Today in our Brahma Vihara practice we'll explore the practice of compassion.

The other day Sally pointed to the connection between the various Brahma Viharas. The basic quality of care, of connection, openheartedness, kindness, friendliness—that's the quality of metta. And it underlies the quality of compassion, the quality of mudita, of sympathetic joy. When that caring heart, that experience of being present, connected, caring, feeling the sense of kindness, when that caring heart is in the presence of suffering, the flavor of the heart will have the flavor of compassion. And when that caring heart is experiencing or in the presence of delight or joy or appreciation, the flavor of that heart becomes empathetic, sympathetic, appreciative joy.

The shift in the formal practice of compassion is that we begin not just exploring the connection with our benefactor, our dear friend, the neutral person. In the metta practice, we're exploring the connection and opening the heart to connect, to have that sense of caring. In the compassion practice, we actively turn towards suffering. We bring the suffering of the beings that we're connecting with into our minds and explore how the heart is in relationship to this being who is suffering.

This can be a challenging practice in some ways in that we're actively turning towards suffering. With some beings this arises naturally—one question the other day mentioned that with the neutral person, the experience of the pandemic and how much suffering there is, just as we open to that connection, the mind naturally turns towards the feeling of compassion.

That's the exploration we're connecting with. The feeling of compassion has that connected quality, but it also is not resisting that suffering is happening. It's open. The feeling is one of openness and not pulling back, not barricading oneself from the suffering.

The phrase sometimes used to describe the experience of compassion—I don't know where this came from, but the first person I heard using it is Jack Kornfield—is "the quivering of the heart." The heart is soft, not hard, and it has this quivering quality to it. It comes with this wish to act to alleviate the suffering. Compassion has a very active quality to it. It comes with the movement to want to help, to want to do something to alleviate the suffering.

This is a beautiful feeling, that movement of wishing to do something. It can be that we experience it as frustrating when we aren't in a position to be able to act, when we can't actively do something to alleviate the suffering of that being. And yet what I come back to sometimes is remembering that the act of offering this wish for compassion is a form of action.

Being in the field with somebody who is suffering, when you are not resisting that suffering, when you're able to be with it and hold it—there's a way that can be felt as a great support.

I got a taste of this at one point. I was sitting with a friend who, we were just out at a park doing some qigong, and then we sat down to have a conversation, and my friend had a memory come up of something from a long time ago that created some distress. I said, "Well, I'm happy to sit here with you." And he said, "I don't know what to say." I said, "You don't have to say anything. I can just sit here with you while you're feeling whatever you're feeling." And I was not at all resistant to what was going on. Actually, I wasn't practicing compassion per se. I was practicing awareness, just being with myself, being with my friend.

A couple days later, my friend came back to me and said, "What were you doing?" He asked me, "Were you sending metta?" I said, "Well, no, I was just being there. I wasn't actively sending metta." And he said, "It was amazing."

So even just our presence, even just that openhearted willingness to sit in the field when somebody is suffering, that can be an action. Don't underestimate the power of that. It's quite lovely, quite beautiful to be one who can witness suffering without resistance.

There can also be this movement to do. And when we have that possibility, action may follow very naturally. It's a beautiful thing actually to taste that motivation coming from such a wholesome quality—to taste the feeling of wanting to do something, to act, to engage in the world that's not coming from greed or aversion, but coming from wholesomeness. This really gives our mind an education and helps the belief, the view that usually comes embedded with greed and aversion, that says, "I'm the only reason you do anything." Those states of mind think they have a lock on action in our lives, that they're the reasons why we act.

But when we get the taste of compassion and the feeling of the motivation that comes with it, we viscerally learn that different place action can come from. Action can come from wisdom, from love, from care.

And it begins to de-condition that belief embedded in the midst of anger and greed.

In terms of the formal practice of compassion, for myself, the formal practices of the Brahma Viharas were initially quite challenging. The way in for me was really the mindfulness practice—beginning to simply be with experience and cultivating the allowing of everything, the happy things and the difficult things. That began to open the heart to being able to be with suffering, to being able to be with joy, without fighting anything, without holding on to anything.

The practice of mindfulness does cultivate these qualities. It's not really a separation from the Brahma Viharas; it's just a different way in. Are we more actively aiming the mind, inclining towards metta, compassion, sympathetic joy? Or are we working through the allowing quality of mindfulness?

The formal practice of compassion unfolds in a similar way that the metta practice does. We choose beings from various categories and explore the possibility of having that connection—feeling that personal connection to a being and exploring the possibility of wishing them to be free from their suffering. In that connection, we are also orienting towards whatever way they might be suffering or struggling.

For a dear friend, we might know specifically what they're suffering about, a particular thing they're struggling with. And as we've said in the metta practice, we don't have to pick the most difficult thing. We don't need to choose the friend with the most challenging situation at the beginning of our compassion practice. We could pick somebody whose struggle is lighter, where there's just a little bit of difficulty.

When we shift to the neutral person, we don't have the specifics, but we can know—just as Sally said the other day with the neutral person in metta—that they have the human experience. They have friends and family, and they also have human losses. This person too has their ups and downs, those moments of struggle. With compassion practice, as we connect with a being, we actively remember the struggles that happen with that being. This is counterintuitive in some ways, but this is where compassion is sparked. Compassion is sparked in conjunction with meeting suffering. We cannot ignore suffering when exploring the active cultivation of compassion practice.

The place to begin, the easy being for this particular category, is someone who is suffering but who is not necessarily the closest person to you. Sometimes it can be someone who cannot help themselves—a child in distress, for instance, who doesn't know how to help themselves. There's a very natural movement of heart when we see a child in distress, a wanting to do something to help, to support them. That's the flavor of compassion, and that's a place to begin.

The first being we would begin with is someone who is in distress but whom we're not that close to, because when we get close to somebody, the reactivity can intensify. We start wherever it's easiest to cultivate the quality without having extra things to deal with. When we're working with somebody close to us, often fear comes up—fear about what happens to me if that problem doesn't get solved—or there's resistance about knowing their suffering. These are the additional things we have to work with ultimately in compassion practice.

As with the metta practice, where I used the analogy of the washing machine pulling what's not metta out into the wash, similarly with compassion practice, as we orient to meeting suffering, the compassion is the quality that is not resistant to suffering, that is able to fully open and connect to it. What we'll see as we do compassion practice is all the reasons why we don't want to do that. That's how the practice works—it pulls those things out.

It pulls out pity, that quality of "oh, poor you," that subtle aversion that isn't a true connecting. It can pull out cruelty on the other side, the sense of "well, they must deserve it if they're suffering this much." These are the resistances in the way of compassion.

So we proceed as we would with metta. We bring a being into our mind, and when we do this together, we'll start with someone you know—but perhaps aren't that close to—who is having some kind of struggle in their lives. Then we could move to the dear friend, the benefactor, ourselves, the neutral person, the difficult person, and then to all beings.

We're not going through all the categories today. We'll have just this one day with compassion practice, so you're going to get the flavor of it. We'll work with the easy being, then ourselves, and then all beings.

The phrase we use is expressive of the wish of compassion: May you be free of this suffering. That's the basic phrase, the basic wish. Sometimes we might have some struggle with that phrase, especially if we're offering it to somebody with a terminal illness, where we know they only have so long left in their lives, and we may be thinking of "may you be free of the suffering" as "may the cancer be gone."

We know that this is not possible, that this is the course of their illness. And so sometimes we can resist that phrase. At times it can be useful perhaps to use an alternative form, something like "may you hold your suffering with ease," or "I care about you with your suffering." Those are some alternative phrases that you could play with.

But I also want to point out that the wish for compassion is actually the wish regardless of the reality of the situation, regardless of whether the cancer or the illness could go away. The wish of compassion is the wish that they have freedom from that suffering. I sometimes connect with that by almost asking myself the question: if I had a magic wand and I could have that illness disappear, would I do that? Yes. That's the wish we're connecting to.

That wish—that all beings be free of suffering—does kind of run up against the reality of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable phenomena. But it doesn't invalidate the wish. We think it might. We might think it would invalidate the wish, that I shouldn't have that wish given the unreliability and uncontrollability of the world, that the wish is not valid. But the wish is the deepest wish of "may it be gone." That is the wish of compassion.

And so holding both of these truths—the wish, the deep wish that that suffering be completely alleviated, and understanding the truth of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable—part of the compassion practice is holding these two together. Opening the heart to hold both at the same time.

So let's settle into a posture that feels comfortable and relaxed, taking some time to connect with the body and relaxing the body. Perhaps allowing the attention to gently coalesce around the area of the heart, taking in whatever the experience is there in this moment. Sometimes at this point I just have a sense of breathing through the heart, almost letting the breath be like a gentle massage in that area.

Bring your attention to connect with a being, someone you know who's having a little bit of struggle in their lives. Recognize the struggle. And as you explore that, connecting and recognizing the struggle, how is the heart? What happens to the heart as you connect to that struggle? Whatever happens—you may feel a quivering, you might feel that flavor of the quivering, you might feel a little pulling back—just allow that to be what it is.

However your heart is, connect to the intention of wishing they have freedom from that suffering. May you be free from this suffering. And how is it to have made that wish? Really, in an embodied way, checking in. Expressing that wish. May you be free from this suffering. What happens, particularly in the area of your heart, as you make that wish?

There is just this one phrase with the compassion practice. You're welcome to shift the phrase if it's supportive for you: I care about your suffering. May you hold your suffering with ease.

Sometimes I find with the compassion practice, with a single phrase, it's a little bit easier to really just connect with the experience that happens with the wish. I'm not needing to rush to get through multiple phrases. Connect with the being and their struggle. Offer the wish. And connect with how it feels to make that wish. Taking your time.

And remember that what's opposite, or what's in the way of that wholehearted wish for them to be free from that suffering—it's natural for that to come out. Can that be just in the field? Keep exploring the wish.

If the reactivity gets overwhelming, you could let go of exploring compassion for a moment and bring the easiest being with metta into your heart. Give yourself some time with that quality of connecting and caring with an easy being. I'll give you some time to play with that for the next few minutes with this easy being, offering them the wish of freedom from their struggles.

Now I'd like to invite you to connect with yourself. Taking yourself in as you are in this moment. Opening your heart to just how you are right now.

Turning compassion towards ourselves, again, we need to orient to some area of struggle, of unease, of stress. Perhaps there could be something slight in the moment—a slight difficult body sensation, or perhaps there could be a little bit of resistance to the practice of compassion. So holding yourself with this, whatever the flavor of unease is, and expressing the wish for yourself: May I be free from this suffering. May this suffering release.

In practicing self-compassion, if there's any resistance that comes up, or holding, or pushing and pulling that happens around the practice itself, that can be included. This too. May there be ease with this. May there be release of this suffering. May this release. May there be freedom from this suffering.

And remembering to check in: How does it feel to make that wish?

If it feels too challenging to offer this wish for yourself, you're welcome to step back to where it's easier again—the first being that we explored. See if you can hold that wish for freedom from suffering for another being for a few minutes, then come back to exploring it for yourself again, opening the heart to this wholesome wish that we ourselves be free of suffering. It's okay to have that wish.

Now, shifting towards an opening of this wish for freedom from suffering, allowing the mind to expand to take in other beings. In a shift to all beings, sometimes I find it helpful to just open the mind and let whoever wants to come in and have that wish expressed to them. Let them show up. May you too be free from your suffering.

Allowing a relaxation of a focus on a particular being and a sense of expanding—first to beings you may know, beings in your household perhaps, or around you. May you be free of suffering. Maybe expanding a little further to beings in your neighborhood that you see on walks. It can be helpful to let these images of beings just pop in, and as images come in, just wishing them that: May you be free from suffering. Knowing that all beings have their struggles.

Relaxing as you open. Opening out to express the wish for all beings. You can use that phrase: May all beings be free from suffering, distress, unease.

And remembering that you are one of all beings. Perhaps you can reflect that you're a recipient of the wish from everyone else, as well as a recipient of your own wish for freedom from suffering. May all beings be free from distress and unease.

As you open out in this way, if particular beings appear, give them a little extra wish. You too.

You can get creative with the compassion practice, like we've been encouraging with the metta practice. It can be helpful sometimes to bring in some support of friends and benefactors to send compassion with you, or sometimes to be surrounded by dear ones who you know wish you well, and explore receiving compassion for yourself, opening to that possibility.

The experience of compassion has a soft quality to it. The heart does not feel hard or constricted at all. But it does have that quivering flavor to it.

When I first felt a real sense of self-compassion, it was a little bit odd. In that first experience, I was suffering a lot at that point. There was something going on that was really hard. Life was pretty challenging.

And as I was going out to try to do something to take care of a situation, there was this funny feeling. I was just being aware, but there was this very funny feeling in my body. And I thought, what's that? Sometimes something feels like it's wrong—something feels wrong. But I just decided, well, let's just see what it is. What is that feeling?

And actually, when I fully opened to it and fully allowed it, it came to me that what this is is self-compassion. The self-compassion acknowledges fully that something is hard. It takes that in, it's available to know that something is hard, and it feels that difficulty, it feels that suffering fully—but it's not resistant to it.

When I recognized that the quality I was feeling was self-compassion, tears sprang to my eyes. I had not really felt that for myself before—both the feeling fully the suffering and the wish to be free of it at the same time. It felt very impersonal in a way.

I share this because I had all these ideas about what it might feel like when it finally appeared. And in my own practice, a lot of the qualities of the brahma viharas began appearing in the mindfulness practice first. Then I began to understand them and could start to cultivate them, start to get a sense of them. So that was my doorway, that was my way in.

Sometimes in practicing these teachings, in practicing the practice of compassion, really opening to what is here—rather than looking for something, looking for some particular experience or some particular flavor to be there—that exploration becomes the teaching itself. In my own experience, that exploration of "what is this feeling that feels like something is wrong?"—I wouldn't have turned to that saying, "Well, that's compassion." It was really just opening to "what is this?" Just the curiosity: what is this feeling? And it showed itself to me as compassion.

The encouragement to land with your experience, your embodied experience in the compassion practice, is an invitation to see how the heart is responding without any judgment whatsoever. And it will reveal these things that are in the way of compassion too.

Mindfulness of Difficult Mental States (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h05

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers profound guidance on working skillfully with difficult mental states, drawing from the Four Noble Truths and her own extensive experience with patterns like self-hatred and depression. She reframes the understanding of dukkha not merely as suffering but as the unreliable, impermanent nature of all experience, and emphasizes that meeting reactive habits with mindfulness transforms hindrances into the path itself.
> Fella introduces the naturalist metaphor for meditation practice—sitting still enough that the nature of mind reveals itself without interference. She explores multiple layers of investigation: noticing what's obvious, feeling how emotions manifest in the body through specific sensations, and touching into the broader, more diffuse interoceptive landscape of emotional experience. This pervading quality, she notes, often has a shifty, Milky Way-like character that can be unfamiliar territory for practitioners.
> Particularly valuable are her practical tools for working with recurring patterns: simply tracking whether a state is present or absent, caught or not caught; broadening awareness to include all sensory experience rather than magnifying the difficulty; and knowing when to kindly redirect attention to something neutral like the feet. She shares how deep insight arose for her right in the midst of self-hatred, revealing that even our most challenging states can be doorways to understanding the constructed nature of all mental experience.

It's quite something, what we're doing together. It's a rare thing in this world to be privileged enough to sit in a community, to participate with a community interested in understanding ourselves with the aim of lessening suffering in the world—to be curious about our own participation in that suffering and how exploring our own minds reveals our involvement in it.

This serves as a reflection of the tendency of the human mind to get involved in struggle: in greed, wanting things to be a certain way; in aversion, wanting things to be not a certain way; in confusion, thinking that having things a certain way will lead to lasting happiness for more than just a split second.

So I appreciate your commitment, your engagement with this. It is not easy to look internally at the way our own human minds get up to what they get up to. And the hope, the direction of freeing our own minds, even in small ways, from patterns and habits of greed, aversion, and delusion, will have an effect on the world. Because just like anger and hatred are contagious—when there's anger, it often gets met with anger, that mirroring being such a human tendency—that mirroring also operates with love and compassion and wisdom and joy. Cultivating the diminishment of the reactive and the growth of the beautiful will tend to expand beyond our own hearts and minds to those that we meet.

So thank you for what you are doing. It is an amazing thing. I appreciate that you are doing it. Sometimes when we're in the midst of this kind of work, we get so involved in the details of our own habits and patterns that we forget to appreciate the amazing value it has, not only for ourselves but for the world. It can be useful to remember that value, to appreciate yourselves. Even as you may be struggling with something, even as it may feel challenging, the very connection with that struggle is a beautiful thing.

Today I'd really like to explore that meeting of challenge. We've talked about it in a number of different ways. Bhante and Anushka in particular—Bhante spoke about the hindrances, and this morning Anushka talked about working with emotions, especially some challenging ones. I'd like to elaborate a little more on ways to work with challenge, much of this drawn from my own experience.

The Buddha taught the Four Noble Truths. The first is the truth of suffering: that we tend to struggle, to react to things as they are. There is suffering—this is the truth of suffering.

The second noble truth is the truth of the arising of suffering. Sometimes this is translated as the origin of suffering or the cause of suffering, but the word can also be understood as "arising." The teachings say that craving is essentially—the way I read this—that with the arising of craving is the arising of suffering. It's a slightly different framing than "craving causes suffering," which makes it sound like craving isn't itself suffering. But with the arising of craving, suffering is there. That's a way that noble truth can read: with the arising of craving is the arising of suffering.

The third noble truth is the ending of that craving, which is the ending of suffering. There is an ending of suffering. The truth of the cessation of suffering—the cessation of craving is said to be the cessation of that suffering.

And there is a path leading to the ending, the cessation of suffering, the cessation of craving: the Eightfold Path. Essentially what we're teaching here, all the tools and practices we're exploring, are found in the Eightfold Path. We're practicing the Eightfold Path here in all that we do.

The Buddha encouraged us not just to take these truths as something to be believed, but he gave us actions associated with each of the Four Noble Truths. He said the truth of suffering is to be understood. The truth of the arising of suffering—the craving, with the arising of craving being the arising of suffering—the craving is to be abandoned. The ending of suffering is meant to be realized, directly experienced. And the path, the Eightfold Path, is meant to be cultivated, developed.

Winnie the other day talked about how the Eightfold Path weaves back and supports the Four Noble Truths—there's a kind of feedback loop there. If we think about these actions we're encouraged to undertake with respect to each of the Four Noble Truths, to understand suffering, then the tools in the Eightfold Path are means to understanding suffering. The engagement with and development of the Eightfold Path will support the understanding of suffering, will support the letting go, the release, the abandoning of craving, and will support the experiencing, the recognition, the realization of the ending of suffering.

The Eightfold Path provides the tools, the practices we use to engage with those first three noble truths. So this first noble truth: understand suffering.

Our whole path could be this, in a way. Just this one truth. If this teaching were all that we explored, it would take us a very long way. And so that's the emphasis for this evening—to talk about how we can understand suffering, how we can understand understanding in this way, the understanding that is referred to in this First Noble Truth.

This is not about intellectual understanding. It really is pointing to an experiential understanding. Understanding what's arising in this present moment. Is it suffering?

There are ways that the teachings point to everything that arises as suffering, in the sense that everything that arises is unreliable. That's another translation for the word dukkha. We often translate dukkha as suffering, yet it can also be translated as unreliability. And so there are times when the teachings seem to say that everything that arises is dukkha. My understanding is that what this means is that there is nothing that arises that's reliable as a place for lasting happiness, because it is impermanent, falling away, changing.

As we have said several times over the last few days, there's nothing out there that we can hold on to that will make us happy, that will be that lasting happiness. And so in that sense, everything that arises is dukkha. Everything that arises is unreliable. Everything that ceases is unreliable experience. Just unreliable experience arising and passing away.

And we get in there and mix it up, try to hold on to it, try to push it away, try to figure out how to create a particular flavor of conditions so that we can feel happy for a little while. Then it falls apart and we get frustrated. What did I do wrong? It's either my fault or somebody else's fault. Must be because everybody else seems to figure out how to be happy but me.

The resistance to the unreliable nature of experience, the impermanent unreliable nature—the confusion in our minds about thinking there would be something out there that's reliable—that's where another kind of dukkha, the experience of suffering, comes in. And this is often in the realm of our reactive habits and patterns, habits and patterns based in greed, in aversion, in delusion.

So we explore: what is the experience when we are experiencing struggle, stress, frustration? What is the experience of that? The Buddha pointed us to the meeting of that as being the path.

We've also said this a lot: the word hindrance sounds like, and does, when those states of mind are operating in their own nature, when they are running the show for us—they are hindering our capacity to settle. But when we meet them with mindfulness, when we meet any reactive habit or pattern, any stress or suffering with mindfulness, it's no longer in the way of the path. It is the path.

I've heard my colleagues say this over and over again, and it bears repeating: these difficult patterns, when they arise and can be seen and met with mindfulness, with wise mindfulness, with the perspective that Winnie spoke about—the wise view and wise intention—whatever arises is our path.

And it's not always easy to meet whatever arises. I've spent—I don't even know how many years now, twenty-some years doing this—and it's not easy. But I will tell you, it is worth the trip. It is worth the ride.

One thing I'll say: we often explore working with difficulty, using tools or an antidote, for example, something that takes our attention away from it at times. Sometimes we do have patterns in our experience that feel very strong, and it can be useful to use some of the tools we know to settle that or turn our attention away. I'll talk about some of those this evening.

But sometimes we can jump to those tools too quickly and not give ourselves the opportunity to explore whether we might be able to meet it with mindfulness. The idea that something is too strong, the idea—if you've ever had the thought, for instance, "I'm too sleepy to be mindful." Anybody had that thought? I see a few willing to raise their hand. "I'm too sleepy to be mindful."

I would just like to propose that if you're having that thought, you're already aware that you're sleepy. That awareness is already there. So give yourself a chance. We have more capacity than we give ourselves credit for sometimes.

I'd like to offer a few things I've found useful in exploring how to work with difficulty, how to find a balanced mind amidst difficulty. These approaches have helped in my own practice to expand the terrain, we could say, where mindfulness can go. So that thought of "I'm too X—I'm too sleepy, I'm too angry, I'm too frustrated, I'm too anything to be mindful"—that thought can be met with the confidence that mindfulness can meet any experience.

Perhaps not always. There are times when whatever is arising, the momentum or the power of the reactivity can be stronger than our capacity to be mindful. And so there's some wisdom that we have to cultivate about whether mindfulness can meet this. But give yourself a chance to check it out. We'll talk about that a little bit too.

I would say that one key tool in my own toolkit around working with difficulty is the confidence that mindfulness can meet any experience. Whether or not I have that capability in this moment, it is possible. And so that gives me the confidence to play with it, even for a few moments, to play with that possibility of meeting something with mindfulness.

This evening I'd like to primarily explore meeting difficult emotions, reactive habits and patterns, difficult mental experience. Often with some of our really charged mental experiences, they feel like they come in layers. A lot of different pieces coming together. Beliefs about things, old emotions coming up, emotions that get woven together. It sometimes can just feel like a big ball of a mess.

So one of the things that can be really helpful is to start with a sense of curiosity. Often the old reactive habits and patterns are coming out of deep and old conditioning, often from family, childhood situations with playmates or family members, or trauma that happened all through our lives. All of that participates in some of these patterns.

And so the curiosity is not about thinking "how can I get rid of this?" Again, the idea is that whatever is arising, this is the path. The mindfulness of this is how the learning develops, how the wisdom grows, how we begin to understand that craving is suffering. That the arising of craving is the arising of suffering. It's not something that is a block to the progression on the path.

Myself, I've worked with a lot of self-negativity, self-hatred being one of the big ones for me. And I remember on one three-month retreat, it was coming up quite a lot. At one point, I just kind of thought—and this was delusion—I thought, "Oh well, I guess I don't learn anything. I guess I just have to deal with this. I'm not going to get enlightened on this retreat." That was the idea that somehow the self-hatred was blocking the development or growth of wisdom.

But fortunately I was willing to work with it. And to my surprise, at one point, there was really deep seeing of the impermanent, unreliable nature of the arising of that self-hatred. Right in the midst of seeing self-hatred there was really clear understanding. And that moment was a powerful moment in my practice to help me have the confidence and the sense of, yes, I want to meet these habits and patterns. It's not like they're in the way. Deep understanding can arise in the midst of seeing self-hatred. I didn't have to wait until the self-hatred was gone and I'd had a long time to settle in concentration with no hindrances arising for weeks. Right in the middle of self-hatred, deeply seeing the impermanent, unreliable nature of the thoughts that were generating it.

So that's a little pep talk. Go for it.

Curiosity is one helpful tool. Can we be curious about these habits and patterns? It can also be helpful to remind ourselves of some of the wise view that Winnie talked about the other day. This is the framework for our mindfulness practice—wise view.

"This is nature." This is a really helpful framing for the experience. This is nature. This framing comes from one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, and my understanding of what he's pointing to with that language is that what's arising in this moment is a natural arising. It's arising based on causes and conditions, things that happened in the past. It's arising based on what's arising right now in the present moment. It's arising based on how I'm relating to it in the present moment. What's growing right now, what's arising, what's coming into being right now—it's nature. A relationship of cause and effect unfolding in this moment.

Just reminding ourselves of this can be helpful. Sometimes I frame this to myself as, "Well, of course this is arising." When I got to the point where I could say that about self-hatred—"of course this is arising, look at the history, look at the conditioning, look at what happened and how the mind related to it in my history, of course this is arising"—instead of feeling somehow like I was to blame for it arising or I was responsible for it arising.

That recognition—that it was nature—really allowed a lot more possibility for just being able, or willing, to witness it. "Oh, yeah, self-hatred is arising right now. This is what it feels like. This is what's happening with it." So sometimes just that framing, if you're working with something challenging: "This is nature. This is causes and conditions. Of course this is arising. I'm bringing curiosity to it."

With curiosity, with a sense of willingness to explore experience with mindfulness, then we're in the terrain of investigation. Looking at, exploring, meeting experience as it shows itself.

Often with these really reactive habits and patterns, with all of those layers and complexity, sometimes we think we've thought our way through it a little bit. For me with the self-hatred, I had kind of thought my way through it: "Well, you know, probably this has to do with those situations, and it's got to do with this thing that happened. So there must really be that thing underneath it." I had kind of thought my way through it, and sometimes when I sat down to practice, I was like, "Let me find that thing in the middle"—rather than asking, "What's presenting itself this time around as self-hatred arises?"

That approach—"What's here with this pattern that's arising?"—embraces the big mess of it. Sometimes I think about these big habits and patterns as being this huge, wound-up ball of a mess. And rather than trying to pull it all apart and figure out all the threads and pieces wound up in there, it's like, with really wide arms, can I just hold the whole thing? Just meet that, whatever is showing up in this moment. What's here? What's obvious about this experience right now?

We might be making assumptions about what's happening in the middle, and those thoughts will arise, those ideas: "I really think there's fear in the middle of this. I've got to find the fear so I can be with the fear, and then the whole thing will fall apart." You hear some greed in that? It's like, okay, well, what is here? What's available?

You can hold those ideas about what might be in the middle—maybe there is fear, maybe. But rather than looking for it—because if you go looking for something, sometimes you'll find it, and the finding of it sometimes happens because we're making it happen—really, hold those ideas lightly. That's a hypothesis, but let's just see what's here. Let's just meet what's actually here. Meeting what's obvious about the whole complex experience.

Sometimes I approach this with an image that I first learned from Gil Fronsdal, though I think it's a pretty common thing for Dharma teachers to talk about, so he probably got it from one of his teachers. Thinking about the practice of mindfulness as being like a naturalist. We are, after all, nature. We are observing nature as we observe our hearts and minds, as we meet our experience with mindfulness. We're observing the nature of a human being.

A naturalist, when they go out in nature, tends to go to the area or kind of nature they're interested in exploring, interested in understanding. So this is about understanding—we're looking at understanding something, understanding a habit or pattern, understanding nature. Going out into nature, they'll find a place to sit in the forest, or in the desert, whatever it is. And they'll just sit and watch what happens.

They may pick their place to sit based on what they're interested in learning about. Maybe they're interested in studying the habitat of a redwood forest—what kind of creatures live there, how do they live, what do they eat, how do they interact? And so that naturalist would put themselves in a redwood forest and just observe. What creatures come out? How do they interact? Where do they forage for food?

The stiller they are, the more they get to see nature in its naturalness—what is wanting to arise. If they're going in and digging holes to see what's living in that hole, they're not going to see how those creatures live naturally.

And there is a place for that kind of science, right? We may cut up a plant, take it back to the lab, put it in the machine, pull it apart, look at the cells. There's a place for that. And there's also a place for seeing the bigger picture and just meeting nature as it shows up.

That comes with stillness for the naturalist—sitting and just being willing to be still enough that nature begins to trust the observer and to show up as it does. Our practice can be like that: non-interfering. The mindfulness can have that quality of not interfering, just allowing what wants to show up. Not digging into that big ball of many layers and threads, but simply asking: what's here? What's most obvious?

There are a few explorations that can be useful in that place, aside from noticing what is obvious. It might be looking a little more closely—as you might sit a little closer to a redwood tree, but then remain in stillness. How does it feel in the body? Anushaya really spoke to this this morning, so I won't go into a lot of detail, but just that curiosity: What is this pattern, this habit? How does it feel in the body? What are the sensations?

Often there's a particular contraction in the stomach, or tension in the shoulders, or clenching in the jaw. There can be very specific sensations associated with, for instance, anger. Anger might have a feeling of pressure and heat rising in the body, tension or clenching in the throat, a tightening in the face, a distortion of the face. We might notice some very specific sensations—things we're familiar with landing with. Particular pressure, particular body sensations.

And then there's another area of experience in the body. I found myself speaking about this in quite a few meetings in the last few days, so I want to bring this in too. There's a broader feeling of the whole—the whole feeling, the whole mess of what's happening right now.

This is a kind of experience that's not so commonly valued or taught in many of our families. I certainly didn't learn it. I learned how to be with pressure on my hands—it's pretty easy to be with certain kinds of sensations, like pressure or contact, hands touching, or a clenching of the jaw. Very discrete kinds of experience, almost like you could draw a line or a circle around a particular area. The contact points of your hips against the cushion or chair or bench, feet on the floor, contact of hands—these are sensations we know how to touch.

Some people also have a sense of what I recently learned a word for in Western psychology: interoception, the internal visceral sense of the body. This I did not have much experience with. And this kind of experience, especially with reactive emotions, has a much broader, more pervading quality. It often doesn't have the sense of something we can draw a line around. It often feels very, very big, kind of wobbly. It doesn't have a lot of familiarity to it sometimes, if we're not accustomed to meeting this kind of experience.

Our awareness can meet specific experience. When we touch our hands together, we can know those sensations. So it's almost like our awareness can narrow down to a very precise focus. Awareness can also be very broad and take in a very broad experience. Sometimes when we go broad with awareness, it takes in a sequence: a sound, then a body sensation, then another sound, then an emotion coming up, then a pressure or a tension. So in a broad awareness, we may be receiving a wider range of experience, but it still has that very precise quality when we experience something—a specific sound, a specific pressure in the knee.

But then there's also this quality of a diffuse, broad, pervading feeling that can be met with a broad awareness. I'll give you an analogy in the field of seeing. If you go out on a moonless night with a dark sky, here at Spirit Rock we can sometimes see the Milky Way when there are no clouds. Seeing the Milky Way is that kind of diffuse experience. The vastness of the Milky Way isn't taken in by focusing on a little part of it. The awesomeness of the Milky Way arises because we're taking the expanse of it in. Our minds know how to meet expansive experience.

Just there's some areas of expansive experience perhaps that we haven't gained familiarity with meeting. And in my own experience, in my own practice, this area of the expanded feeling around emotion was one of those—unfamiliar territory. It can have that Milky Way-like experience. Or maybe even more analogous, like the Northern Lights. I've never personally seen the Northern Lights, but I've seen videos of them, and they kind of shift and change. The Milky Way is apparently static—it's not static, but from our point of view here on Earth, it looks kind of static. Not a lot of change up there. But the Northern Lights do this weaving and intensification of color.

The experience when we meet a broader feeling of our emotions has that kind of quality. Not a lot of stability. Kind of a wobbly feeling. Maybe a slippery experience.

Maybe right now, just as I'm speaking, can you just touch into how you are? One way into this is just whatever you're experiencing—because this isn't just available with emotions, it's actually available all the time. It's maybe a little more obvious with strong emotions. But whatever you're experiencing right now, just taking in, letting yourself settle with how you are—that's a way in. It's like, how am I right now? In the big picture, how am I right now? And how does it feel? Not the precise sensations, but the whole thing. All that's here. How does the whole thing feel? The feeling of it?

There may not be words for it, partly because it can be a pretty shifty, dynamic experience. Sometimes it can be diffuse and vague. Sometimes it can be pervading and strong. So just see if there might be a possibility of touching into the whole, the big picture of how you are in this moment. All that's happening right now.

It often can have a shifty quality—shifting between pleasant and unpleasant and neutral really quickly. It doesn't really land with any one experience too quickly. It can be hard to put words to.

With emotions, this feeling, if we can touch into that place, it can be hard to stay with, maybe partly because we're not so familiar with staying with something so imprecise. And so you can just play with it a little bit, exploring: how is this with the body? What is the whole experience of this with the body? Just see if you can touch it for a few moments. And then just go back again to what's obvious.

But in my own exploration of this particular aspect of emotional experience, as we gain a capacity to rest with it, to land with it, there's a lot of that shifty landscape of the big mess of it that becomes available to be touched. And sometimes so much of our reactivity—our launching out of that into thoughts and justification and reactivity—is coming from that really shifty landscape of experience.

So it may be possible to touch into it. If you gain some sense of being able to meet that broad, diffuse, shifting landscape of an emotion, it can be useful in another kind of investigation. Again, we're talking about investigation of emotions through the body. It can be interesting, while holding that feeling, to just be curious: Anything here want to show up? Anything else want to show up? Anything else available? Not to look for it, but just to be inviting. What else might be participating in this show?

That may begin to touch into some of the deeper patterns or conditioning around the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience.

"Oh, I don't feel safe." Or, "Wow, I'm really vulnerable." Or, "This is not okay." Something may arise with that touching into the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience. And the seeing of it—if it can be held with mindfulness, the seeing of that whole thing can be very healing. Very healing. Bringing a lot of capacity to meeting this kind of difficult emotion.

So mostly I've been talking about just meeting the experience, with a little bit of exploring perhaps a different piece of the experience that may not be so familiar. First of all, what's obvious? How is it in the body? And then this more pervading feeling.

Another exploration that can be really useful around challenging states of mind is checking into how we are in relationship to it. For myself, with self-hatred—self-hatred arising—I carried so much aversion to that self-hatred, so much of a sense that it was a problem that it arose. And that part wasn't being seen. When there was the capacity to see that, to see, "Oh, there's self-hatred, and there's thinking it's a problem"—there's a difference between the challenge, the difficulty, and the relationship to it. And sometimes the relationship to it is really driving the show. The thinking it's a problem to have self-hatred was leading me to certain kinds of exploration about it in order that it should go away. Not the curiosity of, "What is this?" but something else entirely.

And then beginning to see, at times, the possibility of a relationship to it that's more one of curiosity, interest, patience. So these are two kinds of relationships to experience. There might be a relationship of aversion or greed—wanting something to happen, wanting something not to happen. Or there might be an attitude of patience or calm or interest, willingness to be with it, faith, confidence.

When I found that relationship—and that relationship actually comes by seeing the relationships that are in the way—the relationship of ease, of peace, of curiosity, of patience, we get to find that place by noticing that it's not okay. So that same pattern of seeing what's here holds true here. But it has to be seen.

I think often these attitudes or relationships to experience are hidden. They're below our conscious awareness. And so sometimes a little check-in can help. Like, "Okay, this is happening. This pattern, this frustration is happening. What's my relationship to this? How am I with this?" That can be something that, again, not trying to figure it out, but just that little curiosity about—is there a relationship to this? What's the relationship to this? Not trying to find it or figure it out, but sometimes just that invitation. It's more of an invitation. "Any relationship want to show up? Any relationship want to let me know you're there?" That kind of thing.

Sometimes it will show up. And you'll be like, "Oh, that's what's going on. I think this is a problem. I think this shouldn't be happening." Then it becomes something we can be aware of. It becomes something else, like, "Oh, what's going on is that frustration is happening and thinking it's a problem is happening. That's what's going on." And how does that whole thing feel? How is that in the body, that feeling of "it's a problem"?

So there are times when settling back and having this kind of exploration of what's here, what's obvious, isn't so easy. The momentum of the habit or pattern is a lot stronger than our capacity for just being with it. And so I'd like to offer just a few tools here, some things that can support some measure of being with it.

There is, you know, the redirecting of attention away from difficulty, which I'll get to in just a moment. But first, there are a few tools that exist somewhere in between active investigation—that deepening into holding what's here, meeting it, seeing what wants to show up—and simply redirecting attention elsewhere.

Sometimes sitting in nature, the naturalist sitting in nature, a forest fire comes through. You're not going to just sit there. It's like, "Oh, forest fire coming through." You need to do something. So sometimes we do need to take action. There's a middle ground between the forest fire coming through and just sitting quietly.

One tool I've found really useful is quite simple—a simple approach for working with patterns that tend to be ones that come back a lot, ones that repeat. For myself, I kind of stumbled into this tool while working with a repeating pattern of depression. Not a very intense depression, a kind of low-grade depression that was coming up a lot on one retreat.

At some point, I'd been doing a lot of investigation and diving in, but I realized that it was much more supportive for the practice to do something really simple with it. Just to notice—and Bhante mentioned this the other day, actually—just to notice when it's there and when it's not there.

When something's coming up a lot, I wasn't doing a lot of investigation because the mind wasn't able to really settle with it that much. But it was able to know: yep, there it is. Yep, it's there. I could know it was there in an almost very stepped-back, broad way. But also to recognize when it wasn't there. Because with these more pervasive habits and patterns, sometimes we can have a kind of subconscious belief that it's always there. We don't actually notice that it disappears, that we're not living in it constantly.

So that piece of inquiry—is it present, is it not present? Depression present? Not present?—I found there were a lot of times it wasn't present.

Then I began to see that when it was present, there were two distinct experiences. When I could recognize, "Yes, depression is present," there was noticing that depression was present and it wasn't a particular problem. It's like, "Oh yeah, I can know that. Yeah, that's what's happening right now. The mind feels kind of low." Not a lot of reactivity to that experience. And there were times where it felt like it was a problem. Times when I could be aware that it was present and it was just present, or I could notice that it was present and I was caught by it.

So I began just noticing the difference: caught by it, not caught by it. Caught by it, not caught by it. Often when we're caught by it, it's because there's some attitude in the back of the mind that's not clearly seen. So "caught, not caught" was just a simple way of acknowledging there's some attitude there. I don't really know what it is, but it feels like something's off. Caught. Not caught. Not here. Here. Caught. Gone.

In this exploration, through this very simple three-part inquiry—not diving in, not looking in detail—it began to be a very dynamic experience. Depression kind of there, and then vanishing. And then, oh, it would be back. And then I would get caught by it. Sometimes it went really quickly between those states, sometimes more slowly. But when I began to be okay with this pattern of being caught by it, being not caught by it, not there, I began to see just how dynamic it was. That was such a helpful tool. A really simple noticing around it, not a lot of detailed investigation.

Another tool that can be really useful is one that allows something challenging to be present without focusing on it directly. It's not quite going so far as "the forest fire is here and you need to get out," but there's something happening and it feels pretty sticky.

The depression was like this too. I discovered this tool around the depression as well. I just began to realize: well, yeah, the depression is there, but there are thousands of other things going on.

It was as if the mind had taken the depression and made it the biggest thing. I was looking at the depression, just buried in it. But when I took the mind up out of it, I could see that yes, there was a lot else going on right now.

So I consciously brought in a reminder for myself. Seeing is happening. Hearing is happening. I cycled through the senses a little bit. Yes, there's seeing, there's hearing, there's feet on the ground—oh, and there's the depression. And there's seeing, and there's hearing. Just rotating through other experience to remind myself that the depression was not everything in my experience.

Because that kind of magnetizing to the experience makes it explode and become really big. So this is simply putting it back into the context of the entirety of our experience. That can also be really helpful.

And then there are times when we really need to turn our attention away from something, when it's not helpful to try to be with it. I use a rough guideline: if I can be with something with mindfulness, even in this simple way of noticing present or absent, caught or not caught, and it feels like it's staying at about the same level—not amping up when I'm trying to be with it—then I'm still in the terrain of learning with it. But if it feels like the dial gets turned up to ten when I try to pay attention, if it just goes screaming off the scale, that's the time to say, "Yep, not the time. Not the time to be with that."

It's really helpful to cultivate something neutral to let your attention go to. For myself, I often use my feet on the ground. Walking meditation with attention to the feet can be good because there's a little bit of movement happening. I found myself working with this around anger. I would notice the mind getting into anger and it would just get so stuck. If I tried to be mindful of it, I would just get lost in it for long stretches of time.

So when I noticed that was happening, I would bow to that experience. "Yes, I see you, anger. I know you're asking for attention. I'm sorry mindfulness isn't strong enough for you right now, but I'll get back to you. And right now we're going to pay attention to our feet." It was a very kind redirecting of the attention. The kindness there is important, as opposed to, "Can't be with that, gotta go somewhere else." A kind redirecting of attention to something neutral can be really helpful at times, along with some discernment about when that approach is necessary. Is it possible to be with experience?

To end, I want to say what I said at the beginning: working with these difficult patterns and habits is not some kind of lesser practice. It really is where wisdom can grow—right in the midst of something. For me, it's so mind-blowing. Seeing in the midst of self-hatred: this is just a thought. Thoughts being believed and producing this whole show right in front of my eyes. It's just a construction of mind. Seeing not only that this was a construction of mind, but that everything in our minds is a construction of mind. Such deep understanding can happen right in the middle of looking at these difficulties.

Guided Mettā Practice: Neutral Person (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 43 min

In this guided meditation from the month-long retreat at Spirit Rock, Andrea Fella introduces the practice of extending mettā (loving-kindness) to the neutral person—someone we encounter but don't really know, such as a postal worker or fellow retreatee. She explains how the neutral person serves as a representative for the vast majority of beings on the planet with whom we have no personal connection, marking a significant turning point in the progressive expansion of mettā practice.

Andrea offers the evocative image of mettā phrases as a magnet that draws out our resistances to well-wishing, and a washing machine analogy where the phrases act like soap, pulling old habitual patterns into consciousness where they can be released. She notes that some practitioners find the neutral person surprisingly easy to work with due to the absence of complicated history, while others experience dryness or disconnection precisely because there's no personal relationship to enliven the practice.

Practical guidance is offered for working with difficulties: returning to an easier category of being when challenged, shifting phrases from positive statements ("may you be happy") to the negative phrasing found in the original Pāli ("may you be free from distress"), or transitioning to compassion practice. The guided meditation moves progressively through self, benefactor, dear friend, and neutral person, with Andrea emphasizing the embodied dimension of practice—noticing how each wish affects the heart and chest area, rather than keeping mettā as merely a mental exercise.

Today in our metta practice we'll be expanding to another ring of beings. In this expansion, the teachings point to starting with where it's relatively easier and working out towards where it might have a little more challenge. So we start where it may be easier to really feel that connection.

Traditionally it is said that the self is easiest, and in our own culture we've often found not necessarily so. So we begin in this place potentially of what we call self and easy being—someone for whom it's easy to feel that connection. Then we expand out to a dear friend, where there may be a lot of love and a lot of connection and a lot of more spontaneous caring. Yet often in a dear friend category, with someone who is in that relationship with us, there are often rubs. We know them so well, they know us so well, and there are rubs. You know: "Well yes, I love that person, but why did they do that thing?" This brings up some of what Greg talked about as the far enemy potentially, or the near enemy with the dear friend—the confusion between that unconditional love and the kind of reciprocal expectation.

Today we'll be expanding out to what is often called the neutral person. This is someone that we don't know very well, someone who we may have contact with but don't really have much of a relationship with. This kind of represents, in a way, a turning point in our metta practice. We can think that the neutral person is a stand-in for the vast majority of beings on this planet that we don't really know—almost a representative of our relationship to all beings in a specific person.

I find the use of specific people helpful rather than thinking generally of categories, like "all of my dear friends" or "all of the people I don't know." What bringing in a specific individual does is really highlight the relational aspect—what our relationship to that person is and how we feel, what happens when we try to wish that being well.

When we try to wish our dear friends well, we may sometimes just have it flow and feel like, "Yeah, I really want my friend to be happy." And then sometimes we come up with that rub. We're not trying to deny that rub. Perhaps one of the other teachers used this analogy: Guy Armstrong sometimes uses the analogy of metta being like running a metta magnet over our heart. And what does a magnet do? It pulls its opposite. So we can think of this practice of bringing these phrases up, bringing the wishes, the intention towards well-wishing, as being the magnet that will pull out into consciousness our resistances to that well-wishing.

In choosing a neutral person—again, an actual person that perhaps you've seen—it could be somebody here on retreat that you just don't know very well. It could be somebody in your daily life that you've seen a lot: a postal worker or a clerk at the store, somebody that you've seen a lot but don't have a strong relationship with, where there's a feeling of kind of not knowing much about them. Just a neutral kind of feeling there.

As we bring the phrases or the wishes of well-being to a neutral person, often when wishing well for a benefactor or for ourselves or for a friend, we know something about what it would mean for them to be happy or for ourselves to be happy, healthy, safe, and at ease. With a neutral person we don't know the specifics of their lives. On one retreat I did a month-long intensive metta practice here, and I picked a dear friend who's an artist as my dear friend person. I would just envision my friend in her artist studio, knowing that that was a place where she was really happy, and that kind of brought in that quality of, "Yeah, I really hope you have that connection with your art and love and express yourself in that way."

But with a neutral person we don't have that information, so we more explore the well-wishing through what it means to be a human being that might be happy. Just the general happiness of having loved ones around us, the happiness of having people care for us, the safety of having a place to live and having food, the health of being able to take care of ourselves. The connection with these phrases—may you be happy, healthy, safe, and at ease—is more reflecting on the human wishes, the wish for all humans to have that in our just basic human ways, in a way connecting with our shared humanity in this part of the practice.

There are kind of two sides that people sometimes have in their relationships with the neutral person. Some people actually find that the neutral person is their easiest being, precisely because there isn't the complication. It seems simpler in a way to just wish somebody that we don't know, "Yeah, I hope you're happy." For some of us, the well-wishing for a neutral person is a little more challenging because there's not the specificity. It may be harder to connect with those wishes, harder to deeply care about somebody that we don't know. We might find our mind wandering off, getting bored. That's okay. This is part of the filings that are not metta being pulled out by exploring this. So we just notice our relationship.

The practice of metta, these phrases that we offer—may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you be safe, may you live with ease—they are expressions of an intention from our heart, wishing other beings well.

As an intention, the use of a phrase and the connection with that intention means that essentially we're connecting with a thought here. I think of metta practice as a reflective practice. We're bringing thought into our mind and using that in our meditation. So bringing in that thought, we connect it with our embodied experiential level. How does that wish—expressing that wish for that being, "may you be happy"—how does it feel?

Guy Armstrong suggests that having made that wish, we step inward to the heart area, the heart and chest, and simply see how it feels to have made that wish. To me, this was a huge benefit for metta practice, because before that it had mostly been in my mind. I was thinking of it as just a mental practice of saying these phrases. But saying the phrase—how does that thought affect your experience now? Give yourself an opportunity to feel it.

It might be that there's a little bit of an opening, a releasing in the heart. Or it might be that there's a contraction. That's just what we recognize. This is how it feels to make this wish right now. And if you do feel a contraction, just remember: it's the metta magnet doing its job, making these relationships of resistance, of holding on, conscious. Making them available to be released. To be seen and known.

Another analogy I like for the metta practice is that of a washing machine. The clothes we put into the washing machine—maybe they have dirt ground into them. That's what we're putting them in for: to pull the dirt out. We have the water, and then we put the soap in there, and then there's the agitation of the washing machine. The water I think of as our consciousness, our awareness. The soap is the metta phrases. And the dirt ground into the clothes is all of our relationships—the habitual old habits and patterns of relating to people around this relationship of well-wishing.

We put the clothes into the washing machine, turn it on, and it agitates. The job of the soap is to attach to the dirt—it's got a stronger connection. The chemical nature of soap is that it connects to the dirt, so the soap grabs onto it, pulls it out of the clothes, and puts it into the water so that it can be rinsed away when the water goes down the drain.

Similarly, in our metta practice, the metta phrases are like the soap searching out those old habits and patterns that are deeply ground into our minds, pulling them out into our consciousness so they can be washed away. And the repetition of the phrases—it's like that agitation of the washing machine.

I'll say one more piece before we step into practice again today. When there's difficulty in the metta practice—with the neutral person in particular, I mentioned there might be boredom or disconnection or dryness—you just notice that and keep going. It's just, okay, that's the relationship right now. That's what's being pulled out into the wash. Yes, there's a dryness there. Just keep going.

If it gets too challenging, if there's a lot of aversion, sometimes we can just let the aversion come up. It's like the metta is releasing it. On that retreat I mentioned, where I was doing metta every moment that I remembered when I was awake, I was a dishwasher here in the dining room. I was doing the metta phrases as I was doing the dishwashing. And I would see myself get frustrated as the door would stick and the switch wouldn't work very well. I'd find my mind just explode in this aversive state: "Who designed this stupid machine anyway?" May all beings be happy. Not having to hold on to that—just, oh yes, there it is being released. May all beings be happy.

You don't have to necessarily stop as soon as any kind of aversion or difficulty comes up. See if you can just keep going, because sometimes it's just a release into the consciousness. It's the release of the dirt into the water, and it can be washed away.

If it gets more activated, if the aversion begins to gain an upper hand, or the desire begins to gain an upper hand, then there are some useful tools. As we move further along in this practice with different beings, one helpful shift we can make is to go back to a place where it's a little easier. If you're doing the neutral person and you find it's getting really dry and you space out for minutes at a time, it may be useful to come back, bring in the easy being, the benefactor again, and see if you can connect with that quality of well-wishing. Then go back to the neutral person. That's a good first step if you find it too challenging: go back to a category where it's a little easier to feel the connection. Then, of course, you can shift to vipassanā practice for the difficulty.

And another thing that I found useful is to shift the phrases from being stated in the positive—may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you be safe—to being stated in the negative: may you be free from distress, may you be free from illness, may you be free from danger. The same sentiment, just expressed as "may you be free from" rather than "may you have something." Sometimes I've found that's a little bit easier to connect with.

There are two interesting pieces to this. One is that in the Pali, the metta phrases have that quality—the words that are used have that sense of "may you be free from something" as opposed to "may you have something." The other piece is that it's a little bit closer to the compassion sentiment: may you be free from suffering, may you be free from danger, may you be free from illness. That's in the terrain of the compassion phrases.

This is another thing that can be useful if you're struggling with the metta practice. Sometimes you can just shift to compassion. For myself at times, I found the metta practice so challenging. I felt like I had this steel band around my chest—so painful I couldn't even remember the metta phrases. Guy Armstrong, one of my metta teachers, said, "You could just try shifting to compassion for yourself." The phrase there is just one phrase: may I be free from suffering. And that was quite easy to shift to.

So that's another option if it's challenging to work with metta, challenging to work with a particular being. In terms of difficulty: first of all, can you just stay with the phrases and let it come out in the wash? Then there's shifting to an easier being, shifting to vipassana practice, shifting the phrases to the negative phrasing, or shifting to compassion—and potentially compassion for yourself.

We've been doing this for a while now, so we'll start. I'll begin with just a little bit of a reminder about how to settle in, but then as we go, I'll offer a few gentle reminders—now you might want to shift to the next category, now you might want to shift to a dear friend. I won't be saying the phrases continually. There will be much more room for you to explore this in your own way.

Connect to your posture. Find a posture that's comfortable—as comfortable as can be—both relaxed and alert. Let your attention connect in the area of your heart. Just feel whatever is there in this moment.

How are you? That kind of question itself is a kind of metta toward ourselves. How are you right now? As if a dear friend were asking that question and really wanting to know the answer. Not wanting you to cover over anything. How are you right now?

Perhaps reflect on something that you appreciate about your own goodness. If this brings a little bit of a ripple in your mind or feels challenging, I will just offer you my appreciation for your willingness to be here right now. It's a rare, beautiful, and amazing gift to yourself and to the world. So let yourself appreciate that. It's a beautiful quality. We all share this here.

Today we'll begin with self. Allow yourself to connect with some sense of yourself—perhaps the felt sense of yourself sitting here, or an image of yourself. And begin offering these wishes:

May I be happy.

Let yourself feel how it affects the heart and mind to express that wish.

May I be healthy.

May I be safe.

May I live with ease.

Continue for yourself for the next few minutes.

If it feels appropriate for you, bring in an easy being or a dear benefactor—someone who has truly supported you in your life. Let yourself connect with this being, taking a few moments to feel that relationship. I sometimes envision myself standing with the person and simply feeling the energy of being in their presence.

Again, with each being, it's useful to reflect for a moment on something you appreciate about them. Notice how that reflection affects your heart and mind. And begin offering the wishes of well-being to this being:

May you be happy.
May you be healthy.
May you be safe.
May you live with ease.

Continue with yourself or your benefactor—whatever feels most resonant for you in this moment.

And if it feels resonant, allow yourself to bring a dear friend into your mind, to connect with a dear friend. Reflect for a few moments on something you appreciate about this friend, and begin offering them the wishes of well-being.

Now allow the connection with a neutral person, someone you may not know well. It may be a little harder to visualize this person, but see if you can hold them in some fashion in your mind—perhaps recalling places you've seen them.

In terms of appreciation, if it's somebody in your life like a postal worker or someone who works at a store, simply reflect on how that service supports you—that we are all connected, we all support each other in this life. We wouldn't be able to live without this interconnectedness that we share. If it's a person here on the retreat, just recollect that they are doing something here, wiping tables or chopping vegetables. That too is a gift, something to appreciate.

Begin to offer them the phrases of well-being, the wishes of kindness.

At any time, if it feels too challenging to work with this particular person, you're welcome to shift to where it's easier—to your dear friend or easy being, perhaps, or to yourself.

CHAPTER 162

Dependent Co-Arising Part 1 (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h03

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers an accessible introduction to paṭicca samuppāda (dependent co-arising), which the Buddha described as profound, subtle, and hard to understand. Rather than beginning with the challenging early links of ignorance and mental formations, she starts where practitioners can most easily connect with direct experience: the six sense bases, contact, and vedanā (feeling tone).
> Fella traces how each sense impression carries a pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling tone that is itself conditioned by prior experience. When ignorance co-arises with feeling, craving naturally follows—the leaning toward pleasant, away from unpleasant. This craving intensifies into clinging (actually grasping what we want), which gives rise to becoming (the intentions and actions serving our clinging), and finally birth into identification. She illustrates this vividly through her own experience of oscillating between "good yogi" and "bad yogi" identities, showing how these opposed self-concepts are actually interdependent.
> The practical heart of the teaching emerges in her account of watching craving arise and pass during walking meditation—discovering that craving can vanish without getting what it wants, releasing the mind from its grip. She emphasizes that freedom is available at any link in the chain through mindfulness and wisdom, and that simply understanding experience as conditioned, without knowing all the details, can transform our relationship to difficult patterns like self-hatred.

It feels like such a privilege to sit here with you, with a gathering of processes of body and mind interested in getting to know themselves. What an amazing thing.

From this perspective that I have the privilege of being in—witnessing the unfolding of your practice and conversations with some of you, just watching, seeing you move through your day, sitting, walking, eating—I have the sense of the Dharma steeping us all.

I know from the inside, at least in my own experience of these retreats when I was on that side of the hall, sometimes it can feel like we get pretty wrapped up in the details of a particular struggle or stress. Maybe we lose sight of the bigger picture of just the way Dharma works, the gradual nature of the wearing away of greed, aversion, and delusion.

The Buddha talked about this path as a gradual path. One analogy he used was this: He said, as if there were a ship being dragged onto dry land after it has spent months on the sea, saturated with the sea water, the wind, and the waves—all of the parts of the ship saturated by all of that on the sea—and then dragged up on dry land and further saturated by the wind and the sand blowing across it and the sun baking the parts of the ship. He points to how, over time, gradually—and he particularly focuses on the rigging of the ship, the rope—how gradually over time that rope will wear away.

If you think about this analogy, on any particular day, if you look at the rope and then the next day and the next day, it's not going to look like much has happened in terms of the wearing away. But it is inexorably being weakened through the contact with the sun, the sand, the wind, the water. Until one day, maybe a year or two later, you walk up to parts of that ship and pick it up and the rope falls apart in your hand. Maybe you didn't even see the rope wearing away.

This gradual nature of the path—to me it's important to remember that regularly. We don't measure how our practice is doing based on what happened today and whether it was pleasant or unpleasant. Over time—I think it was the Dalai Lama who said—look back five years, ten years and see: Are you kinder? Is there a little less reactivity in your mind? The practice works on us slowly. So it is an exercise in confidence, faith, and patience to walk this path.

On the night of the Buddha's awakening, I found the quote of what is said to have happened in the Buddha's mind. How we know this, don't ask me. But he's telling the story, perhaps, and he says: "Then the thought occurred to me"—telling the story of that night—"this Dhamma that I have attained is profound, hard to see and hard to understand, peaceful, refined, unattainable by mere reasoning, subtle, to be experienced by the wise. But this generation delights in attachment, is excited by attachment, enjoys attachment. For a generation delighting in attachment, excited by attachment, enjoying attachment, this-that conditionality and dependent co-arising are hard to see."

He goes on to say it's also hard to see the relinquishment of acquisitions, the ending of craving—Nibbāna. And it is said he doubted whether, as Greg mentioned last night, there would be anybody who would understand him. But for our great fortune, he did decide to teach.

I'd like to offer some reflections this evening on the teaching he said would be so hard for us to understand: dependent co-arising. This is, as he said, subtle, hard to see, hard to understand, profound, unattainable by mere reasoning. It's not a simple teaching.

There are actually multiple forms of it in the teachings, the suttas, but two key forms of dependent co-arising. One describes the process by which suffering comes to be. We can look at this teaching of dependent co-arising as an elaboration on the second noble truth, the arising of suffering—that with the arising of craving is the arising of suffering. This is a more detailed elaboration on that.

The second form of conditionality described in the suttas is conditionality that describes how our minds move towards freedom. There are conditions that support the mind to see the ending of suffering, the ending of craving, the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion. A set of conditions are described that are cultivated as we walk this path, wholesome qualities that strengthen.

This same process of conditionality—which this evening I'm going to focus on, particularly the part of the teaching that describes how it creates suffering—I want to say at the beginning that this same process in our minds, this "when this arises, that arises; when this ceases, that ceases; with the arising of this is the arising of that; with the cessation of this is the cessation of that"—that simple statement of conditionality doesn't simply take us into suffering. There are processes at work: wisdom, mindfulness, concentration, investigation.

that support the movement of the mind towards release from greed, aversion, and delusion. So that's rather good news—it's not as if this process of conditionality only works to create suffering. It also supports the creation of conditions for release.

There's a famous teaching, or I'd say an interchange, between Ānanda, who was the Buddha's attendant for many years, and the Buddha. Ānanda comes to the Buddha and —you get the impression he's rather excited. He says, "It's wonderful, it's marvelous how profound this dependent origination is and how profound it appears. And yet it appears to me as clear as clear."

The Buddha, knowing that at this point Ānanda is not yet awakened, says, "Do not say that, Ānanda. Do not say that. This dependent origination is profound and appears profound. It is through not understanding, not penetrating this teaching, that this generation has become like a tangled ball of string, covered as with blight, tangled like coarse grass, unable to pass beyond states of woe."

He really points to this: not understanding how the process of suffering is created, not understanding how dependent origination can lead us away from suffering—this is a profound teaching, and through not understanding it, we stay caught. We stay stuck.

So perhaps we have to begin with hearing something about this teaching and begin to recognize some of what he's describing in our own experience.

I would say that the teachings of the Buddha have different flavors to them. Some of his teachings, and much of what we've been offering in this retreat, are instructional in nature—how to practice, how to meet our experience, the teachings on the four foundations of mindfulness. But some of his teachings are descriptive in nature. This one, the teaching on dependent origination applied to how suffering arises, is a description of the habitual nature of our minds. I wouldn't call it exactly a practice. It describes what our minds will do when we're not present.

This process the Buddha described about how suffering is created—it's the tendency of our mind when it is caught by ignorance, when it's caught by not seeing the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. When we don't understand suffering, the arising of suffering, the possibility of the ending of suffering, and the path leading to the ending of suffering—not understanding that, as the Buddha said to Ānanda, we stay caught.

And so he described what happens for us when we remain caught. This teaching is really a description at a very detailed level of what goes on in our mind. It's his recognition, through his own exploration of his own mind, of how suffering comes to be. He described it for us with the hope of helping us understand how we get caught. So this teaching is a very clear description of how suffering happens.

Part of why it's helpful to talk about this is that we can begin to see suffering as a phenomenon that is impersonal, human. Recognizing how these processes work in our mind as he describes them, we might begin to feel a little less identified—less like "it's my fault that I have self-hatred arising," and more like we're beginning to understand that conditions have led to this. And so there's a recognition of the humanness of our patterns of suffering. We're not alone in this process. The Buddha described a kind of archetype of how suffering happens. When we look at our own experience, any particular flavor of suffering, we can start to see these patterns—these archetypal patterns, these human patterns—happening.

This teaching also points out the conditioned nature of suffering. Suffering arises when certain conditions are in place. If those conditions fall apart—and the teachings of the Buddha help us meet our experience in such a way that the conditions supporting suffering begin to fall apart—when those conditions are no longer there, suffering no longer arises.

So the conditioned nature of suffering means it's not destined for our minds. Somebody used the phrase the other day about suffering being optional. Well, in a way it is optional. When we begin to recognize these patterns and habits in our mind with mindfulness and wisdom, we can see that there's a choice, a choice point. We don't just have to follow the habitual tendencies of mind. Mindfulness and wisdom can release those habitual tendencies, and the releasing of them can lead to release from suffering, stress, unsatisfactoriness.

So this chain, this teaching, this description of conditions that lead to the arising of suffering—it describes conditions; we're not locked in some kind of inevitable process. When conditions change, and the practice of wise mindfulness, wise effort, wise concentration, the Eightfold Path, create the conditions for the mind to take the other trajectory that the Buddha pointed to—the trajectory of conditions that lead us away from suffering.

This description of the links or conditions that lead to suffering also describes, and I think this is interesting to know, how the sense of self is created and latched onto. The same process is at work: the creation of identification, the creation of suffering. This is useful for us to remember because sometimes, especially when we start talking about the teaching on not-self, people hear that teaching and think, "I need to find not-self, I need to see through self." But sometimes what's actually present is suffering—that's what's available to be seen, the dukkha of a particular habit or pattern. Looking at the dukkha, looking at the sense of self—sometimes one is more available than the other.

We don't have to think, "I have to see—oh, there's some kind of suffering arising, where's the sense of self in that?" We don't need to find the not-self there. We can simply be curious about the pattern of suffering as it's arising. Sometimes the sense of self is more obvious, more available to be seen. We don't have to find it if it's not there, if it's not obvious, if it doesn't feel accessible. It is there—it just may not be what is easily available to touch into experientially. We may have some concept about it, but the experiential touching into—"Oh, that's that sense of self, that 'turkey feeling' Anushka described the other day"—that's different.

This chain of dependent origination has twelve links, so it's a pretty detailed description of how suffering comes to be. This evening I wanted to explore a portion of this teaching, not trying to go through the whole thing. But I'll state the links now, starting with a kind of statement of this teaching:

With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. With mental formations as condition, consciousness comes to be. With consciousness as condition, mental and physical processes come to be. With mental and physical processes as condition, the six sense bases come to be. In dependence on the six sense bases, there is contact. In dependence on contact, there is feeling. In dependence on feeling, there's craving. In dependence on craving, clinging. In dependence on clinging, becoming. In dependence on becoming, birth. In dependence on birth, old age and death—and therein, the Buddha says, is the entire mass of suffering.

This is also understood as a cyclic process. When suffering is met with habits of mind, with our familiar ways of meeting experience, it tends to lead to more ignorance, and we just go round and round in this cycle. This chain or cycle is said to describe the process of samsara, how we stay caught in suffering. There's also the understanding that if that suffering is met with wisdom, with mindfulness and wisdom, it can lead to faith. It can lead to delight and joy. It can lead to concentration and seeing things as they are—that direction towards freedom from suffering.

So there are points in this process where there can be a shift. Actually, anywhere in this process we can bring mindfulness and wisdom, curiosity to what's happening in this moment.

I'd like to start the exploration of this teaching today not at the beginning, where it starts with ignorance, because those first few links are some of the more challenging to really see in direct experience. Instead, I'd like to start us where it's easier—start the teaching where we really can contact our experience.

We have a body that's conscious, and this body with its consciousness has six sense bases: eyes, ears, nose, tongue, skin, and mind. Because we have this consciousness, the sense bases are contacted by sense impressions. Contact with the sense doors results in sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. Contact with the mind door is the recognition of thought, emotion, mind states—a whole host of things going on in the mind.

This is much of what we've been looking at. Bhante did the exploration on the sixth sense basis, looking at what contact is, what happens with contact. This is the simple impression: we have these senses and there's contact with our senses. Right now you may be noticing hearing. You may be noticing seeing. Body sensation—heat perhaps, or contact points. This is contact. This is the sensitivity of the sense base being contacted by its sense object. Light waves for the eye, sound waves for the ear. The sense object comes in and makes physical contact with our physical sense bases.

So these are the first two links I'm exploring: the six sense bases, and in dependence on the six sense bases, contact. The six sense bases condition contact with the consciousness that's available to receive experience. And contact conditions feeling, the next link.

Greg talked a lot about feeling last night. And as he mentioned, every single sense impression that we have—every sight, every sound, every smell, every taste, every touch, every contact with the mind—has a flavor of a feeling tone. Pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

So we see the deer outside. Contact of that with the senses. There's perhaps a sense of pleasantness there. Doesn't have to be—could be unpleasant. Each of these sense impressions has a feeling tone, and that feeling tone is itself conditioned based on our prior experience. So as Greg said last night, the feeling tone itself is not inherently in the object itself. It partly depends on the conditions in which the object is touching our sense bases.

An example of this might be: maybe you find the taste of milk pleasant after eating a cookie, especially a chocolate cookie. For me, that's true. But if I taste milk after eating a pickle, it is not pleasant. So the pleasant or unpleasant is not in the milk—it's in the conditions. This is a simple example of how different conditions may shape the feeling tone. Greg talked a lot about that last night, so I'm not going to repeat too much of it.

Based on the feeling tone, which is already conditioned based on our prior experience, we tend to respond with the habitual tendency of wanting more pleasant, wanting to get rid of the unpleasant. This is the next link: feeling conditions craving.

I think it's important to recognize that this feeling-conditions-craving link is really leading from feeling to craving. It's conditions, not causal. Feelings don't have to lead to craving, as Greg pointed to last night. They don't have to. Seeing things with mindfulness and wisdom, we may be able to just notice the feeling tone and it not lead onward to craving.

When we don't see it with mindfulness and wisdom, basically we could say the mental function or the mental formation of ignorance is acting in our minds. That very first link in the whole chain of dependent origination—it's like the ignorance link tumbles us forward into this chain. And so when ignorance is arising with feeling, it's really strongly going to lead to craving. When we are unaware of the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience, we think there's something to hold on to. And so feeling will lead to craving in that case, with ignorance being present.

One of the ways this teaching is framed, or translated—sometimes we call it dependent origination, sometimes it's called dependent co-arising. And when ignorance is co-arising with feeling, craving comes right along for the ride. So really, a lot of our work here is exploring bringing mindfulness and wisdom to whatever is here, whatever is happening. If we bring mindfulness and wisdom to the experience of feeling, it doesn't have to follow into this link of craving.

And yet often mindfulness and wisdom aren't necessarily strong. The movement, the habit, the pattern of this cycle is so fast. It's like in less than a split second this whole thing can unfold. This whole twelve steps can happen in less than a split second. So there is a tendency for craving to arise around feeling tone—craving to want something pleasant, to want to get rid of something unpleasant.

Craving is embedded in both greed and aversion. Aversion is the craving to get rid of. Greed is the craving to hold on to. And then there's delusion embedded in all of it. Because the mind wanting the pleasant, the greed, is kind of like the movement towards the pleasant. And that movement towards pleasant is predicated on, or based on, or founded in the belief, the delusion, that having that pleasant thing will make me happy, will do it for me. Or likewise on the flip side with aversion—the belief that getting rid of that unpleasant thing will make me happy. Those beliefs are delusion at work.

Sometimes we just see the leaning towards. Sometimes we can actually recognize the idea in the mind: "Yeah, I need that. That's what will make me happy." So based on the feeling tone, we tend to lean towards pleasant, lean away from unpleasant.

When mindfulness is not around, we're like an automatic machine—get pleasant, get rid of unpleasant, maybe just space out around neutral. Given this tendency to lean towards, this kind of idea of "Ooh, I need that," craving becomes this whole movement of picking up an intention or momentum to go towards something.

The next link is clinging. With craving as a condition, clinging tends to arise. I think of clinging almost as an intensification. There's a kind of gradient from craving to clinging. Craving is the leaning towards, the reaching out for something. Clinging is when we actually pick it up.

This might be craving and clinging around some particular sense pleasure—food, a sight—that leaning towards. It might shift. For instance, you might notice a kind of pleasantness seeing particular flowers or a particular plant. "Oh, I've not seen that plant before." So maybe there's a sense of curiosity, something pleasant there. And yet there may be this feeling of "let me look a little closer." There's a craving, a wanting to see it or get a little closer. Then maybe it becomes, "Oh, I need to take a picture of this," and we kind of land on it. Or maybe we want to get out some pruning shears and take some of it back to our room, really actually physically possess it.

This happens a lot—craving, clinging, picking it up, holding onto it—around physical experience, but it also happens around mental experience. For example, we might be listening to the teachings or seeing somebody doing walking meditation really mindfully. There's a sense of "Ooh, maybe I could do that too," a little sense of what it might be like to have that kind of experience. So there's this idea born in the mind—a kind of fantasy of being the best yogi here.

That fantasy might have a pleasant feeling tone to it. The idea is, "If I was that, that would feel pretty good." So the feeling tone comes in. Then there's the desire, the wanting, to have that fantasy become what happens to us. That's the craving. Then there's the potential of picking up that idea—"Oh, I need that. That is what is going to make me happy." We've latched onto that belief that if I can become that good yogi that's in this fantasy in my mind, then I will be happy. That's where we've clung to that idea.

The next step from clinging is becoming. With clinging as condition, becoming tends to happen. Thanissaro Bhikkhu has a beautiful phrase around becoming that I like as a description. Becoming, he says, are the intentions and actions that arise in the service of clinging.

In this case, the idea of "I need to become a good yogi"—that's the clinging. This is what's going to make me happy. We've clung to that as being necessary. And so in that becoming necessary, there's this arising of "Okay, what do I have to do? How do I have to practice?" The intentions, what am I going to do to make this happen? This is becoming—this movement towards our goals that have come up through the clinging. The sense of "It's mine, I'm going to make this happen."

So becoming is the intentions and views that serve our clinging. We tend to like becoming. Becoming feels pretty good because when becoming happens, we're buying into the idea of "I'm in control, I've figured it out, I know what I'm going to do and I know how I'm going to do it and it's going to get me there and it's all going to be great when I get there." That's the feeling of becoming. We've picked up this belief in the controllability of experience. Sometimes we can control experience, but ultimately what tends to happen is that at some point we notice we can't.

So we tend to like becoming because it feels good. And then, following on from becoming, the next link is birth.

At times this is talked about as being an actual birth into a subsequent life, but it's also pointed to as the birth into an identity. Certain teachers have really emphasized this—Bhikkhu Buddhadasa in particular pointed to this understanding. Birth can be looked at as a birth into an identity. Like, "Oh, I am a good yogi." So it's no longer just the wish; there's some sense of having gratified that.

There's a kind of gradation between becoming and birth in a way—the movement towards an identity. At some point it may feel like we've landed there. Or maybe it feels like we don't land there and we experience suffering immediately: "I failed. I haven't figured out how to do this. I can't do this."

I've experienced this around the idea of being a good yogi—the sense of the fantasy of what it means to be a good yogi. The whole project of "I could be continuously mindful." That's what the good yogi identification thinks.

On one retreat, I almost flipped back and forth between these identities on a regular basis. I'd take a step and think, "Oh, I can really feel that step. I'm a good yogi"—birth right into that. "Yeah, I'm a good yogi." And then the mind wandered. "Oh, I'm a bad yogi." Split second, one to the other, and believing both of them. This is becoming and birth. Seeing that process—it's really useful to begin to see this happen.

I found for myself, in terms of exploring this particular dynamic, that sometimes strong identities have a kind of grip. The good yogi identity was pretty strong for me. I was pretty identified with that—like, "Yeah, I'd better be a good yogi. If I'm not a good yogi, it's a problem." But then, proof: I couldn't be a good yogi. With my idea of what a good yogi was, I couldn't be that all the time. I didn't have control over the mind wandering, and that was evidence that I was a bad yogi.

Instead of actually exploring the process of picking something up—picking up the identity—I began to see, as I looked at this, "Okay, I'm just going to notice these identities happening. Good yogi, bad yogi, good yogi, bad yogi." Watching that back and forth, I saw something: the bad yogi actually depends on the good yogi. The bad yogi doesn't even exist if the good yogi is not an issue.

At first I thought what I needed to do was get rid of the bad yogi and just be the good yogi—that if I could just not have the bad yogi, there wouldn't be a problem. But I began to see that the bad yogi identification depended on, was intimately connected with, the good yogi. These two identities were locked together.

So the exploration of these processes at work can begin to help us weaken the identification.

The next step from birth is aging and death. As I just pointed to in that example, you take birth into some kind of identity, and the inevitable, impermanent, unreliable nature of experience will shatter that identity—will shatter that sense of "I have that thing." If it's having a physical possession, the impermanence of physical things means they break, they get lost, and we can suffer with that.

But I think much of the time we're suffering around the identities that we hold on to, feeling like we need to control those identities. Yet the uncontrollable nature of the arising and passing of experience means that we don't have control. We can't always be the identity we want to be. And so we will suffer. When it's proved to us—in my case, "You can't always be the good yogi"—there was a lot of suffering around that.

So this cycle of dependent origination, this is as far as I'm going to go today—kind of the middle of the chain: sixth sense bases, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, identification.

aging and death—or the entire mass of suffering. The aging and death of that identity, the impermanent nature of it, means it will fall apart. And therein lies the suffering that results.

I'll save the rest of it—the early links of ignorance, mental formation, and consciousness—for my next talk. But there's plenty in this part to reflect on, in what we've explored a little bit tonight.

One piece I want to point to is how strong this pattern is, and partly why it's so powerful for us, why we tend to get caught in it over and over again. Part of this has to do with the feeling tone of each of these links. Because each of these links is some arising experience—craving, clinging, becoming, birth, identification, the taking up of a sense of self. It's all mental formations at work. And so if we think about what the feeling tones of those are, because they are mental formations, they have a feeling tone.

Craving—that desire when we have a pleasant feeling and we want to hold on to that pleasant feeling. We may not notice this initially, but the craving itself... In fact, we might think that it's pleasant because we're so focused on the idea of getting that thing or getting rid of that thing. We might think that craving is pleasant. But if we look at the actual experience of craving, if we feel into the actual experience of craving, it's unpleasant. Craving as a mental formation tends to have an unpleasant feeling tone.

Becoming, as I mentioned a few minutes ago, tends to have a pleasant feeling tone because there's a sense of knowing where we're going, knowing where we're headed. And so with that craving and clinging and becoming, if we get what we want, if we have that thing, that part feels good. The clinging, when we've gotten the thing that we want—the phrase is, we're "in association with the loved." That feels pretty good. We've gotten something that we want, so there's some pleasantness there too.

And we tend to go for pleasant. We tend to crave that pleasant. So we get something we want, and because of the inevitable process of impermanence, the pleasure of that fades over time. What happens is we think, "Well, the last time I felt pretty good was when I got something I wanted. So what do I want to want?" You could call this Google mind. Sometimes I find myself sitting in front of that Google screen thinking, "What do I want to know?" Not just wanting information, but that sense of wanting to have something to find, to get that hit of "Oh, I figured something out."

This cycle tends to reinforce itself. It also has a kind of power in that when we get the thing that we want, not only do we have the pleasantness of the association with what we want, but we also get the perhaps more hidden pleasure of the feeling of the dissatisfactoriness of the wanting going away. There's a double hit of pleasure when we get what we want—because wanting is actually really unpleasant. And we don't quite know how driven we are by that wanting, wanting to get rid of that feeling of unpleasant. The only way we know how to get rid of that feeling is to get something that we want.

But this practice, what we're doing here, helps us to recognize or see that there's another way toward ease or peace of mind, rather than having to get what I want to fill that gap, that hole of dissatisfactoriness. Craving itself is a mental formation that is impermanent. And so if we have some interest or curiosity about what the experience of craving is—this unpleasant feeling—and watch what happens, we'll see that craving can vanish without getting the thing that craving wants. The craving can vanish.

I watched this at one point in walking meditation. I was doing this back and forth, walking outside, and I wanted to be away from people. I had a lot of aversion when people were around, so I was kind of out by myself. But I began noticing that when somebody would walk into my field of vision—and I was doing a kind of secluded walking practice, so not looking up, but I would see somebody pop into my field of vision, in my peripheral vision—there was so much wanting to look at the person. So strong.

Initially I was really just like, "I am not going to look," putting the blinders on. There was aversion in the mind around looking, and I just forced myself not to look. It felt like I was feeling that craving and pushing it down, as opposed to really feeling the craving. I got to see this a lot.

This was a three-month retreat, so over the course of multiple weeks I got to look at this pattern a lot. And one day it finally occurred to me, well, craving is happening here. Maybe I should look at the craving.

So looking at the craving, I began to see that it arose—and this is the dependent origination piece—it arose when the person popped into the field of vision. There was the contact, contact of seeing. Then the idea arose: I'll be happy if I look. There was that process going on. As long as the person was in my field of vision, I felt the pull. It felt like wanting, like this tractor beam of you are going to look.

But instead of holding my mind with blinders on, I used mindfulness to not look and just watch the craving. Feeling the craving, feeling it, feeling it. It got really strong as the person walked right in front of me. All I would have to do was just briefly flip my eyes up to see who they were. So strong. But I just watched the craving.

And then the person went around the corner and vanished. When the person vanished, the craving vanished. That feeling of the craving vanishing felt like I was released from a vice grip. It was so much freedom.

Then for a little while I started getting interested—it was so much fun to watch the craving vanish. I was waiting for people to come around so I could watch the craving and then watch it vanish when they disappeared. And then I realized I was holding on to the craving in order to see it disappear. And then the craving just went away.

There's so much we can see by looking at what our minds are doing. In this case, sometimes people ask, "I've heard you can cut the chain of dependent origination at feeling. It doesn't have to go to craving." But in this case it had already gone to craving. That doesn't mean freedom can't happen. There's another teaching that points to every single link of dependent origination. It describes how freedom can be found by being aware, being mindful, noticing the arising of craving, noticing the ending of craving. Freedom can happen anywhere, whatever we are knowing in the moment.

I didn't have to go back and say, "Where was the pleasant feeling? Can I go back and cut it off at the pleasant?" Craving is arising. Mindfulness of the craving. Mindfulness of the clinging. Mindfulness of the becoming—that sense of "I'm in control." Mindfulness of that. Wherever we are, the teachings point to the mindfulness and wisdom that can essentially cut through the delusion, the ignorance around things being permanent, reliable, controllable, me. It's that ignorance arising with the craving that is seen through and cut through with mindfulness and wisdom. Wherever we are, whatever is arising, that is where mindfulness can open to wisdom and possibly to freedom in a moment—right in the midst of craving, right in the midst of self-hatred.

The last piece I'll say is this: this description is pretty complicated. All these different pieces, remembering all of them. Can I see each individual piece? Sometimes the mindfulness can get very strong and quite detailed, watching these things unfold moment to moment. But there's also a power to just understanding that something is conditioned without needing to know how it was conditioned.

For me, with the self-hatred piece—I talked about self-hatred last time I spoke—there was real power at one point in simply recognizing, "Oh, right. This is deeply conditioned based on past history." Not knowing all the details of that conditioning, but just knowing: yes, self-hatred is conditioned. It arises. Of course it arises. That understanding was supportive for being able to meet that pattern. Before I really understood it was conditioned, I felt like I was to blame for it.

You know, I should be able to control it. I should be able to stop it. But when I began to understand—oh, it's conditioned, it's a conditioned arising—everything shifted. That reflection, "it's conditioned, it's nature, of course it happens," created the conditions for me to have less struggle, to meet the pattern with mindfulness when it arose.

So just knowing that something is conditioned can be really powerful. If that's all you remember from this talk, that's enough.

Let's sit for a moment.

Thank you for your practice. The world needs it.

CHAPTER 163

Choiceless Attention

Andrea Fella · 56 min

In this dharma talk from a month-long insight meditation retreat, Andrea Fella introduces the practice of choiceless attention—a receptive form of awareness where practitioners let go of preference for any particular object and allow experience to naturally unfold. She carefully distinguishes between attention (the factor that selects what we attend to) and mindfulness (the quality of knowing what is happening), explaining how we can consciously direct attention or allow it to move naturally through the field of experience.

The instruction begins with deep relaxation, then opens through the field of hearing before expanding to receive all aspects of experience—body sensations, sounds, thoughts, emotions—without preferring one over another. Andrea addresses common challenges including confusion, discomfort with not directing attention, and the drifty quality that can arise. She suggests gentle noting practice and offers the option of "anchored open awareness" for those who find the transition challenging.

Andrea shares her personal journey with this practice, initially finding it chaotic before discovering it as deeply natural and easeful. She explains how attention can be both precise (noticing specific sensations) and broad (taking in spaciousness or calm), and how this practice particularly supports seeing the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), unsatisfactoriness (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). The talk concludes with a discussion of momentary concentration—continuity of mindfulness on changing objects—as a valid and complete form of samādhi cultivation.

Over these last days, we've been offering progressive instructions that encourage us to open up to the entirety of our experience. While giving some preference to an anchor, we have still explored when the attention is drawn to other experience—attending to aspects of physical experience, breath, body sensations, sounds, aspects of mental experience, emotions, moods, feeling tones, thoughts, and the subtle impulse about to move, about to think, about to have an emotion: the intention. And in the in-between times we're also exploring the other physical senses—seeing, tasting. Nothing left out. We can be mindful of anything.

How we are mindful is crucial: curious about experience as experience, rather than as something about me or something to do something with. Just, what's this experience? How is this felt as a human being? What is it like to be a human being experiencing this? That kind of curiosity, with kindness—wise attention.

We've encouraged using an anchor for the attention, a place to settle the attention, and have given some preference to the anchor. Unless the attention is strongly pulled to something else, we've been giving some sense of preference to collecting the attention with the anchor, which can support a stability of mind and a continuity of mindfulness —to have that place to return to.

As the momentum of mindfulness strengthens, we might explore a less directed form of practice, one where we're not choosing anything in preference to anything else. A form of practice sometimes called choiceless attention, open awareness, receptive awareness, which opens more widely to the flow of our experience moment to moment, without preferring any particular aspect of experience, without giving preference to an anchor.

This shift—from giving preference to an anchor to letting go of that preference—highlights a factor of the mind called attention. Attention is different than mindfulness. Mindfulness is a receptive quality of the mind that knows what is happening in the present moment while it's happening. Attention is a factor of experience that happens in every moment, choosing something to attend to.

This factor of attention is interesting. It is amenable to conscious choice. We can consciously choose what we would like to pay attention to, and this is how the anchor practice works—we prefer attending to the breath, and we can choose. Right now perhaps I could suggest: attend to the sensations of your hands. A form of my words directing your attention perhaps. Or you might notice a breath in this moment. So the factor of attention is amenable to choice.

And yet, if we are not consciously choosing what to attend to, attention will naturally choose something out of the range of experience to attend to—a natural unfolding of attention, a conditioned unfolding of attention, but not our entering in with some sense of "I'm going to pay attention to this."

Attention and mindfulness are different. I used to think earlier in my practice, when I first learned the directed form of mindfulness practice, that if I wasn't choosing what to pay attention to it meant I wasn't being mindful. But mindfulness is more just that basic aware quality, that we-know quality, or self-reflective capacity of our minds to know that we know. Attention is pulling particular features or experiences out of the field to attend to.

So we can be mindful, be aware, settle back, relax, and simply let go of any preference for what to attend to, and see: what is attention interested in attending to?

It's often helpful to begin with relaxation, relaxing that part of the mind that has such a habit of doing and choosing. So let's start there: allowing the body to relax. You might explore this consciously, scanning through the body and relaxing various parts. And yet at times it can be interesting to explore just dropping in a request, an expression of wishing: maybe the body can relax. Or, body, can you show me how to relax? Rather than trying to do it, it's like an intention, dropping in a request. May the body relax. And see—how does that request land in your system?

Sometimes our system knows ways to relax that we don't consciously know how to do.

So arriving with yourself here in your body—may the body relax. See what happens. I even find sometimes, dropping in that request a few times, a deeper relaxation might happen. May the body relax. May the body relax. May the mind relax. We don't even have to actually know what that means—just dropping that request into the system and seeing what happens. May the mind relax.

We'll begin this exploration of a more open, receptive awareness by choosing a field: the field of hearing. Starting with hearing can sometimes remind us of how it feels to settle back and let experience come to us. Because we never know what the next sound will be. It's pretty clear we're not in charge of doing the sounds. So we can connect to the field of hearing and receiving. Perhaps the sound of my voice. The silence between the sound of my voice. Small rustlings, poppings in the room. Maybe receiving, hearing, noticing this quiet hum of some machine—relaxing and receiving the sounds.

Exploring the possibility of settling back. Not having the attention going out and looking or listening for sounds, but settling back to just hear what comes to the ear naturally, easefully, in this moment. And in this moment. If it doesn't seem that there's much in the way of sound, you can just recognize the silence. Receiving an alternation of sound and silence.

And now expanding, or allowing, the field of awareness to receive from all aspects of our experience. Perhaps body sensations—often a very obvious field of experience—and attention can gravitate towards what's most obvious in a moment. Perhaps there's a recognition of the pressure of the contact points, hardness, softness, coolness, heat, the breath—interwoven with hearing. Relaxing and not trying to control where the attention is, but rather just letting the attention naturally shift from experience to experience.

Attention may also receive thoughts, or emotions, or moods. Our practice here, in this form, is simply checking in: What's happening now? What's obvious now? And how about now? The breath, hearing, tingling, moisture, thinking, breathing—relaxing and allowing experience to come to you. Settling back.

It can be helpful to use the noting practice in this form. Gently acknowledging what is most obvious now. Maybe about once every second or two, naming that. Hearing. Contraction. Hearing. Thinking. Just a gentle, steady, relaxed connection, acknowledging what attention has already touched.

If you use the noting about once every second or two, it's pretty likely there'll be a lot of things you notice in between what you're actually noting. And that's okay. The noticing is the most important part.

Sometimes in a shift from the more directed practice to a more receptive practice, the mind can get a little confused or uncomfortable about not directing the attention. That can just be something else that we notice. Oh, uncomfortable—that's what's obvious right now. Confusion is happening. Or sometimes there's the experience of searching for something to notice. Searching is happening.

Relax. Allowing. Relaxation. Receiving what is obvious in this moment, and in this moment, and this moment.

The habit of directing the attention might arise, almost without you doing it. You could notice that too. Directing. Directing is happening. And then explore the possibility of receiving again.

Sometimes with this form of practice the mind can get a little drifty.

When you notice drifty mind, the first thing to explore is simply noticing: "Oh, drifty mind." If the mind continues to be very drifty, you could reconnect consciously with your anchor—refreshing, reminding yourself what it's like to be connecting and knowing experience in the present moment. Then, when attention naturally notices some other experience besides the anchor, let that be the place where you begin receiving again, letting go of the preference for the anchor at that point.

What's happening now? What's obvious? What's already here, already being known? How about now? And now?

You are welcome to explore this form of practice. You might play with it a few times during the day, or for some of you it may feel quite easeful and supportive for your mindfulness practice—you're welcome to do it as your main practice, just letting go of the anchor. There are also times when it's supportive to come back to the anchor, allowing the mind to settle and collect, and then open again. Or if you're cultivating concentration, simply staying with the anchor.

There are many different conditions out here in your minds, and we offer these tools as a support for your practice. What supports you to be mindful, to be present with experience?

I would say that with open awareness practice, in shifting from directed attention to open or receptive awareness, it can feel uncomfortable at first. When I first received this instruction, it felt so chaotic—like objects just spinning around me. I thought, "How do I notice all of these things?" It was so uncomfortable.

So I began with what I described to my teacher as an "anchored open awareness practice." I stayed in touch with the anchor and yet noted or noticed a lot of other things: "Oh, there's breath... and hearing... and breath... and body sensation... and breath... and thought... and breath." Practicing with the anchor let me get more comfortable with the wide variety of experience. I felt like I needed to tether just a little bit.

What I would say is that I initially thought this open awareness practice was not my practice, but that was mostly because I had so much habit around directing attention. When I finally began to let go of that aiming—there was a little bit of control in there, wanting to be in charge of what I was paying attention to—when that began to soften, I found that this receptive awareness practice is very natural for this mind. Very easeful. And so it is now my primary practice.

Even if it doesn't feel natural, even if this is your first time exploring open awareness practice—for some of you it may be, while many of you are already familiar with it—give it a chance. Several times. Many times. Perhaps like me, there's a little bit of holding on to what's familiar. When we open into open awareness, sometimes we step into less familiar territory, and it can take some time to be relaxed and easeful there. So give yourself permission to play with it for a while, then perhaps go back to the anchor, then play with it again.

In sitting practice, a particular experience can happen as we shift to open or receptive awareness, where it feels like you know that you're aware, and you are aware of distant experiences—sounds, body sensations—but it almost feels like you're surrounded by cotton balls. None of those experiences really feels like what attention is paying attention to.

In that experience, there is always something that attention is attending to, but sometimes it's an object or experience that's a little less familiar to us. I have found at times that what the mind is attending to in that place is a sense of spaciousness. That's what attention is interested in—spaciousness itself, not the specific experiences happening within the spaciousness.

Attention can have this quality of being very precise, noticing very specific sensations like the pressure on your hand, a sight, a sound, a particular body sensation, the arising of a thought. And attention can also be very broad. Attention can take in spaciousness. Attention can take in calm, which also has a very diffuse quality at times. We don't know calm by looking for some particular part of experience—calm is a very diffuse kind of experience. Attention can meet diffuse experience as well as precise experience.

In opening to open awareness, the attention will naturally be drawn to some of these experiences we're not so familiar with being aware of. In that place where you may know that you're aware, but not really be clear about what awareness is aware of, or what attention is connecting with in that moment, it can be helpful simply to recognize: "Well, I know that I'm aware. Not clear what the object is. That's okay. Not clear what the object is."

Sometimes it can take time for the mind to begin to really understand certain kinds of experiences—like calm, like equanimity, like spaciousness. What is that experience? Attention can land there and know that other things are happening, but it feels like attention is not really going to those other experiences. There is a little bit of attention that meets those experiences, that they are being known even in the distance—there is a little bit of attention there. But it can be useful, rather than trying to make those be where the attention is more focused, to open to a kind of sense of being aware and knowing that you're aware. And there's something there that the attention is connected with.

At one point in Burma, I was practicing the Mahasi technique—what we've been instructing you in, in a kind of modified form over these days. I had shifted to the open awareness practice, which is the direction that this practice heads. The mind was just noticing all kinds of different things, and at some point it was like it was riveted. There was clear awareness. I knew that I was aware. I had no idea what the mind was so riveted to. There was a strong sense of interest—I could tell the mind was really interested—but I had no idea what it was interested in. I just noticed that there was awareness and interest. And I recognized the recognition: "Don't know. Don't know what it's interested in." That was the experience. I didn't have to make it something else. We don't have to change our experience. Just notice what it is.

We have just a few minutes for questions.

Question: It was my understanding that choiceless awareness is one of the goals, per se. Is that not the case? And also, I find that it's not something that I make happen—it kind of happens on its own.

I would say there are many forms of practice. The kind of arc of what we've been exploring here heads in the direction of open awareness. I wouldn't say it's the goal of the practice. The goal, the aim—if we have to say an aim of the practice—is to meet our experience, to understand how greed, aversion, and delusion work in the mind so that wisdom can grow and release greed, aversion, and delusion. The Buddha points to ānāpānasati, mindfulness of breathing, as being a complete practice in and of itself.

And as you noticed, sometimes when we start with something like ānāpānasati, there can be a natural movement toward opening up to more and more experience. So I wouldn't say that choiceless awareness or choiceless attention is the goal of the practice. It is a useful meditative tool for understanding our minds, and it's particularly supportive for helping us see the impermanent and conditioned nature of experience. Because we're not controlling what we're attending to, the uncontrollable nature of experience becomes very obvious. The changing nature of experience, that we're not doing experience—this becomes very obvious. So it's a support for seeing the truths of impermanent, unreliable, not-self. And there are many, many meditation practices.

Question: I just wanted to say that my particular construct of a person has its share of anxiety, like I'm sure a lot of people have. And five years ago I lost the vision in my right eye, so that upped my anxiety. We all go through our day noticing things, and for my own protection, I notice more—I'm trying to notice more for myself.

For a variety of reasons—safety, embarrassment, whatever it might be—I notice more. And during this practice, I noticed what a relief it was to let the noticing come to me. I just felt, "Oh, I can let go. I can let go of some work." I've been looking for that, wanting to let go and not really knowing how. And what you said about anger—going back to that a little bit—that's probably where I'll be for a while because there's a certain comfort there. But it just feels like a relief, like I can let out a sigh.

Yes, it can feel that way. As I described from my own practice, it didn't initially feel that way, but definitely for me at this point, it's such a relief not to have to choose. I appreciate that—the sense of release. There's a release in knowing that it's okay not to control experience, to just let experience arise and be known.

I want to mention for some of you who may not be having that experience: that's okay. You can also simply recognize, "Oh, there's confusion," or "There's a sense of not knowing where to land, how to notice all this stuff." You can notice that too.

But if you are experiencing something like relief, this may be a practice that's a little more organic for you, a little more natural. You're welcome to continue playing with it and heading in this direction, because this too is a complete practice in and of itself.

The concentration in this practice develops through the continuity of mindfulness rather than through focus on a particular object. It's not that we develop concentration and then open up, and then the concentration dissipates in the opening, requiring us to return to one object and focus again. Concentration can continue developing in the moment-to-moment noticing.

We could say that a simple definition of concentration is moment-to-moment mindfulness. Focused or one-pointed concentration is moment-to-moment mindfulness on one object. This other kind of concentration—sometimes called momentary concentration or moment-to-moment concentration—is continuity of mindfulness on changing objects. So we're not letting go of cultivating concentration here. And it can be very restful this way.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 164

Dependent Co-Arising: Part 2 (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this continuation of her teaching on dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda), Andrea Fella explores the first links of the twelve-fold chain: how ignorance (avijjā) conditions mental formations (saṅkhāra), which in turn shape consciousness and the entire field of our experience. She illuminates how saṅkhāra function as fabricators that construct all five aggregates (khandha)—form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness—moment by moment.

Fella draws on several key suttas to explain how ignorance is abandoned through direct knowing of impermanence, and how understanding that 'nothing is worth adhering to' leads to liberation. She explores the vipallāsa (perversions of perception) that cause us to see the impermanent as permanent, the unreliable as reliable, and not-self as self. The teaching becomes particularly powerful when applied to collective conditioning—how cultural beliefs and views around race, ethnicity, and identity perpetuate suffering through unseen ignorance.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with deeply held beliefs and views in meditation. Fella shares from her own experience with self-hatred, demonstrating how recognizing beliefs as beliefs—rather than facts—creates space for transformation. She introduces the parallel teaching of transcendent dependent origination, showing how suffering met with wisdom leads through faith, delight, joy, tranquility, and concentration toward liberation. The message is ultimately hopeful: freedom is possible wherever we wake up in the chain of conditions.

Last week in the talk I gave, I talked about the teaching of dependent origination. I got through many of the links but not all of them, so I wanted to continue with that teaching.

Just a little bit of a recap at the beginning. This teaching is a description of the habitual or usual processes of our bodies and minds that keep us caught in the cycle of suffering, keep us caught in the cycle of becoming, of selfing, of identification. It's a complex description with twelve links, and just to remind you, the traditional form begins with ignorance. With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. With mental formation as condition, consciousness comes to be. With consciousness as condition, mentality-materiality comes to be. With mentality-materiality as condition, the six sense bases. With the six sense bases as condition, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, aging and death. And the entire mass of suffering, the Buddha says.

This is understood as conditions that support and move us in the direction of being caught. I take some hope in the description of it as conditions as opposed to cause, because with it understood as conditionality, it points to the fact that if conditions change, the process can head in another direction.

In fact, I did mention last time that there's another form of dependent origination in the teachings that the Buddha offered, one that describes a set of conditions beginning from suffering. When suffering is met with some degree of wisdom—even if it's just an intellectual kind of curiosity—when we hear a teaching, when we hear something that says it's possible to be free of suffering, that there's a way we can do that, it might spark our attention and lead to some kind of confidence or faith or a sense of interest: let me hear that teaching. And this is a condition that leads us—that kind of confidence, that faith—leads us to engage with the teaching, perhaps leads us to taste some of the benefits of that teaching, which then reinforces the interest in continuing on that path. And so there is another form of dependent origination called transcendent dependent origination that also talks about the conditions that move us from suffering to freedom.

And yet there is still this strong tendency for suffering to kind of hook into our usual habitual patterns and habits. Our familiar ways of relating to experience, our familiar ways to navigate the world—thinking if I'm suffering, the best way out of this is if I get something I want, if I get rid of something I don't want. This kind of thought pattern, this kind of belief, this kind of view is essentially the ignorance that begins to propel this chain. And yet right at the very beginning of this, from suffering, when suffering is met with curiosity, with interest, with wisdom, it can head away from ignorance. I find this very inspiring and promising, a hopeful message in what the Buddha taught.

And yet he did want us to understand how we get caught. This is why he spent so much time to really describe this process. It amazes me how detailed this process he described—how we get caught in suffering—how detailed it is, how clear it is, how clear it can be.

This teaching on how we get caught in suffering can be understood in two ways in the suttas and in the commentaries. In one form it can be understood as conditions from our past lives propelling us forward into the next life. We tumble forward in this life and pick up these same habits and patterns and then potentially get born into a next life. So one way of understanding this teaching of dependent origination is how the cycle of rebirths comes to be.

Another way it is understood in the teachings, in the suttas and in the commentaries, is as something that happens in a moment. In a split second, when ignorance arises in the mind at the very beginning of that chain, it's already shaping our choices, our habits, our direction, what we choose to do, how we choose to engage. It's already shaping feeling leading to craving, leading to clinging, leading to becoming. In a moment, when ignorance is arising, it's like the entire suffering is picked up with ignorance. And if there can be a seeing through the ignorance—many of the teachings that Buddha pointed to in his teachings talked about how one uproots ignorance.

A couple of key pieces. A certain bhikkhu approached the Blessed One and said to him, "Is there one thing through the abandoning of which ignorance is abandoned and true knowledge arises?" The Buddha replied, "Ignorance is the one thing through abandoning of which ignorance is abandoned." That sounds a little recursive. So the person goes on to ask, "But Venerable Sir, how should a bhikkhu see for ignorance to be abandoned?" And the Buddha says, "When one knows and sees the 'I' as impermanent, ignorance is abandoned. When one knows and sees form as impermanent, when one knows and sees whatever feeling is impermanent, mental formation is impermanent"—basically the five aggregates of clinging as impermanent—"then ignorance will be abandoned."

In another place he offers a different perspective on abandoning ignorance. He says, "When one has heard nothing is worth adhering to, one directly knows everything." And I think it's more than just hearing—it's hearing and understanding directly. Nothing is worth clinging to, because it is impermanent. So over and over again the Buddha pointed to ignorance as being a key for us.

I'd like to review these first few links in the chain. Last time, we really started where it's easy to see these links clearly. We have our sense bases, and we can know that we've got contact. We have a sight, we notice the feeling tone of that sight, and then we might notice how we tend to like pleasant feeling, how we tend to want to get rid of unpleasant feeling—the craving that tends to arise based on feeling.

That's where we began last time, and we went through those links up through suffering. We explored how the process from the point of contact with the "I" and the habitual tendency of craving, clinging, becoming, identification, and birth will ultimately lead to a sense of struggle and stress. Why? Because we cannot hold on to something that is impermanent. It will fade. It will fall apart.

The whole project of trying to hold on to something—or actually, the motivation through which that craving and clinging happens—is believing that holding on to it will bring some lasting happiness. And then it's proved over and over again that it doesn't.

This belief that holding on to something will bring lasting happiness, holding on to the pleasant, getting rid of the unpleasant—this is one way to understand the beliefs shaped by ignorance.

It is ignorance—not understanding the nature of experience as impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable, not understanding the nature of suffering—that leads us to think having what I want will make me happy, getting rid of what I don't want will make me happy.

This ignorance, this first link in the chain in the description of dependent origination, is also conditioned. It is conditioned by suffering. Sometimes suffering, if it's met with some wisdom, or if it's met with a kind of questioning—is there someone who can tell me a thing or two about why we suffer?—can lead somewhere different. The Buddha said ignorance and suffering will lead to either bewilderment, confusion of mind, or it will lead to search: Does someone know a way or two out of this suffering?

If that search happens to come upon teachings that offer a way out of suffering, then faith can arise. That whole process of wholesome qualities can arise and lead us towards the letting go of the habits and patterns that lead to suffering. But much of the time, suffering leads to bewilderment, to confusion. We just stay stuck in our traditional familiar habits and patterns, trying to get what we want, trying to get rid of what we don't want.

The greed or the aversion, the wanting or the not wanting, is the action or the tumbling forward of the mind that believes that action will be somehow beneficial to us. So it really is the beliefs or views that underpin greed and aversion. Those beliefs or views are delusion. They're rooted in ignorance. They're rooted in not understanding that experiences are impermanent, unreliable, not self.

This is the kind of flipping on its head that our minds typically do, what Bhante talked about the other night—the vipallāsa, the perversions. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable to be reliable. We tend to take what is not self to be self. We tend to take what is not beautiful to be beautiful.

In another place, the Buddha describes meeting somebody who was saying things like, "Oh, I found the permanent, blissful, eternal state." And the Buddha responded, "Alas, sir, Brahmabhaka is immersed in ignorance, insofar as he will say of what is actually impermanent that it is permanent, and will say of what is actually unstable that it is stable, and will say of what is actually non-eternal that it is eternal. He is immersed in ignorance."

This perversion, this standing on its head of the way we tend to meet experience—this is where the ignorance is rooted. We have talked some about how to see through this. But what we're going to explore tonight is what happens when we don't see through it—the kind of mess we get ourselves in, what happens there.

Suffering tends to condition ignorance, this not seeing things as they are. Not seeing that the nature of experience is impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. Not seeing the truth of suffering, the truth of the arising of suffering, the truth of the ending of suffering, and that there is a way to the ending of suffering.

With ignorance as condition, the next link in this process of our being caught in this cycle arises: mental formations. Saṅkhāra, as Anushka spoke about the other night in the teaching on the five aggregates. Mental formations are the mental processes that tend to shape our choices, our actions, how we engage in the world. There are many of them. This is a really big category. In the Buddha's division of our experience into these five aggregates of body, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness, mental formations is huge.

It contains all of our emotional life. It includes mind states—sleepiness would be one of those. Actually, love and mindfulness are also mental formations. So mental formations can be both wholesome and unwholesome. Mindfulness, concentration, wisdom—all mental formations.

And essentially our project here, what we're doing here, is to explore with mindfulness the mental formations that arise. We begin to see that the wholesome mental formations tend to move us in the direction of more happiness, ease, and peace. Essentially, this puts us on that alternative dependent origination chain—transcendent dependent origination. And we see that as we engage with unhelpful, unskillful habits of mind, unskillful mental formations, it tends to create more suffering.

And it's not a mistake to see that. In seeing that with mindfulness, it's very different to see unhelpful mental formations with mindfulness than it is to simply be caught in unhelpful mental formations, which tends to reinforce them—just dig that groove deeper. "Whatever one frequently ponders becomes the inclination of the mind." I believe Bhante mentioned that earlier today.

When we are pondering unhelpful mental formations, the pondering is a kind of picking up the belief inside of them and following it: "Yep, that's what's going to make me happy." But the mindfulness of it is a different thing. We may feel the suffering that comes with those unhelpful mental formations, but we're seeing it with wisdom instead of believing it—believing that this is the way I need to act or engage in order for happiness to follow.

So mental formations includes much of our emotional life—both wholesome and unwholesome emotions, both wholesome and unwholesome mind states. It includes thoughts. It includes beliefs. It includes agendas—things that we wouldn't think of as emotions. It includes intention and motivation. It's a big category. These are the kinds of things that arise in our mind that impel us. Anushka used the word "drive" the other day. I like the word "shape." Mental formations tend to shape our experience. They tend to shape the rest of our experience. They tumble forward and shape our experiences.

In the chain of dependent origination, with ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. In this particular chain, the mental formations that are described are already informed by ignorance, already shaped by confusion—the belief that having something will make me happy because I think it's permanent, reliable, that there's something out there that will be permanent and reliable. So in this chain, the mental formations that arise tend to be unhelpful. They're already shaped by ignorance.

Out of ignorance, because of the ignorance arising, we take the most obvious move to get rid of the unpleasant, to hold on to the pleasant, based on what we've believed in the past—all that we've known. And that's all that we've known: that getting something I want is going to make me feel better.

We talked about this the other day, noticing the feeling tones of the links. When we get what we want, the having brings us some happiness. But also, the momentary alleviation from the wanting feels good because the mind is released from its association with the unpleasantness of wanting for a few moments. That feels good. And that's all that we tend to know: if I get something I want, I'll feel better. We don't think about or understand the possibility of a different way.

We've been talking about that in probably almost every talk—that if we look at the craving with mindfulness instead of acting on it, being curious about it, we may see the craving fall away without having gotten what it wants. And we experience the release from the suffering of that wanting without ever getting what the wanting wants. I described that experience of feeling like, when the wanting to look at people who were walking with me fell away, it felt like being released from a vice grip.

But based on ignorance, the ideas, the habits, the patterns of "I've got to do this"—it's just assumed. We take those misperceptions to be truth, and we tumble forward into these mental formations.

So I want to explore mental formations a little bit from a perspective slightly different than what Anushka offered—similar, but with different teachings. In the teaching on the five aggregates around mental formations, the Buddha offered a definition of mental formations different from the one I just offered you, where I described emotions, mind states, thoughts, beliefs, views, agendas, motivations—these are all mental formations.

But the Buddha describes it in a different way in one place. He describes it as a process instead. What do sankharas do? What do mental formations do? Somebody asked him, why do you call them mental formations?

In this particular translation I'm going to read, the translator rendered the word sankhara not as mental formation but as fabrication. And it makes the translation work to translate it as fabrication, so I'm going to use this translation for now.

Someone asked the Buddha, "Why do you call them fabrications?" The Buddha responds, "Because they fabricate fabricated things. Thus they are called fabrications. What do they fabricate? They fabricate form as a fabricated thing. They fabricate feeling as a fabricated thing." So here he's going through the aggregates. "They fabricate perception as a fabricated thing. They fabricate fabrications as a fabricated thing. And they fabricate consciousness as a fabricated thing."

When I first read this, my jaw dropped. I could see that the word "driver" is good. This is the engine of creation of the aggregates—mental formations, fabrication. The process nature of these mental formations is to fabricate the aggregates over and over again.

So how does this work? Let me give two examples, starting with an unhelpful fabrication: anger.

How does anger shape—again, I like that word—how does anger shape our form? Well, when anger arises, often there is an experience of pressure, of heat. There's bodily sensation that arises. Anger can actually distort our face, physically changing the shape of our face when it's arising. So anger shapes our body.

When anger is arising, feelings often become unpleasant. So it shapes the feeling. Occasionally I've noticed at the very beginning of anger, just as it's arising, a little bit of the sense of becoming and a sense of pleasantness, like, "Oh yeah, I'm in control here." There's a little hit of pleasant sometimes at the beginning of anger, and then quickly it can go right into unpleasant. So the anger shapes the feeling tone.

It shapes our perception, how we recognize things. When we're angry, we tend to be perceiving things through a lens of anger. We may interpret—you know, maybe somebody is looking at us with an expression on their face, and we interpret it as them having some kind of judgment about us. We don't know what's going on in their mind. Maybe they had some gas! But we may be seeing through that lens of anger. So our perception takes in, "That person is judging me. That person is angry at me." Anger shapes how we perceive experience.

When anger is arising, our consciousness tends to be shaped by this. We will tend to land on things that confirm what makes us angry, not to see things that disconfirm it. So it actually creates these gaps in what we experience, what we become conscious of. It shapes our consciousness. And it tends to construct or shape more anger.

A wholesome mental formation—love—may shape the face, shape the body to have pleasant feeling. It may shape the body to feel light, create a softness of the face. Often it creates a feeling of pleasantness. Our perceptions are shaped by the quality of kindness. We're more connected to other people. It creates conditions for more connectedness.

So this description of the sankharas, the mental formations, as being what shapes the aggregates—fabricates form, fabricates feeling, fabricates perception, fabricates fabrications, fabricates consciousness.

The next two links in the chain of dependent origination are consciousness and mentality-materiality. I'll explore this more deeply later, but essentially those two links serve as shorthand for the five aggregates. This definition of mental formations as the shapers or constructors of the aggregates can be understood as an elaboration of these links: mental formations condition consciousness and nāma-rūpa, mentality-materiality.

Not only are emotions and mind states mental formations, but also views, beliefs, and ideas. All of our mental formations not only tend to shape our lives forward, tumbling on, but they have been shaped by our past, by our conditioning. This is how the cycle becomes circular. What arises as a mental formation doesn't simply arise out of nowhere—the ignorance that shapes mental formations has a long history in our lives, in our own personal experience. It actually has a long history through our cultures, through our family dynamics.

Views, opinions, and beliefs also belong to this realm of mental formations. This is an important area to explore with curiosity. What is the mind believing? When we're caught in some kind of trap or struggle, there is always some view operating within it. According to this teaching, all such views trace back to some form of ignorance at the deepest level—some belief in something being permanent, reliable, controllable, some sense of self. But there are countless flavors of beliefs that each of us holds based on our own lives, our personal conditioning, and our cultures.

When we start to get curious, we can investigate what's being believed when we feel caught or stuck. This has been tremendously useful in my own practice. When there's a pattern or habit of being really stuck in something, I'll sometimes drop in the question: what's being believed right now? Because beliefs, when they're not seen, function as if they are simply fact. We're not aware that they're beliefs—we take them to be truth. If we can be curious about what's being believed and actually see it as a belief, something shifts.

In my own practice of working with anger and self-hatred, one of the beliefs operating was "I'm unworthy." When I could see that—oh, that's the belief that's happening, there's a believing of unworthiness—something became possible. I find that often in such places we might think we're supposed to counter the belief. I certainly did plenty of this: "Oh, I think I'm unworthy? Well, I'm worthy." Trying to convince myself I was worthy, trying to convince myself I was doing good.

Sometimes that approach can be supportive. As Bhante was discussing the other day, we can remind ourselves: I'm on the path, I've got right view, I'm looking at things in a wholesome way, I'm following the precepts, I'm not failing. Sometimes that kind of reflection helps. But when there's a deeply entrenched view—like this "I'm unworthy" feeling in my experience, this sense that somehow I'm inherently unworthy—trying to convince myself I wasn't unworthy just didn't work. That part of my mind that believed I was unworthy would simply respond: "You can't fool me. I know I'm unworthy."

What I began to recognize was far more helpful: seeing it as a belief. I didn't have to stop believing it, but I needed to see that it was a belief. And that was possible. I could see that "I am unworthy" was a belief. I still believed it, but I saw that it was a belief. This recognition creates a small crack in the mind, opening the possibility that as a belief, it may or may not be true.

This exploration of beliefs can be extraordinarily powerful when we're suffering, when we're struggling.

Some of our views come from personal conditioning—how we grew up, our own lived experiences, the circumstances that shaped us. And some of our views come from our collective or cultural backgrounds: family culture, workplace culture, school culture, the broader society, what we absorb through television, through what we watch, through the internet. We are shaped by the mental formations of the world. Those fabrications are not just our own—they come in and start shaping us.

Often these mental formations from family and culture arrive at such a young age that we never question them. These kinds of views can be even more difficult to recognize as views, as beliefs, precisely because we tend to share them with people around us.

There may be, for instance, mental formations related to the concept of race. Beliefs, ideas, views that we have all been shaped by through our own upbringing. What our beliefs are around race—they're all ideas. And yet the shaping of that, when it's not seen... those beliefs, those views around race can lead to racism. So much suffering has come from this kind of unseen ignorance. Unseen beliefs, just taking the fabrications, the mental formations that we were swimming in, that we were stewing in as children in our cultures, taking those to be the way it is. So much suffering generated by this.

One scholar has a beautiful way of framing this, of speaking to this, tying it back to the vipallāsa, the distorted perception. The professor is a professor of Sanskrit at a university in Sri Lanka. His name is Professor Mahinda Palihawadana. And I got this from a paper that he wrote, which is a great paper. I recommend you read it after the retreat. It's called "Theravada Perspective on Causation and Resolution of Conflicts."

He says, "This process of distorted perception, of placing every bare perception into a framework of emotions and beliefs that have come out of our past, our history, our conditioning, robs the freshness out of our experience. But we are not aware of this constant interference of the past. Because of this unawareness, which is our ignorance and our delusion, we see humanity as fragmented—as me and others, us and them—and in various other stereotypes: skin color, ethnicity, language, ideology included."

This is where wars come from. This is where hatred comes from. This ignorance.

And so we are shaped by our mental formations and we begin to see our world through this. As Professor Palihawadana says, we don't see the interference of the past. We are receiving information, but it's like we've got these lenses on with our beliefs and our views. We tend to take in information that confirms those beliefs and views, and we tend to not take in information that disconfirms them. This is a fairly well-studied phenomenon in psychology in recent years.

So with mental formation as condition, consciousness comes to be. Based on our views, our ideas, our beliefs, our perceptions, our emotions, we will take in certain information and not take in other information. This filtering mechanism does seem to be pretty deeply built into our psyche. There's a process in psychological terms called selective attention, which if you have some kind of agenda, a thing you need to do, that agenda is supported by a process of mind that will select information useful for that purpose and screen out information that is not useful.

There's a famous study—many of you may have heard about this—about selective attention. I'll describe it anyway because it's such a great example of this filtering mechanism and how even something as simple as an agenda can have us see certain things and not see other things.

In this study, they had people watch a video of people passing a basketball between other people. Two teams of people, people in one color shirt and people in another color shirt. They were asked to count the number of times a basketball passed between the hands of people with one particular color shirt. So a pretty focused kind of agenda. You have to track it—they're passing the basketball pretty fast—you have to track it pretty closely. At the end of the video, they were asked, "Okay, how many times did you see the basketball pass between the people?" And most of them could answer correctly.

And then, occasionally, somebody would say something like, "Was there like a gorilla in that video?" And indeed, while this had been happening, a person in a gorilla suit had walked right into the middle of the people passing the basketball, danced around a little bit, beat its chest, did gorilla-like things, and then walked off. Very obviously—I mean, if you are looking at the video without an agenda, you are not going to miss the gorilla. And yet the vast majority of people do not see the gorilla.

And what's even a little more scary: sometimes they would play the video back after somebody asked, "Was there like a gorilla in there?" They'd play it back, and yep, there's a gorilla there. Some people would say, "You switched the video on us. That has to be a different video because I would have seen the gorilla."

That is ignorance. There's a kind of ignorance in the not seeing, but the deeper ignorance is believing our own sense perception is reliable. We can see with this kind of example that mental formations do shape what we see. We do not see everything that's out there. We tend to think our minds are like video cameras and our eyes are like video cameras and our ears are like tape recorders, and that we see and hear everything that's here. But that is not the way our minds work. Believing that is the way our minds work is ignorance, because we are definitely shaped by these agendas. Even something as simple as an agenda can shape what we see and what we don't see.

And then think about something more than agenda. Think about a whole view or pattern around around race and how that shapes what we see and what we don't see and how we see it.

It's humbling. It is humbling to see this and to recognize this as the way our minds work. And yet knowing that it is the way our minds work can be helpful, because then we wouldn't be like that person who says it has to be a different video. We would say, "Oh, I didn't see that. I missed that." And we can perhaps learn from something that we didn't see.

So our consciousness is shaped by mental formations, and the mental formations shape not only our consciousness but also the next link: mentality-materiality. Mentality-materiality is essentially defined as the other four aggregates—form, and the other mental aggregates: feeling, perception, and mental formations. There's such a close dependence between consciousness and these other aspects. They inform each other. Fabrications shape our consciousness. What we take in tends to shape what we feel and perceive and think—how we feel our emotions.

And so at this point we're kind of back at the place where we started last week. We've got a body and a mind—a conscious mind in a physical body that perceives and feels. And we're receiving input, contact: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch. But you can see at this point, it is not a neutral experience. It's already shaped by past conditioning.

The unawareness of that past conditioning is—as the quote from Professor Paliha Wadana says—our ignorance. The unawareness that we are placing every sense contact, every bare perception, into a framework of emotion and belief that have come out of our past, our history, our conditioning. That's what's happening.

So it's very humbling to see this. And yet the teaching here that the Buddha is offering is ultimately hopeful. It's a very humbling teaching to hear how much we miss and how much our conditioning shapes what we're even seeing and hearing and perceiving. And yet to know this information is a way that we can begin to move in a different direction.

The wisdom that can come from being curious about—well, what is human experience? How is this experience shaped? How is it shaping my next experience? The seeing of that with mindfulness begins to uproot and undermine that ignorance. So this is our exploration here.

Last time in the talk I said that there's a teaching pointing to any of the links—a way the Buddha said, "See that, wherever you are, whatever you're noticing." If it's the arising of confusion, know that. There can be freedom right there in meeting that with curiosity, with mindfulness, with a sense of allowing it to show itself—not to follow it or believe its story, but to be curious about it. See what happens as you notice it.

You have all talked about in your meetings seeing something like this. Seeing how being mindful of something creates a different perspective. More space, a little more ease. When we can see, "Oh, what's happening? Oh, it's anger that's happening. It's just anger. I can be with that." Or sadness: "Oh, it's sadness that's happening." Sometimes it feels like a relief to actually acknowledge, "This is what's happening."

And so we begin to taste the benefit of mindfulness and wisdom. We feel in the moment—we can feel this does lead in a different direction. We gain some sense of faith and confidence, maybe even joy and delight. Some of you have talked about that, a sense of, "It's so delightful to see this in such a different way." Even if it's frustration or something that we think of as unpleasant, to see it—"Oh, it's frustration that's arising." Several of you, many of you, have talked about laughing upon seeing these habits and patterns come up. That's the delight and joy that arise in connection with this mindfulness.

And those are some of the steps on the path of transcendent dependent origination. From faith, the engagement with confidence—and that faith is a kind of motivator that gets us to act on the teachings.

With faith as condition, delight arises. With delight as condition, joy arises. With joy as condition, tranquility arises. I may be missing a few steps here. With tranquility as condition, happiness arises. With happiness as condition, concentration arises.

That was not what I thought! Happiness is a supporting condition for concentration? I thought concentration was about holding on to something.

With concentration as condition comes knowing and seeing things as they are—beginning to see impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. And that leads to a kind of disenchantment with our familiar beliefs, our familiar habits and patterns. We get disenchanted with our idea that having something will make us happy. It's a good kind of disenchantment.

And then the mind begins to let go—a sense of not being bound up with all of our greed and aversion. The word is virāga, dispassion. The word may not have a flavor that sounds appealing, but it's very much a sense of release and letting go. And then release, freedom.

Right in the middle of looking at some pattern or habit—I talked about being with self-hatred and seeing something so clearly, seeing the belief, noticing the self-hatred coming up, seeing a thought and seeing the thought conditioning a belief being believed. And then recognizing: this is all just a constructed thought in the mind. It's nothing. It's just a construction. And it fell apart. Such a deep seeing, right in the midst of looking at something so challenging. The mind shifting and moving towards letting go. Bliss, ease, peace.

And I'll tell you—if I can do it, you can do it. There was a lot of self-hatred, a lot of miserableness. I was such a miserable person. This practice has transformed this mind and this body. It is possible. It takes confidence and commitment and willingness to be with wherever we wake up in this process of arising conditions of suffering.

We don't have to find the end of suffering. We don't have to find some kind of place of not having suffering in order to then see some insight into nibbāna. Suffering is the condition—when met with wisdom and mindfulness, suffering is a condition that leads to freedom.

So let's sit for a moment. Freedom is possible. The Buddha said, if it wasn't possible, I wouldn't ask you to do it.

CHAPTER 165

Disenchantment and Dispassion (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h04

> In this retreat talk from the one-month insight meditation retreat at Spirit Rock, Andrea Fella offers an in-depth exploration of two crucial stages on the path to liberation: disenchantment (nibbidā) and dispassion (virāga). Drawing from the Khandha Saṃyutta and teachings on transcendent dependent arising, she explains how seeing the five khandhas as impermanent naturally leads the mind toward release, much like water flowing downhill.
> Fella illuminates how nibbidā—literally meaning "finding out"—arises when we truly see that clinging to impermanent phenomena makes no sense. She honestly addresses the challenging emotional terrain practitioners may encounter at this stage: fear, terror, revulsion, homesickness for familiar ways of being, and profound disinterest. Rather than forcing attention on difficult experiences, she guides practitioners to notice these relationships themselves as arising phenomena. The talk includes the powerful teaching to Māluṅkyāputta, where the Buddha points to the natural absence of passion for things never experienced as a taste of virāga.
> Practical wisdom pervades this teaching, including how insight itself is impermanent yet leaves traces that allow us to recognize delusion when it returns. Fella offers the accessible analogy of outgrowing a childhood toy to help practitioners understand the natural fading of attachment. She concludes with Bhikkhu Bodhi's reminder that liberation comes not through escapism but through direct understanding of the conditioned—meeting our experience "in all its darkness."

Over these days and weeks, we've been exploring our experience, getting to know our experience as human experience.

When we first start looking at our experience, noticing what's happening, most often we notice what might be called the specific characteristics of experience as we attune and attend to our human experience. We notice that body sensation is pressure and pulsing and tingling and vibration. We begin to drop underneath the ideas of experience and touch into what the experience actually feels like.

And then as we keep exploring, as mindfulness gains momentum, as there's a little more continuity, it seems that the wisdom that grows as we explore experience begins to get interested in what we've called the more general characteristics of experience.

Bhante used this phrase the other day when he talked about anicca, dukkha, anatta. They're sometimes called the three general characteristics of experience—that all experience, whatever is happening, whether it's body sensations or emotions, moods, thoughts, sight, or sound, has these characteristics of impermanence, unreliability (not a reliable place for the mind to find lasting happiness), and not-self.

So our practice tends to head in this direction, towards curiosity about impermanent experience, and from that recognition we see it is unreliable. Also, the impermanent nature of experience—all experience, including what we think of as I, me, mine—we see that too comes and goes.

Impermanence, the seeing of impermanence, is pointed to over and over again in the suttas as how our mind begins to let go of its habits and patterns. The meeting of our direct experience, human body and mind, begins to point out to us that every single arising experience is impermanent. It will pass away, including this sense of self. And so the impermanent nature of experience is really highlighted as onward leading to the release of the mind from its craving, clinging, stress, and suffering.

There's a quote from the suttas. The Buddha says, in relation to the aggregates (sometimes the Buddha will point to impermanence through various aspects of experience, and in this case he's pointing to it through the five aggregates): "Form is impermanent, feeling is impermanent, perception is impermanent, volitional formations are impermanent, consciousness is impermanent. Seeing thus"—so actually experiencing form, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and consciousness as impermanent, not just hearing about it and thinking about it, but actually seeing the impermanent nature of our experience—he says, "Seeing thus, one experiences disenchantment towards form, disenchantment towards feeling, disenchantment towards perception, disenchantment towards volitional formations, disenchantment towards consciousness. Experiencing disenchantment, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, the mind is liberated. When it is liberated, there comes the knowledge: it is liberated. One understands: done is what had to be done, destroyed is birth, the holy life has been lived, done is what had to be done, and there is no more for this state of being."

It is liberated—the mind liberated from craving, liberated from clinging, liberated from greed, aversion, and delusion. And it points to the seeing of impermanence as the slanting, sloping, inclining towards—I think Diana used that phrase the other day—inclining towards freedom. Slanting, sloping, inclining towards freedom. As we see impermanence, our mind heads in that direction.

Here it says, "seeing thus"—seeing the impermanence of form, feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness—one experiences disenchantment. So it's a kind of natural occurrence, a natural arising.

There's another sutta that talks about this place in practice. It actually connects with the teaching I spoke about last time at the end of my talk, the teaching on transcendent dependent origination. And these two qualities, disenchantment and dispassion, are found in that list. I did mention them in my talk, and I'd like to land with these two words a little more today, to explore them with you—how the path of practice may unfold in this terrain as the mind begins to let go.

In one sutta, the path of the movement towards freedom is described as a very natural unfolding. It says, "When one has faith, there's no need for an act of will: may joy arise." As there is this kind of confidence—oh, there's a way, there's a path, there's something I can do—a delight leaps up in the heart that there's a possibility for freedom. So it says there's no need for an act of will to try to make delight arise. And it goes on, saying that when there is delight in the mind, there's no need for an act of will: may joy arise. And it goes through these steps of the movement in the direction of freedom. There's no need for an act of will.

It's natural that in one with delight, happiness arises. In one with delight, tranquility arises. And then the sutta describes how happiness leads to concentration, concentration leads to seeing things as they are. This includes seeing the three characteristics—seeing the nature of experience, the very nature of every single thing that happens as impermanent, unreliable, not self. Concentration is a supportive condition for seeing that nature of experience.

Then it says, when one sees things as they are—sees things as impermanent, unreliable, not self—there's no need for an act of will: may disenchantment arise. It is natural that disenchantment will arise in one who sees things as they are. And it says the same about dispassion arising from disenchantment.

This is understood at a certain point as being like water running downstream, water running down hills and rivers. The nature of water is to run downhill. At a certain point in practice, instead of the hindrances and our habits of mind having the upper hand—where it feels like when we relax and don't do anything, we get swept away in thought—there develops a kind of momentum in the direction of freedom. Gil Fronsdal sometimes says there's a biological movement in that direction, a biological imperative towards freedom when we begin to touch into experience as it actually is. That biological or natural inclination of mind towards freedom begins to lead, instead of our hindrances leading.

Let me explore these two words: disenchantment and dispassion.

Disenchantment is Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation of the Pali word nibbidā. I particularly appreciate this translation because it does feel like what happens at this point in practice. When we begin to really see things as deeply impermanent at a very moment-to-moment level, our system begins to understand and feel that it does not make any sense to cling to something that is slipping away. The habits, the patterns of greed, of wanting to hold on to something, of wanting to get rid of something—those habits and patterns are seen as relying on the delusion, or the enchantment, that things are permanent, that there is something reliable out there.

These are very deeply conditioned habits, though. It's not like seeing impermanence even at a really deep level once or twice completely uproots that tendency. It begins to wear away at it. This seeing of the impermanent nature—even as it is wearing away in this gradual way—this seeing of the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience begins to show us that we have been confused. Those vipallāsa: taking what is impermanent to be permanent, taking what is unreliable to be reliable, taking what is not self to be self. The habits and patterns of mind have enchanted us to believe that they're helping us.

It's amazing to me sometimes when I look at what's happening in the mind. When I was really caught by self-hatred, it was hard to understand why my mind would choose to do this. But just watching it over and over again, I began to see the kind of security it found in a familiar pattern. There was something in there, something that it thought it was doing for me. Enchanted—we can be enchanted by self-hatred. It's not typically what we would think of being enchanted by, but whatever habits and patterns we have, there's some part of the momentum of that habit or pattern that thinks it is making us safe somehow, making us feel grounded or loved in some fashion, making us feel like things are a little less vulnerable.

As we begin to really see the impermanent nature of experience, looking at what's happening in our minds, looking at clinging, looking at craving, looking at suffering—whatever's coming up—we don't have to wait for the hindrances to go away in order to see the impermanent, unreliable nature of even those things.

At one point on a retreat, I had this amazing recognition around some of these patterns and habits. The mind was really reaching out to try to find some place to land, to hold on. The first recognition was that this craving and clinging was a habit of mind, and that sometimes when something was going on, the mind would go for that habit and it would suffer. When we see the clinging, when we see the craving with mindfulness, we feel the suffering of it. That's not a mistake. It's actually how the mind begins to get an education, how it begins to educate itself: "Oh, this is not so helpful." We begin to see, too, that it's optional. It's not like the thing is making us crave it—our mind is constructing the craving.

Seeing that, seeing "the mind is doing this, the mind is constructing this idea that it needs this thing"—the mind is making stuff up there. There's a bit of enchantment: the craving, the clinging thinks it needs to get something.

Then I began to see, looking more at the experience, that what the mind was craving—I thought it was craving something out there, whether a good meal, pleasant sense experience, or getting rid of unpleasant sense experience, which tended to be my go-to thing. I felt like if I could get rid of the unpleasant experience, then I'd be okay. The mind thought it was trying to reach out and do something with something out there. But as I looked at this, I began to see: what the mind is craving is also something in the mind.

It's an idea. It was an idea that there was something unpleasant that was actually there, lasting and permanent. And so not only is the craving and the clinging a product of our mental activity, our mental creation, but the thing we think we're craving and clinging to is also a creation of our minds. We cannot actually cling to something that is impermanent. And so our mind makes up an idea and clings to an idea.

Check it out for yourself. What is it that you are actually craving? What are you actually craving when the mind is reaching out? So not only is that a construction of mind, it's also an impermanent, unreliable phenomenon. And then the "me" that I think needs to do this—that's also something made up by the mind.

Seeing all of this construction in the mind is another way that we become disenchanted. We begin to see that this whole project is like the mind just looking at itself and doing stuff inside. It's kind of crazy. And yet it is a craziness that we all share. We are not alone in this habit and pattern of wanting to get something, wanting to get rid of something. This is very deeply conditioned enchantment—an enchantment we share as human beings. It's the rare person that can see through this on their own, as the Buddha is said to have done. The rest of us need some help.

Bhikkhu Bodhi pointed out in an article he wrote about this topic that the word nibbidā, which he translates as disenchantment, literally means "finding out." Essentially, seeing the impermanent nature of experience helps us find out that we've been going about our project of finding happiness in a completely mistaken way.

Bhikkhu Bodhi describes the experience of disenchantment like this: "Nibbidā signifies the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena which supervenes when the illusion of their permanence, pleasure, and selfhood has been shattered by the light of correct knowledge and vision of things as they are."

With disenchantment, there's this recognition that there's no point in clinging or craving to something. There's a kind of natural withdrawal from wanting to crave, wanting to cling, from that whole pattern.

And yet, in my experience of this process, this time in practice of seeing the impermanent nature and beginning to recognize that the mind has been confused, that it has been enchanted and is no longer quite able to hold up its ideas and beliefs as strongly—it is a bumpy place in practice. It is a hard place in practice to begin to really deeply see that what we relied on for our whole way of being and living and finding happiness is completely mistaken.

Our minds don't just go, "Oh yeah, I'll serenely withdraw from that." They kick and scream and fight and say, "No, there's got to be someplace. Maybe that thing isn't worth clinging to, but there's got to be something. There's got to be." So deeply conditioned is this habit of trying to find something to land on, to hold on to, to permanently find a place to find happiness.

The experience at this point, when we're really seeing into the impermanent nature of experience—particularly seeing how things fall away—can be difficult. When we're seeing the arising of things, the arising side of impermanence, it can be quite delightful. Even seeing the arising and passing of things can be quite delightful. But when we start to see that things are just always vanishing, slipping away, it feels really unstable. It feels like really shaky ground.

There are some emotional responses to this time in practice. I think these are like resistance—different flavors of resistance to becoming disenchanted.

Nibbidā is sometimes translated as disgust or revulsion. I don't usually like to use that as the translation, but I have experienced at times that quality in really seeing the impermanent nature of experience, seeing things just slipping away—just kind of like, "Oh, enough." Or feeling like I'm being impinged on by sense experience incessantly, like, "Enough already, enough. Give me a break." There can be that place of revulsion or disgust, like, "Won't this ever stop?"

One of the reasons for naming some of these relationships—I'm going to name several different flavors—is because the way through this bumpy time of practice is not by trying to force yourself to be with that impermanent, slipping-away experience when there's so much resistance to it. Sometimes it feels like fear and terror, even. It can get that strong—like there's nowhere to land, nothing to hold on to. The mind just does not like these truths. At a very deep level, it doesn't like these truths. And so it relates to them in these ways: with disgust, with revulsion, with fear, with terror.

And the way through this is not by trying to force yourself to stay with the impermanent experience, but to notice the relationship. The path deepens at this time of practice by recognizing the fear, the terror, and noticing the relationship to this truth of impermanence. Because basically what's happening is that the system is sending up its flares: "No, it can't be this way." It's just an arising experience of "No, it can't be this way." And sometimes that comes out as fear or terror.

Sometimes the flavor of the relationship is—one of my teachers in Burma, Sayadaw U Janaka, used this description—homesickness. At times the feeling can be that, and I related to it. It's like the feeling of losing our familiar ways of landing in this world to find some comfort. Those are gone. It feels like you've lost a home, lost some place to snuggle in and say, "I'll be safe here." Sometimes it can have that quality of homesickness.

Sometimes it can have the flavor of just a kind of disinterest. At one point I was watching this incessant nature of experience, and at first it was like, "Enough already! Can't you stop?" So noticing that, noticing the fear, noticing all of that, watching the fear dissipate—there's this incessant nature of experience and the mind just sort of goes, "Oh, it's just not interesting."

So disinterest then. The mind isn't interested. This is an interesting place to recognize. And I think that the knowing of disinterest can be useful at many places in practice. Even if it's at a time when you're not actually seeing the depth of impermanence, sometimes we get bored or disinterested. That's a time when the mind will tend to wander if you don't notice it.

In this particular situation, noticing the impermanent nature, disinterest was happening. And I did notice that the mind would kind of slip out with the disinterest. It got so disinterested that it's like, "Yeah, let's just not pay attention." And I would wake up a second later, lost in some thought. "Wow, how did that happen? I was right there." Okay, there's disinterest. Disinterest slipped out. Just keep noticing that relationship.

To explore the quality of disinterest in general: earlier in my practice, I noticed a kind of state of mind of boredom. "Done with this, I don't want to practice anymore." That would arise in my mind. Not wanting to practice would arise. And at first when this was happening, I felt betrayed by my mind. I was telling myself, "I do want to practice," trying to shut down that belief. "I do want to practice. Not wanting to practice, not wanting to practice." I felt like either I had to believe that thought and stop practicing, or I had to get rid of the thought. It was not okay for that thought to simply be an arising. I didn't see it as just an arising.

And then I had the great fortune one day in Burma—we all listened to everybody else's interviews, everybody else's meetings. We all got in there at the same time, and the first person who described their experience got to report and then leave, but the rest of us heard everybody else's descriptions. I got to follow one person who was so clearly in a really continuous state of mindfulness. I thought, "Wow, she's really right in there." And she reported very matter-of-factly, "Not wanting to practice arose. And I noted: not wanting to practice."

I was like, "You can do that?" It was a revelation to me. When the mind is not interested, disinterest is arising. Boredom is arising. And it can be a flavor at this particular point in practice—the seeing of the impermanent nature of experience. And the practice deepens. The mind begins to let go of those wishes that it weren't so, that it weren't impermanent.

You know, we have this deep wish—so deep—that it weren't so, that things weren't impermanent. But the letting go of that wish happens through the seeing of these relationships. Wishing it weren't so, wishing it were otherwise—that's what's happening. Fear that there's no place to land—that's what's happening.

As the mind begins to align with the truths instead of resisting them, it more naturally moves in this direction of dispassion, of a deeper letting go. The mind begins to deeply understand that holding on to something that is slipping away just does not make sense. And so the movement toward clinging begins to release.

The word for this in Pali is virāga, often translated as dispassion. I mentioned the other day that the word dispassion can potentially have a negative feeling for us. We want to have some passion—like compassion. We like compassion. With passion. Compassion. Dispassion sounds dry, sounds like not caring, sounds disconnected. That's part of the reason I want to explore this word and this terrain a little bit, just to perhaps reorient the mind to what happens at this point in practice.

The word itself—virāga—the rāga part literally translates as a dye, a hue, a color, a deep color. And virāga means the fading of a dye, the fading of that intensity. Sometimes the analogy for sense desire among the hindrances is the colors, the swirl of colors in a bowl of water, how we just get enchanted by that swirl of colors, the rāga there. And so virāga is the fading of interest in the colors of experience.

This term—fading, the dye fading—when we think about how that happens, you might put a cloth in the sun for a long time and gradually it will fade. It will begin to bleach out as a natural process. And so the word itself possibly indicates a gradual process of letting go.

There are some descriptions of how this gradual letting go might happen. The Buddha describes in one place how the attachment to sensual pleasures faded for him. He said, "I abandoned the craving for sensual pleasures, removed the fever for sensual pleasures, and I abide without thirst, with the mind inwardly at peace. I see other beings who are not free from the lust for sensual pleasures, being devoured by craving for sensual pleasures, burning with fever for sensual pleasures, indulging in sensual pleasures, and I do not envy them, nor do I delight therein. Why is that? Because there is a delight apart from sensual pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, which surpasses even divine bliss. Since I take delight in that, I do not envy what is inferior, nor do I delight therein."

This points to different levels of what can fade, different levels of attachment that can release. The craving for sensual pleasures is a first level that might fade. At first as we meditate, we might begin to taste some of the ease and peace of wholesome states—perhaps a little bit of concentration that arises. These wholesome states give us a contrast to the pleasure of sensual experience. We begin to see that the mind, by relying on these wholesome states, can begin to abandon and let go of its reliance on sense pleasure.

And yet the Buddha says there is a delight apart from even unwholesome states. In another place he says that we should not even cling to wholesome states. He talks about the simile of the raft, where he says that if you've crossed over a flood—and in this case, the flood is a simile for greed, aversion, and delusion—you've used a raft to cross over. While crossing the flood, you probably had to hold on to the raft. The raft is an analogy for the Eightfold Path. You have to make effort. You need to hold on to the raft while you're in the midst of the flood. So there is some sense of using the wholesome states of the Eightfold Path while crossing over. They allow you to abandon, to let go of, to transcend the flood.

And yet he says, once you get to the other side, would you pick up the raft and carry it around on your head saying, "This has been useful to me to cross the flood, so I'll take it with me"? You wouldn't do that because it's no longer useful. And so, he says, we should abandon even wholesome states. How much more so should we abandon unwholesome states? By relying on wholesome states we can begin to abandon unwholesome states.

And then by relying on understanding the impermanent nature of wholesome states, we can begin to abandon wholesome states—by seeing that they too are just phenomena.

So there are different levels of attachment. We may get attached to the practice. I certainly have, and still am at times. And then I see, "Oh right, clinging to investigation—that's what's happening right now." So there may be different levels of fading away: by relying on this, abandon that. We can begin to let go. I mean, if I had tried to let go of the wholesome states while self-hatred was running amok, it would not have been very pretty.

So the relying on, the kind of holding to—"Yes, I need to be mindful of this, I need to direct my attention, I need to know what's happening here"—that began to allow the mind to let go, for that attachment to fade. And then the whole attachment to those ideas and beliefs of "I'm no good"—those don't have much traction in the mind anymore. The habits and patterns fade. But then there are still others. It's not like one big searing insight that transforms everything. There's a gradual unfolding, a gradual nature to this. And the Buddha talked about that over and over again—the gradual path.

So there is this fading aspect of dispassion, the fading away of our attachment to things. The Dalai Lama has famously said, "Look at the trajectory of your practice over the course of five or ten years. Look at what's changed." You will notice that things are no longer quite so sticky over a long course of practice. There may still be some sticky things, but you can take some appreciation, some delight and joy, in what has been released.

And there are times in our practice, especially on a long retreat, where we see into something so clearly that the mind lets go of a clinging. We feel like it's so obvious why picking anything up is not a good idea. It's so obvious that craving causes suffering, that craving and suffering arise together. It's so obvious that the mind just stops doing it. And it seems so natural, so clear. Like, "How can I not see this?"

And then, ten minutes later, the mind is caught again wanting something, feeling like it's got to have that thing.

Seeing that multiple times, I began to recognize, "Well, I guess it is actually not that obvious." Yes, it seems so obvious when greed, aversion, and delusion are not active in the mind. The clarity of non-clinging and the value of non-clinging is really obvious. But as soon as greed re-arises, the belief of greed that "I need something"—it just obscures that understanding.

And yet, having seen something so clearly, I did begin to recognize over time: that experience wasn't me fooling myself. For the first few times looking back, I thought, "I must not have really seen that. If it was so clear then, it would still be clear now." I thought I had deluded myself into thinking I was seeing clearly. But that was delusion talking.

So this understanding, insight itself, is impermanent. It comes and goes too. And yet once we've seen through something, once we've understood something, then when the delusion comes back, the understanding isn't completely gone. It may not be active—the wisdom may not be shattering that delusion in the moment—but we can know in that moment, "Oh, the mind is confused. The mind is deluded. The mind has been enchanted again."

We can know that because we've seen it without that enchantment. This is how we can actually start to see delusion working in the mind. It's not a problem, actually, that the delusion comes back. It's just the momentum of that habit re-arising. And yet now we can see, "Oh, there's that habit re-arising." We can see, "This is the mind caught by thinking it's useful to cling again." And seeing that, there can be a little more space to hold it just as another arising, not to get all caught in it again. We can know delusion.

There's an aspect of dispassion that's also connected to letting go. There's a passage about freedom, about nibbāna, that basically equates dispassion and nibbāna—this quality of mind that is just not moving to pick up craving, not moving to pick up anything. This is the definition of freedom. This is peaceful.

This is the sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbāna. The relinquishment of all attachments. Dispassion.

Another definition for nibbāna, for freedom, is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. We could also say the non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion. This came up in response to a question Bhante responded to the other day. Somebody asked if the Buddha, after his awakening, experienced any stressful qualities in the mind. His description of that state—I'll read the whole paragraph, which describes the opposite of freedom:

"Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up"—and the word translated as "lust" here is rāga, that same word that virāga is the opposite of—"if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbāna, immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

No mental pain or grief, experienceable in this life. The absence of greed, the non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion. So dispassion, virāga, is the absence of the arising of that rāga, that movement, that craving, that wanting.

Another way to understand dispassion is the not picking up of something. Typically greed, aversion, and delusion will pick up and try to hold onto something. So let me offer two ways to feel into this.

One is to think back to something that you loved as a child, some toy. What was your favorite toy when you were five years old? Have you even thought about that recently? What was that toy? And remembering perhaps your relationship to that toy over time. There might have been a period where you just loved that toy and it went with you everywhere. You would not put it down. And then as you aged, as you grew, that toy began to lose some of its interest for you. Very naturally. Just the aging process, the maturation process—that particular toy began to lose some of its appeal. And yet you might go back to it every now and then, find some pleasure in it, some comfort in it, and then lose interest again. And now, here as an adult, where is that toy? Is there any attachment or interest in it at all?

In that process of thinking about losing interest in a toy, disenchantment is the process of realizing it's not so interesting anymore. Perhaps going back to it occasionally—is there anything still there? And then losing interest again. So there's that back and forth. Until one finally lets go at a certain point. That's the letting go, the experience of just not being interested anymore. That perhaps is the beginning of dispassion.

But at a certain point, even interest and disinterest become irrelevant. Thinking back on that toy now, is there any sense of interest or disinterest? It's just like, "Yeah, it's a thing." We don't even think of picking it up. It's not relevant to pick it up. It has no value in our lives to pick up that toy and play with it as an adult. That's kind of what dispassion is like. Not picking it up. It's just not relevant. It's not that we hate it—there's no aversion. The relationship simply isn't relevant anymore. It's just an old relationship that no longer makes sense. And that's what dispassion is like.

As I was preparing for this talk today, one thing I do is read through the suttas. I was looking for where the word virāga appears, and I found one that I hadn't remembered in a while. It's an interesting sutta.

It's very similar to the Bahiya Sutta. There's a portion of the sutta that gives that same teaching the Buddha offers to Bahiya—about how in the seen there is only the seen, in the heard only the heard, in the sensed only the sensed. That's how you should train yourself, he says.

But to this person, Malunkyaputta, he starts from a little different place before giving that teaching. He says, "What do you think? The forms cognizable via the eye that are unseen by you, that have never before been seen, that you don't see, that are not there to be seen by you—do you have any desire or passion for those?" And Malunkyaputta says, "No."

Just let this in. Sounds cognizable by the ear that have never been heard, that you don't hear, that are not to be heard by you—do you have any desire or passion for those?

For me, as I reflected on this, it gave me a taste. I felt into that. Sights not seen. There is that quality of dispassion that can be tasted in the reflection on how there are many things I know nothing about. No passion one way or the other. No interest or disinterest about things unseen. A little taste of that quality of dispassion.

Smells cognizable by the nose that are not smelled by you, that have never before been smelled, that you don't smell, and that are not there to be smelled by you—is there any desire or passion in that?

And then the Buddha goes on to offer the teaching for things that are heard, seen, sensed, cognized. In reference to the seen, let there be only the seen.

I think he gave Malunkyaputta this kind of pointing, almost a pointing-out instruction for what dispassion might feel like. And then it's like, okay, for things that are seen, that's also possible. In the seen is only the seen. In the heard is only the heard. In the sensed is only the sensed. In the cognized is only the cognized. That's how you should train yourself.

When for you in the seen there will be only the seen, in the heard only the heard, in the sensed only the sensed, in the cognized only the cognized, then there is no "you" in connection with that. Just seeing, just smelling, just sensing, just cognizing. A thought arising being known, no "you" in terms of that. When there is no "you" in terms of that, there is no "you" there. When there is no "you" there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This is the end of suffering.

I'll end with another quote from Bhikkhu Bodhi about this process of moving in the direction of freedom, of disenchantment, of dispassion, of realizing nibbana, of realizing the unconditioned as it is sometimes called.

Bhikkhu Bodhi says, "Though the realization of the unconditioned requires a turning away from the conditioned—we could say the withdrawal from, the dispassion from, requires the dispassion for the conditioned—it must be emphasized that this realization is achieved precisely through the understanding of the conditioned. Nibbana cannot be reached by backing off from a direct confrontation with samsara, with suffering, to lose oneself in a blissful oblivion to the world. The path to liberation is a path of understanding, of comprehension and transcendence, not of escapism or emotional self-indulgence. Nibbana can only be attained by turning one's gaze towards samsara, towards the conditioned, towards suffering, and scrutinizing it in all its darkness. The understanding of the conditioned is the way to the unconditioned."

Let's sit for a moment.

Thank you for your attention and for your commitment to meeting your experience in all its darkness.

CHAPTER 166

Equanimity Practice

Andrea Fella · 29 min

> In this guided meditation from the March Insight Meditation One Month Retreat, Andrea Fella leads practitioners through a systematic equanimity (upekkhā) practice, the fourth of the brahmavihārās or divine abodes. She explains the traditional progression of directing equanimity toward different categories of beings: beginning with a neutral person where balance is easiest, then moving to a benefactor, dear friend, difficult person, and finally oneself—noted in the commentaries as the most challenging.
> The practice centers on wisdom phrases that acknowledge the truth of kamma (karma): "You are the owner of your karma. Your happiness or unhappiness depends upon your actions and choices, not upon my wishes for you." Andrea emphasizes that this is not merely a mental exercise but an embodied exploration, inviting practitioners to feel with mindfulness how each expression lands in the heart. She notes how resistance, clinging, or disconnection that arises reveals where we are in a "rub" with wisdom—valuable information rather than something to judge.
> Andrea highlights the interconnection between equanimity and the other brahmavihārās, observing how the heart may naturally shade toward mettā, karuṇā (compassion), or muditā (sympathetic joy) as we connect with different beings. She connects this formal practice to vipassanā meditation itself, noting that mindfulness practice is fundamentally an equanimity practice—cultivating the capacity to meet whatever arises with balanced awareness. The session concludes by extending equanimity to all beings everywhere, dedicating the merit of this wholesome intention toward the happiness and freedom of all.

In this formal equanimity practice that we'll be doing, which Bhante introduced yesterday, we typically start with a neutral person—someone for whom there's not a lot of relationship, someone we don't know much about. That's the place where it's easiest to hold that balance of mind. Then we move to a benefactor, a dear friend, and then a difficult person. It is said in the commentaries, my understanding is, that the self is the hardest to wish that balance of mind for, to have that sense of equanimity for.

And I would say that what we are doing in our Vipassana practice, our mindfulness practice, is an equanimity practice. We are cultivating that capacity to have equanimity for whatever arises in our hearts and minds.

So allowing yourself to find a posture that feels easeful, comfortable. And the attention—allowing the attention to just take in how you are in this moment. Can there be a sense of allowing how you are to be just as you are? What we've been doing in the mindfulness practice.

Perhaps begin by recollecting or reflecting on how helpful it is, what the benefit of a mind that is balanced and non-reactive is for the world, is for relationship, is for the planet. Maybe appreciating the capacity or the possibility of that, even if we're not really feeling it. Just bringing to mind the value of that non-reactivity, of that balance of mind. Perhaps sensing into what a gift it would be, what a gift it can be, to bring a peaceful heart into our relationships, into the world.

And perhaps you can touch into even just a little bit from that reflection of the value. Maybe you can taste just a little bit, a sense of okayness.

We'll begin with bringing a person to mind, a neutral person, perhaps a person you've been working with over these weeks as a neutral person. Bringing that person into mind and expressing or connecting to these phrases of wisdom. I'll offer a few different ones, much as Bhante did yesterday.

"You're the owner of your karma. Your happiness or unhappiness depends upon your actions and choices, not upon my wishes for you."

Or another flavor: "I care for you but cannot make your choices for you."

Or another flavor: "I wish you happiness and ease and understand that your journey is your own."

In connecting with these expressions of wisdom, these thoughts of wisdom, and holding this person in mind—this is not simply a mental exercise. Expressing that phrase of wisdom in connection with that person, take some time to feel with mindfulness how it lands in your heart, in your system, to express that wisdom. "I care for you, but I cannot make your choices for you."

At times there may be an okayness with the neutral person, perhaps a sense that it feels resonant, feels like there's an alignment with that. That may be just the beginning flavor of equanimity in relationship to that being, that person.

With the neutral person there also might be a little bit of a sense of, well, do I really care about this person? And so maybe a tiny bit of disconnection. Noticing that, not to judge ourselves for what our relationship is to this wisdom. The job of the wisdom is to draw out its opposite, where we are in a rub with it. And so if you feel any kind of resistance or clinging or holding or pushing, that too, that too can be there.

Connect with the being. Express the wisdom phrase and feel how it lands with mindfulness—to make that wish.

Allowing yourself to bring a benefactor, someone for whom it's easy to connect with without a complicated relationship but with a deep sense of care. And connecting to the expression of wisdom: "You're the owner of your karma. Your happiness and unhappiness depend upon your actions and choices, not upon my wishes for you."

And again, reflecting, touching into how it feels to express that in relationship to this being. Holding this being in your mind and this expression of wisdom. It may feel different than with the neutral person. Feeling into how it is. Connect to the being.

Express the wisdom and feel how it lands. Perhaps bowing to your benefactor internally, then letting go and bringing a dear friend into your heart.

Really in this period, we're just going to get a flavor with each being of perhaps some of the differences, some of the places of stickiness that happen as we explore expressing this wish for different beings.

Bringing a dear friend into mind, bringing the relationship into mind here really, where there's closer connection. I sometimes would just envision as if I was really sitting right in front of that person, the feeling of that.

And then: I wish you happiness, but I can't make your choices for you. How does that feel, to express that wish for this dear friend? Or dear one, perhaps. A dear one in your life—maybe a relation rather than a friend.

If there's a struggle or difficulty, a strong kind of difficulty that comes up, sometimes additional wisdom reflections around just the vastness of change and the uncontrollable nature of experience and the conditioned nature of experience for all of us might support a little more space to hold what arises in relationship to the dear one.

Sometimes in this exploration, especially with those we are closer to, the realities of the relationship, what's actually going on in their lives, can kind of bubble up. It may be that there's particular suffering or particular happiness that's happening for somebody.

And so sometimes the flavor of the heart in making this wish can begin to shade towards compassion, metta, or sympathetic joy. That's okay. All four of these Brahma Viharas really connect as the heart opens with this equanimity.

Connecting with the dear one: I care for you, and I understand you have your own journey. Perhaps acknowledging, bowing internally to your dear one. Thanking them for this participation.

And letting your mind connect with someone for whom there's a little bit of rub—a being with whom there's a challenge or difficulty. Seeing if there can be a sense of connection and an expression of the wish: You are the owner of your karma. Your happiness or unhappiness depends upon your choices and actions, not upon my wishes for you.

Again, feeling into how it feels internally in your heart to express this wish. Sometimes there can be, with a difficult person, a little bit of a tone in offering this phrase—a little bit of blame or judgment. Just noticing that if it happens. Exploring the possibility of a little more neutrality there, expressing it as wisdom. And as with other Brahma Vihara practices, if one particular being is too triggering, let go of that being. Connect again to a place where it's a little easier.

Letting go of this person or being, and letting yourself connect with yourself. Perhaps just in the experience of sitting here. Being with yourself. And connecting with this expression of wisdom in relationship to yourself: I too am the owner of my karma. My choices and actions shape the unfolding of my journey. My happiness or unhappiness depends upon my choices and actions. Feeling into how that lands, to make that wish.

And for the last minute together, connecting to the wider world: All beings are the owners of their karma. Their happiness or unhappiness depends upon their choices and actions, not upon my wishes.

May the goodness of our intention towards wisdom be a condition for the happiness, well-being, and freedom of all beings everywhere. May our wholesome actions, wholesome movements of heart and mind, ripple out and touch all in the world. May all beings know peace.

Thank you for your willingness to explore this equanimity practice for this entire month—or two months, having been here for a month or two—really exploring this possibility of a heart of peace. As was said last night, the fact that you're even in this room is an amazing thing. The heart of goodness. There's so much goodness in this room. So much. Let yourself soak it in. Soak in your own goodness and the goodness of this field.

May it serve the planet.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 167

The Story of Aṅgulimāla (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 1h00

In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella shares the complete story of Aṅgulimāla from the Aṅgulimāla Sutta (MN 86), weaving together both the canonical account and the rich backstory from the commentaries. The tale begins with a promising student named Ahiṃsaka (meaning "non-harmer") whose fellow students' jealousy leads them to plant false rumors with their teacher. Through this narrative, Fella illuminates how the three unwholesome roots—greed, aversion, and delusion—create ripple effects of harm, and how confirmation bias and the power of repeated falsehood can corrupt even wise minds.

Fella draws compelling parallels to modern psychological research, including the Milgram experiments on obedience to authority, demonstrating how these ancient teachings about the human mind remain remarkably relevant. She explores how power dynamics can lead people to abandon their ethical principles, and how the Buddha's teaching that "you are the owner of your actions" serves as a crucial reminder of personal responsibility.

The talk culminates in Aṅgulimāla's encounter with the Buddha, his transformation, and his eventual full awakening—despite having killed 999 people. Fella emphasizes how sīla (ethical conduct) serves as both a protective boundary and a foundation for meditation practice. The story offers profound hope: if Aṅgulimāla could find liberation, transformation remains possible for anyone willing to commit to the Noble Eightfold Path.

This evening I thought to tell a story from the time of the Buddha. It's a story that I think really speaks to just how the confusion of our minds can affect not only ourselves but others—the ripple effects—and yet the possibility of transformation even right in the midst of deep confusion.

In reflecting on this story, it feels to me that there are many parallels between things that happen in this story and things that happen today in the world. It's a reflection that the human mind—the greed, the aversion, the delusion that the Buddha spoke about—creates so much stress and suffering both internally and externally. That part of our minds hasn't changed much in the last 2,600 years. And so the teachings of the Buddha, as we all have found, have real value. I think there's a deep appreciation for the value and the transformative power of these teachings to help turn the mind away from greed, aversion, and delusion towards wholesomeness, towards wisdom, towards compassion, towards equanimity.

The story is the story of Aṅgulimāla. Many of you, or at least some of you, I'm sure have heard of this story. Aṅgulimāla was a mass murderer at the time of the Buddha. Certain parts of this story are pretty familiar to those who have studied the suttas. There's a whole sutta in the middle-length discourses, in the Majjhima Nikāya, titled the Aṅgulimāla Sutta that tells his story of the time he met the Buddha and the transformation that happened for him. There's also a whole backstory that the commentaries provide about how Aṅgulimāla became a mass murderer. That's the piece I really want to fill in because, to me, it has so much richness of teaching—this exploration of what the conditioning was that led someone in that direction. So it's very much a story of conditioning.

Some aspects of this story are magical or mythological, and I don't know how much of it has been shaped and sculpted over the years, how much of it is actual fact. And yet there does seem to have been a person who was a criminal. The Vinaya, the Buddha's teachings on the monastic rules, does speak about Aṅgulimāla and some rules that came out of the situation with him. So in all likelihood he was an actual person at the time of the Buddha.

I'm going to tell some of this story by reading from a compilation. Hellmuth Hecker created this version based on a combination of the backstory from the commentaries and the sutta. So I'll read some of it from Hellmuth Hecker's version and some of it I'll tell myself. But I'll start with Hellmuth Hecker's version:

At the time of the Buddha, at the court of King Pasenadi of Kosala, there was a learned Brahmin called Bhagavagaga who held the office of royal chaplain and was thus one of the kingdom's highest dignitaries. One night his wife, Mantāni, gave birth to a son. Soon afterwards, the father cast the boy's horoscope and to his consternation found that his son was born under the robber constellation of the planets. This indicated that the boy would have within him a tendency to commit robbery.

On the day of the child's birth there was another disquieting event. All the weapons in the armory of the city of Sāvatthī had suddenly begun to sparkle. In the morning, the Brahmin went to the palace as usual and asked the king how he had slept.

"How could I have slept well?" replied the king. "I woke up in the night and saw that my auspicious weapons lying at the end of my bed were in a bright sparkle. So I was afraid and perturbed. Should this mean danger to the kingdom or to my life?"

The Brahmin said, "Do not have any fear, oh king. The same strange thing happened in the entire city, and it does not concern you. Last night my wife bore me a son, and unfortunately his horoscope had the robber constellation. This must have been the cause for the weapons sparkling."

The king asked, "Will he be a lone robber or the chief of a gang?"

"He will do it alone, your majesty."

And the man whose son was just born then says to the king, "What if we were to kill him now to prevent any future misdeeds?" He was willing to sacrifice his own son out of concern for the kingdom.

But the king says, "As he would be a loner, let him be raised and properly educated. Then perhaps he may lose these tendencies."

So the Brahmin and his wife named their son Ahiṃsaka, which in Pāli means "non-harming." They gave him a name that would support his movement away from harm. And they raised him to be intelligent and studious. He grew up well-behaved, studious, intelligent, and very strong in his body. The parents had good reason to feel that his tendencies—they didn't see any tendencies as a child toward becoming a bad person.

When Ahimsaka reached the age for formal education, his father sent him to study in Taxila, an ancient and renowned place of learning in India. There he was accepted as a student by the institution's main teacher.

Ahimsaka proved to be exceptionally studious and deeply engaged with his teacher. They developed a very good relationship. He surpassed all of his fellow students and became the teacher's favorite.

The other students grew jealous. "Since that young Ahimsaka came, we are almost forgotten," they said among themselves. "We must put a stop to this and cause a break between him and the teacher."

They began by slandering Ahimsaka, but this approach gained no traction because his behavior was utterly impeccable. So these jealous students decided on another route—they would plant seeds of doubt in the teacher's mind.

In three separate groups, seemingly unrelated, they approached the teacher. The first group said, "We have the sense, we believe there is talk being heard, and we think Ahimsaka is plotting against you." The teacher dismissed them: "Don't tell me this non-sense."

The second group, appearing unconnected to the first, came with the same message: "We've heard this; we think Ahimsaka is plotting against you." Again the teacher rejected their claims: "This is ridiculous. He is like my son. I know him so well."

Then a third group came, repeating the same accusation, but adding: "Well, if our teacher does not trust us, then examine it for yourself. See for yourself. Find out for yourself if Ahimsaka is plotting against you."

The story tells us: "Once suspicion is roused, finally the poisonous seed of suspicion took root in the teacher's heart, and he came to believe the possibility that Ahimsaka wanted to push him out. Once suspicion is roused, one can always find something that seems to confirm it."

The teacher's suspicion grew into conviction. "I must kill him or get him killed," he thought. But then he continued reasoning: "It will not be easy to kill such a strong man. Besides, if he is slain while living here as my pupil, it will harm my reputation, and students may no longer come to me. I must think of some other device to get rid of him as well as to punish him."

Let me pause here and reflect on what has just transpired in this story.

We have the jealousy of students. Ahimsaka, simply being who he is, is a delight to be around. The teacher genuinely loves him. He is doing nothing wrong. The story makes clear that the seeds of doubt the students are planting are complete falsehoods—they are fake news.

Jealousy contains probably an equal mixture of greed, aversion, and delusion. There is the greed of wanting something someone else possesses—in this case, the close relationship with the teacher. There is the aversion arising from not having it, and aversion toward the person who seems to be supplanting you. And there is the delusion that acting on these impulses would bring actual happiness—the deluded belief that getting rid of Ahimsaka, creating a split between teacher and student, would create lasting happiness for them.

So jealousy, this unwholesome motivation, prompted the students to lie, prompted them to act unskillfully, prompted them to be unethical in order to get what they wanted. We see the condition of unwholesome mind states creating unskillful, unethical behaviors.

And then we have this propaganda dynamic at work in the story—the repeated hearing of something. Over time, we begin to take in as truth what we hear repeatedly. We become more likely to believe something we've encountered again and again. Then we might see the world from that perspective, or if we're investigating whether something is true, we might look for evidence that supports it while ignoring evidence that disconfirms it.

This is the well-known tendency of confirmation bias that we discussed a week or two ago. This is a teaching about how our minds work, captured in that sentence: "Once suspicion is roused, one can always find something that seems to confirm it."

This is such a tendency of our minds. It's a frightening aspect of our minds in some ways. We talked about this the other day—how our minds will tend to not see something when we have a particular perspective. Actually not see it.

And yet, recognizing that this is how our minds work, knowing this information is so useful, because it does begin to help us to potentially question what we take as our views, what we take as true, what we take as what we believe.

There have been some studies done on how quickly views form. There's an article called "Why Facts Don't Change Our Minds," and in it they discuss a study about how quickly a view was formed. In this study, students were handed packets of information about a pair of firefighters, Frank K. and George H. Frank's bio noted that, among other things, he had a baby daughter and liked to scuba dive. George had a small son and played golf. The packets also included the men's responses on what the researchers called the Risky-Conservative Choice Test.

According to one version of the packet, Frank was a successful firefighter who, on the test, almost always went with the safest option. In the other version, Frank also chose the safest option, but he was a lousy firefighter who'd been put on report by his supervisors several times.

Midway through the study, the students were informed that they'd been misled and that the information they'd received was entirely fictitious. The students were then asked to describe their own beliefs. What sort of attitude toward risk did they think a successful firefighter would have? The students who'd received the first packet said they thought he would avoid it. The students in the second group thought he'd embrace it.

The researchers noted, "Even after the evidence for their beliefs has been totally refuted, people fail to make appropriate revisions in their beliefs." They observed that in this case, the failure was particularly impressive since two data points—Frank and George—would never have been enough information to generalize from. So one exposure to information, told almost immediately it was fake news, and still that first impression shaped their views. The researchers noted, "Once formed, impressions are remarkably perseverant."

This is humbling. This is humbling, to see this, to recognize just how quickly views can form. And often we don't even know they're views. So knowing something about this can help us.

There are other places in this article that talk about ways we can begin to correct for this confirmation bias. There was a study where they asked people their views, and then asked them to explain in detail what they thought about particular political policies. People had very strong views about these policies, but when asked to describe in detail how those policies would actually work, they realized that they didn't really know how they would work, and they backed off a little bit on the intensity of their beliefs.

So this is a bit of a clue. Can we reflect a little more carefully on the ramifications of what we think?

The story continues. The teacher has decided, based on fake news, based on information that was not true—he did not know that he was being lied to. So he didn't get that extra bit of information. You know, "by the way, this was false." Still might have gotten in there, because just as this example shows, how quickly views can form. But the teacher had been told things that weren't true, yet he believes they were true. And in his own exploration, he confirmed they were true. So the teacher is acting out of what he thinks of as true.

Here's where I feel like there's a thread of how sīla, ethical conduct, really plays out in our lives in the world. The students, out of jealousy, told lies. Just think about the ripple effects here that are happening based on these actions, and how potent our actions can be, especially when they're rooted in unethical conduct. I mean, this is a piece of this story—how potent unethical conduct is.

So the students told these lies out of jealousy. The teacher, believing them—so the teacher is now acting out of what he thinks of as true. His response is: I need to have him killed, or somehow get rid of him. That's coming out of what he thinks of as true. And yet again, the action that his mind is pointing him toward, out of anger, out of fear, out of aversion, out of fear that he's going to somehow be supplanted—he's contemplating taking life.

the movement towards unethical conduct in this story.

I think another piece of this that's useful to reflect on is the teacher taking action, believing that the beliefs he's basing his actions on are true. It's delusional, it's not true, and yet we see the power of belief to shape action—especially someone who holds power. In this case the teacher holds some power, and that will come out in just a moment in terms of what unfolds between the teacher and Angulimala to come.

So the story continues. It happened that soon afterwards, Ahimsaka's course of studies had come to an end and he was preparing to go home. The teacher called him and said, "My dear Ahimsaka, for one who has completed his studies, it is a duty to give a gift of honor to his teacher. So give it to me."

Ahimsaka replies, "Certainly master, what shall I give?"

The teacher replies, "You must bring me a thousand human little fingers of the right hand. This will be your concluding ceremonial homage to the science you have learned."

Ahimsaka's immediate response is, "I can't do that. How can I do that? My family has never engaged in violence. They're harmless people."

The teacher says, "Well, if the science does not receive its due ceremonial homage, it will yield no fruit for you."

Then Ahimsaka consented, and after worshipping his teacher, he left.

The commentaries kind of question this—there's a wondering why Ahimsaka went ahead with this. They speculate that some of it might have to do with the predisposition that was foretold in his horoscope when he was born, that he was born with these propensities for violence. But the other piece that is considered is the unquestioning devotion to a teacher. The teacher seemed to understand this. He understood that Ahimsaka, being a dutiful student—even the language here is, "Well, if the science does not receive its due ceremonial homage, it will yield no fruit for you"—so there's this devotional movement to do what the teacher asks.

This is a power differential here. Ahimsaka trusted the teacher and took up his suggestion.

Again, there are some studies that point to this being not just a dynamic that played out in ancient India in this story. The dynamic around power and people who will do things that they know are unethical when asked to do so by someone in power and control—this has played out over history.

After World War II there was a lot of questioning. Researchers took up the question of how this could have happened, that ordinary human beings would do this kind of thing to the Jewish community. And so there were studies about whether power was a significant factor. One of the researchers at Stanford—some of you may have heard about the Milgram studies—Milgram speculated that power was a big piece of this. Someone in authority telling you to do something. He wondered how willing people would be to go against what they know is ethically wrong, given someone in authority telling them they should do it.

So he created a study where two people came in: one was a confederate, a participant in the whole experiment, while the other was the person being experimented on. These two people arrived at the lab and were both told this was an experiment about learning, looking at how much negative reinforcement would support or diminish learning. One person drew a straw indicating they would be the learner, the other would be the person who administered the punishment—the negative reinforcement.

The person who was unknowing about this experiment was always the one who ended up delivering the punishment. The setting was that somebody was in a room, hooked up to a machine that would deliver shocks. Questions were asked, and if they got them wrong, they were given shocks. The participant who didn't know about the experiment was the one giving the shocks.

This machine had a dial that went from 15 volts to 450 volts. At 15 volts, it said "mild shock." At 450 volts, it said "danger." As the experiment progressed, the learner was answering many questions wrong, and so the experimenter would tell the person giving the shocks, "Okay, you need to turn up the dial, make the shock more painful."

As the voltage increased, the confederate would start screaming. They weren't actually being shocked—they were acting—but they would scream, and the person giving the shocks would look at the experimenter. Often there was this sense of, "Should we keep going with this?" And the experimenter would say things like, "The experiment requires that you continue. Please continue. Keep going." In a neutral way, but with that prompting.

The experiment requires that you continue. Two-thirds of the participants—two-thirds—delivered the highest level of shock, which would have been very dangerous. I don't know, it could have even caused death. Two-thirds of the people. And everyone in the study went to a significant level. Everyone went to a very significant level of delivering shocks.

Milgram wrote: "I set up a simple experiment at Yale University to test how much pain an ordinary citizen would inflict on another person, simply because he was ordered to do so by an experimental scientist. Stark authority was pitted against the participant's strongest moral imperatives against hurting others, and with the participant's ears ringing with the screams of the victims, authority won more often than not. The extreme willingness of adults to go to almost any lengths on the command of an authority constitutes the chief finding of the study and the fact that most urgently demands explanation."

There were some additional studies they did to moderate or check what aspects might change whether somebody would be willing to do this. Something as simple as taking the lab coat off the scientist reduced participation. But the thing that almost completely eliminated it was when the people were reminded that they carry the responsibility for their actions in the experiment. They were reminded that if harm comes to that person, it's your responsibility. Almost no one was prepared to obey in that case.

This is really the teaching on karma. The Buddha says—and we talked about this in the equanimity phrases—you are the owner of your actions. The responsibility for your actions lies with you. So again, this is pointing to a teaching on ethics: that we are the owner of our actions, that whether we act ethically or unethically has an effect not only on others but on us.

I think there's a humbleness in seeing how little power it takes for people to forego their own sense of ethics when they're not reminded of it. Maybe we should remind ourselves daily of this. The Buddha encouraged us to remind ourselves daily: I am the owner of my karma, the owner of my actions. My happiness and unhappiness depend upon those actions.

So ethics supports us. Commitment to ethics can help us counter some of the powerful forces of ignorance and craving in our minds. If the students had thought about not lying because that action would be a breach of sila, a breach of ethics, they might have looked at their minds and seen the aversion and the greed in there and chosen not to act on it. Sometimes just the not acting—the ethics—can be a kind of warning bell for us. Are we getting ready to act unethically? There's some ignorance and delusion there. So it's a really useful guideline for us.

So Ahimsaka goes off to get the thousand fingers, and he chooses to do so not by going to a charnel ground and chopping off fingers of corpses, but by killing victims and cutting off their fingers. He basically terrorized the neighborhood. People in that area went to the king and said, "You've got to do something. This guy is killing everybody. This is a problem."

And at this point, the Buddha enters the story.

At this point, Ahimsaka has killed 999 people, so he has one more person to kill to fulfill his obligation to the teacher. The news is getting out, the whole neighborhood is talking to the king, and Angulimala's mother—oh, and I forgot to tell you how he got the name Angulimala. The name literally means "garland of fingers." Mala of fingers. Angulimala. That's how he got the name, because he strung the fingers that he cut off into a garland and wore them around his neck.

His mother was in the neighborhood, and she had an intuition. Nobody knew who Angulimala was, but his mother had the intuition that it was him, because he had never come home from school. She just had that sense that it might be him, and so she decided to go find out—to put herself in the way of this person who was killing all these people.

At the same time, the Buddha, with his kind of magical power, surveys the world and understands that Angulimala is getting ready to kill his mother. There's a connection discussed in the suttas, a deep connection between Angulimala and the Buddha over many lifetimes. The Buddha saw that in killing your mother, according to Buddhist cosmology, you are taking an action that would prevent you from being awakened in this lifetime. But the Buddha also saw that Angulimala had actually developed so many wholesome qualities that he had the capacity to become fully awakened in this very lifetime. If he killed his mother, however, that would nullify the possibility.

And so the Buddha decides to put himself in the way of Angulimala, to go search out Angulimala.

At this point, the story becomes a little bit mystical. The Buddha finds Angulimala, and Angulimala sees both his mother coming and the Buddha coming at the same time. He sees his mother, recognizes her, and thinks, "Well, it's my mother, but I need this thousandth finger." The compassion in his heart is so dead at that moment that he is even contemplating killing his mother.

The Buddha comes into the picture, and Angulimala sees him. He doesn't know this is the Buddha—he thinks he's just some random ascetic wandering through the forest. And so he says, "I'll kill him instead. Why kill my mother?" He didn't understand that the consequences would be equally severe for killing a Buddha.

Angulimala sees the Buddha and starts to chase him, to follow him. But the Buddha used some of his supernormal powers to make it impossible for Angulimala to catch him. The Buddha was walking at a normal walking meditation pace, and Angulimala was running as fast as he could, yet he couldn't catch up.

Angulimala thought, "This is amazing. Formerly I caught up even with a galloping elephant and seized it. And I can't catch up with this monk who's walking at his normal pace. What's going on?" He stopped running and yelled out to the Buddha, "Stop! Stop, monk! Stop!"

The Buddha kept walking and said, "I have stopped, Angulimala. It is time for you to stop."

This jarred his mind, because in that moment Angulimala was standing still and the Buddha was walking. Angulimala said to himself, "These monks tell the truth, but here I am standing still, and this monk is walking, yet he tells me he's stopped and I haven't. What does he mean?"

The Buddha knew this would jar his mind a little. And so Angulimala asked him, "What do you mean? While you're walking, you tell me you've stopped. But now when I've stopped, you say I've not stopped. What is the meaning of this?"

The Buddha replies, "Angulimala, I have stopped forever, forswearing violence to every living being. But you have no restraint towards things that breathe. That is why I have stopped and you have not."

So again, he's pointing to ethics here. He's pointing to stopping the violence—that the Buddha has forsworn violence. And yet I think there's also a pointing, in a way, to something deeper. The freedom of the Buddha, the mind of the Buddha, the freedom the Buddha points to, is the stopping of greed, aversion, and delusion, the stopping of ignorance. That's another way the Buddha has stopped: ignorance, greed, aversion, delusion no longer arising, no longer functioning in the mind. And when ignorance arises in the mind, when delusion arises in the mind, this is where unethical behavior springs from.

So I think this is another pointing—not only the ethical teaching but a pointing to the deep stopping that's possible. Although perhaps the Buddha knew in that moment Angulimala wasn't quite ready for that part of the teaching. But maybe he was ready for the teaching on ethics.

Angulimala had a very radical change of heart in that moment, a really strong sense of having met a teacher who could help him. And so he asked the Buddha for ordination, and the Buddha ordained him.

Meanwhile, the king is still looking for Angulimala. The villagers do not know of this transformation. The king is out looking for Angulimala to kill him. On his way, he's in the neighborhood of where the Buddha resides, and so the king, passing by, stops where the Buddha is and pays respects to him.

The Buddha sees the king with his army and says, "Where are you going with this army? Is there a war?"

The king says, "No, there's not a war, but there is this single man, Angulimala. We need to put him down. But I don't have much hope in that."

The Buddha, with Angulimala sitting next to him—now with his shaved head and robes, unrecognizable to the king—says, "But great king, if you were to see Angulimala with shaven head and beard, clad in the yellow robe, gone forth from the home life into homelessness, and that he was abstaining from killing living beings, from taking that which was not given, and from false speech, eating only at one time a day, living the life of purity and virtue and noble conduct—if you saw him thus, how would you treat him?"

"Venerable sir, we would pay homage to him, invite him to accept the four requisites of a monk, and arrange for his protection. But how could such an unvirtuous person of evil character have such virtue and restraint?"

Then the Buddha gestured: "This, great king, is Angulimala."

The text says the king's hair stood on end. He lost his composure. But the Buddha said, "Do not fear. There's nothing to fear."

This is interesting to me because at this point in the story, the Buddha is telling the king not to fear. He's saying, essentially, trust me. And the king does trust him. With that phrase from the Buddha, the king kind of relaxes and offers the requisites to Angulimala, offers him protection.

It's a counterpoint in the story to the teacher telling Angulimala, "Trust me, you have to do this thing." In this case, the Buddha is saying, "Trust me, there's nothing to fear." So what's the difference here?

And again, I think it comes to ethics. Because what the teacher was asking Angulimala to do was something unethical. He was asking him to kill beings, to take life. And so that perhaps should be something to examine, even in a position of trust and power—when somebody is asking you to do something unethical, there's a pause there.

In the case of the Buddha, the Buddha is pointing to the ethical action. He's pointing to not harming, not killing Angulimala. So ethics may be a support for us in terms of deciding how to act. Maybe something about who to trust.

At this point, Angulimala is a monk, and we've been talking a lot about the external dimension of the story—the interactions between people and how ethics plays out. Now the story turns to the inward dimension of Angulimala as a monk, practicing, trying to meditate.

Can you imagine trying to meditate after killing 999 people? What would be coming up in your mind? The story gives us a hint:

"Angulimala had not been able to focus his mind on the basic meditation subject which he'd received, though he'd tried day and night. Before his mind's eye had appeared the place in the jungle where he had slain so many people. He heard their plaintive voices imploring him, 'Let me live, my lord. I'm a poor man and have many children.' He saw the frantic movements of their arms and legs when in fear of death. When faced with such memories, deep remorse gripped him and made him get up from his seat and leave."

This is what happens. This is the inner consequence of unethical conduct. And likely, he hadn't really felt the impact of it until he sat down and looked at his mind.

So he struggled. He struggled meditating. But he stayed. He committed to staying in the community. He didn't get much support from the community—they knew who he was at that point. They didn't give him much in the way of alms. In fact, they'd throw things at him. But he kept going. He kept going. Committed to the sīla. Really committed to the sīla at that point.

At one point on one of his alms rounds, he heard the wails of a woman having difficulty giving birth, and his heart broke open in compassion for her. To me this is another beautiful piece of the story—contrasted with his lack of compassion for the people he was killing, now his heart breaks open in compassion for someone giving birth. His heart broke with that suffering.

Then he went and talked to the Buddha about it. And the Buddha suggested that Angulimala go to that woman and say, "Since I was born, I have never purposely deprived a living being of life. By that truth, may you and the infant be safe."

And Angulimala says, "I can't say that."

I wonder about this one—why did the Buddha do that? Why did the Buddha tell him to say that? I'll tell you what he said next.

He said, "Then Angulimala, say to that woman: Sister, since I was born with the noble birth, I have never purposely deprived a being of life. By this truth, may you and the infant be safe."

That, Angulimala said, that I can say. Since I became a monk, I have never purposely deprived another being of life.

The kind of magical piece here is that this truth statement apparently created an easeful birth for the woman, and Angulimala has actually become a kind of patron saint for women in childbirth through that kind of statement, that acknowledgement: since I became a monk, since I was born with the noble birth, I've never purposely deprived a living being of life.

I thought about this a little bit. There's not a lot of explanation for why the Buddha told him to do this. It seems uncharacteristic of the Buddha to ask somebody to say something that's not true. I wonder a little bit if it's a test for Angulimala. Again, the Buddha's saying, go to this woman and say I've never purposely deprived a being of life since I was born. He's asking him to say something that's not true. Again, the power dynamic—a teacher asking him to say something that's unethical, that's not true. Is he willing to do it just because of that power dynamic? And he wasn't. He wasn't willing to do that.

The other piece of this that the commentaries point to is that it was really encouraging Angulimala to reflect on his sīla since he became a monk. He had had a kind of rebirth there into a life of non-harming. He had fulfilled his name, Ahimsaka.

It is said that this shift, when he went to the woman and said this statement—this true statement: since I became a monk, I've never killed another being, I've never purposefully deprived another being of life—after that point, his mind could settle in meditation. And the story ends as happy-ending Buddhist stories do: Angulimala became fully awakened. The transformative power of the practice. And it didn't stop people from throwing things at him when he went on alms round. And yet his mind could be at ease with that.

For myself, this story really points to how sīla supports us. And for ourselves too, this way of reflecting on our sīla. Several of us have mentioned this—that we can reflect on our ethical conduct as a support to help settle the mind. Our lives here on retreat: we are living the Eightfold Path. Anushka spoke about this last night. We're living the Eightfold Path. Bhante pointing to this in his own story. Following the Eightfold Path. Right action—yes, I'm doing that here and now. Right speech—yes, doing that. Taking some kind of support from that.

And also, for myself, I have this feeling, a kind of inspiration, in the depths of some of my retreats when I was really struggling, having such a hard time. Sometimes I would remember this story and think: if Angulimala could do it, maybe I can too.

Let's just sit for a moment.

A verse from Angulimala's enlightenment poem:

Non-harmer is the name I bear who was a harmer in the past.
The name I bear is true today. I hurt not anyone at all.
I stayed in forests, at the roots of a tree, in mountain caves, but with an agitated heart.
But now I rest and rise in happiness. And happily I spend my life.
For now I am free of Māra's snares.
Oh, for the compassion shown me by the Buddha.

May we all live with ethical conduct, following the Eightfold Path to freedom from craving and clinging. May all beings know ease and peace.

Thank you for your practice.

CHAPTER 168

Mettā Practice: Self and Benefactor (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 47 min

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella introduces the practice of mettā (loving-kindness) meditation within the context of the brahmavihāras, the four divine abodes of the heart. She explains how these practices support the Buddha's central teaching of understanding suffering and its cessation, noting that while the structured mettā practice we use today may predate the Buddha, the suttas clearly describe the cultivation of a heart "pervading all quarters" with boundless loving-kindness, without hostility or ill will.

Fella offers the helpful metaphor of running a "mettā magnet" over the heart—the phrases we use are designed not only to cultivate wholesome qualities but also to reveal what obstructs them. This honest approach acknowledges that for many Western practitioners, offering kindness to oneself can be surprisingly difficult. She encourages starting where it's genuinely easy, whether with a beloved pet, a benefactor, or any being that naturally evokes a smile, rather than forcing connection where resistance exists.

The guided meditation demonstrates a contemplative approach: connecting with the being, offering a phrase such as "May you be happy," and then mindfully noticing how the wish lands in the heart. This integration of mettā with vipassanā allows practitioners to observe whatever arises—warmth, constriction, confusion—with acceptance. Fella shares her own journey with the practice, acknowledging that for years she avoided these sessions because they "tied her up in knots," until eventually the mindfulness practice itself had cultivated enough mettā for the formal practice to become accessible and beloved.

Our path of practice is about cultivating qualities of heart and mind that support our capacity to meet our experience as it is, to see and understand suffering, and to move in the direction of the ending of suffering. The whole of the Buddhist practice, the Buddha said, is encapsulated as, "I teach suffering and the end of suffering." All of the tools, all of the practices that he taught can come at that in different ways. And so he taught the mindfulness practices, he taught concentration practices, and he taught these loving-kindness practices that we'll be offering in these afternoons.

Actually, the version of the loving-kindness practice that we'll be offering—it's possible that it predates the Buddha. We don't exactly know when this particular frame of the mettā practice came. But we do know that the Buddha taught the imbuing of the heart with the quality of loving-kindness. In the suttas it's expressed something like: "One abides pervading one quarter with a mind filled with loving-kindness. Likewise the second quarter, likewise the third, likewise the fourth. So above, below, around and everywhere, one imbues the whole world with loving-kindness—abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will."

So that's kind of where we're headed with the loving-kindness practice. But there were some very wise people who realized that just imbuing the world with loving-kindness in all directions may not be so easy, and they came up with some ways to support our capacity to see both where we can offer kindness to people and where we get stuck.

This practice of mettā is one of the Brahmavihāra practices, and during this retreat we'll be offering some exploration of mettā in the first few weeks, and then we'll also offer some exploration of the compassion practice. We're not going to try to go through all four Brahmavihāras in the February portion of this retreat; we'll cover the mettā practice and the compassion practice.

Practicing these qualities is part of wise effort. The Buddha pointed us to cultivating the skillful qualities that support the opening of the heart, that support wisdom. And this is a direct cultivation of wholesome qualities—to explore opening the heart in loving-kindness.

The quality of mettā, as the description in the suttas points to, is a boundless quality that has no restrictions. It's not dependent on conditions. The quality of the heart that feels that is one that feels open, connected, caring, not resistant to what's here, friendly.

And as James said in his talk last night, when that quality—kind of the way these Brahmavihāras fit or work together—when that quality of the open heart is in the field where someone or some experience is having suffering or struggle, the heart that is open, that is caring, that is connected, that's not resistant, that heart will feel that suffering and resonate with it. A kind of quivering in the heart. And that meeting of this heart of kindness with suffering is compassion.

And if that heart that is open, connected, and caring is in the field of someone or a situation that is joyful, where someone is experiencing goodness or joy in their lives, then that open heart resonates in empathy with that, with the quality of muditā, empathetic joy.

So these qualities, these first three Brahmavihāras, are intimately connected. The open heart is the open heart, and then it is open to whatever is here. It doesn't try to convert sadness into joy. It meets whatever is here.

And the fourth Brahmavihāra, the Brahmavihāra of equanimity, creates conditions, supports the mind to have that balance—to not be overwhelmed by the sorrow or swept away by the joy, but to understand: it's like this in this situation. There can be joy here. There can be sorrow here.

The practice that we offer, that we teach as mettā practice, as I said, provides a way for us to see where we can meet and share and offer that quality of well-wishing and where we struggle with it. The people who put this practice together—I think they really are quite smart to see that we can kind of delude ourselves in a way. We might say, "Oh yes, may all beings be happy," this boundless wishing of loving-kindness, until we think of that particular person. And then there's a constriction. "Well, maybe everybody but that person I wish boundless loving-kindness for."

And so the practice here is to bring—we structure the exploration in categories. The encouragement is to start where it's a little easier to cultivate the kindness, the love. And classically, interestingly, classically that's said to be with ourselves as the easiest place to cultivate that feeling of well-wishing. Well, here in the West, often for many of us, that is not the easiest place to start. And so for some of us, an easier place—we start with what we call an easy being. And we could call that being a benefactor, someone who has supported you or helped you or served you. Someone who you have no question cares for you.

And for me, even that I was struggling with a little bit. And then at one point, sitting in this very hall, Joseph Goldstein was offering the mettā practice, and he said, "For this category of being, just think of a being that makes you smile." And my cat popped into my head.

And I thought, yeah, I can wish my cat that kind of love. No barriers to that with my cat. So that was a place for me to start.

So we start where it's easy to wish well. And that's maybe a little different than we sometimes think when we want to cultivate something. We may think we need to lean into where it's hard. But in this particular practice, leaning into where it's easy creates the conditions and supports the heart's capacity to stretch and to feel that quality of loving-kindness—really beginning to touch into that, the embodied feeling of that quality in our hearts.

So starting where it's easy with this easy being or benefactor, then over the time in this retreat, we'll gradually open to offer the suggestion to include different groups of beings. Moving to a dear friend as the next group. We generally suggest you just pick one person, almost as a representative of that category. So you pick a person, a dear friend, and then you explore the possibility of well-wishing for that person.

Now, with a dear friend, we often do have a sense of care and concern, but we often also have the feeling of, "Oh, but yeah, they did that thing." And so we start to feel where it's hard, that our well-wishing may be conditional. We explore this in our practice.

One of my colleagues—at that point when I was exploring this in one long retreat, a February month-long entirely doing metta practice—Guy Armstrong said, "Think of the metta practice like you're running a metta magnet over your heart." A magnet, its job is to pull its opposite to it. And so every time you're expressing these wishes of kindness, it's like you're running this magnet over your heart. What it can do is evoke or pull into consciousness what is not metta, the opposite of metta.

As we explore this practice with these various groups of beings, we may see we don't feel happiness and joy and love and connectivity. We feel that clench, that "Oh, but they did that thing and I wish they hadn't done that thing." When that happens, you can think of the metta magnet as doing its job. It's not a failing of the practice or a failing of how you're doing the practice. It's designed to pull out the things that get in the way. And then we work with that. We'll talk about all of this over these sessions—how to work with this.

Each subsequent category can add a little more difficulty or different kinds of difficulty. The dear friend can evoke the sense of betrayal sometimes when things come up. Then we shift to a neutral person, someone we don't know very well at all. That being may evoke different kinds of things, like just a sense of disconnection. A sense like, "Well, how can I care about somebody I don't know?" So we explore that feeling of disconnection. Or maybe sometimes for some people the neutral person is actually easier because there isn't anything specific getting in the way. We see these things as we explore these very specific beings.

I think this is the brilliance of this practice—that we are bringing particular people into our minds and exploring how that connection feels. How does it feel to try to connect and wish them well?

After the neutral person, we open to a difficult person, someone with whom we have active struggle, and try to explore well-wishing in that context. There it can get quite challenging. And so we explore ways to meet that. Again, we'll talk about each of these over the subsequent days. I'm just laying out the arc of the practice right now, what we'll be doing over the month.

The practice has this form of bringing a particular being into mind from one of these categories. Today we'll start with easy being and self. We bring a particular being into mind and then offer or express wishes for them, saying phrases in our mind. These phrases are expressions of the wish that they be happy, healthy, safe, and at ease. It's essentially a wish for their well-being. What we're exploring is seeing how it feels to make that wish.

The wish is an expression of an intention. "May you be happy." Feeling that genuinely expressed is an expression of metta, an expression of love and care and connection and concern in the heart. May you be happy.

So the phrase is an expression of an intention. We may or may not feel the quality of love there. Again, that may be what the metta magnet is drawing out—"Well, I can connect kind of with that intention, but I don't really feel it." That's okay.

You simply notice how it is.

The phrases that are often offered as a standard set in English are: May you be happy. May you be healthy. May you be safe. May you live with ease. These phrases are offered while bringing a particular being into the mind, and the phrase is directed toward that being.

For me, the practice began to become more alive and resonant when I really started exploring with each phrase. Language is actually quite powerful. Saying a phrase like this, if we're attuned and mindful and paying attention—being attentive to how we are after having made that wish, particularly in the area of the heart—we may notice that the phrase evokes something. It may be constriction. It may be a feeling of connection. It may be a feeling of confusion.

When I started connecting with the person before every phrase, saying "May you be happy," and then taking a few moments to feel how it felt in the area of the heart to have made that wish, the practice transformed. Essentially, I was using mindfulness during this practice. At first it had felt like just a lot of words, trying to connect through language. But when I started to touch into the feeling—whatever it was, maybe just a little bit of a shift, not even sure what that shift was, but simply touching into the area of the heart and asking, "How does it feel to have made that wish?"—and then moving on to the next phrase, touching in again, "How does it feel to have made that wish?"—that's when something opened.

So we're inclining the mind toward a quality of well-wishing through using these phrases, but being very honest with ourselves about what is actually here.

I think that's enough for the basics. Let's practice. Let's do some practice together.

Starting by finding a posture that feels relatively comfortable—as comfortable as you can be. It can be helpful to remind yourself about relaxation. Bring your attention to the area around your heart. For some of you, it may be helpful to put your hand on your heart as a way to connect with that area. You're welcome to keep it there for the whole sitting or just when it feels helpful to connect.

Simply touch in, being aware of the experience or the sensations here in this area. How is the heart right now? Just feel what's here, honestly opening to that. No judgment around it—just, "Oh, it's like this." Maybe it feels a little tired or tender or tense or tight. That's okay. It's okay however it is.

Now bring to mind a being that makes you smile. Maybe a dear teacher, or a child in your life, or someone for whom the relationship does not feel too complicated. It might be a pet. Spend a minute or two reflecting on what you appreciate about this being. This reflection on appreciation of the good, what we appreciate, is said to be a support for metta. What do you appreciate? Ways they've supported you. Notice how it feels to make this reflection. It's possible to think and feel into the heart at the same time, remembering what you appreciate about this being.

Find a way to connect with this being in some way—to imagine them here with you perhaps, or hold an image of them. I sometimes would, just sitting with my eyes closed, pretend they were sitting next to me or in front of me. I didn't have a lot of imagery available, but I could have the sense of them being with me. That may be possible for you too—a kind of felt sense of them, connecting with their energy in some way, their being. For some it can be useful to include the name of the being in offering these phrases.

So with a connection, an image or feeling of being with this being, begin to quietly in your mind offer them these wishes.

May you be happy.

Offer that phrase, and then check in.

Almost, perhaps, think about not only offering the phrases to the other person but dropping them into your own heart. May you be happy—and how does it resonate? What happens in your heart with that wish?

May you be happy.

And no demand for any particular feeling or experience. Honestly noticing how it is.

May you be healthy.

May you be safe.

May you live with ease.

Connecting with the being, expressing the wish, and noticing how it affects your heart to make that wish.

May you be happy.

May you be safe.

May you live with ease.

Now I'll give some time for silence for you to explore this on your own. Connect with the being, say the phrase, and then touch into the felt experience in the heart. How does it land to make that wish?

Whatever is arising with this, can there be a sense of it's okay that this is arising? That is also an expression of metta for yourself.

And now I'll encourage you, or invite you, to explore the possibility of opening to metta for yourself. Let your easy being stay present. Just kind of connect with yourself. This may be as an image of yourself, or just the felt sense of you sitting here in this moment.

Take a moment to reflect on something you appreciate—things you appreciate about yourself, kind things you've done. And if that feels challenging, I will offer you that you are here, at a retreat where you have the intention to open your heart and connect. That's a rare and amazing thing. Let yourself appreciate that about yourself. If you can't feel it, borrow my appreciation for you. Because it's amazing that you're here.

Connecting with yourself, beginning to express these same wishes for yourself.

May I be happy.

Again, noticing how it lands. How does it feel, dropping that wish into your own heart? How does it feel to make that wish?

May I be healthy.

May I be safe.

May I live with ease.

And if this is challenging for you, it's okay that it's challenging. One way in might be to envision the easy being you were just offering wishes to, and imagine that they are offering you well wishes. That your easy being is standing in front of you, with you, wishing: May you be happy. Sometimes we can receive it more easily that way.

Exploring this possibility of receiving metta for yourself.

May I be happy.

May I be healthy.

May I be safe.

May I live with ease.

Continuing in silence for another few minutes.

And to close the sitting, I like to sometimes bring back all the beings I've been exploring in this session. So today, the self and your easy being. Envisioning yourselves together, wishing together:

May we be happy.

May we both be healthy.

May we be safe.

May we be at ease.

And then allowing that well-wishing to expand, as best you can imagine, to all beings. The two of you together, wishing: May all beings be happy.

Again, remembering to check: how does it land to feel, to make that wish? May all beings be healthy. May all beings be safe. May all beings live with ease.

You are welcome to explore this practice. In fact, we encourage you to explore this practice. You could explore it at a particular time—perhaps this sitting could be a time when you explore this practice. Or you could play with it in the walking period. Sometimes it can feel easier to do it outside or with a little more space. I would often do it with walking, imagining the being was walking next to me. So you are welcome to play with exploring this practice in sitting or in walking. Maybe a sitting or a walking a day, two, if that feels good to you—exploring this cultivation, this softening of the heart.

It will support your mindfulness practice to have this softening. Sometimes in the midst of our vipassana practice, the mindfulness practice, we may find challenges arising. And for some people, it can be helpful to remember the metta practice at those times. Look at what supports you.

For me, I will let you know that this practice was very challenging for a long time. In fact, I did not come to this sitting for several years because it just tied me up in knots. And for me, the metta was being cultivated through the mindfulness practice. I could feel it more in the "oh, it's like this"—so much stuff happening, and it's okay that it's happening. That is cultivating metta too. The mindfulness practice cultivates metta for ourselves. It is a metta practice for ourselves. The allowing that we encourage—that is metta.

And yet for some, the metta practice provides an easier doorway. For me, it took a while. At one point during one long retreat in Burma, I discovered—my teacher there said, "Try some metta practice before your sitting. It will help you." And I thought, well, you don't know me, but I'll give it a try. And I found, to my surprise, that enough metta had been cultivated through the mindfulness that it was right there. Yes, I do wish myself to be happy and healthy and at ease. It was very powerful. And yet I needed that time.

So if you struggle with the metta practice, talk to your teachers in the interviews about it. There are supports that can happen, and it may or may not be something that is serving you at this time. We have to be aligned with our own system in this practice. In the metta practice, we start where it is easiest. And for myself, in the entirety of the practice, it was easiest to start with mindfulness practice and not do the metta. But at this point, I love the metta practice. I have a strong connection with it. Just touch into what is supportive for you and check in with your teachers about it.

If you struggle with it—I mean, I tried for a while before I finally realized it was not working for me. If it is a little uncomfortable, or if it feels like, "I'm not feeling boundless love," that may just be the mental practice working for you. The rough guideline would be: if it feels like the metta practice is tying you up in knots, it may not be the right practice for you at this point. At this point. And that is what it was doing to me at the beginning.

If it feels like sometimes you can touch into the quality of openheartedness and caring, and sometimes it feels like a struggle, then drop back to where it is easier. That is the instruction with the metta practice. If you shift to a being where it is more challenging—if you are doing yourself and it is hard, but you found you could connect with the easy being—just drop back and do it for the easy being. You do not have to push with where it is more challenging.

You can find a place where you can connect with the easy being, where the practice flows naturally.

So thank you for your practice, remembering just how amazing it is that you're here. It is a rare thing in this world, what you're doing. Thank you for your practice.

CHAPTER 169

Mindfulness of the Body and Exploring the Elements (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of mindfulness of the body as taught in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). She begins by contextualizing the four foundations of mindfulness—body, feeling tone, mind states, and dhammas—explaining how the Buddha's framework supports wise mindfulness that leads to liberation. The talk emphasizes the importance of "abiding, observing" with qualities of relaxation, receptivity, ardency, and clear comprehension while setting aside greed and distress.

The heart of the teaching focuses on the six body contemplations found in the sutta: breath, posture, clear comprehension of activities, body parts, elements, and death contemplation (maraṇasati). Fella devotes particular attention to the four elements practice—earth (solidity, hardness, weight), water (fluidity, cohesion, moisture), fire (temperature), and air (movement, vibration, pressure)—offering practical guidance for experiencing these qualities directly in the body.

This elemental exploration serves as a method for dropping beneath concepts to the actual felt sense of bodily experience. Fella explains how this practice helps distinguish between body and mind, revealing how physical sensations trigger mental reactions and how much of what we call "pain" lies in our reactivity rather than the actual sensation. Through this investigation, practitioners begin to understand experience as impermanent, unreliable, and impersonal—insights that paradoxically bring relief rather than despair.

This evening the topic is mindfulness of the body. This is one of the teachings found in the texts, the Buddhist texts, the suttas, and in particular in a text called the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. The Buddha talked about mindfulness of the body in many places in the suttas, but a kind of collection of meditation instructions is offered in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. This is really the basis for what we're offering in our instructions, this teaching.

The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, just as a little overview, is a collection of practices and directions for how to be attentive to our direct experience. At the very beginning of the sutta, the words say, "This is the direct path to the overcoming of sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair, to the realization of freedom, the realization of nibbāna." And what is this path? The four foundations of mindfulness, or the four establishments of mindfulness. Satipaṭṭhāna is the word translated either as foundation or establishment. Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates it as a frame of reference. We can think of these teachings as being four grounds or ways, four areas of experience perhaps, that are useful to connect with—and connect with in a particular way.

To be aware of the guidance is wise mindfulness, how to be aware in a skillful way. Mindfulness itself, at least in the suttas, points to a kind of neutral quality. There can be wrong mindfulness guided by wrong intention and wrong view, and right mindfulness guided by right intention and right view. Right view is basically laid out in the sutta—how to be mindful in a way that is conducive to liberation, to freedom. I would say the basic piece of that is that we attend to experience, curious about experience in and of itself. What is this experience? How is it appearing?

If you think about someone who has broken into a house and is wanting to steal things, they may be very aware of what they're doing—very clear of each step and each movement, very careful about how they move through the house so that they're not making noise or generating anything that would lead to their discovery. They are not, in that process, exploring their experience as: what does it feel like to be reaching and touching? What is the experience of stepping? They are aware of their experience with the intention to steal. It's a wrong intention.

I don't think we need to worry about our intention here for mindfulness. We are all exploring our experience with this basic curiosity: what is it like to be aware? What is it like to be a human being?

So these four establishments of mindfulness, the four that are in this sutta, are: body, the physicality of our experience; feeling tone, the aspect of our experience that shows up as pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant; mind states; and mental phenomena.

Now feeling tone isn't exactly separate from body or separate from mind, because the teaching is that every experience of body and mind is also pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This is, I think, why Thanissaro Bhikkhu uses this translation of frame of reference. We may choose to observe our experience through the frame of reference of the body, noticing the physicality of experience. What's happening in our minds can affect our bodies, but we're choosing to observe from this frame of reference through the body. Or we may choose to observe experience through this frame of reference of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. That doesn't mean that mental and physical experiences aren't happening. It's just this curiosity about that aspect of experience.

So the frame of reference of body, the frame of reference of feeling tone, and the frame of reference of mind states—mental experience. Whether the mind is contracted, distracted, whether there's greed, aversion, delusion present or absent in the mind, whether there's concentration present in the mind or not.

These first three foundations are really—mostly the instructions in those are about just noticing what's here. The instructions in the first foundation on the body, for instance, around the breath, are: when breathing in, you know that you're breathing in; when breathing out, you know you're breathing out. Just notice what's happening there. In the second foundation around feeling tone, it says: when feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands one's feeling a pleasant feeling; when feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands one's feeling an unpleasant feeling. There's not much in the way of what to do about it other than know that it's happening. This really basic instruction: be aware of experience as it is in the present moment—bodily experience, feeling tone. And in the mental experience, even there, the instructions say something like: one understands a mind affected by greed as a mind affected by greed; one understands a mind not affected by greed as a mind not affected by greed.

It's not saying to get rid of the greed. It's saying to understand it, to know it's present.

So in these first three foundations or frames of reference, these establishments of mindfulness, it really is this encouragement to get to know just experience as experience.

Right here, the instructions for mindfulness are pointing to this way of being aware, being attentive, being mindful.

The fourth foundation of mindfulness has a little different quality to it. We could say the fourth foundation of mindfulness—the name of it is the Dhamma, the Satipaṭṭhāna of Dhamma. Small-d dhamma. Large-D Dhamma usually refers to the teachings of the Buddha or this nature of experience, the truth of experience. Small-d dhamma usually is translated simply as phenomenon—just phenomena of experience.

And yet the instructions in this section of the teachings are pointing to ways we understand the small-d dhamma through the framework of the Buddhist teachings, the large-D Dhamma. So there's an instruction about looking at the hindrances, noticing the presence and absence of the hindrances, noticing the presence and absence of the seven awakening factors, noticing the five aggregates and the six sense spheres, and the clinging that happens in dependence on the six sense spheres, and noticing the arising of the aspects of the Four Noble Truths: This is suffering. This is the arising of suffering. This is the ending of suffering. This is the way leading to the ending of suffering.

We could say in this one there's more of an encouragement to be attuned to what processes of mind and body lead to suffering, and what processes of mind and body lead away from suffering. So this is the encouragement in this teaching—to be attuned to the experience of suffering and non-suffering. When we get caught, when we get stuck: the stress and the release from stress, the release from suffering.

There's also, at the beginning of the sutta, a definition or a framing of what supports this wise mindfulness, what supports this establishment of mindfulness. I'll read this with respect to the body because it's repeated for each of the four foundations:

"How does one establish mindfulness of the body? One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, mindful, clearly comprehending, setting aside greed and distress for the world."

This phrase really points to some of the attitudes and skillful means, some of the supports. James talked about some supports for mindfulness the first evening. It's really a succinct description of what supports mindfulness.

"Abide observing." Abide—just that word really points to relaxation and receptivity. You're not usually running around doing stuff when you're abiding. Settle back, receiving. So abide, relax, receive, and observe. Connect with experience. Abide, observing. Relaxed, receptive, and attentive.

So here, right in these first two words, it points to relaxed and alert. These are not opposites. That may be a bit of a paradox for us, but we can be relaxed and alert at the same time.

Another quality: ardent. I think of this as connected to curiosity—the heart engaged. Interest in what is happening. Interested in the body as a body. Observing the body as a body with interest and curiosity.

Clearly comprehending. This piece, "clearly comprehending," points in one place in the teachings to being aware in all activities of your life, so it points to continuity—doing this continuously, as continuously as possible. And in other places in the suttas, it defines clearly comprehending as understanding the impermanent nature of experience.

So: abide relaxed, receptive, and attentive to the body as a body with interest, understanding the impermanent nature of experience.

And "setting aside greed and distress for the world." This one points to a word we've also been using a lot in the last few days: allowing. We often, as experience arises, have greed or distress around it. And one of the ways to explore that is not to push away this greed and distress, but to open a little more broadly and allow what's here to be here—even the greed and distress.

Bhikkhu Anālayo points to maybe a little bit of the paradox in this phrase. In some ways it's translated as "having set aside greed and distress for the world." And that feels like a bit of an impossibility when we start.

If I've already set aside greed and distress for the world, I'm already there. And so Bhikkhu Anālayo, in looking at the language here, translated it more as "setting aside"—that this process of setting aside greed and distress for the world is what happens as we do the practice, through this inclination towards allowing.

So this is the framework of our practice of mindfulness, of wise mindfulness: abide observing the body as a body, ardent, clearly comprehending, mindful, setting aside greed and distress for the world.

The Buddha starts with the body, and it makes sense to me that he started there. As I've explored all of these in my own practice, the body is the most obvious when we sit down and try to be mindful, aware of our experience for the first time. Usually the body is one of the first things that's obvious. There are other things, mental processes that are obvious like thinking, but it's harder to be mindful of those. Thinking is usually what pulls us out. And so I think it was brilliant that the Buddha said, let's start with the body. Attend to the body. That will help you to connect and be able to then start to meet more subtle kinds of experience with mindfulness, like thinking, like mind states and feeling tone.

The body is a good place to settle deeply, to allow the mindfulness to connect with present moment experience. Getting familiar with being aware of the body also begins to support our understanding of the mind. There's a strong connection between body and mind. Things happen in the body and it affects what happens in the mind. There are conditioned responses—when something happens in the body, we start thinking about it or there are emotional reactions. Things happen in the mind, a thought happens, a memory of an argument we had with a friend, and we feel it in our body.

So there's a strong connection between body and mind. And at times we actually are not so clear about what body is and what mind is. It sounds like we should be able to know that difference easily, but through this practice I've really seen how often there's been a confusion. I've interpreted something as being body when it was really something happening in the mind. So the more clear we are about what the body actually is, what the experience of body actually is, the more clear we can be about what our mental experience is.

And the mental experience is really where suffering and non-suffering happen. The body is just physicality. The mind is where the clinging happens, the wanting, the aversion, the confusion—all of the things that make us spin out and struggle happen in the mind. And so the more clear we can be about the body, the more we can begin to understand how the mind works. This is, I think, another reason the Buddha pointed to the body first.

Some other benefits of mindfulness of the body: the body is always in the present moment. If you are aware of some aspect of your body, you are in the present moment. The mindfulness, the awareness is in the present moment. Mindfulness of the body, because it can be so grounding, connected to this physicality, also helps us to recognize when the mind goes off. I think we see this a lot with paying attention to the anchor. If we're paying attention to the breath, the body sensations, or hearing—which is also within the field of body, bodily sensation, contact with the ear door—if we're paying attention to bodily experience, we begin to recognize when the mind gets disconnected from bodily experience because the bodily experience is more obvious.

It's also an important part of our understanding of our physical experience, of our being. There's a lot of information in this physical body. Craving and clinging show up in our physical body. For me, this experience in the body, in the area of the heart, has become like one of my touchstones. Is this area soft and relaxed, or is it clenched and tight? I don't judge it. It's just, oh, there's clinging or craving when there's tension here. When it feels soft, there's more of a sense of ease and connection. So in the body, there is this kind of non-verbal feedback about the state of our mind.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, there are six separate mindfulness practices around working with the body. The breath in the body.

We've been working with that a little bit—some of you using the breath as your anchor. There's also exploring posture, which we've been doing with the different postures we've worked with: the sitting posture, the walking posture, some of you practicing lying postures, standing posture. When you're standing in line, you can stand and know you're standing. That instruction in the Satipatthana Sutta—stand and know you're standing, walk and know you're walking. Just that simple exercise is encouraged in this teaching.

And there's clear comprehension of all activities. I don't have it all memorized, but it includes when going and coming, when reaching, when bending and extending the limbs, when talking and remaining silent, when eating, when urinating and defecating—that's actually in there. Let my having said that help you remember that going to the restroom is an opportunity for mindfulness too. All through the day, all activities—this clear comprehension.

There's awareness of parts of the body: just being aware of hair, skin, nails, teeth, sinews, muscles, bones. Going through these parts of the body serves almost as a way to help us recognize the impersonal nature of our bodies. One teacher, when somebody was experiencing aversion toward another person, encouraged them to do this kind of practice with them. It's like, well, is it their head hairs that I'm angry at? Is it their body hairs? Is it their teeth I'm angry at? You just break the body apart in this way, and it becomes clear—yes, it's just a collection of parts.

Then there's the elemental nature of the body, which is primarily where I'm going to spend time this evening. I'll explore that particular practice exercise in the suttas at length. And the sixth contemplation is death contemplation, maranasati, contemplation of the decomposition of the body. The encouragement at the time of the Buddha was to go to the charnel grounds and notice the different decaying stages of corpses and to remind oneself: this is what will become of me. I am not immune from this. This is the nature of the body—to decay, to die. This awaits all of us.

Paradoxically, this maranasati, this contemplation of death, at least in my own experience, does not feel depressing when done within the framework of the Dharma. What it does for me is remind me—like one day I was doing my dishes and thought, wow, this might be the last time I get to do dishes. How do I want to be here for this? This might be my last day on the planet. How do I want to show up? Do I want to have these petty arguments going in my mind? No.

So that reminder that we don't know when we're going to die can be both a spur to the practice, encouraging us to wake up, and an encouragement to drop—to drop pettiness, to drop little resentments. If I knew I was going to die tomorrow, how do I want to be right now? If I knew I wasn't going to wake up tomorrow, how do I want to live the rest of this day?

So the elements—this is really what I'd like to take time to explore. This has been a very foundational practice for me, one that has really supported my getting familiar with the actual experience of the body, what we might call the felt sense of our bodies.

We often think of our bodies in terms of concepts. I'll sometimes sit with somebody and ask them to describe what they're experiencing. What are they feeling? And they might say, "Well, I'm feeling my hand," or "I'm feeling my shoulder." But those are parts of the body. They are concepts. We don't actually feel shoulder. We don't even know what a shoulder is when we're born. A baby would never say, "I feel my shoulder"—well, they can't speak anyway—but they're just experiencing sensations. Tension, tightness, moisture, heat, vibration, pulsing, tingling. That's what the experience of the body is.

When we say we're experiencing hand, we're experiencing some sensation in that area of bodily experience that we call hand, that we have assigned the label or concept of "hand" to. So this practice around the elemental nature of the body, the elemental nature of experience, begins to point to the direct felt sense of what the actual sensation level of experience is—the terrain, the texture, the feeling of our bodily experience.

The language of the suttas is a little odd in a way, given how our minds typically think about experience. But the language says, "One reviews this body, however it is placed, however it is disposed."

And so in any posture, one notices that it consists of elements. In this body are the earth element, the water element, the fire element, and the air element.

Now in India at the time of the Buddha—and I did a little bit of looking this up—it looks like pretty much in many cultures at about this time, 500 to 600 BCE, in Greece, India, and China, there was this understanding or general sense that matter, the physical world, is composed of smaller parts. And those parts, they thought the smallest elements were earth, air, fire, and water. So that was breaking down experience as far as they could, as far as their understanding went. Now we've broken it down further to atomic and subatomic particles.

But what the commentaries did with this, when exploring what this means in terms of meditation experience, is describe these as experiences in the body that relate to the qualities of those elements. So the earth element has a quality of solidity. The water element has the quality of liquidity, fluidity. The air element has the quality of movement. And the fire element has the quality of temperature—heat or coolness. The commentaries point to what is the experience of these, and that's how we connect with the elemental nature of the body.

I'm going to go through each of these almost, not quite as a guided meditation, but you could close your eyes as you listen to this part of the talk and see if you can take in this frame of reference of exploring bodily experience.

The earth element would be aspects of the body that are solid. For some people, it can be felt as simply this sense of this body being earth sitting on earth—this matter, this solidity. Sensations like heaviness, hardness, softness, density, weight. For instance, you might notice the contact where your hips are meeting your chair, cushion, or bench. You might notice some hardness there, particularly at the sit bones, or the uprightness of the body. For those of you who are sitting upright, the structure of the skeleton is holding you up. You might have a sense of the solidity of that structure of the body—the hardness, solidity, weight. The weight of earth on earth.

The air element is experience connected with movement. In sitting in stillness, one of the most obvious kinds of movements can be the breath, the movement of air through the body. You might feel a kind of pulsing or tingling or vibrating in your nose and throat as the air passes. That's a sensation related to movement. You might notice the expansion and contraction around your ribcage, that movement of the body, or the rising and falling around the abdomen.

There may also be, if you settle back in the body and explore with a receptive quality—not directing the attention or looking for any particular sensations, just sitting with the body in quiet, receiving what's available—there may be some obvious sensations of pressure where feet or hands are touching. But touch into the whole body. Some of you may have a sense of a vibratory energy quality in the body. You may not all feel this, but some of you may notice that vibration, tingling, pulsing. These are also part of air element, movement. This continual feeling of movement, even in stillness. Not only the movement of the breath, but this vibrating energy, the energy of life in the body. That's air element, that vibratory energy. Other aspects—there are many flavors of air element: pulling, pushing, pressure, expansion, tingling, pulsing.

And fire element, the element of temperature. Now this one may be a little less obvious at times. There are some ways to explore it. I find sometimes it's very apparent—when you go outside, you really feel the coolness on the skin. Or at times, I find my hands are cold but my body is warm. And so if you touch, say, the inside of your arm with your hand, often there's a temperature difference.

So you might have the temperature sensation highlighted if you explore that. The breath, sometimes behind your mask, may be very warm—in that area, the breath kind of collecting behind the mask. There can be warmth in that area. That's fire element. You may notice when you go outside and take off your mask, the feeling of coolness in the breath as the cold air comes into your throat, feeling the temperature there.

And then water element. This is perhaps the most obvious when there's perspiration, or can be very obvious, I find, behind the mask sometimes. There can be a lot of moisture behind the mask. Tears. But this also is understood as the element of cohesion—what glues things together.

Think about this. If you look at flour, a pile of flour, which could be earth, right? Earth element. It's just grains. But when you add water to it and knead it and push the water through the pile of flour, you get a ball and it becomes very elastic. The water element has turned the flour into this cohesive thing. That's the understanding around the water element too—this cohesion quality. It can be experienced as stickiness, slipperiness.

The commentaries say the water element is experienced mostly in dependence on some of the other elements. We will know the water element in relationship to other elements.

So an example of that—I'll do a little exploration here. You can go along with me if you like. Using your tongue, I'll go through some of the elements here in the mouth. Using your tongue, pushing against your teeth, you can really highlight the hardness of the teeth with that movement of pressure. That's earth. But that hardness is highlighted because of the pushing there. That's air element—the pushing, the movement. The movement is kind of highlighting the hardness when you push your tongue against your teeth and feel that solidity. You can notice the hardness more, or the pushing, the movement.

And then take your tongue and run it across your teeth. The movement of your tongue across your teeth, the saliva in your mouth, the moisture, will create a quality of slipperiness. That's the water element being revealed in dependence on both movement and the hardness of your teeth. You can get more of a sense of the liquidity in your mouth in dependence on those other elements.

In my practice with this teaching, I have just stuck with exploring experience from this more immediate language—vibration, pulsing, tingling, moisture, stickiness, cohesion, pressure, hardness, softness, heat, coolness. That language is more immediate for me than trying to translate that vibratory energy of the body to "air element" or the hardness I'm feeling in my hips to "earth element."

That's me. That's just me. For you, it may be very natural to notice earth element or water element or air element. I had a friend who was talking about doing walking meditation, just noticing the earth element and the air element in the walking. For me that just added a layer of idea, of concept, that made it hard. But the direct experience in walking—the pressure, the lifting, which was kind of a lightness, and then the movement, a feeling of pushing and lightness, and then the landing, the hardness on the ground—that kind of feeling was what I worked with. I wasn't trying to name in my mind all of the different elements. But that was the feeling. The lightness. It almost felt like my foot was a balloon lifting up into the air. And then moving forward like somebody had pushed it. And then hitting the ground—hardness. And then the softness of the pads of my toes, like, "Ooh, that feels really soft." Just touching into that feeling, the feeling in the body through these elemental experiences.

I look at this as learning the language of the body. How does the body communicate with us? Through these sensations—this sensation level of experience.

I'll be offering the instructions in the morning, and we'll continue this exploration in the morning instruction sitting—applying this kind of practice to our sitting practice and our walking practice. We'll talk more about how to explore this practice. You may already have a little taste of it now.

I'll give you one small piece to play with perhaps for the rest of the evening. You can explore these sensations in your anchor, primarily body or breath as anchor. Notice, for instance, on the in-breath, the movement and any vibratory sensations. Wherever you're noticing the breath, what are the sensations you're experiencing? Breathing in—perhaps a kind of vibration in the nostrils and throat, the movement in the chest, and then the rising pressure in the abdomen into a point of hardness. Then the release, the collapse of the pressure.

You can play with this if you're using a more broad, whole-body kind of anchor, touching into what the bodily sensations are in that anchor. What is being noticed? Or you can let your anchor be as it is, but then there will be times when attention is drawn to other sensations, other body sensations. You're paying attention to the breath and a pain in the knee arises, or the back gets tense, and the attention gets drawn there.

We can turn toward that. When attention gets drawn to something, we can be curious about it. We don't have to let it go and return to the breath. We're going to be expanding the instructions in mindfulness to include more and more aspects of our experience, as per these instructions in the Satipatthana Sutta—exploring more and more. When we find attention drawn to another physical sensation, we can be curious about it. What is the experience? The attention gets drawn to tension in the shoulder. What is that experience? Oh, there's pressure, hardness, burning. Touching into the elemental nature of the experience.

This exploration helps in a way to shift our perspective on our experience, dropping beneath the concepts of the body to the experience itself. In that shoulder, rather than thinking, "Oh, the shoulder's so tight," it becomes, "Oh, well, there's hardness, there's tension." It begins to pull apart the concepts. It may even begin to pull apart the concept of pain.

Pain is a concept. Often there's unpleasantness associated with it, and we'll get into talking about pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral in a few days. But right now, just exploring—oh, there's hardness or tension or burning or pressure. What is the actual experience of that? Because so much of what we actually call pain lies in our reactivity to the experience, not in the actual physical experience.

This is one of the great gifts of this practice: to begin to tease apart what is body and what is mind. There is a very tight interconnection between the two, especially around the realm of pain. The idea that it's a problem, the idea that this is going to last for the rest of the sitting—this creates more tension, which turns into a feedback loop, adding more physical tension in the body.

So there's this exploration around the elements as an encouragement to discover: what is the actual physical experience? And then also the encouragement to be curious about what's going on in the mind. There's aversion happening. There's fear happening. We can begin to tease those apart and perhaps see through this exploration that when fear gets stronger, the whole experience of tension and pulling and pressure is exacerbated. And when fear weakens, it's much less intense. Again, this teasing apart of body and mind—a very interesting and valuable exploration that this elements practice can really support.

Through this process of seeing the elemental nature of experience and noticing how body and mind are connected, we begin to see that these sensations of the body often trigger a reaction in the mind. We can start to see this as conditioned. We see that there are processes going on in the body. Sitting for a long time in stillness tends to create sore backs. It's just part of the body, just part of what happens. That then leads to reactivity, which often feeds back into the body.

So we see processes of body leading to conditions in the mind. This idea: This is going to last forever. This is a problem. I hate this. When is the bell going to ring? They've fallen asleep up there. When are they going to ring the bell? All of that is adding suffering. Not only does it feed back into the body and add physical tension, but the tension in the mind around that is painful itself. It just multiplies. It multiplies the painfulness and the suffering of it.

And we can see these as processes, as feedback loops. We start to understand our system as processes of body and processes of mind that are interweaving and interplaying. We begin to understand these processes as impersonal. I'm not doing them. I mean, if we had a choice, if we think, "Oh, I'm the one making myself miserable," well, are we actually deciding to do that, or is it habits that are doing that? Processes that have been so deeply conditioned. Reactivity that's been deeply conditioned. These processes of body, processes of mind, are not self. They are tumbling on—tumbling on of these body-mind processes.

And we see this with clarity. As we begin to clearly see the nature of our bodies, highlighting what body is and what mind is, the impermanent, impersonal nature of our experience and the unreliable nature of our body-mind experience is revealed to us.

That doesn't sound like good news, but actually it's really good news to see it, because it's the not understanding it that creates the mind's reactivity around it. When we align with that understanding—understand experience as impermanent, unreliable, and impersonal—what a relief. Just mental and physical phenomenon tumbling on. That's all it is.

Thank you for your practice. And I'll offer this from Bhikkhu Bodhi, who says there are really only two instructions: start and continue. So carry on.

CHAPTER 170

Mindfulness of Feeling Tone (Vedanā)

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of vedanā (feeling tone), the second foundation of mindfulness in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). She explains how every experience—whether physical or mental—carries a quality of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant, and how this feeling tone serves as the launching point for reactivity. Drawing from the teaching of dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda), she illuminates the crucial link between feeling and craving, showing how ignorance leads us to habitually grasp at pleasant experiences and push away unpleasant ones.

Fella references the Buddha's teaching on the two darts, explaining how an untaught person experiences both physical pain and the additional mental suffering of reactivity, while a well-taught practitioner experiences only the bodily sensation. She shares research demonstrating that feeling tone is indeed a mental construction shaped by conditions and expectations, not an inherent property of sensory experience. The Abhidhamma teaching that sight, sound, smell, and taste are inherently neutral—with pleasantness or unpleasantness arising from our mental interpretations—offers a powerful framework for investigation.

Practical guidance includes exploring feeling tone through physical sensations, eating meditation, and investigating where reactivity actually arises. Fella shares personal examples of discovering that aversion often springs from thoughts and beliefs rather than direct sensory experience. She encourages a playful, curious approach rather than making feeling tone into a project, suggesting that simply receiving these teachings can naturally inform practice.

We've been here for more than a week now. For those of you for whom this is a first month-long or two-month retreat, there's a somewhat different arc, as you may be noticing—a somewhat different arc of practice on a retreat of this length than on a week-long retreat, by which today you would be packing up and leaving.

In my own experience, during the first three-month course I did at IMS, ten days in I was feeling like I was just battered. My mind hadn't really settled. There was a lot of physical unpleasantness, a lot of pain in the body. I raised my hand in the hall and said, "You know, by this point in another retreat, I would have been really settled. I'm not settled—what's going on?" The teacher said there just seems to be something about the mind understanding the length of a retreat, and so it can take about a third of the length of the retreat to really settle in.

I breathed a sigh of relief, but since I was doing a six-week retreat, it meant I still had another week or so of settling in. But it actually relaxed me because I thought I was doing something wrong. So just taking in what's happening, everything that we've been pointing to—just keep going.

Tonight, the topic is a little more elaboration on vedanā, or feeling tone. Tara brought this into the morning instructions yesterday. The Buddha talked about this aspect of experience a great deal and pointed to the power of noticing feeling tone with mindfulness.

Every single experience has this quality of being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. The Buddha really highlighted the value of noticing that with mindfulness, and it being the place where—essentially—feeling tone is the point. It's the point, the basis of reactivity. When we are reacting, when we are experiencing some kind of greed or aversion or confusion or mental agitation, the basis of that is usually not clearly seeing feeling tone, or the views underlying feeling tone. So the Buddha really highlighted this as an important aspect, and we wanted to take a little more time to land with this teaching.

This feeling tone is a part of every single experience of body or mind. Every sense experience has a feeling tone associated with it. Every mental experience has a feeling tone associated with it. There's the understanding that with the contact at the sense base—whether sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, or the sense base of the mind—with that contact comes feelings. With that contact also comes consciousness and perception. We'll talk more about those as we go.

These three mental aspects—perception, feeling, consciousness—connect with every single sense impression we have. With this arising of consciousness, feeling, and perception, consciousness, feeling, and perception are all mental qualities, mental aspects, mental functions we could say. With every single experience we have, whether it's a physical experience or a mental experience, a large part of what is experienced in that moment is our mind doing its work.

There was actually a question that touched on this: "When I'm experiencing something that's materiality, like hardness in the kneecap, I see that as materiality. But pain in the knee seems more mental, and a lot of experience feels like it's mental, even if it's something physical like the breath. A lot of it feels like mentality."

It is. Every experience, every physical experience, has both physicality and mentality. Sometimes our mindfulness lands more to recognize the physical side of it—the hardness or vibration or pulsing or tingling, or pitch and tone in hearing, or form and color in sight. And sometimes the mindfulness, the awareness, is more interested in some of the processes by which the mind actually experiences these physical sensations.

The feeling tone—whether the experience is physical or mental, the physicality of hardness or pulsing or tingling or vibration, the contact with the eye door, contact with the ear door—the feeling tone associated with that, they come together. It's not like one happens and then the next thing and the next thing. They arise together. Feeling tone arises with the physicality. Consciousness arises with the physicality. The feeling tone is actually a mental experience. It's an aspect of the mind. Even in the physical touch sense, when we experience pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral in our physical realm, it's still understood in Buddhist psychology to be a mental experience. I'll talk about that more in a moment.

This feeling tone arises in dependence on the contact with our sense bases. They arise together; they're co-arising. But it's conditioned.

If the sense impression is not arising, there's no feeling arising with the sense impression. They come together. It's a basic aspect of our human experience, and yet we seem to miss it. When things are really pleasant, we can notice they're pleasant—but actually, not so much.

In my own experience, I discovered this in a funny way. One time I was driving a car and noticing that my mind was just tumbling forward into the future, completely tumbling forward. I was trying to bring it back: "Okay, come back, hands on the steering wheel, just be here." And it would just leap out into the future. It felt like anxiety. It felt like the mind was trying to figure something out.

After this happened a bunch of times—coming back, hands on the steering wheel, mind launching out again—I finally decided to ask, "Well, what else is happening here? What else is going on?" What I discovered was that I was really happy. I had not noticed the happiness, that pleasant quality. I had not noticed it. And I think sometimes what my mind did with that happiness was something like, "Oh, how can I keep this happiness? I've got to make sure this person knows this thing and that person knows that thing so that I can have this happiness stay for longer."

The mind can miss pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant because it's so busy responding and reacting to it. Some part of our system knows it's there, but we just leap onto it and start thinking and planning and remembering and fantasizing and judging. So we often actually miss the experience itself of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

The Buddha pointed to this as a key place. The habit around pleasant experience—the very human habit—is that we want more of it. We like it. We want to hold on to it. So we lean into it. There's a kind of greed associated with it. We're not really noticing the pleasant so much as wanting more of the pleasant in the future, missing that we're experiencing pleasant now. This is the habit of mind. It just wants more. It grabs on. With pleasant, we tend to want more of it, leaning into the future.

With unpleasant, we tend to not like it and want to get rid of it—different strategies for how we might do that. And with neither pleasant nor unpleasant experience, or what we sometimes call neutral experience, we often don't even notice it at all. We kind of space out about it.

In one teaching that many of you have probably heard, the Buddha is talking about this aspect of feeling tone and says that someone who has never met the teachings—described as an untaught worldling—experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant feelings. And a well-taught disciple, someone who's heard the teachings and has practiced well with them, also experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant feelings. So he asks, what's the difference between the two? It's a kind of rhetorical question, and then he goes on to answer it.

He says when an untaught worldling is touched by a painful bodily feeling, they worry and grieve. They lament, beat their breast, weeping and distraught. They thus experience two kinds of feelings: a bodily feeling and a mental feeling. He offers an analogy: it's like if somebody were hit by an arrow or a dart, and then immediately hit by a second dart. The feeling becomes much more painful if you're hit by two darts.

He goes on to say that a well-taught noble disciple, when touched by a painful bodily feeling, will not worry or grieve or lament, will not beat their breast and weep nor become distraught. Only one kind of feeling is experienced—a bodily one, not a mental one. It's as if they had been struck by just one dart.

This points to the truth that painful feeling is going to happen. Painful bodily feeling will happen. But the well-taught noble disciple doesn't have reactivity to that painful bodily feeling. They simply notice it as painful.

The reactivity to feeling tone—you know, the analogy of the two darts. I've never been struck by two darts, but I can imagine that the second dart would be far worse than the first. And it's like that with the mental reactivity to physical unpleasantness. It multiplies the painfulness. It multiplies—it's not simply additive. Our minds get really tied up when there's that mental reactivity to physical pain.

So the Buddha points to feeling tone as a kind of springboard from which reactivity arises. This is also explored in the teaching of dependent origination—an investigation of how feeling fits into the process by which suffering arises for us. I'm not going to give a full dependent origination talk this evening. That teaching goes through twelve links that condition each other, basically moving from ignorance to suffering—how we move from ignorance to suffering. But in the middle of that chain, there's a series of links very relevant to our topic this evening.

The teaching points to this: when we have a body and mind, we have our six sense bases. And with those six sense bases, we have contact. The eye receives sight, the ear receives sound, the body receives physical contact, the mind receives mind objects. With that contact, the next link is feeling arises. And again, this is a co-arising. The teaching is often called paṭiccasamuppāda, dependent co-arising, as one translation has it. So with the six sense bases having contact, contact and feeling come together. We have contact and feeling.

Conditioned on that is craving. This craving arises—it's a strong human tendency for craving to arise when feeling arises. With pleasant, we want more, the craving to have more. With unpleasant, we want less, the craving to get rid of. With neutral or neither pleasant nor unpleasant experience, we may just crave something. Sometimes when there's neutral experience, we just want something to happen. Or it may be that the mind just kind of detaches and goes into a sort of delusion, a place of not connecting.

With this craving, then there's clinging that follows—we want something and then we hold on to it. And with that clinging, there arise all of these views and ideas and patterns and habits in service of that clinging, to keep it, to have it be mine. This is becoming—a kind of identity gets born around that clinging, in service of maintaining it. And then suffering follows. Again, I'm being very watercolorish around this teaching right now.

So this teaching points to the link where we have a habitual tendency to leap off of feeling into craving. And that happens when ignorance is present. Ignorance is at the head of the chain in the teaching of dependent origination—it's the thing from which the whole sequence follows. When ignorance is present, and we could offer one simple definition of ignorance: the view or belief that having pleasant and getting rid of unpleasant will make me happy. That's a very deeply conditioned view in our system. We don't think about it. It's not like we have to think, "I want pleasant, I think that's going to make me happy." It's so deeply embedded. It's embedded in our whole being—embedded in evolution, we could say. Even single-celled creatures move towards nourishment and away from noxious chemicals. So there's this movement towards pleasant and away from unpleasant built into the whole of our evolutionary system.

It's not to say that supporting our bodies with nourishment isn't helpful, or that we should sit outside in the cold and freeze. But what the Buddha points to is that it's not necessary to have craving in order to come inside if you're freezing outside. It just becomes natural: this would support this being, this is helpful for the support of this being.

In the days before he sat down under the Bodhi tree, the Buddha had emaciated himself, thinking that depriving the body of food was a way to freedom. At some point he realized, "I'm going to die and I'm not going to find freedom. This is not the way to freedom. Maybe food would be good." And so this was not craving. It was more the understanding that the mind wanting to move in the direction of letting go of craving, of freedom, needs to nourish itself. There's a nuanced understanding about what craving is.

But we feel it. We know craving exists in a visceral kind of way. In my own experience, when there's craving happening, there's some kind of constriction going on. We feel that.

When ignorance is present and the mind has this view—"getting the pleasant will make me happy, getting rid of the unpleasant will make me happy"—when that view is operating in the mind, feeling leads to craving. When pleasant arises, that view responds, "Yes, hold on to it. It'll make me happy. Ultimately make me happy." When unpleasant arises, the view motivates, "Yes, get rid of it. It's going to make me happy to get rid of that."

When that ignorance is operating, feeling leads to craving. That's why it's so habitual. It's so hard to see that view. We often miss the feeling tone itself. The Buddha actually pointed to seeing the feeling tone—then you might be able to see this whole process unfolding. He pointed to this over and over again.

We can see the feeling tone. And when we see the feeling tone with wise mindfulness, when we're actually present for that, it can short-circuit that habitual tendency because wisdom may be present instead of ignorance. "What is this feeling tone?

What's going on here?" And maybe seeing that leaning towards, "Ooh, I need to hold on to that. I need to get that thing or get rid of that thing." Maybe seeing that happen as the mind opens to, "Oh, this is pleasant," or "This is unpleasant."

This really highlights the importance of meeting feeling tone with mindfulness and wisdom, with this kind of perspective we've been offering for mindfulness—curiosity. What is this experience? What is the experience of pleasant? Can I know that? What is the experience of unpleasant? Can I know that?

The Satipatthana Sutta, which I talked about last week with respect to the body, has a whole foundation on feeling tone. It's pretty simple. Here are the instructions—I'm only going to read the first part right now.

"How does one abide observing feelings as feelings?" This observing feelings as feelings is looking at them not as something to get rid of or to hold on to, but just to get to know, to understand them. The Buddha pointed to understanding our experience. That's this instruction: abide observing feelings as feelings. Just know pleasant feeling as pleasant.

"And how does one abide observing feelings as feelings? When feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel an unpleasant feeling.' When feeling a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands..."

I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling.

That's it. Know it as it is. Very simple sounding, but not so easy to do.

It can be helpful to explore and get familiar with feeling tones—perhaps taking some time to specifically investigate this quality of feeling itself. I know that Tara mentioned we don't have to go looking for it, but sometimes with something so subtle, it can be useful not necessarily to look for it, but to hold a space for it. Perhaps in this sitting, you might think, "I'll be available to seeing feeling tone." And then we can explore. There are some particular avenues of exploration that can be easier places to begin recognizing feeling tone, so it can be helpful to get familiar with it a little bit.

I'll speak about the nature of feeling tone itself. I mentioned earlier that it's a mental process. This may be easier to understand around feeling tones associated with mental activity—an emotion or a thought. That the feeling tone connected to mental experience is also mental made sense to me. Happiness, for instance, has a pleasant feeling tone. Anger often carries unpleasantness with it. Understanding those as mental felt natural.

But it was harder for me to really understand that physical experience—the feeling tone associated with physical sensation—is also a mental creation. Let me give an example that might help illustrate this.

Suppose you're standing on a busy street corner, waiting for a friend. People are walking by, people you don't know, and you're just standing there in the spot where you'd agreed to meet. Then you feel a hand on your shoulder. Someone has come up from behind you. That might be experienced as pleasant—the experience of the hand on your shoulder—because you're expecting your friend.

But if you're on that same street corner and not expecting anyone, and you feel somebody touching your shoulder, it might be experienced as unpleasant. Same street corner, same contact, but the conditions around it are different. You may startle because you're not expecting to be touched in that situation, and so it's experienced as unpleasant.

The conditions surrounding physical experience create different experiences of pleasant or unpleasant.

There are actually some recent studies that agree with this. Science agrees with the Buddha that feeling tone is mental. There was a study examining how people perceived pain. It had two parts. In the first, participants experienced either a moderately painful stimulus or no pain, and they were asked to rate how unpleasant and painful it was. In the second setup, participants experienced either moderate or more intense pain. On a screen, they could see beforehand whether it was going to be moderate pain or intense pain.

In the first scenario, people said that moderate pain was unpleasant—it was painful for them. In the second scenario, not only did they say that the moderate sensation was pleasant, but the MRI of their brains also showed they were experiencing pleasantness with that moderately painful sensation, when they saw it was not going to be the intense one.

Again, the moderate stimulus was the same in both parts, but the conditions around it were different. The researchers were surprised by this. They thought participants would probably find the moderate pain less painful, but they did not expect them to find it pleasant. They concluded that the likely explanation is that subjects were prepared for the worst and thus felt relieved when they realized the pain was not going to be as bad as they feared. In other words, a sense of relief can be powerful enough to turn an obviously negative experience like pain into a sensation that is enjoyable.

So the experience of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—the mind makes it, and it's very dependent on conditions.

Getting familiar with feeling tone, getting to know it: the easiest place to start is with the touch sense, the physical touch sense. These receptors of our physical body are very much designed to recognize pleasant and unpleasant. So the first place to be curious about pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral is in the physical realm, the physical touch realm. Those elemental sensations we were exploring—the hardness, the vibration, the pulsing, the tingling—there's the material aspect, and along with it is some quality of whether it feels pleasant or unpleasant to you in the moment.

At different times, I've seen that because of a view in my mind, sometimes a sensation—where I could tell it was the same level of intensity—

Sometimes it felt unpleasant, and sometimes it felt neutral.

One of the best places to explore this quality of feeling tone is with an itch—partly because itches have so much to reveal about what the mind does with experience. It's not just the itch itself; there's also the mind that wants to leap away from it. Itches drive us nuts.

So bring curiosity to the experience of an itch at the sensation level. For me, the sensation of an itch is almost like a little buzz. It appears, it's intense, and then it vanishes. It appears, it's intense, and then it vanishes. That intense sensation is unpleasant. What we often do, though, is fail to see the changing nature of the experience—that the unpleasantness is actually coming and going. With our minds, we pull it along, creating a kind of permanence to that sensation. We don't really see that it's there with a buzz and then vanishes, there with a buzz and then vanishes.

So we explore that quality of unpleasantness. Oh, there's unpleasantness. And then when the sensation vanishes, the unpleasantness vanishes. And my experience of that unpleasantness vanishing is itself a pleasant experience. There's a kind of fun way we can see pleasant and unpleasant following on from each other.

Explore the unpleasantness of experience, the pleasantness of experience. There may be times in the breathing, for example, when it feels smooth and easy. Or there may be a touching into a vibratory, light energy in the body that's experienced as pleasant. As a way to get familiar with this quality, you could take some part of a sitting—or a whole sitting—and just be curious: here's what's happening in the body, and can there be a recognition of whether there's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral around that experience?

Another prime place to explore this is in eating. Notice the pleasantness and unpleasantness around the flavors, the tastes. Notice the pleasantness and unpleasantness when you walk into the dining hall. The seeing of particular food—you might think, "Ooh, that food I like"—and so there's a pleasant quality. Now, that pleasantness is more a rising in dependence on the idea that we like it than on the seeing itself. I'll talk about that in just a moment. But just being curious: when you go into the dining hall, there's a stream of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences. You put food in your mouth, there's a stream of pleasant and unpleasant experience. And then neutral, as the food gets chewed up.

That first bite. I love playing with vedanā with chocolate. I don't think I ever knew before I started practicing just how pleasant chocolate is. Good chocolate is just—wow—the whole body goes into this kind of delight.

So yes, noticing the pleasantness. And what I've discovered with chocolate, for me at least—I don't know, my body may be particularly attuned to chocolate—but the flavor itself can be very intense. There's that initial hit of it, and then there's a kind of flood through the system around, I don't know, probably endorphins or something. There's just a flood through the system of pleasant experience. The pleasure of chocolate can last for several minutes. It's impermanent—it is impermanent—but it's quite amazing to watch how long the pleasantness lasts. And then what happens as it ends? The immediate, "Oh, can I have another one?"

I had one interesting experience with raisins. Raisins are kind of fun to play with this, because for the first ten seconds or so of chewing, I don't taste hardly anything. And then suddenly there's this burst of flavor. And then after a little while, still chewing the raisins, the flavor gets weaker, not so strong anymore. The strength of the pleasantness changes. You can just play with the flow of pleasant and unpleasant.

And then there's exploring with respect to our mind states, our moods, our emotions. Most of the hindrances—at least greed and aversion, ill will and sense desire—have a constriction in them. Now with sense desire, we may not notice the unpleasantness right away, because what's going on there is that the mind is thinking about the pleasantness of the thing it wants.

So it's kind of focused on that. When we want something, we're not experiencing the pleasantness directly because we don't have the thing. But we've got the idea in our mind: "If I get that thing, I'll be happy." And so the suffering of sense desire is often masked because we are fooled by the pleasure of thinking about having it in the future—the idea that it will be pleasant in the future. So we miss that sense desire itself has an unpleasant quality to it.

This is another useful and interesting exploration. When you notice the wanting, if you notice that the mind is pulling and wanting something, feel the wanting itself. See if you can notice the feeling tone of wanting. The feeling tone of aversion is much more obviously unpleasant. The anger or frustration or irritation—there's already a tension in there; we can feel that as unpleasant more easily. But emotions, moods, and mind states all have a feeling tone associated with them.

Thoughts can also have a feeling tone—we'll talk more about thoughts starting tomorrow in the instructions. Views and beliefs can have a feeling tone or be associated with a feeling tone. So all of our mental and physical activity has a feeling tone associated with it, and we can get curious about what that feels like. What is the feeling tone?

I would say it's actually quite interesting to begin to recognize that much of our feeling tone is shaped by conditions. I talked earlier about the conditions around feeling tone—the standing on the street corner and feeling a person touch you. There are views and beliefs around that whole situation that will shape whether that feeling of somebody touching you is pleasant or unpleasant. In the study around painful stimuli, whether you could tell in advance if it was going to be more or less painful—there's the knowing in advance, the conditions of what the mind understands before the sensation, that shapes the feeling tone.

This happens all the time. Our views and beliefs shape how we feel, shape the feeling tone of experience—not just how we feel emotionally, but whether we take something to be pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. So much of what we think of as physical pleasant or unpleasant comes because we have ideas about the experience.

The Abhidhamma and commentaries to some of the suttas actually speak to this very directly. They say that while the touch sense base does have a pleasant and unpleasant aspect to it, and our mind door can have the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral aspect to it, the bare sense at our other physical sense doors—sight, sound, smell, taste—the Abhidhamma says that is inherently neutral. There's no inherent sight that is pleasant or unpleasant.

Now, if you cut yourself with a knife, our body is designed to feel pain. Our body is designed to recognize that as unpleasant and take care of itself, to heal itself. So there is the understanding of unpleasant and pleasant possibility at the physical sense door.

I don't know that I completely believe this teaching in the Abhidhamma—that taste, for instance, is inherently neutral—because I think there are some ways that certain tastes will make us gag. Some of the tastes that make us gag happen because of conditioning; I've had that happen. But there are certain flavors, I think, that are almost designed—it's like, "This is dangerous for the body." So I don't know whether this is actually true or not. But I have found it to be a very useful exploration in experience.

To begin to be curious: when there's a physical experience that we're taking to be pleasant or unpleasant, where actually is the unpleasantness or the pleasantness?

An example from my practice: I was doing walking meditation at IMS on a three-month course, so it was pretty deep into the retreat. Actually, pretty much right before this, Carol Wilson had given a talk where she said something like, "If you're noticing aversion, there's something unpleasant in your experience that you're not clearly seeing." And so I was doing walking meditation, happily walking along—lifting, moving, placing—very focused. The room was pretty full, so we were kind of close to each other. And somebody came into the room and slipped in next to me so that it was really tight.

Aversion just flared. I was immediately caught in reactivity: "How could they do that? What's going on?"

And then I remembered what Carol had said. Okay, what is it? What is unpleasant here? What's actually unpleasant?

I went through all of my senses. The person was doing a kind of funny walk, but it wasn't really unpleasant. I had to admit—it's just a funny walk. That's not what I'm reacting to. They weren't touching me, so it wasn't in the touch sense. They weren't making any noises, so it wasn't in the sound door, the ear door.

I went through all the physical senses, and it became clear—the unpleasantness that this reactivity was springing from was not there. It must be something going on in the mind.

I didn't see much at that point, but I kept walking. At some point I noticed a thought: "They're weird." Okay, there's a thought. I didn't quite see that I was reacting to that thought—I didn't see it as unpleasant so much. I just thought it was true.

I kept watching what was going on, and then I saw another thought: "They have bare feet and it's freezing cold out." This was the justification for believing they were weird.

I could see just how ridiculous the whole thing was. It was like—oh my gosh, this aversion is arising from a thought, a belief in the mind that's completely ridiculous. That's where this aversion was coming from.

In the next pass of walking, the aversion was gone, and I was spontaneously doing metta for the person. I did not have to try to let go of the aversion. The seeing clearly—investigating where the unpleasantness actually was, recognizing how the belief of "weirdness" was constructed—that was enough.

This investigation around where the reactivity is actually springing from is tremendously useful. We might be sitting in the dining hall hearing somebody do something, or sitting in the meditation hall—this is classic. You're sitting and somebody rustles next to you, and there's aversion. Is it actually the sound that's unpleasant? Or is it an idea that the person should not be moving, that they have the gall to move when they're sitting next to me?

So much of the time, we are reacting to the unpleasant quality of a thought in our own minds. The vast majority of our unpleasantness is created in this way.

When we react to something in the physical world, like the rustling of sound, the teaching of the Abhidhamma points us toward recognizing that it's not really the sound we're reacting to. This is what I feel that teaching about the neutrality of our physical senses is pointing toward.

When we see something and we like it—we see a flower, for instance—what's being seen is form and color. What we are liking is the idea of the flower in our mind. That's what's pleasant.

This is very useful to understand and to begin to be curious about. It can be seen. We can begin to recognize that when we like something or want something, the question arises: where is the actual pleasantness?

It's largely a construction of our own minds that we think something is pleasant or think it's unpleasant.

Another useful exploration is around neutral experience. What happens when experience feels pretty neutral, neither pleasant nor unpleasant? We tend to like the highs and the lows. We like being excited about things. We actually even sometimes prefer major drama to neutrality. So be curious about what happens with neutral. It can lead to boredom. When it's not clearly seen, the mind can get bored, thinking something more exciting should be happening.

My exploration around neutral has been interesting. I've found, at least for myself, that when there's neutral experience, that's like a place where our habitual patterns are likely to show up. When things are pretty quiet, not much going on, our mind will just reach out for some habit to bring in.

I was doing walking meditation at one point and experiencing a lot of neutral, actually recognizing there was neutral. I had also heard some things in the hall that when it gets really neutral, that may be a place where the mind is going to go to Nibbana. That's what I believed—that some major amazing thing would happen if I spent a lot of time in neutral. That was the belief I had created. So I was spending a lot of time in neutral, and the belief was, okay, this is really good. It's good that it's neutral and something good is going to happen.

Nothing good happened. It stayed neutral, and the mind went to its deeply conditioned habit of believing that I was a failure. That's what arose: you're a failure. Fortunately, in this situation I saw that this was coming out of the neutrality and the idea that something good should happen. When that didn't happen, the belief that you're a failure arose. I could just smile at it and say, wow, out of nothing, the mind went to "you're a failure." Out of neutral experience.

So this exploration of feeling tones is really fruitful. I would say don't make a huge project out of it, but bring curiosity about it from time to time.

One of the ways these teachings work—one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, would give a talk like this. He would talk about perception or feeling tone or something, and I would go off and try to do it and give myself a headache. I'd come back and report my experience, and he'd say, "Are you trying to do that?" I said, well, yeah, I thought you were telling me to do this. He said, "Nothing I say is anything for you to do. It's information that is like Dharma rain."

This talk is just Dharma information. The very listening to and taking in this information has an effect. At the next sitting or maybe sometime tomorrow while you're practicing, something of this talk might arise in the present moment. There may be, "Oh, maybe feeling tone could be available. Maybe that could be something to explore." It's not something you necessarily have to pick up to do. These talks are often more like explorations of things that can be seen, not necessarily instructions for what you should do next. If you happen to have a curiosity arise about exploring feeling tone, play with it for a little while. See what happens. Playfulness in practice and lightness in practice really support us.

CHAPTER 171

Exploring the Five Aggregates and the Sense of Self

Andrea Fella · 1h03

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound exploration of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā) and the process of selfing (ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra). Drawing from the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta (SN 22.59), the Buddha's second discourse, she examines how form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhārā), and consciousness (viññāṇa) constitute the entirety of our experience—and how clinging to these aggregates creates suffering.
>
> Fella presents the aggregates not as static categories but as dynamic processes, citing a sutta passage where each aggregate is described as a verb: feeling feels, perception perceives, fabrications fabricate. She explains how mental formations shape all other aspects of experience, using the example of anger conditioning the body, feeling tone, perceptions, and consciousness. The talk addresses why the Buddha taught that these aggregates are not self—because they are uncontrollable, impermanent, and unreliable.
> The practical heart of the teaching draws on Dōgen's famous instruction: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self." Fella encourages practitioners to investigate strong senses of identity with curiosity rather than aversion, sharing her own transformative experience with self-hatred patterns. She emphasizes that identities are mental formations to be honored and understood—strategies that once helped us navigate life—rather than problems to eliminate. Freedom comes not from getting rid of the sense of self but from understanding its constructed, impermanent nature.

Last night Jaya talked at the beginning about listening to a talk and how sometimes we might want fewer words or more words. I'd like to offer a little reflection or suggestion about ways to practice with listening to a Dharma talk.

We can sit in meditation and simply receive the sounds. I've done this at times where I just let the words wash through, and every now and then there will be some phrase that really lands, really resonates. That's one way—not to try to track the talk, but just to be available to receive the words and the understanding of what the words mean.

Another way is to be really attentive to the content, understanding the content, but at the same time be very curious about how that content is affecting you in the moment. It's a skill, this capacity to receive content and feel the resonances of that content. That's really taking in the Dharma.

In the suttas, it talks about different circumstances under which people become awakened. Listening to a talk is one of those circumstances. Sitting in meditation is one of those circumstances. Reflecting on the Dharma internally is one of those circumstances. And giving a Dharma talk is one of those circumstances.

One of my very favorite suttas is a story of a teacher who was offering a talk on the topic that I'm going to be speaking about. He was talking to a group of other monastics, and they were asking him a lot of very detailed questions. He was explaining and exploring with them how he sees experience. The last line of the sutta says something like, "And while this discourse was being given, all of the bhikkhus listening to the discourse became awakened, and the venerable one giving the discourse also became awakened." That's inspiring to me, that possibility. May it be so.

To me it also points out how the talk is a Dharma reflection, and I'm exploring it myself as I'm offering it. So can it be received as a reflection? Received and opened to—how does this land? Not so much in the thinking realm, arguing about it or figuring it out, but just noticing. There may be some parts that land and resonate, other parts that don't. You don't have to figure them out. Just let them go in, let them wash through. I talked about Dharma rain the other day. Let it drizzle in. At some point, that teaching, that language, may arise again in a time or place where it really flourishes, leads to understanding and insight.

Now the topic tonight is exploring the five aggregates and the experience of selfing. Last week Tara spoke about the three characteristics—she spoke about anicca and anatta—and Kim spoke the next evening about dukkha. These are characteristics of all experience. Everything that we experience is impermanent, changing constantly at different paces, perhaps, or at least with the perception of different paces of change.

Experience, because it's impermanent, is unreliable as a place where we can say, "Yep, that's where I'm going to be permanently happy. If I could hold on to that, if I could have that, I could be permanently happy." But we can't have anything permanently because it's all changing. Dukkha. Unreliable.

And not self. All experience is not self. Not mine. Not who I am. Not myself.

Tara spoke about ways we might open to this truth of anatta. Sometimes it happens by surprise or spontaneously, simply through meeting experiences—just the continuity of mindfulness. We touch into a space where we're just seeing the changing nature of experience and there's no one here doing any of it. We're just seeing that unfold. So sometimes the practice opens us to understanding. It's a kind of dropping into an understanding of not-self.

And there's another way in to exploring this.

The Zen teacher Dogen had a famous quote: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be awakened by all things."

This points to an exploration not of "Can I find anattā? Can I experience anattā?" but rather, "What is this experience that I think is self?" To explore that experience directly. We feel it—we feel a sense of self at times, sometimes strongly. And the encouragement is to be curious about that. What is that like? Is it what we think it is?

When we have a sense of self, we don't usually investigate it. We just take it for granted to be what it seems to be presenting itself as: a solid, stable something that's here. We don't actually begin to be curious about it. We believe it without question, don't even reflect on it.

But as we start to be curious about it, to bring dhammavicaya—that aspect of investigation—to this experience of the sense of self, something shifts. The sense of self is not nothing. It is an arising experience. And so we investigate it like we investigate any other arising experience, like an arising emotion or an arising thought. "Oh, here's the sense of self. What's that? What's happening there? What's that like?"

As we do that, it begins to reveal its nature as impermanent, conditioned, and unreliable—not the thing that we think it is. So as we explore curiosity about this sense of self, we begin to directly, experientially understand, feel into, recognize that this sense of self is not what we assume it to be.

The Buddha talked about this sense of self as arising in a process. We could call it the selfing process. He used the phrase "I-making and my-making." And he really talked about this in relationship to another teaching called the five aggregates.

We've mentioned the five aggregates but not gone into much depth on them yet. I think Kim mentioned them in her description of dukkha, because one of the definitions of dukkha is that the five aggregates of clinging are dukkha. The five aggregates can be understood as basically the processes of body and mind—everything that we're experiencing, the tumbling on of our mental and physical processes. And clinging to that is suffering.

So these mental and physical processes called the aggregates, the five aggregates, are: form, which is the physical realm—body and all of the physical realm around us; and then the other four aggregates, which are mental processes. The aggregates are understood actually to be both processes of body and mind and also the results of those processes. So feeling, for instance, is understood to be both the process by which feeling happens and the result—the pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant aspect of experience.

Form, feeling, perception (which Jaya spoke about last night), mental formations or volitional formations, and consciousness. These are the five aggregates, and I'll describe them in a little bit more depth in just a moment.

The Buddha spoke about our experience in different ways, for different purposes I think, pointing to different aspects of our experience. One of these ways to look at the body-mind processes is through these five aggregates—this physical aggregate of form and these four mental processes that make up our experience. Another way that the Buddha spoke about our experience was through the six sense bases: the five physical sense bases plus the sense base of the mind. Our experience can also be seen in those terms.

This exploration of the aggregates the Buddha particularly pointed to for the value of seeing how we cling to them, because that clinging to these aspects of experience is where we tend to create a sense of self. Recognizing these aggregates in our experience is something we're already doing. We've talked about most of these in various ways.

Form is body—the four elements, the physical experience of hardness, softness, all of that realm of physical experience. Plus what's described as form derived from those basic elements, which includes sight, sound, smell, and taste. So form is also the sight that contacts the eye; it's touching form. Sound is the wave through the atmosphere.

It's vibrating the air, and then it touches our eardrum and impacts form to create the sound. So this is all understood to be form.

And then feeling—we talked about that at some length. The process of feeling, sensing whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Here is where we begin to really see this sense of the aggregates as being both the process by which something happens and the result of that process.

In the suttas, there's one description of these aggregates as verbs, as opposed to nouns. We could think of pleasant experience, unpleasant experience, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant experience as being the what of our experience in the realm of feeling. But in the sutta, there's this person asking the question: "Why is it called feeling?" And the response is: "It feels. That's why it's called feeling." What does it feel? It feels pleasant. It feels unpleasant. It feels neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

With perception, a similar thing. Jaya spoke about perception last night—this recognizing aspect of experience. We recognize form and color in the realm of sight; perception gets layered on itself in a way. The result of perception, the result of the process of perception, is this recognition of something. But with the photons hitting the eye, the first thing that happens is this contact and the recognition of something being seen. What's seen initially is really just form and color, but we often don't see that part. We very quickly see a person or a book or a plant or something like that.

Sometimes when the mind gets really quiet, we can see the layered or staged nature of perception happening. On one retreat, I was sitting outside and turned my head, and my eyes landed on a shape. The mind kind of clicked into recognizing the shape: jagged. Then it clicked into recognizing the color: green. Then it clicked into recognizing: leaf. Just like that. It's a process of perception.

The sutta also describes this: "Why is it called perception? It perceives—that's why it's called perception. What does it perceive? It perceives color, it perceives form, it perceives sound."

We can see this in our experience, this process of perception. Particularly as the mind gets a little more quiet, you might notice this—sitting in the hall, hearing a sound of maybe the turkeys. The first thing is just hearing, but you might notice the mind then say the word "turkey" and think, "Well, my mind is labeling things." That is also sometimes the way perception works. It puts the word into our mind. It's recognizing experience.

And then consciousness, another aspect of mental experience. This is often understood to be the very basic knowing of experience, usually defined in terms of the six sense bases. With every sense base, there's the object and the knowing of it—the sight and the knowing of it, the sound and the knowing of it, the taste and the knowing of it. We can actually begin to notice that difference between the experience and the knowing of it. We may talk more about this as we go on.

And then volitional formations, mental formations—the fifth of the aggregates. This is the whole realm of mental experience that we often think of as the mental activity: thoughts, emotions, beliefs, ideas, views, states of mind. This includes things like states of concentration, peace, anger, irritation, boredom, ideas, beliefs, views. This is a big territory.

We've talked about working with this aspect of experience, the what of this, the mental formations. We've explored working with emotions, working with difficult states, working with the hindrances, working with the seven factors of awakening. All of this is mental formation. Working with thoughts, exploring being aware of thoughts—thoughts are mental formation.

The process of volitional formations is described in a little more depth in that sutta where the aggregates are described as verbs. I'm going to read Thanissaro Bhikkhu's translation because it works with the wordplay that the Buddha used for this particular aggregate.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates this aggregate, which is often translated as mental formation, as "fabrication"—something constructed in the mind. All of these formations are both constructed in the mind, resulting from conditioning, and they also construct. They tumble forward; they construct.

And why are they called fabrications? Because they fabricate fabricated things. Thus they are called fabrications. What do they fabricate as a fabricated thing? For the sake of form, they fabricate form as a fabricated thing. For the sake of feeling, they fabricate feeling as a fabricated thing. For the sake of perception, they fabricate perception as a fabricated thing. For the sake of fabrications, they fabricate fabrications as a fabricated thing. For the sake of consciousness, they fabricate consciousness as a fabricated thing.

What this is pointing to is that the mental activities in our mind—all of the thoughts, ideas, beliefs, views, emotions, wholesome states—condition the rest of our experience. Arising in this moment, they shape the next moment.

How can we see this? We actually can see this. Take something like anger, the arising of anger. Anger shapes the body, it shapes form, often resulting in experience of heat, pressure in the body. So that mental formation fabricates the body in a particular way, maybe even distorting the face. Feeling tone usually becomes unpleasant when anger is arising. The perceptions we have, how we perceive things, become distorted through a filter of anger. We may perceive somebody attacking us or perceive someone doing us wrong as we have this filter.

Our consciousness is actually directed by filters like this. When we are angry, we tend to take in things that confirm. There's a confirmation bias. When we're in a particular state of mind, our consciousness tends to pull things out of experience that confirm that state and tends to ignore things that don't confirm that state. So our consciousness, what consciousness receives to be experienced, is shaped by our mental formations. And anger, this arising of anger, tends to construct more anger—the mental formation of more anger.

This is something we can also be curious about, seeing the conditioning nature of how our mind states affect our experience. We've been talking about this, noticing how thoughts affect your body. This is where this teaching comes from.

The five aggregates are happening all the time. Right now, while you're listening, the five aggregates are tumbling on. There's sound waves coming through the room that are hitting the ear. Form contacting form on your eardrum. That resonance is perceived as voice. And through the process of perception and a lot of conditioning, there's understanding of the words. So there's the perception, understanding the meaning of the words. And then there's the feeling tone—in this case, probably more related to the perception of the meaning rather than the actual vibratory energy of the sound. The feeling of how it lands: pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This may be related to mental formations that may be arising—confusion, interest, curiosity, frustration, annoyance—feeling tone associated with that, and the consciousness of all of it.

Right now, the experience you're noticing can be understood through this framework of the five aggregates. You don't have to divide up your experience this way. You don't have to try to divide up your experience this way. I'm pointing to this because there are times in which it's very useful to understand experience in this way. And the Buddha spoke about the sense of selfing coming up in dependence on these particular aspects of experience.

In his second discourse, the Anattalakkhana Sutta, the Buddha points to some of the main ways that we consider experience to be self and why these aggregates are not self. The first thing he points to in this sutta is that these aggregates, the tumbling on of these aggregates, is not under our control—not under our ultimate control. There is some way in which we control the body. For instance, I can think and decide I'm going to pick up the glass right now. So there's some measure of control that we have. But ultimately, it's pretty limited, the measure of control that we have.

The understanding, in a way, of what we think of as self, and where we get caught around the sense of self—in meditation, we may feel like we're watching our mind, and the mind wanders, and we get frustrated. "I'm meditating. Why is my mind wandering? That should be under my control." Well, the wandering mind, the thinking mind, is a mental formation. This is what the Buddha said about the lack of control. I'll read a couple of these; I won't go through all of them for each aggregate.

"Form is not self. If form were self, the body would not lend itself to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of the body, 'Let my body be thus, let my body not be thus.' But because form is not self, the body leads to affliction, and it is not possible to say, 'Let my body be thus, let my body not be thus.'"

"Mental formations are not self. If mental formations were self, they would not lend themselves to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of mental formations, 'Let my mental formations be thus.'" Wouldn't that be nice? How often is that possible? We are seeing how rarely that is possible. Sometimes our mind is amenable to that. "May my mind have ease," and sometimes there's some ease. But much of the time—no.

And the Buddha says, "But because mental formations are not self, it is not possible to say of them, 'Let my mental formations be thus, let them not be thus.'" It's not a mistake. It's the nature of experience to not be ultimately controllable. This should be a relief, actually.

And yet we get to look at it. We get to observe it. We get to observe experience. The amazing thing about this practice and this process is that the mental formation of wise mindfulness—also not self; wouldn't it be nice to say, "May mindfulness be thus"—but the cultivation of this, because of that other teaching around mental formations, that mental formations shape experience, means that when mindfulness arises, it tends to shape experience in a certain way. It tends to shape more mindfulness. It tends to shape wisdom and understanding.

So we use this understanding to cultivate the wholesome mind, to observe and let go of the unwholesome. Mindfulness has this amazing property that we've talked about: when we bring attention to the wholesome, it increases its likelihood of coming up in the future. When we bring our mindful attention to the unwholesome, to the reactive states of mind, it creates the conditions for it to arise less frequently in our experience over time.

So this aspect of control is a common way that we identify. The sense of self thinks it should be in charge. And if it runs up against not being in charge, there's suffering. That feeling like I should be able to control my mind and be continuously mindful leads to suffering, because we believe in that sense of control. It's just a process. When we can simply understand the uncontrollability of experience and not hold on to "I should be able to control," there's so much freedom. So much freedom.

The next piece the Buddha points to in this sutta is the impermanent nature of each of the aggregates. They're uncontrollable—we can't ultimately control these processes tumbling on—and they're impermanent. They're arising and passing away. Body experience arising and passing away. Now, the body does have some stability.

And yet we understand through the reflections that John was pointing to this morning: I'm of the nature to age. I'm of the nature to sicken. I'm of the nature to die. The body is impermanent.

Feelings are impermanent. The mental aspects of the aggregates are rapidly impermanent. When we start looking at feelings, at feeling tone, we see how rapidly they change. A sensation arises and passes, and the feeling tone with that arises and passes. Sometimes there's a little more stability, as when the mind enters into states of concentration. There can be periods of multiple minutes or even a couple of hours that have a stability of feeling tone, but ultimately it passes away.

So we can be curious about the impermanent nature of the aggregates—the Buddha points to this curiosity. Perception arising and passing away. You walk into the dining hall and there are many perceptions: perceptions about the food, perceptions about the people, perceptions about how I am in relationship to all of it. And then the mental formations, impermanent—all of the ideas and views and beliefs that arise in relationship to those perceptions, all coming and going. Consciousness of all of it, also coming and going.

The Buddha pointed to this: these aggregates are impermanent. Because they are impermanent, they are unreliable. We cannot say, "I can land on this and I will be happy. I can hold on to this thing forever and I will be happy." Because it will ultimately fall apart. It will ultimately dissipate.

Given this impermanent, unreliable nature of experience, the Buddha then asks: does it make sense to call something that is impermanent and unreliable a self? And he answers no. He says it doesn't make any sense to call something impermanent and unreliable a self.

This is really based on what our intuitive sense of self might be. We feel like a sense of self is something stable, continuing through time. Somehow we have this notion that I'm the same person I was ten years ago, that there's something continuing. A kind of process, a tumbling on of these aggregates—this process is happening, but there's no stability there. And what we think of as self usually has some notion of stability. It also often has some notion of control, the sense that if only I could control experience, then I could have things be pleasant all the time.

This part of the sutta, in my impressionistic reading of it, is really encouraging us to investigate: what do we call self? What do we think of as self? When it feels strong, what is it? What is that experience?

This is where Dogen's teaching points. Get to know this experience. Study this sense of self. Explore. Understand. Just be curious about it.

The sense of self, in the Buddha's understanding, in the Buddhist understanding, is not nothing—it is an arising experience. Like frustration is an arising experience. It's not nothing. There are resonances with that. The arising experience of frustration has a shaping aspect to it. It shapes our relationship to the next moment. It shapes our feeling. It shapes our body. It shapes our perceptions. It shapes our consciousness.

And so the arising of these mental formations, these feelings, these emotions, has an effect. We see that effect, we can feel that effect, we get to know that effect by looking at our mind states.

The Buddha speaks of the sense of self as being a mental formation. It's an arising experience. The term that's used is sakkāya-diṭṭhi—identity view. It's an arising belief. The sense of self is a belief. And so it doesn't quite feel like emotion; it's more of a view. The sense of self is more of a view. So it's an arising experience that can be explored, that can be felt into, that can be known.

With respect to these aggregates, the Buddha pointed to different ways we identify. The first way he talked about is: I am this thing. I am form. I am feeling. I am perception. I am mental formation. I am consciousness.

As I go through these, you might just listen and see if they resonate with something familiar for you. For instance, "I am the body"—that's identification with form. Or "I am this emotion. I am miserable." Before I met the practice, I really identified as being miserable, unhappy, as someone who was never going to be happy. And there were times when I experienced happiness. What my mind did when that happened was, "Well, yes, I know I'm happy now, but I know that really what I am is miserable." So I was identifying with the miserableness. "I am miserable." Not understanding, not seeing that miserableness comes and goes like happiness comes and goes. Identifying with that. Identifying with mental functions: I'm the one who thinks, I'm the one who feels or knows. So that's one form of identification—I am something.

The second form of identification is possessiveness. Something is mine. The body is mine. Things belong to me. Ideas are mine. I've suffered a lot around identifying with the ownership of ideas.

The third is a sense of being inside of something. For instance, "I am inside of the body." Maybe that feeling is familiar. I've felt all of these—that the body is mine, mine to do with what I want; I am the body; and I am in the body. They're different, slightly different forms of identification.

Now, the Buddha goes through all four of these ways of identifying against all five of the aggregates, so there are twenty ways of personality view, of identity view coming into being. I've tasted a few of these. I can't say that I understand what it means to be inside of feeling—that one doesn't quite resonate for me. But "I am inside of consciousness"—

That one I've experienced at times—that sense of identification in a state of deep concentration, of being inside a space of vast consciousness or vast awareness. A little identification in that beautiful vast state: I'm inside of that.

Or the next one: something is inside of me. Consciousness is in me. Emotions are in me.

So again, the exploration of this is an encouragement to just be curious about how the sense of self is experienced. I don't encourage picking this up, trying to remember all of these categories, and trying to think, "Okay, is it feeling that's inside of me, or do I think I belong to feeling, or is it mine?" Just let this be, again, the dharma rain. There may be times when a strong identification comes up and there's a curiosity about observing it—perhaps a recognition of, "Wow, I really feel like I own this," or "I really feel like I am this." Believe it completely. I am miserable. That is who I am. We may begin to see that and remember, "Okay, well, that's an identification." Just be curious.

In a more holistic way, we could say—or just a way to explore experience without trying to put all these categories and labels on it—I'm going to describe a few ways of exploring sense of self that I've experienced. There are so many different ways a sense of self is experienced. And one of the powers of this curiosity is simply to begin wondering: when is a sense of self strong? How long does that sense of self last? Is it the same sense of self that lasts all day long, or are there a whole bunch of different senses of self arising? There are many, many senses of self and identities that happen.

One example of this was very stark in my experience. On one three-month retreat at IMS, there were questions in the hall in the morning, as we sometimes do here. Somebody asked a question that created a whole huge papañca storm in my mind. This analytical sense of me arose: "I'm right, and I know how that question should be asked and how it should be responded to." There was just this whole—me. It was so powerful. And it was pretty uncomfortable. I was feeling the unpleasantness of this sense of self, the clinging around it, the contraction around it.

When the morning question period ended, that sense of self was lingering. It was just there. So I went out and did walking meditation, observing and watching the sense of self, feeling how contracted it was, how much it was like "me" and all the analytical thinking and how smart I was feeling. I was just feeling all of it. And it was challenging and unpleasant to be with.

I was doing walking right in front of the door at IMS when this huge truck drove up. It was loud and banging, the door opened, the brakes squealed, and in a split second my mind switched from that analytical, forty-year-old, argumentative self to a two-year-old. "It's a truck! Oh my gosh, wow, that's so cool!" It was just like that.

I think it was because I was watching, curious about the sense of self. I didn't learn much about that analytical sense of self except that it was suffering. In terms of how it was formed—I felt the suffering of it. But what I got to see was that when conditions changed, when the mind was drawn to the big, noisy sound of the truck, it just delighted in it like a two-year-old would. The impermanence of that sense of self, the complete unrelatedness of this new sense of self to the previous one—just no connection whatsoever. Not even in the same ballpark.

So we go through many senses of self and can switch in a moment.

Curiosity is valuable here, and I'd say a good time to explore the sense of self is when it's pretty strong, when there's a clear sense of identity coming up.

One piece that's important to know, to understand, and to honor—really honor—about senses of self is that they have been constructed in our lives as strategies to navigate our world. Many of them have served us, helped us through big messes, helped us find safety. In observing the sense of self, we can have this idea or overlay that we're supposed to see not-self, or we're supposed to somehow get rid of these identities, or we're not supposed to have identities. Identities are simply mental formations. They arise and can be known.

Much as we talk about meeting our suffering and difficult states of mind with honoring and respecting—acknowledging yes, this is happening—we can explore these senses of identity in a similar way, honoring them, almost bowing to them. Like that analytical me—that served me a lot. And yes, there was a lot of clinging to it, a lot of thinking I needed to be right all the time, and the suffering that came with that. But the pattern itself is not wholly bad. It's simply a pattern that was navigating life. And so in the observing of it, we hold it with a sense of care and respect. This is a part of this being that can be known and understood.

That's a big piece I want to emphasize in this exploration: when you see a sense of self, don't think of it as, "Well, I'm supposed to see the not-self in this somehow." Just notice what you're noticing about this identity, how it's shaping things.

Often when a sense of self feels really clear, it's connected with habits and patterns, old deep conditioning. Identities around certain emotions—pride, shame, feelings of unworthiness, self-hatred—that pattern was very strong in my practice. And just having the patience to notice that sense of "I'm a failure, I'm no good," the courage to meet that, was completely transformative.

That pattern around self-hatred is something I observed over the course of years. At times it was more powerful than my capacity to be mindful, and I had to simply set it aside and take a walk. But other times, I could be right there with it, watching it arise. At one point, seeing the feeling of "I'm a failure" descend as I left the meditation hall, I went back to my room and realized there was actually some capacity to be with this. So I sat in meditation kind of late into the night, just watching the arising of that.

I'd see that it was coming and going. That was a powerful piece—I could see it wasn't always there in that time. I was sitting, and then there would be "you're a failure." I would just feel this shame and this withering sense. And there it is. Contact, unpleasant. Then there would be a space, and it would arise again. I'd see it: contact, unpleasant, withering feeling. I just watched it, watched it appear, disappear, appear, disappear.

At some point, the mind saw that arising thought—"you're a failure"—and was right there with the thought as it arose, seeing it arise out of nothing. No sense of shame or anything. It was just arising. This thought was just arising. And then came a kind of recognition: what's going on here is that I'm believing that thought. That's what's making this experience of self-hatred. That's what's making this identity—believing that thought.

The seeing of that, just in a moment, and the self-hatred vanished. Very, very powerful seeing. The next moment was a moment of complete bliss. And then there was the idea, "I figured it out! Never again." And then I saw that—okay, yeah, probably not. That recognition made the bliss become more just contentment. Just, yeah, right now, it's not here.

That moment was extremely powerful. It didn't get rid of all of those thoughts, but it really undermined the belief in them. So the pattern of self-hatred went from this deep rut that was nearly impossible to get out of, to a kind of wide valley of "Oh, there's that thought. Yeah, I don't need to believe that thought."

So this investigation, this curiosity, this honoring of these patterns—not to get rid of them or fix them or change them, but to understand. As Kim mentioned the other night, the practice is to understand dukkha. To understand the sense of self.

Understand it. The freedom comes with the understanding.

Let's sit for just a moment.

Just remembering that you don't have to remember any of this. Just continue noticing what's arising and honoring it, meeting that with kindness and wisdom and wise attention. Moment after moment.

Thank you for listening to the Dharma.

CHAPTER 172

Wisdom and Freedom (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this profound talk from a month-long retreat at Spirit Rock, Andrea Fella illuminates the Third Noble Truth—the cessation of suffering—and the central role of wisdom (paññā) in realizing freedom. Drawing from her teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya's emphasis that "the purpose of practice is the development of wisdom," she explores how wisdom functions as an active quality of mind that recognizes suffering, releases craving, and realizes liberation.

Fella offers an intimate account of her own journey with anger, describing how simple mindfulness practice in daily life—without any formal meditation training—led to a transformative moment of non-arising. This personal narrative illustrates the gradual nature of the path, likened in the suttas to rope slowly wearing away through exposure to the elements. She explains the three types of wisdom: sutamayā paññā (wisdom from hearing/learning), cintāmayā paññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanāmayā paññā (wisdom from direct practice and insight).

The talk explores Nibbāna not as something to attain, but as the absence of creed, aversion, and delusion—"visible in this life" and accessible in ordinary moments. Fella describes various ways wisdom manifests: shifts in perspective around difficulty, seeing the conditioned nature of experience, recognizing experience as mental constructs, and witnessing the non-arising of reactivity. She emphasizes that recognizing wisdom at work strengthens it, and that while insights are impermanent, they leave an indelible understanding that supports continued practice through the gradual fading of defilements.

My heart feels so full sitting here and seeing you and knowing the work that you're doing, what you are exploring and seeing and understanding.

We've been here for three weeks, and it is such a privilege to witness what's unfolding for those of you who I'm meeting with, but also in talking with the other teachers, what's unfolding for everyone. About seventy-eight different retreats happening. And an amazing quality of the Dharma is that it meets all seventy-eight retreats.

The other night Jaya spoke about a kaleidoscope and how the Dharma can be like a kaleidoscope. The kaleidoscope has all the little bits of glass or crystals—I have one with shells in it that I particularly love. The same shells, but a little turn and you see it in a completely different way. The Dharma can be like that. We can look at the Dharma from different perspectives, different angles, to get different understandings perhaps, but all pointing at the same truth.

Tonight I'd like to turn that kaleidoscope a little bit and continue the exploration of the last few nights on the Four Noble Truths and the path by orienting around the Third Noble Truth and what supports that—what supports that realization of the release of dukkha, the realization of the release of suffering. There will be some overlap in terms of what others have said, but to me it feels like this is a really good place to linger, this topic.

One of my core teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, has said that the purpose of practice is the development of wisdom. Wisdom is found in the list of the five faculties, which are five qualities that support the path of practice. Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about them as five qualities that are alive moment to moment in our practice and that may shape how we're meeting the experience in a particular moment.

These five faculties are confidence, faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. Perhaps sometimes faith is strong, and that motivates energy, that motivates us to practice, which develops the mindfulness. The momentum of mindfulness creates that concentration which allows a cultivation of the wisdom. And then that wisdom further supports our confidence, supports our wish, our willingness, our engagement with the practice.

Sometimes wisdom may be very strong in clearly seeing. At other times, mindfulness may be strong in seeing things, but not with the clarity to just have things go poof—to have some of those reactive patterns and habits go poof. And so that's a time when wisdom is being developed.

The wisdom connected with the path of practice is associated with understanding suffering. Jaya mentioned this the other night. The Buddha said, "I teach only suffering and the end of suffering." So all of the understanding that is developed is looking at understanding how suffering arises, the things that put it together, the causes of suffering, the possibility of its release, and the skills, the tools, the practices that support the cultivation of seeing that release. That's the classic definition of wisdom, really—the seeing of the Four Noble Truths.

As Jaya spoke about, it's present at the beginning as an understanding and is with us all the way along the path and is what is understood at the end. We come to completely see through how our minds create not only the suffering, not only the craving, the clinging—those being qualities of mind that our minds are engaging in—but our minds are also creating everything that we're clinging to.

Wisdom sounds like something—I don't know, just the definition of wisdom we may have from our lives sounds like something that is like something we'd have in a book. But in the practice, as I've come to understand it through exploring the experience of wisdom, it's an activity of mind. Wisdom is that function of mind, that activity which engages with those actions connected with the Four Noble Truths.

The activity of wisdom is to recognize suffering, to understand it. When there's an understanding of suffering, wisdom is working. The activity of wisdom is to let go of the craving. When that happens, wisdom is working. The activity of wisdom is to realize the release of suffering. And the entire path is cultivated through this development of wisdom.

Wisdom develops in relationship to seeing the impermanent, unreliable, conditioned nature of experience, seeing the not-self nature of experience. And as that wisdom grows strong, as we clearly see the nature of experience in this way, the mind, imbued with that wisdom, the activity of wisdom releases the suffering.

It releases the suffering when there is clinging, and it also recognizes that these things are not worth picking up. So this framing of realizing the release of suffering—sometimes we do experience it that way, as a feeling of release. Other times, it's felt as something much subtler: just not picking up anything that would lead to craving. Just not picking it up. The mind simply doesn't go there. It understands that way leads to suffering. There's just no movement in that direction to pick it up.

This not picking up is the freedom. This is Nibbana—the ending of suffering. And in the suttas, it's primarily described by what it is not: non-clinging, the absence of craving, the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. Nibbana is not something we get. It's not a thing to get. It is the absence of craving, the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

Jaya quoted this the other night: "This is the noble truth of the cessation of suffering. It is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishing of it, freedom from it, non-reliance on it."

That phrase—as I was reading this the last couple of days, thinking about this talk—the phrase "non-reliance on craving" really landed for me. It startled me. Why would I rely on craving? But when I look at what my mind does, that's exactly what it does. It relies on craving to navigate the world. Craving believes that craving is the answer. And so we rely on it to find happiness. This phrase, "non-reliance on craving"—for me, it just touched the heart, let it soften a little, let that phrase reverberate.

One of the clearest definitions in the suttas of Nibbana is the ending or absence of greed, aversion, and delusion—the extinction of greed, aversion, and delusion. I'm going to read a few quotes strung together. I think they're from a book by Nyanaponica called The Word of the Buddha, a little booklet that gathered all the teachings of the Buddha. The Four Noble Truths are said to encompass all the teachings of the Buddha, and under each truth, he brought together the relevant teachings. It's one of my favorite books.

Under the Third Noble Truth, he put together these quotes:

"The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called Nibbana. Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed, with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is Nibbana—immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise.

"And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and nothing remains to be done. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so neither forms, nor sounds, nor odors, nor tastes, nor contacts of any kind—neither the desired nor the undesired—can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is the mind. Gained is deliverance. This is peace. This is exquisite."

The resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana.

In those quotes, there are a couple of phrases that really resonate with me. One: "If lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one experiences no mental pain or grief." That sounds pretty good. It doesn't mean there won't be physical pain, and it doesn't mean there isn't a feeling of resonating with the suffering of the world. Dispassion allows room for vast compassion. When the heart is not constricted with greed, aversion, and delusion, there's room for so much connection, so much resonance of heart with both the joy and the sorrow, held with balance of mind.

Sometimes I think we might hear these descriptions and find them sounding kind of flat. Why would I want that? But as we practice, we do begin to get little tastes of what it means when the mind has let go of greed, aversion, and delusion. And it feels anything but disconnected and flat. It feels incredibly connected. So: "experiences no mental pain and grief."

The other phrase that strikes me is "visible in this life." This description of freedom, of nibbana being the extinction of greed, aversion, and delusion—the little experiences I've had along the way of when the mind does let go of greed or aversion, or sees clearly—this is a kind of experience I've seen as possible not just when sitting on a cushion with eyes closed in stillness, but when I'm in my kitchen cutting an apple. Freedom in a moment. The mind not going somewhere. The possibility of the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion in this life. And my aspiration is in this lived life, not just in this life sitting in meditation. This possibility of carrying what we're doing here into the world.

This cultivation of wisdom that allows for this release—wisdom being the wholesome quality of mind that does the activity of letting go—the cultivation of wisdom is gradual. Kim spoke to this, about the gradual nature of the path, bringing in the image of fading away with viraga, dispassion. I love that in the teaching of liberative dependent arising, or transcendent dependent origination, this aspect of the path, viraga, is actually a metaphor—this fading away. Raga is like the fading of color of a cloth that's been dyed a bright color. You might put that cloth in the sun and it gradually fades. So that's the process: the fading away of greed, aversion, and delusion in our minds.

There are many stories in the suttas of sudden awakenings, but most of those happened after a long time of practice. So there is that gradual cultivation, the gradual development of wisdom.

There's another analogy in the suttas about the rigging of a ship wearing away. The story goes something like this: after a ship has been out at sea for six months, where the rigging has been getting used, exposed to the elements, splashed by salt water, exposed to the sun and the wind—at some point that ship gets hauled up onto dry land. It sits on dry land and it's exposed to more elements: the cold, the sand blowing on it from the land, more wind and sun and water. Over the course of months, that rigging rots away. It falls apart.

I think of this as the rotting rope analogy. Think about a piece of rope you might come across on a beach somewhere. If you come back to that beach day after day, you might not see much change in that rope. But maybe one day, six months later, you come back and think, "Oh, that piece of rope is still here. Let me pick it up and take it away." And you try to pick it up, and it just disintegrates because it's been worn away moment by moment, day by day, by the elements.

This is an analogy for the path of practice, for its gradual nature. Each moment of mindfulness is like a grain of sand across that rope. It takes many moments for the clinging to wear away.

Now, that may sound depressing. But there's a saying: the Dharma is good in the beginning, the Dharma is good in the middle, and the Dharma is good in the end. Because we do taste—we get little tastes of wisdom at work. And I heard that James told a little bit of my story. Within the first couple months of my practice, I saw something about anger. Anger was something that was making me pretty non-functional at the time, and I was looking at it just in a really basic way. After having spent a couple months observing it in daily life, there came this moment of seeing. I had no training whatsoever other than a little sentence in a book that said, "Try observing your difficult emotions rather than acting on them." Okay, I guess I'll see what that's like.

And the first time I really saw the anger, it was like, "Wow, I did not know this hurt." My mind had believed—that reliance on craving and clinging—the mind had believed that anger was going to do something for me.

It was going to make the person I was angry at miserable so that I would somehow feel better because they were miserable. This was what the mind was doing with this idea.

The first time I really felt it, it was like, wow, that is so painful. I have no idea what to do with this. I guess I go back to work. I was sitting at my computer, frozen, when this happened.

I had set an intention to wake up every time I experienced anger, and I did that for months. The process was slow and gradual. I did begin noticing that the anger wasn't as strong when I noticed it. Now, retrospectively, I know that the mindfulness was becoming very attuned to anger and arising more quickly as the anger was coming up. So it wasn't as painful, it wasn't as strong. It was much easier to say, "Oh yeah, there it is," and get on with my day.

I didn't have any guidance on feeling it in my body. I knew nothing, really—I was such a beginner. But just the power of this simple, simple practice in daily life was remarkable. I had not ever sat down to meditate while I was doing this.

And then one day, I was in my kitchen cutting an apple. The memory of the person I was angry at arose—we were together at a fruit stand in the Sacramento River Valley. I could see that the memory was connected to what I was doing, to cutting the apple. That was a conditioned thing; I could see that.

What I'm describing here took place in a split second, though it takes a while to describe. I saw that thought about this person I was angry with, and I felt this freight train of energy, this pull of "Oh yeah, I really want to jump on that thought and think more thoughts to get angry." I felt the intention toward anger there.

And what happened in that moment—and again, I know this retrospectively—is that wisdom arose. Not consciously, really, but in a way that recognized: that way lies anger. And my mind said, "I don't have to get on that thought. I don't have to go there."

I didn't believe it, because I had not had this person come up in my mind without anger arising. So I was standing there, waiting for the anger to come up. And it did not arise.

I sank to my knees with gratitude. It was a moment of seeing the non-arising of something that had been so powerful in my experience. And I knew: this stuff works. I will be doing this for the rest of my life. This works.

So this is the practice, just in a simple way. And I had never even sat down to meditate before I saw this. Actually, it was around that time that I thought, "Gee, maybe they call it practice because it helps you see these things in daily life. So maybe I'll sit down and meditate." That experience pulled me into the practice.

The practice of satipaṭṭhāna, the gradual development of seeing experience even in this really simple way, can give rise to very profound understanding. Wisdom growing, in that case really grain by grain, just over the course of those months. Wisdom developing around the suffering of anger. And the wisdom strong enough in that moment when I cut the apple to direct the mind not to go there. I didn't have to do the letting go. I didn't do anything other than stand there with a knife in my hand, watching in amazement as my mind didn't get angry.

Satipaṭṭhāna, our practice, cultivates this wisdom moment by moment. So I want to spend some time exploring the cultivation of wisdom. My teacher, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, spoke about wisdom a lot. He used this word more than most other teachers I've had, and it caught my attention.

He would talk about wisdom at work—"see wisdom at work," he would say. He would talk about using wisdom reflections to help us in our practice.

In the suttas, there's a teaching about three kinds of wisdom. First, there's the wisdom of hearing, learning, listening: sutamaya paññā. Suta meaning hearing, maya meaning to bring into being, and paññā meaning wisdom—the wisdom that is brought into being through listening. This is the kind of wisdom that is received from our teachers, from reading books, from studying the Dharma. We have to learn the wisdom somewhere. The Buddha is said to have understood all of this on his own, figured it out without any books or anybody to help him with these wisdom understandings. The rest of us need some help. So there's the learning we engage in through receiving the teachings.

The second kind of wisdom is cintamaya paññā—the wisdom that is brought into being through reflection. We hear, we listen, we read, we take in the Dharma, and then we think about it. Does this make sense?

I met this practice through a friend sending me a book when I wrote to her saying I was in the Peace Corps, far away from all of my friends. My friend sent me a book where I read that line: "Try observing your emotions instead of acting on them." I thought about that sentence and concluded it didn't make any sense to me. Wouldn't that just make me more angry? But I did have a little bit of faith because my friend said this was useful, so I borrowed the faith of my friend. And I was at wit's end anyway—nothing else had worked, so I might as well try this. There wasn't real intellectual understanding there, but there was a little bit of willingness to try it out. That's the faith piece. I borrowed the faith of my friend and just tried it out. And then, as I described, within a few months I began to understand how it worked.

That connects with the third kind of wisdom: bhāvanāmaya paññā, the wisdom connected with practice, with actually engaging in the practices—not just thinking about it, but doing it. Stepping into the process of looking at experience. This includes both the cultivation of wisdom through practice and the direct experience of wisdom itself, the arising of insight and understanding.

The second kind of wisdom, cintamaya paññā, can be really useful in our bhāvanāmaya paññā—in the time when we're actually sitting in meditation and cultivating our mindfulness practice. There are times when the mind is a little wobbly or caught by something, and we can drop in wisdom that might help us. Many of you have talked about this. Almost intuitively sometimes this happens. Sometimes wisdom will do this on its own.

I think I mentioned at one point that I was sitting in meditation and a phrase arose—something a teacher had said to me in an interview a year earlier. That phrase arose, and it was exactly the wisdom the mind needed in that moment. It wasn't something I tried to do, but wisdom that arose in a verbal way. "Oh yes, that sounds useful. Let's explore that." Sometimes thoughts can be connected with wisdom, and we can actually use thoughts skillfully in our practice. When we're a little out of balance or wobbly, we might drop in a reminder: "This is impermanent. This is just constructed phenomenon." Sometimes that wisdom can go in quite deeply and allow for a release. But sometimes it just gives us a little more space, lets us settle back and recognize, "Okay, right, I can be with this." Understanding at the intellectual level can support us to meet things at the experiential level.

At one point, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, in one of my interviews with him, asked me to recognize wisdom at work in my experience. "What is it like for you when wisdom is at work?" I said, "I don't think I know what you mean, Sayadaw. I don't think I get it."

But I went off and started to hold that question in my mind. I wasn't really trying to figure it out, but when I noticed some kind of easing of experience or a release from being caught by something, I just thought, well, wisdom must be working there somehow. That's how I began this exploration.

Over the course of quite a bit of time, I've come to see so many different ways that wisdom works. And what I've begun to understand too is that this recognition—because wisdom is a wholesome quality, like concentration, like mindfulness—when we become aware with mindfulness of wholesome qualities, it strengthens them. So becoming aware when wisdom is working tends to strengthen wisdom. This is another way to cultivate it: becoming aware of these moments when wisdom is at work.

Now, that terrain Jaya was talking about—those moments of freedom, little moments, those little moments of just a release of some kind—those are some of the moments when wisdom is at work. I'd like to describe a few of these, by no means comprehensive, but just a few of the ways we might see wisdom at work.

One of the most familiar ways, perhaps, or an early way that we start to see wisdom at work, is when we feel a shift of perspective around something that's been challenging. We've been caught by something—caught by a pattern of frustration or confusion or depression—and then we recognize, "Oh, this is just confusion. I can know this." There's a little feeling of letting go there. It's not that the pattern disappears, but there's some ease around it. It feels like there's space.

One way I sometimes talk about this is through an analogy: when we have our foot on the gas pedal in a car, the gears are engaged and they're going. When we're caught by a pattern, the gears are engaged. But when we can see, "Oh, it's just confusion," it's as if the gears disengage, and the car gets put into neutral. There's no more fuel being added. But when the gears disengage, they don't stop spinning. We still see the pattern working, but there's a lot more ease around it. This is wisdom allowing that disengagement, allowing us to witness, to see how that pattern is feeling, how it affects us.

We might also see the conditioned nature of experience. Sometimes, through this continuity of mindfulness, this kind of thing can happen pretty much any time—in the in-between times or in sitting practice. Just watching a pattern unfold. For instance, sitting in meditation and feeling pressure in the bladder, then recognizing the unpleasantness of that, and realizing it's a good idea to get up and relieve that pressure. Sometimes we can see that unfolding and recognize, "I'm not doing this. This is just conditions arising and conditioning the next thing and the next thing." The conditions of sitting for an hour creating the full bladder, the pressure creating the intention to stand and relieve the pressure—all of that can be seen as not me doing it.

Often we don't quite see it that way. We think, "Oh, I'm getting up and going to relieve myself." But we can see these conditions unfolding and directly understand—the wisdom understands—it's not me doing it. The insight into not-self comes through seeing that conditioned unfolding.

Sometimes we might see experience as simply something arising right in the present moment. A thought arises about the past, and we recognize this is just a thought happening in the present moment. We see it as an arising—it wasn't there a moment ago, it's there now. We see that impermanent nature, arising in this split second.

You may recognize some of these as I talk about them. And you may not have quite recognized them as being manifestations of wisdom. That's part of why I'm naming these things—to support your recognition of this quality that is at work in all of you.

Another understanding that might happen—and one of you in your report today described this, which made me remember it—is beginning to see that everything in our experience, what we are experiencing, is a construct of our own minds.

I see this kind of like our experience as a reflection of what is out there. I don't think of what's in my mind as being completely constructed out of whole cloth. I think you're actually sitting out there. I think there are a bunch of people actually in this room, and it's not just a figment of my imagination. But what I know of it, what this being experiences, is entirely a construct of the mind. And that can be directly seen. It can be quite unsettling to see that.

At one point, seeing this, I think the way it first really expressed itself to me or showed itself to me was that I could see I was clinging to something—I could see the clinging. I could see that the clinging was my mind doing that. But then recognizing that what I was clinging to was also something my mind made up. The mind just goes, "Yeah, that's ridiculous." We can't actually cling to anything out there. The only thing we cling to is something our minds construct. And we can see this. That is wisdom that is very freeing, as the mind begins to understand its uselessness. Clinging doesn't serve us. We've been relying on something that's not reliable.

I'll just mention one or two more of these. I have a whole list of them here, and I'm not going to get through them all. But one thing I want to point out is that sometimes I've been talking about these wisdoms that arise, that are experienced as a release or a shift, a feeling of letting go. But early on in this talk I mentioned there's also the not picking up—this kind of seeing that there isn't a picking up. There can be a recognition at times that greed, aversion, and delusion are simply not arising.

At one point, following the whole experience I described about anger—that was not the end of my anger, I'm here to tell you. There was a lot of work over the next couple of years. That was not even the last anger about that particular person. But it really gave me the confidence to keep looking at it. And over a couple of years, I kind of watched it grow, watched it, watched it, saw it happening, had to set it aside a lot of the time because it was too strong, stickier, more powerful than the momentum of mindfulness. So I couldn't look at it a lot of the time, but I would see it, I'd bow to it, I'd say, "Yep, I'll get back to you. I promise I'll get back to you."

And I began to notice over the course of probably a couple of years that the pattern wasn't arising as frequently. Then one day—I remember exactly where I was; some of these insights have that quality, seared into your mind—I know exactly where I was walking on my sidewalk when I realized, "Wow, I haven't had that anger come up in a long time." Must have been months. And in that moment, I was thinking about the person I had been so angry at because I remembered the anger I had experienced many times. And I could not even call it up. I could not construct it. It was gone. And I never saw it go away. It disappeared while I wasn't looking.

This is also how wisdom works sometimes. It can work in the background or silently, just that gradual wearing away. It's like I went to pick up that rope of anger and it just wasn't even there anymore. So sometimes wisdom expresses as the non-arising of reactivity. It's just not picked up.

The other example in this category, more directly experienced, is that description I talked about where I saw the mind kind of heading towards anger—not angry in the moment, but leaning like, "Yeah, I want to get angry"—but wisdom took me in another direction. That was a very direct seeing of the non-arising of reactivity.

And then sometimes we're in a space where the mind is just so balanced. A lot of continuity of mindfulness, just seeing experience coming and going, arising and passing. Nothing sticky. Nothing clung to, just slipping through. Again, wisdom is there—not as an experience of release, but as the understanding of non-clinging in that moment.

Sometimes in those meditative states, seeing things very rapidly arise and pass away, there's that kind of understanding. Things are happening so rapidly that the mind understands there isn't anything to cling to. It understands that impermanent and coreless nature—just nothing to cling to.

So these moments of seeing wisdom at work are a pointer to freedom. They probably still have some clinging in them somewhere, because much of the time those kinds of experiences are still experiences. And it's so clear when they're happening. It's like, "Wow, why would I ever pick anything up? Why would I ever want to get angry? Why would I ever do that?" It's just so clear.

I remember on one retreat, I was watching things come and go and seeing the mind just respond with, "Yeah, no, nothing to cling to. Don't pick it up." I was so happy. It was like somebody was whispering in my ear, "Don't cling, don't cling." And then I thought I'd figured it out. Half a day later, when the delusion came back, when that reliance on craving re-arose, it became very clear to me that it is not obvious. It is only obvious with that clarity.

And so insights are impermanent. And yet, as Kim said the other night, we can't unsee them. We know. There's a knowing there, a deep connection with that truth. Even though we can't see it now, the value of having seen it—when we're no longer able to see it directly—is that we now know this is delusion.

Before we really have that clarity or understanding, when delusion is there, it's very hard to see. We can't really recognize it as delusion. We are fully in that reliance on craving. But having seen through it, when the reliance on craving comes back, when those patterns of delusion return, we can see them and know, "Yep, that's delusion."

As Kim said, we can't unsee it. We may not be seeing it directly in this moment, but there's an understanding that can be there, that can support us to have more patience with meeting the pattern again and again and again—as the wisdom gets stronger, develops, and grows gradually.

CHAPTER 173

Evening Talk: Five Aggregates and Studying Self-ing

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this evening dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers an intimate exploration of how we can study the sense of self through the lens of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā). Drawing primarily from the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta (SN 22.59), she illuminates how the Buddha pointed to the uncontrollable, impermanent, and unreliable nature of form, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and consciousness as evidence of not-self (anattā).

Fella presents the aggregates not merely as categories of experience but as active processes—verbs rather than nouns. She gives particular attention to the volitional formations (saṅkhārā), describing them as the 'engine' of experience that constructs and shapes all other aggregates. The sense of self, she explains, is itself a volitional formation that arises and passes like any other conditioned phenomenon. She shares the Buddha's teaching on four patterns of identification with each aggregate: 'I am this,' 'this is mine,' 'I am inside this,' and 'this is inside me'—offering twenty potential ways we construct identity.

With characteristic warmth and humor, Fella encourages practitioners not to hunt for subtle senses of self but to notice when identification arises obviously—in moments of pride, comparison, or reactivity. She suggests that 'othering' always implies 'selfing,' and invites curiosity about both. The talk emphasizes approaching these patterns with a non-contentious attitude, honoring each arising as worthy of attention rather than something to eliminate. This practical guidance supports practitioners in seeing through the constructed nature of self without creating a new project of self-improvement.

As we practice receiving experience, there are lots of different things that we notice—different patterns, different habits of mind, some personal to us, familiar reactivities, and some more universal. All of what's happening to us, what's happening in experience, is just this human experience tumbling on. In many ways, everything that we're experiencing is simply human nature.

Some of it may be more personally conditioned, perhaps based on our own family patterns and habits, or what happened to us on the playground at school, or just how we've grown up and the conditions we were surrounded by. But a particular pattern we all have—our own flavors of—is a human tendency, a pattern of selfing.

The sense of self is an arising experience. We usually, or often, take it for being me. There's a kind of belief in it, a belief in that pattern that it is me, who I am. And yet this too is just another arising experience that can be seen. We can be curious about this sense of self, what we are thinking of as a self, what we are thinking of as a sense of self. As we begin to get curious about it, we start to see that it is not what we think it is. It's not stable. In observing the pattern, we see there's not just one thing we're calling "me." Lots of different senses of self are happening. We see it's an arising that arises and passes. One sense of self arises and passes. Another sense of self arises and passes. We see the impermanent nature of it, the conditioned nature of it, how it arises based on things happening in the world or things happening in our minds and our experience.

This seeing, this observing the sense of self like we would observe any other arising experience—with curiosity and interest—begins to undermine the kind of beliefs we have in it. It undermines those unquestioned beliefs about the sense of self. We can say that perhaps studying the sense of self, or being curious about it, doesn't have to be picked up as a project, which the word "studying" seems to imply—like, "Okay, I'm going to really study this, look at it." But it is a phenomenon that will arise, sometimes more obviously than others. And so some curiosity about what it is when it arises can be valuable.

As we are curious about a sense of self, we begin to see that it is not what we think it is. What we take to be self is not self. The Buddha talked about this sense of selfing, this process of selfing. The term translated into English is "I-making" and "my-making." He talked about it a lot through the perspective or the exploration of the five aggregates.

Carol mentioned these the other day, and I think most of you have heard talks on the five aggregates or are familiar with them at least to some extent. Just as a reminder, I'll do a very brief recap of the five aggregates to set the context for the exploration around studying selfing.

The word itself, "aggregate," is a kind of technical word that we don't use very much in English. In the Pali, the word khandha, I understand, is actually a much more ordinary word. It means something like "group" or "heap." But "aggregate" is actually a good word because in the suttas these five aggregates—form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness—are described both as the results of experience, the "what" of our experience. Form is body experience, physical sensations. Feeling is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience. Perception is the noticing of recognition, the perception that happens as we recognize something. Mental formations are those many emotions, moods, and thoughts. And consciousness is the simple knowing aspect of experience. The aggregates are talked about in that way, as the "what" of experience.

But they're also described as the process by which these things are experienced. So the word "aggregate" to me is interesting because it is both a noun—aggregate, like aggregate rock, which is a rock of rocks, that's kind of the image of what the aggregates are, just a group of stuff—so "aggregate" can be the experience itself. But "aggregate" is also a verb: to aggregate, to collect, to gather.

One of my favorite suttas around the aggregates describes them in terms of process, as verbs rather than as nouns. For example, it describes feeling this way: "Why is it called feeling? Because it feels. What does it feel? It feels pleasant. It feels unpleasant. It feels neither pleasant nor unpleasant." It's described as the process of feeling. All of them are described in this form of verbs.

So we can think of the aggregates as the processes of body and mind. The aggregates to me are an interesting set. They, in my understanding of the teachings, describe our conditioned experience—the happenings in our body and mind, the conditioned happenings in our body and mind. So pretty much everything we're experiencing.

There are other ways that the Buddha talks about the processes or experiences of body and mind, the six sense spaces being one of those. The aggregates are interesting to me because in terms of processes of body and mind, they describe one physical process—the process of form—and four mental processes. So this teaching on the five aggregates really teases apart the workings of the mind, how the mind experiences, how it puts experience together.

Form, the physical process of our human system, includes the physical sense bases and their objects: body, eye, ear, nose, tongue—the physical sense bases—and their objects: tactile sensations, sight, sound, smell, taste. This is a very rudimentary sense of our physical experience. The physicality of experience in the touch sense, for instance, is vibration, pulsing, tingling, heat, coolness, liquidity, moisture, hardness, softness. The physical touch sensation is not, for instance, hand or foot. That experience or recognition of hand or foot is found in the perception aggregate—that recognition.

Our physical sense bases have really quite simple input. The eye experiences form and color. Any objects that we see—wall, door—that's all perception. In my own exploration of the aggregate of form, it has been a really helpful way to begin teasing apart ways that mind and body get confused or conflated, the way the overlay of concept gets confused with the actual physical experience. We can begin to see the actual physical experience and then recognize, for instance, the sensation of pressure, and then perhaps an image of the foot as the perception. So the recognition of the form aggregate helps us begin to tease apart the physical from the mental.

And then feeling—this process of recognizing pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This aspect of experience is understood to be mental. As I said, there is one physical aggregate and four mental ones, so the aggregate of feeling is understood to be mental. Feeling tone is not inherent in the objects of experience; it depends on conditions. It is constructed based on history, conditioning, events happening in the present moment.

I saw this really clearly on one retreat while eating a meal. It was a simple meal—an apple and bean dip for an evening meal. I took a bite of the bean dip and just tasted, experienced that. I don't remember much other than the bitterness and just a little bit of the oiliness of the bean dip. I don't remember much about the pleasantness or unpleasantness I experienced there. But when I took the bite of apple, it was so pleasant—it was like the best apple I'd ever eaten, or so I thought. It was just so juicy and just the right amount of tartness and sweetness for my liking.

A couple of things happened as I ate. One is that when I had the bite of bean dip and then the bite of apple, I noticed that the intensity of the pleasantness was stronger after the bean dip. Something about the contrast, conditions on the tongue, whatever, just created conditions of more pleasantness. And then the other thing I noticed was that as I ate, the mind got used to it. It wasn't so interesting anymore, and that also reduced the pleasantness. So we can be curious about this process of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—how the mind feels experience.

And perception—again, I'm going through these really quickly—perception is that process of recognition of experience. A sight happens; form and color hit the eye, and there's a pattern there. We could say that perception depends on memory, like our mind goes and tries to find the thing from our history that is most similar. So we see something—there's the form and color—and then the mind recognizes it as chair. That recognition may happen as a word in the mind, the mind saying "chair," or it might happen as an image, or it might happen as a felt sense of sitting on a chair.

It can come in through various sense modalities. The process of perception is layered in a way.

I saw this on another retreat, watching how the mind put together perception. I was sitting just outside and turned my head, and I landed on a form. The mind recognized it in a kind of staged way, and it did it with words in the mind. It said: "green, jagged, leaf." So noticing that that process was a process in the mind—recognition, perception—different from the seeing. It was a process of recognition.

This process of recognition is very useful. We probably couldn't walk across a room without it. And it's useful to recognize that it's a happening, that it is a part of our mental process, happening all the time.

And then consciousness—usually understood to be a very simple aspect of knowing experience, just the meeting of the sense base. There are said to be six classes of consciousness, one for each of the sense bases: seeing consciousness, hearing consciousness, smelling consciousness, tasting consciousness, touch consciousness, and mind consciousness. Just a simple recognition—contact of a sound with the ear, hearing consciousness arises, hearing arises. A really simple aspect of knowing.

I saved volitional formations for last. It's not usually last in the list of the aggregates, but I wanted to spend just a little bit more time with this one. In terms of the "what" of experience, this is a lot of what we're noticing: moods, emotions, thoughts, ideas, beliefs, views—all of these are mental formations. States of mind, including concentration, mindfulness, patience—all states of mind are mental formations.

What we could say is the "what" of the mental formation. The mental formations are those mental activities that include intention, include some kind of activity, agency—but not necessarily a conscious agency, not necessarily a conscious act of will. But these patterns—and we can see this, we know this actually—with something like anger: when we're caught in anger, it's like anger is doing our experience. It's shaping our experience. There's a kind of activity of anger. And likewise, there's an activity of metta that shapes our experience. This is the process side of the volitional formations—they shape our experience.

The definition of volitional formations in this verb form states that volitional formations construct the conditioned. What is the conditioned they construct? They construct conditioned form as form. They construct conditioned feeling as feeling. They construct conditioned perception as perception. They construct conditioned volitional formation as volitional formation. They construct conditioned consciousness as consciousness. So this is the engine of our experience. Volitional formations shape what happens. The sense of self is a volitional formation. It shapes our experience.

For example, just looking at anger in terms of how it shapes the other aggregates: when anger is arising, it can affect the body. We know this—it shapes the feeling of the body. I often feel pressure and heat when anger is present. It can distort the face, make it kind of ugly. Feeling tone usually becomes unpleasant with anger. We tend to perceive things through the lens of anger, perhaps seeing what someone else is doing as an attack on us, or interpreting somebody else's facial expression as meaning something when maybe they just have some pain in their gut. Our consciousness is also directed by anger. When anger is present, consciousness tends to become conscious of certain things and not of others.

Selective attention. And anger tends to construct more anger. So this is how volitional formations work. They're very potent, part of our experience and what we see and explore. How does experience condition other experience?

These five aggregates are happening all the time, whether we're mindful or not. It's like the tumbling on of our experience. Mindfulness is also a mental formation, and I almost think of it as being a mental formation that reveals the functioning of the five aggregates. Sometimes the mindfulness can come up and meet all five aggregates in a kind of broader sense of what's happening. Sometimes the mindfulness may land or connect with one of the aggregates in particular—form or feeling. Mindfulness meets just what's happening. The aggregates are happening, and when mindfulness arises, that's what it's meeting: the arising and passing, the tumbling on of these conditioned experiences.

In his second discourse, the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta, the Buddha pointed to how we tend to identify, how a sense of self is created in relationship to these aggregates. The first thing he points to in the sutta is this: in terms of these aggregates, he's talking to a group of people and saying, "In terms of form, do you have control over form? Do you have control over feeling?" This is the first thing he points to. I'll read you two of these passages.

"Form is not self. If form were self, the body would not lend itself to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of the body, 'Let my body be thus, let my body not be thus.' But because form is not self, body leads to affliction, and it is not possible to say, 'Let my body be thus, let my body not be thus.'"

"Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were self, consciousness would not lend itself to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of consciousness, 'Let my consciousness be thus, let my consciousness not be thus.' But because consciousness is not self, consciousness leads to affliction, and it is not possible to say, 'Let my consciousness be thus, let my consciousness not be thus.'"

He says this for all five aggregates, pointing to the uncontrollable nature—the not inherently controllable nature—of these conditioned experiences. There are times when we have some measure of control, but not ultimate control. We cannot say, "May my mindfulness be thus." Wouldn't that be nice? "May I be continuously mindful." It's not possible to say that, because it is not self.

This is a common way that we impute a sense of self—this sense of agency, a sense of control, of ability to control. And then we suffer when it's not possible, because we feel like we failed in some way. We feel like if we were a better person, or if we were doing it right, we would be able to control this. And the Buddha says, "Well, it's not self. That's why you're not able to control it."

It's actually something of a relief. When we see that something is not controllable—oh, that's a pointer to not-self. There's so much evidence for not-self out there. The mind wanders? Evidence for not-self, right there. We don't see it as such, often. We feel like, again because of that view or belief of self, we think it's somehow a personal failing that the mind has wandered.

So control—this aspect of control—he really emphasizes this. Noticing the uncontrollable nature... we don't like that. It feels uncomfortable. But we may be able to hold it with this understanding: "Oh right, this is a pointer to not-self."

Then, for each of the aggregates in the sutta, he points to the impermanent nature of each of these aggregates. Form, impermanent. Feeling, impermanent.

Perception, impermanent. Volitional formation, impermanent. Consciousness, impermanent.

And then, because impermanent, inherently unreliable as a place to land for lasting happiness. This word dukkha can mean the experience of suffering, and it also can mean the inherent unreliability of experience—that it is not a place where we can land for lasting happiness. It is dukkha because it is not reliable. That's another translation that can be used at times for dukkha: the unreliability of experience. Conditioned experience arises and passes away. It does not last. Not reliable.

And then the Buddha asks a question here. He says, does it make sense to call something a self that is impermanent and unreliable?

So what is it that we call self? What is it that we think of as a sense of self? I think it often does include this kind of sense of permanence, of stability, some kind of reliability. But really, one of the ways I take this part of the sutta is as an encouragement to look at what it is that we think of as self. What is it that we take to be self? And then to look closely at it and see if it is actually functioning in the way we think it is, in terms of that belief of what self is.

We don't really articulate to ourselves very clearly what we think of as self. It's a feeling, it's a sense. So get to know the experience you're calling self when it arises. And it arises a lot—you don't have to go looking very far for it. Sometimes, as I said the other day, the experience may feel more like reactivity, and you may not have a clear sense of what the sense of self is in that reactivity. You don't have to go trying to figure out what the sense of self is in the pattern of reactivity. There will be times when the sense of self is really clear. Then begin to be curious about it. What is that? What am I calling this "me"? What am I calling this sense of me? Get to know the experience that you're calling sense of self.

The Buddha talked about identification, identity, and view—this I-making and my-making—in a four-part way of looking at each of the aggregates. Four ways to look at each of the five aggregates, so twenty different ways of a sense of identity arising. I'm not going to go through all twenty right now. I'm just going to give you the pattern and explore a couple of the ways in which we might notice this.

The first pattern of identification he points to is: I am form, feeling, perception, mental formation, consciousness. I am the body. There's that sense of "I am the body." I am a mental formation—I am angry, I am miserable, I am confused. Roles or social identities are mental formations also: I'm the parent, I'm the student. These are ways that we have that sense of "I am something." I am the one who thinks, who knows, who chooses.

The second pattern is: something is mine. Form is mine. Feeling is mine. Things belong to me. Emotions are mine. Ideas are mine. At one point I suffered so much around this appropriation of a word. It was my word.

Other people were using the word and they weren't giving me credit for it. So much suffering. An idea is mine. What is that feeling of appropriation, that mineness? What is that? What is that like? What does that feel like?

The third pattern: I am inside of form, feeling, perception, mental formation, consciousness. For me, this one has the flavor at times of feeling like I'm inside the body. Maybe that kind of sense of somehow I am this thing that's traveling around in this body. Occasionally, at times, experiencing being inside of consciousness—the sense of vast consciousness and a sense of me kind of somehow in that. Again, just ways that maybe help us see how we identify.

And the last pattern: something is inside of me. Consciousness is in me, emotions are in me. I'm big and these things are in me. Again, just being curious about how you are feeling a sense of self. It is a phenomenon, it is an arising, it is a mental formation that's arising.

So those four again, just to restate them: I am something, I am an aggregate. The aggregate is mine. I am inside the aggregate. The aggregate is inside me.

There's another teaching that the Buddha offers that I found to be a simplification in a way, a simpler way of looking at the sense of self. I can see often when there's a sense of self, it falls into one of three categories, as opposed to these twenty that the Buddha's talking about. So this is a simpler perspective. The Buddha said often of experience: we should know form is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself. Feeling is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself.

And so that three-part reflection: this is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself. The first one—this is not mine—is the way we take something to be mine, the way that we identify, that sense of appropriation again.

Then the other two I began to tease apart in my own experience just through seeing a sense of self. The first one: I am. I am this. To me, "I am" brings up the sense of the agent, the doer, the one who's in control. So that piece of the sense of control is what this speaks to. When we're identifying, we may be identifying "I am"—I am the doer, I am the thinker, I am the one who chooses, the one who decides, the one who acts. The agent of the sentence. I am.

The third one, to me, is a subtler experience. The self that feels like it's the doer—that one can be more obvious in some ways. And then this last one, "this is not myself," puts the sense of self as the object of the sentence rather than the subject of the sentence. There was one time I was observing experience and I could clearly see I was not doing consciousness, I was not doing what was going on in here. But it sure felt like it was happening to me. I went and reported that to my teacher, who was Gil Fronsdal at the time, and I said, "I can't see through this." Me, the doer, not able to see through that sense of it's happening to me. He just laughed and said, "Just notice that's how it is." Of course, of course—that's what he said.

But that kind of recognition—to me it was a subtler sense of self in a way. The sense of "I am the one who does"—that one was easier to see and easier to release in a way. It was more obvious.

This sense of things happening to me—just another sense of me, a subtler sense of that. So there's lots of different ways that a sense of self is experienced.

I think it's useful to begin to see this. When we recognize that there are many different identities, at some point I began to see that what I took to be the sense of self—many of these senses of self were just familiar patterns of contraction. And there were a lot of different ones. I had somehow created this idea that they were perhaps pieces of one big one. But then seeing them come and go, come and go, watching familiar patterns... You know, me being the analytical, intelligent one who knows how to ask questions in the hall when other people aren't doing it right. This analytical person—that was a very strong identity. I suffered a lot around it and could see it clearly.

At one point I was watching that identity, doing walking meditation in front of IMS, watching that identity and feeling the suffering of it. Just this "analytical Andrea." And then a truck drove up. Within a second, I was not analytical Andrea anymore. I was a two-year-old just delighting in a truck. It was like—poof—that one disappeared and this one arose. It was quite startling because it had been such a sticky pattern, and then it was gone in a second, replaced by this other experience.

So we can see these patterns come and go, see their impermanent nature, begin to understand that they're not what we think they are. Identities are often conditioned patterns and habits, like that analytical one of mine, conditioned by years in school where I got rewarded. It wasn't me that made that. There were so many conditions that created that pattern—not just about me, but about how my parents were with me, how it was in school, what other kids said. So many different pressures created that sense of self.

Sometimes we can see senses of self as strategies that have been conditioned for us to navigate the challenges of life, to navigate the difficulties of life. What are your patterns, habits, strategies? How do you feel them? Again, curiosity about them as they arise.

And it doesn't have to be a pulling apart. I offer this teaching about the aggregates as a support for understanding the whole of this process of selfing, but in the exploration of the experience of it, just notice what's obvious. This sense of self, the whole thing of it—let it reveal itself, how it's functioning.

We can observe our identities and see how they shape our experience. They are mental formations. How do they shape our experience? What do they make us think? How do they make our body feel? How do they shape our actions as a sense of self arises?

So again, looking at a sense of self is probably easiest when it feels pretty obvious, when it arises more prominently, rather than trying to find a sense of self.

James Baraz tells a fun story about this. He said he was given the instruction at some point to go off and notice a sense of self. He was doing walking meditation in the basement at IMS, and he said it was all very subtle—"Oh my, not much sense of self here, and oh, maybe there's a little sense of self there"—kind of looking for the sense of self. He was alone in the basement until somebody came down and walked by. James was doing a really slow walking, and this person walked by kind of fast. The thought that arose in his mind was, "Well, I'm doing so much better than he is." Oh! Wow, that one was obvious. There it is. You don't have to go looking for some subtle thing. Just be with your experience, and there will be times when a sense of self is really obvious.

Some emotions, some senses like "I'm right, I know how to ask questions"—that sense. See what's going on there. Certain emotions can have a sticky sense of self: shame, unworthiness, self-hatred, pride, arrogance. They contain a sense of self in them also. All of our reactive emotions have a sense of self in them. Sometimes the suffering of the reactivity—like for me with anger—the suffering of the anger was way more obvious than the sense of self in the anger.

There was at times the sense of "I'm right," but the anger was way stronger in terms of what could be seen obviously. So just notice what's clear, what's obvious.

Another interesting piece to be curious about in terms of selfing is if you notice othering happening. You start noticing, "Oh, they and them, they're doing that thing. They should, they shouldn't." When there's a sense of other, there is a sense of self. We can notice that othering as a kind of counterpoint to selfing. So be curious about othering. What's going on there?

A sense of self may also arise when there are others in our environment and it's like we think we know what they're thinking about us. That sense of being othered, that experience can be interesting to see. So just, again, be curious about where you're noticing the sense of self and what you are noticing there. You don't have to pull apart whether it's "I am inside of X" or "X is inside of me." Some of those things will become clear at times. It feels like I'm in control, feels like I am the one who is doing, I am the thing. Sometimes that is clear. Just notice what is obvious.

I think an important piece too about exploring the sense of self is not having a contentious relationship with it. We're talking about allowing experience, allowing our reactivity to be here and just be with it, be curious about it. Same thing with these senses of self—a kind of sense of honoring that it is an arising and it is worthy of our attention. There's something to learn here. The sense of self is such a powerful shaping force in our minds, as are all of the mental formations, all the volitional formations. So curiosity about how they are arising and how they are tumbling on.

And check the attitude when you're noticing a sense of self. We've got lots of opinions and ideas about them. But see if it can come back to that simple recognition: this is what's arising. What does this feel like? What's this?

CHAPTER 174

Recognizing Wisdom

Andrea Fella · 22 min

In this contemplative talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound exploration of how wisdom (paññā) manifests and can be recognized in meditation practice. Drawing from her own experience and the teachings of Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she invites practitioners to investigate the "job description" of wisdom—what it does, how it functions, and how it is experienced. Rather than seeking wisdom directly, she emphasizes creating conditions for its development by becoming curious about what obstructs it, particularly the attitudes of greed, aversion, and delusion.

Fella identifies several "symptoms" of wisdom working: experiencing a shift in perspective around challenging situations, recognizing dukkha simply as dukkha without resistance, seeing thoughts of the past as present-moment arisings, and understanding the conditioned nature of how suffering is created. She shares a particularly illuminating personal example of working with a persistent pattern of anger, where wisdom operated almost imperceptibly in the background until one day she realized the reactivity had completely released. This gradual process resonates with sutta descriptions of defilements wearing away like ship rigging exposed to the elements over time.

The practical relevance of this teaching lies in its invitation to notice and appreciate wisdom already at work in our practice. Since recognizing wholesome qualities nourishes their growth, becoming attuned to wisdom's functioning strengthens it further. This creates a positive feedback loop connecting to the five spiritual faculties (pañc'indriya)—as wisdom strengthens, so do confidence, energy, mindfulness, and concentration, all supporting deeper understanding and the release from dukkha.

This morning I'd like to offer some reflections on recognizing wisdom working in our practice.

We cultivate wisdom not through trying to find it, but by creating conditions that support its development. And one of the main conditions is beginning to be curious about what's in the way of wisdom. So we check the attitude, we begin to get really familiar with those attitudes related to greed, aversion, and delusion. As we see them and begin to understand them, the mind moves more and more in the direction of wise attitude, wise mindfulness—that non-reactive, curious, allowing attention that can learn with experience.

As we find more and more our way to this wise attention, we have the experience of wisdom working. And you've all had experiences of wisdom working. At one point, Sayadaw U Tejaniya explicitly asked me, "What is it like for you when wisdom's working?" That became a kind of curiosity. At first, I wasn't really quite sure what he meant. But as that question was simply held in practice, I began to see many different ways that wisdom expresses itself—wisdom as an activity of mind.

Sometimes Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about getting familiar with the job descriptions of our activities of mind. He would say, get familiar with the job description of aversion or of greed. And this was an encouragement to get familiar with the job description of wisdom. What does wisdom do? How does it function? How is it experienced?

As a wholesome quality, the recognition of it—as we've been talking about—creates the condition for its nourishment. It feeds it. And so the recognition of wisdom at work also nourishes it.

At one point on a retreat I was teaching, somebody asked me a question in the hall: What are the symptoms of wisdom? I like that phrasing of the question. So here are a few ways that I've noticed the symptoms of wisdom. And I'm sure there are many, many others. This is an encouragement both to point to ways in which you've already seen wisdom at work but perhaps didn't quite take it in as that's what's happening —"Oh, this is wisdom doing its job"—and also to inspire a curiosity for yourself about how you experience wisdom working. Because you do.

One way, maybe one of the first ways that we experience wisdom working, is when we feel a shift of perspective around something challenging, where there's not resistance to it. We're seeing it, but there's just a sense of, "Oh, this is just frustration. This is just confusion." And so while the pattern may not disappear, wisdom is supporting the capacity of mind to know it with balance.

We could say, in a way, that part of the job description of wisdom is to understand dukkha really well. Wisdom knows dukkha as dukkha. That's that recognition: "Oh, this is dukkha, this is just anger."

Another part of the job description of wisdom is that it can release dukkha. In that case, the wisdom is perhaps releasing just the reactivity around something—like thinking it's a problem—so that the pattern, though it may have strong momentum, is still seen with some measure of curiosity and interest where learning can happen, where further wisdom can grow.

Sometimes we can see experience simply as a present moment arising, just a pattern arising in this moment. For example, recognizing thoughts of the past arising and recognizing that they're happening now—just a thought happening in this moment.

We may see the conditioned nature of how dukkha is created. For example, we see an idea in our mind about something someone is doing, and then we realize that a reactivity is happening not to what the person is doing but to our ideas about it. Again, wisdom recognizing the process by which dukkha is created. Wisdom often arises, or the development of wisdom is often connected, with the experience of dukkha.

We might also recognize that what has felt like a deep pattern of reactivity, something that happens frequently, is actually created in an instant.

Loneliness, for instance—we may feel a sense that it's a pervasive pattern, but then actually see it arise in dependence on a thought and recognize that it is coming into being in this moment. It did not exist a moment ago. We begin to poke holes in the notion of its pervasiveness, seeing the impermanent nature.

Sometimes wisdom is quite strong, and as soon as it sees a pattern of dukkha, we feel it let go. We feel a release. That release is a symptom of wisdom—it is not the wisdom itself.

The other piece about wisdom is that sometimes wisdom expresses itself as thoughts. Like earlier when I said, "Oh, this is just anger." But the thoughts are not the wisdom. They're perhaps an expression of it. The wisdom is the understanding of the dukkha. We might at times attune to that sense of release as a symptom of wisdom and almost lean into it, or look for it, or use it as a signpost for wisdom. And yet sometimes wisdom can operate almost in the background.

I've had times in practice looking at patterns and seeing how much the mind would be caught by that pattern—anger in particular. When I tried to turn the mindfulness to it, I would just instantly be in the anger and not really able to look at it. So for quite some time, when I saw anger arising and saw the rapidity of it, I would kind of bow to it, acknowledge it, recognize it. "Yep, I see you. And I'll pay attention to you when my mindfulness gets stronger. But right now I'm going to put my attention on my feet. I'm going to pay attention to something neutral."

That whole complex of intention became encapsulated by the phrase "not now" in my mind, with a gentle approach—a feeling of bowing to the anger, "not now," and putting my attention somewhere else. I did that for a long time with one particular pattern, a particular anger around a particular situation that was very charged. I'd see the thoughts about that situation arise and think, "Okay, yep, I feel that—not now." And I did that redirecting for a long time.

The way wisdom operated in this situation was very quiet, almost imperceptible—actually imperceptible until a certain point. I began noticing slowly, very slowly, that those flares of anger, that movement, were getting a little more spaced apart. They were getting spaced further apart. Instead of being several times a day, it was every few days, or every week or so. It was just very gradually not happening as much.

And then one day—this day when the wisdom became apparent to me—I remember it as one of those things where, when wisdom is strong, when understanding is clear, it gets seared into your mind. I remember exactly where I was when this recognition arose: that I hadn't felt that anger in a long time. That was what arose in that moment. "Gee, I haven't felt that anger at that person, that situation. I haven't felt that in a long time. I don't even know how long it's been."

And of course, in that moment, the thought of that person, the situation, was there in my mind. And I could not find a shred of anger. It was gone. The pattern had released while I wasn't looking. And at some point there was that awareness: it's gone.

This is resonant with some of the descriptions in the suttas of the gradual wearing away of the defilements—the images of the rigging of a ship slowly wearing away. A ship, after having spent a long time at sea with the rigging exposed to the salt water and the sun and the wind, being pulled up on dry land for the season and further exposed to wind and sun and sand, slowly wearing away and eventually falling apart. But each day, not seeing any particular change in that wearing away of the rope. Then one day you notice: oh, it's fallen apart.

So sometimes wisdom doesn't have that kind of feedback of release.

It's simply the non-arising. We recognize that something's not there anymore—a reactivity no longer present.

So just being curious about this quality, this wholesome quality of mind that we are cultivating in this practice: wisdom. Wisdom and awareness are the main two wholesome qualities we actively cultivate, with the rest of the wholesome qualities being revealed through this strengthening of wisdom.

And as we recognize wisdom and cultivate the conditions for wisdom, we receive very clear feedback about the value of the practice—the release from dukkha, the non-arising of dukkha. This supports a further arising of confidence, of faith.

The five faculties that Carol talked about a week ago—with the strengthening of understanding comes a strengthening of confidence, a sense of: yes, this is useful. And with that, there's a strengthening of energy, mindfulness, concentration, and more wisdom.

So let's sit together.

CHAPTER 175

Evening Talk: Five Aggregates and Emptiness

Andrea Fella · 1h00

In this evening talk, Andrea Fella continues her exploration of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā) through the lens of emptiness (suññatā), drawing primarily from the Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta, the Lump of Foam Discourse. She begins by clarifying the Theravāda understanding of emptiness—not as a metaphysical statement about reality, but as a direct investigation into the insubstantial, conditioned nature of experience itself. Empty of self and anything pertaining to self, our experience is revealed as processes tumbling on without any stable, solid core.

The talk examines each aggregate through the Buddha's striking similes: form (rūpa) as a lump of foam on the Ganges—appearing solid from a distance but disintegrating upon inspection; feeling (vedanā) as a water bubble arising and bursting with contact; perception (saññā) as a shimmering mirage that reflects something real yet deceives us about its nature; mental formations (saṅkhārā) as a plantain tree trunk that appears solid but contains only layers of sheaves with no heartwood; and consciousness (viññāṇa) as a magician's illusion, weaving together sense streams into seemingly coherent experience.

Andrea offers practical guidance for investigating these teachings directly in meditation and daily life. She explores how our beliefs and views shape feeling tone, how perception creates convincing but constructed representations of reality, and how seeing the conditioned arising of each aggregate helps dissolve our habitual grasping. The talk illuminates how recognizing the empty nature of the aggregates supports the letting go of misperceptions about self, ultimately freeing us from unnecessary suffering.

This evening, I'd like to continue exploring the five aggregates, which I talked about last week. This is what we're seeing—this is our experience—so there's actually quite a bit to explore around it. The perspective I'd like to bring this evening is from a particular sutta that points to or explores the empty nature of the aggregates. I want to say something about that perspective: why it's useful, how it's helpful for us.

First, a little bit about the Theravada perspective of emptiness. My understanding of the Theravadan perspective on emptiness is that it's not a kind of metaphysical teaching, a teaching about the nature of stuff out there. As we explored a little bit around looking at perception of impermanence yesterday, the teaching is really radically pointing us to looking at the nature of our experience. And so the Theravadan perspective on emptiness is regarding the empty nature of experience—the insubstantial nature of experience, we could say. Other words that point in here: without inherent existence, empty of inherent existence. Another way to think of it is the conditioned nature of experience, the tumbling on of processes of body and mind affecting each other. No stable, nothing stable in there, nothing solid in there. In that way, experience is empty.

Perhaps think of it as empty of thingness. Every experience has an arising, and maybe there's a phrase that talks about the arising, the persisting, and passing away of experience—all experience having that trajectory, that impermanent nature. But there's the understanding that there's no thing there. So empty of thingness, empty of substantiality.

I think we can begin to see, recognize, or understand the empty nature of experience from the perspective of conditionality—seeing how a thought arises which conditions an action. No me there making that decision. Thought conditioning an action. Intention conditions action. We can see how sight conditions perception, conditions thinking. We can see this in our practice. We begin to deeply recognize that this being is just a tumbling on of these processes of body and mind.

Another way into the understanding of emptiness is through the recognition of the impermanent nature of experience—seeing the arising and ceasing, the arising and ceasing, that begins to poke holes in the idea that there's anything that's stable. So we could also say that the understanding of emptiness is: there's not a thing, there is process. The process is not nothing. The process can be recognized, can be seen. It's just not what we usually take it to be.

One of the ways the Buddha defined emptiness is in a sutta where Ananda came to the Buddha and said, "It is said that the world is empty. The world is empty, Lord. In what respect is it said that the world is empty?" And the world here—the Buddha pointed to a kind of definition of the world. He said, "Empty. It is just this fathom-long body with its perceptions and mind that I make known the world, the arising of the world, the cessation of the world, and the way leading to the cessation of the world."

So this is my understanding of what the meaning of world here is: the world of experience. That's all we know of the world. This body and mind meeting—these sense organs, very sensitive sense organs being impinged, contacted by stimuli. And our mind, what we experience, is our mind's reflection of that, you could say. And so this is what, in my understanding, he means by the world.

The Buddha responds, "Insofar as it is empty of self or anything pertaining to a self, thus it is said that the world is empty." So empty of self or anything pertaining to self.

The sutta that I'm going to explore—many of you have probably heard it or heard teachings from it before. In pointing to the emptiness of the five aggregates, I think this is quite useful because, in terms of the way the Buddha speaks about emptiness as being empty of self and what pertains to self, the five aggregates are the way the Buddha pointed to how we tend to misperceive self. And so seeing the emptiness of the aggregates can help us to let go, to re-understand, to perceive more accurately what's going on here in this tumbling on of processes.

The sutta is the Lump of Foam Sutta, the one that uses the similes for the aggregates. We'll look at each one of these and explore a little bit about the analogy itself and something about how it might help us to see the empty nature of the aggregate.

The commentaries say that the Buddha was sitting on the bank of the Ganges River and he saw a lump of foam floating down the Ganges. That created the inspiration for him to give this Dharma talk. He said, "Suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam. One with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial."

For what substance could there be in a lump of foam?

So too, whatever kind of form there is, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—one inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in form?

This image of a lump of foam—I haven't seen lumps of foam on the Ganges River, but I have seen them in the Pacific Ocean. I was out one day with a fellow teacher. We were taking a day away from the February retreat at Spirit Rock, and we went out to the ocean. It was a windy day, a cold day. There was a lot of wind whipping up the waves. The waves were crashing down, and there were huge lumps of foam being blown up in the air and landing on the beach. Big, huge lumps of foam.

You look at a lump of foam like that from a distance, and it looks like a form. I can imagine on the Ganges, if a big lump of foam is floating along, it's holding its shape, appearing kind of stable. From a distance it might seem quite stable. Well, these lumps of foam on the beach in San Francisco—the wind was blowing them, and they weren't small. They were lumps of foam as big as this table here. They were coming at us, these big lumps of foam just flying down the beach. And as they were flying down the beach, they were simply disintegrating. What substance could there be in foam, in a lump of foam? It was just this ephemeral kind of process.

The Buddha doesn't mention this part so much in the sutta, but just unpacking this analogy: foam is created—at least in the Pacific Ocean, I know—in big lumps like that when there's a lot of agitation, a lot of stirring. The organic matter in the water gets stirred up and bubbles, creates a froth, and clings together. So there are conditions that come together to create this lump of foam. And there are conditions that came together to create our bodies. Pointing to the conditioned nature of experience is a big part of understanding the empty nature of the aggregates.

We can reflect on the nature of the body, and the Buddha encouraged this. There are places in the Satipatthana Sutta to reflect on the nature of the body to decay—the charnel ground contemplations. There you can really see how the body falls apart when there's no more life force in it. And the encouragement is to reflect: this too is my nature. This is the nature of the body.

We can look inwardly into the feeling, the experience of body, and feel its actual experience. We talked about this last week when I discussed the aggregates. The actual experience of body is quite dynamic. It doesn't stay still very long. We often relate to our body through a concept—hand or head or foot—and that can create a sense of stability. But when we actually feel the body, just right now maybe the hand is a good place to feel this. You just touch in and feel into the sensations. In that space that we call hand, what are the sensations happening there? Maybe even coming a little closer to a finger. Not pushing in, but just receiving. What are the sensations there?

As I explore it, it's like there's a lot of dynamics. Nothing lasts very long. Sensations are coming and going quite quickly. And those sensations are coming and going in dependence on conditions. There's the condition of the touch sense of the hands, but then there are nerve endings and the blood coursing through, and there's lots of sensations that may be experienced there.

At the sensation level, when we touch into that world of experience, we do see the impermanent and kind of bubbly, popping nature of experience. At one point, paying attention to my breath during the three-month course, the sensations of the breath just felt like bubbles popping. I remembered this analogy and went to Joseph. I said, "It wasn't just an analogy—it's like the way the body actually is. It's bubbles." He was pretty muted in his response, but I was very excited.

So yes, we can touch that kind of quality of sensations. But then our minds kind of look down at the body and say, "It looks pretty stable to me." Even as we know that cells are changing and being sloughed off and all kinds of things are changing, there's just some sense of that stability. And so some reflection can also support us here—bringing to mind that this being began as an egg and a sperm joining. That joining process began the process of cell division and then specialization of cells. I mean, we were two cells. We weren't two cells. It's all just a process. So some reflection can also support that recognition of the conditioned or empty nature of our experience.

And what do we grasp at when we grasp at the body? This is an interesting question. When we're clinging, when we think we're clinging to body, what are we actually clinging to? Usually it's some idea. An idea of how we want our body to be. An image. Some concept there. Again, concept. Concept is a major place where, when we're not seeing concept as yet another creation of the mind, we often reify around concepts and take that concept to be the reality. And that concept-making tends to obscure the impermanent nature, the empty nature of experience. So it's interesting to look at what it is we're actually clinging to if we think we're clinging to body.

So, feeling tone. "Suppose that in the autumn when it's raining and big raindrops are falling, a water bubble arises and bursts on the surface of the water. One with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a water bubble? So too, whatever kind of feeling there is, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near, one inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in feeling?"

So this image of a water bubble appearing when a raindrop or drop hits the water. One day I was standing in front of IMS and watching this happen. It was pouring rain and there was a puddle in the pavement that had collected because of the water. And when the water drops would hit the puddle, a little bubble would appear. It would float on the surface and then vanish. It made me laugh every time it vanished. There was one, it arose, just a sudden appearance and a disappearance. I think the laughing was because of the little bit of startle—that it looked so thing-like, and just vanished so quickly.

The commentaries mention around this particular analogy that as soon as you try to grasp one of those bubbles, it's going to go away. That part of the ephemeral nature of the water bubble—the reaching out to grasp it, you can't. It's too ephemeral.

So some of the similarities here with feeling and exploring this: similarly, like the moment that the drop hits the water, that moment of contact, very quickly the water bubble forms. The drop creates a plopping in the water, creates a little air pocket, and the water kind of hovers over that little air pocket for a while and then bursts. So with contact as a condition, there is feeling. Contact and feeling, contact and feeling—that kind of ephemeral, very fleeting experience with every contact.

The conditioned nature of that water bubble takes several things to come together for that water bubble to appear: the pond, the falling water, the contact, maybe even the rapidity—how quickly it strikes may have something to do with whether that bubble is created or not. So there are conditions that come together for the creation of that water bubble. And likewise, conditions create feeling. It's not inherent.

I mentioned this last week: feeling is not inherent in the experience. So this is an interesting exploration. What is it? Not so much to think about, but to be curious about. Something arising is pleasant, something arising is unpleasant. What's the condition for which something is pleasant? What's the condition for which something is unpleasant?

There are a couple of pieces there that are interesting to look at. There are some basic things—like, you know, if you cut yourself with a knife, that's generally unpleasant. But beyond that area of contact, there's so much area of feeling where it's not that simple. Feeling tone can depend on how we perceive something. So for instance, the classic analogy or simile of the snake and the rope.

We walk into a room and see a coiled form in a corner. It's dim, the lights are dim. We might think it's a snake, and that will produce feeling tone, probably some reactivity as well. But then if the lights come on and we see it's a rope—a misperception—the feeling tone is very different about a coiled rope in the corner. Now there may be some ideas like, "Who would leave a coiled rope in the corner of the room?" But the rope itself, what we are perceiving, is affecting how the feeling tone is experienced. This happens all the time, way more than we might think.

Views also influence feeling tone. An example of this: I was meditating one night late in my house. I had trouble sleeping, so I got up and was just meditating in the middle of the night. I began hearing this tapping noise, and there was some fear there. I could see there was some reactivity. Mostly this thinking of it as unpleasant—just like, "It's unpleasant. This is an unpleasant sound."

Then as I kept observing, I began seeing a lot of things that were going on, like an idea that the tapping was a rat in my wall. When I saw that idea, that view, that this is some creature in my wall making this sound, I could see that the feeling tone of the sound was shaped by that view. When that was seen, it was like, "Oh, there is fear here. There is this idea that there's some rat in the wall." I could see that and see there was some reactivity there. Then when I heard the tapping again, it was just neutral or even slightly pleasant, because the view had been teased out of the picture.

Originally the sense of that tapping being unpleasant seemed inherent—the sense that "this tapping is unpleasant." But seeing what is it actually? What is actually unpleasant here? So often it's view, it's an idea, it's a concept.

We can see this in spades with our fellow yogis—our ideas and views about things that they do or don't do. And it's all our own ideas in our minds. Look at where the reaction is. Look at what is actually creating or shaping that sense of feeling tone. Feeling tone, like an airy bubble, just arising and based on conditions. Again, that sense of conditionality being an important exploration around this emptiness of the aggregates.

Now, perception. "Suppose that in the last month of the hot season, at high noon, a shimmering mirage appears. One with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, and insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a mirage? So too, whatever kind of perception there is, whether past, future, present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near, one inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, and insubstantial. For what substance could there be in perception?"

I love this analogy of the mirage. I actually did a little bit of looking at how a mirage actually works. The classic mirage of seeing water in a desert—the way it works is that there's heat shimmering off of the desert. It creates something that produces a kind of reflective surface, the shimmering heat. Maybe there's a little bit of moisture in the air creating the conditions for the reflection. And what you're seeing when you see water, when you think you're seeing water on the desert from a distance, is a reflection of the sky on the surface there. It looks like water.

You can take a picture of a mirage—it's an optical phenomenon. It's not completely nothing, and it is actually a reflection of something. That's the piece I think is so interesting about this analogy. Because our perceptions are the best our minds can do in the moment to recognize experience. But it's a reflection of experience, not the experience itself.

The deceiving power of the mirage is that if you take it to be reality, you're going to go running after it, and it's always going to recede because of the way mirages work, and you're never going to get to water. There's no water there. But the mirage is deceptive in that it makes you think there might be water there. So it's a misperception—there's something actually being reflected, it's reflecting the sky, but the mind is taking it to be something that it's not.

And that is what we tend to do—this is where delusion enters into perception. We tend to take our perceptions to be reality. We don't even consider that what we're experiencing is our mind's creation. We simply take it to be what's out there.

So perception is empty of substantial nature. It's not what we're taking it to be. And yet, as I said last week, perception does a pretty good job. It does a pretty good job of reflecting what's out there. Perception itself is a useful and necessary process for us to navigate the world. So we're not trying to get rid of it, but we do want to not misunderstand it. We want to have an understanding that what we are experiencing—the perceptions, actually everything we're experiencing—is constructed in our minds. That's all that's going on. We're experiencing what's constructed in our mind.

We can see the process of perception. I talked about this last week: hearing a sound, you may see in the mind an image of what the sound is, that representation. It may be an accurate reflection, or it may not be. But we often do, I think partly because perception does such a good job much of the time, take the concepts to be reality. There's a kind of reification—it's like, "This is what is out there." This is a key way we take perceptions to be substantial, this kind of assuming. It's a belief, an assumption of their reality.

This mistake is easier to see when perception makes an error. This has been a fun part of my own practice—to be curious about this, to recognize when perception makes a mistake and see what happens.

I'll keep this one brief. There was one point when I was at Shwe Oo Min, hearing a squealing sound at night—actually in late evening, at dusk. It sounded, my perception was, that it was a pig. The squealing was like the sound of a pig, so that was my perception. The sound seemed kind of distressed, and so my mind created the story that this pig was being butchered. I imagined there was a butcher shop on the other side of the wall from the monastery and that this was happening each evening—they were butchering the pig for market the next day. That was my story.

Now, I knew that was a story. I knew that I did not actually know there was a pig being butchered there. But there was still compassion arising for that imagined pig.

Then one night, instead of meditating in my room, I was out walking at dusk at that time, and there were these bats flying very close, and they were squealing. So that squealing I had heard was not a pig—it was a bat.

This was so instructive, because now I knew that the whole thing about the butcher shop, all of that, was a concoction of the mind. But I had not had a clue that the idea that it was a pig was also a concoction of the mind. That was quite something. Perception had made a mistake.

I'm thinking about that snake-rope analogy—the perception of the coiled form is a snake, the perception of the coiled form is a rope. Different experiences arise based on those perceptions. So again, to see that kind of belief in our perceptions as reality—this is not easy to see. But we can begin to be curious about perception.

On one retreat, Sayadaw talked about perception so much that it just became what I started to be curious about. So much of the understanding I have around perception came not because I was looking for it, but because it was in the field during that particular retreat.

Now, mental formation. "Suppose someone seeking heartwood, needing heartwood, wandering in search of heartwood, would take a sharp axe and enter a forest. There they would see the trunk of a large plantain tree, straight, fresh, without fruit bud core."

They would cut it down at the root, cut off the crown, and unroll the coil. As they unroll the coil, they would not find even softwood, let alone heartwood. One with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in the trunk of a plantain tree?

So too, whatever kind of volitional formations there are—whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—one inspects them, ponders them, and carefully investigates them. As they investigate them, they appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in volitional formations?

This image of the plantain tree is wonderful. They're big. I lived in the South Pacific, and there were banana trees there. They have big fat trunks. They look really stable, really solid. You can come up and knock against them—they're hard. They look pretty stable. But if you chop one down, it's just these sheaves, layers and layers and layers, this coil that's described in the sutta. Layer upon layer upon layer. The sheaves are pretty rigid, kind of stiff, and there's layer upon layer of these rigid sheaves. But if you take each one apart, there's nothing solid in terms of wood. It's just a pile of leaves in front of you. You can't use it for wood.

This analogy for me also points to the experience of mental formations—just feeling layered, especially with some of these deep, sticky, old habit patterns we have. How layered they are. And the rigidity of the sheaf—those patterns get kind of stiff. They're layered upon layered upon layer, and we interpret them to be a thing, or solid, or "It's been here forever, it's the way I've always been."

But then as we start to observe our mental formations, we see they're just one on top of another. They condition each other, they kind of weave together, but it's all just mental formation and mental formation and mental formation, layering on itself. Sometimes when I think about exploring this, I mention that sense of stepping back. It's just a big mess. Can you just know the big mess? And as we observe that big mess, we see that it's not stable. We feel the kind of movement in there, the different pieces of reactivity, different kinds of mental habits and formations. We see that shifting quality of it. And we begin to understand it's not heartwood. It's not who I am. It's not me—it's just processes unfolding.

Again, the believing aspect seems to come into many of the ways in which we take these aggregates to be stable—believing the substantiality of them, believing the meness of them. The belief kind of holds that plantain tree together. The belief holds all of those different sheaves together.

So seeing or recognizing what's being believed, connected with a whole pattern of layered reactivity—that's been so helpful in my own practice. I've mentioned it before, but I'll mention it again because it is so powerful. What is being believed? Seeing a deep, deep pattern of self-hatred arising—it's like watching a banana tree being created right in the moment, this big stiff thing. But seeing the belief there: it's just a thought that's being believed. That's all that's happening here. That's all that's happening.

And then consciousness. "Suppose that a magician or a magician's apprentice would display a magical illusion at a crossroads. One with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in magical illusion? So too, whatever consciousness there is—whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—one inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in consciousness?"

This is an interesting simile.

All the others are more about natural processes, natural things. This one brings in a being, this simile—an intentionality of weaving a spell. I'm not sure I've completely unpacked this in my own understanding, but there are a couple of pieces that feel resonant to me in this analogy.

A magician weaves together many different things and pulls focus so that you're not seeing where the illusion is created. There's so much going on in this magical illusion. And then when something appears in some fashion, we haven't seen how it was created. The focus had been pulled; we hadn't seen how it came to be. There are conditions that had it come to be—it didn't just magically appear. But that's the illusion: that it just magically appears.

There's something of that in how our minds deceive us, how delusion deceives us into taking things to be solid and real and stable. We haven't seen them come to be. They are just there, and we take them as if they've always been there.

Another piece of this illusion relates to consciousness itself. Consciousness is this simple knowing aspect of experience—six kinds of consciousness: seeing consciousness, smelling consciousness, tasting, touching, hearing, and mind consciousness. But we often don't experience them as individual streams. When I look at the wall, I see the wall, and I'm not going to go running fast at that wall because I know it's hard based on my experience of walls before. The mind, in seeing that wall, has created the understanding—and it's a valuable one—that it's solid. The seeing of the wall and the solidity, the hardness, the touching of that wall are woven together in my mind.

I think this is how consciousness weaves together all of our senses into a coherent experience. This is a piece of the magic show of our minds. Again, the processes of mind are just these streams that our mind is putting together, really helpfully, to help us navigate the world. But it is all just the creation of our minds.

Let me say a little more about consciousness, because I didn't talk about this too much last time. Consciousness, this bare aspect of knowing, is different from awareness or mindfulness. I'm using awareness and mindfulness synonymously here. Mindfulness is different from consciousness in that mindfulness may or may not be arising in the present moment. Consciousness is arising in every moment, whether we are mindful or not.

We can be lost in thought and still walking down the street because consciousness, feeling, and perception, as Sayadaw will say, are doing their jobs. Mindfulness doesn't have to be there to navigate the world in that way. Consciousness in that way is arising and helping our system take care of itself—to know that you're getting ready to walk into a tree, for instance. Consciousness, feeling, and perception help us navigate the world. So every moment of experience will arise with consciousness; mindfulness will come and go.

Now, being mindful of consciousness—this is interesting. Every moment of experience has the moment of knowing, the consciousness of hearing, and there's the hearing itself. There's the hearing, the object, and the consciousness. Every moment has both of those things: the object and the consciousness. There's the hearing and the knowing of hearing. There's the sound and the knowing of hearing. There's the sight and the knowing of seeing. There's a mind state and the knowing of the mind state. Every object has both: the object and the knowing of it.

Mindfulness can recognize the object side, and it can recognize the knowing side. My understanding is that mindfulness basically uses the five aggregates to reflect them back on themselves. Mindfulness uses consciousness, feeling, and perception to reflect all of the aggregates back on themselves. It's hard to talk about, but I'll do the best I can here.

In terms of recognizing the knowing, which is useful for seeing the processes of body and mind—what's going on here?—awareness can recognize the knowing itself. It can recognize the knowing; it can recognize the object. We might play with this a little bit. This is not something we force. For me, this tends to happen especially if there's been a dharma field of exploration around this topic; then the mind may start to recognize the knowing side.

But trying to find it is probably not so helpful. We may, however, be able to recognize that there's body sensation—there's the contact, there's the pressure—and then there is knowing of that.

I'm going to offer you an image that was helpful for me in this way of seeing, this understanding that every experience can reveal the knowing. It's there. It's not like we have to find it. It's already there.

I was sitting a retreat at Cloud Mountain during the winter, and it was quite cold. It had snowed three days in a row and hadn't gotten above thirty-two degrees. The air was really clear, and the sun finally came out one afternoon and started to heat up the snow that had gathered on the trees. It was really light snow—so light I could just blow it away. About eight inches deep, but it would just poof. Really light and crystalline. As the sun hit the trees, the snow started to fall off in great clumps. Walking through the woods, I'd hear this clump, then another.

That afternoon I was sitting and looking out my window into the courtyard. One of these snowfalls came right through the courtyard, and as the snow fell through, it illuminated sunlight that was streaming through—sunlight that had not been apparent. I was startled by that. There's sun out there? It looked like it was just shadow. The entire courtyard appeared to be in shade. I walked out onto the deck and leaned over, and there were two patches of sun underneath the deck. So there was sunlight streaming through the courtyard that was not visible in the air. There was no dust. You know how you can often see sunlight when there's dust? There was none. So it just looked like shade. But then as the snow fell through it, the light was revealed.

We often think of light as illuminating objects. In this case, the object illuminated the light.

That became a kind of meditation image for me. The object illuminates the knowing. I don't have to think of it as the knowing illuminating the object. The object can help the mind see the knowing. This image was supportive for that understanding—the recognition that there are just objects and knowing, objects and knowing, objects and knowing.

I think this simile of the magic show is truly appropriate when considering the entirety of our experience. This believing process is like the magician's wand—everything becomes solid and stable through it. And yet it's all just processes constructed in the mind. We can start to see this nature of experience as void, hollow, insubstantial. Just processes tumbling on. That's all.

I'll close with a quote from Thich Nhat Hanh: "For things to reveal themselves to us, we need to be ready to abandon our views about them." We could change that word "views" to "beliefs." For things to reveal themselves to us, we need to be ready to abandon our beliefs about them.

CHAPTER 176

Awareness with Thoughts and Thinking

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this guided meditation and teaching, Andrea Fella offers a nuanced exploration of how awareness relates to thinking—one of the most challenging aspects of meditation practice. Rather than treating thoughts as obstacles to eliminate, she invites practitioners to investigate the quality of mind that has been thinking and the "planet" we wake up on when mindfulness returns.
>
> Fella distinguishes between different modes of thinking: the emotionally charged thoughts that pull us strongly into content, and the more dreamlike drifting that lacks emotional investment. She introduces the concept of "modalities of thought"—how we can think through hearing (inner dialogue), seeing (imagery), or kinesthetic feeling—and encourages curiosity about these processes rather than judgment. The teaching emphasizes that the moment of mindfulness returning is extraordinarily instructive, revealing the effortless and receptive nature of awareness itself.
>
> A key insight offered is the distinction between attention (manasikāra) and mindfulness (sati). Attention is a mental factor that selects what awareness connects with, operating whether we're mindful or not—as evidenced by how we navigate the world even while lost in thought. This practice works by not choosing where to place attention, but rather observing where attention naturally goes. Fella also addresses how we can be aware with thinking through broader, receptive awareness that can simultaneously know thought content, its effects on us, and accompanying body sensations—a skill essential for bringing mindfulness into daily life where thinking is necessary.

Awareness with Thoughts and Thinking

We'll start with just noticing how you are in this moment. Just acknowledging: this is how the experience is.

And remembering that relaxation is so helpful for supporting a quite natural capacity to be aware. You could start with some relaxation of body, consciously scanning the body and relaxing, softening the muscles of the body.

I also find it helpful at times, rather than consciously doing a scan and exploring a conscious relaxation, to just invite—drop in an invitation for the body to relax. And then just see how the body and mind respond to that invitation.

May the body relax.

I often find that just dropping that invitation in and being available to see how the body and mind respond, some aspect, some area releases that I wasn't even aware was held.

May the body relax.

May the mind relax.

Not trying to do it or figure out how it might work for the mind to relax. Just dropping that invitation in.

May the mind relax.

Turning the attention towards recognizing awareness. Are you aware? What is obvious? What is awareness naturally already connecting with? That may be body sensation. Maybe sound. Emotions or moods.

Are you aware? What is obvious?

What is obvious moment to moment may change, will change. Whatever the object is itself may shift and change—pitch and tone of sound, body sensation pulsing, fluctuating. And the attention may also shift to some entirely new experience. The curiosity about that shift of attention, and not needing to stop it, just taking in whatever the attention is naturally and easily connecting with right in this moment.

From time to time, checking, being curious about the attitude, the relationship to experience. Do you want something to happen? Moving towards a wanting? Do you want something to stop happening? Pushing away? There may be ideas or beliefs present. It should be this way, it should be that way. Or it may be okay.

And keeping the practice simple: Are you aware?

What's being received? What is awareness already aware of?

Awareness will get lost. Our habit of being pulled into the content of thinking is quite strong. And at some point there will be recognition—awareness will return. Notice in that moment, often we are already connecting to "I've been thinking." But can you recognize, or be curious about, the return of awareness itself? Aware again, in that moment.

Because thoughts are such powerful shapers of experience, there's value in a curiosity about how having been lost in thought has affected the present moment experience. Often in the return—that recognition of being aware again—the content itself fades a little bit, but the impact of having been thinking lingers. What is here now?

I sometimes think about, or have the idea or image, that being lost in thought is like being on another planet. The mind makes a whole world in its thoughts. And when we come into awareness, we are waking up into that space. So it's kind of like: what planet am I on right now, as awareness returns? Often that planet has been shaped by the thoughts, perhaps with emotions or moods. So maybe it's planet frustrated. Or maybe it's planet calm. Sometimes when our minds wander into thoughts, it doesn't always construct reactivity—it sometimes can construct ease and calm. That can be surprising to notice. So if you're not reacting to the fact of having been wandering, you might notice surprising things upon the return of mindfulness.

Are you aware? What is obvious?

As we become aware of thinking, we might notice there are different ways that we think. Sometimes it feels like our thoughts charge us out of the present moment—there's a lot of pull to the content, a lot of emotional investment. And sometimes our minds drift out of the present moment, not so much with investment in the content, but more almost dreamlike images, or just random thoughts. I'm just describing things I've noticed here. We're not looking for anything, but you may recognize when you notice thinking that there are these different kinds of flavors of thought.

When there's that more emotional tone to the thinking, it's really helpful to notice the effect. As you wake up into thinking, we may have a habit of noticing "thinking" and then trying to come back to some kind of experience, like the breath, or come back to something that's not the thinking. And while attending to the content of the thoughts itself may not be so useful, there's a kind of place in between—noticing that the thinking, that the contents, have had an effect. That effect is already here.

So when there's this waking up with thinking: what's here? It's the same instruction. What's obvious? Just different ways of describing the different kinds of experiences we might have. What's obvious in this moment, as we've been lost in thought? What planet have I woken up on? Planet calm, planet frustration, planet anger, planet confusion. What is the space that you're already in? What's here?

When there's more of a drifting out of the present moment, when it's not so much an emotional connection or tone, often the content doesn't pull us so much. It's more the quality of the mind that's the space we've ended up in. So it's still useful to check: what's that space like? One thing we may notice in waking up with those kinds of thoughts is how the mind is thinking. I sometimes call this the modality of thought.

We can think in almost all of—I'd say we probably can think in any one of—our sense modalities. We often think as if we're hearing ourselves or talking to ourselves, through the sense door of hearing. We often think through imagery, seeing. We can also think through a kinesthetic experience, a sense of the feeling of something. I used to be a dancer, and that was how I thought about my dances—the feeling of what it was like. So there's that possibility too.

So when there's less of a charge or pull—more of that drifting out of the present moment—sometimes we might notice that the mind has been thinking in one of these ways. I've found it useful to simply notice: oh yes, there's been imagery, or there's been the experience of talking to myself.

But again, it's really useful to notice the quality of the mind that has been thinking, because often in that space of drifting out of the present moment there is more calm or ease. Sometimes I've found that after waking up, if I'm not judging myself for having been lost in thought—if it was one of those spaces of drifting—there can be more ease in the waking up than there was before the mind wandered. Just that curiosity of "what's here now?" can reveal this. And sometimes it is reactivity. So simply noticing that, looking at the quality of the mind that has been thinking—it can be surprising. Maybe it's joy. Maybe it's happiness. Maybe it's mettā.

Often when we're lost in thought, we are drawn to the content of thought. In formal sitting, this exploration around "what's the quality of the mind that's thinking?" is really helpful—not attending too much to what the content is. And yet, in our lives we need to think, and we can be aware with thinking.

As I said last night, the attempt to be aware of thinking by looking at it often doesn't work—it will often make the thought go away. The kind of awareness that allows us to be aware with the thought is this more receptive awareness, a broader awareness. That kind of awareness can know the content of the thought, can know how that content affects you, can know how it might play out—the shaping of how that thinking might unfold. It can notice the body sensations that are happening with that thought. That broad awareness can know all of this together.

This is a learning, a process of exploring what it means to be aware with thinking. There's often such a habit of aiming or directing the attention that we don't have the opportunity as much to have that space of broad awareness that's just noticing the thoughts happening.

As I mentioned last night, one place where you can begin to recognize that you can be aware with the content of thought is in that moment when mindfulness returns while thinking. Because often in that place there is awareness and thinking at the same time. And it's because that kind of awareness returning is receptive awareness—it's first receptive before we pick it up and then start to direct.

That moment of mindfulness returning—there's so much to learn there about how broad awareness feels, about the effortless quality of awareness, about the nature of how awareness receives experience. That moment is so instructive, if we're not judging ourselves for the mind being lost. When I began to see the value of that moment, it did not matter how many times my mind wandered. I got so interested in that moment of mindfulness returning, in what I was learning there. There's so much to see in that moment.

So there was a question—and I want to keep this somewhat brief; I sometimes do a longer dharma talk on this topic, so this will be an abbreviated version. The question was: "Can you distinguish attention from awareness in this tradition? Is it the difference between seeing and looking? Manasikāra versus sati, with examples."

Attention is a function of mind. My sense of what attention does is it chooses something out of experience to connect with. It's the factor of mind that, we could say, decides what awareness is connecting with. It is different from the factor of sati, of mindfulness.

We can know this through a simple reflection. If you're wandering around lost in thought, not mindful—and we've all experienced this, walking down the street completely lost in our thoughts, not aware—you are still walking through the world, still seeing and hearing, not walking into things, not stepping in front of cars. Something is processing. Seeing and hearing are still happening, and something is attending to that. So attention is working even when we're not mindful. That's one way we can see that mindfulness and attention are not the same thing.

And yet what I didn't understand initially about mindfulness was that I thought when I was mindful, it meant that I was choosing what to be mindful of. This is an interesting feature about attention. Attention is a factor that—kind of like the way our breath works...

We can either choose to breathe consciously—breathe in, breathe out—or we can forget about breathing altogether and breathing will happen on its own. Attention is kind of like that. We can choose where to place our attention, and if we are not choosing where to place it, the attention will be somewhere nonetheless.

Many forms of mindfulness practice work by cultivating mindfulness through choosing what we are attending to—choose to attend to the breath, for instance. This form of mindfulness is more interested in not choosing, but rather seeing that process of attention do its thing. Attention will be picking something out of experience.

Now, we might think of attention as being something specific. But attention can be specific and focused, or attention can be noticing broader, more diffuse experience. Sometimes the attention is connecting to a space or the quality of the mind as opposed to something specific—a sensation in the body, an experience, or a sound.

I used to think that if I wasn't choosing what to attend to, then I wasn't being mindful. This practice works counter to that assumption. We are simply exploring where the attention already is, with awareness.

So you have some days of practice here without our words to bother you. The rest of today and tomorrow—we won't be here in the morning tomorrow, but you're welcome to come and sit together during this time. We'll start the groups on Monday.

There was a question about whether it's okay to lie down in the hall. We generally encourage that only if you have a physical need. For me, with this body, I pretty much do exclusively lying meditation. I know there are some bodies that need to do that in the still posture. But it's not something to do in the hall simply because you're tired of sitting and want to lie down.

What we will do is set up a space with a couple of zabutans, and we'll put a sign on it indicating that it's a shared space for occasional lying posture. You're always welcome to do your lying meditation or any meditation in your rooms as well. That's mostly what I choose to do.

When I'm doing lying meditation, there are times when the mind gets into spaces that are so quiet that it's very close to sleep. I can kind of come in and out of sleep and see that happening. And when I fall asleep, I snore. Sometimes I actually hear the snoring—"What's that sound? Oh yes, that's me snoring." I don't want to have that happening in the hall, so I choose primarily to practice in my room, especially when the mindfulness gets more continuous, more stable, more settled.

It's fine to do the lying practice in the hall. If you've not done a lot of it, you can talk to me about how to approach it. The one key trick I use if I feel I'm in the hall and maybe in danger of falling asleep is putting my arm at right angles to the floor. You need some kind of feedback. If you fall asleep, your arm will drop. Now, you may not always notice that it drops, but when you wake up, you will know that it has dropped and therefore know that you have fallen asleep. This is important because in the lying posture, it's possible to fall asleep and wake up feeling like it's been continuous mindfulness, not knowing that you've actually drifted off. So you need some feedback.

Enjoy your days.

CHAPTER 177

Working with Difficulty

Andrea Fella · 46 min

> In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella addresses one of meditation's most essential skills: knowing when we can simply be present with difficult experiences and when we need additional support. She begins by distinguishing between not liking something and genuinely being unable to be with it—a crucial recognition that prevents us from prematurely abandoning our capacity to meet what arises.
>
> Fella challenges the common belief that certain mind states, such as spaciness or agitation, are inherently incompatible with mindfulness. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), she reminds us that every mind state is simply a mind state that can be known with awareness. She offers several practical tools: dropping in wisdom reflections like "this is nature" or "this is dukkha" to reconnect with right view; using questions as invitations rather than demands for answers; and the "and" practice of broadening attention when reactivity narrows our awareness. For persistent patterns, she suggests noticing both their presence and absence, and distinguishing between moments of being caught versus not caught.
> Throughout, Fella emphasizes that the purpose of meeting difficulty is not to eliminate it but to understand its impermanent, conditioned, and not-self nature. This understanding, cultivated through the three levels of wisdom (sutamayā paññā, cintāmayā paññā, and bhāvanāmayā paññā), naturally supports the release of clinging and suffering. Her teaching offers both reassurance that mindfulness can meet any experience and practical guidance for when additional skillful means are needed.

This morning I thought of reflecting a little bit about working with difficulty—those skillful means for when it's challenging to simply settle back and meet what is arising.

As we've said repeatedly, a big piece of the learning that develops and grows is recognizing when we can be with something, when the mind is balanced to meet just this is what's happening, and when we can't, when that's a challenge, when that's a struggle.

And yet there are some pieces to recognize, some ideas, some beliefs that can be in the back of the mind that make us think we can't be with something when actually it's possible. Some of the tools I'm going to explore are ways that might potentially support the mind in having more capacity to recognize that it can meet what's here.

I think the first piece is the distinction between not liking something and not being able to be with it. Things can be unpleasant, we can not like them, and we can simply recognize they're unpleasant and we don't like them. But if we're not noticing the not liking—the aversion—we may think that this object is a problem, that the object is in the way of being mindful.

So the key, as we've said several times, is: can we actually be aware with it? We may know the aversion, we may know the experience, and if the aversion isn't getting stronger, if what we're responding to isn't kind of taking over, then there's still learning happening. We have to begin to recognize how much the aversion or reactivity is pulling us out of mindfulness. Can we be aware of the experience and the reactivity? Are we getting lost in the experience? Are we getting lost in the reactivity? If we're finding ourselves repeatedly lost, repeatedly pulled out of mindfulness, not able to be mindful, that's probably a time to start bringing in some tools.

We do need to honor the strength of our reactivity. It's not helpful to try to push through, to just bear down and say, "I'm going to sit through this." That may be cultivating aversion—probably is cultivating aversion. And we can use our familiar tools to stabilize our mind, whatever those are, whether it's metta or stabilizing with a primary object. Whatever tools you use are fine.

And as Carol pointed out that first day, it's really important to bring right view into the mind as you shift to a tool, to recognize that the point of using a tool, of shifting the attention away from what is actually happening, is to help stabilize the mind—not to get rid of, not to avoid. That's a piece to also explore.

So we can use our familiar tools to stabilize our mind, and yet we can often have a belief that some experiences are problematic, that it's not possible to be mindful of them, or that the difficulty is somehow in the way of mindfulness.

A classic example of that is the experience of spaciness—the idea that if I'm spacey, it means I'm not mindful, or that I can't be mindful with spaciness. But spaciness is just another mind state. It is possible to be aware with it. It's possible to recognize, "Oh, this is what it's like to have a spacey mind." But if we have a belief in the back of the mind that spaciness is somehow inherently non-mindful, we won't even try.

I think that's what we often think with some of these states of mind that we consider problematic. We think they're inherently non-mindful, that certain mind states are inherently non-mindful. But every mind state is just a mind state, and we can bring mindfulness to it, we can know it with mindfulness. We may not actually be able to bring mindfulness to it through effort—I've seen that with certain mind states, it's more that when the momentum of mindfulness is there, the mindfulness and awareness can meet those states of mind. It's not that I'm actually doing the mindfulness there.

Sometimes if we have an idea that certain states of mind are inherently non-mindful, we might jump more quickly to our habitual tools, our skillful means. We might jump quickly to, "Okay, I need to settle the mind here, I need to calm the mind, I need to bring in some metta." If we have the belief that we can't be present with certain mind states, we won't even explore that possibility.

One of the tools we can explore there is simply recognizing that the conscious picking up of a tool—the recognition of "Oh, I need to do this," or thinking "I should shift the attention to the breath" or "I should bring in some metta"—that very arising, that conscious arising of that thought, means you've already recognized whatever it is you think you can't be mindful of. You already have seen it.

This happened to me. I think I mentioned this briefly the other day. I was walking to my room, which is where I mostly did my meditation at the monastery at Chuyumen, and I noticed that I was trying to put my mind into what I would call a meditative mind state. In retrospect, that meant a subtle repression of thought. That was what a meditative mind state meant to me. And then I recognized: wait a minute, I'm already aware. I saw my mind starting to make that shift, to pick up that perspective of "this is what meditation is."

And seeing that kind of shift, there was the recognition: wait a minute, I'm already aware of this. Why not just know this? What's wrong with knowing this mind state?

There are so many ideas and agendas and beliefs about meditation that have us holding the perspective that we can be aware of certain things and not others. One tool that I use, one thing I recognize in my own mind, is that if the mind is saying something like "I can't be mindful with this," I recognize that I already am mindful of this. What does that mean? It's already happening. So open into that and check the attitude, because there's that belief, that idea in the back of the mind.

Over time, I think one of the key tools in my toolkit in terms of working with difficulty is knowing that it's possible—and this developed over a long stretch of time—knowing that it's possible for mindfulness to meet any experience. There's nothing that mindfulness can't meet. And it is also true that it is not always possible in this moment. The strength of reactivity may be stronger than the strength of the mindfulness in this moment, and there are times to bring in some supports.

This morning I want to reflect on a few supports that are outside of different practices. They're more supports that I've stumbled into and that Sayadaw has pointed to in terms of being able to connect with what's actually happening—supports that help us to meet what is actually happening.

The first thing, and Carol mentioned this the other day, is right view. The recognition that the aim of exploring experience, even a difficulty, the aim of being with the experience of a difficulty isn't to get rid of it. It's to understand it. Through that understanding, over time we begin to see the impermanent, the unreliable, the conditioned nature of experience—that the experience is not me, not mine, not who I am. And those understandings support letting go. The mind, when it sees something as impermanent, unreliable, not-self, realizes it doesn't make any sense to cling to it.

But this is the development. This isn't where we start. We can remember at the beginning that this is our direction, this is our perspective, this is our aim: to understand experience so that wisdom will support the release of suffering and clinging.

To me, this brings in a real sense of curiosity about what's going on. Curiosity is such a support—curiosity about "what is this?" Not curiosity about how I can get rid of this, but what is this experience? What's happening here?

So that's the first piece: just reminding yourself that this is happening, it's something to understand. Every single experience has Dharma nature. No matter what it is—whether it's aversion or greed or a belief in the mind, or the arising of compassion and joy—every single experience has Dharma nature. Every single arising will pass away. Every experience is impermanent. It's unreliable as a place that we can land on for lasting happiness. So it doesn't matter what is happening. Every experience can show this Dharma nature. That's what we're exploring. That's what we're trying to see and understand: the Dharma nature. So bring curiosity to whatever is happening. There's no special experience that has to happen in order for us to find Dharma nature. Everything has Dharma nature.

Another useful support—and this is in line with wise view, supports for helping the mind have that perspective—is to consciously drop in wisdom reflections. Reminding yourself of wisdom, either wisdom that you've heard from teachers or read from dharma books, or things that you know you've understood in the past. Maybe not in this moment, but you know you understand it.

This is the level of wisdom that is the hearing, that we've learned. And then the level of wisdom that is reflective, the use of thought. Bringing in wisdom reflections is a use of this second level of wisdom essentially, the cintāmayā paññā, the wisdom of reflection. We can drop in reminders to ourselves of wisdom that we've understood. "This is impermanent." "This is dukkha." That one actually has been surprisingly helpful for me when I recognize, oh yeah, that's right.

It's all dukkha. This is what the Buddha said we should understand. When I saw that clearly, it was so interesting—just reminding myself, this is dukkha.

Another reflection that Sayadaw has suggested is "This is nature." That one has been deeply resonant for me. What this means, to me, is that it points to the conditioned nature of experience. Whatever is happening right now—this difficulty, this challenge—has been conditioned. It arose based on conditions. It will continue as long as conditions are in place. It will end when conditions fall apart.

Dropping that in is a kind of pointer to this aspect of Dharma nature, the conditioned nature of experience. This is nature. To me, this creates such ease in the mind when something challenging is present—just to remind myself of this. It also brings in that recognition that everything has Dharma nature, that there's nothing outside of what can be understood, what can be learned with.

So this is the use of wisdom reflections. But something important to notice: when you drop in a wisdom reflection, it's not meant to bring in a lot of thinking. It's not about elaborating with many thoughts. It's just a recognition that what's here is a condition. Thoughts are powerful conditioners, and dropping in a thought like this can have a shaping effect on your experience.

So notice what happens when you drop in a wisdom reflection. That's the practice. Drop it in, kind of like dropping a pebble into a still pond, and then notice the ripples that follow. We're dropping a pebble of wisdom into our experience—and then what are the ripples? What happens when you drop in that wisdom reflection?

As I said, for me, when I drop in the reflection "this is nature," I feel space. I feel more balance. I feel a subtleness, a capacity, and more curiosity arising. So notice the effect that wisdom reflections have on your experience. Again, it's a pointing toward being more fully with what is here. It's not trying to shift attention away from what's here. It's an exploration, a tool that may support you to open more fully to what's here.

The next tool or support I'll offer is again one that Sayadaw points to: the use of questions to support investigation of what's happening. And again, with questions, you're not trying to figure out the answer. It's very similar to dropping in wisdom reflections. You drop in a question and then just see what happens. I use the analogy of pressing a doorbell. What happens? Who answers the door?

You drop in a question, and the initial questions can be simple: What is obvious? What's the attitude? These basic questions of the practice can support meeting a challenge, a difficulty. Especially "What's the attitude?" Sometimes that's all we need—to recognize that when there is struggle, there's some attitude that isn't being seen. If we drop in that question, sometimes the attitude can become obvious, can become clear. But we don't have to dig for it.

We don't have to look for it. As Sayadaw says, these questions are tools that support the strengthening of curiosity in our minds. But we don't have to look for an answer. We simply drop in these questions and then see what's obvious, what's here.

In terms of working with difficulty, certain questions may be particularly supportive. The first ones are fundamental: What's obvious? What's the attitude? What's the relationship to it? How does it make the body feel? And again, the intention isn't to direct the attention to the body, but dropping in that question can support a very natural opening to what is happening with the body.

One really useful question when difficulty is present is: What purpose is it serving? Again, we're not trying to figure it out, but sometimes that question can land in a way that allows us to see something more that's already happening right now—something where the nib of the reactivity is connecting to something that might be a little bit buried under the surface. What purpose is this serving?

Another question I find useful is: What is being believed? It has a similar flavor to asking what purpose this is serving. What's being believed?

So these are some supports using questions. And again, they are all supports to help the mind open more fully to what's here. It's not a digging. It's not trying to see anything in particular. It's an invitation. You can think of questions as an invitation. I sometimes think of them as asking, "Body and mind, are you willing to show me what's being believed right now?"—as opposed to "I need to see that." It's an invitation, an inviting of curiosity. Perhaps this is something that might be useful.

There are times when what's happening and the reactivity to it are fairly strong, pulling the attention while the reactivity amps up. In those situations, I've found that not aiming directly at the object can be helpful. One tool I've found really useful is letting the attention get more broad. I call this the "and" practice.

There's something going on. There's the reactivity. There's the attitude to that reactivity. And there's seeing happening. And there's hearing happening. And there's other body sensations. Oh, and there's that thing. And there's seeing. It's just reminding yourself, stepping back to a broadening of attention.

Sometimes with a reactive experience, awareness collapses down to just that thing, and it feels like there's nothing other than that. But there are thousands of things happening in the present moment. So we step back and consciously remind ourselves: there are other things happening right now. We're not trying to avoid noticing that thing—it's not completely stepping away. It's not that much of a stepping away. It's more like opening more fully to the recognition that a lot of things are happening. That thing is happening. And there's seeing. And there's a breath. And there's a body sensation. And there's a sound. And there's that thing. It's that quality of "and"—just keep going.

And... And... And...

That's a little bit more of directing in a way. It's directing the attention kind of away from that challenging thing. And sometimes that is useful.

Another thing I found really useful, especially when there's something—a kind of reactivity that happens a lot—and some of you mentioned this kind of pattern, a pattern that's very familiar, something that's coming up a lot, that seems kind of persistent. When there's a persistent pattern, when it comes up a lot, when it seems more stable in a way, when it feels like it's always there or there a lot—something I find really useful is to notice when it's not there. Notice its absence.

It's not always there. And sometimes we don't consciously recognize that so much. So notice its absence. Notice when it's present. Notice when it's absent. Just noticing that distinction. What's it like when it's absent? What's the experience when it's not there?

The Buddha actually points to this in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta around hindrances: notice when they're present, notice when they're absent.

And then, when it is present, I found it useful to recognize the difference—that there are times when it's present and it's just like, yeah, it's there, it's not a problem. There's that thing, whatever—pain in the body, impatience—and it's not a problem. And then it shifts to being a problem. We get caught. This is an attitude arising. This is a kind of reactivity to the thing.

So noticing the difference. Caught, not caught. Caught, not caught. And I found it useful to keep that simple, not to even necessarily try to understand what's the flavor of caught. Is it greed? Is it aversion? Is it confusion? Is it beliefs? Is it ideas? But just knowing that I'm caught, noticing the difference between caught and not caught.

You'll start to see—that's essentially the place where we can start to see when we're caught. We can actually also know that we're caught. And when we're not caught, we feel the flavor of the mind that's not caught. We notice that difference. And we can also see that we can know being caught without being caught.

So that's enough, I think, around that. Let's sit together.

Just letting the mind notice what's here. Are you aware? What is obvious? And remembering the support of relaxation—just this moment receiving experience.

CHAPTER 178

Supports for Continuity

Andrea Fella · 1h04

In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella investigates the art of sustaining mindfulness throughout the day without the forceful effort that often accompanies our attempts at continuous practice. Drawing on Sayadaw U Tejaniya's teaching of the three yogi jobs—cultivating right view, being aware, and keeping being aware—she explores what actually supports the momentum of mindfulness rather than depleting us through striving.

Fella offers the skillful analogy of riding a kick scooter: at first we must tap frequently to build momentum, but as momentum develops, we can ride with increasingly light effort. She emphasizes that recognizing the value of practice naturally inspires continuation, connecting this to the faculty of faith (saddhā) as a condition for energy. The talk addresses common places where mindfulness gets lost—painful sensations, habitual mind states like boredom or anxiety, shifts in attention, and even the unfamiliar territories that open as practice deepens. Rather than forcing awareness in these situations, Fella encourages curiosity about what catches the mind.

The teaching culminates with an exploration of sampajañña (clear comprehension) from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), where one understands feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away during all activities. Fella emphasizes that this broad, 360-degree awareness develops naturally through cultivating momentum, and that even brief bursts of such continuity can offer profound insight into the nature of mind.

We've been talking a lot about the importance of continuity. Sayadaw U Tejaniya, at one point when yogis were—I don't know what the right word is—a little confused perhaps about not having a lot of instruction in the practice, kept coming to him asking, "What am I supposed to do? What am I supposed to do in this practice?" So he came up with the idea of three key yogi jobs that we do in this practice. We've been talking about them all, not so much in this framework, but we've mentioned them all. He said the three yogi jobs are to cultivate right view, to be aware, and to keep being aware—basically to do that continuously.

And yet, I think the way we normally go about continuity is a kind of more forceful or effortful way, and that's not so helpful necessarily. We can use effort to support and cultivate mindfulness, but it often is bound up with some striving, some holding, some pushing, some trying, some more doing.

So what I thought to explore this evening is some things that support continuity. What is it that creates conditions that support continuity of practice? As Carol said, the idea of continuity often creates this idea of "I've got to do this all day long," and we do—we are encouraged to practice all day long—but not with a kind of forceful mind. So we can also think about what will support this. We could also say momentum—the momentum of mindfulness or the establishment of mindfulness. Those are other words that evoke this continuity, the mindfulness that is happening moment after moment, that momentum of mindfulness, that establishment of mindfulness.

It is essentially this: moment after moment mindfulness is what concentration is in this practice. The continuity of mindfulness is what establishes that concentration, which is where the capacity to see clearly comes from.

We've talked about a lot of these things that I'm going to explore tonight in different ways, maybe touching on them in light ways here and there, but I'm just going to put them all together.

Sayadaw pointed to really understanding the value of practice. He said if we really understood the value of practice, we wouldn't stop practicing. This points to faith, really. Carol spoke about faith the other day and that sense of taking refuge in awareness and wisdom. When we taste the value that awareness and wisdom have for us, it inspires us to continue practice. Carol spoke about the five faculties and how faith, confidence, is a condition that supports energy. When faith is strong in our hearts, when we have a sense of the value of practice, quite naturally there's a motivation to practice. You don't have to try so hard. It's just where our heart wants to go.

Beginning to really notice—and this is the place where we've pointed to—notice what it's like when you are aware, when you are seeing clearly. What does it feel like? This is how we begin to feel the benefits of awareness and wisdom. We feel the kind of spaciousness around a challenge. So many of you have pointed to this in the practice meetings: seeing a challenging experience arising, and yet being able to have a new relationship with it, not so much a problem. I've asked several of you, "What is that like? What does that feel like?" To have that different relationship—that's really connecting to the value of the practice. It's connecting to how it feels to be attending with mindfulness and wisdom. It feels valuable. We understand it's valuable. We understand it's worthwhile.

And so the more we recognize that value, the more it supports our natural inclination towards engaging.

Faith. Confidence. Understanding the value of practice is a support for continuity. We've talked about making effort in this practice, and this is a way to cultivate a momentum to engage. As I said this morning, Sayadaw said the only work we give our minds is to remind ourselves to be aware. This is a form of effort in this practice—just this reminding. But it's so light. It is so light. Aware. Aware.

At the beginning, we've talked about using these questions: Am I aware? Or simply, Aware, perhaps? And, What is obvious? As we begin to recognize the experience of being aware a little more clearly, and as we begin to feel into a momentum of awareness, then it might be useful to explore backing off on the questions. As Carol mentioned, not even actually asking the question in the mind—it's more like you're nodding at experience. This. And aware. Touching into the experience.

The gentle effort we make gets tuned to the momentum. And the more momentum there is, the less we have to put in that personal effort, the less we have to try.

I often give this analogy—many of you have heard it, so you'll hear it again here—of riding on a scooter. Not a motorized scooter, but a kick scooter, one of those where you stand with your foot on the platform and tap the ground to get yourself going. At the beginning, you have to tap pretty frequently to build momentum. But after a little while, there's momentum, and you can put your foot up and just ride for a bit. Then you start to feel into when the scooter gets a little wobbly, and you know you need to tap again.

It's like that with mindfulness. At the beginning, we need to remind ourselves more frequently: Aware of what? Maybe using those questions. But as momentum builds, we become familiar with the experience of that momentum—like getting familiar with riding on the scooter and knowing when that momentum is there. Then we can back off of how much we're reminding ourselves, like we back off of tapping on the ground.

And actually, on that scooter, if you're going at a pretty good pace, maybe even with a little downhill—sometimes that happens with practice—we gain the momentum, and it really feels like it's carrying itself. Sometimes you can just ride for a ways. If you put your foot down at that point, it's actually going to get in the way. It's going to slow you down.

Likewise with mindfulness. If you're reminding yourself, be aware, be aware, be aware, and you're already aware, it's kind of getting in the way.

At one point Joseph had his own way of expressing this to me. I was going in for an interview, and I don't remember what I was reporting, but what he said in response I remember so clearly. He said, "If you go into a room and the light is already on, it doesn't make any sense to keep flipping the light switch."

It's that kind of thing. There was a little too much vigor in my practice, trying to connect with being aware. This is part of the art form of the effort in this practice—understanding and knowing how light it can be. And knowing when we do need to engage, when we do need to bring in that question: Am I aware? What's obvious?

Mindfulness is a wholesome quality of mind. It's a mental formation, one of those fabrications I was talking about this morning. It has conditions. It is conditioned.

It arises in dependence on conditions, and it also conditions our mind. As with other wholesome qualities, recognizing mindfulness, being aware of it, being cognizant of it—knowing what it feels like, knowing when it's there, when it gets weak—cultivates mindfulness like any wholesome state. Being aware of love supports the conditions for more love to arise. Mindfulness is similar in that way. Recognizing mindfulness is a supportive condition for mindfulness.

And so mindfulness arises and passes like other experiences, like other qualities of mind. I think it's useful, in terms of cultivating a continuity of mindfulness, to understand what we're exploring here: can we create conditions for mindfulness to arise more frequently? I have found it really useful to take an interest in that arising and passing of mindfulness—not as a form of judgment, but to begin to get curious about what are the conditions that support mindfulness. What are the conditions that allow it to be here? What are the conditions in which it gets weak? It's like studying this quality of mind. Sayadaw U Pandita said mindfulness is the most wholesome mind state. And we can explore it, as well as anger and aversion and greed and love and compassion and patience. We can get curious about mindfulness.

We often think of the comings and goings of mindfulness as being a problem. We would call it, when mindfulness goes, "the mind wandered." And when it comes back, it means it had wandered, and that was a problem. We've talked about this already, especially looking at that moment of mindfulness returning, and I want to highlight it again here because it is a support for cultivating continuity—to recognize when mindfulness returns. In that moment, if we're not judging ourselves, we're recognizing: this is what it's like for mindfulness to come back. This is the experience of awareness. This is what it's like. That recognition is a great place to begin to get familiar with the experience, with the feeling of it.

So there are these moments of mindfulness returning. We could call it unprompted mindfulness. Many meditation practices work by prompting mindfulness, and I'd say when we're exploring the question "Am I aware? What's obvious?"—that's a prompting of mindfulness. That's this technique's version of prompting mindfulness. We are aware, and we're reminding ourselves to continue to be aware. That's a prompting of mindfulness, and that is one way to encourage and cultivate mindfulness.

But these moments when mindfulness just returns—those are moments of unprompted mindfulness. They simply arise. There are a lot of them, and they're such a great place to begin to recognize the quality of awareness, the effortless quality of it. We've talked about this, so I won't dwell on it too much, but I want to point to this: recognizing the moment of mindfulness returning is a support for continuity. If we think about continuity as meaning we have to hold on to mindfulness, we have to be constantly prompting it, then those moments when mindfulness returns will seem like a problem. But they're another support for continuity—those moments of noticing mindfulness returning.

And then there are the places or ways that we lose mindfulness. Often we might notice these in retrospect, and I'd encourage this as another kind of exploration: where am I losing mindfulness? This can involve noticing, through the arc of your day, the places or times of day, the activities you're doing, or the mind states that are happening where mindfulness tends to get lost. What I want to encourage here is curiosity. What happens in those times? What happens in those situations?

Curiosity is a very natural motivator for energy. It's a great support for cultivating continuity, for cultivating the momentum of mindfulness. So being curious about where we lose mindfulness, where the attention wants to go.

Now I want to say this, really emphasizing the curiosity, because there can be a tendency if you begin to recognize places or times that you tend to lose mindfulness. For instance, you might notice you lose awareness in particular activities like your yogi job, or when you're putting on your shoes and your coat to go outside, or when you go into your room—that's another one. Sometimes we lose mindfulness when we go into our room. So there may be particular places or activities where we notice, over the days, that we begin to recognize: "Yeah, whenever I go into that yogi job, I just lose it," or "whenever I go into the bathroom, I lose it."

Recognizing where we lose awareness, we can bring curiosity to what happens in those situations. Not as a way to double down, to say to yourself, "Okay, I know I lose awareness when I go to my yogi job, so I am going to be mindful. I'm walking, walking, walking. I'm picking up the knife. I'm chopping, chopping, chopping." That kind of forcing, trying to stay present in a situation where you've noticed in the past that your mind tends to get lost—you're not going to learn that way.

There's something going on. When our mindfulness gets lost, something is happening. We've missed something. We've not seen something. It may just be a habit of some kind. It could be a picking up on some kind of excitement—there are so many different things that might happen.

For instance, going to a yogi job, if you're in a yogi job with other people, maybe there's a little bit of a feeling of excitement. Even though you're not talking, you're in a community. It feels social, and so there's a little bit of orienting to what the other people are doing. And maybe that's where the mind gets lost—it doesn't notice that it has gotten really happy about being in this little community of veggie choppers. So it's missed something.

As you notice a place or location or activity where you tend to lose mindfulness, as you're heading there, just get curious: What happens? What happens there? Not to try to change or force anything, but just be curious. Something goes on. Something happens in this situation. Can the curiosity help you to recognize what is it that has caught the mind? What is it that catches the mind?

And that is the basic encouragement no matter what way we lose awareness. I'm going to go through some other examples of different kinds of experiences.

We might lose awareness with painful experience, painful body sensation, difficult bodily experience. I noticed this in my own practice. There were a couple different strategies that my mind used, but they all involved not being mindful when there was a lot of pain in my body. One of them was singing. My mind started singing, and it would be checked out. I would wake up singing and recognize, "Oh, so this is what happened." Originally, I'd wake up and say, "Oh, there's singing, and oh yeah, there's that pain." I would try to be mindful of the pain and it would just catch me and pull me in, and I would be aversive to it, and then I would start singing again.

At some point, through this kind of exploration, I began to notice that when I woke up in the singing, the mind was not bothered by the pain. There was a little moment there of being aware and not being bothered by the pain. That was kind of interesting to me. It was like, "Huh, my mind has figured out how not to be bothered by this pain. It just doesn't know how to do it with awareness."

As I explored this, I realized that when there was awareness with the pain, the mind was magnetized and zoomed in on the pain. That was cultivating the aversion, and that was making things worse. When the mind went to the singing, it was basically a way to ignore the pain, a way to not be looking at the pain directly.

So I explored that as I came back. This was a strategy my mind had used to avoid pain—to get lost in singing. And I began to realize: I don't actually have to lose awareness when there's pain. And I don't have to be drawn into the pain either.

So I allowed that learning around what the mind was doing as it wandered, or what it was doing when it got caught in a situation like that with the painful bodily sensation. I used what the mind was doing as a way to learn something about how to be with the experience. And what it meant was being with the whole experience and not focusing in on the pain. That's what I learned. I saw that the mind is not bothered by the pain when it's not focusing on it. So maybe I can be aware and not zero in on looking at the pain.

Our minds have strategies that they've learned, and sometimes those strategies—well, we've talked about why our minds do these things, these habitual things. This is maybe another reason: in this case, my mind was doing that in order to not be so stressed by the pain, and that was the only way it knew how to do that. Well, it knew a couple of ways. Another one was spacing out. It had figured out how to space out and not attend to the pain too. So there were a couple different strategies the mind had learned, but they generally involved not being mindful. And so I began to be curious about that—what might it mean? I saw that the focus on the pain was what was kind of amplifying it. So what might it mean?

Our minds have learned strategies to deal with challenging situations. They do the best they can in navigating our lives before we meet this practice. This creates all these habits, and they become our comfortable things, even if they're not necessarily ultimately that helpful. But our minds were doing the best they could. What can we learn from that? What can we learn from bringing mindfulness to what those habits are and how they function?

In that case, I saw that the habit functioned to decouple me from focusing so closely on the pain. Okay, maybe I can try to do that with awareness.

We also often lose mindfulness in habitual mind states—boredom, depression, anxiety, confusion, wanting, planning, thoughts of home. When we notice those habitual mind states, at some point we often will wake up into them. Recognizing in that moment what the experience is that we are waking up into. I talked about this as being like asking, "What planet are we on?" It may be around thoughts having created something, a world of some kind, or a mood maybe creates a feeling or a space. Boredom or confusion or anxiety. For me, depression was one that I tended to get lost in.

When we wake up into the experience, we begin to have a sense of what it means, what the experience is. Again, not to try to jump over it or to come back to something else. It's like, "Oh, it feels like this. It feels like this." Whatever thought had been happening, it feels like this. And that recognition—that kind of beginning to recognize those habitual states in the moment that we wake up—gives us a familiarity, a sense of what the quality of that mind is. And it may begin to help us to see it as it's coming into being.

When we tend to get lost in a habitual state of mind, something that comes back a lot, we're often in it or it's already there before we really notice it. But this kind of recognizing—okay, this is what I tend to get lost in, just that familiarity of recognizing that—then we might start to recognize, and also the recognition of when it's not there, we might start to see, "Oh, here's the climate starting to change." The feeling of a mood starting to shift. I remember feeling like the self-hatred was just starting to descend, really starting to feel the beginning of it. Instead of being already lost in it or caught in it, beginning to see how it arises.

This supports us because when we can begin to see how something arises, there can be a little bit more curiosity again about what this is. What is it that gets me caught here? What is the mind doing here?

There was one retreat where I was experiencing a lot of anger. It was a situation that had happened on the retreat with somebody there that I was in relationship with. And every time I was in their proximity, there would be some anger, and then sometimes just thinking about it later. It was something that had happened at the retreat that had generated this anger, and it just kept coming back—the memory about it, all of this.

And boy, it was my anger retreat. I got to see anger in spades. I felt the pain of it. It's kind of like, well, why does it go here? It is so painful. So many of you have asked that kind of question.

At one point, I watched it so much that I got to really feel the beginnings of it. On a retreat at home—I think it was a three-month retreat—Carol said, "Get to know the smell of it coming." And that's what it's like, just the feeling of it starting to put itself together.

With the anger, at one point I saw this. I got to see just the very beginnings of it. And it felt warm and pleasant and powerful. Just a split second later, it turned into pain. But just that split second at the beginning of the anger, it felt like I'm in control here. I know what I'm doing. I know what I'm going to do.

Quickly it became very unpleasant, but the very first split second of it was pleasant. I was shocked. That's the hook. That's what the mind is hooked to there. It gets hooked to that feeling of control.

So we can, just again through being willing to watch these patterns—just watch them, watch them, watch them—we don't always get to see the beginnings, but we're learning something wherever we are waking up with it. Whether it's waking up into it, what are you seeing there?

We also can lose awareness when attention shifts. This is one of the reasons why I like to emphasize noticing the shift of attention early, especially in this style of practice. I think a lot of those moments when our mind just kind of wanders off, it's because we haven't noticed the attention has shifted. We haven't noticed that the attention picked up on something. Our agenda was someplace else, but the attention picked up on something else. We haven't noticed that shift.

We have the agenda to be meditating. We are sitting here, thinking, "I'm going to be doing this." With this style of practice, it's more open—we're receiving whatever arises. But there can be things that arise where we still have this idea that that's not the practice. Those moments of the attention shifting to something, or perhaps shifting to something we're not so clear about—we maybe have an idea of mindfulness as being where objects are really clear and precise. And so if the attention shifts to one of those more diffuse or vague experiences, if we've got the habit of noticing only precise experiences, we may not notice that the attention has shifted to a different kind of experience.

So those shifts of attention, really cultivating curiosity about them—for me that has been one of the things that's really supported continuity. Notice: oh, the attention's changed. And again, not to have any agenda for where the attention needs to be. We're not in charge of the attention in this practice. We are curious about how the attention is being shaped.

I mentioned this one too, so I'll just touch on it briefly. The mind can go into habitual states where we tend to get lost—spacing out, sleepiness, those foggy, dull states of mind. We can have the idea or the sense that they're inherently not mindful states, a belief that we can't be mindful in them. But it's not necessary for mindfulness to get lost in those states. And so again, curiosity. This has been such an interesting thing for me to explore.

When the mind starts feeling really slippery and just kind of drifting out, when it feels like it stops attending to things and just goes—rather than thinking, "I need to focus," we can ask, "Oh, what does that feel like? What does it feel like for the mind to just go, to feel like it floats off?"

The feeling that it's floating off, we often think of as being somehow a problem, but it's just another mind state. We can be aware with any mind state. Just interest. Interest in this.

And again, with some of these states, it really is interest that supports our capacity to see them. Sleepiness, for instance. If you are exploring, trying to be aware of sleepiness, it's probably going to wake you up. So trying to be aware will shift the mind state. But it's possible to be aware with it, with curiosity. Aiming the attention alters the climate in the mind, and some experiences are more subtle—trying to look at them obscures the experience. That's what I'm trying to say. The energy that we might be using to look at something is grosser than what is actually happening.

So some of those states of the mind settling into quiet, or just releasing—seeing those experiences requires a different quality. It's more just interest that can allow that, not "I need to look at this." The momentum of mindfulness can begin to allow mindfulness to infuse states and experiences where we may tend to get lost.

I think this can happen as the practice deepens. Sometimes shifts of mind towards more subtle experience or new, unfamiliar states—those places too we can get lost. Mindfulness can get lost as the mind begins to settle, and I don't know what's actually going on, but it kind of feels like the mindfulness and wisdom start to get interested in things that I don't have any idea about. There's less familiarity. As the practice deepens, there can be less familiarity for some of the objects, some of the experiences that happen.

And in those places, sometimes the mind can wander. Sometimes that has to do with unfamiliarity. Sometimes it has to do with a kind of "whoa, that's scary, I don't know what that is," and we pop out of it. That's not so much the mind wandering or getting lost—it's more like it just pops out of something. But sometimes we can go into a state, sink into it maybe, and not have so much awareness in there, partly through unfamiliarity.

The momentum of mindfulness and curiosity can be very helpful here with these kinds of things. I would play with this over and over again—just sit, let my mind do its thing, and then I would notice it was gone. Drifted. It just slipped out. There was a lot of clarity, seeing very clearly, and then suddenly mindfulness is gone. And then mindfulness would return. "Wow, it went away. It just slipped out. What happened?" And so I would let it settle again, and then it would slip out again. Just over and over, curiosity: What's happening there? What's happening there?

Again, with that kind of thing, we can't try to see it or hold on to the mindfulness. It really is a patience for seeing something that's unfamiliar.

Also, as the practice deepens, as there's more settledness, there can be other flavors of the mind getting lost. One teacher, Michelle McDonald, talked about what she called the purity-purification cycle—the mind settles, becomes more pure, more wholesome qualities arising: more ease, more settledness, more peace, more spaciousness. And then sometimes in that kind of space, for different reasons, the mind just kind of gets complacent there, isn't really clearly aware of that, and then it picks up on one of its old habit patterns and starts to ruminate. Or it starts to plan its next retreat because this one is so good.

It just goes out and gets lost in those places of purity. There's a lot of clarity in those states, and they can be places where mindfulness slips away too.

Sometimes in that settled space, it's like conditions are being created for something that hasn't been seen, something that's been held back, held down for a long time. Finally there's room for it to be seen. And sometimes those patterns—deep, old conditioning—arise in those spaces. It's not a mistake. Sometimes it feels like the mind recognizes: okay, you're ready now for this.

So there can be these cycles of ease and peace and settledness, and then seeing—it's like another door, another room has been opened, revealing material that hasn't been seen in a very long time, or has never really been clearly explored or looked at. The purification, the seeing. For me, this was a useful framing: Oh, it's purification. That's it. This understanding eased my mind a little bit around the process.

I'll end with talking about one of the classic teachings on continuity, from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta—clear comprehension. Many of you are probably familiar with that section where it talks about one acting with clear comprehension, or "in full awareness" as it's sometimes translated. While going forward and returning, one acts in full awareness. While looking forward and away, one acts in full awareness. While flexing and extending one's limbs, one acts in full awareness.

This is pointing to all activities. The sutta mentions even while defecating and urinating—I love that it includes what might seem like the most profane activity. One acts in full awareness. So it really is encouraging us with all activities, as we've been practicing here: while chopping vegetables, while going for a walk, while eating a meal, while getting dressed in the morning.

The key in this sutta, however, is the phrase "full awareness"—one acts in full awareness. Not just that we engage with all activities, but with full awareness. The Pāli is sampajañña.

The definition of sampajañña is not given in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, but it is defined elsewhere, and that definition is something like: one clearly comprehends when feelings, thoughts, and perceptions are known as they arise, persist, and pass away.

If we take that phrase and put it into the sutta: while going forward and returning, one understands feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away. When flexing and extending one's limbs, one understands feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away.

This is a very broad awareness being pointed to. Feelings, thoughts, and perceptions is a kind of stand-in for three of the aggregates: feeling, perception, and mental formation. With all activities.

To me, this is the culmination. This is what's pointed to in this sutta. It's a pretty high bar: one understands feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away while doing all activities. But this is what starts to happen as the momentum of mindfulness develops. As there is more momentum, we start to see feelings, thoughts, and perceptions with whatever we're doing. This broad awareness can see so much at one time. Carol calls it 360-degree mindfulness—just aware of the whole of experience. And this also points to attuning to the impermanent nature of experience, bringing in the wisdom side as well.

I don't feel like we can really do this; to me, it feels like something that arises. As we cultivate the momentum of mindfulness, as we cultivate this capacity to see experience, this begins to be available.

One last piece about continuity: when I first heard talks about this, I thought I had to work really hard for a really long time, developing mindfulness all day long, before I'd see anything, before I'd have any kind of insight or understanding. But what I've seen in my own practice is what I'll call little bursts of continuity. There are times when, for a few moments—three seconds—conditions come together for us to see in a moment, while we're doing whatever we're doing, feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away in a split second. This can happen in daily life.

The intention to cultivate the continuity of mindfulness, to notice mindfulness when it returns, to prompt it with light effort—this creates conditions where at times there may be just a moment of something arising.

There was a moment for me early in my practice—and I wouldn't have even known to describe it this way at the time—but I had been cultivating awareness of anger, just practicing with that. And then there was one moment in my kitchen where I was cutting an apple, and in a split second I got a burst of that continuity. For just two seconds, a few moments. And in those few moments, I saw a whole array of things arise. I saw thoughts related to what I was doing arise. I saw other thoughts related to those, connected to anger. And I saw the whole mushrooming of anger that could begin but hadn't begun—all within a split second. A burst of continuity revealed feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away.

It was a very powerful moment. The first time, I think, that I ever really saw. It was the moment that let me understand: this practice works, and I'm going to be doing this for the rest of my life. Because it was so clear that this was a path for understanding the mind and being released from painful mind states. And it happened in a very brief moment.

Sometimes we can get these little bursts of continuity. But they only come with the intention to cultivate that continuity.

Let us end with the sharing of blessings. Appreciating the value of practice—this is what we've been exploring—and sharing it. Now let us chant the verses of sharing and aspiration.

Through the goodness that arises from my practice, may my spiritual teachers and guides of great virtue, my mother, my father, and my relatives, the sun and the moon, and all virtuous leaders of the world—may the highest gods and evil forces, celestial beings, guardian spirits of the earth, and the Lord of Death—may those who are friendly, indifferent, or hostile—may all beings receive the blessings of my life. May they soon attain the threefold bliss and realize the deathless.

Through the goodness that arises from my practice and through this act of sharing, may all desires and attachments quickly cease, and all harmful states of mind, until I realize Nibbāna. In every kind of birth, may I have an upright mind with mindfulness and wisdom, austerity and vigor. May the forces of delusion not take hold nor weaken my resolve.

The Buddha is my excellent refuge. Unsurpassed is the protection of the Dhamma. The Solitary Buddha is my noble guide. The Sangha is my supreme support. Through the supreme power of all these, may darkness and delusion be dispelled.

CHAPTER 179

Noticing Perception

Andrea Fella · 1h00

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella offers a deep investigation into saññā (perception), one of the five aggregates (khandhas), examining how this fundamental mental process shapes everything we experience. Drawing on her practice with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she explains that perception functions as the mind's pattern-matching system—going into memory banks to find the closest match for incoming sensory stimuli. She describes how perception operates in layers, from basic recognition of form and color to more complex identification of objects.

Fella unpacks the Buddha's analogy of perception as a mirage—we experience not reality directly, but the mind's construction of it based on conditioning and memory. Through vivid personal examples—mistaking bat squeals for a pig being slaughtered, watching her mind construct 'leaf' from 'green, jagged,' and the Exploratorium exhibit where flashing lights created the illusion of a school bus—she demonstrates how perception stabilizes our world while simultaneously deceiving us into believing in permanence and solidity.

The talk addresses how perception intertwines with delusion, leading us to mistake our mental constructions for accurate representations of reality. Fella emphasizes the Buddha's instruction to 'cultivate the perception of impermanence' (anicca-saññā), explaining that this counteracts our habitual perception of stability. When we see that both what we cling to and the clinging itself are mind-made, understanding of dukkha and anattā naturally follows. Rather than trying to stop perception, we learn to recognize it at work, preventing the slide into papañca (mental proliferation).

This evening I'd like to reflect on the process of perception.

We've been talking about this quite a bit, and tonight I'd like to come at it from the perspective of seeing the process of perception itself—how it's conditioned, how it confuses us, how it gets us caught in misperceptions. Some of this will be revisiting things we've talked about, but perhaps from a slightly different perspective.

One thing I want to say at the beginning is that I'm going to be talking about how we might be able to recognize perception at work in our minds. And yet this isn't, as we've said a number of times, an instruction to try to do that, to try to look for it or see it. That can be a way to explore these aggregates, perception being one of the five aggregates. We can sometimes aim or direct toward trying to look at those aspects of our experience. But there's another way into this whole thing.

The way I found it worked for me with Sayadaw U Tejaniya is that sometimes he would start talking about something. On one retreat in particular, he talked about perception a lot. Almost every group I was in, he was talking about perception—how perception and delusion kind of mixed it up. And without trying, just being in the field of that curiosity that Sayadaw had about perception, my mind started to be curious about perception, and I started seeing it in different ways.

So this also can be a way that we start to see something or recognize something—not so much by trying to find it, but just being in the field of discussion about it or exploration about it. As we've said, as the mindfulness gets more continuous, it can start to see things more clearly; sometimes it can start to see more subtlety. This is one of the areas it can start to see. So just take it in that way. This isn't something to leave the hall and start trying to do.

A little bit of a review about what perception is: perception as one of the five aggregates. We've talked about those a couple of times now in the hall—these functions of mind. I talk about them as being functions or processes of mind that kind of make up what we are experiencing.

Just to name them: there's the aggregate of the body, of form, the physical aspect of experience. Then there's feeling, the process of experiencing pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. There's the process of perception, of recognizing experience. There are mental formations, the volitional activities of mind, which includes thoughts, emotions, and beliefs—all the wholesome and unwholesome qualities of our mind. This includes things like greed, aversion, and delusion. It includes things like mindfulness, compassion, and wisdom. So that's a big bucket, the mental formations. And then there's consciousness, this kind of bare recognition of experience, the knowing of experience, the meeting of experience at a sense door—contact with the eye door, and eye consciousness arises.

There are six kinds of consciousness: eye consciousness, ear consciousness, nose consciousness, tongue consciousness, body consciousness, and mind consciousness. Likewise with perception—six classes of perception, the same six classes. Feeling also has the same six classes. These aggregates work with the six sense bases; each sense base will have these aggregates connected with it.

One of the things about perception, feeling, and consciousness: I think of those three as kind of the bare experience of what we're experiencing. The mental formations are in relationship to what we are experiencing. So perception, feeling, and consciousness—that's kind of how we know our experience. Sometimes we know it more through the feeling door, the feeling experience of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Sometimes we know it more just through the knowing; we just know the experience. And sometimes we know it through this aspect of perception.

Perception, I think, is one of the functions of mind where we really tend to land with our understanding of our world, because it is that function that helps us to recognize experience. It operates with memory. We meet experience over and over again, and as we meet experience—in a field of learning with our families as we grow up—we're told, "Well, that's a chair," and "That's a wall." We're given names for things. And we begin to recognize walls that we've never seen before because of this pattern matching, this way we have of recognizing experience.

That is a really useful function in our minds. We can recognize something that we've never seen before, never experienced before, because of its similarity to things that we have experienced.

And this process does make mistakes. We'll get into that.

So this mental process of recognition is related to memory in a way. It is connected to what we've learned. When there's contact with the eye or ear—a stimulus—it's almost like the process of perception is the mind going into its memory banks and saying, "What is this like? What's the closest match I can find for this stimulus that's coming into my eye or my ear?"

Perception also has a kind of layered nature to it. Perception can work at a level that's very basic—just in the eye door, for instance, recognizing form and color, shape, shadow, light and dark, without much orientation to what the experience is or what the name of the experience is, other than "that's light" or "that's dark," or "that's a square" or "that's a circle." Form, color—that's one layer of how perception can work. And then we may start there, just noticing squares and circles, and then we might recognize them as zabutans and zafus.

This kind of seeing of how perception functions—I don't see this all the time, but every now and then there's a really clear example of it: the mind, through the continuity of mindfulness, able to watch the mind put a perception together. This happened for me on one retreat. I was sitting outside and my head turned, and it just landed on a shape. I watched the mind name the color, the form. It landed on a shape, and it's like I heard the mind saying, "Green. Jagged." And then it came up with the perception "leaf." So the perception was layered on top of the more basic perceptions of green and the jagged shape. Then "leaf" kind of popped into the mind as the recognition of what that form was.

Perception often happens in the mind as a kind of subtle form of thought. In that example, it was those words popping into my mind. I wasn't trying to identify that thing personally. I wasn't trying to do that. That was the process of perception recognizing green, jagged, leaf. In that case, those perceptions appeared in the mind as those words. This is one way that perceptions can appear—we can recognize the name of something.

But just as thoughts can appear in our minds through any sense door, we may experience thoughts as words in our mind or as images—almost as if we're talking to ourselves through the ear, like we're hearing something or seeing something. Thoughts can be in these different forms. They can even be, I think I mentioned, the sense of thinking physically, through dance—the feeling of the dance. I would think it and feel it. That's another way that thoughts can arise.

And so perception also can happen through any of these doorways. I'd say probably for most of us, perceptions will often happen through those sense doors that are our strongest. So often for those of us who are sighted and who have hearing and language, the perception often comes as a visual image or as a word in the mind, as if we're saying the word in the mind.

Often we talk about perception from this perspective of the recognition of objects, and this is one of the main ways that perception works—it's an easy way to talk about it. But there are some other functions of perception. Perception also creates the experience of location, of space.

I experienced this when I was in Hawaii practicing for quite a long time. I was in a little cottage, meditating inside, and there are so many birds there. You may experience this here at certain times of the day when the birds are really singing. But my experience was, as the birds sang—and they were loud—there was a sense of hearing happening, a recognition of "bird," and often an image of a bird in my mind. I would envision these birds walking around on the ground—the francolins in particular, they're really noisy. And I would envision them, I would see them, but I would also have this feeling of the mind launching into space in the direction that I thought the bird was. The creation of the distance and the location of the bird. There was this clear sense of the mind trying to locate the bird.

And that is also a part of the perceptual process.

I've experienced a flavor of how the mind orients towards space habitually. At my parents' house, there's a stairway, and the stairs are all the same height—mostly—when we're going upstairs. We don't recognize how the perception of the first couple of stairs affects us in terms of the rest. We expect the stairs will all be about the same height. In my parents' house, the top step is about an inch and a half shorter. And every time, for years, it took a long time before I didn't land funny at that top stair. The mind was expecting a certain height to land on, and when it wasn't there, there was a kind of drop. That too is perception at work.

Perception works in different ways. I think there is also perception around time, perception around the location of our body, the orientation of our body upright. We feel this in airplanes sometimes—when the airplane tips, we feel the shift of our body in space. These kinds of things are related to perception.

Perception is a really useful process, recognizing what's around us and what objects are. It's really useful, and it's just something that happens. It's not something we're trying to stop from happening. But what we often do is mistake some things about perception. There are confusions and delusions that arise around perception. I want to speak to some of that, but first I want to talk a little about beginning to see this process, see perception working.

For me, the place where this has been most obvious, where it's easiest to see, where it naturally arises with a little more continuity of mindfulness, is when I'm hearing sounds. What I might experience is the hearing, the experience of the sound in the ear—the sound of a woodpecker. The sound is just the sound. And then in the mind, the word "woodpecker" appears, if you know what a woodpecker is. Or maybe an image of a woodpecker appears. It may even appear in context. Sometimes with birds, I may see them on the branch of a tree. It's not just a bird with no background—the bird appears in context. That image or word, that's perception at work.

And quickly, as Carol mentioned the other night, very quickly what can happen is we go from that bare recognition of "that's what that is" to thinking about it, to having ideas and beliefs and opinions about it, to having reactions to it. The perception can be a launching point for so much of that slippery slope towards papañca that Carol talked about.

If we can start to recognize perception, when we start to see the perception itself—and my speaking about this might create that kind of interest, that "oh, that's perception"—the seeing of it may help to keep it just at that level, not going down the slope of

"oh, where might that woodpecker be and where can I find it?" and "let me go out on my next walking and see if I can find woodpeckers." Just: there was the perception, there was the sound, and there was the recognition. It was a woodpecker.

Sometimes I've seen with the process of perception, when conditions are a little fuzzy—like seeing in dim light—I'll watch the mind experimenting, exploring: "What is that? What is that experience?" One time I walked into the common area room we were sharing, and the light was really dim.

It was night. It was dark. There was just one little light on in the corner, very dim. And there was this big, massive shape there. My mind went, "It's a deformed being." And then, "No, I'm pretty sure it's not a deformed being." But it tried on three or four different perceptions before it landed on, "Oh, it's a vase of flowers."

Sometimes that can be fun to see—how the mind works. I just saw this the other day, actually. I was walking somewhere in this vicinity around IMS, near a parking lot, and there was this massive boulder in the parking lot. I thought, "Wow, I don't remember seeing that massive boulder." The next moment it was like, "Oh no, that's a car with a car cover on it." Again, the perception—when I first looked at it, yeah, it kind of looked like a big boulder. But no, it was just perception making a mistake.

It's also helpful to look at perception as we see it at work. We begin to recognize perception at times, and we get a sense of the difference between perception and thinking—where it has slipped from just the recognition of what's there, how we're meeting experience, into the thinking about it. When we see perception working, it has less opportunity to deceive us, to fool us.

Perception is very intertwined with the process of conditioning. And the process of perception can get us into trouble when we don't quite see how it works.

There's an analogy that the Buddha uses for each of the aggregates, and I won't go through them all now, but just the one for perception. He says that perception is like a mirage. Each of these analogies is a kind of description, an analogy of how that experience may feel. But it also brings in some of the way that aggregate tends to carry a delusive nature—how we get confused about it.

With perception, this is such a great analogy. Perception is like a mirage. If we unpack what a mirage is—I think the classic mirage that we're all familiar with, that probably most of us have experienced or seen, is on a warm day in a dry climate, like the classic image of seeing water in a desert. What that is, at least as I understand how it works, is that the air waves and the heat create this optical refraction that makes like a mirror out of the air. What we're seeing is the sky reflected on the ground. And it looks like water. We're seeing something that we've got a history of. It's like, "Oh, that looks like water." I've seen in Death Valley not only the blue water, but also distant objects reflected in it. It's really quite compelling. This looks like water. But it is basically an optical pattern. They don't call it exactly an illusion because it's not that something is there that's not there. It's a reflection of something that is there. But it's being misperceived—often misperceived.

This is perfect as an analogy for perception. Because perception is our way of experiencing the world—one of the key functions through which we experience the world, along with feeling and knowing. What we are experiencing is a reflection of something that's out there. But we're not experiencing what's out there. We're experiencing the reflection. We're experiencing the mind's construction based on memory, based on prior history, based on conditioning. We are experiencing what the mind has constructed.

We're not experiencing the world directly. We experience the world through our mind's creation of it. This is quite profound and quite startling when we start to see it. All of our experience, everything that we experience, is created by our minds.

the mirage—often those mirages can be misunderstood. And this is pointing to how we misunderstand perception. We take our perceptions to be accurate representations of reality, and that's one of the big places we get caught, one of the ways we get confused by perception.

Because this process—because what we are experiencing is what's created by our mind—this process is prone to distortion. It can be distorted by interpretation and is affected by conditioning. What we perceive, how we perceive the world... we kind of think we're taking in the world like we're cameras and microphones picking up what's actually out there, and that what we're experiencing is that recording somehow. But that's not quite the way our minds work. Our minds are much more influenced by history and conditioning. What we are taking in is already shaped by past conditions.

So our perceptions are not pure, let's say. They are influenced by our history, our upbringing, our ideas. And then likewise, our perceptions will come into relationship with our ideas and beliefs, and so what we perceive will then shape how we relate to things.

An example that kind of incorporates both of these sides: This experience happened at Shwe Oo Min practicing with Sayadaw, probably during that retreat when he was talking about perception so much. So it was appropriate—the exploration and what happened here. This happened over the course of a number of days.

I was practicing in my room, mostly in the evenings. Around the same time each evening, there was this squealing noise that started happening. And the perception that arose in the mind was that this was a pig squealing. This was conditioned by my past—I had heard pigs squealing, so I perceived this as a pig. And then the mind started to go into some thinking and some ideas about the pig, and some paññā about what was going on with the pig.

It was happening so regularly every night. The monastery is pretty close to the village, and my room was pretty close to the monastery wall. So I had this thought that on the other side of that wall was the local butcher, and the squealing was the pig being slaughtered for the market the next day.

I knew that this was all a story, that I did not actually know whether the pig was being butchered. Maybe it was just a pig squealing every night. But anyway, that's what the mind had done with that squealing. And it happened regularly. I don't remember how long it took for the story about the butcher to arise over the days, but it arose. And over the days I was feeling all this compassion for the pig each evening.

Then one night I decided instead to do a walking meditation at that time rather than sitting in my room. As I was walking up and down the walkway, there were these bats flying around, swooping. It was kind of startling—they would fly right at you and then just miss. And these bats were squealing. I immediately recognized that this is what I had been hearing, and that the perception of a pig had been a misperception.

Now, I kind of knew that the story about the butcher shop was a construction in my mind—there's no need for compassion if they're bats, not pigs. But what I had no idea of was that it was not a pig. That was a shock.

Seeing how the perception can make a mistake—it was a kind of innocent mistake, because that squealing was the only experience I'd had of that kind. It was the best match this mind could find for that sound. So that part was conditioned: the seeing of it as a pig, the recognizing it as a pig. And then the squealing itself sounded distressed, so that perception conditioned what arose next.

Distressed squealing is what conditioned the whole chain of assumptions and views about the pig being slaughtered and the compassion that arose with that. So perceptions play with conditioning in fascinating ways.

This experience also made it very clear to me that the whole thing around the compassion and all of that—it was not responding to something that was out there. It was responding to a construction of my own mind. It was responding to the construction that this was a pig. And it was just a construction of the mind.

So there are really many layers of understanding that happened with this. The seeing of the perception and the whole conditioning process, but also the seeing that the experience was just in the mind. The recognition, the perception, what I was perceiving—that was a mental function. It was just the mind doing that. Everything that we experience, everything is created by our minds.

I'd say that perception and feeling and knowing does a pretty good job of helping us navigate the world. It does a pretty good job of representing things. But it is so prone to mistake and error. It's really humbling to see how much we are attributing reality to our perceptions. Delusion is what convinces the mind to believe that perceptions are what is out there.

We can work with perceptions. It's not that we're trying to stop perception or not have perception, but we do need to know that perception has this nature of being conditioned, being influenced by past conditioning, that it's not necessarily accurate.

There was an exhibit I saw at a science museum in San Francisco called the Exploratorium. This was a number of years ago. My nephew had come out for a visit, and I thought, this is a great place—let's go to the Exploratorium. It's a fun place with all these science exhibits, things that point out different ways that our world works and how we see the world. It's got all kinds of interesting things.

We walked in, and I noticed on the back—it's a big cavernous warehouse-type place, just open with all these different exhibits around—hanging up in the air were these bars. They were probably six feet tall, spaced maybe about three or four feet apart. Just tube bars hanging from the ceiling, and there were lights flashing on them. That was my first experience with that exhibit: seeing from a distance bars with lights flashing on them hanging from the ceiling. I thought, huh, I wonder what that's about. I'll have to check that out later.

We wandered around, and at some point came and sat down, resting our feet and having a drink. My nephew was sitting there looking up at the ceiling, and he said, "Oh, it's a school bus."

I looked up to where he was looking and it was the bars with flashing lights on them. I did not see a school bus there. I saw yellow lights flashing on most of the bars with an occasional red light. I thought, what? What are you talking about?

Then he said, "Oh, now it's butterflies." I thought, what?

So I stood there for a while, wondering what's going on here. What is he seeing? I stood there and it just took a kind of relaxation of the eye, and suddenly the mind perceived that there was a screen hanging from the ceiling. A screen that was about forty feet wide and six feet high. And across that screen was driving a school bus. The image was so detailed that I could read the name of the school district on the side of the school bus.

And I knew that I was not seeing a school bus, that all that was happening were flashing lights on those bars. The mind

This was an exhibit on perception and how the mind holds on to what we've just perceived for a few moments. And in this case, if you kind of held on, it seemed to be functioning with the way our sense apparatus works. The school bus was driving across the picture, so the lights on this bar were being—in the mind—carried from one bar to the next. The timing of the flashing lights was just right such that by the time the eye and the mind carried that set of flashing lights across, and it carried multiple versions of that flashing light across to get the image, it was stunning to see: this is mind-made. This is mind-made. This is the kind of thing that goes on all the time and we don't notice it. We don't recognize it—this way that the mind holds on to experience.

And it's useful. It is very useful that our minds hold on to and stabilize experience. This is one of the functions of perception: it stabilizes our world. What's actually going on in our visual field as I'm looking around is pretty chaotic. As I move my head, it looks like you're all staying pretty still. But if there were a camera doing what my eye does, it would be pretty jumpy. We would see that it was bouncing around. So our perceptual field tends to stabilize. The perceptual processes tend to stabilize our experience. And perception also holds on to the last things it has perceived to smooth out the experience—as that example with the lights and bars at the Exploratorium and seeing the school bus illustrated.

This is both a feature and one of the big ways we get caught, because we believe in the stability of our world. We believe in the stability of experience. This, I think, is one of the key ways we have the misperception that takes what is impermanent to be permanent—because of very fundamental ways our perception works, this stabilizing nature of perception. And this is where the delusion creeps in too. We believe that stability. So much suffering happens around this.

In terms of suffering and clinging, I think we do really get the flavor of the experience of suffering through the experience of craving and clinging and aversion and greed. We get the flavor of suffering, and we understand that we're clinging to something. Many of us understand the suffering is our mind's doing. We begin to get that—our minds are creating the suffering by trying to cling to things.

What's a little harder to see is that what we are clinging to is also made by our minds. We are clinging to stuff our mind makes up. Now, it is reflective of what's out there, but we can't actually cling to what's out there because what we're experiencing is what's created by our minds. And this process of perception is really playing into the stabilizing, into thinking there is something to cling to. The idea, the concept, the perception—the whole process kind of gets stabilized, and we can hold on to concepts and perceptions. The mind can repeat perceptions. And that's, again, a feature. It helps us to smooth out the experience so that we're not in a chaotic perceptual field. But it also gets misunderstood to be the nature of things—as being stable. And they are not stable.

So this, I think, is part of the encouragement to cultivate the perception of impermanence. Our minds habitually cultivate the perception of stability. That's the way our sensory apparatus has functioned. And so it's interesting to me that the Buddha used that phrase: cultivate the perception of impermanence. Often these three—anicca, dukkha, anattā; impermanent, unreliable, not-self—are described as characteristics. And that makes it sound like there's something out there that they're characteristic of. In the suttas, the words for impermanent, unreliable, and not-self are not connected with that word in the texts.

The word for characteristic, lakkhaṇa, is not actually used in the text of the sutta itself. It's assigned as a name to one of the suttas—the Anattā Lakkhaṇa Sutta, the Characteristic of Not-Self—but within the discourse, that word is not used. What is used over and over again is to cultivate the perception, or to observe impermanence, observe unreliability, observe not-self.

To me this is another piece of teaching that reveals why he uses this language—cultivate the perception of impermanence—because what we are experiencing is what's been created in our mind. All that we can know is our perceptions, our experience. That pointing to cultivate the perception of not-self, as opposed to "see that this is true in the world," really indicates to me that the Buddha was directing us to experience over and over again. He's pointing to: know the experience, know what's happening here.

Then we can see that with the way the mind functions, there are times it perceives things as stable and times it perceives things as changing. Sometimes it's useful to perceive things as stable. The Buddha is pointing to the usefulness of recognizing the perception of impermanence. Because when the mind sees the perception of impermanence, it encounters the counterpoint to seeing things as stable. It's like: well, sometimes it feels stable, sometimes it feels impermanent. The mind understands that this is a perception. And it also begins to understand that experience is unreliable as something to cling to, because we want to cling to something stable.

The whole process of clinging is about landing and staying—taking a stand, finding that landing spot. And there's nowhere to land. The trying to land on something, the clinging to something, will reveal itself in its changing nature at some point, and then suffering will arise.

So the Buddha said: cultivate the perception of impermanence. It will support the understanding of unreliability, of the dukkha nature of experience, and it will support the understanding of the not-self nature of experience. He encouraged us to cultivate all of these—the perception of dukkha, the perception of unreliability, and the perception of not-self.

CHAPTER 180

Transcendent Dependent Arising

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the teaching of transcendent dependent arising (lokuttara paṭiccasamuppāda), a twelve-link chain describing the conditions that support the mind's natural movement toward freedom. While the more commonly known dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) describes how suffering perpetuates itself through ignorance, craving, and clinging, this complementary teaching reveals how the same lawful process—when this arises, that arises—can lead to liberation.

The chain begins with suffering (dukkha) as a supportive condition for faith (saddhā), which arises when we encounter both the recognition of suffering and a teaching that offers a path forward. Faith supports delight (pāmojja), which supports rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), happiness (sukha), and concentration (samādhi). These wholesome qualities then support knowledge and vision of things as they are (yathābhūtañāṇadassana)—seeing the impermanent, unreliable, and not-self nature of experience.

Andrea explores how this seeing leads to disenchantment (nibbidā), where we recognize our former enchantment with greed, aversion, and delusion. She describes various emotional flavors that arise in this territory—fear, vulnerability, homesickness for delusion, and resistance—emphasizing that noticing our relationship to experience becomes crucial practice here. As dispassion (virāga) develops, the mind naturally ceases moving toward or away from experiences, understanding that picking up anything makes no sense. This dispassion serves as a decisive supportive condition for release (vimutti) and the knowledge of release. The talk offers both inspiration and practical guidance for recognizing this unfolding process in one's own practice.

Over these weeks of being here, we've been watching the mind do its thing, getting familiar with the habits and patterns of our minds. And I've been hearing from pretty much all of you a real sense of just being able to watch—a kind of amazement of, "Yeah, I don't have to be involved with it. I can just watch it happen." And often we see it weaken. We see it fall apart. We do experience a kind of letting go. At least we experience a kind of okayness that it's here. We're not caught up in the habit or pattern.

So we're seeing how the habits and patterns affect our minds. We're learning with them. We're also seeing how the practice affects our mind. Both of these things are going on at the same time—the qualities of awareness and wisdom and patience. We're hearing the understanding and the recognition: "Oh, this is what it's like to be aware with something," and what effect that has on the experience. More ease, more peace, even as we're seeing something challenging.

And so we're seeing both the conditioning, the habits and patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion, how those tumble on. And we're also seeing how the wholesome qualities flow on, how they strengthen and develop as we practice. So we're seeing the conditionality on both sides: the conditionality of how greed, aversion, and delusion affect the mind, and how the wholesome qualities and the practice, the qualities of awareness and wisdom, affect the mind.

The Buddha described the conditionality of our reactive habits and patterns in the teaching of dependent origination. I think most of you are familiar, at least to some extent, with that teaching. And that's not the topic of tonight's talk, by the way, but I'm going to talk about it just a little bit right now, as a kind of framing.

The teaching of dependent origination describes the arising of suffering, describes the arising of the sense of self, describes how we get caught—the patterns of how getting caught works in our minds. It's kind of an amazing teaching, that the Buddha could see so clearly how these patterns work in our minds. It describes the conditioned nature of suffering.

In this teaching, there are some very familiar links in the chain. Particularly, there's a place in the teaching of dependent origination where it says that with every sense experience, we experience a feeling tone. And then from that feeling tone, what tends to arise is craving. That's one of the key places where we're taught to be curious. What happens? How does feeling lead to craving? Because it doesn't always lead to craving, and we can see that. And so we can understand in that experience.

The teaching says that when feeling arises, craving can arise. But it is not what might be called a cause. Feeling doesn't cause craving. There are other conditions that are in play for feeling to lead to craving. And the teaching of dependent origination offers one of the keys at the very head of the chain: the whole thing is kind of initiated, kind of started rolling, with ignorance. Ignorance about how suffering works, ignorance about impermanence, ignorance about unreliability, ignorance about not-self. So with that kind of functioning in the mind, when ignorance is present in the mind, feeling will lead to craving in that moment. When feeling is arising with ignorance in the mind, feeling is going to lead on to craving. And so we start to see the difference between when the mind has ignorance, when feeling leads to craving, and when feeling can just be feeling, and we understand it doesn't have to lead on to craving.

This teaching on dependent origination also includes, in some forms of it, that there are conditions that lead to freedom. Some of the conditions that lead to freedom are talked about with respect to dependent origination in this way: when ignorance is not arising, feeling may not lead to craving. Probably won't lead to craving when ignorance is not present. And when craving doesn't arise, clinging doesn't arise. And when clinging doesn't arise, becoming doesn't arise.

This is one of the ways that the teaching on dependent origination, in its simplest form in the suttas, is taught—just a very simple statement of relationship: when this arises, that arises.

When this is, that is. When this ceases, that ceases. When this isn't, that isn't. This formula offers a way to understand how, when craving is not arising, clinging doesn't arise. When craving ceases, clinging will cease. There's a way out of the pattern, out of the habits and patterns that our minds typically go through.

If certain conditions aren't present, suffering doesn't arise—the suffering connected with greed, aversion, and delusion. When feeling is met with mindfulness and wisdom, ignorance is cut through, and craving won't arise. The conditions for how those things might not arise are awareness and wisdom.

There's also an understanding that there can be cultivation of conditions that support the letting go, that support the ending of the habits and patterns which lead to suffering. Often we don't know how to let go. We can't do that letting go so much. But the Buddha points to conditions that will support letting go.

It's said he had a reflection after he became awakened. He got curious: the mind is free from greed, aversion, and delusion—how did that happen? What was the condition that supported that release? And he walked backwards. What was the condition that supported that? And what was the condition that supported that? He walked back through a number of different conditions in the mind.

This is actually quite inspiring to me. He walked back to suffering as a supportive condition for the launching towards freedom. And this is embedded in his teachings—he speaks of understanding suffering, the first noble truth. That's the head of another process, another teaching: the teaching of transcendent dependent origination.

I'm going to go through this teaching this evening, but I'm not going to try to walk through every single link. It's a twelve-link chain, as the teaching of dependent origination is also a twelve-link chain. I'd like to describe the flavor of it rather than going into depth with each link. There isn't really time for that.

Let me start with a few reflections on this teaching. The first thing that's inspiring to me is that the Buddha pointed out there are conditions that can support our freedom, that support the mind moving in the direction of freedom. The same lawful process that perpetuates dukkha—when this is, that is; when this arises, that arises; when this isn't, that isn't; when this ceases, that ceases—the same lawful processes that perpetuate dukkha also lead us to freedom.

I'm going to read through the links now. I won't define them just yet, but I'll list them. These are understood to be supportive conditions.

The condition of suffering supports the arising of faith. The condition of faith supports the arising of delight. The condition of delight supports the arising of rapture, which supports the arising of tranquility, happiness, concentration, knowledge and vision of things as they are. Knowledge and vision of things as they are supports disenchantment. Disenchantment supports dispassion. Dispassion supports release. And release leads to the understanding that freedom has been reached.

So, starting with suffering as a supportive condition for faith—this is interesting, and I think I'll spend some time with this link. Suffering leads to faith. But suffering also leads to ignorance.

has not really reflected on suffering in a way that includes an understanding of its workings. When we experience suffering—and certainly before I met this path—I was caught by my anger, caught by my self-hatred. It felt like there was no way out.

Bhikkhu Bodhi says this about suffering and faith: "Since it is suffering that impels us to seek the way to freedom, suffering is called the supporting condition for faith. By itself, however, the confrontation with suffering, even at the level of mature reflection, is not sufficient to generate faith. For faith to arise, two conditions are required. The first is the awareness of suffering, which makes us recognize the need for a liberative path. The second is the encounter with the teaching that proclaims a liberative path."

So for suffering to not just lead us back into the cycle of ignorance and the tumbling forward of feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, suffering, ignorance—for it not to just tumble on that way—something has to happen. There has to be a kind of reflection around suffering. What is this? Is it possible to be free of this?

It's said that the Buddha had this reflection or question around his own experience: Does somebody know a way out of this? There's a teaching in the suttas that says suffering will lead either to ignorance and confusion, or it will lead to search. And that's that question: Is there a way out?

I had this question for myself. I had tried just about everything to not feel like I was helpless, like I was being whipped around by conditions in the world—by what people did to me. That's how it felt: what people did to me and how my mind reacted to it. I was miserable. I was so miserable. And there was a question: Is there a way? Is there a way out of this?

Right around that time, a friend sent me a book about the Dharma. I didn't really understand much of what the book said, but I got a sense that there might be a way. The simplicity of the teaching I received from that book—I think I mentioned this earlier—was just: try noticing your difficult states of mind. So for me, anger in that time. Try noticing your anger instead of reacting to it. Try noticing your anger instead of following the anger.

I did not understand how that worked or why it would work. I thought, won't that just make me more angry? But I was in a place where I was willing to try just about anything, including something that didn't seem to make a lot of sense. There was suffering and the meeting of a teaching that said there's a way. Even though I didn't understand the connection, there was a willingness to try.

That willingness is a little bit of faith. That willingness to say, well, you know—for me it was kind of like I'd hit bottom, so nothing else had worked. I'd tried everything else I knew of to navigate my life. And here was another kind of out-of-the-blue crazy idea, but why not? Nothing else has worked. I might as well try this.

Within weeks I understood something about how and why it worked, and so faith began to be supported. At first it was just taking it on faith. Actually, I didn't just take it on faith from the book because my friend had said, "This stuff is really useful. It works." So I had that too, that piece in terms of the leap to faith. But fairly quickly I began to see the value and the benefit. This launched me onto this chain: faith supports delight, rapture, tranquility, happiness.

It put me onto that path.

The sutta in which this teaching is described presents this chain, this set of conditions, as a very natural unfolding. The image, the analogy that's used, is one of water running downhill. The Buddha says, just as when the rain falls from the sky and the water collects in rivulets and gullies and flows down the mountain to ponds and streams and rivers to the ocean—just as that happens, so this process towards freedom happens.

There's another sutta that speaks of some of these same links and uses slightly different language for understanding the naturalness, the onward-leading quality of finding our way into the path. It uses the phrase "there's no need for an act of will." That teaching begins with virtue. If someone is engaging with virtue, if someone is not harming, there's no need for an act of will: "May non-remorse arise in me." It is natural for non-remorse to arise in one who is engaging with ethical conduct. In one who does not have remorse, there's no need for an act of will: "May delight arise." It is natural for one who does not have remorse to experience delight. And this is where the chain links up and goes on. There's no need for an act of will in one who experiences delight. It is natural for rapture to arise.

Now I'd say this doesn't mean that we don't have to do work, because those patterns of delusion and ignorance are so strong. They get in the way. We see this, right? We see this. It's quite natural for delight to lead to rapture, and rapture to lead to tranquility, and tranquility to lead to happiness—when the mind is not caught in greed, aversion, and delusion. That's the movement. And so it's a natural movement.

And yet, we can think about that analogy. This occurred to me when I was giving this talk one time. The water falls on the ground, and not all of it gets to the ocean. Some of it gets absorbed into the ground and pulled up into the plants and then evaporates back into the air. Some of it just gets stagnant in a little pond. There's a little dam in the way, and the water just sits there and then evaporates and goes back into the air. So those processes also happen in our minds. The ignorance and the delusion are like the formation of dams for that process of naturally flowing.

This teaching of the naturalness of the unfolding—to me it's inspiring, but it also means we can't just sit back and say, "Okay, I don't have to do anything because it's natural." The defilements also have their momentum. They're also nature. And they will take over. So we do have to bring a practice for this natural process to unfold.

As this process unfolds, the process towards freedom, the way it's framed—faith supports delight, delight supports rapture, rapture supports tranquility, tranquility supports happiness, happiness supports concentration—it sounds like they're one step at a time. But really it's more of a spiral, and there are feedback loops in this process.

So in my story around meeting suffering, finding a teaching, and then being willing to practice with it—that was the work. I found that teaching. Now the other thing about the teaching that the Buddha offers: it's a teaching of engagement. It's not a teaching just to believe and think about. We have to put it into practice. And so the faith has to put us into motion—to act, to try what the Buddha taught, to try those tools: mindfulness, effort, looking at the wholesome, understanding the wholesome and the unwholesome, all of the teachings that the Buddha offered for working with our mind. And here we're exploring primarily mindfulness and wisdom—to observe, to have the curiosity around what's going on here in our minds.

That's the activity, that's how we engage. That's the doing part. And this particular practice does move more into not doing as much. When mindfulness gains momentum, we don't have to do much at all. But we've been talking about skillful means, ways to navigate. When we see the defilements get strong, we bring in some tools to navigate, to not be caught in them.

To be able to learn with them, as opposed to being pulled under by them.

These feedback loops are so important. I talked about that experience for myself—trying this thing that made no sense to me intellectually, but then seeing over the course of the next few weeks a very clear understanding of how this practice helped.

That first moment really of seeing—just seeing, "Oh my gosh, this stuff works!" I could see the mind kind of heading towards a pattern and it just let it go. It just vanished. And it's like, "Oh my gosh, I never would have thought that was possible." It's possible for the mind to let go of that pattern of anger. Wow, that's amazing. Delight and joy arose there. And there was also a kind of feedback loop to support the faith. So there was the faith to try it, and then as I played with it, there was the confirmed experience: this works. That supported more faith, which supported more engagement, which supported more seeing, which supported more delight and joy. The whole thing—it's like these feedback loops.

A little bit of faith will support a little bit of effort, which may begin to allow us to see something, and then there's some delight that supports more faith, there's more engagement, we may see something even more clearly, something new. Seeing some nature of something as impermanent supports it even more. We gain some concentration, which supports our mind to feel more stable and balanced. It's a spiral. It's a cycle.

This chain is teaching that in a way—it is pointing to conditions that are supportive for freedom. And yet there's a little bit of a paradox here, because the whole direction of this, the liberative teaching, points in the direction of non-clinging, not acquiring. So there's a kind of paradox: what does it mean to cultivate these conditions but not acquire them? Not have a sense of trying to hold on to them. What these conditions support is letting go, not clinging—even to beautiful states of mind.

The whole teaching of noticing when there's clinging, just that encouragement—notice when there's clinging—we start to be attuned to that. We start to be attuned to the feeling: contraction, distraction maybe. We start to be attuned to that experience, and we will feel it when we start to cling, if we start to cling to wholesome states. So the very direction of the teaching helps us to not cling to anything.

We may hold on to or cling to wholesome states of mind. I definitely knew there was clinging to investigation in my practice around investigating anger. I kind of knew that there was an identity there. I really knew that I was a good investigator. And yet, while I was clinging to that, while I was observing and knowing about anger, the suffering—there undoubtedly was some kind of tightness around the investigation. But while there was investigation of anger and self-hatred, the little bit of clinging around the investigation was not felt as suffering. And as the self-hatred and the anger fell apart, got really diminished, then I started feeling the clinging in how I was using the investigation. That's when I could really start to look at that part. What does it mean to investigate without clinging to investigation?

So the practice, as Gil Fronsdal sometimes says, is self-correcting. It will point out when we're clinging. And because that's what we're exploring, we'll see even when we cling to the practice. And we will feel the suffering of that.

These first few links—suffering supports faith, delight, rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration. To me there's some inspiration here in this set of links: that these beautiful qualities—delight, joy, happiness, calm—are part of the path. And the conditions of supporting them, of nourishing them, of their growth and development—they are nourished by being aware of them, by recognizing them. Delight is happening. Happiness is happening.

This, to me, is part of the beauty of this teaching—that these qualities of mind are firmly on the path. They are supportive conditions. They aren't the end of the path. They aren't what we're going for. They are supportive conditions that support the mind to be able to see. Moving to the next few links of the chain: for the mind to become concentrated and to see things as they are.

To see the changing, conditioned, unreliable nature of experience.

All of these conditions support the mind to become more stable. The concentration of mind and the different kinds of concentration we've talked about. Here we're exploring the moment-to-moment concentration more than one-pointed concentration, although one-pointed concentration can happen in this practice—but that's not really the point of this practice. So concentration develops, stability of mind develops, and we are curious. The aim, that concentration with wise view, starts to get curious about experience as impermanent, unreliable, and not-self. Wisdom starts to show us things as they are.

This link in the chain—knowledge and vision of things as they are—impermanent, unreliable, not-self. I'm not going to spend a lot of time here; we've talked about this extensively over the last few weeks. But as we start to see this, as we start to see the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience, sometimes that's experienced as quite delightful. It can feel almost like a relief. Feeling the letting go of clinging around something, understanding that something is conditioned—it's just not me, not who I am—and something falls apart, and it's like, what a relief. So sometimes seeing things as they are does feel good. It has a relieving quality, a releasing quality to it.

And sometimes there's a deep rebellion against seeing things as they are. This is part of the process of how our minds work. Carol talked about the comfort we have in our habits and patterns—it feels like an old comfortable shoe. When those patterns and habits start to fall away, there can be this sense of, well, who am I without these things? There can be some resistance to seeing the nature of experience as it actually is. At some level, we don't like the fact that things are impermanent and unreliable. So there can be at times a kind of, no, I don't like this.

I would say this is in the terrain of the next place in the chain: knowing and seeing things as they are leads to disenchantment. As we start to see things as impermanent, unreliable, not-self, we recognize that our old habits and patterns are... yes, we become disenchanted with them. We see that they're based on an incorrect perspective of experience. We start seeing through. We've been enchanted. Actually, I like this definition, the framing of this link as disenchantment, because it points to how we have been in a spell of enchantment—thinking that having something will make me happy, that getting rid of something will make me happy. We've been enchanted by delusion, enchanted by ignorance, and through that whole process we think greed and aversion are actually doing something for us. Through this process of recognizing the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience, we start to see that no, actually, it's not the way our minds' magic showed us to think it was. We start to become disenchanted with our habits and patterns, disenchanted with greed, aversion, and delusion, with the ways we've been living our lives.

Bhikkhu Bodhi has this to say about disenchantment—the Pali term is nibbidā: "Nibbidā signifies the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena which supervenes when the illusion of their permanence, pleasure, and selfhood has been shattered by the light of correct knowledge and vision of things as they are."

If only it was that easy. I think that serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena that happens when the illusion of their permanence, pleasure, and selfhood has been shattered—that's kind of the end of the process. Getting to that point is a challenging part of practice, where we are resisting tooth and nail. I do not want it to be this way. There are many different relationships we have to seeing the truth.

I'll spend a couple of minutes here. We start to see truth and we resist those truths, and there are emotional flavors that we have when we start to see the truth. I'll just name a few of these. Nibbidā itself, translated here as disenchantment—I like that one. That's the sense of seeing something that we thought was something else; we become disenchanted with the way we saw it. But the word is also sometimes translated as revulsion.

And this can be a flavor of the relationship, of seeing the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience—a feeling of "ugh." It doesn't have aversion in it. I think it's in the commentaries that this flavor is compared to a dog that has found a bone, but this bone has been sitting in the sun for ages. It's bleached, there's no nourishment left in it, there's no marrow in the bone. The dog picks up the bone, smells it, and just walks away. "There's nothing here for me." That's the flavor of nibbida. There's nothing here for me. There's no use in picking anything up. It's not going to nourish me.

As we explore other flavors of relationship to seeing, at a very deep level, the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience—sometimes it can be fear. There can be a sense of "Who am I?" or a feeling of vulnerability. My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya pointed out a flavor of homesickness. I like this one because there is a feeling at times of wanting to go back to delusion—if only I could just ignore the fact that things aren't the way I want them to be. There's this wanting to go back to the delusion we had, that feeling of homesickness, of returning to those comfortable habits and patterns, even though now they've been revealed to show suffering. So homesickness is another flavor. Sometimes there's a flavor of just disinterest, of boredom, of not wanting to practice. "Enough already. Enough already."

At this point in practice, when we're starting to really deepen through to see the nature of experience as impermanent, unreliable, not-self, this teaching that Sayadaw U Tejaniya points to—to notice the relationship to experience—becomes crucial. Because that's how the practice will deepen. All of these relationships are like the mind grasping at not wanting it to be this way. So as the mind is going through opening to truth, it reveals very deep and subtle levels of clinging. They aren't necessarily felt as subtle. This can be a pretty challenging time of practice. So notice those relationships.

Sometimes when somebody is talking about experiencing a lot of fear arising and they've been practicing for a while, I will ask, "Is there any content connected to this fear? Is there a story about it?" And often they'll say, "No, it's just... it just feels primal. It feels visceral." That can be the flavor. Feeling into the nature of experience as completely unreliable—vulnerability, fear can be a very natural kind of resistance to that truth. It's not about some story of abandonment as a child or something that happened ten years ago. It's much more related to the direct experience of meeting the nature of experience.

As the mind begins to attune to, to land with the truth and not resist it in these ways, it moves in the direction of dispassion. We're no longer drawn towards that which we were formerly enchanted by. This to me is like the serene withdrawal. There's been that recognition—we're just not interested in moving towards or away from anything. We're not interested in craving, clinging, becoming. The mind is not drawn towards or away from experiences. And there's an understanding that holding on to any experience makes no sense.

The word for dispassion, viraga—that word itself is often translated as dispassion, but it also has a meaning of something like fading. Raga can have the meaning of strong color; it also has the meaning of lust or strong desire. And the "vi" prefix means the fading of that. Viraga: fading of lust, desire. But the "raga" part also refers to the bright colors of cloth, like dye. And viraga is what happens when you put a cloth out in the sun—the cloth fades. There's a natural fading process that happens if you wash the cloth in soap and water and then put it out in the sun. The dye is going to fade over time. So this word, often translated as dispassion, also carries an analogy. And I take some comfort in this analogy, because the fading away of a dye is a long, slow, gradual process.

So this is another place where the Buddha is pointing to the gradual nature. The very word for the mind that lets go and stops moving towards and away from experience, the very word itself says this is a process. It's a slow process of fading away—the letting go, the release of the fibers of that rope. It's a similar image in a way. It's a gradual process.

The last few links, which I'm not going to say much about at all: dispassion is that place of the mind understanding that there's nothing to pick up. The mind doesn't move towards things or away from things. It understands that picking up anything doesn't make any sense. So dispassion is this deep understanding.

And when there is the depth of understanding with dispassion, the next two links—release and knowledge of release—it is said that dispassion is a decisive support condition. Release and knowledge of release will follow. So the earlier links all involve more work, the practice, observation of experience and curiosity and investigation. But dispassion, the wisdom of not picking up; release, the heart experiencing the release of suffering, the recognition that suffering is not here; and then the knowledge, the intellectual understanding, the reflection—it's said that there does come a reflection: it is released. These follow quite naturally.

So this whole set of conditions, the path that we are on, the tools that we are exploring—they have put us in this flow. We hear these qualities in your descriptions of experience. We try to point them out. Notice the wisdom. Notice the delight. Notice the joy. Notice this process. Because the noticing of the process of the path unfolding is a supportive condition for the path to keep unfolding.

I'll read this last quote from Bhikkhu Bodhi about realizing the unconditioned. And the unconditioned is another way of saying freedom, nibbāna:

"Though the realization of the unconditioned requires a turning away from the conditioned, it must be emphasized that this realization is achieved precisely through the understanding of the conditioned. Nibbāna cannot be reached by backing off from a direct confrontation with saṃsāra to lose oneself in a blissful oblivion to the world. The path to liberation is a path of understanding, of comprehension and transcendence, not of escapism and emotional self-indulgence. Nibbāna can only be attained by turning one's gaze towards saṃsāra and scrutinizing it in all its darkness. The understanding of the conditioned is the way to the unconditioned."

To me, that comes back to that very first link. Suffering leads to faith. Suffering met with wisdom is a supportive condition for freedom.

CHAPTER 181

Wisdom and Trust

Andrea Fella · 41 min

In this talk from the Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella examines the profound shift that occurs when mindfulness gains momentum and wisdom begins to guide practice naturally. She describes how wisdom has its own "job description"—to understand and release dukkha—and how recognizing this function deepens our trust in the practice. Rather than feeling we must direct or control our meditation, we can witness how understanding arises and suffering releases, often in ways we could never figure out intellectually.

Fella addresses two common edges of trust that practitioners encounter as practice deepens. First, she explores the experience of mindfulness becoming "slippery," where we notice more gaps and slipping out of present-moment awareness. Rather than immediately intensifying effort, she suggests bringing curiosity to these moments of slipping, which can reveal doorways to unfamiliar yet valuable territory. She shares a personal example of discovering that what seemed like losing focus was actually the mind releasing into a broader, more settled space.

The second edge involves encountering unfamiliar states—experiences without words or labels, sometimes accompanied by unexpected imagery as the mind attempts to make sense of new terrain. Fella encourages practitioners to notice the discomfort of not knowing and the urge to identify or understand, while simply receiving whatever arises. She concludes with a surprising teaching: deepening practice doesn't always feel extraordinary. Sometimes it manifests as profound ordinariness—clear, simple perception that encompasses all of life. This ordinariness itself can be an edge of trust, challenging our expectations of what spiritual development should look like.

At times when mindfulness gains momentum, mindfulness and wisdom can see more of the processes unfolding inside. As has been said, and as we've pointed to, wisdom begins to take the lead in the practice. It feels much less like we're doing the practice, like we're guiding or directing what's happening. We can start to see the natural unfolding of wisdom—seeing conditionality, seeing impermanence, understanding the unreliable nature of experience.

A while back, I talked about noticing the job description of some of our mind states—noticing the job description of aversion, greed. I also mentioned noticing the job description of the wholesome qualities: How do they act? What do they do? There's a kind of trust in this, that we see how these mental formations are functioning. We're not doing them. We're watching their nature unfold.

We can also get curious and see how wisdom does its job. We can recognize how wisdom functions, seeing the release of suffering, understanding dukkha. That may be the key job description of wisdom: to understand and release dukkha. So seeing this, seeing understanding arise, witnessing the release—at times we feel it in the moment. Yesterday I talked about the gradual nature, that sometimes we don't see the release. We just recognize in retrospect that something has disappeared. And in that moment we see the wisdom, the understanding that something has been released, that something is not being picked up.

This deepens the trust, recognizing that wisdom does its job. We're not responsible for this understanding to happen. In fact, there's usually no way we could figure out how to release dukkha. I remember sitting in the meditation hall at one time, noticing the clinging to something, feeling the suffering of that clinging. And the thought that arose in my mind was, "I would let go of this if I knew how." So it's really clear sometimes that we don't know how to let go. And the seeing of wisdom doing that begins to bring a lot of trust to the practice and the natural unfolding of this practice.

We do begin to trust more and more the non-interference, just the witnessing, and the patience. We begin to trust this natural process, the gradual nature of the path. And there are some edges to that trust at times, where we run into things. Our practice reveals things that kind of throw us back a little bit. They make us feel like, "Wow, is this really trustable? Can I trust the mind here? Maybe I should start doubling down and trying to do the practice again, as opposed to just receiving, just witnessing. Maybe I should direct the attention to something."

There are a couple of edges I want to point to—places where we may tend to think we need to bring in effort. And maybe it's a place of patience, to begin to learn with whatever is there.

One thing I'll mention is that sometimes when the mindfulness gains momentum and there's a little more continuity, we start seeing gaps in our mindfulness. We start recognizing the mind slipping out more. Sometimes it can feel like the mind is wandering more. It can slip into thought or slip into imagery or random thoughts. At one point, doing some walking meditation, the mindfulness got more continuous and I could see just these little jumps—mindfulness going out to something and then dropping back, losing mindfulness for a couple seconds and then coming back, a couple seconds and coming back. Really seeing the in and out of mindfulness.

We may have a tendency in these times of seeing more slipperiness of mindfulness, or the mindfulness kind of getting lost, to amp up the effort. "I need to hold my mind present." There can be a place for that. It's an interesting recognition, a difference in the quality of how the mind is slipping out.

You know, if the mind is charging out of the present moment and getting caught in things, that may well be a time for more effort—perhaps effort to notice the caught part of things. And sometimes the slipping out feels more like... it just feels slippery. The mind goes to nothing particularly sticky. It just loses mindfulness and drifts to a quiet space, getting lost in that.

So it may be the quality of where the mind goes when it slips, and some of that is revealed when mindfulness returns. When mindfulness returns, is it calm and easeful? Or is it caught in something?

In my own practice, what I've come to explore in these places where mindfulness slips out is to at least take some time, when I first notice that, to have curiosity about the slipping. Not to try to hold myself present, not to try to hold on to the experience, because that very activity of effort may obscure the subtlety of what's happening in the slipping. And we can see this—it is possible to see what the mind is doing. It can take patience, sometimes seeing a slip over and over again.

This lesson was really brought home to me at one point. I was doing a more directed practice, paying attention to the breath. As I was paying attention, I started seeing there was this slipping away from the breath, slipping out into non-mindfulness for brief moments, and then I would come back and wake up and return to the breath. At some point I recognized that as the mind was letting go of the breath, I could see that. I could see the release from the object. There was a tendency at that point to say, "Oh, come back to the object. Come back to what I'm familiar with." I couldn't see what it was letting go into, but I could feel the letting go.

So instead of trying to hold my attention with the thing I was familiar with, I got curious about what that slip was. And mindfulness could be there with that. The experience in the release, the letting go of the object, was a real broadening and settling—it was like a whole different space, one I was very unfamiliar with. There was a little bit of fear that arose, and then that needed to be seen.

So these times when it feels like mindfulness is gaining momentum yet we see more slipping out—rather than bringing in effort, hover in that space for a time, a little while, and see what can be learned by just receiving. Be willing to let the mindfulness slip out with curiosity, or almost with intention. It feels like intention to me. Maybe like dropping in the request: "Maybe the mind can see where it goes"—but then not trying to do it. That has been a way in my own practice that has extended the reach of mindfulness.

This brings me to the second area I was thinking of: places where an edge of trust often arises when we start to see unfamiliar terrain. Things we're not familiar with, things we've never experienced before, that we don't have words for and can't identify—we may find our mind wanting to figure them out, label them. We may start seeing strange imagery. I've seen sometimes the mind, in a space it doesn't quite understand, puts up an image. I remember one time seeing a field of wheat. "What's that about?" I reported this to Steve Armstrong, and he just said, "This is just the mind trying to understand the experience." It's the mind's way of perceiving an experience you're unfamiliar with.

So sometimes we may see this kind of imagery. You don't have to give meaning to it. The mind in perception just tries to make the best match. For me, looking out at that field of wheat was the best analogy for the state I was experiencing.

There are times with unfamiliar states when we might notice our mind trying to identify. We can just notice that—notice the searching for a label, the wanting to have some clarity, wanting to know, wanting to understand. As our practice gains momentum, as mindfulness and wisdom deepen, wisdom orients towards the deepening of practice, the deepening of seeing, and it will take us to places we don't know and cannot possibly know before we go.

So there's some trust there that we don't have to figure it out. It's an edge of trust—that it's okay if I don't understand this. What does it feel like? What's the experience? And what's the relationship?

Wanting to figure it out. Uncomfortable. Often the experience of unfamiliar experience is really uncomfortable. Notice the uncomfortableness—that's the relationship.

This is the simplicity of the practice: just meeting what's here and recognizing these edges of trust where our minds start to go, "No, I want to understand." If that's what's happening for you, simply notice that relationship, receive this.

Sometimes as mindfulness gains momentum, it does take us to these spaces of unfamiliar experience or more subtle experience. And we may kind of almost subconsciously use that as a signpost: "Oh, this is good practice. This means it's getting better," or something. And I'll just say that, kind of to my surprise, another experience that can happen, another way the deepening of mindfulness can be experienced—the momentum of mindfulness and wisdom—is that things feel really ordinary. Just ordinary. Ordinary perception.

And that can be an edge of trust too. We don't believe it could possibly be right. Surely I should be seeing something more extraordinary.

At one point I was noticing this at a three-month retreat, and I was reporting to Joseph and talking about noticing this ordinariness. At that point it was kind of like, "Wow, this is amazing. It's just ordinary, and it's so clear. I can live life like this." So I was getting a little excited. It's extraordinary that it's ordinary.

I went and reported this to Joseph, and he smiled. And he said, "Yeah, it can feel extraordinary. And then it just feels really ordinary."

To me, that was pointing to the attachment, the sense that the extraordinary is what deepening practice is. And he said, "Yeah, and it can just be really ordinary."

Everything is practice. Everything. Everything.

What's the experience?

CHAPTER 182

Awareness and Wisdom Doing their Jobs

Andrea Fella · 41 min

> In this guided meditation from a long retreat at the Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella offers gentle instruction on resting in receptive awareness rather than actively seeking or figuring out experience. She distinguishes between simple awareness that meets what arises and wisdom that becomes interested in the nature of experience itself—noticing impermanence, unreliability, and not-self rather than focusing on specific objects like sounds or sensations.
>
> Fella emphasizes that we don't need to wait for special states to recognize the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa); every experience, including resistance, confusion, and wanting, reveals this same nature. When awareness and wisdom simply meet these arising conditions without trying to change them, there can be a natural release accompanied by ease and spaciousness. Yet even this pleasant experience is just the next arising to be received.
>
> Addressing practitioners nearing the end of a long retreat, she acknowledges that familiar habits and patterns may arise more strongly as departure approaches. With the momentum of sustained practice, there's greater capacity to feel even strong experiences without being swept away. She encourages both those leaving and those staying to simply check: Is awareness doing its job? This simple returning to receptive presence allows the natural functioning of awareness and wisdom to continue their work.

Simple awareness. Just meeting this experience. Just this experience.

Perhaps there's a sense that you're already aware. Experience already known. Resting and receiving.

What is the truth of this moment? What is true right now? Not true in terms of thoughts and ideas, but the truth of the actual experience. Sensations arising and being known. Feelings, thoughts, perceptions arising and being known. What is obvious? Receiving. Awareness receiving. Awareness doing its job.

At times, wisdom taking the lead. Wisdom interested in noticing experience. Sometimes when wisdom is taking the lead, it's not as interested in the objects themselves—in the sights, the sounds, the smells, the sensations, the feelings, the thoughts—but more interested in the nature of the experience. Although sometimes that may be what is being received: the changing nature, the unreliable nature of experience. Slippery, nowhere to land. Or maybe the conditioned nature of experience.

Awareness and wisdom do this receiving. We don't have to look for anything, figure anything out. Just letting awareness and wisdom do their jobs. At times this is possible. And our conditioning, our habits of mind arise at times and resist what is being seen, what is being received. That too is nature. That too can simply be received. Resistance being known. Confusion being known. Wanting being known. Just another arising, also conditioned, impermanent, not-self.

We don't have to wait for some special experience or special state of mind to see the nature of experience. Every experience reveals this. Every experience has this nature: impermanent, unreliable, not-self. Whatever arises has the nature to pass away. Just meeting what is arising.

If we're noticing resistance or wanting, in the meeting of that, sometimes awareness and wisdom just meeting that, they can naturally release without our inclining or trying to do anything with them. A natural release. And at times of that releasing, there can be the experience of ease that comes with that release—of calm, of spaciousness. And that's just the next experience that awareness and wisdom receive.

Sometimes we can rest in a space of release and ease, and then perhaps a subtler kind of disturbance is revealed. Not a mistake. That too can be recognized. Awareness and wisdom doing their job.

After all these weeks of practice, there's quite a bit of momentum of awareness and wisdom. For those of you who'll be leaving in a few days, it's quite likely there are familiar habits or patterns arising. And those can be seen much more clearly with the momentum that's available. So check. If something arises that feels strong, if it feels like it's sweeping you away, notice if you can feel the sweeping. Likely there'll be much more capacity for that.

For those of you who are staying, you may feel some of the ripples of the energy of the departures. And that too, just an arising, a rising construction that can be known. Check the awareness. Awareness doing its job. So simple.

I notice not many of you have been taking the opportunity. And that's okay. It is a really valuable opportunity—with the level of momentum of practice that's here, to recognize the possibility of being aware with this very difficult object, with the speaking. Just a reminder that it's available, and it is optional.

CHAPTER 183

Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of mindfulness through close examination of a single sentence from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). Rather than surveying the entire discourse, she unpacks the rich meaning contained in the Buddha's description: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world."
>
> Fella examines each key term—abides (viharati), observing, ardent (ātāpī), fully aware (sampajañña), and mindful (sati)—revealing how they point to a practice of relaxed yet alert receptivity. She distinguishes wise mindfulness from our ordinary capacity for self-awareness, noting that mindfulness itself is neutral and must be shaped by the other factors of the Eightfold Path. The word "abides" evokes a sense of being at home and dwelling in experience, while "ardent" points to wholehearted curiosity rather than forceful striving.
> Particularly valuable is her discussion of receptive awareness as foundational to all meditation practices. Using the analogy of a radio receiver, she explains how we can attune to specific aspects of experience—like the breath—while maintaining a receptive rather than grasping quality of attention. She emphasizes that the effort required in each moment is actually quite light; difficulty arises when we project forward to sustaining attention for an entire sitting. The phrase "free from desires and discontent" is reframed as an active process of "freeing from"—describing what naturally unfolds through steady, curious practice.

Tonight I'd like to talk about mindfulness, exploring it from the texts, because as Dawn mentioned last night with her real resonance with the texts, this is also the case for me. I've often found that even a sentence—and that's what we're going to look at today; we're not even going to look at a whole sutta, we're going to look at a sentence—can be deeply illuminating. We'll look at all those different words in that sentence and how they resonate, how they affect us, and what they mean about what mindfulness is, what our practice is.

I've found that this kind of exploration, really unpacking or exploring the texts in this way, has been very meaningful for me. It feels supportive in terms of making the connection between what the Buddha taught and what we do in our practice.

The main meditation instructions, or some of the main meditation instructions in the Buddha's teachings, are found in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta—the teachings on the four foundations, sometimes called the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. I like Bhikkhu Anālayo's translation: The Four Establishments of Mindfulness. This is a sutta that really collects many of the instructions about how to practice, gathered around four basic areas, the four establishments. Those four areas are the body, feelings, mind states, and dhammas.

The foundation of the body contains a number of instructions that explore connecting with the physical body through breathing, through daily activities, through our postures, through contemplating the elemental nature of our bodies, through contemplating the parts of the body and the nature of our body to decay.

The foundation on feelings is an exploration around what we could call the felt sense aspect, the feeling aspect of experience. In the Buddhist understanding of feeling, this means experience as pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. In all of our sense bases, in all of our senses, the understanding is that experience can have one of these flavors: pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This is a whole foundation, and we will talk about it. I'm not going to talk about it tonight, but we will be talking about all of these over the course of these weeks.

The third foundation is looking at the qualities of our mind—whether there's greed, aversion, or delusion in the mind, or the absence of greed, aversion, or delusion in the mind; whether the mind is concentrated or not. It's more the state of the mind that it's pointing to. Know these things. All of these foundations are pointing to ways to recognize what's happening in our experience. These things are always happening in our experience. It's more of a pointing: this is a useful way to explore knowing what's happening in our experience through these foundations.

The fourth foundation is a little more complex. The first three are kind of simple in a way. We recognize body experience, the feeling tone experience, what the quality of our mind is. The fourth foundation is in a way almost about investigation of our experience through some of the frameworks of the Buddhist teachings. We're encouraged to understand our experience through the framework of the hindrances: Are the hindrances present or absent? Are the enlightenment factors present or absent? How do we recognize the sense bases? Do we understand our experience in terms of the aggregates? And understanding our experience in terms of the Four Noble Truths.

This is all direct experience, not thinking about it. All of these instructions are connecting to what is the actual direct experience.

So this is the broad picture of what satipaṭṭhāna is: the establishment of mindfulness with these different areas of experience, different establishments, different foundations.

At the very beginning of that sutta, the Buddha offers a phrase, describes what satipaṭṭhāna is in just a few words. He offers a sentence that describes what mindfulness of each foundation is. This is the sentence that we're going to look at today.

We'll look at some of the words in this sentence. It starts with a rhetorical question: How does one practice the foundations of mindfulness? "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world."

And then it's repeated for each foundation. "One abides observing feelings as feelings, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desire and discontent for the world. One abides observing mind states as mind states, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desire and discontent for the world. One abides observing dhammas as dhammas"—phenomena as phenomena, another translation for dhamma—"one abides observing phenomena as phenomena, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world."

There are a number of words in that sentence, and they're all pointing to what we might call supports for our mindfulness practice. Mindfulness is in there, but there are many other words pointing to how to be present and what to be present with.

Since we are all more familiar with mindfulness, I'll start there. The more I practice, the more it seems to me that I'm not sure I can really say what mindfulness is. There are some approximations we can make, but it's kind of mysterious sometimes. We have some general words, some basic definitions: being present, being aware, witnessing, observing, connected with, being with experience, knowing what's happening while it's happening. That might be a good working definition—knowing what's happening while it's happening.

The mindfulness of our practice, the mindfulness of what the Buddha describes as wise mindfulness or right mindfulness, is related to a very ordinary capacity of our minds: the capacity to be self-reflective, to know that we are aware, to know what's happening for us in the present moment. This aspect of our minds is human, natural, familiar—and yet we often use that capacity in the service of greed or aversion. We use that capacity to know what's happening in the present moment in order to get what we want, to get rid of what we don't want, to shape our environment so that it feels pleasant. So that capacity in and of itself—to know what's happening in the present moment—isn't quite what the Buddha meant by wise mindfulness.

In fact, in the suttas, the quality of mindfulness is understood to be a neutral quality that can be shaped towards either right mindfulness or wrong mindfulness. Right mindfulness is shaped by wise view, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort—which then proceeds to wise mindfulness. And wrong mindfulness is shaped by wrong view, wrong intention, wrong speech, wrong action, wrong livelihood, wrong effort. At least that's the definition in the suttas of wrong mindfulness.

The suttas point to how mindfulness itself can be shaped. As I said a few moments ago, knowing what's happening for us in the present moment—that quality of mind can be harnessed in the direction of being curious about present moment experience as present moment experience. That might be another good working definition of something closer to wise mindfulness: knowing an experience in the present moment as an experience in the present moment, and being curious about it as an experience in the present moment.

It sounds like almost nothing, but that's not our usual perspective. Normally, when we become aware of something in the present moment, we're interested in acting on it in the service of getting what we want, getting rid of what we don't want. We're not interested in asking, "What does this feel like? What is this experience like?" We want to get rid of unpleasant things. We want to hold on to pleasant things. We're not interested—or often not quite interested—in exploring what that experience is actually like. That's part of what we're nourishing here: that curiosity. What is this experience?

We get curious about what it feels like right now. How is it arising in this moment? If what's arising is reactivity, rather than acting on it to try to get rid of it, we ask: What does this experience feel like? That begins to help the mind understand suffering. We understand that those qualities of mind—reactive qualities like greed, aversion, delusion, anger, frustration, confusion, hatred—when we recognize them in the present moment, we understand them as suffering.

This is actually looking at the First Noble Truth. We're encouraged to understand suffering in the First Noble Truth—to understand this through experience. What is this experience of reactivity? How does it affect the body?

How does it affect the mind? And perhaps learning something about how it comes to be, and how it goes away when it goes away—as opposed to asking, "How can I get rid of this? How can I fix this? How can I change this?"

Paradoxically, the very exploration of what this experience is as a human experience tends to change it.

This quality of mindfulness—the Buddha understood this everyday ordinary capacity of mind to be aware in the present moment, to know what's happening in the present moment—when shaped, when cultivated from a particular perspective, is very freeing. And you all know this, or you wouldn't have signed up for a six-week retreat or a three-month retreat. How freeing this is. You've had a taste of that—that sense of the freedom that can be there with this curiosity. What is this experience in the present moment?

And so this sentence in the Satipatthana Sutta I understand as a kind of pointing of the perspective—the perspective of how to cultivate mindfulness. How do we cultivate this quality, shape this ordinary quality of mind so that it leads to freedom?

We'll explore this sentence from the perspective of the body: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world."

I love this first word: abides. Even as I say it to myself, I feel a kind of relaxation. Abide. And it's actually a very good translation of the Pali, because the Pali word viharati means something like abode, home, dwelling place. The Brahmaviharas are the divine abodes—this is the same root word, viharati, abide.

And so it evokes a quality of being at home. Abiding. Resting. Receptive. Contentment perhaps. A dwelling. Maybe a sense of intimacy, because being at home there can be a feeling of comfort, of intimacy. I feel it also points a little bit to this receptive quality that we've been emphasizing with mindfulness. When we're at home, relaxed, we can be available. We don't have to be on guard. We can just be receptive. We can be available.

So: abide. How does that word feel for you? If I just say right now, just abide, just abide. For me it feels like rest, just a resting, a relaxation.

This relaxation—I think Devin brought it up, Nakowai brought it up, Dawn probably brought it up, we've all brought it up—this is abiding. This is that beginning to be able to land and to dwell in our experiences, finding a home in our experience. Relaxation supports this.

We can explore, and I find often at the beginning of a retreat, spending some time consciously relaxing is really helpful. Scanning through the body, doing a little bit of bodily relaxation—Devon did that in the guided meditation a little bit. Just scan through the body and relax the body. And as you relax the body, it's a condition that supports the mind to relax. Especially when you relax the face. Right now, just explore if you can soften the face. See what happens in the quality of your mind as you relax your face.

Relaxation is not counter to attention. We might think it is, but we can be relaxed and attentive. This quality of relaxed attentiveness—the relaxation and attention, the receptivity of mindfulness—can have that quality of relaxed attention.

If right now you don't try to look at anything, don't try to find any particular experience, just relax—what's obvious?

Is there something that's being received already? You don't have to look for anything. There's something here in the experience. We don't have to look for anything.

So if you had a sense of that—of just relaxing and just receiving whatever's here—you could play with it. Just receive a breath. There's a breath happening, so can you receive a breath?

This quality of relaxed, receptive attention is supportive for any form of meditation practice. It's useful for concentration practice. It's useful for insight practice. It's useful for mettā practice. It's useful for open awareness practice. This understanding, or stepping into that relaxed, receptive awareness of being mindful—it's really the foundation.

I spent a lot of time striving and pushing and looking, and it created a mind that was pretty tight. Then I kind of had to let go and back off and let the mind relax for a while. On one particular retreat, after really holding on to that breath—"I am going to stay with this breath"—and getting so tight, I spent a day or so just relaxing. And then after that: wow, that breath is really easy. I didn't have to work for that one. And that next breath. And then the mind would grab onto it.

So I began to appreciate that cultivating that receptivity, that relaxation, was kind of primary. The practice unfolded more skillfully when that was the ground out of which the practice was unfolding—as opposed to "I'm going to do this, I'm going to hold on to it, I'm going to figure this out."

As I began to see this pattern around working with the breath and then relaxing and settling back, I noticed that at the beginning when I'd come back to the breath, it was quite easy and restful. Then as soon as I saw the mind get tight around it, I would let go: "Okay, let's relax." So instead of taking three days of getting tight and a couple days of relaxing, then three days of getting tight and a couple days of relaxing, it would be like a few breaths. A breath of getting tight, a breath of relaxing, then try again. It was much more just playing with that edge—a couple of breaths and then noticing how the mind began to get tight, and then, "Okay, relax, step back." The relaxation became more primary.

"One abides observing." This is a simple word—noticing what's here. The two words together, "abides observing," to me kind of encourage both the relaxation, the receptivity, and the meeting of experience. So there's something that we're observing.

And to me, observing here is not so much thinking about or looking at—it's feeling. Feeling into. What does it mean to experience the present moment? And what we are experiencing in this sentence is the body. What does it mean to observe the body, to know the experience, the direct present-moment experience of the body? To abide with relaxation, observing, being with the body.

The sentence here is interesting: "One abides observing the body as a body." This repetition points to some of the wisdom that is being carried into how we practice mindfulness. This is: know experience as experience. Know the experience in the present moment as experience in the present moment. Know the body as a body. Know the breath as a breath. Know vibratory energy in the body as vibratory energy in the body. Know pressure as pressure. Simple, connecting, direct. Abide observing. The body as a body.

Let's play with it now with the breath. Abide. Relax. Connecting with, meeting the breath as a breath. Simple. Just a breath. What is the experience of the breath—as opposed to our ideas about the breath?

What is the experience of body as opposed to our ideas about the body? What's the direct, felt experience of the breath?

Sometimes we feel it in the nostrils, in the mouth, in the throat. Sometimes in the chest. Sometimes there's a broader sense of the whole body. This is direct experience. The breath is a breath. The body is a body.

This approach also encourages, I think, a non-judgmental and non-interfering awareness of experience. The body is a body. This is a human body. It's impersonal. It's just a body doing its thing. This is a way to point toward exploring the experience of breath and body as human experience, rather than thinking about it as my breath or my body. It's a human body. A human body that does its thing.

There's a phrase later in the Satipatthana Sutta, throughout the foundation of the body, where after each instruction on how to practice with a particular area—like the breath—it offers a few other little pointers. And one of them is: one recognizes there is a body.

Sometimes it can be that simple. Joseph points to this instruction a lot. There is a body. Even saying that—as I say it right now—it just creates for me a sense of the whole body experience. It's very direct. One understands there is a body.

Sometimes understanding the body as a body has more specificity. We feel into sensations of the breath, or the sensations as we're walking, our feet on the ground. There's more of a sense of specific sensations. But sometimes it's more: there is a body. There's a broad range of ways to meet our experience. It doesn't always have to be narrow and focused on some detail. Sometimes it can simply be: there is a body. And what is the experience?

One abides observing the body as a body. Another translation for that: one abides observing the body in and of itself. Again, a pointing to the wisdom side of what we are actually interested in exploring here.

What is the Buddha, in giving these instructions, saying? He's saying these instructions are onward leading. Noticing your experience in this way is useful. Try it. Come and see. Ehi passiko—the Dharma is ehi passiko. Come and see. Try it for yourself.

It's not something that we can necessarily understand just from hearing it. The first time I heard an instruction like this, I thought, "Well, what good is that going to do?" Somebody sent me a book that talked about mindfulness meditation. I was experiencing a lot of anger at the time. And what I got out of this book was: try noticing that you're angry. Try noticing what anger feels like. And I thought, "What good is that going to do?"

So we may have to take it on faith at first. The Buddha says this is a useful way to explore. Come and see. Try it for yourself. You will find out for yourself that it is useful to explore experience—noticing the body as a body, as a human body, just as experience.

I spoke about receptivity, that quality of abiding and observing, of receiving experience. I want to talk just briefly about how sometimes we might think of receptivity as something we only practice in open awareness—that we settle back and don't choose an object.

and we just receive what's arising. That's a way sometimes people think about what receptive awareness means. But mindfulness itself, I think, is receptive—it just depends on where the attention is, what it's receiving.

If we think about a radio, a radio is a receiver. If you have a tuner on the receiver and all of the tunings are gone, it's just going to receive all the frequencies at once. That would be kind of like receptive awareness—a broad receptive awareness, receiving many frequencies and just noticing lots of different things. But with a tuner on a radio, you can pick a channel and tune to a particular frequency and listen to a particular channel, hearing that channel clearly.

So we can tune the radio, and then the radio doesn't go out into the air and grab those airwaves. It's not reaching out for that frequency—it's receiving. It's just attunement to a particular frequency or channel. We can think about the receptivity around our breath meditation, for instance, as a kind of attunement to the breath. We just attune to the breath, but then we receive. We receive that channel. We receive that aspect of experience. And we don't even have to think of it as narrowing. It can be that we're just saying, okay, let's see what's in that channel. There may still be stuff going on around it, but we're just letting this be the preference of what we're receiving. Just receiving.

Try this right now. What is it like for you if you're just, again, abiding? That relaxation. And there's a breath. Just receiving the breath, however it's showing up. You don't have to dive in and find any particular detail about the breath. Just receive it as it is. An in-breath, an out-breath, as it is. And then another one, as it is. There can be sound going on around, but you can still know. Just receive the breath as it is.

In my experience, this simple receptivity—attuning to a particular channel like that—the attunement begins, just over time, as you attune to that particular aspect of experience, the continuity of mindfulness there begins to reveal more detail. We don't have to try to dig in and see that detail; it becomes available. Not by forcing or holding or pushing, but just through steady, gentle perseverance. Receiving.

One abides observing the body as a body. Ardent. This word has some connotations that might, in our language, feel a little hard. But ardency has a connection to heartfelt. The word itself is even related to heart. The Pali word is ātāpī. It's connected with this sense of wholehearted, gentle perseverance, heartfelt interest, curiosity. These qualities are brought in with ardency.

For me, the biggest flavor around ardency is curiosity. What is this experience? What is this human body? How does it do this stuff? And I can see I'm not in charge of it. What is this? It's got that quality of heartfelt interest. It's rapt, it's connected, it brings in those heart qualities. The word ardent also points to the steadiness, the gentle perseverance that Don was speaking about last night—the steadiness and continuity that both Don and Nakowai mentioned. That we keep going. There's that sense of wholehearted commitment.

And abide. These two—abide ardent—they're kind of like relaxation and alertness. I think ardency also brings in that quality of alertness. In my experience, relaxation and alertness are not on a continuum. You might think that relaxation is over here and alertness is over here.

But the mind that can be extremely relaxed can also be very alert. Now, that doesn't always happen. Sometimes when we're really relaxed, we fall asleep. But it's possible—the relaxed mind can be quite naturally very alert. So we shouldn't think about them as necessarily separate ends of the spectrum. We can play with this, the quality of relaxation and engagement in that relaxation. "Abide observing"—that also kind of brings those two together. Abide, observing, ardent.

In terms of continuity—and I'm sure we'll speak more about continuity over the coming days—it's really helpful, and Dawn was speaking of this too, this kind of gentle persistence, a light touch of effort, a light touch of application of energy. It actually doesn't take much to be connecting with something in the present moment for a moment, for a split second.

Right now, can you notice a breath? What about the sensations of your hands? The contact of your hips against where you're sitting? When I name each of those areas, it probably wasn't hard. It was almost like it was just there. Sometimes, at least if you're listening, it probably just popped in. Oh yeah, there are the hands. There's a breath. That's all the level of effort you need in a moment. Just a light touch of effort to connect—this breath, this half a breath, and then this half a breath, and then this half a breath.

Where we get caught, I think, is when we think, "I have to do this for forty-five minutes." But the level of effort in a moment? It's very light. It's not actually possible to pick up the amount of effort we think we need. I've done this, you know, sitting down at the beginning of a sitting: "Okay, I am going to be aware for this whole forty-five minutes. I'm going to bring up this energy and I'm going to do it." You can't do that. We'll exhaust ourselves very quickly trying to do that, and then the mind will wander, or we'll just get really tied in knots.

Just the light touch. Just enough for this moment. Connect. Connect again. Connect again. And notice when the mind says, "Forty-five minutes?" Just this moment. Just this moment. And then the mind will wander, of course. And then it'll come back and you just start again. Just starting again. That light touch of effort, over and over again.

One abides observing the breath as breath, ardent, connected, wholeheartedly connecting, fully aware.

The next word, "fully aware," is sampajañña. Some of you may be familiar with this one, sometimes translated as "clear comprehension." Many people are familiar with this phrase from the first foundation of mindfulness—the instruction on clear comprehension is kind of about daily activities, being aware of all activities in the day. Knowing when you're reaching, arms bending and extending, going and coming, using the toilet—it's in there—and eating, and being silent, and talking. All of these daily activities are pointed to, and the instructions there say something like, "One acts in full awareness while going and returning. One acts in full awareness, or one clearly comprehends, while going and returning. One clearly comprehends while reaching and extending the arm."

So the activities themselves aren't necessarily what clear comprehension is. But that seems to be mostly what people associate with that teaching of clear comprehension—the continuity and the practice with, you know, the continuing throughout the day. And that may be partly what's pointed to here: keep practicing, continue.

But there's another place in the suttas where this term "clear comprehension" is actually defined. The definition of what it means for somebody to clearly comprehend something is that experience—feelings, thoughts, perceptions, body sensations, experience—is understood as it arises, remains present, and passes away.

So if we put that phrase into that section of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, it would sound something like: "While bending and extending one's arm, one understands feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, remain present, and pass away."

That's the other piece of the definition of clear comprehension: one understands feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, remain present, and pass away while being aware. This is bringing the mindfulness to a whole new level, actually. It's pointing to a broader sense of what's happening in experience. One observes the body as a body, fully aware—the feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away.

In my experience, that level of awareness comes over time through the gentle persistence of being curious about what is here. Slowly, over time, the mind begins to see the feelings, thoughts, and perceptions that are arising in relationship to what's happening in the body. This is also pointing to impermanence—the understanding of impermanence and the importance of understanding impermanence as we are exploring our experience. And again, this isn't something that we try to do. It's more of an understanding, more of an insight.

So this aspect of clear comprehension and full awareness, to me, is beginning to point to the insight nature of this practice—where it's heading. This will get unpacked over the course of many talks, what we're exploring over these weeks, what this aspect of this sentence means. But I think we can just rest with: what does it mean? What's the feeling of "fully aware" to us? Sometimes Joseph uses the phrase, "Well, are you just more or less aware, or are you fully aware?" And so it kind of brightens the mind a little bit to explore the possibility of full awareness. Full awareness. It also brings to me a sense of full body, full immersion—an immersion kind of feeling.

The last part of this phrase: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world." Now this phrase, again, in a way it's pointing to where we're headed. We're probably not going to be free from desires and discontent for the world anytime soon. We may get little respites from being free from desire and discontent for the world. But often at the beginning of retreat, we sit down, we notice the breath for a few moments, and then we think about what we want to go do next, or what's for lunch, and there's desire there. So we are going to be working with desires and discontent.

It's interesting to me that this phrase is part of the definition of mindfulness. To me, it kind of points to where we're headed ultimately. But there's also something that Bhikkhu Anālayo pointed out that I really like—his take on this. He said that the Pali term for "free from" can be understood in the active verb tense, so happening simultaneously to this process of mindfulness. So he translates this as "freeing from." We could put a little bit of "freeing oneself from" in there: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world."

The process of freeing is what happens as we do this practice. I love that perspective because that's my experience. I don't free myself—the freeing happens. Freeing from desire and discontent from the world.

Anālayo also says we could understand it as "setting aside." And this sometimes can happen. Sometimes we can consciously say, "Yeah, I'm not going to go there right now. I can just set lunch aside for now and come back to the breath." So we can do that sometimes, and that's a skillful practice. That's skillful. But sometimes those thoughts are very strong, and the process of mindfulness there is not to beat ourselves up, like, "I'm not free from desire and discontent."

It's to notice what's arising. Desire is arising right now. Discontent is arising right now. What is the human experience of desire? What is the human experience of discontent? That's where the process continues.

It's not a mistake when we experience desire and discontent in our practice. And so we explore allowing when they arise. We abide observing. It shifts in a way to another aspect of mindfulness. If we're noticing the body, abiding observing the body as a body, and desire and discontent arise, then we perhaps begin exploring the mind state. We begin noticing, oh, this is what the mind state of desire is like. And this is how it affects the body.

So can we allow whatever arises? There are times, as I said, when we can set them aside. But there are times when they're so strong that we cannot. And so we observe them. We get curious about that as human experience. Understanding desire in and of itself. Discontent in and of itself. And this is the process of freeing from. This is how it works.

One abides observing the body as a body. Feelings as feelings. Mind states as mind states. Phenomena as phenomena—ardent, fully aware and mindful, freeing from desire and discontent for the world.

May it be so for all of us.

CHAPTER 184

Untangle the Tangle

Andrea Fella · 54 min

In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella investigates the nature of dukkha from multiple angles—as obvious suffering, as the unreliable nature of all conditioned experience, and as the stress created when we cling to what is impermanent. Drawing on the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) of aniccā, dukkha, and anattā, she explains how suffering isn't caused by the world failing to meet our wishes, but by our relationship to experience through greed, aversion, and delusion.

Fella introduces a compelling framework: our suffering emerges from a "tangle" between life's core truths (impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable) and our core wishes for well-being (the brahmavihāra aspirations to be happy, healthy, safe, and at ease). When these threads collide, fear and confusion arise because our minds don't understand how they can coexist. Rather than cutting out this tangle with a scalpel, she suggests we honor it through mindfulness—placing it in a "lubricated warm bath" where wisdom naturally untangles the knot.

Through a personal story of fear following the September 2001 attacks, Fella illustrates how opening to suffering can reveal the mettā wishes hidden within reactive states. She emphasizes that wisdom doesn't ask us to abandon our wishes for well-being, but to embrace them while releasing our craving for particular outcomes. The talk concludes with the Buddha's response from the suttas: those established in virtue and wisdom, developing mind and heart, can untangle the tangle as lust, hatred, and ignorance fade away.

So much of our practice and our journey looking at our minds and beginning to understand what's going on in there is around recognizing and understanding dukkha.

Dukkha is the Pali term usually translated as suffering, but the English word suffering doesn't really capture the depth and breadth of dukkha. Dukkha can be quite obvious, and often that's where we really start to know it—in the obvious realms of our minds fighting with themselves or fighting with the world. And yet dukkha is really quite deep, extending to the very subtle level where we simply don't like things the way they are.

There's another translation of the word dukkha, another framing or perspective. Sometimes in the texts dukkha refers to what we would call suffering, and sometimes it refers to the nature of experience itself. There are phrases in the suttas that say all conditioned experiences, all conditioned phenomena, are impermanent; all conditioned phenomena are dukkha.

It's not true that all of our conditioned phenomena are felt as suffering. Joy isn't experienced as suffering. And yet all of what arises in our body-mind is impermanent. Because it's impermanent, it's not a reliable place to land for lasting happiness. This is another meaning of the word dukkha—that there's no experience arising in our mind and body that is a reliable place where we can say, "Yep, that's going to do it for me. I can hold on to that or be there forever," because it will pass. So this is another meaning of the word: unreliable.

I'm sure many of you have heard of what are often called the three characteristics of experience: impermanent, unreliable, not-self—anicca, dukkha, anatta. This framing of the nature of experience as anicca, dukkha, anatta points to the unreliable nature of experience. We can't count on anything to last, so it's unreliable. And everything is conditioned, not me, not who I am, uncontrollable in a way—we don't have ultimate control over what is happening in experience.

These three are the nature of everything that arises in our experience. This is one of the key wisdom teachings of the Buddha: all conditioned experience is impermanent, all conditioned experience is unreliable, all experience is not-self. I won't go into the distinction there right now; that's not where the talk is headed. We'll leave that for another day, another talk.

This is understood to be some core wisdom of the Buddha—this understanding that what arises has the nature to pass away. Clinging to what arises, which will pass away, creates suffering. There's stress. There's an image I heard a long time ago, and I believe the teacher said it came from some yogi. So who knows where this image came from? But it's very apt.

The sense of suffering when we're clinging to something impermanent, something going to pass, is like rope burn. When a rope is slipping through your hand, if you're trying to hold on to it, it's going to burn. That's what clinging does. When we're trying to hold on to something that is slipping through, it burns—it's suffering.

So the Buddha's teachings on dukkha come from both the perspective of the unreliable nature and the perspective of that rope burn. What is that clinging? What is the mechanism at work in our minds by which we end up trying to cling?

So much of our journey is around this exploration. We meet dukkha as we sit and walk and look at our hearts and minds. This is really right in line with what the Buddha taught. He pointed to, in the Four Noble Truths, that there is dukkha—both the unreliability of experience and this experience of struggle, stress, suffering, clinging. And he said of this noble truth: dukkha should be understood.

And he didn't mean think about it to figure it out. He meant really investigate. Know the experience of dukkha. Know what is happening there.

So this is where we've been when pointing to this investigation of experience. I would say Mia's talk last night was wholly about this topic of understanding dukkha and those hindrances—understanding them, opening to them, familiarizing ourselves with the experience of them. That's the understanding that the Buddha was pointing to. Not that we could think it through.

From an ordinary perspective, we often think of suffering as something that happens to us. Something that's out there, happening to us, and we're just being blown around like leaves in the wind. We think stuff out there is what's making us suffer. In Mia's talk, she really pointed to this. Especially with greed and aversion, we think that the problem is with what we're averse to, or with what we want and not having it—that's the problem. But the Buddha's pointing to something different: notice the experience of the wanting, of the aversion. That's where the dukkha is. It's not the not having that's really the dukkha; it's the aversion to not having. It's the aversion to being in association with something that we don't want, or not having something that we want.

So one way to look at dukkha—in terms of that experience we call suffering or stress or unsatisfactoriness, that sense of things not feeling right—is that this kind of dukkha is not about the world not meeting our wishes. It is really about our relationship to that. The states of mind experienced as suffering are rooted in greed, in aversion, in delusion. These are the states of mind we've been talking about, like feeling contracted. When we feel them, we know the suffering of them. But so often we're so focused on the object—like with greed, as Mia described last night—we're so focused on the thing we want that we miss the suffering of the wanting. The idea, the fantasy of getting that thing takes prominence in our mind. We experience the pleasantness of the fantasy while missing entirely that there's a feeling of lack, a feeling of suffering around the wanting itself.

Our struggle, our stress, is not inherent in what's happening in the world—whether we get something or don't get something we want, or are associated with something we don't want. The suffering isn't really about that. It's really about our relationship to it.

And this is actually good news. Because if it were because of the world that we suffer, it would not be possible to be free from suffering. But because those qualities of mind—the aversion, the greed—are really where the suffering is experienced, freedom becomes possible. You can see this even in small moments when you notice greed fall away. When we feel that wanting fall away, as Mia pointed to last night, we feel the release of that. We feel that we didn't need to get what we want to feel okay, to feel content. When we experience that, when we touch into that, when we see the aversion fall away or the greed fall away and the world hasn't changed—it's our minds that have changed—this is huge for our understanding of what the Buddha was talking about.

It's possible to change our minds. It's possible to change our minds.

Now, I will say there are situations in the world, situations of injustice, of people behaving unethically, that we may feel like the only rational response is to be angry about. But we can explore, and can actually experience, what it might mean to essentially align ourselves with: well, this is what's happening. Injustice is happening in the world. People behaving unethically in the world. This is happening. And recognizing that without hatred—it is possible. It's challenging, but it's possible. We feel a different relationship with the world, one of compassion, one of care, wanting to alleviate suffering as opposed to annihilating those who are perpetuating what we don't like. Or what is objectively unjust, treating other beings cruelly. And yet there is the possibility of responding from a heart that is not constricted. It is possible.

There's a beautiful quote that I love around this topic. Because essentially what this is about is aligning with, recognizing: this is the truth. This is what's happening in the world. In that recognition, not fighting it, but also not saying, "Yes, things as they are"—that's not what equanimity really is.

Here's the quote: "To accept means to receive what is offered. Circumstances of life give rise to conditions, and our acceptance of these conditions is just the acceptance of things as they are. What is not meant by the idea of acceptance is any agreement or disagreement with the way things are. Acceptance is about basing ourselves in reality, not about making judgments of liking or disliking or of agreeing and disagreeing."

To accept the situation is to be grounded in the actual state of things without getting lost in ideals or fantasies of how we would like it to be. We then have a good basis from which to see what action may be called for. Acceptance does not imply inertia. On the contrary, to be grounded in reality gives rise to a true response—a response from the heart, a response from compassion, rather than a response from hatred, from greed, from aversion.

When our mind is caught in aversion, it will tell us there's no other rational response to this situation. It cannot understand. The mind that is averse can't understand that there might be another way to meet the situation. And so it takes a little bit of a leap of trust, of faith, to explore that possibility—recognizing, okay, there's this situation and there's injustice and there's aversion to it. Just even that, recognizing there's aversion to it rather than blindly following the aversion, will be more skillful.

I would sometimes, in a situation like this, recognize, "Yep, I don't like this," and then kind of broaden, opening to whether I can find an attitude of compassion—connecting to the suffering of the situation to act rather than connecting to my anger about the situation.

In our minds here on retreat, suffering arises and over and over again we see the habits and patterns unfold. We see it many times. For myself, self-hatred was a big thing—anger at the world and hatred of myself, a lot of that arising. And I could see it over and over again. I could see the suffering of it. I could feel the suffering of it. There were times when it would be like, "This feels really painful. I would let go of this if I knew how to let go of it." Sometimes our minds are caught, and sometimes it would release—and then three minutes later it would come back. There were times when I would see something released like that, anger released or self-hatred released, and think, "Oh, phew, okay, done with that." No. Not quite.

We see how much suffering these patterns create, and it might make us wonder: why on earth do our minds do this? Even after we've seen it, it comes back again and again. Why do our minds do this?

I've thought about this a lot, and I'd like to offer a perspective on why our minds do this. I think as human beings, our human system wants to move in the direction of well-being, wants to have ease and peace, wants to be happy and healthy and safe. And yet there's something in our human minds, in our human system—we are fundamentally confused about what well-being actually is.

All living organisms have this kind of movement towards the pleasant, towards nourishment, towards safety, and away from noxious environments. Even a single-celled organism will do that. This movement towards the pleasant, away from the unpleasant, is natural. And I think at some level it's based in this movement towards well-being—essentially the wish of metta, wishing to be happy, healthy, safe, at ease. This is deep. I call these core wishes. At a very deep level, this is what our system actually wants.

But our minds are pretty complex things, and it seems like at times our moving towards what we think of as well-being is taking the shortest route towards getting something pleasant, without recognizing the suffering in the wanting itself. We move towards that—"get that thing, get that thing." Even if we know at some level that getting those things is impermanent, even if we know at a reflective or experiential level that, yeah, this happiness will be here for a while, we think that well-being would consist of stringing moments of happiness together—getting what I want, getting rid of what I don't want, creating and constructing my environment to be the way I want it to be. If I can just keep doing that over and over again, that's as good as it gets.

This is our orientation towards happiness and well-being before we meet the Dharma. We think that happiness would be arranging our environment to get what we want. And yet, seeing the way things actually are, coming back to the nature of experience—experience is impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable, not self. I can't be in ultimate control of orienting and arranging the world. That project of stringing together moments of happiness is doomed to fail. And we start to see that. Things are impermanent. Things are unreliable.

Things pass. What we love, we lose. Sometimes we have to be in proximity with things that are challenging and unpleasant. It's just the nature of life.

So it's not a mistake when we're in association with things that we don't like, or when things that we love, we lose. It's not a mistake. It's the nature of life. And so a lot of our suffering, I think, results from fighting with this nature—resisting the impermanent nature, wanting to hold on to things that we want. That rope burn. We get that rope burn. Losing things that we love is not a mistake. It's not. And yet we suffer around it. We resist the truth, we resist the nature of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable experience.

So that's one side of the suffering—that we're resisting the truth. And what the quote pointed to really was taking in what reality is. This is the way things are.

At the same time, some of our suffering also feels like it's connected to these deep wishes for well-being—the deep wishes to be happy, safe, healthy, and at ease. And these collide with the nature of experience being impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. It's like our minds don't understand how these coexist.

I think of these as the nature of experience—impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable—being kind of the core truths of life. And the deep wishes for our well-being, those metta wishes essentially, are basically the core wishes of us as human beings. The suffering that we experience often comes when these two get tangled up.

I can think of these as threads—the threads of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable, and the threads of wanting to be healthy, happy, and safe. These come together, and our minds don't understand how they can coexist. I want to be safe, and it's unreliable. There's vulnerability. I'm not safe. And so the reactivity is born here. We get tangled. There's a tangle between these different threads of our experience. The tangle of these core truths and these core wishes.

This image of the tangle is in the suttas: "A tangle within, a tangle without." I think we can relate to that—the tangle inside. It sometimes does feel like a tangle. How do I navigate this? A tangle within, a tangle without. And the world seems tangled. The world seems a confused mess. "A tangle within, a tangle without. This generation is entangled in a tangle. I ask you this, O Gotama, who can untangle the tangle?"

So that's a piece of the exploration. I want to explore the tangle a little bit and understand what's going on there.

There's reactivity, there can be reactivity born around the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience. It just doesn't seem right sometimes, right? The way things are, that loss happens. There's just this kind of "no" that comes up inside. No, it shouldn't be like this. And so there's a resistance to that side of the truth.

We often do resist that. And then, you know, on the side of the wishes—that we want to be happy and healthy and safe—there's the sense that these two don't jive. It's kind of like, well, either the truths can't be right, or our minds would say it's either/or. Either things are impermanent and unreliable, or I should be able to be happy, healthy, and safe. But feeling that these could work together just doesn't seem possible.

And so sometimes something can happen where we may recognize, okay, yes, things are unreliable, there's vulnerability. And we may have the sense that, seeing that things are vulnerable and unreliable, I shouldn't want to be safe. I've had people say this to me in practice discussions: "I know things are unreliable, so I shouldn't want to be safe." But that wish for safety is valid. That wish for safety is completely valid. What happens is that we cling to the wish for safety. We demand that things be a certain way, that safety look the way we want it to look. And that's where some of the suffering comes from.

It's a kind of misunderstanding about the wishes themselves—and this is what we're exploring in the metta practice. The wish: May I be happy. May I be healthy. May I be safe. May I live with ease. Those wishes are valid all the time. Even if there's something going on, like... sometimes people struggle with wishing well-being for someone who is terminally ill, for instance. It's like, wishing them to be healthy? That's delusion. I shouldn't wish them to be healthy. But the wish—the wish itself—is the metta.

I sometimes play with this notion or this idea: if I could wave a wand and say all beings would be healthy, would I do it? Yeah, I would do that. And so that's the wish. The wish is valid. And we have to acknowledge the truths—the truths of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable.

So this notion of, well, okay, being human is vulnerable, so I shouldn't want that, shouldn't have that wish—this can become a kind of spiritual bludgeoning. Using wisdom to say you shouldn't want, you shouldn't wish for well-being or happiness. But the wish is valid.

The meeting of these two—I mean, it's like the tangle, right? The impermanent, unreliable, running up against wanting health, happiness, safety. It gets tangled. Fear, confusion arise. And for a while in my own practice, when I ran up against knots—and they feel like knots sometimes, they feel like tangles, they feel like knotted messes of stuff—I thought, especially around things like self-hatred, that the whole complex of messy, yucky feeling, that tangle, was wholly bad. That I needed to get the scalpel and excise it, cut it out.

But think about having a knot like this, a tangle in threads. If you take scissors and cut out the knot, you end up with a hole in the cloth. The knot, the tangle, is composed of the threads of the truths and the wishes. The tangle, the fear, the confusion, the anxiety—it's just a confusion of those truths and those wishes intertwined.

Sometimes I talk about or think about what we do with mindfulness practice as taking that knot and, instead of taking a scalpel to it or scissors to it, we put it into a lubricated warm bath. We honor the tangle. We meet the experience of the suffering, and that meeting begins to untangle the tangle. We can't actually do the pulling apart of all the threads ourselves, but wisdom and mindfulness do the untangling. It is the honoring of that tangle—I think of it as the honoring of the suffering—meeting it, opening to it. It begins to reveal the truths and the wishes for well-being.

Within any state of suffering, I think it's like that. The willingness to meet it is a direct opening to wisdom on the one hand and our heart opening into love on the other. Whatever tangle there is, that tangle has these threads—threads of recognition that, yes, impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable, this is the truth. And the threads of our wishes for well-being and happiness and ease.

I'm not quite ready to say that every suffering has this composition, but I'm getting close. You know, that self-hatred—there was some part of that that thought it was helping me out somehow. The anger definitely thought it was helping me out. And so the wish for well-being was pretty buried in the self-hatred. But it was in there. Wanting to be loved and feeling like I was unlovable.

So if we honor our suffering, opening to the tangle with wisdom, with mindfulness, it begins to reveal these threads. We start to see, and begin to have the trust, that these truths and these wishes can coexist in a weave. It's not intuitively obvious how that works. And so there's the exploration.

I've had some experiences where this kind of investigation has really pointed me to this connection between the suffering and, in particular, the metta wishes.

At one point in September of 2001, I had flown back to visit my family. While I was there, the attacks on the World Trade Center happened, and so my flight home was delayed—I had ten days or something. When I got on the plane, there was some trepidation. There was bad weather where my parents lived, so the plane was delayed leaving. I had a layover in the Houston area to get back to California, and I missed my flight. There were no further flights to California that evening, so I had to get a hotel.

I was in the hotel that evening and the power went out. This was at George Bush International Airport, and George Bush was the President of the United States at the time. Initially I thought, oh, it's just a power outage, but it went on for a long time. It was really dark—I had to use my Indiglo watch to navigate to the bathroom. It was so dark in there. I went to the window and looked out, and it wasn't just the hotel. As far as I could see, the power was out.

In that kind of experience, in seeing that, I thought: terrorist attack. That's where my mind went. George Bush International Airport, named after the President of the United States. What a symbolic gesture. So the mind was doing some proliferation, obviously. But there was a lot of fear from this, obviously from what had happened a few weeks before. The conditions were there supporting that.

So I was feeling into the fear. And the suffering of that—there had been enough practice. I had started practice probably four years before that. The suffering kind of kicked the practice in, and I started just being with the fear.

Then what happened was that metta started up. I began with the phrases, and when I got to "may I be safe," it's like, yeah, that one really landed. May I be safe? Yes, that's what I want. There was just this feeling of really landing with that wish for safety.

I also noticed that as I was connecting to these metta wishes, the fear was not there. And then I landed with the wish, "may all beings be safe." That one was even stronger. Yes, that's the wish. That's what the heart really is opening towards. May all beings be safe.

Then the mind would slip into a little bit of thinking, papañca, and the fear would resurge. The fear was very strong, but equally so was the metta, the wish. And the disappearance of the fear was quite interesting when the metta was strong.

And that really gave me the understanding that the fear was composed of those threads of the wish for well-being. The medicine was really connecting with the wish. It was quite something.

So wisdom and love, the truths, the core wishes—they kind of work together. Wisdom asks us to let go of the expectations, the hopes, the craving for a particular outcome around the wishes. And the wishes connect us. I don't think that wisdom asks us to let go of the wishes. I think wisdom asks us to embrace those wishes—to embrace the movement towards connection and care and love and compassion. Wisdom is asking us to stretch, for our hearts to hold both the truths and the wishes, finding that weave instead of the tangle.

The tangle is untangled not by pulling things apart, but really through honoring: wow, this is what it's like. And that's what happened for me with the fear. It's like, oh, this is the fear. This is what the fear is like. And then in the midst of that opening to the fear, the mettā wishes arose. They were right there—really pointing to the deep connection between how we kind of misinterpret or misunderstand. The fear, the reaction to either the truths or the wishes, is a fundamental misunderstanding.

The Buddha responded to the question: "A tangle within, a tangle without. This generation is entangled in a tangle. I ask you this, O Gotama, who can untangle the tangle?" And he said, "One established in virtue, wise, developing the mind and wisdom, a practitioner ardent and discreet—this one can untangle the tangle."

I feel like really it should say the wisdom and the ardency untangle the tangle. It's not us that do it.

And then it goes further: "Those for whom lust, hatred, and ignorance have faded away, for them the tangle is untangled." The fading away of greed, aversion, and delusion happens through that engagement, through the honoring of the tangle. Coming back to the First Noble Truth—understanding dukkha. This whole talk has really been pointing to that: understanding dukkha. Not resisting the suffering. The suffering is going to show us the way. The tangle, the suffering, will show us the way to love and wisdom. Right in the midst of that suffering are the threads that can allow us to see the truth—impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable—and connect deeply to those wishes for well-being, for ourselves, for all beings.

Thank you for your practice. It's so wonderful to be participating in a community where this exploration around looking at our minds and transforming our own minds is what we do—because it will affect the world. So thank you for doing this. It's not easy; I know that.

CHAPTER 185

Dependent Origination (Paṭicca Samuppāda)

Andrea Fella · 1h04

> In this comprehensive talk, Andrea Fella guides practitioners through the Buddha's profound teaching on dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda), the twelve-link chain describing how dukkha comes into being. She references the famous exchange where the Buddha gently corrects Ānanda's claim that this teaching appears "clear as clear," emphasizing its genuine depth and profundity.
>
> Fella walks through each of the twelve links—from ignorance (avijjā) through mental formations (saṅkhāra), consciousness (viññāṇa), mental and physical processes (nāmarūpa), the six sense bases (saḷāyatana), contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), clinging (upādāna), becoming (bhava), birth (jāti), to aging and death (jarāmaraṇa). She offers practical examples from her own meditation experience, including how habitual aversion shaped her consciousness to perceive predominantly unpleasant experiences during choiceless awareness practice.
> The talk emphasizes that this chain describes both the arising of suffering and the process of selfing as interconnected patterns. Drawing from the Sammādiṭṭhi Sutta (MN 9), Fella explains that understanding any single link with wisdom—seeing its arising, its cessation, and the path to its cessation—can interrupt the entire cycle. She encourages practitioners to recognize that suffering is conditioned rather than personal, and that mindfulness and wisdom introduce new conditions that can transform these ancient human patterns.

Last week I talked about dukkha and how it comes to be in relationship to the basic truths of experience and our wishes. Tonight the topic is dukkha again—I actually like talking about dukkha—and the teaching the Buddha offered on how suffering comes to be: the teaching of dependent origination.

It's a fundamental teaching in the suttas. It's also quite challenging, we could say. For those of you who are not familiar with it, it consists of twelve links, twelve conditions that follow each other, that tumble forward, tumble onwards to the creation of dukkha. We could say it's a detailed elaboration of the second noble truth. The first noble truth states that there is dukkha, and dukkha should be understood. The second noble truth states that there is an arising of dukkha—that dukkha arises with craving. Sometimes that's framed as the cause of dukkha is craving. This teaching of dependent origination looks in detail at how craving comes to be and how it leads onward towards "the whole mass of suffering," as the Buddha says in the teachings.

Aspects of this teaching can seem obscure. There are certain parts of it that are easier to map onto our experience, and some parts that seem a bit opaque at times. The Buddha actually acknowledged that this was a challenging teaching. There's a famous story of Ananda coming to the Buddha saying, "It is wonderful, it's marvelous how profound this dependent origination is and how profound it appears. And yet it appears to me as clear as clear." And the Buddha says, "Don't say that, Ananda. This dependent origination is profound and appears profound. It is through not understanding, not penetrating this, that this generation has become like a tangled ball of string, covered as with a blight, tangled like coarse grass, unable to pass beyond states of woe."

The Buddha was a little bit chastising Ananda for calling dependent origination clear, because the Buddha understood that Ananda didn't fully understand the teaching. There was some sense in Ananda that "I understand this," and the Buddha responded, "Well, I don't think so. It's very deep. It's very profound."

So we're probably not going to be able to understand it tonight. And yet, in my own practice, pieces of this teaching—even just little pieces—have been extremely powerful. The continuation of exploring and reflecting, of looking at how these various links play out in experience, has been transformative. And it's not just about thinking about it. It's about looking in experience. The encouragement really is, with each of these links, to understand experientially what's described and what the relationship is to the links around it. There are actually a lot of feedback loops in this chain, so there are many ways we can see the conditionality playing out.

The name of this teaching is dependent origination, or dependent co-arising. It is essentially a teaching on the conditioned nature of suffering. We can begin to see how conditioning plays out in our practice, how conditioning plays out in the construction of our reactivity. It's a very clear description of how suffering comes to be as a human pattern.

For me, that's an important aspect I resonate with—that it's describing how human minds work. We can recognize this in our own minds. The fact that the Buddha looked at this and talked about it 2600 years ago, saying this is how human minds tangle themselves up in knots, and that it's still how human minds tangle themselves up in knots, means I'm not alone. The patterns being witnessed in this mind are similar to the patterns that have been played out for the entire duration of human experience.

So we can see suffering as human. It's not personal that suffering is arising here. It is the nature of our human experience when mindfulness and wisdom are not available. The tendency is for the human mind to fall into this pattern. All of us have experienced this, maybe not seeing it in this way exactly, but this is playing out over and over and over again. We can begin to understand suffering as human. It's described simply as what happens in our minds.

The other piece of overview is that what arises and is experienced as suffering is conditioned. Certain patterns—

And the other piece around this description is that it's describing suffering as arising from what's happening in our minds. The kind of suffering that we can be free of is the kind of suffering that our own minds put together. And that is actually what we call suffering.

We may not believe that at first. We've talked about this a bit—that we tend to think suffering is something happening out there to us. But when we start to look at the experience from this perspective, we see that it is our relationship, how our minds work, that creates what we call suffering.

Yes, there is unpleasant experience, pleasant experience. We've talked about the feeling tone of experience, and often our relationship to that is that we suffer around it. We feel like when something's unpleasant, there's no way to not suffer around it. But we can start to see that there's an option. We can see this in our own minds, in our own experiences.

I think Gil Fronsdal has said—and I don't know if it's original to him, but I heard it from him—unpleasantness, physical painful experience, that happens. Suffering is optional.

So given that the chain of dependent origination describes conditions that lead to suffering, and they are described as conditions, some of those conditions are stronger than others—in particular, ignorance. When ignorance is arising in the mind, feeling will lead to craving. When the mind does not understand that things are impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable, feeling leads to craving. The ignorance is a very powerful condition for suffering. We will experience suffering when ignorance is present in the mind. It's almost more like a cause there.

When craving is arising, we will be experiencing suffering. We may not recognize that we're experiencing suffering. We can delude ourselves into thinking we're not experiencing suffering when we're experiencing craving around something pleasant—focused on the pleasant and missing that the craving is actually really painful. But that stress of the craving is part of the human experience and is creating suffering, even if we're not clearly aware of it.

Given that suffering is conditioned, the good news is that when conditions change—and in particular when mindfulness and wisdom are brought into the equation—a whole different process begins to happen. A whole different direction of the path. Faith can arise. Delight, joy can arise. The sense of confidence that this is possible, that there's a path. Concentration. Understanding arises. Leading onwards, there's a whole different teaching of dependent origination called transcendent dependent origination that points to the conditions that lead to freedom.

And so we're on that path here, bringing mindfulness and wisdom to our experience. And what do we see as we do that? We see these patterns, these conditioned patterns of the habitual ways that our minds have been caught in suffering.

One of the other things I'll point out briefly about this teaching, these links, this cycle—it does loop around on itself, and it's often pointed to as describing the arising of suffering. And yet the very same cycle, a certain piece of the cycle, also describes the process of selfing. So it's the very same process that leads to the arising of suffering and leads to the arising of selfing.

We can look at it this way: whether we are noticing the experience of suffering—of reactivity, of aversion, of confusion, of reactive mind states—we may experience that as becoming familiar with what it's like to be aware of suffering. And sometimes we can actually notice the experience of the identification in there. They're both happening. It's just that sometimes the interest in the mindfulness is oriented more towards noticing the identification and the selfing, the experience of selfing. And sometimes it's more interested in noticing the experience of suffering.

So the links, the twelve links. Typically the twelve links begin with ignorance. With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. With mental formations as condition, consciousness. With consciousness as condition, mental and physical processes come to be. With mental and physical processes as condition, the six sense bases. With the six sense bases as condition, contact. With contact as condition, feeling. With feeling as condition, craving. With craving as condition, clinging. With clinging as condition, becoming. With becoming as condition, birth. With birth as condition, old age and death. And there arises the entire mass of suffering.

That entire mass of suffering—the tendency of that entire mass of suffering is to lead onward into ignorance again. We typically meet our suffering with not understanding suffering.

And so the cycle loops on itself. While the classical teachings start the description of dependent origination with ignorance, I find these first three or four links—ignorance conditions mental formations, mental formations condition consciousness, consciousness conditions mental and physical processes—to be some of the most challenging to both understand conceptually and understand in experience. So I'm going to start this description in a place where you've probably already been experiencing some of what's described here.

We have a conscious mind and body, mental and physical processes tumbling on. These include our five usual physical senses—seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching—and the sixth sense base of the mind. So we have this mind and body with these physical sense bases. Those are two of the links, and I'm not going to go into much detail about those right now. We just know we have a body and a mind, and we have these senses. That's fairly easy to connect with.

Each sense door, each sense base, is a very sensitive receiver, we could say. The eye takes in light waves. The ear takes in sound waves. The sense base is almost like an antenna—it receives the field of its base. The eye receives sight, the ear sound, and so forth. When that happens, that's called contact. In the physical realm, it's very clear: there's a sensation, there's a contact, we feel it. Contact is that meeting of the object of the sense with the sense base. There's contact with the sense door—the sight, the sound, the smell, the taste, the touch, the experience arising in the mind. That contact produces the experience for that sense base.

Each sense impression—contact—each sense base conditions contact. Contact conditions feeling, feeling tone. Each of those sense impressions, whenever there's contact with the sense base, there's a feeling tone associated with it. We've talked about this quite a bit, so just a quick overview here.

With each contact at a sense base, there's a feeling tone: pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. As we explored the other day in the instructions, that quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral arises based on conditions. It's not inherent in the sense experience itself. Sometimes we might experience a particular contact as pleasant, sometimes as unpleasant, sometimes more pleasant or less unpleasant, just depending on the conditions. It might depend on the conditions of your own body and mind, or it might depend on external conditions. There's that feeling tone for each contact, and we can get familiar with this as an experience—the contact and then the feeling tone.

The understanding about feeling tone in particular is that it's just part of being human, we could say. The teachings point to arahants, people who are fully awakened, as still experiencing feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. That's just part of having a human body. So up to this point in the chain of dependent origination, people who are fully awakened have the physical sense doors, the physical and mental processes, the sense doors, the contact, the feelings. These are all just part of being human.

Based on feeling tone, our habitual response—the response of the mind that does not understand suffering—is that we want to hold on to, lean into, or get pleasant experience. We want to get rid of unpleasant experience.

We may not notice neutral experience. It may not rise to the level of awareness. Or if it does, we may react to it with a kind of boredom—again, a wanting it not to be neutral. We like the highs and the lows. We don't particularly like it when it gets neutral. This is the habitual response.

Now, a person who's fully awakened would not have this habitual response. It would not lead from feeling to craving. And yet this is our habitual response, and it happens over and over again. We get to see this over and over again—this craving, this wanting. Like we're a simple automatic machine that automatically moves towards the pleasant, moves away from the unpleasant, and ignores the neutral. The neutral is not important, so we ignore that part. This is craving: the wanting to move towards the pleasant, to move away from the unpleasant. And again, this is very human, and yet it is not necessary. That's hard to understand, so you might have to just take that on trust or faith for a little while. A long while sometimes.

We often habitually act on this craving. The craving can arise just in the mind—you know, just "I want, I want, I want, I want." When it rises to the level where we start to take action on it, that's when it moves to clinging. We begin to hold on to something or actively start to push something away. Bhikkhu Bodhi talks about the distinction between craving and clinging using an analogy. He says that as a thief is going through a house to steal things, the reaching out to something is like the craving. When they actually pick it up, that's the clinging. So it's almost an intensification, but there's a range there from craving to clinging. The clinging is where we have picked it up. We hold on to the experience. We try to hold on to something that's pleasant. Sometimes we can get stuck to something that's unpleasant, trying to get rid of it. That's clinging.

I didn't initially understand what it meant to cling to something that was unpleasant. That language didn't make much sense to me. But then I realized, as I looked at my experience, when it was really unpleasant, I was clinging to "not this." It's like, "anything but this." And I would find myself—if this table were the thing that I didn't like—I would find myself stuck to the table, trying to push it away. Actually clinging to the thing I wanted to get rid of, thinking that was going to be how to do it. That's clinging.

The next link is becoming. This one I'll describe a little bit more. One of the monastic teachers in the Thai forest tradition, Thanissaro Bhikkhu, says that when we cling to something, it's like all of our intentions and motivations start to—he uses the phrase—"rally in the service of clinging." Our intentions and motivations kind of join up and say, "Yep, we're going to go with this one." That's becoming. There's a sense of congealing or a movement towards "Yes, this is me needing to do this." There's the beginnings of a movement towards a sense of self. You can say becoming is like the intentions toward a self.

We like becoming. Becoming can feel good—that sense of "I know what I want and I know where I'm going and I know how I'm going to get it." That movement of becoming feels like I'm in control, like I've figured it out. We like that feeling. I think this is one of the sticky links here, because it feels good.

Following on from becoming is birth, this full-blown movement into identification. Something becomes mine, or me, who I am. I'm in control. This thing is mine.

I am the person who does this or that. This is the birth of a sense of self. It can take obvious forms, like "this is mine," or it might be more subtle, like "I'm the kind of person who does this."

Following on from birth—this full-blown taking of "this is who I am"—suffering inevitably follows. Actually, suffering follows inevitably from craving. Craving itself is already suffering, in my experience. But suffering also follows from birth because there's no way to sustain the clinging. There's no way to sustain that identity forever. It will fall apart.

Sometimes this feels good. When my self-hatred identities fell apart, that was pretty good. But when there's an identity that we feel attached to—like "I figured it out"—it's different. The flip side of my self-hatred identity was this sense of "I figured it out, I can do this." And then when it was proven, perhaps ten minutes later, that I didn't have it figured out, self-hatred arose. Because it's like, "Well, if I can't control the figuring out, if I can't keep that, then I must be a failure." Those identities—the "I figured it out" and the self-hatred—were kind of two sides of a coin. I began to see that. Suffering inevitably follows this whole process.

Let me offer an example, something I have actually experienced, as a way of thinking through dependent origination. Contact with the sense door: an idea from hearing teachers, an idea arises in my head about what it might mean to be a good yogi, what kinds of experiences I might have. So thoughts arise about that. There's the contact with the thought: "I could be a good yogi, maybe." For me, this arose with the frame of a fantasy—telling the teacher that I had seen something, that I had discovered some insight. I hadn't discovered any insight, but I had the fantasy. That was a pleasant fantasy.

So there was contact with the sense door, and then the pleasantness of that fantasy. There was a desire to have that fantasy become reality so I could go to that teacher and tell them I'd had an insight. The clinging results in movement toward "Okay, what are things I could do?" and the belief that this is necessary in order for me to be happy. "I will accomplish this. I will do this." That's the clinging.

The becoming is like the whole priorities of behavior and thought that arise in dependence on this idea of what it's going to take to have this insight. Ideas arise: "Okay, what do I need to do? I need to move really slowly—lifting, moving, placing—being sure everybody thinks I'm doing it well, looking really good, sitting long in the hall, being the first one in the hall in the morning." All of those things, born from that becoming.

Taking birth might be, for instance, if this does lead to some kind of success and there was some understanding that arose. There was that sense of "Oh, I figured it out." That's birth. "I've got it. I'm a good yogi." There's that sense of "Yep, okay, got it figured out."

And then, as I said, I experienced at times a fluctuation between "I'm a good yogi" and "I don't know how to meditate"—within seconds. I would experience feeling a step: "I can feel that step. I'm such a good yogi." And then the mind would wander: "Oh, I'm such a bad yogi." Flip, flop, flip. Identification. It's all just identification. It's all the mind making up the idea of being a good yogi and being a bad yogi.

It's just experience.

So the suffering of the bad yogi is immediately apparent—the kind of self-flagellation, the beating myself up around that was immediately apparent. The suffering of the good yogi was not as immediately apparent until there was the sense of failure. And then there's a falling apart of that identity, the not being able to be in control of human experience.

So let's come back to the links earlier in the chain. We've gone through basically body and mind, physical sense bases, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, aging and death. That's the last of the chain, and from there arises suffering.

The first link in the chain is ignorance, and it is conditioned by suffering. This is where the chain becomes a cycle. The arising of suffering tends to lead to ignorance. We don't know how to relate to it. We've been caught in this cycle of ignorance around suffering for our whole lives, for multiple lives perhaps. Certainly all of humankind has been perpetuated by these confusions around suffering.

So suffering often leads to confusion. What did I do wrong? How can I fix this? Why is this happening to me? Why me? Why my family? This is related to suffering—the sense of "why me?" The feeling of the struggle, the stress. It's suffering.

A main definition of ignorance is not understanding suffering, not understanding the Four Noble Truths: not knowing about suffering, not knowing about the arising of suffering, not knowing about the ending of suffering, not knowing about the way leading to the ending of suffering. This is ignorance.

Another way to understand what it means to not understand suffering is that we are caught by misperceptions. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable to be reliable as a lasting source of happiness. We tend to take what is not self to be self. This is also ignorance—when we're caught by these misperceptions, when we are acting as if things are permanent, reliable, and self, we are caught in ignorance.

So the basic condition for suffering to lead to ignorance, the loop of this cycle, is for suffering to not be understood. If suffering is not understood, it perpetuates this cycle. We are lost in our views and ideas and ignorance, believing I can control things, believing things are permanent, reliable, self.

Because the condition for suffering to lead to ignorance is not understanding suffering, understanding suffering is a key to break this cycle. When we bring mindfulness and curiosity to our suffering, we are actively undermining this perpetuating pattern. And yet we don't undermine it enough, so we get caught in the cycle. There's ignorance that follows from suffering—we're kind of living in that. By the time we come to practice, we have lived many, many lifetimes of suffering leading to ignorance. We have cemented this process, habituated this process.

So suffering has led to ignorance. With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. Not understanding dukkha, that ignorance, taking things to be permanent, reliable, self—we choose things, we decide things. The whole framework of not understanding suffering leads us to choose and decide to act in certain ways, usually to choose and decide to act to keep pleasant, get rid of unpleasant, to follow our habitual tendencies around that. This is choosing, this deciding based on our conditioned habits and patterns. This is mental formation.

Mental formations includes a wide range of experience. It includes all of our mind states. It includes our thoughts. It includes emotions. It includes views and beliefs. And I think views and beliefs are some of the most—sticky and unseen aspect of mental formation.

And then, ignorance leading to mental formation—even the ignorance of "this thing is permanent." That's a kind of view. This idea that there's something permanent that I could get and hold on to, that's a view, a deeply conditioned view. "There must be something reliable out there. If I found it, I could have happiness." Those are views embedded in that ignorance. And these views really shape our choices. They shape how we relate to things.

So this is mental formations. Our mental formations come into being not just here in our—I mean, it sounds like this is just something happening inside a human mind and body, but we are social beings, and many of our views and beliefs... some of them are human, like the misunderstandings around "there must be something permanent, reliable, self"—those kinds of things are human delusions, human confusions. And yet also in our social lives, we absorb views from our families, we absorb views from our cultures, that shape how we relate to things.

This is where so much suffering comes from. The ideas about who we are, who others are—the whole selfing and othering thing. The realm of political division right now, like "us and them." All of that is views. And a lot of our views come in not because somebody sits down and says, "This is what we believe." Some of it does come that way. But a lot of it comes from just how the people we're around behave. Our views are absorbed in that way.

So this is where a lot of our mental formations come from. I didn't choose to have the views that were inculcated in me in grade school and in my family. That's just what my conditioning was. And yet it's crucially important to understand our views and to see how views, when clung to, lead to so much suffering in the world.

I like to encourage people at times—when you're noticing some kind of reactivity in your experience, when you can hang out with it and really feel into that space of reactivity—it can be useful to just acknowledge, "Okay, yep, I'm feeling this. I don't like this.

This situation is not good." And just feeling into that not-goodness. When you can really feel that, drop in the question—not trying to find the answer, but just drop it in: "What is being believed?"

Beliefs are so under the surface. They're often not visible, but they are sometimes amenable to being seen if you invite them. Sometimes they show up. I talked about one of those the other day—a view that was shaping the whole aversive experience in the walking hall. A view of somebody being weird, and realizing, "Wow, that is based on nothing. It's based on bare feet." And seeing when that belief was seen, when that view was seen, it fell apart.

Now that doesn't always happen. Sometimes when we see a view, we recognize, "I am on board for that one. I believe that one." Notice that. Even just seeing that a belief is a belief is different than just taking it to be true. "So that's a belief, and I really believe it." And you might see too that beliefs—it's not like on or off with beliefs. There's a gradation. Sometimes it's a little, sometimes it's medium. Just recognizing that, noticing that, is very powerful.

So mental formations shape consciousness, the next link in the chain. Ignorance shapes mental formations. Mental formations shape consciousness. Our views, our habits, our patterns, these perspectives that we've absorbed—they condition what our consciousness receives.

An example of this, a really simple example: My mind has a very aversive tendency, and early on in my practice, when my teacher taught me this open awareness practice that we have been exploring the last couple of days...

And he did it for me in a guided meditation during an interview. He said, "Just let go of directing the attention and notice where the attention lands." I did that silently for a while, and after two or three minutes he asked, "So what have you noticed?"

I said—and he had used the term "choiceless attention" or "choiceless awareness"—I said, "I don't see how this can be choiceless, because every single experience that my attention landed on was unpleasant."

I understand now that this kind of tendency is shaped by the deep pattern of aversion. I wasn't experiencing aversion in the moment—it wasn't like I was feeling aversion. But the tendency of the mind to be aversive means that the mind orients toward looking for things that are unpleasant so that it can get rid of them, so that it won't have aversion. That's its orientation. So when I stopped making choices about what to attend to, the habit that was conditioned by aversion found all the unpleasant experiences. Or maybe not all of them, but each one it landed on was unpleasant.

This is mental formation—the tendencies of the mind, the habits of the mind—shaping what comes into consciousness, shaping what I became aware of. It was kind of amazing. I know intellectually that the entirety of my experience is not unpleasant. But when I just let the attention land on experience, everything was unpleasant. This is the shaping that mental formations do to consciousness.

Based on emotions, states of mind, agendas, and views, our mind tends to orient toward looking for information that confirms those views, that reaffirms those emotions. The modern psychological name for this is confirmation bias. When we have views, we tend to look for things that confirm our views. This is a very sticky kind of pattern.

To see how this works, to recognize when these views are happening—this is one of the values of recognizing that there's a view present. It orients our minds to look for certain things, to recognize certain things. It creates a filter that screens certain things in and other things out. We will notice certain things and we won't notice other things. Consciousness will not become aware of certain things with some of those perspectives operating.

And the perspective that we're bringing here—curiosity, mindfulness, hearing the teachings of wisdom—these begin to put new views into the mind to help us see things. Like I saw: "Wait, everything was unpleasant. What's going on there? I know everything's not unpleasant. What's going on?"

With consciousness as condition, our mental and physical processes are in turn shaped. That's the next link—nāmarūpa in Pali, meaning bodily and mental processes. Consciousness shapes feeling, perception, mental formations, and body.

If we reflect on this: when the state of our consciousness has been shaped by anger, for instance—or in my case, as I was describing, the state of my consciousness was shaped by a habit of aversion, even though I wasn't experiencing aversion in that moment—what happened was that physical and mental processes tended to notice unpleasant experiences.

But if we look at a more striking example: when there's something like anger in the mind, the mental formation of anger is shaping consciousness. How does that affect the body and mind? It tends to make the body tense, maybe distorts our face. It tends to make feeling tone unpleasant. It tends to have us perceive things through the lens of anger. It tends to shape more anger. The state of our consciousness affects our mental and physical processes.

And now we're back to where we started in the chain. When I began, I said we've got a body and mind, we see things, we hear things. We might think initially that we're seeing and hearing things like cameras and microphones—just taking in everything. But now you can see that this place of the inputs, the contacts, it's not like cameras and microphones. It is completely shaped by the qualities in our minds. We're not starting from a neutral place when there's contact. There's already conditioning playing out.

Our filters, our perspectives tend to reinforce themselves. And so it's no wonder we tend to cycle in this chain. It takes a lot of commitment and dedication to begin to see through it.

It's not easy. And yet we can see through it. The conditions can change. What we are doing here is changing the conditions of our conditioning.

This chain describes conditions that support the arising of suffering. Bringing mindfulness and wisdom to what we are experiencing adds something new to this whole process. The main way the conditions are changed is through mindfulness, wisdom, and love.

The teachings often emphasize mindfulness of feeling, and I'm sure many of you have heard that aspect of the teaching. Mindfulness of feeling is a kind of place to break the chain. Certainly the Buddha emphasized this—that when we really get to see feeling, to know feeling, that can short-circuit the process. If you see feeling with wisdom, it won't lead on to craving. It's just, "Oh, there's feeling." When wisdom is meeting feeling... whereas, as I said earlier, when ignorance is arising with feeling tone, it will lead to craving.

That head of the chain, ignorance, is continuously arising with all of those links. When ignorance arises, it's like the entire twelve links are picked up in a split second. When ignorance arises, feeling leads to craving and craving leads to clinging. Clinging leads to becoming—all of that in a split second. And so seeing actually any one of the links with wisdom can change the whole pattern.

There's a teaching in the Majjhima Nikāya, a teaching on right view—Majjhima number nine. It describes a process or a practice around each of the links. For each of the links, it's a similar pattern. I'll say it for clinging for now, but it's the same for all of the links: One understands clinging. One understands the arising of clinging, seeing how it arises. One understands the ending of clinging. And one understands the way leading to the ending of clinging.

That's the framework of the Four Noble Truths. Actually, it's pointing to the Four Noble Truths as practices or understandings that can arise with experience. With each of those links—it doesn't matter which one it is—becoming, birth, sense of self arising: when one understands the sense of self arising, one understands the sense of self, understands the arising of the sense of self, the ending of the sense of self, and the way leading to the ending of the sense of self, one here and now makes an end to suffering.

So while, yes, there's a strong emphasis on the feeling-craving link, this teaching points to something important: it doesn't matter where you wake up. Maybe you've been lost in a chain of thoughts and you wake up into a sense of self, or you wake up into stress and suffering. The mindfulness right in that moment—"Oh, this is suffering. This is craving."—that begins the process of dismantling the suffering.

The last piece I'll say is that this chain is fairly complex, and there are times when you can kind of see it playing out. Occasionally you can really see feeling, craving, clinging—you can see the little way it's happening sometimes. You can see the cycle unfold at times. But I found in my own practice that if I'm not seeing it from that perspective in that moment, even just the reminder and the deep knowing, the deep understanding, "This is conditioned"—that's really helpful.

Sayādaw U Tejaniya would use a phrase: "This is nature." That one really resonated for me. This is what's arising right now. It's arising because of causes and conditions. This tree is what's growing right now. This blooming bush of anger and self-hatred—that's what's arising right now. That is nature. It's arising in dependence on causes and conditions.

Just understanding that can create so much space to be able to then have some curiosity about, "Well, what is that experience of that dukkha?" You begin to see into where you are in the moment. And that's all that's needed. We don't have to back up and say, "Where was the feeling? Where was the feeling that I was craving about?"

It doesn't matter. Right now, you can see this.

Let's just sit for a moment. Let the words go. You don't have to remember any of it.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 186

The Four Noble Truths as Direct Experience and Insight

Andrea Fella · 1h04

In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella guides practitioners beyond a conceptual understanding of the Four Noble Truths toward direct experiential insight. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and the Buddha's description of his own awakening, she emphasizes that these truths—dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path leading to its end—are meant to be seen clearly in each moment of experience.

Fella illuminates the Fourth Foundation of Mindfulness (dhammānupassanā), explaining how we observe phenomena through the lens of the Dhamma itself. She outlines the specific actions associated with each truth: suffering is to be understood, craving is to be abandoned (through wisdom's natural releasing), cessation is to be realized, and the path is to be cultivated. Through vivid personal stories—including her transformative experiences with loneliness, wanting, and anger—she demonstrates how these insights arise organically through sustained mindful investigation.

The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing these truths in daily meditation: noticing when dukkha is present or absent, observing how craving constructs suffering, witnessing moments of release, and recognizing wholesome qualities as expressions of the Eightfold Path. Fella suggests that deep insight into these truths naturally unfolds in sequence, culminating in the profound recognition that "this works"—the direct understanding that the path itself leads to liberation.

One of the most central teachings of the Buddha is the teaching on the Four Noble Truths. This can be understood as where we need to begin to start the path of practice. The Eightfold Path leads with Right View, and one of the key definitions of Right View is an understanding of the Four Noble Truths.

At the beginning, this is of course a more intellectual understanding. But that perspective—an intellectual understanding of suffering, what suffering is—is where we must start. We need to begin with some kind of understanding of what the Buddha means by suffering: this aspect of our experience that is created by basically wanting things to be other than they are.

The Four Noble Truths also offer a causal relationship. The Second Noble Truth is the truth of how dukkha arises—dukkha arises when craving arises. So we begin to get curious about how craving relates to this experience of struggle, of stress, of not liking the way things are. By definition, craving is not liking the way things are.

The Buddha discovered that what we call suffering, and his whole path, his whole journey, was about one question: Is it possible to have freedom from suffering? He understood through his own practice, his own investigation of his experience, that the very things we do thinking they will make us happy are actually the very things that create suffering. It's not the not having that makes us suffer—it's the wanting to have that makes us suffer.

At the beginning, we need to understand some of these teachings so that we can begin to explore in our own experience and see for ourselves that yes, actually, when wanting is arising, when craving is arising, there's already suffering happening. We start to see this, we start to recognize these experiences in our direct experience. All of the Buddha's teachings really point to looking at our experience, our direct experience.

The Four Noble Truths—the truth of suffering, the truth of the cause or origin of suffering, the truth of the ending of suffering, and the truth of the path leading to the ending of suffering—at first we need to understand what he meant by all of this. And then the encouragement, over and over again, is to look at your experience. See how the truth of suffering is experienced.

The Four Noble Truths convey what the Buddha understood: that craving, wanting things to be a certain way, is actually what we call suffering. When we are experiencing suffering, there is something we want to be otherwise. This is not actually obvious. We think we need to have things be otherwise in order to be happy, and we don't realize that it's the wanting itself that is creating the suffering.

The Third Noble Truth points out that it is possible to have this kind of suffering come to an end. When the wanting comes to an end—the statement of the Third Noble Truth says it's the ending of this craving that is the ending of suffering.

The Fourth Noble Truth teaches that there is a way, a path. The Buddha's own journey and his brilliance allowed him to describe the path of practice: the Eightfold Path of wise view, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. This is what will support us to see for ourselves the truth of suffering, the truth of how craving is intimately connected with suffering, and the truth that it's possible to be free of that craving and be free of suffering.

At first, teachings about the Four Noble Truths help us enter into the understanding the Buddha offered. But direct understanding of the Four Noble Truths is the way the Buddha described his own awakening. He said, "I directly knew as it actually is: this is dukkha, this is the arising of dukkha, this is the ending of dukkha, and this is the way leading to the ending of dukkha. Knowing and seeing thus, my mind was liberated."

He pointed to a direct experience of understanding around these Four Noble Truths. And then he unpacked it for us. He brought in the Eightfold Path—the tools that can support us to begin to see this for ourselves. He brought in teachings around each of the Four Noble Truths, an action associated with each: that we should understand suffering. By understanding, he meant not just the intellectual side, but understanding through experience. What is this experience of suffering? How does it come to be?

Seeing how it comes to be, we start to see the Second Noble Truth—how suffering arises. That seeing begins to support us through data gathering, just gathering data on understanding suffering. We begin to see how craving leads to suffering, how craving actually is suffering. And then the wisdom begins to let it go.

And this is the action associated with the second noble truth—that one lets go of the craving.

Now, that letting go is often, as you all are well aware, not something you can just say: "Be gone, craving." I mean, if we could do that, we would. I remember sitting in this hall saying, "I am suffering so much. If I knew how to let it go, I would." And sometimes when we're in that kind of space, what's being asked of us is to understand the suffering.

So that instruction, that encouragement from the Buddha—understand the experience—that recognition... I didn't in that moment actually recognize this. But at later times I did. It's like, "All right, this is suffering." Understanding that this experience happening right now is suffering, and this is what the Buddha suggested I understand—that's an insight.

That shift of relationship to suffering... the Buddha spoke of these actions in association with each of the noble truths in three parts. The first is simply knowing the truth, recognizing: this is suffering. And then recognizing that suffering should be understood—that itself is an understanding. The difference between believing I need to do something to get rid of it, to fix it, to change it... that's not the perspective of "suffering should be understood." That's a perspective of craving around suffering. And then the third understanding or insight that comes along with that action of understanding suffering is: suffering has been understood. We begin to recognize how craving leads to suffering.

So with each of these truths there is an action, a practice essentially. With suffering, it's understand it. With craving, it's let it go—but mostly it's allow the wisdom to let it go. Create the conditions of understanding the suffering, and wisdom begins to weaken and ultimately will release it. There are times when we can consciously set something aside, turn away, say "not now," put our attention on something else. That's a kind of form of letting go, but it's not the letting go that frees the mind.

The third noble truth is meant to be realized—this truth of release, the truth of the release from dukkha. That is meant to be realized. And the fourth noble truth, the path, is meant to be cultivated.

So there are these practices that come along with each of the four noble truths. And in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, there's also an instruction around the four noble truths that much more sounds like the understanding the Buddha had on the night of his awakening. The Buddha said, on that night, "I directly knew, as it actually is: this is dukkha, this is the arising of dukkha, this is the ending of dukkha, this is the way leading to the ending of dukkha."

The instruction or mindfulness practice in the fourth foundation of mindfulness has very similar language. It's pointing to seeing the Four Noble Truths through experience—the direct experience of recognizing this is suffering, this is how suffering arises, this is how suffering ends, this is the way, the path leading to the ending of suffering. A direct experience of that.

So this is how I want to explore the Four Noble Truths: through this teaching in the fourth foundation of mindfulness. Let me offer a little overview.

We've talked about each of the foundations—not so directly as much, but we've explored the experience of each of the first three foundations: body, feeling tone, and mind states, the quality of the mind. We've talked a lot about noticing how the mind is in relationship to experience. This is a way of understanding the third foundation of mindfulness.

The fourth foundation of mindfulness is basically asking us to look at our experience, and the word for this foundation is dhammānupassanā. Dhamma in this context means something like phenomena. The word has multiple translations or senses depending on the context in which it's used. Dhamma with a small "d" means basically phenomena. I talk about dhammas arising—everything that arises is a dhamma, an experience.

So the fourth foundation encourages us to notice our experience from perspectives of the Buddha's teachings. We could say it's looking at the dhamma, the small "d" dhamma, through the lens of the Dhamma, the capital "D" Dhamma. There are five explorations in this where we notice... In this fourth foundation we are essentially opening to all phenomena. It is the movement towards receptive awareness, choiceless awareness. We're opening to every experience.

And then there's an encouragement at times perhaps to notice how experience can be understood from the perspective of various Buddhist teachings.

With each of the practices—there's a practice about the hindrances, the aggregates, the six sense bases, the seven factors of awakening, and the Four Noble Truths—we explore experience. We simply recognize experience, and then bring a little curiosity about how it might be connected to this particular lens of the Dharma. With each practice, we notice the experience in terms of the teaching.

Each practice begins with the phrase: "And how does one abide observing Dhammas as Dhammas? Here one abides contemplating Dhammas as Dhammas in terms of the five hindrances." Or: "One abides contemplating Dhammas as Dhammas in terms of the seven factors of awakening." Or: "One abides contemplating Dhammas as Dhammas in terms of the Four Noble Truths."

So we receive experience as experience in a simple way, and then notice in terms of the particular frame.

At times, we might notice—for instance, around the hindrances—the presence or absence of sense desire. In a moment of experience, sense desire will either be present or absent. So we open to what's happening and bring a curiosity: Is sense desire present or absent? Is ill will present or absent? Is restlessness present or absent? There are other instructions about the hindrances that encourage us to notice and get familiar with how they arise. But it's basically really simple.

The instruction for the Four Noble Truths asks: How does one understand Dhammas as Dhammas, or phenomena as phenomena, in terms of the Four Noble Truths? And the instruction says: One understands as it actually is, "This is dukkha." One understands as it actually is, "This is the arising of dukkha." One understands as it actually is, "This is the ending of dukkha." One understands as it actually is, "This is the way leading to the ending of dukkha."

In a moment of experience, one of these four things is possible to see. Either suffering will be present or it will be absent—the first and third noble truths. We may actually see how suffering is put together—the second noble truth. We may see that directly in experience, in a moment, how suffering is coming together. Or in a moment of experience, we may see how the path is being cultivated.

If you're curious about how the path is being cultivated: well, first of all, if mindfulness is happening, that is cultivating the path. If we're applying effort, that is cultivating the path. If there's stability of mind, that is cultivating the path. These qualities, these wholesome qualities that we've been cultivating, these are expressions of "This is the path."

The language in the Fourth Foundation really emphasizes present moment experience, not simply a conceptual understanding of the Four Noble Truths—which is necessary to recognize that this is dukkha in our present moment experience—but it is emphasizing the recognition: In this moment, this is the experience of dukkha.

And this is an insight. We can understand the Four Noble Truths. The Buddha said that on his Night of Awakening, these are the insights that woke him up: "This is suffering. This is the arising of suffering. This is the ending of suffering. This is the way leading to the ending of suffering." These are insights. They're understandings. They're not just concepts to think about. They can be seen in the moment clearly, and free the mind.

Over and over again in the suttas, this kind of seeing is emphasized. This kind of seeing: "This is something. This is X." In the talk on dependent origination last week, I mentioned that with each of the links of dependent origination, there is a teaching that points to understanding any of the links from this perspective. One understands, "This is clinging." One understands, "This is how clinging arises." One understands, "This is how clinging ends." And one understands, "This is the way leading to the ending of clinging." The same thing repeated for feeling.

Same thing repeated for mental formation. Same thing repeated for becoming. This pattern of the Four Noble Truths is understood to be an insight that can illuminate wherever we are in experience. It can be an insight for wherever we are in experience—to see this is what's arising, this is the experience that's arising, this is how craving is happening in this moment, this is the ending of craving, the non-arising of craving in this moment.

To make sense of these insights, for me it's helpful to reflect on the fact that there are a couple of different ways that dukkha is understood in the suttas. The first way is that dukkha is understood as the suffering that arises when greed, aversion, and delusion are present. Craving is present, suffering is arising when greed, aversion, and delusion are arising. And the ending of suffering is talked about as the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion—visible in this life, this possibility of greed, aversion, and delusion ending in this life, the ending of suffering in this life.

So in this case, this is the dukkha of craving, clinging, becoming—the constriction around greed, the constriction around aversion, the constriction around delusion. The experience is around understanding the presence and absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. This is the understanding of the First Noble Truth: seeing the presence of greed, aversion, and delusion. When we see that greed, aversion, and delusion are present, we feel into the truth of this is suffering. When we have moments—perhaps brief moments—of greed, aversion, and delusion falling away, we experience the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. The Third Noble Truth.

So seeing aversion, for instance, and knowing it as dukkha—that is an insight. And I think we begin to understand the insight nature of it by seeing how experience shifts when we do understand aversion as "this is dukkha."

I felt it. I felt it at one point in Burma. I was practicing with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, and the first couple of weeks were really hard. The shift of practice style was challenging because I was used to really focusing, and that kind of approach let me just go right into not having a lot of dukkha—just focusing on the breath. But the style I was learning there was open from the beginning, and there was a lot of dukkha, a lot of reactivity.

After about ten days, I thought, "You know, if I was doing another practice, I'd be way more settled by now. There is so much dukkha, there's so much suffering right now." And I actually heard myself say that: "There's so much suffering." And I was like, "Right, suffering. This is what the Buddha said we're supposed to understand."

There was a shift in that moment. The shift of seeing, "Oh, this is dukkha" as an understanding, not as a "poor me, this is dukkha." This is dukkha. This should be understood. It was kind of that flavor of the insight around the action—right, this is dukkha, this should be understood. And that shifted my relationship so that there was more interest in observing the experience of dukkha. That's an insight. To recognize it as dukkha is an insight.

Sometimes we might see the conditions putting suffering together. We start to see how it's arising. We see how the mind is latching on to something.

Early in my practice I was exploring a pattern of loneliness. I felt it pretty much every night as I went to bed. And I was not terribly confused about why I was experiencing loneliness—my partner of ten years had just broken up with me. So I wasn't particularly confused about it, but I was interested in seeing and understanding. It was kind of interesting to me that it happened regularly, so I thought, "Okay, I'm just going to get to know this pattern." I watched it regularly every night.

And one night I noticed that while I was setting my alarm clock to go to bed, the loneliness started. It's like, what? That did not make any sense to me. Going to bed by myself—that's the kind of idea I thought the loneliness was about. But setting the alarm clock? I noticed the loneliness just arose.

It was very clear seeing the arising. So I just kept watching, and then over the next few nights I began to see that when I was setting the alarm clock, there was a memory that arose of being with my ex-partner. We were in a place where we were having a lovely time in Disneyland, and we were looking up at a marquee that had a clock on it. It was a memory that had a clock in it, and I could see the connection between the digital clock I was looking at and the digital clock in the memory.

I could also see that the loneliness was a response to the memory. So that was the trigger, the cause in that moment. The mind had jumped onto that thought, and it was like, "Poor me, I'll never be happy again. I'll never be able to go to Disneyland and be happy ever again." That kind of mindset. This was the craving, the clinging. And it was a memory. So that was seeing how the loneliness had been put together—seeing how the mind latched onto the memory and created a story around it and suffered around that story.

The next night was actually even more interesting in a way. I mean, that was fascinating to me, that I could see all of that. But the next night was even more interesting because as I set the alarm clock, of course the memory was there. Of course I thought about that experience. And the loneliness did not happen. It was as if having seen how it was put together, it no longer had the power to put itself together.

This is the power of seeing, of the data collection essentially. The seeing how the craving had arisen created the conditions for the letting go. It wasn't exactly that I experienced the release in that moment, but I noticed the absence. The suffering did not arise in that experience.

Sometimes we see the suffering when it ends. In that story I didn't see the suffering when it ended—I mean, I saw it didn't arise the second night. That first night when I saw it, I saw the loneliness and I saw how the loneliness had been put together. I don't particularly remember seeing how the loneliness ended there. And the next night I didn't see the loneliness end. The loneliness never arose, which is actually even better.

But sometimes we actually get to see the ending. We get to see how the suffering falls apart.

So here's a story of doing walking meditation—there are lots of stories in this talk. I was doing walking meditation and there was a lot of craving around looking at people. I think I mentioned this earlier—wanting to look at their faces. It would come up a lot during walking meditation. I was doing walking meditation just out in the front here, and when anybody would walk by, I would see this intensity of wanting.

At first I was doing, "I'm not going to look." It was kind of a guarding the sense doors in a way, but there was a little bit of aversion in that guarding. "I'm not going to look. I'm not going to look." I did get to see to some extent that there was wanting there, but it was being repressed by this "I'm not going to look."

At some point—because I was here on a three-month course and had plenty of opportunity to see this happen—I got curious and thought, "Well, okay, this is happening. This is happening every day. I might as well look at the wanting as opposed to repressing the wanting," which is what I was doing with the "I'm not going to look."

So I started getting curious about the wanting. And what I noticed is that wanting sprang into being as soon as somebody entered into my field of vision. That was the arising of the wanting—as soon as somebody sprang into my field of vision. I got curious about this. "Wow, okay, there it is."

I felt the wanting, and it felt like such a strong urge to look. So I was feeling that urge and not looking. I was using mindfulness to just be curious about the wanting, which is a form of guarding the sense doors, by the way. Mindfulness can be a guard of the sense doors.

So I saw that there was seeing, I saw that there was wanting, and through the curiosity of watching the wanting, I didn't look at the person. I just watched the wanting. And as the person got further up in front of me, and then walked right in front of me—it would have been so easy to flick my eyes up—the wanting got so intense. It grew as the person moved more into the field of how easy it would be to look at them. The wanting got stronger. So I noticed the strengthening of the wanting.

Then, standing and doing the walking meditation out here—I was standing at this point—just watching the wanting. And the person went up the stairs and into the door, into the building. The wanting vanished in that moment. It felt like being released from a vice grip, seeing that wanting end. It was a very cool experience. I thought, "Wow, that is so cool."

So I kind of got into watching people and watching the wanting, and then when they would disappear, watching it go away. I really got into that. That was fun. I spent—I don't know how long—a couple of weeks really looking forward to having the wanting arise so I could watch it go away.

And at some point, in the middle of watching this whole thing unfold, I realized that I was clinging to the wanting in order to see it go away. In that moment, it released—even though the person was standing right in front of me. That was a deeper kind of understanding around the letting go. The stimulus, the thing that I had wanted, was right in front of me, and I no longer wanted it. That wanting was just gone.

So these examples are pointing to ways that we can see these truths, ways that we can see these Four Noble Truths in experience. And it comes about through curiosity about suffering, curiosity about how suffering arises, and getting to witness it falling apart. Sometimes actually seeing it fall apart—and in the seeing of the wanting fall apart, there was another kind of learning there about just how much the wanting was suffering. Because of the feeling of the wanting going away, there was so much... it's like the mind had been so tight.

We don't usually recognize just how tight the mind is around craving. Until we see it go away and we feel the freedom of that, the release and the ease of that, we don't really understand. And then suffering starts to be felt more clearly as we experience the kind of purification I was pointing to the other day. We start to experience the freedom, and when it comes back, when the suffering comes back, we feel it much more clearly. It's not a mistake.

Sometimes there's a question about the sequence of these four truths: why is the third noble truth, the ending of suffering, talked about before the fourth noble truth, how we get there? There's a couple of different ways of understanding this, why this might be.

There's a kind of familiar framing of the Four Noble Truths as the Buddha being a physician, and this is how you go about looking at an illness. The first thing is there's the illness: suffering. There's the reason for the illness: craving. There's the prognosis: is it possible to cure it? Yes, possible to cure it. And how? The prescription: the Eightfold Path.

So that order is kind of how you would go about seeing a doctor. You'd go to the doctor and you'd go through the experience of your illness in that order. That's one way to understand why the fourth noble truth is at the end—the path is at the end, the way leading to the ending of suffering is at the end of the four noble truths.

Another way to understand it is through the cause and effect relationship between the first two noble truths and the second two noble truths. The first noble truth is a statement of what happens, and the second noble truth is a deepening into how it happens. Likewise with the third and the fourth noble truths. The third noble truth is a statement of what's possible, and the fourth noble truth is how it happens. So there's a causal connection, a kind of conditionality, between the first and second noble truths—craving is what leads to suffering. And in the third and fourth there's a parallel framing. The fourth noble truth describes the conditions that lead to the ending of suffering. That's another way to understand why the fourth noble truth is the last one.

Stephen Batchelor had a perspective on this that I found really interesting for a while. He was pointing to the first three noble truths, noting that as mindfulness strengthens, we tend to see those first three in order. The first thing we usually see is the suffering. Before we see the ending of suffering, we see the suffering. Then as we deepen into recognizing the suffering, we start to see how it's put together. As mindfulness strengthens, we start to see that. And then we begin to see how it falls apart. So those first three noble truths do happen in a kind of order.

Then he described the cultivation of the path by unpacking the analogy of the path itself. A path is—there are all these paths in the woods here, and you know they didn't just appear yesterday. They stay paths because people walk on them. Likewise with the Eightfold Path, Stephen Batchelor said those first three noble truths are how we walk on the path. We are cultivating the path by walking on it, keeping the path clear for those coming behind us. That's essentially how paths work. We are all participating in keeping these paths in the woods clear, and we are all participating in keeping the path of practice alive by what we're doing here. This is a way to think about cultivating the path.

There's another way that in my own experience, reflecting back on some of my insights, some understandings that have arisen, there's a way that sometimes we can see these Four Noble Truths actually arising in that order in experience. To me, those three ways of thinking about the path as being the last of the Four Noble Truths were more conceptual. They're all more conceptual ways to explain why the path might be at the end. But I had a particular experience that really pointed this out to me in retrospect. I did not see this at the time, but this was one of those understandings or insights that was so powerful that it keeps arising in my experience. New understandings continue to happen around it. Some of our insights can be that way.

When these Four Noble Truths actually happen as insights, as deep insights, I think they actually happen in this order. The way the Buddha framed it in his understanding: "I understood as it actually is—this is suffering, this is the arising of suffering, this is the ending of suffering, and this is the way leading to the ending of suffering." The understanding may have arisen in that order for him. I had an experience where they arose in this order for me.

I'm going to go through this. It's quite a detailed story, but I'm going to unpack how this happened. This was early in my practice, in the first few months. I was working with anger, working with a lot of anger. I spent a couple of months just getting familiar with anger and beginning to understand that anger is dukkha. The very first time I noticed it—I had read this book that said, I was very interested in understanding my anger because I was being whipped around by it. There were times when I was completely non-functional around the anger. I would find myself frozen at the computer, just non-functional.

The invitation was simply to get to know your anger, get to know it. And the very first time I actually recognized "I'm angry, this is the experience of anger," it was shocking to me how much it hurt. Because frozen in that space of mind, in the story of the anger—this is the same partner who broke up with me, about the same person—the story of the anger was "that person is going to be so miserable when I'm angry at them."

that I was miserable. And so that was a shock, but it also was an insight. This hurts. This is suffering. And I spent a couple of months kind of getting familiar with anger, getting really familiar with the fact that it was suffering. And just that—just that part of the practice—was really useful.

I learned a lot of different things. I learned that piece around, "I thought this was going to hurt that person, but it's hurting me first." I also saw that this practice was making it easier to see the anger, that I wasn't in such a rage. Even that was huge for me—just to be able to see that the anger was happening and not be caught in that mind that was just in the rage. I would find myself frozen at the computer, and that stopped happening.

So I spent a couple of months getting familiar with anger. Then one day I was in my kitchen, and I was cutting an apple. As I was cutting the apple, there was a lot of mindfulness present—I wasn't trying to be mindful, you know, but there was a lot of just mindfulness there. And I think my attunement to mindfulness connecting with the anger had created the conditions for the mindfulness to arise in this moment.

So I was cutting the apple, and what I'm going to describe happened in a split second. It's going to take me a couple of minutes to describe, but it happened really fast.

I was cutting the apple, and there was a memory of being with my ex-partner at a fruit stand. I could see the connection, kind of like I described with the alarm clock—I could see the connection between what I was doing and the memory. In this case, the mindfulness was right there as the memory arose. And I saw this kind of impulse, this gathering. We talked about intention. This was an intention. I felt the gathering of impulse to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry. I was not angry in that moment. I could see that I was not angry in that moment, but I felt the urge, the pull to get angry.

In that moment, that's seeing the second noble truth, essentially—the craving. There was the craving. I wasn't actually angry in that moment, but there was the urge, the movement towards the anger. So I saw that impulse. Seeing that impulse, the thought that came up in the mind was, "You don't have to get on that train." And it didn't happen. The impulse went away. And the anger never arose.

So that was the third noble truth—seeing how that impulse, even the impulse, had a little bit of a sense of suffering to it. It was not the full-blown anger. It was not anger at all. But that craving fell away. That's seeing the third noble truth. I saw that. That happened.

And in the next moment, I was standing there and kind of waiting to get angry, because I had not had this person arise in my mind without anger arising in a very long time. So I was standing there waiting to get angry for a moment, and it didn't happen. And in that moment there was the recognition—actually, I sank to my knees. It's like, "This works." This that I've been doing, this path—this is a path, this is a way. I saw in a moment that it was possible to not get angry. This is a path.

That kind of recognition, sinking to my knees—I found a path. I knew that anger was going to arise again. I was not deluded about that. But I saw that what I had been doing was a way that anger could be released, could be overcome, could ultimately be let go. So that recognition—"Oh, this works"—that's how it expressed itself in my mind.

This works. And it was like, this is amazing, this works.

I understood how it worked even. I understood something about how it worked because I could see that it had been those couple of months of getting familiar with anger and feeling the suffering of it that was what had the wisdom there that said, "You don't have to go there." That way lies suffering. You get on that train, suffering will follow.

The mind understood how the practice worked in that moment. So it not only understood that it was a path, it understood something about the nature of how the path works.

In that moment, I knew I'm going to be doing this for the rest of my life. This is a path. That is the insight of the Fourth Noble Truth—that recognition. And it can come in a lot of different ways. These kinds of insights can come in a lot of different ways.

Sometimes, just to finish about the four insights, I don't think you can have an insight into "this is the path" without going through those first three. How could you? That insight followed the freedom, the freedom of the letting go of suffering. The realization "this is the path" followed. So I think that's the way that they arise—in a moment of deep understanding, a moment of deep seeing, clear seeing.

Sometimes I think this particular seeing, especially around the Second Noble Truth, the seeing of how the suffering was put together, the recognition of the thought, the conditionality of the thought, the craving to jump on that thought, to think more thoughts—that was seeing quite a bit of detail in a very short time. So that understanding around the Second Noble Truth had quite a bit of detail. The understandings that I had developed over the earlier months around dukkha, like the recognition of "oh, this hurts"—that was a pretty simple insight.

So sometimes the insights, and more and more in my own practice now, it feels like the insights are getting simpler and simpler. There's a release from dukkha and there's not even a knowing what was released, but there's the understanding it is released. Just a recognition that something has let go. That's enough. That's enough.

These insights sometimes can have a lot of detail and sometimes can be really simple. The detail is revealed. That's not something that we do. I could not have done the seeing of that. It was the momentum of the mindfulness that saw that.

This instruction can be instruction around noticing the Four Noble Truths in experience. Just a simple way to understand our experience. Dukkha. This is dukkha. Sometimes even just bringing that in as a reflection, a wisdom reflection, can help our minds. This is dukkha.

Sometimes if we're finding ourselves walking back and forth and wondering what's being cultivated right now, and there's not particularly anything flashy happening—maybe it's patience, and maybe that's cultivating the path. So when it doesn't feel like there's much happening but there's not clear dukkha either, maybe there's wholesome qualities. Maybe this is the path. And it can be just a reflection to support the mind to stay with experience.

And then sometimes when mindfulness is very stable, it opens into very clear seeing. And this is one way that this can happen.

Thank you for your practice. It's an amazing thing, an amazing journey that you're on. And thank you for being on it, for being on this path.

CHAPTER 187

Disenchantment and Dispassion

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella guides practitioners through the transformative territory of disenchantment (nibbidā) and dispassion (virāga)—two crucial qualities that naturally arise as mindfulness deepens and we begin to see the impermanent, unreliable, and not-self nature of all experience. She begins by grounding the teaching in the Buddha's description of Nibbāna as freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion, emphasizing that this liberation is "immediate, visible in this life."
>
> Drawing from the khandha teachings and the Buddha's instruction to cultivate the perception of impermanence, Andrea explains how clear seeing leads to a natural process of letting go. She offers an honest exploration of the emotional terrain practitioners encounter—fear, overwhelm, boredom, homesickness, and even revulsion—as the mind resists these truths. Rather than viewing these reactions as obstacles, she reframes them as revealing where clinging still exists, encouraging practitioners to meet these relationships with mindfulness.
> The talk illuminates virāga through the analogy of cloth fading in sunlight—a gradual, natural process. Andrea distinguishes between the release of suffering and the deeper aspect of dispassion where craving simply doesn't arise. She concludes by emphasizing that the path to the unconditioned is through direct understanding of the conditioned, not through escapism, offering encouragement for this challenging yet transformative journey.

The topic tonight is an exploration of some of what happens to us on the journey, especially as we start to touch into and see these truths—the nature of experience as impermanent, unreliable, not self.

We might think that journey, as we begin to see these truths, would be smooth sailing. But actually, very deeply, our human system resists these truths, and so it's a bit of a bumpy ride at times.

I want to start with the possibility where the Buddha said this practice leads: freedom. We've said a number of times what the definition of freedom is. In some ways, when we say the word freedom, we think it's freedom to do whatever we want. But in this context, freedom means freedom from. Freedom from greed, freedom from aversion, freedom from delusion. And this is the definition for what the Buddha called Nibbana.

Nibbana, the ending of suffering, is primarily described by what it is not. It's non-clinging, the ending of craving, the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. So it's not about accumulating or getting or having anything. It is this deep release. And in fact, the word Nibbana can be translated as release. It literally means something like "cooling."

The cooling process is understood to be a natural process. Greed, aversion, and delusion are often talked about as being fires—the fire of greed, the fire of hatred, the fire of delusion. When we have a fire, it's adding something; it's adding heat to the system. But when we stop doing that, when we stop adding that heat, the natural process is for that thing that was being heated to cool down.

So that's the imagery. Nibbana is really a kind of metaphor, an image, an analogy for what happens as we let go, as greed, aversion, and delusion are released, are given up. There's a cooling, a release from suffering.

I have some readings on Nibbana. These are from several different sources, gathered together by an author who put together a whole collection of readings on the Third Noble Truth. I liked the way they flowed together:

The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called Nibbana.

Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed, with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin nor at the ruin of others nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is Nibbana, immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise.

And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and nothing remains to be done. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so, neither forms, nor sounds, nor odors, nor tastes, nor contacts of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired, can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is the mind, gained is deliverance.

This is peace, this is exquisite—the resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, Nibbana.

There are a couple of pieces in these readings that are particularly inspiring to me. Maybe you don't think about enlightenment as being your goal. Maybe there's something about what we think of enlightenment—some altered state, or blissful floating, I don't know. We have ideas. But the Buddha basically says: the ending of greed, the ending of aversion, the ending of delusion. When lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one experiences no mental pain and grief. That sounds pretty good.

The other piece that really points to here is this: it is immediate, visible in this life. Here and now, it is possible. That description of Nibbana, of freedom—the falling away of greed, aversion, and delusion. Maybe we get little tastes of something approximating that, and we have a sense of what it might be like in this life. To me, this sounds achievable in this life. The ending of greed, the ending of aversion, the ending of delusion. And so this is what he says: it's possible in this very life.

The path that we're practicing here, what we're doing, what we're exploring—the perspective of mindfulness that's curious about experience as experience—begins to stabilize the mindfulness so that we can see what's happening. At first, we experience quite a few hindrances; that's what's been happening in our minds.

We get to see what's been happening, and so we see that. We see a lot of the hindrances. But over time—and many of you are experiencing at least even short stretches of the falling away of the hindrances—we get a little taste of that freedom, a little taste of that.

And as there are times of the falling away of the hindrances, we start to recognize some of the qualities of experience that all experience has in common. These qualities, these characteristics of experience that Nakaway spoke to: the impermanent nature of experience, the unreliable nature of experience, the not-self nature of experience.

The texts also offer some descriptions of what happens as we start to see impermanence. When the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates sensual lust, it eliminates ignorance, it uproots the conceit "I am." And that conceit "I am"—it's kind of the subtlest form of identification. The more obvious forms, the identity view, we've talked about a lot, seeing into how we identify. But even seeing through that, there can be just this subtle sense of "I am." And that's conceit. It's said to be one of the very last clingings that falls away.

And so the Buddha points to cultivating the perception of impermanence. He told his son to do this. He said, "Cultivate the perception of impermanence and it will uproot the conceit 'I am.'"

So the understanding of impermanence, seeing impermanence—and I actually said this to somebody today in the practice meeting—we can incline, when we notice that the mind is a little more stable, we can kind of incline towards: How is impermanence showing up? But seeing impermanence deeply is an insight. It's not something we do.

It's something that's revealed. And yet there can be that kind of turning towards when we see that the stability of mindfulness is present. We could just kind of check: Is change being noticed right now? And how is change being noticed? But it's not so much a practice of something we do.

And again, the description here is that the clear seeing of impermanence leads to a process of letting go. And here's that description. You may recognize this list—Mario Line spoke about it the other night, the list of the five aggregates:

Form is impermanent. Feeling is impermanent. Perception is impermanent. Volitional formations are impermanent. Consciousness is impermanent. Seeing thus, one experiences disenchantment towards form, disenchantment towards feeling, disenchantment towards perception, disenchantment towards volitional formations, disenchantment towards consciousness. Experiencing disenchantment, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, the mind is liberated.

And so it describes a kind of natural process with seeing impermanence. There's this description of the mind becoming disenchanted with experience, basically. Disenchanted with the experience of the body and mind processes. And so these two words, disenchantment and dispassion, are descriptions of what happens for us as we start to see impermanence.

These two words I'd really like to explore. These two words are spoken here as being the natural result, in a way, of clear seeing. Seeing thus—seeing form is impermanent, feeling is impermanent, perception, volitional formations, consciousness—seeing that it's impermanent, one experiences disenchantment. One experiences disenchantment seeing impermanence. So it's not like it's saying you have to make effort to do this. It's the seeing of impermanence that begins to disenchant the mind, basically. Disenchant the mind with the idea that something will be worth clinging to.

So these two words, disenchantment and dispassion. A deep opening to the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. We start to really thoroughly see—as we see the impermanent nature of experience, impermanence really kind of pokes holes in this idea that something would be worth clinging to.

Because whatever is happening, the steady mindfulness shows it to be changing—and actually changing quite rapidly. It doesn't last for more than a split second.

And so this disenchantment is becoming... we really begin to see that our usual ways of relating to the world—trying to hold on to pleasant things, trying to navigate around and get rid of unpleasant things—this is just not the strategy. We actually see, when we see impermanence clearly, that there isn't anything to hold on to. What we think we're holding on to is also something the mind has made up.

This was kind of shocking for me when I first really recognized this. I realized that I could clearly see that the suffering was my mind doing something—holding on or pushing away. I saw that the suffering was created by the mind. And then I began to recognize that what I was clinging to was also created by the mind.

There is nothing that can be held onto. No wonder we suffer. We're trying to hold onto something that is not possible to hold onto. When we're holding onto something, we're essentially holding onto a perception—something that the mind has created. Everything that we experience is something our mind has created. And so we have the perception about what we're experiencing, and we cling to perceptions.

We can fool ourselves for a little while because perceptions can stabilize in the mind. Perceptions can stabilize for some stretch of time. This is actually the way concentration works—one-pointed concentration. In one-pointed concentration, we stabilize on a perception of something. It's called the nimitta. That is what the nimitta is: this perception the mind has made of the object that the mind clings to, absorbs into, shifts into. And it can only last for a certain amount of time. Even that level of stabilizing a perception will only last for a certain length of time. Most of our perceptions last way shorter than that.

Suffering is created by the mind. What we're clinging to is created by the mind. And the belief that we need to cling to it is a view created by the mind. It's all the mind having enchanted itself to believe that holding on to a perception will make me happy.

So we start to see that our habits of clinging are based completely on mistaken understanding, based on illusion, misperception. And so we start with seeing the impermanent nature of experience, and seeing that perceptions change very quickly also. What we're clinging to is changing quickly. We get disillusioned. It's a good kind of disillusionment. This is the disenchantment.

The reason we cling is because we have views and ideas—beliefs, essentially—that clinging will make me happy. But that's just enchantment that we've picked up through our own experience, through how we've been taught. And these beliefs around clinging to things making us happy—it's not just a few of us that do this. It is families, parents, it's what we learn. It's like the best that we think it can get is to hold onto something and be happy. We haven't had the understanding. Until we meet the Dharma, we probably haven't heard anything like: clinging, trying to hold on to things, will make you suffer, will create suffering.

So as we see the changing nature of experience, we see we've been caught in a spell of misperception, of ignorance, delusion. Seeing that that ignorance is happening, when we start to recognize that we've been caught in that kind of spell—seeing the spell, seeing the ignorance—is the first step to disenchantment. Even recognizing the belief, the view, "having what I want will make me happy"—that's the delusion that's embedded in greed. "Having what I want will make me happy." Even recognizing that as a view is a beginning. We start to see that it's an idea, it's not the truth.

When views are not seen, we just take them to be true. And so we can begin to see through these delusions—beginning to see through the taking of things to be permanent that are impermanent, taking things to be reliable that are unreliable, taking things to be self that are not self.

These are fundamental misperceptions, views that we hold: that there are reliable things out there, that there are things that could be permanent out there that would make me happy if I just found them. So even though we may still be woven in the spell a little bit, we start to see through these views, these ideas. Maybe it starts at a reflective level. It starts by reminding ourselves, "Yeah, things change."

Bhikkhu Bodhi, the scholar monk who translated many of the suttas that we share here, wrote about the experience of disenchantment. The Pali term for disenchantment is nibbida. He uses that term here: "Nibbida signifies, in short, the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena which supervenes when the illusion of their permanence, pleasure, and selfhood has been shattered by the light of correct knowledge and vision of things as they are."

In my experience, it's not quite that easy. That may be the end stage of disenchantment, but we kind of go kicking and screaming through that process. Seeing that things are impermanent, unreliable, not self, uncontrollable often—some part of us as humans just goes, "No, it should not be this way." And so we resist. We resist as we start to see the impermanent nature of experience, the unreliable nature of experience. It's not like our minds just see it and go, "Oh yeah, no problem. I'll stop clinging."

The whole process of the path requires that we see impermanence over and over again, and see how we are resisting it. There are so many ways that we resist these truths, and this is part of our journey. It's not a mistake that we find ourselves in what can feel confusing—we start to see impermanence and think, "Oh, smooth sailing," but we find that the mind has relationships to this. It doesn't like seeing impermanence. Quite a lot of the time it goes, "No, it should not be this way."

So there are many emotional flavors of our relationship as we start to see impermanence, unreliability, and the changing nature of experience. I think a lot of these emotional relationships are to what is essentially the corollary of impermanence: unreliability. When we see that things are impermanent, we realize there's nothing there to rely on. And our emotional relationship is largely about this unreliability. We so want to have something to rely on. Our whole structure of how we've been raised as human beings is to find something to rely on. So seeing that there's nothing reliable, we don't like that.

There are many emotional flavors of terrain that we go through as we start deeply seeing the unreliable nature of experience, feeling into the vulnerability of being human. I think these different emotional flavors of relationship are connected to the deep resistance to these truths. They are ways that, seeing these relationships, we're still clinging to not wanting things to be impermanent, unreliable, not self. When we start to see these emotional responses to impermanence, to unreliability, to the uncontrollable nature of experience, those relationships are revealing where we're still clinging.

So it's not a mistake. This is firmly on the path—seeing these relationships, these reactions to impermanence.

There's one translation of nibbida that sometimes describes it as disgust or revulsion. I don't particularly like this translation; I much prefer disenchantment. But there are times I've experienced the flavor of relationship to seeing things change as one of revulsion. It was kind of a surprise—just like, "Oh, yeah, I don't want to see this." It felt so wrong. And several suttas point to the understanding of the danger in clinging to things that are impermanent.

In a way, seeing the danger of clinging to something impermanent, the mind could recoil against it. It's similar to how we might recoil when we see a rattlesnake—there's a danger there.

I had this happen once. I was walking one evening at Spirit Rock, and there was a crack in the sidewalk. I was just about to step on it when it coiled up and started rattling. I was pretty mindful, and I don't remember feeling fear in that moment. But I watched the body step back. It just moved away from that danger.

This is perhaps another way to understand that sense of revulsion. When we see clearly the danger, the mind withdraws from it. This is that description from Bhikkhu Bodhi—the dignified withdrawal from phenomena, which supervenes when we really see the impermanent nature of things.

So with nibbidā, the mind understands the danger of clinging. Sometimes as we start to see the impermanent nature, we understand that way lies suffering. Clinging to that, that way lies suffering. The mind just says, "No, not going to go there."

There's another analogy, I think actually in the Visuddhimagga, describing how if a dog were to find a bone that had been completely dried out in the sun, with no nourishment left in it at all, he would go up to it, maybe sniff it, and just walk away. There's nothing here for me. And that's described as the dog having disgust for the bone. There's no nourishment there. It's not worthwhile, not valuable.

That's a sense of what we begin to see—that what we have taken to be nourishment, the clinging to something to make us happy, isn't actually nourishment. It's not moving us in a direction of freedom.

There are other flavors of relationship to seeing impermanence clearly. Fear. Mia spoke of this last night. Fear can arise with respect to seeing the changing nature of experience. And I think that fear comes up because of the understanding. As we see impermanence clearly, we recognize that it's not reliable. And the fear is: but there must be something that's reliable. If this thing isn't reliable, what can I rely on? So there's that movement toward searching for something reliable, a fear that we're not going to find something we can depend on.

The whole path points us toward finding an ease and a happiness that is completely unlike anything we've experienced before—the happiness of not picking something up, of letting go, of not needing to have something be stable.

At times when impermanence is showing up in a very rapid way, when we're seeing things change so quickly, some of the early experiences can actually be very delightful. So this is also a relationship, and we can cling to that. It's like, "Oh, I figured it out. I'm enlightened." We see how things are just coming into being and falling apart and coming into being, and everything seems so easy. There's nothing to hold on to. It's like a magic show, and it seems so delightful.

So that's also a relationship worth noticing—that sense of "I figured it out," or the delight, the joy. At one point, talking to one of my teachers and describing this delight of seeing these truths, he said, "Okay, we have to talk about the imperfections of insight." The defilements related to insight. The ways we can cling to insight itself—like, "Oh, I've got it, I figured it out."

So, noticing these relationships. But sometimes when we start to see impermanence in that particular way, it seems like we know the object that's arising. It's clear. It pops into being.

We know exactly what it is, and then we see it fall apart. Sometimes impermanence is going so fast we don't even know what the objects are. We tend to like clarity. We tend to like knowing what we're seeing. And that kind of experience starts to feel uncomfortable. Sometimes things go so fast it can feel overwhelming. So that kind of experience of fear is like, "How do I navigate this?" That overwhelm or fear at the rapidity of change can even feel as strong as terror sometimes.

I'm going to say a few more, but before I go on to name a few more of these kinds of relationships—the path unfolds. This is a terrain, a place in the path where the path unfolds by meeting the relationship. And so when this is happening, our practice is not to try to force ourselves to be with the rapidly changing experience, but to be with the fear itself. And you may find in being with the fear that it also starts to rapidly change. So the path unfolds through noticing the relationships to impermanence, noticing the relationships to that unreliability, noticing the relationship to dukkha. Because that experience of things changing rapidly is a flavor of dukkha. It's a flavor of seeing the unreliable nature of experience.

A couple other experiences we may have around this exploration of seeing impermanence: my teacher in Burma, Sayadaw U Janaka, pointed this one out. He's the only person I've heard call it this. He says sometimes it can feel like homesickness. And to me, that flavor is, again, the flavor of disenchantment. It's kind of like, "I wish I could go back to not seeing this. I wish I could go back to believing that there was something reliable, or that experience was controllable." And so there can be a longing for what we had—that comfortable fit of our hindrances. We get a longing for that flavor of homesickness.

And then, as we start to see this nature of experience as impermanent more and more, we move through some of these relationships. Then there can be another one that's just like boredom. Like, okay, I've seen this enough already. Another flavor can feel like oppressiveness—we feel like we're just being impinged upon. Like we're in a house with eighteen teenagers having a party and they're just poking at you. So much stimulation. It just feels overwhelming—that kind of being bombarded by sense impressions.

And then it can shift into this sense of just, "Okay, I've seen this, been here, done this—how long do I have to watch this?" Boredom is another relationship. Notice the boredom. Sometimes in this place it can shift from boredom to disinterest. It's like, yeah, this is just not interesting anymore. Had enough of this. It can also shift into the flavor of not wanting to practice.

All of these can be seen. I was practicing in Burma, and at this particular monastery we kind of lined up and got to hear the reports of the person ahead of us. I was fortunate to be last in line, so I got to hear everybody else's reports. This one person—who I could tell was further ahead of me on the path, this was a number of years ago—her reports were so clear. And at one point she described, "Yes, while I was practicing, not wanting to practice arose." And I thought, "You can actually report that?"

It was such an aha moment. It showed me that that state which had arisen in my mind—that too was just a state that had arisen in my mind. Not wanting to practice had arisen. It's something that can be seen. "Oh yeah, not wanting to practice is happening. Okay, we'll keep walking and I'll notice not wanting to practice." Simple.

Before that moment, I had this idea that somehow I either had to believe it and stop practicing—I actually felt betrayed by my mind. It's like, "No, I really know I want to practice. Why is it telling me I don't want to practice?" Or I had to get rid of it.

I thought I had to get rid of that arising because it was wrong. But it's just another arising. All of these relationships to seeing impermanence are just more arisings. They're ways that we're clinging, ways that we're relating to the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience.

So as our practice deepens through opening to these relationships to impermanence, the mind begins to move much more in the direction of actually letting go. And this is the dispassion—experiencing disenchantment, one becomes dispassionate. Again, it's the natural unfolding here. There's an image given of water flowing down a mountain. It's just the nature of water to flow down the mountain and gather in rivulets and streams and ponds and rivers. That's its nature. And likewise, from disenchantment, dispassion follows.

The Pali word for dispassion is viraga. The word has the connotation of—it's almost an analogy—it's used in terms of cloth. If a cloth is sitting in the sun for a long time, it will viraga. The dye in the cloth will fade. So viraga means to fade. The term itself suggests a gradual process. Think about how long it takes if a cloth is sitting in the sun, or curtains hanging at a window. How long it takes for the curtain to fade. It's a slow process, but it's also a very natural process.

To me, this whole process of disenchantment and dispassion is reflective of the gradual nature of the path. There are a number of analogies the Buddha gave around this gradual nature, and this imagery of viraga is one of them. Over the course of our practice, we may see the fading away of different kinds of attachments. Different levels of desire can fade. We might first start seeing the fading away of some of the ways we clung to our big reactivity. For me, the anger and the self-hatred—those were some outer layers of craving, clinging, and aversion that over the years I began to see. Looking back, it's like, yes, wow, at this point I'm not reacting in the same way that I used to. We see the fading. We're starting to see the fading away of the ways that we cling—a fading away of the attachment to wanting things to be my way. And then we might start also seeing a fading away of attachment to pleasant states of concentration, even a fading away of attachment to insight and understanding.

Over the course of our practice, we can see this. The Dalai Lama famously said, don't try to look at your practice day to day to see what has been released or let go of. But look back over five years, ten years. You will notice a difference. You will see that there are things that have been released. And we can see that the practice has contributed to that.

This fading away—it's not quite like the cloth hanging in the window where it's a gradual, continual fading. It's more like it comes and goes. We see a release of something, and then the next moment or hours later we've picked it up again and we're craving and clinging to that thing. So it's more like a wave, a wave that gradually dampens in the release.

There's that fading-out aspect of dispassion. There's also the letting-go aspect of dispassion. It's just the mind fundamentally letting go when we see that there is nothing to cling to. The mind lets go.

I said earlier that freedom is not about getting anything. All of the descriptions of freedom are about what's not here, what has been let go of. One definition of freedom—this is peaceful life—I read this earlier: "This is peaceful, this is sublime, the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana." Here, dispassion and nibbana are understood to be synonyms. This is the freedom. Dispassion is the freedom.

We may not like the word dispassion, but it really is losing the passion around greed, aversion, and delusion. That's what we become dispassionate about. Compassion, the sense of caring and connecting—that becomes stronger. The heart that is not tied up in the knots of greed, aversion, and delusion feels, connects, cares. The Brahma Viharas are a natural expression of a heart that is not clinging.

The feeling of mettā, the expansive feeling of mettā, at times may be touching into that. The feeling of muditā, the feeling of joy in the joy of others. The feeling of compassion, of feeling the suffering of others and not constricting around it. We might think about dispassion as being something very flat. But the quality of the heart that is open is anything but flat. It is so resonant and responsive to the world.

The letting go aspect of dispassion—we can think of it also as the release of suffering. And the feeling of that, that's a flavor of what we touch into when we feel the release from suffering. Sometimes we can actually experience this. Like my description of seeing how craving let go when the person disappeared into the building. Seeing the release from that and feeling like I had been released from a vice grip. Sometimes we can get a taste of that, of the release. And as I described in that example, I got attached to wanting to see the release.

The deeper aspect of dispassion is the non-arising of craving. It's like it's not even picked up. So there's nothing to let go of because nothing has been picked up.

We might be able to feel into this a little bit if we think back to childhood. For disenchantment, think about what was your favorite game or toy when you were five. The attachment to that we had at the time—maybe not wanting to share it with friends, or maybe only under certain conditions. There's that kind of attachment. And yet there's a lot of joy and delight that we get from that toy. But as we grow up, I found there was a clinging, a kind of homesickness feeling. I wish I still liked playing with those dolls. I really used to like playing with those dolls. So that's a little bit of disenchantment. We're outgrowing what we had been attached to. We're seeing it's just not satisfying anymore. We're seeing that it doesn't provide what we thought it had provided. One begins to let go of that. There's this experience of just not being interested in that toy anymore.

As an adult—maybe now you've remembered that toy—but how long has it been since you thought about that? As an adult, we don't even think of picking up that game or toy. Interest or disinterest, neither one is relevant. There's not the picking up.

I'll close with a quote about freedom. The Buddha described another word for freedom. Nibbāna is a word used for freedom. Another is the unconditioned. That term also the Buddha defined as the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion—the unconditioned, the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion. Maybe a flavor of the unconditioned nature of freedom, again, is in the not picking up. Interest and disinterest are not relevant. There's not even the sense of needing to let go of anything. It's just not picked up. This term, the unconditioned, is used in this final quote. It is another synonym for freedom, nibbāna.

Though the realization of the unconditioned requires a turning away from the conditioned—everything in our experience is conditioned—it must be emphasized that this realization is achieved precisely through the understanding of the conditioned. Nibbana cannot be reached by backing off from a direct confrontation with samsara, the world of suffering. Nibbana cannot be reached by backing off from a direct confrontation with samsara to lose oneself in a blissful oblivion to the world. The path to liberation is a path of understanding, of comprehension and transcendence, not of escapism or emotional self-indulgence. Nibbana can be attained by turning one's gaze towards samsara and scrutinizing it in all its starkness. The understanding of the conditioned is the way to the unconditioned.

And so this place of scrutinizing the conditioned in all its starkness—it feels that way sometimes. We feel the suffering of the world sometimes, and we feel ourselves constrict around it. This is our journey. It's not an easy journey that we're on.

And yet, we also see, as we practice—all of you have seen the value of the practice. We go through these cycles of purity and purification, back and forth. And that is the fading of the dye, a slow process of the release of greed, aversion, and delusion.

Thank you for your practice. This is such a challenging and amazing path that you're on. Carry on.

CHAPTER 188

Opening to the Attitude about Experience

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this dharma talk from a retreat on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, Andrea Fella guides practitioners beyond simply noticing what is happening in meditation to exploring how we relate to our experience. She explains that while awareness of the six sense doors reveals the 'what' of experience, true liberation requires uncovering our hidden attitudes—the deeply conditioned perspectives rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion that often operate beneath our conscious awareness.

Fella introduces a practical technique of periodically dropping in the question 'What's the attitude?' as an invitation rather than an analytical inquiry. She describes four basic flavors of attitude: those connected to greed (wanting more of pleasant experiences), aversion (wanting unpleasant experiences to go away), delusion (disconnection, boredom, or unexamined beliefs), and wise attitude (ease, balance, and curiosity). Drawing from the third foundation of mindfulness, she emphasizes that noticing both the presence and absence of unwholesome qualities reveals the wholesome states naturally present when reactivity subsides.

The talk addresses common beliefs that create suffering in meditation—such as thinking certain states are required for practice, or that sleepiness and restlessness are obstacles rather than valid objects of awareness. Fella shares her transformative experience of finding freedom while observing self-hatred, illustrating that insight can arise with any experience when met with curiosity rather than resistance. She emphasizes that the very seeing of unwise attitudes is the medicine, and that we discover wise attitude not by transcending our mental states but by meeting them with friendliness and investigation.

It's really such a privilege to sit in a room with more than a hundred people who are interested in exploring their minds in a deep way. I was just sitting here feeling this gratitude for you and your commitment to the practice, to doing this work, which isn't easy. It's said to be a rare thing, this interest in the Dharma. I really want to express my appreciation for that.

Even just the precepts that we take—if you think about what we're doing there, committing to non-harming through taking these precepts. Even if we just looked at the first precept, refraining from killing, and even just looked at that in terms of refraining from killing other human beings, much less animals and bugs—if everybody on this planet today decided to follow that precept, we would live in a different world. It's not a small thing what you're doing here. We can get myopic at times looking at our own experience and feel like we're maybe just navel-gazing. But what we are doing is so helpful for the world. So thank you for that.

This afternoon in the instruction period, Will mentioned this sense of often looking for the why—that's our tendency when things are going on. We look at why things are happening. He mentioned this particularly around emotions, that we want to know why, we think about the why. How was I conditioned in the past? What was the why of that? And the why, as he said, often gets into the thoughts, thinking, reflecting, problem solving. He pointed instead that what we're doing here is looking more at the what and the how.

We've talked a lot about the what we're experiencing: the six sense doors. All of our experiences at the six sense doors—this is the what of our experience. One way of understanding the how of experience—and there are different perspectives on this—is to have a curiosity about how we are in relationship to what is happening. We've talked about this, about exploring the attitude, the relationship. Another phrase for this would be: how am I in connection with what's happening?

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, my teacher, has this phrase: awareness alone is not enough. My understanding of what he means is that just noticing what is obvious—that's a lot of what we're emphasizing. The what of experience is what is obvious. We sit down and we notice what's obvious: body sensations, emotions, moods, sights, sounds. All of the what of experience.

But if we're just noticing what's obvious, we may be missing these hidden perspectives that are so deeply conditioned into our minds. Habits, habitual ways of meeting experience. We could call them hidden views or hidden perspectives that we're so familiar with, so conditioned to meet experience from, that we don't often even notice they're happening. They kind of fly under the radar. We wouldn't necessarily notice them if all we're noticing is what is obvious.

So it's useful to begin to be curious about how we relate to experience, to begin to recognize these habits and patterns that we carry with us. If we are just noticing what's obvious, these hidden perspectives are operating in the background. They're simple perspectives often, just almost taken for granted. Like when something unpleasant happens, we don't like it and we want to get rid of it. That's just what we do. We don't normally think to recognize, to know, to be aware of the not liking.

So that's what this investigation or curiosity into the how, into the attitude, is exploring: What are these perspectives? And how do they feel, basically? This is useful, and as Sayadaw said, awareness alone is not enough. The hidden perspectives of agendas or habits and patterns of how we usually meet experience—often those patterns and habits have been shaped by greed, wanting to get what I want, aversion, wanting to get rid of things that I don't like, and confusion or delusion—beliefs, attitudes, beliefs about what should be happening or shouldn't be happening, views and opinions.

If we're not aware of those beliefs, in noticing the what, in noticing what's obvious, we are unwittingly reinforcing those perspectives. If we are observing something—knowing, for instance, an unpleasant experience from the perspective of "this has to go away"—then we are actually cultivating that perspective. If we're not aware of it, if we don't know that it's happening, we're reinforcing that perspective.

One of the famous quotes of the Buddha: "Whatever one frequently ponders becomes the inclination of the mind." And this is intuitive. We know this from experience. If we think about something a lot—or as someone mentioned, if we hear something a lot, if we hear a particular song repeatedly—then that tends to happen. We tend to think about it more. Whatever we put into our minds gets reinforced. We put certain things into our minds consciously and we can see how those things get reinforced. If we think about a particular person frequently, we tend to think about that person even more.

These hidden perspectives, these attitudes that we're not so cognizant of, they get reinforced not because we're aware of them, but because we're acting on them, because we're following them. And most of the reasons why we suffer, why we struggle—they are found in this terrain of these relationships to experience. So looking at this and beginning to uncover these habitual, often hidden perspectives is a direct path. This looking at these hidden agendas, beginning to uncover them, this is also a very direct way to freedom.

One of the definitions of freedom in the Buddhist understanding is the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion. Greed, aversion, and delusion are understood to be the engines of why we suffer. And these are the baseline motivators of many of our habitual perspectives. So beginning to be curious about these hidden perspectives, we are making a direct line to see the ways that our minds contribute to our own suffering and contribute to the cycles of reactivity internally and externally.

We've said many times here—I think we've said it at least three times a day, if not more—what is happening, the experience that we are knowing, is not what we're cultivating. It's not about the experience. We are cultivating a way of attending to experience. And so this way of attending to experience includes looking at, or being curious about, what is the perspective that we're bringing to the observing.

Because this is often hidden, it's useful to have a way to begin to invite it to show itself, you could say. Not so much that we're digging for it, but it's more like, "Hey, any attitude there that wants to let me know it's there?"

So just a couple of examples around attitude. I think you basically have the flavor, but I mentioned there are actually four basic flavors of attitude. I've mentioned three of them that are related to greed, aversion, and delusion—those three qualities of mind that underlie the habits and patterns that tend to lead to suffering.

A simple example for each one: If something pleasant is happening, we tend to like it and want more of it. There's a greed, a leaning into it. If something unpleasant is happening, we tend to not like it and want it to go away. We want to fix it, to change it, to problem-solve around it. Those are some flavors that can come in with aversion.

Delusion is a little subtler. It can be obvious in some ways—it can just be a kind of disconnection from experience. But boredom can have a flavor of delusion to it. It's like, "Yeah, that's not important," and we get bored with something.

This is a bit of a tangent, but whatever experience is happening, the Dharma can be seen with it. There's no experience, no matter how seemingly trivial, that does not reveal the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. Whether it's reaching for a door or feeling an emotion, there's no particular experience we have to find in order to see the truths that lead to freedom—the understandings, the insights. So if we're bored and think, "Yeah, this isn't so important," that's delusion. Delusion is at work there.

So that's a form of delusion. And that attitude of "yeah, this isn't important" — it may not be important with respect to some task we have to accomplish at work. The fact that we know we're seeing might not be important in terms of accomplishing a goal we're doing at work. There are different kinds of relative understandings we may have around what's important and what's not important, what's trivial, what's worth our attention. But in our practice, there's nothing that's not worth our attention.

If we find we're bored in our meditation, that's an example of a relationship that involves delusion. There are lots of them. I'm not going to go into that right now, though I sometimes do — I've actually given a nine-part series on delusion. There's a lot to say about it.

These attitudes, these flavors of attitude that are related to greed, aversion, and delusion — when we see those, we're in the terrain of seeing the hindrances. We're seeing the reactivity. In terms of noticing these attitudes, I'll talk more about what happens when we notice the attitude in a moment. For now, I'm just going to describe what the attitudes are.

So we have these three basic kinds of attitudes related to the unwholesome qualities of heart and mind: greed, aversion, and delusion. The fourth flavor of attitude is related to the wholesome qualities of heart and mind. This is a relationship we can have with observing experience that is basically a relationship of ease, of balance, of calm. It's a relationship that allows us to be at ease with whatever is happening.

When I said a few moments ago that we can see the Dharma in any experience, this kind of attitude — we could call it wise attitude — is a perspective that allows us to be at ease with whatever is happening and to see its nature. We can start to see its impermanent nature. We can start to see its unreliable nature, that it's not reliable as a place for lasting happiness. We start to see that it's not "my" experience — it's an experience, a conditioned arising.

That fourth kind of attitude, wise attitude — we could say right attitude — is a flavor that's actually also useful to notice. Sometimes when we begin to notice our relationships to experience, we can notice this balance of mind. This is useful to recognize. It's in the terrain of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, in the third foundation of mindfulness, which is actually the terrain of what we're talking about here: the attitude of mind, the state, the qualities of the mind. In that sutta, it talks about noticing the presence and absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

We're more attuned to noticing the presence of things. It's easier to recognize when something is there. But we can also notice: when greed is not there, what's it like? When aversion is not there, what's it like? When delusion is not there, what's it like? There are many flavors of mind that can be present when those are absent — calm, ease, peace, equanimity. There might be a flavor of love, of compassion, of patience, of joy, delight, contentment. It can be experienced in many different ways.

When greed, aversion, and delusion fall away, it can be very interesting to see what's here. For myself, this was useful because I was so oriented towards noticing greed, aversion, and delusion. It was much harder for me to begin to recognize those wholesome qualities. They were there — I could see, "yeah, no problem." But it was interesting to rest in that place. What does "no problem" feel like? Oh, there's actually joy here. There's peace. There's curiosity here. What do those qualities feel like?

There's a kind of investigation, a curiosity that we can begin to recognize — wise attitude as well. Now, it's not a problem particularly to have unwise attitude, as long as we are recognizing it.

The problem with attitudes connected to greed, aversion, and delusion is when they remain unseen. When they go unrecognized, as I mentioned a few moments ago, they reinforce themselves.

I spent a lot of time doing this, actually, with an aversive quality—or perhaps more accurately, there was a holding on to observing an unpleasant experience because I had discovered that when I looked at an unpleasant experience, it could go away. The motivation in my mind at a certain point became to make these unpleasant experiences disappear. I was looking at them. It wasn't that I was trying to push them away. In fact, I was holding on to them in order to make them go away.

That attitude contains a little bit of greed: "If I look at this just right, if I really get in there and look at it just right"—that's the greed side. "It will go away"—the aversion side. I spent a lot of time doing that without seeing it clearly, and that reinforced those habits.

So again, when we start to recognize these perspectives that are operating, the very seeing of them is the medicine.

If we can be curious—this checking of attitude or exploration—I think I mentioned on the first day that from time to time we can be curious about what the relationship to experience is. This is a tool we can use in our practice. We mostly spend time noticing what is happening, noticing what's obvious. And from time to time—perhaps every four or five minutes—we can check in: what's the relationship to what's happening?

This begins to get more familiar. As we cultivate this checking in, this curiosity about what the attitude is, it starts to become more natural. At a certain point, it's something we don't have to think about doing. It simply becomes part of how we know experience. But at least for me initially, there needed to be a little bit of conscious checking in—dropping in the question every now and then. What's the attitude? What's the relationship to experience? It can be that simple.

One particularly useful time to do this is whenever there's any kind of suffering. If there's suffering happening right now, if it feels hard to meditate, if there's a struggle going on, there's an attitude in there that hasn't been clearly seen. So if there's any struggle in your practice, it's a great time to ask, "What's the attitude?"

This checking in, this asking of the question—we're not trying to think about it, not trying to figure out what the attitude is. As I said at the beginning, it's more of an invitation. We're dropping in an invitation: is there an attitude available to be seen right now?

The question itself—"What's the attitude?"—is just a dropping in of an invitation to the mind. Think of it like sitting in front of a still pond and dropping a pebble into the water. Ripples will naturally result. You can sit there and watch as the ripples happen. Dropping a thought into the mind while meditating will have ripples. You don't have to do anything more to try to find the answer.

So you can simply drop that question in: What's the attitude? Different language may be more helpful for different people. Sometimes the phrasing "What's the relationship to what's happening?" works well. Or "How am I with what's happening?" It could be that simple. Maybe just, "How am I? How is the mind with what's happening?" Drop that question in and then just keep noticing the obvious.

What is obvious? That question dropped into the mind is going to shift the experience a little bit. And maybe something will show up. Sometimes something shows up really clearly. Like, "I don't like this." It's just blindingly obvious what the attitude is. Sometimes it shows up more as a feeling shift. For instance, it might be that you're noticing some pain in the body. And then you ask, what's the attitude with that pain? And what you become cognizant of, the ripple that you notice, is a feeling of bracing through the whole body. A kind of holding. That's an expression of an attitude, we could say. That bracing is a kind of holding back, a kind of pushing away. So dropping in that question may change the feeling of what's happening, or it may come as an actual thought in the mind.

For myself, when I drop a question into my meditation—and I do use questions, it's kind of an inquiry—I learned this from my teacher, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, to use questions from time to time. He taught it very much in this way: you just drop the question in and then you just keep practicing. You see what the result is, what the ripples are.

I've learned that when I get an answer or response through words in the mind, I hold that really lightly. Maybe, maybe not. That's an interesting idea. That's an interesting perspective—perhaps that's what's motivating this. When I get a response in the felt sense of experience, I'm more trusting of that. And this speaks a little bit to what Will said last night, that real connection is not about the conceptual. So when there's a response to that question through concept, I hold it lightly. It's not that I dismiss it, but I also ask: Is there a feeling with that? Does that really resonate? Because we have all kinds of ideas about our relationships to things. And sometimes when we ask that question, what might pop up is the most obvious thing we've thought about—"Of course there's fear in the middle of this," or whatever.

So just explore that dropping in of a question without following thoughts or thinking about it. See what happens as you drop in that question. If you get some kind of sense of a response, then all you need to do is notice that. A lot of times when I talk about working with the attitude, somebody will say, "Well, when I notice an attitude, what do I do with it?" You just notice it. There's nothing more you need to do with it. If you become aware of a perspective that you're looking through, then you've become aware of it. And now it is one other thing in the whole field of what you're noticing that is also being noticed.

An analogy I used the other day involves perspective. We may be looking through blue glasses—blue sunglasses or something. And we may forget. I've forgotten sometimes that I'm wearing my sunglasses and I'm looking for them, and then I realize I've got them on. I've forgotten because I've gotten adjusted to looking through them. So it's not so obvious that they're coloring the world. But then I can notice, "Oh right, they're on my eyes." And then I might be able to recognize there is a blue tinge to the world. We can begin to see that. So that might be one shift that happens as we begin to notice an attitude—we just begin to notice how that perspective is tinging experience. That attitude or perspective of aversion is tinging how we're looking at things.

This perspective—I'm a real connoisseur of aversion, we could say. I have looked at it a lot, and so when I see it arising in the mind, I can see that it influences. Like I look at a tree and it's like, yeah, I don't like that tree. It affects how we meet experience.

And so seeing a perspective, we can begin to recognize, okay, it's tinging things. We can begin to notice the effect that that has. We also might be able to actually begin to know, yeah, I'm looking through those glasses. We can begin to see—I need to really look through them, but I know they're there. It's almost like the glasses get taken off and you're looking at them rather than through them.

Sometimes that happens as we notice an attitude. It's like that becomes the thing that we're noticing. Rather than the thing that we were having that relationship to, like an unpleasant experience, we're more attuned to the aversion to it. We begin to get curious about the aversion itself.

So in noticing an attitude, there are different levels or layers at which we can be noticing it. But at each of these layers, we can begin to see a little bit of a shift. Even just noticing, yeah, I'm looking through blue glasses, I'm looking through that perspective of aversion—there can be a little bit of an "oh, that's what's happening." We know that. It shifts the whole experience because now we have an attitude of curiosity about the attitude of aversion. We have this bigger kind of field in which we're noticing the attitude of aversion. And maybe it even becomes interesting to be curious about the aversion. It becomes perhaps one of the more predominant things that we're noticing.

We don't have to make that be what happens, but that can happen. That would be like we're looking at the sunglasses. Oh yeah, look at that. I can see that on the other side, it's blue. And where it's up here, it's not blue anymore. We can begin to see something about how that attitude works, begin to see the way that those attitudes influence our experience.

If the mind can shift from looking through the attitude to being with it, to seeing it as an experience, we can feel a shift. There's a shift of understanding, and we know the difference. You've talked about it in your groups—seeing, "Oh, I see what's happening. Yeah, there's an aversion here." And when we see that, it's not like it goes away immediately, but there's more ease in the mind.

This is a really important thing to know: as we start to get curious about looking at these unskillful attitudes, these unwise attitudes, that's what allows us to move in the direction of wise attitude. We get curious about seeing these patterns instead of being driven by them. That shift—instead of looking through it, we're knowing it's there. We can know it's there and be okay. That okay quality is wise attitude.

One of the things Sayadaw U Tejaniya says is that we get to know wise attitude by being really curious about unwise attitude. We don't get to wise attitude by somehow magically transcending our states of mind. We get to know that the meeting of our experience is what helps us learn about how to meet experience.

This reminded me of a phrase that Joseph Goldstein sometimes used. He'd say, we want to understand dukkha—because that's what the First Noble Truth says, we need to understand dukkha—we want to understand dukkha without experiencing dukkha. And it doesn't work that way. The very understanding of dukkha comes through meeting it. But meeting it with a perspective of curiosity. Meeting it with a perspective of friendliness. That friend that says, "Yeah, you can be here too."

And so this checking the attitude – it's really a simple tool to help us recognize that there's a pattern or habit in the mind that hasn't been clearly seen, one that might not be willing to just show up in terms of what's obvious if we simply keep noticing what's obvious. But as soon as we give it that invitation and it shows up, then it's just something else to know. There's nothing magical or special we do with it. It's just another experience to recognize.

As I said at the beginning, it doesn't matter what we are attending to. We can see the impermanent nature of an attitude also. Actually, some of my most heart-opening understandings have come from seeing the impermanent nature of my really persistent patterns of mind. Self-hatred. Watching self-hatred. Seeing the resistance to it. And seeing in the midst of watching it that it's just a thought being believed. That's what's going on – this thought that's being believed. And the recognition that the mind doesn't have to believe that. It's just a belief this mind made up. That belief was an attitude, a really deep perspective applied to that thought. Right in the midst of seeing self-hatred – freedom. Freedom. It doesn't matter.

I actually thought at the beginning of this retreat, which I now call my self-hatred retreat because I spent a lot of time feeling and experiencing self-hatred – at the beginning of that retreat, I thought, "Well, I guess this is the retreat where I don't get enlightened." I thought I wasn't even going to have any insight. I thought that the self-hatred had to go away before I had any insight. And then I discovered that right in the midst of looking at self-hatred, the mind can understand the impermanent nature of it, the conditioned nature of it. Just seeing: this is what's arising.

So this checking of the attitude helps us to uncover these hidden perspectives. I'm going to talk about a couple of hidden perspectives – these are examples of common attitudes that we carry without recognizing them about meditation itself.

This is an interesting piece about attitude. Often our attitudes are related more directly to the experience of whatever's happening. An unpleasant experience will tend to create an attitude of aversion; a pleasant experience tends to create an attitude of greed. But we can have beliefs – and this is in the realm of delusion – we have beliefs that we don't think of as greed or aversion. We just think of them as true. This is true. And a lot of attitudes about the meditation itself can be this kind of belief.

We may have attitudes that are related to agendas around our meditation. An example that I think many of you probably are familiar with is that you may have the attitude that sleepiness is not a good meditation object. Now, we've talked about this, so maybe you don't have that attitude anymore, but you probably have had that attitude. The idea that I can't be meditating while I'm sleepy. There's a little bit of aversion in that, perhaps, because we feel like the sleepiness is unpleasant sometimes.

But the experience of sleepiness – and this is an interesting thing to notice about how beliefs and attitudes work – the experience of sleepiness is only unpleasant because you have the idea that you shouldn't have it while you're meditating. The experience of sleepiness itself is kind of inherently pleasant. But when it arises during meditation, we have this idea: shouldn't be happening. That idea creates a filter that affects the experience of sleepiness, and we experience it as unpleasant.

But if we let go of that idea that it's a problem to be sleepy while meditating – and as Leanne said, just let yourself fall asleep and see what happens – if you let go of that idea, you'll probably start to notice how pleasant sleepiness is.

So there's a belief or an agenda around meditation about what are good objects and what are bad objects for meditation. There are a lot of these kinds of beliefs in meditation. I had at one point a belief that I had to be in a certain state of mind in order to meditate.

At one point I was practicing in Burma, and I think some of this comes from familiarity with meditation. When we get more familiar with the practice, we get more familiar with certain states of mind, and we associate those with good practice. So then we think, "That's the state I need to be in in order to meditate."

I found myself as I was moving from walking practice to my room to sit, I found myself kind of putting my mind into a state that was a subtle form of repression of thought. Just a little bit of, "Yep, we don't think while we're meditating." But I noticed it doing that. I noticed it trying to create a meditative state. It's like, "Wait, I'm aware. What's wrong with this state? This is a state of mind. I'm knowing this one. Why do I have to change it in order to meditate? There's already meditation happening."

So there was a little belief—that belief that I had to put my mind into a certain state to meditate—that was revealed. And when that was seen, the mind recognized, "Well, there's nothing wrong with this state. I'm aware."

So if you're trying to change the state of your mind and you notice that, have some curiosity about what's going on there. What's the belief? That's an interesting question that can get at something, maybe a question that can help if the question "What's the attitude?" doesn't resonate. Sometimes when we drop in that question we don't get much of a response, and that's okay. You don't need a response; you can just carry on. You don't need to find an answer to the question.

Sometimes that happens because the attitude is more quiet or more subtle. Sometimes it can happen because the attitude is one of calm and we're not noticing those calmer attitudes. So there are various reasons why we might not understand what the attitude is. But if you find yourself struggling, another question that can be useful is: What is being believed? Because beliefs are a form of attitude—a subtler kind of attitude, perhaps. Greed and aversion are more obvious: like that, don't like that. There's a belief in there. But beliefs don't necessarily have a flavor of liking or not liking. They're just, "This is what's true."

Sometimes that question of what is being believed can open something up. "Oh yeah, this is not okay, what's happening." You know, the belief like "I'm a failure"—that was one of my beliefs connected with self-hatred. I'm a failure. And I began to see that that thought could happen and the belief not happen. It was just a thought. The thought and the belief were different.

So if you find yourself trying to change the state of your mind—like if there's sleepiness, dullness, restlessness, those are states of mind that often we try to change in order to put ourselves into a state that we can meditate in—try recognizing if you can be aware of the state. Often it can sometimes just be a belief, just the idea: "I can't be mindful while this is happening." If you're thinking that thought—"I can't be mindful while restlessness is happening" or "I can't be mindful while spaciness is happening"—you're already aware of that state. So try mindfulness before doing a shift, before making a change.

There are some other beliefs around practice that can get in the way and create suffering. Another belief I've definitely experienced—one I hung onto for quite a while—was that when I was mindful, experience would be clear. And if experience wasn't clear, it meant I wasn't being mindful right. To me, that was just true.

As I began practicing with Sayadaw U Tejaniya and beginning to explore the mind, there's so much in there. There's so much to see. It's like, oh my gosh, I was looking at this much. And when I started practicing with Sayadaw, it was like, whew. There is so much to see. Part of it is that we orient more to what's familiar, we orient towards what we recognize, and if we are aware and we're not clear about what's happening, we may think, "That's a problem."

But what we can know is simply this: I'm aware, and it's not clear. I'm aware, and I don't know. I don't know what the object is. Or I'm aware and it's really fuzzy—no clarity at all.

Some of these beliefs need to be pointed out to us. They're really hard to see, these beliefs around what we think of as meditation, what we think of as clear practice. This style of practice sometimes feels more busy. We're not settling in with one object, one experience. So sometimes it feels like there's a lot going on, and people say the mind is restless. But is it restless, or is it just knowing a lot? There are so many different experiences, so many different ways we can be aware.

I think often we stumble into a kind of clear awareness, or sometimes we stumble into our first taste of the mind really settling. It feels a certain way—clarity, quiet, no thoughts in the mind. That's one flavor. And whatever flavor we kind of stumble into first, we think that's what we're supposed to go for. That's it. That's what I'm supposed to be doing. And then we unwittingly limit ourselves by not recognizing there are different ways it can feel.

Awareness might feel focused and precise and clear. Sometimes it's broad and vague and fuzzy. Sometimes it's like we're looking at fog, and we're looking at fog. Sometimes there's clarity, sometimes there's not clarity. Sometimes we know what the objects are, sometimes we don't. Sometimes we know one object at a time, moment after moment. Sometimes we know lots of objects at the same time. There are many different ways awareness works. So how is it working for you?

These ideas can get in the way. We can be unwittingly looking for something through these beliefs and perspectives.

I'll just say one last piece. This kind of curiosity about the attitude—it feels like it's not good news when we see these hidden perspectives, but it's what will lead the mind to understanding. At a certain point, you may actually be really happy you're seeing anger. It's like, yay! It's way better to see it than not to see it. Celebrate.

So let's just sit for a moment, letting the words fall away. You don't actually have to remember anything that I said. Don't worry about it. In my experience, it's in there. You can think of it like dharma rain. The water falls down and works its way through, and at some point, perhaps some bit of that moisture will arise with the growth of a plant. We don't have to hold on to any of it.

The practice is simple. Really simple. Just this. And from time to time, some curiosity about how I am with this.

Thank you for your practice. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 189

Love and Wisdom

Andrea Fella · 47 min

In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella addresses a common question about the role of the brahmavihāras (loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity) in Sayādaw U Tejaniya's wisdom-based meditation approach. Rather than being separate practices, Fella explains how these heart qualities naturally emerge through the very orientation of wise view—the allowing and receiving of experience as it is.

Fella illuminates how the brahmavihāras can serve as skillful means when mindfulness feels overwhelmed by reactive patterns, while also exploring a deeper understanding: our habitual struggles are actually tangles between natural wishes for well-being (mettā) and the truths of impermanence and uncontrollability. Through her personal example of experiencing fear after the September 11th attacks, she demonstrates how these tangles can untangle through mindful awareness, revealing that our defilements aren't wholly bad but contain misunderstandings wrapped around wholesome wishes.

The talk offers a beautiful reframing of practice—that when we meet experience with allowing awareness, it feels like being seen and held with love. Fella suggests that the brahmavihāras represent the emotional map of a heart free from clinging; when greed, aversion, and delusion fall away, love, compassion, joy, and equanimity are what remain. This reveals the profound integration of love and wisdom at the heart of liberation.

The other day, one of you left me a note with a question, and I responded with about three sentences. As I was reflecting on what to talk about tonight, I realized I could turn those three sentences into a Dharma talk. This is how it works sometimes.

The question was: what is the place of the brahmaviharas in this style of practice? This is a question I hear with some regularity. This is a wisdom-based practice, and we don't actively teach Brahmavihara practices on this retreat. On many Vipassana retreats, there's a metta period in the middle of the afternoon to talk about that practice, that style of practice—and it's a separate practice. I think most of you may be familiar with it.

I did speak a little to this question in the first reflection I gave on the first night of the retreat: that the very orientation of wise view, observing experience from a perspective of things as they are, allowing things to be as they are—it feels very much like a wisdom perspective, and sometimes it can be interpreted as a purely wisdom perspective. Just the way the teaching lands: just notice things as they are, receive things as they are.

But as I said that first evening, that opening to allowing things as they are, the feeling of this practice more and more becomes such that this perspective of wisdom is felt as care, as love, as connection, as intimacy. These qualities of love, of compassion, of joy, of equanimity—they come along for the ride. And so while the practice, in terms of hearing what we're doing, sounds dry, the experience in the practice becomes anything but dry.

I wanted to explore this question from a couple of different perspectives. First, just to elaborate a little on what the Brahmaviharas are, for those of you who may not be so familiar—there are a few of you who are newer to the practice here.

The Brahmaviharas are four qualities of mind that are naturally cultivated as we practice. They are wholesome qualities worth cultivating, and worth actively cultivating. There are different ways to actively cultivate wholesome qualities. These four are: metta, or love, loving-kindness; compassion; sympathetic joy or empathetic joy—joy in the joy of others, in the success or beauty of others; and equanimity, the quality of balance of mind. These are qualities of heart and mind. They naturally arise sometimes, and there are also ways to actively cultivate them.

The Brahmavihara practice is often what people are asking about when I hear this question: what's the place of the Brahmaviharas in this style of practice? People are often really asking: can I do Brahmavihara practice in this style of practice? Can I use that ever? Is it cheating if I bring that in sometimes?

The practice of the Brahmaviharas, again just to fill this out for those who may be less familiar, is a practice of using thought. We consciously bring—it's usually practiced in a relational perspective—so we bring people to mind, beings to mind, including ourselves, and explore wishes related to each of these brahmaviharas. We actively explore well-wishing for ourselves and others: May I be happy. May I be healthy. May I be safe. May I live with ease. With compassion: May I be free from suffering. With sympathetic or empathetic joy: May your joy and delight continue. May your success and well-being continue. And with equanimity, a reflection on understanding that beings make their own choices and live their own lives, and we can't make their choices for them. We wish them well, but we can't make them happy.

The practice of the Brahmaviharas is explored through bringing those thoughts into mind. The thoughts themselves are expressions of the wishes, expressions of those qualities. A heart that would be feeling those qualities would naturally have those wishes. So it's using the tool of thought to incline the mind towards these qualities.

For me, I actually found that knowing and understanding the way thoughts work, how thoughts shape the mind—the way I would practice this is I would drop one of those thoughts into my mind: May I be happy. And then I would settle back and ask, what is that thought? How does that thought affect the system? Sometimes it would bring more contraction, sometimes more openness. But actually, this way of practicing the Brahmaviharas shows a kind of interface between this style of practice and Brahmavihara practice. Because we're bringing a reflection into the mind, and we use reflections in this practice—sometimes more encouraged as wisdom reflections.

This is nature. We're not trying to make ourselves see it as nature, but we're inviting the mind to open and see what the effect of that reflection is on our system. The Brahmavihara phrases work similarly—they're love reflections, compassion reflections. How do they land? How do they affect the being?

So this is the formal Brahmavihara practice with an added dimension: we recognize that what we're doing is conditioning the mind, and we observe the effect. We bring a thought into the mind—what's the effect? How does it affect us? We explore how wisdom reflections affect us in this style of practice, and bringing in love reflections, compassion reflections, is equally possible. The orientation would be to notice what's the effect of those thoughts. How do they land? Not particularly trying to find the metta, but simply: "May you be happy"—how does that make the being feel?

The Brahmavihara practice itself is more of a directing of the attention, a directing of the mind towards specific qualities. In this style of practice, we are more opening to what's here, what qualities of mind are present. And yet, as we've said a number of times, there are moments when the momentum of something challenging is stronger than the momentum of our mindfulness. Sometimes it feels to me like the momentum of a pattern is like a tsunami, and mindfulness is like a little trickle. When that's happening, mindfulness doesn't really have the capacity to meet the experience. We all learn our own ways of recognizing that. Alexis mentioned the other day that if we can see something with interest, that's a good sign there's enough capacity of mindfulness to meet the difficult pattern. One thing I often use is noticing whether the pattern seems to be getting stronger, or the reactivity to the pattern is intensifying—that would be a time to bring in a skillful means.

We've talked about various skillful means, both in the groups and in the hall, so I'm not going to make an exhaustive list here. But one of those skillful means is metta practice. If, for you, in those moments where the mind is overwhelmed by a reactive pattern, metta is grounding—if metta is a way to stay with your experience—please use it. Use it for as long as the mind needs to come to some stability and balance, and then explore the possibility of letting go of that as a skillful means and opening again to what's here. Maybe after you've done some metta practice, what's here is some metta. So that's what you can notice.

For me, Brahmavihara practice was something that came late. It really wasn't until I began exploring it from this perspective—what's the effect of these phrases on my system? How do they change my being when I drop that phrase in?—that the metta began to resonate. But this is not one of my go-to skillful means, so it's not one I think about offering so much. I know that for many people, metta is really powerful. So this is your discernment. It's your practice. It's for you to discern if a skillful means is needed when mindfulness can't just meet an experience, or is being pulled into the rabbit hole. If it's being pulled into the rabbit hole, use some skillful means so that you're not pulled in. And perhaps metta is one of those for you. All of the Brahmavihara practices are fine to use as skillful means.

So that's one way the Brahmaviharas can come into this practice—really individual, up to you whether it's an appropriate skillful means for you.

Most of the way that the Brahmaviharas connect to this practice is in understanding them as qualities of mind, recognizing that they are natural capacities of our heart and mind that may be a little weak at times.

So beginning to be curious about the experience of these qualities of mind—this is one of the main ways that they begin to be recognized.

As I said at the beginning, one of the key ways, and this is all very natural. Last night, Nisha gave a beautiful talk around both the nature of the natural unfolding of the way our habits of mind work and that we can watch that. The watching of that puts us on a path where there becomes a natural unfolding of the deepening of awareness and wisdom. This is a lawful process, the way the practice unfolds.

And so it's a lawful unfolding that these qualities of love, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity begin to, we could say, come along for the ride with this practice quite naturally. The first way that they begin to come along for the ride is that the orientation of wise view carries metta in it. That perspective of—as I said at the beginning, but just to reiterate—that perspective of "this is allowed." What's happening now? Things as they are. Everything is allowed. Everything is valued.

Sometimes we think that "everything is equal" feels like it diminishes things, but it actually elevates things. Everything is valued. All experience is valued. And that perspective is one that brings metta to the practice.

We can remind ourselves of this much as we bring in wisdom reflections at times. "This is nature" is a reflection that for me is one of the most powerful wisdom reflections. When the mind is kind of wobbly about some experience, a little bit identified with it, just that reminder—this is nature. It's just causes and conditions unfolding. It's like, of course this is happening. It's been conditioned. Look at the history of this being. Of course this is arising.

When that reflection comes into my mind, I open to how does that reflection affect my capacity to meet the experience? What happens? What happens with the experience? And quite often it creates a little bit of space. It creates a sense of balance. Maybe some sense of equanimity is there. So in using those wisdom reflections, we get curious about how they affect our meeting of experience.

If you're not feeling metta in this practice, or a sense of—like I said, it doesn't feel dry, it feels quite intimate, quite connected, quite caring to be meeting myself—I think I said that the very first night: if somebody were to sit in front of you and say, "You be you. I'm here. I'm here with you. No matter how you are, I'm here with you." Most of us would feel that as a kind of love—to be seen, to be witnessed, to be held in that space of allowing us to be how we are. We would feel that as love, and that's how it can feel with our mindfulness and wisdom. It can be this container of loving attention, kind attention, caring attention—sometimes with the flavor of compassion, sometimes with the flavor of joy, sometimes more with the flavor of equanimity.

If you're not feeling that, there could be a little bit of a wisdom reflection or a little bit of a question, an investigation dropping in. When it feels like you're connecting with experience, when it feels like things are okay, you might have a curiosity: what other qualities are here with that okayness? How does that okayness actually feel? There are so many flavors that we can begin to really touch into. The different flavors of the Brahma Viharas can be present in how we're meeting experience.

If there's a struggle, sometimes that flavor of care has the quality of a feeling of compassion. If there's a feeling of things going smoothly or well, that flavor might have a flavor of joy and delight. And I've even seen—I don't know quite how it works, but...

Seeing anger, it's like, wow, look at that—and having so much joy. I think the reason the joy is there now, as I'm remembering that experience, is because I understand that I'm no longer caught by the anger when I'm seeing it. There's that sense of having some release, some kind of sense of yes. That's the heart resonating with something delightful. So sometimes the quality can even be joy, even in the midst of working with a challenging experience.

We can have some curiosity about the flavor, the experience of what it's like when the mind is meeting experience with some balance and ease. That's a place where we can begin to feel these Brahma Viharas, to feel them as qualities in the mind, in the heart. And as we've said again a number of times, when we touch into and see with wisdom wholesome qualities, it nourishes them. It creates the conditions for them to become stronger.

The recognition of those qualities kind of coming along for the ride—it's really valuable to actually check in and notice. Oh yeah, there's joy here. Oh, there's compassion here in this okayness with being with experience. That strengthens and cultivates those qualities.

Then we can open to the qualities when they naturally arise. And they may begin to naturally arise as you become more familiar with them. We begin to see them more. This is another way that they're strengthened—we can begin to notice when they naturally arise.

I mentioned the other day that during one of my sitting periods on a long retreat, I kept having thoughts about friends from the Peace Corps arise in my mind. And I was like, you know, come back, come back to what's here. Thoughts of friends from the Peace Corps. Yes, I know I'm thinking, but come back. I had that relationship with the thoughts. But the thoughts were so persistent that I finally kind of surrendered and was like, okay, what's here with these thoughts? And it was metta. When I finally began to attune to the thoughts and what was going on with them, metta was obvious. And attuning to that quality of metta, the thoughts didn't need to continue. There was just the feeling of metta.

Sometimes we can notice this in ordinary moments. We're in the lunch line and we see somebody we know getting something that they like. Or we see somebody doing something that touches us. This was one that I saw one time with a friend: I was doing walking meditation at a retreat center, upstairs in a room with a window that looked down into the courtyard at Spirit Rock. My friend was doing walking meditation down there. I saw her and it was so clear she was really mindful. The experience was joyous —mudita for her, for that. May that continue. There it is. There's mudita arising as what's obvious. That can be known. And so that's another way these qualities are strengthened: when they arise, we notice them.

There's another place I want to spend a little more time with. As we meet a challenging experience, sometimes as those challenging experiences fall apart, we may see a connection to metta in the midst of a difficult experience. Let me unpack that a little bit.

Sometimes metta can be revealed not so much in the way I was talking about a moment before—where we're exploring something challenging and the way we're looking at it cultivates the qualities of compassion, metta, joy, and equanimity. This is different. Here, metta can be revealed as something that's kind of a mixture within the pattern itself.

Metta, the wishes for well-being, are often bound up in a tangle with our struggles and reactivity. This is, I think, partly why some of those patterns are so potent for us. Those habits, those patterns we've grown up with—the reason they're so strong and pervasive is because essentially they think, these patterns, that they're going to do something that will make us happy. They're trying really hard to make us happy. But fundamentally they're going about it in a really misunderstood way. They've fundamentally misunderstood what happiness is.

Greed's idea of happiness—within greed, the belief, the movement is: I'll be happy if I get that thing. That's the delusion embedded within the movement towards something. With aversion: I'll be happy if I get rid of that thing. So that "I'll be happy if" is right in the mix.

And so many of these strategies are self-strategies, habitual tendencies. It's as if they've tried to take care of us for our entire lives. They've done the best they can. They've tried really hard. And yet, they don't do such a good job.

In my own exploration of this, I began to see that right in the midst of anger is a wanting to be safe, a wanting to have a sense of "I'm okay." Even self-hatred—there's a wanting to be loved, actually, in the midst of that one. Feeling like I was not lovable. Hating myself for not being lovable. But within all of that is this wish to be happy, healthy, safe, at ease. The wish for safety is often tied up in fear. So within our habitual reactivity, quite often—maybe even always, though I haven't found a counter-example yet, so I won't say always—within our struggles there is this wish for well-being.

And often what happens is that wish for well-being, which is a natural wish, a human wish, a wholesome wish, a mettā wish—I think this is partly why these patterns have such a hold on us. When anger is saying, "I'll take care of you, I'll help you get rid of these things that are problems," when greed is saying, "I'll take care of you, I'll get these things that'll make you feel better"—when those patterns are operating, they don't have the perspective that there's another way happiness can happen. They don't understand that there's another way well-being can arise.

So those patterns in the mind will really resist a view that they have to go away. That idea of "I'm going to look at this so that it will go away"—how many of us do that? It's so habitual. It's such a way we orient ourselves.

With my anger pattern, when I first started looking at it, first started seeing it, I felt like everything that was going on in there was wholly bad. It felt like a tumor. That pattern—it's bad, it's not good for the system. I need to get the scalpel and cut it out. Take that whole thing, get rid of it. But because, I think, part of the reason that movement runs up against resistance—when we try to do that, and I tried—when we try, some part of the system is saying, "No, I need to be taken care of." And it doesn't understand that there's another way. There's that sense of "Wait, what?"

So the wishes for well-being are kind of connected and tangled in these patterns. If we think of our entanglement as a big ball of tangled threads, one set of those threads are the wishes for well-being. And the other set of threads that comes into play is the nature of life itself. It's impermanent. It's unreliable. It's not amenable to our conscious control all the time—even much of the time.

And what happens when these wishes for well-being bump up against reality? "May I be safe"—but things are unreliable. Things are uncontrollable. That's where the tangle is. It's this tangle between mettā and truth. Our habitual minds don't understand that these can coexist.

So our habitual minds sometimes, as we begin to meditate, start to understand about impermanence, unreliability. We feel into vulnerability. Yes, that's truth. Vulnerability. We touch into some of those truths—yes, uncontrollable. But then, "No, I want to be safe." And we might bludgeon ourselves with the truth.

"I know things are uncontrollable, so I shouldn't want to be happy." That will not fly in our minds, because metta is a wholesome, natural wish. And so if we are at all telling ourselves that vulnerability means we shouldn't want to be safe—that's the confusion about how these two things can coexist.

It is possible to know vulnerability, to know the unreliability of experience, to know that experience is not controllable, and to simultaneously recognize the wish for happiness, safety, well-being. But what happens often is that we haven't learned this perspective that these can coexist, and the habitual patterns become the tangle.

The interesting thing about the tangles is that there's nothing extra there. It's a tangle of views—views around how it's not okay. Sometimes if we're holding the metta wishes, we feel somehow betrayed by reality, that things are impermanent and unreliable. So it's one side or the other; we feel like there's a problem. And that feeling like there's a problem is the tangle.

Think about a cloth with tangled threads in the middle. If you take scissors and cut out the knot, you end up with a hole in the cloth. But it is possible to untangle the tangle—to recognize how these wishes for well-being and these truths become knotted together. I think of mindfulness practice with these tangles as being like a lubricant, something that loosens the tightness of the knots. It's not getting rid of any of the fibers. It's loosening the tangle. And at some point, we may begin to see that these can coexist.

In my experience, through not holding tightly to the metta or bludgeoning myself with truth—just being with the pattern, recognizing self-hatred when it arises, asking what's here, what's showing up, meeting depression, meeting whatever comes, again and again—sometimes I've seen the metta quality, the threads of metta, revealed.

The wisdom side was more apparent in my mind's tangle. Understanding that I don't have control—that was apparent. But the metta quality was not so visible. Let me share an example of how this unfolded.

I was watching a pattern of fear. It was after the September 11th attacks, and I was on one of the first flights after air travel resumed. I flew through Houston, my flight was delayed, and I missed my connecting flight, so I had to stay at the airport hotel. In the middle of the night, there was a power outage. As you might imagine, right after those attacks, my mind went immediately to terrorist attack. There was a lot of fear. I looked out my window and all of Houston—or all that I could see—was dark.

As that was happening, I could feel the uncontrollability of the situation. I watched the mind producing all kinds of disaster scenarios, noticed the fear, just noticed it. And then spontaneously, I noticed the mind begin doing metta. May all beings be happy. It wasn't just about me. May all beings be safe. That one really resonated. Yes, that's what I wish. May all beings be safe. As that thought moved through my mind, there was a sense of yes. And then the fear would return.

And I saw the deep connection between the fear and the wish. The fear was a response to the wish—but it had a demand embedded within it, a demand about needing to be safe, an insistence that uncontrollability is not okay. The fear was that response: This uncontrollability is not okay. This need for safety is paramount.

But when the mind was connecting to that experience of "may all beings be safe," that feeling of the mettā wish, there was the understanding of: Yes, this is the way it is, and may all beings be safe. And then the fear would come back.

I got to see that happen over and over again—how the fear was connected to the wish. That was my first real experience of seeing that these defilements, as we sometimes call them, are not wholly bad. There's a misunderstanding in there that's not useful—that's where the defilement is. But there's also something true and beautiful woven within.

To bring this back to the brahmavihāras and cultivating them: so many, if not all, of our patterns and habits of reactivity have this nature of being a tangle between basically love and wisdom. Whenever there's a reactive pattern, looking at it with mindfulness, looking at it with allowing awareness, it's an opportunity to see that all of those reactive patterns have in them threads of love and truth.

If we're willing to meet that experience, the tangle can untangle. It untangles itself. And then we experience the love and we understand something about the truth.

So this too is a way that the brahmavihāras happen. These beautiful qualities of love and compassion and joy and equanimity—they happen as our hindrances fall apart. It's not that they disappear exactly; they untangle, they get reoriented. And there's a weave of cloth that emerges.

Essentially, I think of the brahmavihāras as being the emotional map of the heart that is not clinging. When greed, aversion, and delusion fall away, the brahmavihāras are what's there. There is a deep connection between love and wisdom.

Now let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 190

Retreat Opening: Establishing Mindfulness, Refuges, and Precepts

Andrea Fella · 1h07

> In this opening talk for a month-long retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella introduces the distinctive meditation approach of Sayadaw U Tejaniya, which she has practiced for twenty years. Rather than directing attention to a chosen object like the breath, this method emphasizes receptive awareness—relaxing and noticing what is already being received by consciousness. Fella explains that mindfulness in its essential nature is receptive, and we can cultivate it by settling back to observe whatever experience naturally presents itself.
>
> The talk grounds this practice in the Buddha's Four Noble Truths (cattāri ariyasaccāni), explaining that suffering (dukkha) arises not from unpleasant experience itself but from our relationship to experience—the craving, aversion, and delusion that color our responses. Fella describes how mindfulness meeting difficult mind states creates conditions for their weakening, while awareness of wholesome qualities strengthens them. A key instruction involves "checking the attitude"—noticing how the mind relates to whatever is arising, which reveals subtle views and beliefs about meditation that perpetuate reactivity.
> Fella offers practical guidance on the four aspects of this practice: relaxing body and mind, recognizing that awareness is present, knowing what awareness receives, and periodically checking the relationship to experience. She addresses common challenges like sleepiness, noting that the belief "I can't be mindful while sleepy" itself creates aversion. The session concludes with taking the refuges (Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha) and the five precepts (pañca-sīla), establishing the ethical foundation and community container for the retreat ahead.

So welcome everybody. Most of you are arriving today. There's a couple of you who are staying on, so thank you for welcoming us into your space. I think to track what the weekly schedule will be, I'll say something about that tomorrow morning. I do know that for some of you, the introduction said there would be a two o'clock optional sitting and a Wednesday Q&A in the hall. That was the last retreat, so that's not happening. The posted schedule is our schedule.

I thought I'd start by saying a few words about the kind of practice we're doing. But first, I should say something about the absence of my fellow teacher, Diana Clark. Diana agreed to step in when Nisha Patel had to pull out of teaching this retreat. Only Diana is teaching another retreat this weekend, so she'll be arriving on a red eye from Sunday night, getting here Monday morning. I'm going to do the heavy lifting of the teaching for the first few days.

It actually ended up working out for me. I have a family situation—my brother passed away a couple of weeks ago, and I'm going to go down to New Jersey to participate in a memorial service for him. So I'll be leaving on Friday and returning on Sunday. Diana will be holding the load at that point, and I just feel so grateful to have a colleague that I can navigate this with.

So I thought I'd start by saying a few words about the style of practice that we'll be offering this month, the form of the practice. Not a lot tonight. I got here pretty late last night, and it was a lot to get here. For all of you too, it's a lot to get here. So I don't expect you have too many brain cells functioning. There's not going to be a lot of information tonight. Tomorrow morning at the 8:30 sitting, please come to that sitting. That will be where I offer the basic overview of the instructions. The instructions for this style of practice are so simple, it may seem like we don't need to elaborate, but elaborate we will.

Just tonight I thought I'd offer a little bit of an overview about this form of practice. How many of you are familiar with the style of teaching that Sayadaw U Tejaniya offers? Many of you, a few of you not.

I met Sayadaw U Tejaniya about twenty years ago now. I met him when I was helping out at a retreat in Burma, and I was hearing a lot of people talk about this teacher. I was really intrigued by what they said about him—in particular, the orientation towards observing the mind and the emphasis on relaxation.

So I went and met him. One of the things that had happened to me was in a prior retreat when I had been practicing in Burma. I had been sitting for long periods, and it injured my body a little bit to do that, so I had to shift to lying meditation at that retreat with those Sayadaws. When I asked them, "When should I come for my next interview?" they said, "Oh, you can come back to interview when you can sit again." And I felt kind of abandoned.

I felt like I could continue practicing in lying meditation, but they felt the practice required the upright posture. And so I left thinking I wouldn't be able to practice in Burma for a long time, not until my body healed.

Then I heard about Sayadaw Utejaniya and went to meet him. One of the first things I said was, "Sayadaw, I can't sit for very long. I do most of my meditation lying down. Would that be okay? Can I come to your monastery to meditate and practice with you if I'm in the lying posture?"

He looked up at me and said, "If you know how to meditate, it doesn't matter what posture you're in."

Yes! Thank you, Sayadaw.

So the next year I came back for six weeks and learned his method, which is different in many ways. I'll describe a little about how it differs from the forms of meditation practice that may be familiar to many of us. But first I want to say a few words about the motivation—why we practice.

I think we all understand that there's a lot of suffering in the world. In our own hearts and minds there's a lot of struggle and stress. Many of us come to meditation practice hoping to understand something about our minds, hoping to understand how we might have more ease and peace in our lives.

This is really what the Buddha pointed to in the Four Noble Truths: that suffering is a part of experience. The first noble truth, the truth of suffering, the truth of dukkha, the truth of stress—this is part of being human. And much of the stress we experience, what we call suffering, is actually not what we might think suffering is. It's not simply unpleasant experience—it's our relationship to experience that creates the stress and suffering in our minds, that creates the tension, that creates the difficulty in navigating our lives.

The second noble truth is that this suffering arises with craving, with greed, with aversion, with delusion. And there is a possibility for an ending—the ending of suffering, the ending of greed, the ending of aversion, the ending of delusion. This is the ending of suffering. That was the way the Buddha spoke about it.

Now, this doesn't mean there aren't difficult things, unskillful things that people do in our lives. It doesn't mean everything is suddenly all wonderful. But it means our hearts are not fighting with what is happening. In that not fighting with what's happening, we come into alignment, recognizing: okay, this is what's happening.

This is my understanding of equanimity—an orientation of mind that is in alignment with what is actually happening, what has already arisen. We understand that it has arisen, and we're not fighting with the fact that it has arisen. The heart that is not fighting with the nature of what's happening can respond skillfully to what's happening.

Equanimity doesn't mean we just say, "Oh yeah, that's what's happening, okay." Equanimity also includes the capacity to respond—but to respond skillfully, to respond with kindness, with ethics, with wisdom, instead of responding from greed, from anger, from hatred. The movement of our hearts around suffering shifts radically.

The practice of meditation, the practice of mindfulness, begins to help us understand the forces at work in our own hearts and minds—how greed, aversion, and delusion are operating within us. I think this also helps us understand how they're working in the world. As we see how to navigate them in our own minds, we learn how to navigate them differently in the world. This, to me, is really the purpose of our practice: to cultivate a new relationship with our own hearts and minds that will support us in a new relationship with the world.

The key teaching the Buddha offered for understanding our hearts and minds—understanding how greed, aversion, and delusion create stress and suffering, and how their release creates conditions for ease and peace, for skillful action, for compassion and wisdom to lead our choices instead of greed, aversion, and delusion—this teaching is mindfulness.

Awareness. Awareness is the word Sayadaw Utejaniya uses for mindfulness, and I like this word. For me, the word mindfulness feels kind of up here somewhere, feels a bit heady. But the word awareness is more evocative of what the experience actually is when I am aware, when I'm mindful. So I like using awareness for mindfulness. Other teachers use awareness in different ways, but I wanted to clarify at the beginning: the way I'm using awareness in this retreat means mindfulness.

One of the functions of mindfulness, one of the ways awareness works, is this: when we are meeting, when we are receiving qualities of mind based in greed, aversion, and delusion—when we meet those with mindfulness rather than reactivity, with just a simple, basic recognition of "this is what it's like, this is the human experience of someone experiencing anger or frustration or greed, this is the human experience of that"—

When mindfulness meets those kinds of qualities in the mind, it creates the conditions for them to weaken. My understanding of how this works is that when mindfulness feels—and really, I feel like mindfulness, awareness, has a feeling quality to it. There's a feeling that comes when we are aware of experience.

So the experience of recognizing anger, for instance: when we are mindful, when we are aware with anger, we will feel the experience. And the feeling of these states of mind that are based in greed, aversion, and delusion—generally they don't feel very good. This is actually not a mistake. When we're recognizing them with mindfulness, when we're knowing, "Oh, this is what it's like to be a human being that's frustrated," we feel the suffering of that, we feel the dukkha of that. And we understand in feeling that, that it's not helpful.

So it's not a mistake when we experience the tension, the contraction around these difficult states of mind. But as some teacher said—it's an apocryphal statement—it's the kind of suffering that leads to the end of suffering. That kind of observation of experience allows the mind to begin recognizing, "This is not helpful," and it begins to find its way to letting go of those states. Now, it doesn't happen in a split second, usually. It takes time.

And yet that experience of recognizing, "Oh, this is the experience—when there's greed in the mind, this is what it feels like; when there's aversion in the mind, this is what it feels like"—the feeling of that tension, that contraction—the very experience of being aware of it can create some space around it, so that there's a sense of, "Oh, it's okay that it's happening." And there's the sense of the awareness and the wisdom that are being cultivated while witnessing that difficult state of mind. At times we can touch into those. There have been times when I was witnessing really strong anger and feeling genuinely happy—because it was being seen, and because there was an understanding of how the wisdom works, that the wisdom will begin to release, will begin to help the mind let those states go.

Simultaneously, when we bring mindful attention to compassion, to wisdom, to patience, to love, it creates the conditions for those to get stronger. So this very simple capacity of awareness, when it is brought to bear with a curiosity about "What is this experience?"—that's crucial. The perspective we bring to observing experience matters tremendously. If we are observing experience in order to make it go away, or in order to hold on to it, to get more of it, that's cultivating greed or aversion in the back of the mind, in the perspective through which mindfulness is meeting experience. It's meeting experience with that kind of lens on it.

But if instead it's more of a curiosity—"Oh, what is this experience? What is it like to be feeling this right now?"—that perspective, it sounds like such a small shift, like nothing almost, just to understand this is an experience happening in the present moment as it's happening and to be curious about it. That makes all the difference in the world. It makes the difference between continuing to be caught by our reactive habits and patterns and beginning to free ourselves from them.

And so mindfulness, awareness—very powerful, very powerful function of mind. This is the main thing we will be cultivating here: mindfulness, awareness. We'll be cultivating it from a slightly different perspective than some of you perhaps are familiar with.

Many times mindfulness practices begin by orienting toward a directing of the attention to some particular experience, like the breath. That's a choosing, a selecting something out of experience, and then we let our attention rest there. When the attention wanders from that, we come back. We notice the attention has wandered, and we return. In this way, we're cultivating mindfulness around a particular experience. This is a fine way to cultivate mindfulness. It develops, it grows, it begins to strengthen. Then over time we begin to expand to include more and more different kinds of experiences.

The style that I'm going to be offering, the style that Sayadaw U Tejaniya offers—instead of exploring the directing of attention to cultivate awareness, to cultivate mindfulness, it's a receptivity. Instead of choosing what to pay attention to, we are simply settling back and noticing that awareness is already receiving something. Fundamentally, awareness is receptive. The function of directing the attention—that's something connected with the factor of attention. Attention and mindfulness are different things.

I'll talk more about that probably in a day or so. But the aiming or directing of attention is a way that we can know we are connecting to an experience. We can also know that we're connecting to an experience because attention is always connecting to something. Whether or not we are choosing to direct the attention, attention is connecting with something. And that attention is directed essentially based on our conditioning—what we have cultivated our attention to go to, or where it's gone habitually in the past.

So attention will always be with something, and we don't have to choose to direct the attention in order to be mindful. This was a big shift in my understanding about mindfulness. When I first started practicing, I thought if I wasn't choosing where the attention was, it meant I wasn't being mindful. But that's not true. Mindfulness is essentially receptive. We can choose to direct the attention to the breath, but then what mindfulness does is receive that breath. Mindfulness just receives whatever attention is connecting to. Mindfulness in its nature is receptive. This awareness—its nature is receptive. And so what we're exploring here is attuning to that quality or functioning of mind: that mindfulness receives experience.

To begin connecting with this receptive quality of mindfulness, one of the things Sayadaw suggests at the beginning of practice is to relax. Relaxation is a huge support for this connection with receiving experience. We can start by consciously relaxing the body. When we explore this in a guided meditation, I'll probably do a bit of a body scan to support relaxation—just allowing there to be a relaxation of body.

And then allowing there to be a relaxation of mind. The mind often has quite a bit of tension in it around needing to do, needing to fix, needing to change. Thoughts about the past, thoughts about the future. There can be a sense of also relaxing the mind. Maybe the worries, the concerns can soften a little bit.

As the body and mind begin to relax, there's an invitation to just notice what's already happening. What do you already know? Like right now—what are you aware of right now? It might be something like just sitting here in this room and listening to me. It can be very broad. This is another piece of how this style of practice helped me understand that I was often thinking attention was very precise, landing on very specific things. But attention can land on very broad things, and so it's also possible to just be aware of sitting here in this room in a very open way. Or it might be something more specific, like the sensations of your hands, or a breath. So if you relax, what's obvious? You don't have to look for anything. One teacher, Gil Fronsdal, sometimes says, "What's coming to you? What experience is coming to you?"

If you have not practiced in this style before, likely what might happen as you relax—and this is what happened for me when I began this style of practice with Sayadaw U Tejaniya—he encouraged the relaxation, so I relaxed, and then it's like, okay, what's obvious? Well, what was obvious was bodily vibration. That had been my primary object for a long time. And so when I relaxed, that's where the attention went. Of course it went there. That had been conditioned.

So if you haven't done this style much, when you relax and check in to what's happening, you may find that whatever familiar meditation experience you're used to paying attention to, that's what's happening. That's okay. You don't have to say, "Oh, I shouldn't be paying attention to that because it's supposed to be receptive." Well, that's what's being received. What I would like to encourage is to notice the difference between when it feels like it's just happening—like you relax and then, wow, there's the breath, it's just being received, it's so simple.

It's so easy. It's so obvious. And there's a difference between that and when it feels like you are aiming, when you are doing it. If it feels like you're starting to do that, then it can be useful to, well, first of all, notice that—notice that directing of the attention.

And then perhaps, again, encourage a relaxation. Because that directing of the attention probably has some tension in it. So relaxing and again, then receiving. And maybe what's received again is what you're familiar with, and that's okay.

When I finally went and reported this to Sayadaw, I said, "When I relax, what I'm noticing is the body. I'm noticing body sensations. I'm not noticing what's happening in the mind." And he said, "Well, you need to do that too." But he didn't tell me much about how to do that. He'd given this other instruction, though, which I'll cover a little more in a bit, but I'll mention it now. And that is to check the attitude—to notice how the mind is in relationship to what's happening.

So I began the practice by just letting the relaxation and the attention rest with the body sensations, as I was familiar with. And then I kind of checked in. It's like, okay, so how's the mind with this? What's the relationship to the fact that this is what's happening? And I noticed that the mind was really calm and very happy. I had not noticed that before. And that was the beginning of really understanding how to watch the mind.

So this practice—we begin with a relaxation and then we just check in and see: Where is awareness? What is awareness naturally receiving? The entirety of our human experience is possible in terms of what's received. It can be any of our six sense-based experiences, and it might be something happening in the mind.

Over time, this style of practice—partly because of this checking of the attitude, because of the encouragement to be curious about "this is what's happening, how am I in relationship to it?"—we begin to recognize more and more how the mind is working. Is there wanting something to continue? Is there wanting something to go away? Is the mind balanced around it? Is there ease? Is there calm?

And the mind is where that greed, aversion, and delusion are working and creating stress and suffering—and where the release from greed, aversion, and delusion happens. So this practice begins to help us understand really clearly how to watch the mind. And from the beginning too. It's not just like some long stretch of time after you've done this practice. It happens pretty quickly that we begin to see, "Oh, I see." In my case, it was like, "Oh, there's happiness and ease in the mind. That's... wow." And I'm seeing it. I was seeing it—seeing what it was like to have that experience. What's it like to watch the mind?

So this practice, we begin with relaxation. And actually the instructions for this practice are pretty simple. There's four basic aspects. Relax. Recognize that you're aware and then know what awareness is receiving—that's two and three. Recognizing that you're aware—for some of you, that may be clear. At times, that can take a little bit longer to really understand what it means to know that I'm aware. And we'll talk about that. As I said, we'll unpack this.

Multiple layers will unpack this. So there's a relaxation, then we recognize that we're aware and what awareness is receiving. Notice what's being received. And then from time to time, checking in: what's the relationship with what is being received? What's the relationship to the experience that's happening?

Now this piece—the relationship—there's so much that gets revealed here. So many different ways that we assume certain things about meditation. One of the things I found in this style of practice is that it really showed me how many ideas I had about meditation: views about what was good meditation, what was bad meditation, what kind of objects were appropriate for meditation, what needed to be happening. All of these ideas and beliefs. And they can get pretty subtle. They can get pretty quiet. This practice begins to help us see this.

A simple example is around sleepiness—that experience of falling asleep in meditation. How many of you have experienced that? I think all of you, for sure. And how many of you have had the thought, "I can't be mindful while I'm sleepy"? But sleepiness is just another experience. Mindfulness can receive any experience, even that thought, "I can't be mindful while I'm sleepy." You're already aware that you're sleepy. There's already some awareness of it. But the idea—that's a belief. There's a view there. "Sleepiness is not a good thing to be while meditating." And so what happens? We fight it. We think we need to get rid of it. That sets up an aversive relationship to it. The belief "I can't be mindful while I'm sleepy" creates the conditions for aversion to arise. Then we're relating to the experience through aversion, fighting the sleepiness.

There's so much to see in looking at the relationship to experience. It begins to make a beeline for how we might be relating to experience in terms of greed, aversion, and delusion. And then we observe that. The checking of the attitude isn't meant to say, "Oh, there's aversion in connection with sleepiness—how do I get rid of the aversion?" That's more aversion. Rather: what is the experience of aversion? "Oh, there's sleepiness and there's aversion to it. What's it like to have sleepiness with aversion? This is that—this human experience. What's that like?"

The checking of the attitude isn't meant to try to get rid of the attitude, but to understand it—to understand something about how it's affecting the mind, how it's affecting the body.

So that's a little bit about this style of practice. Tomorrow I'll give a more structured teaching around it. For now, just let this be an offering. You don't have to figure it out.

There's so much about the way the Dharma works—if we allow the Dharma to come in, I think of it like rain. Rain hits the landscape and filters down through the soil, absorbed into the earth, and then plants' roots begin to take it up. Think of the teachings as being like that. Just let them hit your system. You don't have to do anything with them. You don't even have to remember them. I will repeat myself a lot.

So, coming into a retreat, we honor in a way the container that we're creating.

We step into this container at the beginning of a retreat with the refuges and the precepts as an expression of the way we want to be together in community. You're all experienced students, so I'm not going to say too much about these. We've heard many talks about the refuges and the precepts. I'll just say a couple of things.

The refuges are really the orientation, the perspective of how we want to orient our lives towards the Dharma. We take refuge in the Buddha as the being who discovered, who found—he didn't create, but as he said through analogy, he found this ancient city and he found a path to this ancient city. He was not claiming to have created this. But he discovered, he found his way to the Dharma. And in finding his way to the Dharma, he woke up. He realized the freedom, he realized the possibility for the ending of suffering. That was his whole purpose on his journey: Is there a way to end suffering in this life? Through discovering the Dharma and then creating the teachings for us, we take refuge in the Buddha as an expression of the being who both found the Dharma, created a teaching around it, and then woke up.

And that the Buddha is a human being—to me, this is the beauty. When I take refuge in the Buddha, I think of this. It's the refuge in the possibility for a human being to awaken. It's possible for me to awaken. And the way to awaken is to connect with the Dharma, to take refuge in the Dharma—the teachings, the instructions, the understanding, the wisdom the Buddha offers. This is our path. This is how we wake up. We get lost, we wander off the path, but whenever we wake up, whenever mindfulness returns, in that moment we can essentially take refuge in the Dharma again. This awareness—this can free the mind.

And the Sangha, the refuge in the Sangha. To me, there are a couple of pieces around this. First of all, the lineage—the way that we know what the Buddha did and how he taught is because of this lineage of the Sangha, beings who practiced and carried the teachings 2,600 years to us. It's amazing. So much gratitude for that. My colleague Gil Fronsdal says that Dharma is passed from warm hand to warm hand. We can think of this as a lineage of beings that have supported, passed from warm hand to warm hand, for 2,600 years.

And the Sangha also is a support for our practice—here, this is our Sangha. It's lovely to practice in community. There were times when I was sitting retreat, my first long retreats of two months or three months, I would just be sitting with my eyes closed feeling all the dukkha of what I was experiencing. Then I would open my eyes and see somebody sitting calmly. Or at one point I remember watching somebody move their hands very mindfully to a new position. It brought me right back into mindfulness. If they can do it, I can do it. So we support each other here.

One of the ways we support each other and support the world is through a commitment to ethics, a commitment to non-harming. This is what the precepts are really speaking to—that commitment to not harming. Not harming through physical action, refraining from killing living beings. Not harming through taking things that are not freely offered. Not harming through containing our sexual energy. Not harming through speaking falsely—and here, more noble silence. And then not harming ourselves and the possibility of losing clarity of mind through refraining from intoxicants.

These precepts are an ethical ground for our connection in community. And these are not small things. If every human being on the planet decided to refrain from killing living beings, it would be a different world. Completely different world. If everybody decided they would not tell lies, it would be a different world. So these commitments, they're not small things. Honor yourself for committing to them.

It can happen that we do break the precepts. If you find that you have broken a precept—what happened for me at one point on retreat was that I told, I can't remember exactly what it was, but it was a skew to a report that I gave to my teacher. I went to him and said, this is what happened.

I did not speak truthfully in the meeting. And I was in quite a state, actually. I was really in a lot of dukkha over having done this. This was my teacher in Burma—not Sayadaw U Tejaniya, another teacher—and he said, "You need to take the precepts again. You need to take the refuges and precepts again." I said, "Sayadaw, I've done that." And he said, "You need to take them in front of me." So I did. In front of him, I took the refuges and precepts, and he said, "Now your sīla is purified."

That was what I needed to hear—that the act of committing again to the precepts, even if I had broken a precept, the act of committing again purifies the heart. You understand that it was not skillful to have done that. But you take, you commit again. You recommit.

We make it easier here to follow the precepts, since you're not speaking much. It's just easier on retreat. But I definitely found at times, even in the interviews, it would be, "Oh, I did it again. I skewed that report." It was very painful. Very painful. But I learned a lot. I learned a lot about how breaking the precepts harms me, creates the pain here, and how to move forward, how to continue, how to carry on.

So we will take the refuges and precepts now together. Tonight we'll take the five precepts together, and then each night before the dharma talk, we'll take the refuges and precepts together. The dharma talks will be on Tuesday night and on Friday night. Those of you who are taking the eight precepts, we can take the eight precepts on Tuesday night.

The refuges we'll do together in Pali. The precepts we'll do call and response.

Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammā sambuddhassa
Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammā sambuddhassa
Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammā sambuddhassa

Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Dutiyampi Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Dutiyampi Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Dutiyampi Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Tatiyampi Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Tatiyampi Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Tatiyampi Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi

And call and response for the precepts:

Pāṇātipātā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Adinnādānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Abrahmacariyā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Musāvādā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Surāmerayamajjapamādaṭṭhānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi

Idaṃ me sīlaṃ...

That last part means: through my connecting with the precepts, may I find the deepest freedom.

So we'll just do a short sitting, just a few minutes. Finding your way to a posture that feels comfortable, alert, and yet relaxed. We're not going to do a whole scanning of the body for relaxing, but maybe just an invitation for relaxation. Maybe there can be a softening of the body. And maybe a softening of the mind.

Exploring the possibility of receiving with awareness. Whatever is easy, whatever is easy to connect to or receive, what is most simple. It might be something in the body. It might be hearing. Maybe it's the breath. What's being received? Now what's being received?

When we're not directing or aiming the attention, it's quite common for what's being received to change. So maybe for a few moments with the breath, and then with hearing, and then another body sensation, and then maybe a thought. The shifting of the attention is not a problem. We can settle back and allow, as Gil said, let experience come to us. Relax and receive.

The mind will wander into thought or drift off. If we lose mindfulness, not much we can do about that. And yet the moment that we recognize that we have lost mindfulness, in that moment mindfulness is already back. We're aware again already. So what's being received? There's nothing particularly to come back to.

We're already back. So what is awareness receiving?

Relax and receive. Again, allow what's happening, bringing that sense of curiosity to the receiving. What's this experience like? This human experience.

So many of you probably need some rest. You're welcome to take your rest or continue to practice as you wish.

CHAPTER 191

Supports for Continuity

Andrea Fella · 47 min

> In this guided meditation and instruction from a retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella introduces a practice centered on the simple yet profound recognition of awareness itself. Rather than directing attention to a particular object, practitioners are invited to notice what awareness is already receiving—whatever is obvious and easy to know in the present moment.
>
> The talk emphasizes relaxation as a foundational support for this receptive awareness. Fella guides a systematic relaxation through the body, noting how tension in the face and visceral areas directly reflects tension in the mind. She explores how relaxation and receptivity work reciprocally: conscious relaxation supports the capacity to recognize awareness, while resting in receptive awareness naturally brings about further ease and softening.
> A key teaching addresses the moment when mindfulness returns after the mind has wandered. Rather than judging ourselves for losing awareness, Fella encourages curiosity about this return—seeing it as a precious opportunity to recognize what it feels like to be aware. She uses the metaphor of waking up on a new planet, inviting practitioners to explore the mental landscape that was constructed during wandering. This includes checking our attitude: How are we relating to what's happening? Is there wanting, aversion, or perhaps an unexpected calm? By releasing judgment and cultivating curiosity, the recognition of awareness itself becomes a support for its continuity, creating a natural, effortless quality to practice.

I will start this morning settling in with the sitting, and I will offer some reminders about this method of practice that we're offering.

Our basic exploration is recognizing that we're aware. This capacity to recognize that we're aware and to be curious about our experience as experience is supported by relaxation. Especially at the beginning of a retreat, it can be helpful to consciously connect with a relaxation of body, a relaxation of mind. It takes some time to allow for relaxation, and so we'll do this in a kind of systematic way again today.

Opening to the sensations of your head and face, see if there can be a softening. The face in particular has a very direct connection to the mind. If there's tension in the mind, it can be expressed in tension in the face. Relaxing tension in the muscles of the face can allow for a natural softening in the mind. Soften the muscles around the eyes, the mouth, the jaw. Allow for a relaxation of the neck and shoulders. A softening of the arms and hands. Maybe there can be a relaxation of the chest and upper back, all of those muscles around the rib cage. Perhaps there can be a relaxation, a letting go of tension across the stomach and abdomen, in the middle and lower back. Relaxing in the hips, maybe inside the hip socket. Maybe there can be a softening of the legs and the feet.

I also find it helpful to explore the possibility of relaxing inside the body. Perhaps there can be a softening inside the throat. A softening, a relaxation of the heart, the area around the heart. Maybe the stomach and the intestines can relax, all those organs inside the body. This area too is very connected to the mind, and so a relaxation of this inner landscape, this visceral area of the body, can support a softening in the mind, a relaxation of tension in the mind. Maybe too there can be an invitation for the mind to relax. As my colleague Gil Fronsdal suggests, as if the brain were a muscle, maybe the brain can relax.

Having explored a relaxation of body, of what might be possible to consciously release, I sometimes find it useful to just drop in again an invitation for there to be relaxation. May the body relax. And then just see how the mind and body respond to that invitation. Not trying to do anything, just seeing what happens as you drop in that invitation. May the body relax. I sometimes find with that kind of invitation some tension releases that I didn't even know was held until it has released. May the body relax. May the mind relax.

We've been connecting with awareness through this process of relaxation, being aware of various areas of tension and release. And now, allowing for a connection with the recognition: Are you aware? This is simple. Don't look too hard for it. In fact, looking for it will probably make it harder to recognize.

Just aware. Just knowing.

And yet often, especially at the beginning, it's easier to recognize awareness when we notice that we are aware of something. This can also be a doorway. So what is awareness aware of? What is being received?

There's no need to choose something to pay attention to. There will be something awareness is already receiving. What is obvious? What is easy to know? It may be the breath or body sensations, hearing—whatever is being received.

Exploring the possibility of allowing. It's just physical or mental phenomena happening in this human body. We are exploring this human experience, getting to know it like a naturalist in nature. What's showing up? It may be anything in our body, mental and physical processes. It could be thoughts or emotions.

Settling back, maybe with the feeling of experience coming to you. Sometimes it can feel that way. Sometimes it can feel like awareness is following the attention, kind of moving where the attention is. It's just a different experience that can happen. There's not a right way. It's noticing how awareness is receiving.

And recognizing that with this shifting of the attention, it's not a problem that the attention shifts. It may at times settle with one experience for a while, and at times it may move more quickly. We don't have to know all the details of what the awareness is landing with. Whatever is obvious is enough.

Sometimes I have the feeling of just resting and receiving. I remind myself: let awareness do its job. I don't have to do that. Awareness will be aware. That's its function.

Are you aware? What is obvious? What is awareness already receiving?

If you notice that the attention gravitates to a familiar meditation experience like the breath, that's fine. Just noticing the difference between when that happens naturally—it can feel very effortless—and when it feels like we start to do that attending. Notice the difference there between receiving the experience and directing the attention to it. If you notice a directing of the attention, there is likely some tension with that. So perhaps remembering relaxation. Relaxing, receiving.

And awareness will get caught, will lose mindfulness, will lose awareness, be lost in thinking or lost in a state. At some point, mindfulness will return. In that return, some curiosity about the experience of becoming aware again. It's a great moment to begin to get really familiar with what it's like to be aware.

That awareness will be aware of something, likely something connected with where the wandering went. We don't need to judge that. It's conditions. It's the conditioned nature of the mind.

And so opening to what's here now, in this moment. It's kind of like the wandering creates a landscape in the mind, a new world that we haven't been clearly aware of because the mindfulness was lost. But in the return of mindfulness, we're often waking up into that landscape.

So what's the landscape like? We're a naturalist on a new planet. What planet are we on?

This is recognizing the effect. This is seeing the conditioning, how the mind has been conditioned. It's not a mistake. It's not a problem. It can be received. It is being received in awareness. Are you aware? What is obvious? What's easy? What is awareness already aware of?

And from time to time, we check the relationship. How are we with what is happening? What's the attitude, as Sayadaw would say? Do you want something to happen? Want something to stop happening? Is there confusion? Or maybe there's an ease, an okayness, a balance of mind.

Checking the attitude can be done with a simple question: How am I with what's happening? Again, it's an invitation. It's not that we're looking for something specific. It's an invitation for an attitude to show up, to be more clearly recognized. Sometimes we don't necessarily recognize an attitude, and that's okay. Just continue noticing what's obvious.

Often I find that in asking a question like that, sometimes an answer appears as a word in the mind or a sentence. But more often it actually appears through a shift in the experience, a recognition of, "Oh, this is arising also. This is also here, and it hadn't been clearly seen." Maybe there's a recognition of some tension around a pushing away. "Oh, there's aversion." It may not be expressed in words in the mind. So in checking the attitude, simply notice the experience. We drop in that invitation and keep noticing what's here, what's obvious.

Fundamentally, this practice is extremely simple. Very little to do. Just a light touch of effort to connect—aware of what? Aware of what?

Relaxation, as I've said several times, is so helpful. It's a helpful condition that supports our capacity to recognize that we're aware, to have this receptive aspect, this receptive awareness. At the beginning, it is helpful to consciously relax. And as we continue in this exploration of recognizing awareness and allowing, receiving what's here, what I find is that connecting with that receptivity quite naturally brings relaxation into the experience.

So it goes both ways. The relaxation supports the receptivity, and the receptivity supports a relaxation. You may find that starting with just what's here and noticing, "Oh, there's some tension," quite naturally that tension releases.

I mentioned in the meditation about when the mind wanders—we wake up at some point, and noticing the return of mindfulness, that moment when we become aware again, how important that moment is to begin to see, to recognize the experience of awareness, what it feels like to be aware.

If we're not judging ourselves for having gotten lost, it's much easier to notice that return of mindfulness. At one point, I began to get really curious about that experience of the return. And just that curiosity really helped to release the judgment around the fact that the mind wandered, because if in a 45-minute sitting the mind wandered a hundred times, that was a hundred opportunities to see awareness returning and to get familiar with that experience—what it's like to be aware.

The recognition, getting familiar with what it's like to be aware, will be a support for the continuing of the awareness.

And in the waking up after the mind has wandered, as I mentioned, it's like when the mind wanders it can wander off into some thought or fantasy or memory of something we were doing yesterday or an experience last week when we were not here. It can be wandering off into something, and the constructing power of the mind is so powerful. So when we wake up, we often get to see what has been constructed while the mind was wandering. We're waking up into something that has been shaped by the conditioned nature of our minds. The mind wandered—perhaps it heard a sound, and that sound reminded us of something, and that reminding allowed a memory to arise, but we got lost somewhere in that process instead of being aware of it.

And so when mindfulness returns, we can see what had been shaped. I often use this analogy of the mind creating a planet, just a whole world while it's wandering. And our exploration when mindfulness returns is to be curious: What planet am I on now? Is it planet confusion? Planet fun? Planet frustration? And then just feeling that. What's that like? Can that be received? Can that be allowed?

Noticing the attitude is a really useful practice after returning from wandering. We often have not only a relationship to the fact of the wandering itself, but we may have relationships to what it wandered into. A feeling like "that was a waste of time." Okay, that's what's arising now—that attitude.

Sometimes when the mind wanders—and I've seen this happen more often than I would have expected when I first started getting curious about what had been shaped by the mind wandering and began to lose the judgment about it—sometimes when the mind wanders, it wanders into calm. It wanders into ease. For me it was kind of like the mind saying, "Hey, you're working too hard. Let me show you how to relax." And it would get lost in that relaxing, and then there would be a coming back into awareness and being curious: Oh, what planet was I on? I was on planet calm. Okay, that's what's here now.

If we're judging ourselves for the wandering itself, that judgment will probably obliterate the calm. So just really be curious about what's here. What's here in each moment.

CHAPTER 192

Continuity

Andrea Fella · 53 min

> In this guided meditation and teaching from the Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella offers profound yet practical instructions on maintaining continuity of awareness. She emphasizes the simplicity at the heart of practice: asking "Are you aware?" and "What's obvious?" rather than trying to create special states or particular experiences.
>
> A significant portion of this talk explores the relationship between awareness and thinking—a territory where many meditators struggle. Fella clarifies why thoughts often seem to disappear when we try to observe them: the directing or aiming quality of attention (vitakka in Pāli) uses the same mental energy as thinking itself. She distinguishes this directed attention from the receptive quality of awareness that can know thinking while it's happening, observing how thought content shapes emotions, body sensations, and subsequent mental formations (saṅkhārā).
>
> Fella describes various ways thoughts manifest—as inner speech, images, or even through other sense modalities—and addresses the hypnagogic, daydreamy quality of mind that often arises as practice settles. Throughout, she repeatedly emphasizes that nothing she describes is something to "do"; rather, these are descriptions of what can naturally be noticed. This teaching illuminates how understanding the conditioned nature of experience leads to a natural weakening of unwholesome qualities and strengthening of wholesome ones, all through simple, receptive awareness.

Are you aware? What's obvious? What's easy? What is already being received?

It doesn't matter what the experience is. We can be aware with any experience. We can be aware when the attention rests with one experience for a while, or when it's shifting from experience to experience. Every experience offers an opportunity to learn curiosity about experience as experience.

If it feels like there's a struggle, any tension about connecting with experience, notice the relationship. Check the attitude. Be curious about what perspective is here. If checking the attitude, noticing the relationship, allows something new to be seen—something that had been hidden—then that too is just another experience, another happening.

Notice the return of awareness. If the mind has wandered and woken up again, recognize that re-arising of awareness. Aware again.

Quite often the mind wanders, gets hooked, and part of that being hooked and losing mindfulness is often connected to the process of thinking. And thinking itself is not inherently an experience that we can't be mindful of, like any other experience. It's just an arising phenomenon that awareness can know, can connect with. You can be curious about the experience of thoughts, of thinking. A simple recognition: thinking is happening.

Sometimes the recognition might be a little more specific—the kind of thinking that's happening. But we don't have to try to do this or label this. Mind can just open to the recognition that thinking is happening. Often Sayadaw will say, "Can you know a thought is a thought? Can you know a thought is just a thought?"

Sometimes thoughts are pretty potent. They have a pull. There's strong content that's attaching or interesting the mind—the content of the thought. And if the content is compelling, it can be really useful to recognize that this content, the contour of the nature of the thought, is shaping our experience. Thoughts about a conversation with a friend—that content will have an effect, likely an effect on us, conditioning emotions, conditioning body sensations. And so, some curiosity: How is this thought affecting the body and mind?

Sometimes the content is less strong, not particularly compelling. We can have some curiosity about how we know we are thinking. How is the thought appearing? Is it as if we're speaking to ourselves? As if someone else is speaking to us? Images? Sometimes even a felt sense in the body, a kinesthetic experience. We can recognize how thoughts are happening, how they are experienced.

We can also be curious—and this is very interesting with thoughts that are more random or drifty or daydreamy—to be curious about the quality of the mind that is having those thoughts. It can be spacious, easeful, calm. And often we kind of just lose awareness, drifting off into those states, the quality of the mind. Yet we can be clearly aware of the calm, the ease, the spaciousness.

Not looking for any particular experience, not trying to create a special state. Whatever is present can be received, is being received. The practice is so simple. Are you aware? What is awareness receiving?

Sometimes in exploring being aware with thinking, people describe that when they notice a thought, the thought goes away, and so they've been confused about how they can actually know thinking while it's happening. What I would say is that that kind of observation—it's more about how the mind is looking at the experience. If we're directing or aiming to look at a thought, and the practice of noting is doing that, like naming "thinking" or "planning" or "remembering," it's a directing, it's an aiming, often. And that very activity of aiming uses the same energy in the mind that thinking uses. And so it takes the energy out of the thought. That way of observing will naturally cause the thought to tend to disappear. The very word in Pali for that aiming or directing of the attention is vitakka.

It's also translated as thought or thinking. So that energy of aiming will tend to create the conditions for a thought to go away. This can be very useful. This is partly how the mind can settle with a more concentration practice.

And yet we are also interested, especially in this style of practice, in learning how to be aware with all experience. The kind of awareness that can know thinking while it's happening is receptive. A receiving quality can simply know what's arising in that awareness, including thought, and be aware in the recognition of that arising—how it's affecting other experience.

So there's this curiosity about being aware with thinking and how thinking, especially the content, has a very potent conditioning power in the mind. We become curious not so much about what the content is, although that can be apparent as we become aware with thinking, but about how that content is affecting emotions, affecting the body. This is seeing the conditioning power, the shaping power of thoughts—the shaping power of mental formations.

Mental formations are a functioning of mind that shapes all of experience. They shape how our body is, the quality of the feeling tone, what we're perceiving. They shape other mental formations, so the content of a thought can shape an emotion. And they can also shape what we tend to notice, where the attention goes, what consciousness meets. So it's a very powerful shaping quality, and this is useful to notice.

Noticing the conditioned nature of experience, we begin to recognize and understand what qualities of heart and mind shape unhelpful suffering, unskillful experience, unwholesome qualities of mind—and what shapes the wholesome. Quite naturally there will be a weakening of the unwholesome and a strengthening of the wholesome in the seeing of these processes, in the seeing of this conditioned nature.

When content is less strong, we can be curious about the process of how thinking is happening. A certain level or layer of thoughts often feels as if we're speaking to ourselves, talking to ourselves. Sometimes we can notice it's like somebody else's voice, or like a radio playing—we're hearing somebody else speaking to us. It might be images. Thoughts can be experienced through any sense modality. Often, I think, it is through sound and sight, as if we are seeing or hearing our thoughts. Now, it's not really that seeing and hearing are happening, but they're expressing themselves in that way.

We can notice this—the process of how thinking is happening. It can also be as if we're smelling something. This for me is much rarer, but I have experienced it: there's a smell, and it's like I'm actually smelling something, and then I realize, no, that's a thought. Physically too—sometimes a thought can be experienced as if we're doing something. This was how I practiced my dances when I was a dancer: thinking the feeling. Any sense modality, we can be curious about how thoughts are arising. And sometimes that's what's obvious.

Again, this isn't something to try to do. This is more of a naming of things that can be noticed. I'll probably say this multiple times. Certainly Sayadaw said it to me several times, because I would hear what he talked about and then go try to do it. I'd come back and report either my struggle or my success, and he would say, "Are you trying to do that?" And I would say, "Yeah, I thought that's what you suggested." And he'd say, "Nothing I say is anything for you to do. It's simply a description of things that can be noticed."

It's useful to describe or to hear different things that can be seen, because sometimes the descriptions will help us recognize: oh, that's actually what is already being noticed, but it hadn't been clearly recognized until it was named. So this description around noticing the way thinking is happening—you don't have to try to do this. Just continue simple, simple practice. What's arising? What are you noticing? What's naturally being noticed? This information, this sharing, is a condition that may allow you to recognize something different in your experience.

Another piece around thinking: often, especially as the practice begins to settle, as the mind begins to settle, it's not discursive thinking that's happening but rather daydreamy images, hypnagogic states—that quality of just random, seemingly random thoughts coming through about people we don't know, things happening we don't particularly care about. Just imagery, or words even, kind of funny random words appearing in the mind. When that kind of thinking is happening—

there's usually a quality to the mind that's pretty relaxed, pretty spacious. And so that can be recognized. Sometimes we get lost in the relaxed, spacious quality of mind. It's like those hypnagogic images are almost a sign of the mindfulness weakening a little bit, because the mind is getting caught in the state itself.

So the recognition of the quality of the mind can brighten the mindfulness. If you kind of wake up noticing those hypnagogic images, if you're waking up into those, notice the quality of the mind that's already happening. It's just available. It's available to be recognized. And again, not something to do—it's something that can be seen, something that can be recognized.

A couple of you have asked about reading. There are some books by Sayadaw U Tejaniya in the library. There are a limited number of those books, and so I'd like to encourage you not to keep them in your room for the retreat, but to share them with each other. We are going to order a couple more copies so that they're available.

I would also encourage, if you do reading, to do it sparingly. Maybe just a paragraph. And while you're doing that, see if you can notice—these are thoughts, this is content that you are taking in. This is a way of exploring a relationship to content. Read a sentence. How does that content affect your experience? Does it brighten the mind? Does it allow you to recognize the awareness? Reading a few sentences and noticing how it affects you.

I recently published a book that we're going to have about four or five copies available in the library as well. And I will give you a copy when you go. I don't want you just reading the books during the retreat. They'll be available in the library—you can, again, sparingly read. And you don't even have to read. I feel like we are offering you plenty. But some people tend to learn with that modality, so it's available if you wish. But do keep in mind that there are a limited number of those books, so please share.

CHAPTER 193

Recognizing Delusion

Andrea Fella · 1h05

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines delusion (moha) as the most foundational of the unwholesome roots, explaining that greed and aversion cannot arise without delusion underlying them. She identifies three distinct levels: the familiar disconnection or 'checked out' quality when mindfulness lapses; personal delusions shaped by our conditioning, culture, and family that function as unexamined views; and the deepest level —the universal human tendencies to perceive what is impermanent as permanent, what is unreliable as reliable, and what is not-self as self.
>
> Fella offers practical guidance for recognizing each level, drawing on the Buddha's teaching of 'gratification, danger, and escape' to investigate how long sense pleasures actually last, and exploring the three flavors of self-identification: 'this is mine' (ownership), 'this I am' (the agent or doer), and 'this is myself' (the passive recipient of experience). She emphasizes that delusion doesn't obscure the object of experience but rather obscures its true nature—its impermanent, unreliable, and not-self characteristics.
> The talk concludes with an encouraging perspective on the path: while insights into the delusory nature of experience may feel obvious in moments of clarity, delusion will return—yet each time it does, we can recognize it more clearly. Through patient practice, these veils gradually thin, and we learn to meet even the mind's persistent searching for solidity with tenderness rather than resistance.

We've been talking about checking the attitude, and there are four basic flavors of attitude: those associated with or in the bucket of greed, of desire, of wanting, leaning toward; those in the field or terrain of aversion, wanting to get rid of, to push away; those in the field of delusion, which is the topic of tonight's talk; and those in the terrain of basically balance of mind, wise thinking, wise attitude—that perspective that allows us to be at ease with whatever is happening.

They are all worth recognizing. I'd say that greed and aversion are usually the most familiar. We know what those feel like. We are pretty clear when those are present. Greed is that kind of leaning toward. There's often a visceral sense of reaching out, wanting, a grasping toward. Aversion is that pushing away or wanting to get rid of.

Delusion can be harder to recognize. But in a way, it's more foundational than the other two. Greed and aversion would not arise if it were not for delusion. So there's delusion embedded in the movement to want to hold on or grasp onto something, and in the movement to want to push away something. Delusion is all over the place, but often it's harder to recognize.

Sometimes people have the idea or the belief that we can't really see delusion, that it's one of those things we can't see—that in its very nature, if there's delusion in the mind, it means we're not mindful. That is not the case. We can begin to recognize delusion functioning. And then it's no longer driving the mind in the way it was. When we see greed as greed, it's no longer driving the mind in the direction of that wanting. When we see delusion as delusion, it's no longer obscuring the mind. It's no longer functioning as a filter or a confused perspective on experience.

So partly this talk is information about how delusion works, and ways that we can begin to be curious about recognizing it so that we can start to see it.

There are different levels to delusion. The most obvious, or the one that most people are more familiar with, is a kind of checked-out quality, a disconnection—just not being aware. That space where we're not aware, there is delusion happening there. That one is harder to see directly, but we can see it when the mindfulness returns. And we can begin to see flavors of that quality of being checked out: spaciness, dullness, and so forth.

The next level down is more what I'll call personal delusion. It's delusions that have been shaped by our personal lives, by our cultures, by our families—ways that we think the world works that are basically views or perspectives we're not seeing as views or perspectives. This is one of the key ways that delusion functions: there's something happening in the mind, a belief or a view or a perspective, that's not seen as a belief. So we're just taking it to be truth. We're taking it to be how things are, how things are supposed to be.

These can be shaped in simple ways. Our culture, for instance—whatever culture we grow up in, whether it's familial or the broader culture—there are some basic, familiar ways that we learn about how close to stand to somebody that we don't know, or how much eye contact we make with them, or whether we touch somebody we don't know. These things are just embedded in how we interact, and nobody sits us down and tells us this is what we do. We just absorb it. Many views come in this way. It's not like somebody has taught us these views; they've been more absorbed through seeing how people interact with each other.

These kinds of views we can begin to recognize as perspectives, sometimes when they're challenged. When I was younger, I really enjoyed traveling around the world, and I found those edges fascinating—seeing where things were different, where this is not the way I'm used to interacting with a stranger, for instance.

So those are kind of neutral views in some way, and wars have been fought over less. These personal views, perspectives around how we interact with each other, what we believe about each other—this is the realm of this middle level of delusion, and it creates a lot of suffering.

But the most insidious level is the set of delusions that we share as human beings. At that middle level, we share the processes by which delusion works: this picking up of a view and believing it, thinking that this is the way the world should work or the way the world works, and not recognizing it as a perspective or as a view. That's a similar way that delusion functions across cultures, but they're different flavors of beliefs or perspectives that are picked up. At the more insidious level, the deepest level of delusion, are delusions that we share as human beings.

These misperceptions seem to be woven into the very fabric of our being, and to some extent into our biology, into how our senses function. These are the three basic misperceptions: we tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent; we tend to take what is unreliable to be reliable, or what is suffering to be pleasurable; and we tend to take what is not self to be self. I'll spend the most time on this third one, but let me say a little about those first two as well.

The first one involves a lack of awareness, a disconnection from experience. This happens to us all the time. When we get lost in thought, when the mind is pulled into thinking, we are not aware of what's happening. We become absorbed into a world. That absorption into that world, and to some extent believing that world—that's delusion. When mindfulness returns, we often can recognize, "Oh, wow, I've been lost in thought." Although sometimes we stay believing those thoughts.

I had one partner where I would find myself lost in thoughts, thinking about things he might do and getting angry at him for things he might do. And then I'd wake up and recognize, "He didn't do this." But then I'd think, "But he could. He could do those things." And so the anger was still bubbling, even though I saw that I was now aware those were just thoughts. Sometimes even that imagined world creates a perspective we hold on to.

So this form of delusion we can really begin to get curious about in that moment when mindfulness returns. When mindfulness returns, as I've said, we have that sense of what it was like in the moments before—to not be aware, to be lost. In that return of mindfulness, we get the flavor of that mind that feels disconnected. We may even begin, through that recognition, through mindfulness returning and seeing that quality of the disconnected mind that was present moments before, to recognize the feeling of the mind starting to disconnect, the movement in that direction. We can begin to be attuned to that quality of checking out or moving into disconnection.

Doubt is also a flavor of this quality—doubt in the practice, doubt in our capacity. When these states are not seen, we're caught by that view of doubt. We believe, "I can't do this," or "Everybody else can do this and I can't," or "I'm failing." In that case, doubt isn't really obscuring our experience. We're still aware; we're just doubting our capacity, doubting whether we're doing it right. The doubt is functioning more as a perspective, as a view. When that view is not seen, we're caught in that wavering feeling: "Should I do this? Should I do that? How can I do this? I'm not doing this right." We're caught in that.

But if we can see, "Oh, what is happening is that doubt is arising," then it's no longer functioning as doubt. It's no longer in the way of the practice. It is just another experience. Any experience will do. It's an impermanent, constructed phenomenon that reveals the nature of experience. None of what I'm talking about here is a problem when it's seen. It's not in the way. But it does need to be seen, and delusion is particularly hard to see—hence this talk.

The second level of delusion concerns our views that are created or shaped by our lives, by our conditioning—our personal conditioning, our familial conditioning, our social conditioning in our schools or workplaces. We get immersed into a particular culture or setting, and people in that setting interact in certain ways. As I said a few minutes ago, we absorb that culture.

We have a culture here that, I think, the first time I landed in a culture like this, I thought was pretty strange. You don't make much eye contact, you don't talk. It felt very strange, and I felt very uncomfortable. But over time, I learned to really appreciate the value of some aspects of this culture and absorbed its flavor.

So we absorb these—what's the right word?—these ways of interacting with each other. That's not a problem in itself. We have shared agreements here. But where it does become a problem is when we don't understand that this is a shared agreement and we begin applying it elsewhere, in other situations. We pick it up as being the way things are supposed to be, rather than seeing it as appropriate for a particular context.

We're seeing it as simply the way things are supposed to be.

We pick up these views through a kind of absorption. When we're in a family culture, when we're in a particular culture from a very young age, we pick up some of these views without any articulation for them. They're just what we know, how we live our lives. This becomes a perspective that we bring to our experience, and that particular perspective begins to filter how we receive experience.

We have a belief or a view about something. And because that belief or view has been so embedded in us, the way our minds tend to work is that we see things that confirm that view, and we actively don't see things that disconfirm it. This is a well-documented psychological phenomenon called confirmation bias. The Buddha's languaging of this, from way before that term existed, is: whatever one frequently ponders becomes the inclination of the mind. Frequently pondering doesn't necessarily mean consciously thinking about something, but being in the field of something over and over again. It becomes how we orient to the world.

Again, views are not inherently problematic, but they become problematic—they create suffering—when we run into people holding different views. In this country, all over the world really, people holding different views about religion, about immigration, about political things—this is generating war. It's generating a lot of suffering in the world. This is not a small kind of suffering. It's not a small thing to begin to recognize: oh, this is a view that's being held. It's not necessarily absolute truth. It's one way of looking at the situation.

When we can recognize a view as a view, there's a little bit of space to understand it's not necessarily absolute truth—it's a perspective. That can create conditions for a little more room to have conversation, to navigate different perspectives. Views will happen. We need to recognize that they are views. This is part of the power of the question, to check from time to time: what is being believed?

Some of our own suffering, as I mentioned earlier, my tendency towards self-hatred was ultimately seen as a thought that was being believed. "I'm a failure. I'm no good. I'm not worthy of being loved." That perspective. Now, the thought or belief itself was not where the potency was—it was in the strength of the belief that it was so potent.

So much of our suffering around greed and aversion contains beliefs. There are views embedded in greed and aversion. Greed itself is that leaning towards, that reaching out, that tendency to want to latch on. Aversion is that pushing away, wanting to separate from. Each of those has its own view, and without the view, the greed or aversion would not be happening.

Within greed is the perspective: getting that thing will make me happy. That belief is not itself felt as a belief—it's just true. If I get that thing, I'll be happy. And in aversion, the perspective is: if I get rid of that thing, I'll be happy. Seeing or recognizing that thought doesn't necessarily feel like aversion. It just feels true. That unpleasant thing is in the way of being happy. I need to get rid of it in order to be happy.

There are beliefs embedded in greed and aversion. Most, if not all—I think all—of our suffering, when we are suffering, there is some kind of delusion at work. There's some kind of belief or view at work that's not clearly being seen. When we can really feel the quality of the emotional suffering, however that suffering is being felt—this is what I've seen for myself in the practice.

When I can really feel into that without resistance, when I can know it, it's like, "Yep, there it is. It feels like this." And it feels like it's okay to be with it. It's not pleasant necessarily, but it feels fine to hold it and meet it.

When I can hang out with some kind of dukkha, even for not very long—a minute or so—that can be a useful time to bring in that kind of question. Because it feels to me like being able to be with the dukkha, being able to be with the aversion, being able to be with the greed—when we can hang with the experience, feel into it, it's a place or a way of being with experience that allows for potentially something to be seen that hadn't been seen before.

So: what's being believed? Or a broader question: anything else want to show up? Just opening to something else. In that space where we can meet experience, we're inviting something that had perhaps been a little repressed. We're willing to see whatever wants to be here.

When those beliefs are not seen, that's the delusion. When they're seen, we can recognize, "Oh, that believing is happening."

I also find it useful, in that space of recognizing there's a belief happening here, to look more closely. Because sometimes when we see a particular belief, it can be like, "Yeah, I can see why the three-year-old me believed that, but I don't even consciously believe this anymore." And if we see that, we may think of just dismissing it: "Yeah, yeah, I know this isn't true. This belief is silly." But some part of the system is believing it. So not to dismiss the belief, but to really acknowledge: okay, this is being believed. This is the experience of believing this.

I find it interesting at times to see just how strong the belief is. Am I really on board with that one? Or is it that kind of place where I can see I don't consciously believe this, but at a deeper level, there's something saying, "Yeah, this is true. I am no good. I am a failure." I could see objectively I wasn't a failure, but it didn't mean that I didn't feel that way.

Now, the deepest level of delusion—the third level—these are delusions we share as human beings, quite fundamentally. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable to be reliable as a place for lasting happiness. And we tend to take what is not self to be self.

You probably recognize these as the flip side of what is often talked about as the characteristics of experience: that the nature of experience is impermanent, unreliable or dukkha, and not self. But what our minds do is attribute permanence, attribute reliability, attribute self to experience.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya says delusion doesn't obscure the object—it obscures the nature of the object. When delusion functions in this way, when we're taking something impermanent to be permanent, we're still knowing the object, but we're seeing it in a distorted way. We're attributing something to it that is not in its nature. And we will suffer because its nature is impermanent. Attributing the nature of permanence to it and thinking we can find happiness by holding on to it, we will suffer because it is going to fall apart.

In terms of taking what is impermanent to be permanent, there are so many pieces of our human system that create this tendency to believe in the solidity or stability of things—just the way our perceptual system works. When I'm looking around the room here, what I perceive is stability of the floor and all of you seated on the floor. But if I had a camera moving the way my head was moving, it would look kind of jumpy. There's a perceptual process that creates the sense of stability.

Our perceptual processes also take in rapidly changing information. We know this through how the eye works—the eyes receiving little bits of light and putting together an image. It's just like pixels. It's not anything whole. Our minds have this capacity to stabilize, and it's actually helpful. It's kind of helpful not to feel like we're walking on a moving ship all the time.

There was this exhibit at a science center in San Francisco that I went to with my nephew when he was ten. We walked in, and in the back of the building, kind of across the way, there were all these bars hanging up on the ceiling.

And they were probably six feet high and maybe three inches around, and they had flashing lights on them. There were about fifteen or twenty of these bars, spaced about two feet apart. So there were a whole bunch of these bars, and that's what I noticed—these flashing lights on these bars. I thought, "I wonder what that is. I'll have to check that out later."

At a certain point, we were sitting down having a drink, resting our feet, and my nephew kind of looked up. He said, "Oh, it's a school bus." And I looked up and saw flashing lights. I said, "What? What are you talking about?" He said, "Oh, now it's butterflies." What are you talking about?

So I had to stand there and let my eyes relax. At a certain point, I could see it—it turned into the perceptual processes. It's entirely perceptual, the way this thing works. I could see the entire place where the bars were hanging, like it turned into a screen. And across that screen, I could see a school bus driving. It's kind of like what you might see if you had slits in a fence and something drove past it. Your mind carries the image from one to the next, to the next, to the next. I think it's called persistence of vision. That's how the perception worked, and it created this illusion of a thing up there.

I mean, I knew there was no school bus up there. It was only flashing lights. But it was so detailed—I could see the name of the school district on the side of the school bus from those little pixels of information flashing past.

So this is the power of our human system to create stability. Of course we confuse. Of course this happens. Of course we think there's stability. Of course we believe we should be able to find it.

Another way that impermanence is masked—so our perceptual systems will mask impermanence, kind of hide it from us—is that we tend to relate to experience through concept. For instance, our hand. We relate to our body often through concepts of our body. If we just look at our hand and think about it as a hand—what it does, how it touches things and reaches things—that's creating an idea that we are meeting experience through.

Now if we, just right now, let our attention rest in the hand and feel what that experience is like, it's probably quite a dynamic sense. Maybe pulsing, tingling, prickling, moisture—there's a lot of different sensations going on. And then think about it again as a hand that does things. When I do that, it's like I lose touch with those sensations. I have to work when I'm thinking about it as a hand to stay in touch with the sensations.

This sense of relating to experience through concept is a very powerful delusory function in our minds. We tend to meet experience not through direct contact with it, or even direct recognition of how it's being reflected in our minds, but through an idea, through a concept. We meet people through concepts. We meet meals through concept. We meet pretty much everything through concept.

So there can be a curiosity around: What is it that you're taking to be solid? What is it that feels like it might be permanent or solid or stable? When we start to look for solidity, there are times in the practice where there's a tendency to be searching for someplace we can land on. As we start to really feel into the impermanent nature of experience, our minds are just so wanting there to be some kind of solidity that we'll be looking, looking, looking for some place that's solid.

The encouragement in practice is: if it feels like there's something solid, have some curiosity. That pain in your knee—is it really solid? This was for me a kind of a place of curiosity for a while. When it felt like there was something solid, I would say, "Okay, let's feel that. What is that solidity?"

How does it feel? Is it really solid?

We sometimes take what is unreliable to be reliable, what is suffering to be happiness. And this is really a corollary in many ways to the impermanent nature of experience. When we take things to be permanent or stable, we believe that there's a lasting happiness that can be found by holding on to those things. The unreliability inherent in the nature of experience—its impermanence—makes it unreliable as a place where we can find lasting happiness. There's no experience in our bodies and minds that lasts more than a split second. And yet our minds are constantly trying to put things together and hold on to them.

It kind of feels like our minds think sense pleasure is as good as it gets. And that's, again, basically what we've learned through our lives—that's where we find happiness. If I get what I want, I will feel ease. I will feel better. I'll feel happiness.

The Buddha had a great teaching to help us recognize that trying to find happiness in unstable places is not ultimately reliable. This teaching is called gratification, danger, and escape. He suggested—he said—yes, we do experience pleasure when we get what we want. We experience pleasure with respect to sense experience. But rather than saying "don't do that," he said notice how far that gratification extends. Essentially, how long does it last when we feel gratified by having a sense pleasure? How long does it actually last?

Sometimes it can last surprisingly long. I played with this around chocolate and discovered that chocolate really works with my system. I get a real hit of the pleasure of the taste, and then there's something else that happens—a deep relaxation or something. The endorphins, I don't know what it is, but it feels pretty good. A piece of chocolate, if I'm not just shoving it in my mouth but actually tasting it and really meeting that chocolate—the pleasure of that chocolate can last about 45 seconds. I thought that was pretty long, actually. But it doesn't last longer than that.

So this is an interesting thing to play with. Not to make something bad around experiencing sense pleasure, but to notice. I began to see in my early explorations of this how in those first few moments of getting that hit of chocolate, there was the belief: yes, this is going to do it for me. Now, I knew intellectually it wasn't true, but some part of the system was like, yes, this is so good.

That exploration—how long does it last—helps us to see, again not to make a problem about it, but to see what happens when that pleasure ends. Do you reach for the next piece of chocolate? Is it looking for pleasure again where it's just going to be the next thing, the next thing?

I think this is how we tend to live our lives. It's like we're stringing together pearls on a necklace. If I can just keep stringing together pleasant experience after pleasant experience, that would be a life worth living. But it takes so much work. There's so much suffering in the orienting around getting, getting, getting, getting rid of, getting rid of.

So, some curiosity: what are you relying on for happiness? How reliable is it? The Dharma is a way of relying on something different—a different way of relying. It's not demanding any particular experience or any particular thing. It's landing with, or just streaming with, the changing nature of experience and not resisting that this is the nature of experience—this changing, impermanent, unreliable flow of experiences.

And then there's the third tendency: we tend to take what is not-self to be self. I'm not going to try to do a whole not-self teaching here. But this is basically, again, a misattribution. We tend to attribute to our processes of body and mind—this tumbling on of causes and conditions—we attribute a self to what is simply causes and conditions unfolding. Again, it's a kind of reification.

We're attributing something that's stable, that's permanent, that's reliable to this stream and saying, "That's me. That's who I am."

The basic exploration around this is to be curious when it feels like there is a sense of self arising—again, not to try to find not-self. There's that famous quote of Dogen: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be awakened by all things."

So we are curious about what—like with the other two—we are curious about what are we taking to be solid? What are we taking to be reliable? What are we taking to be self? When it feels like a sense of self is arising, what is that experience? How long does that last?

That's kind of fun to watch too. We think of the sense of self as being this stable thing that's always here, but when we start looking at it, we discover there are so many different senses of self, and they have no relationship to each other.

I was at IMS, practicing with a sense of self—at the time I was about forty years old, and I was right. I knew the right way that people should be doing things and how they should be asking questions in the hall, and this other person in the hall was asking questions in a way they should not be asking questions, and I was suffering. I was feeling the suffering of this analytical, argumentative self, and it was so familiar. It felt so heavy and so like me. But I was just watching it.

And then conditions shifted. A big truck drove up in front of IMS, and it had loud brakes and it crashed to a stop, and the doors banged, and I was standing right next to it, and I turned into a two-year-old. "Wow, it's a truck!" Split second—one identity to another. There was no relationship between these two.

Another time I was having a meal and feeling depressed, just feeling that depression, and then suddenly something else happened. It was like, "Oh, that's gone. Where did that go?"

So notice when there's identification. Notice when there's a sense of self. And again, see how long is it actually lasting?

There's so much evidence for not-self. This is one of those confirmation bias things—because we have this view that we're a self, we find evidence all over the place for a sense of self. But when we start being curious about not-self, there is also a lot of evidence for not-self.

The simple fact of the wandering mind. You sit down and meditate, tell yourself you're going to be present, and the mind wanders. You didn't decide for that to happen. It happened. That's evidence for non-self. The mindfulness returns—who did that? You didn't make that happen either. That was conditions coming together. But we give ourselves credit for it. "I did that." The sense of self sometimes is like this after-the-fact attribution. An intention arose, and then, "Oh, I did that."

But we can start seeing how the system is doing its taking-care-of-itself work. We sit for a while, we get a full bladder, there's an intention to stand and relieve the pressure. That can all happen without a me doing it. So again, just being curious about that sense of me, of I.

There's a teaching the Buddha often brings in—and this will be close to the last piece. We should recognize that experience arising, usually framed around the aggregates, is not mine, is not who I am, is not myself. This is a useful three-part reflection on exploring the sense of self. We can turn them around to where we do create a sense of self: "This is mine. This is who I am. This is me." Those three have slightly different flavors of senses of self. The "mine" is the owner—that's the more obvious kind, in a way.

The owner of the body, the owner of things—that sense of "that thing is mine" or "that is mine." So that's one flavor we can feel into: that quality, that sense of ownership.

Now the next two—"this I am" and "this is myself"—this is my understanding of these. But it has been very helpful, so I share it with you.

"This I am," to me, is like the sense of self as the subject of the sentence. "I am this. I do this." It's the agent, the one who's active, the sense of the one who's doing. That's a very potent place of identification—the one who feels like they're in control. And the Buddha pointed to that piece around control as being a very powerful point of identification. So that, to me, is that kind of exploration around "this I am." It's like: when does it feel like I'm the one acting, I'm the one doing? Many of our emotions have this quality. "I am the one who's angry, and I want to get even"—our emotions have this kind of active quality.

And then there's another flavor, a subtler flavor, I think, of sense of self that we can start to see: that we're not doing things. At one point I was realizing, "Wow, perception is happening." Perception arises, things are recognized, there's knowing and there's feeling. It's all happening. I could see that I was not the one doing it, but it felt like it was happening to me.

This is, I think, that third flavor. This is the reflection: "This is not myself. This is not me." Or flipping it around: "This is me." It's the self as the object of the sentence, the one who's just being impinged on. So there can be the recognition that we're not in control, but boy, does it feel like it's happening to me.

I actually went and reported that to my teacher at one point. I told him that I was seeing that I wasn't doing the consciousness, the feeling, the perception—it was just happening, but it's happening to me. And I said, "I can't see through that one." And he, of course, simply said, "Well, just notice that that's what's happening. That is the feeling, the experience is that it's happening to me. Know that."

This is seeing through these—the sense of witnessing or seeing the way we take things to be permanent, reliable, or self. We don't do the understandings of impermanent, unreliable, not-self. It is insight. It is a result of practice to see through these delusions. So my teacher telling me, "Yeah, don't try to see through the sense of me, just notice that it's happening"—that creates the conditions for the potential for witnessing it falling away.

And this can happen with any of these. We can witness the mind shifting and letting go of how it's been holding on to these. There was one retreat where I was seeing suffering so clearly and seeing that it made no sense to cling to anything. I felt like there was somebody whispering in my ear: "Doesn't make any sense to cling."

And it's just like everything was just being released, released, released. It seemed so obvious. It was so clear. So that was a moment—or a set of moments, you know, it was minutes at least, maybe even hours of being in that space. And it was so clear. It was like, how can I not see this? I'm never going to cling again. This is just so obvious that clinging makes no sense.

But guess what? It's not so obvious. When you're in that space, it's obvious. But delusion returns. And when delusion returns, then you can really begin to see it much more clearly and know: thinking there's something to cling to—yep, I know that's delusion. Because there's been the shift, there's been the experience of seeing so clearly that it doesn't make any sense. But then the conditions change and the delusion of "I want that thing, I need that thing"—it comes back. But then we can clearly know that's delusion at work.

Through the practice, we at times get to see these veils, these perspectives of delusion fall away, and see so clearly. And it feels very obvious. It's like, how can I not see this? But delusion is very powerful, so it will come back. Yes, even insight is impermanent. But it does unwind. The delusion begins to unwind and it gets thinner. Sometimes we get those moments where there's such clarity—we're not clinging. And then it comes back. And we see again, it's almost like another layer, another layer of how we're clinging.

There was one point where the mind was doing this kind of seeing things just falling apart, falling apart—very slippery, seeing the impermanent nature of experience. And there was this yearning to want to find somewhere to land. Like, I'm so tired of just falling, falling, falling. I want some place—please let me land somewhere. And the mind was searching. There would be ease in just recognizing, yep, nowhere to land, it's okay. And then the mind would go into this searching thing.

And at some point I just got very tender with that part of the mind. It was almost sweet or something. "Yeah, you go ahead, you try. You try to find some place to land. I'm here with you. I'll hang out with you while you look." I knew at one level—I mean, I knew because I had seen that letting go is much more easeful. I knew that there wasn't a landing place. But some part of the system, again kind of like that thing I described earlier, just could not buy into that.

And so we get to be with that, hang out with that—not try to somehow stop it, saying "stop that." We can't. It's not self. It's doing its thing.

CHAPTER 194

Awareness of Awareness

Andrea Fella · 47 min

In this guided meditation and teaching from the IMS Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella offers intimate instruction on one of the subtler aspects of vipassanā practice: recognizing awareness itself rather than focusing solely on the objects of awareness. She guides practitioners to notice that awareness is always already functioning, receiving whatever arises in body and mind, and invites exploration of what it actually feels like to be aware.

Fella describes how awareness can manifest in many different qualities—sometimes following attention as it moves between objects, sometimes feeling utterly still while experiences arise within it, sometimes receiving with crystalline clarity, other times with a broad, diffuse openness. Drawing from her practice with Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma, she shares how she initially tried to force this recognition and gave herself a headache, learning instead that awareness of awareness naturally unfolds without effort. The key teaching: we don't try to create this recognition; we simply notice when it happens.

This exploration has profound practical implications for meditation. Our usual training emphasizes paying attention to objects—no one taught us in school to notice that we're aware. Yet this capacity is natural to the mind and, when allowed to arise without grasping, can reveal different flavors of knowing: sometimes objects feel distant while awareness is prominent, sometimes both awareness and objects shine with equal clarity. Fella encourages practitioners to release expectations about how this should feel, remaining open to however awareness reveals itself moment to moment.

Are you aware?

Relaxation supports our capacity to be aware, to recognize that we're aware. What is awareness receiving? Experience is already awareness, already aware. Awareness receiving whatever is arising in our bodies, in our minds. Awareness can meet any arising experience.

Often we are more interested in, or just the habit of our minds is more interested in, what is being received than it is in recognizing that we are aware. We can know awareness, recognize its functioning. Awareness receives. Awareness shines a light on what's happening. We know awareness is working through how it is experiencing, through how it is receiving experience.

It doesn't feel like a turning around to look at awareness. It feels more like an opening, a broadening, a stepping back. The objects, the experience, don't disappear when we recognize that we're aware.

Are you aware?

The simplest way of recognizing this is just knowing that you're aware. The question "aware?" supports a curiosity about what it is to be aware. We can begin to have a sense, a felt sense, of what it means to be aware. And yet even without that felt sense, we can sometimes simply know that we're aware, and that's enough. That's a place to begin this recognition.

Are you aware?

The feeling of awareness is not always the same. The feeling shifts sometimes depending on how awareness is receiving experience. This is a key thing that awareness does: to receive.

Sometimes it feels like awareness is receiving very clear, specific experience, one moment after another. We recognize the shifting of attention and that awareness is receiving the objects that attention is shifting between. Sometimes it can feel like the attention is moving and the awareness is kind of following the attention. And sometimes it can feel like the awareness is very still, and objects are appearing in awareness.

Sometimes the quality of the receiving can feel like a flowing, smooth shifting. Sometimes it can feel jumpy, almost like popcorn—one object appears, another object appears. Sometimes awareness will be receiving a very broad, diffuse, non-specific experience. At other times, very focused, precise, a lot of what we would usually call clarity. Sometimes it can feel like awareness is receiving many, many things at the same time.

Let go of any concepts or ideas you have about awareness and experience what is happening. What is the feeling of being aware? There's not a right way or a best way to know the awareness. And it can shift and change from moment to moment, how awareness is receiving.

Are you aware?

Sometimes it can feel like awareness and the experience are separate, as if the awareness is observing the experience from a distance. And sometimes it can feel like the awareness is right inside the experience. Just notice how it is.

Aware? How is awareness receiving?

At times the attention will be more curious about the experience of the object too. We don't have to try to do awareness of awareness. And yet it is something that is possible, the recognition of awareness itself.

Are you aware?

When I was practicing with Sayadaw at his retreat center in Burma, he talked about recognizing awareness a lot. I think that's part of the condition that helped us to begin to recognize it. The pointing that it's possible—the mind begins to open to that possibility to recognize it.

With that conversation in the field, what can happen is that we kind of stumble into recognizing, "Oh, this is what it means. This is what it means to be aware of awareness."

Initially, I don't know—I would say it was very cool. "Wow, I can actually know that. I can see that. Wow." And so there's a tendency to try to do that, to create it, to put the mind into that space. And yeah, I gave myself a headache trying to do that.

So I went and reported this to Sayadaw, what was going on. And he said, "You know, don't try to be aware of awareness. Just notice. Sometimes there's the clarity of recognizing being aware, and sometimes the clarity of recognizing the objects. It will kind of naturally shift between those. So you don't have to make it happen—it will happen."

It's a subtler recognition than the recognition of objects. We are trained through our school, our parents all telling us, "Pay attention, pay attention to things, pay attention to objects." We're really trained to notice what's happening in experience. I don't think I ever heard my parents or my teachers in grade school ask me to notice that I was aware. That's not where our training has been. Objects tend to be more obvious than recognizing awareness. It's a subtler kind of experience, a subtler kind of recognition.

And yet it's quite natural—our minds have this capacity to know that we're aware. They have this capacity. And it will happen. This is what I mean by stumbling into it. We stumble into that recognition.

Another interesting piece around that stumbling is that whatever that first way we really kind of stumble into recognizing, "Oh, this is what it means to be aware of awareness"—where there's a felt sense or a feeling of that—then we think that's what it means to be aware of awareness. But there are many ways that it feels. If you're looking for one particular flavor, you may miss that other flavors could be happening.

It can feel very different: this sense of awareness following the attention, almost feeling like awareness is moving, versus the sense of awareness being still when objects either just appear in awareness or come into awareness—these things can feel different.

Often I'd say that initial or first taste of being aware of awareness does kind of feel like the objects might be a little distant. There's less clarity about the objects. And that's okay. If the interest is more in knowing the awareness, sometimes the detail of the experiences is less precise or less clear to us.

And yet there's also another flavor of being aware of awareness that I stumbled into at one point—again, it was just a stumbling into it—which was a clarity of awareness and a clarity of objects where they were both equally clear. Sometimes it can feel like we're knowing the object, the attention more picking up the texture of the experience itself. Sometimes we're more aware of the awareness, where the interest is more in what it feels like to be aware. And then there was this thing where it was just equal clarity about awareness and the objects.

Boy, did I cling to that one. "That's what I'm supposed to be doing." But it's just another way it can feel.

So just notice the relationship to when you're noticing this or not noticing it.

CHAPTER 195

Allowing What Has Come to Be

Andrea Fella · 45 min

> In this gentle yet profound talk from the IMS Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella illuminates the heart of awareness practice: simply opening to what is already here. She clarifies that acceptance—allowing things as they have come to be—is not about agreeing or disagreeing with experience, but fully acknowledging "this is the experience." Drawing on the insight of Zen teacher Daishin Morgan, she distinguishes this allowing from passivity, showing how clear recognition of present conditions actually creates the foundation for skillful response.
>
> Fella explores how mettā is not separate from insight practice but is lived within it. The quality of allowing what arises—without trying to fix, change, or reject any aspect of experience—naturally feels like love. Just as a friend who truly listens without agenda offers us the gift of being seen, this practice extends that same caring attention to ourselves, welcoming all of our experience: the confusion, the beauty, the wanting.
> The talk deepens into an exploration of equanimity and how, contrary to our assumptions, the falling away of greed, aversion, and delusion does not lead to inaction. Rather, wholesome qualities—wisdom, compassion, curiosity, joy—gain strength and have their own natural agency. Wisdom begins to guide practice and life; compassion moves to alleviate suffering. What Sayadaw U Tejaniya calls "Dhamma effort" emerges: a shift from personal striving to being carried by these wholesome qualities, as the need for a controlling sense of self gradually weakens through alignment with wise view and ethical conduct.

Are you aware? Our practice is so simple. Aware with what is already arising, what is already here. Being with this human experience. Opening to what is here.

We're opening to the unfolding of the conditions of our lives. The nature of things as they have come to be. Opening to what is already happening. Awareness receiving what is already happening.

This opening to is an allowing. Allowing what is here. Accepting what is offered. The offering of our conditions revealing themselves.

One teacher, Zen teacher Daishin Morgan, points out that this acceptance, the acceptance of things as they are, is not about agreeing or disagreeing with the experience. It's about fully acknowledging this is the experience. Clearly meeting, knowing this is the experience. That is the quality of acceptance. Accepting, allowing what is already happening.

And yet this perspective of accepting and allowing what has come to be, clearly recognizing this is what has come to be—it's not a perspective of passivity. In fact, it really creates conditions for us to in the next moment respond skillfully. In our practice, a skillful response is often continuing to witness, continuing to be with. And yet even in our formal practice, there are times that we may recognize a skillful means is useful, or a question and investigation.

This practice is a wisdom practice, wisdom based. The teachings are wisdom teachings. We talk a lot about noticing things as they are. Recognizing the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience with any experience. Exploring a perspective of allowing, curious about the attitude and even allowing. If a perspective of wanting something to happen has arisen, we allow that and we are curious about that. How has that been shaped?

The teachings are very much in the wisdom vein, and sometimes people ask, what is the place for metta in this practice? In my experience, the metta is lived in this practice. The allowing perspective, opening to allowing what is already here to be here—in the feeling of the practice, that feels like love.

If we were sitting in front of a friend and we were having trouble, when the friend was just willing to listen and be with us, not trying to fix us, not trying to make suggestions or figure things out for us, but just willing to be with us fully, most of us would feel that as love. Feeling very cared for, very seen, that feeling of being seen.

And this is what this practice does for us. We see ourselves fully, completely. All the messiness, all the confusion and delusion, all the wanting, all the beauty. It's all welcome with awareness and wisdom. No part rejected. And this simple practice allows this, opens to this feeling of care for ourselves. Wisdom and love grow together.

Just simple. What's this? Opening fully to our experience as it has come to be. Noticing relationships to what has come to be: wanting, not wanting, and beliefs, ideas about what is happening. Those attitudes based in greed, aversion, and delusion. This practice begins to weaken those tendencies of greed, aversion, and delusion. There's more capacity for allowing, more capacity for acceptance of what has come to be.

And that place of opening to this is what is here, opening to things as they have come to be without reactivity to what has come to be—that is equanimity.

If I was completely okay with what is happening, why would I do anything? But that's not the way it seems to work. Because as greed, aversion, and delusion fall away, the wholesome qualities gain strength—qualities of wisdom, love, compassion, patience, interest, joy. And these qualities also have a kind of agency. They act in the system.

We're familiar with the way aversion acts based on wanting to get rid of things. Greed acts based on wanting to have things. Delusion acts based on what it believes. And so we begin to see that it's not necessarily a "me" doing that. We see that this is the conditioned and conditioning nature of those qualities of mind. Anger tends to construct anger, tends to create more tension in the heart and mind.

The wholesome qualities also have an activity to them. Again, not "me" doing it. The nature of love seems to be to connect us. The nature of compassion, to alleviate suffering. The nature of curiosity, of interest, to explore in a wholesome way. The nature of wisdom is to recognize suffering and to release suffering—this is the wisdom that we're cultivating here.

So these qualities of mind do things. And when there is equanimity, these functions of mind, these capacities of mind get stronger. Wisdom begins to act, wisdom begins to guide the practice, wisdom begins to choose and navigate our lives. Compassion acts—this movement to alleviate suffering.

And so the place of equanimity is not a place of passivity. It's not necessarily a place of self-doing. But we can be present with the way our wholesome qualities carry us.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya points to this as a kind of shift in the practice—from when we're making a personal kind of effort, and we have to start there, where it does feel like we're involved in the choices of practice—to certain times when practice becomes more effortless. These are times when wholesome qualities are guiding the practice. Sayadaw calls this "Dhamma effort"—wisdom taking the lead instead of an idea coming from beliefs and views that we have.

We have to start by aligning with wise view and making choices based on wise view. The teachings unfold through exploring how to skillfully have a sense of agency and sense of self that aligns with wise view, that aligns with ethics. And as we do that more and more, the need for that sense of self weakens.

I'm so happy to be here with you. I really appreciate your sincerity, your care, your commitment. It's a rare thing in this world, what you're doing. Thank you.

CHAPTER 196

Rhythms of Practice

Andrea Fella · 49 min

> In this Forest Refuge talk, Andrea Fella addresses a common concern among meditators: the seemingly problematic return of reactivity after periods of ease and spaciousness. Drawing on Michelle McDonald's evocative teaching of 'purity and purification,' Fella reframes these shifts not as mistakes or signs of poor practice, but as the natural rhythm through which wisdom unfolds. Both states—the spacious ease and the arising of old habits—reveal the fundamental characteristics of experience: impermanence (anicca), unreliability (dukkha), and conditioned arising (paṭicca samuppāda).
>
> Fella describes how this process unfolds as a deepening spiral rather than mere cycling. As grosser forms of greed, aversion, and delusion (lobha, dosa, moha) release, subtler layers become visible—previously masked by stronger reactivity. The very calm that develops allows repressed material to surface and reveals increasingly subtle ripples of grasping. She notes that these subtler forms can actually feel like strong dukkha precisely because we've tasted freedom from grosser reactivity.
>
> The practical instruction remains beautifully simple: meet whatever arises with curiosity and awareness. Notice shifts between states. Observe the quality of mind—whether there's resistance to purification or grasping at purity. This teaching offers reassurance that the path naturally includes both the clearing and the revealing, and that sustained, receptive awareness is the appropriate response to whatever presents itself in each moment.

Aware with whatever is arising in this moment. Sometimes what's arising are habits, old patterns of confusion or reactivity. This can be seen, received. Sometimes what's arising is spaciousness, ease. This can be seen, met, received.

In terms of the cultivation of awareness and wisdom, both reveal the nature of experience: impermanent, unreliable as a place to land, and not self—conditioned arising in dependence on conditions and causes.

It's quite natural for there to be a shifting between the arising of reactivity, of struggle, patterns and old habits, and for there to be times of spaciousness, of ease, of the mind more settled. One teacher called this the rhythms of purity and purification. Michelle McDonald called this purity and purification.

This is part of how the practice unfolds. It's not a mistake. It's not a problem. Just noticing the relationship, especially when there's a shift—a shift from spaciousness and ease to old reactive habits and patterns. What's the relationship? Wanting to hold on to the ease, resistance to the arising of the habits and patterns? Or simply, "Oh, this now. Just this."

We tend to like the purity side and resist the purification. We can sometimes think we're doing something wrong. Surely if I was practicing properly this reactivity would not be arising. But it's a natural cycling. It's not actually even cycling—it's more of a spiral deepening. Often we're seeing something at a deeper level, a more subtle form of grasping arising. And so just noticing how it is, aware with this, just this.

These rhythms, these shifts between ease and seeing our habits and patterns, seeing how greed, aversion, and delusion are arising—these shifts between purity and purification, as Michelle McDonald puts it, are simply part of how the practice seems to work. It's not a mistake, nothing that we've done wrong.

We tend to like the shift from purification to purity. We think we've figured it out. And it is often a meeting of some kind of reactivity or holding or clinging. That meeting allows for a release, allows for a shift into letting go, openness, more spaciousness and ease.

These shifts can sometimes happen simply because the mind picks up on something else instead of attuning to the reactivity. It meets some other experience, and that becomes what the attention rests with, and it shifts to more ease. There are different ways that shift can happen from purification to the quality of mind that's spacious and at ease, balanced, calm.

We get a taste of that spaciousness and ease, and then reactivity returns for different reasons. Sometimes in that space of more calm and ease, it's almost like the habitual ways that we've been keeping things held down begin to release—ways that we've repressed things or not seen things. Those kinds of repression structures get released, and so it's quite natural that some of those things that have not been seen start to be able to be seen.

Or sometimes in that space of ease and calm, we get a little complacent. We're not really clearly noticing the quality of the mind that is easeful and receptive and interested. We're not really recognizing what it's like to have a mind that's at ease. And in that complacency, the mindfulness weakens. And the habits of greed, aversion, and delusion arise. It's natural that this happens. Again, it's not a problem. It's just something to notice.

Wherever we are, whatever's arising, this is what is asking to be seen in this moment. It's not random; it's arising in dependence on conditions and causes.

Another way the shifts between purity and purification can be recognized or experienced is that in that space of ease, the mind gets more attuned to that spaciousness, that ease, that balance of mind. It feels to me sometimes like a whole layer of reactivity can fall away. Patterns and habits, bigger patterns and habits of reactivity, can fall away, and then we have a period of time where we're in a space of more ease.

That reactivity, that old pattern, is simply not arising—or not arising as much. And then, in that space of ease, we start to see subtler kinds, subtler forms, subtler flavors of greed, aversion, and delusion that were masked by the larger reactivity and are now being revealed by the quieting of the mind.

It's like the ease is revealing that there are still subtler ripples—subtler ripples of greed, aversion, and delusion still working. They're being revealed. It's not a problem.

And then we start to feel those subtler ripples, and sometimes, because we've had that feeling or that sense of spaciousness and ease, they can actually feel like pretty strong dukkha. We've experienced a sense of not having reactivity. But then we begin to see those flavors of greed, aversion, and delusion, and they begin to weaken and release. And we have another period where it feels more spacious, more easeful.

We can maybe go through these cycles—it's almost like going down into deeper and deeper layers. Ease, ripples, release. Ease, ripples, release.

For myself, whenever I would notice any kind of shift, that would spark a curiosity. What's happening? There's something new arising, or something new being seen, perhaps. So, what's this?

The instructions are so simple: What's this? And noticing the relationship. Noticing the quality of mind meeting the experiences.

CHAPTER 197

Not Knowing

Andrea Fella · 43 min

> In this contemplative talk from the IMS Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella addresses a subtle but significant aspect of deepening practice: the experience of being aware without knowing what awareness is connecting with. As mindfulness becomes more continuous, practitioners often encounter moments where they clearly recognize they are aware, yet cannot identify or name what is being known. Fella encourages us to simply rest in this recognition rather than grasping for clarity.
>
> The talk explores our deep conditioning around needing to know and understand. Most of us have strong habits of searching, naming, and trying to land on something familiar when faced with uncertainty. Fella points out that this very grasping—the doubt, the discomfort with not knowing, the anxiety that can arise—becomes itself an object of practice. By recognizing these reactions as conditioned patterns of mind, we can begin to release our tight grip on the need for certainty.
>
> Fella offers a profound reframing: as practice deepens, wisdom itself begins to orient toward the unfamiliar, toward what we cannot seek because we don't yet know it exists. This is not something we can do through effort, since we cannot look for what we don't know. Instead, we learn to trust awareness and wisdom, becoming comfortable with the unknown. This trust supports the conditions for genuine insight and release, which by their very nature cannot be predicted or grasped in advance.

Simply continue. Aware. Aware with the experience that is already happening.

Sometimes as the mindfulness gets a little more continuous, there are times when we know that we're aware, and yet we don't know what awareness is aware of. It can feel like there is the awareness and there is the recognition that there is hearing and body sensations, but that doesn't seem to be what the awareness is really connecting with.

In that experience of aware and not sure what awareness is really connecting with or receiving, we can simply know that. Aware. Don't know what the object is. Just resting and receiving that.

This helps us also to really clearly recognize that we're aware. We begin to trust that. We know we're aware. And yet the experience, whatever it is, may be unfamiliar. It may be a subtle kind of state that we don't have a name for. We don't recognize it. But we can know that we're aware. Simple. Trusting that. Trusting awareness and wisdom.

Some curiosity arises: what's it like? What's the experience like to not know? We often have some relationship to that. Most of us have a long history of being encouraged to be clear, to know. And it feels uncomfortable to not know. It might feel confusing or vulnerable. It might create some anxiety.

So we need to notice the relationship. We might start grasping for something clear, searching to make things more familiar. And the practice is simple. We notice that we're aware. Awareness will naturally be receiving something. We don't always know what it is, and we can know that.

Sometimes it's clear. Sometimes we do know what it is. We can know that. Sometimes it's something pleasant. Sometimes unpleasant. We can know that. Just experience arising in this human body and mind. Being seen, recognized.

We're curious about its nature. We're curious about where we tend to grasp, to hold, and feel the suffering of that. In feeling that with awareness and wisdom, it begins to release. We notice that.

What's actually happening in this moment? Body sensation arising and being known. Mind states arising and being known. Awareness recognized. Simple.

And sometimes our minds complicate things, trying to search, look, figure out. That too is just an arising and can be known. Simple. Complication is happening.

Just another experience, another object. What's this?

We can be drawn to what's familiar. The way our minds work, our habits, our conditioning shapes what we tend to receive, what we tend to notice. And often that orients to what is familiar—what we already know, what we're already used to noticing and recognizing.

Sometimes in our practice, that recognition of what we're familiar with begins to help us see more clearly what we are familiar with, to see more texture. The direct experience of what we're familiar with makes it seem more lively, more here. Some of you have used the words "raw experience" in your descriptions. Even as we orient to what's familiar, we begin to see more fineness, more subtlety.

And yet sometimes that way of meeting experience becomes like a habit in itself—that sense of the clarity of experience, the clarity of knowing, the clarity of seeing more closely, more detail. This is one way the practice helps us to see more clearly what's happening. We can see into how those experiences come into being and how they fall apart. That's one way that mindfulness and wisdom are curious about experience.

Yet also, as mindfulness gets stronger, as mindfulness and wisdom gain momentum and have more continuity, it feels like wisdom starts to get interested in things that we have no clue about—things we are not at all familiar with. Wisdom begins to orient towards noticing the unfamiliar. This kind of exploration that wisdom begins to do on its own is not something we can really do, because we can't look for what we don't know.

When wisdom begins to be curious about what's unfamiliar, it can feel uncomfortable because we're so used to knowing. We want to know. We have that strong conditioning. When we don't know what's happening, we have a strong conditioning to try to figure out what's happening—a searching, a trying to land, a trying to name, identify, to recognize. All of that is conditioned. And the practice actually deepens through noticing that relationship: noticing the wanting to land, noticing the searching, noticing the idea that it's not okay to not know, noticing the doubt.

So we recognize those as processes of mind, and begin, over time, to get more comfortable, more okay with the fact that there are times we just don't know what's happening. We can be aware, we can know that we're aware, and not know what awareness is receiving.

I helped myself get more comfortable with this place of not knowing by reminding myself that, largely by its nature, insight—understanding into the nature of experience, a deepening of insight—we can't know what that will be. The Buddha speaks of freedom, the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion. Do I have some flavor or taste of what that might be like? I don't know. That ultimate release, the place the Buddha is said to be living in—we can't really know.

When the mind releases, that's another place of the unknown. When the mind lets go, sometimes that experience of letting go can bring a little bit of uncertainty or fear. Where is it going? We can't know. And so the curiosity turns toward what's in the way: all those ideas about needing to know, searching for something, needing to have clarity about what's happening.

As we see those as complications, as we see those as habits, as patterns of mind, their weakening supports the conditions for the mind to simply open to this. The very act of looking, trying to find—all of those movements of mind, the doubt, the trying to land, the searching for something, the trying to find clarity—will tend to obscure what's unfamiliar.

So we have to trust. Trust wisdom. Trust awareness. It's okay to not know.

CHAPTER 198

Aware... Just This...

Andrea Fella · 43 min

> In this guided meditation from a retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella invites practitioners into a quality of awareness that is simple, receptive, and unelaborated. She guides meditators to meet experience exactly as it is—sensations, thoughts, and mental processes—without searching for something better or resisting what's present.
>
> Fella draws on the Buddha's teaching to Bāhiya, pointing to the direct recognition that "in the cognized is only the cognized." This teaching emphasizes meeting experience without adding layers of self-reference or conceptual elaboration. Whatever arises—whether pleasant or unpleasant, wanted or unwanted—can be received by mindfulness. As she reminds practitioners, receiving experience is mindfulness's job; we don't need to add effort or tension to make it happen.
>
> The talk addresses a subtle tendency that can arise in mature practice: the impulse to be "involved" with mindfulness, to try harder to see clearly or connect more fully. Fella suggests recognizing this tension itself as something arising, and then relaxing back into trust—letting mindfulness and wisdom do what they naturally do. For practitioners with established momentum, she encourages simplicity: the simpler the awareness, the more clearly experience reveals its impermanent, not-self nature. Just this. Just continue.

Aware, with experience as it is.

Sensation arising, aware with sensation. Thoughts arising, aware with thoughts. Whatever is obvious.

Sometimes there is more curiosity about awareness itself, also recognizing awareness as simply what's here, what's available. Processes of mind, processes of body, arising, being recognized as experience. When thoughts, opinions, ideas arise about experience, that too can be seen as just an arising.

In the cognized is only the cognized. In reference to the cognized, there will be only the cognized. Just thoughts arising with awareness.

Whatever is arising, whatever is obvious—there is not a better object with which to understand the Dharma. This experience, just this, as the nature of being impermanent. Not worth clinging to. Just a phenomenon in the mind and body arising. Not me, not who I am, not mine. Just a phenomenon.

Experience arising in dependence on causes and conditions. Simple, just aware. This is what's happening.

If there's a sense of searching, looking for something, trying to find a better experience, or a resistance—that too is something arising that can be known. Searching, looking, resisting. There is no experience that can't be received with mindfulness. That's the job of mindfulness: to receive. It can receive any experience. So let mindfulness do its job.

Sometimes I find I'm involved with mindfulness, trying to see more clearly or connect more fully. When I feel that kind of tension around the mindfulness, a reminder often arises: mindfulness can do this. I don't need to be involved. Letting mindfulness and wisdom do what they do. Receiving just this. Aware.

There's quite a bit of momentum in practice at this point for all of you. Continuing and just keeping it simple. The simpler the awareness, the simpler the mind, the more will be seen and understood. We can get out of the way.

Just continue.

CHAPTER 199

The Mind of Freedom

Andrea Fella · 54 min

In this contemplative talk, Andrea Fella offers a deep reflection on a profound sutta from the Aṅguttara Nikāya that describes the Buddha's own experience of liberation. Drawing on the scholarship of Bhikkhu Ñāṇananda's "The Magic of the Mind," she presents this teaching as an elaboration of the Bāhiya Sutta's famous instruction: "In the seen, there will be only the seen." The Buddha describes a mind that does not conceive or imagine a visible thing apart from sight, does not conceive of an unseen, does not conceive of a thing worth seeing, and does not conceive of one who sees—and similarly for hearing, sensing, and cognizing.

Fella carefully unpacks each of these four aspects, exploring how ordinary minds habitually create things and selves through the process of conceiving (mañ̃ati in Pāli). She connects this to papañca (mental proliferation) and the construction of self-view, illustrating with personal examples how we grasp at ideas, create objects of craving around things not yet experienced, and solidify experience into something we believe exists independently of the knowing process. The teaching reveals that what we experience is always a construct of mind meeting conditions—we never actually experience "what's out there" but rather the process of contact itself.

The talk culminates in a reflection on the Buddha's remarkable stability—not through grasping or landing on anything, but precisely through not clinging. This "suchness" (tādī) represents a radically different kind of steadfastness: alignment with the truth of impermanence rather than resistance to it. Andrea encourages listeners to hold these teachings as reflections rather than concepts to grasp, remaining curious about how the words land and what resonates in direct experience.

Tonight I'd like to reflect a little bit on a sutta in which the Buddha basically describes what the mind of freedom is—in a way describing his experience. I've been reflecting on this sutta for the past few years and speaking about it in this form, and I find this reflection is really best held as a reflection. Not necessarily trying to track every word or understand all the concepts. In fact, the description sometimes seems almost paradoxical or hard to understand. So rather than trying to grasp it, simply open to the words, the reflection, and see what lands, what resonates. I encourage receptivity during this talk—receiving what I'm offering and being curious about what your experience is as you're hearing the words, as you're taking it in.

This sutta is from the Anguttara Nikaya. I first learned about it from a book by the scholar monk Nyanananda called The Magic of the Mind. In that book, Nyanananda says that the description the Buddha offers of his own mind—I don't know if we can call it experience exactly, but the quality of the mind of a Buddha—could be understood as an elaboration of the Bahiya Sutta, which we talked about last week.

In the Bahiya Sutta, we explored those phrases: "In reference to the seen, there will be only the seen. In reference to the heard, there will be only the heard. In reference to the sensed, there will be only the sensed. In reference to the cognized, there will be only the cognized." In that sutta, there wasn't much description about what that meant. In this sutta, we find a little bit of a description of what perhaps it means for the mind to have that space or that opening to "in reference to the seen, there will be only the seen."

I'm going to read a section of the sutta. This translation is from an early version by Nyanananda. He chooses particular words for this translation, and in a later translation he chose different words, but I'm going to start with his first choices and then shift to his later choices.

"Whatsoever is seen, heard, sensed, cognized, attained, sought after, and pondered over by the mind, that I have fully understood. All that is fully known to the Tathagata"—the Tathagata is basically his name for himself, meaning something like "one thus gone"—"but the Tathagata has not taken a stand on it. A Tathagata does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight, does not conceive of an unseen, does not conceive of a thing worth seeing, does not conceive of one who sees. Does not conceive of an audible thing apart from hearing, does not conceive of an unheard, does not conceive of a thing worth hearing, does not conceive of one who hears. Does not conceive of a thing to be sensed apart from sensation, does not conceive of an unsensed, does not conceive of a thing worth sensing, does not conceive of one who senses. Does not conceive of a cognizable thing apart from cognition, does not conceive of an uncognized, does not conceive of a thing worth cognizing, does not conceive of one who cognizes."

That description uses the word "conceives" repeatedly. The Pali word translated as "conceiving" here is manyati. There are a couple of different flavors of that word. The Pali Text Society dictionary says it can mean to imagine, to think, or to be convinced, to be sure. Later, Nyanananda chooses to translate manyati as "imagine," and it creates a different flavor to that passage, which I'll read using that word later. I found it quite interesting to listen to the different way it lands with different words.

Conceiving is also often talked about in terms of the sense of self—how we conceive ourselves to be the same as, less than, or equal to others. So it often is used in relationship to the sense of self and measuring ourselves against others or measuring ourselves against ourselves.

In another passage, there's another flavor of how an ordinary person relates to the seen, heard, sensed, and cognized. Last time, during the talk on the Bahiya Sutta, I went through a passage that described how our minds usually relate to sense experience—not in the flavor of "in the seen is only the seen," but how the mind picks things up and runs with them. This is another flavor of how an ordinary person relates to experience:

"One perceives the seen as the seen. Having perceived the seen as the seen, one conceives oneself as the seen, one conceives oneself in the seen, one conceives oneself apart from the seen, one conceives the seen to be mine, one delights in the seen. Why is that? Because it has not been fully understood."

This is really pointing to different flavors of identification. "I am this"—conceives oneself as the seen. "I'm in this"—conceives oneself in the seen. "I'm separate from this"—conceives oneself apart from the seen. "This is mine"—conceives the seen to be mine.

These are simply different flavors of our relationship to experience through the sense of self. The conceiving probably has a relationship to this process of selfing, this process of identification, this process of constructing an "I," a "me," one who possesses.

Conceiving is also understood in the suttas as being closely related to papañca, that word I talked about last week—the reification, the mind running amok with thoughts. But I also spoke about how papañca could be understood as a solidification of an object: how what one perceives, one thinks about; what one thinks about, one objectifies; what one objectifies, one makes into a thing. And in that process of thing-making, there's also a process of I-making, of separation.

I sometimes think of these processes of conceiving and papañca as flip sides of a coin. At times we may notice the mind making a thing, and at times we may notice more clearly the mind engaged in the process of selfing. Or we may not notice at all—we get caught in this all the time. But we can be curious about these processes. They are simply processes at work in the mind to create the sense of self, to create the sense of separation, to create a thing. And in someone who is not craving, who is not clinging, whose mind is free, these processes are not happening.

This is one interesting thing about this passage, really. The Buddha uses words to describe the mind that is free, and he's using language largely that talks about what is not happening. He's not talking about what's been gained or appropriated, but about processes that have stopped occurring: not conceiving of a visible thing as apart from sight, not conceiving of an unseen, not conceiving of a thing worth seeing, not conceiving of one who sees.

I want to go through each of these four things—four processes that aren't happening in the mind of the Buddha—and reflect a little on each one. When I first went through this, I used Ñāṇananda's teachings in his book to help me begin to unpack and understand what some of these might mean. But what was most fruitful was really a curiosity: when I explore these reflections, what does it do in the mind? How does it land?

I'll go through each of these largely through the realm of seeing. Occasionally I'll bring in one of the other flavors—seen, heard, sensed, cognized—to point to some of the other ways we might encounter resistance.

A Tathāgata does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight. What this points to is that an ordinary person does tend to conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight—believes their experience of seeing to be the reality of what is experienced. That's the flavor of it to me.

In my own exploration, I turned each one of these around. So: the Tathāgata does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight. When am I conceiving of a visible thing as apart from sight? What does that mean? What is the mind doing there? Again, I think it has to do with that sense of creating a thing. The mind creates a thing and then believes that thing to have a reality. The Tathāgata's mind does not construct—does not internally construct any idea of a thing that exists apart from the experience of seeing.

The Tathāgata does not conceive. Let's throw "imagine" in there: the Tathāgata does not imagine a visible thing as apart from sight. This points to the process nature of our experience. What we are experiencing through our sense bases is the phenomenon of eye and forms meeting. There's the process of that contact—eye consciousness and contact. The experience is a process being constructed, and what we are experiencing is that process. We're not actually experiencing what's "out there." We're experiencing a construct of our minds.

We don't usually understand it that way. We believe that what we are experiencing is what's out there, and so much delusion can arise because of this. Everything we experience is constructed by our minds, and all kinds of ideas, opinions, and views influence that construction. That a Tathāgata does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight means simply understanding that seeing is happening, but the thing that is seen is a result of the process of seeing. It's not separate from that process. The sight that is seen cannot be separate from seeing. The process of seeing creates the sight and then knows that sight.

Thinking a little about the flavor of this with respect to the cognized: one does not conceive or imagine a cognizable thing apart from cognition.

We can make a thing, an idea, out of mental processes as well. There was one time I experienced a lot of suffering because I had taken ownership of a word. I had expressed that word to one person, and then later I heard other people using that word and attributing it to this other person. And I'm like, "Wait, no—I defined that word. I made that word." So much suffering. Creating, taking ownership, making a thing out of a word. Creating a cognizable thing apart from cognition.

The Tathagata does not imagine a visible thing separate from the process of seeing. One understands the process of seeing as the process that both creates the sight and knows it. All experience constructed by the mind and known by the mind.

And then this next one: a Tathagata does not conceive of an unseen. Now this one's maybe a little different. This one, for me, I've been exploring for a while, and Ñāṇananda even says that the commentary's definition of this seems really shallow. The commentaries say that what this means is the Tathagata does not conceive, "I am seeing things that ordinary people don't see." And this could be a piece of it, in a way. It's a kind of superiority conceit—"Look at me, I'm seeing all of these processes at work as processes. I'm seeing what ordinary people don't see." But Ñāṇananda and Bhikkhu Bodhi both say this just seems like not really what this is pointing to.

This is pointing to almost the opposite: the Tathagata not conceiving of the unseen. So again, flip this around. How might an ordinary person conceive of something unseen? Well, there are some obvious ways this might happen. If somebody says, "Gee, I saw this thing," but somebody else hasn't seen it, then they could be conceiving, "Well, maybe you saw that, but I'm not going to believe it until I see it myself." And so there's a conceiving around things not seen—that unless I've seen it, it doesn't exist. That's one flavor, perhaps, of this.

Or here's one that I experienced on one three-month course. There may be a relationship to something not experienced, conceiving around something not experienced, and then desire arising around that, having not experienced it. So again, conceiving of something unseen and then deciding, measuring oneself against it.

In my case, on my first three-month course, I was listening to the dharma talks and hearing the teachers talk about all these experiences. Arising and passing was one that they talked about. And it sounded very cool, and I really wanted to see it. I had never seen it, but it was described, and it was like, "Ooh, I want that." And so I began creating ideas around it and wanting it. At one point, there was so much suffering around this—feeling like I was failing because I hadn't seen this thing, trying to imagine what it would be like to see this thing.

And then at one point, this arose in my mind: going up to my teacher in the interview and telling him I had experienced this. And we were laughing and celebrating that I had seen this insight and understanding. As I watched this story play out in my mind, I realized I had no idea what I wanted, but what I did want was being seen as someone who had seen that. That began to help me let go of that whole craving around something I had not seen.

Now, if we think about this, what's really happening there is there's a craving happening around an idea. So that's a cognized. There's a craving around something that is cognized, a thing-making around something that's cognized. And so that kind of puts it into that side of things—the conceiving of a cognizable thing apart from cognition.

That's what the mind was doing. But it was around something that I didn't know, didn't understand. It had created this idea. And this is so much of what we do—we create ideas around things and then want them.

Another way to understand this conceiving of an unseen, how we tend to do that: again, we're probably not going to just land in the Buddhist mind, this mind of freedom, but we can begin to see how we participate in these processes, how the mind participates in these processes, how it participates in this process of conceiving of something not seen, something not heard.

Sayadaw tells a story of a time he was here. He was being escorted around and shown the area. One of the staff members, or somebody the staff had asked to help take Sayadaw around, was driving him through the area. The person mentioned that there were all these deer, and happened to mention there was a deer alarm on the car—a very high-pitched tone so that the deer hear it and don't come close to the road when the car is driving by. He said Sayadaw might be able to hear it.

Sayadaw couldn't hear it, so it was unheard. It was described as being something, but he couldn't hear it, so it was something unheard. And he tried to listen for it. He said he tried hard to hear it, and he couldn't hear it. And then he said, "I just relaxed myself. And I heard it."

So it was the conceiving of the idea that it could be heard, and that he could try to hear it—the conceiving around it kept it from being experienced. Maybe this is another way to reflect on this: how do we conceive of an unseen and unheard and unsensed and uncognized?

But an alternative reflection on this that feels in some ways more profound is perhaps along the lines of when we begin to understand these processes, when we begin to recognize, maybe see directly, that our mind is creating what is experienced—that what we are experiencing is a creation of our mind. Then perhaps conceiving of the unseen could be the view, the possible view, that if everything is constructed by my mind, then there isn't anything out there actually. A kind of mind-only perspective.

Nyanananda has a parable or analogy that elaborates on both of these first two: conceiving of a visible thing as apart from sight, and conceiving of an unseen. He's exploring an image of a dog that's crossing a stream on a plank. There's a kind of bridge across the stream, and the dog is trotting across. It's an area where there's a pool in the stream, and the dog trotting across catches sight of itself in the pool and gets intrigued. It starts looking into the pool, starts wagging its tail, maybe barking, trying to communicate with this dog that's a reflection of himself.

Nyanananda says, "When a dog crossing a stream stops halfway on the plank and starts wagging its tail and peeping curiously down, the reason is the sight of his own image in the water. It imagines another dog there. The dog thinks there's something there to see apart from the process of seeing. It is unaware of the fact that it is seeing what it sees because it is looking. It thinks it is looking because there is something out there to be seen."

It is unaware of the fact that it is seeing what it is seeing because it is looking. It thinks that it is looking because there is something out there to be seen. The moment it realizes that it's seeing because it's looking, it will stop looking at its own image in the water.

Nyanananda says it's because of personality view—this sense of separation, this sense of identification, the view of self—that the world is carried away by this illusion. One goes on looking, saying one is doing so because there's something to be seen. But the seen is there because of the looking. This is again the sense of the idea of something separate from the process. There is just this process of seeing happening. And then, not imagining a visible thing apart from sight, we might come up with the idea that there isn't anything out there to be seen—that notion that if it's all processes in the mind, it's all just mind-made.

This reminds me of a sutta, one of the phrases in the Samyutta Nikaya: "For the most part, the world depends upon a duality, upon the notion of existence and non-existence." So if it doesn't exist in the way we thought, then it must not exist at all. And so if we see, as we see, that what we are experiencing in sight doesn't exist in the way that we're used to thinking about existence, then it must not exist—conceiving of an unseen.

Nyanananda says again, "Apart from the fact of having seen, there's nothing substantial to see. One does not imagine a visible thing apart from seeing. On the other hand, it is not possible to deny the fact of seeing happening. One does not imagine an unseen."

Let this land. Again, we can almost think of these as koans, or as invitations to be curious—not to try to figure it out, but to explore. To be open to: how might I be conceiving, or imagining, an unseen? Or imagining something apart from sight?

One does not conceive of a thing worth seeing. To me, this pretty directly speaks to craving—the sense of wanting, of something to have, something to hold on to. One does not conceive of a thing worth cognizing. That may be a little harder to feel into. I mean, isn't the Dharma worth cognizing? That might be. Again, what might it mean to allow for that cognizing, the reflection of the Dharma, to arise without grasping it? Without holding to it?

Another translation of this phrase comes from Ñāṇananda: "does not conceive of a thing worth seeing, does not conceive of a thing worth hearing." Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates it more along the lines of how I was speaking to it in terms of papañca. He translates this as "does not construe an object to be seen"—the thing seen, the creation of the object itself. That to me is very resonant with the way we were exploring that first phrase: does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight. Does not construe a thing to see. Just seeing, hearing, sensing happening.

And "does not conceive of one who sees"—this is that sense of self. We've been exploring this. What is this experience of the sense of self? And with all of these, we notice where we are. We notice what's arising. We don't try to pick up these phrases and impose them on ourselves. But we can use them as explorations. What's arising is a feeling of one who's seeing. That can be seen, not clung to. That can be recognized as an arising. It can be recognized as an arising cognition. The sense of self that's seeing is a cognition. It's a function of the mind, just a process in the mind, believing itself.

I'm going to reread the section using "imagines." Just don't try to think through this. Having kind of explored these sentences, just let this land. What is it like to hear these words?

The Tathāgata does not imagine a visible thing apart from sight, does not imagine an unseen, does not imagine a thing worth seeing, does not imagine one who sees. Does not imagine an audible thing apart from hearing, does not imagine an unheard, does not imagine a thing worth hearing, does not imagine one who hears. Does not imagine a thing to be sensed apart from sensation, does not imagine an unsensed, does not imagine a thing worth sensing, does not imagine one who senses. Does not imagine a cognizable thing apart from cognition, does not imagine an uncognized, does not imagine a thing worth cognizing, does not imagine one who cognizes.

To me, the word "imagines" really makes it land that these processes are our minds making things up and believing them. And even that believing is an imagining.

I want to go back to the first part of the section I read: "Whatsoever is seen, heard, sensed, cognized, attained, sought after, and pondered over by the mind—that I have fully understood. All that is fully known to the Tathāgata, but the Tathāgata has not taken a stand on it."

This phrase "not taking a stand"—I want to reflect on this a little bit. At the basic level, taking a stand would mean there is this, that thing-making and the craving, the holding to, the attachment to, the solidifying with. And so not taking a stand is non-craving, non-clinging, non-conceiving, not attaching to views about. Not creating a thing to stand on. This is what we do. Our minds create a thing and then think we can stand on it. We think it's stable, think it's reliable.

Following that section, the next sentence in the sutta is: "The Tathāgata being such-like in regard to all phenomena seen, heard, sensed, and cognized—is such."

And so "such-like" is basically this description of not conceiving, not imagining a visible thing apart from sight, imagining an unseen, imagining a thing worth seeing, imagining one who sees. Such-like.

This word "such," tādī—it's a simple word, actually. It means something like "this" or "that" or "such." The Tathagata being such-like in regard to all phenomena. The Tathagata being just this—just this process of seeing, the process of hearing, the process of sensing, the process of cognizing, nothing other than that. Just this. Such.

As I feel that word, it lands. The Tathagata is such—nothing other than this, than just this, just experience tumbling on. Not conceiving in any way with respect to seeing, hearing, sensing, cognizing. Not imagining in any way with respect to seeing, hearing, sensing, cognizing. No cognizer, no thing cognized. Just the processes of cognizing happening, the process of seeing happening, the process of hearing happening—nothing other than that, and understanding that. Processes create and experience what is experienced. That is all. Nothing other than that. That's a phrase that has landed for me with respect to this "such." Nothing other than the processes.

Now, an interesting thing about this word tādī is that sometimes it's translated as "stable." And so to me, the fact that in this first part of the sutta the Buddha says the Tathagata does not take a stand on this, and yet the Tathagata is stable, creates a little bit of a dissonance for us, perhaps.

Ñāṇananda says this quality of being tādī or "such" is often rendered or translated as firmness, steadfastness, and immovability. Generally one associates firmness, immovability, or stability with landing on something, with holding on or leaning on. But here we have just the opposite. Not to hold on to anything is to be such. Not to hold on to anything is to be stable. This suchness has a flexibility of a higher order and an adaptability.

So: not taking a stand, and yet stable. We normally try to find stability by landing on something, by our minds creating something and trying to land on it. We think this is where stability would be. But what might a different stability look like?

Ñāṇananda says this quality of being unshaken, this immovability, this stability, is the result of not grasping. It comes when there is no clinging. It is for the one who rests on or leans on something that there is instability.

Why is that? Why is landing on something unstable? Because what we land on is inherently falling apart. It's already falling apart. Ñāṇananda says if you're leaning on a wall and the wall is damaged—I think earthquake, because I live in California—you're leaning on a wall and the wall is shaking. It's like the earth is shaking. The earth is not stable. We think of it as being stable. So when we are leaning on, holding to, feeling like that stability in something we think of as stable, landing on something, we find it's not. Because everything is arising in dependence on conditions and falling apart when those conditions change.

And so the Buddha points to this—the such, the not-clinging, not-landing mind that's aligned with experience as impermanent and is not trying to find stability in that. It's like this slipperiness, this alignment with the truth of instability. That's a different kind of stability. Nowhere to land, changing experience, understood as changing experience.

CHAPTER 200

Release - and Not Picking Up

Andrea Fella · 46 min

In this contemplative talk from a retreat setting, Andrea Fella explores the nuanced territory of release and freedom in meditation practice. She begins by describing how awareness and wisdom naturally receive and understand the conditioned, impermanent, and dukkha nature of experience—including the subtle ways we cling and search for a place free from suffering.

Fella distinguishes between two aspects of freedom from craving. The first is the familiar experience of letting go—the release and ease that arises when wisdom understands how clinging participates in suffering. She notes how pleasant this release can feel, partly due to contrast with the previous state of tension, and cautions that even this sense of release can become a subtle object of clinging if we begin seeking it as an aim.

The second, subtler aspect of freedom is the mind simply not picking up craving in the first place—non-reliance on greed, aversion, and delusion rather than active release from them. This may initially manifest as disinterest or even boredom as we become disenchanted with experience. Eventually, she suggests, even interest and disinterest become irrelevant—there is simply experience arising and ceasing, not being picked up. When old habits of clinging return, we can notice the dukkha more clearly, continuing to observe experience as it is. This teaching offers practical guidance for practitioners navigating the deepening stages of insight and equanimity.

Aware and receiving. Maybe you're already aware, already known, as there's a momentum to awareness and wisdom. Awareness and wisdom simply receive and understand—experience, understand the conditioned nature of experience, the unreliable nature of experience, the impermanent nature of experience.

And sometimes the understanding is the dukkha nature of experience. Sometimes that's experienced as unreliability, nothing worth holding on to. Sometimes it's experienced as understanding, feeling the dukkha, feeling the dukkha of the clinging. This is not a mistake. We notice our relationship—the subtle ways we try to avoid or want to get away from, or search for some place to land where there is no suffering. And that very process is also dukkha. But we can see that. Such deep habits, not personal habits, but human habits of clinging.

And sometimes we experience the letting go, the release, the ease. When the mind understands the way clinging is participating in the suffering, when wisdom understands that, it lets go. Sometimes we experience that letting go, the release. That ease, that peace, that release can be very pleasant, in part because of the contrast. And we can appreciate that release, understand that it is a letting go.

And sometimes there can be a very subtle clinging to that too—that sense of the release being the aim, that experience of release being the aim. So in a subtle way we may start looking for that release.

There's a letting go aspect of freedom, a letting go of craving. One definition of the third noble truth: freedom is the ending of craving—giving it up, relinquishing it, freedom from it, non-reliance on it. Another way to understand freedom is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion, the absence of craving, the non-arising of craving.

Sometimes initially our experience of that freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion is the sense of letting them go, of the release from them. There's also the possibility of understanding that the mind is not picking up the craving, not relying on it, not picking up, not latching on.

At first this can perhaps be experienced as a sense of not being interested in. Awareness and wisdom, not interested in picking things up, not interested in clinging. Sometimes that feeling of disinterest, maybe even boredom—this is in the flavor, some of the flavors as we become disenchanted with experience. It's not so interesting anymore. So we might have that sense of disinterest. That can be known.

And at a certain point, interest and disinterest just don't seem relevant. Neither interest nor disinterest. Just experience arising, ceasing, not worth clinging to. Just experience not being picked up.

And then after a time we see the habits of tending to pick up come back. We feel the dukkha of that. Again, sometimes even more clearly we feel the dukkha. Not a mistake. And so we just notice experience as it is, aware of this, aware of the relationship—just experience tumbling on.

So notice what happens there. Is there discomfort? Is there a sense of running up against habits of mind, habits of culture? Again, just noticing that, and trying to remember the guidelines we've created around a pretty broad container of silence around the center.

You all have a lot of momentum in the practice. In that momentum, the practice can get even simpler.

So carry on.

CHAPTER 201

What is True in This Moment?

Andrea Fella · 47 min

> In this contemplative guided meditation from the IMS Forest Refuge, Andrea Fella invites practitioners into a profound simplicity of awareness—receiving experience exactly as it arises and passes in each moment. The practice unfolds as an exploration of what is actually true right now: sensations, sounds, emotions, and mind states simply arising and being known.
>
> Fella guides attention toward the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) as they reveal themselves naturally in direct experience. She points to the changing nature (anicca) of all phenomena—sensations, thoughts, and feelings arising, persisting, and passing away. She illuminates the dukkha nature of experience, noting how nothing is reliable as a place for lasting happiness, how there is nowhere solid to land. And she touches the not-self (anattā) quality—experience as uncontrollable, not mine, not who I am, just phenomena tumbling on according to conditions.
> What emerges is an invitation to profound relaxation through alignment with these truths. Even resistance, when it arises, becomes simply another phenomenon to be known—changing, conditioned, not self. Fella quotes Bhikkhu Bodhi's distillation of practice into two essential instructions: to start and to continue. This talk embodies the elegant simplicity at the heart of vipassanā—a mind that receives just this moment without adding, concocting, or imagining. Just this is the path.

What is the experience of this moment, the truth of this moment as it is arising and passing? Sensation arising, being known. Sound arising, being known. Emotions, mind states arising, being known. Experience as experience.

We might be attuned less to the experience and more to the nature of experience. The changing nature perhaps—sensations, thoughts, feelings arising, persisting, and passing away. Sometimes the interest is more attuned to the change itself and may not even be so interested in what is changing.

Perhaps interest in the dukkha nature of experience is what's clear, what's recognized in the moment. Sometimes the experience of the contraction around clinging, or sometimes the understanding that experience is just not reliable. There isn't any place to land. A changing nature, tottering, all experience shifting, changing, nothing reliable. Nothing reliable is a place for lasting happiness.

Aligning with these truths, the mind can deeply relax. Just rest in the non-resting.

At times we may be noticing the uncontrollable, the vulnerable nature of experience. Conditions changing, not under our ultimate control. Not mine, not who I am. Just experience tumbling on.

Receiving experience as it is, arriving, showing itself, however that is. Open to receiving this, just this.

And sometimes there's resistance arising to this—frustration, wanting something else to be present, not aligned with the truth of this moment. And yet the truth of this moment then also includes that resistance. That can be seen just as a phenomenon. Resistance too is changing, conditioned, not self. Phenomena arising and being known.

Noticing when imaginings arise, knowing them as imaginings.

It really is so simple. A mind receiving just this. It's a very simple mind. Not adding, not concocting, not imagining. And if those arise, those are simply known.

Simple practice. Aligning with the truth of this, just this. Just this is the path. There is no other.

Bhikkhu Bodhi has said that there are really only two instructions: to start and to continue.

Simply continue.

CHAPTER 202

The Present Moment

Andrea Fella · 51 min

> In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella addresses a question that arises for many practitioners: why do we keep returning to the breath and the present moment? She explores multiple dimensions of this foundational practice, from the simple pleasure of concentration to the profound discovery that the present moment is the only place where choice actually exists.
>
> Fella examines how reactivity begins at its most subtle level—in the movement toward pleasant experience and away from unpleasant experience—and how mindfulness practice reveals these patterns. She introduces the distinction between passive and active awareness, explaining how truly being present differs from the vague awareness that operates when we're lost in thought. The talk includes practical exercises from Jack Kornfield's teachings, such as sitting until the urge to get up has arisen and passed three times, and pausing before speaking to witness the moment of intention.
>
> Particularly powerful is Fella's personal story of working with overwhelming anger, discovering through patient practice that she could witness the very birth of reactive patterns and choose not to follow them. This account demonstrates how meditation reveals the microcosm of our habitual tendencies, showing us where suffering begins and where we have the power to respond differently. The teaching emphasizes that while we can choose our actions, we cannot control their results—pointing to the importance of releasing attachment to outcomes while remaining fully present to each moment of choice.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the present moment.

As meditators, we emphasize the present moment. We come back to our breath over and over again to train ourselves to wake up to the present moment. But after we've practiced for a while, sometimes it gets kind of rote to us, this coming back over and over again. And we begin to think, what does this have to do with anything? Why am I doing this? Why am I spending my time coming back to the in-breath and the out-breath over and over again?

So that's what I'd like to address tonight. Why do we do this? What are the benefits of it?

As I was contemplating this, the first thing that came into my mind is that a lot of us do it because it feels good. When we come back to the breath over and over again, it begins to steady the mind and stabilize the attention, and some concentration starts to develop. Concentration in and of itself feels good. It gets quiet, and there can be all kinds of pleasant sensations in the body and in the mind that arise through the concentration.

But another thing that we start to see as we do this practice and get a little bit concentrated is that the mind has stopped its normal mode. It gets out of its habitual tendencies as it becomes a little bit concentrated. And we start to see, even if only for a few moments, that a lot of our difficulties, a lot of our struggles are released in this letting go of what our habitual tendencies are—letting go of the tendency of the mind to go off, and simply coming back. So even for a few moments, we start to see the benefits of the lessening of reactivity.

This reactivity of mind that has us moving out from the present moment is a lot of the reason why we suffer, why we struggle. At its core, what is reactivity actually? When we think about it, we usually think of states of mind like anger or resentment or hostility or avarice—something like that where there's a very strong sense of reactivity in the mind. But at its core, at its very beginnings, the reactivity is born out of contact with something being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. And out of that experience of pleasant or unpleasant, there's a movement either towards it, if it's pleasant, or away from it, if it's unpleasant. If something is pleasant, we like it, we want it, we want to get more of it. If something is unpleasant, we usually want to try to get rid of it. So that's the birth of reactivity—that place where the pleasant moves into liking, to wanting, to grasping.

A lot of what we see as we come back to the present moment, as we practice this training, is the fact that it's really hard to stay here. And we actually think that's a problem, that we can't stay here. But that's part of what the training is—to see what makes us unable to be here.

As we come back again and again, we start to see the mind will go off into some rant with a friend. "Boy, why did that person do that?" And we're off into some kind of reactivity. Or perhaps we're paying attention to our breath and there's a little bit of pleasant feeling coming, and suddenly we find ourselves off on a beach in Tahiti. The practice is to come back, but also to notice what has taken us away. What are the habits of mind that take us away? That's part of the training—to witness that. It's not a problem when the mind has wandered. It's part of what we see, part of the training to actually understand what our habitual tendencies of mind are, what we react to, how we respond to pleasant and unpleasant.

Becoming free of the reactive mind happens in several ways through the course of our meditation. Part of it happens in the way that I mentioned earlier, just because concentration develops slowly over time. Because that concentration has developed, some of the reactivity becomes quiescent. That's one of the ways we begin to let go of our reactivity. And as the reactivity becomes quiescent, we begin to get a sense of, "Wow, it's kind of nice to be without the mind going all over the place. It feels pretty good."

Another way we start to let go of reactivity is when we begin to see that it's unskillful for us, that it makes us suffer. Part of the practice is actually witnessing how we suffer in our anger, in our frustration, in our impatience—that reactivity causes us suffering. Often we are so outwardly focused on what we are angry at or frustrated with or impatient with that we don't really see that we're suffering in the process. The practice of becoming present, waking up in the midst of the reactivity, lets us see that it's actually not so skillful. That's another way we begin to learn how to let go of the reactivity. As the mind sees the suffering that's generated, it begins to let go of the things that cause it.

And likewise, another thing we begin to see as we cultivate this coming back is the benefits of the peace, the tranquility, the equanimity that's cultivated as we do this practice.

We begin to see that those kinds of states of mind make us happier, make us more peaceful, make us more balanced. So through these three ways, as we do this coming back over and over again in our meditation, all three are becoming cultivated.

Mindfulness has a really wonderful property to it. And what I mean by mindfulness is a non-reactive, non-judgmental awareness of what is happening while it's happening. In my experience, with that kind of awareness, it has what feel initially like some kind of magic properties.

It has the property that when you bring your attention to some of these wholesome states of mind—tranquility, equanimity, peace, generosity—when you bring your awareness to states of mind like that, it creates the conditions for those states to arise more frequently in the future. And when you bring your attention to unwholesome or unskillful states of mind like anger, frustration, hostility, avarice, it creates the conditions for those states to arise less frequently in the future.

Now that first one makes sense to a lot of people, and it certainly made sense to me. What I pay attention to tends to increase. That second one—what I pay attention to tends to decrease—I didn't quite understand for a while. But my understanding of what happens is this: when you pay attention with a non-judgmental awareness to a state of mind like anger, and you've got your attention on the anger itself, what you see is the suffering. You see how detrimental it is to your own being. So the mindfulness, the turning of our attention back on some of these unskillful states of mind, shows us that they are unskillful. We get a direct hit of the fact: this is not so good for me.

So it's really wonderful—this one simple quality of mind, this mindfulness, has this power. It's like this incredible wedge that creates a path for us through our experience, showing us what is skillful and what is unskillful, if we're willing to pay attention to it.

The other reason the present moment is such a valuable place to pay attention to is because it's the only place anything ever happens. A lot of us spend a lot of our time thinking about the past, thinking about the future. And as we begin to do this practice and witness our own minds, it can be really humbling to see just how much we do this. It's astonishing how little we're actually here. It's amazing we can get anything done because our minds are continually off. We get these little moments of being here, a little moment of "oh, there's something," and then the mind is off thinking about how it compares to this or that, or why I like it, or why I don't like it, or why I want more of it. And in the midst of that, there may be a little awareness of some thought, and then there's a reaction to that, and the mind is off on that.

So there are these little moments during our day—many of them, actually—where we do have some presence of mind. But the vast majority of our day, we are in our thoughts, thinking about this or that, the past and the future.

Let's explore a little bit about the past and the future. The past doesn't actually exist anywhere. We can't point to it. We can't say, "There it is." What the past actually is, is a thought in the present moment. That's all the past is. That's all the reality it has—what exists in our thoughts. We have a cultural group agreement that the past exists, and we create it over and over again in the present moment by thinking it. As a collective community, sometimes we think about the past together. Likewise for the future. The future doesn't exist. It simply exists as a thought in the present moment. So if we're not actually awake in the present moment, we're missing our lives.

There's another aspect of awareness, as distinct from mindfulness, that I'd like to explore. And this again relates to the quality of bringing awareness into the present moment. Awareness is happening all the time. Every second of our day, there's some kind of awareness going on. And probably even in our sleep, there's some kind of awareness happening. But it's not always an awareness that is connected with the present moment.

I'll give you an example of this. It was the first time in my practice that this became really clear to me. I was on a retreat, sitting in the dining hall, and I was kind of spaced out. I wasn't really paying much attention, just in my thoughts. I don't even know what I was thinking about. But I noticed somebody come into the room and put some food on their plate and then leave. And then I noticed another person come into the room and put some food on their plate and then leave. While this was going on, I was thinking about the people who came into the room. And then after they both had left, there was a recognition: oh, I'm awake now. I'm actually here now, and I wasn't before. I'm present. But I was curious about the fact that I could remember what had just happened, even though I hadn't been awake in the present moment.

I'm sure you've all had this kind of experience. If you're sitting in a room reading a book and somebody walks in and leaves, you're concentrated on the book.

But if somebody came in and said, "Did somebody come in?" you can probably remember, "Yeah, somebody came in." So there was an awareness going on. But that moment where I saw, "Oh, I'm actually awake now in the present moment"—what was the difference?

One of my teachers, Gil, gave me a term for this. He called it passive awareness versus active awareness. And in later discussions with some of my Burmese teachers, what they have said is that the awareness is not concurrent with the present moment in that kind of passive awareness. There's an awareness happening, but it's not concurrent with what's happening. It's not aware of what's happening while it's happening.

And so that active form of awareness brings you into the present moment, and you are aware of what's happening right now in this very moment. You're aware of the pressure on your seat. You're aware of your hands at your knees, whatever. There's just an awareness of what's happening, whatever moods or mind states are going on right now.

Another benefit—one of the most powerful reasons to come into the present moment—and what we can learn in the present moment has to do with choice. The present moment is the only place we have a choice. We have the possibility in this moment to have some input into the direction of our lives, how we want our lives to go. It's the only place that we have this option. If we're not present to make our choices, if we're not present in the present moment to be aware of that possibility that a choice can be made right now, our habitual tendencies will make our choice for us. So if we see this moment of choice, we have the opportunity to influence the course of our lives.

What I mean by our habitual tendencies making our choice for us is that as we go through our day, there are so many different things that operate in our minds—patterns, just ways that we move through the world. Even a simple, small example: every day when I get to a certain point in my day, I have to choose to go out for my aerobic walk. And I would say most days the thought crosses my mind, "I don't want to do that." And if I weren't conscious of it, I would probably half the time just blow off the walk that day. But because I'm conscious of the fact that I'm making a choice, I can choose, "I'm going to do this." And every day, even though I feel like I'm not going to do this today, I choose to do this.

So being aware of that moment when those thoughts cross our mind—"I don't want to do this," "I've got better things to do," "I've got these eight other things that are calling me," "I don't have time to take my walk this morning"—those habitual tendencies would choose for us. That's a very simple example of what I mean by our habitual tendencies making our choices for us. If we're not aware of the fact that we have this choice, our habits will make the choice for us.

There are some ways that we can start to practice with this in our meditation practice. I'd like to talk about some of those and share a little bit about my experiences with them.

One of them was an exercise that I learned from Jack Kornfield's book, A Path with Heart. In it, he suggests that in order to pay attention to this movement of mind, of making a choice, you pick a time for meditation when you don't have to have a specific length of time for the practice. So don't set your alarm to go off after thirty or forty-five minutes. Just have it be an unspecified period of time for your meditation.

Then the instructions are that you sit until a very strong urge to get up has crossed your mind three times. So that first time the urge crosses your mind, you simply observe it. You watch the fact that you want to get up. And this is easiest to do if you actually turn toward the experience: What does it feel like to want to get up? As opposed to kind of gritting and bearing, "Okay, I've got to sit through this." Just observe. What does it feel like? What is the pull? What's happening in the mind?

So observe that whole process of what that wanting feels like. And after some period of time—and it actually doesn't take that long, a minute, maybe two at most—that desire will pass, and the desire to get up will no longer be there. So you can now just settle into your meditation again. You may want to notice if there's any kind of deepening that's happened through that firm attention that's been cultivated by paying attention to the wanting.

And sometime sooner, perhaps, or later, another urge will come, and you pay attention to that. Again, the third time it comes, you can get up.

When I tried this the first time, I had been sitting about twenty minutes a day. And I just assumed my body kind of told me I needed to get up after twenty minutes. I thought, "Well, that's just the way my body is, I guess." I wasn't particularly judgmental about it.

But I tried this exercise, and at the end of the time, after I'd had these three urges pass, I looked at the clock and it had been forty minutes. I thought, "Wow, I guess I can sit for forty minutes." And from then on, I sat for forty minutes. So it had a very strong impact on my practice just to witness that. My assumption—basically I had an assumption that was untrue—and this exercise revealed that to me. Now your experience may reveal something different to you, but it's a really great exercise and I'd encourage you to try it.

You can extend this exercise too, if you can't particularly find a time when you can have an unspecified period of time for your practice. You can extend this to a vow of stillness in the sitting—for instance, not moving to scratch an itch or not moving for a pain in the knee until the urge has come and gone three times. So you can play with this and see how it deepens your practice and how it shows you about this power of choice.

That moment where the mind says, "It's time to get up"—that's a moment of choice. And that movement of the mind saying it's time to get up is our habitual tendency telling us it's time to get up, as opposed to it being an actual decision based on evaluating the circumstances. Observing that choice point can help us start to see these choice points in our lives.

Another great place to practice with this, seeing the choice points, is in walking meditation. If you do formal walking meditation, typically in this practice we do a back and forth walking where you stop, you walk, you come to the end of a path, you stop, you turn, and then you start walking again. All of those points—the starting to walk, the deciding to end walking, the turning, the moving—they all involve choice. So it's a great place to see it, because there's something happening at each end of the path where it's a very clear choice that can be made. When do I turn? Which direction do I turn? It's a wonderful place to observe that.

Another wonderful place to look at this is in speech. I'd suggest doing this with a friend who knows what you're doing—maybe as a pair, a dharma buddy. You get together and decide, "Okay, we're going to pay attention to deciding to speak." The way I suggest doing this initially is to simply pause before you speak. Know that you're going to speak before you speak. You don't have to stop yourself from speaking, but know that you're going to speak before you speak. Know that choice is being made: "I'm going to speak right now." Simply pause, and try to carry on a conversation with a friend in which that pause is part of the practice.

Through starting small, we can begin to cultivate the ability to be present for this moment of choice. And it can help us in our day to begin to see where we're starting to make our bigger choices—or where we're missing the fact that we've made a bigger choice, where we're suddenly driving down the road in search of the latest electronic device because we had this wanting and we are suddenly off and going without ever having seen that we were going to get there.

The other thing I'd like to mention about choice is that when we see that moment of choice, as we practice, as we start playing with looking at a choice being made—with this pause before speaking, with waiting to move in our meditation—what we'll likely see at that moment, kind of all by itself, is not only that a choice is being made, but we will also very likely get to see why we're making that choice. What's the motivation? What reason is pushing us in that direction?

So in the sitting example, you may discover a thought: "Time to clean the refrigerator. Oh, this is a great time to clean the refrigerator! I have forty-five minutes." We get to see what the motivation is, what is triggering it. There may be motivations of boredom, of wanting to get away from the sitting. There may be a motivation of feeling like there's a lot of things pressing on us that we have to do, other things that are more important to us. So we begin to discover the reason why we want to get up.

I really saw this clearly at one time practicing in Burma. I had witnessed the intention in walking meditation quite a lot before this, but at one point I was really witnessing these pairs—the motivation in conjunction with the intention to do something. On one particular walking period, every time I came to the end of the path and I was standing there, I would note "standing, standing, standing," and then I would notice an intention to turn. And there was always something accompanying it. It was usually boredom, frustration, wanting to get on with things. It was never a wholesome mind state—it was always some kind of aversion, a feeling of "just don't want to be standing here anymore, time to turn around." There was just a little hint of some kind of aversion accompanying that desire to turn.

At that point I was in fairly deep retreat, not really wanting to act on unwholesome intentions. So I was kind of stuck. It was like, "Well, can't turn now." I'd see the intention, I'd see the aversion, I'd see the boredom. "Oh, won't turn on that one."

What do I do? I mean, I'm not seeing a wholesome reason to turn around. And I went and reported this to my teacher. I was like, what do I do? I don't want to act on an unwholesome intention, but all of the intentions that accompany the intention to turn are unwholesome. I was in quite a state.

His instructions to me were quite simple and really brilliant. He said, "Note standing five times, and then turn." Basically, it cut through any internal reason to turn and made it a very structured reason, a kind of neutral reason. Note standing five times, and then turn. So we can really start to see these small movements of mind.

Now, this may sound like something so subtle in some ways—to see that kind of aversion happening before we turn. But what I'd like to suggest is that what we see in our meditation is really a microcosm of what's happening in our minds anyway. Our minds don't really change because we are meditating. We just get to clearly see what they're doing. So that kind of pattern of the mind to be averse to things, to have that tendency to not want to be in a particular state, to have that kind of pushing something away—this is a habitual tendency of my mind. We really get to witness in this microcosm of paying attention in our meditation how our minds function at large. And it's very helpful to begin to see these habitual tendencies.

So see if you can start to witness the moment of intention to action accompanied by a moment of motivation behind that action. And again, we have the opportunity at that point—when we see that choice point and we see whether there's a skillful motivation or an unskillful motivation—we can hopefully begin to choose towards taking the action or making the movement when the motivation is skillful, and to not go that direction when the motivation is unskillful. It begins to instruct us. This path, this mindfulness, really points out how we can move through our lives skillfully.

We're not always going to be able to choose skillfully, even if we see it. We're not always going to be able to choose skillfully. But at least we've seen it, and that's a wonderful step. And if we do notice that a motivation is skillful—if we notice a motivation of generosity or kindness or equanimity or peace behind an action, or compassion—we can take joy in the noticing of that mind state itself. We may be motivated by more wholesome intentions more often than we realize. And as I mentioned earlier, the recognition or the awareness of that wholesome, skillful mind state—of joy, of generosity, of kindness—the recognition of that while it's happening creates the conditions for it to arise more frequently. So notice when you have a skillful intention arising, and take delight in it. It's a wonderful thing to happen.

These moments of motivation, intention, and action happen all the time, every moment of our life. Even while I'm sitting here moving my hand this way, every moment through that path of my hand moving, there's a moment of choice. It keeps moving or it stops. It keeps moving or it stops. So there's a moment of choice. It's astounding, actually, when we begin to see how widespread, how much choice we have in our lives. It's overwhelming, actually, to some extent—we cannot really see all of those intentions. But we can begin to see, through this practice of cultivating the awareness of this choice point, the larger, more obvious choice points: the choice to get up from sitting to standing, the choice to start walking, the choice to go get in our car and go shopping. We can begin to see the more major choice points in our life when we start to pay attention to them in our meditation.

This is one of the biggest powers of mindfulness: the ability to witness that moment of choice and to actually decide how to act, instead of having our habitual tendencies choose for us.

I had a very wonderful experience of this pretty early in my practice, and this event is actually what really got me going into the practice. It really showed me the power of the practice, and I'd like to tell this story.

I really got into the meditation practice because of overwhelming anger. I was really, really angry at a particular person. And the anger was so extreme that when it really came up, I was pretty much non-functional. I couldn't function in my work. I would just be enraged and consumed with this anger. And this is what actually got me into the meditation practice—there's got to be a way to deal with this.

I wasn't functional. There had to be a way to deal with this.

A friend had sent me a book on mindfulness, and I thought, okay, I'm going to try this. I haven't got any other things to try. I'm going to see if I can be mindful of my anger. I used it almost like a mindfulness bell—whenever I got angry, I vowed that I would wake up for that experience and recognize what it felt like.

What I noticed initially was that I would be in a full-blown rage by the time I remembered I was supposed to be paying attention. And then it was pretty unpleasant to be in this state of anger. I really noticed the suffering. I really noticed how difficult it was to be present for myself. I couldn't actually do much other than just say, "Yep, I'm angry." Just really gross noticing of anger at that point. I was pretty new in the practice also. I hadn't had a lot of instructions. I didn't know about how to pay attention to my body. This was just a very gross recognition: yep, I'm angry. What am I supposed to do with this? And at some point, I would be able to put it aside and go back to my work.

Over the course of months of this happening, what I began to realize was that I was waking up a little bit earlier in the process. I wouldn't be in such a rage—it would be more like normal anger when I woke up and remembered, oh, I'm supposed to be paying attention to this. And then over even more months, I began to see that I was waking up when it was more like irritation.

I was beginning to recognize it before the mind fed it and allowed it to escalate. That's what I was witnessing: if I broke into the cycle of anger earlier, it didn't get a chance to escalate into rage. And then earlier and earlier—if I broke into it at irritation, it didn't get a chance to escalate into that full-blown anger.

Then one day I was in my kitchen, no anger present. I was just pretty much paying attention to what I was doing—cutting an apple. In that moment of cutting the apple, I saw a thought appear in my mind. I saw a memory of being at a fruit stand with this person I was so angry with. And I saw at that moment that I wasn't angry. I also saw the inclination of the mind to jump on that thought as if it were a train and ride it right into anger—to construct the anger by thinking, "He did this and he did that and he shouldn't have done this."

Having spent several months looking at the anger and seeing how much suffering it caused me—this is my understanding in retrospect; I didn't know this at the time—but having seen so much suffering in that state of anger, the mind simply said, "I don't have to go there. I don't have to get on that thought and ride it into anger. I have a choice."

And I didn't.

The next moment I stood there kind of waiting to get angry, because I'd not had the experience in the previous few months of this person arising in my mind without anger arising in my mind. I thought they had to go together. But I didn't get angry.

In that moment it was like, wow, this is really powerful stuff—that this practice can show me where my anger begins and show me that I have a choice. I was blown away by the power of simple mindfulness to reveal that to me.

Looking back at it now, I think what often happens when we have this kind of reactivity to somebody over and over again is that we'll have a moment like that where we see the choice. And then a few moments later, that thought comes back to bait us again. Another thought about that person will return, and if we don't notice it, we'll jump on that one and get angry.

But in my experience in this particular case, I was so overwhelmed by the power of the practice that it completely drove thoughts of him out of my mind. I was left with so much gratitude and appreciation. That was the operative experience in that moment—the gratitude for the practice. Wow, what can this do for me? It really made me want to keep going.

So with all of this attention on the present moment and cultivating skillful actions, and knowing that as we cultivate skillful actions it tends to make those states appear more often, we do have to be careful in this process. We must be careful not to choose skillful actions in order that a certain result will happen.

We cannot actually control the results of our actions. While we have some choice about the present moment and what we do when we see this choice point, we don't really have a choice about how that action will manifest once it's out in the world—how people will respond, how other events will unfold on the basis of that action. So we need to let go of the results of our actions. This is really the wide web of karma. We can't control how other people will respond to us, and we can't control how our actions will influence the environment. A simple neutral choice, such as turning left or turning right, might mean life or death. We don't know. And that's another great reason to be in the present moment. We never know when that moment will come, that moment of death. We never know whether we've chosen something that will have that be the result of our actions. So wake up for your life, wake up. You're missing your life unless you are present in the present moment with mindfulness.

Someone asked about the interplay between concentration and mindfulness. In concentration practices, what we do is try to keep coming back to a particular object and let go of everything else. In mindfulness practice per se, at some point the practice is simply to be present, simply to be awake for whatever is happening. So that moment of noticing, "Oh, I'm lost," is a moment of mindfulness. You can wake up right in that moment, aware of whatever is happening. You are already awake right in that moment, aware of whatever is happening. And you have a choice. You can then skillfully choose, "Okay, come back," or you can choose to stay present with whatever is happening.

This connects to something I had wanted to mention in that discussion of passive versus active awareness. One of the best ways to really see the distinction between mindfulness and concentration is to cultivate a recognition of what it feels like to be present, what it feels like to be awake. Then it doesn't matter what we're paying attention to in mindfulness practice. If we want to develop concentration, we can actually develop it through simple presence to changing experience. But if we want to develop deep states of concentration, we typically have to focus on a particular object. So that awareness or recognition of presence—what does it feel like to be awake?—is a great thing to cultivate.

Initially I didn't really understand what this meant. People would give instructions in guided meditations and say, "Feel the presence in your body." And I would think, "What does that mean?" I had no clue what it meant for years. Over time, I began to understand it. And one of the places that I learned most to see this is in that very moment you talked about—the moment when we wake up after we've been lost, or the moment where we recognize, "I'm off, I'm off the breath." There's something that I was focused here, and then something pulled me away, and I'm awake now. That moment of recognition—"I'm awake now"—is the best place to recognize and see the difference between passive and active awareness.

Because in that moment, there's a little hint, there's tendrils, there's a remembrance in the mind of what it felt like to not be present—a little bit of a sense of the vagueness of mind or the lack of clarity—and the sense of what does it feel like now. It's quite clear once we begin to look for it, once we begin to see, "Oh, that's what it feels like to be awake."

In order to do this exercise, you really have to be awake and present for the moment you notice, "Oh, I've been lost." And this exercise, at least for me, really helped to cut that little bit of judgment around the fact that I'd been lost, because I was starting to take an interest in that interface. I was starting to take an interest in what it felt like to be lost. So in order to do that, I had to be present and not judging myself for having gotten lost. I started to try to ask: What is the soonest I can possibly see the fact that I've woken up?

It stopped being a problem that the mind wandered because I was so interested in what it meant to come back. So that's a really great place to explore that interface and also to help loosen the tie of the judging mind around that coming back.

Question: Could you comment on the difference between active awareness and mindfulness?

No, I'm not so much drawing a distinction between active awareness and mindfulness. I was wanting to draw a distinction between active and passive awareness. But essentially, they're the same thing.

Comment from participant: I learned tonight that you're supposed to clean the refrigerator, so now I know what's wrong in life.

Another participant: I have a little over four months left in a year-to-live practice. That really puts the commodity of time right on your plate. Early on, I started looking for what this present moment looks like—this razor's edge between the past and the future. How do I dive into that and find more of it? The more I've been sitting with it, I find it's just very, very open. The present moment is a very huge place. A lot gets done, and it keeps changing within now rather than now moving through some fixed time. When you talk about thoughts of past and future, it's much more like—I understand it as construct, and I've been able to gain a lot of insight into a knot up in this, you know, the construct of "this is my past, these are the things I've been through, these are the things that constantly reinforce that I'm an individual, separate self." And I ask, do I really cling to that? It's behind this kind of practice that I've been able to see that, and really see the illusion of the self that we cling to as if it were the truth.

That's beautiful. Thank you for sharing that. This idea you mentioned about the present moment getting really big—that's true. It's kind of amazing that it's just this infinitely changing now. And it gets really big. It contains everything, essentially. So it's quite amazing. Thank you for sharing that.

So it's about ten of right now, and I'm told we should stop. Thank you very much for your attention.

CHAPTER 203

The Ordinary That Transforms

Andrea Fella · 52 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella invites us to appreciate the extraordinary potential hidden within the most ordinary aspects of our experience. Drawing from her extensive practice including long retreats in Burma and ordination as a nun, she reveals how mindfulness—a quality so common it's like the air we breathe—possesses remarkable power to guide us away from suffering and toward liberation.

Fella presents the Buddha's teachings on the six sense doors (seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and mind) and the five aggregates (khandhas): body, consciousness, perception, feeling, and mental formations. She explains how consciousness functions like a mirror—neutral and non-judgmental, simply illuminating whatever arises. Through sustained mindfulness, we naturally begin to abandon unwholesome states and cultivate wholesome ones, not through force but through clearly seeing their effects.

The talk offers practical guidance for touching into the quality of pure knowing, including noticing the moment of waking up from distraction and paying attention during neutral daily activities like brushing teeth. Fella shares her retreat experience of discovering how ordinary consciousness, when met with continuous clarity, opens into what the tradition calls 'the bliss of seclusion'—freedom from unwholesome mind states. She concludes with Lama Gendun Rinpoche's poem celebrating how happiness and peace are already present, available in every instant of open, relaxed awareness.

My name is Andrea Fella, and I've been practicing Vipassana meditation for about ten years now. I quickly got into intensive retreat practice. In the past ten years, I've sat a number of three-month retreats at IMS and a number of long retreats in Burma. At one point, I ordained as a nun in Burma. So I really love the long retreat practice, but I also have a love for daily life practice, which is how my practice began in the first place.

I've also been involved in the service aspect, primarily through being a retreat manager, both at Spirit Rock and currently for a retreat that we hold in Burma in January. It's an interesting retreat taught jointly by a Burmese meditation teacher and two Western teachers—a lovely three-week retreat in the Sagin Hills in Burma. I began teaching in Redwood City about three years ago. Gil Fronsdal is my main mentor, and he asked me to start teaching. So I primarily teach in Redwood City at the IMC Center there, and I teach retreats, daylongs, and classes.

Often when we think about our meditation, we focus on the calm, the bliss, the peaceful states that emerge in our practice. That kind of experience comes to the forefront for us. But what I'd like to talk about tonight is something a little more ordinary. Mindfulness itself is a very ordinary quality. Our experience throughout our day is very ordinary. So I'd like to explore these ordinary qualities of our life that can transform us.

Mindfulness itself is a very ordinary quality of mind. It's nothing obscure. It's nothing rarefied. It's a very simple quality of mind that we experience from the time we're children, really. A working definition of mindfulness is an awareness of what is happening while it's happening. Now, a form of awareness happens all the time, and that's not necessarily mindfulness, because we're aware all the time even if we're not particularly conscious of what's happening while it's happening.

For example, a number of years ago, I was talking to a friend and asked her about the sound of mourning doves. I said, "You know the sound that mourning doves make when they fly away, don't you?" She said, "No, I don't know that sound." I said, "Oh, I'm sure you do. You've heard it hundreds of times. The next time you ride your bike down the road, pay attention when the mourning dove flies away, and you'll recognize that sound." The next day she came back to me and said, "You're right, I know that sound." But she hadn't really been conscious of it in the moment. That's the difference between awareness and mindfulness.

Mindfulness is like the air we breathe, actually. It happens to us all the time throughout our day. It's not something we even actually have to try to do. It will happen to us in brief moments all the time throughout the day. For example, if you are washing your hands and you put them in the water and it's really hot, you know that it's hot when it's happening. There's a moment of mindfulness there, of recognition: "Oh, this is hot." That kind of thing happens all the time to us. But we don't typically pay attention to the fact that it has happened, that we are aware of what's happening while it's happening.

Right now, how hard is it for you to be aware of the fact that I'm speaking while I'm speaking? It's really quite simple. Once I've called your attention to it, it's right there. Or the pressure of your body on the chair—it's right there once I bring your attention to it. Or your feet on the floor. It's a very simple, very obvious quality of mind. But we don't usually recognize it as a valuable quality of mind. In fact, it just goes right by. It's like the air we breathe. It's so ubiquitous that we don't notice it, but it's very powerful. It's very healing. It's very helpful to us. It has the power to teach us, to show us how to live our lives skillfully, how to avoid unskillful actions. And not only that, it can take us to the place where we become completely free from the ways in which we react to the world and suffer.

So when I say that mindfulness helps to show us what's skillful and unskillful, let me offer a brief definition of what I mean by these terms.

Unskillful mind states are those that lead us more deeply into suffering. They tend to produce unskillful actions and cause all kinds of repercussions and difficulties in our lives. Anger, for instance, tends to be an unskillful mind state. It leads to unskillful actions, to things we regret, things we wish we hadn't done. Skillful mind states, on the other hand, are those that lead us away from suffering. These tend to be motivated by non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion.

Now, this is not a moral judgment about what is good and bad. It's really a very pragmatic exploration. What is it that leads us to suffering? What is it that makes us unhappy and frustrated and impatient and angry in our lives? What leads to those unskillful mind states, and what leads us out of them? That's the definition of skillful and unskillful—what helps us get away from suffering, or what takes us into suffering.

So how does mindfulness help to teach us about this? How does this very ordinary quality of mind that happens all the time actually teach us?

Part of what allows mindfulness to show us this is that we need to sustain it over a period of time. That's a little more challenging. That's not something that happens so naturally—that's the concentration aspect of our practice. But when we can sustain that mindfulness, just that very simple ordinary quality of mind, what starts happening is that we begin to notice the ramifications of our actions, the ramifications of our mind states.

For instance, if you pay attention to an unskillful mind state such as anger, if you're mindful of that state, you start to see pretty quickly that it's an unpleasant experience. Not only does it lead to unpleasant consequences often, but it itself is an unpleasant experience in the moment. So we start to see with mindfulness that this is something that is not so helpful to us.

And actually, we don't really have to do much with that knowledge. We don't necessarily even have to try to abandon the anger the next time it comes up. We may, and it can take time—this can be a process. But over time, what starts to happen is that the mind will abandon these unskillful states simply because it sees the suffering. It knows where it's headed, and it goes, "I don't think so." Once it starts to see where it's headed, once it really knows through experience—through mindful experience—the suffering that results from that mind state, it lets go of it almost automatically. Again, that can take some time, but mindfulness will lead us that way. Simply paying attention to our experience will lead us that way. So that's how unskillful mind states are abandoned through mindfulness.

How about skillful ones? If we pay attention to skillful mind states like compassion, generosity, loving-kindness, equanimity, and tranquility, we begin to see that they benefit us, that they function and serve us well in the present moment. So again, the mind will incline more naturally toward those states once they are known in mindfulness. It's almost like magic. It felt like magic to me when I first started experiencing this happening. But it's just a very simple, natural effect of bringing mindfulness to our experience. It creates the conditions for unskillful, unwholesome mind states to arise less frequently in the future, and it creates the conditions for skillful, wholesome mind states to arise more frequently.

Mindfulness is kind of like a wedge. It cuts through our experience and shows us the way. It shows us the path through our experience, away from the unwholesome and towards the wholesome.

It's said that there's a list called the seven factors of awakening, and mindfulness is the first on the list. The others are investigation, energy, rapture, tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. And it's said that if you simply bring mindfulness to experience, the others will follow. It's kind of like the prow of a boat in the water, and the other qualities follow in its wake. Mindfulness is a very skillful, very wholesome mind state to cultivate, and yet it's a very ordinary quality in our life. It's nothing rarefied or obscure—just a very simple quality of mind. All that it takes is noticing it, actually paying attention to when it happens. Notice when you're mindful.

Just that piece—noticing when you're mindful—will have a great impact on developing the cultivation of this wholesome quality of mind, so that it appears more frequently for us. This very ordinary quality of mind, mindfulness, is well worth our attention. I think it was really the brilliance of the Buddha to highlight this quality of mind, to say this is worth cultivating.

So that's the ordinariness of the quality of mindfulness. And now I'd like to talk a little bit about the ordinariness of our experience itself.

The Buddha had several ways of describing what we are as a person, what we are as a psychophysical being. I'll talk about two of those main ways. One is called the teaching on the six sense doors, and one is called the teaching on the five aggregates.

The teaching on the six sense doors is basically a way of dividing up the body and the mind to describe what we are, how we experience our world. The six sense doors in Buddhist psychology are basically the five usual sense doors that we consider—seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching—plus the sense door of the mind, which is what in Buddhist psychology is known as the sixth sense.

Basically, our whole experience comes to us through these six sense doors. We experience sights through the eye, sounds through the ear, smells through the nose, tastes through the tongue, and touch through the skin. And we experience thoughts and emotions through our mind.

There's an analogy about these six sense doors that my teacher in Burma gives. He uses an analogy of a match, a striker, and a flame. With each of these sense doors, the eye and the sight are two separate things. When they come together, when they meet, there is the consciousness of the seeing. So the eye is like the striker, the match is like the thing we're seeing, and when we strike the two together, there's the flame—and that's the consciousness of what is arising. Nothing that we experience can't be found in one of these six sense doors.

Again, this is very ordinary—these are just what we experience all the time throughout our day. One of my teachers, Joseph Goldstein, likes to say with some regularity: only six things ever happen. That's all that ever happens to us. Seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, and things arising in the mind. It doesn't much matter for the purposes of mindfulness what we bring our attention to. It's simply seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, and experiencing things in our mind.

Now, we happen to like certain configurations of seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, and thoughts in the mind better than we like other ones. That's something we need to work with. But for the purposes of mindfulness, for the cultivation of mindfulness, and for waking up, it really makes absolutely no difference what is happening in our experience.

The Buddha actually taught this in one sutta, and I love this sutta. It's got a nice poetic quality, and it's short, so I'll read it to you. The title of this sutta is "The Roots of Everything," and he says:

All things are rooted in desire. They come to actual existence through attention, originate from contact, and converge on feelings. The foremost of all things is concentration. All things are mastered by mindfulness. Their peak is wisdom. Their essence, liberation. All things merge in the deathless, and nibbāna, or freedom, is their culmination.

All things he's talking about—not simply blissful states and concentration, not simply states of clarity. All things lead to liberation. All things culminate in nibbāna. There's no part of our normal everyday experience that is not worth paying attention to. The ordinariness, the very ordinariness of our experience can be the ground for our freedom, for our waking up.

As we start to see this process of life—just this seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, and things happening in the mind—as we start to see this happen, we begin to get a sense that this whole thing is just a process. It's really just an ever-changing flow of things happening. Things appear, they disappear.

Things arise and pass away. Over and over again, things come and go, come and go, come and go through these six sense doors. And when we start to get a taste for the flavor of just this process happening, we begin to see that there's not really anybody there doing anything. Seeing sees. Hearing hears. Thinking thinks. Knowing knows.

This recognition frees us from some of our identification with our experience. And this identification, where we latch onto something and say "this is mine"—that's where a lot of our suffering comes from. Because when we've identified with something and said "this is mine," the law of impermanence is going to take it away from us at some point. And we will suffer for that.

Even the coalescing of a particular identity. "I'm a dancer," for instance. I used to be a dancer. I'm a dancer. I can no longer dance, so I'm no longer a dancer. The loss of that identity for me was really painful. It was an extremely painful process of grieving, for years. So there's suffering around this identification.

At one point on a retreat, I began to experience this quality of just the process, just things happening and nobody there doing anything, simply things happening by themselves. And I was quite surprised at how incredibly relieving it was. When I had originally heard this teaching of not-self, this teaching of there's nobody really here, it was a little bit scary. It's not something that we tend to really want to agree with or say is true. It strikes us as so wrong, so horrible to conceive of not being here. It's like death. We think of it like death.

But in my actual experience of it, it was a huge relief to not have that be there. I came back and reported it to my teacher, and he kind of smiled and said, "No self, no problem." And it was really true.

So the second of the teachings around the psychophysical being is the teaching on the five aggregates. An aggregate is a technical-sounding term, but the Pali term for this is khandha—or skandha in Sanskrit. And the term khandha in Pali means "heap" or "bundle." You would carry a khandha of sticks with you. It's that kind of general term. So this term in Pali is not terribly technical. It's simply heaps of things.

The Buddha identified these five heaps of things that make us up. And what I like about this teaching in contrast to the six sense spheres is that the six sense spheres focus on the body. Seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching are five-sixths of the six sense spheres, and the mind is one of them. In the teaching on the aggregates, it's reversed. There are five aggregates, and four of them have to do with how the mind is broken into parts, different functions of the mind. And one of the five aggregates is the body. So it's exactly reversed in some ways, allowing us to explore our psychophysical being either in more fine detail in our body or in more fine detail in our mental experience.

These five aggregates are: the body, as I mentioned, and the other four—consciousness, perception, feeling, and what are sometimes called mental formations. Consciousness is just the quality of mind that knows, just the simple bare knowing part. Perception is the part of our mind that recognizes what we're knowing. It's connected to memory. So it's the part of our mind that recognizes, "Oh, this is a white piece of paper," or "this is hardness," or "this is a clock." There are many levels of perception. There's the perception of very bare experience down to the level of just vibration and heat and cold. And there's the perception of person, carpet, wood, floor. All of these things are perception.

The feeling part is whether something is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. And that's a very basic, fundamental quality of our experience.

It happens in every single moment of experience that every sense contact either has some quality of pleasant, some quality of unpleasant, or some quality of neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

Built on top of those three, consciousness is kind of the base, essentially. It's the place where we first meet our experience. Then there's the recognition of what it is and the feeling about what it is. Built on top of those bare aspects of experience is a whole array of reactions—thoughts and feelings and moods. Just about everything else you can imagine in your mind goes into that heap. That's the mental formations piece. And then there's the body.

This teaching for me is not simply intellectual. It's actually something I pay attention to in my actual experience. I find it particularly helpful in looking at all the reactivity we have, which is mostly in that area of the formations, the mental formations. As we start to pay attention to our actual experience, we begin to contact just the bare sensations of pressure, vibration, coolness, heat. The closer we get to those sensations, the closer we are to the bare knowing of experience.

Consciousness is kind of the base, as I said. On top of that are perception and feeling. Those three together—you can't really separate them. In fact, the Buddha said you can't really separate these three qualities. I'll read to you what he said about that, because for me it was a revelation. I kept trying to work out how these are different, how they separate, what the separation is between these three.

He's responding to a question. Somebody asks, "Feeling, perception, and consciousness—are these states conjoined or disjoined? And is it possible to separate each of these states from the other in order to describe the difference between them?"

The Buddha replies, "Feeling, perception, and consciousness, friend—these states are conjoined, not disjoined. And it is impossible to separate each of these states from the other in order to describe the difference between them. For what one feels, that one perceives. And what one perceives, that one cognizes."

So we really can't tease these apart completely. But it's like looking at three different facets of the same object. There's either the pleasant-unpleasant aspect, there's the recognition aspect, or there's just the bare knowing aspect. Anytime we're contacting either the feeling of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, or we're contacting the perception of heat, cool, hard, soft—anytime we're contacting those things, we're getting close to the actual quality of knowing, the consciousness that's underneath.

As we begin to actually experience and touch into this direct quality of knowing, we start to see that it has some beautiful qualities. It's clear. It's luminous. It's non-judgmental. Again, this is simply happening in our experience all the time. Every single moment of our experience has this consciousness, this knowing, this perception, this feeling. Every single moment has these things.

This is just something that's happening all the time. But as we can begin to touch into the fact that it is happening, we can start to see and feel and experience these actual qualities of consciousness itself. Consciousness doesn't judge what it experiences. It simply illuminates it. It simply shines the light of knowing on it.

It's kind of like a mirror. You can know something about the reflective qualities of a mirror. You can know how good the mirror is by how clearly it reflects. But it doesn't matter what it's reflecting. It can be reflecting a decaying corpse or it can be reflecting a beautiful landscape. The quality of the reflecting is unchanged. That's the way consciousness functions. It does not care what it's knowing. Its function is simply to know.

As we can touch in more, we can begin to experience the fact that everything is just things arising in our experience. Everything is just coming and going.

So how do we learn to see this knowing? How do we learn to touch into this quality of knowing? I think I talked about this the last time I was here. Some of you may remember, but one of the best ways I know of to begin to touch into this quality of knowing is to notice the moment when you come back from wandering in your meditation. See if you can really touch into that point. What happens?

What's the difference in your experience in that moment when you become mindful again? You can't really know what it's like to not be mindful. But in that moment of waking up, there's a lingering memory of what it was like. So there's a little bit of contrast, and you can begin to sense: what is it like? What does it actually feel like to be awake? What does this presence, this sense of being awake, feel like?

Can you feel it in your life, just right now? Can you feel a sense of presence, of being awake?

For me, this was difficult. When teachers were talking about feeling what it feels like to be present, I had no idea what they were talking about—for years. It was through this exercise of looking at what it's like to come back from being lost that I began to understand. Oh, this is what it feels like to be awake. Wow, this is amazing. There's a clarity here, a clearness to my experience.

Paying attention to that moment has particular benefits. One benefit I found was that it really cut through the whole judging thing about getting lost, because every time I got lost it became an opportunity to see this difference. So it was a great exercise for me, at least. I highly recommend it. It was very powerful.

Another way to begin looking at the knowing is to pay attention to our ordinary experience. When we're sitting here, or brushing our teeth, or eating a meal, or driving on the freeway—very ordinary experience—when it's kind of neutral, that's a good time to check in: what does it feel like to be awake? What does it feel like to be present? Because there's not so much pulling us into the experience itself.

When you're brushing your teeth, for example, you can feel all the sensations, but it doesn't tend to be too exciting or too unpleasant. It's just kind of a thing that's happening every day. But if we can bring our attention to what it feels like to pay attention to that, we can start to recognize this quality of knowing.

It's helpful to use these more neutral experiences because when things are either really wonderful or really horrible, we tend to get caught in the thing itself. When we're experiencing great states of happiness and bliss, it's kind of hard to ask, "Well, what does it feel like to be experiencing this?" Or when we're experiencing really unpleasant experience—again, we tend to be more focused on the actual experience. So look at your everyday, ordinary, mundane experience and see if you can notice what it means to be awake in those experiences.

This quality of knowing, paying attention to this awake, will begin to accumulate and help to wake you up in a way that is inestimable. It really is something we have to work at and experience to know the value of it. But I'm trying to communicate some of that value to you.

Another way to begin keying into the knowing is this: if you can—and this first happened to me when I was paying attention to something somewhat unpleasant—you might notice that there are kind of two states happening in your mind at the same time. There was aversion happening, and I was noticing how unpleasant the aversion was. But then at some point, I began noticing that I was knowing the aversion. And when I noticed that I was knowing the aversion, I noticed that it was neutral. There wasn't a pleasant or unpleasant quality to the knowing. The knowing itself is neutral. If you can begin to key into that, you'll start to get a taste for that knowing quality. In our experience, if something is unpleasant, aversion is unpleasant—but the knowing of it is neutral. See if you can tune into that neutral quality of the knowing.

So far I've talked about the ordinariness of mindfulness and the ordinariness of just our experience, and how we can start to wake up through this ordinariness. The last thing I'd like to talk about tonight is a state of mind I ran into on a three-month retreat I did last fall.

I was doing a different form of practice. I've injured my back a little bit, and I can't do sitting meditation for nineteen hours a day the way I used to. I can't do the slow walking meditation. So I'm lying on my back to do my still posture, and I'm doing pretty fast walking in walking practice. At one point, I began noticing in my walking meditation that I was just paying attention to pretty much everything that was happening. I wasn't trying to do a detailed awareness of the contact of the foot, the lifting of the foot, the touching of the foot. It was just a whole bunch of stuff happening.

I went and reported this to Joseph, and he said, "When you're doing walking meditation and you're doing a kind of choiceless awareness in the way that you describe, the thing I found most helpful is to put your attention here, in the area of the heart, and pay attention to the knowing."

So that was the instruction he gave me. I went off and tried it, doing my walking meditation. I put my attention in the heart and just paid attention. I wasn't sure what he meant by paying attention to the knowing in the heart, but I put my attention here and just noticed what was happening. And the thing that became most obvious to me was clarity of mind. There was just this incredible clearness and brilliance of what was happening.

There was completely ordinary consciousness, completely ordinary perception. It wasn't as if in earlier times on retreats, when I was doing very slow walking and sitting meditation, things would get broken up into all these little bits. I would see consciousness become completely different, and the perception of what you're experiencing becomes entirely unlike normal everyday consciousness.

But what I ran into on this retreat was a completely ordinary consciousness that was completely clear, completely present. It was really quite extraordinary.

This quality of awakeness can be a very beautiful quality of mind. We can bring this quality of awakeness to our daily life. Having touched into it on retreat, I can now experience it in my daily life, and it's quite extraordinary. Part of the reason it's so extraordinary—this incredibly ordinary state of experience, just walking through a room—and yet brilliantly clear. That brilliantly clear part feels quite extraordinary.

Part of the reason it feels extraordinary is because there's a continuity of the knowing that's coming. And that continuity of the knowing of experience puts you into a state of mind where there are no longer any unwholesome mind states arising. No anger, no greed, no delusion is arising. And that state itself is quite an amazing state. The term for that state of mind is the bliss of seclusion, because we are secluded from all of those difficult mind states. That state of continual knowing, even in just a very ordinary state of consciousness, can take us into the bliss of seclusion. So it feels quite extraordinary.

There's a poem that I'd like to share with you that celebrates this extraordinariness of this completely ordinary experience. Some of you have probably heard this before, but it's worth reading and hearing again. It's called "The Spontaneous Vajra Song" from Venerable Lama Gendun Rinpoche, a Tibetan teacher.

Happiness cannot be found through great effort and willpower, but is already present in open relaxation and letting go. Don't strain yourself. There is nothing to do or undo. Whatever momentarily arises in the body-mind has no real importance at all, has little reality whatsoever. Why identify with and become attached to it, passing judgment upon it and ourselves?

Far better to simply let the entire game happen on its own, springing up and falling back like waves, without changing or manipulating anything. And notice how everything vanishes and reappears magically, again and again, time without end.

Only our searching for happiness prevents us from seeing it. It is like a vivid rainbow which you pursue without ever catching, or a dog chasing its own tail. Although peace and happiness do not exist as an actual thing or place, it is always available and accompanies you at every instant.

Don't believe in the reality of good and bad experiences. They are like today's ephemeral weather, like rainbows in the sky. Wanting to grasp the ungraspable, you exhaust yourself in vain. As soon as you open and relax this tight fist of grasping, infinite space is there—open, inviting, and comfortable.

Make use of this spaciousness, this freedom and natural ease. Don't search any further looking for the great awakened elephant who is already resting quietly at home in front of your own hearth. Nothing to do or undo, nothing to force, nothing to want, and nothing missing.

Emaho! Marvelous. Everything happens by itself.

This very simple, very ordinary quality of mind feels extraordinary, and yet over time what happens is that it too becomes ordinary. Nothing special, very simple. We come back to our life but simply with clarity. And this is a space, a non-suffering space that we can live from. We can live from this space and begin to free ourselves from suffering.

So we have a few minutes if there are any comments or questions.

Can you comment on the practice of listening to the sensation of breath?

Yes. In the hearing meditation that I guided you through, there can be a kind of receptive quality to the hearing where there's no effort. Really, we don't have to try to hear something because—just as you're listening to me—it's almost automatic that the ear hears. So hearing tends to be a receptive, open, spacious type of practice.

That style of attention can also be brought to the sensations in our body. Only what tends to happen—at least for me, what tended to happen—was that I tried to feel the experiences. It's almost like I was trying to construct the sensations of pressure, trying to really get in there. And yet when I began to explore it as though I was hearing the sensations, more receiving them—the sensations are happening already, kind of like the sounds are just happening—it's a matter of just directing our attention there and seeing what's there without any trying.

This is coming to that really effortless type of mindfulness. Mindfulness itself doesn't take much effort. It's right here, right now—you can hear me. What takes the effort is simply doing it over and over and over again.

So if we can tap into that receptive quality that happens in hearing, it can be helpful to let us relax and have less striving around attending to the sensations in our body.

I found that using the language of "hearing the body" came to me because when I was in the Peace Corps, I was in a country in the South Pacific that used a pidgin language. It used English words, but basically in this pidgin form. And their term for both hearing and feeling was "harem," which basically meant "to hear." So it occurred to me that maybe we could use that languaging—hearing our sensations—to get a sense of that ease and receptivity of mindfulness.

Regarding whether the Buddha spoke about selfless action, I can't think of any specific passage that comes to mind right now. But in my experience, what happens is that as there is less self in the way, the experience is more naturally responsive. You know that if something happens—somebody falls down or is about to be hit by a car—there's just automatically this movement to pull them back. There's a kind of automatic movement of wholesome activity that can happen when our self isn't in the way. So it's a paradox in some ways. It's not quite like having a sense of self-responsibility, but there's more of the action of responsibility that happens when we don't have all of those identifications.

A question arises about the five khandhas and the difference between that which is aware and consciousness. Is there something observing consciousness, or is consciousness that which is doing the observing? Well, this is one of the key conundrums of Buddhism, and different schools answer it different ways. Some say there is a kind of pure consciousness that knows the knowing. Some say that a previous moment of consciousness is known by the next moment of consciousness—so it's a different moment of consciousness, but it's the same type of thing.

But really, I think what we need to do is just look at our own experience and not try to get caught up in what it actually is. Sometimes to me it feels like there's a big knowing that just seems to know everything. Other times, things seem very much broken up into little bits. The practice is not to try to make our experience fit into one model or the other, but just to know what is happening right now. What is actually happening? I've always found that to be my mantra. If I get confused, it's like, well, what is actually happening?

Another question arises about whether the aggregates of consciousness, feeling, and perception are subject to distortion. I have experienced that those states of perception and feeling can be distorted through all the other stuff. One example: I was on a retreat one time and walked into a room, and across the room I saw a shape. I watched the mind attempt to perceive this. It ran through a bunch of different things trying to figure out what it was. "Oh, it's distorted. What is it?" It was like a horrible being. It took me a number of different tries before I realized it was a vase of flowers. I was seeing just form and color for a while. The perception itself was not really kicking in; it wasn't recognizing it. So that's one way it can be distorted.

Another way is that through emotions, our feelings—the perception of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—can be distorted. If we're angry about something, maybe everything we experience has an unpleasant feeling tone. I've noticed that at times. So there can be these filters. But I think at the core, at the base, they're pretty pure. What happens is that in all of the mental formations is where the distortion actually occurs.

May the beneficial effects of our practice together be offered to support the welfare and liberation of all beings everywhere.

May all beings be happy.
May all beings be healthy.
May all beings be safe.
May all beings live with ease.
May all beings be free.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 204

Why vs. What

Andrea Fella · 55 min

> In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella examines a fundamental distinction in contemplative practice: the difference between intellectually analyzing why we suffer versus directly observing what is actually occurring in our present-moment experience. Drawing from the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), she highlights the Buddha's teaching that a well-trained disciple attends wisely to the Four Noble Truths as lived experience rather than getting lost in questions about past and future.
>
> Through vivid personal examples—from recurring memories of forgetting lines in a play to working with deep patterns of self-hatred on long retreat—Andrea demonstrates how suffering is constructed fresh in each moment through our reactions to thoughts and sensations. She explains that the 'why' of our history is less important than recognizing the 'why' of the present moment: seeing how reactivity arises right now in response to memories and triggers. This direct seeing itself has the power to dismantle habitual patterns.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance on working with emotions through body awareness, noting pleasant and unpleasant qualities, and Joseph Goldstein's technique of noting 'contact' with difficult experiences. Andrea distinguishes between psychological insight (understanding the historical causes of our patterns) and meditative insight (vipassanā)—seeing directly into the insubstantial, impermanent nature of thoughts and feelings. While psychological insight can reduce resistance to difficult states, it is the meditative insight that truly cuts the deep ruts of habitual suffering. She also addresses working skillfully with trauma, recommending Peter Levine's somatic experiencing approach for those dealing with overwhelming material.

I'm very happy to be here with you tonight and hope that I can share some of what I've learned on my path with you.

The title of my talk tonight is "What Versus Why?" The idea for this talk came from a time when I was giving a talk to a group like this on the hindrances—those difficult qualities of mind that we often encounter when we're meditating: states of greed, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt. After the talk, somebody asked me, "When you're working with these difficult states of mind, is it ever useful to ask why they're happening?"

That evening, I gave him a short answer given the time constraints I had. But in reflecting on that question over the next couple of weeks, I realized that it's a very rich question. So that's what I'd like to talk about tonight: this issue of asking why versus looking at what we're actually experiencing.

As a general rule in this culture, we tend to be really skilled at evaluating our experience and asking ourselves where things have come from in our lives, why we are the way we are. Perhaps because of the influence of Freud and Jung and the whole culture of psychological analysis, we are pretty skilled at that. Many of us know, to some extent, that we are the way we are because of certain conditions and causes from our background, our history. This idea of asking why we are the way we are in an intellectual way is very ingrained in our culture. We're very good at this practice; we've engaged in a lot of this asking why we are the way we are.

I think it's helpful to also explore other ways of looking at our experience, other ways of exploring what's going on for us—perhaps a non-intellectual, non-verbal, non-conceptual way of exploring our experience.

When we look at this question of why—why are we the way we are, why do we suffer, why do I get stuck in this habit that I continually fall into even though I know it's not good for me—when we ask that question of why, often we get pulled into thoughts about it. We start thinking about our history, about how our parents raised us, about the relationships we've had with people. We often can come up with some reason why we are the way we are, and we sometimes mistakenly think that intellectual understanding can help to undercut these patterns or help us avoid getting into those kinds of situations where we suffer.

I find that this kind of intellectual reflection can sometimes help. In my own experience, I can see that if I'm in a state of agitation or anger or some kind of difficult mind state, a thought about it can help to reduce it somewhat. It can help me to not act out on anger if I think, "Well, it's really not such a good thing to do, and I don't really have a good reason to be angry. I know this is coming from my conditioning." So it can be helpful to make those kinds of reflections.

But in my experience, what I found is that this kind of intellectual understanding doesn't really touch the habit we have around that particular kind of suffering. I had a very strong anger habit, and even knowing about it intellectually didn't really cut into the fact that it kept happening. In a particular instance, I could think about things and refrain from getting too unskillful about how I acted in that situation, but the actual pattern of anger just kept coming.

So what I'd like to suggest is that there is another way we can pay attention to our experience that can actually help to undercut these patterns and deeply cut into the habits that lead us into suffering.

What is the way out of this kind of reactivity? In the suttas that the Buddha spoke, which have been recorded in the Pali texts, he gives some instruction about this way out of reactivity. I'd like to read this to you. This is actually one of my favorite suttas. I'll just read excerpts from it because these things can tend to be long.

"An untaught ordinary person does not understand what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he attends to those things unfit for attention, and he does not attend to those things fit for attention. This is how he attends unwisely: 'Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future?' Or else he is inwardly perplexed about the present."

Thus: Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where will it go?

A well-taught noble disciple understands what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he does not attend to those things unfit for attention, and he attends to those things fit for attention. He attends wisely: This is suffering. He attends wisely: This is the cause of suffering. He attends wisely: This is the cessation of suffering. He attends wisely: This is the path leading to the cessation of suffering.

When I first read this, those four things that the Buddha says a well-taught disciple attends to—those are the Four Noble Truths of the Buddha's teaching. This is suffering. This is the cause of suffering. This is the cessation of suffering. This is the path leading to the cessation of suffering. When I first read this, I didn't really understand what it meant. It just sounded like the person who is well trained simply thinks about the Four Noble Truths all the time, and I didn't really connect with what it actually meant.

But what he's pointing to in this teaching is that when we're untaught, when we're unskilled, we are focused on these questions of why. Why am I this way? How did I become this? How can I become this in the future? Will I become? We're focused on all of these questions of cause, of why and wherefore.

What the Buddha is pointing to in this teaching—that a skilled disciple attends to "this is suffering, this is the cause of suffering"—he's pointing us into the present moment. He's suggesting that all of our experience, everything that we experience, can be seen essentially through one of the lenses of these four aspects of truth. Either we're experiencing suffering, we're experiencing the cause of suffering (the wanting things to be different than they are), we're experiencing the ending of suffering (something where suffering is disappearing), or we're experiencing the path leading to the ending of suffering.

So he's pointing us into the present moment saying: look at your present moment experience. Notice when you are suffering in your present moment experience. Notice when you are experiencing the cause of suffering in your present moment experience.

Suffering actually occurs right now. It doesn't occur in the past. It doesn't occur in the future. If we are suffering over something that occurred in the past, we are suffering right now with thoughts that are arising about the past. We're suffering in the present moment because thoughts about the past are arising in the present moment.

I had a really clear demonstration of this on one retreat. It had to do with a particular memory coming up over and over again. That memory was about some years ago when I was in a play. I had a role in the play, and one evening during a performance, I forgot my line. I tried fudging, making up lines, because I couldn't remember the line I was supposed to give. I just threw out lines, hoping that either I would remember my line or that the other people on the stage would pick up the cue and help me out—go on or something. Hopefully something would happen. But after four or five things that I made up, I ran out of things to say. And nobody said anything. There was this big gaping silence, looking out at the audience and realizing: wow, they're waiting for something to happen here. It was really unpleasant. It was really embarrassing. It felt pretty bad.

Well, on this retreat, that moment, for some reason, came up many, many times over and over again. I remembered staring out at the audience and felt the embarrassment all over again. Having seen it so many times on retreat where I was really paying attention to my experience, I noticed that the sequence of events was that there was a memory—an image actually appeared in my mind of looking out at the audience—

And then as a reaction to that memory, I got embarrassed all over again. I felt that embarrassment fully once more.

But what became clear to me on this retreat, having seen this sequence a number of times, was that it wasn't as if that embarrassment was waiting, lurking in my psyche somewhere, just ready to appear. It was actually being constructed right then and there in the present moment—because that thought arose and because I reacted to the thought. It was not necessary for that reaction to occur. That thought can appear in the mind, and has many times now since then, and I don't get embarrassed about it. So there's not an absolute direct link between the memory and the reaction to it. And in the present moment is where we can dismantle that. It's the only place we have that opportunity.

So not only does the suffering occur in the present moment, but also the cause of our suffering—the wanting things to be different, wanting things to be other than they are, wanting to have something we don't have or wanting to get rid of something that we do have. Even though some of the events that lead to our suffering might have occurred in the past, the suffering and the cause of suffering actually occur right now, in the present moment.

Here's another example of this. I was in the Peace Corps at one point and had a relationship that broke up while I was there. After we broke up, I started noticing that I was going to bed lonely every night. It didn't particularly surprise me that I was going to bed feeling lonely. I thought, why would I be lonely? Because I've just broken up with my boyfriend. It did not strike me as odd. So I wasn't particularly curious about the why in this case. But I was just observing what was happening in my experience. I started paying attention to what was going on for me. I started looking at the what of my experience. And so each night as I went to bed, I would just observe what was happening.

I began to notice that the loneliness started when I set my alarm clock.

I thought that was really weird. What did that have to do with anything? But I was just watching. So I kept noticing and watched this pattern over several nights. And one night while I was setting the alarm clock, I noticed a thought in my mind. The thought was about my ex-boyfriend. We were in Disneyland looking up at a marquee. We were in Tomorrowland, and we were looking up at a marquee that had a digital clock on it.

I could see the connection between the memory and what I was doing. And I could also see that the loneliness resulted from a reaction to that memory. There was a sense of, "Oh, wasn't that a happy time?" And, "Oh, I'm never going to have those happy times again." That's where the loneliness came from—a reaction to that thought. It didn't particularly have to do with going to bed alone. It had to do with reacting to a memory in the present moment.

But what surprised me even more was the next night. I went to bed, was setting my alarm clock, and I remembered the thought because I had seen it clearly the night before. I remembered that thought, and I didn't get lonely. I was really surprised by that. I think, looking back at it, that the seeing—the clear seeing that the loneliness had been caused by a reaction to the thought—had the power to dismantle the reactivity just through the seeing of it. And so that every-evening loneliness didn't return. Now I'm not saying I never got lonely again. Definitely not saying that. But that regular every-night going-to-bed feeling lonely—that stopped.

So this is an example of looking at our experience, just looking at what is actually happening, what is actually going on in our experience. And what I saw was a chain of events in the mind that triggered the loneliness. By looking at the what of my present moment experience, I saw the why of the present moment experience. It didn't have anything to do with the fact that I'd had this relationship. Well, it did of course have something to do with having had the relationship, but it didn't have so much to do with the history of the relationship. The why had to do with the reaction in the present moment. It was not automatic that I had to react to that thought in that way.

So the why of my experience was essentially revealed by looking at what I was experiencing. The present moment experience opened this up for me.

Beginning to witness our reactivity in the present moment can help us get some space around it and become a little less reactive. Now, it doesn't always happen so quickly—you know, I see this thing one night and the next night the suffering, the loneliness, disappears. But that kind of observation can open up a space around our reactivity and give us some breathing room. We get to see the causes and conditions. Why is it arising in the present moment?

I want to contrast for a moment the difference between the why of history and the why of the present moment. I touched on this in the last example, but I want to make it really clear.

If I go back to the example of the play, the why of history had to do with the fact that I'd been in that play, that I'd forgotten my line that night, and that I'd gotten incredibly embarrassed about it. The why of the present moment was related to that—the memory of looking out at the audience would never have arisen had that not happened. And probably the reaction of embarrassment was also conditioned by something in my history. But the fact that I was reacting, that the actual embarrassment was caused right then, right then in the present moment—it wasn't the old embarrassment coming up. It was actually created right then and there. That's what I mean by the difference between the why of the present moment and the why of our history.

So how do we look at this what of our experience? I really think this is a key for us in our mindfulness practice. Our mindfulness practice opens us up to what is happening right now. What am I experiencing? And if we can observe that and let go as much as possible of asking the question why, we get closer and closer into the actual felt experience, the actual lived experience, and it can start to reveal to us the causes of our reactivity.

What is actually happening right now? A lot of what happens for us in our experience is emotions, thoughts, body sensations. That's a large part of what we experience moment to moment. And we often, particularly around emotions, want to understand why. Why are they happening? But if we look into our present moment experience, there's a whole range of information that we often miss because we're so hooked into our thoughts about the experience—our thoughts of why is this happening? What did they say? How did they say it? How could I have done this differently? We're so hooked into the thoughts, and we think that's the way we're going to solve our problems. We think that's the way out. And there is some truth to that—it can help us. But what I'm suggesting is that there's also a whole host of additional information in our experience that we often neglect because we're not trained at observing it.

If we can come into our physical experience—and the body is an excellent place to do this, whether we're experiencing emotions or thoughts—the body is a great place to check in. What does the body feel like in the present moment? How does the body experience this emotion? That can help take us out of the thoughts we're turning in if we come into the body and pay attention to it.

Emotions usually have some kind of physical manifestation in the body. And if we can tune into that physical manifestation, we're in the present moment and we're not getting caught in the narrative or the thoughts around the emotion, which tend to exacerbate the problem. The thoughts often fuel it and turn us up more. So if we can let go of the thoughts and come into the bodily experience, we get a double benefit: we're in the present moment, and we have let go of the things that tend to increase the problem.

Another really good thing to check into in terms of the what of our experience is whether something is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Just noticing: is this thing that's happening a pleasant experience? Is it an unpleasant experience? It's a very basic kind of knowledge, very basic information. And sometimes we can actually be surprised when we look at things. Things that we think should be pleasant, like excitement, can be a little bit unpleasant when we actually notice them. There's a little bit of spinning, a little bit of agitation and churning in the body. So look at what is pleasant and particularly what is unpleasant.

When we look at the what of the experience, sometimes the why of the experience is just revealed to us. There was a time about a year ago when a student came up to me after one of my introductory classes. It was his first introductory class, his first introduction to meditation. He told me that he was having panic attacks. He was a scientist and had a strong training in looking for the why.

That's what he did as a scientist—to look for why does this happen, what's the cause of this? And so when his panic attacks came up, the way he worked with them was to ask himself, or to point out to himself, that there was no reason why he should be feeling panic.

Sometimes this can help with panic attacks, to actually use our reason, to use our rationality, to notice that there's nothing happening, that I'm not in immediate danger—to really use our consciousness, our conscious thoughts, to help attenuate a particular panic attack. But he was finding that they just kept coming.

So I suggested to him, I said, "I'm going to ask you another question. Rather than asking yourself, 'Why is this happening?' or pointing out to yourself why this shouldn't be happening, just ask yourself: What is happening right now? What is this experience?"

He was actually able to do this quite quickly. I was surprised at how readily he took this instruction in. But sometimes suffering like that can really be a powerful motivator.

So he started noticing what was happening. He said, "I noticed the tension in my neck, the tightness in my jaw, and then I'd feel this rising of sensation." And over the course of some months of paying attention to what was happening, he began to notice that it wasn't nearly as intense when he was simply attending to what was happening. He actually began to notice some of the triggers, some of the beginnings of the panic attack. And just staying right with what was happening in the moment, often the panic attacks would simply dissipate.

Some months ago, he actually reported to me that he hadn't had a panic attack in a long time. This was a shift—the shift from looking at the why, or trying to reason his way through it, to just experiencing what is happening. It had a huge effect on his experience.

Sometimes when we look at our present moment experience, as I've talked about, the why of the present moment can be very clearly seen when we're attending to our present moment experience. And sometimes the why of history can also be seen. We can also learn or get a connection with what's the historical pattern, or what's the historical cause, of this event. But it's not actually necessary to see that historical why. It's mostly necessary to see what is happening in the present moment and to notice the reactivity in the present moment. That alone is enough to dismantle our suffering.

Sometimes if we're looking for the why of experience—this habit we have of looking for why things are the way they are—we can mislead ourselves. We can come up with explanations that may or may not be true.

There's a really strong connection between the mind and the body, particularly where emotions are concerned. Emotions express themselves in the body as physical experience. So if an emotion appears, it expresses itself as a physical experience. But also physical experiences themselves can trigger an emotion.

As an aside, I'd like to share with you some research that actually demonstrates this. The researchers were surprised at how close the connection is between the mind and body with respect to emotions. This was done by Paul Ekman and Richard Davidson, who have done quite a lot of work with emotions. Richard Davidson in particular has done a lot of work on the neuropsychology and neurology of meditation.

They did this research on emotions, and Paul Ekman said, "In the course of our research, we found something that surprised us. If you intentionally make a facial expression, you change your physiology. By making the correct expression, you begin to have changes in your physiology that accompany the emotion." This was seen both in work on bodily physiology and in some of the work that Richard Davidson was doing on changes in the brain. "The face is not simply a means of display, but it's also a means of activating emotion." In other words, simply putting the face into a smile drives the brain into activity typical of happiness, just as a frown does with sadness.

So if you need a hit of happiness, put a smile on your face and see what happens. According to the research, it works.

This connection between the mind and the body is really powerful, and it can be misleading. It can mislead us sometimes into making erroneous judgments. I noticed this in my own meditation when I'd notice a particular physical pattern appear in the body. The pattern generally was one that felt kind of familiar—a familiar set of contractions, perhaps contraction in the throat and tightening around the heart. There was a feeling that was very familiar.

And I noticed that when particular contractions happened, the mind would start scanning, trying to figure out why. Why is it feeling this way? What is happening? What is this emotion? Often it would leap to a conclusion that it was a particular emotion, and then start scanning the environment for why that emotion was coming up.

So sometimes these particular patterns, these habits, or the contractions in the body—it's like we have habits of mind. I know you're all familiar with this idea: habits of ways that we do things, ways that we think, particular ways that we react to things. We have habits of mind, but those can also translate into habits of body.

If you are prone to anger, for instance, as I was, then any time the body kind of reached into something close to an anger state, the mind could start figuring out it was angry. But actually it was just the body. It was a habitual contraction in the body that was happening. It wasn't particularly that I was angry, but given that habitual state of the body, the mind would create the anger out of it—because it figured it had to be angry, looking around the environment. Why am I angry? I could almost always come up with some reason why I was angry, some person that had done something.

So this looking for the why, which can be kind of automatic for us, can lead us into states—it's kind of a self-fulfilling prophecy almost. If we can just notice what is happening: Oh, there's contraction in my throat. There's a heaviness around my heart. What does it mean? We don't actually need to do that part. If we can just rest with the sensations. If there is an emotion there, often the paying attention to the what will show us what that emotion is. And if we're paying attention to the what, we may also see some kind of thoughts or triggers for it. So if we just keep with the what, we're less likely to make this kind of leap into a self-fulfilling prophecy.

I have an example from my practice that ties all these different aspects of what and why together. I'd like to share this experience with you. It unfolded over quite a long time—it was a three-month retreat.

One of my strongest patterns in my history, along with anger, was around self-hatred and unworthiness. And during this one particular retreat, for some reason that was up for me. I was experiencing a lot of self-hatred, a lot of feeling of not being worthy of doing this practice. So I began to explore it, to look at it.

Now this particular pattern of self-hatred and unworthiness—I had some idea already through a lot of therapy that it had to do with a particular relationship from my early life. I knew that kind of intellectually; there was a connection between these feelings and that relationship. But I hadn't really had a direct experience, a real direct connection. It was all intellectual. I could see how things had unfolded and it made sense to me, but it wasn't an actual direct experience of knowing that connection.

So during this retreat I began to see more clearly that that relationship was connected to those experiences through this exploration of what—seeing the pattern of how those thoughts about the relationship would lead to the feelings of self-hatred and unworthiness. I had some clear direct experiences that connected the relationship with the feelings.

At one point, I felt a huge release of compassion for this person, for the way that they had acted that caused my suffering. And to some extent there was some compassion for myself for being the recipient of that. There was a huge release around it.

But that release—I guess I call that a psychological insight because there was a clear understanding of the connection between the relationship and the feelings of self-hatred. What continued to happen on the retreat, however, was that the self-hatred and unworthiness kept coming up. It was not lessened at all by this psychological insight.

This kind of surprised me because I'd had such a huge release around it. It felt so cathartic to have that experience of forgiveness and compassion. That person—I no longer had that kind of resentment towards them. But it didn't touch the habit of self-hatred and unworthiness.

It did do something helpful though. It actually was a profound experience, and I began to see over time the role that that psychological insight played. Because over the next few weeks, paying attention to self-hatred and unworthiness, I began to see that I was no longer quite so reactive when it came up. It still came up. It was still very strong. But there wasn't quite so much resistance to it.

It was more like, "Oh yeah, this is just causes and conditions. This is just the fact that this relationship happened and this is the result." So I stopped resisting the experience, which made it much easier to be present for the experience of self-hatred and unworthiness. It's a really hard thing to pay attention to because it feels so unpleasant. It feels so horrible to hate yourself. But I could see that the psychological insight had given me a much easier way of paying attention to the present moment. So having some insight into the psychological why—a psychological insight into the why—helped me more than the intellectual understanding of the why. But it still didn't really cut into the habit.

So I just continued observing, just continued observing the self-hatred and unworthiness. And I remember so clearly one night, I left the meditation hall and I was fine, no problem. As I walked up the stairs out of the meditation hall, the self-hatred descended and I was powerless. Even seeing the pattern begin, it was so strong. The habit towards that pattern was so strong. I was powerless to touch it. All that I could do was just witness it. And so I witnessed it.

I went back to my room and it was getting to be bedtime, the last part of the day. And I just decided, "I'm not going to go to bed until I have seen this really, really clearly." Fortunately that evening—I thought very fortunately—Joseph Goldstein had given the dharma talk and he'd given an instruction on how to pay attention to something that was really sticky, really hard for us. He'd suggested that noting the pleasant or unpleasant aspect of the experience was a key piece of it. So noticing what the feeling of it was: Is it pleasant or unpleasant? Well, this was clearly unpleasant. But he also said that's often not enough with something really sticky, that you have to note the moment you feel that unpleasant hit. Contact. Note the contact of that experience and then note the unpleasant.

So that's what I was doing in the meditation. I was noticing that the feeling of self-hatred kind of varied. It would subtly go away and then it would come back, subtly go away and then come back. So I was noting every time I saw the least little tendency towards that self-hatred with that contact, unpleasant, contact, unpleasant.

And at one moment I saw that the self-hatred was just a thought. It was simply a thought in the mind, an ephemeral thought. What I actually saw was the ephemerality of thought itself—just that it was like mist, like a vanishing vapor. Seeing that so clearly just cut into the self-hatred instantly. In the next moment, the body was flooded with bliss. And the next moment was this recognition: this insight is impermanent. Even though I've seen this clearly, it doesn't mean that self-hatred is gone. Because that bliss was kind of this feeling of "oh, never again." But the next moment was some wisdom that said, "You know, this too is impermanent." And the next moment was just more of a balance around the fact that, yep, this comes and goes.

While it is true that that pattern is not completely obliterated in my psyche, that moment of insight—and I would call that a meditative insight, a vipassana insight, that seeing really clearly the insubstantiality of the thought—that had the power actually to cut really deeply into that pattern. In the next couple of years after that moment, I didn't experience self-hatred or unworthiness for a couple of years. After that point, I began seeing the very vaguest little tendrils of the pattern of mind, the one that said, "You're no good. You're a failure." The thought would come up: "You're a failure, you're no good." But what has happened, or what that moment seemed to have done, is to cut the belief in that thought. The pattern of the thinking is there, but I no longer believe it.

I'm sure many of you are familiar with this idea of a rut in the mind. It's like if we have these habits and patterns of how we do things and we get anywhere near that habit, it's like this ball drops into this deep rut and there's no way to get it out. That was the way my self-hatred had felt, like it was this deep, deep rut in my mind. And that moment of seeing clearly—it felt like the rut went from there to there.

So now it's no longer so hard for that ball to get out of the rut.

This takes courage—being present with our experience, being present with what is happening for us. But as we do it, as we actually witness what's happening, we start to see that it's the way out of our suffering.

Actually, the first thing we start to see is that it's somewhat easier. It's less suffering to be present for our experience than to be caught in it. It's less suffering to be aware of anger and self-hatred than it is to just be caught in it and continuing to feed the pattern. So there's that immediate benefit. And we also start to see through these moments of witnessing that this is actually the way out. We have to go in to get out, essentially. We have to go through in order to break the patterns.

When asked about what it means to "contact" our experience, I want to clarify something. It can be enough to just look at pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral, depending on how difficult the situation is. What Joseph was saying was that when things are really sticky, it's often not enough to just note that something is unpleasant. We have to know when that experience actually starts. It's like noticing the beginning, keeping the mind so focused that you notice right when that experience begins. For me, I was looking for any little movement of thought or contraction that was heading in that direction, and I would just note: contact, unpleasant.

As for whether retreats are necessary—it's different for different people. I was an intractable case. I think I needed the long retreats. But I know people who seem to have a very intuitive grasp of this and for whom a daily practice is enough to really begin to explore and open to these things. I can't put a blanket statement on it. I think that retreats are immensely helpful—immensely, immensely helpful—if you have any chance to go on even a week-long retreat. It's very supportive of really beginning to see how we can contact our experience and be non-reactive to it and ride it out. We have much more time to play with it on retreat. So I find it immensely valuable, but I can't say that it is necessary.

Someone shared that in other traditions of meditation, the approach often seemed to assume you could leave your history at the door. What they found valuable was this understanding that while insight has certain benefits, there's also a behavioral aspect of being with our patterns as they gradually change. I appreciate that reflection. It's immensely helpful to know what we're bringing into the room. We can't really leave it behind—it comes with us. So we allow it.

Regarding trauma and meditation, there is a really wonderful teacher on just this topic. His name is Peter Levine, and he's developed a great tool called Somatic Experiencing. Some of you may have heard of it. There's a wonderful book he wrote called Waking the Tiger, which you might be interested in. He uses mindfulness techniques, but the key with trauma is this: if you've had a traumatic experience, you need to take care, because if you get close to it, you can get sucked right into it. Mindfulness tends to be not quite strong enough to allow you to just observe trauma without being overwhelmed.

So the technique—and it's a substantial technique—but one of the basic aspects is to cultivate a grounding. This might be the contact of your body with the floor or chair, or even a thought you can go to that calms you down, something that allows you to just gently approach the trauma. Then, before you get too close to it, you return to that grounding experience. This isn't to ignore or push away the trauma, but rather a way of allowing yourself to connect more deeply with your meditative or mindful state so that you can then go back and maybe go just a little bit deeper into that space—and then return again. You do this gentle back and forth.

Sometimes you really need to spend considerable time cultivating the resources first—the grounding, the place where you can feel comfortable in your body. That's the first priority, like building concentration. Get yourself to a place where you can reliably come back to stability. And then you may want to just bring up a thought of the trauma.

Then notice just what happened to your body and immediately return to that grounding experience. It becomes a kind of gentle back and forth, a dance between touching the difficult and returning to stability.

If you're interested in this approach, I strongly recommend doing some research in this area or taking courses on it. It can be very helpful for working with trauma in a safe and supported way.

*

May the benefit of our practice together this evening be offered to support the welfare and liberation of all beings everywhere. As we move out into the rest of our evening, may the people we contact benefit from our time here together.

May all beings be happy.
May all beings be healthy.
May all beings be safe.
May all beings live with ease.
May all beings be free from suffering.

CHAPTER 205

Hindrances: Restlessness

Andrea Fella · 44 min

In this comprehensive exploration of restlessness and remorse (uddhacca-kukkucca), Andrea Fella examines how this fundamental hindrance operates as a covering (nīvaraṇa) that obscures mental clarity and concentration. She explains how restlessness can underlie the other four hindrances—desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, and doubt—making it particularly important to understand. The talk distinguishes between physical restlessness, mental agitation, remorse about past actions, and anxiety about the future.

Fella draws on the Buddha's similes for restlessness: a pond with wind-ruffled water that cannot reflect clearly, and the experience of being enslaved to one's habitual patterns. She emphasizes the Buddha's key instruction that suffering should be understood rather than eliminated, noting that when we bring mindful attention to hindrances, they transform from obstacles into the path itself. Mindfulness has the unique quality of diminishing unwholesome states while strengthening wholesome ones.

Practical techniques offered include: simply putting the body there and sitting through restlessness; allowing awareness to expand widely rather than focusing narrowly; releasing resistance to the experience; shifting attention to the knowing of restlessness rather than the restlessness itself; and coming into bodily sensations to cut the momentum of mental spinning. Fella notes that restlessness is the last hindrance to fall away on the Buddhist path, disappearing only at full awakening, making it a lifelong companion worthy of patient investigation.

I will speak on the hindrance of restlessness this evening.

I'll start with a brief review of the hindrances, since I know you've been hearing about them. Restlessness is one of the five hindrances. I don't know how Shiloh has been translating them, but the translations I usually use are desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and anxiety (or restlessness and remorse), and doubt. These are states of mind that typically obstruct our concentration, our ability to stay present in the present moment. They're called the hindrances, but the Pali term, nivarana, is also sometimes translated as "covering." These hindrances are covering states. They cover the clarity of the mind. They cover the concentration of the mind.

The hindrance of restlessness is a very fundamental hindrance. It can underlie the other hindrances. A mind that is restless is one that's not settled or stable, so it's the antithesis of concentration. In that unsettled, unstable state, the mind is likely to go out and latch onto something it likes and start wanting it, desiring it—the hindrance of desire—or latch onto something that it doesn't like, that it wants to fix, that it wants to get rid of. That becomes the hindrance of aversion or ill will.

Restlessness can also underlie the state of doubt. If the mind is agitated and not able to settle, doubt can often manifest out of that state of the mind not being able to land on anything in particular. It can even underlie the hindrances of sloth and torpor. I'm sure many of you are familiar with how a baby, when it gets overstimulated, will just conk out. It receives so much stimulation that it gets exhausted and conks out. Sometimes that happens with restlessness also. We get so much energy going through our system that we go on overload, and then we get exhausted from being on overload.

The hindrance of restlessness is a fundamental hindrance to become familiar with. If we can become familiar with this restless state, we can sometimes start to see the mind in that restless, agitated state before it leaps into desire or before it leaps into ill will.

These hindrances of desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and remorse, and doubt tend to be some of the key ways that we suffer in our experience. The Buddha had some very good advice for us when we suffer. He didn't say to try to get rid of it. He said to try to understand it. That was his key instruction around suffering: that it should be understood.

This points us to what we should do with these hindrances. We should try to understand them when we experience them—not to get rid of them, but to understand them for the sake of understanding them. When we turn our attention to the hindrances and we're no longer caught by them, when our mind is no longer running out after them, we are no longer hindered in our practice.

The hindrances have this interesting role for us. They do obscure our practice when we don't recognize that they are present. But as soon as we see they're present, they become our practice. They're not in the way of our practice. They simply are the grist for the mill—the compost of our experience.

In my experience with meditation practice, really understanding something has meant not understanding intellectually, but really understanding the experience itself. Understanding what the experience of ill will is, what the experience of restlessness is. Bringing mindfulness to our experience.

Mindfulness has this beautiful, counterintuitive quality. Sometimes when we're told to pay attention to states that seem so difficult or unpleasant, we wonder if it will just increase that state. We tend to think that when we pay attention to something, it makes it stronger. But mindfulness has a very interesting quality. When we pay attention to wholesome states of mind—kindness, generosity, compassion, equanimity, tranquility, loving-kindness—being mindful of them in a non-judgmental, alert way creates the conditions for them to appear more frequently in our experience. Mindfulness does create the conditions to enhance or increase the wholesome qualities of our mind.

But when we bring that same mindful, non-judgmental attention to ill will, to desire, to restlessness, to anxiety, to fear, to frustration, to aversion, it creates the conditions for these states to appear less frequently in our experience.

It is as if the wholesome qualities of mind bask in the light and warmth of mindfulness, while the unwholesome qualities shrink from its clarity and brightness. So there's no need to worry about bringing mindful attention to these unwholesome states of mind. As we do that, they become transforming. They transform. They become the path. They become the way that we walk out of suffering.

Another wonderful quality of mindfulness is that we can be mindful of anything. We can be mindful of sloth and torpor, we can be mindful of restlessness. So much of what I'll talk about tonight is how to work with this hindrance of restlessness, since this is the hindrance that is up for this week—how to get to know it, how to understand how it functions for us, and how to simply be with it.

Restlessness and remorse are related to an excess of energy. The sloth and torpor that you talked about last week are usually related to a lowering or reduction of energy. This is the opposite side of things—restlessness is the quality when the mind has a little too much energy going on. But there are two aspects of this hindrance: there's the restlessness, and then there's what's translated as remorse, sometimes also translated as worry or anxiety.

Restlessness can refer to either restlessness of body or restlessness of mind. Restlessness of body I'm sure you're all familiar with. It's just when the body does not feel like it can sit still. Sometimes in meditation this can get really unpleasant. It can feel like there are jumping beans under the skin, or like your whole body has this energy coursing through it. It can be a very unpleasant experience.

The mind can also be restless, unable to settle on any particular object. You try to bring it to the sensations of breathing, and it's just off to hearing and body sensations and thoughts, spinning off into thinking. The mind can have that restless quality, a kind of jumpy quality to it.

The quality of remorse usually has to do with when the mind is agitated or restless because of something we've done in the past, or something we've not done—something we regret either having done or not done. The mind in those situations tends to play the situation over and over again. That's the restless quality of mind, when it just keeps repeating about something from the past like that.

The translation around worry or anxiety points to the way we can be restless about things that might happen in the future—the way we're worried about how something is going to come out, what we're going to do, how we're going to plan to do something. Planning often has this quality of anxiety to it, and the mind just keeps spinning. How am I going to do this? How am I going to figure this out? This piece doesn't fit with that piece. I can't do that when I do this. How can I figure this out? The mind just keeps spinning in this kind of restlessness.

Restlessness can manifest in really obvious, hard-to-ignore forms, like the sensation of it being nearly impossible to stay seated in your chair, or the mind that's just spinning out into the future or reviewing the past. Or it can take much more subtle forms—just a very subtle stirring when the mind is pretty quiet and the body is pretty settled. Just a little tiny bit of "Oh, how can I make this continue?" or "How can I make this go a little deeper?" Just a little restlessness of mind to change things, even very subtly. That can be a very subtle kind of restlessness manifesting even when the mind is fairly stable and fairly settled.

The Buddha had a number of similes for all of the hindrances, but I'll just talk about the similes he used for restlessness tonight. He had a simile around a body of water for all the hindrances, and for restlessness he likened the mind to a pool of water that's blown by wind. Anyone who tries to lean over that pool and look is not going to be able to see their reflection because the surface of the pond is agitated. You can even sometimes feel that—the Buddha had a genius for creating similes. The quality of the ruffled waves on the pond, the body can actually sometimes feel like that. The mind can sometimes have that feeling of being ruffled.

The other analogy the Buddha used about restlessness is that it is like being enslaved—like you're a slave and you have a master that says, "You have to do this now, you have to do that now, you have to do this." That quality of mind, of the mind just going, "Oh, I've got to think about this now."

I've got to do that now. Our habitual patterns leap in and become like a master to us. The habit comes along and says, "We've got to do this now. I've got to fix this. I've got to figure out how to get rid of that." We become slaves to our habits, and that restlessness of mind is responding to those habitual patterns.

One way I like to think about stilling restlessness is through this image of rippling water—you can envision the stilling of the pond and then the pond becoming very clear. There's another analogy I also find helpful, especially for the subtle kinds of restlessness. There's a restlessness that we sometimes don't even know is present until it disappears. We've become so habituated to a low level of restlessness that we don't notice it. Then suddenly, when we drop into a state of deeper calmness, it becomes really clear. It's like the experience you have in your house when the refrigerator is running and you don't notice it, but then when it goes off, there's that quietness and peace. That's the subtle distinction between subtle restlessness in the mind and the dropping into silence and stillness.

So how do we work with restlessness in our practice? It's a challenging one sometimes, because the body can be so coursed with energy that it's very difficult to stay in meditation practice. The first thing to do is simply recognize it. Recognize that it is happening at a very gross level. You can use naming or noting: noting "restlessness" or "agitation." I like the term agitation—it feels a little more neutral to me. There's just an agitation of mind.

One of my teachers, Sharon Salzberg, tells a story about when she found herself in this restless state. She simply didn't sit, because she figured it wasn't worthwhile—that there wasn't any point to sitting when the mind was restless. She could see that she wasn't able to be present. The mind would go off, then she'd come back for a split second, then the mind would go off again, then she'd come back for a moment, and then it would go off again. Well, what's the point of this? So when her mind was very settled and still, she would sit in meditation and have a lovely experience of quiet, of concentration, of calm, of peace. She thought that's what meditation was supposed to be like.

But at some point she went to her teacher—she was in India doing this practice—and his name was Munindraji. She reported this experience to him and said, "You know, when I'm restless, I just don't sit. I just get up." His advice to her was: when you're experiencing that restlessness, just put your body there. You don't have to try to be present all the time. Notice when you come back, and the mind will go off again. But just put your body there. There is some value to simply sitting through this experience, to knowing this is what the mind is doing, and coming back as best you can. Just keep coming back and coming back.

Sometimes my teacher Gil Fronsdal likes to say that a successful sitting is simply getting to the end of it. It doesn't have to be particularly mindful or clear, but just the fact that you have the determination and resolve to stay present—you're cultivating good qualities in this. You're cultivating the quality of determination. You're cultivating the quality of patience. And you're cultivating what mindfulness you can. So just put your body there. See what happens if you just put your body there.

The rest of what I'll talk about assumes pretty much that you will be able to put your body there and hang out with it a little bit. Although sometimes it is helpful, if you find yourself extremely restless in a sitting meditation, to get up and try walking meditation or standing meditation. Sometimes it can help to allow the body to be in a posture that consumes a little more energy so that the mind can be a little more present.

If you are able to just sit with it, to put your body there, the physical version of restlessness is usually pretty easy to recognize. It has that quality of coursing energy, or sometimes, like I mentioned before, jumping beans under the skin. It's just so unpleasant.

In working with physical restlessness, it's often really helpful to let the mind not try to focus on the specific sensations of restlessness—to not try to directly focus on the physical experience—but instead let the mind get really big. As I mentioned at the end of the guided meditation, when I pointed you to this quality, perhaps some of you might have been feeling a little bit of restlessness. Letting the mind get really big, allowing the restlessness to get as big as it wants to, encompassing the whole room so that it doesn't feel like it just has to stay in this body. The experience can get very large, and when you allow the mind to relax and just get large with the experience, sometimes it's a little easier to stay present.

At one point I was doing a self-retreat at home, and every night I had this incredible restlessness coursing through the body. It was so difficult to stay put, but I had a pretty strong determination to just stay with it for the period of time that I had set for my meditation, which was forty-five minutes. At some point one evening, partway through the retreat, I recognized that there was a resistance to the experience, a resistance to the feeling, and that there was some kind of way in which the body knew what it wanted to do with this experience. I was trying to do something with the restlessness, but really the body knew what it wanted to do with it.

So I just kind of let go and allowed the body to do what it wanted. At that point it felt like the energy just blew a hole in the top of my head. There was this energy streaming through the body out the top of my head, and it became much easier to just be with it, as it felt like the energy had a path through the body. It wasn't contained in the body anymore—it was moving through. And that became much easier.

Letting go as much as possible of resistance to restlessness is key. If there's any resistance to restlessness, that's a form of ill will, a form of aversion—one of the other hindrances. We sometimes call that a multiple hindrance attack, because there's more than one hindrance going on at the same time. What we do in that case is generally try to pay attention to whichever one is most obvious or primary.

So if you're experiencing this resistance to restlessness or aversion to restlessness, then allowing yourself to feel what that aversion is like, what that resistance is like—can you allow yourself to experience that? It's helpful in this process to come into the body, to allow yourself to just experience the bodily sensations, especially when there is aversion. Often the aversion will manifest as some kind of story: "I can't stand this. I've got to get rid of this. I'm never going to be able to sit through this." There's some kind of story going. And if we can let go of the story and just be with what it feels like to resist this restlessness—where is the tightness? where is the holding?—you might in moments see the resistance let go and then just feel the restlessness. And you'll see, actually, that it's easier to just experience the restlessness than it is to experience the resistance to the restlessness or the aversion to the restlessness.

The fewer the hindrances, the easier it is. When you get hindrances piled on top of each other, it can get kind of chaotic in the experience. So just noticing what is the primary hindrance and bringing your attention there, perhaps to where it manifests in your physical experience.

Another way to work with restlessness—and this is an interesting one, a subtle one, but I'm going to go ahead and mention it—is to become aware that you know that restlessness is happening. Every experience that we have, whether it's a physical sensation or a mental experience, with every experience there's the thing itself, the experience—restlessness in this case—and then there is the mind that knows the experience. So there's the knowing of the experience, and there is the experience. In this case there's restlessness, and there is the knowing of the restlessness.

If you can recognize that you know you're restless, sometimes all it takes is a shifting of the noting in your mind, if you're using noting. You move from a noting of "restless" to "knowing restlessness." Or sometimes people find it helpful to think "the mind is knowing restlessness" rather than "I am knowing restlessness." The mind is processing, doing this experience. The mind knows restlessness.

The knowing experience has some really interesting qualities to it. It's very clear, it's very nonjudgmental, and it's neutral. It's a neutral experience to be in the experience of knowing. One of the interesting aspects of playing with this knowing of restlessness is that it will be very clear to you when you actually land in the knowing versus being in the restlessness, because restlessness is a pretty unpleasant experience. It'll be really clear that you're in the restlessness if you're experiencing all these unpleasant physical sensations. If you can shift to the knowing, if your mind can be more aware of the knowing, there will be a shift, and the experience will become more neutral because the mind is more attending to the knowing of the restlessness than it is to the restlessness itself.

So it's very clear when you actually can touch into that knowing, because there's a shift of experience. It becomes, "Oh, this is just restlessness in the body." And the charge is taken out of it when we can land in the knowing.

The mental form of restlessness often manifests as a lot of thinking. You can tell when there's just this quality of mind that can't stop. And often in this case, there's something fueling the thinking—some kind of emotion perhaps, worry or fear, the mind spinning out and churning into the future.

Again, it's really helpful sometimes to allow the attention to go very wide, to kind of step back and ask, "What's going on? Why is the mind just spinning out?" Sometimes the mind will start spinning and we don't really know what it's spinning about. Other times it's very clear—we're angry about something or we're wanting something, and then the hindrance of ill will or the hindrance of desire is primary. But sometimes it's just spinning and we don't really know what it's spinning about or what emotion lies underneath it.

So opening up, stepping back and asking, "What is going on here?"—you can even just ask yourself that question directly—and sometimes it will become clear.

I had an experience of this at one point. I was driving and I noticed that the mind just kept projecting into the future. It would spin out into the future, and I kept noticing that and coming back, noticing the hands on the steering wheel, trying to stay present for the driving. But the mind just kept spinning out. And it wasn't a pleasant spinning. It was, "How am I going to do this? How am I going to figure this out?" A very unpleasant kind of experience.

At some point, after having come back and seen the mind spin out many times, I realized there's something going on here. So I stepped back and asked, "What is happening in the mind?" And what I realized was that I was really happy. The mind was trying to figure out how to stay happy—how can I keep this state of mind? And I hadn't even noticed the happiness. So that restlessness came from a kind of big energy that emerged out of the happiness. And it was like, "Oh, how is this going to happen in my life? I better make sure that person understands how this is going to work." It was ridiculous.

So sometimes we can be surprised when we open up like this. I would not have expected happiness to underlie that very unpleasant spinning in my mind. I was completely taken by surprise.

Opening up, taking a step back and asking what's going on here when there's restlessness—you can sometimes uncover something you hadn't seen before.

If there are a lot of thoughts going on with restlessness, it's really helpful, particularly in this kind of experience, to come into the body and see if you can notice where the restlessness is manifesting physically. Sometimes I find that when the mind is spinning out, it's actually more unpleasant than the body being jittery. If the body is jittery, you can sometimes stay present for it, but when the mind is spinning out, it's hard to stay mindful.

So if you can bring your attention into the body and notice where the physical manifestation of this mental spinning is happening—you might notice some energy through the body, a tension or tightness in your heart, a contraction in your stomach—just notice where in your physical experience this energy appears. This serves the purpose of keeping you mindful in the present moment, and it also helps to cut the attachment to the thinking. The thinking process tends to perpetuate the restlessness, so if you can cut the thinking by coming into the physical experience of the body, you'll have a chance then to allow it to wind itself out.

These hindrances, and restlessness in particular—it's kind of like your mind is rushing sixty or a hundred miles an hour down the freeway. It's just going so fast.

And when we come into mindfulness around it, it doesn't mean that it stops just like that. It's like putting a car into neutral. When you put a car into neutral that's going a hundred miles an hour down the freeway, it doesn't stop. It just stops going quite as fast. It begins to slow.

So when we stop feeding the momentum of the restlessness with thoughts, we have a chance to allow it to wind itself out in a natural way, as if that car is coming to rest by putting it into neutral. When we bring mindfulness to our experience, to something like restlessness, it doesn't mean that it ends immediately, but it does mean it has a chance to kind of live out its life and then flow out almost like a breath flowing out.

It's also helpful in this to try the exercise of knowing restlessness when you're in mental restlessness as well. See if you can just recognize that the mind knows it's got this mental restlessness. You could use noting again: knowing restlessness, knowing agitation, knowing spinning.

The quality of remorse is sometimes difficult to be with. This is when the mind is going back over something that we wish we hadn't done. Often what seems to happen is that we're trying to figure out how to relive our past—how do we have a better past? And it's not really possible, so it's not terribly helpful.

The thing I found most helpful with remorse is to actually allow myself to feel the remorse. It's not an unskillful thing. It's like, this is the consequence of having done this thing. If we've done something that we legitimately have reason to feel bad about, if we've legitimately hurt somebody or caused someone harm in some way, the feeling of remorse around that is just the recognition of: it's like this. When I've behaved in that way, this is the consequence.

There's a way in which not resisting that feeling of remorse allows us to drop into the actual connection with the person that we've hurt. A way that we drop into a connection with the sadness. Sadness is really the place it drops into most for me when I allow myself to not resist the remorse, when it's just able to be with that sadness. And there may, out of that, also come some desire or wish, a wholesome wish, to make amends, to apologize, or to make some kind of redress.

So remorse is not something necessarily to run away from. It's something that can inform us about how we can more skillfully choose in the future. We can learn from it and move on. There's no need to beat ourselves up with guilt around it. Guilt and remorse are different things. Guilt is: I shouldn't have done that, that was so stupid. Remorse is more: this is the consequence. How can I move on from here? What can I do to make amends? What can I do to redress this action? There's no way to fix the past. We have to move on from here.

So often we have a feeling with the hindrances in general that they're in the way. I mean, after all, they're called hindrances. So we think they're in the way of our meditation practice. We think our task with them is to get rid of them so that we can then become concentrated and then be mindful. But wanting to get rid of them is just another form of ill will—so it's adding another hindrance to the situation, another multiple hindrance attack.

We can be mindful, we can be aware of these hindrances. And as I said before, when we're aware of them, they are no longer hindering our experience. They become our path when we are aware of them. And we can experience very clear, deep insights around these hindrances. I'm sure Shaila has talked about the understandings of impermanence, of suffering, of not-self. We can come to understanding of the impermanence of hindrances. We can come to an understanding of the process nature of hindrances, that they are not me—I am not this hindrance. We can come to an understanding of the suffering nature, the unsatisfactory nature of the hindrance. And these are insights in our practice.

So the hindrances, when we bring our attention to them, can actually be the doorway. They are the path when they're happening. They're not something to get rid of in order that we can get on the path again. They are the path.

The hindrance of restlessness in particular is not one that we will lose anytime soon. The Buddhist path talks about four stages of awakening, and perhaps Shaila has discussed this. The hindrance of doubt disappears at the first stage of awakening. At the second stage of awakening, along with some other developments, there's just an attenuation of greed and aversion, of the hindrances of ill will and desire. They don't go away at the second stage of awakening. So even after the second stage of awakening, after you've gained very clear, deep understanding of the truth of the end of suffering, the hindrances of aversion and desire are still present. It's only at the third stage of awakening that those hindrances drop away. And it's only at the fourth stage, the very end of the path, that restlessness drops away.

So restlessness is something that underlies a lot of the movement of mind. It can be very subtle, this movement of restlessness. Get to know it. It will be with us for a very long time. But as we learn to work with it, it can become our path, observing the restlessness—when we're restless, when the restlessness disappears, it shows us how we walk the path. It points our way forward.

Question and Answer Period

A student asked whether acceptance of restlessness could itself become sloth. Yes, it could be. You could just get dull, sitting and thinking for the whole meditation session, accepting the restlessness without ever making an effort to work with it. It really depends on how that acceptance is manifesting. All of these hindrances weave through each other. We can get restless out of being aversive, or we can fall into sloth and torpor as a response to restlessness. They can all become intertwined. So we really have to be very honest with ourselves about what the actual experience is. Is it just a dullness setting in that allows us to sit through the session while we space out? Or are we actually making an effort to come back? We have to be honest with ourselves.

Another student raised a question about remorse and the pattern of trying to edit the past, noting that while I had focused primarily on situations where one may have unskillfully injured someone, there seems to be another source of that editing—when we have acted in ways that are inconsistent with our self-concept. Perhaps it's about wanting to have been more clever, less forgetful, or more efficient.

This is a different kind of remorse, I think. It's not necessarily about having done something wrong. Though it can be—I can imagine if you have an image of yourself as a green person, someone who doesn't waste energy, and you neglect to combine your errands into one trip, there may be a sense of having injured the planet. So there could be a feeling of wanting to be more careful in the future around that.

But I think the key is letting go of trying to edit the past and simply experiencing whatever the feeling is now, because that will give you some clue as to what aspect of your self-image is in contest here. Is this actually a part of your self-image that you want to cultivate, or is it a part of your self-image that you want to let go of? It's really about coming into the experience of the moment, and you'll see something about what the tension is about.

That's a kind of form of ill will towards yourself. So that's what you pay attention to. You notice that feeling, and that's a hard thing to feel. So that's what you bring your attention to. What does it feel like to be beating myself up like this?

And again, can you let go of the thoughts and come into the body? It's really helpful to use the body as a tool, particularly for this kind of experience. What does it feel like in the body to have this feeling of self-recrimination? You'll probably feel both the remorse and the self-recrimination at the same time. And you may find, as you come into the body, that you come down to just the remorse as the thoughts begin to dissipate, as you stay with the body more.

Now, you're going to end up leaping back out. What happens is you touch the feelings and then it's like, "Oh, I don't want to feel this. I'd rather figure out how I can change my past." Our minds do that kind of thing. So you just have to keep trying to come back into the body as much as possible. And at some point, you may notice a slight shift, at which point you can just touch into the pure remorse.

I've found it's actually interesting—when I can just touch the remorse, it's like, "Oh right, this is what it feels like." And it's no longer the recrimination. The recrimination is far worse than the remorse. It's interesting. It's almost like what we're trying to do is punish ourselves because we think we need to suffer for having done something wrong, so we punish ourselves that way. But we find, I think, that once we actually touch the remorse, we can find a more skillful way to deal with it. We find a more skillful way to approach it rather than beating ourselves up and trying to figure out how to fix the past.

So we should stop. Thank you all for your attention and your participation. I'd like to wish that the practice we've shared here this evening be offered to be of benefit to all beings everywhere.

May all beings be happy. May all beings be healthy. May all beings be safe. May all beings live with ease. May all beings be free from suffering.

CHAPTER 206

Practicing with Vedanā

Andrea Fella · 38 min

In this talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of vedanā—the feeling tone of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral that accompanies every moment of experience. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), she explains how vedanā serves as a crucial weak link in the chain leading from sense contact to craving, clinging, and ultimately suffering. When we bring mindfulness to this subtle quality of experience, we gain the opportunity to short-circuit our automatic reactivity.

Fella references the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), where feeling constitutes one of the four foundations of mindfulness, and quotes the Aṅguttara Nikāya teaching that "all things converge on feeling." She illuminates how vedanā functions as a narrow channel through which all our responses are born—we don't actually react to objects themselves, but to the pleasant or unpleasant quality we experience through them.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with vedanā in daily life, particularly recommending mindful eating as an excellent training ground where all senses come together. Fella shares personal examples, including noticing how a neutral sound became unpleasant through fear-based reactivity, and discovering the initial pleasant warmth underlying anger. As practitioners become more attuned to feeling tone, they begin to witness the very birth of reactivity and find the seeds of freedom in that seeing.

So as Leanne mentioned, I'd like to speak about the feeling tone of our experience, the vedanā of our experience. This is not about emotion in particular, but about a very simple, very specific experience: whether something is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

On the night of his enlightenment, the Buddha had insight into what he understood to be the main cause of our difficulty in life—the problem of suffering, the nature of dissatisfaction. We all experience this. We all experience suffering or dissatisfaction. We all experience this feeling of wanting something that we don't have, of having something that we don't want, of things simply not being the way we'd like them to be, of wanting to change them.

One aspect of the Buddha's insight around suffering is that he understood the cause of suffering to be wanting or craving, as he put it. But his insight went beyond the simple understanding that craving causes suffering. He actually uncovered a whole chain of conditions—causes and conditions—that lead us from our experience into suffering over and over again. He called this chain of conditions dependent origination.

I'm not going to go through the entire set of dependent origination this evening, but just talk about the links in the chain, the various steps or stages of causes that relate to this evening's topic of feeling tone.

Basically, because we have a body and a mind, we experience sense contact. We experience sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, and everything that comes into our mind. These are the six senses in the Buddhist understanding: our five usual senses plus the sense door of the mind. Each of these sense impressions has a particular flavor to it. It's either a pleasant experience, an unpleasant experience, or a neutral experience. Every single bodily sense and every mental impression has this quality of being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

Once we experience that pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality in a very simple, normal kind of way, we either like the pleasant and want it, or we don't like the unpleasant and don't want it, or we perhaps don't even notice the neutral experience. So primarily what happens out of this sense impression of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral is that we in some way react to it, respond to it with this kind of either wanting or not wanting. That's the next link in the chain: wanting or craving.

From the craving, from this wanting, we kind of automatically begin to move—also in a very simple and natural way—to do something about it. We move towards getting the thing that we want or actively getting rid of the thing that we don't want. This movement of mind, this part of our experience, is called clinging. This is where we've actually latched onto our experience in some way, either to grab onto it, to keep it, or to push it away.

Sometimes it's hard to understand what it means to crave something unpleasant. But the craving to get rid of something, the wanting to get rid of something unpleasant, is a form of clinging to it. It's almost as if we get stuck to the thing we want to get rid of. If I want to get rid of this thing, it's like I'm stuck to it with superglue, trying to push it away. That's the way in which it's clinging to the experience.

Once we've clung to something, there is a kind of identification that comes out of that—an identification of perhaps it being mine or not mine. There's this latching on and the identification: "Oh, this belongs to me." Whether it's a state of mind or a physical thing. If it's a physical thing, we might think of it as mine—my glass. If it's a mental thing, like a mood or an emotion, we might think of ourselves as being that emotion: "I'm an angry person" or "I'm a happy person." We latch onto and identify with these states of mind too.

This identification piece in this set of links of dependent origination is called becoming. And actually, in a funny way—or maybe not so funny—we like becoming. It seems like a very natural thing to us. We like knowing what we have. We like knowing who we are. Even if it's identifying with something negative, there's some piece of us that likes knowing who we are and what we have. So that becoming piece is actually something we're drawn to.

From this point, there's a kind of hit in that moment when we get what we want or get rid of what we don't want, and we know that we're the ones that did that. There's a moment of happiness, a kind of a hit of "Ah, everything's all right," even if it's just for a moment in that place of becoming.

But from here, in the Buddha's understanding of this chain of dependent origination, suffering is inevitable—if only for the reason that whatever it is we've latched onto is impermanent and will go away. For example, if I think of this as my glass, if I'm attached to it—it's a lovely glass, it's got a nice swirly pattern on it, it's got the right depth to meet your lip, it's just a very nice glass—but if I happen to drop it and break it, I might get upset about that because it was my glass and I really liked it. I really had an attachment to it. So the clinging and the identification, the clinging to and the constructing of a me or a mine around it, will lead us into some form of suffering.

Now, the suffering that arises might not be very profound or difficult, but it can also be quite profound indeed.

The Buddha realized how this chain of events is linked together, how one thing conditions the next. We start with our body and our sense impressions. From there arises feeling. From feeling comes the very natural wanting or not wanting. From there emerges the natural movement to hold onto or get rid of our experience. And then comes this identification. These things all happen in a fairly natural and normal way—it's almost as if we're built this way. It makes perfect sense that we move towards something pleasant and away from something unpleasant. Even a single-celled creature will move towards food and away from some noxious chemical. So that makes perfect sense; it's not a particular mystery to us.

But the additional piece—the clinging and creating an identity around experience—that part is what leads us towards suffering. The Buddha saw that these things flow from one to another, that there's a tendency for one to move into the next, for one to condition the arising of the next, almost like dominoes falling over.

But he also saw that there are some weak links in this chain, some places where it's easier to short-circuit the pattern and avoid flowing from the natural sense impression into suffering. We can't avoid sense impressions as human beings—they're going to come into us. Cutting that one off is challenging, although it is doable if you get into very deep states of concentration. But in our normal everyday life, we live with sense impressions, and we live with this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality of experience. So is there a way that we can not move on into the wanting, the craving, the clinging, the identification?

The Buddha pointed to this link of the feeling tone—the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—as being one of the key weak links in this chain. He taught that if you bring mindfulness to this weak link, if you actually recognize when something is happening that's pleasant or unpleasant, it gives you the possibility to short-circuit this automatic movement from pleasant to liking to wanting to grasping. It's possible.

It's possible to experience something pleasant without wanting it. It's possible to experience something pleasant and experience the liking, and not have that liking move into wanting. It's possible to experience something unpleasant, not like it, and not have that not-liking move into not-wanting. It's also possible to experience the pleasant and not have even liking arise—that's a slightly subtler version of this.

But the only way this can happen is when we see the feeling tone itself, when we actually experience through awareness, through consciously knowing and recognizing as it happens, this experience of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral as it arises. If we can do that and the wanting does not follow, we will not suffer over it.

The Buddha talked about mindfulness of feeling most prominently in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the discourse on the four foundations of mindfulness. This teaching describes or lays out four different frames or points of view into our experience that we can bring our mindfulness to. Of those four foundations, the second one is mindfulness of feeling. An entire foundation of mindfulness is devoted to this notion of whether something is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. I think that partly highlights how important this quality is to pay attention to.

I'm going to read you a little bit of that part of the sutta. It's brief. The Buddha uses the term bhikkhu here, which means monk, but it says elsewhere in the commentaries to the sutta that whenever the Buddha refers to bhikkhu, he's referring to anyone who's practicing this meditation practice. So he's speaking to all of us when he says this:

"When feeling a pleasant feeling, a bhikkhu understands: 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' When feeling a painful feeling, he understands: 'I feel a painful feeling.' When feeling a neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling"—that's the term for neutral feeling—"he understands: 'I feel a neither-painful-nor-pleasant experience.'"

That's it. Those are the instructions from the Buddha about how to work with feeling. When you feel it, know that you feel it. It's a pretty simple instruction, but not so easy to follow through on.

Typically, what happens to us when we experience something pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral is that we immediately leap onto it in some way and start to think about it. We like it. We want it. We start to plan how to get it, or how to get rid of it if it's something unpleasant. Very quickly we lose track of the fact that it's even pleasant or unpleasant—we're already in the stages of trying to figure out how to get more of it or how to get rid of it.

So stopping the usual momentum of the mind from spinning away from pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral is not easy. But it's helped immensely by recognizing or knowing that this quality of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral is worth paying attention to. Most of the time, we don't think of it as being worth paying attention to. We immediately think it's important to react to it or respond to it. Oh, there's something pleasant—

I need to get more of that. So we lose track of the fact that we've experienced something pleasant. Often we don't even notice it. We're already leaping onto it to do something about it.

This feeling tone is subtle in the sense that we don't usually consciously recognize it. It's not something that normally appears in our experience for very long, because we so quickly move on from it—thinking about it, trying to arrange our environment to either get more of what's pleasant or get rid of what's unpleasant.

But once we know that it's an interesting thing to pay attention to, a helpful thing to pay attention to, it can become quite clear. It can become quite obvious. If you bump your head getting out of your car, it's pretty clear that the experience of the bump is painful. If you're eating ice cream, it's pretty clear that the experience is pleasant. But we have to know to recognize it, to notice actually the pleasant quality or the unpleasant quality. And even when we do recognize it, it's hard to stop there.

When you start recognizing this feeling tone, you'll begin seeing this reaction, this chain of events that I described. You'll feel the bump on your head. You'll feel the unpleasantness. Then you'll start to see yourself reacting in some way—"How could I have been so stupid?" or whatever you go on to think. There's some kind of movement happening. It's not simply "Oh, there's an unpleasant feeling." Very few of us respond that way when something like that happens. We get angry, we get frustrated, and that represents a reactivity to the pleasant or unpleasant experience.

As you start to witness the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral quality of experience and see the reactivity begin to get born out of that pleasant or unpleasant experience, you're actually starting to see something very profound about the way the mind works. This is the way in which it leaps off of pleasant or unpleasant, and this is what sets into motion the whole cascading chain that leads us into greed, aversion, delusion, identification, and suffering.

Every single experience that we have—whether it's a bodily experience through one of our five physical sense doors or a mental experience through our mind—every single experience has this feeling tone associated with it. It's easiest to see with our bodily senses. Our sense of touch, for instance, is highly tuned to pleasant and unpleasant. It's also pretty easy to notice in taste, the things we find pleasant or unpleasant. So it's fairly easy to recognize this quality of pleasant and unpleasant in our bodily experience.

But the sense of our mind—everything that happens in our mind, moods, emotions, thoughts—also has this quality of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Thoughts themselves actually have a subtle feeling tone associated with them. But usually what we associate with the feeling tone of a thought is actually a kind of reaction. A thought arises about something, and then we react to it, and it's that reaction that has a feeling tone more than the thought itself, which probably has a more neutral feeling tone. The simple fact that a thought arises in our mind can be pretty neutral. It's the content of the thought and our reaction to that thought that carries the feeling tone.

This kind of experience—a thought and then the reaction to the thought—actually underlies a lot of what we think of as pleasant or unpleasant. Let me give you an example. One night I was trying to sleep. I had woken up in the middle of the night and was having difficulty sleeping, so I got up to meditate, which is something I often do when I have trouble sleeping. I was meditating and started to hear this very gentle, quiet tapping sound—just a soft tap, tap, tap. To me, that experience was unpleasant. I experienced that sound as unpleasant.

As I kept paying attention, I noticed that unpleasantness. And as I continued paying attention, I noticed that when I heard the sound, a little bit of fear arose. And that was definitely unpleasant—this feeling of contraction in the body. The fear had an unpleasant quality to it. But as I could just be with the fear, the next time the sound came, the next time I actually heard it, I realized that the sound itself was neutral or even slightly pleasant. It was the reaction to the sound that was unpleasant—the fear—which made me associate that fear with the sound. The sound became unpleasant because of the fear.

This kind of thing happens to us a lot with our physical sense experience. So it's very helpful to begin to recognize the feeling tone of our experience and start to see when there is some extra feeling added on top of what the actual feeling is.

Another sutta that I like states that all things converge on feeling. What I take that to mean is that essentially the feeling tone of our experience is where all of our responses are born. For instance, some people like blue, or they hate the smell of hot roofing tar, or they like a particular kind of car. We think it's the color blue we're responding to, or we think it's the hot roofing tar that we're reacting to. But actually, for some of us, the color blue is pleasant and the smell of hot roofing tar is unpleasant—and that is what we're reacting to. That quality of pleasant or unpleasant underneath.

This feeling tone is like a springboard.

It's this narrow channel through which all of our reactivity arises. So that's what I take this to mean: all things converge on feeling. And if we can identify or recognize or be mindful of this feeling tone, we have an opportunity to not end up being so reactive to our experience. Instead of being whipped around by things all day, we can simply recognize, "Oh, this is a pleasant experience, this is an unpleasant experience."

So I'd like to talk for a few minutes about ways to practice with this feeling tone. The sutta I described simply instructs: when you feel a pleasant feeling, know that it's pleasant. When you feel an unpleasant feeling, know that it's unpleasant. But it's a little harder for us because initially it's difficult to even recognize things as pleasant or unpleasant—we're so conditioned to leap away from them.

So initially, in playing with or practicing with this feeling tone, it's helpful to actually consciously direct our attention to it. The easiest place to do this is in the sense door of the body, to check into our physical experience. What's pleasant? What's unpleasant?

An excellent place to explore this is in eating, because eating brings together all of our senses. We see the food, we identify it, we know what we want and don't want, what we like and dislike. There may be colors or forms on the plate that are particularly pleasing or displeasing. There's the smell of the food, which may be pleasing or displeasing. There's the contact of the food, the touch sensations of the texture in our mouth. There's the taste of the food. All of these things have pleasant and unpleasant aspects to them.

And you may find, for example, that something pleasant over time becomes something neutral or even slightly unpleasant. Chewing an apple, for instance—initially there's that burst of juice and sweet tartness in the mouth that may bring a sense of pleasantness, and the crunchiness, the texture, is pleasant at first. But you chew for a while, the sweetness dissipates, the juiciness dissipates, and it's just this pulpy thing in your mouth before you swallow it. It may be neutral or even slightly unpleasant, depending on your experience. The qualities can shift and change as we eat our food, and it's a very interesting place to begin really recognizing and noticing this quality of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral.

If it's a food that we like, we can also notice any mental experiences about it—any sense of, "Ooh, I want more of that. Is there more? Is somebody else taking the extra piece that I want?" All of the thoughts that arise around it, which themselves may be pleasant or unpleasant.

Another good place to look at feeling tone is when strong emotions are present. Whenever there's any kind of strong emotion, there will always be some quality of pleasant or unpleasant underneath. It can be very interesting to simply observe, without any judgment, whether there's pleasant or unpleasant there. Sometimes you might be surprised.

For example, the feeling of excitement has qualities of pleasantness to it. There can be a lightening of the mind and a kind of movement of joy in the excitement. But there can also be an unpleasant agitation quality to excitement. So there can be both pleasant and unpleasant aspects to emotions that we might think of generally as pleasant.

Or take anger, for instance. On one retreat, I was observing anger quite closely. It was coming up a lot, and I got to the place where I began to see the anger arising right at the beginning—just the very inception of that anger. What I noticed was that mostly I had been experiencing anger as a very unpleasant sensation of heat and pressure. But what I noticed as it just started was warmth and fullness. And that was pleasant. That initial hit of anger was a pleasant experience.

I was rather surprised at that. But in some way it made sense to me, because anger is something that hooks us. And I think that initial hit of fullness and warmth—it's just a feeling of life, of aliveness—that is what hooks us in anger.

So we practice noticing the qualities of pleasant and unpleasant in our experience. If you're experiencing aversion, some kind of not-wanting, some urge to get rid of something in your experience—even if it's just a general feeling of aversion, you're having a difficult day of some kind—you might simply check and see: is there something unpleasant in your experience? For me, for instance, when I get hungry, it colors everything.

A lot of things become very unpleasant or difficult when I get hungry. That kind of gnawing experience of unpleasantness, especially when it's not recognized, can filter everything—like a gray glass placed over my experience. If it's not recognized, if I don't notice, "Oh, there's that hunger. I'm just hungry right now," then when I do recognize that experience, it becomes much easier not to be so reactive to everything else.

As you become more familiar with this feeling tone, as you become more attuned to the qualities of pleasant and unpleasant, it gets easier to work with it as the Buddha recommended: simply when there's pleasant, know that it's pleasant; when there's unpleasant, know that it's unpleasant. Then you can start to practice that true mindfulness of feeling. When something unpleasant arises in your experience, just know, "Oh, this is an unpleasant experience."

But it seems to be helpful initially in exploring this to actually look for the pleasant and unpleasant, because we do tend to just leap off of it so quickly. When you can notice this feeling tone and start to notice that the mind reacts and responds to it, you have the opportunity to actually witness the birth of this reactivity—to witness the whole chain of causes and conditions leading us into this reactive, clinging, suffering identification with experience.

In that seeing of the birth of this pattern, that is where the seeds of freedom lie. In seeing the pattern, we have an opportunity to not get caught by it, to not automatically respond in our habitual way. We can actually unwind this chain. This automatic chain can be unwound, and we can live much freer lives—not being whipsawed by this quality of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral, as we are when we don't really see it and recognize it.

We have just a couple of minutes, but if there are any questions... Yes, the reference for "all things converge on feeling" is in the Aṅguttara Nikāya. It's in this book, the Numerical Discourses of the Buddha—Aṅguttara Nikāya 10.58.

Is it desirable to be neutral? And what does neutral mean? Neutral, as the description goes, is neither pleasant nor unpleasant. That's the technical term for it—when something is neither pleasant nor unpleasant, it's neutral. Things are what they are, in general. When experience arises, it has one of these qualities to it. Whether something is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral is essentially conditioned. We don't have a lot of control over that as it arises in our experience.

However, in our practice, what seems to happen is that as we continue to practice, we begin to see more things as they really are. We begin to see that most of our sense contact actually is on the neutral side. Sight, for instance—much of our sight is actually neutral. It's our thoughts around it that are pleasant or unpleasant, that we react to. So we begin to actually experience more and more neutral as we do the practice. This seems to be the direction that the practice moves.

That sounds perhaps like it might be flat or boring, but the quality of equanimity is essentially a neutral mind state, and yet it gives you such a sense of peace that there's a way in which it feels pleasant.

I'm going to read one last quote to end. I find it very interesting. The Buddha is talking about what's pleasant and unpleasant with respect to each of these three aspects: "Pleasant feeling is pleasant when it persists and painful when it changes. Painful feeling is painful when it persists and pleasant when it changes. Neither painful nor pleasant feeling is pleasant when there is knowledge of it, and unpleasant when there is no knowledge of it."

I'll just leave you with that to peruse. That quote is from Majjhima Nikāya 44, paragraph 24.

So it's nine o'clock and we need to finish. Let's do a little dedication of merit.

May the beneficial results of our practice together be offered to support the welfare and liberation of all beings everywhere. May all beings be happy. May all beings be healthy. May all beings be safe.

May all beings live with ease.

May all beings be free from suffering.

Thank you.

The quotation referenced is from Aṅguttara Nikāya 44, paragraph 24.

CHAPTER 207

Yathābhūta: Seeing Things As They Actually Are

Andrea Fella · 54 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella unpacks the frequently occurring Pāli term yathābhūta, which appears 187 times in the suttas and means "as it actually is" or "as things have come to be." She presents this concept as a fundamental meditation instruction from the Buddha, inviting practitioners to explore experience free from the additions of views, opinions, and reactions.

Drawing from the Sallatha Sutta (SN 36.6), the famous "two arrows" teaching, Fella explains how untrained minds compound suffering by adding mental reactivity to physical pain. She shares her personal journey with anger, describing how turning attention toward the feeling itself—rather than the object of anger—created space for wisdom to arise. The talk explores how views and beliefs function as invisible filters, using examples from cultural assumptions to personal identity patterns like self-hatred, demonstrating how both "it's not supposed to be like this" and "this is how it should be" create suffering.

Fella examines progressively subtler layers of mental addition, from gross reactivity to the conceptual overlay through which we normally experience reality, illustrated by her memorable story of misperceiving bat sounds as squealing pigs in Burma. She concludes with the Bāhiya Sutta (Ud 1.10), where the Buddha instructs: "In reference to the seen, there will be only the seen." This teaching reveals that as we train to meet experience directly, the concept of self naturally falls away, ending suffering. The path is one of gradual exploration—not forcing views to disappear, but becoming conscious of how we add to experience moment by moment.

Here at CIMC, I feel I owe a debt of gratitude because I usually teach in California, at the Insight Meditation Center in Redwood City. I heard about the sandwich retreat from CIMC and begged my teacher at the time to offer it, but he didn't want to commit to that kind of retreat—the daily life practice retreat every evening and the weekends around it. So when I became a teacher, I decided I would offer one. I've been offering my own version of a sandwich retreat at the Insight Meditation Center in Redwood City now for about the past five or six years, and there's a whole community of practitioners that have really appreciated it. Your community has offered this form that has now migrated out into the world. Thank you for that. I really appreciate CIMC.

In the Buddha's teachings, there's a phrase that is actually used quite a lot, but it can just disappear into the text. The phrase is yathābhūta, and it's translated as something like "as it actually is." This phrase is used all over the place in the suttas. You'll see the Buddha talking about how one understands suffering as it actually is, one understands the cause of suffering as it actually is, or he talks about understanding the eye and sight as it actually is. I actually looked on Access to Insight tonight to see how many places it was used, and I found 187 places where that phrase appears.

This notion of "as it actually is"—in my understanding, this yathābhūta, "things as they are," "things as they have come to be," "as it actually is"—these are various translations of the term. I understand it to be a kind of meditation instruction from the Buddha: that we should explore our experience as it actually is, free from views, opinions, ideas, and reactions. And that is not the easiest thing to do.

What I'd like to do tonight is explore with you this facet of yathābhūta, this aspect of looking at our experience as it actually is. Why it's so difficult is that we tend to add a lot to our experience. Our mind adds things to our experience. I'd like to look at some of the things that we add and explore how bringing mindfulness and wisdom to those additions can support us to begin to see things as they actually are.

In many places where the Buddha uses this term yathābhūta, he expresses that when one doesn't see things as they actually are, one suffers. So the exploration of seeing things as they actually are is that of letting go of suffering, letting go of the things that we add.

In this exploration of the things we add, I'd like to start with some of the more obvious ones and then work inward to the more subtle ways we add to our experience—things that catch us, that create struggle, that create this dukkha, this suffering.

In one of the Buddha's texts, he almost explicitly talks about the ways we add to our experience. It's a rather famous sutta, so you may have heard this story. The Buddha asks his followers: whether somebody has trained in the practice or not, whether one is an ordinary person or a trained disciple of the Buddha, one experiences pleasant experience, one experiences unpleasant experience, and one experiences neither pleasant nor unpleasant experience. Given that—given that whether we're trained or not, we experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience—what's the difference between someone who is an ordinary person, a run-of-the-mill person, and someone who has training?

He goes on to answer his own question, and I'll read a bit of this text to you:

"When the uninstructed worldling is contacted by a painful feeling, one sorrows, grieves, and laments. One weeps, beating one's breast, and becomes distraught. One feels two feelings, a bodily one and a mental one. Suppose they were to strike a man with a dart and then were to strike him immediately afterwards with a second dart, so that man would feel a feeling caused by two darts."

What he's saying here is that when we experience something unpleasant, we don't leave it simply as an unpleasant experience. As he says, we grieve, sorrow, weep, lament, beat our breast, become distraught. Basically: Why me? Why is this happening to me? This shouldn't be happening to me. So when we have an unpleasant experience, there's the unpleasant experience, and then there is the reactivity to that unpleasant experience.

And what the Buddha says is that these are two unpleasant experiences combined together. In my own experience, they don't simply add—they multiply. The mental reactivity layered on top of a painful physical feeling greatly compounds the suffering. We add reactivity to our experience.

He goes on to describe the instructed noble disciple. When the instructed noble disciple is contacted by a painful feeling, that one does not sorrow, grieve, or lament, does not weep beating one's breast and become distraught. One feels one feeling—a bodily one, not a mental one.

So this training the Buddha offers helps us let go of the reactivity we add to experience. This is perhaps the most obvious way we don't meet things as they actually are. When something pleasant arises, we don't simply meet it as pleasant. We like it, we want it, we want more of it. Yes, more of that, please. When something unpleasant arises, we don't like it, we want to get rid of it. Again, additional movement of mind accompanies the pleasant and unpleasant. With neutral experience, the additional movement tends to be something like non-connecting—we simply don't recognize much of our neutral experience at all.

This movement of reactivity—wanting what's pleasant, pushing away what's unpleasant—is an addition to our experience. We're not simply meeting experience as it is. As we explore more deeply, we begin to understand that the pleasant or unpleasant experience is one thing, and our reaction to it is something else entirely.

With unpleasant experience, as the Buddha described in this sutta, we see how reactivity compounds suffering. We often think we don't have much choice in this matter. It feels like, "This is just the way I am. When that happens to me, I react. That's who I am." We don't always recognize that there is some choice here, that reactivity is actually a process happening in our minds around which there can be just a little space.

When an unpleasant experience arises, if we're mindful, if we're aware with mindfulness of that experience, there can be just a bit of space, and we can choose not to act out of reactivity. This is challenging—not something that happens after looking at it once or twice. It's an ongoing exploration. We can begin by simply recognizing that reactivity is happening, allowing it without acting on it.

How does this work? When I first heard this kind of instruction, I was very new to meditation practice. I received it through reading a book: don't act on your difficult emotions. Anger was the emotion I was working with at the time. Don't act on your anger—just experience it, feel it. My thinking was, "What good is that going to do? If I just pay attention to my anger, won't I get more angry?" I didn't quite understand how it worked. However, I trusted enough to try it.

What I began to understand through exploration is that there's a difference between bringing attention to the experience of anger—turning toward that experience—and being caught in what we're reacting to. Normally when we react, there's something in the world we're reacting to, and then there's the reaction itself. The outer thing and the inner reaction. This exploration of the inner reaction takes our attention away from the thing we're reacting to.

In my situation, I was angry at a particular person. Exploring the feeling of anger took my attention away from thoughts about that person and brought it to the feeling itself. This is what it feels like to be a human being experiencing anger. I still didn't quite understand how it worked, but over several months I saw for myself how valuable it was, how effective it was to take my attention out of the thing in the world—where reactivity was fueling the anger—and turn it toward the feeling of anger itself. I found much more space around the anger, much more ability to navigate my world without acting from that reactive place.

This exploration, this turning toward our reactivity—this is the first step.

to beginning to have some space around that reactivity. And as we get some space around it, slowly over time—and it is a slow process—our mind begins to understand how that reactivity is formed. Slowly it begins to re-educate itself. It begins to understand how a choice is made around that reactivity.

I still remember very clearly one situation, after having observed this anger for many months. I found myself in a situation where I saw a thought arise in my mind about the person I was angry with. I saw the inclination to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry at that person. And in seeing that, essentially in that moment, my mind saw the choice that was possible.

The choice that the mind made—actually, I didn't even feel like I made the choice. It wasn't a feeling of consciously deciding, "Oh, don't think those thoughts, don't jump on that train." What happened is that the mind recognized: that way lies suffering. That way lies anger that burns inside, because I had been feeling that burning by turning towards the feeling of anger. So the mind got an education. The mind got an education that anger is suffering. And when the mind saw itself headed towards that suffering, it just said, "Not going there."

This observing of our reactivity, this willingness to turn towards our difficult emotions, the ways that we react—that willingness is the beginning of our minds starting to let go and loosen around that reactivity.

Sometimes when we reflect on the suffering around the way we react to things, we notice different kinds of suffering. There's suffering that might come when we react to somebody cutting us off on a freeway. There's suffering that might happen if we lose our jobs. Or there's the suffering that might happen if we have a dear friend we learn is dying of cancer.

If we start to look at this, we see that most of us would be pretty happy to let go of some kinds of reactivity—let go of the reactivity around somebody cutting us off on the freeway. But the reactivity around a friend dying from cancer, the anger, the sense of "it shouldn't be like that"—that kind of reactivity, we feel like it proves that we care. There can be a way that we cling to some of our reactivity because of our relationship to our views, our beliefs around that reactivity. We believe that certain kinds of reactivity make us human.

What I'd like to explore is the possibility—and I've seen this in my own practice—that, certainly not all the time, but I've seen times where I find I can meet a really challenging situation. A situation like, "This shouldn't be happening"—such as a friend dying from cancer—where rather than reacting to that and being angry about it, there can be the heart that doesn't contract. The heart that feels the suffering of that, resonates with the pain of that, but doesn't contract.

This is the possibility, and this is actually meeting things as they are. Rather than resisting the truth of impermanence, the heart can open and respond with kindness, with love, with compassion.

This exploration around reactivity, the letting go of that reactivity—it doesn't take us to a place where we're flat and non-responsive. That's a misunderstanding. It can open us to a place where the heart feels like it's vibrating with the world, out of love. This offers the possibility of being responsive to the world rather than reactive to the world.

I think of this as coming into alignment with truth. Rather than reacting to the challenges of unreliability, of impermanence, of suffering, rather than railing against it—"It shouldn't be like this"—well, it is like this. Coming into alignment with that truth, meeting it without resistance, we can respond skillfully. We can meet the pain.

I remember one friend who told me of a very deep pain that he had experienced. He was reliving it in the moment through reflection. I was able, through just trying to be there—I didn't want to close down or contract—I just tried to be there with him, with his pain. I didn't try to fix it. I didn't try to talk him out of it. Just sitting with him. A feeling on my part of that open-heartedness, that willingness to meet the pain.

A couple of days later, he asked me, "Were you doing mettā? Were you doing loving-kindness?" Because it felt to him like there was love there. What I was doing was just trying to keep my heart open to the pain. That openness, that willingness to just meet reality, coming into alignment with things as they are—it can be felt as love. It can have that quality.

So that's one way that we add to our experience, and the exploration of reactivity can help us come into alignment with things as they are, meet things as they are.

Another way that we add to our experience is through views, opinions, beliefs. There are so many different kinds of beliefs that operate in our minds. It's like we're swimming in these beliefs.

We don't necessarily recognize that we're believing things or that we have this orientation. It's like views are a filter on our minds. If I had a pair of blue glasses that I put on and wore around all the time, at some point it would stop being apparent to me that I was looking through blue glasses. The mind would adjust to that and it would just be, "That's the way it is, things look that way." Similarly with our views—we're just seeing through that perspective and we don't actually recognize that we're seeing with a view in mind.

There are views that we have about our person, kind of personal views. Views of who we are, what we do, what we're capable of doing. Views of what our partners should be. Views of what our children should be. These personal views are individual—ones that we each have because of our conditioning.

One simple example from my life: I was both very short when I was a child, and I had really bad eyes. Those two things together meant the teacher always put me in the front row in the classroom. That created this view in my mind, which years later I finally recognized—well, this is why I always sit in the front row, wherever I am. It's a silly little thing in a way, but it created a kind of belief in myself: I like to sit in the front row. There was even a story around it—it shows that I'm really interested to sit in the front row. So it became part of my identity, this sitting in the front row. We have many of these that we may not be so aware of.

Then there are views that are developed based on our life in a particular culture, in our society. Societal views that relate to me personally. For instance, I have this job, so I deserve this job. Ways that we believe we have a right to what we have, essentially—whereas it's really conditions coming together to create the situation that we have these things.

And then there are broader societal views that we pick up. Views about—well, here's a good one: America is a land of opportunity. Anyone who works hard enough can fulfill their dream. This is a view that pervades the dominant culture in this society. Believing that view, swimming in that view, not seeing that view, leads to a kind of denial of the privilege of white people in this culture. Because for a certain class of people in society, perhaps if you work hard enough, you can get what you want—but it is not uniformly the case. So many views that we carry around, that we swim in, that we're unaware of living with.

Some of these views don't necessarily cause us problems. Like the sitting in the front row for me—that didn't particularly cause me problems. But what is the issue? What's the problem with views? Some of the views we carry around do cause suffering, and this is an important place to explore our views. But in any case, views of who we are and views of who other people are, these are limiting. It's like we've put ourselves in a box. This is who I am. This is the kind of thing I do. This is what I'm capable of. This is what that person is capable of. This is who that person is.

When other people do this to us, we don't like it. We chafe at it when somebody else says, "Well, that's just the way you are." We're like, "No, that's not just the way I am. You don't know me." But we do that to ourselves. We put these boxes around ourselves. We live in these views ourselves, often without even recognizing it.

So these views are not necessarily all leading to suffering, but we need to at least be aware that we are carrying these views around. There's a saying in one of my favorite suttas, in the Sutta Nipata in the chapter of the eights: "Those attached to views roam the world offending people." This attachment to views—the Buddha actually points to this as being a source of conflict in our culture.

So anytime we are suffering, there is some kind of view operating. This is an important thing to recognize.

A common view that leads to suffering is something like, "It's not supposed to be like this." And underlying that is often a belief or a meaning. There's the view—"it's not supposed to be like this"—and underlying that is some kind of meaning. Perhaps something along the lines of: "If it's like this, it means I'm a failure. If it's like this, it means I'm not lovable. If it's like this, it means I didn't try hard enough. If it's like this, it means I'm not as good as someone else." A variety of meanings can be attached to that.

So it can be very interesting to start exploring: what do I believe when I'm suffering? There's some kind of suffering happening—what's the belief that's operating? The meaning that's associated with the belief is often a place where we identify, something we're holding on to. We even hold on to things like "I'm a failure." We identify with that. We have habits of identifying with even these negative views, these negative meanings.

As you explore this and start to recognize the belief, you might also notice how much belief is happening around a particular thought. For example, an example from my own exploration: I had a pretty strong pattern of self-hatred, and there was a lot of meaning attached to that—"I'm a failure, I'm no good, I'm not lovable," some of those things I just mentioned. The way it often popped into my mind was simply the words: "You're no good."

As I began to explore this, I saw that there was a process of belief that began to solidify that thought into place. There's the thought—"you're no good"—and then there's a process of believing that thought. They're actually separate things, as I discovered.

I had a recognition at one point, a clear recognition, that these thoughts around self-hatred were just thoughts. There was nothing more to them. They were just phenomena created in the mind. And somehow that insight deeply undercut the belief pattern in those thoughts. At this point, I still will from time to time see these thoughts arise—"You're no good. You're a failure"—but there is not belief in those thoughts.

You can explore this kind of view for yourself. There's a thought that comes up, and there's the belief in that thought. You can ask: how much do I believe this? How much do I actually believe this? At times, if you catch a thought arising early enough, the belief process may not have taken hold so tightly, and you may recognize, "Oh, this is just a thought. I actually don't believe this so much right now."

So there's the common view of "it's not supposed to be like this" that can lead to suffering. And equally, a view that leads to suffering—at least in my exploration—is "it is supposed to be like this." This is right. This is the way it's supposed to be. When I first started exploring my suffering around views...

Along these lines, I found the suffering really congealed—I mean, the experience of suffering really congealed—around the "it's not supposed to be like this." I'm a failure. I'm no good at this. I'm bad. I can't succeed. I really felt the suffering in that side of it, so it was clear that there was suffering there.

The view around that is that it's not supposed to be like this, and because it is like this, I'm a failure. That's the belief underneath it. So there was suffering there. I could see this pattern of belief, and I began looking at that pattern of suffering and beliefs and meaning associated with it.

At some point I began to see that there was another side to the story. That was the side when things were going well, and I told myself, "This is the way it's supposed to be. I can do this. I'm good at this. In fact, I may be better than anybody else at this." That created a kind of flip-side identity that I believed was the way it was supposed to be. So again, the belief was operating—the view that this is the way it's supposed to be.

That didn't particularly feel like suffering in the moment of it happening. It actually felt good. It's like, "Yeah, this feels good. This is the way it's supposed to be." But what I began to recognize is that feeling of "this is the way it's supposed to be" was a setup. It was setting myself to a standard that if I've attained this, I have to keep this. It has to always be like this. And when it can't always be like this—because things are impermanent, they change, things fall apart—then I crashed into the failure side of things.

Actually, in this exploration, I saw it was equally, if not more important, to recognize those times when I felt, "Oh, this is the way it's supposed to be. This is good. This is right." To recognize when I was praising myself, when I was feeling like this is it. To acknowledge that. To acknowledge that as a view, as a belief, not as reality, not as this is how it has to be. And when I began acknowledging that side of it, it really evened out the whole pattern.

We often can't just decide to stop believing something. We can't decide to stop reacting to things. We can't stop our views. We can't decide, "I'm not going to have this view anymore." But we can begin to become conscious of our views. We can begin to recognize the beliefs that are operating.

Having a curiosity about what these views are—when we're suffering, beginning to explore: What do I think needs to happen? What do I think needs to stop happening? What beliefs are functioning here? Begin to become conscious of your views. That's the first step in maybe not letting go of views entirely, but at least recognizing when we have these filters on, recognizing when we are operating out of a perspective so that it's not blind acting out of a view, but consciously recognizing, "Oh, here's a view that's happening right now."

Certain views are skillful to act on in a moment. Other views we may begin to recognize—wow, this one is not so skillful. Maybe I shouldn't act on this one.

So that's another way that we add to our experience, this adding, seeing things through views. Again, when we're experiencing things through views, we're not seeing things as they are.

A subtler way of adding to our experience is the process of recognizing things, of perceiving things, of working with concepts. This is a very normal way that our mind works. I look out at this room and I see men and women and I see green zabutans and I see walls and I see lights. I see

But all of those things are concepts. It happens very quickly in our minds, these concepts, and we tend to relate to our experience through concept rather than through our direct meeting of experience.

A simple example of this: put your attention in your hand right now. Just feel the experience that is your hand right now. You might feel vibration, pulsing, tingling, heat or coolness, pressure. Just the feeling, just the experience there. And now look at your hand and think about it as a hand. When I do that, at least, there's a shift of the experience. I lose touch with some of that experience that I was just exploring with you.

Hand is a concept. The direct experience is not hand. The direct experience is vibration, pulsing, tingling, pressure, coolness, heat. But when we relate to it as a hand, there's a little bit of a distance that happens from the actual experience. This kind of thing happens to us a lot—we relate to our experience through a layer of concept.

Now, that's not necessarily a problem. It's actually a really good shortcut for us. If I had to walk in here and from form and color actually figure out every time I walked into a room, "Oh, those are people, and that's the floor, and that's the wall," it would take forever to navigate our world. So concepts are really useful. They're a really useful shortcut.

But the way we add around concepts is that we believe we are experiencing the real thing. We believe that when we are experiencing things through concept, we're experiencing reality. That is the way we're adding around concepts.

We can start to really see how this works, and the problems that it can introduce for us, when perception—this process of creating concepts—makes a mistake. Because this process of perception is very prone to making mistakes. It does a pretty good job. It's a pretty good pattern-matching algorithm in there that figures out what is happening out there, based on my history. It's kind of like a memory lookup thing. I look out there, and I've seen walls before, so that becomes identified as a wall, and I relate to it as the concept of a wall. But perception can make mistakes.

An example of this: I was in Burma, practicing in a monastery that was close to a village right next door. My room was right next to the monastery wall. Sounds of the village came over the wall—the loudspeakers, the sounds of people doing their things. Every evening I was meditating in my room, and every evening at about dusk, I began hearing a squealing sound. To me, the mind heard that sound and identified it as pig. A squealing pig—this is what I identified.

And then the mind went a little further than that, to create the idea that this sound of squealing had a distress to it. So my mind constructed this idea—and I knew this was a construction, I knew this part was a construction—that what I was hearing was a pig being butchered. That this was the regular every-evening butcher shop just across the wall there, and I was hearing that happen. So there was compassion that was born in my heart for this pig. It happened every night, and so I got to practice with this every evening.

And then one evening, instead of sitting in my room at that hour of the day, I decided to take a walk. I was doing walking meditation, walking up and down at the monastery, and there were bats flying. They fly kind of close, so it's a little startling. And the bats were squealing. I recognized in that moment that the squealing sound I had been hearing, that I had identified as pigs being murdered, were simply bats.

I mean, perception had clearly made a mistake here. It wasn't any kind of willful mistake—it was simply that I had never heard bats squealing before. The sound of squealing, in my experience, matched to pig. So perception made that mistake, and from that created this whole construct, this whole idea.

In that case, it became clear to me that my reaction of compassion—the whole thing just went poof. The compassion vanished because there was no need for compassion. What are we actually reacting to? Much of the time, what we are reacting to is a concept. It's not what's actually happening. That's something very interesting to explore.

And then the most insidious concept that we live with is the concept of self. Actually, all of the other ways that we add to our experience are born out of this very fundamental concept—a misperception, actually. I don't have time to explore all of that notion of self except to say that we can begin to understand how that concept of self is created by exploring all of these other ways that we add. If we explore our reactivity, we begin to understand something about a sense of self involved in that reactivity. We explore our views, our opinions, our beliefs—we begin to understand something about the sense of self that holds that view, that opinion, that belief. From time to time in this exploration, we may see a moment of views falling away. We may see a moment of a sense of self falling away. And then we get an understanding of how that is simply a concept. It's not something that's actually there. It's a very useful concept, actually, and it's not necessarily a problem that we function with that concept. The problem is that we believe that concept to be reality.

I'd like to come back to the words of the Buddha here at the end of my talk. This text I'm going to read is another really famous one you've probably heard, and to me it really expresses this notion of coming to meet things as they are—just what's actually happening in the moment without the filter of views, opinions, beliefs, ideas. Again, we can't just go right there. The way to explore this is to see our reactivity, explore our reactivity, explore our views, our opinions, our beliefs. That helps us to begin to let go of them.

This text is from the Bāhiya Sutta. The Buddha was approached by this renunciate, Bāhiya, who came many, many miles to ask the Buddha for his teachings. He had been a renunciate for many years but just hadn't quite heard the teachings of the Buddha. He came to the Buddha and said, "Please give me your teachings in brief." He had to ask three times because the Buddha was getting ready to go on alms round, but after the third time, this is what the Buddha said:

"Bāhiya, you should train yourself thus: In reference to the seen, there will be only the seen. In reference to the heard, only the heard. In reference to the sensed, only the sensed. In reference to the cognized, only the cognized. That is how you should train yourself. When for you there will be only the seen in reference to the seen, only the heard in reference to the heard, only the sensed in reference to the sensed, only the cognized in reference to the cognized, then, Bāhiya, there is no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This is the end of suffering."

I love this exploration. He offers a training: in reference to the seen is only the seen. This is the training. We practice exploring what it means to see things. We notice our reactivity. We notice our views, our beliefs around seeing. We notice our views, opinions, beliefs around our thoughts. We notice our views, our opinions, our beliefs around what's heard, sensed, cognized. In the seen is only the seen.

We can't arrive there immediately. But that's the training. The Buddha calls it a training.

And what I appreciate about this sutta is that he then points out the benefits of this training. As we begin to meet experience in this way, as it actually is, we see clearly for ourselves: there is no "you" in terms of that. No you there.

This exploration of the falling away of identity view, that concept of self, comes quite naturally as we begin to simply meet things as they are. It's not something we have to force—"Oh, I have to get rid of myself. I have to figure out how to not feel this sense of self." The Buddha points to just seeing things as they actually are, and this begins to reveal the truth to us. And this is the end of stress, the end of suffering.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 208

Where Rubber Meets the Road: A Series on Mindful Living

Andrea Fella · 38 min

In this opening talk of a series on mindful living, Shila Catherine examines how relationships serve as the crucial arena where our meditation practice is truly tested. Rather than adding "right relationship" as a separate path factor, she argues that working skillfully with relationships requires embracing the foundational practices of sīla (precepts), mettā (loving-kindness), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom).

Drawing from multiple suttas in the Saṃyutta Nikāya and Aṅguttara Nikāya, Catherine highlights the Buddha's teaching that admirable friendship constitutes "the whole of the holy life" rather than merely half of it. She explores the qualities that define a true spiritual friend—one who gives what is difficult to give, keeps confidences, and doesn't abandon us in misfortune. The talk also addresses how relationships inevitably trigger the process of "selfing," creating opportunities to recognize and unravel the self-concepts that sustain suffering.

Catherine weaves together teachings on harmony, the criteria for choosing skillful associations, and the importance of balancing solitary retreat practice with engaged community life. She invites practitioners to examine their relationship to saṅgha, the practice of dāna (generosity), and how mindfulness in daily interactions reveals the subtle dynamics of craving and attachment. Ultimately, she points toward how penetrating the illusion of self and other can reveal the boundless freedom of mettā—the immeasurable deliverance of mind through loving-kindness.

Well, I'm going to begin this speaker series on where the rubber meets the road with a talk on roles and relationships. Although we might hear jokes that if the Buddha was teaching today, he might have taught a ninefold path with right relationship added, I would disagree. I believe it's better to deal with relationship dynamics by embracing the basics of the practice: precepts, metta, calmness, wisdom, and mindfulness. I prefer this approach to emphasizing relationship as a separate path factor. Buddhist teachers, communities, and authors may too easily project their social and ideological beliefs into what the Buddha taught, distorting the liberating potential of the teachings.

Relationships are very often the means for building up a sense of being someone, of selfing. I am me in relationship to you. I am a teacher because you're a student. I'm a daughter when I'm in relationship with my mother. I can only be an employee if an employer employs me. Working mindfully with relationships will not only reveal our personal psychological patterns and help us be better people in the world, but an in-depth examination of what happens when we relate with other people will inevitably reveal and unravel the self-concepts that feed and sometimes fester in relationships.

It is essential to bring mindfulness and wisdom into our interactive lives. This is the arena that quickly triggers defilements. Unexamined relationships can feed those defilements and sustain the very patterns that promote suffering. Relationships may be the place where the rubber meets the road in our practice because it's in relationships that the quality of our attention, our mindfulness, and our virtue is often tested.

We see this all the time in the integration process at the end of retreats. We establish such lovely samadhi where the mind has no hindrances. It's a beautiful mind. There's patience, self-compassion, concentration—lovely qualities, all the good stuff that we want. We might be having a fantastic retreat, and then silence breaks on the last day. In the interactions as we begin to speak with people, sometimes we realize that we're not quite as enlightened as we had thought we were in the silence.

This is not a bad thing, and it's not a criticism of retreats. If anything, it tells us how powerful it is to have the periodic retreat experience, a kind of respite from the defilements that are fueled in unhealthy relationships. It creates a space in our lives where we can periodically step outside of the self-concepts that sustain our worlds and our worldly duties. It's incredibly important to learn how to be comfortable alone, at ease in silence, and learn to work with our own minds without the constant influence of the desires, expectations, and judgments of others.

A full insight practice will include working in the deep, silent experience of retreat and also working to bring mindfulness, focus, and attention into the dynamic interrelationships of our lives. This is one of the wonderful ways that we practice as lay people. We might commit time every year to go deep in silent retreats, and then we work between the retreats in a more active engagement with people, with things, with duties, with work. We integrate the purity that we experienced in the silence with the complexity of our daily lives. We use interactions to reveal our personal patterns, and we also periodically go deeper than those personal patterns to recognize the impersonal and liberating truths of the Dhamma.

I think a deep and liberating practice must include both components: some degree of solitude and some degree of community and interaction, silence and relationship. For some people, it's easy to be equanimous when we're alone, but relationships and the complexities of daily life might test our equanimity. In moments of family tragedy, are you sunk in grief and despair? Obsessed with fear? Or can you respond with sensitivity, compassion, and wisdom to the inevitable losses in life? Is your understanding of impermanence deep enough that the mind is undisturbed in the face of death?

I don't believe that there can be a right relationship or a Buddhist code of relating beyond the basic practices of virtue, mental development, and wisdom. We can maintain precepts. We can cultivate meditation. We can live wisely together as parent and child, as sister and brother, as friend and friend, colleague and colleague, as teacher and student, and as married couples.

There's a sweet little story of four old men who approach a house in a monsoon rain. The farmer invites them into the house for shelter, but they first ask the farmer to choose one of them because they will only enter the house if he chooses the one that they would follow. If the farmer chooses the wrong man, then only that man will enter and the other three will stay out in the rain. What are these four men? It's said one is named Wealth, the other is named Success, the next is named Peace, and the fourth is named Harmony. Now the father wants to invite Wealth in—he works really hard to support the family. The mother, though, wants to invite Success in, and the parents start to fight.

After listening to the argument, the daughter says that she wants peace and would like to invite Peace in. Now all three are arguing. And the son says all he ever wanted is harmony. Finally, they all agree to invite Harmony in, and all four men find shelter in their home—because wealth, success, and peace are said to follow in the footsteps of harmony.

Harmony develops not through power or conformity alone. When we stop thinking primarily about ourselves and become willing to deeply consider the needs of others, we begin to find a harmonious relationship to life. This should not go to the extreme of sacrificing ourselves for the benefit of others. There is a balance between self-sacrifice and selfishness, which might be found simply by including the community in our thoughts of what is best.

Sometimes we disrupt harmony with blaming and fault-finding tendencies. How critical are we of others? How demanding are we? How easily do we offer a helping hand, get involved, or assist other people in their needs? How strictly do we define what we will help with or get involved with?

There is a lovely description of a group of monks who lived very harmoniously together. One of them described their practice by saying: "Whichever of us returns from the village with alms food prepares the seats, sets out the water for drinking and for washing, and puts the refuse bucket in its place. Whichever of us returns last eats any food left over, if he wishes. Otherwise, he throws it away where there is no greenery or drops it into water where there is no life. He puts away the seats and the water for drinking and for washing. He puts away the refuse bucket after washing it and sweeps out the refectory. Whoever notices that the pots of water for drinking, washing, or the latrine are low or empty takes care of them. If they are too heavy for him, he calls someone else with a signal of the hand, and they move it by joining hands. Because of this, we do not break out into speech. But every five days, we sit together all night discussing the Dhamma. That is how we abide—diligent, ardent, and resolute."

These monks were renowned not only for living in harmony but for profoundly supporting the development of each other's practice. They remain an excellent example of how to be a good friend, a good partner.

When we live in harmony with others, we do not need to be overly identified with job descriptions and roles or with the relationships those roles define. We might fluidly contribute to the smooth functioning of any communal situation without needing to make a lot of self-statements. I quite appreciate it at Insight Meditation South Bay when people just help clean up this room without necessarily needing to be asked or reminded, without having to organize every single task into formal volunteer assignments.

After coming for several weeks, you'll notice that when the talk ends, the tables get rolled back out, chairs get put around the tables, and the stack of chairs outside the room that the AA group stacked for us get brought inside and hung up on the rack. We go through this procedure at the end of every session. It's lovely to see that this task is just done by everybody. Usually a bunch of people pitch in to help, and when many people contribute, the task gets done quickly and easily. It feels light and not burdensome.

There's an interesting discourse in the Saṃyutta Nikāya where the Buddha's attendant, Venerable Ānanda, said to him, "This is half of the holy life, Lord—admirable friendship, admirable companionship, admirable camaraderie." And the Buddha replied, "Don't say that, Ānanda, don't say that. Admirable friendship, admirable companionship, admirable camaraderie is actually the whole of the holy life. When a monk has admirable people as friends, companions, and comrades, he can be expected to develop and pursue the Noble Eightfold Path."

So what makes someone an admirable friend, a good friend? How do your friends, family, and associates influence you? And how do you influence them? Do your friendships encourage the best in you? Do they support your development of wholesome states?

Also in the Saṃyutta Nikāya: "Bhikkhus, this is the forerunner and precursor of the rising of the sun—that is, the dawn. So too, bhikkhus, for a bhikkhu, this is the forerunner and precursor for the arising of the Noble Eightfold Path—that is, good friendship. When a bhikkhu has a good friend, it is expected that he will develop and cultivate this Noble Eightfold Path."

A wise choice of friends and associates is essential for our development and success in life. In the Itivuttaka it says: "The follower and the followed, one who contacts and one contacted, are like an arrow coated with poison that contaminates its quiver. Fearing contamination, the wise person should not have evil friends. A man who ties up putrid fish with the blades of kusa grass makes the kusa grass smell putrid. So it is with those who follow fools. But a man who wraps tagara powder in the broad leaf of a tree makes the leaf smell fragrant. So it is with those who follow sages."

The destructive influences of bad associations can spread like contagion, putting ourselves and our friends in harm's way, creating conditions that can lead to danger and suffering. The Buddha indicated that it would be better to walk alone like a rhinoceros with only a single horn than to associate with unskillful friends.

Sometimes we might think that friends are just the people we scarf down popcorn with at the movies, or the people we confide our personal problems to, or the people who happen to frequent the same gym. But true friendships are the field for developing and expressing the beautiful qualities of virtue, concentration, and wisdom. Most of the five precepts explicitly involve our associations with other people.

To kill, to steal, to engage in sexual misconduct, to lie—these are obviously hurtful ways to relate to people. When we practice the precepts of not killing, not stealing, not engaging in sexual misconduct, refraining from lying, and also refraining from intoxication, we are integrating wisdom and compassion into our daily interactions.

And so in this practice, we consider not only what we do when we meditate with our eyes closed, but we consider how we choose our friends. Do we choose friends just because they share our taste in movies, or they share our hobbies, or they flatter us? Or they have pleasing personalities? Or they offer professional advantages?

The Buddha recommended in the Anguttara Nikaya: "A friend should be followed when he possesses seven factors. What seven? He gives what is difficult to give. He does what is difficult to do. He patiently endures what is difficult to endure. He reveals his own secrets. He keeps one's secrets. He does not abandon one in misfortune. He does not despise one because of one's loss. A friend should be followed when he possesses these seven factors."

Is this your criteria? You can consider what sort of friends you follow today. What kind of blogs do you read? What kind of groups do you seek to join? Perhaps it would be worth seeking friendships and associations that strengthen our virtue, our meditative development, and our understanding of reality. It matters less perhaps if they share our clothing style, our taste in music, or our political views.

As important as friendship is for spiritual growth, though, it's not easy to actually know the inner qualities of others—at least not for sure. In the Anguttara Nikaya, the Buddha said: "By living with the person, his virtue can be known. And this too, only after a long time. Not casually, by close attention. Not without attention. By one who is wise, not by one who is stupid. It is by having dealings with the person that his integrity can be known. And this too, only after a long time." And it continues: "In misfortune, a person's fortitude can be known. And this too, only after a long time. By conversation a person's wisdom can be known, and this too only after a long time. Not casually, by close attention. Not without attention. By one who is wise, not by one who is stupid."

Now what about intimate relationships, sexual relationships? Perhaps few topics elicit as much suffering and confusion, anxiety, fear, and obsession as the topic of love, of sex, and intimate relations. People suffer when they are in relationships. They suffer when they are not in relationships. They suffer when they want to be in relationships. They suffer when they want to get out of relationships.

Buddhist teachings are not as prescriptive regarding intimate relationships as many other religions seem to be. The Buddha did not idealize the institution of marriage. He did not link women's value to their role as a child bearer. He did not stigmatize divorce. He did not condemn homosexuality, prostitution, polygamy, or monogamy.

But in his time, gender oppression was pervasive. He lived in a culture that had slavery, where women's rights and freedoms were extremely limited, and their very identities were defined in large part by their relationship to male members of the family. Customarily, women's status at that time depended upon being a daughter, a mother, a daughter-in-law, or a wife. Sexual misconduct is usually described as men having sex with women who are under the protection of other men—that is, as their wife, their daughter, or their slave. And that's why the precept of sexual misconduct today is usually interpreted as prohibiting adultery.

But today, with greater freedoms, more diverse economic opportunities, less gender inequality, and a broader acceptance of a variety of love relationships, we must contemplate what sexual misconduct implies for us. Perhaps it might mean a forced relationship. Perhaps it might mean coercion. Or perhaps simply love and respect become the most critical factors for developing harmonious, intimate relationships.

These qualities, though, are difficult to define. Love can easily be distorted and confused with lust, power, or personal desire. When teaching love as a spiritual quality, one of my Dhamma teachers made the point when he said, "Love needs to be liberated from all that is wrapped around it." When love is liberated from the constraints of personal desire and the deluding view that separates self from other, it might be possible to experience an all-embracing love in which we are truly intimate with all of life.

Poonjaji said, "If I love some people and not others, then my love is divided. And love that is divided is not love."

Perhaps because the Buddha primarily taught a monastic community. Perhaps because in ancient times marriages served primarily to establish economic agreements between families rather than expressions of intimate love. Or perhaps because sensual desire and self-interest, which are involved in most relationships, are considered great obstructions to awakening. Whatever the reason, we find very few teachings on relational love beyond the basics of virtuous conduct and the cultivation of loving-kindness and compassion.

In fact, I think it's in some way stretching the Buddha's teaching even to give a talk on relationships beyond the basics of abandoning unwholesome states of lust, hatred, and self-delusion, and cultivating wholesome states of compassion, friendliness, and equanimity. But when we look at monastic communities, we find that relationships certainly characterize these communities. It's harmony that is emphasized more than close, personal, individual relationships.

None of us here are monastics. But still, spiritual community is important. And so we might ask: What is our relationship to spiritual community? What is our relationship to sangha? Do you consider yourself a member of Insight Meditation South Bay? If yes, why? If no, why not? Is this a relationship that you're actively cultivating? Is it a relationship that you value? Or are you just attending Insight Meditation South Bay as you would any evening class, perhaps the way you might come to learn a professional skill?

For insight meditation communities to thrive, we must consider how we relate to the community, what we give to support it, and what we put into its development. Clearly, we have not formed IMSB as an educational group. We're not here simply offering lectures on spiritual topics. If we were, there would be a ticket price at the door. You'd all pay forty dollars to enter, and when you came to a daylong, you would register online and pay your one hundred fifty dollars.

In giving the dana reminder, we're pretty careful to never say that our programs are free. We offer them instead on a dana basis, a donation basis. The teachings may be offered freely, but every event includes a structured opportunity to practice generosity. I'd hate to think that people come here because it's just a cheap activity for a Tuesday night. Once you connect with the dana system and respect the practices that we teach here, I really hope that everyone, without exception, will embrace the practice of generosity and participate in building a relationship with the sangha by supporting it. Dana practice is part of our relationship here. Dana practice is every bit as important to what we do and what we teach here as mindfulness, attention skills, and insight practices.

In the Samyutta Nikaya it says, "By giving one unites friends." Sangha relationships develop by supporting each other. Primarily we are supporting each other's spiritual growth. And that growth happens in the context of complex life relationships.

Community is not a static thing. It's not an object. It's us. We are creating the community by the ways that we interact with each other. Through our communities, we determine how the Dhamma will take root in the West.

How do we discuss the Dhamma? How do we challenge each other? How do we disagree with each other? What qualities do we nurture in each other? How do we help each other when we're sick, when we're getting old, when we're confused? How do we work together to plan events, to sustain our activities? How do we communicate with each other? How do we resolve conflicts when they arise? How do we treat newcomers who walk through our doors? Have we established any internal cliques or social hierarchies that we really should question? Do we swoon over wealthy members or those with social influence? Do we value the intelligence of both the young and the old? Are there any prejudices that blind us to each other's needs? What do we expect from each other—from our leaders, from our teachers, from our volunteers, from our members? What roles do we take?

The roles that we step into are important. But they don't need to be fixed. They don't need to become a source of self-grasping. Social roles can be fluid.

They can be ever-changing. Like in ballroom dance, leaders and followers are equally important, and both must be skillful in their execution of the role. Partner dance is a continuous act of communication. If we don't respect the dialogue of the lead and the follow, we are going to trip each other. All teamwork requires a dynamic engagement in respectful communication and a responsible performance of our roles. This inevitably will require letting go of attachments—attachments to position, opinions, and self-interests.

Roles are embedded in most human communications. So we can perform our roles, but with mindfulness, with integrity, with wisdom. We can use our social interactions to examine the mind, to uproot conceit and self-centered perspectives, cultivating the beautiful qualities of compassion, of love, of equanimity.

The Buddha taught liberation through not clinging. And there are endless opportunities to discover the moments of contraction, clinging, and selfing when we are engaged in relationships. There are endless opportunities to purify the mind in the dynamic of human interactions.

Just notice when and why you suffer. Perhaps you were expecting something from someone and didn't get it. Perhaps we're expecting somebody to satisfy our needs, our wants, our hopes. Perhaps we're expecting someone to make us happy. Of course, when we think about it, we'll remember—ah, yes, craving. That's the cause of suffering. Self-interest—ah, that's the primary delusion. We'll have enough wisdom to fall back on what we know to be true. Craving causes suffering. We know that. Everything is impermanent, and yet we still try to hold on.

Sometimes, though, when we interact with other people, we forget all the great Dhamma lessons that are so clear when we're meditating. And we might just find ourselves again and again trying to assert our interests and satisfy our personal desires. So relationships then become great vehicles for our practice.

People change. People will disappoint us—maybe not one hundred percent of the time, but often enough. Often enough to learn. People don't comply with our fantasies of them. There's often a dissonance between what we hoped for and what's actually happening in a relationship. When this happens, we have a chance to see what's going on, not just in the relationship, but we have a chance to see what's going on in the subtle dynamics of how we are relating to life.

Even our most faithful and satisfying relationships are going to change, simply because all conditioned things change. All conditioned things are impermanent. Everyone that is born will age, get sick, and die. We all will be separated from those we love. And yet we still love, and we grow, and we learn to let go right in the midst of that dynamic relationship.

There is much that we can do to open to human relationships. And more broadly, the Dhamma teachings invite us to consider: what is our relationship to every encounter in life? Being mindful, we are observing not only the meditation object, not only what is impacting our senses. We're examining the quality of the mind that is perceiving our experience. We're essentially mindful of our relationship to life.

And as we're increasingly aware of our relationships, we may find that they don't need to be defined by the divisions of self and other. Penetrating this illusion of self and other, we dissolve all boundaries, revealing an immeasurable freedom that we might call love—the immeasurable deliverance of mind, of loving-kindness, of mettā.

CHAPTER 209

Where Rubber Meets the Road: A Series on Mindful Living

Andrea Fella · 38 min

In this opening talk of a series on mindful living, Shaila Catherine addresses the complex territory where meditation practice meets daily relationships. Rather than advocating for relationship as a separate path factor, she argues that the traditional foundations of sīla (virtue), samādhi (concentration), mettā (loving-kindness), and paññā (wisdom) provide all the tools needed for skillful relating. She illuminates how relationships inevitably trigger defilements and reveal the self-concepts we construct through our identities as parent, child, teacher, student, or partner.

Drawing from multiple suttas in the Saṃyutta Nikāya and Aṅguttara Nikāya, Catherine examines the Buddha's teaching that admirable friendship constitutes "the whole of the holy life" rather than merely half of it. She explores the seven qualities of a true friend, the criteria for knowing another's virtue and wisdom, and the importance of choosing associations that strengthen wholesome states rather than merely sharing superficial interests.

The talk extends to intimate relationships and sexual misconduct, noting how the Buddha's teachings were less prescriptive than many religions, then broadens to examine our relationship to saṅgha and spiritual community. Catherine emphasizes that community is not static but continuously created through our interactions—how we support each other, resolve conflicts, welcome newcomers, and practice generosity through dāna. She concludes by pointing toward the ultimate teaching: as mindfulness reveals our relationship to all of life, the illusion of self and other dissolves, revealing the immeasurable liberation of mettā.

Well, I'm going to begin this speaker series on where the rubber meets the road with a talk on roles and relationships.

Although we might hear jokes that if the Buddha was teaching today, he might have taught a ninefold path with right relationship added, I would disagree. I believe it's better to deal with relationship dynamics by embracing the basics of the practice: precepts, metta, calmness, wisdom, and mindfulness. I prefer this approach to emphasizing relationship as a separate path factor. Buddhist teachers, communities, and authors may too easily project their social and ideological beliefs into what the Buddha taught, distorting the liberating potential of the teachings.

Relationships are very often the means for building up a sense of being someone, of selfing. I am me in relationship to you. I am a teacher because you're a student. I'm a daughter when I'm in relationship with my mother. I can only be an employee if an employer employs me. Working mindfully with relationships will not only reveal personal psychological patterns and help us be better people in the world, but an in-depth examination of what happens when we relate with other people will inevitably reveal and unravel the self-concepts that feed and sometimes fester in relationships.

It is essential to bring mindfulness and wisdom into our interactive lives. This is the arena that quickly triggers defilements. Unexamined relationships can feed those defilements and sustain the very patterns that promote suffering. Relationships may be the place where the rubber meets the road in our practice because it's in relationships that the quality of our attention, our mindfulness, and our virtue is often tested.

We see this all the time in the integration process at the end of retreats. We establish such lovely samadhi where the mind has no hindrances. It's a beautiful mind. There's patience, self-compassion, concentration—lovely qualities, all the good stuff that we want. We might be having a fantastic retreat and then silence breaks on the last day. In the interactions as we begin to speak with people, sometimes we might realize that we're not quite as enlightened as we had thought we were in the silence.

This is not a bad thing, and it's not a criticism of retreats. If anything, it tells us how powerful it is to have the periodic retreat experience, a kind of respite from the defilements that are fueled in unhealthy relationships. It creates a space in our lives where we can periodically step outside of the self-concepts that sustain our worlds and our worldly duties. It's incredibly important to learn how to be comfortable alone, at ease in silence, and to work with our own minds without the constant influence of the desires, expectations, and judgments of others.

A full insight practice will include working in the deep, silent experience of retreat and also working to bring mindfulness and focus and attention into the dynamic interrelationships of our lives. This is one of the wonderful ways that we practice as lay people. We might commit time every year to go deep in silent retreats, and then we work between the retreats in a more active engagement with people, with things, with duties, with work. We integrate the purity that we experienced in the silence with the complexity of our daily lives. We use interactions to reveal our personal patterns, and we also periodically go deeper than those personal patterns to recognize the impersonal and liberating truths of the Dhamma.

I think a deep and liberating practice must include both components: some degree of solitude and some degree of community and interaction, silence and relationship. For some people, it's easy to be equanimous when we're alone, but relationships and the complexities of daily life might test our equanimity. In moments of family tragedy, are you sunk in grief and despair? Obsessed with fear? Or can you respond with sensitivity, compassion, and wisdom to the inevitable losses in life? Is your understanding of impermanence deep enough that the mind is undisturbed in the face of death?

I don't believe that there can be a right relationship or a Buddhist code of relating beyond the basic practices of virtue, mental development, and wisdom. We can maintain precepts. We can cultivate meditation. We can live wisely together as parent and child, as sister and brother, as friend and friend, colleague and colleague, as teacher and student, and as married couples.

There's a sweet little story of four old men who approach a house in a monsoon rain. The farmer invites them into the house for shelter, but they first ask the farmer to choose one of them because they will only enter the house if he chooses the one that he would follow. If the farmer chooses the wrong man, then only that man will enter and the other three will stay out in the rain. What are these four men? It's said one is named Wealth, the other is named Success, the next is named Peace, and the fourth is named Harmony.

Now the father wants to invite Wealth in—he works really hard to support the family. The mother, though, wants to invite Success in, and the parents start to fight.

After listening to the argument, the daughter simply says that she wants peace and wishes to invite Peace in. Now all three are arguing. And the son says all he ever wanted is harmony. Finally, they all agree to invite Harmony in, and all four men find shelter in their home—because wealth, success, and peace are said to follow in the footsteps of Harmony.

Harmony develops not through mere conformity alone. When we stop thinking primarily about ourselves and become willing to deeply consider the needs of others, we begin to find a harmonious relationship to life. This should not go to the extreme of sacrificing ourselves for the benefit of others. There's a balance between self-sacrifice and selfishness, which might be found simply by including the community in our thoughts of what is best.

Sometimes we disrupt harmony with blaming and fault-finding tendencies. How critical are we of others? How demanding are we? How easily do you offer a helping hand, get involved, or simply assist other people in their needs? How strictly do you define what you will help with or get involved with?

There's a lovely description of a group of monks who lived very harmoniously together. One of them described their practice by saying, "Whichever of us returns from the village with alms food prepares the seats, sets out the water for drinking and for washing, and puts the refuse bucket in its place. Whichever of us returns last eats any food left over, if he wishes. Otherwise, he throws it away where there is no greenery or drops it into water where there is no life. He puts away the seats and the water for drinking and for washing. He puts away the refuse bucket after washing it and sweeps out the refectory. Whoever notices that the pots of water for drinking, washing, or the latrine are low or empty takes care of them. If they are too heavy for him, he calls someone else with a signal of the hand, and they move it by joining hands. Because of this, we do not break out into speech. But every five days, we sit together all night discussing the Dhamma. That is how we abide—diligent, ardent, and resolute."

These monks were renowned not only for living in harmony but for profoundly supporting the development of each other's practice. They remain an excellent example of how to be a good friend, a good partner.

When we live in harmony with others, we do not need to be overly identified with job descriptions and roles and the relationships those roles define. We might fluidly contribute to the smooth functioning of any communal situation without needing to make a lot of self-statements.

I quite appreciate it at Insight Meditation South Bay when people simply help clean up this room without necessarily needing to be asked or reminded, without having to organize every single task into formal volunteer assignments. After coming for several weeks, you'll notice that when the talk ends, the tables get rolled back out, chairs get put around the tables, and the stack of chairs outside the room that the AA group stacked for us get brought inside and hung up on the rack. We go through this procedure at the end of every session, and it's lovely to see that this task is just done by everybody. Usually a bunch of people pitch in to help, and when many people participate, the task gets done quickly and easily. It feels light, not burdensome.

There's an interesting discourse in the Saṃyutta Nikāya where the Buddha's attendant, Venerable Ānanda, said to him, "This is half of the holy life, Lord—admirable friendship, admirable companionship, admirable camaraderie." And the Buddha replied, "Don't say that, Ānanda, don't say that. Admirable friendship, admirable companionship, admirable camaraderie is actually the whole of the holy life. When a monk has admirable people as friends, companions, and comrades, he can be expected to develop and pursue the Noble Eightfold Path."

So what makes someone an admirable friend, a good friend? How do your friends, family, and associates influence you? And how do you influence them? Do your friendships encourage the best in you? Do they support your development of wholesome states?

Also in the Saṃyutta Nikāya: "Bhikkhus, this is the forerunner and precursor of the rising of the sun—that is, the dawn. So too, bhikkhus, for a bhikkhu, this is the forerunner and precursor for the arising of the Noble Eightfold Path—that is, good friendship. When a bhikkhu has a good friend, it is expected that he will develop and cultivate the Noble Eightfold Path."

A wise choice of friends and associates is essential for our development and success in life. In the Itivuttaka it says, "The follower and the followed, one who contacts and one contacted, are like an arrow coated with poison that contaminates its quiver. Fearing contamination, the wise person should not have evil friends. A man who ties up putrid fish with blades of kusa grass makes the kusa grass smell putrid. So it is with those who follow fools. But a man who wraps tagara powder in the broad leaf of a tree makes the leaf smell fragrant. So it is with those who follow sages."

The destructive influences of bad associations can spread like contagion, putting ourselves and our friends in harm's way and creating conditions that lead to danger and suffering. The Buddha indicated that it would be better to walk alone like a rhinoceros with only a single horn than to associate with unskillful friends.

Sometimes we might think that friends are just the people we scarf down popcorn with at the movies, or the people we confide our personal problems to, or the people who happen to go to the same gym. But true friendships are the field for developing and expressing the beautiful qualities of virtue, concentration, and wisdom. Most of the five precepts explicitly involve our associations with other people.

To kill, to steal, to engage in sexual misconduct, to lie—these are obviously hurtful ways to relate to people. When we practice the precepts of not killing, not stealing, not engaging in sexual misconduct, refraining from lying, and also refraining from intoxication, we are integrating wisdom and compassion into our daily interactions.

And so in this practice, we consider not only what we do when we meditate with our eyes closed, but also how we choose our friends. Do we choose friends just because they share our taste in movies, or they share our hobbies, or they flatter us? Or they have pleasing personalities or they offer professional advantages?

The Buddha recommended in the Anguttara Nikaya: a friend should be followed when he possesses seven factors. What seven? He gives what is difficult to give. He does what is difficult to do. He patiently endures what is difficult to endure. He reveals his own secrets. He keeps one's secrets. He does not abandon one in misfortune. He does not despise one because of one's loss. A friend should be followed when he possesses these seven factors.

Is this your criteria? You can consider what sort of friends you follow today. What kind of blogs do you read? What kind of groups do you seek to join? Perhaps it would be worth seeking friendships and associations that strengthen our virtue, our meditative development, and our understanding of reality. It matters less, perhaps, if they share our clothing style, our taste in music, or our political views.

As important as friendship is for spiritual growth, though, it's not easy to actually know the inner qualities of others—at least not for sure. In the Anguttara Nikaya, the Buddha said: by living with the person, his virtue can be known. And this too, only after a long time. Not casually, but by close attention. Not without attention. By one who is wise, not by one who is stupid. It is by having dealings with the person that his integrity can be known. And this too, only after a long time. In misfortune, a person's fortitude can be known. And this too, only after a long time. By conversation a person's wisdom can be known, and this too only after a long time. Not casually, but by close attention. Not without attention. By one who is wise, not by one who is stupid.

Now, what about intimate relationships, sexual relationships? Perhaps few topics elicit as much suffering and confusion, anxiety, fear, and obsession as the topic of love, of sex, and intimate relations. People suffer when they are in relationships. They suffer when they are not in relationships. They suffer when they want to be in relationships. They suffer when they want to get out of relationships.

Buddhist teachings are not as prescriptive regarding intimate relationships as many other religions seem to be. The Buddha did not idealize the institution of marriage. He did not link women's value to their role as child bearers. He did not stigmatize divorce. He did not condemn homosexuality, prostitution, polygamy, or monogamy.

But in his time, gender oppression was pervasive. He lived in a culture that had slavery, where women's rights and freedoms were extremely limited, and their very identities were defined in large part by their relationship to male members of the family. Customarily, women's status at that time depended upon being a daughter, a mother, a daughter-in-law, or a wife. Sexual misconduct was usually described as men having sex with women who were under the protection of other men—that is, as their wife, their daughter, or their slave. And that's why the precept of sexual misconduct today is usually interpreted as prohibiting adultery.

But today, with greater freedoms, more diverse economic opportunities, less gender inequality, and a broader acceptance of a variety of love relationships, we must contemplate what sexual misconduct implies for us. Perhaps it might mean a forced relationship. Perhaps it might mean coercion. Or perhaps simply love and respect become the most critical factors for developing harmonious, intimate relationships.

These qualities, though, are difficult to define. Love can easily be distorted and confused with lust, power, or personal desire. When teaching love as a spiritual quality, one of my Dhamma teachers made the point when he said: love needs to be liberated from all that is wrapped around it. When love is liberated from the constraints of personal desire and the deluding view that separates self from other, it might be possible to experience an all-embracing love in which we are truly intimate with all of life.

Poonjaji said, "If I love some people and not others, then my love is divided. And love that is divided is not love."

Perhaps because the Buddha primarily taught a monastic community. Perhaps because in ancient times marriages served primarily to establish economic agreements between families—not really expressions of intimate love. Or perhaps because sensual desire and self-interest, which are involved in most relationships, are considered great obstructions to awakening. Whatever the reason, we find very few teachings on relational love beyond the basics of virtuous conduct and the cultivation of loving-kindness and compassion.

In fact, I think it's in some way stretching the Buddha's teaching even to give a talk on relationships beyond the basics of abandoning unwholesome states—lust, hatred, and self-delusion—and cultivating wholesome states of compassion, friendliness, and equanimity. But when we look at monastic communities, we find that relationships certainly characterize these communities. It's harmony that is emphasized more than close, personal, individual relationships.

Now, none of us here are monastics. But still, spiritual community is important. And so we might ask: What is our relationship to spiritual community? What is our relationship to Sangha? Do you consider yourself a member of Insight Meditation South Bay? If yes, why? If no, why not? Is this a relationship that you're actively cultivating? Is it a relationship that you value? Or are you just attending Insight Meditation South Bay as you would any evening class, perhaps the way you might come to learn a professional skill?

For insight meditation communities to thrive, we must consider how we relate to the community, what we give to support it, and what we put into its development. Clearly, we have not formed IMSB as an educational group. We're not here simply offering lectures on spiritual topics. If we were, there would be a ticket price at the door—you'd all pay forty dollars to enter, and when you came to a daylong, you would register online and pay your one hundred fifty dollars.

Although many people share in giving the dana reminder, we're pretty careful to never say that our programs are free. We offer them instead on a dana basis, a donation basis. The teachings may be offered freely, but every event includes a structured opportunity to practice generosity. I'd hate to think that people come here because it's just a cheap activity for a Tuesday night. Once you connect with the dana system and respect the practices that we teach here, I really hope that everyone, without exception, will embrace the practice of generosity and participate in building a relationship with the sangha by supporting it. Dana practice is part of our relationship here. Dana practice is every bit as important to what we do and teach here as mindfulness, attention skills, and insight practices.

In the Samyutta Nikaya it says, "By giving, one unites friends." Sangha relationships develop by supporting each other. Primarily we are supporting each other's spiritual growth, and that growth happens in the context of complex life relationships.

Community is not a static thing. It's not an object. It's us. We are creating the community by the ways that we interact with each other. Through our communities, we determine how the Dhamma will take root in the West. How do we discuss the Dhamma? How do we challenge each other? How do we disagree with each other? What qualities do we nurture in each other? How do we help each other when we're sick, when we're getting old, when we're confused? How do we work together to plan events, to sustain our activities? How do we communicate with each other? How do we resolve conflicts when they arise? How do we treat newcomers who walk through our doors?

Have we established any internal cliques or social hierarchies that we really should question? Do we swoon over wealthy members or those with social influence? Do we value the intelligence of both the young and the old? Are there any prejudices that blind us to each other's needs? What do we expect from each other—from our leaders, from our teachers, from our volunteers, from our members? What roles do we take?

The roles that we step into are important. But they don't need to be fixed. They don't need to become a source of self-grasping. Social roles can be fluid.

They can be ever-changing. Like in ballroom dance, leaders and followers are equally important, and both must be skillful in their execution of the role. Partner dance is a continuous act of communication. If we don't respect the dialogue of the lead and the follow, we are going to trip each other.

All teamwork requires a dynamic engagement in respectful communication and a responsible performance of our roles. This inevitably will require letting go of attachments—attachments to position, opinions, and self-interests. Roles are embedded in most human communications, so we can perform our roles, but with mindfulness, with integrity, with wisdom. We can use our social interactions to examine the mind, to uproot conceit and self-centered perspectives, cultivating the beautiful qualities of compassion, of love, of equanimity.

The Buddha taught liberation through not clinging. And there are endless opportunities to discover the moments of contraction, clinging, and selfing when we are engaged in relationships. There are endless opportunities to purify the mind in the dynamic of human interactions.

Just notice when and why you suffer. Perhaps you were expecting something from someone and didn't get it. Perhaps we're expecting somebody to satisfy our needs, our wants, our hopes. Perhaps we're expecting someone to make us happy. Of course, when we think about it, we'll remember—ah, yes, craving. That's the cause of suffering. Self-interest—ah, that's the primary delusion. We'll have enough wisdom to fall back on what we know to be true. Craving causes suffering. We know that. Everything is impermanent, and yet we still try to hold on.

Sometimes, though, when we interact with other people, we forget all the great Dhamma lessons that are so clear when we're meditating. And we might just find ourselves again and again trying to assert our interests and satisfy our personal desires. So relationships then become great vehicles for our practice.

People change. They will disappoint us—maybe not one hundred percent of the time, but often enough. Often enough to learn. People don't comply with our fantasies of them. There's often a dissonance between what we hoped for and what's actually happening in a relationship. When this happens, we have a chance to see what's going on—not just in the relationship, but in the subtle dynamics of how we are relating to life.

Even our most faithful and satisfying relationships are going to change, simply because all conditioned things change. All conditioned things are impermanent. Everyone that is born will age, get sick, and die. We all will be separated from those we love. And yet we still love, and we grow, and we learn to let go right in the midst of that dynamic relationship.

There is much we can do to open to human relationships. And more broadly, the Dhamma teachings invite us to consider: what is our relationship to every encounter in life? Being mindful, we are observing not only the meditation object, not only what is impacting our senses—we're examining the quality of the mind that is perceiving our experience. We're essentially mindful of our relationship to life.

And as we're increasingly aware of our relationships, we may find that they don't need to be defined by the divisions of self and other. Penetrating this illusion of self and other, we dissolve all boundaries, revealing an immeasurable freedom that we might call love—the immeasurable deliverance of mind, of loving-kindness, of mettā.

CHAPTER 210

The Rebellious Path of Freedom from Habits of Mind

Andrea Fella · 43 min

In this engaging talk, Andrea Fella presents meditation practice as a revolutionary act—a conscious rebellion against the mind's deeply ingrained habits of grasping, aversion, and confusion. Drawing from her twenty years of practice, she explores how the simple recognition that "we are not our thoughts, we are not our feelings" can create profound space for liberation. She references the Buddha's emphatic teachings on mindfulness from the Saṃyutta Nikāya and Aṅguttara Nikāya, emphasizing that "all things can be mastered by mindfulness."

Fella introduces the Satipaṭṭhāna practice as both beginning and end point of the path, quoting the Buddha's declaration that this is "the only way for the purification of beings." She offers the practical RAIN technique (Recognize, Accept, Investigate, Non-identify) as a method for working skillfully with difficult mind states. The teaching beautifully weaves together wisdom and compassion, acknowledging her own journey of initially prioritizing insight over mettā before recognizing their essential balance.

The talk includes a powerful teaching from Mahāghosānanda, the Cambodian monk who returned after the Khmer Rouge to teach forgiveness, along with verses from the Dhammapada on how our thoughts shape our world. Fella concludes with the understanding that the Buddha's path was inherently revolutionary—challenging us to rebel against our own unwholesome tendencies while inclining toward openness, loving-kindness, and freedom from dukkha.

This talk was recorded by Insight Meditation South Bay in Mountain View, California. For more talks and information, visit www.imsb.org.

Thank you for having me. I appreciate the invitation. Several months ago, I was asked to provide a dharma topic, which is really my least favorite thing to do because I have no idea what I'm going to talk about or want to talk about several months in advance. So I just said, "Rebelling against the habits of mind," because I feel like that's the essence of this practice. We have so many habits, don't we? So that's the title of the talk. We'll see how it goes. Another version of this topic is "The Liberating Power of Awareness."

I'm going to start with a poem by Kabir:

Hold this mind you carry on your back.
Your actions are like a heavy sack.
Strains enough to break your neck.
So drop that stupid load.
This is the last stop on the road.
Stay.
Be love's guest.

I was reflecting on that as I was giving instructions about just being aware of sound. Every time the clapping happened, it was like an encouragement. I felt encouraged. Just now. Just now.

This mind has a mind of its own, doesn't it? It's often unruly, inappropriate—just thinking what it thinks. I remember when I first realized that it's not my mind. It's just the mind. It's just this mind. Your mind, our mind, minds. And that realization helped me. I just didn't personalize it as much all of a sudden. There was some space.

So this idea of rebelling against the mind, rebelling against the mind's tendencies—I believe this is really the heart of what the Buddha is asking. He's saying, okay, first see that the mind is crazy and out of control. That's the first step. One of my teachers says that's the first insight. So if you were new tonight and you experienced flooding thoughts and images and memories and aversions and smells and all the things, that's just the way things are. But when we can see that, when we have some space between us and it, when we're not caught by it, there can be a real liberation from the chaos of everyday life.

A lot of what comes up in meditation—what the Buddha talked about and what is talked about from the Buddhist perspective—are the hindrances: the things that hinder the natural peace and ease of the mind, its resting place. Yet we have these hindrances, these things that get in the way. I'm sure you know them.

So don't worry. Be easy on yourself about that. Because until the Buddha's enlightenment, he battled with the hindrances. Until the evening of his freedom, he battled with anger, with wanting, with craving, with ill will, with drowsiness, with restlessness or worry, irritation, agitation, doubt and disbelief. These are the flavors of this mind, of this mind-body complex.

So this theme of where the rubber meets the road is really, in my opinion—for tonight or this moment anyway—it's really about how we can both befriend and rebel. We're not rebelling against the mind's tendencies towards these hindrances as an enemy, but more as a friend. So I gave the instruction to recognize where the mind goes, and then with a sense of friendliness or kindness with the mind.

Towards the mind, we're inclining friendliness and kindness right in that moment of being lost. That is where the rubber meets the road. Because you can do that however many hundreds of thousands of times a day. Ten is good.

These hindrances—it's important to reflect on them. I was on a retreat once, long ago, at the beginning of my practice. Robert Hall, who is a well-known veteran dharma teacher and also a psychiatrist, retired now, studied with Fritz Perls—smart guy, I really like him a lot. I just visited him down in Mexico; he has a group in Baja.

So he came out one evening. I had been struggling with the hindrances for several days. The lights were low and it was just him. Sometimes there's a parade of dharma teachers, but it was just him that night. And he said, "So, have you figured it out yet?" Of course, I was like, absolutely not. He said, "Have you figured it out? We're not our thoughts. We're not our feelings."

And that was the essence of his dharma talk. That's pretty much all I heard him say. He might have spoken for another forty-five minutes, but all that I heard was: you're not your thoughts, you're not your feelings.

The moment that sunk in on a deeper level, I was able to see that I don't have to be afflicted by my thoughts and feelings. I don't have to be run by them. And actually, now that I could see that, I could even rebel against the tendencies my thoughts have. At that particular time there were lots of themes of anger, resentment, unworthiness, doubt—tons of doubt that first retreat. So it gave me a little space. I wasn't of my thoughts; I was with them. That was really helpful for me.

Meditation—not only in my view, but in many people's view—is a fierce practice in the way that it reveals the stark reality of our everyday mind. We're constantly muttering and scheming and planning, wondering under our breath. Trying to comfort ourselves, I think. This is a strategy of trying to comfort ourselves.

Our internal life is constantly preoccupied with these voices: I like this, I don't like that. She hurt me. He left me. How can I get that? More of this. No more of that. Just this constant chatter. It's in the background, subtle. Sometimes it's very much in the foreground.

The important thing is that we can see it. This is what this practice gives us. This is what's liberating about it. Because if we can't see it, we're just mindlessly grasping.

Like monkeys swinging from one vine to the next, from one thought, from one want to the next want. I have a long-standing relationship with monkeys—I've traveled through Asia and Southeast Asia, through India. Monkeys are a trip, but they're very focused on what they want and what they don't want. And so often, as I'm sure you've heard, Western dharma teachers talk about this unruliness, or the hindrances, as a kind of monkey mind—the restlessness, the jumping back and forth.

So this is all an attempt to find pleasure and comfort, and possibly avoid discomfort or unpleasant thoughts or feelings, even situations. Vipassana takes this untrained everyday mind as a natural starting point. That's the first thing to understand. Whether you're a beginning meditator tonight or someone who has been doing this for ten years, this is the natural starting point.

And you know, the wonderful thing about practice is that it's just that—practice. There's that saying from the Dalai Lama. I heard it a long time ago, but I've been reflecting on it recently. A student asked, "How long will it take before I really notice some progress in my practice?" And the Dalai Lama—I'm paraphrasing obviously—said something like, "It's a good idea to evaluate your practice every ten years." Not to focus on where you are in your practice, how free you are, after you've been doing it a year or two years or even five years. Ten years.

That was really helpful for me when it first sunk in. I heard it a few times before I really let it sink in. And it was helpful because I stopped evaluating my practice. I started just being the practice, doing the practice, exploring the practice, instead of evaluating it. Where am I? Because that's the way our Western minds often think. And it's not just Western, but it's definitely in our culture, in our ethos—this "get more now, fast, quick." You can look on the internet for "enlightenment now, five easy steps" for ninety-nine dollars. "Learn to be a meditation teacher in five weeks." It's just the way we are. It's important to recognize that. It's just the tendency. The Buddha called it greed. Wanting. Desire—unwholesome desire, unskillful desire. Grasping, really. Craving.

So Vipassana takes this untrained everyday mind as a natural starting point and gives a clear and systematic way of developing awareness of this process. That's helpful.

So it's been twenty years now that I've been practicing. And just recently, I was in meditation, and it actually happened a few times—a few periods, a few days, a few weeks—of just checking in: What's going on in here? The Dalai Lama said I could do it. I waited, actually, an extra ten years because I'm particularly stubborn in my mind.

And you know what I've come to recognize? I'm less angry. I'm less quick to judgment. I have a lot less suffering in my life. Not that there isn't difficulty, and there hasn't been difficulty, but I have less attachment to the difficulty. And so I see it arising and passing away sooner—days and weeks instead of months and years. I feel much more connected to my heart, to this emotional self that I, in a lot of ways, for a lot of years, as a survival mechanism, denied.

One of the topics I was thinking of focusing on is kind awareness, or mettā, loving-kindness. It's super important. It's really helpful to focus on seeing the mind and seeing the habits of mind. And equally as important to focus on compassion and loving-kindness and the cultivation of that. I denied that for a long time. I was like, "I just want wisdom. I want the wisdom to see clearly. I want to get enlightened." There was a craving around that, although I had no idea what enlightenment meant. I thought it meant I could levitate or something, read people's minds—some kind of cool power.

But what I've come to find is that the balance of both wisdom and compassion is exactly what the Buddha taught. And it is liberating. Even the awareness, the liberation, the liberating power of awareness that is found through metta or through karuna—loving kindness or what I like to think about as unconditional positive regard. I think of metta that way because "loving kindness" is just a little too woo-woo for me, although I'm more open to it now than I was. I'm not going to talk a whole lot about that, but just to name it—I feel like that's super important. And for a long time in my practice, as I said, I denied it.

This bare awareness or attention is defined by Mark Epstein, who wrote several books. He's a psychotherapist and psychiatrist, and also a Dharma practitioner and teacher across multiple traditions. He described bare awareness as "a clear and single-minded awareness of what actually happens to us and in us in successive moments of perception." What is happening within me and around me in every given moment?

The challenge I have for you—and I think the Buddha gave this same challenge—is how often can you check into that throughout the day? What's happening within me and around me? Not evaluating, not fixing, not problem solving, not judging. Just awareness. What's happening here, just now, just this breath? That's my challenge for you.

Bare awareness takes the unexamined mind and opens it up—not by trying to change anything, but by observing the mind, our emotions, and the body just the way they are. Just the way they are.

The Buddha spoke of the power of mindfulness, sati, in a very emphatic way several times throughout the suttas. I have just a couple here. "Mindfulness, I declare, is all helpful," said the Buddha in the Samyutta Nikaya. "All things can be mastered by mindfulness," from the Anguttara Nikaya.

The third Zen patriarch had this to say, and it stuck out to me. I heard it in a teaching first and then later studied the text directly: "Stop thinking and talking and there's nothing you cannot know." This was really helpful. I think it's helpful for us with this kind of intellectualizing that we may tend to do, especially in the Dharma.

One of the things I'm really grateful for is that when I learned to meditate, I knew nothing about Buddhism. I knew that in a Chinese restaurant there's the happy Buddha—put a little quarter on his belly, maybe you get good fortune or something. That's really all I knew about the Buddha. And somewhere in Asia, I don't even know where. But I just learned to practice. I'm really grateful for that, because the practice became experiential. Then later, as I started taking philosophy classes—I started meditating when I was about sixteen.

So this teaching, "Stop thinking and talking and there's nothing you can't know"—it points to the practice. The rubber meets the road. Doing it, which we're doing. My friend Noah Levine talks about how there's the spiritual revolutionary, the one percent of our population that actually does the practice, that actually meditates. He calls it the spiritual one-percenters.

So how might we work with this in our day-to-day life—this present-time awareness, this mindfulness, this seeing things as they really are? Love and loss. People die. People leave. How do we go on?

As I work with others—one of the things that I do is I'm a psychotherapist and a Dharma teacher and consultant and educator—I come into contact with those who are in denial of the reality of change, in denial of anicca, impermanence. That which arises, passes away. And in turn, they cause much suffering for themselves.

I'm not saying don't feel pain, or that you're not going to have pain and loss. The Buddha never claimed that. But he made a very clear differentiation between pain and suffering. Suffering being when we cling or crave for things to be other than they are. There's the story of the two darts, the arrow of life.

Pain. The First Noble Truth talks all about it, all the ways. Not getting what we want. Or getting what we don't want—that's a particular kind of pain. And then suffering being when we push it away or grasp. This is another way of thinking about the relationship between pain and suffering.

There's a story I heard some years ago, a Zen story. There was this Zen priest who was the abbot of a monastery, and he had all of these monks that were ardent in their practice. He was always talking about seeing through the illusion. And one day, he was off at the edge of the monastery, and he was weeping, crying. Some of the younger monks came upon him and said, "Abbot, Sensei, what's the matter?" And the Sensei said, "I lost my brother. My brother died." The young monks responded, "But it's all illusion. Nothing really—it's just conditions arising and passing away." And he said, "Yes, but this is a very painful illusion."

It was that moment of teaching: yeah, we're still of this world. There still is pain and grief and loss and separation. How can we be with it, actually? Turn toward it, not away from it. The instinctual part of our psyche, our ego, is to turn away or we'll be overwhelmed. So it's important, I think, just to see that.

And then the Buddha's teaching on the mindfulness of impermanence—so helpful in this. That which arises passes away as we experience the pains of life: old age, sickness, death. No escaping it.

So there are a few ways of looking at this mindfulness or this awareness. Being aware of its arising—being aware of the arising of really all kinds of mental fabrications, thoughts and feelings. And then there's the establishment. Once we've established mindfulness, we can develop mindfulness. This is less about what is arising and passing away, but more the minute changes, which is really a nuanced practice. I actually think working with pain can be really helpful—chronic pain or just the dharma pain, the pain of sitting. Seeing how it's changing constantly. It doesn't feel like it all the time, right? Ten years, remember? Ten years of practice.

There are a couple of things I was thinking about. The Buddha talked of this development of mindfulness: "It's better to live a single day seeing the rapid arising and passing away of all phenomena than to live a hundred years not seeing." That's pretty weighty, pointing to the liberating power of this awareness and how we need to rebel against our tendencies to numb out, to check out. To be on our iPhones or work eighty hours a week.

This liberating power of seeing clearly reorients our mind towards freedom from attachment and in turn freedom from suffering. Non-clinging.

I heard you had a talk recently on the four foundations of mindfulness. This is the beginning and the end of the four foundations of mindfulness, which I think talks specifically and emphatically about how necessary this is. This is the only way, folks—he says monks or bhikkhus, but—this is the only way, folks, for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow and lamentation, for the destruction of pain and grief, for reaching the right path, for the attainment of Nibbana. Namely, these four foundations of mindfulness.

I believe what the Buddha is saying is that the only way is to start by seeing clearly – our relationship to our thoughts and our feelings, this body, this life, our attachment to it, our aversion towards it. We have to start there again and again. The only way out is through.

How many people have heard the acronym RAIN? I think this is a really helpful way to work with the content of experience and non-identifying with it. I'll briefly go through it.

RAIN begins with recognize – you need to recognize what's happening. That's essentially what I've been talking about for the last twenty minutes or so. Then accept it. Accept that it's there – not that it's taking over, but accepting that it is present. There is whatever: pain, sickness, loss, story, habitual response. You have to have some acceptance.

And then begin to investigate. So then we're turning actually away from the mind. This is part of the rebellious quality, rebelling against the mind's tendency to just do the rat race – thinking, thinking, thinking, thinking about thinking, thinking about thinking about thinking. How many people do that? Yes, the engineers in the room perhaps.

So investigate: How does it feel in this body? Where can I feel sorrow or grief or loneliness or agitation or anger or joy? Where can it be felt? And how does it change?

Then comes this non-identification, sometimes called dis-identification. One of the ways I've been talking about it more recently is non-personalizing. How can I be with experience without being overwhelmed by it or overcome or lost in it? This non-personalizing, dis-identifying – it's a very complicated thing to do. That's at the crux, actually, of the teaching of anatta, not-self.

If we can see how we're not our thoughts and we're not our feelings, then we can begin to see how it changes. But if we're identified with it, then we're identified with it as a self – as an "I am my anger," "I am this pain," "I am even this joy," or "I am this meditation." Anytime we're clinging or identifying, we're creating a sense of self: "I am spiritual." So this process can develop – this is a process of developing a non-judgmental awareness to our experience – and it can be liberating and healing.

I'm going to read something called "Habits of Mind" by Mahagosananda. Mahagosananda was a Cambodian monk who was alive in the time of the Khmer Rouge. He was exiled to Thailand during the Khmer Rouge because they were killing monks and nuns and the educated – just this horrible genocide. So Mahagosananda was training in Thailand and came back after the Khmer Rouge lost power. He went on a mission, walking around to villages teaching the Buddha Dharma. And there was a lot of anger, a lot of frustration, a lot of vengeance – "Kill the Khmer Rouge! Look at what they've done to us."

Their own people.

And so there's one particular story—the way I understand it—where Mahagosananda actually went back to the village he grew up in and lived in. So many of the elders he knew had died, so many people he'd known his whole life were gone. And he gave a teaching there, and this was part of his teaching around forgiveness and around loving-kindness and compassion.

He said this: "The thought manifests as word. The word manifests as the deed. The deed develops into the habit. Habit hardens into character. Character gives birth to destiny. So watch your thoughts with care, and let them spring from love born out of respect for all beings."

I believe he's saying: rebel against the tendencies of greed, hatred, and delusion. Rebel against those tendencies.

There's another teaching I want to share. This is from the Buddha. There's a great little book called The Teachings of the Buddha by Jack Kornfield—it's my little cheat sheet. I take it with me pretty much everywhere I go. This passage is from the Dhammapada:

"We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with an impure mind, an unskillful mind, and trouble will follow you as the wheel follows the ox that draws the cart. We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with a pure mind, a skillful mind, and happiness will follow you as your shadow, unshakable. How can a troubled mind understand the way? Your worst enemy cannot harm you as much as your own thoughts unguarded. But once mastered, no one can help you as much—not even your father or your mother."

We are what we think. With our thoughts we make the world.

So this awareness of what's happening within us and around us in any given moment is the key to not being a slave to our thoughts. It's learning to rebel against those tendencies. The precepts are also extremely helpful—they help us from spilling over. And this is intention, the very thing Mahagosananda is speaking about. He's talking quite a bit about intention.

So this final quote comes from Ajahn Sumedho, Luang Por Sumedho, the lineage holder of my tradition—the Theravadan tradition, Thai forest tradition. He wrote a book called Intuitive Awareness, and he had this to say:

"Awareness is your refuge. Awareness of the changingness of feelings, of attitudes, of moods, of material change. Stay with that, because it is a refuge that is indestructible. It's not something that changes. It's a refuge that can be trusted in. This refuge is not something that you create. It's not a creation. It's not an ideal. It's very practical and very simple, but easily overlooked or not noticed. When you're mindful, you're beginning to notice: it's like this."

"It's like this" is one of the simplest and most difficult practices. And it points again and again to the ever-changing phenomena. When we can see this, when we can be open to this—which is exactly what this practice does—it helps us to see moments of change, moments of openness.

So we're not so locked in.

I call my group in Santa Cruz "Rebel Dharma" because I believe that the essence of the Buddha's teaching—and actually the essence of the Buddha's life—was rebellious, was revolutionary. It had to have been. It's carried on for so long. And so his teaching's challenge to us is to rebel against our own tendencies toward greed, hatred, and delusion, and to incline the mind towards openness, freedom from suffering, loving-kindness, care, compassion, and equanimity.

Let's end with a little compassion, a little loving-kindness. Mettā. One of my friends calls this the after-dinner mint of the Dharma—after the hard work.

So just sitting relaxed, allowing the eyes to close. Connecting with the breath in the body. This heart space, this emotional center.

Breathing in, silently saying the phrase: May I be happy. May I be happy.

From the head to the heart and the heart to the head: May I be peaceful. May I be peaceful.

May I be free from suffering and the causes of suffering. May I be free from suffering and the causes of suffering.

Oh, this mind you carry on your back—your actions are like a heavy sack. No wonder that your shoulders ache. Another strain's enough to break your neck. So drop this stupid load. This is the last stop on the road where you can find rest. Stay. Stay. Be love's guest.

May any goodness that's come from our practice—may this goodness be dedicated to the freedom from suffering for all beings everywhere. May we all be free.

CHAPTER 211

Intention, Motivation and Purpose

Andrea Fella · 37 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella examines the Buddhist understanding of cetanā (intention/volition) as the pivotal factor connecting mind and body. She explains how this mental impulse precedes every action of body, speech, and mind, and how our habitual patterns—often rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion—shape our motivations when we're not mindfully aware. The Buddha identified this moment of intention as a key place for transformation, where we can shift from reactive habits toward wholesome motivations of kindness, generosity, and wisdom.

Andrea offers practical exercises for exploring intention, including sitting without a timer until the urge to get up arises, then watching that impulse pass before acting. She emphasizes the power of pausing before speaking as a daily life practice, noting that this brief pause creates space to recognize our motivation and potentially choose a more skillful response. Throughout, she stresses the importance of self-compassion when we inevitably forget or fail to catch our reactive impulses.

The talk also addresses connecting momentary intentions with our deeper life purposes and aspirations. Andrea suggests that even mundane activities like grocery shopping can become expressions of our highest values when we consciously recognize the caring inherent in these acts. She shares a touching example of exchanging smiles with strangers during walks, illustrating how simple acts of connection, approached with presence and without expectation, can generate profound joy. The teaching concludes with guidance on working with disappointment when our attempts at connection aren't reciprocated, pointing toward equanimity and the recognition that we cannot control others' responses.

We are familiar with just how much the mind and body influence each other. We certainly see this when we start to meditate. But I think many of us, even before we meditated, were aware that when a strong emotion arose, like anger, it impacts the body. And when calm or happiness comes up, it also gives us a different sense in the body.

So there's a connection between the mind and the body. We're very familiar with the way our emotions impact our body. But also our body impacts our mind as well. When, for instance, we stub our toe—which I did just yesterday—that painful sensation can create stuff in the mind. It can create reactivity, frustration, or self-criticism. So this is a two-way street. The mind influences the body, the body influences the mind.

And not just emotions influence the body. Even thoughts, even the simplicity of a thought, can impact the body. Sometimes, just think about this as an example: maybe in your meditation, a thought came up about something you were doing last week. All that was, was an arising of a thought about something you remembered. But sometimes—and I'm sure you're familiar with this experience—when thoughts come up in the mind, they come along with the emotional terrain or content that was present when that experience happened. The memory arose just as a thought in the mind, and that memory brings with it a whole emotional and bodily interaction.

So this two-way street between body and mind—there's so much connection between the two. In the teachings of the Buddha, he particularly highlighted a quality of mind at which this point of connection between body and mind happens. It's a factor in the mind that he called intention or volition. Volition, intention, is just a little urge, a mental urge. It's a mental urge that impels us to act. Every single action that we do—of body, of speech, even of our minds—has this impulse that precedes it.

In the guided meditation, I suggested at the end that you see if you could just be still, remain still—not with the sense of holding yourself still, but just having that sense of relaxing into stillness—and then see if you might notice an urge to move. You might have felt an itch or just a little bit of discomfort in the body and a little bit of an urge to move. Did any of you notice that urge before you moved? A couple of you. So this urge that happens, it's possible to see it. And this kind of exercise can highlight it.

If you're interested in playing with this at home, you could explore in your sitting meditation one time, when you don't have a particular constraint on the end of the sitting, to sit until there's a strong impulse to get up. Don't set a timer for the sitting. Sit until the strong impulse to get up, to finish the sitting, comes up. But then don't get up. Sit through it. Watch the urge. Feel what it feels like to have that urge to move. And it will pass. It actually won't take very long—probably within a minute, less than a minute even. It might take just fifteen seconds.

So watch that urge pass. And then the second time it happens, do it again. Watch that urge arise and pass. The third time it happens, get up. This gives you a little bit of a flavor of this impulse. It might give you a taste of what I'm talking about—this impulse to move before we move.

So it's possible to see this impulse. It's possible to recognize it. It's possible to know we're going to move our body before we move it. It's possible to know we're going to speak before we speak. It's possible even to know we're going to think before we think.

That one is more subtle, not so easy to see, but it is possible to see. It's possible to see the mind kind of headed towards an emotion before that emotion arises.

So this place of intention—intention itself is just a little impulse, a sense of "about to." Maybe you have a sense of what that is: just about to get up, about to move, about to speak. That little urge in the mind, pointing us toward or having us recognize that something is about to happen—that can be seen, that can be known. And in and of itself, it's a neutral thing. It's just an urge, just an urge to act.

The Pali for this—I know that Shiloh likes to keep you current with the Pali terms—is cetanā. And it's just this impulse, this impulse that arises right before something is going to happen.

I would say the urge itself isn't the crucial part of what this exploration around intention is about. But with an intention to move, with an intention to speak, comes what we can call a motivation—a reason why we are going to say something or do something. This is a place the Buddha said is really interesting to pay attention to. Why we do something. What's our motivation? The Buddha actually pointed to this as a key place in our experience.

When we are not aware of our intentions, our habits of mind—the ways we've been conditioned, the familiar patterns that we all live with—when we're not present and aware for these moments of intention, which we're not present for a lot of them, then basically our habits are deciding, choosing our motivations for us. When we're not aware of this moment of intention, this moment of motivation associated with an intention, then essentially we're at the mercy of our habits. And often those habits are not so helpful.

Aversion has been one of my really strong habits of mind. I would walk into a room and notice everything I didn't like about the room. That would be my orientation because of that aversive habit in the mind. If I wasn't aware of it, if I wasn't aware of that aversive tendency, then walking into a room, the intentions around what I paid attention to were motivated by that aversion.

We have these habits of our mind, and the Buddha said if we're not aware of them, if we're not aware of what's motivating our actions, we're probably doing things, acting on intentions, acting on motivations, that are probably not so helpful.

The whole of what the Buddha pointed us to was a movement towards peace, towards freedom, towards ease. And the exploration around that was to see what's in the way. What is it that makes us struggle? What is it that makes us suffer? How is it that we get caught? He pointed to three particular motivations in our mind—motivations of greed, motivations of aversion, motivations of delusion—as being the motivations that tend to lead us down the path of struggle.

When we act out of aversion, we tend to be strengthening that quality of aversion in our minds. When we act out of greed, we tend to be strengthening the quality of greed in our minds. When we act out of confusion, we tend to be strengthening the quality of confusion in our minds.

So this moment of choice, when we have this intention to act, this intention to speak—the motivation that accompanies that intention is what will either lead us down the path towards more struggle in our lives, or lead us down the path of more happiness in our lives.

The Buddha pointed to those motivations that take us more towards happiness, towards letting go of struggle, as being non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. To put it more positively: motivations of kindness, of generosity, and of wisdom.

We may have a sense sometimes that if we're not acting based on what we want and what we don't want, what would be the motivation for doing anything? There actually are some wholesome motivations, these beautiful motivations of love, of kindness, of compassion, of generosity, of wisdom. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says that when wisdom is present in the mind—which is non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—when wisdom is present in the mind, wisdom also wants to act. It wants to act to alleviate suffering. It wants to act to move towards ease and peace. And so there is this possibility of wholesome motivation, the possibility of action from skillful motivations.

The word "intention" in English carries the connotation of being aware of our intentions. We use the word intention when we say, "I intend to do something," in the sense of "I know that I'm going to do something." The Pali word cetanā is sometimes called a universal factor of mind. It arises in every single moment of experience.

Just that movement I made, that movement of my hands—there were hundreds if not thousands of intentions happening in my mind to make that movement happen. Every single moment there's a little tiny intention happening: just that movement of my hand or the movement of my head, there's an intention arising that I'm not aware of. Teaching in this form right now, I can sometimes see that level of intention when I'm on retreat.

So there are many intentions that we don't see. This factor of intention is not just about the times when we can see it. Every single action of body, speech, or mind is accompanied by an intention, and that intention has a motivation connected to it.

Just this movement of my hands—I can see that in my mind. I don't see the individual intentions, but I can see that the intention is to support what I'm saying, to offer a little bit of visuals, I suppose. So the intention is to help, to clarify. That's the intention in the mind as this movement happens.

The Buddha pointed to this: being aware of our intention to act, to speak, just in this moment. This is the only moment we can be aware of our intentions. We can't redo our intentions from the past. We can't act on intentions in the future. The only place we can act on intentions is right now.

In exploring intention in our practice—and I'll give you some ways to explore this in your daily lives in just a few minutes—we start to see that actually this moment, the choices made in this moment, are the only thing we have. That's it. That's all there is: this moment and the unfolding that happens as a result of choices right now. The Buddha really pointed to this very split second and the choices that we make, inclining our minds towards wholesome choices, skillful motivations with respect to our actions.

When we're not conscious, when we're in a kind of mindless state or lost in thought, then our habits are choosing for us. Sometimes these habits know what to do. When we're driving down the freeway and we're lost in thought, our habits know how to drive the car. Who's doing the driving anyway? The mind is completely on another planet, and yet the signal's going on, lanes are being changed, you're looking over to see if someone's coming up. The habits of mind know how to do that activity. So there are some intentions that are very neutral—they just know how to take care of us.

And then there are other intentions around speech, for instance, where we may bring in our habits of reactivity. When we're not aware—when we speak, and this is actually a really great place to practice in daily life, with our speech—when we're not aware of the intention to speak, when we're not aware of speaking while we're speaking, usually we are speaking out of habit, and often speaking from reactive habit. I think I can probably safely say that everyone in this room has at one time or another said something they wish they hadn't said. That habit of mind—aversion or frustration or impatience—burst out of the mouth.

If we could be present for that moment of knowing when we're going to speak before we speak. It actually takes just a moment. One great practice around this is to simply see if you can pause for a split second before you say something. If you can do that, you have caught the intention to speak before you speak. You may not see the impulse itself, but there's something in us that knows it. That pause is a kind of manifestation of seeing the urge to speak.

If you can pause before you speak, in that moment you will probably already know what is going to come out of your mouth. So you have the opportunity to see that. You may also know why you're going to say what you're going to say—the motivation associated with what you're about to say. Frustration might be the motivation. Wanting to impress might be the motivation. Wanting to convey information. There are many different reasons why we speak.

But in that moment of pausing, we have the opportunity to catch that intention to speak and notice the motivation. And if you see a motivation of frustration or impatience, there's the opportunity to refrain—to recognize the language of harshness or divisiveness that may be about to burst out of your mouth.

And perhaps you might be able to say something with a gentler tone, with more compassionate language. So that moment of catching the intention, that moment of seeing that impulse, is very powerful—simply noticing it and seeing what the motivation is.

Now, doing this as a practice, there's probably going to be many times when you forget entirely. Part of our practice is being very compassionate with ourselves, really forgiving of the ways our mind just goes into mindlessness. We have to be compassionate with ourselves. And when we recognize that we've forgotten, we simply recommit to keep trying. That intention, that motivation to just keep trying, is where the whole practice unfolds from.

I think it's Bhikkhu Bodhi who says that really there are only two things we have to do in practice: we have to start, and we have to continue. And it will unfold from there.

We'll forget. We'll forget. But if in the forgetting—I mean, this happened to me when I very first started. I was first introduced to mindfulness practice reading Thich Nhat Hanh's book Miracle of Mindfulness. I was in my twenties, and I'd read the book at night and think, "Wow, this is really cool. I want to try this tomorrow." And I'd go to my job, and I'd forget. I would forget until I picked up the book on the nightstand the next night. After several days of that, I gave up. What I basically said to myself was, "Obviously this doesn't work for me." And I didn't meet mindfulness again for another fifteen years.

At that point, I didn't give up. At that point, I began watching what was happening in my mind, seeing, "Wow, I'm forgetting mindfulness a lot." And when I noticed that I had forgotten, I simply recommitted: "I'm going to keep trying." That brought an intention into the mind of continue, continue—that motivation to keep trying.

So when you notice that you've forgotten for a day to remember to pause before speaking, just recommit. Keep trying. That commitment, that motivation to keep trying, will bear fruit. It takes time. It may be that the way it bears fruit is by remembering three or four times during the day that you've forgotten, instead of only once every two days. And then maybe five or six times during the day, remembering you've forgotten to be aware while speaking, to be aware of that moment before speaking. At some point, if you keep recommitting every time you remember you've forgotten, it will start to happen. So you really have to be compassionate in that moment, bringing in the intention of compassion when you remember. It's like, "Yeah, I forgot, but just keep trying."

So likely you'll forget a lot. You may notice that moment of intention, you may notice that pause, and the momentum of that mind just wanting to blurt it out is so strong that even seeing the intention didn't matter. Again, compassion. Don't beat yourself up about it. Really, don't beat yourself up about it. But notice what happens. There may be in that moment a wholesome sense of, "Wow, I wish I hadn't said that"—not in a self-hatred kind of way, but a recognition that it wasn't a skillful thing to say, noticing the twist that came out in your language. Recognizing that, you may in that moment be able to stop and say, "I apologize right now. I'm sorry."

In the moment, you may be able to change course.

It takes a lot of compassion to watch our motivations. When we start to watch our minds for our motivations, it's very humbling. We get to see in spades just how powerful those habits of mind are. And so it takes a lot of honesty and commitment and openheartedness for our own foibles, for our own habits and patterns of mind. And again, that motivation to just keep trying will bear fruit. I'm proof of this. It's amazing how much transformation can happen through just continuing. Just continuing.

We can also start to explore larger motivations. The motivations I'm talking about right now are the momentary motivations. And yet, we all have a sense of our ideals or our aspirations. It can be helpful to reflect on those larger motivations, those larger intentions, the sense of purpose in our lives. So right now, what is your aspiration for your life? What is meaningful for you in your life?

Sometimes we have larger motivations in our lives, larger purposes that we're unaware of—having a good job, earning a lot of money, looking good to other people. Sometimes we're living our lives with purposes that we're not really conscious of. And sometimes we can reflect on what our deeper purpose is and begin to see if we might be able to connect our moment-to-moment motivations with that deeper purpose.

Our deeper purpose might be something like: I'd like to not cause harm in the world. I'd like to have an open heart. I'd like to be kind. I'd like to let go of the way my mind ties me into knots. I'd like to experience ease and peace. I'd like to have peacefulness be the frame for my life.

Spending some time reflecting on what a deeper motivation is, what an orienting purpose of your life might be—if you connect with that deeper purpose, then even the simple activities of your life can be connected. It can be interesting to explore: How can I tie a thread from that deeper purpose to the simple activities of my life?

If the intention is opening the heart, kindness, how might going to the grocery store connect to that intention? We go to the grocery store with the intention to buy our food, and that's a perfectly valid intention. We buy our food to support our families. So right there, there's that intention to support our own bodies, to support our friends and family. Right there is the connection with that intention of caring. Purchasing food is an act of caring. Can you be aware of that?

When we just go through the motions, our motivations for getting stuff off the shelves might be impatience and frustration. Whereas if we can connect to the recognition that this activity is actually a kind thing to do for myself—as opposed to something I have to do to get it over with so I can get home to make the food so I can do these other things I haven't done today—can we actually connect with how our simple activities support our deeper purpose? The simple activity of caring for ourselves, right there in buying food.

And then in the people we interact with in the store—the cashier. A friendly smile. I'm not talking about a deep, soulful gaze. Just a simple "How are you today?" Really simply. Kindness in interactions. Smiling at people.

The practice of smiling at strangers is one of my favorite things. At one point, I was doing my exercise in my neighborhood, walking in the streets. I'd do it roughly the same time of day, and I would start to get familiar with the various people. We would exchange smiles. And when I was really present, it was such a beautiful feeling to smile at someone and have a smile back. At one point I wondered: How long does that good feeling last? It was amazing.

I timed it. There was one person in particular, an older man. He would be looking down, and when he looked up and saw me, this amazing smile came over his face. Waves of joy washed through me, and it lasted forty seconds. A smile gave me forty seconds of waves of happiness. Be there for it. Connect to those deeper intentions and be present.

We can orient so much of our lives with these wholesome motivations just through conscious reflection, consciously inclining our minds in that direction.

During the question period, someone shared an experience from a restaurant in Half Moon Bay. She had been trying to make a connection with the waitress but wasn't able to. She tried a number of times and was met with what she called a vacuousness. She experienced disappointment in not being able to make that connection and asked how to work with that.

This kind of experience, I think, calls for equanimity practice—the practice of recognizing that we can't make other people do what we want them to do. You don't know what was going on for her. Compassion is another doorway sometimes. When you see somebody who seems distant, disconnected, there could be something going on. We don't know. You don't want to make something up, but just recognize that we don't know the causes and conditions unfolding for someone else. Often behavior that is disconnected has suffering underneath it, has pain underneath it—pain that may or may not even be conscious.

The reflection on equanimity is basically the reflection that we each have to make our own choices and that we cannot make choices for other people. No matter what we wish—if we wish for a connection, wish for some spark of friendliness or kindness—we can't make the choices for the other person. We can wish them well, but we cannot make them well.

And then also look at whether there's a sense of expectation. That's probably where the disappointment comes from—some kind of unarticulated or unaware expectation that if I behave in this way, I'll get a certain response. Maybe you've done this with other people in the past and there's been that spark of joy. It's like if you get the kind of hit I got with that man smiling, and then another day he doesn't look up. You're trying to get him to smile and he doesn't. You think, "I'm not going to get that hit. This isn't going to feel good." So watch for expecting a particular result from your own actions.

Our work in this world really is, in some ways, to put goodness into the world. And that goodness is amazing—it really does impact the world. And yet we have to put that goodness into the world without expectation of any particular result. It's hard. Sometimes we have to just watch the contraction, the disappointment, and recognize that there was some expectation there. We see it after the fact because we feel that contraction happening.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 212

Intention, Motivation and Purpose

Andrea Fella · 37 min

In this talk, Andrea Fella examines the Buddhist understanding of cetanā (intention or volition) as a universal factor of mind that precedes every action of body, speech, and thought. She explains how intention serves as the critical junction between mind and body, and how our motivations—whether rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion or in generosity, kindness, and wisdom—shape the trajectory of our lives toward either suffering or peace.

Fella offers accessible practices for exploring intention, including sitting without a timer to observe the urge to move, and pausing before speaking to catch the motivation behind our words. She emphasizes that when we're unaware of our intentions, habitual patterns choose our actions for us, often leading to reactive speech and behavior we later regret. Drawing on teachings from her teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she notes that wisdom itself wants to act—to alleviate suffering and move toward ease.

The talk also addresses larger life purposes and how to connect moment-to-moment motivations with deeper aspirations like kindness and non-harming. Fella shares personal examples, including the transformative power of simply smiling at strangers, while also discussing how to work with disappointment when our wholesome intentions don't produce expected results. Throughout, she stresses the importance of self-compassion when we forget to be mindful, reminding practitioners that the practice unfolds through simply starting and continuing.

We are familiar with just how much the mind and body influence each other. We certainly see this when we start to meditate. But I think many of us, even before we meditated, were aware that when a strong emotion arose, like anger, it impacts the body. And when calm or happiness comes up, it also gives us a different sense in the body. So there's a connection between the mind and the body. We're very familiar with the way our emotions impact our body.

But our body also impacts our mind. When we stub our toe, for instance—which I did just yesterday—that painful sensation can create stuff in the mind. It can create reactivity, frustration, or self-criticism. So this is a two-way street: the mind influences the body, and the body influences the mind.

And it's not just emotions that influence the body. Even thoughts, even the simplicity of a thought, can impact the body. Think about this as an example: maybe in your meditation, a thought came up about something you were doing last week. All that was, was an arising of a thought about something you remembered. But sometimes—and I'm sure you're familiar with this experience—when thoughts come up in the mind, they come along with the emotional terrain or content that was present when that experience happened. So the memory arose just as a thought in the mind, and that memory brings with it a whole emotional and bodily interaction. There is so much connection between the two.

In the teachings of the Buddha, he particularly highlighted a quality of mind at which this point of connection between body and mind happens. It's a factor in the mind that he called intention or volition. Volition, intention, is just a little urge, a mental urge. It's a mental urge that impels us to act. Every single action that we do of body, of speech, even of our minds, has this impulse that precedes it.

In the guided meditation, I suggested at the end that you see if you could just be still, remain still—not with the sense of holding yourself still, but just having that sense of relaxing into stillness—and then to see if you might notice an urge to move. You might have felt an itch or just a little bit of discomfort in the body and a little bit of an urge to move. Did any of you notice that urge before you moved? A couple of you. So this urge that happens, it's possible to see it, and this kind of exercise can highlight it.

If you're interested in playing with this at home, you could explore in your sitting meditation sometime—when you don't have a particular constraint on the end of the sitting—to sit until there's a strong impulse to get up. Don't set a timer for the sitting. Sit until the strong impulse to get up, to finish the sitting, comes up. But then don't get up. Sit through it. Watch the urge. Feel what it feels like to have that urge to move. And it will pass. It actually won't take very long—probably within a minute, less than a minute even. It might take fifteen seconds. Watch that urge pass.

Then the second time it happens, do it again. Watch that urge arise and pass. The third time it happens, get up.

This gives you a little bit of a flavor of this impulse. It might give you a taste of what I'm talking about—this impulse to move before we move. It's possible to see this impulse. It's possible to recognize it. It's possible to know we're going to move our body before we move it. It's possible to know we're going to speak before we speak. It's possible even to know we're going to think before we think.

That one is more subtle, not so easy to see, but it is possible to see. It's possible to see the mind kind of headed towards an emotion before that emotion comes up.

So this place of intention—intention itself is just a little like impulse, a sense of "about to." Maybe you have a sense of what that is: just about to get up, about to move, about to speak. This little urge in the mind, pointing us to or having us recognize that something is about to happen, can be seen, can be known. And in and of itself, it's a neutral thing. It's just an urge—just an urge to act.

The Pali for this (I know that Shiloh likes to keep you up with the Pali on these terms) is cetanā. And it's just this impulse that arises right before something's going to happen.

I would say the urge itself isn't the crucial part of what this exploration is about around intention. But with an intention to move, with an intention to speak, comes what we can call a motivation—a reason why we are going to say something or do something. Now this is a place that the Buddha said is really interesting to pay attention to: why we do something, what our motivation is. The Buddha actually pointed to this as a key place in our experience.

When we are not aware of our intentions, our habits of mind—the ways that we've been conditioned, the familiar habits and patterns that we all live with—when we're not present and aware for these moments of intention (which we're not present for a lot of them), then basically our habits are deciding, choosing our motivations for us. And so when we're not aware of this moment of intention, this moment of motivation associated with an intention, then essentially we're kind of at the mercy of our habits. And often those habits are not so helpful.

Aversion has been one of my really strong habits of mind. I would walk into a room and notice everything I didn't like about the room—that would be my orientation because of that aversive habit in the mind. And so if I wasn't aware of it, if I wasn't aware of that aversive tendency, then walking into a room, the intentions around what I paid attention to were motivated by that aversion.

We have these habits of our mind, and the Buddha said, if we're not aware of the habits of our mind, and we're not aware of what's motivating our actions, we're probably doing things, acting on intentions, acting on motivations, that are probably not so helpful.

Let's say the whole of what the Buddha pointed us to was a movement towards peace, towards freedom, towards ease. And the exploration around that was to see what's in the way. What is it that makes us struggle? What is it that makes us suffer?

How is it that we get caught? He pointed to three particular motivations in our mind—motivations of greed, motivations of aversion, motivations of delusion—as being the motivations that tend to lead us down the path of struggle.

When we act out of aversion, we tend to be strengthening that quality of aversion in our minds. When we act out of greed, we tend to be strengthening the quality of greed in our minds. When we act out of confusion, we tend to be strengthening the quality of confusion in our minds. And so this moment of choice, when we have this intention to act, this intention to speak, the motivation that accompanies that intention is what will either lead us down the path towards more struggle in our lives, or lead us down the path of more happiness in our lives.

The Buddha pointed to those motivations that take us more towards happiness, towards letting go of struggle, as being non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. To put it more positively: motivations of kindness, of generosity, and of wisdom.

We may have a sense sometimes that if I'm not acting based on what I want and what I don't want, what would be the motivation for doing anything? There actually are some wholesome motivations, these beautiful motivations of love, of kindness, of compassion, of generosity, of wisdom. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says that when wisdom is present in the mind—which is non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—when wisdom is present in the mind, wisdom also wants to act. It wants to act to alleviate suffering. It wants to act to move towards ease and peace. And so there is this possibility of wholesome motivation, the possibility of action from skillful motivations.

The word "intention" in English, at least, carries the connotation of being aware of our intentions. We use the word intention when we say, "I intend to do something," in the sense of "I know that I'm going to do something." The word cetanā, the Pali word, is sometimes called a universal factor of mind. It arises in every single moment of experience.

Just that movement that I made, that movement of my hands—there were hundreds if not thousands of intentions happening in my mind to make that movement happen. Every single moment there's a little tiny intention happening, just to create that movement of my hand or the movement of my head. There's an intention arising that I'm not aware of. Teaching in this form right now, I can sometimes see that level of intention when I'm on retreat.

So there are many intentions that we don't see. This factor of intention is not just about the times when we can see it. Every single action of body, speech, or mind is accompanied by an intention, and that intention has a motivation connected to it.

Just this movement of my hands—I can see that in my mind. I don't see the individual intentions, but I can see that the intention is to support what I'm saying, to offer a little bit of visuals, I suppose. So the intention is to help, to clarify. That's the intention in the mind as this movement happens.

The Buddha pointed to this: in the moment, being aware of our intention to act, to speak. Just in this moment. This is the only moment we can be aware of our intentions. We cannot redo our intentions from the past—our intentions and motivations from the past. We cannot act on intentions in the future. The only place we can act on intentions is right now.

In exploring intention in our practice—and I'll give you some ways to explore this in your daily lives in just a few minutes—we start to see that actually this moment, the choices made in this moment, are the only thing we have. That's it. That's all there is: this moment and the unfolding that happens as a result of choices right now. And so the Buddha really pointed to this very split second and the choices that we make, inclining our minds towards wholesome choices, skillful motivations with respect to our actions.

When we're not conscious, not aware, when we're in a kind of mindless state or lost in thought, then our habits are choosing for us. And sometimes these habits know what to do. When we're driving down the freeway and we're lost in thought, our habits know how to drive the car. Who's doing the driving anyway? The mind is completely on another planet, and yet the signal's going on, lanes are being changed, you're looking over to see if someone's coming up. The habits of mind know how to do that activity.

So there are some intentions that are very neutral. They just know how to take care of us. And then there are other intentions around speech, for instance, where we may bring in our habits of reactivity. When we're not aware—for instance, when we speak—and this is actually a really great place to practice in daily life, with our speech—when we're not aware of the intention to speak, not aware of speaking while we're speaking, usually we are speaking out of habit and often speaking from reactive habit.

I think I can probably safely say that everyone in this room has at one time or another said something they wish they hadn't said. That habit of mind of aversion or frustration or impatience burst out of the mouth. So if we could be present for that moment of knowing when we're going to speak, before we speak.

It actually takes just a moment. One great practice around this is simply to see if you can pause for a split second before you say something. If you can do that, you have caught the intention to speak before you speak. If you can, in that moment, wait for just a moment, you may not see the impulse itself, but there's something in us that knows it. That pause is a kind of manifestation of seeing that urge to speak.

If you can pause before you speak, in that moment you will probably already know what is going to come out of your mouth. So you have that opportunity to see that. You may also know why you're going to say what you're going to say—the motivation that's associated with that thing you're about to say. Frustration might be the motivation. Wanting to impress might be the motivation. Wanting to convey information. There are many different reasons why we speak.

But in that moment of pausing, we have the opportunity to catch that intention to speak and notice the motivation. And if you see a motivation of frustration or impatience, there's the opportunity to refrain—to recognize the language of harshness or divisiveness that may be about to burst out of your mouth.

And maybe you might be able to say something with a gentler tone, with more compassionate language. So that moment of catching the intention, that moment of seeing that impulse, is very powerful. Just simply noticing it and seeing what the motivation is.

Now, doing this as a practice, there's probably going to be a lot of times when you forget entirely. Part of our practice is being very compassionate with ourselves, really forgiving toward ourselves for the ways our mind just goes into mindlessness. We have to be compassionate with ourselves. And when we recognize that we've forgotten, we simply recommit to keep trying. That intention, that motivation to just keep trying, is where the whole practice unfolds from.

I think it's Bhikkhu Bodhi who says that really there are only two things we have to do in practice: we have to start, and we have to continue. And it will unfold from there.

We'll forget. We'll forget. But this happened to me when I very first started, when I was first introduced to mindfulness practice. I was reading Thich Nhat Hanh's book Miracle of Mindfulness. I was in my twenties, and I'd read the book at night and think, "Wow, this is really cool. I want to try this tomorrow." And I'd go to my job, and I'd forget. I would forget until I picked up the book on the nightstand the next night. After several days of that, I gave up. What I basically said to myself was, "Obviously this doesn't work for me." And I didn't meet mindfulness again for another fifteen years.

At that point, I didn't give up. At that point, I began watching what was happening in my mind, seeing, "Wow, I'm forgetting mindfulness a lot." And when I noticed that I had forgotten, I simply recommitted. I'm going to keep trying. That brought an intention into the mind of continue, continue. That motivation to continue, to keep trying.

So when you notice that you've forgotten for a day to remember to pause before speaking, just recommit. Keep trying. That commitment, that motivation to keep trying, will bear fruit. It takes time. It may be that the way it bears fruit is by remembering three or four times during the day that you've forgotten, instead of only once every two days. And then maybe five or six times during the day, remembering you've forgotten to be aware while speaking, to be aware of that moment before speaking. At some point, if you keep recommitting every time you remember you've forgotten, it will start to happen. So you really have to be compassionate in that moment, bringing in the intention of compassion when you remember. It's like, "Yeah, I forgot, but just keep trying."

So likely you'll forget a lot. You may notice that moment of intention, you may notice that pause, and the momentum of the mind just wanting to blurt it out is so strong that even seeing the intention didn't matter. Again, compassion. Don't beat yourself up about it. Really, don't beat yourself up about it. But notice what happens. There may be in that moment a sense—a wholesome sense—of, "Wow, I wish I hadn't said that." Not in a self-hatred kind of way, but a sense of, "That wasn't a skillful thing to say." Recognizing the twist that came out in your language. Recognizing that, you may in that moment be able to stop and say, "I apologize. I'm sorry. I didn't—"

I didn't want it to come out that way." In the moment, you may be able to change course.

It does take a lot of compassion to watch our motivations. When we start to watch our minds for our motivations, it's very humbling. We get to see in spades just how powerful those habits of mind are. So it takes a lot of honesty and commitment and open-heartedness for our own foibles, for our own habits and patterns of mind. And again, that motivation to just keep trying will bear fruit. I'm proof of this. It's amazing how much transformation can happen through simply continuing—just continuing.

We can also start to explore larger kinds of motivations. The motivations I'm talking about right now are the momentary ones. And yet, we all have a sense of our ideals or aspirations. It can be helpful to reflect on those larger motivations, those larger intentions, the sense of purpose in our lives. Right now, what is your aspiration for your life? What is meaningful for you?

Sometimes we have larger motivations in our lives, larger purposes, that we're kind of unaware of—having a good job, earning a lot of money, looking good to other people. Sometimes we're living our lives with purposes that we're not really conscious of. And sometimes we can reflect on what our deeper purpose is and begin to see if we might be able to connect our moment-to-moment motivations with that deeper purpose.

Our deeper purpose might be something like: I'd like to not cause harm in the world. I'd like to have an open heart. I'd like to be kind. I'd like to let go of the way my mind ties me into knots. I'd like to experience ease and peace. I'd like peacefulness to be the frame for my life.

Spending some time reflecting on what a deeper motivation is, what an orienting purpose of your life might be—if you connect with that deeper purpose, then even the simple activities of your life, it can be interesting to explore: How can I tie a thread from that deeper purpose to the simple activities of my life?

If the intention is opening the heart, kindness, how might going to the grocery store connect to that intention? We go to the grocery store with the intention to buy our food, and that's a perfectly valid intention. We buy our food to support our families. Right there, there's that intention to support our own bodies, to support our friends and family. Right there, there's that connection with caring. Purchasing food is an act of caring. Can you be aware of that?

When we just go through the motions, our motivations for getting stuff off the shelves might be impatience and frustration. Whereas if we can connect to the recognition that this activity is actually a kind thing to do for myself—as opposed to something I have to do, to get it over with so I can get home to make the food so I can do these other things I haven't done today—can we actually connect with how our simple activities support our deeper purpose? The simple activity of caring for ourselves, right there in buying food.

And then there are the people we interact with in the store. The cashier. A friendly smile. I'm not talking about a deep, soulful gaze—just a simple "How are you today?" Really simply. Kindness in interactions. Smiling at people.

The practice of smiling at strangers is one of my favorite things. At one point, I was doing my exercise in my neighborhood, walking in the streets. I'd do it at roughly the same time of day, and I started to get familiar with the various people. We would exchange smiles. When I was really present, it was such a beautiful feeling to smile at someone and have a smile back. At one point I wondered: How long does that good feeling last? It was amazing.

I timed it. There was one person in particular, an older man who tended to look down as he walked. When he looked up and saw me, this amazing smile came over his face. Waves of joy washed through me. It lasted forty seconds. A smile gave me forty seconds of waves of happiness.

Be there for it. Connect to those deeper intentions and be present. We can orient so much of our lives with these wholesome motivations just through conscious reflection, consciously inclining our minds in that direction.

A question arose about being in a restaurant in Half Moon Bay and trying to make a connection with the waitress but not being able to. She tried a number of times and was met with what she called a vacuousness. She experienced disappointment in not being able to make that connection and wondered how to work with that.

That kind of experience, I think, calls for equanimity practice—the practice of recognizing that we can't make other people do what we want them to do, and that we may not be able to control the outcome of our intentions. You don't know what was going on for her. Compassion is another doorway sometimes for that. When you see somebody who seems distant, disconnected, there could be something going on. We don't know. You don't want to make something up, but just recognize that we don't know the causes and conditions that are unfolding for somebody else. And often behavior that is disconnected has suffering underneath it, has pain underneath it—which may or may not even be conscious pain.

The reflection on equanimity is basically the reflection that we each have to make our own choices and that we cannot make choices for other people. No matter what we wish—if we wish for a connection, wish for some kind of spark of friendliness or kindness—we can't make the choices for the other person. We can wish them well, but we cannot make them well.

So that's one part of it: reflection on the suffering that might be occurring, reflection on equanimity. And then also look at whether there's a sense of expectation. When we have expectations—that's probably where the disappointment comes from. There was some kind of expectation, even an unarticulated or unaware expectation, that if I behave in this way, I'll receive something in return. Maybe you've done this with other people in the past and there has been that spark of joy. It's like if you get that kind of hit that I got with that man smiling—if another day he doesn't look up, it's like, I can't make that connection. I'm looking at him, trying to get him to smile, and he doesn't. And there's that feeling: I'm not going to get that hit. This is not going to feel good.

So watch for expecting some kind of particular result from your own actions. Our work in this world really is, in some ways, to put goodness into the world. And that goodness is amazing. It really does impact the world. And yet we have to put that goodness into the world without expectation of any particular result. It's hard. And so sometimes we have to just watch the contraction, the disappointment—and recognize, okay, there was some expectation there. We see it after the fact because we feel that contraction happening.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 213

Mindfulness in Close Relationships

Andrea Fella · 43 min

In this profound talk, Andrea Fella addresses what she calls 'the last frontier of Dharma practice' — bringing mindfulness into our closest relationships. She explores how our relational bonds serve as the most fertile ground for spiritual development, revealing mental patterns and kilesas (defilements) that remain dormant in solitude. Drawing on her teacher Shinzen's teaching that spiritual practice involves 'not fighting with yourself' and 'taking feedback,' Fella examines how relationships offer continuous opportunities for self-understanding.

The talk weaves together the three traditional baskets of practice — sīla (ethical conduct), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom) — showing their relevance in relational contexts. Fella emphasizes wise speech as a cornerstone practice, citing Joseph Goldstein's commitment to this often-overlooked aspect of the path. She offers practical guidance on listening as a form of meditation for others, staying attuned to bodily feedback during communication, and the courage to stop mid-sentence when we notice unskillful speech arising.

Perhaps most powerfully, Fella explores the distinction between love and attachment (upādāna), suggesting that much suffering in relationships stems from our attempts to create false security against the inherent vulnerability of deep connection. She invites practitioners to consider becoming 'unoffendable' — not through suppression but through working with self-clinging (attavādupādāna). The talk concludes with Ajahn Sumedho's teaching on 'not creating' others, pointing toward how insight into not-self paradoxically deepens our capacity to love while making hatred increasingly difficult.

This talk was recorded by Insight Meditation South Bay in Mountain View, California. For more talks and information, visit www.imsb.org.

It's sweet that sometimes when you teach at a place for the first time, there's a little thawing out process that happens, but I'm not feeling that so much. I actually feel like I've been here a little bit. So thank you.

The series title is "Where the Rubber Meets the Road," and I've seen the topics for a number of the talks. But tonight—mindfulness and dharma in relationships—this is really where the rubber meets the road. This is the last frontier of dharma practice.

It's not always clear what the meaning of our meditative experiences are. Different meditative traditions make sense of concentration, of samadhi, or insight in different ways, and sometimes it's hard to know how much to make of those kinds of experiences. But a real place for us to check our practice is in relationship—how our practice shows up in the relational field.

This is so fundamental because we could say that the basic flavor of the dharma is something like non-harming. And harm is, by definition, relational. So this is not some casual aspect of our practice. Our whole practice operates in the relational field. This is a worthy subject for us to reflect on, and a source of incredible delight—and I'll speak personally—humility too.

One of my main teachers, Shinzen, once characterized two maxims for our spiritual practice. He said the first was: don't fight with yourself at any level. And the second was: take feedback. He just left it there. I appreciate how central he made that relational component in our spiritual life. We can learn a lot about our minds based on how we show up in relationships.

When I first started practicing, somehow I heard—I think it was a monastic—say that their aspiration for their practice was to be safe for others. That was a kind of organizing principle. Even though I was quite early in practice, there was something that really cut to the bone for me: to become safe for others. And so naturally we turn to the relational field in seeing how we are safe for others and how we're not.

All of our practice is relevant here. The three baskets of sīla, samādhi, and paññā—conduct, concentration, and wisdom—all have a place in making relationship a part of practice.

Perhaps we can begin by acknowledging that we are deeply relational beings. We're born way too early to live on our own. Sometimes I've had the thought that our gestation period should be like twenty-five years. Sorry, moms—that's not realistic. But the truth is, this is our condition.

I heard this story of the pediatrician and psychoanalytic thinker Winnicott, who started a big conference by saying—he's known as a developmental theorist—"There's no such thing as a baby." And then went on to say, "There's no such thing as a baby without their mother." That's how fundamental the relational world is for us.

Much later theorizing and empirical data have confirmed just how deep the roots of connection and attachment are in us. The psychologist Baumeister writes: "It seems fair to conclude that human beings are fundamentally and pervasively motivated by a need to belong and seem to need frequent, affectively pleasant or positive interactions with the same individuals. And they need these interactions to occur in a framework of long-term, stable caring and concern."

It makes sense, then, that this would be a very fertile garden for our practice, given how deeply we depend on the relational field. Even in monastic communities, where there's a model of leaving one's family, of going forth, there are no communities more deeply relational than a monastic community.

The opportunity here is that our deepest grooves—the most established patterns in our minds—are evident in relationships. Sometimes these grooves are only stimulated in relationship. There are many positive, helpful grooves, but also the grooves of greed, hatred, and delusion. Those get stimulated in relationship.

When I'm single, I feel generally pretty sane. Maybe other people have this experience. Left to my own devices, without having my habits disrupted much, I think, "Oh yeah, I've really got it together." And then being in relationship reveals, "Whoa, I've got issues." The forces, the kilesas, the defilements arise in ways that they simply don't in other situations.

Steven Levine said the reason your family pushes your buttons is because they installed them. Maybe that's not a completely fair characterization, but these grooves are deep, and they're to be honored in a way. We could say that the forces of suffering latent in other situations can arise in the context of close relationship. I'm not speaking only about romantic relationship, but about any deep affective bonds.

The classical language speaks of latent defilements—different strands of suffering that get stimulated. And this is really, in a lot of ways, not bad news but actually our opportunity to practice, to see ourselves more clearly, to become more free, to cook our life, as one Zen teacher says. To see those pieces of our mind that are undigested, where we just default into suffering of one kind or another. It's beautiful work, and it is humbling.

Sometimes in the relational field, I feel powerless against the force of habit. Not frequently, but there are times when I feel completely propelled by habit, even though there's some clarity of mind and I know this is happening. The inertia is too strong. In those moments of feeling propelled by forces bigger than our mindfulness, these can be powerful moments of deepening our commitment to practice—to practice in a way that we don't get backed into that kind of karmic corner where the forces of craving and aversion are stronger than the mindfulness.

So, some practices—and then looking at purifying the nature of our relationships.

It seems mundane, but I'm very inspired by the fact that Joseph Goldstein, the insight teacher, has said that he makes wise speech a cornerstone of his practice. It's definitely not the sexiest aspect of the Dharma. There are flashier ways of practicing, and maybe wise speech seems mundane. But it's helpful for me to hear that he makes it a cornerstone of his practice.

The people I spend time with, myself included, are pretty careful with speech. But there's one friend, a teaching colleague, who is unwaveringly careful with his speech. Over the years of knowing him, in intense situations, at times when it would have been very natural to devolve into harsh or divisive speech, I've just never heard him do it. The feeling this engenders in me—I didn't even realize it could be like this—but there's this deep trust in him. It's not that I was worried about him talking behind my back or anything, but seeing how unwavering he's been inspires a kind of trust. It's that safety of offering oneself as safe, offering safety to another.

Some of our practice is about getting really sensitive to the karmic feedback loop in wrong speech, in unskillful speech. Sometimes it's very obvious, sometimes more subtle, but the body will be impacted when we deviate from our own deepest intentions. It's like this in the whole of our ethical life, but specifically in our speech. We're learning to be really alive to that feedback loop.

I asked a teacher early in my practice, "How do you possibly be mindful while speaking?" And he just gave one of those Buddhist answers we don't like that much: "Keep practicing."

But I think over time, especially as we are less stimulated by the fluctuations of egoic clinging, we actually can listen more deeply to our bodies. Sylvia Boorstein says that sometimes she'll stop mid-sentence when she starts to deviate into unwise speech. It's actually a good practice. I've done this sometimes—I'll just stop. There's a little shame that comes up, because you're trying to make your point, maybe there's some anger in it. But to actually just stop, dead stop, when we become aware: "Oh, you know what? There is delusion in the view right now."

I can feel it. I don't even have to finish this sentence.

Speaking is one dimension, but then there's also listening. We all perhaps know that experience where somebody comes to us with a problem to be solved, and they become very involved in the actual content of the problem. This happened, and now this, and then we could do this, or I could do this, or I can't believe that—and we get seduced into the mode of problem solving. But sometimes, if we just stay really steady and listen in a very open way, that's actually all that's needed.

Sometimes I have to trust this, to have some confidence. The problem being described—I am not going to solve that. But sometimes that's not even actually the problem. Our capacity to listen with a mind that's very open, where we're essentially meditating for the other person—it becomes a kind of co-meditation where we're actually helping to regulate them, to support them. A very beautiful gesture to offer to people.

As we do this, as we listen, it's like listening with the body—just very sensitive to the impact of the words on our bodies. Sometimes what responds is our emotional body, the body that moves easily with all of our environment and internal landscape. We can learn so much about what's happening between two people by listening deeply. It even feels to me like the heart of intuition is that listening. We're listening to the other, and we're listening to our bodies. There are possibilities, I think, of deeper layers of wisdom that arise from that kind of listening.

Now, usually when we think about love, we think of love somewhat tangled up with attachment—not in the psychological sense, but in the traditional Buddhist sense. These things actually get tangled up, and some of what we're doing in bringing our dharma practice to close relationship is beginning to untangle the love from the clinging.

It's tricky, right? There's a lot at stake in our relationships. We depend so deeply on others, and yet the very nature of our existence, of relationship, is that we're vulnerable. There's nothing like absolute security.

This is from a book by Stephen Mitchell, the psychologist, titled Can Love Last? The Fate of Romance Over Time:

"We learn to love in the context of the contrived and necessary safety of early childhood, and love seeks perpetually a kind of safety that screens out the unknown. The need to feel one knows both oneself and the other person, the need for a wholly secure attachment, is powerful for children and for adults. But in human relationships, safety and predictability are difficult to come by. We endlessly strive to reestablish that illusory sense of permanence and predictability. When patients complain of lifeless relationships, it's often possible to show them how precious the deadness is to them, how it is carefully maintained and insisted upon. Love by its very nature is not secure. We keep wanting to make it so."

I don't want to give the impression that we're supposed to continually open to impermanence, open to impermanence, open to impermanence. That's not always the right medicine. But I do think some of the suffering that arises in relationship arises as a kind of defense against the increasing risk and vulnerability of depending on another. One of the theses of this book is that boredom, in a certain way, is orchestrated to create the veneer of predictability. Some of our problems arise out of this—he doesn't use this language at all, but for me it's clinging.

In my own relationships, this arises in the form of wanting to control the views, preferences, and desires of the other. Not in overt ways, but in subtle ways of trying to enforce a certain set of views and preferences—molding the other into some image, feeling perhaps challenged by the otherness of the other.

And maybe most deeply, what I find most disorienting, is not being able to control the suffering of loved ones. We can do something, sometimes a lot, to serve compassion, to ease suffering. But ultimately that suffering—we can't govern it. For me, a lot of suffering and a lot of clinging arises in the face of the suffering of the other.

There's something desperate that gets triggered in me in seeing that—something that is definitely not compassion.

So we're learning how this clinging makes its way in, how it gets tangled up with love. Joseph Goldstein asks us to reflect: In this tangle of love, which is like giving, and clinging, which is like holding, does the clinging in any way enhance the love?

If the Dharma had—I don't like to be reductionistic about the Dharma; it has so many different aspects, and if you just march to one drumbeat, practice gets unbalanced. But if we had to take any mantra to summarize the Dharma, it would probably be let go.

And so letting go in this context means, in my experience, opening to the radical otherness of the partner, the parent, the child, the friend. In that there's a gesture of not knowing them, of opening to not knowing. Part of how we make things feel more secure is to know them inside out. But there's some value in that sense—maybe you know that sense of looking at somebody, maybe somebody you've known for decades, and you can still look at them and say, "I know you, and I don't know you." Or "I don't know you completely." And in that not knowing, there's a kind of openness that arises. We can meet people in a different way, appreciate their otherness, even as we feel deeply connected.

Now, you may be familiar with how the Buddha described clinging: we cling to sense pleasures, we cling to conventions, cling to views, and we cling to self-view. And at the heart of any Dharma subject, it usually brings us back to the themes of self-clinging. Nowhere is this more apparent than in relationship, where we can get a sense of how our own rigid self-definitions—all the yeses, "I am this," and all the nos, "I am not that"—impair our capacity to love and be open. Because we are all of a sudden protecting something. We are standing guard at the gates of self. And so our attention is directed towards bracing rather than opening.

Sometimes I think about Dharma practice as becoming unoffendable. That doesn't mean at all condoning harm, or delighting in insults or something. But maybe you have a sense of what it would mean to become unoffendable—to work through all of the pressure points within the self-clinging, to digest those, to let go, so that there's no longer an emotional charge with any claim about the self. And maybe you can even get a sense of how open that way of being would be. How open to another we could be, the kind of safety we could offer another. Because in that way we wouldn't be—you know, we're always exerting a certain level of egoic pressure on others. And it feels to me like weather systems of high pressure and low pressure—egoic pressure. You can feel that pushing against your being. And when we don't feel that, we're actually invited to be in a different way.

This is Chuang Tzu: "If a man is crossing a river and an empty boat collides with his skiff, even though he be a bad-tempered man, he will not become very angry. But if he sees a man in the boat, he will shout at him to steer clear. If the shout's not heard, he'll shout again and yet again and begin cursing. And all because there is somebody in the boat. Yet if the boat were empty, he would not be shouting and not be angry. If you can empty your boat crossing the river of the world, no one will oppose you or seek to harm you."

So one last thing. The other side of the coin of the teachings on not-self are the teachings, we could say, of not-other.

Somebody asked Ajahn Sumedho—I think it was a young monastic, asking a senior abbot while preparing to go home for a holiday break. They were clearly a little freaked out about going home for the holidays as a monastic and reintegrating with their family. And so the person asked Sumedho, "How can I do this? How can I be kind to them?"

And he said, "Don't create them. Don't create them. You can be kind by not creating them."

Meaning that you don't fixate their being.

You don't pin all of their actions, beliefs, preferences, views on them. You don't hang all of that on the coat hook of their self. Because that coat hook doesn't exist.

I do find that it's possible to love people—it's still possible to love people, even in knowing this. And it's complicated. It's definitely not resolved in my own heart. There is something that wants to love their self, that wants to feel in relationship, one self to another self. But it's possible to still love even with the insight of not-self, not-other. And then our relationships really feel like Dharma. It's possible to still love, but it's increasingly difficult to hate.

Let's just sit for a moment.

Whatever feels useful, please pick up. And leave all the rest behind.

Whatever goodness arises from our efforts together tonight, may this be of benefit. May that goodness be a cause of less suffering, more joy in our lives, in the lives of all we encounter.

Thank you. Nice to be with you.

CHAPTER 214

Thus Have I Heard

Andrea Fella · 44 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella unpacks a teaching many practitioners have heard but perhaps not fully understood: the Buddha's declaration to Ānanda that good spiritual friends (kalyāṇamittas) constitute the entire holy life, not merely half of it. Drawing from the Meghiya Sutta and related discourses, Fella explains how having virtuous companions naturally leads to the other factors that ripen the mind for liberation—ethical conduct (sīla), hearing the Dhamma, arousing energy for practice, and developing wisdom.

Fella presents seven qualities of being a good spiritual friend: not despising your friend, not forsaking them in difficulties, patiently enduring what is hard to endure, preserving their secrets, giving what is difficult to give, doing what is difficult to do, and revealing helpful knowledge. She then explores four means of sustaining relationships found in the Pāli Canon: generosity (dāna), endearing speech, beneficial actions, and treating others as oneself (samānattatā)—seeing our common humanity.

This teaching offers practical wisdom for both formal practitioners and anyone seeking to cultivate meaningful connections. Fella emphasizes that without community (saṅgha), there would be no Buddhism—it is the community that preserves and transmits the teachings across generations. The talk invites reflection on how our relationships can serve as vehicles for mutual awakening and the relief of suffering.

This talk was given at Insight Meditation South Bay.

This is part of a series on some of the lesser known teachings, but I thought I would start with a teaching that I've heard quite a few times—maybe some of you have heard it quite a few times too—that I didn't really understand or didn't really pay much attention to. I'd like to tie it together and flesh it out, including some things that are lesser known teachings.

Perhaps you've heard this part where Ananda, who is the Buddha's attendant, goes to the Buddha and says, "Venerable sir, I've heard that half of the holy life is good spiritual friends." And the Buddha corrects him and says, "Ananda, don't say that. The whole of the holy life is good spiritual friends."

I've heard this teaching quite a few times, and I always liked it. It made me feel good—this importance of relationships. But I'm not sure that I understood it. Why would I go on retreat? Why would I meditate? Why would I listen to dharma talks if the whole of the holy life is good spiritual friends? I felt like there's got to be more to this teaching. Or maybe it's not a real teaching. Maybe it's not really in there, just something that dharma teachers were saying.

So it's in there. When I say "in there," I mean the suttas, the Pali Canon—it's in there. This conversation is recorded. But there's more to it. There's more to that particular conversation, and there are other conversations about the role of spiritual friends and how they can support our practice.

One story is with Meghiya, who was the Buddha's attendant before Ananda. Ananda wasn't the Buddha's attendant for the Buddha's entire teaching career. Before that was Meghiya.

Meghiya, on his way to alms round one morning, saw that there was this mango grove that looked like the perfect place to meditate. So he goes on his alms round, comes back, and says to the Buddha, "I saw this mango grove. I think it would be really great. I would like to go there and meditate for the whole day." And the Buddha says, "No, don't go because there's nobody else here." Apparently the Buddha didn't want to be left alone; he needed to have an attendant with him.

Meghiya responds and says, "Venerable sir, you've done the work that needs to be done. I have not. I still have work that needs to be done. I would like to go spend the day meditating in the mango grove." For the second time, the Buddha says, "No, don't go because there's only the two of us here."

For a third time, Meghiya asks the Buddha. At this time in ancient India, it was the tradition that if somebody asked a question three times, the other had to acquiesce on the third time. We see this in the suttas repeatedly, where people ask the Buddha three times, and he says no, no, and then yes. So when Meghiya asks this third time, the Buddha says yes.

Meghiya goes to the mango grove to meditate. While he's there, he's assaulted by all these unwholesome thoughts. He can't get settled down, and he spends the whole day with thoughts of sensual desire and lust and greed, and thoughts of harming other people. He says, "It's amazing, it's astounding. Even after all these years of practice, I still have these types of thoughts that arise in my mind when I'm going to meditate."

At the end of the day, he goes to the Buddha and says, "I can't believe what happened. I had all these terrible thoughts of lust and harming other people." And I imagine that the Buddha is kind of thinking, "Well, I told you." Instead, what he says is, "Meghiya, when the mind is not ripe for liberation, there are things to do to help make the mind ripe for liberation. There are five things to help make the mind ripe for liberation, ready for awakening, ready for deliverance, ready for liberation from thoughts of lust and harming other people."

In this list of five things to help make the mind ready, number one is good spiritual friends—to help make the mind ready. The second is to be virtuous, to behave in a particular way that supports practice.

Virtuous is kind of a strange word—it may feel a little heavy. I'll talk about it a bit more in a moment.

Three is to hear the teachings, to hear the Dharma. Either to learn about the practice, or to be inspired, or simply to have an opportunity to understand what direction to go and where not to go if you're serious about this practice.

The fourth is: after you've heard about the practice and perhaps been inspired, the fourth quality to help make the mind ready for liberation is to arouse energy for practice. It's one thing to hear about practice. It's another thing to actually do something about it. So the fourth one is to arouse energy.

And the fifth is to have a certain amount of wisdom. You don't have to know everything, you don't have to be completely knowledgeable, and you don't have to already be awakened—but there needs to be a certain amount of wisdom.

So these five things: have good spiritual friends, be virtuous, hear the Dharma, arouse energy for practice, and be wise.

Perhaps it's not surprising that elsewhere in the suttas we read that if you have good spiritual friends—and this phrase "good spiritual friend" is a translation of the Pali expression kalyāṇamitta—then everything else follows. Maybe you've heard that sometimes meditation groups will have kalyāṇamitta groups, where peers get together and talk about the Dharma and share their practice and what's happening with them.

Elsewhere in the discourses we find that if a person has kalyāṇamittas, good spiritual friends, it turns out that they will be virtuous—the second thing on this list. They will hear the Dharma, they will arouse energy, and they will be wise. So having good spiritual friends helps you do all these other things on the path.

Let me spend a little time fleshing some of these out.

This idea of being virtuous—it's not only about how we behave. It's also the attitudes we have. Are we compassionate? Are we caring? For both ourselves and for others. Are we doing the things that need to be done and not doing the things that shouldn't be done?

Implied in this is also the idea of right conduct, appropriate behavior for the context. I can imagine that if you're going to give a presentation to the Supreme Court of the United States, you behave in a particular manner, which is probably different than if you're picking your kids up from daycare. There's this sense that virtue includes having the right conduct for the right setting, behaving in a particular way. It helps support your practice and helps support other people's practice too.

A big part of virtue—ethics, morality, maybe those are better words—is about supporting other people. We don't harm them, we don't steal from them, we don't lie to them. Having good spiritual friends can help us with that.

I know I've had this experience. Early in my practice, I wanted to share a story with some of my Dharma friends. I started to tell this story and I realized, oh, this is actually about somebody else. It's not my story to tell. It was going to be: did you hear what happened to so-and-so? And I thought, that's actually not really supportive. But one of my friends said, "Diane, are you sure you want to go down this path with what you're about to say?" I was so appreciative, because it was just helpful. Yeah, I don't have to be gossiping. I don't have to be telling stories about other people. That's not particularly helpful. It may have entertainment value, but it's not a kind thing to do. That's part of having friends in the Dharma who support you to be the best version of yourself, and who remind you of what you often already know—but sometimes we forget, or we get lost in the moment, disconnected from ourselves. In this way, having good spiritual friends can help us come to the best behavior.

The second area: good spiritual friends can help us hear the Dharma. In very simple ways—"Okay, I'll see you at IMC next Tuesday." Just that type of thing. Certainly this has been helpful for me, having friends that I knew I was going to see here, or saying to somebody, "I'll see you then." It helps support showing up even when you don't feel like going to the meditation center.

And maybe you've had this too, where somebody says, "I read this great book. Have you read this? Here's an interesting podcast. Have you heard of this person? It's really great. There's this article..." Things that get forwarded or shared—an opportunity to hear the Dharma.

And then in the Pali Canon, when they talk about good spiritual friends supporting other people to hear the Dharma, they speak of Dharma that includes talk on solitude. This recognition that even though you have friends and you practice with friends and they encourage you to practice together, it still includes an appreciation of solitude.

Sometimes if we want to meditate, we can meditate with others. Sometimes we meditate by ourselves. But we recognize that it's not all about being with other people. Sometimes we have to really be with ourselves and be with what's happening within ourselves, checking in about what's arising.

And some of this Dharma talk, when you're hearing the Dharma, is also about liberation—hearing things that are inspiring or meaningful or that make us want to engage, whatever that may be for each of us. Perhaps at different times in our lives and different times in our practice, it's different things. But it's not only how to practice, what to do, but things that are inspiring and that encourage us.

The other quality is that good spiritual friends help arouse energy for practice. Specifically, this means the energy to abandon what is unwholesome and to cultivate what is wholesome. That's such a big part of the practice—learning what is wholesome and what isn't wholesome.

Most of us have a general idea, but the more we practice, the more we discover. Just like for me, being about to tell a story about somebody else, realizing there was a time in my life where that seemed perfectly harmless and a normal thing to do. But as I started to practice and become more sensitive to other people's needs and how they were in the world, what made me feel like I had some real integrity was to not start talking about other people. So part of the Dharma is to learn that for ourselves through practice, as well as to have some pointers, some people to point out: here's a direction to go, here's a direction not to go.

And then the last quality is to be wise. What's pointed out specifically is this idea of certain wisdom about seeing the arising and passing of phenomena—pointing towards impermanence.

There are so many different levels of this. We know impermanence, right? We know that the weather today is not exactly the same as it was yesterday and it will be a little bit different tomorrow. But this really deep insight into impermanence is also one of the key insights in this tradition that leads to liberation. A very thorough understanding or knowing of impermanence is one of the gateways into awakening.

It's also a way to just have a better life, if we can appreciate that things change, that they're not always the same. Then we're less likely to hold on to those things that are going to be slipping away, or to imagine things into the future that perhaps won't be that way because things change.

So this insight into impermanence is really key both in the big Buddhist endeavor of awakening as well as just having a better life. We're going to age, we're going to get sick. Things change. People we love are going to age and get sick and die.

With all of this idea of perhaps it is a good idea to have good spiritual friends, what does it mean? What is a good spiritual friend? In addition to these qualities—helping you hear the Dharma, arousing energy, being virtuous, and having a certain amount of wisdom—would you be surprised if I said there's yet another Buddhist list about how to be a good spiritual friend?

It's amazing, all of these lists. I actually love these lists. I'm one of those people for whom they help me remember. Like, oh yeah, there's seven, and I can only remember four—what are the other three? So I actually like having all these lists.

There are seven qualities of a good spiritual friend. Most of these lists, for those of you who are familiar with them, are given in a particular order. Usually when we know the five faculties or the seven factors of awakening, for example, there's a usual order: number one is usually this, number two is usually that. But for these seven qualities of a good spiritual friend, I'm going to mix up the list in a way that feels right, in a way that I think is a nicer way to talk about it.

Number one, in Diana's version: How to be a good spiritual friend? Don't despise your friend.

It seems obvious. I'm a little bit curious why it's in there. But then I started to think about how sometimes maybe you get angry at people.

Or get fed up. Or maybe you're friends from historical reasons—you've been friends for a long time, but you've started to really dislike the person. I don't know. But this is, for me, number one: don't despise your friends.

The rest form a little cluster that I'm interpreting as standing by your friend. Stand by them. So number two is to not forsake them when they're having difficulties, to still stand by them. I think all of us would recognize that's a good quality of a friend. And maybe related to that is to patiently endure what is difficult to endure. There are no details about this, but maybe your friend is going through a really difficult thing, and that is all your friend can talk about—a big event that's happening in his or her life, or a big decision he or she has to make, and that's maybe all that they talk about. But to be a good friend is to patiently endure what needs to be endured.

And the third one is to preserve their secrets. If they share things with you, don't share them with others. I think this is interesting—that this is on a Buddhist list, to preserve people's secrets. It encourages some confidentiality, encourages some intimacy. You can share things with others when you know that they're not going to be sharing them with other people.

Then the next little cluster of qualities for how to be a good spiritual friend is to support your friend. So don't despise them, stand by them in these three different ways, and this third grouping is to support them. What's listed here is to give what is difficult to give and to do what is difficult to do. I think that's right—that's what kind of distinguishes a friend from maybe just an acquaintance. I don't know exactly what "give" might mean, but you can imagine maybe to give some feedback, but in a kind, gentle way that's appropriate. Or to do what is difficult to do—maybe to help support your friend, help them move on a Saturday when you really don't want to. I don't know exactly, but I think all of us understand this is a friend that stands by.

And then here's number seven: a good friend reveals secrets. I'm understanding this two ways. One, maybe about themselves—if you're a good friend, you are sharing what your life is like, part of your inner life. But it could also be practical things, like the best way to get to IMC at 7:30 when there's traffic is don't take 101, go down this other route—some little secret, something that you've learned, some little trick, to freely share those.

So these are the seven ways to be a good friend: don't despise others, don't forsake them, patiently endure what is difficult to endure, and preserve their secrets. Give what is difficult to give, do what is difficult to do, and reveal secrets. I think all of these are something we would recognize. There's nothing here that is surprising or perhaps new.

So we've talked about how having good spiritual friends is really helpful. We've talked about how to be a good spiritual friend. And then also in the Buddhist literature, this earliest literature, the Pali Canon, there's teaching on how to sustain relationships once you have them.

When Shaila invited me to talk and to say something about teachings that aren't spoken of so often, this is one that I had in mind. We don't hear about this so much—how to sustain relationships. Obviously you continue being a good friend, but when the Buddha was teaching, he was teaching from his perspective of ending suffering. If you're a good friend, you help people end their suffering. In his view, it's all about that. All the teachings, everything—the purpose for him was to help other people end their suffering. His idea was that if you're going to be a good friend, you're going to help them end their suffering. So these teachings are pointed in that direction.

The first thing to do to sustain relationships is to be generous.

In the suttas, it is said that among all gifts, the best gift is the gift of the Dharma, the gift of the teachings. This is very consistent with the idea of relieving suffering—if you want to relieve suffering, you give the Dharma. But we can expand this understanding of generosity. It includes giving people the benefit of the doubt. It includes letting them speak fully if something important is happening, generously letting them speak instead of holding to the idea that we must speak. It includes supporting them in other ways, whether with material goods or with time. So the first way to maintain relationships is to be generous, and there are so many different ways to be generous.

The second is to have endearing speech. This phrase, "endearing speech," only occurs in the Pali canon in this particular list of four things for sustaining relationships, which I think is quite interesting. Perhaps not surprisingly, it says that among the types of endearing speech, the best is teaching the Dharma. But what I find particularly interesting here is the emphasis on teaching the Dharma to one who is interested in it and listens with eager ears. It's not about trying to convert people who don't want to hear about this. Instead, for those who have some sincerity and really want to hear about it, we teach the Dharma to them, share what we know. I appreciate this idea as a type of endearing speech—it is something they want to hear, not something they don't want to hear.

Along these lines, we can also understand endearing speech as verbal acts of loving-kindness, this expression of doing metta by saying kind things to other people. When I was looking at the list of speakers for this series on not-frequently-taught teachings, I saw that next week Tony Bernhard will talk more about this, about verbal acts of loving-kindness.

There is also this teaching that part of right speech is to not be divisive—that is, to not repeat elsewhere what you heard here with the purpose of dividing people, setting up an us-versus-them dichotomy. That's part of the ways of speech, like right speech, to not be divisive. Instead, we become promoters of friendships, using speech as a promoter of friendships that reunites those who are divided, that brings people together and supports relationships and community. We speak in a way that supports concord and helps people rejoice in concord and have delight in concord. The English is perhaps a little unusual—it's not part of our active vocabulary to "rejoice in concord." But there is this idea of appreciating the friends we have and speaking in a way that lets them know, supporting the communities and relationships we have.

Another part of endearing speech as a way to maintain relationships is to not speak harshly. Instead, we speak words that are gentle, pleasing to the ear and lovable, that go to the heart and are courteous and agreeable. There is no need for us to use language that is harmful or hurtful. That's perhaps obvious, but what constitutes harsh speech requires sensitivity—there is a right time to say things and a way to say things. The guidelines for speech are, of course, that it be timely, beneficial, kind, and true. Here we add speaking about the Dharma if the person wants to hear about it, and speaking in a way that promotes community and promotes relationships.

The third way to sustain relationships is to do beneficial actions. In the suttas, this is described as performing actions that encourage, settle, and establish a person without confidence in the accomplishment of confidence; encourage, settle, and establish an immoral person in the accomplishment of virtuous behavior; encourage, settle, and establish a miserly person in the accomplishment of generosity; and encourage, settle, and establish an unwise person in the accomplishment of wisdom. I interpret this as a way to help people find their way. I don't think we're going to convert people if they are a certain way—that's not our job. We all have our own path and our own way of getting there.

But to encourage, settle, and establish—I feel like establishing is something a person has to do for themselves. But part of being a good spiritual friend is about creating the conditions in which others can be the best version of themselves, so that they can hear the teachings if that's what they're interested in, if that's what they want to do. And then helping them to practice. These are part of the beneficial actions.

As I mentioned earlier, a good spiritual friend also helps people be virtuous. And you help other people be virtuous by being virtuous yourself. Maybe I shouldn't use that word—it sounds funny to me. Ethical, having integrity. Those sound a little bit better to my ear.

The fourth means of sustaining relationships is this very interesting word in Pali. If we were to translate it directly into English, it would be "the same as myself." Some would translate that as being without bias, without prejudice, impartial—to view others, to see others the same as myself. This idea of common humanity. We all share certain things. We all have difficulties. We all have aspirations, though they may not be the same ones. But the idea that there are certain things we share. It's the opposite of being divisive. It's the opposite of having prejudice. The same as myself. Samānattā.

So I started by talking about the Buddha saying to Ananda, "Ananda, don't say that it's just half of the holy life. Good spiritual friends are the whole of the holy life." Then in other suttas we find this gets expanded—that if you have good spiritual friends, you'll be virtuous, hear the Dharma, have energy to practice, and have wisdom. And you can be a good spiritual friend through these seven qualities: don't despise your friend, stand by them, don't forsake them, patiently endure what needs to be endured, preserve their secrets, support them, give what is difficult to give, do what is difficult to do, and reveal secrets. Once you have relationships and good spiritual friends, it's important to sustain them. We do that with generosity, endearing speech, beneficial actions, and treating others the same as ourselves—seeing others the same as ourselves.

There's more I could say, but I'd like to open it up for questions or comments. But maybe before I do that, let me say one more thing.

Often when we think about the Buddhist teachings or the Buddha, we imagine this very powerful, amazing figure—the Buddha giving a talk, with people sitting around listening. For me, that's how I would visualize that time. And often, as practitioners or scholars, we give importance to that figure in the center, the Buddha. But it's the community that preserves the teachings. It's the community that teaches each other. The Buddha was not always there. He traveled around and wasn't always present for the monastics. This is true today in monasteries as well—very often the monks or nuns are teaching each other rather than the abbot or abbess.

I want to emphasize the importance of community, not only for our own spiritual practice, not only for our own lives—it's part of psychological well-being too, this sense of belonging to community. But also this recognition: without a community, there would be no Buddhism. We would have the Buddha, but there wouldn't be anything passed down through the generations, actively practiced, dispersed throughout the world.

So as a way to tie together this idea of good spiritual friends: there's having good spiritual friends for ourselves as individuals, being good spiritual friends to others, and being part of a community. And then how this community is part of something bigger—that's Buddhism too.

For the benefit of anyone who might not have heard, Sharon was speaking about the importance of trust in friendships, including specifically the importance of not revealing secrets, and also about right speech.

I was happy to find some of these teachings in the early Buddhist literature. I don't think anything I've shared here is new or something we don't already know. But sometimes, just like with so many things in the Dharma, it's helpful to be reminded of their importance.

Sharon also spoke briefly about restoring trust when it's been broken. I was thinking about the guiding principle underlying all these lists—seven ways to be a good friend, four ways to maintain a relationship, and so on. The guiding principle behind what the Buddha was teaching is to help relieve suffering. So if we want to restore trust, the question becomes: How can we support that other person? How can we relieve their suffering? At the same time, we acknowledge and honor what's happening for ourselves too. But if we can hold that bigger picture—for the benefit of others and ourselves, and to not harm either others or ourselves—that becomes our compass.

Elizabeth shared that our friends are aging. All of us are aging, of course. Some of her friends are perhaps becoming harder of hearing, maybe aren't the best drivers anymore, and have many issues arising in their lives. Perhaps they're sharing about these difficulties. In order to be a good friend during such times, these teachings serve as reminders: be generous, do what is difficult to do, patiently endure what needs to be endured, keep secrets.

Then the question arose: Is this teaching us to treat friends differently than random strangers? What do you think? Someone said the answer was no, but he wasn't sure why.

Sharon reminded us of a helpful teaching about how we are dependent on others—for growing our food, making our clothes, sometimes preparing our food as well. We are so profoundly dependent on other people, and recognizing this can influence how we relate to everyone.

But to return to the question about friends versus strangers: How many of you have had the experience that the more you practice, the less interesting it becomes to set up or maintain rivals and enemies and categories of people we don't like? It just starts to feel unnecessary—like we don't need to spend so much energy doing that anymore. So maybe not everybody becomes our best friend, but this idea of withholding generosity toward certain people becomes less compelling. There's simply not as much energy for whatever was preventing us from being friendly toward them. I'm not saying we're all going to become best friends with everyone soon.

Someone observed that friendship requires interacting, requires doing something. And I agree—this list of qualities does involve action. But at the same time, not all of them appear overtly active. Patiently enduring, for instance, sometimes doesn't look very active at all. And yet we also have friends we've known for a long time whom we haven't heard from in decades. Then we reconnect and feel that sense of connection again. So both are true: we have relationships that we actively cultivate as a big part of our current lives, and we have friends from another era, perhaps from when we lived in another place.

Someone else noted how the way we interact with strangers creates its own dynamic. If we act toward them with anger, we're likely to receive anger in return. If we treat them with respect, we'll likely receive respect back. This can be a significant part of our practice—simply acknowledging the person who checks us out at the grocery store, treating them with respect, looking them in the eye, saying hello and asking how they are. These simple gestures can make a real difference. The janitors, the people we often don't notice or pay attention to—extending our awareness and care to them matters.

Thank you.

Where do we go to find these virtuous friends? Do you have some ideas?

For me, I found a lot of people at meditation centers—people who came from different walks of life and had very different lives, but we shared something in common: this appreciation for the Dharma, this trying to find our way with it, to understand it, to discover what practice really is. Through becoming friends at meditation centers, I've made many truly wonderful connections.

So perhaps here, at the end of the sitting when you meet to say hello to somebody, that could be just the introduction of something. It could be the start of something.

Thank you. It's a pleasure being here and teaching with you.

CHAPTER 215

Sustaining Relationships

Andrea Fella · 44 min

In this talk, Andrea Fella examines the often-cited but rarely understood teaching where the Buddha tells Ānanda that good spiritual friends (kalyāṇamitta) constitute not just half, but the whole of the holy life. Drawing from the Meghiya Sutta and related texts, she explores how having virtuous companions helps practitioners develop the five qualities that ripen the mind for liberation: spiritual friendship, virtue (sīla), hearing the Dhamma, arousing energy for practice, and cultivating wisdom regarding impermanence.

Fella presents seven qualities of a good spiritual friend: not despising one's friend, not forsaking them during difficulties, patiently enduring what is hard to endure, preserving their secrets, giving what is difficult to give, doing what is difficult to do, and revealing helpful knowledge. She then outlines four means of sustaining relationships found in the Pāli Canon: generosity (dāna), endearing speech, beneficial actions, and treating others as oneself (samānattā)—viewing others without bias through our common humanity.

The talk emphasizes that while the Buddha is often visualized as the central figure, it is the sangha—the community of practitioners—that preserves and transmits the teachings. This recognition highlights how spiritual friendship is not merely beneficial for individual practice but essential for the continuation of the Dhamma itself. The practical wisdom shared offers guidance for both developing meaningful spiritual connections and maintaining them through life's inevitable changes.

This talk was given at Insight Meditation South Bay.

This is part of a series exploring some of the lesser known teachings. But I thought I would start with a teaching that I've heard quite a few times—maybe some of you have heard it quite a few times too—that I didn't really understand or didn't really pay much attention to. I'd like to tie it together and flesh it out, including some things that are lesser known teachings.

Perhaps you've heard this teaching where Ananda, who is the Buddha's attendant, goes to the Buddha and says, "Venerable sir, I've heard that half of the holy life is good spiritual friends." And the Buddha corrects him and says, "Ananda, don't say that. The whole of the holy life is good spiritual friends."

I've heard this teaching quite a few times and I always liked it. It made me feel good—this importance of relationships. But I'm not sure that I understood it. Why would I go on retreat? Why would I meditate? Why would I listen to Dharma talks if it's all about good spiritual friends? I felt like there's got to be more to this teaching. Or maybe it's not a real teaching. Maybe it's not really in there, just something that Dharma teachers were saying.

It's in there. When I say "in there," I mean the suttas, the Pali Canon—it's in there. This conversation is recorded. But there's more to it. There's more to that particular conversation, and there are other conversations about the role of spiritual friends and how they can support our practice.

One story is with Meghiya, who was the Buddha's attendant before Ananda. Ananda wasn't the Buddha's attendant for the Buddha's entire teaching career. Before that was Meghiya.

Meghiya, on his way to alms round one morning, saw a mango grove that looked like the perfect place to meditate. So he goes to his alms round, comes back, and says to the Buddha, "I saw this mango grove. I think it would be really great. I would like to go there and meditate for the whole day."

The Buddha says, "Don't go, because there's nobody else here." Apparently the Buddha didn't want to be left alone; he needed to have an attendant with him.

Meghiya responds, "Venerable sir, you've done the work that needs to be done. I have not. I still have work that needs to be done. I would like to go spend the day meditating in the mango grove."

For the second time, the Buddha says, "No, don't go, because there's only the two of us here."

For a third time, Meghiya makes his request. At this time in ancient India, it was the tradition that if somebody asked a question three times, the other person had to acquiesce on the third time. We see this in the suttas repeatedly, where people ask the Buddha three times, and he says no, no, and then yes. So when Meghiya asks this third time, the Buddha says yes.

Meghiya goes to the mango grove to meditate. While he's there, he's assaulted by all these unwholesome thoughts. He can't get settled down. He spends the whole day with thoughts of sensual desire and lust and greed, and thoughts of harming other people. He reflects, "It's amazing, it's astounding. Even after all these years of practice, I still have these types of thoughts that arise in my mind when I'm going to meditate."

At the end of the day, he goes to the Buddha and says, "I can't believe what happened. I had all these terrible thoughts of lust and harming other people."

I imagine the Buddha is kind of thinking, "Well, I told you." Instead, what he says is, "Meghiya, when the mind is not ripe for liberation, there are things to do to help make the mind ripe for liberation. There are five things to help make the mind ready for awakening, ready for deliverance, ready for liberation from thoughts of lust and harming other people."

In this list of five things to help make the mind ready, number one is good spiritual friends. The second is to be virtuous—to behave in a way that supports practice.

The word "virtuous" is perhaps a bit of heavy or awkward language. I'll talk about it a little more in a moment.

Third is to hear the teachings, to hear the Dharma—either to learn about the practice or to be inspired, an opportunity to understand what direction to go and where not to go if you're serious about this practice.

Fourth, after you've heard about the practice and perhaps are inspired, the fourth quality to help make the mind ready for liberation is to arouse energy for practice. It's one thing to hear about practice; it's another thing to actually do something about it. So the fourth is to arouse energy.

And the fifth is to have a certain amount of wisdom. You don't have to know everything, you don't have to be completely knowledgeable, and you don't have to already be awakened, but there needs to be a certain amount of wisdom.

So these five things: have good spiritual friends, be virtuous, hear the Dharma, arouse energy for practice, and be wise.

Perhaps it's not surprising that elsewhere in the suttas we read that if you have good spiritual friends—and this term "good spiritual friend" is a translation of the expression kalyāṇamitta. Maybe you've heard that sometimes meditation groups will have Kalyāṇamitta groups, where peers get together to talk about the Dharma, share their practice and what's happening with them.

Elsewhere in the discourses we find that if a person has good spiritual friends, kalyāṇamittas, it turns out they will be virtuous—the second thing on this list. They will hear the Dharma, they will arouse energy, and they will be wise. Having good spiritual friends helps you do all these other things on the path.

Let me flesh some of these out.

This idea of being virtuous—it's not only about how we behave. It's also about the attitudes we have. Are we compassionate? Are we caring? For both ourselves and for others. Are we doing the things that need to be done and not doing the things that shouldn't be done?

Implied in this is right conduct, and sometimes in English we use the somewhat awkward term "resort"—the right behavior for the right setting. I can imagine that if you're going to give a presentation to the Supreme Court of the United States, you behave in a particular manner, which is probably different than if you're picking your kids up from daycare. Virtue also means having the right conduct for the right setting, behaving in a particular way that supports your practice and supports other people's practice too.

A big part of virtue, ethics, morality—maybe those are better words—is about supporting other people. We don't harm them, we don't steal from them, we don't lie to them. Having good spiritual friends can help us with that.

I know I have this experience. Early in my practice I wanted to share a story with some Dharma friends, and as I started, I realized this story was actually about somebody else. It wasn't my story to tell. It was going to be, "Did you hear what happened to so-and-so?" And I thought, that's actually not really supportive. But one of my friends said, "Diana, are you sure you want to go down this path with what you're about to say?"

I was so appreciative, because it was just helpful. I don't have to be gossiping. I don't have to be telling stories about other people. That's not particularly helpful. It may have entertainment value, but it's not a kind thing to do. That's part of having friends in the Dharma—they support you to be the best version of yourself and remind you of what you often already know but sometimes forget, or when you get lost in the moment and disconnected from yourself. In this way, having good spiritual friends can help us come to our best behavior.

The second way good spiritual friends help is by helping us hear the Dharma. In very simple ways—"Okay, I'll see you at IMC next Tuesday." Having friends I knew I would see here, or even saying to somebody, "I'll see you then"—it helps support going even when you don't feel like you want to go to the meditation center.

And maybe you've had this experience too, where somebody says, "I read this great book. Have you read this?" Or "Here's an interesting podcast. Have you heard of this person? It's really great." Or an article gets forwarded—an opportunity to hear the Dharma.

And then in the Pali Canon, when they talk about good spiritual friends supporting others to hear the Dharma, they speak of Dharma that includes talk on solitude. There's this recognition that even though you have friends and you practice with friends and they encourage you to practice together, it still includes an appreciation of solitude. Sometimes if we want to meditate, we can meditate with others. Sometimes we meditate by ourselves. But to recognize that it's not all about being with other people—sometimes we have to really be with ourselves and be with what's happening with ourselves, to kind of check in about what's going on.

And some of the Dharma talk, when you're hearing the Dharma, is also about liberation—hearing things that are inspiring or meaningful or that make us want to engage, whatever that may be for each of us. Maybe at different times in our lives and different times in our practice, it's different things. But it's not only how to practice, what to do, but things that are inspiring and that encourage us.

Then the other thing is that good spiritual friends help arouse energy for practice—specifically, the energy to abandon what is unwholesome and to cultivate what is wholesome. That's such a big part of the practice, learning what is wholesome and what isn't wholesome. Most of us have a general idea, but the more we practice, the more we discover. Just like for me, being about to tell a story about somebody else and realizing—there was a time in my life where that seemed perfectly harmless and a normal thing to do. But as I started to practice and become more sensitive to other people's needs and how they were in the world, what made me feel like I had some real integrity was to not start talking about other people. So part of the Dharma is to learn that for ourselves through practice, as well as to have some pointers, some people to point out: here's a direction to go, here's a direction not to go.

And then the last one is to be wise. What's pointed out specifically is this idea of certain wisdom about seeing the arising and passing of phenomena—pointing towards impermanence. There are so many different levels of this. We know impermanence, right? We know that the weather today is not exactly the same as it was yesterday, and it will be a little bit different tomorrow, I hear anyway. But also this really deep insight into impermanence is one of the key insights in this tradition that leads to liberation. A very thorough understanding or knowing of impermanence is one of the gateways into awakening.

It's also a way to just have a better life too, if we can appreciate that things change. They're not always the same. Then we're less likely to hold on to those things that are going to be slipping away, or to imagine things into the future that perhaps won't be that way, because things change. So this insight into impermanence is really key both in the big Buddhist endeavor of awakening as well as just having a better life. We're going to age, we're going to get sick. Things change. People we love are going to age and get sick and die.

So with all of this idea of—okay, so maybe it is a good idea to have good spiritual friends—what does it mean? What is a good spiritual friend? How is that? In addition to these types of things—help you see the Dharma, arouse energy, be virtuous, and have a certain amount of wisdom—would you be surprised if I said there's yet another Buddhist list about how to be a good spiritual friend? It's amazing, right? All of these lists. I actually love these lists. I'm one of those people that it helps me remember. Like, oh yeah, there's seven, and I can only remember four—what are the other three? So I actually like having all these lists.

There are seven qualities of a good spiritual friend. Most of these lists, for those of you who are familiar with them, are given in a particular order. Usually when we know the five faculties or the seven factors of awakening, for example, number one is usually this, number two is usually that. But for these seven qualities of a good spiritual friend, I'm going to mix up the list a little, in a way that feels right, in a way that I think is a nicer way to just talk about it.

Number one, in Diana's version: How to be a good spiritual friend? Don't despise your friend. It seems obvious. I'm a little bit curious why it's in there. But then I started to think about, you know, sometimes maybe you get angry at people.

Or get fed up. Or maybe you're friends for historical reasons—you've been together for a long time, but you've started to really dislike the person. I don't know. This is, for me, number one: Don't despise your friends.

The rest form a little cluster that I'm interpreting as standing by your friend. Stand by them.

So number two is to not forsake them when they're having difficulties, to still stand by them. I think all of us would recognize that as a good quality of a friend.

And maybe related to that is to patiently endure what is difficult to endure. There's no details about this, but maybe your friend is going through a really difficult time, and that is all your friend can talk about. A big event that's happening in his or her life, or a big decision he or she has to make, and that's maybe all that they talk about. But to be a good friend is to patiently endure what needs to be endured.

And the third one is to preserve their secrets. If they share things with you, to not share them with others. I think this is interesting—this is on a Buddhist list, to preserve people's secrets. It kind of encourages some confidentiality, encourages some intimacy. To share things. So you can share things with others when you know that they're not going to be sharing them with other people.

And then the next little cluster of how to be a good spiritual friend is to support your friend. So don't despise them, stand by them in these three different ways, and this third grouping is to support them.

What's listed here is to give what is difficult to give and to do what is difficult to do. I think that's right—that's what kind of distinguishes a friend from maybe just an acquaintance. I don't know exactly what "give" means—you can imagine maybe to give some feedback, but in a kind, gentle way that's appropriate. Or to do what is difficult to do—maybe to help support your friend, help them move on a Saturday when you really don't want to. Or something. I don't know exactly, but I think all of us understand. This is a friend that stands by.

And then here's number seven: A good friend reveals secrets. I'm understanding this two ways. One, maybe about themselves—if you're a good friend, you are sharing kind of what your life is like, part of your inner life. But it could also be, you know, the best way to get to IMC at 7:30 when there's traffic is don't take 101, go down this road—some little secret, something that you've learned, some little trick, to freely share those.

So these are the seven ways to be a good friend: Don't despise others. Don't forsake them. Patiently endure what is difficult to endure, and preserve their secrets. Give what is difficult to give, do what is difficult to do, and reveal secrets. I think all of these are something that we would recognize. There's nothing here that is surprising or perhaps new.

So we've talked about how having good spiritual friends is really helpful. We've talked about how to be a good spiritual friend. And then also in the Buddhist literature, this earliest literature, the Pali Canon, there are teachings about how to sustain relationships once you have them.

When Shaila invited me to talk and to say something about teachings that aren't so often discussed, this is one that I had in mind. This is something that we don't hear about so much—how to sustain relationships. Obviously you continue being a good friend, but when the Buddha was teaching, he was teaching from his perspective of ending suffering. If you're a good friend, you help people end their suffering. In his view, it's all about that. All the teachings, everything—the purpose for him was to help other people end their suffering. His idea was that if you're going to be a good friend, you're going to help them end their suffering. So these teachings are pointed in that direction, to help end suffering.

The first thing to do to sustain relationships is to be generous.

In the suttas, it says that among all gifts, the best gift is the gift of the Dharma, the gift of the teachings. This is very consistent with this idea—if you want to relieve suffering, you would give them the Dharma.

But we can expand that understanding of generosity. It includes giving people the benefit of the doubt. It includes letting them speak at length if there's really something happening, generously allowing them space to express themselves instead of feeling that we have to speak. It also means supporting them in other ways, whether with material goods or with our time. So the first way to maintain relationships is to be generous, and there are so many different ways to be generous.

The second is to have endearing speech. This phrase, "endearing speech," only occurs in the Pali Canon in this particular list of four things for sustaining relationships, which I think is interesting. Perhaps not surprisingly, it says that among the types of endearing speech, the best is teaching the Dharma—but specifically teaching the Dharma to one who is interested in it and listens with eager ears. It's not about trying to convert people who don't want to hear about this. Instead, for those who have some sincerity and really want to hear about it, teach the Dharma to them, share what you know. I rather like that idea as a type of endearing speech—it's something that they want to hear, not something that they don't.

Along these lines, we can also understand endearing speech as verbal acts of loving-kindness, this expression of doing metta by saying kind things to other people. When I was looking at the list of speakers for this series on teachings that aren't frequently taught, I noticed that next week is Tony Bernhard. When I saw what he's going to be talking about—these verbal acts of loving-kindness—I realized he'll explore this more deeply.

There's also this teaching that part of right speech is to not be divisive. That is, to not repeat elsewhere what you heard here with the purpose of dividing people, of setting up an us-versus-them dichotomy. Instead, speech should be a promoter of friendships, speech that reunites those who are divided. We use our speech to bring people together, to support relationships and community. We speak in a way that supports concord and helps people rejoice in concord and have delight in concord. The English is perhaps a bit formal—"rejoice in concord" may not be part of our active vocabulary. But this idea of appreciating the friends we have and speaking in a way that lets them know, that supports the communities and relationships we have, is valuable.

Another part of endearing speech as a way to maintain relationships is to not speak harshly. Instead, we speak words that are gentle, pleasing to the ear and lovable, words that go to the heart and are courteous and agreeable. There's no need for us to use language that is harmful or hurtful. That's perhaps obvious, but sometimes what constitutes harshness requires sensitivity. There's a right time to say things and a skillful way to say them. Of course, speech should be timely, beneficial, kind, and true—these are the guidelines for what to say. Here we're adding speaking about the Dharma if the person wants to hear about it, and speaking in a way that promotes community and relationships.

The third way to sustain relationships is to do beneficial actions. In the suttas, this is described as doing actions that encourage, settle, and establish a person without confidence in the accomplishment of confidence. Actions that encourage, settle, and establish an immoral person in the accomplishment of virtuous behavior. Actions that encourage, settle, and establish a miserly person in the accomplishment of generosity. Actions that encourage, settle, and establish an unwise person in the accomplishment of wisdom.

I'm interpreting this as a way to help people find their way. I don't think we're going to convert people—if they're a certain way, it's not our job to transform them into something else. We all have our own path and our own way of getting there.

But to encourage, settle, and establish—I feel like that's something somebody has to do for themselves. Yet part of being a good spiritual friend is about creating the conditions in which others can be the best version of themselves, so that they can hear the teachings if that's what they're interested in, if that's what they want to do. And then helping them to practice. These are part of the beneficial actions.

And then, of course, I talked earlier about why a good spiritual friend also helps people be virtuous. You help other people be virtuous by being virtuous yourself. Maybe I shouldn't use that word—it sounds a bit funny to me. Ethical. Having integrity. Those sound a little better to my ear.

The fourth means of sustaining relationships is this very interesting word in Pali. If we were to translate it directly into English, it would be "the same as myself." Some translate this as being without bias, without prejudice, being impartial—to view others, to see others as the same as myself. This idea of common humanity. We all share certain experiences. We all have difficulties. We all have aspirations—they may not be the same ones, but the idea is that there are certain things we share. And it's the opposite of being divisive. It's the opposite of having prejudice. The same as myself. Samānattā.

So I started by talking about the Buddha saying to Ānanda, "Ānanda, don't say that it's just half of the holy life. Good spiritual friends are the whole of the holy life." Then in other suttas we find this gets expanded—that if you have good spiritual friends, then you'll be virtuous, hear the Dhamma, have energy to practice, and have wisdom. And you can be a good spiritual friend through these seven qualities: don't despise your friend, stand by them, don't forsake them, patiently endure what needs to be endured, preserve their secrets and support them, give what is difficult to give and do what is difficult to do, and reveal secrets. And then this idea that once you have relationships and good spiritual friends, it's important to sustain them. We do that with generosity, endearing speech, beneficial actions, and treating others as ourselves—seeing others as ourselves.

There's more I could say, but I feel I'd like to open it up for questions now, or comments. But maybe before I do that, I'll say one more thing.

Often when we think about the Buddhist teachings or the Buddha, we imagine this very powerful, amazing figure—the Buddha—giving a talk. And maybe there are people sitting around listening. For me, if I were to visualize that time, that's what I would see. And often, as practitioners or scholars, we give importance to that figure in the center, the Buddha. But it's the community that preserves the teachings. It's the community that teaches each other. The Buddha was not always there. He traveled around; he wasn't always present for the monastics. And this is true today in monasteries as well—very often the monks or the nuns are teaching each other rather than the abbot or the abbess.

So I want to emphasize the importance of community, not only for our own spiritual practice, not only for our own lives—it's part of psychological well-being too, this sense of belonging to community. But also this recognition: without a community, there would be no Buddhism. We would have the Buddha, but there wouldn't be anything passed down through the generations, actively practiced, dispersed throughout the world as it is now.

This is a way to tie in this idea of good spiritual friends: for us as individuals to have good spiritual friends, for us to be good spiritual friends, and for us to be part of a community. And how this community is also part of something bigger—this is part of Buddhism itself.

So now I'll open it up to see if people have questions or comments.

So Sharon was talking about the importance of trust in friendships, including specifically not revealing secrets, and right speech. I was happy to find some of these teachings in the early Buddhist literature. I don't think anything I said here is new—nothing we don't already know. But sometimes, just like so many things in the Dharma, it's helpful to be reminded of their importance.

She also spoke briefly about restoring trust when it's been broken. I was thinking about the guiding principle for all these lists—seven ways to be a good friend, four ways to maintain a relationship, and so on. The guiding principle is what the Buddha was teaching: to help relieve suffering. So if we want to restore trust, how can we support that other person? How can we relieve their suffering? At the same time, we acknowledge and honor what's happening for ourselves too. But if we can hold that big picture—for the benefit of others and ourselves, to not harm either others or ourselves—that becomes our guide.

Elizabeth was saying that our friends are aging. All of us are aging, right? And some of our friends are perhaps getting difficult to hear, maybe aren't the best drivers, and have a lot going on in their lives. So perhaps in order to be a good friend, these teachings serve as reminders of how to be one: be generous, do what is difficult to do, patiently endure what needs to be endured, keep secrets.

The question arose: is this teaching us to treat friends differently than random strangers? What do you think? One person said no, but wasn't sure why. Sharon reminded us of a helpful teaching—how we are dependent on others for growing food, making clothes, sometimes making food too. We are so dependent on other people. This recognition can influence us.

But to return to the question: how many of you have had this experience, that the more you practice, the less interesting it becomes to set up or maintain rivals and enemies and people we don't like? It just feels like we don't need to spend so much energy on that type of thing anymore. So maybe not everybody becomes our best friend, but this idea of not behaving in a generous manner toward someone becomes less interesting. There's just not as much energy for whatever was preventing us from being friendly toward them. I'm not saying we're all going to be best friends soon, but something shifts.

Someone observed that friendship requires interacting, requires doing something. I agree. This list of things to do—not all of them are really active. Patiently enduring sometimes doesn't look so active. But at the same time, we do have friends we've had for a long time, friends we maybe haven't heard from for decades. Then we hear from them and feel a connection again. So there's both: the relationships we actively cultivate as a big part of our lives, and friends from another era, when we lived in another place or were in a different chapter of life.

Someone noted that with strangers, if you act toward them with anger, you'll likely get anger back. If you treat them with respect, you'll get respect back. This can be a big part of our practice—just acknowledging the person who checks us out at the grocery store, treating them with respect, looking them in the eye: "Hi, how are you?" These simple things can make a big difference. The janitors, the people we often aren't paying attention to—they matter too.

Thank you.

Yes, where do we go to find these virtuous friends? Do you have some ideas?

I would say, for me, I found a lot of people at meditation centers. We came from different walks of life and had very different lives, but we shared something in common—this appreciation for the Dharma, this trying to find our way with it, to understand it, to discover what practice is and how to practice. Through that shared exploration, becoming friends happened naturally. In my own experience at meditation centers, I've made a lot of really wonderful friends.

So perhaps here, at the end of the sit, when you meet to say hello to somebody, that could be just the introduction of something. It could be the start of something.

It's a pleasure being here and teaching with you tonight. I'll stay up here if anyone has more comments or questions they'd like to share.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 216

Thus Have I Heard: Fear and Dread (MN 4)

Andrea Fella · 46 min

In this illuminating exploration of the Bhayabherava Sutta (MN 4), Andrea Fella unpacks a lesser-known discourse that traces the Buddha's journey from experiencing fear in remote forest dwellings to attaining full enlightenment. The sutta begins with the Brahmin Jānussoṇi questioning whether practice in isolated jungle thickets is simply too difficult—a concern that resonates with modern practitioners who face skepticism about meditation and retreat practice.

Fella highlights the Buddha's preparatory practice of reflecting on his own wholesome qualities—ethical conduct, mindfulness, generosity, and freedom from ill will—as the foundation for facing fear. This recollection of one's positive qualities, far from being egotistical, provides the inner strength needed when fear arises. The Buddha's method of meeting fear was remarkably simple: he maintained whatever posture he was in when fear arose, neither moving nor reacting until the fear subsided. This approach embodies what Ajahn Sumedho calls 'replacing fear with awareness.'

The talk traces how this capacity to be with difficult experience leads progressively through the development of the five spiritual faculties (saddhā, vīriya, sati, samādhi, and paññā), the four jhānas, and ultimately the three knowledges that constitute awakening: recollection of past lives, understanding of kamma, and comprehension of the Four Noble Truths. Fella notes that even after enlightenment, the Buddha continued practicing in seclusion—both for the pleasant abiding it offered and out of compassion, to model the path for future generations. The teaching offers profound encouragement: every moment of mindfulness accumulates, building the capacity to meet whatever fear and dread life presents.

This talk was given at Insight Meditation South Bay.

This series focuses on lesser-known teachings, and I was delighted to be invited to speak because there is so much in the suttas. The Middle-Length Discourses alone form one of four books of this size, with fifteen additional smaller collections comprising just the sutta collection. How many of these do we really receive teachings from? There are popular ones we hear frequently, and then there are many others. Some are fairly repetitive or cover the same themes, but there are also distinct ideas worth considering as part of the whole.

What I'd like to discuss tonight is a sutta called "Fear and Dread"—that's the English translation of the title. It's the fourth discourse in this collection, and my summary of it is: from scared in the woods to enlightenment. That's a process a person goes through.

To set the framework: a sutta is simply the name for a discourse that the Buddha was said to have spoken, recorded in these texts. They were first written down over 150 years after he died, so there was considerable verbal transmission. But these represent what we have as potentially closest to his teachings.

There are a number of suttas where the Buddha describes his own enlightenment in his own words. The most famous is the Noble Search, the twenty-sixth discourse in this collection. That's where he talks about studying with two different teachers, practicing concentration, and then realizing that wasn't the pathway to liberation, leading him to strike out on his own in pursuit of full enlightenment. But there's another sutta in this same collection that includes the Buddha's own description of his awakening process—this one called "Fear and Dread." It paints a rather human picture of the Buddha, which is something I appreciate about it. Both human and superhuman. There's an evolution he goes through that I think is relatable for us.

It may help to know that some discourses are organized as what's called a story within a story. They have the main teaching in the middle, and then there's a wrapper on the outside that usually provides context and perhaps some dramatic elements. We'll include that as we examine MN4. MN stands for Majjhima Nikāya, the name of this collection—the Middle-Length Discourses.

The setup for this sutta begins with a Brahmin named Jāṇussoṇi, who appears in several discourses. He comes to the Buddha and essentially complains that practice is hard. But first, he asks if people take the Buddha as a model. He says, "When people go forth out of faith, do they take Master Gotama as their leader, their helper, and their guide? Do they follow the example of Master Gotama?" The Buddha replies with a hearty yes: "That is so, Brahman, that is so."

Why is this at the front of the sutta? Because it indicates that in some way the Buddha can be imitated or followed. The sutta will tell us something we can imitate, something where we can take the Buddha as a guide in our own practice, using him as a model.

It may also help to know that this collection, the Middle-Length Discourses, is now considered by scholars to be a kind of manual for new monastics—people who had gone forth as followers of the Buddha but needed to learn the basic teachings. It's an amazing collection covering all the key teachings, from faith and ethics to concentration and mindfulness, how to live the ascetic life, and a little about lay life. Mostly it's for new monastics: people who want to walk this path and need to know what's essential.

This is the fourth sutta in the collection, so you encounter it quite early. This context can help us understand the teaching. The exchange continues with Jāṇussoṇi, who says: "But Master Gotama, remote jungle thicket resting places in the forest are hard to endure. Seclusion is hard to practice and it is hard to enjoy solitude. One would think the jungles must rob a practitioner of his mind if he has no concentration."

So the Buddha also agrees heartily with this, and he says, "That is so, Brahman, that is so."

What's this here for? My guess is that some young monks had some doubt about practicing in jungle thickets. I mean, you come from a householder life. Some were rich, some were poor, but they were living as regular lay people. And then to come in to be one of the Buddha's followers, you let go of all that. You let go of your social station. Remember that was very important in ancient India—still important now, but even more so then. You put on the robe and you only have the bowl. And then you're going to be told to go practice by yourself. These people didn't live by themselves. They didn't have this individualistic concept that we do here. You're going to practice by yourself in the jungle.

So kind of encapsulated in this Brahman's question is: isn't that kind of hard to go out in the forest? This is my speculation, but I think this is speaking to people who are just learning how to practice. And the Buddha agrees and says, yeah, actually, that is hard.

Or maybe a more modern equivalent is that people—this is still relevant for us—we may have people in our lives who say, "Why do you want to sit on a cushion and do nothing for half an hour? Why is that so important to you? Why do you want to go on retreat where you can't read or write and you only eat a little bit and you get up at six in the morning? Why would you want to do that? Wouldn't it be better to go to the beach?" There's this sense of: isn't that hard? Why be silent?

So then it sort of legitimizes these concerns that we have, either internally or externally. And now the Buddha's going to offer his response. And we know from the first exchange that we can take this as a guide, as a model.

Interestingly, the way the Buddha responds is not to just directly answer, but to talk about how he considers this notion. Isn't it hard to go out in the forest and practice all by yourself in a lonely, scary place and just live by yourself and develop concentration? He talks about how he reflected on his own good qualities.

He says some people have poor ethics and they've lived a kind of unethical life. And not surprisingly, when they go out in the forest, they encounter fear and dread. Some people have lived unmindfully, or they have a lot of greed, or they earn their livelihood in an unjust way. And in that case, they might go out and have a lot of difficulty in the forest.

But he notes that for himself, he doesn't have as many of those things. He says, "I have mindfulness. I have ethics. I have purified mental conduct. I have purified livelihood. I am uncovetous. I don't have a mind overcome by sloth and torpor or ill will or doubt. I am not given to self-praise and disparagement of others. I am not desirous of gain, honor, and renown. I am not lazy and wanting in energy. I am energetic."

He goes through this reflection. And then he decides, well, because of that, it's going to be okay for me to go practice out in the woods.

What does this tell us? There are difficulties in practice, yes, but it's actually a basis of practice to reflect on our own good qualities. This is not a problem. Do you ever reflect in this same way? Do you sit down and go over the ways in which you're generous, the ways in which you have good virtue? It's actually no small thing that your mind is interested in meditation. Everyone in this room is somewhat interested in meditation or you wouldn't be here. Think about how few people in the world have that. Not very many.

So, in fact, if you could sit through this evening's meditation—if you could sit through half an hour of meditation—that's really good. There are a lot of people who would find it very difficult to sit with themselves for half an hour. A lot of people in the world would find that very hard. You're interested in Dharma talks. So for sure, you have a lot of good heart and mind qualities just to be here. And it's worth reflecting on this.

In fact, there is another sutta that talks specifically about beneficial reflections that the Buddha encourages. There was a whole series at IMC not so long ago—six talks about these six recollections, one for each recollection. Two of the six are recollecting one's own generosity and one's own virtue, one's own ethical conduct.

Now you can say, "Well, we're kind of trained in our culture that this might be egotistical—to think about our good qualities and to really celebrate the good things about ourselves." But that's not part of this way of thinking. It's not part of this religious tradition, of the Buddhist tradition. I think this is not egotistical because these qualities—like generosity, like loving-kindness, like virtue—they're not really personal qualities. The more you develop them, the more you understand: these are transpersonal, if you could call it that. These are not qualities that we can own, that we can measure, that we can possess. We might use language—I think this sutta translates this as "I am possessed of," and so forth. But really, these are qualities that exist in relationship and that are bigger than our individual story. They are more part of our common humanity, our common heart, that we can develop.

So I think genuine reflection on these, genuine recollection of these, is really not egotistical at all. And in fact, according to this sutta, it's the basis of being able to overcome fear and dread.

There's more in the rest of the sutta, so let's continue. What happens next, after the Buddha says he recollected all of his good qualities and then decided it was actually going to be fine? He's talking about before he was enlightened. Before he was enlightened, he realized he had these good qualities and decided he was going to go out in the woods and practice. And then he considered that there are particular times of the month—now this is going into specifics of what they believed at that time—certain times of the month and also certain places that are listed as orchard shrines, woodland shrines, and tree shrines, which are supposed to be especially scary, apparently. And he deliberately sought these out. He went there to practice in order to encounter his own fear and dread. He thought, "If I go to these places on these particularly awesome, scary nights, then I might encounter this in my heart."

There are two things to observe about this. First of all, even for the Buddha—or even for the Bodhisattva, I should say, before he was enlightened—there was fear and dread. He was human. He was scared out in the woods when there were wild animals and branches. A peacock breaks off a branch—there are various specifics given here. And he would feel this because it's... I don't know if any of you have actually been out in the deep woods late at night. Maybe you've got your nice tent with the kerosene burner and all that, but if you go out to the bathroom or something, it's like—whoa—it's a pretty wild place. So it's natural.

Along his path, it wasn't just all bliss, sitting down with everything falling into place. He had to deal with his fear and dread. Gil Fronsdal says any spiritual practice worth its salt will eventually bring up fear.

Why is that? Because to mature on the spiritual path, we have to let go of a lot of unhelpful ideas about ourselves, about our lives, about our way of doing things. The way we're doing things now might be okay, but we have a sense that there could be something else—that's kind of why we're pursuing practice. Or we may even have a sense that it's completely not working, that it's a disaster and we need something different. Whatever it is, we're going to have to let go of something about the way we're doing things. And why are we doing things that way?

Because we believe that is safe and helpful for us. That's why we're doing what we're doing. We have needs and desires and a sense of what we want to be, and so we do things in accordance with that. And practice is going to turn that completely upside down at some point. The process of letting go of our views of how things should be and what things are is challenging, because we've put them in place because we think that's what's going to make us safe. That's how it goes.

So we're going to have to dismantle some kind of deep stuff to let go of all that.

The second point about this seeking out of places in order to encounter his own fear and dread—well, that's pretty interesting. He turned toward and actually sought out something that was going to be difficult for him. Should we be seeking out dukkha? It's an interesting question. Teachers in the West often say things like, "You don't have to seek it out. It's going to come find you anyway. Don't make it hard for yourself." And I think there's a place for that. It's a good general instruction because we have pretty stressful lives, and aging, illness, and death are coming anyway. So it's true—we don't need to create it.

But there can be times in practice where certain conditions have come together, we're ripe, we're ready, and we know this is the time to go. I got the sword. This is the time to go find the thing that needs to be cut.

So you might check internally. To what degree do you take on challenges in practice? To what degree are you willing to try something that you know is going to be a little bit hard, like doing a daylong if you've never sat for that long? What would that be like to come and be silent for a whole day, sitting and walking, not just for an evening? Or if you've done that, what would it be like to go on a retreat and stay overnight for a couple of nights and just do that—just be silent, be with my own mind and heart for two days? Wow, what would that be like? There can be times where that feels like the natural next step. Are you interested in finding and meeting the dark corners of your mind where clinging is hanging on? This sutta starts to give some instruction about that, if we're motivated to look into it.

So what happened when the Buddha went to these orchard shrines, woodland shrines, and tree shrines on awesome, auspicious nights of the month and encountered his own fear and dread? He's very explicit. He says that the fear and dread came upon him as he did this, and his approach was simply to not change what he was doing.

He talks about the postures actually—the four postures of meditation, which are sitting, walking, standing, and lying down. Those are the four basic postures. And he says, "While I walked, the fear and dread came upon me. I neither stood nor sat nor lay down till I had subdued that fear and dread. While I stood, the fear and dread came upon me. I neither walked nor sat nor lay down till I had subdued that fear and dread"—and so forth for the other two postures. He just maintained the posture that he had when the fear and dread arose.

This is a very interesting instruction, isn't it? I mean, it's kind of bare bones. But to me, it seems like an enactment of not getting pulled in. Because fear and dread have a sort of urgency to them that says, "You got to do something different. You got to do something about this." They would incite us to move or to stop or to change position in some way. And very calmly, he doesn't comply. He just keeps at it.

Just last week I was on a retreat with Ajahn Sumedho, who was the abbot of Chithurst Monastery, a Thai forest monastery located in England. He was the abbot there for twenty-two years. He himself is English, and he talked about

He used the lovely phrase "replacing fear with awareness," which I thought was just fantastic, just delicious, actually. And I thought of this sutta immediately. How perfect—I'm going to be talking about this next week.

So slowly, over time, what we do in meditation is gain greater and greater capacity of mind to be with challenging feelings and impulses. And fear and dread is surely a challenging one that really pushes at us. There are other challenging ones, of course—anger, for example, is also quite inciting to us. But there comes the ability, the capacity, of not needing to react.

And why do we react? Because these are very unpleasant feelings. We don't want to feel that anymore. We don't want to feel fear—it's actually not that pleasant of a feeling. And so we do something to stop it. That's a lot of what reaction is about: stopping a feeling that we don't have capacity to handle anymore. But as the mind gets stronger, has greater ballast—there are all kinds of analogies you can use—then we can stand firm in the face of a wavering heart and just have awareness. We replace fear with awareness, put the energy into the awareness, not into the reactivity.

So this sutta is giving a possible method for this. You have to tease it out a little bit, but the enactment of it is that you don't move, that you keep the intention to just keep doing what you're doing. And the prior preparation for that is understanding your own good qualities. It's nice, isn't it? It's not that you bear down and say, "I'm going to beat this fear, I'm not afraid"—big boys don't cry, whatever story comes up like that. It's grounded instead in: I've led an ethical life. I have a loving heart. I have some wisdom. I've developed some ability not to have greed in my life. I don't need more and more things. Knowing that about ourselves is what's going to give us the strength that when fear comes and says, "Run!" we say, "No, no, I'm okay."

There are other methods, of course. This is one that's described in this sutta, but as long as we're on the topic—there are methods like grounding in the body when we feel strong emotions. Feeling our feet on the ground is another common instruction for handling powerful surges of energy through the body. But the basic idea is the same: don't get pulled away. Have some kind of inner strength on which we're relying to stand firm.

I recently watched a video by a Dharma teacher who's been practicing for more than forty years, who has recently been diagnosed with multiple myeloma. He has cancer, and he's making his journey through it a teaching for his community. He made this video where he talked about his encounter with the first round of chemotherapy, which didn't go very well. They did their best, guessed what drugs he needed, what dose to give them in, and so they started. And his body just couldn't take that drug at all. He had kidney failure, he had to go into the ICU, they flushed his body, and luckily it worked and he survived. But it was a little close.

Because of the strength of his practice, he was able to actually observe the body falling completely out of balance and struggling to pull the systems back together, which were not working at all with this drug introduced that wasn't working for him. He actually had the wherewithal—the capacity of mind from all that practice—to observe the body flailing like a fish out of water. And he noted that actually there was no suffering, even though it was a horrible experience. He said that directly: it was a horrible experience. But much of the time there was no suffering through it.

So this is the promise of developing the capacity of mind. This is a taste of moving toward freedom that we're offered. Not that your life gets perfect, not that everything works, not that your body doesn't hurt or die, but that there's a way to be with that which has so much strength of attention and awareness and capacity that it's not a problem at that moment. I don't think it was easy for him. He doesn't say it was easy. But I was impressed. It reminded me and inspired me that every moment of mindfulness is one more drop in that bucket. You don't lose the drops. Every moment of mindfulness counts. And if you miss another ten minutes during meditation, don't worry about it. As soon as you start again, the bucket continues to fill. It's fine.

And it accumulates over time.

As I thought more about this, I realized that at first we are developing the capacity to be with strong experience—to be with things that are happening, like body sensations or emotions or thoughts, fear and dread, for example. We're developing the capacity to be with experience.

But there's also, at some point, a shift where we start developing the capacity to be with space, to be with emptiness, to be with not knowing, to be with groundlessness. This too is actually a skill that we need to have some capacity for.

We're so focused in our lives on what is—the things that we have and the things that we are, the existent things, getting the things and keeping the things and maintaining the things. And at some point the mind starts to notice the space around the things also. That can be a little scary when we start realizing there's not a lot of basis for all these things. They're coming and going and changing. We start noticing that our body is not like it was ten years ago and is never going to be like it was ten years ago. It's going that way. And then it starts being like, what is this about?

More possibilities start to open when we're less driven with the things. And that too can be scary, actually. There's a certain fear in the openness that we live in, the actuality of the openness that we're living in. There's a lot of possibilities, and there's a lot of groundlessness. There's some need to develop capacity to be with that also—to tolerate space, if you will. It's not discussed in this sutta, but the same principle applies: replace fear with awareness, whether it's fear of something or fear of nothingness.

Georgia O'Keeffe said, "I've been absolutely terrified every moment of my life, and I've never let it keep me from doing a single thing I wanted to do." I don't know if that's literal, but it's a nice image—that there's the fear and the dread and the terror, and you just keep doing what you're needing to do.

So back to the sutta. What happens after that? He's able to be with the fear and dread. He just keeps walking or sitting or standing or lying down when the fear and dread comes upon him, and he just waits. It says, you know, I just waited until it went away. I just kept doing the same thing.

What happens after that is that it arouses in him energy and mindfulness and concentration. It brings about the development of these spiritual faculties.

For those of you who know the list of the five spiritual faculties, it begins with faith or confidence, which is pretty much what this whole fear thing is pointing toward. Developing the capacity to be with the fear and dread, to be in scary places, to develop seclusion—that's really an act of faith. You have to decide: this practice is so important, I'm willing to be in the woods by myself on scary nights. There's a lot of faith involved in practicing that way. And so that's developed—the faith to just keep walking even when you're afraid, to just keep sitting even when you're afraid.

The result of that is the second spiritual faculty: energy. And then it says unremitting mindfulness was established, my body was tranquil and untroubled, and my mind concentrated and unified. So after the faith comes the energy, the mindfulness, and the concentration, which are the next three faculties. And the fifth faculty, the last one, is wisdom, which is what comes after that.

There's a description then of how he reaches enlightenment. He starts with, "I was afraid to meditate." And it goes all the way to the four jhānas—the four deep concentration states are established in him after he's gotten through the fear and dread. There's a stock description of those. And then it talks about the insight that comes from concentration, the arising of wisdom from a concentrated mind in the form of these insights.

I won't go into a huge amount of detail on these, but these are called the three knowledges that a Buddha attains upon enlightenment. And actually I believe arahants see them also.

The three knowledges are: the first is that one sees all of one's past lives. Remember, there's an understanding in this culture that we've been at this for a while. There's rebirth, there's living lives again and again in different places. It says, "I recollected manifold past lives—one birth, two births, three births, four births, up through a hundred thousand births, many eons of world contraction, many eons of world expansion. There I had such and such a name, of such a clan, with such an appearance. Such was my nutriment, such my experience of pleasure and pain, such my life term, and such my death. And when I passed away from there, I reappeared over there, and there I had such and such a name and such and such a clan."

You can imagine this is a pretty exhausting thing to see. Can you imagine seeing hundreds of thousands of prior lives, none of which resulted in enlightenment? And here you are in the woods reviewing all of this. This is just left as the first knowledge: I understood everything I've been through to get to here.

We can put this in more psychological terms. We're going to have to open everything in our mind to be completely free. We can gain freedom from certain things in certain ways along the path. But at some point, you've got to include everything. And perhaps our past lives are our past days and years and seconds, if you want to think of it in that way. But basically, all of experience has to be seen and held. We need the capacity to hold anything in our lives.

And we have things in our lives that we don't really want to include. "I'm going to forget that moment five years ago, really." Or "I'm going to forget my whole childhood." But we have dents, we have bumps, we have wounds. It's part of the mind. And this teaching is encouraging us to turn toward all of that, to open to all of that—developing the strength of mind to do so.

The second of the three knowledges is understanding of karma. That's the usual summary of it. What the text actually says is "understanding of how beings pass away and reappear." So first, we simply saw the process—there I was there, then I was there, then I did that. And then comes the understanding that there's a logic to that process.

We understand that if we live a life of greed, we're going to pass away and have not as good a life the next time, because we didn't make very much merit doing that. This is a karmic understanding of cause and effect. It basically says that the mind, by what it's doing now, creates the home it's going to have in the future. And we understand how that process happens. If I do something harmful, it's going to have painful results. If I do something meritorious and helpful, it's going to have good results. If I do something like meditation, it can result in freedom. We understand the different kinds of karma and how things unfold.

This is sort of the ultimate wave function of the universe—you know, how things really work. What physicists are looking for is the grand equation for everything. So you get to see that in meditation. But it's not for the physical universe; it's for the unfolding of the heart. A slightly different process.

So this is the second knowledge. It's interesting, right? We understand completely how things unfold. This is complete wisdom about how to live well, which you can understand is important if you're going to be enlightened. You're going to be able to live always making skillful choices. So you have to understand these things.

It's kind of a nice phrase, actually. Let me read what it says about when he gains these knowledges: "This was the second true knowledge attained by me in the middle watch of the night. Ignorance was banished and true knowledge arose. Darkness was banished and light arose, as happens in one who abides diligent, ardent, and resolute."

This arising of understanding from concentration—it's quite beautiful. But he's not free yet, actually. It's only two out of three.

The third knowledge is understanding of the Four Noble Truths, the understanding of the destruction of the taints. I'm using technical language, so what are these so-called taints? They are the tendency of the mind to seek out sense pleasure, the tendency of the mind to want to be something—to want a certain kind of identity, basically—and the tendency of the mind to not want to see everything, to ignore certain things. In more technical language: the taint of sensuality, the taint of being, and the taint of ignorance.

These are banished once one has seen everything and once one understands how things unfold. You understand that it's not worth it to chase after sense pleasure. It's not worth it to chase after identity. These things are not—you've done it for so many lifetimes, going up and down and around. You see that that's not the path. It's not what ultimately gets you there.

And so from that unfolds the understanding of the Four Noble Truths. This is what suffering really is. This is what dissatisfaction is, and why we feel it. And then the cause of that—the arising of clinging or craving is why that happens. And then letting go, opening, not seeking after such things—that is freedom. And there's a path to do so.

Some of this path is laid out in the sutta itself, and the rest is laid out in the broader teachings. But there's a way to get from here to there. It's a very hopeful message.

The Buddha has seen hundreds and thousands of past lives. So he's been everyone, he's been everything—that's the implication. He's been a murderer, he's been a courtesan, he's been a king, a queen, a computer programmer maybe. Somehow there was a path from those to this night of sitting under the tree.

I don't think you need to buy into this literally. I don't think it's meant to be literal. The point is that we live in a lawful universe, and it's possible to navigate through that and get the mind into a state where it can let go of everything that's binding it to its own discomfort.

But the sutta's not over. The Buddha basically says, "That's what happened. I got scared. I didn't buy into it. I got concentrated. I had these three amazing insights and my mind was freed." It's pretty compressed—from regular ordinary scared person in the woods to enlightened.

But remember, this is a story within a story. That whole account about the woods was the teaching, the main teaching. But it started out with the Brahmin Jānussoṇi saying, "Isn't practice hard?" And the Buddha agreeing.

Interestingly, the scene pulls back and the Buddha is talking again to Jānussoṇi. He says, "You might think that I still go out and practice in the woods, that I still go on retreat because I still have stuff to work on in my mind. But that would not be correct."

He says, "I do still go on retreat. I do still resort to remote jungle thicket resting places for two reasons. One, I see a pleasant abiding for myself here and now. And two, I have compassion for future generations."

This is interesting. We learn that the Buddha still goes on retreat, even after he's enlightened. He still practices, he still meditates every day, even after he's enlightened. Why would he need to? He doesn't have to clean out anything else in his heart. Why would you still meditate?

And he gives two reasons. One is it's a pleasant abiding. It's okay—you can enjoy your life. Just like enjoying your good qualities. If you have the ability to have a pleasant abiding sitting in meditation, great. You can enjoy that. The Buddha was not all about the pain and all about the asceticism.

And the second reason: "I have compassion for future generations." What's that about? I think he's setting an example. It's said at the very beginning, do people take you as their guide, as their model? The Buddha says, yes, they do. When they practice, they look to me as an example of what to do. So of course he's going to go out and meditate in the woods, because that's what he wants people to do. He wants them to see him doing that. So it's not about him. Yes, he has the pleasant abiding, but his life is about helping other people. He's free. He doesn't need anything more.

But he has so much compassion. He uses his very behavior, his whole way of being, as an example for us to do the same. Wisdom and compassion—that is all that was left.

And so the Brahman Jānussoṇī becomes a lay follower of the Buddha and declares refuge in him for life.

So whatever fear and dread there is in your heart, don't be afraid of it. There is a path—a step-by-step training of the mind to hold each thing in our life tenderly, not giving in to its urgency. Out of compassion. Out of the possibility that we can overcome that and see for ourselves how to live skillfully, how to live with wisdom, and how to offer compassion to the world.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 217

Becoming Freedom

Andrea Fella · 48 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella introduces the Aṭṭhakavagga (Chapter of the Eights) from the Sutta Nipāta, considered by scholars to be among the earliest recorded teachings of the Buddha. This ancient collection of poems predates the codification of the Four Noble Truths and Eightfold Path, offering a remarkably direct teaching focused on two primary sources of suffering: clinging to sense pleasure and clinging to views.

Fella highlights how these poems describe three perspectives: the ordinary person caught in clinging, the liberated being who is free, and the path between them. The text's description of liberation is notably practical and non-metaphysical—depicting freedom not as an abstract spiritual state but as qualities visible in how one walks through the world: calm, wise, gentle, alert, without anger, fear, or pride. The Buddha's teaching on views is particularly relevant today, showing how attachment to opinions creates conflict and division, illustrated by the classic parable of the blind people and the elephant.

The practice instructions encourage us to model the behavior of those who are free—not by repressing difficult mind states, but by fully acknowledging them while choosing not to let them leak into our actions. This "fake it till you make it" approach, combined with deep honesty about our inner experience, creates a powerful feedback loop that can transform the mind. Fella connects this to the simile of the raft, emphasizing that we use the Dhamma as a tool without clinging to it.

When Shaila invited me to this series, I jumped at it. One of my favorite things is to talk about some of these teachings that are not so common or lesser known. The teaching I picked is from a lesser known book in the Pali Canon called the Sutta Nipata. It's a set of poems sometimes called the Chapter of the Eights. The Pali name for this teaching is the Atthakavagga, which basically means the Chapter of the Eights. It's not really clear why it's called that, because there's not much eight about it. There are sixteen poems, and some of them have eight sections or couplets, but most of them don't. Nevertheless, that's what it's called.

There are a couple of reasons I like this text. One is that historically, most scholars agree this is probably one of the earliest recorded teachings of the Buddha—not only early in its compilation, but also early in his time as a teacher. The way this is recognized is that the Pali itself, the language, is a little more archaic than in some of the other suttas. Thanissaro Bhikkhu points out that for poems that's not so unusual. But the real giveaway is that this is one of the few suttas which is referenced in other teachings. There are texts where people are saying, "Have you memorized that set of poems? Do you know that set of poems?" The Buddha is also talking about memorizing these teachings as a useful teaching tool. From that standpoint, it is somewhat of an earlier teaching.

One of the interesting things I find about this text is that it seems to be from before some of the standard ways that the teachings were codified. There's no mention of the Four Noble Truths in these teachings. There's no mention of the Eightfold Path. The picture you get of the Buddha in these teachings is of a solitary teacher wandering around and talking to people. What he chose to talk to them about in this collection of poems was suffering, and that suffering is created by clinging—clinging to sense pleasure and clinging to views being the two main areas addressed.

So it's a very direct teaching. In some ways it's simple because it's focused around this very basic inquiry: How do we cling? What do we cling to? And what are ways that support letting go of clinging?

There are three different types of verses in these poems. All sixteen chapters contain verses with one of three flavors. They are either describing what it's like to be an ordinary person caught up in clinging and the suffering that comes from that. Or they describe the perspective, the state of mind, the experience of a person who is free. Or they describe how one moves from being a person who's caught to being one that's free.

In this way, the text has a very simple structure. I credit Thanissaro Bhikkhu a lot for my study of this text because he pointed out this structure and said, when you read these poems, look for which kind of verse you're reading—that will help you to understand what's happening. I used that in my own study.

Given that there are sixteen poems and about 210 verses, I'm not going to go through the entire thing. I'm going to pick out a few themes, read a few sections, and highlight pieces that I find interesting about this teaching—a few of the key aspects that I find inspiring about this text.

The two kinds of clinging—clinging to sense pleasure and clinging to views—are central. The first thing I'd like to explore are some of the poems that talk about what it's like to be an ordinary person clinging to sense pleasure.

This is from the very first poem, and I'm using excerpts here rather than reading entire poems. I took the liberty, with all of the translations, of drawing from several sources—Thanissaro Bhikkhu, Bhikkhu Virado, and Sadatissa. Another way I studied this text was to read as many different translations as I could find. In general, if you're studying something in this way, it's often useful to read different translations because they give you different flavors.

To start looking at the perspective of clinging, how an ordinary person relates to their life, here is the first poem in Thanissaro Bhikkhu's translation. I also took the liberty of editing these for gender neutrality:

If one longing for sense pleasure achieves it, yes, they're enraptured at heart. The mortal gets what they want. But if for that person, longing, desiring, the pleasures diminish, they're shattered as if shot with an arrow. One who is greedy is overpowered with weakness and trampled by trouble, for pain invades them as water a cracked boat.

This pointing to the way that as we go through our lives, if we're orienting our experience toward trying to hold on to sense pleasure, hold on to pleasant experience, and get rid of unpleasant experience—this incredibly natural and human way of orienting to the world, which we all do—if that's our way of thinking we'll find happiness, we are destined to experience suffering in this life because things are impermanent. We are bound to be confronted by pleasant things going away and unpleasant things being here. And so the Buddha describes this as "pain invading them as water a cracked boat."

Another verse on this, from the second poem: "Longing for what's over or what's to come, yearning for pleasures in the present and pleasures in the past, those who are greedy for pleasure, hunting for it, deranged, selfish, have entered the wrong road. Look at them, floundering amidst their cherished possessions like fish in a dwindling stream."

That image of fish in a dwindling stream—that one is very evocative to me. At one point during a long retreat, I was experiencing the mind just flopping around, trying to find some pleasure somewhere. And it had that feeling. It felt like a fish. This image from the poem came to me, and I laughed. It brought some amusement to just watch the mind flopping around: "Isn't there some pleasure somewhere?"

These teachings point to the way it is for an ordinary human being clinging to pleasure. And that clinging to pleasure does include clinging to getting rid of displeasure, clinging to getting rid of the unpleasant. But then another major area of teaching in this text is around clinging to views.

Clinging to sense pleasure is something we all do. It's often how we orient, the way we live our lives. It's very natural. We learn from the moment we're born that if we get something we like, something pleasant, it feels good. We get a little bit of a feedback hit:

"Oh, that feels good." Or if we manage to get rid of something we don't like, again there's a little bit of a feedback hit that feels good. So it's very natural that we orient around that. And yet as we begin to practice, as we begin to explore our experience, we see the pain of it—the pain of holding onto pleasure and trying to get rid of pain. We begin to recognize that this may not be so helpful, and so we may begin to have a way to let go of some of our holdings around sense pleasure.

A deeper level, a deeper layer of holding, is around views—clinging to views. Views about who we are, what we're capable of. Views about other people. Views about what's good, what's bad, what's right, what's wrong. So many of our views are absorbed through our upbringing, through our culture, through our families.

We have views about how close you should stand to somebody when you're talking to them. Whether and how much you look them in the eye. Whether you shake hands when you meet somebody you don't know. These are just things that come in through our culture. They're views. They're not the right way—these are simply examples of how views get absorbed.

But when you meet somebody from a different culture and they stand at a different distance, or look you in the eye a little longer, or don't look you in the eye, or perhaps hold your hand while they're talking to you, there can be discomfort because it's not familiar. The holding to views is around believing or having the perspective that this is the right way to do it.

Now these are simple examples I'm giving here—very simple examples. But we hold to views, and in the Buddhist teaching, views are actually some of the main reasons why there's conflict in the world. People holding to views. In our country at this point, views around race are a huge source of conflict. Different perspectives, different beliefs, different views. The Buddha pointed to clinging to views as being one of the main reasons there's conflict in the world. Holding to fixed opinions creates a sense of self and other—this perspective of view.

Some of the teachings from the Aṭṭhakavagga on the drawbacks of clinging to views: "Abiding by fixed opinions and pleased with themselves, they say, 'My opponent's a fool, they're no expert.'"

Upon whatever basis they regard their opponent a fool is the same opinion upon which they regard themselves as an expert. To the extent to which they rate themselves expert, they despise anyone else who makes the same claim.

And my favorite—one of my favorite verses from the entire teaching: "Those attached to perception and views roam the world offending people."

There's another verse where someone asks a question and the Buddha responds. The questioner says, "Those who maintain a view and dispute about the view, saying 'this alone is true'—is criticism all they receive, all they experience? Don't they also receive praise?" This person is pointing to something the Buddha has apparently been talking about—that when you express these opinions, you may be criticized. And he asks, "But don't you also get praised?" As if that makes it better.

And the Buddha says, "Whatever they receive is trifling, not enough to bring them any peace of mind. I say there are only two consequences of dispute: praise and criticism. Seeing this, you should not dispute. Regard instead non-dispute the grounds for peace."

There's so much to explore around views. To begin to recognize that we hold views, to begin to see that if there's conflict, there is a view being held somewhere. And so, curiosity about that. If there's conflict in yourself, sometimes there's a view being held about yourself. This can be something we explore in our experience: if there's some kind of conflict, curiosity—what view am I holding? Just hold that question for yourself.

I gave a teaching this morning around perception and concepts and how these lead to views. There's a classic teaching around this—the blind people and the elephant. I'm sure many of you have heard this teaching story. It's actually a teaching story from the Pali Canon, found in the suttas.

The story goes that a king asks his ministers to bring both an elephant and blind people, and to show the blind people the elephant by having them touch it. Some touched the legs, some touched the side of the elephant, some the tail, some the tuft of the tail. When asked, "What is an elephant like?" they each responded with a different analogy. Some said an elephant's like a post—those who touched the leg. An elephant's like a wall—those who touched the side. An elephant's like a broom—those who touched the tuft of the tail.

And then, hearing each other's responses, the teaching story goes on, they started arguing. "An elephant is like this—you're wrong." "No, an elephant is like that—you're wrong." The view, based on their own experience, became hardened. "This is what an elephant is." And the story goes on that they actually came to blows over this. Rather than being curious—"That's interesting. You think it's like a broom? It sure felt like a wall to me. Let's see if we can figure out what's going on here"—rather than doing that, people tend to solidify around their views.

This particular story is really a teaching for us because it's pointing to views that are created based on our own experience. These are some of the most tenacious views we have. We experience something; we think we know from our direct experience. But maybe we've only got a piece of the picture. Maybe we've only seen a little bit of it. When we come up against conflict in this way, perhaps we can think: maybe there's a bigger picture in which we can explore how these parts connect.

This morning, talking about this, the question came up about political views. Some people are saying it's like a post, and some people are saying the tuft of the tail is like a broom. We are entrenched in our opinions. Is there a way? It seems imperative to me at this point in our country that we find a way to step back and talk about the elephant. Or the donkey—either one. Let's see if we can find a way to the bigger picture. This is creating so much suffering and division and pain in our world. And the Buddha pointed to this 2,600 years ago: views are going to create suffering.

Views are going to create conflict. And so the Buddha spoke directly to this.

The next thing I'd like to share are some verses in this text that describe somebody who is free—somebody who has freed their mind from clinging. Really, these poems are directly pointing to one of the most pithy teachings of the Buddha. When the Buddha was asked at one point, "Could you describe your teaching in a short phrase?" he said, "Nothing should be clung to as I or me or mine."

I think this whole text might be considered a commentary on that one phrase: Nothing should be clung to as I or me or mine.

Those who have released that clinging to I or me or mine—that person is understood in this context to be free of the suffering that comes from such clinging. And that, in the Buddha's understanding, was everything we actually call suffering. We think what we call suffering is something that's unpleasant. But pleasant, unpleasant, neutral experience will come and go through our lives. That's just flowing through. What's really going on is that we react—we become averse to the unpleasant, we hold on to the pleasant. And so it's something happening in our own minds that is creating this struggle, this suffering. This is what the Buddha is pointing to: the release of that clinging.

Some of the poems describe liberated people—people who are free from this clinging. There are different ways they're described, and this is one of the most interesting aspects of this particular text. The way that people who are free are described is primarily in terms of how they are in the world—how they act, how they walk in this world, what they do. Sometimes it talks a little bit about their state of mind, but mostly it's this very ordinary description of somebody living in the world.

Here's a description of somebody who is liberated. A questioner asks the Buddha: "I want to ask you about the perfect person. There are those people we call those who are calmed. Can you tell me how they see things and how they behave?"

"One who has calmed, who has extinguished all craving before the time the body disintegrates, who has no concern over how things began or with how they will end, and no fixation with what happens in between—such a one has no preferences. They have no anger, no fear, and no pride. Nothing disturbs their composure and nothing gives them cause for regret. The wise person is restrained in speech. They have no longing for the future and no grief for the past. There are no views or opinions that lead them. They can see detachment from the entangled world of sense impressions. They do not conceal anything and there's nothing they hold on to. Without acquisitiveness or envy, they remain unobtrusive. They have no disdain or insult for anyone. They are not full of themselves or addicted to pleasure. They are gentle and alert with no blind faith. They show no aversion to anything. They are not people who work because they want something. If they get nothing at all, they remain unperturbed. There is no craving to build up the passion to taste new pleasures. The sage, freed from greed and selfishness, does not speak of themselves as among those who are superior, equal, or inferior. The sage regards nothing in the world as one's own and does not grieve because of what does not exist. Not blindly following religious teachings, such a one is truly called peaceful."

Mostly the description here is in terms of what they don't do. They're not angry, not fearful, not proud; they don't have fixation, no preferences, no blind faith, no aversion. A lot of things have been let go.

This is an interesting aspect of the Buddhist teaching. In general, the Buddha doesn't talk so much about what we can get, but what can be released. Clinging can be released. All of these areas are areas of clinging released. There are a few positive descriptions here: calm, wise, gentle, alert, even-minded. Elsewhere in this text there are some other descriptions of qualities of a liberated person.

Serene, wise, calm. They're mindful. They see, they know. And they're equanimous. These are beautiful qualities of mind that result from this letting go.

So this is a picture of someone who's free in this teaching—someone walking around the world, engaged in the world. It's a picture that may not be very close to where we are, you know: not averse, not frustrated, no preferences. But we're working on that. It's a picture of a person that I can imagine myself to possibly be someday.

This description, this way of describing the liberated state, doesn't present some abstract idea of liberation apart from the qualities of someone who is free. This is in contrast with the standard Theravada description of someone who's liberated—being someone who is free from the round of the cycle of rebirth, someone who on their final passing at death is no longer born again into this world. A metaphysical difference, some fundamental shift of being that changes the metaphysical state of a being. This is a piece of the Theravada tradition that can be found throughout the Pali Canon, but it's not found in this teaching. This teaching really emphasizes this-worldly freedom. I find that to be very inspiring, personally.

There are some quotes from my research around this text. One person who wrote a scholarly text on this, Grace Burford—I believe it might have been her doctoral thesis—gives this quote: "The Atthakavagga is exceptional within even the earliest Buddhist literature in its non-metaphysical presentation of the highest good achievable by humans." Metaphysical presentation is often something that is beyond what can actually be known in this life. "It is significant as an example of how the Buddhist ideal goal can be presented without all of the usual cosmological and metaphysical accessories that accompany it in its traditional Theravada doctrine."

So there's a lot in the Theravada that brings in different realms of existence, things that some Westerners have difficulty connecting with. And this particular teaching is a coherent teaching in which that is not brought in.

Another quote from another scholar: "The Atthakavagga sets out to describe a practical solution to human sorrow—not merely the abstract sorrow of rebirth, but the everyday sorrow of strife and aggression." Again, this is one of the reasons I find this particular teaching so inspiring. It speaks to me here and now, in this very life.

The next set of verses relates to the path of practice—how to get from being the ordinary person to being the liberated person. The training is described in quite a bit of detail in the last three poems. I'll read some of this and see what you might notice about it.

A questioner asks, "Venerable sir, speak about the path of practice."

The Buddha says: "A person should not have covetous eyes. One should close one's ears to ordinary chatter. One should not be greedy for flavors. One should not cherish anything in the world. One should be meditative, not footloose. One should desist from worry, should not be indolent, should live in lodgings where there is little noise. One should not sleep too much. One should be devoted to wakefulness and keen endeavor. One should abandon laziness, deception, merriment, various kinds of amusement. One should not fear blame nor be conceited when praised. One should drive out greed, selfishness, anger, and malicious speech. One should not be a boaster. One should not speak scheming words. One should not cultivate impudence nor utter quarrelsome speech. One should not be drawn into telling lies nor be deliberately treacherous. One should not despise others for their lowly way of life or wisdom or precepts and practices."

If ascetics or ordinary people irritate one with their talkativeness, one should not respond harshly, for the peaceful do not retaliate.

If you want to cultivate peace, act peacefully.

We sometimes think—I know you know there's this really strong feedback loop between our mind and our bodies. What's going on in our mind will filter out into our bodies, as that example around impatience shows. But this feedback loop goes both ways. As we engage in the world, not repressing that we don't feel patient or peaceful, not pretending we're not anxious, but fully acknowledging what's present while choosing how we act—something interesting begins to happen.

Basically, in this teaching, the Buddha is encouraging us to behave as though we were free.

When I read these kinds of paired texts—the description of somebody who is free and the description of somebody who is in training—the difference is the word "should" versus "is." Very much the person who is free is meditative, not footloose, is desisting, is not worrying, is not indolent. So the word "should" here—this isn't, to me, "stop your mind from doing what it's doing." Because we can't do that. Good luck with that.

Rather, in some ways the path of practice he's recommending is to try to model the behavior of those who are free. In my own experience, this is a very valuable practice, but only when I am willing and very honest with myself about what's actually going on in my mind.

Here's one example around patience and impatience: Cultivate patience by acting patiently. That could be something expressed here. Cultivate patience by acting patiently. If you're experiencing impatience, it may be tempting to repress that impatience in order to act patiently. But in my experience, this is not what the Buddha is teaching, and it is not actually effective.

What is very effective is to fully recognize: "Yep, wow, there's a lot of impatience happening here."

I'll give you an example. I was in a Long's drugstore, before it became something else, shopping. I was very impatient, kind of in a hurry to get through the store. And I noticed that this impatience was being expressed through my body. We see this often—our mind states are expressed through our body, even in subtle ways. Through expressions on our face. Through the way we engage with the world. And so this impatience was coming out of me by picking up things off the shelf and throwing them into my basket.

I noticed this and decided, okay, I'm going to practice patience here. I'm noticing the impatience. I'm going to see—not repressing this impatience—but I'm going to see if I can act as though I were patient.

So I slowed down my movements. I fully acknowledged, "Yep, there's impatience here." This was not about repressing. Not about repressing the impatience. This was an act of deep honesty, really acknowledging, "Yep, there's impatience here." The way I explored it was like, "Okay, I'm going to see—can I fully know this impatience but not let it leak out of my skin? Can I not let it leak out of my behavior?"

I began picking up things more carefully and placing them in my basket. Within about thirty to forty seconds, the impatience had fallen away and the mind was quite calm.

This kind of practice, I think, is some of what the Buddha is suggesting here. He encourages us to model the behavior of wise beings—but watch our minds. Not repress. Worry is arising? Notice how worry leaks out into your actions and see: can I really know this worry but behave as though I was not worried? See what might happen there. It's an interesting dance to play with.

Not repressing anxiety in order to act peacefully, but just watching and seeing that movement of rebound on the mind.

In some ways we trust, and we're a culture of "let it out." What's going on in our minds we have to be fully honest about and let it out. This may not be the best approach all the time, especially with something like anger. I'm not suggesting that you repress anger, but expressing it and letting it out tends to reinforce that pattern. And so what might it mean to fully know, "Yep, there's anger here," and what might it mean to act as though I were not angry? It's kind of a fake-it-till-you-make-it teaching. But again, we have to be really honest with ourselves about what's actually going on in our minds.

One thing I'll mention briefly: there's a huge other part of the teaching of this text that relates to views and not clinging to views—not clinging to any views, including the Dharma. This is a somewhat paradoxical teaching in some ways. There are people who believe that the teaching of the Aṭṭhakavagga encourages us to not hold any view at all. I don't get that sense from the texts and from this teaching.

To me, the way in which the teaching of "don't cling to views" is expressed makes it really clear that clinging to views will create suffering. If we're clinging, even clinging to the Dharma—"This Dharma, what the Buddha teaches, this is right. I'm willing to kill for this"—this is going to lead to suffering in the world. Even the Buddha's teaching would lead to that if we're holding it in that way. "You don't believe in this teaching, you're wrong. You're bad." If that's how the Dharma is held, the Buddha said, that's not the way. That's not going to lead to the lessening of suffering. And so even the Dharma, he says, should not be clung to. And yet I don't believe he's saying the Dharma should not be used, should not be valued.

I see this exploration on letting go of clinging to views expressed beautifully by another sutta. This one is very famous, so it doesn't really fit in the category of lesser-known teachings. This is the simile of the raft, where the Buddha talks about the Eightfold Path as being like a raft. We make a raft to cross over our suffering. The suffering is described as the near shore where we are standing. We see the far shore where there's peace. And there's this flood of water in the middle that needs to be crossed over to get there. All you see on this side of the shore are sticks and mud and maybe some vines. And so gathering those together, he uses this analogy, we make a raft to cross over the water, to get to the other side.

There are a number of things I like about this analogy. The first one: we make the raft out of what's available, what's right here. We don't have to build this amazing luxury liner to cross the stream. We can build this raft out of what's available, out of our direct experience and the teachings. The Buddha says that the raft is the Eightfold Path, put together with our sights and sounds and smells and tastes and such—knowing our experience through the Eightfold Path. And so we build our raft.

You can envision a raft made out of sticks and mud and vines. It's going to have a lot of holes in it. You're crossing over this flood—the flood is said to represent the suffering of greed, aversion, and delusion—and you're going to get wet. When you're crossing over this stream, you're going to be in contact with the pain. The raft is keeping you afloat on top of it, not sucked under, not swept away. You're making effort with your hands and your feet to get across. But you're going to get wet. You are going to experience suffering. And yet the raft is giving us a new perspective. The Eightfold Path is giving us a new perspective.

Now, if the teaching is "don't cling to anything," well, if you let go of the raft when you're in the middle of the stream, you are going to drown.

So use the raft. Cross over the stream with the raft.

And then the last part of this teaching is that the Buddha says: suppose somebody, having made use of this raft to cross over the stream, once they're on the other side, thinks, "Wow, this raft has been really useful to me. Maybe I should put it on my head and carry it around with me wherever I go." Would that be useful? No. Instead, let the raft drift away and go about your business.

So in that way is my understanding of not clinging to the Dharma. At the very end of that teaching, the Buddha even says that even the Dharma and wholesome states should not be clung to—how much more so unwholesome states should not be clung to. And yet that analogy has described making use of the Dharma to free ourselves, to be in contact with suffering in a way that helps us move from being pulled under and sunk by it to being able to meet it in a new way, to transform our suffering. We do that by being in contact with it, not by somehow magically transcending it and floating above to land on the other side.

I hope this has given you some sense of appreciation for this early teaching of the Buddha. There are a few translations out there if you're interested in this text and want to read it. I will warn you, it's hard to read—a little dense, with some archaic ways of expressing things. Thanissaro Bhikkhu has a full translation of the Aṭṭhakavagga on Access to Insight, with helpful notes, but again, it's challenging to read. My understanding is he does a fairly accurate, literal translation, but that creates some challenges in English. There are other translations available online—"Chapter of the Octads" or "Chapter of the Eights" are good search terms.

Gil Fronsdal has also written a book that will be coming out with a publication date of October 27th this year, called The Buddha Before Buddhism: Wisdom of the Early Teachings, from Wisdom Publications. He's writing commentaries to each of the poems, so that may be of interest to you. There aren't many English language translations of this poem out there—Bhikkhu Bodhi, as far as I know, has not done one yet.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 218

Becoming Freedom

Andrea Fella · 48 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella delves into the Aṭṭhakavagga (Chapter of the Eights) from the Sutta Nipāta, considered by scholars to be among the earliest recorded teachings of the Buddha. This ancient collection of poems predates the formal codification of the Four Noble Truths and Eightfold Path, offering a remarkably direct teaching focused on two primary sources of suffering: clinging to sense pleasure and clinging to views.

Fella highlights how these poems describe three perspectives: the ordinary person caught in clinging, the liberated person who is free, and the path between them. She emphasizes the text's unique presentation of liberation not as a metaphysical state but as a way of being in the world—the freed person described through qualities like calmness, gentleness, alertness, and equanimity rather than abstract transcendence. The teaching on views is particularly relevant today, showing how fixed opinions create conflict and division, illustrated through the classic parable of the blind people and the elephant.

Practically, Fella explores how we can model the behavior of those who are free while remaining deeply honest about our actual mental states—not repressing difficult emotions but choosing not to let them 'leak out' into our actions. She connects this to the simile of the raft, teaching us to use the Dhamma skillfully without clinging to it. This talk offers both scholarly insight and practical wisdom for transforming suffering in everyday life.

When Shaila invited me to this series, I jumped at it. One of my favorite things is to talk about some of these teachings that are not so common or lesser known. The teaching I picked is from a lesser known book in the Pali Canon called the Sutta Nipata. It's a set of poems sometimes called the Chapter of the Eights. The Pali name for this teaching is the Atakavaga, which basically means the Chapter of the Eights. It's not really clear why it's called the Chapter of the Eights, because there's not much eight about it. There are sixteen poems, and some of them have eight sections or couplets, but most of them don't. But that's what it's called, the Chapter of the Eights.

There are a couple of reasons I like this text. One is that it seems to be, and historically most scholars agree, probably one of the earliest recorded teachings of the Buddha—not only early in its compilation, but also early in his time as a teacher. The way this is recognized in this particular text is that, first of all, the Pali, the language itself, is a little more archaic than in some of the other suttas. Thanissaro Bhikkhu points out that for poems that's not so unusual. But the real giveaway is that it is one of the few suttas which is referenced in other teachings. There are texts where people are saying, "Hey, have you memorized that set of poems? Do you know that set of poems?" The Buddha is also talking about memorizing these teachings as being a useful teaching tool. So these poems are at least referred to in other texts, and from that standpoint, it is somewhat of an earlier teaching.

One of the interesting things I find about this text is that it seems to be from before some of the standard ways the teachings were codified happened. There's no mention of the Four Noble Truths in these teachings. There's no mention of the Eightfold Path. The picture you get of the Buddha in these teachings is of a solitary teacher wandering around and talking to people. What he chose to talk to them about in this collection of poems was suffering, and that suffering is created by clinging—clinging to sense pleasure and clinging to views being the two main areas discussed in this text.

So it's a very direct teaching. In some ways it's simple because it's focused around this very simple place of looking at how do we cling, what do we cling to, and what are ways that support letting go of clinging.

There are three different types of verses in the sixteen poems. Most of the verses have one of three flavors to them. They are either describing what it's like to be an ordinary person caught up in clinging and the suffering that comes from that. Or they're describing the perspective or the state of mind or the experience of a person who is free. Or they're describing how one moves from being a person who's caught to being one that's free.

In this way, it's got a very simple structure. I credit Thanissaro Bhikkhu a lot for my study of this text because he pointed out this structure and said, when you read these poems, look for which kind of verse you're reading—that will help you to understand what's happening. I used that in my own study of these poems.

Given that there are sixteen poems with about 210 verses, I'm not going to go through the entire thing. I'm going to pick out a few themes, read a few sections, and highlight a few pieces that I find interesting about this teaching, a few of the key aspects that I find inspiring about this text.

The two kinds of clinging—the clinging to sense pleasure and the clinging to views—the first thing I'd like to explore with you are some of the poems that talk about what it's like to be an ordinary person clinging to sense pleasure. This is from the very first poem, and I'm using excerpts here, not reading entire poems. I took the liberty, with all of the translations—I'm using some translations from Thanissaro Bhikkhu, some from Bhikkhu Virado, some from Sadatissa—of editing them for gender neutrality. Another way I studied this text was to read as many different translations as I could find. In general, if you're studying something in this way, it's often useful to read different translations, because the different translations give you different flavors.

So, to start looking at the perspective of clinging, the perspective of how an ordinary person relates to their life, here is the first poem in Thanissaro Bhikkhu's translation:

If one longing for sense pleasure achieves it, yes, they're enraptured at heart. The mortal gets what they want. But if for that person, longing, desiring, the pleasures diminish, they're shattered as if shot with an arrow. One who is greedy is overpowered with weakness and trampled by trouble, for pain invades them as water a cracked boat.

So this points to the way that as we go through our lives, if we're orienting our experience towards trying to hold on to sense pleasure, hold on to pleasant experience, and get rid of unpleasant experience—this incredibly natural and human way of orienting to the world, something we all do—if that's our way of thinking we'll find happiness, we are destined to experience suffering in this life, because things are impermanent. We are bound to be confronted by pleasant things going away and unpleasant things being here. And so the Buddha describes this as "pain invading them as water a cracked boat."

Another verse on this, from the second poem: "Longing for what's over or what's to come, yearning for pleasures in the present and pleasures in the past. Those who are greedy for pleasure, hunting for it, deranged, selfish, have entered the wrong road. Look at them, floundering amidst their cherished possessions like fish in a dwindling stream."

That image of fish in a dwindling stream—that one is very evocative to me. At one point during a long retreat, I was experiencing the mind just flopping around, trying to find some pleasure somewhere. And it had that feeling. It felt like a fish. This image from the poem came to me, and I laughed. It brought some amusement to just watch the mind flopping around. Isn't there some pleasure somewhere?

These teachings point to the way it is for an ordinary human being clinging to pleasure. And that clinging to pleasure does include clinging to getting rid of displeasure, clinging to getting rid of the unpleasant. But another major area of teaching in this text is around clinging to views.

Clinging to sense pleasure is something we all do. It's kind of how we orient, the way we live our lives often. It's very natural. We learn from the moment we're born that if we get something we like, something pleasant, it feels good. We get a little bit of a feedback hit—oh, that feels good. Or if we manage to get rid of something we don't like, again there's a little bit of feedback hit that feels good. So it's very natural that we orient around that. And yet as we begin to practice, as we begin to explore our experience, we see the pain of it—the pain of holding onto pleasure and trying to get rid of pain. We begin to recognize that this may not be so helpful, and so we may begin to have a way to let go of some of our holdings around sense pleasure.

A deeper level, a deeper layer of holding, is around views—clinging to views. Views about who we are, what we're capable of, views about other people, views about what's good, what's bad, what's right, what's wrong. So many of our views come in, are absorbed through our upbringing, through our culture, through our families.

We have views about how close you should stand to somebody when you're talking to them. Whether and how much you look them in the eye. Whether you shake hands when you meet somebody that you don't know. These are just things that come in through our culture. They're views. They're not the right way—just examples of how views get absorbed. But when you meet somebody from a different culture and they stand a different distance, or look at you in the eye a little longer, or don't look at you in the eye, or perhaps hold your hand while they're talking to you, there can be discomfort because it's not familiar. The holding to views is around believing or having the perspective that this is the right way to do it.

Now these are simple examples I'm giving here—very simple examples. But we hold to views that are actually, in the Buddhist teaching, some of the main reasons why there's conflict in the world. People holding to views. In our country at this point, views around race are a huge source of conflict. Different perspectives, different beliefs, different views. The Buddha pointed to clinging to views as being one of the main reasons there's conflict in the world. And holding to fixed opinions creates a sense of self and other—this perspective of view.

Some of the teachings from the Aṭṭhakavagga on the drawbacks of clinging to views: "Abiding by fixed opinions and pleased with themselves, they say, 'My opponent's a fool, they're no expert.'"

Upon whatever basis they regard their opponent a fool is the same opinion upon which they regard themselves as an expert. To the extent to which they rate themselves expert, they despise anyone else who makes the same claim. And one of my favorite verses from the entire teaching: "Those attached to perception and views roam the world offending people."

There's a passage where someone asks the Buddha a question. The questioner says, "Those who maintain a view and dispute, saying 'this alone is true'—is criticism all they receive? Don't they also receive praise?" This person is pointing to something the Buddha has apparently been discussing with him about how when you express these opinions, you may be criticized. And he says, "But don't you also get praised?" As if that makes it better.

And the Buddha says, "Whatever they receive is trifling—not enough to bring them any peace of mind. I say there are only two consequences of dispute: praise and criticism. Seeing this, you should not dispute. Regard instead non-dispute the grounds for peace."

There's so much to explore around views. To begin to recognize that we hold views, to begin to see that if there's conflict, there is a view being held somewhere. And so curiosity about that. If there's conflict in yourself, sometimes there's a view being held about yourself. This can be something we explore in our experience. If there's some kind of conflict, curiosity: what view am I holding? Just hold that question for yourself.

I gave a teaching this morning around perception and concepts, and how these lead to views. There's a classic teaching around this—the blind people and the elephant. I'm sure many of you have heard this story. It's actually found in the Pali Canon, in the suttas.

The story goes that a king asks his ministers to bring both an elephant and blind people, and to show the blind people the elephant by having them touch it. Some touched the legs, some touched the side of the elephant, some the tail, some the tuft of the tail. And when asked, "What is an elephant like?" they each responded with a different analogy. Some said an elephant is like a post—those who touched the leg. An elephant is like a wall—those who touched the side. An elephant is like a broom—those who touched the tuft of the tail.

Then, hearing each other's responses, the story continues, they started arguing. "An elephant is like this—you're wrong!" "No, an elephant is like that—you're wrong!" The view, based on their own experience, became hardened: this is what an elephant is. And the story goes on that they actually came to blows over this.

Rather than being curious—"Oh, that's interesting. You think it's like a broom? It sure felt like a wall to me. Let's see if we can figure out what's going on here"—rather than doing that, people tend to solidify around their views.

This particular story, I think, is really instructive because it's pointing to views that are created based on our own experience. These are some of the most tenacious views we have. We experience something; we think we know from our direct experience. But maybe we've only got a piece of the picture. Maybe we've only seen a small part of it.

When we come up against conflict in this way, maybe we can think: perhaps there's a bigger picture in which we can explore how these parts connect.

This morning, the question came up about political views. Some people are saying it's like a post, some people are saying the tuft of the tail is like a broom. We are entrenched in our opinions. Is there a way forward? It seems imperative to me at this point in our country that we find a way to step back and talk about the elephant. Or the donkey—either one.

Let's see if we can find a way to the bigger picture. This is creating so much suffering and division and pain in our world. And the Buddha pointed to this 2,600 years ago: views are going to create suffering.

Views are going to create conflict. And so the Buddha spoke to this.

The next thing I'd like to share are some verses in this text that describe somebody who's free—somebody who has freed their mind from clinging. Really, these poems are directly pointing to the teaching. One of the pithy teachings of the Buddha, when he was asked at one point if he could describe his teaching in a short phrase, was this: "Nothing should be clung to as I or me or mine." And really, I think this whole text might be considered a commentary on that one phrase. Nothing should be clung to as I or me or mine.

Those who have released that clinging to I or me or mine—that person is understood in this context to be free of the suffering that comes from clinging. And that, in the Buddha's understanding, was everything we actually call suffering. We think what we call suffering is something unpleasant. But pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences will come and go through our lives. That's just flowing through. What's really going on is that we react—we get averse to the unpleasant, we hold on to the pleasant. And so it's something in our own minds that is creating this struggle, this suffering. This is what the Buddha is pointing to: the release of that clinging.

Some of the poems describe liberated people, those who are free from this clinging. There are different ways they're described, and this is one of the most interesting aspects of this particular text. The way that people who are free are described is primarily in terms of how they are in the world—how they act, how they walk in this world, what they do. Sometimes it talks a little bit about their state of mind, but mostly it's just this very ordinary description of somebody living in the world.

So here's a description of somebody who is liberated. A questioner asks the Buddha:

I want to ask you about the perfect person. There are those people we call those who are calmed. Can you tell me how they see things and how they behave?

One who has calmed, who has extinguished all craving before the time the body disintegrates, who has no concern over how things began or with how they will end, and no fixation with what happens in between—such a one has no preferences. They have no anger, no fear, and no pride. Nothing disturbs their composure and nothing gives them cause for regret.

The wise person is restrained in speech. They have no longing for the future and no grief for the past. There are no views or opinions that lead them. They can see detachment from the entangled world of sense impressions. They do not conceal anything and there's nothing they hold on to. Without acquisitiveness or envy, they remain unobtrusive. They have no disdain or insult for anyone.

They are not full of themselves or addicted to pleasure. They are gentle and alert with no blind faith. They show no aversion to anything. They are not people who work because they want something. If they get nothing at all, they remain unperturbed. There is no craving to build up the passion to taste new pleasures.

The sage, freed from greed and selfishness, does not speak of themselves as among those who are superior, equal, or inferior. The sage regards nothing in the world as one's own and does not grieve because of what does not exist. Not blindly following religious teachings, such a one is truly called peaceful.

Mostly the description here is in terms of what they don't do. They're not angry, not fearful, not full of pride. They don't have fixation, no preferences, no blind faith, no aversion. So a lot of things have been let go.

This is an interesting aspect of the Buddhist teaching. In general, the Buddha doesn't talk so much about what we can get, but what can be released. Clinging can be released. All of these areas are areas of clinging released. There are a few positive descriptions here: calm, wise, gentle, alert, even-minded. Elsewhere in this text there are some other descriptions of qualities of a liberated person.

Serene, wise, calm. They're mindful. They see, they know. And they're equanimous. Such beautiful qualities of mind that result from this letting go.

This is a picture of someone who's free in this teaching—someone walking around the world, engaged in the world. It's a picture that may not be very close to where we are: not averse, not frustrated, no preferences. But we're working on that. It's a picture of a person that I can imagine myself to possibly be someday.

This description, this way of presenting the liberated state, doesn't offer some abstract idea of liberation apart from the qualities of someone who is free. This is in contrast with the standard Theravada description of someone who's liberated being someone who is free from the round of the cycle of rebirth—someone who, on their final passing at death, is no longer born again into this world. A metaphysical difference, some fundamental shift of being that changes the metaphysical state of a being. This is a piece of the Theravada tradition that can be found throughout the Pali Canon, but it's not found in this teaching. This teaching really emphasizes this-worldly freedom. I find that to be very inspiring, personally.

There are some quotes from my research around this text. One person who wrote a scholarly text on this teaching was Grace Burford. I read what I believe was her doctoral thesis, and she offers this quote: "The Aṭṭhakavagga is exceptional within even the earliest Buddhist literature in its non-metaphysical presentation of the highest good achievable by humans." Metaphysical presentation often involves something that is beyond what can actually be known in this life. "The Aṭṭhakavagga is exceptional within even the earliest Buddhist literature in its non-metaphysical presentation of the highest good achievable by humans. It is significant as an example of how the Buddhist ideal goal can be presented without all of the usual cosmological and metaphysical accessories that accompany it in traditional Theravada doctrine."

There's a lot in the Theravada that brings in different realms of existence—things that some Westerners have difficulty connecting with. This particular teaching is a coherent teaching in which those elements are not brought in.

Another quote from another scholar: "The Aṭṭhakavagga sets out to describe a practical solution to human sorrow, not merely the abstract sorrow of rebirth, but the everyday sorrow of strife and aggression." Again, this is one of the reasons I find this particular teaching so inspiring. It speaks to me here and now, in this very life.

The next set of verses relates to the path of practice—how to get from being the ordinary person to being the liberated person. The training is described in quite a bit of detail in the last three poems. I'll read some of this, and you might notice certain things about it.

A questioner asks, "Venerable sir, speak about the path of practice."

The Buddha says: "A person should not have covetous eyes. One should close one's ears to ordinary chatter. One should not be greedy for flavors. One should not cherish anything in the world. One should be meditative, not footloose. One should desist from worry, should not be indolent, should live in lodgings where there is little noise. One should not sleep too much. One should be devoted to wakefulness and keen endeavor. One should abandon laziness, deception, merriment, various kinds of amusement. One should not fear blame nor be conceited when praised. One should drive out greed, selfishness, anger, and malicious speech. One should not be a boaster. One should not speak scheming words. One should not cultivate impudence nor utter quarrelsome speech. One should not be drawn into telling lies nor be deliberately treacherous. One should not despise others for their lowly way of life or wisdom or precepts and practices."

Basically, in this teaching, the Buddha is encouraging us to behave as though we were free.

When I read these kinds of paired texts—the description of somebody who is free and the description of somebody who is in training—the difference is the word "should" versus "is." Very much the person who is free is meditative, not footloose, is desisting, is not worrying, is not indolent.

So the word "should" here—to me this isn't about stopping your mind from doing what it's doing. Because we can't do that. Good luck with that. But in some ways the path of practice the Buddha is recommending is to try to model the behavior of those who are free. In my own experience, this is a very valuable practice, but only when I am willing and very honest with myself about what's actually going on in my mind.

In one example around patience and impatience: cultivate patience by acting patiently. That could be something expressed here. Cultivate patience by acting patiently. If you're experiencing impatience, it may be tempting to repress that impatience in order to act patiently. But in my experience, this is not what the Buddha is teaching, and it is not actually effective.

What is very effective is to fully recognize: yep, wow, there's a lot of impatience happening here. I'll give you an example of this. I was in a Long's—this was before it became something else—shopping in a Long's, and I was very impatient. I was kind of in a hurry to get through the store. And what I noticed was that it was being expressed through my body. We see this often—our mind states are expressed through our body, even in subtle ways. It's expressed through the expressions on our face. It's expressed through the way we engage in the world. And so this impatience was coming out of me by picking up things off the shelf and throwing them into my basket. Just this kind of grabbing and tossing.

I noticed this and decided, okay, I'm going to practice patience here. I'm noticing the impatience, and I'm going to see—not repressing this impatience—but I'm going to see if I can act as though I were patient. So I slowed down my movements. I fully acknowledged, yep, there's impatience here. This was not about repressing the impatience. This is an act of deep honesty, really acknowledging, yep, there's impatience here. The way I explored it was like, okay, I'm going to see—can I fully know this impatience but not let it leak out of my skin? Can I not let it leak out into my behavior?

And so I began picking up things more carefully and placing them in my basket. Within about thirty or forty seconds, the impatience had fallen away and the mind was quite calm.

This kind of practice, I think, is some of what the Buddha is suggesting here. He encourages us to model the behavior of wise beings, but watch our minds. Not repress. Worry is arising? Notice how worry leaks out into your actions and see, okay, can I really know this worry but behave as though I was not worried? See what might happen there. It's kind of an interesting dance to play with.

So this to me is really beautifully spoken here in this next verse: "If ascetics or ordinary people irritate one with their talkativeness, one should not respond harshly, for the peaceful do not retaliate."

If you want to cultivate peace, act peacefully.

We sometimes think—and I know you know—there's this really strong feedback loop between our mind and our bodies. What's going on in our mind will filter out into our bodies, as that example around the impatience shows. But this feedback loop does go both ways. So as we engage in the world, not repressing that we don't feel patient or peaceful, not repressing our anxiety—

Not repressing anxiety in order to act peacefully, but just watching and seeing that movement of rebound on the mind.

In some ways we trust—and we're a culture of "let it out." What's going on in our minds, we believe we have to be fully honest about and let it out. This may not be the best approach all the time, especially with something like anger. I'm not suggesting that you repress anger, but expressing it and letting it out in some ways tends to reinforce that pattern. And so what might it mean to fully know—yep, there's anger here—and what might it mean to act as though I were not angry? It's kind of a fake-it-till-you-make-it teaching. But again, we have to be really honest with ourselves about what's actually going on in our minds.

There's a huge other part of the teaching of this text that relates to views and not clinging to views—not clinging to any views, including the Dharma. This is somewhat paradoxical teaching in some ways. There are people who believe that the teaching of the Aṭṭhakavagga encourages us to not hold any view at all, and I don't get that sense from the texts and from this teaching.

To me, the way in which the teaching of don't cling to views is really clearly described: clinging to views will create suffering. If we're clinging, even clinging to the Dharma—you know, this Dharma, what the Buddha teaches, this is right, I'm willing to kill for this—this is going to lead to suffering in the world. Even the Buddha's teaching would lead to that if we're holding it in that way. "You don't believe in this teaching, you're wrong. You're bad." If that's how the Dharma is held, the Buddha said that's not the way. That's not going to lead to the lessening of suffering. And so even the Dharma, he says, should not be clung to.

And yet I don't believe he's saying the Dharma should not be used, should not be valued. I see this exploration on letting go of clinging to views to be expressed by another sutta—this one very famous, so it doesn't really fit in the category of lesser-known teachings. This is the simile of the raft, where the Buddha talks about the Eightfold Path being like a raft.

We make a raft to cross over our suffering. The suffering is described as the near shore where we are standing. We see the far shore where there's peace. And there's this flood of water in the middle that needs to be crossed over to get there. All you see on this side of the shore are sticks and mud and maybe some vines. And so gathering those together, he uses this analogy of making a raft to cross over the water, to get to the other side.

There's a number of things I like about this analogy. First, we make the raft out of what's available, what's right here. We don't have to build this amazing luxury liner to cross the stream. We can build this raft out of what's available, out of our direct experience and the teachings. The Buddha says that the raft is the Eightfold Path, put together with our sights and sounds and smells and tastes and touch—knowing our experience through the Eightfold Path. And so we build our raft.

You can envision a raft made out of sticks and mud and vines. It's going to have a lot of holes in it. You're crossing over this flood—the flood is said to represent the suffering of greed, aversion, and delusion—and you're going to get wet. When you're crossing over this stream, you're going to be in contact with the pain. The raft is keeping you afloat on top of it, not sucked under, not swept away. You're making effort with your hands and your feet to get across. But you're going to get wet. You are going to experience suffering. And yet the raft is giving us a new perspective. The Eightfold Path is giving us a new perspective.

Now, if the teaching is simply don't cling to anything—well, if you let go of the raft when you're in the middle of the stream, you are going to drown.

So use the raft. Cross over the stream with it.

And then the last part of the teaching is this: the Buddha says that someone having made use of this raft to cross over the stream, once they're on the other side, suppose they think, "Wow, this raft has been really useful to me. Maybe I should put it on my head and carry it around with me wherever I go." Would that be useful?

No.

Instead, set the raft adrift and go about your business.

So in that way is my understanding of not clinging to the Dharma. And at the very end of that teaching, the Buddha even says that even the Dharma and wholesome states should not be clung to—how much more so unwholesome states should not be clung to.

And yet that analogy has described making use of the Dharma to free ourselves, to be in contact with that suffering in a way that helps us move from being pulled under and sunk by it to being able to meet it in a new way, to transform our suffering. And we do that by being in contact with it, not by somehow magically transcending it and floating above and landing on the other side.

I hope this has given you some sense of appreciation for this early teaching of the Buddha. There are a few translations out there if you're interested in this text and want to read it. I will warn you, it's hard to read—a little dense, with some archaic ways that things are expressed. Thanissaro Bhikkhu has a full translation of the Aṭṭhakavagga on Access to Insight, and he has some good notes with it that are helpful, but again, it's challenging. My understanding is he does a fairly accurate, literal translation, but that creates some difficulties reading it in English. There are other translations out there on the internet that you can search for—"Chapter of the Octads" or "Chapter of the Eights" are good things to search for.

And Gil Fronsdal has written a book that will be coming out—I think the publication date is October 27th this year. The book will be called The Buddha Before Buddhism: Wisdom of the Early Teachings. It will be available from Wisdom Publications. He's writing commentaries to each of the poems, so that may be of interest to you. There's not a lot of English-language translations of these poems out there; Bhikkhu Bodhi, as far as I know, has not done one yet.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 219

Buddha's Practical Advice for Maintaining Material Gains and Wealth

Andrea Fella · 27 min

In this illuminating talk, Shaila Catherine presents a rarely discussed discourse from the Aṅguttara Nikāya that reveals the Buddha's practical wisdom for lay practitioners regarding material well-being. The sutta identifies four factors that determine whether families can maintain their wealth: looking for things that are lost, repairing things that have gotten old, being moderate in consuming food and drink, and placing virtuous people in positions of authority.

Catherine skillfully connects these seemingly mundane instructions to deeper practice principles. The advice to look for lost items and repair belongings becomes an invitation to cultivate mindfulness in our relationship with material things—extending sati beyond the meditation cushion into daily interactions with our possessions. She reads from the Majjhima Nikāya's description of how the Buddha ate with complete presence, using it to explore moderation not as austerity but as conscious, purposeful engagement with the requisites of life.

The teaching on virtue in leadership opens into a profound reflection on sīla as the foundation for all wholesome states. Catherine cites the suttas describing how satipaṭṭhāna practice, the seven factors of awakening, and the Noble Eightfold Path are all developed "based upon virtue, established upon virtue." She extends this to show how trust—grounded in ethical conduct—enables society and commerce to function. For contemporary practitioners, this discourse offers a framework for bringing mindful attention, contentment, and integrity to our material responsibilities without either grasping or negligent disregard.

I'm the last of a series of speakers in what we've called "The Lesser Known Teachings of the Buddha." I put together this series because I was very intrigued as I read the discourses. We've been reading the numerical discourses of the Buddha, the Aṅguttara Nikāya, this year in our monthly study group, and I became aware that there were many discourses, especially in that collection, that are not often heard about. There are lots of surprises here—even after years and years of studying the suttas, there are just lots of surprises in the Aṅguttara Nikāya. So I wanted to devote a series to looking at the things that are just not so commonly talked about.

I knew I was going to be jet-lagged for this talk, so I picked a very simple one. I wanted to speak about how we maintain wealth and material gains. How many people think of the Buddha as teaching that? No, we think of the Buddha as being all about renunciation, about letting go, about giving up the home life and going into homelessness. We don't think about him as giving advice about how to keep your wealth. But there actually are discourses where he was speaking to lay people and giving them advice as to how to protect their family's wealth.

Just knowing this opens up the discourses a little bit, moving us beyond some idea that these are spiritual words that are all very elevated and otherworldly. Instead, the discourses of the Buddha are conversations that he had with real people, and he dealt with whatever their situation was.

The discourse is from the Aṅguttara Nikāya, the Book of the Fours, and I'll just read it. It's two paragraphs:

"In every case where a family cannot hold onto its great wealth for long, it is for one or another of these four reasons. Which four? They don't look for things that are lost. They don't repair things that have gotten old. They are immoderate in consuming food and drink. They place a woman or man of no virtue or principles in the position of authority. In every case where a family cannot hold on to its great wealth for long, it is for one or another of these four reasons.

In every case where a family can hold on to its great wealth for long, it is for one or another of these four reasons. Which four? They look for things that are lost. They repair things that have gotten old. They are moderate in consuming food and drink. They place a virtuous, principled woman or man in the position of authority. In every case where a family can hold on to its great wealth for long, it is for one or another of these four reasons."

So I want to look at these four reasons together tonight.

"They look for things that are lost." It's really practical—really, really practical. I understand this to be encouraging us to be mindful of our interaction with the material world so that we don't engage with things in a careless manner. We bring attention to the most ordinary of daily activities, which is our relationship to the various things that we touch, that we work with, that we have, that we hold.

We're not only mindful of how we place our bodies in the sitting posture, but we're also mindful of the things that we touch, what we hold, what we're responsible for, what we use, what we protect, what we own, what we possess. What we wash, what we clean, what we move, what we do, the stuff that we do stuff with. We're mindful of our hands.

Some people have habits. Do you have a habit of losing your glasses? Or a habit of losing your keys? Or a habit of wondering where you put that ring or that watch or that book? Have you lost your phone? What do you lose? Sometimes the things that we lose repeatedly—and often find—we lose them because we weren't mindful of our relationship to them.

We weren't aware and attentive of how we were using it and what we did with it.

And so a simple instruction like this—to look for things that are lost—I think helps us to start to bring attention to how it is we lose something in the first place, and to practice mindfulness then with touch, with holding, with the things that we're responsible for. And when we lose them, then we look for them. We don't have to get all worried and anxious that we've lost it. It's probably in our pockets. It's probably in whatever jacket we were wearing yesterday. Because often when we think we've lost something, we've really just misplaced it. So by looking for things that are lost, it helps us to bring attention to that arena of our relationship to things.

And I think this connects again with the next point, which was that they repair things that have gotten old. Whether this is about fixing a vacuum cleaner or being attentive to the state of your toaster or taking the time to actually stitch and patch up a hole in clothing rather than just throw it away as soon as it starts to wear a little bit—I think this item encourages us to respect our possessions and respect the work that went into acquiring them.

Because everything that we have was gained through effort. It was gained through labor. It was gained through time. We invested in it and other people invested in it. So by repairing things, we give respect to things so that we don't just toss everything away as soon as there's some little waver of "whatever, it's not working." We consider: can we fix it up? Can we repair it? Can we make the effort to keep them in good condition, to keep them operating? It's just a basic respect for the effort and the time and the labor that goes into producing things.

Now, things are a little bit different these days with the consumer economy. In the Buddha's time, not much was really tossed away. Almost everything was either repurposed or repaired. I think the disposable society that we live in today would have been unimaginable 2,600 years ago. Many of our electronics, our appliances, our products are difficult, if not impossible, to repair because they're designed to stop working or to break down after a certain period of time. Or companies stop producing the parts that would enable somebody who even had the skills or the interest to repair them, because they want to force new purchases.

I can't tell you how many times—you've probably all had this experience yourself—where something breaks down, some appliance or something, and you call the repair person, and they look at the date you bought it, and they say, "Oh yes, this was designed to last for six years. Be lucky, be happy—it's only seven years old. We don't repair it after five years." I mean, that happens very frequently, whether we're talking about water heaters. Why do water heaters have to break down after ten years? They're nevertheless designed to.

So we have a different society and expectations and economy that we're working within. We have to adjust our understanding of what the Buddha was saying. And we don't also want to just hang on to things because they're broken and we don't want to throw them away, and then we just live with piles of clutter. That would be even worse.

But since there are lots of situations where we might not be able to take this quite literally, I think we can still consider this an invitation to be mindful of the maintenance that's required for daily life and to consider again: how do we tend to, how do we care for our material responsibilities? Are we lazy and just let things fall apart around us because we don't bother to maintain them, we don't bother to keep them up? Or are we flagrantly wasteful, just throwing things away at the slightest sign of wear and just buying new instead of even attempting a minor repair? Or are we paralyzed—neither repairing them nor throwing them away—and then just living with useless clutter around?

We can develop an appropriate, moderate, non-wasteful, and wise relationship to our stuff. I think that's what this is pointing to. It's encouraging us to develop contentment, right effort, and a practical relationship with material things.

The third item is that they are moderate in consuming food and drink. I'd like to read a verse from the Middling Discourses about how the Buddha eats. It says: "When he receives rice, he does not raise or lower the bowl or tip it forward or backwards. He receives neither too little rice nor too much rice. He adds sauces in the right proportion. He does not exceed the right amount of sauce in the mouthful. He turns the mouthful over two or three times in his mouth and then swallows it. And no rice kernel enters his body unchewed and no rice kernel remains in his mouth. Then he takes another mouthful. He takes his food experiencing the taste, though not experiencing greed for the taste. The food he takes has eight factors."

It is neither for amusement nor for intoxication, nor for the sake of physical beauty and attractiveness, but only for the endurance and continuance of this body, for the ending of discomfort, and for the assisting of the holy life. He considers, "I shall terminate old feelings without arousing new feelings, and I shall be healthy and blameless and shall live in comfort."

So that's how the Buddha eats.

Now, this might seem a little bit extreme, perhaps a little bit controlled. But I think it certainly demonstrates some composure in action and a non-indulgence in the most ordinary of activities—eating—and a sense of simplicity, an awareness of what is enough. It encourages us to reflect on how we engage with food.

Often when food is mentioned in the discourses, it isn't just about food. Food is an example of a requisite. It's an example of something that we need to live but can overindulge in or can use for the wrong reasons. So I extend this to consider: How do we engage with our food and our clothing and our housing and our entertainment and our vehicles? How do we engage with things? Is there moderation? Do we use enough, but maybe not excess?

Is our interaction appropriate, moderate, enough to provide the sufficient conditions for our health, for our safety, for our well-being, for our growth, and for our pleasure, joy, and happiness? There's nothing wrong with that either. Or do the excesses in our lives dominate even the very ordinary activities related to our food, our shelter, our clothing, and our social activities? Because after a while, excesses become burdens.

Now, I don't take this to be a literal instruction that we should obsessively chew our rice. I read it instead as an encouragement to relate consciously and moderately and purposefully to the ordinary activities, the necessary activities of living. So just reflect for a moment: Are there ways in which you feel the unsatisfactoriness, the burden, the pangs of excessiveness in any area of your ordinary life? And how might it be possible to bring greater simplicity—not austerity, but simplicity—to your living?

I'd like to say a few words about the fourth item: placing a virtuous, principled woman or man in the position of authority. The texts actually do say "woman or man," by the way. Sometimes I shift the genders around, but this was actually in the text. So it was clear that in some situations, women certainly did have authority in certain arenas and under different conditions.

Virtue is the basis not only for developing meditation—virtue is actually the basis for developing all wholesome states. It's the foundation of our practice. In satipatthana practice, the development of mindfulness—sati means mindfulness—we find satipatthana is developed based upon virtue. Similarly, the factors of awakening are developed based upon virtue, and the Eightfold Path is developed based upon virtue. In fact, all wholesome states are explicitly described as being based upon virtue.

Just to give you a sense of this, there's a discourse about a monk named Bahiya. For those of you familiar with the suttas, this is not Bahiya of the Bark Cloth, who got enlightened quickly and then was killed by a cow. This is a different Bahiya, who lived a nice long life as a monk.

The discourse says: "Bahiya, purify the very starting point of wholesome states. And what is the starting point of wholesome states? Virtue that is well purified and a view that is straight. When your virtue is well purified and your view straight, based upon virtue, established upon virtue, you should develop the four establishments of mindfulness, the satipatthanas."

In another discourse: "Bhikkhus, just as whatever kinds of seeds and plant life attain to growth, increase, and expansion, all do so based upon the earth, established upon the earth, so too, based upon virtue, established upon virtue, a bhikkhu develops and cultivates the Noble Eightfold Path, and thereby attains to growth, increase, and expansion in wholesome states." There's very similar phrasing where, based upon virtue, established upon virtue, one cultivates the seven factors of awakening. Basically, it's describing that virtue is clearly a necessary foundation for success in meditation.

But virtue also plays a very important role for maintaining our material wealth and our material gains. We need to trust the people that we work with, the people that we work for, and the people in positions of authority. We can probably imagine the myriad ways that corruption and deception and lies, slander, theft, and greed can destroy wealth.

When you go into a bank, you have to trust the teller. There has to be a certain degree of trust to give over our money to these institutions. We have to trust our financial advisors and our accountants to conduct themselves rightly. We may double-count the change when we get our money at the grocery store or at a shop, but nevertheless, each time we swipe our credit card, there is trust involved in this exchange. We have to trust our employers to be fair and trust the virtue of friends and family whom we allow to enter our homes.

As a society, we need the people we put into authority to have virtue. Without virtue, corruption will increase and the sense of security will diminish. We need trust for society to function.

I'm actually in quite a fortunate position to be associating and working with very virtuous people.

I mean, all the volunteers at IMSB—it's a very virtuous group of people, probably the best you can find anywhere. And it's especially important to me personally because my livelihood and my income is sitting in a basket by the door.

So I'm not only thankful for the virtue of this group—because the dana actually does go in the bowl instead of coming out of it—but also for the virtue of the volunteers who manage the dana, who take it to the bank, who process it, and who at the end of the month send me a check of the combined donations, which is the equivalent of my income, my salary. What's lovely about it is the environment of trust within which that occurs.

Not everybody is so fortunate to feel safety in their work environment. Some people go to work in an environment that has far more contention, backbiting, fear, competition, and other unwholesome, unpleasant qualities than we find here. So I'm very grateful for that.

But I do think this aspect of cultivating virtue is important to understand, not only in terms of our meditation practice, but also to realize that it gives us a strength in integrity—which is actually a strength in social environments too. Too often I hear people say that virtue is of no use in business, that it's a hindrance or a failing. I don't think it is. I believe it's actually a source of strength.

It would be ignorance to think that because we're virtuous, everybody else is. But we can be virtuous and also be intelligent in assessing the degree of virtue of others, so that we don't get used or abused or exploited or betrayed. We can bring intelligence to our practice of virtue and bring that virtue into many different businesses, into our relationship with the material things and the wealth that we have.

So I have a couple of reflective questions for this topic as well. First, consider if there are some situations in your life where somebody in a position of authority has actually had a very protective effect on your material well-being—where you've sensed that somebody's virtue has helped you, has protected your material wealth, whatever degree of wealth that might be.

And consider if you rely upon anybody—it could be businesses, professionals, friends, or family—to protect your assets, to look out for your home, to advise you about your investments, to watch out for your things. I think sometimes it's worth reflecting not only on their professionalism or effectiveness or knowledge, especially if it's a job, but also to realize that underlying all of that is virtue. To respect the virtue involved, the virtue that supports professionalism, the virtue that brings integrity into a transactional relationship.

CHAPTER 220

Goals in Meditation: Commitment to Enlightenment

Andrea Fella · 30 min

In this profound talk, Shaila Catherine addresses a delicate topic in meditation practice: how to maintain commitment to enlightenment without falling into counterproductive goal-seeking. She begins by acknowledging the common hesitation in insight meditation circles around goal-setting, as it can easily devolve into grasping, comparing, and self-judgment. Yet she argues that reflecting on our deepest aspirations—when done wisely—can fuel energetic inspiration rather than insecurity.

Drawing on the Greater Discourse on the Simile of the Heartwood (Mahāsāropama Sutta, MN 29), Catherine illustrates how practitioners can mistake preliminary attainments for the ultimate goal. Just as villagers seeking heartwood might settle for twigs, branches, or bark, meditators might become satisfied with fame, virtue, concentration, or even profound knowledge and vision—all valuable, but not the 'perpetual liberation that does not fall away.' She also references the Visuddhimagga's ten corruptions of insight, explaining how experiences like luminosity, rapture, tranquility, and equanimity become impediments only when we cling to them.

Catherine shares her own journey—from urgent, almost agitated commitment that led her to India on a one-way ticket, to periods of loving devotion and calm dedication. She emphasizes that commitment need not be attached to particular techniques, teachers, or institutions, but rather to something profound and ultimately indefinable: freedom, peace, the ending of greed, hatred, and delusion. The talk concludes with an invitation to contemplate what we are truly committed to in our spiritual lives.

Commitment to Enlightenment

I think it's important to consider what we want in our spiritual lives, because what we want is what we tend to move toward.

In insight meditation groups, we tend not to encourage a lot of specific goal setting because people can very easily slide into the more common worldly patterns of trying to envision what we want and making it happen—grasping after some kind of future experience that we've already imagined, already conceived of. We might expect some specific spiritual gain or then start to compare where we're at with where we think we should be. And usually our timeline of development is rather unrealistic. It backfires. If we get involved in comparing, it backfires, and we end up discouraged, we end up judging ourselves, we end up doubting our practice.

But it is possible to reflect upon our commitments, to reflect upon our aspirations, without fueling insecurity, without it leading to doubt and comparing and conceit and envy. We can nurture instead an energetic inspiration by reflecting upon the noble aims—perhaps an aim of awakening, awakening from the patterns of ignorance, purifying the heart from greed, hate, and delusion, ending chronic misperceptions that create a kind of resistance to how things actually are in our lives. Or just having the inspiration to continue to learn, to continue to grow, to continue to improve our experience and ourselves and the way we meet life, so that we meet it with an increasing sense of virtue and clarity and mindfulness and wisdom.

The Buddha described the aim of practice in a number of different discourses and in a number of different ways of saying what the purpose of his teachings were. In one discourse, the Middle Length Discourse Sutta number 29, called the Simile of the Heartwood, he uses a simile that describes a story where somebody needs heartwood. They need that strong inner wood in order to make a chair or a table or a bench or a pillar or a post. And so this person who needs the heartwood goes into the forest in search of heartwood and comes to a tree that actually possesses heartwood. But that person really doesn't know what heartwood is. And so they get excited that they found this tree and they leave with the twigs and the leaves.

Another person comes, also seeking heartwood to do a building project, and they find a tree that has heartwood, but they also don't know what it is, so they leave carrying away only the branches. Another person looking for heartwood does the same thing but leaves carrying away the bark, and another one takes only the soft inner wood. Each of these people needs heartwood, and they feel pleased with what they've found because they believe that their purpose has been fulfilled. In fact, they praise themselves for their discoveries and for their attainments of these twigs and these branches and this bark. And then they disparage others. It is said they become intoxicated with their gains, their attainments, and grow negligent. But because they didn't know the aim, they didn't actually know what the heartwood was—though they're unaware of this—their purpose is not going to be fulfilled.

This simile is used to describe the many valuable things that happen in the course of our spiritual practice. In this discourse, the Buddha then goes on to describe four things that are gained in the course of our practice but should not be mistaken for the goal, and a fifth thing that is considered the noble aim and the heartwood of the path.

He considers first popularity, fame, a sense of gaining prestige or social respectability, and he does not praise this. Yes, it happens, but he does not praise it at all. Then there are three things that he praises: virtue, concentration, and knowledge and vision. These are attainments that develop in the course of our practice. They happen, and they're praiseworthy. And then there's the fifth, which is the final—what's called the perpetual liberation that does not fall away.

The simile of the heartwood reminds us to reflect upon what our aims for practice are and what is the highest aim, what is the heartwood of the path, so that we won't be satisfied with deceptive attainments, even praiseworthy accomplishments that develop in the course of our mindfulness training and our meditative development.

When we are engaged in a sincere and deep meditation practice, we're going to encounter periodically some very lovely experiences. We might experience some joy and bliss, some calmness and tranquility. Perhaps the mind might become luminous and bright, flexible and wieldy. We might experience very refined states of concentration or deep states of clarity and wisdom. These are great. Don't complain if they occur. You don't need to fear them. You don't need to avoid them. You don't need to resist them. But they're not the heartwood. They're not the aim. They're not the ultimate goal of this path.

In the Visuddhimagga, a fifth-century meditation manual, we find a very important list of ten corruptions of insight. These corruptions of insight occur very naturally in the course of our meditation practice and become impediments only if they are mistaken for the goal, only if we become attached to them and therefore stop short of the heartwood. These corruptions of insight include light and luminosity of the mind, a radiance of mind. The second is knowledge of matter and mind—to really have a very clear, vivid, and genuine understanding of the nature of body and mind. The third is rapturous bliss, happiness, joy. The fourth is tranquility.

The fifth is pleasure and happiness. The sixth is resolution or determination. The seventh is exertion—right striving, right effort. The eighth is mindfulness. And the ninth is equanimity.

They don't really sound like impediments to the path, do they? In a way, these are the things that we are cultivating. These are practices that we nurture—certainly mindfulness, equanimity, energy, resolution, joy, tranquility, and knowledge of matter and mind. What's corrupt about these?

Well, it's the tenth that tells us. The tenth item is attachment. And if we are attached to any of these, then it will become an impediment to the development of our practice. It will prevent us from reaching the ultimate goal of realization.

Not all of these experiences are going to occur for every meditator, but this list of nine items does describe the kind of positive experiences that can arise in our practice and have the potential to distort our perception of the path if we neglect to see them as conditioned, as impermanent, as not I, not me, and not mine.

Just as a villager who goes into the forest looking for heartwood would be more successful if that villager knew what heartwood was—at least knew some of the defining features of it, or what it wasn't—as we explore the depths of our minds, as we explore how we encounter experience, how perception operates, we could benefit by having a sense of what we're looking for. We could benefit from an understanding of what the Buddha was teaching, of what he was teaching for, of the purpose that motivated his ministry.

So we can first reflect individually: What are we seeking? What brought you here tonight? What brings you to your meditation seat? What inspires you to pick up a Dharma book instead of a comic book? What are you interested in developing? What are your goals?

Are you committed to enlightenment? To inner peace? To wisdom? To calmness? To living with greater love and compassion? To being more present for the encounters that you experience in a day? What motivates your practice? What do you want?

One of the classic definitions of enlightenment is the ending of greed, hate, and delusion. Does that motivate your practice? Is that something that you want? Are you committed to putting an end to the movements of greed and hate and delusion as they arise within your own mind and your own life? How strong is that commitment?

I think these are very noble goals. They require dedication, they require effort, they require earnestness. The Buddha urged his disciples to abandon the defilements of mind as earnestly as a man whose turban or hair was on fire would attempt to extinguish those flames. There's no complacency, thinking, "Ah, maybe I'll get around to it later. I've got other things to do." No, when your hair is on fire, you don't think about the long list of other possible distractions. You take care of it. It's the business at hand. It's what calls your attention.

If we're complacent, we might allow the fires of greed, hate, and delusion to smolder within our own minds. We might not bother to address them until they burst into flame, causing panic and suffering, until we act on them. And then, in a way, it's too late. It's caused a bit of harm.

So we need the effort to align our energies with our commitments, to maintain a steadiness of attention on our aim, and to do the work that develops wisdom and brings inner peace. Even just to sit every day in meditation. Even just to watch the mind and bring it back to the present moment as we're showering, brushing our teeth, as we're interacting, as we're driving, as we're doing all the various things that we do in a day. To watch the mind in those encounters and to see: is greed, hate, or delusion determining our engagement with activity? If so, can we find an option out? Can we shift to non-greed, non-hate, non-delusion?

Whether we're sitting in meditation or bringing mindfulness to daily life, each moment requires some degree of diligence, of non-complacency. Having a sense of an aim can bring inspiration and a sense of urgency to our practice.

But even if we have a sense of urgency, very often it might appear as though our practice doesn't develop very quickly. Suzuki Roshi said in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind: "After you have practiced for a while, you realize that it is not possible to make rapid, extraordinary progress. The progress you make is always little by little."

Not like going out in a downpour when you know you're getting wet, but rather like walking in fog when you do not know that you're getting wet. If your mind has ideas of progress, you will be disappointed by the pace. So we need patience. We need trust in the gradual unfolding of the path.

I like the term commitment, but sometimes it might sound forceful or too strong, perhaps even restrictive to some people. What is the emotional tone behind our commitments? I think that emotional quality, that feeling quality, the sense of the way we make a commitment varies at different times in our lives.

For me, sometimes my commitment to the spiritual life has felt like just a deep but kind of nagging curiosity—a sense of chewing on something, wanting to know something, not being satisfied with the current state of knowledge and understanding, a sense of having my interest piqued.

And sometimes my sense of commitment has felt so urgent that it was as though I would have sacrificed anything to pursue my practice, that nothing could stand in my way, that my very life depended upon it. It's probably not surprising that during that period of incredible, almost agitated urgency, I flew off to India on a one-way ticket and spent the better part of a decade abroad. I left school, I left family, I left work, I left all my worldly aims behind. I even left my name behind and accepted a new one. I endured typhoid, dengue fever, giardia, hunger, and quite uncomfortable situations. But I didn't want to let anything stand in my way, and it didn't feel difficult because of the energy of that sense of urgency.

At other times, that sense of urgency didn't feel so agitating. In fact, it felt more like a loving devotion—a sense of being deeply devoted to the possibility of awakening, a kind of smooth, deep, but earnest commitment. I simply had the sense of loving the possibility of awakening more than I loved doing anything else. To love liberation and that potential with my whole heart, and to feel a deep caring and appreciation for the Dhamma path.

And sometimes this sense of commitment feels to me like just a deep calm—a gradual dedication, a gradual inclination, a very gradual training. I often say that the meditator's mascot is the tortoise, the tortoise that just plods along and keeps on going. Sometimes it retreats into its shell—goes on retreat, enters into silence for a few moments, sits in meditation—and then it stretches out into the world again, enduring whatever comes on its path, never giving up, continuing to plod along.

Whatever that energetic flavor is, whatever the emotional style might be, we still need perseverance. We need patience. We need commitment. We need dedication. Because our development takes time. This isn't about snapping our fingers and having instant enlightenment. We're cultivating profound qualities that lead to a potential transformation—a radical transformation, a deep transformation. But usually we must nurture conditions for a long time before those conditions ripen and we can taste the fruit of our practice.

So as you consider what you are committed to, please be careful that you're not committing to some kind of institutional form as your ultimate goal. I think it would be a mistake to place our commitments in social structures, thinking, "I have to attend long retreats to develop my practice," or "I have to ordain as a monk or nun in order to pursue this path." I don't think we need to make a commitment to a particular technique for the duration of our practice or our lives. And we don't need to identify with or become committed to particular teachers or communities. Yes, there's value in loyalty, in trust, in gratitude—those are virtues. And there's value in discipline and steadiness. If we shop around and are always changing our practices, going from this teacher to that teacher every two seconds, we're never going to gain real depth. But our deepest commitments, I think, need to be to something profound—the heartwood of the path.

Commitment is a movement of energy and intention, and it does not require any special costume, any special custom, or any special association, because it is broader than any particular method. At different times in our lives we might emphasize one meditation technique, and then at another time we might emphasize another. This doesn't make the second one better or more important than the first. There are times when we might work with mindfulness of feelings, other times when we might focus on mindfulness of breath. There are times when we might deepen our samādhi and strengthen our concentration, and other times when we might focus on enriching compassion and loving-kindness. Sometimes we'll focus on virtues—really work with the ethical precepts or cultivate our capacity to give, to let go. There are so many different dimensions of the Dhamma path, and at different times in the course of our practice, we may be involved to a greater or lesser extent with different modes of practice.

So perhaps what we dedicate ourselves to is something rather profound—perhaps something we can't even define or limit to a specific image or understanding. What is freedom, really? What is peace? What is the end of ignorance, craving, and hatred? We might have an inkling of it. We might have a sense of it.

But each of these ideas is worth spending a lifetime getting to know. What is the deepest meaning of freedom? Of peace? Can we have a goal that is worth exploring for a whole lifetime, so that the meaning of it becomes rich and profound?

The commitments that we make are powerful. They set a direction. They have an effect.

And so please reflect: What are you committed to? What are you committed to in your spiritual life?

I'd like to invite you to meditate for a few minutes and contemplate that question. What are we committed to?

CHAPTER 221

Goals in Meditation: Commitment to Enlightenment

Andrea Fella · 30 min

Drawing from the Mahāsāropama Sutta (MN 29), the Simile of the Heartwood, Shaila Catherine examines the delicate balance between having spiritual aspirations and avoiding the pitfalls of goal-oriented grasping. She explains how the Buddha distinguished between valuable attainments that arise in practice—virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and knowledge and vision—and the ultimate aim of perpetual liberation that does not fall away.

The talk explores the ten corruptions of insight from the Visuddhimagga, including luminosity, rapture, tranquility, and even mindfulness itself—experiences that become impediments only when we become attached to them and mistake them for the final goal. Catherine emphasizes that the classic definition of enlightenment as the ending of greed, hate, and delusion (lobha, dosa, moha) requires earnest dedication, comparing the Buddha's instruction to extinguish mental defilements as urgently as one would put out flames on one's own head.

Catherine shares her personal journey, reflecting on how commitment manifests differently throughout one's practice life—sometimes as urgent intensity, sometimes as loving devotion, and sometimes as patient, tortoise-like perseverance. She encourages practitioners to commit to something profound beyond institutional forms or specific techniques: the heartwood itself, the deep transformation that unfolds gradually through sustained dedication to awakening.

Commitment to Enlightenment

I've titled this talk Commitment to Enlightenment. I think it's important to consider what we want in our spiritual lives, because what we want is what we tend to move toward.

In insight meditation groups, we tend not to encourage a lot of specific goal setting because people can very easily slide into the more common worldly patterns of trying to envision what we want and making it happen—grasping after some kind of future experience that we've already imagined, already conceived of. We might expect some specific spiritual gain and then start to compare where we're at with where we think we should be. Usually our timeline of development is rather unrealistic, and it backfires. If we get involved in comparing, it backfires, and we end up discouraged, judging ourselves, doubting our practice.

But it is possible to reflect upon our commitments, to reflect upon our aspirations, without fueling insecurity, without it leading to doubt and comparing and conceit and envy. We can nurture instead an energetic inspiration by reflecting upon the noble aims—perhaps an aim of awakening from the patterns of ignorance, purifying the heart from greed, hate, and delusion, ending chronic misperceptions that create a kind of resistance to how things actually are in our lives. Or simply having the inspiration to continue to learn, to continue to grow, to continue to improve our experience and ourselves and the way we meet life, so that we meet it with an increasing sense of virtue and clarity and mindfulness and wisdom.

The Buddha described the aim of practice in a number of different discourses and in a number of different ways. In one discourse, the Middle Length Discourse Sutta number 29, called the Simile of the Heartwood, he uses a simile that describes a story where somebody needs heartwood—that strong inner wood—in order to make a chair or a table or a bench or a pillar or a post. This person who needs the heartwood goes into the forest in search of it and comes to a tree that actually possesses heartwood. But that person really doesn't know what heartwood is. So they get excited that they found this tree, and they leave with the twigs and the leaves.

Another person comes, also seeking heartwood to do a building project, and they find a tree that has heartwood, but they also don't know what it is, so they leave carrying away only the branches. Another person looking for heartwood does the same thing but leaves carrying away the bark, and another one takes only the soft inner wood. Each of these people needs heartwood, and they feel pleased with what they've found because they believe that their purpose has been fulfilled. In fact, they praise themselves for their discoveries and for their attainments of these twigs and these branches and this bark. And then they disparage others. It's said they become intoxicated with their gains, their attainments, and grow negligent. But because they didn't know the aim, they didn't actually know what the heartwood was, and though they're unaware of this, their purpose is not going to be fulfilled.

This simile is used to describe the many valuable things that happen in the course of our spiritual practice. In this discourse, the Buddha goes on to describe four things that are gained in the course of our practice but should not be mistaken for the goal, and a fifth thing that is considered the noble aim and the heartwood of the path.

He considers first popularity, fame, a sense of gaining prestige or social respectability, and he does not praise this. Yes, it happens, but he does not praise it at all. Then there are three things that he praises: virtue, concentration, and knowledge and vision. These are attainments that develop in the course of our practice. They happen, and they're praiseworthy. And then there's the fifth, which is the final—what's called the perpetual liberation that does not fall away.

The simile of the heartwood reminds us to reflect upon what our aims for practice are and what is the highest aim, what is the heartwood of the path, so that we won't be satisfied with deceptive attainments, even praiseworthy accomplishments that develop in the course of our mindfulness training and our meditative development.

When we are engaged in a sincere and deep meditation practice, we're going to encounter periodically some very lovely experiences. We might experience some joy and bliss, some calmness and tranquility. Perhaps the mind might become luminous and bright, flexible and wieldy. We might experience very refined states of concentration or deep states of clarity and wisdom. These are great. Don't complain if they occur. You don't need to fear them. You don't need to avoid them. You don't need to resist them. But they're not the heartwood. They're not the aim. They're not the ultimate goal of this path.

In the Visuddhimagga, a fifth century meditation manual, we find a very important list of ten corruptions of insight. These corruptions of insight occur very naturally in the course of our meditation practice and they become impediments only if they are mistaken for the goal, only if we become attached to them and therefore stop short of the aim. These corruptions of insight include light and luminosity of the mind, a radiance of mind. The second is knowledge of matter and mind—to really have a very clear, vivid, and genuine understanding of the nature of body and mind. The third is rapturous bliss, happiness, joy. The fourth is tranquility.

The fifth is pleasure and happiness. The sixth is resolution, determination. The seventh is exertion, right striving, right effort. The eighth is mindfulness. And the ninth is equanimity.

They don't really sound like impediments to the path, do they? In a way, these are the very things that we are cultivating. These are practices that we nurture—certainly mindfulness, equanimity, energy, resolution, joy, tranquility, and knowledge of matter and mind. What's corrupt about these?

Well, it's the tenth that tells us. The tenth item is attachment. If we are attached to any of these, then it becomes an impediment to the development of our practice. It will prevent us from reaching the ultimate goal of realization.

Not all of these experiences will occur for every meditator, but this list of nine items does describe the kinds of positive experiences that can arise in our practice and have the potential to distort our perception of the path—if we neglect to see them as conditioned, as impermanent, as not I, not me, and not mine.

Just as a villager who goes into the forest looking for heartwood would be more successful if that villager knew what heartwood was, knew some of its defining features, or at least knew what it wasn't—so too, as we explore the depths of our minds, as we explore how we encounter experience, how perception operates, we could benefit by having a sense of what we're looking for, having an understanding of what the Buddha was teaching, and of the purpose that motivated his ministry.

So we can first reflect individually: What are we seeking? What brought you here tonight? What brings you to your meditation seat? What inspires you to pick up a dharma book instead of a comic book? What are you interested in developing? What are your goals?

Are you committed to enlightenment? To inner peace? To wisdom? To calmness? To living with greater love and compassion? To being more present for the encounters that you experience in a day? What motivates your practice? What do you want?

One of the classic definitions of enlightenment is the ending of greed, hate, and delusion. Does that motivate your practice? Is that something that you want? Are you committed to putting an end to the movements of greed, hate, and delusion as they arise within your own mind and your own life? How strong is that commitment?

I think these are very noble goals. They require dedication, they require effort, they require earnestness. The Buddha urged his disciples to abandon the defilements of mind as earnestly as a man whose turban or hair was on fire would attempt to extinguish those flames. There's no complacency thinking, "Ah, maybe I'll get around to it later. I've got other things to do." No—when your hair is on fire, you don't think about the long list of other possible distractions. You take care of it. It's the business at hand. It's what calls your attention.

If we're complacent, we might allow the fires of greed, hate, and delusion to smolder within our own minds. We might not bother to address them until they burst into flame, causing panic and suffering, until we act on them. And then, in a way, it's too late—it's caused a bit of harm.

So we need the effort to align our energies with our commitments, to maintain a steadiness of attention on our aim, and to do the work that develops wisdom and brings inner peace. Even just to sit every day in meditation. Even just to watch the mind and bring it back to the present moment as we're showering, brushing our teeth, as we're interacting, as we're driving, as we're doing all the various things that we do in a day. To watch the mind in those encounters and to see: Is greed, hate, or delusion determining our engagement with activity? If so, can we find an option out? Can we shift to non-greed, non-hate, non-delusion?

Whether we're sitting in meditation or bringing mindfulness to daily life, each moment requires some degree of diligence, of non-complacency. Having a sense of an aim can bring the inspiration and the sense of urgency to our practice.

But even if we have a sense of urgency, very often it might appear as though our practice doesn't develop very quickly. Suzuki Roshi said in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, "After you have practiced for a while, you realize that it is not possible to make rapid, extraordinary progress. The progress you make is always little by little."

Not like going out in a downpour when you know you're getting wet, but rather like walking in fog when you do not know that you're getting wet. If your mind has ideas of progress, you will be disappointed by the pace. So we need patience. We need trust in the gradual unfolding of the path.

I like the term commitment, but sometimes it might sound forceful or too strong, perhaps even restrictive to some people. But what's the emotional tone behind our commitments? I think that emotional quality, that feeling quality, the sense of the way we make a commitment varies at different times in our lives.

For me, sometimes my commitment to the spiritual life has felt like just a deep but kind of niggly sort of curiosity—a sense of chewing on something, wanting to know something, not being satisfied with the current state of knowledge and understanding, a sense of having my interest perked. And sometimes my sense of commitment has felt so urgent that it felt as though I would have sacrificed anything to pursue my practice, that nothing could stand in my way, that my very life depended upon my practice.

And it's probably not surprising that it was during that sense of incredible, almost agitated urgency that I flew off to India on a one-way ticket and spent the better part of a decade abroad there. I left school, I left family, I left work, I left all my worldly aims behind. I even left my name behind and accepted a new name. I endured typhoid, dengue fever, giardia, hunger, and quite uncomfortable situations. But I didn't want to let anything stand in my way. And it didn't feel difficult because of the energy of that sense of urgency.

There were other times, periods of my practice, when that sense of urgency didn't feel so agitating. In fact, it felt more like a loving devotion—a sense of being deeply devoted to the possibility of awakening, a kind of smooth, deep, but earnest commitment. I just had the sense of loving the possibility of awakening more than I loved doing anything else. To love liberation and that potential with my whole heart and to feel a deep caring and appreciation for the Dhamma path.

And sometimes this sense of commitment feels to me like just a deep calm, a gradual dedication, a gradual inclination, and a sense of a very gradual training. I often say that the meditator's mascot is the tortoise—the tortoise that just plods along and keeps on going. Sometimes it retreats into its shell, goes on retreat, enters into silence for a few moments, sits in meditation, and then it stretches out into the world again, enduring whatever comes on its path and just not giving up, continuing to plod along and continuing to go.

Whatever that sense of energetic flavor might be, whatever the emotional flavor, whatever the style, we still need perseverance. We need patience. We need commitment. We need dedication. Because our development takes time. This isn't about snapping our fingers and having instant enlightenment. We're cultivating profound qualities that lead to a potential transformation that is radical, that is deep. But usually we must nurture conditions for a long time before those conditions ripen and we can taste the fruit of our practice.

So as you consider what you are committed to, please be careful that you're not committing to some kind of institutional form as your ultimate goal. I think it would be a mistake to put our commitments into social structures—such as thinking, "I have to attend long retreats to develop my practice," or "I have to ordain as a monk or a nun in order to pursue this path." I don't think we need to make a commitment to a particular technique for the duration of our practice or our lives. And we don't need to identify with or become committed to particular teachers or communities.

Yes, there's value for loyalty, for trust, for gratitude. Those are virtues—discipline and steadiness. If we shop around and are always changing our practices and going from this teacher to that teacher every two seconds, we're never going to really get the depth in one. But our deepest commitments, I think, need to be to something profound—the heartwood of the path.

Commitment is a movement of energy and intention, and it does not require any special costume, any special custom, or any special association, because it's broader than any particular method. At different times in our lives we might emphasize one meditation technique, but then at another time we might emphasize another. It doesn't make the second one better than or more important than the first one. There are times when we might work with mindfulness of feelings. There are other times when we might focus on mindfulness with breath. There are other times when we might deepen our samādhi and try to strengthen our concentration, and other times we might be focused on deepening and enriching compassion and loving-kindness. Sometimes we'll focus on virtues and really work with the ethical precepts, or cultivate our capacity to give or to let go. There are so many different dimensions of the Dhamma path. And at different times in the course of our practice, we may be involved to a greater or lesser extent with different modes of practice.

So perhaps what we dedicate ourselves to is something rather profound—perhaps something we can't even define or limit to a specific image or understanding. What is freedom, really? What is peace? What is the end of ignorance, craving, and hatred? We might have an inkling of it. We might have a sense of it.

But each of these ideas is worth spending a lifetime getting to know what the deepest meaning truly is. Can we have a goal that is worth exploring for a whole lifetime, so that the meaning of it becomes rich and profound?

The commitments that we make are powerful. They set a direction. They have an effect. And so please reflect: What are you committed to? What are you committed to in your spiritual life?

I'd like to meditate for a few minutes and contemplate that question. What are we committed to?

CHAPTER 222

Nurturing the Process

Andrea Fella · 35 min

In this thoughtful exploration of goals in meditation practice, Andrea Fella draws from the Buddha's simile of the hen incubating her eggs to illuminate a profound teaching: what matters is not our wishes for awakening, but whether we properly nurture the conditions for it to unfold. Just as a hen who incubates her eggs rightly will see them hatch regardless of her wishes, practitioners who devote themselves to development will find liberation—while those who merely wish for it without practice will not.

Fella examines how our conceptual minds can actually hinder spiritual progress. We can only wish for what we can imagine, yet awakening transcends our ordinary understanding. Drawing on teachings and the story of Sukhasiddhi from the Tibetan tradition, she illustrates how following moment-to-moment wisdom rather than predetermined goals can lead to unexpected and profound transformation. The Eightfold Path itself is presented as a unique construction—one designed to undermine the mind's tendency to identify and control, ultimately undoing itself.

The talk offers practical wisdom for practitioners at all levels: rather than trying to engineer our own awakening through willpower and planning, we can learn to trust the inner voice of wisdom and compassion that naturally guides us. This requires faith—not blind faith, but confidence in the natural unfolding of the path when we practice with ardency, alertness, and the willingness to put aside greed and distress. The invitation is to relax, do the practices properly, and allow the path to unfold in ways we could never have imagined.

So this series that we're just really embarking on is about having goals in meditation practice or in life, I suppose. And I love this topic because we all have some relationship to the idea of goals in addition to the goals themselves, of course. Some people absolutely love having goals, and some people feel completely oppressed by goals. Some people think that goals are necessary, and they actually may end up limiting themselves by always working within set ideas. And other people may think that goals are totally pointless, but would probably do better if they were to stay on track and commit to an outcome. You can place yourself on this matrix somewhere.

Fortunately the Buddhist teachings are flexible enough to accommodate many different approaches, and I hope this series demonstrates that. You'll hear talks from many different perspectives and have a chance to reflect for yourself from that range how you relate to goals. I think that would be a good outcome.

So tonight I'm going to pull out a thread from the teachings that can be applied to this question of goals in practice. A goal is about the future. It's something that will be attained after some time and probably some effort. But practice asks us to focus on the present moment—what's happening now. So there is the future-oriented goal of aiming for awakening, and there's also the present moment intention to stay with experience without clinging, which is the instruction. Following this immediate intention can allow the path to unfold in ways that we couldn't even imagine. And it does rely on quite a bit of faith.

So let's talk through some of that. I want to start with a very simple case. There's a simile that's used several times in the suttas about a hen nurturing her eggs. It's pointed out that her future-oriented wishes for the chicks are not very important compared to whether or not she properly incubates the eggs.

Here's how it goes: Suppose a hen has eight, ten, or twelve eggs. If she doesn't cover them rightly, warm them rightly, or incubate them rightly, then even though this wish may occur to her—"Oh, that my chicks might break through the eggshells with their spiked claws or beaks and hatch out safely"—still it is not possible that the chicks will break through the eggshells and hatch out safely. Why is that? Because the hen has not covered them rightly, warmed them rightly, or incubated them rightly.

And then you get the positive side later in the sutta: Suppose a hen has eight, ten, or twelve eggs that she does cover rightly, warms rightly, and incubates rightly. Even though this wish may not occur to her—"Oh, that my chicks might break through the eggshells and hatch out safely"—still, it is possible that the chicks will do that. Why is that? Because the hen has covered them, warmed them, and incubated them rightly.

So what can we learn from this very simple idea? It's not really about what we want, but about what we do. Does this sound familiar in practice? Rather than having a future goal, we can nurture the process of the path. And by linking it to the life process of chickens and eggs, we get the sense that this is a natural process, actually. We will return to this later.

A little more about these suttas that talk about the hen. As often happens in suttas, after the image or simile is given, then the Buddha gives an application to how this would work in practice. So he has the thing about the hen not incubating her eggs properly, and then one of the suttas goes on this way: Even though this wish may occur to a practitioner who dwells without devoting themselves to development—"Oh, that my mind might be freed through non-clinging"—still, her mind is not released through non-clinging. Why is that? From lack of developing.

And then you get the positive side: Even though this wish may occur to a person who dwells devoting themselves to development—"Oh that my mind might be freed through non-clinging"—still her mind is freed from the effluents through lack of clinging. Why is that? From developing.

So in one case the person isn't doing any development but they wish that they will be awakened.

And it doesn't happen. In the other case, they are doing the development but they don't ever bother to have the wish to awaken, and still they awaken anyway. So this is something to consider.

The sutta says "from developing"—the dwelling with or without development, and then they get awakened from developing. So we could rightfully ask: developing what?

Different suttas give different answers. There are a few suttas that use this same analogy, but they all reiterate known lists of practices and mental qualities that relate basically to the Eightfold Path. So they're pretty clear. We're being told that the point is just to do the practices and not to spend a lot of time wishing for results.

I like this, actually. It's very simple.

But then there's also this word "rightly"—about the hen. She was warming them rightly, incubating them rightly. So there is also a little bit of nuance there: not everything will work. Only certain things will work if we do it rightly. The Buddha did give us very good instructions, and we do have to follow them.

Now I'll put a few caveats on this. First of all, one issue that Westerners have with their perfectionist mindsets is that everybody's worried about whether they're doing things right. I don't know how many questions I've had where people raise their hand and say, "Is it okay for me to do such and such?" This is a fine question because there are instructions. But for the most part, we can wrap ourselves up quite a lot in whether we're doing it right. So I don't want to be making that point exactly. Let me say that this realm of "rightly" has a little bit of width to it. It's not like a really narrow line. But nonetheless, there are things that will work better than others.

The texts are pretty clear. The instructions are right there. The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta says you should sit ardent, mindful, and alert, putting aside greed and distress for the world. That's a clear instruction. But do we follow it? When we sit and practice mindfulness, do we sit ardent and alert and put aside greed and distress for the world? Or do we spend a lot of time thinking about all of our greed and distress about the world—which would not be mindfulness practice? So it's clear. But we have to do it.

The other issue I want to raise about this sense of rightly practicing is that it's both a blessing and a little bit of a disadvantage, depending how you look at it, that we have a huge amount of spiritual practice available to us in this area. For the most part this is wonderful—it's great. People come; look at all the people here tonight. It's wonderful. There are places where that just wouldn't happen. And of course there are centers that do Tibetan Buddhism and Zen, and we're sitting in a church, and there are many other spiritual paths available.

The challenge, though, is that for some people this richness somehow helps them find their way through. But for others it becomes an exercise in choosing what they want out of spirituality. "I like the Sufi dancing—that's really great, I go and do the dancing. But the part where I have to work with a stern teacher who's going to challenge my assumptions? I don't do that part." Or, "I come to the insight meditation, but I'm definitely not going on a retreat where I have to share a room with somebody else because I have my space issues." It becomes this exercise of choosing based mostly on what feels comfortable and pleasant to us.

I'm not saying that we should deliberately go for the stuff that's difficult. But any spiritual practice worth its salt had better bring some difficulty to our lives at some point. So I'll just insert that also—part of "rightly" does include reworking the way our mind works, which can be a little uncomfortable sometimes.

So that's kind of the simple warm-up image: this chicken, and the wishing versus the doing. Now I want to explore several dimensions that could be unpacked from this simple chicken lesson. It can actually get kind of subtle and deep.

First of all, wishes. This idea of wishes. Wishes themselves can be limiting because we can only wish within the realm that we can imagine. We may not know what to wish for, actually. People often want to work on particular problems that they have, problems they know are causing suffering. This is a fine approach, fair enough in some sense. But sometimes we don't want to take such a direct approach with our particular forms of suffering. It might be better just to follow the meditation instructions sometimes.

This is from Ram Dass, who is not a conventional teacher. But this is what he says: "Instead of trying so hard to get out of the shadow, the dark—which I think actually reinforces the shadow and its reality—just do your practices. If somebody says to me, 'I'm having these terrible thoughts and I don't know why, will you help me understand why?' I tell them that I'd rather sit with them and help them follow their breath. The breath has no content to it at all. It's just breath. It's better to strengthen the centering, the quieting, the presence, than to keep strengthening the problem, which gets reinforced when you work on it directly."

So of course this is one quote given in one context. I'm not saying at all that we never work directly on difficulties or we never work directly on, say, particular urgent life issues that have come up. That can be very important. But the attitude of approaching them with the sense of "I am working on this in order that it will go away or be replaced by something that I prefer" can be a little controlling in some cases.

Just to give a personal example, I came to practice because of chronic pain and health problems that I had. And I found that I didn't have the capacity to work with those. I hadn't developed myself well enough to be able to meet that particular kind of dukkha. And so certainly one of my initial goals was "I want to be able to deal with this." And that was absolutely a compassionate approach and a fine intention to have.

But I can say in retrospect that it was fortunate for me that somehow I didn't get caught up in relating absolutely everything through the filter of my health. In fact, I did just listen to the instructions, and it was actually relieving to me not to think about that so much and just do the "ardent, alert, and putting aside greed and distress for the world." I think that really, frankly, sped up the process and also avoided reinforcing the aversion that can happen when we come in and say, "I want to deal with my anger. I want to deal with this because I don't like it."

We have to be so careful. Maybe you'll learn about this in the mindful self-compassion and self-esteem course, I'm not sure. But there's an art to being able to work with issues. And these practices, far from being cold and detached because they tell us not to get sucked into the content, are actually really compassionate because they help us to have a relationship to our experience that is healthy and that can allow our heart to grow and expand in a way that it just doesn't when we focus so hard on that one thing.

I also had no idea where meditation would take me, and that was good. It happens to have completely rearranged my life in ways that are wonderful, but I couldn't have anticipated that. So I certainly couldn't have had as a goal to do the various things I've done, like sit two years of retreat. If you'd told me that before I started practicing, I would have said, "Yeah, right, I have too much energy for that." But other things have just happened. I changed my career. I changed my lifestyle. Now I teach the Dharma. That wasn't my goal when I was twenty.

It unfolds differently for everyone, of course. This is not any kind of a thing to imitate. But it all just happened step by step. It wasn't a plan. It just unfolded step by step. So there's a process. We have to stay open to what can happen.

And at risk of offering a very hackneyed image, the caterpillar doesn't know what a butterfly is. It just doesn't have any concept of that. And then there's also maybe what Misha Merrill said in a little bit more down-to-earth way. She said, because her own life had a couple turns like this—she actually thought she was going to be an artist, and then it didn't happen, and she was devastated, but then something even better happened—so you never know. What she said is, "You may think you're going to be a chocolate cake, but then you discover yourself becoming a steak." This can be disturbing if you're vegetarian.

So we can't actually imagine in our unawakened mind what we're looking for. We don't know what we're looking for. We might think it's just a sort of better version of what we have. But I think the teachings ask us to be a little bit more creative and open than that, to go a little bit farther than that. Or maybe another example: if you're looking for the source of a river, you might discover that the source of the river is ice from a glacier, or it might be the sky that produces the rain. It might not look anything like a river.

So we can trace this idea a little bit farther in that the conceptual mind itself is actually a limitation. Another problem with a goal is that it's inevitably a concept of some kind. And the very structure of our ordinary mind is that it creates ideas and concepts and abstractions. We couldn't live if we didn't do that, of course. All the time we're doing that. But the teachings tell us that this can actually hinder the path in subtle ways. Even when we're not creating full-blown goals and aims, our very concepts along the path can be a hindrance. So we have to continually watch that. And I'll unpack this a little bit. The mind looks for known patterns.

It loves to have a template. "Oh, this is the meeting template that we're about to go into." And then you play out the meeting template, and afterwards you say, "Well, that was another unsatisfying meeting." Why? Because everybody played out the meeting template. It's just how it goes.

But this ability of our mind, when applied to spiritual practice, means that we will inevitably project some kind of idea about how the path is going to unfold. We've heard dharma talks, we've read dharma books, and then—subtly or even unsubtly sometimes, but especially subtly—we will try to recreate that. We'll try to replicate what we read in the book or what we heard in the talk, and this can actually hinder the process.

So what to do, though? Because we have to hear teachings. I don't think anybody—well, the Buddha was the one who could advance on the path without hearing teachings. But the rest of us, we need to hear teachings. So that means I am going to continue with this talk, even though I've now warned you that you shouldn't be listening to dharma talks because then you're going to try to apply and replicate everything I'm saying. So it's too late. The ideas are already coming. Let's just go with it.

Having an idea of the path in the background of our mind—what does that actually look like? It means that we will see certain things and not see other things. We will remember experiences that conform to what we had in mind, and we'll forget the ones that don't. As we're going along, we have this idea that we're following this path, and so we downplay or forget things that don't seem to match.

Now, when the mind gets concentrated—Shaila is a wonderful concentration teacher—the purpose of getting the mind settled and still is so that we can watch how it works. Then we see very clearly that there's a lot of manipulation in the mind. We are not just seeing experience as it is; we're actually putting our template on it all the time. It's really fascinating. Sometimes it's disturbing, but it's really fascinating to watch this happening in the mind. You don't have to say, "Oh, this is terrible, I need to throw out all my concepts." You can't, actually, and you couldn't live without them. It's enough to see them, and this helps to detach from them. But we really get a glimpse of how constructed our everyday world is and what a deep habit this is.

Awakening is the one thing that cannot be constructed.

So the Buddha was aware of these issues of construction, and he understood very well how the human mind works, including the ways that it tries to engineer its own awakening. And so he devised a template that's different than other templates. He devised a template called the Eightfold Path. The great thing about it is that it includes refining our conduct—there's an ethical section—developing our mind—there's a meditation section—and cultivating wisdom—there's a wisdom section of the path.

What you may not know about this brilliant Eightfold Path is that it is actually designed to undermine the mind's tendency to identify, including with the path itself. The Eightfold Path is a construction that will undo itself, unlike our usual constructions, which bind further. That's what makes it different.

This is not something you have to believe. This is something that, once again, we have to do. Remember the part about doing and not just sitting and wishing to be awakened.

The idea that we can somehow control our awakening is actually based in conceit. It's based in the same drivenness and striving that spiritual practice is designed to relieve us of. And what a relief it is when we realize that we're not in control of our awakening. Phew! I have no idea how to do that. Great. I'm just going to do the practices and let that take care of itself.

None of this is to say—to put a caveat in again—that we shouldn't reflect on our path, or that we shouldn't deliberately address particular issues when they come up in certain cases, or when we know that we have certain kinds of letting go to do. That is useful. It also doesn't say that we should blindly do practices and never think about whether they're actually helping us, or that we should blindly follow a teacher, or that we should blindly follow what a community is doing. There is still a need for discernment, of course. But there's this distinction: we don't think that we're in control as we're doing it.

So then an interesting question arises: Is anything in control? Why do we have these senses that we want to undertake a certain practice at a certain time? Why did you come to this meditation group at a certain time? Sure, you've got the story, you've got the thing that you put on, but there's something else, right, in you that's working.

And when we look back over our life, sometimes we realize, "Oh, I thought I was doing such and such, but actually there was some other force going on there."

So there isn't somebody in control, but wisdom and compassion will prompt us to do things that help further our path. That's actually their job. If we let our ordinary mind—that is to say, the one that sets goals—get involved in controlling our spiritual practice, it actually ends up obscuring the path. But if we open and let these wiser parts of ourselves, namely our heart, our wisdom and compassion, have the reins so to speak, they will follow the path in a way that's efficient for us and will help awaken us and help us let go.

We can take long detours if we follow what we think we logically ought to, or if we get emotionally caught up in what a teacher or community is doing to the point where we're not looking out for our own well-being. So a lot of the path then is about learning to hear this inner voice that's being offered by wisdom and compassion, the voice in the heart. And the good news is you can hear it long before awakening, actually, if you are willing to open to it and trust it.

This is the part where we have to think a little bit about faith. There is this inner voice. There is this sense in our heart that something would be nourishing for us or something would be good for us. And this is something that we can place our confidence in.

I want to tell a story about faith and about letting the path unfold without so many goals. It's a story from the Tibetan Shangpa tradition—the story of a woman named Sukhasiddhi.

She was a poor woman who lived with a husband and three sons. Things were not going well in their world—their business, their life. They were running out of money, basically, and they were down to their last portion of rice. The husband and sons said, "Well, we're going to go out and get work today, get some resources for our family." Of course, Sukhasiddhi stayed at home while they did this. The husband and the three sons went off in the four cardinal directions, saying, "We're going to do work and come back with some money. You stay here."

And so she did. During the day, a wandering spiritual seeker—the equivalent of the Buddha, somebody who's given their life over to meditation and just being a beggar—came by and knocked on the door and begged for food as a practitioner. She said, "Well, they're out getting money." And she cooked up the last portion of rice and gave it to him. Off he went.

At the end of the day, the husband and sons came home discouraged and said, "Well, we didn't get any work today, so how about the rice?" She said, "Oh, I gave it to a wandering mendicant who was a spiritual seeker." They were enraged that she had given away the last of the food, and they threw her out.

So she went off into the world and found that she had more resources than she thought. She was clever enough to beg for a while, and then she got enough money from that to buy some barley and malt and decided to make beer. You may be aware that beer is a symbol of wisdom in the Tibetan tradition—shocking for Theravadans, I know, but this is important.

She discovered she was pretty good at making beer, actually. She took it to the marketplace and sold it and made even more money, because it was really good beer. She just kept doing that. She discovered she had this talent, and it became her livelihood.

One day a very well-dressed woman showed up and asked for beer—a little surprising, this very well-dressed woman. Sukhasiddhi asked, "Is it for you?" The woman said, "No, actually it's for my teacher, who is an awakened spiritual teacher, but he likes really good beer, so I thought I'd get some for him." Sukhasiddhi said, "Well, in that case, why don't you just take it, since it's for your teacher." So she gave the beer freely.

Every day the well-dressed woman came back to get beer for her spiritual teacher, and Sukhasiddhi gave it on donation, just freely. After a while, the master said, "This is really good beer that you've been bringing me every day. Where do you get this?" She said, "Oh, there's this woman in the marketplace who makes it." He said, "Well, bring her here. I want to meet her."

So the well-dressed woman came and said to Sukhasiddhi, "My master would like to meet you. Why don't you come?" She went, and the master saw that she was very close to awakening. He gave her just a simple teaching, and she woke up and gained all the spiritual powers. Sukhasiddhi—that was not her original name; I don't know what her original name was—she was named Sukhasiddhi at that point and became a great teacher, one of the great female teachers of the Tibetan tradition.

There's a lot in this story, and we can't unpack quite all of it, but I would offer that what she was acting on was faith in the spiritual side of life.

What happens when your life falls apart is that the spirit comes knocking on the door—in the form of the beggar. And she didn't question it; she just fed it. The last of her rice, actually. It didn't produce an immediate positive effect. Maybe she got thrown out. But she didn't worry about that. She just went on, moment by moment.

And then there came another opportunity. Oh, this beer is for a spiritual master. She gave it away. She fed it. She didn't try to make money off of that. So when the opportunities presented themselves, she gave freely. And the result was that she ascended higher and higher spiritually and eventually was led to the place where the conditions were right for her to awaken.

Probably it wouldn't have happened if her husband and sons had made money that day. Probably not.

So she didn't have any idea that she was pursuing awakening. But she fed her faith along the way. She did what seemed right in each moment. And it had bigger effects than she could ever have imagined.

There's a picture outside the interview rooms at the Insight Meditation Society—I don't know if you've ever been there, in Barre, Massachusetts. It's one of the classic centers of our tradition. There's a picture that's one of those Japanese prints, very elongated, seeming to portray flower stalks and shoots. Maybe one of those ink ones where you blow on the ink; I'm not sure. But the caption says something like, "Try not to have any expectations." Most of the little ink trails or flower shoots are down near the bottom of the picture. And then there's one that goes all the way up, about six feet, to the top of the page. I think that's instructional for us.

So you remember the chicken image? We're back to the chicken. The hatching of chicks, sitting on the eggs, incubating them properly—it's a natural process. And so to what degree, we can ask ourselves, do we trust in our path as a natural unfolding process?

You can look at how long-time practitioners practice, people who've been at it thirty or forty years. For the most part, these people are very unpretentious. They pretty much go along with their life, and from time to time they undertake particular trainings or practices that seem moving to them—like they'll decide to go on a retreat with a particular teacher, or take a trip to Asia, or take three months off and write something. And then the rest of the time, it's going along with life. Going along with life.

Often, the result of these little things—"Oh, I'm going to do this retreat," or "Oh, I'm going to go to Asia"—often the result is surprising, even to thirty- or forty-year practitioners. They just have a feeling that some fruit is coming to ripen, and so they should go. What we see in this example is that truly we're not in control of this process. It's only a matter of how deeply we accept this.

So, relax. Relax. Just do the practices, and do them properly or rightly, and the path will unfold. Sometimes it will unfold easily and sometimes not so easily, but it will always be unfolding just as it can in a given moment.

That is my offering on the sense of goals in practice. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 223

Cooling the Fire

Andrea Fella · 43 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella reframes our understanding of awakening by returning to the literal meaning of nibbāna—not 'enlightenment' but 'cooling,' an ordinary Pāli word describing what happens when fire is no longer fueled. Drawing from canonical descriptions, she explains that this freedom is the extinction of greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha), resulting in a heart that experiences no mental pain or grief. Rather than gaining something special, awakening is about releasing what constricts us.

Fella shares touching stories of two very different Burmese monastics she encountered—one radiating oceanic tranquility, the other bubbling with constant laughter even while discussing near-death illness. These contrasting expressions of freedom illustrate that liberation doesn't look one way; it allows our unique nature to shine through. She emphasizes that freedom from aversion doesn't mean indifference to suffering—rather, the unconditioned heart resonates deeply with the world's pain through compassion rather than resistance.

The practical heart of this teaching addresses how we work with greed, aversion, and delusion. Using the metaphor of tangled threads, Fella suggests that suffering arises when our natural wholesome wishes for happiness collide with the truths of impermanence and uncontrollability. The practice isn't to cut away these knots but to understand them—allowing mindfulness to gradually untangle the threads into a beautiful weave of love and wisdom. Like the Buddha's analogy of shipwreck debris slowly worn by sun, sand, and wind, this transformation happens gradually, often imperceptibly, yet inevitably when we maintain our practice.

So as Ted said, the title for this talk is Cooling the Fire. The inspiration for that name came from the word that is typically translated as enlightenment. When we talk about the Wesak Festival at the end of the month, we're celebrating the Buddha's birth, death, and enlightenment. Typically we do think about the Buddha becoming enlightened, and we might think about that as being the goal for the path. When Shaila invited this group of us to teach this particular series, she asked us to reflect about the goal—what we explore, what we think of as the goal of the path, and how we might find our way towards that.

The first thing I wanted to reflect on here is the Pali word that the Buddha used for his awakening: Nibbana. The literal meaning of that word is nothing like enlightenment. I don't know how people came up with that translation or why people use it, because the word itself basically means something like cooling—the act of cooling. I was told by one colleague that he understood this was a very ordinary word in the time of the Buddha, that you would speak about a fire cooling or the rice cooling. The nature of things when they're heated is to cool. That's just what happens when you no longer keep adding the heat. When you no longer keep adding the fuel to a fire, the fire goes out, the fire cools. And so the word for this freedom—what the Buddha spoke of as the possibility, the freedom that he discovered—it was a cooling of something.

When asked about what is cooled, I'll read some excerpts from the suttas about this word nibbana and what it means to have that freedom. These are from four different passages, but they weave together nicely:

"The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called Nibbana."

If we replace cooling there: the extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this is cooling.

"Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed, with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbana, immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

"And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and nothing remains to be done. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so, neither forms, nor sound, nor odors, nor taste, nor contact of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is the mind, gained is deliverance."

"This is peace, this is exquisite. The resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

This is a description of what the Buddha understood to be the freedom that the path he found offered—this freedom, this release, this cooling of greed, aversion, and delusion. In one of the Buddha's early teachings, he used the analogy of fire for greed, aversion, and delusion. He said everything is burning with the fire of greed, everything is burning with the fire of aversion, everything is burning with the fire of delusion. We could look at nibbana as the cooling of those fires, the cooling of the fires of greed, aversion, and delusion.

To me this conveys something completely different than enlightenment. When I first heard the term enlightenment and started practicing, I had this image of getting something, of having some particular state or being in some particular way. But these descriptions speak not of what one gains, but what one lets go of. That to me is interesting because it actually leaves a lot of room for what's here. When one lets go of greed, aversion, and delusion, it means that the goal—how we are, how we might manifest in the world having let go of greed, aversion, and delusion—there's a lot of room for many different ways that would look. And that to me is inspiring.

When I practiced in Burma, I met a number of very wise and very kind and very practiced people. And they were very different. One that I met—I'll tell these stories because it feels like it might give a little flavor. I was practicing and supporting a retreat in the northern part of Burma in the Sagaing Hills. That particular part of Burma has hundreds and hundreds of monasteries in the hills. You can just walk in the hills and move from one monastery to another. We knew some of the monks in various monasteries in that area, so we would take hikes in the hills and go visit them. At one point we were hiking—it took about thirty minutes or so to hike to this one monastery—and we were chatting along the way. As we approached the monastery gate, one of the people with us who had been to this particular monastery a lot turned to us and said, "We need to be in silence as we walk into this monastery. We need to be in silence as we walk through the gate."

And so we fell into silence. As I walked through that gate, just the setting itself was remarkable—kind of set in a bowl, with cliffs on three sides of the monastery, so it was nestled in this protected area. The cliffs had been whitewashed so that rainwater could fall down into a catchment system. Something about the visual and the feeling of walking in—I felt like I was being immersed in an ocean of tranquility. It was quite remarkable.

And then I met the monk that lived there. I got so happy just sitting with him. He was such a calm and peaceful person that I felt like this quality was being transmitted through his very being. I was simply happy sitting in his presence, feeling so at ease and so peaceful.

We went to visit several monasteries repeatedly during that time. I'll tell one story of another monk I met. He had a very lively mind and was so delighted by the world that he was pretty much constantly laughing. We came in one day—he was probably ninety at this point. He had shriveled over the years that I had known him, and he looked like this little tiny being sitting in his chair. We knew he had been sick, and we asked him how his health was. He just laughed and laughed. I was hearing this through a translator, but it's so interesting how I feel like I heard it right from him. He said, "Oh yes, I've been really sick. I almost died the other day." I thought, wow—that's a happy guy. Something about him was so delighted, and it just made you delighted to be in his presence.

In both of these cases, such different expressions of freedom. This inspires me because it points to something important: whatever expression of the release of greed, aversion, and delusion happens here in this being, I can step into whatever that is. I don't have to model anybody in terms of how I engage. There's a way in which freedom, I think, will express itself in each of us in its own way.

In those quotes I read earlier, there are also some things I find deeply inspiring. The first is what the Buddha describes as the state of mind of one who is cooled, whose greed, aversion, and delusion has been released: such a one experiences no mental pain or grief.

Now, that might seem kind of unfathomable. Wouldn't one grieve if one lost a dear friend? Or saw the state of our country? Isn't grief a natural response to that? But I think the grief being pointed to here, and the mental pain—this is the suffering the Buddha spoke of—includes within it a form of aversion. The mind is rejecting something, pushing something away or holding on to something. The way things are, the way the world is, the fact that every single one of us—all of our family members, our parents, children, brothers, sisters, friends—every one of us is going to die, and we don't know the order in which that will happen: this is truth. The state of the world as it is right now has come to be. It is happening. It is truth in a way—this is what is here.

The resistance to what has already come to be is, at least in my understanding, part of what the Buddha is speaking about with this mental pain and grief: we are resisting what is already here. The heart is constricted or closed or rejecting something that is already present.

What the teachings also point to, though, is that when we see suffering happening in the world, if the heart is free from greed, aversion, and delusion—if the heart is not constricted by these forces—that heart feels suffering very profoundly. This is a place where we may need to come to a new understanding: what would it be to feel the suffering of the world very profoundly and deeply, without constriction?

The Buddha doesn't call that mental pain and grief. He calls it compassion—the heart that responds to the suffering of the world instead of fighting against it, instead of pushing against it.

When the heart that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion meets suffering in the world, the way that heart responds is qualitatively different. I feel like the heart constricted by greed, aversion, and delusion is somehow hard, encased, encrusted.

It feels stiff. It doesn't resonate in sympathy with what's happening. It may shake, or it may break, or it may prove very brittle.

The heart that has become free from greed, aversion, and delusion—my sense of that, just from little tastes maybe every now and then, little tastes of the heart that is freed from at least chunks of greed, aversion, and delusion—there's a feeling of resonance. There's a feeling of quivering. The heart resonates. It feels almost like a bowl of jello. It doesn't shatter when some kind of energy shakes it. It just vibrates and wobbles and wiggles.

So when the heart that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion is contacted by suffering, it resonates with that suffering. And it wants to act. It wants to alleviate that suffering. When that same heart contacts joy in the world, it also resonates with that very deeply, feeling the delight of empathetic or sympathetic joy.

The heart that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion is not the heart of uncaring indifference or non-action. It is the heart infused with the qualities of love, of compassion, of joy, of equanimity, of generosity—that connected quality.

And yet, the usual way that we engage, when our hearts are covered by greed, aversion, and delusion, when they're operating from that perspective, it's very difficult for that heart to fathom that there's something else, another way to act in the world. It's like we're blinded. The delusion embedded in aversion says, "You have to act on me in order to be okay in your life when things are difficult." The delusion embedded in greed says, "You have to follow through with me in order to be happy, in order to get the things that you want."

These states of greed and aversion have an embedded delusion in them that basically believes they are the reason why we do anything. And they can't fathom that if they go away, there would be anything that we would do. Wanting believes, "Why would I do anything if I didn't want?" Wanting is not going to tell you that if it goes away, there are other beautiful motivations for life and for connection and for engagement.

One piece that I find inspiring is this: no mental pain and grief. What might that be? Just to even contemplate what a heart free from greed, aversion, and delusion might look like—I find that inspiring.

The other piece that I find inspiring is this: "This is nibbana immediate. Visible in this life. Inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise." Visible in this life. To me, that points to the possibility of living in the world, of being engaged in the world from this perspective of the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. When I think of enlightenment, I kind of envision myself floating somewhere above the planet, not really engaged. But the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion—little tastes of moments of that in life, in engagement—reveals a possibility for being in the world, cooled, free from greed, aversion, and delusion.

So what does it mean then to come to this? What does it mean to find our way to becoming free from greed, aversion, and delusion?

Another teaching the Buddha offers around suffering points to a connection: when we are acting motivated out of greed, aversion, and delusion, we are destined to suffer. We will suffer. We may not suffer immediately, but we will. It's like we're setting into motion the seeds of suffering if we are acting out of the energies of greed, out of the energy of aversion, out of the energy of delusion. We're setting that suffering into motion.

There's an equivalence, in a way, between a mind with greed, aversion, and delusion and a mind in which there is suffering. This is the statement of the First Noble Truth: there is suffering, the truth of dukkha. And the Buddha encouraged us about suffering. The encouragement is to find our way to release from suffering, but the instructions are not "get rid of it." The instruction about suffering is to understand it.

This is our path. The whole of the Eightfold Path—wise view, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—is designed to help us come to an understanding of suffering.

So what does understanding mean? In a really simple way, all packaged together with the wisdom of the Buddha and his Eightfold Path, it's a simple instruction to be aware of the arising of greed, aversion, and delusion, and get to know what that experience is as a human experience.

This is important—that there's a sense of coming into awareness around these states of mind: greed, aversion, and delusion. Beginning to know: greed is happening right now, aversion is happening right now, delusion is happening right now.

And yet that may not quite be enough. One of my teachers has pointed out that if you go to somebody on the street who's yelling and screaming and say, "Hey, do you know you're angry?" they'll look at you like you're nuts. "Yeah, of course I know I'm angry." But they're not knowing anger in the way of understanding what the human experience of anger actually is. They are knowing anger in terms of what it's going to do for them and how it's going to get them what they want.

This is not the kind of awareness that will support becoming free from greed, aversion, and delusion, because essentially that kind of awareness of anger—"How's it going to get me what I want? How's it going to help me figure out this problem or get rid of this thing or make sure that person never bothers me ever again?"—if we're caught in that cycle, we are reinforcing that anger is what's going to make us feel better at some point.

We get caught on this cycle. Something happens, we get angry, we yell at somebody, and they go away. For a little while, okay, that feels better—they're gone. So we've gotten what we wanted. But there's been a lot of mess put out into the world in the meantime, and we have also cultivated this quality of anger internally.

What we're asked to do, what the understanding the Buddha is pointing to when he says "understand suffering"—it's not to understand it only intellectually. That's helpful; it's helpful to have a framework of understanding. The Buddha taught that aversion is a form of suffering, and it's useful to have that perspective. But that's not enough. Even that isn't enough. We have to actually do the work for ourselves and begin to experience and recognize that anger itself is already suffering. The feeling of anger, the human experience of anger, hurts. It creates pain internally.

This is what the Buddha asks us to do in terms of understanding what's happening in our minds—understanding greed, aversion, and delusion. He asks us to look at the human experience. What does it mean to be a human being feeling greed? What is that experience of greed?

We might not usually think about that. Typically with greed, again in terms of the reinforcement of greed, we think, "Get what I want—that's what makes me happy." We follow through on greed. We look at the things we want and say, "Yep, that's what I need and I'm going to go after it." In that going after, we are missing that the feeling of wanting is itself already painful. The feeling of wanting. When wanting springs up, there is already suffering there. There's already a feeling of lack, a feeling that something's wrong, that something's off.

As I mentioned earlier, when we are caught by that view of wanting, wanting is not going to tell you, "Oh, by the way, if you hang out long enough, wanting will go away, and that particular desire is no longer going to be a problem." Wanting is not going to tell us that.

So the instruction around exploring greed, aversion, and delusion in practice is to bring mindfulness to the experience. What is the experience of wanting? See if we can take our attention out of the thing that we want, or in aversion, the situation that we don't like. Take the attention out of that for a little while and turn the attention to the inner landscape. What is the experience that's happening inside?

Now, this kind of instruction can be challenging, particularly around social injustice. It might feel like, in removing—I said remove the attention from the thing that we are wanting to have or to get rid of and put the attention on the aversion itself. This is a beginning instruction.

This is an instruction that helps us become familiar with these qualities and states of mind. Over time, what we begin to do is recognize: okay, there's this thing out here, and here's my relationship to it. Yes, I don't like that. That's happening, and yes, that feels like a bad thing to be happening, and I don't like it. I want it to go away. So there's aversion there.

But there's also the possibility to know the aversion while we are engaged with the situation. It's almost like we've taken another step back. We have some sense of: yes, there is aversion happening, and this is what that aversion is in relationship to. We may be able to recognize that aversion puts filters on our mind and has us start to see things in a particular way. And seeing things in a particular way means we're also not seeing other things.

When we start to see the filters that aversion creates, we can begin to act in a way that takes this into account. This aversive state of mind is happening right now, so perhaps I should take some care about how I engage. As I said earlier, the absence of aversion in the face of even social injustice does not mean that we would not engage. This is hard to understand, but it is the way the heart works—when the heart does not have that encrusting of aversion and it sees suffering happening in the world, it will act.

When we're caught by aversion and thinking, "This is wrong, I hate this, I need to annihilate this situation because it is so unjust—I have got to bring everything that I have in terms of all of my anger to bear on this situation"—when we're caught by aversion, that's the belief operating: that this is the only way something would change, if I act out of that aversion. It takes a little bit of a leap of faith to recognize that aversion is not the only motivator possible.

We need a little bit of care and caution when we see this, because as we go through this process of looking at greed, aversion, and delusion, it's not like one time looking at aversion will do it for us. It's a process. There's a gradual learning and a gradual releasing of these energies. There will be many times when we are engaged in the world and also experiencing aversion or greed. If we can have that step back and recognize, "Yep, I'm caught by aversion right now," that can help us balance the mind a little bit. We might recognize that part of what's going on in that mess around the aversion is also the contact with the pain of the suffering. The anger can be a kind of rejection of that pain. And yet the heart that is free from aversion is going to feel that pain and not resist it.

Embedded even in the aversive reaction, there is this movement of the heart towards wishing there not be suffering in the world, towards wishing that human beings didn't do this to each other. Recognizing that the anger is there, maybe we can connect to the thread that leads into that connection between us—the wish that beings be safe, the wish that beings have ease in their lives. Often the anger is tangled up with that wish.

In that tangle, I do sometimes speak about any form of suffering as a tangle between the deep, natural, human, wholesome wishes—to be happy, to be safe, to be at ease, to have health and well-being. This is the wish for metta for ourselves. This is wholesome. And yet those wishes come into contact with the way the world is: impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. Our minds get it all tangled up. When that wish for safety meets the uncontrollability of life, it feels like a problem. The threads get all tangled up there.

Any kind of suffering, my sense is, is a tangle between these threads of truth—the thread of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable, the ultimate nature of experience—and the deep wish for happiness, well-being, safety. Our mind just cannot comprehend how these can simultaneously coexist. We might think, and I've heard people say in meetings, "Yeah, I know it's all impermanent and uncontrollable, and so I shouldn't want that happiness." But no, that's not the way it works. That wish for happiness, for well-being for ourselves, is natural. It is not going to just disappear. There's a way we might use these truths to bludgeon ourselves. "Oh, you shouldn't want to be happy. You shouldn't want to be safe." Trying to go to emptiness or something. "Everything's impermanent—okay, yeah, I'm fine with that." Meantime, the part of us that wants to be healthy, happy, and safe is going, "What's going on here?"

And so on the other side of it, if we are connecting to those wishes for happiness and health and safety, and we see that things are impermanent, unreliable, we might feel betrayed by the world, or might feel like the world is just wrong.

So what might it mean to hold both of these? Because both exist—the love that's very natural, that's a part of our human wholesomeness and well-being, and these truths. The mind that can't comprehend that they can coexist gets tangled. And this is suffering. Anger is a tangle between uncontrollable and wanting to be happy, in a way we could say that.

And so we've got this tangle. We might think that what we need to do is get rid of the anger, get rid of the tangle, take some scissors, cut that knot out of the fabric. But what are we doing there? It's composed of these threads. The knot itself is the suffering, not the threads.

And so the practice of being with that anger, the practice of opening to it and understanding—this is the human experience of anger. My sense of it is it's kind of like a lubricant or something that allows these threads to untangle. And then we have a weave in our lives between love and wisdom. They're woven together, supporting each other and informing each other, but not tangled anymore.

So that practice of understanding suffering—that's my sense of what the Buddha is pointing to: to understand the knot has these threads, and that this can be known and can be seen. The understanding of that creates the conditions for the untangling. It's a very gradual untangling. And the Buddha pointed to that too, the gradual nature of the untangling.

At one point he gave an analogy of a shipwreck. Parts of a ship are strewn over a beach—the wood and the rigging, the rope—and he said the sun, the sand, the wind, the water, all the elements act on all those parts of the ship, and gradually, slowly, over the course of months, they wear away.

Unpacking that analogy a little bit, that's pretty much all he said—that the sun, the sand, the wind are like the mindfulness. But if we think about it, think about that rope on a beach. You go back one day after the shipwreck, and the rope is there. It's pretty solid. You can pick it up and it's hard to pull apart. Go back the next day—what's worn down? Can you see any wearing down that's happened? Probably not. But the inexorable nature of the elements acting over the course of months and months and months... you come back six months later, you try to pick up that rope, and it falls apart.

This is the way he described the practice working. This gradual unfolding.

Now to me, this actually is happiness-producing, this gradual nature of the path, because it fits my experience. I've had a few experiences where there's a kind of momentary seeing of something really clearly that lets something go. But the vast majority of the way that the practice has unfolded has been this very gradual releasing of greed and aversion and delusion.

Sometimes I look back at something, kind of in surprise at one point, seeing a pattern. Wow, yeah, that one—what happened to that one? I don't remember seeing it go, but I sure remember having it there. And not even being able to call it up in that moment. And it never returning. A particular hatred at a particular person. Gone. Replaced by mettā. Through this gradual path.

So I have confidence in this goal stated as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion because of seeing, in small ways perhaps, the way they are released. We get flavors of this, we get tastes of it. Maybe just in a moment, for a second—seeing how the mind, when we meet aversion or greed, some difficult reactive state, with that curiosity of, "Huh, what's this? What's this state of mind?"

When we meet it that way, there is a feeling of a little space around it, not being quite so hooked in it, not quite so squeezed by it. We feel a shift. Sometimes we might even see a particular pattern, in a moment, just let go when it's met in that way. And again, a taste, a flavor of that possibility of being free from greed or aversion or delusion.

Just a little taste gives us the sense of that possibility. We get this little taste, and in this life, this possibility opens before us.

CHAPTER 224

Cooling the Fire

Andrea Fella · 43 min

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella reframes our understanding of the Buddhist goal by returning to the original Pāli term nibbāna, which literally means 'cooling' rather than the commonly used 'enlightenment.' Drawing from sutta passages, she explains that this cooling refers specifically to the extinction of greed, hatred, and delusion—not the attainment of some special state, but the letting go of what causes suffering. She shares inspiring stories of two very different Burmese monks she encountered, illustrating how freedom from these afflictions can manifest uniquely in each person.

Fella addresses a crucial distinction: the heart free from greed, aversion, and delusion is not indifferent but deeply responsive. When such a heart encounters suffering, it resonates with compassion rather than contracting in resistance. She uses the metaphor of a heart like jello that vibrates and wobbles rather than shattering—one that naturally moves toward alleviating suffering without the mental pain and grief that comes from fighting against reality.

The practical instruction centers on understanding suffering rather than eliminating it. Fella describes suffering as a 'tangle' between our wholesome wishes for happiness and safety and the truths of impermanence and uncontrollability. Through mindful awareness—meeting reactive states with curiosity about their human experience—these tangles gradually loosen. Using the Buddha's analogy of shipwreck debris slowly worn away by sun, sand, wind, and water, she emphasizes the gradual, inexorable nature of this untangling, offering encouragement that even small tastes of freedom point toward the full possibility of nibbāna 'visible in this life.'

So as Ted said, the title for this talk is Cooling the Fire. The inspiration for that name came from the word that is typically translated as enlightenment. When we talk about the Wesak Festival at the end of the month celebrating the Buddha's birth, death, and enlightenment, we typically think about the Buddha becoming enlightened, and we might think about that as being the goal for the path. When Shaila invited this group of us to teach this particular series, she asked us to reflect about the goal—what we explore, what we think of as the goal of the path, and how we might find our way towards that.

The first thing I wanted to reflect on here is the Pali word that the Buddha used for his awakening: Nibbana. The literal meaning of that word is nothing like enlightenment. I don't know how people came up with that translation or why people use it, because the word itself basically means something like cooling—the act of cooling. I was told by one colleague that this was a very ordinary word in the time of the Buddha, that you would speak about a fire cooling or the rice cooling. The nature of things when they're heated is to cool. That's just what happens when you no longer keep adding the heat. When you no longer keep adding fuel to a fire, the fire goes out, the fire cools. And so the word for this freedom that the Buddha discovered was a cooling of something.

When asked about what is cooled, I'll read some excerpts from the suttas about this word nibbana and what it means to have that freedom. These are from four different passages, but they weave together nicely:

"The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called Nibbana."

If we replace enlightenment with cooling there: the extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this is cooling.

"Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed, with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbana, immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

"And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and nothing remains to be done. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so, neither forms, nor sound, nor odors, nor taste, nor contact of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is the mind, gained is deliverance."

"This is peace, this is exquisite—the resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

This is a description of what the Buddha understood to be the freedom that the path he found offered—this release, this cooling of greed, aversion, and delusion.

In one of the Buddha's early teachings, he used the analogy of fire for greed, aversion, and delusion. He said everything is burning with the fire of greed, everything is burning with the fire of aversion, everything is burning with the fire of delusion. We could look at nibbana as the cooling of those fires.

To me this conveys something completely different than enlightenment. When I first heard the term enlightenment and started practicing, thinking maybe someday I'll attain enlightenment, I had this image of getting something, of having some particular state or being in some particular way. But these descriptions speak not of what one gains, but what one lets go of.

That is interesting because it actually leaves a lot of room for what's here. When one lets go of greed, aversion, and delusion, it doesn't look one way. The goal, or how we might manifest in the world having let go of greed, aversion, and delusion—there's a lot of room for many different ways that would look. And that, to me, is inspiring.

I met some people in Burma when I practiced there—a number of very wise and very kind and very practiced people. And they were very different. I'll share one story because it gives a little flavor.

I was practicing and supporting a retreat in the northern part of Burma in the Sagaing Hills. That particular part of Burma has hundreds and hundreds of monasteries in the hills. You can just walk in the hills and move from one monastery to another. We knew some of the monks in various monasteries in that area, so we would take hikes in the hills and go visit them. At one point we were hiking—it took about thirty minutes or so to hike to this one monastery—and we were chatting along the way. As we approached the monastery gate, one of the people who was with us, who had been to this particular monastery many times, turned to us and said, "We need to be in silence as we walk into this monastery. We need to be in silence as we walk through the gate."

And so we fell into silence. As I walked through that gate, just the setting itself was remarkable—it was nestled in a bowl with cliffs on three sides of the monastery. The cliffs had been whitewashed so that rainwater could fall down into a catchment system. Something about the visual and the feeling of walking in—I felt like I was being immersed in an ocean of tranquility. It was quite remarkable.

And then I met the monk who lived there. I became so happy just sitting with him. He was such a calm and peaceful person that I felt it was being transmitted through his very being. I was simply happy sitting in his presence, feeling so at ease and so peaceful.

We visited both of these monasteries multiple times, and I'll share one story about another monk I met there. He had a very lively mind and was so delighted by the world that he was pretty much constantly laughing. We came in one day—he was probably ninety at this point, and he had shriveled over the years that I had known him. He looked like this tiny little being sitting in his chair. We knew he had been sick, and we asked him how his health was. He just laughed and laughed. I was hearing this through a translator, but it's so interesting how I feel like I heard it directly from him. He said, "Oh yes, I've been really sick. I almost died the other day." And I thought, wow—that's a happy guy. Just something about him was so delighted, and it made you delighted to be in his presence.

In both of these cases, such different expressions of freedom. This inspires me because it points to whatever expression the release of greed, aversion, and delusion takes in each of us—I can step into whatever that is for me. I don't have to model anybody in terms of how they engage. The freedom, I think, will express itself in each of us in its own way.

In those quotes I read earlier, there are other things I find inspiring as well. The first is what the Buddha describes as his state of mind—the state of mind of one who is cooled, whose greed, aversion, and delusion has been released. He says such a person experiences no mental pain or grief.

Now, that might seem unfathomable in a way. Wouldn't one grieve if one lost a dear friend? Or saw something difficult, saw the state of our country? Isn't grief a natural response? But the grief being pointed to here, and the mental pain—this is the suffering the Buddha indicated. Included in that suffering is a form of aversion, where the mind is rejecting something, pushing something away or holding on to something.

The way things are, the way the world is—the fact that every single one of us, all of our family members, our parents, children, brothers, sisters, friends, every one of us is going to die, and we don't know the order in which it will happen—this is truth. The state of the world as it is right now has come to be. It is happening. It is truth in a way also; this is what is here.

The resistance to what has already come to be is, at least in my understanding, part of what the Buddha is speaking about in this mental pain and grief—that we are resisting what is already here, that the heart is constricted or closed or rejecting something that is already present.

What the teachings also point to is that when we see suffering happening in the world, if the heart is free from greed, aversion, and delusion, if the heart is not constricted by these forces, that heart feels the suffering very profoundly. This may require us to come to a new understanding—what it would be to feel the suffering of the world very profoundly and deeply without constriction.

The Buddha doesn't call that mental pain and grief. He calls it compassion. The heart that responds to the suffering of the world instead of fighting against it, pushing against the suffering of the world.

When the heart that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion meets suffering in the world, the way it responds is quite different. I feel like the heart that is constricted by greed, aversion, and delusion is somehow hard, encased, encrusted in a way.

It feels stiff. It doesn't resonate in sympathy with what's happening. It may shake, it may break, it may be very brittle.

The heart that has become free from greed, aversion, and delusion—my sense of that, just from little tastes perhaps, every now and then, little tastes of the heart freed from at least chunks of greed, aversion, and delusion—there's a feeling of resonance. There's a feeling of quivering. The heart resonates. It feels almost like a bowl of jello. It doesn't shatter when some kind of energy shakes it. It just vibrates and wobbles and wiggles.

So when the heart that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion is contacted by suffering, it resonates with that suffering. And it wants to act. It wants to alleviate that suffering. When that same heart contacts joy in the world, it also resonates with that very deeply, feeling the delight of empathetic or sympathetic joy.

The heart that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion is not the heart of uncaring indifference or non-action. It's the heart that is infused with the qualities of love, of compassion, of joy, of equanimity, of generosity—that connected quality.

And yet, the usual way that we engage, when our hearts are covered by greed, aversion, and delusion, when they're operating from that perspective, it's very difficult for that heart to fathom that there's something else, another way to act in the world. It's like we're blinded. The delusion embedded in aversion says, "You have to act on me in order to be okay in your life when things are difficult." The delusion embedded in greed says, "You have to follow through with me in order to be happy, in order to get the things that you want."

These states of greed and aversion have an embedded delusion in them that basically believes they are the reason why we do anything. They can't fathom that if they go away, there would be anything we would do. Wanting—the belief behind wanting is: why would I do anything if I didn't want? Wanting is not going to tell you that if it goes away, there are other beautiful motivations for life, for connection, for engagement.

The one piece that I find inspiring here is this "no mental pain and grief." What might that be? Just to contemplate what a heart free from greed, aversion, and delusion might look like—I find that inspiring to consider.

The other piece that I find inspiring is this statement: this is nibbana. This experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbana—immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise. Visible in this life. To me that points to the possibility of living in the world, of being engaged in the world from this perspective of the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

When I think of enlightenment, I kind of envision myself floating somewhere above the planet, not really engaged. But the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion—little tastes of moments of that in life, in engagement—reveals a possibility for being in the world and cooled, free from greed, aversion, and delusion.

So what does it mean to come to this? What does it mean to find our way to become free from greed, aversion, and delusion?

Another teaching the Buddha offers around suffering makes a connection: when we are acting motivated out of greed, aversion, and delusion, we are destined to suffer. We will suffer. We may not suffer immediately, but we will. It's like we're setting into motion the seeds of suffering if we are acting out of these energies. And so there's a kind of equivalence between a mind with greed, aversion, and delusion and a mind in which there is suffering.

This is a statement of the First Noble Truth: there is suffering, the truth of suffering. And the Buddha encouraged us about suffering. The encouragement is to find our way to release from suffering, but the instructions are not "get rid of it." The instruction about suffering is to understand it.

This is our path. The whole of the Eightfold Path—wise view, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—is designed to help us come to an understanding of suffering. So let's talk simply about what this means.

So what does understanding mean? In a really simple way, all packaged together with the wisdom of the Buddha and his Eightfold Path, it is a simple instruction to be aware of the arising of greed, aversion, and delusion, and to get to know what that experience is as a human experience.

This is important—that there's a sense of coming into awareness around these states of mind: greed, aversion, and delusion. Beginning to know: greed is happening right now, aversion is happening right now, delusion is happening right now.

And yet that may not quite be enough. One of my teachers has pointed out that if you go to somebody on the street who's yelling and screaming and say, "Hey, do you know you're angry?" they'll look at you kind of like you're nuts. "Yeah, of course I know I'm angry." But they're not knowing anger in the way of what is the human experience of anger. They are knowing anger in terms of what is it going to do for me and how is it going to get me what I want.

This is not the kind of awareness that is going to support becoming free from greed, aversion, and delusion, because essentially that kind of awareness of anger—how's it going to get me what I want? How's it going to help me figure out this problem or get rid of this thing or make sure that person never bothers me ever again?—if we're caught in that cycle, we are reinforcing that anger is what's going to make us feel better at some point.

We get caught on this cycle. We get angry, something happens, we yell at somebody and they go away. And so for a little while, okay, that feels better—they're gone. We've gotten what we wanted. But there's been a lot of mess put out into the world in the meantime, and we have also cultivated this quality of anger internally.

What we're asked to do, what the understanding the Buddha is pointing to when he says "understand suffering," is not to understand it only intellectually. That's helpful—it's helpful to have a framework of understanding. The Buddha taught that aversion is a form of suffering. It's useful to have that perspective. But even that isn't enough. We have to actually do the work for ourselves and begin to experience and recognize that anger itself is already suffering. The feeling of anger, the human experience of anger, hurts. It creates pain internally.

This is what the Buddha asks us to do in terms of understanding what's happening in our minds—understanding greed, aversion, and delusion. He asks us to look at the human experience. What does it mean to be a human being that's feeling greed? What is that experience of greed?

We might not usually think about that. Typically with greed, again in terms of reinforcement, we think: get what I want, that's what makes me happy. We are following through on greed. We are looking at the things that we want and saying, "Yep, that's what I need and I'm going to go after it." And in that going after, we are missing that the feeling of wanting is already painful. The feeling of wanting—when wanting springs up, there is already suffering there. There's already a feeling of lack, a feeling that something's wrong, that something's off.

As I mentioned earlier, when we are caught by that view of wanting, wanting is not going to tell you, "Oh, by the way, if you hang out long enough, wanting will go away, and that particular desire is no longer going to be a problem." Wanting is not going to tell us that.

So the instruction around exploring greed, aversion, and delusion in practice is to bring mindfulness to the experience. What is the experience of wanting? See if we can take our attention out of the thing that we want, the situation that we don't like in aversion. Take the attention out of that for a little while and turn it to the inner landscape. What is the experience that's happening inside?

Now this kind of instruction can be challenging, particularly around social injustice. It might feel like we are—when I say remove the attention from the thing that we are wanting to have or to get rid of and put the attention on the aversion itself—this is a beginning instruction.

This is an instruction that helps us become familiar with these qualities and states of mind. Over time, what we can begin to do is recognize: okay, there's this thing out here, and here's my relationship to it. Yes, I don't like that. That's happening, and it feels like a bad thing to be happening, and I don't like it. I want it to go away. So there's aversion there.

But there's also the possibility to know the aversion while we are engaged with the situation. It's almost like we've taken another step back. We have some sense of yes, there is aversion happening, and this is what that aversion is in relationship to. We may be able to recognize that the aversion puts filters on our mind and has us start to see things in a particular way. And seeing things in a particular way means we're also not seeing other things.

When we start to see the filters that aversion creates, we can begin to act in a way that takes this into account. This aversive state of mind is happening right now, so perhaps I should take some care about how I engage. As I said earlier, the absence of aversion in the face of even social injustice does not mean that we would not engage. This is hard to understand, but it is the way the heart works—when the heart does not have that encrusting of aversion and it sees suffering happening in the world, it will act.

When we're caught by aversion and thinking, "This is wrong, I hate this, I need to annihilate this situation because it is so unjust—I have got to bring everything that I have in terms of all of my anger to bear on this situation"—when we're caught by aversion, that's the belief that's operating: that this is the only way something would change, that I must act out of that aversion. It takes a little bit of a leap of faith to recognize that aversion is not the only motivator possible.

We also need a little bit of care and caution as we go through this, because looking at greed, aversion, and delusion is not a one-time thing. It's not like one look at aversion will do it for us. It's a process. There's a gradual learning and a gradual releasing of these energies. There are going to be many times when we are engaged in the world and also experiencing aversion or greed. If we can have that step back and recognize, "Yep, I'm caught by aversion right now," that can help balance the mind a little. We might recognize that part of what's going on in that mess around the aversion is also the contact with the pain, the pain of the suffering. Anger can be a kind of rejection of that pain. And yet the heart that is free from aversion is going to feel that pain and not resist it.

Embedded even in the aversive reaction, there is this movement of the heart toward wishing there not be suffering in the world, toward wishing that human beings didn't do this to each other. Recognizing that the anger is there, maybe we can connect to the thread that leads into that connection between us—the wish that beings be safe, the wish that beings have ease in their lives. Often the anger is kind of tangled up with that wish.

When it's tangled up like that, I sometimes speak about any form of suffering as a tangle between the deep, natural, human, wholesome wishes—to be happy, to be safe, to be at ease, to have health and well-being. This is the wish for mettā for ourselves. This is wholesome. And yet those wishes come into contact with the way the world is: impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. Our minds get it all tangled up. When that wish for safety meets the uncontrollability of life, it feels like a problem. And so there's a tangle. The threads get all tangled up.

Any kind of suffering, my sense is, is a tangle between these threads of truth—the thread of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable, the ultimate nature of experience—and the deep wish for happiness, well-being, safety. Our mind just cannot comprehend how these can simultaneously coexist. We might think, and I've heard people say things like this: "Yeah, I know it's all impermanent and uncontrollable, so I shouldn't want that happiness." No, that's not the way it works. That wish for happiness, for well-being for ourselves, is natural. It is not going to just disappear. There's a way we might use these truths to bludgeon ourselves: "Oh, you shouldn't want to be happy. You shouldn't want to be safe." Trying to go to emptiness or something. "Everything's impermanent. Okay, yeah, I'm okay with that." Meantime, the part of us that wants to be healthy, happy, and safe is going, "What's going on here?"

And so on the other side of it, if we are connecting to those wishes for happiness and health and safety, and we see that things are impermanent, unreliable, we might feel betrayed by the world, or might feel like the world is just wrong.

And so what might it mean to hold both of these? Because both exist—the love that's very natural, that's a part of our human wholesomeness and well-being, and these truths. The mind that can't comprehend that they can coexist gets tangled. And this is suffering. Anger is a tangle between uncontrollable and wanting to be happy, in a way we could say that.

And so we've got this tangle. We might think that what we need to do is get rid of the anger, get rid of the tangle, take some scissors, cut that knot out of the fabric. But what are we doing there? The knot is composed of these threads. The knot itself is the suffering, not the threads.

And so the practice of being with that anger, the practice of opening to it and understanding—this is the human experience of anger. My sense of that is it's kind of like a lubricant or something that allows these threads to untangle. And then we have a weave in our lives between love and wisdom. They're woven together, supporting each other and informing each other, but not tangled anymore.

So that practice of understanding suffering—that's my sense of what the Buddha is pointing to: to understand the knot has these threads, and that this can be known and seen. The understanding of that creates the conditions for the untangling. It's a very gradual untangling. And the Buddha pointed to that too, the gradual nature of the untangling.

At one point he gave an analogy of a shipwreck. Parts of a ship are strewn over a beach—the wood and the rigging, the rope. And he said the sun, the sand, the wind, the water, all act on those parts of the ship, and gradually, slowly, over the course of months, they wear away.

Unpacking that analogy a little—that's pretty much all he said, that the sun, the sand, the wind are like the mindfulness. But if we think about it, think about that rope on a beach. You go back one day and something has happened there. The day after the shipwreck, the rope is there. It's pretty solid. You can pick it up and it's hard to pull apart. Go back the next day—what's worn down? Can you see any wearing down that's happened? Probably not. But the inexorable nature of the elements acting over the course of months and months and months... you come back six months later, you try to pick up that rope and it falls apart. This is the way he described the practice working. This gradual unfolding.

Now to me, this actually is happy-producing, this gradual nature of the path, because it fits my experience. I've had a few experiences where there's a momentary seeing of something really clearly that lets something go. But the vast majority of the way the practice has unfolded has been this very gradual releasing of greed and aversion and delusion.

Sometimes I look back at something, kind of in surprise at one point, seeing a pattern. "Wow, yeah, that one—what happened to that one? I don't remember seeing it go, but I sure remember having it there." And not even being able to call it up in that moment. And it never returning. A particular hatred at a particular person. Gone. Replaced by metta. Through this gradual path.

So I have confidence in this goal stated as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion because of seeing, in small ways perhaps, the way they are released. We get flavors of this, we get tastes of it. Maybe just in a moment, for a moment, a second of seeing how the mind, when we meet aversion or greed, some difficult reactive state, with that curiosity of, "Huh, what's this? What's this state of mind?"

When we meet it that way, there's a feeling of a little space around it—not being quite so hooked, not quite so squeezed. We feel a shift. Sometimes we might even see a particular pattern, in a moment, just let go when it's met in that way. And again, a taste, a flavor of that possibility of being free from greed or aversion or delusion.

Just a little taste gives us the sense of that possibility. We get this little taste, and in this life, this possibility opens before us.

CHAPTER 225

Milestones on the Path to Freedom: Assessing Progress in Practice Wisely

Andrea Fella · 42 min

In this thoughtful talk at Insight Meditation South Bay, Andrea Fella addresses the delicate art of assessing progress in Buddhist practice. She distinguishes between day-to-day assessments of meditation and the longer arc of spiritual development over years or decades, offering guidance on how to evaluate progress without falling into common pitfalls of clinging or self-judgment.

Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho and her own experience beginning meditation through biofeedback for chronic pain, Fella emphasizes the importance of holding assessments lightly. She explores how the early stages of practice often reveal unflattering aspects of our minds, and why trusting the process of awakening is essential. The talk addresses how to relate skillfully to beautiful experiences like jhāna states and the brahmavihāras, as well as genuine insights—using a vivid metaphor of a hiker encountering a milestone on the Pacific Coast Trail to illustrate the danger of trying to "carry" our insights with us.

Fella offers a compelling alternative to the achievement-oriented language of "attainments," suggesting we view progress through the lens of conditionality (paṭicca samuppāda). She references the Saṃyutta Nikāya's description of stream-entry and offers practical markers for self-assessment: ethical purity, the weakening of greed, hatred, and delusion, the ability to meet suffering with compassion, and most importantly, the trail we leave behind us in the world. The teaching concludes with encouragement to hold insights as "sticky notes" that can always be revised.

Thanks to Insight Meditation South Bay for hosting me tonight and all the dedicated volunteers here. It's really touching to see the dharma service here. It's beautiful.

I am the last person in a series on goals that's been happening here at IMSB. My talk tonight is called "Milestones on the Path to Freedom," and it's about assessing progress in practice. You can assess it wisely or unwisely. Some assessments are the flip sides of goals—we set a goal to become more regular in our sitting practice, and then we can assess whether or not we're regular in our sitting practice. Others are more general, just a sense of how is it going?

I'll offer my perspective on these, and it is limited to my own experience and my own learning. I'm going to offer it in two broad areas. The first is assessing day-to-day practice of meditation. The second is more broadly looking at our progress over the arc of our practice. That can be a few years or many years, and I know for some of you it is many years.

The start of my own journey towards meditation was through the secular meditation doorway. Even though I'd been doing Tai Chi and yoga for years, I started sitting biofeedback meditation because of chronic pain. That's what actually got my butt on the cushion. I didn't really have any expectations about what was supposed to happen when I was sitting, and in retrospect, that was a huge gift. I'd actually been told by the physical therapist and the nurse who taught me, "Don't expect the pain to go away while you're sitting. You'll notice benefit over time, but don't look at it every time you sit." Sure enough, the pain didn't lessen for years, but the suffering started lessening much faster.

I gradually noticed that meditation was having these small but noticeable beneficial effects on my day. This typifies one approach you can take to meditating: hold it really lightly. Notice that you're doing it. Don't have any expectations at all for what happens on the cushion. But check in—how's it going on a day-to-day level? Am I feeling more grounded, more aware, more patient?

The Dalai Lama suggests looking back at one's practice regularly, about every five to seven years or so. Spacious. Big picture. The other piece to that is noticing the day-to-day. How am I showing up? Am I a little bit less anxious? Am I a little bit more grounded? Am I a little bit kinder in traffic? That's where the rubber hits the road for a lot of us. I know it does for me.

I notice for myself, and many other practitioners have noticed, that this kind of attention can be really helpful. As the practice starts to gain momentum, it's nice to take a slightly closer look. Unfortunately, most of what we notice when we take a closer look—or at least I should speak for myself—most of what I noticed when I took a closer look for the first number of years wasn't exactly good news. I've heard Joseph Goldstein and Gil both speak about this: the first few impressions we get of our minds aren't exactly flattering.

This can make assessment a little bit tricky because it's not always the most pleasant process to start to see that unfold. It's been really helpful for me to trust that the system will right itself, that the mind will change itself.

Ajahn Sumedho actually talks about this. He's quite eloquent, so I'm just going to read a bit of his passage here. This is from Kamma and the End of Kamma, for those of you who like citations, in a chapter entitled "Is There an End?"

He says: "If you just assess how you're doing in terms of daily occurrences, the conclusions aren't that reliable. The mind gets stressed out over having to handle many options and look out for potential mishaps, and also blown around by input that we have very little say over—such as the actions and speech of others, or the input of media, or just life on the streets. And then there are the physical ailments, which may bring up difficult and uninspiring mind states all of their own. Moreover, the ongoing process of meditation exposes some most ungratifying mental programs: escapist fantasies, finding fault with oneself or others, hunger for attention and praise, the need to be in control in all situations—they're all common enough. And along with it becomes the impression that this is what you are, and you should be something else, and you shouldn't be like this at all. Hence, there's a cross-current of mind states that well-meaning people go through when they attune to Dharma practice. It's because we're waking up, and waking up from the accident of life makes us aware of the bruises. We accumulate hurt over what we've been through and things that seemed like they might have been a good idea at the time but ended up causing us headaches. There's the need to feel good and on top of things, but an untrained mind constructs unskillful and unreliable ways of bringing that about. So in waking up, we need to meet our own tangles and dysfunctions with a willingness to glean some understanding from them. And that means taking refuge in the Dharma—in the understanding that it is exactly through the process of meeting stress, conflict, and dis-ease that something wider and wiser unfolds."

I know that was quite long, but I read it because when I first encountered this passage, it struck me that it gets to the heart of how assessment and practice interweave. There's a trust in the arc of the practice, ideally—a trust that the mind is opening to something wider and wiser precisely by doing that very counterintuitive move towards pain, towards suffering. And this makes assessment tricky, because generally we want to feel like we're moving closer to ease. Yet the process has all these bumps. "Oh, that's suffering. And so is that. And so is that."

So there's this—not quite paradox, but a kind of spaciousness required to gently hold that both things happen. The mind moves towards ease, and there are bumps and bruises, as Ajahn Sumedho calls them, along the way.

It can also be helpful to consider meditation itself in our assessment. So far I've been talking more about the antics of the mind, which one or two of you might have noticed during the sitting. But there are also little micro-assessments, little micro-noticings that can happen during practice. This isn't so helpful to do if it becomes a discursive evaluation or a story about what's happening, but more a noticing about what's happening—a wise investigation. For example: Is the breath feeling easeful or not, if one is doing breathing meditation? Is there additional pleasure happening, if one is doing concentration meditation? Or simply noticing the conditions of each moment: "Ah, this conditions distraction; this conditions ease."

There are different assessments depending on the form of practice you're doing, and there are many forms of practice that work just fine. It's going to vary if you're doing mindfulness of mind practice, concentration practice, classic ānāpānasati. You can suss it out for yourself. But those little in-between goals and assessments of those goals are just fine, as long as they're held with a lot of space, a lot of lightness.

Some assessments are broader than any technique. How am I relating to this practice? Can I meet what's happening right now? Am I clinging? Can it be met kindly? And there's also practicing with your practice—that might not make a whole lot of sense, but what I mean is examining our relationship to practice itself.

For example, I went through some years of clinging to retreat practice. Not the most unwholesome thing to cling to, but it was still clinging. I might still have a little of that, come to think of it. And this gets to another piece: even the most wholesome goals, if there's clinging, become problematic. That's why it's so important to assess how I'm relating to my practice, and relating to the process of maturation itself.

This brings me to assessments over the arc of practice, as I mentioned at the beginning. This part of the talk is especially aimed at those people who have taken on a deeper or wider goal, something profound in their practice—perhaps even awakening as a goal, or at least held it as a possibility. Those in search of that heartwood that Shaila talked about in the first talk. And that involves assessing beautiful experiences that can arise on the path.

Some people can feel more ease, joy, even sometimes extraordinary bliss or calm can arise. Their presence or their absence can be an aid or an impediment to practice depending on how I relate to it.

What I mean by that is when these kinds of lovely experiences arise—even if it's just that sit where you felt like you were just in it, the whole sit until the bell rang—let it nourish you. That's an important part of this practice. Soaking in the good. And recognize that if it's clung to, it becomes a tripping point. With strong, mature awareness, the inclination to crave these states or to hold on to them tends to fade, and eventually the wish to hold on to them past their usefulness dissolves entirely. That can take some time.

Some practitioners have goals to cultivate beautiful qualities—the brahma-viharas: loving-kindness, compassion, altruistic joy, equanimity. Absolutely beautiful goals. Or the paramis, everything from generosity to wisdom, the perfections of those qualities. The same holds true, however, for those goals. Clinging to them, meeting them or not, can be painful. And allowing them to arise either as a result of hard-won practice or as a natural part of the progress can really be beautiful. In my experience, these beautiful qualities do arise as part of the maturation of the path itself. Either way, when they emerge, it's helpful to celebrate them. It's okay to be happy about being happy.

I'd also like to take a few minutes to talk about assessing insights. Here I'm talking specifically about Buddhist insights, not the psychological insights that colloquially we discuss, which are also very important. But here, more opening to the path unfolding in certain ways that the Buddha pointed to in the early teachings—noticing the arising and passing away of phenomena, or noticing disenchantment with things that used to enchant the heart and mind that aren't so useful anymore. Those kinds of insights.

To start, I'm going to offer what you could call a metaphor, but you can take it as a visualization if you want to. If you want to close your eyes and come along, you can.

Imagine traveling, maybe on the Pacific Crest Trail—a beautiful hiking path. The path goes up sometimes. It goes down sometimes. It wanders through shady forests of majestic redwood trees and pine and fragrant bay laurel. This path itself is more ancient still than even the massive trees, and the light in the canopy above is luminous and diffuse all around. At times the way is rocky, narrow, and difficult. Other times you can travel with ease through bright verdant meadows where birds sing and butterflies flutter.

After one particularly long ascent through the woods, you turn a corner, surprised by a magnificent vista ahead of you. Perhaps it's even a glimpse of your destination. One might wonder how far you've come towards that destination. There's no map, but off to the side you see a milestone, a signal of progress.

How might one relate to this whole scene? Is it more important to focus on the scene or the milestone? The pleasure of the moment, the awe, or the marker? You could even be a bit silly and pick up the milestone and take it with you to show other people that you've found it. Imagine how that makes the rest of the hike.

I bring that up because some of the most beautiful and inspiring moments along the path, these experiential insights, can have that quality. You just have to be there to feel it. And I'm here to tell you from personal experience that if you try to pick up that milestone and haul it along with you, it's nothing but trouble. It'll weigh you down.

This happened in my own practice fairly early, actually. It's common enough—many people have had this happen. One insight I had was very powerful and moving. It had a huge impact on my life. At first I didn't see it as anything I had done, and it kind of percolated through my system. But over time I was exposed to more and more skill-based teachings, and I started looking back to it more and more, with a little bit more attachment, a little bit more clinging. I reified this experience, tried to get back to it. Friends, that is a recipe for suffering.

So that's a very common pitfall of assessing insight. Don't lug around that rock if you can possibly avoid it.

Another pitfall is framing concentration states, insights, or even the process of awakening itself as attainments. I'm going to own my own perspective here. Some people find attainments to be very inspiring—the idea of certain levels of practice can really help focus one's efforts. For someone like me, however, it's not a useful way of framing the process of awakening. The concept of attainment can inspire so much energy, but it also has a strong tendency to evoke this problematic view of and focus on me, mine, I. My attainment. Not my attainment. I didn't get that attainment. Getting. The problem is in the word getting.

As Andrea Fella mentioned, the word "enlightenment" itself, just like "attainment," is not a very accurate translation of the Pali. Nirvana means something closer to extinguishing or cooling fire. That's nirvana. Attainment—I don't know the Pali for it, but I'm pretty certain it doesn't carry the same ring it does in English. These attainments can be a big obstacle to integrating the wisdom of insight, and they can very effectively block further spiritual maturation.

Our choices do matter a lot. Our effort and practice matters a lot. But it doesn't make much sense to take credit for it, particularly as the practice matures. So what's the alternative? The alternative is to consider conditions. Conditionality, conditioning the mind—you've heard those words before, many of you, I know you have.

While even insights can be dead weight if we try to cling to them or identify them as personal accomplishments, the same insight viewed as a process of unfolding conditions becomes something quite different. Yes, there is skill in choosing what part of the path to take. There's skill in helping to unfold our practice. We have our part to play. It's a bit more though—here's a metaphor I like a lot, one Susie Harrington introduced me to. It's like a kayaker going down whitewater rapids. Yes, there's choice and there's definitely skill. But the water, the rocks, the weather, the snow melt—all of those things are conditions too. We can take some credit for our skill, but wiser still to look at the whole river and see the conditions and understand how we interact with them. This kind of perspective is wisdom, and it can help reinforce wholesome development in addition to making for a wiser assessment.

Conditionality can also help to undercut another problematic way that many practitioners identify with goals. I spoke before about falling short of a goal. That too is conditions. It doesn't need to be a story about me, how bad I am, the things I've done wrong. Instead, it might simply be the conditions in my life. Did I drink too much coffee before I got on the cushion this morning? Did I not get enough sleep? Is my job stressing me out? This is a more compassionate way to hold falling short of those goals.

When assessing assessment for yourself, you might consider criteria that make sense for you and your practice. I look to the suttas for ideas about how maturity is assessed. If you examine the end of the path as described in the discourses, they offer some pretty clear guidelines. Ethical purity is a significant one. How we relate to what's happening in our minds. And absolute trust in the Dharma.

I'm going to read a little bit from the Samyutta Nikaya. It's a conversation between one of the Buddha's biggest lay disciples, a man named Anathapindika, and Sariputta, one of the Buddha's most trusted senior disciples and teachers. In this particular vignette, Anathapindika is experiencing such severe pain he feels like his head is being crushed. He's not having a good day. Sariputta consoles him by reminding him that as a stream-enterer—someone who's already partially awake—he's utterly free of the bad qualities that lead to states of woe. And then he reminds Anathapindika that he possesses four very important factors.

Unwavering confidence in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, and the virtues dear to the noble ones—which means following all the lay precepts of not killing, not stealing, not becoming intoxicated, not using sexuality in an unwise way, and not lying. Moreover, he's certain to reach the fruits of the path.

I quote that briefly because it gives a picture of what's valued here: trust, ethical development, and a commitment to awakening itself are some of the pieces that are held there.

For me personally, I've got some others that I use, based on that framework. I assess my level of altruism—my willingness to serve, to offer, my generosity. I look at the strength of greed, hate, and delusion in my mind, as Andrea Fella talked about. It's usually rather humbling to examine. And I notice whether that's weakening, and how I'm relating to it. Can I just be with it compassionately and notice what's happening? Or does there have to be judgment—second, third, fourth arrows in addition to the clear seeing? The ability to meet suffering with compassion, to either do that or not, is for me a very good marker of how my practice is progressing on any given day.

And perhaps most important of all: What is the trail I'm leaving behind me in the world? What is my wake, inside my heart and outside? That's a pretty good one for me. It doesn't matter how good I feel on the cushion if what's happening off the cushion isn't so helpful.

The most important thing these days, though, has become to hold things lightly. Any more, it's just more and more about the joy of being on the path itself and noticing the contentment of that.

So in closing, I want to encourage you, in considering assessing your practice or setting new goals, to keep in mind conditionality. Notice how you're relating to your practice. Hold things lightly. Thanissaro Bhikkhu once told me to hold insights as sticky notes, so they can always be revised later. And above all, notice those choice points. And don't take it personally—any of it.

After sitting quietly for a few minutes, someone asked about wise reflection—one of the terms I had used—and whether it comes about through invitation or naturally emerges in meditation.

It can go either way, in terms of being invited or just emerging. What I've found for myself is that when the mind gets quiet enough, a certain kind of reflective capacity is just naturally there, and I allow space for that. So that's one form of wise reflection.

One of the most useful things in my practice—it happened sometime when I was in Burma, I don't actually remember which teacher invited this—was being told to take a few minutes at the end of meditation and schedule a date with yourself for wise reflection. Reflect back on how that meditation was, not from this point of I, me, and mine, but asking: What conditions arose? What went away? What strengthened? How was whatever you're working on? How was the concentration? How was the awareness? Allow time to use our natural intelligence as part of this practice.

It felt very liberating for me at the time to be invited to use that part of our minds that often just sort of gets quieted down—to reflect back after the fact.

Another question came about the Buddha's very succinct teaching that there are three goals in Buddhism: to abstain from evil, to cultivate the good, and to purify the mind. "This is the teaching of all the Buddhas" is sort of the ending refrain. The question was essentially: this is too many goals—how can we simplify this?

I think it's a beautiful question. I would encourage you to ponder for yourself if any of those goals hold the other two inside of them, and if you can use one as your North Star. I'm saying that not to be tricky, but because I've found that the practice is kind of holographic. If you look deeply enough into sila, the rest of the path unfolds. If you look deeply enough into bhavana, or what you were calling samadhi—meditation—the rest of the path unfolds. And so it is for all of them.

To allow yourself one simple goal can be a beautiful thing if it unfolds enough of what's important to you.

One of your challenges in the past has been considering goals, whatever they are, to be about I, me, and mine—having them be something concrete that's about your experience, your insight, your attainment. And what you've discovered, it sounds like quite beautifully, is that instead of thinking in terms of mine, you think in terms of this reservoir of peace, this reservoir of freedom from suffering that is available if you simply stop practicing clinging, if you stop practicing suffering. So there's a sense of abundance, right? That's very much about the letting go process.

I'm curious—does anybody else have thoughts on how you've used assessments or goals that's been helpful or not so helpful?

So you're noticing some clinging with your daily life practice, and it's around an app that gives you the number of days you've practiced in a row. You're noticing that if you don't sit today, it's going to ruin your record, your number of consecutive sits. I'm not sure how much that's clinging and how much it's skillful means. It sounds like a little bit of both, and that's it—that's exactly right.

There's craving that leads to the end of craving. There's desire that leads to the end of craving. The entire Eightfold Path is based on having certain kinds of desires, some of which are more wholesome than others at any given point. And in general, the principle is this: anytime we can trade a form of clinging or craving for a more wholesome form, we're going in the right direction. Thanissaro Bhikkhu calls this "trading candy for gold"—slowly trading the less virtuous motivation or the less virtuous feedback or experience for the more virtuous one.

We start where we're at. And if having an orientation towards making it to 365 days straight is helpful for you, that's where you're at. You're also commenting that using this technology and this form of motivation has helped you meditate every day, and that short periods many times accrue more benefit than sporadic longer sits—which has been my experience over time as well.

The observation here is that another way of relating to a milestone, besides picking it up and hauling it with you, is to be nourished by the fact that it happened and to allow it to build confidence. This is incredibly helpful. To me, conditionality and confidence can go hand in hand. It's confidence in the practice as it moves through your body, your heart, your mind. All of us are the Dharma. The Dharma expresses through each of our bodies and hearts and minds. And it's completely wholesome to have confidence in that, to let it be something that buoys you. It doesn't have to be a form of clinging. It can simply be growth in understanding the capacity of this individual to embody the Dharma.

Thank you all so much for your time and attention. It's been a pleasure to be with you.

CHAPTER 226

Refuge in Saṅgha with Andrea Fella and Amana Brembry Johnson

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this collaborative dharma talk, Pam Weiss, Andrea Fella, and Amana Brembry Johnson explore the often-overlooked third refuge—the Saṅgha. Drawing from the Upaḍḍha Sutta where the Buddha declares that spiritual friendship is not merely half but the whole of the holy life, they examine how American individualism has shaped convert Buddhism's relationship to community.

The teachers share the powerful story of Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī's persistent petition to join the Saṅgha, with Ānanda serving as an ally who helped open the doors to women's ordination. This narrative illuminates how Saṅgha functions through mutual support, speaking up for unheard voices, and the courage to persist against resistance. Andrea Fella explores three layers of refuge—going for refuge, gaining full confidence through practice, and ultimately becoming a refuge for others through ethical conduct and embodied understanding.

The talk weaves together the teaching of paṭicca-samuppāda (dependent origination) with the practical reality that our inner patterns reflect collective conditioning. The teachers emphasize that mindfulness tools for meeting personal suffering equally apply to engaging with suffering in the world—not through passive equanimity, but through compassionate action. Amana Brembry Johnson frames Saṅgha as beloved community, a necessary refuge for those walking the radical, counter-cultural path of practice. The session concludes with Pam Weiss's reflection on love as a force—not mere feeling—that recognizes no barriers and breaks down the delusion of separation.

So this afternoon we want to talk a bit about the third of the three refuges or jewels, the Sangha jewel.

I sometimes think of this as the lost jewel. We've been talking about how Buddhism, or convert Buddhism, as it moves from one country to another and has landed in the United States, picks up the flavor of the culture or cultures that it comes to. And we've talked a bit about the impact of capitalism and democracy on the tone and shape of convert Buddhism here. There is another dimension of this culture, which maybe simply put is a very heightened kind of individualism in American culture, that has also influenced to some degree how Buddhism, convert Buddhism, was initially translated into our culture. We have this kind of myth, perhaps, of ultra-independence. So this Sangha jewel is pointing us to something quite different than that.

There's a story in the Pali Canon of a dialogue between the Buddha and his attendant, Ananda. I love Ananda. He is, in my reading of these stories, kind of like this slightly bumbling, friendly, warm, but not super smart, nice guy. And he acts in many ways as the interface between the Buddha and his community, his Sangha. I always imagine it might have been kind of intimidating to bump into the Buddha. But if I might be afraid to talk to the Buddha, then there's Ananda. And Ananda's like this sweetheart. So he kind of helped in that interface.

So there's a story in which Ananda—who's not the sharpest tool in the shed—comes to the Buddha and says, "I had this big insight." It doesn't actually say that in the Pali Canon; I'm riffing a little here. So he had this big insight, and the Buddha says, "What is it?" And Ananda says, "Well, I realized that Sangha is fully half of the holy life." In other words, he realized how important Sangha was. And the Buddha reprimands him, as is often the case in these dialogues between the Buddha and Ananda, and he says, "Don't say that, Ananda, don't say that. You got it wrong again." And Ananda wants to know, "Well, how is it then?" And the Buddha says, "The Sangha is the whole of the holy life."

It's a strong statement. There is, at the very center of Buddhist teaching, this understanding of our interconnectedness, this teaching of what's sometimes called paṭicca-samuppāda, the interdependent web of being. That's really at the heart, in some way, of what the Buddha woke up to, what he saw. We could understand this as a description of what he realized in what I spoke about the other night as the third watch of the night—the truth of this dynamic, interdependent web of being.

Now, the Buddha did something quite radical in establishing his community, which is that 2,600 years ago in northern India, it was a very stratified class and caste system. Andrea was reminding me of this piece—how there was hierarchy within the Buddhist Sangha, but it wasn't based on one's prior position. So you could be a king or a merchant or a soldier or whatever, and that didn't determine your standing in the community. It was based on how long you'd practiced, how long you'd been there. That's an interesting reframing of how things were set up.

I think it's important to name that even though the Buddha opened the doors of the community to all different classes, there was one big category that got left out. And that was women. So in the beginning, women were not invited into the community. It was all monks and laymen, mostly monks.

And so there's another story that also features Ananda. This is a story in which Pajapati—the Buddha's mother died within a week of his being born, and he was raised by her sister—at some point comes and basically petitions the Buddha to allow women into the Sangha. And she comes, the story says, three times. Three times in Buddhist mythology is understood as a lot; three is many. So she came many times to visit the Buddha and to ask to be received, for her and women to be received. And the third time that she came—oh, he said no. She was not deterred. She came again. He said no. She comes a third time, and this time she brings her friends. This is another way of talking about sangha. So she brings this big group of women with her.

And coming to visit the Buddha was not an easy thing. They had to travel over dusty roads for many miles. So they show up, this whole gathering of women, outside the area where the monks are staying. They're in tattered robes, with swollen feet covered in sores from walking all that distance.

Ananda sees them and hears them, and he intercedes. Pajapati goes in and asks again, and the Buddha says no. The women—not yet nuns—are outside wailing and crying out. Ananda goes to them and asks, "What's going on? Why are you so upset?" And they say, "We want to be able to join the Sangha, to become part of the holy life."

So Ananda—the "not so smart guy"—goes in and, in my reading of it, he tricks the Buddha a little bit. He says, "Isn't it the case that women are equally able to attain enlightenment as men?" And the Buddha says yes. Ananda says, "Then you have to let them in. You have to do this." He kind of pins the Buddha in a corner. And so the Buddha says okay. And he does.

I love this story as a way of understanding this piece of Sangha: that we need each other. We need all of our voices. We might understand Ananda in this story as a kind of ally figure. He's speaking up for, giving voice to, a group of people whose voices aren't being heard. It's a beautiful expression of that.

And I think it's important to say that the misogyny you hear in this story has continued in the Buddhist tradition. It's not gone, but it is changing. It's changing in large part because of courageous voices like Ananda's, who are willing to stand up and offer support. And it's changing because of courageous voices like Pajapati's, who didn't give up. She was told no once, twice, three times. She didn't give up or let go or go away.

So this is a living aspect of our teaching—the full integration of Sangha as alive, essential, whole of the holy life, part of our practice, and the extension of including all of our voices in the various languages that we speak. There are important changes happening in the context of Buddhist teaching and Buddhism and Buddhist Sangha that we are sitting right in the middle of now. This is a way of inviting you and me and all of us to wholeheartedly engage, to bring our care and our love and our voice to expressing, to becoming the fullness of the teachings as they continue to land here.

I had the opportunity to spend some time at the end of last year in Bhutan, which is a Buddhist country. There were many extraordinary things about that experience, but it had a profound impact on me in terms of what I'm talking about here. When I was in a culture in which the teachings were completely embedded in daily life, it was so moving. Buddhist teaching wasn't something rarefied that happened only in monasteries or retreat centers. It was expressed as a completely relational practice. It was expressed in how people took care of the temples and the statues and so on, but much more, it was completely infiltrated into how people related to each other, how they took care of each other. There was a kind of ethical purity that didn't come from trying to be good. It came from a deep understanding that we are deeply connected. And the same thing was true in the way the culture and community related not just to the human community, but to the animal community and to the earth itself.

For me, it helped me understand that there's a whole dimension of our nascent integration of convert Buddhism in America that is ours to be realized, ours to be expressed, ours to be fully embodied and fleshed out.

Maybe that's enough place to stop for now. We're going to share this talk in the spirit of Sangha. I was reflecting about the Sangha from the perspective of the analogy that is offered about the refuge in the Sangha being like the support of attendants who help us when we are ill, when we're needing to take our medicine. Yesterday I offered the analogy of the Buddha being like the doctor diagnosing the illness, the Dharma like the prescription—what we have to do, the actions we have to take to cure ourselves—and the Sangha like the attendants who help us and support us while we are taking the medicine. We need each other, as Pam was pointing to. We really need each other, as the story she's telling points to. And we see this in our own practice here.

We are a Sangha, and we support each other—not only in our practice, but quite literally in the preparing of food, the cleaning of dishes, the washing of bathrooms. Everything we do supports each other so that we can live with ease together. We have created this community of external support, and the internal work we do is also sustained by having like-minded people walking the path alongside us.

Because this is hard work. I think you've all felt that—the courage it takes to meet our own minds, the courage it takes to open to our struggles, our suffering, to really open to all of that messiness inside. It takes personal courage, and that courage is supported by having a community of practitioners with us.

I remember on one early retreat feeling like I was in the midst of some major meltdown, sitting there with my eyes closed. Then I opened my eyes and saw people sitting around me very quietly, just as you are sitting now. I had no idea what was going on in their minds, but simply looking at people sitting there, I thought, "If they can sit with whatever's going on in their minds, I can do it too." Some of you may have felt this flavor of Sangha support here in our community together.

This is a real part of our practice—that we support each other. When we find it challenging, when our courage is flagging, we might just look up and see somebody walking mindfully across the room, and our courage rises in that moment. We support each other in this way. We take refuge in the Sangha. We borrow the courage of others to help us.

In the texts, this is described as the beginning of refuge. In my exploration of the Pali Canon and the suttas around refuge, it feels like there are three layers. The first layer is this going for refuge—going for refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. This involves taking on trust that these will be supportive, using the support of the community, perhaps taking a leap of faith that the teachings make sense, and trusting what the Buddha said: "Yes, this seems like something useful to try." This going for refuge is almost like borrowing the confidence of others to begin our journey.

Then that deepens over time. There's a phrase that says as we practice, as we engage in these teachings, as we have enough confidence in them to actually practice, we ultimately gain full confidence in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. This is the place where we have learned enough, where we have had understandings that transform us, where that shift of perspective allows us to see the teachings directly for ourselves at a very deep level.

This shift of perspective lands us into the third aspect of refuge, where we can become a refuge for others. The teachings explore this possibility—that we can understand the teachings deeply enough that we enter into the Sangha. Pam mentioned a couple of days ago the technical definition of refuge in Sangha: those beings who have had a deep understanding of what the Buddha taught, whether laymen or laywomen, monks or nuns. The Sangha of refuge is the community of people who have had this understanding. When we gain such understanding, we step into the place of becoming a refuge ourselves.

I'd like to explore that a little. There's one place where the Buddha encourages us to become a refuge for all beings, and the first aspect of that is ethics—engaging in harmlessness. Amana mentioned the other day, when talking about the precepts, that in engaging in harmlessness and ethical conduct, we are offering the gift of fearlessness to all beings. This is that refuge. When we are committed to non-harming, beings can feel safe in our presence. This commitment to ethical conduct is one form of becoming a refuge.

So we walk the path. We engage in the inner journey ourselves. Much of what we learn in this setting is how to look internally, how to look at our own hearts and minds, how to see the way our own hearts and minds create such a mess in there. It takes the Sangha to support us in doing that, to have the courage for it. As we walk the path, we cultivate the qualities of heart and mind that the Buddha encouraged us to cultivate, cultivating that refuge in the Dharma.

One of the analogies I appreciate about the path comes from Stephen Batchelor, who pointed out something essential about following the path of the Buddhist teachings. Looking at the analogy of a path through the woods: in order for there to be a path, many, many people must have walked on it.

And so we are seeing the Sangha as we're walking on a path. We may not see them right in front of us, but the existence of that path through the woods is evidence of that community that has walked there. And then as we follow in that path, we in turn are keeping it clear for people following us. This is also a way in which the Sangha works—that we become a refuge by engaging in the path. We can't help but be a refuge because we are keeping the path alive for people to follow.

So there's this inner side of the practice, looking internally at our own mess and the suffering that's inside. And yet there's also a whole area of our relationship to the world, our relationship to the suffering in our world. I believe that the same tools that help us to meet the messiness of our own minds can support us in meeting, opening to, and engaging with the suffering in the world. To me, this too is a part of being a refuge—that we don't simply limit our exploration of suffering to our inner struggles, but we open our hearts to the world and explore what it means to meet that suffering, the external suffering, the outer world.

This is looking at practice internally and externally, the inner practice and the outer practice. Now, one of the reasons I think that the tools of our inner practice work so well in the outer world is because essentially our communities and cultures are created by a bunch of human minds interacting. And we ourselves are shaped by a bunch of human minds that have gone before. This is really spoken about in the teaching that Pam mentioned about dependent origination—this shaping of our minds by intentions and actions. It's not just about how it's happening inside, because we are not shaped in isolation. It's not just an individual thing. We are a collective. We are a community. And the shaping that happens here is a result of so much shaping that came before—my engagement with my parents and their parents, and the cultures that they were shaped by. All the views, the ideas, the opinions, everything that has shaped me—I didn't make it all up. It was conditioned into me through the cultures. And so all of this mess that's in here has been shaped by a lot of mess that's come before. If I'm not waking up to this mess, then probably what's going to happen is I'll perpetuate the mess.

This speaks to the inner work, the waking up, the seeing of how the patterns and habits work. We see it's not just about me. We see it's a human thing. This is what we're learning when we see our own minds. Initially, it really feels very personal. It's like, "Oh, these are my struggles. This was my conditioning. These are my difficulties and problems." And eventually we begin to recognize, no, these are human problems. These are human patterns. That recognition begins to turn us outward also.

I remember on one retreat, I was sitting there recognizing that this quality of suffering happening in here was a reflection of suffering in the world. And I was like, "Oh my gosh." I had had a really privileged life—my parents loved me and cared for me—and I'm experiencing a lot of messy, yucky stuff in my mind. No wonder the world is so painful. No wonder. It's just seeing this confusion multiplied by eight billion. No wonder it's so challenging out there.

This opens our heart to some extent to compassion for the messiness of the world. We see in our own hearts the struggles that we have, and we recognize, "Oh yeah, other people too." When we're meeting suffering in the world, we are meeting greed, aversion, and delusion at work, habits and patterns at work. We start to see this. We start to see that the way our own mind works—just as one example, we see a thought arising in our mind and an impact, an effect of that thought. Whether or not the thought is true is kind of irrelevant in a way. My own belief, my own thought that I was a failure and was unworthy—those beliefs, those thoughts had an effect on how I engaged in the world, even when I could see them and think, "Wow, I don't even actually believe that." But still there was this effect. We see that our thoughts have a tremendous power.

The truth of a thought doesn't actually necessarily mitigate its effect. And likewise in the world—the beliefs we have, the views we carry about other people, about all the fake news that's out there. In some ways, the effect of fake news, the effect of views and opinions, even if they are not at all based in reality—the effect is real. Just like the effect of our own thoughts on our hearts and minds is real. And we see that. We wake up to that.

Some of this exploration around bringing mindfulness to the ways our minds work helps us see into how suffering is created, and gives us perhaps a little bit of capacity to hold some of the messiness in the world. Now, this isn't about non-action. My sense is that engagement with the world can become a refuge. I do think that the tools of mindfulness, of balance, of equanimity, of compassion can be applied in meeting the suffering of the world.

And yet, what does it mean to meet injustice in the world with equanimity? My sense of that is not that it means we sit back and say, "Oh yeah, things as they are. People being slaughtered. That's what's happening." That's not the way equanimity expresses itself, in my understanding.

Equanimity expresses in a kind of recognition that this is what is happening. So there's a true acknowledgment: yes, this is the condition. And rather than trying to deny that it's the condition, we come into alignment with this is what's happening. The heart that is able to hold that is not one of passivity. That heart that is not pushing away or holding onto, that is in that place of "this is what's happening"—it has a kind of movement to respond. To respond with compassion, not with anger, not with hatred, but with compassion.

And that's another way that this practice, the inner practice that we do, unfolds. We've talked about holding all of our messiness and seeing that a transformation happens because our hearts and minds can hold that with balance. The compassionate response to that, the inner compassionate response, is a releasing of suffering. Externally, it may look more like taking action, not simply holding it with equanimity and it magically releasing. It probably looks more like stepping into action through compassion.

Refuge. Refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. I want to enter this from one of the perspectives of what dukkha is. And what's come up throughout the retreat, for me, has been the delusion of separation. This is one of the aspects of dukkha—that there are separate individual whole pieces, when in fact we are all just aggregates of each other, pieces of each other.

I wish I had brought this quote from Martin Luther King. I haven't memorized it, and I should, because I like to refer to it a lot. So I'm going to just talk about it a little bit. He said that we are part of a single garment, and each of us are individual threads of that garment. Without each thread, there would be no garment. And so this illusion of separateness creates a lot of suffering.

To go back a little bit further to refuge: refuge is a condition of being safe or sheltered from pursuit, danger, or trouble. From dukkha. Refuge is an asylum. It is a sanctuary. It's a safe haven and a port in the storm. And so when we take refuge in sangha, we're really taking refuge in beloved community.

I remember in my twenties and thirties, I used to fast a lot because I thought that was really the healthy thing to do—to detox the body and cleanse. And a lot of times I felt like I was looking through a peephole out at the world, by myself, because I really didn't have a lot of people around me who were also doing that.

And I found it very difficult to do it on my own. People were asking me, "Well, why are you doing that? Why are you eating like that?" They were questioning me and challenging me and not supporting me, really.

And to fall into community, to fall into sangha, where we can rest and be supported in our journey towards liberation, to go up against the conditioning that is out there—the conditioning of unsafety, of not being sheltered, of not being cared for, of not being considered, of not being included.

I love the story that Pam brought of Ananda and giving you a bit of Ananda's personality in it. And the Buddha saying, Sangha is the whole of the Dharma. The whole of the Dharma. How far can we get without each other?

I want to bring up another thing that Pam was touching on throughout the retreat when she spoke of seeing the sky through a straw. How much of the whole picture can you get from seeing through that straw? And she followed it up with: it is only together that we see the whole sky. And it's only together that we are whole.

So as we undertake this journey towards liberation, we are weaving ourselves back together, recognizing that there's no space between you and I, that we are all of this. And also understanding the importance of creating safety by developing the moral compass, the ethics that Andrea was just talking about. Not to harm, not to kill, not to steal, not to lie, not to violate other people's bodies sexually, not to violate ourselves sensually—taking in too much visually, through hearing, touch, taste, smell.

It's challenging to walk this path. Though we may seek the fruit of liberation, we're wading through a lot of murky water. There has been a path, as Andrea pointed out, trod down where we can see it, but it's still a dense forest growing all the time, every day. And it takes beloved community to traverse this territory. This is taking refuge in the sangha.

I wish I could remember those words of Martin Luther King—just the intricate web that we are with each other.

I think of my children. I have a bunch of grandchildren. And I think of how deeply, tenderly I love them, because I take them as my own, as a part of me. And in that, I provide a refuge for them. I protect them. I keep them safe. I harbor them. I give them a port in the storm. And if we could all take refuge in each other in that same way, we begin to create the conditions of this world in the way we want to live—in harmony and peace and compassion, kindness, care for each other.

So I don't have much more to say about refuge in the sangha, except that it is a beloved community that supports us and floats us in a tumultuous world, a world on fire. And the very process and act of practicing is a radical act today. It is so radical. It is so against the stream. And community is so necessary to be able to paddle upstream.

As you were speaking, I'm remembering this African proverb that says: If you want to go fast, go alone. If you want to go far, go together.

So this is a long path. As you described, the forest keeps intruding, growing back, getting messier. And this truth of our connection—it's not a metaphor. It's not an analogy. It's not an image. It is really what the Buddha woke up to.

So often in the teachings, we talk about the absence side—this sort of emptiness side of the truth of how things are—that there is an absence of a separate, solid, permanent self.

The Buddha called this Anatta, which was later expanded to be understood as a teaching that there is no separate, solid, unchanging anything. This is the teaching of Sunyata.

And sometimes when we meet that side of the teaching, it can feel scary. It can feel kind of cold, if that's a word to use—like, yikes, nothing. Which of course doesn't mean nihilism; I don't mean that. But still, there's the letting go side of the practice, there's the shedding, there's that.

But that's not the only side. There's another way of going in. I think of that sometimes as the wisdom side of the teaching. But there's another side, which is what we're talking about here. One side is: no, there's no separate solid me. That's one way of saying it. There is an absence of that. But what is there a presence of? What there is a presence of is this web of connection. That's what there is, not what there isn't. This web of connection that we are made of.

It's interesting because we have this metaphor—some of you may have heard it—of the two wings of the bird. One wing is compassion and the other wing is wisdom. And you need both wings to fly. That's where freedom comes from. If we have too much wisdom without compassion, it gets kind of scary, cold, sharp. If we have too much compassion or kindness without wisdom, we have what Pema Chödrön calls idiot compassion. We're trying to do well—this speaks to our efforts of engaging in the messy world—but we don't have the wisdom to actually do well without either doing more harm or harming ourselves. So we need both.

But I've been enjoying actually intentionally using this other side, this interconnected side, as a way to talk not just about compassion but about love, which is not a word we use that much. And I don't mean love as a feeling. This is a really important thing. But love as a force.

This is from Maya Angelou. She says, "Love recognizes no barriers." Love is what breaks down that illusion of separation. She says it jumps hurdles, leaps fences, and arrives at its destination full of hope. If we only see the wisdom emptiness side, the absence-of side of our practice, it's easy to lose hope. We need to keep filling ourselves with love in order to be able to stay in it—to go far, not just to go fast.

And this is embedded in the teaching of refuge in Sangha. It's the truth of the fact that we are actually joined at the hip—that there's no way, in fact, for me to wake up and be free while other people suffer. If I am a sensitive human being and there are people suffering, I feel it.

And so just as Andrea was saying in such a beautiful way, we have this opportunity in the context of a supportive community to cultivate this capacity to be with our own suffering, which frankly feels like just about enough sometimes, doesn't it? Like okay, that's about as much as I can handle. No more. But we don't get that, because pretty soon we're going to walk out the door and there are going to be a few other people there, and they probably won't be in silence. And they may not have taken up these ethical precepts that Amana recited on the first night.

So we have to understand how it is that we extend that out. And we don't extend it out by walking around saying, "Oh, there's not really a me here. No self, no me here, stomp, stomp, stomp." No. We can understand it by understanding and feeling the truth of how to be with this universal suffering that's ours as human beings. And to do our best. One of my old teachers used to say the whole of our practice can be summed up like this: not making things worse. It sounds sort of simplistic, but pretty good actually, right?

So we move back into the world tenderized. We move back into the world, hopefully with some wisdom, with some insight that we've gained into how we work and how to work with our own suffering. But we don't stop there. We take that because we understand our connectedness, and because it's not just wisdom but also love that is shot right through the center of this practice.

do our best to meet ourselves and each other and the earth itself with this understanding of interdependence, this understanding of needing each other.

And we can begin not just to tolerate various other people, just like we're not just going to tolerate our own boredom or sleepiness or restlessness or anger or grief. It's not good enough to tolerate. We actually have to be interested. We have to reach across the aisle and say, "Who are you? Tell me. I want to understand. I want to know."

We have to be willing to be with and listen deeply so that we are touched by, so that we are shaped by, so that we begin to feel those threads. Because that's what we are anyway. It's just a matter of sliding in, you know? If you want to go fast, go alone. If you want to go far, go together. We are together. I paraphrase, but that's what the Buddha said. And because of that, we have the capacity to go a long, long way.

We continue to not just be impacted, but to also impact the world—to love what we see, which doesn't mean saying, "Oh yes, everything is fine." Sometimes that love is fierce. But it comes from love, you know? A fierce love that says no is still coming from love. It's not coming from greed or hatred or delusion.

So, just in case what I'm saying sounds like, "Oh no, I'm not like that"—actually, you are. And the fact that you've been here sitting with yourself for all of these days is an enormous act of love. So please don't miss that. You could not think so, but that's just what you think.

So let's sit for just a minute together.

Thank you for listening.
