At a certain point in my practice, the suffering around the investigation, the doing of it, began to be very painful. When I would try to turn my attention and practice by doing the investigation, there would be so much suffering. And this was a real conundrum for me. It's like, how do I investigate investigation? How do I deal with this? What do I do here?

The understanding around that happened slowly over maybe eighteen months of just beginning to try, exploring, tarrying and hurrying around this pattern of investigation. And at some point the mind recognized: this mind investigates. Let it investigate. But don't jump on the bandwagon of investigation and try to do it. And so that was my clinging—I had owned the investigation.

It's not that the investigation stops. That's needed. Mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, tranquility, concentration, equanimity—the seven factors of awakening, beautiful states of mind that are necessary for our path—and yet we can cling to every one of them. And again, sometimes that clinging will be supporting us to let go of something more painful, more unwholesome. At some point, the suffering of that clinging will begin to be obvious, and that's when we need to turn to it and explore, understand: what's that suffering about? So let suffering be your guide around that.

The Buddha actually talked about this kind of staged release in his own practice. He said: "Before my enlightenment, while I was still only an unenlightened bodhisatta, I too clearly saw, as it actually was with proper wisdom, how sensual pleasures provide little gratification, much suffering, and much despair, and how great is the danger in them. But as long as I did not attain to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sensual pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, or to something more peaceful than that, I recognized that I could still be attracted to sensual pleasures. But when I clearly saw, as it actually is with proper wisdom, how sensual pleasures provide little gratification, much suffering, and much despair, and how great is the danger in them, and I attained to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sensual pleasures, the rapture and pleasure of concentration, or to something more peaceful than that—freedom—then I recognized that I was no longer attracted to sensual pleasures."

And so we can use, in some ways, the pleasure of concentration to help us let go of the pull towards pleasure in the sense realm. We see there is no comparison in terms of the pleasure and peace that are available from the practice.

So the teaching of the simile of the raft points us to eventually letting go altogether of the raft, letting go of the teachings altogether. But what is the mind of someone who has completely liberated themselves? The mind of someone who's free from greed, aversion, and delusion.

There's a description in the suttas of such a person. There are different descriptions; I'll just read this one: "In one of right view, right intention comes into being. In one of right intention, right speech comes into being. In one of right speech, right action comes into being. In one of right action, right livelihood comes into being. In one of right livelihood, right effort comes into being. In one of right effort, right mindfulness comes into being. In one of right mindfulness, right concentration comes into being. In one of right concentration, right knowledge comes into being. In one of right knowledge, right release comes into being. Thus, the path of the disciple in higher training possesses eight factors. The path of the arahant possesses ten factors."

And to me what this says is that an arahant, someone who is fully awakened—the word is possesses this tenfold path, the eightfold path plus right knowledge and right release. It is in someone who is free, in their very being, that they are living the Dharma. They don't have to hold it up on their head and say, "This is the Dharma."

They are the Dharma. They are living the path very naturally.

And so, letting go of the Dharma—someone who has crossed the flood, they don't need the teachings. They are living the life of freedom. Very naturally, the awakened mind chooses skillfully.

Transcending the teachings, transcending virtue, doesn't mean that we wouldn't behave ethically. The expression of someone who is free walks in the world with compassion, with wisdom, with love, living in the world in a very ethical way.

And so crossing the flood—this is what we're doing here, participating all together as a community in this process. This community will be going our separate ways in a couple of days, yet we continue wherever we are. The flood crossing does not just happen here in this room at IMS. Every moment of our lives we can build our raft, whether we're here or in our workplace, meeting our flood moment to moment.

CHAPTER 61

Supports for Continuity

Andrea Fella · 57 min

> In this talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers practical guidance on establishing and maintaining continuity of mindfulness—what the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta describes as the 'establishing of mindfulness.' She explains how this continuity supports both concentration (samādhi) and the development of insight into impermanence, unreliability, and not-self.
> Fella introduces the metaphor of a child's hoop-and-stick game to illustrate the 'light touch' approach to effort: rather than trying to grip mindfulness for an entire sitting, we can gently tap our attention moment by moment, allowing momentum to build naturally. She distinguishes between 'prompted mindfulness'—when we consciously remind ourselves to be present—and 'unprompted mindfulness'—the effortless return of awareness that happens thousands of times daily, offering a taste of what non-doing feels like.
> The talk explores common 'rabbit holes' where mindfulness gets lost—certain locations, activities, physical discomfort, and habitual mind states like the hindrances. Rather than doubling down with forceful effort, Fella encourages curiosity about these patterns. She shares a personal story about discovering that her mind's tendency to space out during meals was actually the mind seeking needed rest. Through investigating these moments with interest rather than judgment, we learn about our conditioned patterns and glimpse the uncontrollable, not-self nature of the mind itself.

I appreciate in the moments before the talk, sitting here and listening to the rustlings, the sounds of people coming in and finding their place. It gets to be almost quiet, and then somebody adjusts their posture, shifts in the chair, and then it goes a little quieter, and then there's a little shift. Just hearing it gradually get quiet. Something about that I really appreciate—just hearing the natural movements of humans as we do our thing.

In the instructions and in the talks in the last days, several times we've mentioned this encouragement towards continuity of mindfulness, encouragement towards the sustaining of mindfulness over time. I wanted to speak about that this evening: the importance of it, and how to encourage it, really. What are some supports for that aspect of mindfulness?

When the Buddha talked about this in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, that phrase that Greg mentioned the other night—satipaṭṭhāna can mean the establishing of mindfulness. And to me, what the establishment of mindfulness is, is this coming into the continuity of mindfulness. Mindfulness is established when it is moment to moment present in our experience. And this is a form of concentration, this establishment of mindfulness, this continuity of mindfulness.

It can express itself in different ways. Continuity of mindfulness might be happening as we stay with one experience, like the breath, and that produces one form of concentration, a kind of one-pointed concentration—maybe the kind of concentration we're more familiar with, this focused concentration. But a different form of concentration happens as the mindfulness becomes stable, as we are not pulled out of the present moment by reactivity, by thoughts, by slipping out because of inattentiveness or boredom. This is another form of concentration, in the Pāli called khaṇika samādhi, momentary or moment-to-moment concentration.

This continuity of mindfulness is essentially how concentration gets established. As we encourage that continuity, as we encourage the stability—either through the one-pointed concentration or through this moment-to-moment concentration—in the moment-to-moment concentration there's a stability of mindfulness, not necessarily a stability of objects, a stability of experience. We may be aware, continuously aware, moment to moment, of changing experience. Now a body sensation. Now a sound. Now a vibration. Now a thought. Now an emotion. Just moment after moment, knowing what's happening. In a way, it's the stability of mindfulness itself rather than the stability of an object.

This continuity supports concentration. It is also where mindfulness gets its power from. As mindfulness becomes more continuous, this is how we begin to really see very deeply into our experience, to understand our experience as impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable—not me, not mine, not who I am. We begin to understand the conditioned nature of our experience through this continuity of mindfulness. And so continuity of mindfulness is really important.

Many of my teachers have said this: we practice mindfulness from the moment we wake up until the moment we go to bed. This is our practice. And yet, as Greg said the other day, we're probably not going to be mindful from the moment we get up to the moment we go to bed. There will be gaps. What I'd like to really explore this evening are ways to support continuity.

So, a couple of shorter tools or reflections to start. One way to support continuity, or really engagement with our mindfulness practice, is understanding the value of practice. Sayadaw U Tejaniya says that if we understood, really, really understood the value of practice, we wouldn't stop practicing. Clearly you all understand the value of practice or you would not have signed up for this retreat. And yet sometimes we can forget. Sometimes, especially in a long retreat like this, it can start feeling almost like rote. It's like, okay, this is what we do. Our job is: I get up and I'm mindful while I get dressed and I'm mindful while I go to breakfast. We lose a sense of the connection or the juice with the value.

If we find ourselves taking the practice for granted, or feeling like we're getting up to go to work today, it can help to reflect a little bit on what benefits you've gained from the practice, to recognize how the practice has supported you. Also reflect and recognize that you can practice right now. We do not know how long we'll be able to practice. We actually don't know whether today's our last day here, today's our last day alive. So while we are alive and have energy—while we have our minds. We don't know whether, in our aging process, our minds will shift into dementia, losing the capacity to choose to practice. So right now, in this time, you have chosen to be here. You have this capacity. Using it, remembering that we won't always have this possibility—this is one way of remembering the value of practice.

Another exploration around continuity: when we talk about practicing in a continuous way, bringing mindfulness moment to moment, often that calls up the idea that what this is about is trying to do it. Bringing effort into the practice. Trying to be mindful. I remember many times sitting down thinking, "I am going to be mindful for this whole sitting," almost trying to muster the energy to be present for the entire forty-five minute sitting in that first second. This is perhaps a familiar way of applying effort in our daily lives and in other things.

But in our practice, we can really only be mindful for a moment or a few moments at a time. So exploring how we use our energy in this encouragement towards continuity, rather than that mode of sitting down and trying to pick up mindfulness for forty-five minutes—all that's necessary, actually, is to notice in this moment: right now, how hard is it for you to be mindful of the contact of your hands? How about the sound of my voice? The contact of your hips against the chair or cushion or bench. Usually it's not so difficult. When I name each of those things, it often just pops into awareness. You don't have to struggle and rouse the mind, saying, "Okay, go to the hips." It's just—oh, it's there.

And so that kind of noticing—for a moment, in this moment, what's most obvious? Maybe a breath, half a breath. For a moment, it's not difficult to be mindful. The investigation or exploration might be: enough effort or energy to be mindful in this moment.

Maybe let's explore this with the breath right now. Can you be mindful of an in-breath? That's it. That's all the energy you need—just an in-breath. And as the in-breath ends, how about enough energy to be with an out-breath? And enough energy to be with an in-breath. That's all. Just a light touch of mindfulness. In being with the breath, just enough energy for half a breath at a time. Can I be mindful for half a breath? Usually. And then do it again, and again, and again.

As we do that—just that light touch, just a gentle connection, light touch of mindfulness, moment after moment after moment—it creates a kind of momentum. It's like the ball of mindfulness begins to get rolling.

There's a game that some children play. You have a hoop and a stick. You rest the hoop on its side and tap it gently with the stick. The gentle taps get it rolling. If you tap it gently a couple of times, from one side or the other, you can get the momentum of that hoop going so that for a while—and you have to run next to the hoop, that's part of the game—as the hoop gets rolling, you run with it. Then after a little while, when the hoop gains momentum, you don't have to tap it anymore. You run with it, and when you see it start to get a little wobbly, you tap again. Tap that hoop again to keep the momentum going.

That's kind of how the light touch of mindfulness works. Just enough energy to connect with half a breath or connect with this moment of experience—this body sensation, this sound, this thought, this emotion. Just enough to connect with that, and then do it again. Gentle, that gentle tap, tap, tap, that gentle connecting.

At a certain point, when the momentum gets rolling—as with the hoop—if you keep tapping it when the momentum is going, it's going to get in the way of that momentum. So we begin to learn in our mindfulness how frequently we need to remind ourselves: oh, next breath. Maybe we can, just in a gentle way, connect with half a breath and discover that with ease we're with a breath or two.

So it's this beginning to recognize the experience of the momentum of mindfulness, like the momentum of that hoop. And then we might begin to even recognize that, like with the hoop getting a little wobbly, needing to tap again to keep it going, we might begin to recognize when the mindfulness gets a little wobbly. Oh, I need to remind myself—just a touch, this light touch of mindfulness moment after moment.

In the walking practice this can also be helpful. At one point, one of my teachers said he had done the walking practice. He said he couldn't do the walking practice by saying, "I'll start at the beginning and I'm going to be present for the whole 45 minutes of walking." Just like I said about my sitting—that was too much. He said, "So I set the intention to be mindful for one path." He was doing the back and forth walking, so about ten or twenty paces. "I set the intention to be mindful for that length and then to do it again when I went back."

And I played with that, and it was like, that was too long for me. That was too much picking up of "I'm going to be mindful till I get to the end." And so instead I started looking about two feet out and saying, "Can I be mindful till I get to that spot on the carpet?" A step and a half. Yep, made it. Okay, how about that spot? Oh, made it to that one too.

So just, if the mind is really restless or really sleepy, sometimes just picking off little bits—just enough, just enough effort to get to the next step or the next half a breath. Light touch of effort, moment after moment. This is a gentle persistence, a very gentle persistence. It is a persistence, but it's not a gripped kind of energy.

Given that continuity is really encouraging this becoming continuous with mindfulness, I think one of the main ways that I have explored this aspect of the practice is rather than using—well, I have used this kind of very light touch, I use that a lot actually—but quite often what I explore is just noticing the comings and goings of mindfulness.

Mindfulness, as we've been talking about, is a quality in the mind. It's like metta, it's like concentration. It's a quality in the mind that can be cultivated, that has conditions that support its cultivation. And one of those conditions that supports its cultivation is noticing when it's present, noticing when it's here. So being cognizant of the comings and goings of mindfulness.

We usually call this the mind that wanders, or the mind that gets lost. When the mind is getting lost, we don't usually think about it as mindfulness disappearing, but that's what's happening. And so we can turn this aspect of the wandering mind or the thinking mind on its head and instead reflect on exploring the coming and going of mindfulness itself.

The first place, probably the easiest place to begin to explore this, is when it comes. I've had people at times say, "Well, I can't see when mindfulness gets lost. It's either here or it's not. So the only thing I can see is when it comes back." And that's often true—that's one of the easiest places to begin to see the difference or the shift between non-mindfulness and mindfulness, when mindfulness returns.

But it is also possible to begin to get familiar, as I was speaking about with that hoop—the momentum of the hoop, seeing it get wobbly—we can also start to get a sense of this quality of mindfulness itself and begin to see it get wobbly. Begin to see the connection with experience get weak. And so we can start to see the mindfulness getting lost.

Now we'll start with looking at, exploring something about seeing it return. And we've all mentioned this—I think almost all, I've heard many of us mention this moment of mindfulness returning. It is a great moment, noticing it when it returns.

This noticing of mindfulness returning is another way that we can cultivate continuity of mindfulness. We usually think of cultivating continuity of mindfulness in the way I spoke about, with that gentle reminding, the gentle prompting every half breath, every few steps. And that works as long as we are mindful. The kind of mindfulness we explore in that case is called prompted mindfulness—when we are mindful, we remind ourselves in that gentle way.

This re-arising of mindfulness, when our mindfulness has been lost, that is called unprompted mindfulness.

Because it just happens. It's a great recognition, actually, if we are interested in the moment of mindfulness returning in and of itself, and not so hooked into an idea or a self-judgment. Often in that moment when mindfulness returns, we can have a kind of judgment: "I wasn't mindful." But that thought, in the moment, isn't actually true—because we are mindful right now.

If we can be really curious about that moment itself, about the mindfulness returning, we notice something remarkable: we didn't have anything to do with that moment. It was completely effortless. This is one of the great things we can begin to taste in that moment of mindfulness returning—what it means to be mindful without trying to be mindful. Because that's so often a place where we get caught up, in the churning and doing of mindfulness.

That moment when mindfulness returns is an effortless moment. We didn't have any say over it; it just happened. Conditions came together for that mindfulness to return. And this kind of mindfulness actually happens a lot. Especially on retreat, you have an opportunity to see it probably thousands of times a day. Thousands of times a day you get the opportunity to taste that effortless mindfulness and to be curious about it.

That moment is also really useful in terms of beginning to recognize what it is like to be mindful—what the quality of mindfulness itself is like. Because in the moment of mindfulness returning, if we're curious about it in and of itself, and not thinking about the fact that we weren't mindful a moment ago, but curious just about this—wow, mindfulness is back, what's that like?—there's an interesting contrast. Between what it feels like now, in this moment, for mindfulness to be back, and what it was like seconds before, or half a second before, when mindfulness was lost. We get a taste of the difference between mindfulness and non-mindfulness in that moment. We get a felt sense of what it's like to be mindful. This is really useful.

Because this moment actually happens a lot—way more than we think. As we develop a taste for it, as we attune to that quality of mindfulness returning, we recognize it. And as we begin to recognize what that moment is like, it essentially begins to point itself out to us when it happens. Often that moment of mindfulness resurfacing gets hooked into something like, "Oh, I wasn't mindful a minute ago," and we just get lost because we haven't actually taken in, "Oh, I'm mindful again." If we can take in that we're mindful, it begins to sensitize us, to tune us to the quality of that moment. We begin to notice that it happens more. The feeling or the flavor of it begins to point itself out to us, and we see more of those moments—more and more of those effortless moments of mindfulness all day long. What a celebration that is.

So in that moment when you remember, when mindfulness returns, simply recognize that you're aware now. That awareness has returned. I actually use awareness and mindfulness synonymously—I just like to let people know that because sometimes they seem like different words. But for me, I like the word awareness for mindfulness. It's actually more evocative for me of the quality of what it is like. There's more of an evocative sense to the word aware.

Notice that you've become aware. Then you might notice whatever's obvious in that moment—maybe not rushing back if you have a particular anchor that you're using, or a primary experience that you're gathering your attention around. Just take in what's here now.

The mind hasn't been present in the moments before, and often the mind has been off getting up to something—thinking about something, or just spacing out, whatever it's been doing. It's been doing something while you haven't been mindful. And often that has an effect on us in the present moment when we return. So noticing that quality: how is the mind now, in this moment, with the mind not having been present in the moments before? What is the effect, essentially, of what the mind had been doing while it wasn't mindful, on my present moment experience?

To my surprise, especially as my practice has continued over the years, quite often when mindfulness returns there's maybe even a little bit more settledness, more calm than was there before. So it's not always that the mind gets up to hindrances when it's not mindful. Sometimes the mind wanders into metta and we're not aware of it. Or it wanders into peace or calm and we're not aware of it.

In the waking up, yes, sometimes the mind will have gotten into an argument with a friend, and that will have an effect on our present moment too. Useful to notice that. And yet sometimes our mind will kind of find its way into more ease and peace. So it's really useful not to have an a priori idea about what might be there—just, "Ah, I'm back. What's here? What's here?"

I find that curiosity is, I think one of the other teachers also mentioned this, such a good tool in our toolbox. It's not always available, but it is a very powerful motivator of energy. When we're curious, there's a natural engagement with the present moment, a natural inclination to keep being present. Curiosity is a really great support for continuity.

Curiosity is also a really helpful tool when we're exploring the comings and goings of mindfulness—particularly the goings of mindfulness. Curiosity about how do we lose awareness? Where do we lose awareness? This curiosity is not intended to be an encouragement for judgment, but more a genuine wondering about what the mind is doing, what it's getting up to. Be curious about where the attention wants to go, and see if possibly mindfulness might be able to follow it.

So, exploring how do we lose awareness? Where do we lose awareness? I'm going to go through several ways that in my own experience I've seen the mind lose awareness. You may have your own ways. I tried to put them into general categories, but I don't think this list is all-encompassing.

One of the ways to explore where we lose awareness is just to be curious as we go through our day. Where are the rabbit holes of mindfulness in terms of activities? In what kind of activities or locations do we tend to lose awareness? We might tend to lose awareness when we go to our yogi jobs, or when we go into our room and close the door—it's like, "Finally, nobody's looking. I do not have to be mindful right now." We might be more inclined to lose awareness if we go on the loop. Just noticing if there are places. Or maybe going into the dining hall—that's often a rabbit hole of mindfulness, the dining hall. Curiosity about what happens.

The encouragement here, again, is to explore through curiosity. Going through the day, at the end of the day you could reflect, or begin to recognize over these days that you see some patterns. "Yes, in my yogi job I lose awareness. When I go into the dining hall for lunch, it's gone until I'm doing my dishes." You might begin to notice some of these patterns.

The encouragement here isn't about doubling down and trying to force the mind to stay mindful all the way through that dining room line, but rather to be curious about what happens there. Something's going on in the mind that causes you to lose mindfulness. It's not random. Something happens. So what is it that happens?

The encouragement is this: once you've seen some patterns, once you've seen, for instance, that the dining hall or taking a walk on the loop or going into your room are places where mindfulness gets lost—often as we're heading to those places we have some mindfulness. Here at noon there's mindfulness, and the bell rings. Curiosity about when is it that mindfulness gets lost. Maybe it actually carries all the way until you cross that door and then start looking at the board with the dedications. Where does it happen? When does mindfulness get lost?

When you have the understanding of, "Okay, it's likely mindfulness is going to get lost when I head to the dining room"—let's see what happens.

Our minds get into these kinds of stories, and the mindfulness gets lost.

So be curious about where the sticky parts are. What happens in there? Add some interest, some curiosity about this—not trying to say, "Can I be mindful all the way through lunch?" but rather, "Let's see if I can notice where I get lost."

If you're curious about that, you might begin to see, if you're tracking it—kind of like, "Okay, yep, mindful here. Mindful as I'm walking. Mindful as I'm standing in line. Mindful as I pick up my dish"—knowing, you can track where you are. And then you're eating. So somewhere between picking up your dish and eating, that's where it happens. The next day you can add a little more interest after you pick up your dish. Again, curiosity around this is really helpful.

I'm going to skip a couple of the ones I had on my list to get to some of the others, but I'll mention two of them briefly.

It's really common for us to lose mindfulness when there's uncomfortableness in the body—pain or discomfort. And so again, rather than trying to force yourself to be with the pain, be curious about what happens. What does the mind do?

I found at one point that my mind had a strategy of spacing out and daydreaming when pain was happening. When I noticed that, when I woke up in the daydreaming, I recognized that the pain wasn't bothering me. It wasn't that it was gone, but it wasn't bothering me while I had been daydreaming. I just hadn't been mindful. And so I got curious about the fact that the mind knew how to not be disturbed by the pain. It didn't have to be disturbed by the pain—it just didn't know how to do that mindfully.

What that began to instruct me in was how I might be able to just kind of set the pain aside. I didn't have to zero in on it and focus on it, which is what my mind had been doing. Sometimes we can learn from what our mind does around particular difficult experiences. I learned that my mind knew how to let go of a kind of magnetizing to pain, and it didn't have to be disturbed by it. So I could kind of ignore it in my mindfulness.

Pain is a big one. Looking at what happens there as the mind gets lost—most of us do have strategies for navigating pain, and a lot of them include non-mindfulness. But they don't have to include non-mindfulness. So curiosity about that: What happens there?

We also tend to lose awareness in very habitual states of mind. Jeannie gave the talk on the hindrances the other night. Those are five very habitual states of mind that we tend to lose mindfulness in. The exploration is really about whether we can bring the mindfulness into these states.

Often we recognize that we have been lost. We sometimes recognize that we've lost awareness when we're waking up. In that moment of remembering, we see essentially that we got lost—"Wow, I got lost in boredom," or "I got lost in this habit of anger," or "I got lost in this spacing out, this habit of spacing out." In the waking up, sometimes we can see that we are habitually waking up in some kind of familiar, old patterns.

Again, we may have some capacity to know when those patterns come up—"Oh, boredom's coming up." When we see that we tend to habitually get lost in boredom, we can add some interest there too. Add some interest, as Jeannie was talking about—being curious, being interested in the hindrances themselves, or any habitual pattern.

One of the main ways that mindfulness gets lost, and I think this is a pretty common way, is that we are paying attention to something in our experience—noticing the breath, for example, or doing walking meditation outside at night and noticing the cool air and the movement of the body. And then there's a sound. These past nights, as we've left in the evening, there's been a very cool owl sound. So maybe you're doing walking meditation and you hear that sound. Then you start thinking about the sound, then you start thinking about owls and what kind of owl it is, and the mindfulness is gone.

Much of the time that happens because we haven't actually noticed that the attention shifted from what our kind of plan was.

I'm going to be paying attention to the walking and the movement, and that's where my attention is, and oh, hearing, and oh, owls... and it's out.

We haven't noticed that the attention has shifted from what we had the intention to pay attention to. So this is a really helpful thing to begin to see—when the attention shifts from one experience to another, we can begin to get familiar with this attentional shift.

One place that this can be really fun to play with is in walking. Perhaps not in the formal walking such as Bhante described, but if you're taking a walk, you might explore noticing: seeing is happening, knowing seeing is happening, or hearing is happening. And then be curious about when the attention shifts. You could do a walking practice for a few moments, shifting between seeing and hearing, body moving through space, and feet touching the ground. This is one alternative walking practice, actually—seeing for a few paces, hearing for a few paces, body moving through space for a few paces, feet contacting the ground for a few paces. You can do that while taking a walk. It's a great kind of more everyday life or ordinary movement practice.

In the seeing and hearing, you could be curious, while the seeing is happening, about when the attention might shift between seeing—just kind of taking in the flow, like a movie camera moving through space—and when it shifts from seeing to looking. That will happen very naturally. Maybe a bird or a squirrel runs across the path. The movement catches the attention and we are looking at that. This is a shift of attention.

Likewise in hearing, we might be taking in ambient sound and suddenly a particular sound catches our attention. Noticing this shift between a more general awareness and a very pointed awareness—noticing that shift, we don't have to stop the looking, but we can begin to get familiar with that shift of attention.

As we get familiar with that, it can carry into our meditation practice, our sitting practice, our more formal practice. Sitting in the hall, paying attention to the breath, and then hearing the sound of a car drive down Pleasant Street. The attention shifts, and we may begin to be familiar with what it's like for that attention to shift. We're with the breath, with the breath, and then we feel the attention kind of let go of the breath and move to something else. If we can notice that, then we're just hearing. Hearing is happening. Hearing is happening. If we don't notice that, then we may be in that car driving down Pleasant Street, leaving IMS, going to Boston.

So noticing that attentional shift—this is a really useful exploration. Noticing this shift between seeing and looking, hearing and listening, can be a great place to get familiar with that quality, the quality of attention shifting.

And then there are certain states of mind where each of us may have a kind of habit of non-mindfulness. We have some in common, often. Spaciness is often a place where we're not mindful. Low energy sometimes is a place where we're not so mindful. Sleepiness or drowsiness, a daydreaming kind of state of mind—often not so mindful. So there are certain states that the mind can go into where awareness will habitually not be there.

But it is not an inherent part of that state of mind to be non-mindful. Thinking about something like spacing out—it almost seems by definition that spacing out would be non-mindful, as part of the very definition. We might think, "Well, I guess that meant I can't be mindful of that, so better try to be present with the breath again."

Well, at this point in my practice, if there's any state of mind where I think I can't be mindful of it, I don't believe that thought. It is possible to be mindful of any state of mind—except potentially non-mindfulness. But even that we can begin to recognize the quality of it as mindfulness returns. States of mind like spacing out or sleepiness or dullness or even falling asleep—it is possible to be mindful through the process of falling asleep into sleep. It's possible.

And so again, this exploration—for me, there began to be a curiosity about exploring these states that I thought I couldn't be mindful of. One of the best ways to begin seeing that or exploring that is in the moment when mindfulness returns. If you wake up into daydreaming, for a few moments you are aware of daydreaming. That gives you the flavor of what it's like to be mindful of daydreaming. If you're spacing out, when you come back into mindfulness, for a few moments there's this recognition—that's the mind spacing out. That is the mind being aware of that state of mind.

I've told this story quite a lot, but it's a useful example, so I'll tell it again. I was exploring this at one point. I was eating a meal and kept noticing the mind spacing out.

And at first I was exploring being mindful during eating. When I noticed that spacing out and came back into mindfulness, the intention was to pay attention to eating. Okay, I'm back. Be mindful. Lifting up the fork, putting it in my mouth, chewing, tasting. The mind would space out again. I'd come back and bring that mindfulness in, paying attention to all of that, and it would space out again.

At some point, I got curious about the spacing out. And this, again—it was curiosity that really fed this investigation. Having seen that it happened a number of times, I began to notice the mind letting go of eating breakfast, letting go of paying attention to taste and lifting and sensations. There was this feeling of mindfulness releasing its hold on the physicality of the sensations. But there was an awareness of that. So rather than bringing attention back to the physical sensations, there was more of a sense of, "Oh, okay, I'm aware—let's see what the mind is doing."

There was an ability to be aware of the mind as it kind of went and hovered up to the right-hand side of my head a little bit. It felt very restful. It felt very pleasant. It was disconnected from the field of physical sensation, but I was very aware. There was full awareness of the state of mind. And in that experience, there was this real sense of rest. The mind was tired. It wanted to rest, and I wasn't letting it rest. I kept dragging it back—be mindful of the breakfast. And my mind basically said, "Forget it. You are not doing this right. We are going to take a rest." And it took its rest.

When I let that happen with mindfulness, the mind rested. It was so restful for that time. It lasted about thirty seconds, and then that state was released and I was eating breakfast and present with the body sensations very easefully.

This connects to what I was saying earlier—that sometimes when the mind loses mindfulness, it's not necessarily getting up to hindrance; it may actually be helping you. This has been my experience. Sometimes when the mind wanders, it's trying to help us let go. If we can be curious in that moment, seeing that the mind's letting go of something rather than having the agenda of "Oh, come back," if I'm aware in that letting go and able to be present for it, sometimes the mind is wandering into a new space.

I mostly want to encourage curiosity about exploring this. Curiosity is a support for continuity, rather than doubling down when we notice places where mindfulness gets lost. I certainly was trying to double down when I kept dragging my attention back to eating breakfast. That wasn't so helpful. But it was helpful to start to see the mind and think, "Let's be curious about this. Where's the mind going? Oh, it's resting. Resting feels very good."

In this curiosity around seeing the coming and going of mindfulness, there's so much to learn. We learn a lot about our conditioned habits and patterns of mind, because often where our minds wander is around those conditioned habits and patterns. We also learn about our beliefs about meditation and mindfulness—what we think we can be mindful of, and what we think we can't be mindful of. Sometimes we might have this idea that we can't be mindful of something. If I ever have the thought "I can't be mindful of this," I just say, "Really? If you're even thinking that thought, you already are mindful of it. You're aware enough of it to name it in that moment."

So, curiosity. We also start to see something about the uncontrollability of our mind through looking at this coming and going of mindfulness.

Being mindful—that's kind of the main yogi job. That's our intention. We sit down thinking, "I'm going to be mindful." And how long does it last? A couple breaths, maybe a few minutes, then the mind wanders.

Who did that? Who decided to make the mind wander? You probably didn't decide to make the mind wander. Sometimes we do—sometimes we kind of check out intentionally. But mostly it happens just because conditions come along. It's not self that the mind wanders.

And then that moment of mindfulness returning—who did that one? You weren't in charge of that one either.

So this exploring the comings and goings of mindfulness—every day this truth of not-self is staring us in the face, very obviously. And we usually kind of miss it, because we think we're supposed to be in control of the mindfulness.

If we're curious about the comings and goings of mindfulness, as opposed to judging ourselves about non-continuity, we can get this awe of the mind—this mysterious mind.

So let's just sit for a couple of minutes.

CHAPTER 62

Exploring Vedanā (Feeling Tone)

Andrea Fella · 1h03

In this three-month retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of vedanā (feeling tone), one of the four foundations of mindfulness as taught in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). She illuminates how the simple quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither-pleasant-nor-unpleasant accompanies every moment of experience, and how our habitual belief that obtaining pleasant experiences and eliminating unpleasant ones will bring happiness creates the conditions for craving and suffering.

Fella draws on the Buddha's teaching of the two darts—how an awakened practitioner feels only the bodily feeling of pain, while an uninstructed person adds mental suffering through reactivity, creating a feedback loop of escalating distress. She shares compelling research demonstrating that even physical pain perception is shaped by mental expectations, and offers personal examples of how careful investigation revealed that apparent unpleasantness in sounds or situations actually originated in subtle fear, thoughts, or beliefs rather than the sensory contact itself.

The talk also distinguishes between worldly (sāmisa) and unworldly (nirāmisa) feeling tones—the ordinary pleasures of sense contact versus the spiritual joy arising from presence, concentration, ethical conduct, and insight. This distinction proved pivotal in the Buddha's own awakening when he recognized that the pleasure of concentration could serve the path. Throughout, the instruction remains beautifully simple: just recognize what kind of feeling is present, without judgment, allowing this clear comprehension to gradually weaken the reactive patterns that bind us to suffering.

This evening I'd like to explore a little bit more around the topic of feeling tone that Greg and Jaya spoke to the last couple of days.

It is such an important area of our practice, of our awareness—this exploration of the quality of whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. So important that the Buddha put it into its own foundation in terms of the four foundations of mindfulness, really highlighting its importance in our understanding. It comes up a lot in the teachings, being aware of and understanding the nature of feeling tone.

Part of the reason for that is because when we are motivated by our habitual tendencies, when our belief structure is oriented around believing that when we get things that are pleasant, we'll be happy, and when we get rid of things that are unpleasant, we'll be happy—this is a fundamental, very human belief structure. When we are oriented in that way, we act. Basically what happens is that the craving that Jaya spoke about last night arises in dependence on feeling tone. When something is pleasant and this belief structure is in place—that getting something pleasant will make me happy—craving arises. When something is unpleasant and this belief structure is in place, then craving arises that leads us towards aversion.

This mechanism of how our suffering begins, how our suffering arises with this underlying belief structure around having pleasant things making me happy and getting rid of unpleasant things making me happy, is a fundamental delusion that we tend to share as human beings. That ignorance, that delusion, is often an unseen motivating force that leads pleasant on to liking, to wanting, to greed; and leads unpleasant on to not liking, to not wanting, to wanting to get rid of, to aversion.

Beginning to explore the feeling tone itself helps us to see this pattern of how the mind moves in this direction and also begins to help us see something about that underlying belief system.

I'm going to read what Greg read the other day, the beginning of the section on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta:

And how does one abide contemplating feelings as feelings? Here, when feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel a pleasant feeling." When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel an unpleasant feeling." When feeling a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling."

It's so simple. It sounds simple. It's actually not that simple. But the encouragement here is not, "Oh, something pleasant is happening, hold on to it," or "Something unpleasant is happening, push it away or figure out how to get rid of it." Rather, it's just this very simple, non-judgmental awareness. This is what we've been practicing with—this simple receptive awareness: this is what's happening in this moment. The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta as a whole has this flavor of just noticing, this is what's happening right now. And so it is with the feeling tone.

Feeling tone can be kind of subtle sometimes. Sometimes it's more obvious. If we fall down and bruise our knee, the unpleasantness of that can be kind of obvious. But we may not be so oriented towards the simple unpleasantness of it. We're probably more interested in telling stories about this, in figuring out what we need to do about it, rather than just recognizing, "Oh, this is unpleasant."

Not to say that figuring out what we need to do when we've fallen down and bruised our knee is not useful and necessary. But we often skip over the actual experience of the unpleasantness and start reacting to it. Again, because of this underlying belief structure: this unpleasant thing is a problem, this unpleasant thing is something I need to get rid of—how am I going to do that?

In terms of beginning to understand this pattern, this underlying belief structure and that movement from feeling to craving, craving, as Jaya pointed to last night, is already suffering. Often we don't quite notice that in the moment, but already as soon as craving springs up, as soon as that wanting something arises—we want something that's not here, we want to get rid of something that is here—there's some imbalance. We are not simply recognizing the unpleasantness or the pleasantness of the experience. Beginning to get familiar with feeling tone can help us to see these patterns and see how the habitual movement of our minds leads us from feeling to craving.

As Greg mentioned the other day, feeling is arising with every single sense contact—every single sight, sound, smell, taste, touch sensation. Everything arising in our mind has a feeling tone. It's a basic aspect of human experience, and it's conditioned. The texts tell us that dependent on the eye and sight, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact. And then there's feeling. Feeling and perception arise.

With contact as condition, there is feeling. With every sense base, when there's contact with that sense base—that sensitivity that Greg pointed to—when there's contact with that sensitivity, feeling is there.

And yet so often we don't notice it. We don't see the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral aspect of experience because our habit is to try to arrange the world around the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. We're more in our minds reflecting on or thinking about the world. We've kind of taken birth in the world of what it's going to be like either when I get that thing or when I get rid of that thing, rather than really being aware of what this experience is. What is this experience of pleasant or unpleasant?

And so we tend to habitually and automatically react to feeling because of this underlying belief structure. But we don't really notice it. This feeling tone, as I said, tends to be where the reactivity is born when we have this ignorance or this delusion underlying our minds. And we all have this. It's not some unique thing to you if you find that you tend to shift from pleasant to greed, from unpleasant to aversion. It's very human.

This morning I was speaking about intention and how those intentions are connected with motivation. These responses to feeling—whether we like it and want more of it, or don't like it and want to get rid of it—that's very commonplace. That's where often our motivations arise from: not clearly seeing the feeling tone, instead being motivated by this underlying view or belief, this need to get or need to get rid of.

The Buddha pointed out that this habitual movement, the habitual way that we tend to respond to feeling tone, is not necessary. It's optional. He described this in a sutta, where at the beginning of the text he said that ordinary people—the translation here is "the uninstructed worldling"—the uninstructed worldling feels things that are pleasant, feels things that are unpleasant, and feels things that are neutral. And then he says, "And so too does an instructed noble disciple." Someone who is fully awakened will experience things that are pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral.

So right there, that pops the bubble—the belief that if we get fully awakened everything will be pleasant. He says right here that people who are awakened will experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience.

But then he goes on to ask: what's the difference? And basically, what he describes is that for an uninstructed worldling, for an ordinary person, when a pleasant feeling arises, they want more of it. They gravitate to it. Desire springs up for it. Craving arises. When an unpleasant experience arises, aversion springs up in relationship to it.

He gives an analogy for unpleasant feeling. He says, "When an uninstructed worldling is contacted by a painful feeling, they sorrow, grieve, and lament. They weep, beating their breast, and become distraught. They feel two feelings, a bodily one and a mental one. Suppose one were to strike a person with a dart and then strike them immediately afterwards with a second dart. That person would feel a feeling caused by two darts. So too, when the uninstructed worldling is contacted by a painful feeling, they feel two feelings, a bodily feeling and a mental one."

This is what happens to us a lot, especially around painful feeling. Unpleasant sensation arises and aversion arises. We don't like it. We sorrow, grieve, lament, weep, beating our breast, and become distraught. And it says here that we feel two feelings, a bodily one and a mental one. But my experience is that it's not just like they're added together. It's more like it's multiplied, because of this feedback loop. Like when you take a microphone and put it up to a speaker and the volume just goes crazy. It gets really loud because of that feedback loop. It's kind of like that with unpleasant feeling.

When we experience an unpleasant feeling and there's aversion, then our experience of the unpleasant feeling gets more painful, which creates more aversion, which makes us feel more pain, which makes us feel more aversion. It's just feedback—a feedback loop. That's a very common pattern. When we're not able to be mindful of either the unpleasant feeling or the aversion, that kind of cycle will tend to happen.

And the Buddha goes on to describe what happens when an instructed noble disciple is contacted by a painful feeling.

They do not sorrow, grieve, or lament. They do not weep, beating their breast, and become distraught. They feel one feeling—a bodily feeling, not a mental one. Suppose one were to strike a person with a dart, but not strike them immediately afterwards with a second dart. That person would feel a feeling caused by one dart only. So too, when the instructed noble disciple is contacted by a painful feeling, they feel one feeling—a bodily one, not a mental one.

This really points to the possibility, through instruction, through training, through practice, through the work that we are doing, of transforming our relationship to feeling. Basically, it's touching into that underlying belief structure. Through witnessing feelings, seeing the reaction to feelings, seeing how this plays out over and over again, we begin to understand that the movement towards pleasant, the movement away from unpleasant—the greed, the aversion—are not very useful.

Greed has its delusion embedded in it. When we are caught in the mind state of greed, there's a delusion embedded there. The greed itself is the wanting of something pleasant. But the delusion embedded in greed is the belief that having that thing will make me happy. Having that pleasant thing will make me happy. And when we're caught in the mind state of greed, we are buying that belief. We are caught by that delusion. The mind tends to orient towards greed in relationship to pleasant things.

Similarly with aversion, there's a delusion embedded in it that says getting rid of that unpleasant experience will make me happy. When that belief system is in place, feeling becomes like a springboard—we leap right from feeling into craving.

But as we begin to explore feeling, begin to get curious about the experience itself, start seeing how this process unfolds, that belief structure begins to weaken. And we can in that moment simply be with what's happening: "Oh, this is feeling. This is the feeling that's arising." Sometimes the clear mindfulness of it can short-circuit our habitual movement into craving. We get a taste of the possibility that it's not necessary to follow through on that belief.

This leaping from feeling into craving is a very human, natural kind of movement. It's almost organic. Even single-celled organisms move towards food, away from noxious chemicals in the environment. It's a very natural movement. And yet this movement towards pleasant, away from unpleasant, and the mind states motivating it—the mind states of greed and aversion—are really where the suffering is. In the craving. That's where the suffering is.

The suffering isn't in the pleasant or unpleasant itself, or in responding to pleasant or unpleasant based on compassion, kindness, or wisdom. Because we can, in seeing pleasant experience, understand a skillful response. This isn't about sitting here being a lump on a log. But it is about noticing the habitual response of greed and aversion, and recognizing the suffering found there.

Feeling tone is experienced around both bodily feeling and mental feeling. All physical contacts have a feeling tone and all mental contacts have a feeling tone. Both kinds of feeling tone—those connected with physical experiences and sense impressions, and those connected with the mind—are all mind-created.

This can be a little hard to understand in the realm of physical sense experience. It seems as though certain kinds of contact would be inherently unpleasant or pleasant. It feels like it's physically unpleasant or physically pleasant, so it may be difficult to grasp this point.

But I will say that I read a recent report of a study that corroborates this—that feeling tone, even physical feeling tone like physical unpleasant sensation, is a mental experience. I'll read pieces of this article:

"Pain isn't always a pain. Sometimes it can actually feel good. People experienced pleasure during a painful stimulus if the stimulus turned out to be less bad than they were expecting. The researcher said, 'It's not hard to understand that pain can be interpreted as less severe when an individual is aware that it could have been more painful. Less expected was the discovery that pain may be experienced as pleasant if something worse has been avoided.'

To see how people perceived pain, researchers hooked participants up to a device that applied variable levels of painful heat to their arms. At the same time, researchers measured their brain activity using magnetic resonance imaging scans. In the first scenario, participants either experienced a series of slightly or moderately painful stimuli—about as painful as grasping a slightly too hot cup of coffee—or no pain."

In this scenario, participants rated that painful experience of the warm contact as unpleasant. They described the experience as unpleasant. In the second scenario, the participants experienced either a series of that moderate pain or a more intense pain. On a screen, they were warned which kind of pain was coming. The moderate pain was the same as the moderate pain in the first experience that they had rated as unpleasant, yet participants rated the moderate pain as pleasurable in the second scenario, when the alternative was the intense pain.

During the moderate stimulus in the second setup, participants' brain activity also showed less activation in the pain region of the brain and more activation in the region associated with pain relief and pleasure. So it wasn't only their report—the brain actually felt it as pleasurable. The researcher said the likely explanation is that the subjects were prepared for the worst and thus felt relieved when they realized the pain was not going to be as bad as they had feared.

Mental conditions and expectations can condition how pain is felt, how that stimulus is experienced, whether as painful or pleasant. The same measurable level of heat, the same level of "pain" applied to the arm, yet a completely different experience. The feeling tone, as Greg pointed out the other day, is not in the object. It's in our experience. It's created by our mind and is often created based on expectations, views, ideas, and beliefs. It's not as simple as saying that thing is always pleasant or that thing is always unpleasant.

Getting familiar with feeling tones is really helpful in terms of exploring this process of the mind that reacts to feeling tone. We need to become familiar with the feeling tone itself, because we so quickly react to it. Exploring it in sitting, in walking, in our daily activities—we can begin to recognize that certain sensations are unpleasant. We may simply notice something as an itch, for instance, but not really notice the quality of the itch, the unpleasantness of it, and what happens to that unpleasantness.

When I've really explored what an itch is, it has a kind of zing quality to it. It's like one tiny spot on the skin that zings and then stops, then zings again and stops. The unpleasantness of it feels unpleasant in that moment, but the unpleasantness comes and goes.

Likewise with pain—often there's a shifting landscape, different sensations arising and passing. We create a whole block around it, looking at it as one solid thing. But if we start to be curious about what's actually unpleasant here, we sometimes find that certain sensations of pain, even in our sitting, aren't quite what we assumed. Maybe there's a little twinge in the knee, and this is where we can learn from that pattern of reactivity. If we notice the unpleasantness, maybe we discover that it's not so unpleasant right now, in this moment. But what our mind has done is pick up the rest of the sitting and project the entire sitting where that pain is getting steadily worse. That's what we're reacting to.

Being curious about what the sensation actually is and what its pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality might be—this is the practice. We can notice pleasantness in our sitting too, perhaps the physical pleasantness of the breathing. The feeling tone is most easily seen at first in the physical realm, in the physical sense realm. Our skin in particular, our touch sense, seems very attuned to this quality of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. It's a really easy place to begin exploring, to really recognize it.

Playing with this in our daily activities, in our yogi jobs, in eating—just seeing that there's a steady stream of experience, and every single experience has pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral qualities to it. We can begin to be curious about that flow. Washing dishes, for instance. Maybe we have the idea of it as an unpleasant thing, but as you're standing in line, noticing: what's unpleasant here? Is the actual standing unpleasant? Maybe there's a little ache in the back that's unpleasant. Okay, so that's unpleasant. Then you get up to the place where you're actually washing the dishes and you put your hands in the water—maybe it's a fresh thing of water and the experience is actually pleasant. Just seeing how this flows: pleasant, unpleasant, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral.

If we see that flow clearly, then we may not immediately leap to the reactivity.

And in this exploration, it's really helpful—and somewhat interesting, I think—to begin to notice what our habitual responses to feeling tone are. We may have somewhat different responses at different times. Different people, for instance, may have more habitual relationships to pleasant and unpleasant. For me, when I experience something unpleasant, I would get stuck to that unpleasant thing, trying to push it away. It would be like I was glued to that unpleasant thing, trying to figure out: How do I get rid of this? What do I need to change? What do I have to do? What do I have to figure out here? So there would be a stuckness to the unpleasant thing. The aversion was experienced as being stuck to that unpleasant thing.

A friend of mine said, "Gee, when I experience something unpleasant, immediately my mind goes, 'Oh, let me find something pleasant.'" It just unsticks from the unpleasant and goes to greed immediately. It starts searching for something pleasant. That's a different strategy: ignore the unpleasant, find something pleasant. Just don't look at that elephant in the room. And so we can begin to see what our habitual strategies are for being with feeling tone.

And then there's the feeling associated with mental experience. This sometimes can be more subtle, although certain kinds of feeling associated with mind states—for instance, happiness—we tend to recognize as a pleasant experience. Anger, often unpleasant. Fear, often unpleasant. Calm and ease, maybe pleasant, maybe somewhat neutral even. There's a little less of an obvious feeling tone with ease.

So everything in our mind, all arisings in our mind, have a feeling tone. It can be interesting also to explore—both in physical feeling and in mental feeling—how feeling tends to change over the experience of it. Sometimes this can be surprising. At one point I began to notice, I was curious about the feeling tone connected with anger on one retreat. I was experiencing a tremendous amount of anger, and so I got very familiar with it, pretty much noticing the unpleasantness of it. But then at one point I began really seeing just the very beginning, just the very beginnings of the arising of anger. And to my surprise, it was really pleasant. It was just this beginning—a sense of warmth and fullness and power. It was a sense of aliveness. That quickly flipped into pressure and heat and unpleasant. But it was so interesting to see how the feeling tone at the beginning—my mind was kind of recognizing, "Wow, that may be some of the hook to anger." It's that initial feeling of aliveness and power that quickly flips.

So we can start to see this. Not only do emotions have feeling tone, but thoughts can have a feeling tone as well. Often thoughts may have a feeling tone based on an emotion that they're connected with. So for instance, a thought like "that person doesn't like me"—the thought itself might just be a neutral thing. There were certain points in my meditation where I saw certain thoughts that were habitually experienced as unpleasant. At one point I came on retreat right after the Twin Towers attacks, and on retreat there were a lot of images from that experience, that situation, coming up in my meditation. Typically the experience was unpleasant. And yet at a certain point, the mind, in seeing some of those images, just saw them as images. That felt a little odd because there was no feeling tone—it was just neutral, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. It felt a little odd to have that content not be landing in a way.

But then in a few more moments there was the recognition of the meaning of those images. And the emotional response was not that of aversion but really of compassion. So the image itself still didn't have a flavor of pleasant or unpleasant, but the meaning of the image was touching the heart with the recognition of suffering and compassion. And so thoughts may be kind of neutral themselves, but then they quickly bring in emotional tones, beliefs, and views that have feelings. So the thought that somebody doesn't like me—we might have a feeling of rejection that feels unpleasant.

And this points to something really important about feeling tone: beliefs, views, and thoughts are a primary shaper of feeling tone.

What we believe, what we think about—that shapes how we receive experiences as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

In fact, the commentaries to the Abhidhamma have a teaching around feeling tone that I don't know if I believe actually, but I found it really interesting to hold as a question. The Abhidhamma commentary says that in terms of our physical senses, the touch sense of our skin can be pleasant or unpleasant, that it's just very attuned to that pleasant-unpleasant quality. But our other four physical senses—seeing, smelling, hearing, and tasting—the commentary says that the initial contact is neutral, that any pleasant or unpleasant experience we have in those other four physical senses is a result of something going on in our minds. Some view, some belief.

We might be able to touch into this around seeing. We go outside perhaps and see a beautiful flower. I was appreciating these flowers—they're beautiful, and the sense of them is pleasant. The beauty and the pleasure of that. But what's happening really at the first contact is that there's just color and form in the eye. Very occasionally in my meditation, I've looked out of a window or something and there have been no objects. It's just been color and form. It's neutral. Color and form is neutral. It's when they become objects, when we see them as things that we have associations with. I have associations with flowers as beautiful—some flowers as beautiful. There's a flower that sometimes appears in meditation halls that has a very strong scent, and it's very hard for me to be near. I see that flower and it's not so pleasant because of that association.

So curiosity around exploring this has been a big part of my own practice. When there is something in the physical realm that I'm taking to be unpleasant or pleasant, I get kind of curious about it. Where is the pleasantness actually? Where is the unpleasantness?

One night I was having difficulty sleeping. Often when I'm having difficulty sleeping, I'll just meditate. So that evening I got up to sit in the middle of the night and was sitting there, just being aware of my experience. There was this quiet little tapping, kind of scratching sound that came and went. When I noticed, heard that tapping or scratching sound, my experience was: I don't like that. Unpleasant. That tapping sound is unpleasant. For a while I just worked at it, looked at it that way—unpleasant sound is happening.

Continuing to explore it, as I looked at the experience, when that tapping sound happened I noticed there was tension in the body. The tension is not the tapping sound. The tension is unpleasant too. At that point there was still the sense of the tapping being unpleasant, the tension being unpleasant.

Then at some point in hearing the tapping sound—this went on probably thirty, forty minutes, coming and going—there was just a quick rush of fear through the body. That was startling. I hadn't seen that actually before. I hadn't seen that there was just this subtle flush of fear through the body. The fear was clearly unpleasant. As I began to notice the fear with clarity, the next time the tapping sound happened, I realized that the tapping sound itself was neutral. The experience of the fear had kind of imputed or put its unpleasantness into the sound.

This kind of thing happens a lot in our experience. It's very similar to how the expectation of something being more unpleasant creates conditions for it to be experienced as unpleasant. The state of our mind will affect the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality.

So curiosity about when you're experiencing a reactivity—if there's a persistent reactivity, a persistent aversion—it can be really useful to explore what is actually unpleasant here. What is the mind actually reacting to? What is it responding to?

Most of our reactivity actually comes off of mental thoughts, beliefs, views—a mental unpleasantness, rather than a physical unpleasantness. Now, in terms of the touch sense, that's not necessarily as much the case. Again, you fall down, you hurt your knee, you cut yourself with a knife—there is physical unpleasant sensation there. But a lot of what we react to is, "Oh, what am I going to do? I've cut myself with a knife." So begin to be curious about it. If you're experiencing a reactivity, in particular Carol Wilson gave the instruction: if you're experiencing aversion, there's some unpleasant experience you didn't notice. So what is it? What was that unpleasant experience? What is the experience? What is the unpleasantness there? Sometimes it can be surprising. If you're hearing somebody rustle in the hall and you're experiencing that as unpleasant, it's probably not the sound itself that's actually unpleasant. It's more likely to be an idea about somebody disturbing my practice. So that curiosity—what actually is happening here?

At one point, after I'd heard Carol give this instruction about if you're noticing a reactivity there's something unpleasant that you've missed, I was doing some walking meditation in the upper walking room here and it was pretty full, pretty crowded. I tended to notice a lot of unpleasant and a lot of aversion in walking meditation in general, so this was not an uncommon experience for me. As I was doing the walking meditation and kind of feeling like I've got a pretty narrow lane here, but pretty okay with this, somebody else came into the room and started walking next to me. I got even more squished. And boy, the aversion went through the roof.

Remembering Carol's instruction, I got curious. Okay, what is unpleasant here? I cycled through the senses. It was pretty clear—okay, there's no physical contact, it's not physical unpleasant. Check, that one's not the one. They weren't making sound, it wasn't unpleasant sound. There was no unpleasant smell. Taste was not an issue. So I went through all the physical senses and realized, okay, it's not in the physical realm. There must be something going on in the mind.

I didn't see anything in particular that was unpleasant in the mind that I was averse to. I just felt averse there. So I was just walking back and forth, keeping my mind attuned to what's going on in the mind. And then I saw a thought. The thought was, "They're weird." I was kind of like, "Huh, well there's a thought." I still didn't quite get it—I didn't quite see the connection between that thought and the aversion yet. And then on the next pass through, there was this explosion of a thought: "They've got bare feet and it's freezing cold out." That was my mind's justification for "they're weird"—that they were in bare feet and it was cold out. Cold to me. My experience was cold.

In that moment of recognition, seeing that explosive thought helped me to see that there was reaction to the thought "he's weird." There was fear about "he's weird." And the fear was what was unpleasant. That whole complex of reaction was based in "they've got bare feet." The mind just saw it was ludicrous. There was not really a basis for the reactivity once it was seen.

Once it was seen, then the next pass in walking meditation, it was just this well-wishing: May you be happy. I didn't try to do that. It's just what happened. And so this exploration around feeling tone can help us to see how this whole complex of reactivity unfolds.

The second part of this sutta talks about a different aspect of feeling tone. It uses a kind of funny word for us. It talks about worldly pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral, and unworldly pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. It says: when feeling a worldly pleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel a worldly pleasant feeling," and so forth. When feeling an unworldly pleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel an unworldly pleasant experience."

So what is this worldly and unworldly? The word being translated as worldly is sāmisa, which basically means something like "connected to the flesh." This refers to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience connected to our sense realm. The unworldly—sometimes the worldly, the sāmisa, is translated as "of the flesh" or "carnal," sometimes as "not connected to the path," or it's pointed to by some translators as our ordinary kind of pleasure. The unworldly kind of pleasure, nirāmisa, is often translated as "spiritual pleasure" or "connected to the path." These are feeling tones that come about as we practice, that tend to be connected to the path of practice.

The Buddha is pointing to the usefulness of understanding the difference between feeling tones that are ordinary, related to sense experience, and feeling tones that are related to practice. This was a major understanding in his own practice. At one point early in the night when he sat down under the rose apple tree, he remembered back to states of concentration that had spontaneously arisen when he was a child. He had been practicing a lot of ascetic practices at that time, basically believing that unpleasant experience would support the mind to let go of the body in some way. And that night he remembered those states of pleasurable concentration and is said to have thought, "Why am I afraid of that pleasure which is not connected with this movement towards grasping? Why am I afraid of that pleasure that's connected with concentration?" Then he is said to have asked the question: "I wonder if this kind of pleasure, this kind of happiness—maybe that's part of the path." And in that reflection, he is said to have realized, "Yes, this is part of the path. This kind of happiness and pleasure is part of the practice."

That completely shifted how he practiced. He began being curious about this distinction between these different kinds of feeling tone. This was an important understanding in his own practice, and I think that's why he includes it here—this understanding of the difference between these two.

The ordinary pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings are connected with sense impressions, connected with bodily sensation, with ordinary sense contact. This includes thoughts that relate to sense contact. The taste of a meal may have pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral sensations to it. The thought of the taste of a meal may have pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral sensations to it. That is also the same kind of worldly pleasure.

Now again, he's pointing to a distinction here—the kind of pleasure that is worth moving towards, or the kind of feeling tones that help us recognize: Am I headed in the direction of the path? Or am I getting caught in more ordinary kinds of pleasure? And yet the instructions are still very simple. They are: just notice. Is the pleasure worldly pleasure? Worldly pain? Worldly unpleasant? Is it unworldly pleasure? Unworldly pain? Just noticing that distinction.

This unworldly pleasure really is the pleasure associated with the path of practice: states of concentration, insight, the happiness of giving, the pleasure that comes with knowing you're engaged in ethical conduct. There's delight and joy that arises as you realize the heart is aligned with ethical conduct. There's the pleasure of being present. This one can be kind of interesting—it can be so similar sometimes that we might confuse it or mistake it for the pleasure of sense pleasure. As the mind gets more present and aware, we can go outside and it's like everything is sparkly sometimes. Really beautiful. A very pleasant experience. We might think that's the worldly pleasant, the pleasure of the senses.

But I think it's more connected to the pleasure of being present. Because in that state we can look down at an oil stain on the driveway and be like, "Wow, that's amazing." There's a difference—that pleasure of being present and available for what's arising.

And then there's the pleasure that comes with concentration and the pleasure that comes with insight. We can be noticing aversion, being with physical unpleasant experience, and having a kind of delight in the seeing of it. Have you noticed that? Sometimes we can see that. It's kind of interesting to have this experience of both "Wow, there's aversion happening" and yet "Wow, it's so cool to see it." There's a space around it. There's a sense of delight in the engagement, in the practice.

This is the kind of pleasure that comes with the path of practice, which the Buddha said is not the kind of pleasure we need to be afraid of. We don't need to be afraid of any pleasure as long as we're mindful of it, actually.

One thing to point to quickly, because I've been emphasizing the unworldly pleasure—and there's a lot of that which does happen for us as the mind settles, as there's connection with experience, as concentration develops, the mind can move into many states of happiness, of ease and bliss. And yet, unworldly feelings are not always only pleasant.

There's one text that describes in particular what happens around seeing the impermanent nature of experience—how that, depending on what's happening, depending on how the mind is meeting it, can unfold differently. It's interesting. When recognizing the impermanence, change, and fading away of sense experience, one sees as it actually is with proper wisdom that sense impressions, formerly and now, are all impermanent—joy arises. That's pleasantness arising with the recognition of impermanence. Sometimes we can have that, the sense of seeing the arising and passing of experience, and it's very joyful.

Other times, when recognizing the impermanence, change, and fading away of sense experience, one actually sees as it actually is with proper wisdom that sense impressions, formerly and now, are all impermanent—one generates a longing for supreme liberation. There's a kind of disenchantment with sense impressions, and this experience can be felt as unpleasant.

And when recognizing the impermanence, change, and fading away of sense experience, one sees as it actually is with proper wisdom that sense impressions, formerly and now, are all impermanent—equanimity arises. Equanimity does have a kind of neutral feeling tone.

So this is pointing to the qualities of unworldly pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience. And through all of this, the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta suggests simply to recognize what kind of feeling is happening. Simple. When it's a worldly pleasant feeling, we know it's a worldly pleasant feeling. No judgment around it in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. And in fact, elsewhere in the texts it clearly says that clearly comprehending feeling of any kind, worldly or unworldly, is liberative. It leads us to being able to understand and let go of the ways our mind clings.

The simplicity of this practice of noticing the feeling tone and seeing all of the ways that the mind creates reactions, responses to the feeling tone—this is such a crucial process to see. The key in terms of helping us understand how suffering comes to be is this: what we see is that the response to feeling tone is created by our own minds. It's optional. It is a construct of our own minds that we react. It's motivated by that underlying belief.

But when we begin to see through that underlying belief—that having to get pleasant and needing to get rid of unpleasant is the way to go—we see that that's just delusion. We see that the whole of our suffering has been constructed. The mental reactivity has been constructed by our minds. The mind starts to let go of it, letting go of that movement from feeling to craving. The craving releases.

And then we are in a position to respond with wisdom, with compassion, with love, with generosity to what's happening. Not be in a reactive mode, but a responsive mode.

So let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 63

Untangling the Tangle

Andrea Fella · 53 min

In this profound dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella explores the Buddha's core teaching that suffering (dukkha) is not something done to us by external conditions, but arises from our relationship to experience through greed, aversion, and delusion. Drawing from the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11), she examines how the Four Noble Truths invite us to understand suffering rather than simply endure it.

Fella offers a beautiful framework for understanding suffering as a "tangle" where our wholesome wishes for safety, happiness, and well-being become knotted with the truths of impermanence, unreliability, and uncontrollability. She emphasizes that these threads of love and wisdom are not inherently in conflict—they only appear so when viewed through the lens of craving and confusion. The craving for particular outcomes around our wishes creates the knot, not the wishes themselves.

The talk provides practical guidance for working with this tangle through meditation. Rather than approaching suffering with analytical aggression or spiritual bypassing, Fella suggests "honoring" our suffering with a gentle, patient presence—like rubbing a cloth softly rather than taking an ice pick to experience. She shares a moving personal story of investigating depression during retreat in Burma, discovering that what appeared to be exclusion-related pain was actually suppressed mettā waiting to be released. This teaching invites practitioners to trust that suffering, when held with mindfulness and compassion, reveals the very love and wisdom that compose it.

The Buddha said famously at one point, "What I teach is just suffering and the end of suffering." Probably more than one of us has said this already. And so pretty much all of what he taught was collected around the theme of suffering and the end of suffering.

One of the pointings that the Buddha offered us around suffering comes in his first discourse—what is said to have been his first discourse—the discourse setting the wheel of the Dhamma in motion. In that discourse he described the Eightfold Path and the Four Noble Truths. And with each truth he offered an action, something we need to undertake with respect to that truth. The truth of suffering, he said, should be understood.

This may sound like a simple thing, just to understand suffering, but what he's pointing to, the kind of understanding he came to around suffering, is so radically different than what we habitually or more commonly think of as suffering. When he points us to understand suffering, he's actually pointing to a radically different perspective.

Our usual perspective around suffering often is that it's something that happens to us. We feel kind of like leaves in the wind, just being buffeted around by conditions. Stuff out there makes us suffer, makes us angry, makes us frustrated. And in order to be happy, stuff out there has to change. That's our more habitual way of relating to suffering.

The Buddha pointed to something different. What we call suffering isn't something that's done to us, but lies in our relationship to the world. The Buddha defined this dukkha, this suffering, as the result of a relationship to what's happening in the world—when that relationship is one of greed, aversion, or delusion. Suffering is reactive emotions rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion. People or situations or conditions in the world don't actually have the power to make us angry or to make us afraid, to make us reactive. We essentially give that power to the world through this reactivity. Struggle, suffering, reactivity isn't inherent in what's happening in the world.

And that's actually really good news. Because if it were inherent in what's happening in the world, there would be no hope for us to become free. The conditions of the world are what they are—impermanent, unreliable, largely uncontrollable. And yet it is possible for us to change our minds. This opening to the reactivity, opening to the greed, aversion, and delusion, is one of the conditions that supports our minds to begin to let go of the greed, aversion, and delusion. Our minds can change. Our minds don't have to react with these habitual relationships.

Yet this changing of our minds doesn't mean that our minds somehow also change to think or believe that injustice or unethical behavior happening in the world is somehow okay. This takes a bit of turning our minds around what's being taught here. When we open to what is actually happening, what we are exploring meeting is what is already here, what's already arisen. We're aligning ourselves with the truth of what's already happening. What's already here is already here, and a reaction or a holding on or a pushing away or a confusion about what's already here simply confuses and obscures the situation.

As the mind shifts to releasing greed, aversion, and delusion, it doesn't mean that we don't act in the world. This can be hard for us to understand, especially early on in our practice, because greed and aversion have been so much the motivating forces of our actions. When greed and aversion are at work in our minds, telling us we need to act to get that thing or get rid of that thing, fix that problem, change that—when our minds are caught in that view, that view of greed, of aversion, which is essentially a delusional view—the mind cannot fathom that there would be any other motivation or reason to act.

And so it takes a little bit of a leap of faith and trust to begin to let go of our habitual ways of acting in the world, of responding to injustice, of responding to unethical behavior, and to explore what it might mean if greed or aversion weren't here. When greed and aversion are not clouding the heart and the heart sees suffering, that heart wants to act—not from confusion or anger or hatred or craving, but from compassion for the suffering.

So we begin to be more curious about the suffering that is arising in our minds. We begin to really see how much of what we call suffering is essentially our own mind's creation. As we begin to see this, a question sometimes comes up. It certainly came up for me. As I saw my mind heading towards anger, yet knowing anger was painful, seeing it charging towards anger—I could tell the mind was clinging to something that was going to cause it suffering. Why does the mind do this? What possibly can the mind be thinking?

So essentially, I think our minds are really confused. I would say that our human organism has a kind of orientation at some level that wants us to be happy, that wants us to experience well-being. And so there's a pull in the direction of well-being.

And yet the way our system is structured—I mean, it's kind of as simple in some ways as a single-celled organism moving towards nourishment and away from noxious chemicals. That natural pull towards pleasant, away from unpleasant. A very natural movement in a living organism. And yet the way our organism is structured, there's a lot happening between that pleasant experience and our pull towards it.

I think I mentioned in the talk on vedana, on feeling tone, how much of our pull towards pleasant and away from unpleasant is motivated by views and beliefs. And so a lot of our mind, our patterns, our habits—there's this movement, we want to move towards happiness and well-being, and then there's this way that our system has learned based on how it's gotten pleasure in the past. It goes for the quickest route to happiness. And that's often getting what I want or getting rid of what I don't want.

Time and time again we have done that. Time and time again we have gotten what we want, gotten rid of what we don't want, and had a little bit of happiness that comes from that. And so we've learned that there is a little bit of happiness that comes from that. Our mind is not really looking very deeply into what's going on. And so it's kind of like our minds think that's as good as it gets. That's the best kind of happiness that's possible. Getting what I want. Getting rid of what I don't want.

And what we're not seeing, what the mind is not seeing—it's clouded by confusion. The mind is fundamentally confused about what leads towards well-being. And so in that situation, the mind is caught by greed or caught by aversion, believing, "Get that thing, then I'll be happy."

What's going on there is that the mind is basically creating a scenario about having that thing—having that pleasant experience, having somebody look at me the way I'd like them to look at me. Our mind creates this image or projection or fantasy of a future moment in which I'll have that thing. And that feels good, that idea of having that. And so that's where the mind heads.

But what it's missing in that moment is: what's the actual present moment experience? What's actually going on right now? Because what's going on in the present moment is the wanting. The feeling of needing something that's not here. And already in that experience, if we were to actually look at the present moment experience, there's already suffering there. And that is obscured because our mind has taken up residence in this thought.

So essentially, greed is willing to forego, willing to completely ignore that it's suffering now for the possibility of some happiness in the future. This is a confusion that, when we start to investigate what's going on under the surface, we start to see—the suffering that's happening in the greed itself, in the aversion itself. And that begins to give the mind a new education, a new understanding about this movement to well-being.

Our minds are confused because they're caught by habits of mind with which we have been trained. We have been trained to do this. So we're living often in these thoughts and views rather than actually meeting what's happening here and now.

And if it were possible to only live in our thoughts and views, that might be a good strategy. But reality seems to have its way of intervening, coming in and pointing out to us that things are impermanent, unreliable, largely uncontrollable. And so the happiness that we get in that situation is fleeting. It doesn't last that long.

I'd say most, if not all, of our suffering really comes about through a struggle with this impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable nature of experience. It's not a mistake that things are impermanent, uncontrollable, and unreliable. It's the way things are. It's not that we've failed, that things are unreliable. It's the way things are.

So this is a big part of our confusion—that we have misunderstandings about this basic nature of reality. At very fundamental levels, we think things are permanent, or should be.

When we want things to be permanent, we think they should be. We think they should be reliable. Certainly they should be controllable. If something isn't controllable, I've failed in some way.

At the same time, there's another thread woven into our suffering. Our suffering seems to be connected not only to a misunderstanding about the inherent nature of reality, but also to a deep inner wish to be happy—an inner wish to be safe and at ease, to have well-being. And often suffering arises when these wishes seem out of reach.

This exploration around these threads—the truth of the way life is and these deep wishes that we have—has been central to my own practice. So much of my inquiry into suffering has been seeing the interplay between these two: the deep wishes we could call core wishes for our own happiness, for the well-being and safety of ourselves and our loved ones, this metta wish, and the truths of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable.

This wish for well-being is a beautiful wish. It's a wholesome wish. It's the wish of metta. And a lot of our suffering happens when that wish gets tangled up with the truth. Our suffering is this tangle—this knotted confusion between impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable and our deep wish to be safe and happy and peaceful.

We find ourselves in this tangle, caught in strategies that try to deal with the seemingly irreconcilable nature of these wishes and these truths. We have a deep wish for safety, well-being, happiness, and we start to see the vulnerability, uncertainty, impermanence in the world. Fear is born. Anxiety is born. Confusion is born. Anger and rage can be born when these two get tangled up.

This meeting of truths and wishes is where craving arises. Craving is essentially a misunderstanding that has interplay with both sides. We meet the truth of impermanent, uncontrollable, and craving says something like, "No, that's just wrong. It should not be that way." In the meeting of those truths with craving, we may either blame ourselves for the impermanent, uncontrollable, unreliable nature of our experience—somehow feeling like we're wrong or we've failed—or we may blame the world, put it out there as if the world is somehow targeting us with these events. Or we blame somebody else for that impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable nature of experience. There's a distortion there, not really taking in the truth. This is truth.

Deeply tied up with craving is often this wish, the wish for our own well-being, our happiness, the wish for the well-being and happiness of our families and friends. These two collide and get tangled because it feels like if I want to be happy and healthy and safe, then there's something wrong if I can't control things. The uncontrollability and the wish for safety become so knotted up, so tangled, because we cannot see—our minds just cannot understand—how these two might coexist: the wish for our safety and the truth of uncontrollability. The mind has trouble holding that both of those are valid.

As we begin to touch in through our meditation practice to this truth of impermanent, unreliable vulnerability, we might begin to experience the feeling of vulnerability that comes with this wish for safety and tell ourselves, "Well, things are impermanent. Things are uncontrollable. Vulnerability, okay, that's just the way it is." But it may be that this movement is almost a denial of that wish for safety.

Sometimes we can fall into what Bhante was talking about this morning—spiritual bypassing—where we use the Dharma as a way to ignore or deny what we may be experiencing, something like anger or aversion. "No, I'm a good Buddhist. I don't experience those things." We find ourselves in that spiritual bypassing mode.

There's also something that I'm going to call spiritual bludgeoning—when we sometimes beat ourselves up with the Dharma. It sounds like, "Yep, things are impermanent. That wish for safety? That's just not a valid wish." We may try to beat our wishes for well-being and happiness and safety with this kind of understanding: "Well, things are impermanent, and so this vulnerability—okay, that's just the way it is. This wish for safety is not a valid wish." We may think that.

And yet, that wish for safety is a wholesome movement of the heart. What happens as it meets that truth of uncontrollability is that the clinging, the craving around that wish for safety is demanding safety in a certain way—demanding a particular result, as Bhante talked about this morning.

So the exploration here is beginning to be curious about this knot between these two, between these truths and these wishes. The craving around a particular way to be safe is what creates this tangle when our experience is impermanent and uncertain.

Wisdom asks us to let go of the expectations around the wishes. Wisdom asks us to let go of the craving for particular outcomes around these wishes, around this movement of well-being and love. It asks us to let go of particular expectations. It doesn't ask us to let go of the wishes. Wisdom actually wants us to embrace those wishes. Wisdom is wanting us to simultaneously recognize these two threads. The threads of truth and the threads of love can coexist—not tangled, but interwoven. The weave of our lives can be this weave of love and wisdom, not in conflict.

One of the things I've learned is that whenever there's suffering, whenever I'm experiencing suffering, there's a tangle going on. Think of the way threads get tangled—the knot is composed of these knotted threads of love and wisdom. The tangle exists because of the confusion, because of the craving. And so anytime there is suffering, it's an opportunity. The suffering is pointing right out to us where we are resisting the truth and where we are confused about love. It's an opportunity for us to see right into love and wisdom when we meet suffering.

Certainly in my years of practice, when I saw suffering, I often did a couple different things. One was this sense of it feeling like a tumor, some really bad thing—this anger or whatever it was—and I felt like I needed to take a scalpel and cut it out of my system, to excise it, throw it away. But if we look at the tangle, if we take scissors and cut the tangle out, we are left with a hole in our fabric.

Actually, my experience is that when we're trying to get rid of something in that way, thinking that this is bad, wholly bad, approaching our dukkha as something that is bad and has to be gotten rid of—what that suffering is composed of is not going to just let itself be cut out. Because again, these threads of love and wisdom are there waiting to be revealed in the tangle.

So how can we do this? How can we let the tangle untangle?

Another strategy that I often employed was when I saw something challenging, I would think, "Okay, there it is. I am going to figure it out." Put it under the microscope, find all the pieces, pull it apart, figure out what's in there. A form of greed, essentially—greed combined with aversion, both of them together. I learned a lot doing that, but I also reinforced a lot of greed and aversion in doing that.

What I have learned is really helpful in this seeing of the tangle is to honor it. I've started using this word honoring. Honor the tangle. Respect that suffering. It's there to show us love and wisdom. Can we hold it in that way? Willingness to honor this tangle will—it's a slow process, I'd say, a slow unwinding sometimes. And what is often helpful there is a gentle meeting, just of the most obvious piece of whatever's here in that tangle.

And so we might, in the way that I had described, have put it under the microscope, kind of like, "Yep, I've seen anger before, there's usually fear in there, I'll find the fear." And yes, I would find fear when I was looking for it. Or maybe there's something that we think is going on there, and so we may try to dive inside of the pattern to find out what's happening. A lot of the time, if we're looking for something, we will find it. We'll construct it even.

So in my own experience, it can be really helpful to just settle back and explore meeting that pattern of the tangle. Think of it as a kind of warm bath of mindfulness and wisdom that lubricates the tangle, lets it loosen gently. And as it loosens, little pieces of it are seen. Just be with what's most obvious about these tangles. Let the tangle reveal itself to you.

This takes patience and trust, deep trust. And also it takes recognizing when that's possible. You've been practicing here for nearly three weeks, and this is possible at least some of the time. In your meetings you've been reporting this possibility of just holding suffering—that the mindfulness is strong enough for all of you at times to hold suffering and learn from it in this way.

For me, realizing that suffering is this beautiful, beautiful pointing to love and wisdom has given me so much patience around it—that what can be revealed there is beauty and truth, love and truth, as we can hold it with mindfulness. It takes knowing when we can do that, because there are times when we try to meet a particularly tangled knot and what happens, instead of the mindfulness being a lubricant letting the tangle loosen and weaken and point out the love and wisdom that's kind of in there, is that it just gets more and more knotted up. If that's happening, if it feels like it's getting tighter and tighter, if it feels like we're going down the rabbit hole of the pattern, that is not the time to try to sit with it. Then it's time to redirect the attention, work with something else, set it aside. There are lots of different ways we've talked about doing that. And yet there's a lot of capacity that you've developed over these weeks with which to meet dukkha.

My microscope kind of way of meeting dukkha was like if I wanted to figure something out about this cup, I'd be taking an ice pick to it, trying to pry it apart and figure out what's inside of it and what it's made of, what's underneath that glaze. I could smash it even. That's a pretty violent way to go about meeting suffering.

The kind of investigation or meeting—being with, actually, it's more being with—one of my teachers at one point, I think it was Sayadaw U Pandita, brought a cloth up and said, "This is how we meet experience." Rubbing it with a soft cloth, staying in contact with it, that kind of gentleness. There's a different set of things that are learned in this way. That's a being with experience. One of you in the interviews talked about accompanying ourselves. That's the quality.

If you notice that there are ideas or views about what might be underneath, hold those views lightly. So many times when I have been investigating some kind of suffering, I thought I knew something. I thought I had some idea about what it was about—some connection to my childhood trauma on the playground, or some relationship issue. I thought I knew. My analytical mind would come up with very reasonable ideas about what this suffering was about. But many, many times I saw that when I actually just set those aside, when I actually allowed it, held it in this way I'm talking about—this gentle holding, letting it reveal itself to me—so many times I was completely surprised by what was revealed.

One of the most surprising experiences I had along these lines was when I was practicing in Burma with Sayadaw U Tejaniya at Shwe Oo Min Monastery. I was experiencing quite a bit of low-grade depression over several weeks. I could see some of how it arose and actually tied it to this notion of being excluded on the playground. There was a particular time in the day when talking was allowed at this monastery, and people would get together and walk and talk—there would be these walk and talks happening up and down the middle road of the monastery. I often saw this depression coming up there, and it got strengthened as I saw two people together talking. This idea arose: "Oh, this is connected to being excluded on the playground."

Fortunately, I just put that aside and said, "Okay, well, what's here? What's happening?" I investigated this in many different ways over the course of a couple of weeks, just seeing when it was coming into being, what happened. I actually at one point noticed it came into being out of calm. My mind was really calm, and suddenly it was sinking into depression.

Well, that's interesting, huh? I wonder what that's about. So again, just noticing.

At times when the depression was kind of strong and I needed to not be so focused on it, I would expand my awareness: "Okay, well yeah, that depression's there, and there's thousands of other things happening in the present moment." So okay, there's seeing happening, hearing's happening, walking's happening, oh there's the depression, okay, there's seeing, there's walking, there's the depression. Just letting myself take a bigger container. There's just so many different ways of working with this.

And then at one point, as I was walking back to my room, I felt the depression really get strong. But at this point the mind was pretty at ease with working with it. As I went to my room and did my lying meditation—because I was doing primarily lying meditation—I felt the depression just expand. It felt like it was growing really big. I was like,

"Wow, I haven't felt it get that big before." But this is what was happening. It was just expanding, expanding. Okay, can I be with it while it expands? I could. I could be with it. It's a little scary, but I could be with it.

And then at some point, while I was sitting with that expanding depression, it felt like the entire thing flipped inside out and it became expansive mettā.

The next thing my mind did was have a kind of smashing thought: "Oh, that's sappy, that's stupid." And I was like, wow. Seeing that as the mind entered into this vast, beautiful mettā experience, there was this relationship to it—"that's sappy, that's stupid." Seeing that the mind wanted to repress the mettā. That was the depression—this kind of subtle holding down of this mettā. That was not what I had expected.

Many, many times in investigating some kind of suffering, I have seen love in there, with some kind of weird or contorted relationship to it. And connected also to these truths of impermanent, unreliable—that relationship around that mettā was something like, "Well, that mettā, that's not reliable." Something like that.

And so the tangle—honoring the tangle, allowing it to reveal the love and the wisdom. It's a very beautiful process that we're engaged in. This transformation happens.

I think Bhante used the analogy around ice and water. In a way this is similar, because the ice is like when love and wisdom are all frozen up together. But that ice, every single molecule of that ice is water. It's H_2O. And yet it's frozen, it's stuck. The transformation, the melting, just changes state to a fluid, malleable state. Very similar to this.

The tangle—the tangle is the threads of love and wisdom. And our practice helps us to hold and meet that, so that we see into these truths. Our heart begins to stretch through this exploration to understand actually that our hearts can hold both: these wishes, these pure wishes of well-being, of love, of connection, of care, of compassion—and these truths. They are not in conflict. They're only in conflict when viewed from the perspective of greed and aversion and delusion.

And so honoring what's arising. Because it is pointing the way for us. Our suffering points the way for us to more deeply understand. Honoring our pain, honoring our confusion.

It reminds me of a phrase from a poem I mentioned at the beginning of the retreat, a poem by Izumi Shikibu: "Watching the moon at dawn, solitary mid-sky, I knew myself completely, no part left out."

No part left out. The pain, the confusion, the anger, the frustration, the craving—all asking to be seen, and in a way waiting to reveal love and wisdom.

Let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

This concludes the talk.

CHAPTER 64

Not-Self and Selfing

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this profound exploration of the Buddhist teaching on anattā (not-self), Andrea Fella guides practitioners through understanding how we habitually construct a sense of self and why the Buddha considered questions like "who feels?" to be invalid. Drawing from key discourses including the second discourse of the Buddha on the five aggregates (khandhas), she illuminates how our ordinary way of attending—asking "Was I?" "Am I?" "What am I?"—leads to a thicket of views and suffering.
> Fella uses the beautiful analogy of a rainbow to illustrate the conditioned nature of self: just as a rainbow arises from the confluence of moisture, sunlight, and an observer—and cannot be approached as a solid thing—so too our sense of self is a confluence of conditions rather than a fixed entity. She explores the Buddha's teaching that form, feeling, perception, mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness are all "not-self" precisely because they cannot be controlled and are impermanent and unreliable.
> The talk offers practical frameworks for investigation, including the Buddha's threefold reflection: "This is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself." Fella unpacks these as pointing to progressively subtler levels of selfing—the possessive self, the agent self, and the recipient self. She shares personal examples of watching identities shift dramatically in moments, revealing their constructed and impermanent nature. Rather than trying to eliminate the sense of self, practitioners are encouraged to study it with curiosity and meet it with allowing and love, letting wisdom naturally untangle these habitual patterns.

The Buddha in his conversations with his followers often talked about how our minds get caught in different ways at different times. I'd like to start this evening by sharing one of those teachings.

He begins this teaching by describing one of the ways in which an ordinary person relates to experience. You might recall that when we talked about feeling tone, I mentioned a text in which the Buddha also described how an ordinary person—I think "ordinary worldling" was the translation that was used there—how they relate to feeling tone. Here he's talking about how an ordinary person attends to things.

He says an ordinary person—this is someone who's not met the teachings, who doesn't practice—does not understand what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, they attend to those things unfit for attention and do not attend to those things fit for attention.

This is how they attend unwisely: "Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future?" Or else they are inwardly perplexed about the present thus: "Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where will it go?"

These thoughts, this way of attending—I think you get the drift—attending through the sense or the perspective of I, of I-me.

He goes on to say that when they attend unwisely in this way, one of six views arises. The view "self exists for me" arises as true and established. Or the view "no self exists for me" arises as true and established—that one's interesting. There, the Buddha points to this view of no self as being one of these six views that arises. Or the view "I perceive self with self" arises. Or the view "I perceive not-self with self" arises. Or the view "I perceive self with not-self" arises. Or else they have some such view as this: "It is this self of mine that speaks and feels and experiences here and there the results of good and bad actions. But this self of mine is permanent, everlasting, eternal, not subject to change and will endure as long as eternity."

This, he said, is called the thicket of views, the wilderness of views, the contortion of views. The untaught ordinary person is not freed from suffering, being caught in this thicket of views.

This kind of habitual way we have of meeting experience through the perspective of self, the Buddha says, inclines us towards these different views of self. Caught by this perspective of self, he says there's a direct connection with suffering.

I'll read another teaching, because this sense of questioning—he's saying here that pretty much any view at all around the self, any way you can even think about having a view of the self: I perceive self with not-self, I perceive self with self, I perceive not-self with self—all of these are mistaken understandings, he says.

And so the question arises, and has arisen for thousands of years, something along the lines of: well, okay, if there's no self, then who feels? Or who decides? This kind of question has come up in some of our meetings. So I thought I'd read a story of an exchange between the Buddha and someone with questions along these lines, so we can hear how the Buddha responds to this kind of question.

The questioner asks the Buddha, "Venerable Sir, who feels?"

"Not a valid question," the Blessed One replied. "I do not say one feels. If I should say one feels, in that case this would be a valid question. But I do not speak thus. If one should ask me, 'Venerable Sir, with what as condition does feeling come to be?' This would be a valid question."

To this the valid answer is, "With contact as condition, feeling comes to be. With feeling as condition, craving."

And this person, not quite getting it, asks next, "Venerable Sir, who craves?"

"Not a valid question," the Blessed One replies.

I'll skip some of it, but basically: with feeling as condition, craving comes to be; with craving as condition, clinging; with clinging as condition, becoming.

And so the Buddha is really pointing to this question around "Who is feeling? Who is experiencing?" It's not really relevant here. It's not the way, the understanding of the way things are happening in our experience.

To me, this way of responding to the question is really pointing to the conditioned nature of our experience—that we are just this conditioning tumbling on. That's all that is happening. Conditions arising, passing away. Conditions arising, giving rise to other conditions, giving rise to other conditions. This is what this being... I won't say this is what this being is, but this is how this being happens. Maybe I could say that. This is how this being happens. We are more a happening.

One philosopher, Buckminster Fuller—I thought of this today and went and looked on the internet. The internet is great this way; you can find pretty much anything. I remembered this from when I was a teenager. I read a book by Buckminster Fuller called I Seem to Be a Verb and wanted to get the whole quote. So here's what he says:

"I live on earth at present and I don't know what I am. I know that I'm not a category. I'm not a thing. I'm not a noun. I seem to be a verb, an evolutionary process, an integral function of the universe."

That's what we are. We are functioning. We are functionings—human functionings, human happenings. We could say, instead of a being, human happenings.

So I'd like to briefly give some analogies, some senses of how to understand this teaching of not-self in a more analogical way. Because there's nothing really out there that's a thing. We know through just our understanding, to some extent, of the way physics works, that there's no stasis anywhere—that there's just this continual flux of particles. And yet we congeal into the sense of something. We congeal, we put on top of experience, that things are things, including ourself.

And so one analogy, thinking about this happening as a conditioned set of arisings—an arising that comes with a set of conditions—a good analogy for this is a rainbow. A rainbow seems to kind of, sort of be a thing, although it's very ephemeral. When I was a kid, I was shocked that you could actually take a picture of a rainbow. It's got some kind of happening going on, for sure. But it's this confluence of conditions that makes that happening, that has that happening be realized, that makes that happening arise. There's moisture in the air. There's sun that has to be hitting those drops of moisture. And then there needs to be an observer.

I think anytime there is sun and water in the air, at some place there will be a rainbow—whether it's landing anywhere. There would be the possibility of a rainbow if there was somebody standing in the right place to see it. But it really does need the observer.

I actually decided to look this up on the internet to see how rainbows work. And one of the things I thought was really cool was this: it said that a rainbow doesn't actually exist in the way that we think it exists, because you cannot approach it as a thing. You cannot walk up to a rainbow. If you walk up to a rainbow, it may appear that the rainbow is staying the same distance from you. Every step you take towards the rainbow, basically what's happening is you're seeing a new rainbow. Because the distance from those water droplets is essential in terms of the refraction and where we are. The distance is essential. So we take a step, and we're seeing the water droplets refracted just a step further.

It doesn't exist in the way we think it exists as something out there. It's this confluence of conditions.

At one point I was doing a self-retreat. A friend of mine let me use their cabin on the Oregon coast this past January, and I was there during a really stormy time, so some of the waves were enormous. I was up on a cliff seventy-five feet above the ocean, but some of the waves were breaking and spraying water up above the seventy-five foot mark of the cliff. As I stood there one afternoon, each time the wave broke and sent up this shower of water, I saw a rainbow appear in the air in front of me. Sometimes I could see the rainbow appear and vanish and appear and vanish and appear and vanish as wafts of mist went through that area. It was very interesting to see. It looked like the rainbow was hovering there just waiting to be revealed. But it's the conditions that come together.

And so the sense of self is kind of like that. It is conditions that are interpreted as I or me or mine.

In another discourse of the Buddha—one that Sally mentioned the other night, the second discourse of the Buddha—the Buddha really began to unpack this teaching of not-self with respect to the five aggregates. I want to give you a little bit of a flavor of this text.

With respect to each of the five aggregates, the first thing that the Buddha points to is this aspect of how we think of a sense of self as being something that has control—control over our experience, control over what we feel or think or do. This is a very common way to have a sense of "I am." I'm the one who chooses, I'm the one who feels, I'm the one who thinks. The sense that I should be able to make things happen the way I want them to. This notion is a very common way to impute a sense of self—the sense of agency, the sense of control.

The Buddha points to this as what we actually see when we really go through our lives. Over and over again, we have staring us in the face this kind of truth of not-self. Only we don't see it because we have views and beliefs that we're holding to. We're looking at our experience through those views and beliefs and thinking, for instance, something like, "Well, I should have control over my thoughts," or "I should have control over my emotions. Why can't I just stop myself from doing this thing over and over again?" We think we're failing, we think we're a failure, we think somebody is doing something to us—as opposed to recognizing that this is simply an aspect of not-self staring us in the face, that we don't have this kind of control.

So the Buddha said—I'll just read a couple of these to give you the flavor. Form is one of the five aggregates: form, feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness. Form refers primarily to the body but also to all physical form.

"Form is not self. If form were self, the body would not lend itself to affliction, and it would be possible to say of the body, 'Let my body be thus. Let my body not be thus.' But because form is not self, it is not possible to say, 'Let my body be thus. Let my body not be thus.'"

Mental formations are not self. Mental formations include all of our emotions, our mind states, things like mindfulness, anger, frustration. I'm going to read through this with a couple of examples.

"Anger is not self. If anger were self, anger would not lead to affliction, and it would be possible to say of anger, 'Let my anger be thus. Let my anger not be thus.' But because anger is not self, anger leads to affliction, and it is not possible to say of it, 'Let my anger be thus. Let my anger not be thus.'"

"Mindfulness is not self. If mindfulness were self, it would be possible to determine of mindfulness, 'May my mindfulness be thus. May my mindfulness not be thus.' But mindfulness is not self. Therefore it is not possible to say of mindfulness, 'May my mindfulness be thus. May my mindfulness not be thus.'"

That's a little bit of a relief.

It's also a way we suffer, isn't it? A lot of us suffer over this, thinking we should be in control of the mind. So this notion of control is one of the main ways that we tend to impute a sense of self. And when we see that we do not have control, rather than taking this to be a personal failing, we might remind ourselves: not self. No control, not self. This is not self. Mindfulness is not self. Self-judgment is not self. Frustration is not self.

So that's one piece of this teaching, this notion. And the Buddha pulls out this aspect of control particularly for us to examine. Then for each of the aggregates, he reminded his followers—he actually engaged them in a dialogue. He said, "So form, body—is form permanent or impermanent?" They said, "Well, it's impermanent." And he says, "Well, okay, so what is impermanent—reliable or unreliable?" "Well, it's unreliable." "Is what is impermanent and unreliable fitting to be called self?" And he went through this with each of the aggregates.

Because the aggregates are impermanent and unreliable, they tend to lead to dukkha. They lead to dukkha when they are clung to. In the time of the Buddha, one of the understandings or definitions of what self is—the self we are aspiring towards—was a self that is permanent and blissful. So in this situation, he was most likely speaking to people who held this perspective, that the self worth aspiring towards is permanent and blissful. And what the Buddha says is, you cannot find anything in your experience that is reliable and blissful all the time. So is that worthy of being called self? And those followers of the Buddha responded, "Well, I guess not. I guess it's not worthy of being called self."

But for us, maybe that's not the sense of self that we connect with—that idea of some permanent, stable, blissful entity that we're shooting for, merging with some kind of oneness. Maybe that's not our view or worldview. But what I think this teaching is partly asking us to do, what I read in this instruction, is the Buddha saying, "Well, what is your definition of a sense of self? What do you take to be self?" And then start looking at it. Is it what you think it is?

A sense of self we usually do impute some kind of solidity to, some kind of stability to, some kind of ongoingness to. Some of that comes from a sense of memory and continuity, from remembering what we've done. So there's some sense of stability, some sort of something that's traveling through time. But what is that? What is that experience?

To me, one of the things this teaching points to is: whatever you think of as self, start looking at it. Because that's what the Buddha had them do in this sutta. What is it that you call self? Something permanent and blissful? Okay, let's look at our experience. Is there anything you can experience that's permanent, that's going to be here forever? Nothing found in our process of humanness is permanent.

So this exploration—how does the practice help us to shift from this idea of not-self, or anatta, the Pali term that's often translated as not-self? And I like that translation, "not-self" as opposed to "no-self," because "no self" tends to have us reify this idea that there is no self—which was one of those views the Buddha said leads to suffering. This notion of "there is no self" established as the way it is—he says that's a view that leads to suffering.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu, I think, is the one who really brought in this use of "not-self," which to me speaks to: what do we call self? What do we take to be self? And the "not" in front of it says, well, it's not what we think it is.

It's not that. What do you think self is? Well, it's not that. And how about this? Nope, not that either.

So the exploration here isn't to try to pick up this idea or teaching of not-self or no-self and walk around saying, "I'm a no-self," or even "I'm a not-self"—to kind of overlay that teaching or that idea onto our experience and try to not have a sense of self. Because good luck with that.

Our practice really is to see: What is it that we are calling self? What are we taking to be I or me or mine? In this moment, are you the one that's listening? Are you the one that's a meditator? What are you taking to be I or me or mine right now? There can often be some subtle thing there.

One famous quote by the Zen master Dogen: "To study the way is to study the self." That's our work—study these senses of self, get to know what the experience is. "To study the self is to forget the self." My understanding of this teaching is that our work is to study what we think of as a sense of self. As we explore that, there's a very natural understanding that arises: "Hmm, I thought that was self, but it kind of showed itself to be not that." So a very natural unfolding of this study is that we begin to understand in a different way than a kind of intellectual thinking. We begin to understand this teaching of not-self in an experiential way. "To forget the self is to be enlightened by all things."

To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be enlightened by all things.

And so to study the self—this is the exploration of what do I call I or me or mine.

There are different ways we may experience a sense of self. Get familiar with how you experience a sense of self. Sometimes it might be that we see a sense of self kind of congealing, a strong sense of identity coming into being, and we recognize something about a sense of self. Or we might notice—and I think this was more of an earlier understanding for me—seeing a sense of self shifting. Having a kind of identity around some aspect of who I was, and then something else happened, and in a split second there was another identity, like a flip off of one and a flip on of another.

On one three-month course—I think it was my first three-month course—I was reactive to the questions that were asked in the hall, the live questions in the hall. And by one person in particular. I got very argumentative in my mind with this person about their questions. And I spent some time out in front of the meditation hall, outside on the driveway, walking up and down and feeling into that sense of "I am right." I know how these questions should be asked, or whatever I was thinking. I was this identity, this very familiar—really, really familiar—analytical person. I was forty at the time, twenty years ago. Analytical Andrea arose. And it was suffering. I could feel the suffering of it. So I was walking up and down and feeling that suffering, trying to understand, doing a little bit of the microscope thing, trying to figure out this sense of self. But I was just watching it and feeling the suffering of it, basically.

And then this truck drove up. It was one of those lunchtime things. The truck drove up and stopped in front of the building, and the brakes squealed, and the door slammed. And my mind immediately flipped from this forty-year-old analytical, argumentative person to a two-year-old that was like, "Ooh!" And I was just reveling—I was standing there feeling the bangs and the big bursts of sound, and rapture was just going through me.

In a second.

That was interesting, because that sense of self had seemed so solid, so there. And it changed in a split second. That helped me to see something about the impermanent nature of self and that sense of "that's me." This is actually one of the really great tools around exploring not-self—when we start to see these identities, just noticing what kinds of senses of self there are.

Another time I was sitting in the dining room, basically miserable, feeling the miserable self.

And then I picked up my fork and I noted "lifting, lifting," and suddenly I became a practicing yogi, and the miserable self disappeared. It was like—whoa, what happened?

So we can see these shifts of identities. And in seeing these shifts, we start to recognize and understand, especially for the ones that are kind of entrenched. The ones that are entrenched, we impute a permanence to. We think they're always there. And we can start to recognize through this kind of exploration—like when I turned into that two-year-old, the forty-year-old analytical one was not there. It just did not exist. We begin to poke holes in this belief of the solidity, or the ongoing traveling through time, of these identities.

The Buddha offered a number of ways to explore this. He actually identified twenty ways that we create identities. I'm not going to go through all twenty ways we create identities—you can breathe a sigh of relief. But I will just mention the frame and a couple of the things he said about it.

We get the twenty by taking the five aggregates times four methods of identifying with each one. Five times four is twenty.

These four methods of identifying: The Buddha says we tend to create an identity or a view of self as "I am something." I am my body, I am my feelings, I am my emotions. This is a very common way that we identify. "I'm angry, I'm miserable." We identify with roles—I'm the parent, the child, the teacher, the student. So we have this "I am something" going on sometimes. And we can reflect or hear the kinds of thoughts going on in our mind and begin to touch into the flavor of identity that's happening.

Another one is the possessive quality: something is mine. My emotions are mine. You might have more of a feeling of the emotions being mine rather than "I am my emotions"—maybe a slightly different flavor of identifying around the emotions. The body belongs to me. The body is mine. Some entity exists that owns the body. That's another flavor of identification.

And then two other interesting ones: "I am inside of something." I'm inside the body. I'm inside of consciousness. Sometimes in a meditative state it can feel like that—I'm inside of consciousness. A sense of sitting here behind the eyes and looking out. The "I" is up here somewhere, looking out. That feeling of being inside. Or something is inside of me—another flavor of identification. Consciousness is in me, maybe. Emotions are in me.

So the Buddha points to these different ways of identifying. He was a real analyzer—he really pulled things apart and saw how they worked and were put together. I think it can be useful at times to recognize that we are identifying in different ways at different times.

Now, for myself personally, this twenty-part framework is not one that I use in my own practice very much. Occasionally I'll use it in a reflective way, recognizing, "Oh yes, taking myself to be inside of my body." Something like that. But there's another framework that the Buddha offered that I find really useful in my practice. That one I'm going to spend more time with, because I can talk about how it's informed my understanding and my practice.

There's a very common encouragement by the Buddha: when we notice something arising with the aggregates, with dukkha, with clinging—in so many different places—there's this encouragement that one should see with proper wisdom. Whatever is arising—the body, feeling, perception, clinging, craving—one should see with proper wisdom: "This is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself."

So he has this three-part exploration. And what I began to explore is not so much...

I mean, sometimes I use that. Sometimes I just remind myself. It's kind of like using that as a reflection. Sometimes I remind myself when I'm caught by something—caught by some mind state—this is not me, this is conditioned. Conditioned.

So that's another way of understanding or framing this statement: this is not who I am. And the understanding of the sense of self being a conditioned unfolding, a conditioned arising—sometimes we can just remind ourselves, yes, this is conditioned. I also like using, "This is nature." One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, offered this: "This is nature." What's happening right now is like a plant growing or a rainbow arising. It's just nature. And so that reflection can sometimes help bring a little more balance in the mind so that the mindfulness can have some more ease with it. So that's one way of using that reflection, which has been very helpful for me.

Another way of exploring it is to look at the three parts and see what sense of self is being turned over. The first one—"this is not mine"—is turning over the possessive self: this is mine. There are times when the primary sense of identification is around ownership, possession. My own papers at one point had so much suffering in one retreat where I had taken ownership of a word. I had thought in some way that I had coined a phrase, and I heard other people using that phrase. And they weren't giving me credit. So much suffering.

So that's one way of having that sense of self—I own this, this is mine. That's probably the most obvious form of selfing. And I think it's interesting: as I reflected on these three, to me it's like each one points to a subtler sense of self. This possessive sense of self, we recognize this, we know this one. And so beginning to get familiar with it—in this way of asking, okay, what is this sense of self? What is this feeling of possession? What is that like? When I started exploring these senses of self, I found a lot of contraction in the body, a lot of familiar mind states. And what I began to realize is that what I called a sense of self was just a lot of familiar contractions and mind states.

The second one—after this possessor—is "this I am not." That's turning over the sense of "this is what I am." I am solid. I am this kind of being that travels through time. I am the one who chooses, who decides, who acts. This is self as agent in some ways—this sense "I am."

That exploration around that sense of self is something that we've pointed to in several talks. Looking at this aspect of how action happens, in the instructions on intention and in Sally's talk on intention and in Greg's talk on karma, we talked about this—this aspect of how choice arises, intention arises, dependent on conditions. We can start to see this.

I think I gave the example in the instructions around intention that something might happen: you have your breakfast and you've had your tea or coffee or water, whatever you've had to drink. And then sitting in the hall after breakfast, the bladder gets full. The pressure builds. There's discomfort. There's the intention to relieve that pressure, which leads to the intention to get up, stand, use the restroom. Sometimes we can see this with such clarity that it's a little bit spooky. Because it really shows us at times how these intentions are conditioned. And what I thought was me deciding to get up—I decided to get up and go to the restroom—was a whole series of conditions unfolding.

This can be a little odd to see sometimes, but we can be curious about this. When we think, "I am the one who's acting or choosing," begin to investigate that. What is that?

"Who is choosing?" That, as the Buddha would say, is not a valid question. With something as condition, intention arises. In this case, with feeling as condition, discomfort arose. With discomfort as condition, the intention to relieve discomfort arose.

So this is the second sense of self—the one who's in control, who decides, who chooses. I had an interesting experience one day seeing the subtlety of this feeling of being in control and the sense of self embedded within it.

I was taking a drive with my dear friend Annie one time while teaching this retreat. We went out for a nice drive on a beautiful day, and she was driving me along all these back roads I'd never been on. I was just the passenger, looking out the window, really happy. As I felt that happiness—and sometimes on these retreats even as teachers we gain some continuity of mindfulness—I had that happen in that moment. There was a real continuity of seeing that sense of happiness arising, and what I saw in being present with it was that the happiness was predicated on this sense of "Ah, I've got it figured out." It wasn't as simple as just appreciating that in the scene is only the scene, in the heard is only the heard. There was a subtle sense of "Ah, I'm in control." That felt good.

I just had to laugh at myself. How subtle is that? I didn't beat myself up for having that experience. It's just—that is so subtle. That sense of control, and the happiness had seemed so simple.

This is a kind of exploration we can do.

And then the third one: "This is not myself." This one took me a little more reflecting on what it might mean. I don't know if this is exactly what it's pointing to, but it was useful as I explored it in this way.

So there's the sense of "mine," there's a sense of "I am," and then there's a sense of "me." Initially I didn't quite feel into what the difference between "I am" and "me" might be. But as I kept exploring my experience, noticing the senses of self and what was going on around them, there was one point where I could clearly see the sense of self as the one who does things—seeing these intentions arise and the actions follow, thinking "Who's in charge here anyway?" It's really quite odd.

I also noticed something about the knowings—you know, the choosing or knowing what I'm aware of. At one point it became so clear to me that I was not in charge of this knowing process. It was just happening. I didn't even really get to pick what was coming into that awareness. This was just happening, just unfolding. And yet there was a clear sense in that moment: I wasn't in control, but it sure felt like it was happening to me.

That pointed me to a subtler sense of self. We could say the first one is the self as agent or as subject—self as the subject of the sentence. "I am the one who does this"—the agent of the action. And the "me" is self as the recipient, the object. "I'm the hapless one that things happen to." That's also a sense of self.

I found it really useful to notice these three different flavors of senses of self. Sometimes a sense of self feels really clear; there are times when it's not so obvious. And when it's not obvious, that's not the time to go looking for it.

Sometimes we might be experiencing suffering around an emotion, and we might see there's a feeling of anger or frustration. We might think, "Well, where's the sense of self here?" There's clearly perhaps the sense of "I am angry" or "I am frustrated," but that feeling of the "I am" is overwhelmed by the anger itself—by the feeling, the experience of that anger. Sometimes what we're able to notice is not so much the subtlety of the "I" that feels angry, but just the anger itself. We don't have to try to find the "I" in the middle, or the "I" that's connected to dukkha.

Just looking at dukkha is good enough.

In fact, there's a teaching where the Buddha described how dukkha comes to be—a teaching of dependent origination, these links of just the process by which suffering arises. And we've talked about pieces of it. Contact leads to feeling, which leads to craving. When ignorance is present in the mind, feeling leads to craving, craving leads to clinging, clinging leads to becoming. Becoming leads to birth, and birth leads to suffering.

And so the work of the First Noble Truth—to understand suffering—really points to understanding this process of dependent origination, how suffering comes to be. That same process also describes how the sense of self comes to be. Becoming is this arising of the sense of self. Birth is taking identification—one way to understand birth is taking birth into an identity. This same process describes both how the sense of self comes to be and how suffering comes to be.

So whatever is obvious to you in the moment, if it's suffering that's obvious, you are exploring this process. You don't have to go searching after hearing this talk. It's not necessary to think, "Okay, where's the sense of self in there?" And yet sometimes that is what's staring us in the face.

Kind of like when I was doing the walking meditation and feeling that sense of "I'm right." Self-righteousness is a good place to feel the sense of self—that's a great one. So if you feel self-righteous, take that as an opportunity to explore. What is this feeling? What is it? And as I saw in that example, how it just shifted on a dime and became something else.

The sense I had in that first experience of really feeling into that sense of self was how solid it felt, how real it felt, how stable it felt. And then when it vanished in a second, it was like, "Wow, that was not stable." No. Thank goodness that was not stable.

Another way we can see selfing—I talked about noticing the thoughts in our mind. So many of our thoughts relate to me. I'd say probably the vast majority of our thoughts have me at the center. We can tell this because our thoughts come with "I," "me," "mine" in them. And yet sometimes our thoughts come with "they," "them," "that person." "They shouldn't be doing that." This is an othering. We are creating a self out of them, making them something separate. And in that process by which we other, there is a sense of self here.

Sometimes it may be more clear to us that we are othering, so we can be curious about that as a form of selfing. What does it feel like when there's this sense of imputing otherness? So much suffering comes from this type of selfing.

When we create other, we create an identity here. Sometimes these self and others have to do with specific individuals, specific somebody that we have opinions or views about. And sometimes these otherings come from more cultural perspectives, tribal identities that we might have, group identities that we don't necessarily recognize. The othering that happens around race and sexual orientation and religious affiliation—this is a huge place of suffering, and it comes about through this mental formation of selfing and othering.

We can begin to be curious about that kind of selfing, that othering. We may not be able to feel into the self that's here, but maybe we can feel into the sense of separation. When we create a sense of self, when there is a sense of self arising and being believed, there is a separation. It may be us from some other part of ourselves. It may be us from some other person. It may be us and some thing that we own—we are creating a separation there, thinking that we can own something.

The sense of self comes with a separation.

And we can feel into that sometimes, we can feel into that experience of separation.

Seeing the selfing, seeing the senses of self arise, we see how intimately connected with dukkha it can be. These senses of self—we often have identities around strategies that we've used to navigate difficulty. Strategies for safety in our lives. Strategies for happiness. This is often where these senses of self congeal.

And so these senses of self have mistakenly been trying to help us get through life, get through the impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable nature of the way things are. Very much like when I talked about the tangle—the tangle of suffering—the sense of self is also a tangle. It's a different version of that tangle. Or maybe it's the same version, just seen from a different perspective.

And it's really important to meet that with allowing and love, to let the wisdom begin to untangle the threads of that sense of self. Rather than trying to not-self the self, meet it with mindfulness.

It also has these pointers back to love and to wisdom—this wish to be happy, healthy, safe, and trying to navigate these impermanent, unreliable situations, and the tangle that happens there. So sometimes that tangle is felt as an identity. Sometimes it's felt as suffering. Sometimes we feel it as both.

And honoring these with our respect. The word respect means to look at again—that's the derivation of that word, to look closely at. So respecting these tangles, holding them with respect and honoring them. Not to dismiss our identities, but to hold them with care. Let them reveal and release with wisdom.

Let's just sit for a few moments.

CHAPTER 65

Dependent Origination (Paṭicca Samuppāda)

Andrea Fella · 1h03

> In this comprehensive teaching, Andrea Fella unpacks the Buddha's profound doctrine of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), the twelve-link chain describing how suffering comes to be. She begins by acknowledging the teaching's depth, referencing the exchange between Ānanda and the Buddha where the Buddha cautioned that this teaching only appears clear while remaining profoundly subtle. Rather than starting with the traditional first link of ignorance (avijjā), Andrea works from the more experientially accessible middle links—the six sense bases, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, and birth—before circling back to explain how ignorance and mental formations (saṅkhāra) shape consciousness itself.
> Andrea illuminates how this cycle operates not just across lifetimes but moment-to-moment in our direct experience. She offers a vivid example of how the idea of being a "good yogi" can trigger the entire chain: pleasant feeling leads to craving, clinging intensifies into fixed beliefs about what we need for happiness, becoming rallies our intentions in service of that identity, and birth into that identity inevitably brings suffering when it cannot be maintained. She also explores how cultural conditioning shapes our mental formations, creating shared ignorance about the nature of happiness.
> The liberating heart of this teaching emerges through Andrea's personal story of practicing with self-hatred during a three-month retreat. Drawing on Sammādiṭṭhi Sutta (MN 9), she emphasizes that freedom is possible wherever mindfulness meets experience—not only at the feeling-craving junction traditionally emphasized, but at any link in the chain. When wisdom sees clearly that arising is just arising, the entire pattern can fall apart. This is the good news: we are not stuck in this cycle, and understanding dependent origination itself becomes a condition for liberation.

A few days ago in the morning I responded to a question about dependent origination, and following that there were quite a few requests for a talk. So that's what we're doing tonight.

I'd like to start with just offering what the Buddha's words were on this teaching. With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. With mental formation as condition, consciousness comes to be. With consciousness as condition, materiality and mentality come to be—nāma-rūpa comes to be. With nāma-rūpa as condition, the six sense bases. With the sense bases as condition, contact. With contact as condition, feeling. With feeling as condition, craving. With craving as condition, clinging. With clinging as condition, becoming. With becoming as condition, birth. With birth as condition, aging and death and the entire mass of suffering comes to be.

As I said the other morning, the Buddha described this as a teaching on how suffering comes to be. And this teaching is not just as simple as understanding causality as we understand it in the world, because what it really points to is the conditionality in our own minds that leads to the arising of suffering. It is pointing to an internal process, the conditions internally that lead to suffering.

It's a complex teaching in many ways. I think one of us referred the other day to an interchange between Ānanda and the Buddha. Ānanda came to the Buddha and said, "It is wonderful, it is marvelous how profound this dependent origination is and how profound it appears. And yet it appears to me as clear as clear." And the Buddha's response is, "Do not say that, Ānanda, do not say that. This dependent origination is profound and appears profound. It is through not understanding, not penetrating this doctrine, that this generation has become like a tangled ball of string, covered as with a blight, tangled like coarse grass, unable to pass beyond states of woe, unable to pass beyond suffering."

He was pointing out to Ānanda that what he thought was clear as clear about dependent origination—that he wasn't quite really penetrating the depth of the teaching. Conditionality can seem clear, cause and effect can seem clear, and yet what the Buddha is pointing to is subtle.

I think of this teaching as an elaboration on the second noble truth. The second noble truth states that with the arising of craving is the arising of suffering. Dependent origination goes into more detail on how that happens.

I found it useful in my own practice, not simply as a theoretical teaching. My understanding is that it is a description of how suffering comes to be. It's not a practice. Many of the teachings that the Buddha offered were practices about how to look at our experience, but this is more a description—and yet a very penetrating description that helps us to see clearly. While not a practice in itself, it is a teaching that helps us to practice.

There are a couple of key pieces that for me have been really useful to reflect on about this teaching, just in a broad brush way. One of those pieces is that this description is about how suffering arises for human beings—the conditioned nature of suffering for human beings. This itself is useful for us to recognize: that suffering is conditioned, and it is human. Being born in this human realm, we are caught in this process, and until we see through it we will continue to struggle.

The other key piece of this teaching is that the arising of suffering arises in dependence on processes within our own hearts and minds. This is good news because it means that there is the possibility for releasing, shifting, changing this. Given that suffering is conditioned, if the conditions are changed—and just hearing this teaching is a condition that leads to something potentially different happening—then when the conditions change, there can be a different unfolding. Experience does not have to follow in this very habitual way of leading to suffering.

Another thing that has been useful for me, a way to think about dependent origination, is that it essentially points to ways that our mind habitually works. But it is not a description of the way our minds necessarily work. It is possible to change our minds.

Key conditions. One of the key conditions is hearing the Dharma. And for some of us, hearing the Dharma lands in a way such that we are inspired to engage. It doesn't land that way for everybody. It has landed that way for all of you. So here you are, cultivating mindfulness and wisdom—conditions which alter the habitual processes that usually lead us to suffering.

Another thing I think about is this description of dependent origination as a description of how suffering comes to be. It's kind of a description of the tangle that we get caught in. It describes this tangle. And so understanding something about how our minds get tangled helps the untangling.

So this teaching on dependent origination, as I stated it earlier—I'll just name the links one more time. Ignorance conditions mental formations, conditions consciousness, conditions mentality-materiality, conditions the sense bases, conditions contact, conditions feeling, conditions craving, conditions clinging, conditions becoming, conditions birth, conditions old age and death, conditions the entire mass of suffering.

And there's an understanding, although it's not so explicit in the teachings on dependent origination, but elsewhere in the teachings the Buddha points to how suffering conditions ignorance much of the time. And so this chain of dependent origination becomes a wheel or a cycle, with the suffering that arises often—but not necessarily—conditioning more ignorance, which leads us back through this chain again.

This teaching on dependent origination has multiple ways we can look at it. Both of these different ways are supported by what's in the texts, what's in the suttas. One of the ways we can look at dependent origination is as a description of how suffering comes to be over a lifetime, or even over multiple lifetimes. The conditions from our past—ignorance from our past, mental formations from our past—are feeding into how we are now and in the future, creating suffering. Things from our distant past can be coming into our present, creating suffering now or perhaps creating suffering in the future. And so there's a kind of large time frame on which this teaching operates.

It is even understood as operating over multiple lifetimes. Conditions from previous lives may be arising, conditioning things in this life that we suffer in connection with. What we do in this life may condition suffering in a future life. And so the teaching is understood on this vast timeframe, describing how we are propelled through the cycle of suffering throughout our life here and also through multiple lives.

It is also understood in the texts as a description of how suffering arises right in this moment—the conditions in this moment that lead to suffering. The teaching also points to how we can release that suffering in this moment.

This perspective of dependent origination describing the arising of suffering moment to moment in our experience—this is the one that I have more direct experience with. I don't have direct experience with lifetime-to-lifetime understanding around this teaching. I have some sense of how things that happened long ago in this life, from my childhood, have played into how I suffer here and now. But at the same time, what I see is that play between past and present happens now, through the arising of a thought of the past right now. And so this moment-to-moment arising of conditionality is really where I'd like to focus this talk tonight.

I'm going to go through all twelve of these links, and I'm going to start not at the traditional beginning with ignorance, because in my own experience and understanding, these first four links were some of the most challenging to understand. What I'd like to start with tonight is where it's easier to understand—which is a lot of what we've actually talked about already. So I'll go through some of these links fairly quickly.

If we start with the fact that we are living, we are alive—we have a body and we're alive, we have consciousness and this physical being, mind and body—because of that, we have these sense bases. And with these sense bases as conditioned, because we're conscious, we experience contact with these sense bases. This is the six sense bases conditioning contact. We experience contact with the eye; there's contact through form and there's sight. With the ear, there's contact and hearing. With the nose, contact and smelling. These six sense bases—eye, ear, nose, tongue, the touch sense, and the sense base of the mind—with all of our sense bases there's this contact. We're alive and we experience contact.

With contact as condition, there is feeling—the feeling tone. We've talked a lot about feeling tone. Every sense contact, every sense impression on the five physical senses and in our mind includes this feeling tone: pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

With this feeling tone as condition—and we've explored this extensively—our habitual response to feeling is that when there's pleasant feeling, we like it, we want more of it. When there's unpleasant feeling, we don't like it, we want to push it away. We've also discussed how feeling tends to lead to craving, how it habitually leads to craving.

I want to point back to one of the early links that we didn't explore in depth. Feeling will lead to craving when there is ignorance in the mind—that very first link. When there is not understanding how suffering comes to be. This is what we sometimes call dependent co-arising. With ignorance at the head of our process, when ignorance is arising, feeling leads to craving. When ignorance is arising, feeling and craving come together; there's this co-arising where ignorance, feeling, and craving arise together.

But this is very habitual, very familiar. We're like automatons wanting to maximize pleasant and minimize unpleasant, usually missing the neutral altogether. So feeling leads to craving. You've all seen this—it's not mysterious. We've got our sense bases, there's contact, there's feeling, and often it leads to craving.

With craving as condition, clinging arises. In my sense, clinging is really an intensification of craving. The craving is like the leaning toward, the movement toward something, and the clinging is the latching onto it. Bhikkhu Bodhi offered a wonderful analogy: craving is like a thief reaching out to get something, and clinging is when they've picked it up to take it. That's the flavor of clinging.

Once something is clung to—and for me, at least experientially, this is something useful to become familiar with—we can sense the quality of these links, of each of these things. We know feeling, that quality of pleasant and unpleasant. Craving, to me, has a quality of leaning toward. Clinging has a quality of squeezing or constriction. The body almost feels like it squeezes around an idea, or it literally squeezes to pick something up. There's a feeling in there—clinging has that quality of holding, of contraction.

Once we have clung to something, the next link in the chain is becoming. This one we've touched on briefly. Becoming is in the realm of identification, the heading toward an identity. Once an experience is clung to, our whole system seems to rally in the service of that clinging—to have intentions and actions that follow through on it, to produce or to control. These intentions and actions that serve clinging, this is becoming.

Now, in my experience, becoming actually feels good. It's like this place in our minds where we feel like we've figured it out: "I know how to keep this thing. I know how to navigate my life. I know how to do this." There's a feeling of being in control, of having figured it out. This is becoming. Becoming feels good.

So it's this heading in a direction. We haven't quite landed yet, in a way, with becoming and birth. Birth, in this understanding of the moment-to-moment teaching of dependent origination...

Birth refers to birth into an identity—really landing in "this is who I am. I am this person." It's a solidification of that becoming. In a similar way to how craving and clinging exist on a gradation, I see becoming and birth, or becoming and identity, as being on a gradation from one to the other. We're reaching towards something, we think we've got it figured out, and then we land in the birth.

Sometimes the birth can feel like we've really got it under control, but with birth comes the recognition that now I have to make sure I stay here. This is that vipariṇāma dukkha, the suffering of change. And sometimes we can take birth into something unpleasant. We definitely can take birth into unpleasant identities. I got really good at that with self-hatred, seeing that process. Sometimes it's amazing to think that we actually have intentions that rally in the service of self-hatred, but we do. We can see this. We can see that there's a wanting to have that, because we think it serves us in some way.

With this birth, there will either be suffering in the nature of the birth itself—in my experience of taking birth into self-hatred, it was just unpleasant in and of itself—or even if we take birth into something we think is a good identity, in that moment of taking birth there's a recognition of "whoa, this is not very stable." Some piece of us understands it's not very stable and that it is destined to fall apart. This is old age and death. Once we take birth, we inevitably will suffer, either through the nature of the identity itself being painful, or through the understanding that this identity, even if it's a great one, is not going to last.

Let me offer an example to make this clearer. One thing that's been coming up for a lot of you is this notion of being a good practitioner. So an idea of maybe being a good yogi arises in the mind. This is contact—contact with the sense base of the mind, the idea of being a good yogi. The feeling of that, like an idea or a fantasy in the mind, the feeling of being a good yogi—that feels pretty good, so it's a pleasant experience.

Based on that pleasant experience there's a wish, a desire, a movement towards wanting to make that a reality, wanting to follow through, to have that fantasy or idea become a reality. That's the craving. And then with that comes the clinging, the intensification of that, which would be the fixed idea or belief that in order to be happy, in order to be okay, I need to be this good yogi. There's a belief that it's necessary—I will not be happy unless I get this, unless I can be this good practitioner, whatever this idea is we have in our mind about what a good practitioner is.

And then the becoming—from that clinging, that sense of necessity, comes these intentions and actions to make it happen. Intentions rally in the service of that idea, that thing we think is a necessity. We start engaging in behaviors, maybe sitting long hours or walking really slowly or whatever we think being a good yogi is.

Let's say for simplicity's sake that these activities have you seeing some things and create the sense of "oh, I am a good yogi." Birth. We take birth in that. "I am a good yogi." We have this distinct feeling of having accomplished or created what we wanted in order to be happy. This creates the sense of self, this birth into identity, and augments the distinction between self and others. In this sense of being a good yogi, we may also be checking everybody else out as to whether they're good yogis or not, and whether we're the best yogi.

And yet, even if this lasts for some time, having taken birth into this sense of being a good yogi, at some point something's going to happen. Many of you have reported this kind of thing where something happens. Suddenly we don't seem to be able to stay with our breath as long as we want to. Something has shifted, and there's a crash. Based on what our idea of being a good yogi is—and I think this is where a lot of the suffering comes from, the idea of what a good yogi is—we're not measuring up to that anymore. We're not measuring up to our own sense of what that is, and then we suffer.

I went through this over and over again. Taking a step and feeling "oh, I can be right with that step," and step, and right with that step, and then suddenly the mind wanders and within seconds it's good yogi, bad yogi, good yogi, bad yogi.

So much pain, so much suffering around this.

The cycle of this chain reinforces itself in certain ways, and one of those ways has to do with the feeling tone associated with some of these links. Wanting, for instance—when we actually touch into the experience of wanting, that feeling of leaning that I talked about—when we notice that feeling too, we recognize that craving is a mental formation. It has a feeling tone, and it generally feels unpleasant when we actually touch into it.

We often miss that unpleasantness because we are thinking about what we're going to get. We're not really clearly seeing the unpleasantness of the wanting in the direct moment's experience. This wanting is unpleasant. Then when we get what we want, when we cling and move into becoming, that's pleasant. There's something pleasant there—the pleasantness of having the thing that we want, the pleasantness of the feeling of control in that becoming. There's also the pleasantness of the unpleasant wanting going away. And that's actually a really powerful driver.

That wanting, that quality of leaning in, that unpleasantness of wanting, the feeling of offness around the wanting—that goes away for a moment when we get something that we want. And yet, getting the thing that we want isn't very reliable. It kind of falls apart relatively quickly. In that falling apart, our minds go something like, "Well, the last time I felt pretty good was when I got something I wanted. So what can I want in order to get it so that I can feel good again?"

This perpetuates the cycle—basically wanting to want in order to get rid of the wanting. That's actually what's going on. We want to want in order that the wanting go away.

So that's the kind of easy part of the chain in a way, the part that maybe we have a little bit of experience with in our practice so far. But we actually have experience with this other part too, at the beginning of the links. Let me come to the beginning here and review these first parts of the chain.

With suffering, once suffering has arisen, as I said earlier, that suffering tends to condition ignorance. The definition of ignorance in the texts is not knowing about suffering, not knowing about the arising of suffering, not knowing about the cessation of suffering, not knowing about the way leading to the cessation of suffering. This is called ignorance. Ignorance here is not ignorance about how to drive a car or how to cook a zucchini, but ignorance about this process of suffering.

The Buddha said that when suffering happens, it leads to either bewilderment, confusion, more ignorance—or in certain situations, it leads to search. This is said to be what happened for him when he met suffering. It's said that he had the thought, "Does anyone know a way out of this suffering?" And so this is the beginning of search, this searching for a way out of suffering.

If we hear some teachings and gain some faith in the teachings, this puts us onto the process that leads us, in the same kind of conditioned nature, toward freedom. Suffering can also lead to faith when it comes into contact with some curiosity and search and hearing a teaching. This is pointing in the direction of transcendent dependent origination, toward freedom.

But very often, suffering leads right back to ignorance. Because we don't understand suffering. We think we need to adjust the world to deal with suffering. We have to get rid of what's unpleasant. We have to get what's pleasant. This is just the fundamental misunderstanding, and this is the driver of this chain.

Ignorance—suffering not being understood—this is why mindfulness is so powerful in our practice. When mindfulness is present, it has the capacity to see into suffering in a new way. Ignorance generally thinks that having what we want will lead to happiness, following that kind of belief. And we've seen this doesn't go very far toward a deeper kind of happiness. It can lead to a certain kind of happiness—that happiness of sense pleasure, the happiness of getting what we want. It is a kind of happiness.

The Buddha pointed to it as a kind of happiness. But he also said it is pretty much the least kind of happiness that's possible for us as human beings. Caught in this ignorance, we think that kind of happiness is as good as it gets. And so we stay stuck on that wheel.

Ignorance conditions what we do with our minds—this ignorance about not understanding suffering. Based on not understanding suffering, we make choices. We decide how we're going to engage. We tend to go for what we want, get rid of what we don't want. We think this kind of happiness is as good as it gets. That's how we organize our lives. And this organization is mental formations.

Not understanding suffering, we choose things, we decide things, we act based on conditioned habits and patterns. Due to ignorance, we usually take the most obvious move to get rid of unpleasant sensations and to have pleasant sensations. We go for the quick fix, the quick hit. And while we think we're making ourselves happy, this is actually digging us deeper into the cycle, because we're reinforcing this pattern: I got something pleasant, that felt good. Oh, it goes away. Well, find something else to want. It just reinforces that. This ignorance reinforces that. And so with ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be.

I want to talk a little bit about this link not just internally, not just in our own minds. Because the ignorance that we have in our minds around how happiness comes to be, what we can do to make ourselves feel good—this is not simply what's happening in our own hearts and minds. We learn from our families, our cultures. We're taught this same pattern. And so there's a way in which it's not only ignorance in our own hearts and minds, but a kind of collective ignorance that leads to collective mental formations around how we engage in the world.

We can think of culture as being shared mental formations—shared views, shared ideas, shared beliefs. And we teach these to each other. So our ignorance is not just our own. It's coming to us through conditioning, through our families, through our fellow playmates on the playground, through what we see on media. We learn what to believe, what to think.

This kind of ignorance and mental formation that comes through our culture is hard for us to see because it's shared with people around us. We share beliefs and values and we think that's what it is to be human. That's what a good human being is—what I've learned to be. But it's just these views and opinions and beliefs that we've been shaped with.

These mental formations—we have so many that we have absorbed through our culture. Some of these really create suffering not only for ourselves but in our culture as a whole. Views and beliefs around race, around sexual orientation, around climate change. These are mental formations, shared mental formations. And yet we sometimes think of mental formations as just something happening in my own mind. But these things that happen in our own mind affect how we engage in the world, how we meet each other, care for each other, hate each other, hurt each other. This is an important piece to begin to be curious about—these mental formations that are shaped collectively.

With mental formation as condition—whether mental formations coming from our own habits and patterns, based in ignorance, some of them our own particular flavors, like my own flavor of self-hatred that was my own, and some of them more cultural or collective mental formations—with these mental formations as condition, the next link arises: consciousness comes to be.

My understanding of this is that with these views, these ideas, these beliefs, with the arising of a particular state of mind that's a mental formation—such as anger, for instance—that shapes what consciousness becomes aware of. We seem to think of ourselves as being like cameras and microphones just picking up everything that's out there. But that's not quite the way our minds work. Based on our views, based on whatever our mind state is, based on even something as simple as an agenda, our consciousness is shaped to select some things out of the vast incoming data and not select other things.

One term is selective attention. When we have a focus on something, have an agenda to do something, our minds tend to focus down on that and we will not see things that are not relevant to that agenda. Really not see them.

I was watching a show on perception—I think it was on PBS, a television show about how the brain works and perception. They did a lot of experiments helping you to see these things in your own mind. There was one where they said, "Okay, watch this magic trick. They're going to do a magic trick and you need to figure out how the keys get out of the cup." He put some keys in the cup and then later the keys were gone or something. It was a pretty simple kind of magic trick.

I watched really closely. I was focused on that magic trick, trying to see what he did. Maybe I saw it—I'm not sure really that I saw what it was. But I was really focused in on that magic trick. That was the agenda: see how that magic trick works. Then they said, "Okay, did you figure that out?" And they showed us how it worked. Then they said, "And did you see the guy in the giant bunny suit that walked by?"

I had not seen the guy in the giant bunny suit. It was really obvious. Selective attention had consciousness seeing some things and not seeing other things. This is important to recognize—that we are not seeing everything that's out there.

Then there's another term, confirmation bias, which has been in the news a lot lately. Given particular views, opinions, beliefs, given particular perspectives, we tend to—this is well studied psychologically—we tend to pick things out of the environment that confirm those beliefs and not see things that disconfirm them. These are ways that our minds function. Knowing that our minds do this can help us to not assume we know more than we do.

So with mental formation as condition—with beliefs, views, emotions—we see certain things, we don't see other things. Consciousness. And with consciousness as condition, what is arising in our consciousness with these views and beliefs and ideas or emotions tends to shape the rest of our system, our mental and physical processes.

Just imagine the arising of anger, for instance, a mental formation shaping our consciousness. We're picking certain things out of the environment with that anger, not other things. The quality of mind, the consciousness, is filtered by this quality of anger. This tends to shape not only what we perceive, what we pull out of the environment, what we know—it shapes what we feel. When we're experiencing anger, we tend to orient towards things that confirm that anger or reify that anger.

At one point I was practicing walking meditation, and I was experiencing aversion. I often experienced aversion doing walking meditation with other people in the room. I was just noticing the aversion, just doing my back and forth walking, and at one point I turned around and somebody had put their shoes at the end of my walking path. My mind just exploded with aversion to these shoes. This was very unpleasant. The anger was shaping how the mind perceived the experience. If I'd been experiencing love and connection—I can imagine there were a few times I experienced that—if I had turned around and seen the shoes in that situation, very different experience shaped.

When mental formations are arising in the mind, it shapes our bodies, it shapes what we perceive, what we think, what we feel. And so here we are with a body and a mind. And there's contact. We're back where we started—contact. Only now we see that it's not just a simple "oh, there's a sight coming into the eye." It's already been filtered and chosen and pulled out based on views and ideas and opinions.

This is another way the cycle tends to perpetuate itself. Because those views and ideas that shape our mind tend to have us orient towards receiving information that further shapes those same things. The cycle tends to reinforce itself.

And yet it is not hopeless. Because this chain—it's a chain that describes conditions—it's not lockstep, it's not cause-effect, cause-effect, cause-effect. It's conditions.

And if the conditions change, the whole cycle can shift. The main conditions that help change this cycle, that help it move in a different direction, are understanding—understanding suffering, that root point of the chain, the ignorance. Shifting the conditions so that we understand suffering. Mindfulness and wisdom are really the tools that support a change of this pattern.

The teachings emphasize in various ways—there are many teachings in the suttas that point to mindfulness of feeling as a very powerful tool that helps to shift the conditions of this unfolding. Feeling leads to craving, leads to clinging, leads to becoming, leads to birth, suffering. When we bring mindfulness to the feeling tone of experience, we have the opportunity to see that as an arising, to see the feeling. Seeing the feeling itself, just the seeing of the feeling with mindfulness, helps the mind to not necessarily do its automatic shift to craving. Sometimes just the awareness of feeling can short circuit that movement towards craving, towards greed and aversion around pleasant and unpleasant. Clearly experiencing the feeling tone with mindfulness is bringing wisdom to feeling tone. It's bringing wisdom in there. And so that's often a place where there's an emphasis around breaking this chain of dependent origination at this feeling-craving link. There definitely are a lot of instructions around feeling tone—looking at feeling tone, understanding feeling tone—in the suttas that really help us orient towards this as a very crucial practice.

And yet there are also teachings—one particular teaching that I really have resonated with. It's in the Majjhima Nikāya, Majjhima 9, called Right View. In that text, it looks at every single link of dependent origination. It doesn't exactly talk about dependent origination as such, but it talks about every single link. And it points to how you can practice with that link so that there can be freedom. Any link, any place where we notice, any place where mindfulness can join—whether it's with craving or clinging or becoming or ignorance—the teaching says, around clinging for example, that one can understand clinging, one can understand the arising of clinging, one can understand the ending of clinging, and the way leading to the ending of clinging. And in that seeing, in that clear seeing, freedom will be right there.

When I first learned about dependent origination, I thought I had to stop the experience at feeling, and that that was the only way to come to an end of suffering. But this teaching just spoke right to my heart. It's like, wherever you wake up, if you're noticing anger, notice that. Freedom is possible right there through the seeing of how it arises, how it ends. Understanding it. This really is uprooting the ignorance that's coming along with whatever's happening—that co-arising of ignorance.

When we're caught in this chain, this cycle, ignorance is arising. To me, this is the co-arising. It's like when ignorance is arising, the entire twelve links are picked up all at once. When ignorance arises, we are already suffering. And so the real medicine is seeing through that ignorance. And wherever we are, mindfulness and wisdom can penetrate that.

I had this really shocking experience. I mentioned my self-hatred retreat at one point, where I was seeing self-hatred. It was a three-month retreat where self-hatred was really predominant, and so I was looking at it a lot. I watched it from many different ways, many different perspectives. I had the belief that, well, I guess this is my self-hatred retreat and enlightenment will have to wait. That's kind of what I was thinking. And yet I was pretty dedicated about looking at the self-hatred.

One evening, in being right there—there had been a lot of freeing around the self-hatred that had allowed me to be able to meet it—I was watching it arise, watching it arise, just seeing these little weavings of self-hatred coming together and just noting it immediately. Oh, there it is. That's it arising. It's unpleasant. Contact unpleasant. I was actually using that note: contact unpleasant. As soon as I noticed this little flavor of self-hatred, contact unpleasant. And as the mind sat with that, at one point it saw so clearly—the mind saw that this was just an arising. It was just an arising. It was just a thought. And in an instant, with that wisdom—it's just a thought—that whole pattern just fell apart. Not completely. But that moment was really powerful.

It was like a tree was uprooted. But I still see just little wisps of that pattern every now and then, just little wisps of it. But the belief is not there anymore.

And so that understanding—what was uprooted really was the belief that it was me.

That mindfulness and wisdom, meeting whatever's arising—that was a moment that really changed my life. That moment. Right in the midst of self-hatred, deep understanding. Deep understanding.

And so truly, wherever you are, whatever you are meeting, that is where freedom is possible. And that, to me, is the good news of this teaching.

We are not stuck with this cycle. Freedom is possible.

Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 66

Mettā Practice: All Beings

Andrea Fella · 47 min

In this guided meditation talk, Andrea Fella explores the culmination of mettā practice—extending loving-kindness to all beings. She begins by reflecting on the value of the traditional Theravāda commentary method, which works through categories of beings (self, benefactor, dear friend, neutral person, difficult person) before opening to all beings. This systematic approach, she explains, reveals where we encounter resistance or "rub" in our hearts—discovering that while we may easily wish all beings well in the abstract, specific individuals may challenge our open-heartedness.

Fella then introduces the sutta-based approach to mettā, drawing particularly from Bhikkhu Anālayo's teachings on the directional radiation practice found in the Pāli canon. Rather than focusing on specific beings, this method involves pervading the six directions—front, sides, back, above, and below—with the quality of loving-kindness. She emphasizes that this practice isn't about pushing mettā outward but rather gently allowing it to expand, like drawing back a curtain to let light spread naturally into space.

The guided meditation integrates both approaches: first gathering the five categories of beings into a group and practicing with "may we be happy," which evokes the non-exclusive, mutual nature of mettā. Then practitioners are guided to connect with whatever taste of open-heartedness is present and allow that feeling to radiate through the body and into space in all directions. This practice points to mettā's immeasurable quality—abundant, exalted, without hostility or ill will—embracing all beings seen and unseen.

And today we'll explore the metta practice in relationship to all beings.

The practices we've been exploring have followed the standard Theravada method of metta practice, which comes from the commentaries more than from the suttas, using categories of beings. From my perspective, one of the real benefits of this method is that we get to see where the rub is with individual beings before we explore opening to all beings.

The teachings in the suttas basically just express this: one should abide pervading the directions with loving kindness. And it can be easy to deceive ourselves, to delude ourselves, thinking, "Oh yes, I do wish all beings to be happy." But if a particular being were to come to mind—maybe not that person.

And so the use of self, benefactor, and dear friend begins to help us see where metta is generally somewhat easier. With benefactor, it's often easier. Often it's easier with self, though for some of us it's not as easy. But then we get to the dear friend, and with someone we often think it should be easy, we frequently remember incidents. "Oh, but they did that thing." And it gets in the way of our open heart. We see that with specific individuals, it may not be so easy to simply say, "May all beings be happy."

And so we explore the specifics in this way, with the teachings from the commentary helping us recognize where we may have a little bit of challenge with the feeling of metta in offering metta to particular beings.

With the neutral person, sometimes there's more a sense of not caring so much or not feeling a connection. For others it may actually feel easier to offer metta to a neutral person because there isn't the specific history. In some ways, the neutral person is really a stand-in for all beings, because the vast majority of beings on the planet are neutral to us. We don't know the vast majority of beings, and so that neutral person begins to point to any rub we might have about connecting with this deep wish for well-being for all beings.

With the neutral person, we also realize that we have to connect more. The connection with somebody we don't know needs to come from the place of just our common humanity, our shared humanity. Sitting in the Vipassana practice, looking at our own minds and hearts, we see what goes on in our own minds and hearts—how hard it is to be a human being, what our joys and sorrows are like at a human level. That's the level at which we can connect with all beings: just our common humanity.

And then of course the difficult person really begins to reveal the rub, where it's truly hard to wish this person well. We begin to recognize that we can not close a being out of our hearts, even if the actions of that being have been unskillful. Wishing a difficult person well isn't about saying or converting any sense of something that person did that was unskillful. We don't have to dismiss that or push it under the rug. What we explore is not closing our hearts to beings even though there have been unskillful actions. We can see this in our own hearts and minds too—that we have behaved unskillfully at times. Again, the humanness of that. And so there's some sense of keeping the heart open, even for challenging beings.

In exploring metta to all beings, we are taking in all of these categories of beings. There are different ways to explore metta to all beings. We can simply use the phrases: "May all beings be happy. May all beings be healthy. May all beings be safe. May all beings live with ease." And just continue with this holding of all beings in mind.

Yet it can be challenging to envision all beings. One way I've practiced with this form is to just allow my mind to wander through the planet, let those phrases come, and let my mind envision beings—human beings, non-human beings, insects and spiders and snakes, this person or that person. We can let the metta be infused with a little bit of specificity as we let our mind roam through the world of beings.

Another way to express the wishes for all beings is through certain phrases that help us connect to all beings in different ways. "May all beings be happy. May all breathing beings be happy." For me, that actually evokes something different. "May all breathing beings be happy. May all living beings be happy. May all personalities be happy." These are just different ways to frame or language all beings in our minds. Sometimes that evokes something for us that can support the quality of metta.

The way that metta is taught in the suttas, using directions, is what I'd really like to explore today. This will be the main approach I'll offer in the guided meditation—this use of directions for the metta practice.

The texts say, and I think you've chanted this, at least those of you who've been here in the evenings: I'll read this part with respect to loving-kindness.

"I will abide pervading one quarter." One quarter here means a quarter section of space—the quarter of space in front of us. If we're dividing the space, this 360-degree space around us, into four pie-shaped pieces: front quarter, to the first side, to the back, to the second side, and then above and below.

This is what the instructions are pointing to: "I will abide pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with kindness. Likewise the second, the second quarter, the second direction. Likewise the third, likewise the fourth. So above and below, around and everywhere, and to all as to myself. I will abide pervading the all-encompassing world with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will."

The teacher I first really connected with for the radiating metta practice was Bhikkhu Anālayo. He uses the sutta teachings in his practice for metta, and that's a piece of what I'd like to offer in the guided meditation—how he explores this.

The way it starts is basically to connect to something that gives you a taste of the flavor of metta. In one of the questions this morning, somebody asked about doing the metta practice when there were times the feeling was just there. It felt really good, and so there was this question about whether that was kind of cheating, or not what they were supposed to be doing if they were supposed to be sending it to others.

Well, in this form of practice, that's where we start—connecting with this feeling as best we can, and then exploring the possibility of just letting that feeling spread out in space, in this direction to the front, as far as it wants to go. In this style of practice, we aren't even necessarily needing to think about the beings. This is about feeling the quality and allowing the quality to expand as far as it wants to into space.

My image of this is that whatever beings are in that space, they receive that metta. And so it's pervading the space, which is what the teachings here in the suttas encourage about this practice: "I will abide pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with kindness." It's not particularly pointing to any particular beings, and yet as we pervade the space, there's a sense of the metta kind of washing over whoever's in that space—whatever beings in the air, walking around on the ground, small beings, medium-sized beings, large beings, seen and unseen. Just allowing that feeling to spread.

When Bhikkhu Anālayo taught this, the thing that really struck me is that he encouraged not trying to push the metta out. He said it's as if you have a curtain with a light behind it. You gently open the curtain partway, and that light would just expand, spread into the space. If the light is like a candle, it may spread so far. If it's a spotlight, it may spread further. We don't have to try to have an agenda to push the metta. It's more just allowing it to go as far as it wants to in this form of practice.

We'll explore this in the guided meditation, but to begin with, there are really two parts. One is a technique of allowing the individuals we have been working with to come together. We'll call them up one by one—yourself, your benefactor, your dear friend, your neutral person, your difficult person—and it will be as if we're creating a little group of folks standing with us. Then we'll explore the possibility of offering metta for this group. This group essentially is a stand-in for the whole variety of different kinds of beings that are out there for us. It's just a way into beginning to generate some of this quality of metta. Then we'll shift to the directional practice.

Allow yourself to find a comfortable, relaxed posture. It is often helpful to let the attention rest in the area of the heart, maybe having the feeling of breathing through the heart center. Just opening to whatever is there. An act of kindness to yourself—to not have to have it be any different than it already is. That itself is metta for yourself, this allowing your heart to be as it is.

Allow yourself to call yourself to mind, however that is easiest for you—either just this experience of sitting here, or maybe an image of yourself. Put your hand on your heart if it's supportive to connect to this area.

We'll start with the phrases, just for yourself for a few moments:

May I be happy.
May I be healthy.
May I be safe.
May I live with ease.

Let yourself see how that lands in this area of your heart, to make those wishes.

For another minute or so, just in whatever phrases are most resonant for you, wishing yourself well.

Now, allowing your benefactor to join you—either standing face to face or side by side, whatever feels most comfortable for you. Letting your benefactor in your imagination stand or sit or lie with you, and allowing them to join with you in offering metta to both of you together.

May we be happy. May we be healthy. May we be safe. May we live with ease.

This begins to evoke part of the quality of metta not being exclusive—that in wishing metta to more than ourselves, we are also wishing it for ourselves.

May we be happy.

Taking another few minutes to connect with your benefactor in this way, the two of you offering metta to each other.

And then allowing your dear friend to join you. The three of you standing together.

May we be happy. May we be healthy. May we be safe. May we live with ease.

It can be fine too to play within your imagination with where you are located on the planet.

And allowing your neutral person to join the circle, join the group, however you find yourselves situated. And if you can't have a sense of the neutral person joining in, or don't have that sense arise, that's fine. Just continuing with this reflection. The four of you standing together.

May we be happy. May we be healthy. May we be safe. May we live with ease.

To me this also evokes that this metta, the metta quality, is not giving over our happiness for the happiness of others. It is a mutual wish for all of us to be happy.

And then letting the person with whom you have some difficulty also join the group. And exploring the possibility of continuing the wish.

May we all be happy. May we all be healthy. May we all be safe. May we all live with ease.

Continuing for a few minutes to explore this offering of well-wishing to each other, in whatever words or phrases are most resonant for you.

If you have in this exploration a taste of even a small kind of sense of openheartedness or well-wishing, that can be the starting point for the next part. And if this part has been challenging for you, then I invite you to bring to mind a being that makes you smile. And that smile, that quality—that's where we can begin here.

So with that quality, however subtle or however it may feel for you, first an exploration of recognizing that the feeling is inside. Perhaps a feeling of it being inside, and allowing that feeling to just spread from wherever it is through the tissues, through the heart, maybe through the chest and bones of the body in the front of your body.

And as it is possible, maybe envisioning this curtain that Analayo talked about—drawing back a curtain and allowing that feeling to just spread as far through this body and into space, maybe like bubbling off of the body into space, as far as it wants to go. Sometimes in doing this I have a sense that it just goes maybe a few inches out, sometimes further, sometimes more expansively, and this fluctuates. So just connecting to this feeling.

And you can refresh the feeling if you wish, contemplating your group of five wishing each other well, or this being that makes you smile. And then letting the feeling expand into space in front of you as far as it wants to go.

And then allowing the curtain to open a little further to the second quarter. Letting the feeling pervade through that part of the body in that direction. Bubbling, rippling, perhaps a feeling of waves or just energy moving outwards in space to the side, as far as it wants to go. And any beings in that space, seen or unseen, small, medium, or large—they get to participate in that quality.

And allowing the curtain to open still further around the third quarter, to behind you. Exploring letting the metta also, the feeling also, pervade through the tissues and bones and spaces of the body in the backward direction, bubbling off, rippling off the body to the rear, as well as to the front and side, just as far as it wants to go.

Sometimes in my exploration of this, there's a sense of certain directions being easier than others, and that's fine. Just noticing how it is for each direction. In a way this is kind of analogous to expanding our awareness—we're allowing our metta to expand as far as it wants to go.

And I find relaxation really helpful here. We're not pushing.

Then allowing the curtain to open to the fourth direction, allowing the feeling to penetrate through the body. I think of it as starting in the heart, penetrating through the spaces and tissues and bones of that side of the body—perhaps tingling or bubbling or rippling through, then bubbling off the surface and expanding into space as far as it wants to go. To the front, to the first side, to the rear, to the second side. This is allowing the feeling and letting it expand as it wishes.

Then, as though there were a curtain underneath you, letting that quality pervade the body in the direction down towards the floor, towards the earth. Allow the metta to go through the earth as far as it wants to go. We don't have to think about the earth as being a block—it's very porous, the earth. The metta can go right through it.

And then the final direction: above. Gently drawing back the curtain above us, allowing the feeling to move through the body upwards, through the shoulders and neck and head, off the top of the head into space. In all directions, however far the quality wishes to expand. To the front, to the side, to the back, to the other side, below and above—in all directions.

If it feels like it dims or weakens, just refresh the connection with the quality. Whatever way is supportive for you—it may be through the use of a couple of phrases, or thinking of a particular being that makes you smile, or thinking about your benefactor offering you metta. Then let that feeling spread as far as it wants to, into space, in all directions.

CHAPTER 67

Not Knowing

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this profound dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella examines one of our deepest human tendencies: the persistent desire to know what will happen next. She reveals how this wanting to know actually obscures a fundamental truth—that we genuinely have no idea what the next moment will bring. As mindfulness deepens, practitioners begin to touch this truth directly, seeing moment-to-moment experience arising without any ability to predict or control what comes next.

Fella explores how views, beliefs, and concepts—particularly those connected to a sense of self—create the illusion of knowing. Drawing on the classic Buddhist teaching of the blind people and the elephant, she illustrates how we construct partial views based on limited experience and then mistake them for complete truth. She references the Aṭṭhakavagga from the Sutta Nipāta, noting that "those attached to perception and views roam the world offending people." The Buddha particularly cautioned against creating views from meditative experiences, as even profound states can become sources of clinging.

The talk addresses the discomfort that arises when we genuinely open to not knowing—feelings of vulnerability, fear, and insecurity. Fella distinguishes between reacting to the idea of not knowing versus actually meeting the present moment, sharing how she discovered that "every step was known" even while the mind projected fear about an imagined unknown future. Using Joseph Goldstein's skydiving analogy, she describes the practice as a progressive letting go—from initial enthusiasm, through fear of releasing, to the eventual realization that there is no ground, only endless changing conditions. This recognition, rather than being terrifying, becomes a profound relief and liberation.

What happens next?

This question of what happens next is such a driving force in us as human beings. We so want to know. We want to know what will happen next, what will happen tomorrow, what will happen next week, twenty years from now.

I've heard some of this in the meetings over the last few days, especially from those of you who are leaving—a sense of uncertainty about how it's going to be when you're home. And I know for myself at this point in the retreat, as a yogi staying for three months, there's a little bit of that same uncertainty. The first time I stayed three months, I didn't know the teachers that were coming in, and that was pretty uncomfortable. My mind was turning over: How's it going to be? What's going to happen?

This tendency we have to want to know what's next is butting up against the truth that we have no idea what's going to happen next. Really, really no idea.

The more we practice—both on the large arc of practice in our lives and also on a retreat of this length—we begin to touch into this truth more directly. Actually, there are times when it feels like we're directly touching into this truth that we don't know what's going to happen next, but it may actually be more of an understanding of this truth.

We can understand this truth on many levels. On the more gross levels, very fundamentally, we do not know when our last breath will be. Accidents happen every day. Every day someone wakes up in the morning and it's their last day alive, yet they're not aware of that.

On a more refined level, a more moment-to-moment level, as the mindfulness gets stronger and more continuous, we start to see that moment to moment we really don't have any idea what the next arising will be. This became more obvious to me as I practiced, as I shifted from a directed attention to a more receptive kind of attention, a more open awareness where I wasn't consciously deciding what to pay attention to. Just this endless—sometimes it felt like an onslaught—of experience, and no idea what the next moment would bring.

This truth that we don't know what the next moment will bring is not a mistake. It doesn't have to be a problem. And yet our mind habitually comes back to this question: What's next? What's next? Thinking somehow that having an idea of what's next will control the uncontrollable.

This truth is related to the truth of impermanence—the changing nature of experience, the uncontrollable nature of experience. As we come more and more fully into the present moment, we see this truth more clearly.

There are so many ways that our minds obscure this truth, that we miss it in our everyday lives. Even here on retreat we miss it. A big part of what's in the way, what's obscuring this truth that we don't know what the next moment will bring, are our views, beliefs, agendas, thoughts—especially those connected to a sense of I, me, and mine.

We carry ideas about what's happened in the past, thoughts and views about what's happened before, into the present moment. And somehow our mind thinks, "Well, what's happened before, that's what's going to keep happening." Views and beliefs about who we are, what we do, what we're capable of. What we think we have been capable of, we project that this is what we will be capable of. We box ourselves in with these views based on what we think about ourselves, what other people think about us. We box other people in based on what we think about them—carrying our ideas and views and beliefs from the past into the present moment.

What might it mean to open to the possibility that we're not what we think we are?

We project into the future this idea of knowing, of thinking that we know what will happen, in ways that are so subtle. Like just sitting here this evening, you might envision what tomorrow will be like. Maybe you don't know exactly what it'll be like, but you have the sense that you'll wake up in the bed in the room that you've been in. We just feel like we know what's going to happen.

These ideas and concepts of what has happened, we take to be what will happen. At one point this nature of the mind got pointed out to me—this tendency to pick up yesterday and put it onto tomorrow, or pick up today and put it onto tomorrow. That's what it's going to be like. Or pick up last Tuesday and that's what tomorrow Tuesday is going to be like. Oh, it's Monday—pick up last Monday and that's what tomorrow Monday is going to be like.

When I joined the Peace Corps, I had a very odd experience as I was flying. I got on the plane and left my friends behind, left my house behind, packed everything up—everything that I was going to have for the next two years in a couple of suitcases—and flew to this little island in the South Pacific. I'd read some materials; this was part of this wanting to know. I tried to educate myself about what the place would be like, what I might see there, what the culture was like.

But as I was flying in the airplane, I had this very odd experience of thinking—it was kind of like my mind believed I wasn't going to get there because I couldn't envision it. I could not imagine what tomorrow would be like. It was a very strange experience. And then when we did arrive, it was this interesting realization: oh, okay, here I am. This is where I am now. I get in this line, get my passport stamped. Okay, I can do that. I didn't know what was on the other side of customs and immigration. But each moment was just the next thing, the next thing, the next thing. And that is actually how things unfold.

It was such a clear experience for me of how much we pick things up, how we create the future and then live that creation so much of the time, rather than really entering into just what's here, what's actually here.

When we carry things from the past into the present, when we carry things from the past and the present into the future, we also construct this present moment. We live in a constructed present, and mostly we are not so clearly aware of that. Everything that we experience, without exception, is a creation of our minds.

I'm not saying that there's not stuff out there. At least I think that you're out there, and I'm not just some brain in a vat imagining giving a dharma talk. I think this is happening. But what I'm saying is that my experience—the only thing I can touch—is a creation of this mind. And the same is true for you. All that we experience is a creation of our minds, and yet so often we do not recognize this. We take that creation to be what's out there, what's actually there.

This concept-making, this perception and conceptualization, is a huge way that this not-knowing is obscured. Really entering into this truth—that we do not know what this moment, this next moment will bring, that this unfolding is a mystery—becomes difficult. And a big piece of that obscuration is because our minds believe the concepts we are constructing to be reality.

This concept-making is useful, and so I'm not advocating that we live without concepts. I think our cultures might descend into chaos if we didn't have concepts and shared ideas—yes, we have breakfast at this time, lunch at this time. These shared values, these shared senses of things matter. And yet to not recognize that this is a construction of mind is a major way we mistakenly take what is impermanent to be permanent, what is unreliable to be reliable, what is uncontrollable to be controllable.

With this kind of understanding of concepts, thoughts, and views, we don't have to get rid of them. Perceptions—we're probably not going to be able to get rid of them. But we can know that they are concepts, they are thoughts, they are views. Understand concept as concept. Understand a view as a view, a perception as a perception. And we are recognizing these too as simply arisings—impermanent arisings in the mind.

As we see our thoughts, our perceptions, our concepts as something that's just arising, we get closer to meeting or touching into, fully opening to this truth that we do not know. So much of our belief that we know is tied up in our ideas around concepts. And when we see this concept being constructed as an arising, we see it's not what's actually out there. It is just something the mind is making up. It is creating it. It is imagining it.

And yet, as I said, the mind actually does a pretty good job of imagining. It does a pretty good job of being somewhat in the vicinity of what's going on out there. And yet, as we start to see this process of concept-making, even the aspect of perception—which is a more rudimentary form of a concept, just a bare recognition of what's happening—we see that they're really prone to making mistakes.

Recognizing concept as concept, recognizing perception as perception, we can hold it lightly and recognize: this is my perception, this is what I am understanding at this point.

The Buddha pointed to this danger around concepts, to how views and perceptions can really create a lot of suffering in our world. There's a famous teaching story of the elephant and the blind people. Many of you may be familiar with a version of this story, and it's found in the Buddhist texts.

In this teaching story, a king asked an elephant trainer to bring an elephant before a gathering of blind people in his kingdom. The trainer showed each person a different part of the elephant, telling each one, "This is an elephant." Some touched the legs, some the tail, some the trunk, some the side. When asked afterward to describe what an elephant is like, they each offered their understanding. Those who touched the leg said an elephant is like a post. Those who touched the tail said an elephant is like a broom. Those who touched the side said an elephant is like the wall of a storeroom. The story tells us they came to blows over what an elephant truly is—"An elephant is like this! An elephant is not like that!"

In this story, I notice there's a kind of deception happening, because the person showing each one the elephant said, "This is an elephant." They were being encouraged to create the view that this part was the whole elephant. Yet this kind of thing happens to us all the time. We create views based on direct experience. This is really pointing to something important: our views aren't constructed out of complete imagination—they're built on our experience. But we don't see that we're only getting a small piece of the picture. We think we have the whole picture when we've only got a part of it. And so we take our view to be the truth of what something is.

This story cautions us about creating views out of direct experience. What's so important is to recognize that they are views. When we can recognize, "Oh, this is a view," then perhaps we can hear other views. If we're not taking our view to be absolute truth, we can have a discussion, put the pieces together.

One of my favorite quotes from the suttas comes from the Aṭṭhakavagga, a text in the Sutta Nipāta. It goes something like: "Those attached to perception and views roam the world offending people." Holding tightly to views, we aren't able to see clearly.

The Buddha particularly cautioned us around views related to meditative experience. In the sutta Bhante has been mentioning—the teaching on the all-embracing net of views, with its extensive list of views people held at the time of the Buddha—many of the stickiest views come out of deep meditation experience. When we touch into something in meditation, something that feels so true, so deeply present, we can attribute some ontological reality to what we have experienced rather than recognizing that this too is an experience. The Buddha really cautioned us about creating views that arise based on our meditation experience.

This wanting to know—we can start to see it. I've heard some of you over these past weeks talking about this urge to understand, to know. The mind starts searching: What is it that I need to know? It can be uncomfortable. We can feel a sense of discomfort if we don't have a sense of knowing.

This begins to point to what happens for us as we touch into not knowing. As we begin to open to just what's arising—including recognizing that this concept is a concept arising, this belief is a belief arising—we begin to see that we don't know what's coming next. This can be uncomfortable. At a deep human level, we want to know. So we can start to look at that wanting to know, and the discomfort that comes with it.

By its very nature, insight is something we cannot anticipate. In some ways, opening to this truth of not knowing becomes a kind of practice for the opening to insight. Because we cannot know what we don't know. We tend to be drawn to the familiar. We like knowing that we know. We like paying attention and feeling certain about what we're paying attention to. We like that.

Sometimes we can gravitate toward what we're already familiar with, and it feels pretty good. Being right with the breath feels pretty good—knowing how the breath feels. And yet at some point in our practice, orienting toward what we're already familiar with, keeping the mind directed there, is not going to let us see something new.

Sometimes if we're in that place of wanting to know, we might be searching for something familiar to land on, or trying to figure out what the awareness is paying attention to. And the very act of searching might be obscuring something. It takes trust to open to this truth of not knowing.

On one retreat, I suffered a lot over wanting an insight—wanting to have an insight about impermanence. I really wanted that insight. Teachers had talked about things in the hall, and it seemed like that would be a really cool thing to see. And so I was suffering a lot because I wasn't experiencing what I thought I might experience.

At some point I was feeling into the wanting—wanting this insight, wanting this understanding. I was doing walking meditation out front here, and I noticed that the mind was creating a story. It was telling a story about being in the interview room with my teacher and telling my teacher that I'd had that insight. And we were laughing and celebrating, and it felt really good.

In that seeing, I realized: I have no idea what I want. What I want is to be able to tell somebody that I had that insight. So the idea that I wanted this understanding—I didn't know what that was. I wanted some perks or something that I thought would come with it. We don't know what we're looking for. We really have to enter into this not knowing.

Even in more ordinary ways, there can be things that we miss because we're looking for the familiar or orienting toward what we already know. Sayadaw U Tejaniya talked about a time when he was here visiting in Massachusetts. Somebody was driving him around in a car, and the driver mentioned that there was a deer alarm on the car—a high-pitched tone that deer can hear, higher than humans typically notice. He said to Sayadaw, "You can hear it if you try. It is possible to hear it."

So Sayadaw said he was trying to hear it, trying to find it. And he couldn't find it, couldn't hear it. Again, he didn't know what he was looking for. And then he said he relaxed and stopped trying. And he heard it.

This is a pointer for us—this relaxing and stopping looking. This kind of curiosity, not of "how can I see this thing," but more of "relax and what's here?" That supports a kind of investigation—a meeting of investigation that is not investigating something we already have our ideas about, but more of a "What's this? What's this?"

So what's the difference between this truth of not knowing and the not knowing of ignorance? In some ways, they're completely different things. The not knowing of ignorance actually gets in the way of seeing this not knowing of moment-to-moment experience.

Because in the not knowing that we've been exploring, we touch into really being present for moment-to-moment experience. Really being here. It points us to this truth of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable—to the nature of experience being impermanent, unreliable, and uncontrollable. It's about letting go of views, concepts, and ideas, or recognizing that views are arising, so that we can see into this truth.

The not knowing of ignorance is a not understanding of the nature of impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. Because of views, we take things to be permanent, we take things to be reliable, we take things to be controllable. The not knowing of ignorance is bound up with these views and concepts, and not seeing that that's what they are.

Another question might arise: Okay, so views get in the way of seeing the nature of things as they are. So what's this wise view about? Isn't that just another view that gets in the way?

This reflection was one that was around at the time of the Buddha. There's a story of Anathapindika. I love this story. It's such a deep teaching, and it's given by a householder. Anathapindika was a householder, so that's a nice thing to reflect on. He was talking to some followers of other religious perspectives, other sects. And they came up to him and said, "Tell us, what are the views that the Buddha has?" And Anandapindika said, "Well, you know, I can't tell you what the views are that the Buddha has." "Well, how about the monks? Can you tell us the views that the monks have?" And he said, "No, I can't tell you that either." So they finally asked him, "Well, can you tell us what your views are?" And he said, "Yes, I can tell you that, but first, why don't you tell me what your views are?"

And so they did, and each one of them offered their perspective—in this case, on some aspect of ontological reality. One of them said something like, "The universe is infinite. This alone is true, everything else is wrong." Another said, "The universe is not infinite, it's finite. This alone is true, everything else is wrong." And they had various views like this, again held in this way, kind of along the lines of the story of the blind people and the elephant—that this is what's true.

After they all told Anandapindika their views, he said, "This view of yours has either arisen based on something somebody else told you, or it's based on unwise attention to an experience that you've had. And clinging to that view creates suffering." They turned that over a little bit, but then one came back to him and said, "So what are your views?" And Anandapindika said, "Here's the kind of view that I hold: I hold the view that clinging to anything—clinging to views—is suffering."

They tried to use his own argument against him: "Well, you're clinging to that view too." And he said, "Well, when I see that I'm clinging, I see that it's suffering. And right there, the mind lets it go."

This points to what right view is about. It's about a view that is in alignment with the nature of experience—the impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable nature of experience—and that clinging creates suffering. It's an experiential kind of view, a view about what's the nature of experience. It's not about what's the nature of some ontological reality. It's about understanding how clinging to experience creates suffering, and how not clinging is release from suffering.

So it's a different kind of view in a way. But at the same time, initially we do have to pick it up as a belief. We do have to pick up these teachings that the Buddha offers as a kind of belief. If we didn't pick it up as a view or as a belief, we would never step on this path. But what seems to happen as we practice is that we start, because of that view, to look at our experience in a different way. We start to recognize what's happening in our experience, not through the concepts but through what's arising and what's passing away.

Through holding that view and bringing the practice of mindfulness—these two together, mindfulness and wise view—then we see in our direct experience what leads towards suffering and what leads away from suffering. So again, it's experiential. And the experience of wise view, the understanding or the insight there into wise view, is the insight that clinging causes suffering, letting go releases suffering. It's a direct experience. It's not another idea. It's a direct connection with the actual experience of the truth of release.

You can experience this. When you see some wanting release, you feel the freedom of that. That's not an idea. That's the release from suffering. And so this way of experiencing lets us touch into things as they are, seeing the impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable nature of experience.

We begin to touch into this truth that we do not know what the next moment will bring. As we touch into that more fully, it can be really uncomfortable—seeing this truth that we don't know, seeing how impermanent, unreliable, and uncontrollable experience is. At some very deep level, our system, the system of this being, just goes, "No. I don't like that. I don't want it to be that way." And so we resist it. We fight it.

We're afraid. There are many different relationships here—feelings of vulnerability, insecurity, fear—when touching into this truth, touching into this unreliability, this not knowing.

There are different ways this happens. When you explore and experience this—and I heard some of this in meetings today about some of you going home—there's a sense, a feeling of "Wow, what's waiting for me?" A little bit of fear. The idea of not knowing creates fear. On a kind of bigger level, a more ordinary or conventional level, we can experience this fear of not knowing. And on a more moment-to-moment level, we can also experience this fear of not knowing.

Sometimes this fear, or feeling of vulnerability, or feeling of insecurity is actually not based on the actual experience—it's based on the idea that you don't know. The idea that something's going to happen and I don't know what it is. The mind reacts to that. A kind of projection into the future. A little bit of imagining what's going to be waiting for me. "I don't know what's going to be waiting for me." And it's true that we don't know what's going to be waiting for us. But we're not actually in that. We're not actually responding to the fear of this deeper level of not knowing. It's more of a fear of an idea that we don't know.

This was pointed out to me on one retreat. Even on a very moment-to-moment level, this kind of fear can play out. I was experiencing a kind of fear about just realizing, "I have no idea what the next arising is going to be." And I was in this place of agitated fear around not knowing what the next moment's arising was going to be. "Am I going to be able to meet it? I don't know if I'm going to be able to meet it. I don't know what it is. How can I know if I'm going to be able to meet it?" And so the experience of fear was prevalent.

During one walking meditation—I was walking in the hall right outside the meditation hall—I decided, "Okay, I'm going to face this fear. This fear about not knowing what is going to happen." And what I discovered, as I decided to get curious about this fear and about the unknown, was that every step I took, it was known. And then the next step was known. There's nothing unknown in this moment's experience. I could see that the mind was projecting just to the next split second, not knowing what that was, and fear that "I'm not going to be able to meet this. I have to be able to control how I meet this." And it was just—in the next moment there was a step and there was the awareness of it. With that came the recognition that fear is not about what is actually unknown; it was about the idea that I didn't know.

This is one way that happens, and I think this happens a lot to us, both in this moment-to-moment way and also in our everyday lives. When we are thinking about not knowing, or not being certain about the future, feeling vulnerable or insecure—what is it that we're actually relating to? What are we reacting to? Often it's an idea, a construction of our minds that we're afraid of.

And sometimes there is this experience of a slipperiness to the mindfulness. It's like as soon as the mind is touching into something, it's already vanishing, and we don't even know what it is. So sometimes there's this feeling of just slipping, slipping, slipping—and nowhere to land. A more direct experience of this, a more visceral experience of this place of not knowing. And again, we can have different relationships to that—fear, confusion, anxiety.

It's really important to recognize that, because the path unfolds by noticing. Essentially, that fear, that anxiety is a resistance to this truth, to this experience, to this slipping away of experience, this passing away of experience. And so it's a form of clinging. It's a form of "No, it's not okay that it's like this." That is where, that is how the practice deepens—by looking at the clinging, by knowing the clinging. Sometimes in that kind of place you might look at the anxiety and see it too is just slipping away. Nowhere to land.

Joseph gives an analogy of the practice, a kind of summary of this talk in a way.

I think Joseph came up with this analogy about skydiving — that the practice kind of unfolds like skydiving.

Initially, perhaps you're strapping on your parachute and getting in the plane. Maybe there's some enthusiasm and excitement: "Oh, I'm going skydiving, this will be fun." You get in the plane and you're climbing, experiencing that. Then you get to the place where you've come to altitude and you're told, "Okay, it's time to jump out of the plane." You kind of look over the edge and it's like, "Yeah, no, I don't want to let go." So there's this clinging and this fear around the letting go, to step into that falling.

Then you finally get up your courage to let go, and you've got your parachute on, and you're falling. Initially it's a little bit scary, but then at a certain point you hit this place where it almost feels like floating — the place where the body has reached terminal velocity so that it just feels like you're floating. There's this delight of experience, a kind of joy and bliss of just being right there with the falling.

And then you realize you don't have a parachute. And then the fear really kicks in. You're trying to navigate — what am I going to do? How am I going to figure this out? There's terror, dread, imagining what it's going to be like when you hit the ground.

And then, he says, you realize that there's no ground. That's that understanding of not knowing — just this endless changing of conditions. No ground. And that is actually a relief.

Letting go like this requires a lot of trust. Part of our practice is recognizing this. The parachuting analogy is great because there are times when it's like, "No, I don't trust jumping out of this plane." There are times where we run up against our edges, and that's not a mistake — that's just running up against our clinging, and we simply know that. So we take the step of opening to, "Okay, this is what's here, and there's fear." Or, "This is what's here, and there's patience to be with it." Trust. And let go, and let go, and trust.

It's a process. The whole of our practice could be looked at as a deepening of this trust — to let go at deeper and deeper and deeper levels.

Sometimes meeting this unknown can feel like we're standing on the edge of an abyss, and we're asked to step into it. The trust there — hard, hard to trust that. And yet as we start to trust, we take the step into the abyss. And in the next moment, we find ourselves standing on the edge of the abyss.

CHAPTER 68

Supports for Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this three-month retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of the foundational phrase from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10): "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world." She unpacks each element of this deceptively simple instruction to reveal the depth of guidance it contains for meditation practice.
> Fella begins with an overview of the four foundations of mindfulness—body, feeling tone (vedanā), mind states, and dhammas—before diving into the meaning of key Pāli terms. She explores how "abides" (viharati) points to a quality of being at home, settled, and relaxed with experience, while "observing" (anupassī) indicates a close, receptive attending. The phrase "body as a body" encourages direct, non-conceptual knowing—experiencing sensations like pressure, tingling, or warmth rather than abstract ideas about body parts.
> The talk emphasizes the crucial role of relaxation in meditation, offering practical guidance on inviting the body and mind to soften. Fella distinguishes between right mindfulness (sammā sati) and ordinary awareness, noting that the Buddha's approach involves bare, curious observation without the overlay of views, opinions, and reactivity. She describes how this quality of allowing becomes an expression of mettā—loving attention that accepts experience exactly as it is. The teaching concludes with Bhikkhu Anālayo's insight that "freeing from desires and discontent" happens simultaneously with mindful observation, making the practice itself the path of liberation.

It was such a beautiful evening tonight. As I was coming over, I was seeing the light changing on the trees, lighting them up a kind of reddish color. Then I went upstairs to reflect and be a little quiet before my talk, sitting there watching the sky turn this beautiful red. I hope some of you got to see that.

The practice that we're doing here is really based on some instructions that the Buddha gave. We've mentioned this in the last few days, and I'm sure many of you have heard of the Satipatthana Sutta, which is a collection of teachings. Some people dispute whether the Buddha actually gave it front to back or whether it was a gathering of his teachings around meditation. But in any case, it's a very comprehensive description of the mindfulness practice.

The very name of the sutta, Satipatthana, means something like "establishing mindfulness." So that's what we're doing—establishing mindfulness in a way that supports the ability to see and understand our experience. It's a particular perspective of mindfulness.

The Satipatthana Sutta describes four establishments, or ways, or fields in which to collect the attention. Perhaps that's a way to look at it, or perhaps it's simply a description of what might be noticed in various areas of experience.

It talks about the establishment of mindfulness with the body, which is what we've been really focusing on these last days. Then there's the establishment of mindfulness with the experience of feeling tone—this very simple and basic experience of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. All experience has a kind of flavor of this sort. Every sight, sound, smell, taste, touch is pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

The third foundation is mindfulness of mind states. The sutta describes these pretty simply and encourages us to recognize whether greed, aversion, and delusion are present or absent, and whether the mind is moving towards concentration or not. So it's looking at the mind first with respect to greed, aversion, and delusion, and then how it's settling with respect to concentration.

The fourth foundation is a little harder to describe, but I'll say very simply that we could look at it—mindfulness of dhammas, or mindfulness of phenomena—as mindfulness of processes that will lead us either towards or away from suffering. In that sutta, the Buddha points to particular teachings: the hindrances, the six sense bases, the five aggregates, the four noble truths, the seven factors of awakening, and how an exploration of those experiences helps us to understand suffering and the release from suffering.

So that's a very quick overview of the Satipatthana Sutta.

What I wanted to explore this evening is that at the very beginning of the sutta, the Buddha gives a teaching of what Satipatthana is in brief. He's famous for these really brief summaries. I like this phrase—it contains so much in just a few words. I wanted to unpack it and look at how its words offer instructions and support for what we're doing here.

The phrase, which is repeated four times right at the beginning, once for each of the four establishments, is: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world." Then, "One abides observing feeling as feeling, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world." Likewise for mind states and phenomena, dhammas.

I'll start this exploration with the word we're perhaps most familiar with: mindfulness. It seems interesting to me, this word. Sati is the Pali word, and it is connected to a root meaning "to remember." So it's connected with remembering—remembering what? Remembering ourselves. But the way sati is used in the sutta gives us a clearer picture of what the Buddha is pointing to, and perhaps we can understand from another perspective what this mindfulness is that he's encouraging us to cultivate.

As we've explored here, and I'm sure you've explored on other retreats, mindfulness can be looked at as being present, being connected with experience, aware, witnessing, observing. These are perhaps some synonyms we could use to fill in what this word means. Connected with, aware with, feeling into experience, being with experience—or perhaps just knowing what's happening while it's happening. All of these words point in the direction of the experience of mindfulness.

It is a quality, a state of mind that we cultivate. And in my own experience of practicing, the longer I practice mindfulness, the less clear I am of exactly what it is. So it's okay if you're not exactly clear about it. There's a sense of knowing when I am clearly aware and mindful, but what it is exactly is hard to describe. These words point in the right direction: being with, feeling into, presence of mind.

The mindfulness that our practice is based on is rooted in a very ordinary, human capacity of our minds.

Our minds possess this capacity to know what's happening while it's happening—to be aware that we know. It's a kind of self-reflective capacity that we have as humans, this ability to know that we know. This itself is a neutral capacity of mind.

We can know that we know. We can be aware that we're angry, for instance. But we may not be knowing it in the way the Buddha is pointing to—with a kind of non-judgmental, detached observing of, "Oh, this is what the experience of anger is like." Knowing what's happening in the present moment as it's happening.

More often, the more ordinary way of being aware of anger—perhaps before we meet mindfulness practice—is to know that we're angry and to know why we're angry and who we're angry with and what they did wrong. There's a whole complex of views and ideas and opinions all wrapped up in that awareness of being angry. So it's not just simple: "This is what anger is like."

And that's what I think this points to. The Buddha recognized that this capacity we have to be aware in the present moment is really powerful when explored from this particular perspective. Just know what's happening in the present moment and be curious about that experience. What is it like to be experiencing what this is in this present moment? So that's my understanding of this direction the Buddha is pointing us with satipaṭṭhāna—the direction of wise mindfulness or right mindfulness.

Sometimes I explore the difference between right mindfulness and wrong mindfulness. Actually, in the suttas there is the phrase "wrong mindfulness," connected to the wrong eightfold path, which is motivated by wrong view and wrong intention, wrong speech, wrong action, wrong livelihood, wrong effort. These qualities that support us can be skewed towards freedom or skewed towards our habits and patterns.

If we think about this quality of being aware—knowing that we're aware, knowing what we're doing in the present moment—think about how a thief might be very aware in a house where they've broken in to steal something. Very aware of being very quiet, aware of every step, every movement. But the motivation for that awareness is not to just be curious: "What is it like to step? What is it like to reach? What is it like to touch?" It is: "I need to be really quiet so that I'm not caught, so that I can get these things and take them away." The motivation is greed, perhaps aversion if there's something they're wanting to take away from somebody, or anger at someone they want to take something from.

So the motivation is crucial. The Buddha noticed that this quality of being aware is very powerful when aimed towards simple knowing. What is this like? Beginning to dive underneath views, ideas, opinions, concepts, just to the bare experience.

As we explore this bare experience, what seems to happen is that when we explore, for instance, what anger feels like, we learn pretty quickly that it doesn't feel good, that it hurts, that it's painful. Actually, one of my early mindfulness practices was exploring anger because it was big. It was really ruining my life. So I decided, having met mindfulness, "Okay, this is what I'm going to see if I can get to understand. I'll get to understand anger."

The first time I actually woke up and recognized, "Oh, this is what anger feels like," it was like a shock. It's like, "Oh my God, this is awful. This feels horrible."

We learn pretty quickly as we start to look at the experience happening right now. This is what anger feels like. This is what joy feels like. This is what loving-kindness feels like. We feel very viscerally that the unwholesome qualities of mind—those based in greed, aversion, and delusion—are painful in the moment, directly painful. Qualities that are wholesome, supportive of the heart opening and connecting—love, compassion, kindness, curiosity—those have a quality of softness, lightness. They have various flavors to them, but they generally have a feeling of moving in the direction of ease and peace and well-being.

With this quality of just curiosity—"What's this experience like?"—we begin to taste what experience is leading us to suffering and what is leading us away from suffering. We get a sense of what is suffering and what is well-being.

Our mind has convinced us that anger is somehow going to make us be happy. It's kind of amazing to watch that process. When we're not aware of the experience of anger, our minds delude us into thinking it's actually doing something good for us.

That part of the mind is willing to forego ease and peace in the present moment for the idea of revenge or the idea of getting something in the future. And so being aware right in the present moment takes us to that understanding. Wisdom understanding grows through that simple meeting. It's quite amazing.

I think the Buddha was brilliant to understand this. We don't have to find what's wholesome and unwholesome. By this simple practice of observing, it points itself out to us. This is the mindfulness the Buddha encourages us to cultivate.

Some of the other words in this phrase—"one abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world"—point to qualities of mind or attitudes that we could bring to mindfulness to support this kind of observing. I'm going to take some time to explore some of these qualities tonight. I probably won't get through the whole sentence, but just some of them.

The first word that really lands and resonates with me deeply is this word "abides." Even just the feeling of saying the word—abide, abide. The word is a translation of the Pali viharati, which is related to the Pali vihara, which means a place of living, a home. And so this is a sense of being at home with mindfulness. Mindfulness brings us home into the present moment. Abiding. Resting. Sometimes the feeling of being at home is a place of safety and a place of rest. That quality of abiding brings that sense. This is a quality to bring to mindfulness.

Other words that resonate with this for me: intimacy, being with, dwelling, receptive, content. At its core, what this really points to for me is relaxation.

Relaxation is such a crucial support for any form of meditation practice. Whether we're practicing mindfulness of the breathing, loving-kindness practice, open awareness practice, or focused concentration, relaxation is a deep, deep support. I did not know this, and I'm not sure I would have believed it in my first few retreats, especially when I was trying to focus the mind. It didn't feel relaxed. It was like, "No, I'm supposed to hold on to this, I'm supposed to do this, I'm supposed to grab on and stay, stay, stay, stay." It did not feel relaxed. Over the years I did begin to hear what the teachers were saying. I'm sure they emphasized it. They probably emphasized it as much as I'm going to tonight. But sometimes it just takes a while to get in.

Relaxation is crucial. And we can explore this. We can begin with a container of relaxation in our meditation. I often will start there in my practice, relaxing the body—sometimes with a body scan, sometimes just opening and dropping in a kind of intention or invitation. Maybe the body is willing to relax right now. It's amazing sometimes that kind of invitation can be very powerful. You could try it right now.

Maybe the body can relax. Not trying to do relaxation. Just dropping that kind of invitation in. And see how the mind and body respond to that invitation.

For me, dropping that in, I can feel sometimes just a subtle "oh"—there was something that let go and I didn't even know it was being held. So I'll feel into that. I'll just drop that in and feel that releasing happen, and drop it in again. Maybe the body can relax. Feeling some more opening, softening.

As the body softens and relaxes, it creates the conditions for the mind to be a little more soft and relaxed. Not so wrapped up in thoughts and worries and opinions and views, but just willing to settle and be with experience.

Maybe the body can relax. And maybe, just maybe, the mind can relax—inviting that as well. This relaxed attention.

As we relax, as the mind relaxes, sometimes very naturally the mind lets go of some of its ways it's caught and whirling and spinning. As that tension releases in the body and the mind, there can just be this very natural "oh yeah, and I'm aware now." Awareness is here.

So it can be a very relaxed way into touching into the recognition that we're aware, with very little effort, allowing the relaxation to support this recognition of being aware of just this in the present moment—mindful, not pushing, not striving, and not drifting.

So "abides." Abide observing. This next word, anupassī in the Pali, translated here as "observing," means basically to look at closely, see clearly, closely observe, touch into repeatedly. So we abide observing. This might feel like a bit of a conflict—settling back, relaxing, and yet connecting. I'll talk about that in just a moment.

It can be, and this to me points to the fact that relaxation and connection are not opposites. We can connect with relaxation.

"Abide observing the body as a body." This next phrase: "Abide observing the body in and of itself." This to me gets to that pointing I mentioned earlier—just knowing the experience directly, just what's happening in the present moment. Not our ideas about it, our views, our opinions. The body in and of itself.

Tonight I'll just explore this one through the perspective of the body, since we're exploring the body more in these first days.

So meeting the bare experience of the body, just the sensation level of experience. We often think of our body in terms of parts—hand, head, shoulders, knees, feet. Sometimes when I'm talking to someone who's newer to the practice, I'll ask them, "What are you experiencing right now? What are your sensations?" And they'll say, "Well, I feel my knee right now." Knee is a concept, right? It's a reference to a portion of this fathom-long thing sitting here. But the experience of knee—knee is not an experience.

Let's look at hand, actually. Let's make it something a little less charged, since perhaps you may have some sore knees right now. Hand. Hand is a concept. We can think about our hand, know what it does. It picks up things. It holds on to things. It moves things around. Knowing our hand as what it does—that's the conceptual level of hand. That's not the experience of hand.

So touch in right now. Put your attention in that area of hand. What sensations? What's the actual sensation level of experience in hand? Pulsing, tingling, stiffness, throbbing, pressure, heat, tension. That's closer to the direct experience. Those are words, and words are concepts, but the experience is much closer to those words than it is to "hand."

And this is, I think, what this is pointing to. We understand or know the body as, in and of itself, as a body. This also, I feel, encourages a non-interfering awareness. Just to know what is actually happening with the body. Not the opinions and ideas and views and relationships we have to it, but just—this is what it is. This is how it is right now. This is the body right now. This is the experience of body right now.

Of course. The experience of the body is like this. This begins to bring in wisdom. It begins to bring in understanding. It points to the impersonal nature of the body. It's kind of just this collection of sensations that we have very little control over. It's human experience. This is human experience. What is the experience of body underneath perhaps concepts, views, ideas about it, opinions? Just the sensations.

This is what we're pointing to in the instructions.

Touching into the breath and the body. We could use breath here too: one abides observing the breath as the breath. Just a sensation. Pressure increasing, releasing. Maybe a sense of vibratory energy expanding and contracting. A flow of sensations. Coolness at the nostrils. A kind of coolness in the throat. The breath in and of itself. Abide. Abide connecting with the breath as it is.

This combination of "one abides observing" points to something important for me. To abide feels receptive—settle back, let experience come to you. You don't need to go out and find things or look for things. Just settle back and be with what's here. That's the quality of abides.

Observing brings in a little bit more of directing, of choosing perhaps, attending to some particular area of experience: the breath, the body, sound—those three areas we've been encouraging. This is the gathering and collecting of attention so that we can be mindful.

Mindfulness has a wide range of ways it can be experienced. Mindfulness can be receptive, where we settle back and simply notice what's arising in the present moment without choosing or directing the attention. And mindfulness can also be connected with choosing and directing attention—we can choose to attend or aim toward the breath, the body, hearing.

This is an important piece, because early in my practice I thought that if I wasn't choosing what I was aware of, then it meant I wasn't being mindful. But sometimes there are moments in practice where something else is happening that's very strong, and we can't necessarily choose not to look at it. There's a strong sensation in the knee pulling the attention—I'm not choosing to do it, I'd rather be with the breath. In those situations, perhaps we abide with that experience, bringing in the breath alongside it, but not trying to push away what's demanding attention.

So this "abide observing" allows us to connect with an experience like the breath, to aim or direct—okay, that's what I'm going to pay attention to for now, that's where I'll set the intention. But then we settle back and simply see what's there, rather than trying to find what's there. We allow there to be an abiding with the breath, a resting with the breath as it's showing up.

This has been said multiple times: just as it is. We don't need to find exactly how it's being experienced. Just this—what is it, how is it being known right now? How is mindfulness able to know it right now? That is this abiding and observing together.

It's like tuning a radio. You tune to a particular channel, narrow the bandwidth of what's being received. But the radio doesn't go out at that bandwidth and grab the radio waves. It's receiving all of that and then simply looking at this channel. It's a receptive quality rather than going out and grabbing.

This receptive quality of attention can be very supportive. It supports a relaxed knowing, a relaxed observing of whatever it is that you're choosing to cultivate as a stable place to land the attention. So this is really pointing to a receptive quality of awareness. Relaxed. Relax and receive—two words that maybe are different flavors of this sentence that the Buddha offers. Relax and receive.

Another word that I think is implied in the text here, especially in this phrase "observing the body as a body, feelings as feelings, mind states as mind states," is allowing. Observing the body as it already is, what is happening, without trying to fix it or change it. This is allowing the body to be as it is. So we cultivate an attitude of allowing, allowing things to be as they are.

This is actually one of the kindest things that we can do for ourselves. It brings in the quality of mettā. Annie in her talk spoke about how mettā is woven into our practice, and it's woven in right in the mindfulness practice with this quality or attitude of allowing—allowing your experience to be as it is.

Just imagine what it feels like when you have a friend who is so willing to accept you completely as you are. A friend who doesn't want you to change, who is willing to be there with you when things are hard, celebrating with you when things are going well. This friend who just lets you be who you are. There's a real sense of care and connection, a feeling of being loved. That is what this quality of mindfulness feels like—loving attention.

So right in the mindfulness practice, this quality of mettā is being cultivated as we explore just allowing ourselves to be just as we are. It's like we learn how to belong to ourselves, this sense of being cared for just as we are. It's beautiful. It's a beautiful quality of the mind. It's about allowing all of our human experience, opening to all of it.

This allowing perspective isn't about agreeing or disagreeing with what's happening. We can allow things to be as they are and not like them. But what it is, is a recognition: this is what is happening. What is happening is already happening. What we're observing has already happened. So it's here. We're really connecting with that truth of this moment—it's here already. Wishing it weren't this way is just suffering.

But allowing, opening to experience as it is, is also not about passivity. Allowing really helps to open us, especially in our daily lives. Here on retreat, particularly in our sittings, we can really just allow what's flowing through us, really be that friend sitting with ourselves. "I'll be here with you for everything." And there are times in our lives, and there may be times here also, where the opening to experience points us to, "Oh, something actually does need to change here."

So this perspective of mindfulness isn't about just letting things roll over us. It supports connecting with a skillful response—not out of greed, aversion, or delusion, but out of compassion. Compassion is allowing connected with the quality of loving-kindness. When that allowing meets something that needs to happen, or something that may need to change, the perspective of allowing connects with compassion, a wish to alleviate suffering.

So allowing is a key support for our practice, but there are times when we can't command ourselves to allow. And this is where we step back a little further—to allow that we're not allowing. This is what's happening: I don't like it, it feels like I can't allow it. But can I know? "Yeah, not liking is what's happening. Okay." Be that friend who is just okay with you not liking this thing. That's okay. So we step back to just check in: can I not try to change this not liking, but just allow it?

the non-allowing. It feels like moving into a bigger container. So relax. Receive. And allow.

Another word in this phrase: ardent. This has the quality of diligence, wholeheartedness, connecting to experience. It's a place where commitment to the practice comes in—persistence, where effort is really pointed to. We can't just abide. The dude abides and floats off into the ether. There has to be a connection. Ardency.

And yet, there's a balance. Abiding and ardent. Relaxation and effort. These two are not opposites. They can support each other. There's a way that we can make effort in a very relaxed way. We can dwell and be really connected to experience.

A key for this kind of balance between abiding and ardent is a light touch of effort—just enough effort to be present right in this split second. That's all, actually. Can you know a breath right now? How about the sensations of your hands? Another breath. The sound of my voice. When I name each of those experiences, probably there was just a moment of connecting with that experience. Not too hard. Just for a moment. Just right there.

What is harder is sustaining it. And this is where we often get tight in our practice. Kind of the idea that we sit down and think, "Okay, I'm going to be mindful for forty-five minutes." It's like we pick up the whole forty-five minutes in that first second. And that's a recipe for tension. But you can just be aware of sitting, and here's a breath. And how about another one?

Joseph offered on one retreat I taught—he may still offer it at times—what he calls the secret teaching of practicing with the breath. All you need to do is make enough effort to be with half a breath. Just the in-breath. Can you be with an in-breath right now? And then at the end of that in-breath, can you be with the out-breath? Just enough effort for those few moments. That's the lightness of the effort. Just connecting, receiving for that moment, those few moments. How does the in-breath feel? How does the out-breath feel? How about the next in-breath?

And after a few of those, the mind will probably wander, and that's okay. At some point you'll recognize that the mind has wandered, and you can come back to just another half a breath. A light touch, over and over and over again.

Now, don't pick up the "over and over and over again." You mean I've got to do this for six weeks or three months? No, you just have to do it right now. That's it. That's all there is anyway. This is all there is—this moment, that's it. Six weeks from now doesn't exist. Just this moment. Aware now. And again. And again. How much effort does it take to be with this?

It's often a lot less than we think.

"One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, mindful, free from desire and discontent for the world."

That last phrase I don't have time to go into in great detail, but one thing I'll mention: Bhikkhu Anālayo, in his exploration of this sutta—many of you have probably seen or perhaps read his book Satipaṭṭhāna—when he describes this phrase, looking at this particular piece, "free from desires and discontent for the world," he says that the Pali used here (and I'm not a Pali scholar, so I can't confirm or deny this, but I trust Anālayo), this word vinaya, which we actually chant—vinaya gedam—we chant that in the sutta that Greg is teaching us tonight. Vinaya means "freeing from," and it can be understood as happening simultaneously with everything else going on in the sentence.

So we could say that this phrase might read: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world." This freeing from can happen simultaneously with the process of mindfulness.

And this is what we do. Something challenging arises—desire, discontent, greed, aversion. Desire and ill will, the first two hindrances. Mindfulness can be brought to those, and that's the very work of freeing ourselves. We free ourselves by being with them and understanding them, understanding how they affect us. As I said earlier, understanding the stress they cause.

We understand that they are stressful—that when we're caught by them, when we're caught by desire and discontent, we believe the story they're telling us, which is: "If you get this thing, if you get rid of this thing, then you'll be happy." We're caught in that belief, essentially deluding ourselves that this is good for us. And we're not noticing how it's affecting us here and now, the stress it's creating on our system here and now.

So this attending to it, bringing mindfulness to desire and discontent, is the process of freeing ourselves from these challenging states. At times we may be able to set them aside, but sometimes it's not possible. And then allowing, abiding, relaxing with, receiving, opening to can be a very powerful way to explore them. There are times to say no to them, definitely, and we'll talk about that more in the talks that are coming.

So this phrase—"one abides observing the body as a body, ardent, mindful, fully aware, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world"—it really brings together the what and the how of our practice. The what of our practice: body sensations, mind states, moods, emotions, processes of body and mind, all these foundations of mindfulness. What we are experiencing—this body, this human body, these processes of body and mind. Body as a body. Feelings as feelings. Mind states as mind states. Phenomena as phenomena.

What we're paying attention to, and how to pay attention—the attitude or the way we bring attention to it. Relax. Abide with some diligence, some perseverance, some heartfelt connection. With kind, loving attention. Allowing. Receiving. Receiving the experience.

All of this creates the conditions—relax, receive, allow—creates the conditions for the mind to understand, to learn what this being is. It's a doing. It's a being. It's not an "is." It's a process. And we understand the processes of this being that lead us, get us caught, take us into our habits and patterns. And those processes that free the mind, release us from those habits and patterns.

Our organism fundamentally wants to move towards well-being. That's good news. Because as we see the stress of a challenging mind state, very naturally the mind, the body, the being wants to move in the direction of releasing it when it understands it.

Relax. Receive experience. Allow it to be as it is. And let the learning happen. The wisdom will develop with mindfulness cultivated in this perspective.

Let's sit for a moment.

Thank you for your practice.

CHAPTER 69

Relax Connection with the Breath

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this retreat guidance session, Andrea Fella offers practical instructions for settling into breath meditation through relaxation rather than effort. The talk begins with the traditional chanting of refuges and precepts (both five and eight precepts for different practitioners), then moves into detailed meditation instruction.
> The core teaching emphasizes creating what Fella calls a "container of relaxation" before connecting with the breath. Rather than immediately focusing attention on breathing, practitioners are guided through a systematic body scan—softening the face, neck, shoulders, torso, and eventually the interior spaces of the body. The instruction includes using gentle mental invitations such as "May the body relax" and "May the mind relax" as surprisingly powerful tools for releasing tension, rather than trying to force relaxation.
> Fella introduces a particularly nuanced technique of connecting with the breath through "peripheral awareness"—similar to soft-focus vision where one sees things at the edges without looking directly at them. This approach addresses a common difficulty where aiming or focusing creates tension. The teaching encourages receiving the breath rather than seeking it, befriending the experience exactly as it is, and using only enough effort to connect with half a breath at a time. Questions from practitioners about balancing postural alignment with relaxation are addressed, emphasizing that the goal is not a "correct" posture but whatever supports relaxed attention.

This morning we'll start by chanting the refuges and precepts together. For those of you continuing on five precepts, as we chant the precepts together, after you finish chanting the fifth precept, you can just fall silent while those of you who are taking the eight precepts will continue and chant the next three. Then we'll all come back together again to chant the final Yidang Meisi Lang.

Those of you who are on eight precepts, how many of you have never chanted those last three before? A few of you. So I'll do those three call and response, a few words at a time, particularly for the seventh one. But we'll chant everything else together.

Each morning, in offering these instructions, we've been exploring ways to settle and collect the mind with an anchor for the attention. We've suggested three possible anchors: the breath, whole body sensation, and the experience of hearing. You may by now have a sense of which of these is more comfortable for you to settle in with. We've also been pointing to ways to gather and collect the attention in a relaxed way, and each of us finds our own approach to doing that.

Today I'll offer one way that has been very helpful for me to settle naturally and easefully with the breath. The guided portion will focus on collecting the attention with the breath, and as we come to the end, you're welcome to shift to hearing or the body if you're using a different experience to gather and collect the attention.

Allow the posture to be relaxed. Our skeleton is actually designed to hold us upright, and we can relax all the muscles around those bones. Find a posture that's balanced. You might want to rock a little bit and find a posture where you can actually relax the muscles around the bones.

In settling in to connect with the experience of breathing, I've found it so helpful to begin by creating what we might call a container of relaxation. Rather than starting with attending to the breath, I start with relaxing the body. We can do this in a systematic way, through a slight, gentle scan through the body.

Perhaps the muscles of the head and face can relax. I find softening the face to be particularly useful—allowing all the muscles around the forehead, the eyes, the cheeks, the jaw to soften. Relaxing the crown of the head, the back of the head, the neck. The shoulders. Softening the arms and hands.

Relaxing the torso, all of those muscles around the rib cage. Sometimes a deeper breath at this point can really help to stretch and expand those muscles, and then soften and relax on the out breath. Perhaps another deeper breath, with the emphasis on allowing this part of the body to really relax.

Softening the muscles across the abdomen, the lower back and middle back. That can be an area where we almost subconsciously hold tension. So perhaps let that area hang forward a little bit. Softening the hips, inside the hip sockets, the legs, the feet.

There's also sometimes the possibility of working from the outside of the body inward, to soften more deeply inside the body, in this core area. Perhaps there can be a relaxation inside the throat. Perhaps the area around the heart can relax. Perhaps the stomach and intestines can soften and relax.

As the body relaxes even just a little bit, it creates conditions that support the mind to soften and relax. You may notice a little bit of softening of the mind. One of my colleagues, Gil Fronsdal, has used an analogy to support the relaxation of mind which I've found useful at times: as if the brain were a muscle, perhaps the brain can relax.

And sometimes there can be a little more release that's possible by dropping in a request, just an invitation: May the body relax. Not trying to do it, not searching for any place to relax, but simply dropping in that invitation and seeing how the body responds. May the body relax. May the mind relax.

As there is a little bit of relaxation of body and mind, awareness can be more easily available. So are you aware? And how is that awareness feeling into, connecting with, being with the breathing? The breathing that's already happening. There's no need to aim or focus or try to find the breath. Maybe have the sense of letting the breath come into awareness—receiving the breath as it is.

With an openness and a curiosity: how does it show up? Not looking for any particular sensations, but just being available to connect with the sensations that are happening while you're breathing, wherever that is for you. It may be a broad area of experience in the torso. It may be a little more contained around the nostrils or in the throat. It may feel like a movement or a flow of sensations—the expanding and contracting of the chest, the rising and falling of the abdomen.

Allow the mind and the body to stay relaxed as much as possible. And if you find tension creeps back in, perhaps drop in that request again: may the body relax. And connect with the breath, allowing the breath to be as it is.

For some of us, bringing attention to the breath can make it hard to let go into just the breath breathing itself. If that's the case for you, just notice: this is how it is to pay attention to the breath right now. This is the experience. This is how it feels. However it is, allowing it to be. Allowing your experience to be exactly as it is—this friendly, receptive, caring attention. Befriending your body, befriending the breath.

A light touch of effort, just enough to connect with half a breath. How does this in-breath feel? How does this out-breath feel? And doing it again. And again.

There will be times when other experience arises and pulls at the attention. For now, we're still exploring staying with the breath. You can gently acknowledge that experience, maybe with a light touch of a note—hearing, or thinking, or sensing—and then reconnect. Relax, perhaps, because sometimes when the attention is pulled there can be tension that comes in. So relax, and reconnect. How is this breath?

If the attention is pulled more strongly and it feels like there's not an easy way to let go or set aside that other experience, maybe there can be an opening to: well, that's happening. There's thinking happening, and the breath is happening. There's thinking and the breath. This is a little broader container, perhaps, but it allows the attention to stay connected to the breath even as other things go on around it. Hearing and the breath. Other body sensations and the breath. Thinking and the breath.

The guided offering this morning is really just one way to explore and support a relaxed container for the practice. For myself, that kind of exploration of relaxation at the beginning was really supportive, because this body and mind was very tense. It was helpful to take the time to go through—often a body scan—especially depending on when I sat down and how much tension there was. And that can come and go during the retreat.

And so as the retreat moves on, there may be days that you sit down and just feel very relaxed at the beginning. When that happened for me, I would simply invite a little more relaxation, just use those invitations. These invitations can be surprisingly powerful as a way in, especially as the mind settles a little more.

On retreats where I was doing this more focused practice, I would settle in, check in—okay, pretty relaxed—and then just drop in. Maybe there's a little more relaxation. "May the body relax"—and feel, not do it, but just feel into how the body responds to that. And then, "May the mind relax." And then, "May the attention rest with the breathing." Again, not trying to aim at the breath, but inviting the attention to just connect. "May the attention rest with the breathing. May the breathing be comfortable and relaxed."

Those invitations supported the connection to the breath to be infused with relaxation for me. If you find this useful, play with it. If you don't find it useful, just let it go. There are so many different ways in, and what I find is that we each find our way based on things we've heard in teachings, in instructions, and things that come to us as we practice.

A question arose about the relationship between relaxation and maintaining an erect posture—about how one might work to find an upright position that involves some effort in the lower spine, and whether that creates a contradiction with the relaxation approach.

I think it really depends, and you can play with both. See what supports the mind to be most settled. If you actually find that using a little bit of tension in your lower back to keep the posture upright helps—sometimes a little bit of tension down there can allow other things to relax, and that's fine. Or you could just play with what I've found for myself: finding a spot where, even if it's a little slumped, everything can be relaxed, and that supports the mindfulness. We're really not looking for a correct posture, but rather what posture will support a relaxed attention. You can play with both and see what actually is supportive. And it may be different at different times.

I'll offer one more tool that I've used to support a very relaxed connection with the breath. This one may be a little less intuitive. It uses the way our mind can look at things on the periphery of our attention.

In the visual field, for example, if you're looking straight ahead, you can also see things off to the side in your peripheral vision—not by looking directly at them, but by softening the gaze. Not aiming at looking straight ahead, but softening and just kind of taking in what's there on the periphery.

That kind of softening of the gaze can also happen in our minds, in connecting with the breathing or other objects as well. You might just play with that now: explore a large container and the breath, not looking directly at the breath, but allowing it to kind of come in from the sides.

For me, I found that aiming was where the tension got the most tight—when I thought, "Okay, I'm going to look right here at the nostrils."

You can also have the intention to connect with the nostrils at the nostrils, but not look directly at it. It can take a little time, but play with that. It feels like a broader attention that's connecting here, but not looking at it directly. For me, that brings in again a little more softening in the mind that is connecting with the attention. That can also be a kind of knowing the breathing—you're aware that you're breathing without focusing on particular sensations.

This talk was given during a meditation retreat. The original transcript has been lightly edited for readability while preserving the teacher's voice and meaning.

Awareness of Thoughts and Thinking

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this comprehensive dharma talk from the three-month retreat at IMS, Andrea Fella offers detailed guidance on working with thoughts in meditation practice. She begins by framing the fundamental purpose of practice: learning about our minds to understand how they participate in suffering (dukkha) and cultivating qualities that move us toward ease and freedom. The talk emphasizes that mindfulness has an almost magical quality—when we observe reactive states non-judgmentally, they naturally diminish, while wholesome qualities (paramīs, brahmavihāras) grow stronger when recognized.
> Fella makes a crucial distinction between being lost in thought and being aware of thinking, encouraging practitioners to recognize that moment when mindfulness returns as an opportunity to understand what mindful awareness of thought actually feels like. She categorizes thoughts into 'active' or 'energetic' thinking—often connected to emotions like anger or fear—and 'drifting' thoughts that arise when the mind is relaxed but not quite mindful. For energetic thoughts, she suggests naming the category (planning, arguing, judging), noticing the audience, and exploring underlying emotions. For drifting thoughts, she recommends connecting with the quality of mind itself, which is often spacious and calm.
> The teaching addresses the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa)—impermanence (anicca), unreliability (dukkha), and not-self (anattā)—as they manifest in thinking. Fella notes that thoughts particularly reveal the not-self nature of experience: we don't choose what thoughts arise, and mindfulness returns unbidden. She also discusses working with beliefs as a subtler form of thought, and offers practical strategies for when difficult thought patterns overwhelm our mindfulness, including broadening awareness and gentle redirection rather than suppression.

What are we doing here? That question can come up in a variety of tones of voice. It can be asked with frustration—"What am I doing here?"—or it can be a legitimate kind of curiosity. What is this? How does this practice work?

We do like to encourage you not to think too much about that, but I'm going to say a few words at the beginning here about our purpose, about what we're doing, in a simple way.

We're trying to learn about our minds. We're trying to understand ways that our mind gets caught and participates in what we call suffering, and to cultivate qualities of mind that participate in moving in the other direction—towards ease, towards peace, towards freedom.

Essentially, looking at our minds does this quite naturally. When we observe and get curious about what this experience is, whether it's something reactive or a beautiful, wholesome quality of mind, mindfulness has what seems almost like a magic property. Winnie mentioned this the other night: this ability, when we are mindful of something in a non-reactive, non-judgmental way, to transform our experience. If what we're meeting is reactive—a reactive emotion such as anger, confusion, frustration, irritation, annoyance, anything rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion—when we're mindful of that, it creates the conditions for it to diminish in our experience, to get weaker. Because we understand that it's suffering. Mindfulness and wisdom work together to help us understand that suffering, and very naturally, the mind wants to move in the direction of letting that go.

And when mindfulness meets or connects with wholesome qualities—Tara mentioned a whole list of them the other night in the paramis: generosity, energy, wisdom, patience, love, equanimity, all of the brahmaviharas, mindfulness itself—when mindfulness recognizes these wholesome qualities, it creates the conditions for them to grow stronger.

So really, all we have to do is be mindful. And very naturally, over time, the reactive things will diminish and the wholesome will increase.

Partly this happens through how we meet experience and get to know it. At first, when we are beginning either a period of practice, a retreat, or are earlier in our practice, what we're getting familiar with is what particular experience feels like—what is sometimes called the specific characteristics of experience. The body has these sensations, these qualities of pressure, heat, coolness, vibration, tingling, pulsing. Those are the specific qualities of the sensations of the body.

But every experience, no matter what is happening, has what we might call general characteristics. Everything that happens in our bodies and minds is impermanent. It is unreliable because it's impermanent—unreliable as a source for lasting happiness. And it is not me, not mine, not who I am.

This meeting of experience with mindfulness begins to point out these general characteristics to us. We see all of these body sensations—tingling, pulsing, vibration—as impermanent. We see our mind states as impermanent. We see thoughts as impermanent, emotions as impermanent. And since impermanent, unreliable. We find we can't control what's happening. Often we see we're not in ultimate control of these body sensations. Did I decide for this tingling to happen? It happened. So we're not in control of what arises, and that points to this characteristic of not-self.

We see that every experience can reveal this to us. We don't have to wait for some special experience to notice that it's impermanent. Every experience can show us this truth. And when we see experience as impermanent, unreliable, and not-self, quite naturally our minds recognize: this is not worth clinging to. Impermanent things are not worth clinging to.

I've heard this description for a long time, and I think it came from a yogi—I can't attribute a source to it—but this yogi described suffering as being like rope burn from grasping at changing phenomena.

You know, when a rope drags through your hand, the movement of that rope burns your hand. If you let go of the rope, it stops burning. The sense of clinging to something that is impermanent creates a suffering like rope burn. And so our minds begin to understand that and start to let go—quite naturally—start to let go.

We've been exploring different phenomena in our instructions in the morning, and there's been a theme, a thread that has been carried through. When we've talked about body sensations, these are impermanent. Mind states, these are impermanent. Thoughts, these are impermanent. And so we're really learning how to meet all of these different experiences with mindfulness.

Some experiences can be more challenging than others. We tend to get caught—we each have our favorite emotions to get caught with, and certain body sensations we probably get caught with. And we all also tend to get caught with thoughts. It seems to be a human phenomenon that we get absorbed into our thoughts and spin and worry and plan. So it's human.

This morning Tara talked about working with thoughts, and I'll talk a little bit more about it tomorrow, but I thought to take a little more time to just unpack it this evening—working with thoughts, different kinds of thoughts, different ways to work with them. These are, as Tara mentioned this morning, just another experience that can be known as an impermanent, unreliable phenomenon.

Looking at thoughts also is a real pointing to that not-self quality. Because so often when a thought arises, it's kind of like, "Well, where did that come from?" It's not self. It came from conditions. It arose based on habits, patterns, things from your memory. It's just an arising that happened. You didn't try to make it happen. It just happened. And so looking at thoughts really can help us to understand this, experientially connect with this understanding or teaching around not-self.

Sometimes people have the idea—and it can be a subtle belief or an obvious one—that what meditation means is having a mind that gets quiet, without thoughts. That sometimes happens in meditation. I think some of you have experienced it; many of you who've talked to me have mentioned that. And it's very pleasant, one of the things we like about it.

This just reminded me of a study I read. The headline was, "People would rather shock themselves than be left alone with their thoughts." People were given the opportunity to sit in a room quietly for an hour. There was a buzzer there that they could shock themselves with, or they could sit there and be with their thoughts. And people chose to shock themselves. So this is what we're dealing with—we don't like thoughts. Learning to have a more friendly relationship with thoughts can be useful.

It's possible for the mind to get quiet and not have thoughts in meditation, but that's not necessarily the goal. Our aim is this continuity of mindfulness that meets experience moment to moment and understands it as experience in the present moment—whatever it is: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, body sensations, things arising in the mind, emotions, moods, thoughts—being with moment-to-moment experience as it's arising and recognizing that it's happening right now. That's our aim in mindfulness practice. And so if thoughts arise, we can explore the possibility of being mindful of them.

Now it is challenging. Being mindful of thinking, of thoughts, is challenging because they have this quality—we are so habituated to following the thoughts, to getting caught in them, to thinking about them. That's what we've done our whole lives. So of course we get caught in thoughts. Of course. Deciding to sit down and meditate is a teaching on not-self right there. You sit down: "I'm going to meditate. I'm going to be with my breath."

You sit down determined to be with your breath for fifteen minutes. And what happens? A minute, two minutes in, you're thinking. Did you tell yourself, "I'm not going to pay attention to the breath anymore, I'm going to pay attention to thinking now"? No, it happened. It's not self.

And then, even more amazing, we're thinking, we're all lost in thought, and suddenly mindfulness returns and we become aware that we're thinking again. Did we decide to have mindfulness return? No. Again, it's not self. It arose because of conditions, because you planted seeds of mindfulness earlier. So right there, just watching the mind wander and come back—a teaching on not self.

In exploring thinking, we need to understand the difference between being lost in thought and being aware of thinking. I think we can intuitively know this because we all understand that moment when we wake up, the moment when mindfulness returns. There's a difference in quality between being lost in some story or memory and then having mindfulness return—that moment when, "Oh, aware, I'm aware." That quality of difference begins to point out what it feels like to be lost in thought and what it feels like to be aware. So getting familiar with that distinction is important.

In that moment when mindfulness returns, often what we become aware of is that we are thinking. And immediately most of us judge that: "I'm thinking. I shouldn't be thinking. I should bring myself back to the breath." But right there in that moment, you are aware of thinking. So that moment of mindfulness returning into thought is a great opportunity to recognize what it's like to be aware while thinking. Take a moment to notice that. Thinking is happening. Aware of that.

There are many different options for what to do next. It can simply be noticing the thought. But often one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says what people do in that moment is they shoot the thought. "Thinking!" And then it goes away because there's such an intense focus on it. But there's a kind of intensity to that—"I'm thinking"—and it's almost like that note obliterates the thinking. It's not really a natural release of thinking. It's a kind of overwhelming of thinking through that noting process, through that intense aiming and shooting, as he says, shooting thoughts.

So when we become mindful or aware—oh, thinking is happening—can there be a gentler awareness of thinking? So that there is a connection with the capacity the mind has to think and know that we're thinking at the same time. That's what we could call mindfulness of thinking. We are thinking and we know that we're thinking.

When we are not aware of the thinking, we're often just pulled into our thoughts, our habits, our patterns, often connected to deep conditioning. Reactivity can arise. We go down a train, a rabbit hole—I sometimes call it a rabbit hole. We go down a rabbit hole and it can take us a while to come back out because there's so much conditioning around getting hooked into thoughts.

So beginning to recognize the difference between being hooked and being aware of thinking—just curiosity about that. What is that difference? And that moment when you recognize that you've become aware is a prime moment to get curious about that. Aware of thinking. It's happening. The mind can do that.

One thing I like to distinguish is that there are so many different kinds of thoughts that happen. You might have noticed that.

things like that. But there's also—you know, somebody mentioned the narration kind of thought, and then there's daydreaming kind of thoughts, and there's just drifting random thoughts. So there's a lot of different kinds of thoughts.

And roughly, in terms of talking about working with thoughts, I like to distinguish between what I'll call active or energetic thinking, where there's a kind of investment in it, maybe. There's a pull into it. There's an energy with it. I call that active thinking. And the other that I'll distinguish right now is what we might call something like drifting thinking, where there's not much of a charge. It almost just feels floaty. There's often not a lot of emotional stuff going on in there. It's just a drifty kind of space.

And there are very different ways to work with those kinds of experiences.

So I'll start with talking about the active thinking or the energized thinking, because that's often where we can struggle. That kind of thinking is often connected to an emotional pattern. And we'll talk in a moment about making those connections.

But one of the first things that can be useful with a kind of thought pattern that is really engaged is something Tara mentioned this morning, which is to kind of name it—connecting, taking a step back from the content and noticing the type of thinking in terms of a category, like planning, remembering, judging, fantasizing, arguing. It's connected to the content a little bit, but it gives you a bit of distance from the story or the narrative that's connected with the thought. So you can name or note that just very lightly. Arguing, arguing is happening. Arguing.

These kind of energized thoughts, energetic thoughts, active thinking—it kind of feels like we've been hooked onto them. So there's some engagement with them. And often it feels like, while it might have arisen unbidden, it's kind of like we've jumped on the bandwagon. Yeah, I really want to think about that.

So this kind of naming the thoughts helps us to take a step back and just notice the type of thoughts. And it also begins to point out—Jack Kornfield sometimes would say, what are your top three favorite tunes? I was the angry thinker. That was my number one hit, anger. So you begin to get familiar with the kinds of patterns, all different ways in.

I mean, some of you have talked about planning, you know, being a planner, and it's like, oh yeah, I'm planning what to have for lunch, planning how to brush my teeth, I'm planning—you know, here there's not much to plan, but we plan. So that planning is the habit. So just begin to notice the habitual qualities. This is noticing something about the specific characteristic of this kind of thinking. Planning tends to be directed at the future. Remembering at the past. So we can have different relationships with different kinds of memories in that way.

Our habitual thoughts, the ones that we find are our top three—I would say those are often related to old and deep patterns. Things that have happened to you before. Ways that you've engaged in your life from the time that you were a child. These are deeply conditioned habits. And so again, of course they arise. You can't expect to come and sit in the hall at IMS and leave your mind outside. It comes in with us. Sometimes I say on these retreats, this is your mind 101. You are learning what your mind does, how it does it.

So again, with these energetic kind of thoughts, if you find them having this, you know, naming them as planning or remembering—another piece that can be useful with these thoughts that have a lot of energy to them is just check in. Who's the audience for this thought? Am I talking just to myself, or do I have a large audience? Or is it one specific person that I am trying to convince that I'm right?

Kind of get a sense of it. Often when we're thinking, we're not just talking to ourselves—we are talking to someone. And so having a sense of that: Is there an audience? Whose voice is the thought in? Sometimes thoughts are images. We'll talk about this more in a bit. Sometimes they're images. Sometimes they're as if we're talking to ourselves, or as if someone else is talking to us.

We might hear something in one of our parents' voice, or in an old teacher's voice, or in our boss's voice. Just notice these things. They are part of the process of how our mind does thinking. We don't have to do much other than recognize: "Okay, yeah, arguing and trying to convince this person I'm right—that's what's happening right now." Just noticing. We can notice that this is happening in our own minds.

When we're really lost in the thoughts, we believe it's happening to us right now. It's kind of startling. I got this shown to me very clearly at one point when I had had a painful breakup with someone. It was maybe a year into the breakup, and I was still processing, still dealing with this. I began noticing at times that I would wake up into thoughts and be really confused, because in the thought, I was right back in the relationship. It felt like I was there. Then I'd come out and think, "Wait a minute, that's not even—that was a year ago. That's not happening right now." It was happening in my mind.

Beginning to recognize this—naming these energetic thoughts, recognizing the audience, recognizing whose voice it's in—helps us see that this is happening in our minds. This is not actually happening.

Another useful piece here: when you notice that you're thinking, you come into awareness and recognize, "Yes, okay, I know I'm thinking, I know I'm planning, remembering, judging, fantasizing"—whatever that is. Another useful step is to take a broader view, kind of opening up a little bit and checking out: How am I relating to this fact that I'm thinking?

This is often where judgment comes in. We don't like the fact that we're thinking. The attitude to our thoughts is often related to the fact that we're practicing meditation. We're sitting down and meditating, and we have the idea, "I'm not supposed to be thinking." When thinking arises, we get annoyed with ourselves. The attitude might be annoyance. So take a moment to check out: I know that thinking is happening—what's my relationship to noticing that?

Over time it can become really neutral. It's just like, "Oh yeah, thinking is happening. That's not a problem. That's just what I can notice right now. It's another experience." But as we begin to become familiar with working with thinking, we will often see a relationship that is resistant. We don't like it. Or the other side of it might be that we just want to put down the meditation altogether and go back into that fantasy—it was way more pleasant than feeling all of this stuff in my body. So there can be both the greed, the desire to go back into the thinking, but often there's the relationship of aversion, not liking, wanting it to go away, having a conflicted relationship with it. So acknowledge that. Thinking is happening and I don't like it. That's what's happening right now.

With this active thinking, I mentioned a few moments ago that there's often emotion related to it, connected to it. Tara mentioned this morning to check in: Is there an emotion related to the thinking? Thoughts are sometimes an emotion's way of trying to get our attention.

For instance, if you're ranting at somebody—"I'm right, I'm right, you're wrong, I'm right"—maybe it just feels like judging and arguing. But what is the emotion here? It might be fear or anger, the flywheel off of which those thoughts are coming. When we can connect with an emotion, it's often already happening; it's just a little below our conscious awareness. We may not be consciously mindful or aware that those emotions are there.

Opening up to whether there are emotions present with this thought is not a trying to dig. And it's very important, I think, not to look for specific emotions. If you're having thoughts of arguing, for instance, it's not so helpful to ask, "Well, is there fear here? Is there anger here?"

But more just, what kind of emotions are here? Is there an emotion here? It's kind of opening up with that question, being available to see if there is an emotion present.

When I've explored it in this way, more than once I've been surprised by the emotion that's been there. When I'm not looking for the emotion, when I'm not thinking, "I know what the emotion should be, there must be anger under here"—if you're looking for an emotion, you may construct it and you'll find it. But if you're more just willing to let the experience show itself to you, sometimes we can be completely startled and not at all expect what is here.

I had an example of this in my daily life. I was driving, and my mind was consumed with planning—this spinning, intense energy of planning. I wanted to be present for driving, so I kept coming back to the hands on the steering wheel, trying to be present. I was skipping over the thought a little bit. I wasn't exactly pushing the thought away, but I was also not engaging with it. Just, "Okay, stop. I'm going to pay attention to driving." And it just kept coming. It was so strong. It kept coming and coming. Finally, with my hands on the steering wheel, I just said, "Well, what else is happening here?" Just that simple question—what else is going on right now with this planning? I mean, it was not pleasant. It was intense. "Got to do this, got to figure out this, got to make sure this person knows this thing and that person knows this thing."

When I stopped and just asked, "What else is happening here?"—I was really happy. I had no idea I was happy. And as soon as the mind actually opened to that, all of that planning thought went away. In retrospect, what I saw was happening was that the mind was trying to figure out how to hold on to this happiness. How can I make sure that everybody knows everything they need to know so that I can feel this happiness—when I wasn't even feeling it?

So opening to that curiosity, to what is here, can be so surprising. In the middle of being curious about depression and depressed thoughts, I noticed mettā. That was... what? And again, it was just an opening to "what else is here?" Oh, there's mettā here. Not at all what I expected. There can, of course, be—in the middle of arguing and frustration thoughts—anger and hatred and all of those things. But I just want to point out: don't look for anything in particular. Just be curious about what shows up, and then work with it as we've talked about working with emotions in the body, being with it in the body.

Often when we connect with the emotion that's underlying thoughts, the thoughts will dissipate. Because as I said, it's like the thoughts are often, in this kind of energetic experience, the emotion's way of trying to get our attention. So when we finally connect —"Oh, this is what's happening"—the thoughts may dissipate.

In trying to be aware, mindful of extremely strong thoughts, these energetic patterns with a lot of emotional charge to them, it's helpful to really have the wisdom to understand whether or not the mindfulness can actually meet the experience. Sometimes the energy of a reaction, a thought and the emotion with it, can have more momentum than our mindfulness has momentum. And it feels like our little stream or trickle of mindfulness is swamped by a tsunami. If trying to be mindful of a pattern like that just pulls you right back into it, if you're just swamped by the energy of the emotion, then that's not the time to try to be mindful of that pattern.

There's a number of things we can explore in that moment. It's not what we would call pure mindfulness, but it's skillful means to support us to stay present rather than getting lost. An important part of this is that we're letting go or redirecting the attention to something else. But it's important to do that in a way that's not a repression of that strong energy, the strong thought, the strong emotions with it—to not be repressing that.

It's more like what I would do at times. Anger was my big thing. I would get lost in worlds of anger. And as I began to practice with it and notice how strong it was, notice that I couldn't quite be mindful of it in that moment, it would be like I would bow to it. I'd say, "I see you."

I see you're really asking for attention, but mindfulness isn't quite strong enough at this point, so I'm going to turn my attention to something else. That was the whole conversation I would say to myself a few times, and then it just translated into "not now" with a very gentle tone, so that it had no aversion in it. Just "not now." And then I turned my attention to something else.

There are different ways to turn our attention. Depending on how strong the energy is, it might be that you can just let that energy still be there but expand, and let yourself know there's lots of other things happening in the present moment. Just remind yourself there are thousands of things happening in the present moment other than this thing. Sometimes it can feel like we're pulled by a magnet to pay attention to something that's very painful, very difficult. And just the reminder: yeah, that's happening. And seeing is happening. Hearing is happening. Well, there's that thing again. And seeing is happening. And hearing is happening. And there's sensations on my feet. And oh, there it is again. And seeing is happening.

I would rotate through my senses and just broaden to expand the field of attention. Rather than being collapsed in on this one thing, it just got broader. You can also just redirect the attention, turn to something else. That can be a little harder if it's got that really strong magnetic pull to it. But if you can—and I did that with the anger—I said "not now." I was often walking when this happened for some reason. Anger would take over when I was walking. And so I would acknowledge the anger and I would say, "Well, you can take a walk with me, but I'm going to pay attention to my feet." That was a way to just redirect. I wasn't attending to it at all, but I also didn't tell it it had to go away. So these are gentle ways to hold these challenging emotions and turn the attention elsewhere.

Now, if these emotions are really strong, often they're felt in this area—in the torso, throat, chest, stomach. Powerful emotions often have sensations in this area. And so for myself, I found coming back to the breath was not always useful in this kind of place, in terms of redirecting the attention. Because of all of that tension associated with those emotions in the body, as soon as I tried to be with a breath, all of it would be clenching. It just reminded me of it and I was right back in it. That may or may not be the case for you, but give yourself permission to not necessarily come back to your breath if it's your anchor. Let yourself broaden with some challenging emotional states. Broader awareness, or turn to hearing. Hearing can be great there because it's not in this area of the body, that experience of hearing.

I have lots more I could tell you about working with difficult thoughts, but I want to get to drifting thoughts, so I'll shift in that direction.

These kinds of thoughts are much less energetic, and often actually some of these thoughts come when the energy is a little low or when the mindfulness is a little weak. These kinds of daydreams, random thoughts that seem—you find yourself seeing images or thinking about people you don't know. They're talking about things you're not interested in. It just seems random. There's not a lot of emotional connection either. It's just like, why am I hearing people talk about that? Something in your mind is making connections and you're aware of it.

Often I have found for myself that when that kind of thinking is happening, and it feels like a drifting or a daydreaming quality, or maybe you're even seeing images, dream-like images—those are also thoughts. What I like to suggest is this: you can use the noting if you like, you can explore "daydreaming is happening, drifting is happening." But what I find most useful for myself in that space is to connect with and become aware of the quality of the mind that is drifting. It's often quite relaxed, quite spacious, and quite non-reactive. It's just not quite mindful.

So we're bringing, essentially—that state is candy. If just a little bit of mindfulness is brought in there, it can open us to a relaxed, open, nonjudgmental, aware space. So with that drifting thought, that's often one of the first things I encourage people to check. Can you know the quality of the mind that is drifting or daydreaming?

Touch into that. And then potentially use the noting for that quality—spacious, calm, peaceful, relaxed. Touch into the quality of the mind there, rather than the fact of the thinking. Because the thinking there is not so interesting. It's just the mind relaxing and doing its random brain-firing things. It's not something that's often terribly relevant for us. But the quality of that mind is really useful. We can connect to it and find... I have found at times when I connected to that, it's like feeling the mind dropping into a completely new terrain of awareness—broad, spacious, relaxed, and receptive.

We can also, in this time or place where there's not so much charge to thinking, be curious about and recognize how the thinking is happening in our minds. Tara mentioned this also this morning—that we essentially can think in any of our sense modalities. Seeing and hearing are two of the biggest ones. We often will see images here, or hear our thoughts as if somebody is talking to us, like it's a radio. So we're talking to ourselves. It comes in through an imagined hearing and an imagined seeing as our thoughts.

But we can also think in all of our sense modalities. I have at times experienced having scents or smells come in, very rarely tastes, but I've had that occasionally. And then, more often for me—I was a dancer—a memory of movement, the feeling... we can have kinesthetic thoughts. To give you a flavor of that right now, being with yourself, imagine that you're going to stand up. Is there any sense—some of you may have felt this—when I do this, sometimes I have a sense of that feeling of the movement, almost. If you just imagine, "I'm going to stand up," it can almost feel like the standing has happened and you haven't stood. That may give you a clue of what a kinesthetic thought would be like.

So we can think in all these different modalities. And sometimes it's useful to acknowledge, as a part of recognizing the process of thinking, how the mind is doing its work. It's not the content we're interested in here so much as how the mind is thinking. It's thinking by creating images. It's thinking by creating sounds. I would sometimes use the note for the sense modality to notice the thought. Rather than noticing "drifting" or "thinking," I would notice "seeing." This is a seeing thought. I knew I wasn't really seeing, but it was acknowledging that the thinking was happening through that sense modality.

This was really helpful at one point. During one of my three-month courses, I think I watched every movie I've ever seen—including seeing the titles in the font they were in in the movie. As soon as I saw an image arise from those movies, I would note "seeing," and then it would vanish. And then I might see another. This got to be pretty fun, actually, because I could watch a movie in about seven seconds. It would produce the image, I'd note "seeing," and that one would vanish. Then another frame would appear, half an hour later in the movie, and "oh, seeing," and that one would vanish. I would just watch these thoughts arise and vanish. Again, just watching them, noticing them, not having a conflicted relationship with them.

In talking about the noticing—for instance, with the drifting thought, noticing the quality of the mind—what's the quality of the mind that's thinking? That's noticing, in a way, how the thinking is affecting experience. In this case, it's almost more that the thinking is a byproduct of something else that's happening. The mind has relaxed, it's become spacious and calm, and there's not enough mindfulness, so random thoughts appear. So we're noticing what's going on with the thoughts. Thoughts are happening—and what else is happening with the thoughts? That's a good general tool.

What else is going on while this thought is happening? How does thinking affect experience?

Thinking is a powerful conditioning force in our minds. When thoughts arise—and we often think of emotions as coming up first and then thoughts following—but thoughts can also arise first. We can be in one of those random, drifty spaces and because of association, stumble into some thought that reminds us of somebody we had a conversation with, and then we're back in that argument with them. So it was kind of like we drifted out of mindfulness. It wasn't like there was a lot of emotion, but the thought arose and then we started having that argument, and that thinking generated emotion.

So there's a cycle between thought and emotion, thought and emotion. And generally being curious about what else is happening with the thinking begins to unpack or unweave some of what has been conditioned by thoughts and some of what the thoughts might be conditioning.

Sometimes I call this noticing—like when you wake up into thinking. I talked about this at the very beginning: when you notice that thinking is happening, take the opportunity to recognize, "Oh, I'm aware of thinking. Here it is." As opposed to immediately, "Oh, thinking, let me come back to the breath." There's something that's happened there. While you've been wandering, something has been shaped. Thinking has shaped your experience in some fashion. And so see if you can take that in. I sometimes call this noticing the landscape that you're waking up into. Or notice the planet that you're waking up on.

It may be that the thought you're waking up into has shaped an emotion of anger, fear, confusion. It also may be that the thought has shaped some wholesome qualities. This was another really big aha moment for me around working with thoughts—just being curious about, okay, what else is here with this thought? Like that happiness, you know? Like a wholesome quality of happiness.

I was having a lot of thinking about some friends. I was sitting right about there on a three-month course and thinking about friends from the Peace Corps. They were coming up repeatedly in my mind. "Yep, thinking, come back to the breath." Doing that, shooting the thoughts as Sayadaw Tejaniaya was talking about. "Thinking, come back to the breath." It's like, "They're not here. Go away. Breath. Breath." And it was so potent though. It was such a strong pull. They kept coming back.

And finally, it's kind of like—you know what happens when you surrender? It just is so much easier. It's like, okay, this is what's happening. What else is here? It was mettā. And I was like, "Oh, wow." Just this expansive quality of feeling, "I love you." The thoughts stopped. And the mettā remained.

So what planet is actually there with the thoughts? I often find that we think we can set it aside and come back, but it's more like an aikido move. Open to what's here and connect with it. And see what happens next.

There are a couple of other kinds of thoughts that I'll mention briefly, just to touch on them. And if these are happening for you, you can check in with the teacher you're meeting with.

This morning somebody mentioned narration as a kind of thinking. In addition to how Tara talked about it, I find sometimes that narration happens and it's just a really neutral thing, you know. It's just like I'm walking down the hallway and I go into the bathroom and turn on the light, and the mind is saying, "She's walking down the hall. She went into the bathroom. She flipped the light switch. She thought about telling Joseph about this experience." Just a continual narration of what was happening. It drove me nuts for a while. And I think really it's just an experience that we seem to do. We tell ourselves the story of "me" constantly all day long. And at certain points in the meditation, it becomes obvious that this is happening.

A way to work with that narration, at least for me, is to really acknowledge the not-self nature of it. I couldn't stop it. That's a useful exploration around not-self—can I make this not happen? Can I turn this off? No. Okay, it's not-self. It's a process that's unfolding, and what I can do is be aware of it. So that narration can be worked with in that way.

Another kind of thought—almost not a thought, not a thought in the way we normally think of thoughts at least—are the deeper perspectives we carry: views, beliefs. These are a kind of thought in a way. Beliefs are a kind of thought. They're not often consciously recognized because they are a perspective we're looking through. We're not really knowing that we believe something—it's just true.

One way to begin exploring this area is when there's some kind of struggle, where it feels like you're caught. You're aware of it, you know you're caught, but you just keep staying caught. You can keep working with it in that way, but sometimes it can be useful—because when we're caught like that, there is some kind of belief happening. A little bit of curiosity, "What's being believed right now?" can sometimes allow that belief to bubble into consciousness so we can become aware of it.

With beliefs, they aren't exactly on or off. We have ranges of beliefs. Sometimes when a belief is exposed, when it comes up, it's like, "Wow, I don't even believe that." We're not trying to stop believing or stop the beliefs, but just to see them. Sometimes when those beliefs come up and they're not really believed anymore, it's like, "That's an old belief. I don't believe that anymore." Those old beliefs can operate below the surface because of their habitual conditioned nature, but when they're exposed, they can sometimes just release.

Then there are those beliefs we're really on board with. That one comes up—"I'm to blame"—and yep, I'm on board with that. So just notice: if you see a belief, you can be curious about how strong it is. You don't have to stop believing it. Those strong beliefs will not go quietly, but they may be willing to be seen.

There can be a kind of release or relief when we see something—that whole pattern of struggle and confusion, and then to see, "Oh, I think I'm to blame here. Yeah, actually, I think I'm to blame here." The mind can relax a little when it sees what's actually going on. Even if there's still a sense of that being believed, when it's exposed to mindfulness, there can be that sense of, at least it's being seen. Maybe there can be an okayness about knowing that. Like Bruni mentioned the other night—"I don't like this." Yep, that's what's happening. I don't like this. And the heart can go, "Yeah, oh, it actually feels good to be acknowledged." I don't like this. Yes.

So beliefs can be really helpful to explore, especially when we're caught in something. The belief won't always show up, but you could just give yourself that opportunity: What's being believed here?

So that was a lot. Sometimes my teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya would say, just let the talk—you don't have to try to remember it. Let the talk be like dharma rain, just raining into your system. The rain falls and goes into nooks and crannies, just filters in through the soil. At some point, some piece of that rain may nourish the understanding of something. And you don't have to go looking for it. So you don't have to remember anything I said.

But at some point when you're working with something, it might arise—oh, beliefs. So just trust that process.

Let's sit for a moment. Trusting the process. Opening to just how it is. Appreciate yourself for what you're doing. And if it feels hard to do that, borrow my appreciation. It's an amazing thing that you're doing.

Thank you for your practice. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 71

Understanding Delusion

Andrea Fella · 1h06

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of delusion (moha), the most subtle and fundamental of the three unwholesome roots described in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). While greed (lobha) and aversion (dosa) are relatively easy to recognize, delusion by its very nature is much harder to see.
> Fella presents three progressive levels of delusion: First, the simple loss of mindfulness—being lost in thought, spaciness, or sleepiness. Here she shares a personal insight about how states like spaciness can actually be met with awareness rather than fought against. Second, delusion operating through our personal and cultural conditioning—the views and beliefs we've absorbed from family, society, and direct experience. She discusses confirmation bias, privilege, and the Buddha's teaching from the Brahmajāla Sutta (DN 1) about how even deep meditation experiences can become sticky views. Third, the most fundamental human delusion: mistaking what is impermanent (anicca) for permanent, what is unreliable for a source of lasting happiness, and what is not-self (anattā) for self.
> Practically, Fella encourages investigating: What is being believed right now? What feels permanent? Where am I looking for happiness? She emphasizes that non-delusion cannot be manufactured—it arises through insight—but we can incline the mind toward curiosity about how delusion operates. When moments of clarity fade and confusion returns, she counsels trust in those insights rather than self-judgment, recognizing that unwinding delusion is a gradual process.

The other night, Bruni talked about mindfulness of mind—awareness of particular, really simple aspects of mental experience that are useful to pay attention to, as described in the Satipatthana Sutta.

The first part of that teaching talks about noticing the presence and absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. Bruni spoke quite beautifully about working with this and its value. Greed, aversion, and delusion form a list of three that the Buddha spoke often about, emphasizing the importance of understanding these states. They are described as the three unwholesome roots, the three tendencies of mind from which all unwholesome mind states arise. In fact, he described freedom—Nibbana—in the simplest way as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

I really like that definition. It's so simple. It also feels like something we can get a taste of, a sense of the direction that the mind is headed in this practice. For moments, we may experience times when it feels like greed, aversion, and delusion are not arising. The peace of that, the ease of that, the spaciousness of that, the non-problem of that is quite lovely.

The practices the Buddha taught—mindfulness, the practice of observing what's happening in the present moment while it's happening—as we've discussed, the simple practice of mindfulness from the perspective that Winnie so beautifully pointed us to with the Eightfold Path, Wise View mindfulness with that perspective, creates the conditions for transformation. When we are observing greed, aversion, and delusion with this perspective, it creates the conditions for them to diminish, to weaken, to fall apart, for us to get that taste of release from greed, aversion, and delusion. So they are really worth paying attention to, getting to know, looking at, and becoming familiar with.

Now greed and aversion are relatively easy to recognize. We know that feeling of wanting, of pulling, of being pulled towards something—the feeling of "gotta have, gotta have." We know the feeling of aversion, that wanting to be separated from, wanting to not have that thing, that experience, that person, that idea, that thought. In the meetings I've been having with those of you I'm meeting with, people are describing pretty clear experiences of recognizing greed and aversion.

Delusion, by its very nature, is much harder to see, to recognize, to experience and understand. It's not so hard to recognize, "Oh, this is greed. I know greed's happening." But to recognize, "Oh, this is delusion happening in the mind"—not so easy.

So tonight I'd like to explore with you some ways we can begin to recognize delusion and begin to work with it. Recognizing it is the biggest part of that work.

Delusion can arise following on from greed and aversion. Greed arises, we want something, we get it perhaps, we get a hit of happiness from it, and the perspective that we get is, "Okay, having that thing made me happy, so I need to keep that thing, I need to hold on to that thing—that will be what makes me happy." That kind of idea or belief that having anything is what ultimately makes us happy is a form of delusion. Greed and aversion can create perspectives or filters in the mind—views where we're seeing through the lens of aversion or greed, and then everything is colored with that. That's a form of delusion. Our minds are obscured by this filter.

But delusion itself is more fundamental than greed or aversion. Ultimately, greed and aversion are based on the tendency of the mind to have delusion. If the mind did not have the tendency toward delusion, greed and aversion would not arise. We'll talk about that more as well.

Tonight, in exploring this topic, I'd like to look from what we might think of as the more obvious forms of delusion through to some subtler forms, and then ultimately to some very fundamental forms.

The first level I'd like to look at is basically losing awareness—not being mindful, disconnection, uncertainty, confusion, often manifesting as sleepiness. Just this disconnection from experience.

The second level is delusion that operates even when we are aware. This is a kind of delusion based on views, beliefs, and ideas—things that we've grown up with, perspectives that we have taken up just because we've grown up in them. We're swimming in the soup of those perspectives and we can't see that we're seeing the world from that perspective. This is a more individual layer of delusion, based on whatever soup each of us grew up swimming in.

Then there's a deeper level, a more profound level of delusion that it seems we all share as human beings—basic distortions where we mistake reality to be something it's not. This one too operates when we're aware. So we'll go through each of these.

The first form of delusion is basically not being aware. Mindfulness is gone. We're lost in thought, perhaps believing the fantasy or construct of whatever the mind is creating. I might have mentioned this the other night, but at one point, after a long relationship broke up—maybe even a year or so after—every now and then my mind would get lost in fantasy, and it created that world of being back in that relationship. When I came back out of being lost in thought, it was very confusing, because in that space of being lost in thought, the mind completely believed it was back in that relationship. That's delusion—in that space, lost in thought, believing something that's not real. Living in an unreal world. We do this so much in our world of thoughts.

We can also be lost in states of mind—spaciness, sleepiness, dullness, the sloth and torpor and restlessness flavors of the hindrances. But none of those are inherently non-mindful. We just have a very strong habit of not being mindful in those states.

This became very clear to me at one point. I was sitting at my table, having a meal, and while I was eating my mind kept spacing out—losing awareness and drifting off. I was practicing with being present. It was like I said to my mind, "Come back and be with eating. Pay attention to eating." And seconds later, it would be spaced out again. This happened several times. Come back to eating, space out. Come back to eating, space out.

At some point, I decided—or perhaps wisdom kicked in—and it encouraged me to just be curious. "Well, okay, so the mind is spacing out. Let's see what happens if I just try to be aware while the mind is spacing out." I felt like the mind went and hovered somewhere above my head, sitting up there. And it was very restful. It felt very relaxed and peaceful.

What I recognized in that moment was that I was really tired. I was exhausted, and I had been yanking my mind back—"Do this! Do this!"—and my mind was saying, "Look, you're trying too hard. Just rest, relax. It's time to relax. We're too tired to pay attention to something in particular." And yet it was quite easeful to be aware of that state of what I had called spacing out. It was spaciousness. It was easeful. It was relaxing. It was restful.

The mind hung out in that state for maybe twenty or thirty seconds, and then the state shifted. It was kind of like a foggy space, this foggy state—diffuse, fuzzy. Not a lot of precision to what I was noticing. I wasn't really attending to particular senses or body sensations or smells or sights. Just this fuzziness. "Oh, fuzziness feels like this."

But after thirty seconds or so of just being with that, letting the mind rest, it was like on a sunny day where the sun slowly dissipates the fog. And then there was quite an alertness in the mind and a clarity of body sensations and smells and sights and sounds. Being aware of eating at that point was just very natural.

So that state of spaciness—I had thought of it as not mindfulness. There's a habit of not being mindful in those states, but I would say pretty much every state of mind, except perhaps non-mindfulness itself, we can be mindful of. Sleepiness. Dullness. Fogginess. Restlessness. All of them. We've talked about this possibility of waking up into them.

We may think of these states as inherently delusive states. "I can't be mindful if I'm sleepy." That thought itself is delusion. If you find yourself thinking, "I'm too tired to meditate. I'm too spacey to meditate. I'm too whatever to meditate"—just don't believe that thought. It's a deluded thought. It's delusion at work.

We can be aware of whatever it is the mind thinks is in the way. Be aware of tiredness, aware of sleepiness, aware of spaciness. We can also begin to get familiar with the quality or feeling of what that disconnected mind feels like.

When the mind returns, when there's a kind of waking up and mindfulness returns—in that moment, often there's a particular response. It depends on what you're doing, but often we judge ourselves. It's like, "Oh, I've been lost in thought. I should be mindful. I should bring my attention here." And that actually can obscure something very useful to see in that moment. All those ideas and thoughts about what I had been doing, how my mind was wandering, what I should be doing instead—that's a very common response. So just notice that, of course, when it happens. Judging, believing something needs to happen.

But in that moment, it is possible—the more continuous the mindfulness is cultivated, the more we're just okay with mindfulness coming and going and seeing that mindfulness comes and goes—the more we can be aware right as mindfulness arises. And in that place, when mindfulness is arising into something, there's a kind of lingering taste or scent of what it was like in the moments before. So the moment of coming back into mindfulness, there's a lingering feeling or sense of what that disconnected, non-mindful state felt like. We can begin to get a taste of that sometimes in this space.

Sometimes we're waking up into something stronger like anger or aversion, and then we actually get a taste of that state, a really clear sense of it. Or we might wake up into thinking and get a really clear sense of, "Oh, this is what it's like to be aware of thinking." But sometimes if we're returning from one of those vague, diffused, disconnected, fuzzy states, the return of mindfulness is like waking up into that state, and you get a sense of what it's like to be mindful of this. There's a little bit of a recollection, an awareness—it just felt like I wasn't here. Like the mind wasn't here. We can get a taste of that, a flavor of that. We can begin to get familiar with that kind of feeling of having a veil or a haze in front of our minds as we're exploring and connecting with experience.

So that's the kind of delusion related to mindfulness being lost—and ways to explore a little bit there, particularly that moment of waking up. This is what it feels like to be aware right now. And a moment before, there was a flavor or feeling of what it was like to not be aware.

The second kind of delusion I'd like to talk about this evening is delusion connected to our personal conditioning, that soup we've been raised in. Some of this has to do with things we experienced personally—how other kids treated you on the playground, or just ways there was engagement with you in your life. Some has to do with familial patterns and habits. We all have our own conditioning from our families.

Some of my friends and I sometimes talk about differences here. In my family, teasing was not a loving thing. And one of my close friends came from a family where teasing was a very loving thing. So there's a little bit of a disconnect between us sometimes around teasing. This is just our own conditioning.

This kind of conditioning can come from family, from our own experience, and also from cultural conditioning, our culture's ways. There's so much of this that we're simply not aware of how we've been conditioned, how we've been shaped. The practice really helps us to uncover these patterns, these habits, and to see that they have been conditioned.

But when we don't see them, they're basically operating underground. These habits, patterns, and conditions are operating beneath the surface. And we often just take them to be the baseline of reality. We don't see that they're a perspective on reality—we take them to be reality. We think we're perceiving things accurately, but we're seeing them from a particular lens, a particular view.

It can be hard to see that we're having this kind of perspective, and very hard at times even to see evidence to the contrary—evidence that it is a perspective. This is well documented in the psychological world, in a field that studies confirmation bias. These studies show over and over again that we tend to take in information that agrees with what we believe, and we tend to actively ignore or simply not recognize information that does not agree with what we believe. We can actively discount information that disagrees with what we believe.

In fact, some studies examining the divisions so apparent in our country right now, particularly around politics, have shown that if you give people evidence to support the other side's perspective—in a reasoned, rational approach using just evidence and facts—people tend to get more entrenched in their views. It's very difficult to shake ourselves out of these perspectives. This is how delusion works so powerfully.

I want to give some examples of this kind of delusion. There are many, but I'll offer a selected set. One kind of views we hold are views about ourselves and others. We have beliefs about who we are, what we're capable of. We have beliefs about other people. This one is really quite easy to start seeing.

Many of you, most of you—I'd say probably all of you—most of the people here you do not know. You don't know much about them. You don't know what they think. But that doesn't stop us from having all kinds of views and opinions about them. On that first day of the retreat, we talked about Vipassana romance and Vipassana vendetta.

These things tend to spring out of this kind of delusion—views and opinions about someone based on very little information. We think we know who someone is, what they are, how they are, what they're capable of.

We can begin to recognize that our thoughts and ideas here, especially because we don't know people, are just that—ideas. This is harder to see when we know people well. We categorize people; they do something repeatedly, or even just once or twice, and we think, "Well, that's who they are." We can recognize when we're doing this with others, especially when we don't know them. We can recognize when other people are doing it to us. But it's so hard to recognize when we do this to ourselves.

We have ideas, views, and opinions about ourselves that are deeply embedded. Many of our challenges in life stem from some kind of belief we hold about ourselves, our capabilities. My own pattern of self-hatred—a pattern I worked with for many years—was deeply conditioned. Beliefs like "I'm a failure," "I'm no good," "I can't do things right." It shocked me, actually shocked me, when I began to see that this was a pattern in my life, because until I came to meditation and started looking at my mind, I thought I was very competent. I would not have said self-hatred was part of my equation.

But then I started looking at what my mind was telling me in the practice. It was very challenging. This was a perspective operating under the surface—this perspective of "you're no good, you can't do things right"—propelling me to try to prove myself wrong, to do everything competently and well and right, to prove that all those imagined people in my mind who thought I couldn't do things were wrong. But all of that activity of accomplishment was really rooted in this belief, this delusion that I was a failure somehow.

So it's hard to see sometimes what beliefs are operating in our own minds. I mentioned this exploration around thoughts—to check in when there's a struggle happening, when there's a lot of thoughts going on—"What's being believed?" This can be a useful exploration at times. If there's even just something that seems really confusing, like the mind is spinning and whirling and you think, "What's going on? I have no idea"—well, what's being believed? Perhaps "I should know what's going on." Maybe it's that simple. So that question—"What's being believed?"—can be very powerful in supporting a seeing through of the delusion that's operating.

Views and beliefs about ourselves are one form. Cultural views, the perspectives of our culture—how those come in—are another. These are often not spoken. They are perspectives that we absorb simply because we are so deeply swimming in the soup of our culture that we take things in without question. Simple things, for instance, like how close you stand to a stranger when you're talking to them. Whether or not you make physical contact with someone when you're talking to them. How close do you need to be to make physical contact with somebody? These are things nobody sits down and tells you. These are things we absorb.

So this is a lot of how these cultural perspectives come in—just through living, swimming in the soup of our culture. And sometimes we can notice that these perspectives are operating when we find somebody behaving differently than the norm. We might feel really uncomfortable if somebody comes up and stands right next to us while we're talking to them. It's like, "That's not right. That's not how we do this here." But it's just a perspective. It's just a convention, really.

And so we can start to see some of these perspectives, these cultural perspectives, conventions. Travel is a great way to see this. If you go spend some time in another culture, you'll get a taste of what your perspective is. Some of these simple, almost neutral perspectives, really. Standing three feet or five feet away from somebody—these are things we can begin to just see as almost neutral conditionings, what we've grown up with.

And then there are some other conditionings in culture that are way more insidious and way more harmful. In the culture of the United States, for instance—and I don't know that I really, I mean, I think I did hear this at times—but there's this idea: America is the land of opportunity. If you work hard enough, you can live your dream. That's a view that's embedded in the culture of the United States. Sometimes these perspectives come because we're immersed in it. We're immersed in it. We're told it repeatedly.

This particular view of the United States being a land of opportunity, that anyone who works hard enough can fulfill their dream, ignores—is not really taking in—the inherent advantages of being born with a certain gender, a certain skin color, with parents who have a certain economic status. There's a kind of privilege that some people have that others don't have, and there's not an equal footing, really, of opportunity for everyone.

So not recognizing that this is a view, a perspective, not seeing how some advantages are conveyed on some and not others, can lead to a kind of denial around this privilege of being in a white body, in a socioeconomic status that has more resources at their disposal. And there's that saying some of you may recognize: that some of us are born on third base and think we're hitting a home run.

So just that—this perspective or view that there's equal opportunity without seeing the varieties of experience that come in, that opportunities are not all equal—this kind of thing creates so much suffering. Delusion is not a small thing. When we're acting from delusion, it can have major ramifications. Now standing two feet or five feet away—maybe not major ramifications. But there are many perspectives that we do not see, these views that we grow up in, that are so damaging. And if we are here to see suffering and find ways to let go of it, this is an area that we need to look at. How is our delusion working?

Another example of perspective that creates a lot of suffering: sometimes views can be created not just from swimming in the soup, but from our own personal experience—yet without getting complete information. One teaching story from the time of the Buddha, which many of you may be familiar with, is the story of the blind people and the elephant. In this teaching story, the Buddha tells of a king who asked the blind people in the kingdom to be shown an elephant. And so some of the people were touching the elephant in various parts—some touching the trunk, some touching the feet, the legs, some the side of the elephant, some the tail, some the ears.

And then when they were asked, "What is an elephant like?" some said, "Well, an elephant is like a post." And some said, "An elephant is like a broom"—those who touched the tuft of the tail. Some said, "Like a wall of a storeroom"—those who touched the side. And none of that was—I mean, that experience itself was not delusion. That's what they experienced. But what happens is that we tend to, getting information, we get partial information about something, and then we create a view: this is what this thing is.

And this teaching story says that the people were comparing their views. "Well, an elephant's like this." "Well, that's not right. An elephant is like this."

"No, you're wrong. An elephant is like this." It's the holding to the view, holding to the perspective, not admitting that there may be a different perspective or a broader perspective that can encompass all of them—that's where the delusion is. That's the delusion. Believing the perspective.

Even here, and this is the confirmation bias at work, somebody says, "Well, to me it felt like a wall of a storeroom." "Well, that can't be right because it sure felt like a post to me." The belief in our own experience—and I think this is even more insidious when we have had direct experience. We had direct experience of something, and then we create a view: "This is what the experience is like."

In one teaching, a deep teaching on views found in the first sutta in the Dīgha Nikāya called the All-Embracing Net of Views, the Buddha describes a whole range of different views and perspectives that people hold to. These are speculative views about the nature of reality. He described how many of these views come to be, different perspectives, and points out that some people say the world is infinite, others say the world is finite. There were ten—I can't remember them all, and it's not important that I give you all ten. What matters is that people were asserting all these different perspectives of what the world was like.

And then the Buddha explained how these views get formed. He said what happens is they go into meditation and have an experience of the world being infinite. They come out of that meditation and say, "I've touched reality. This is it. The world is infinite." Somebody else goes into meditation and sees this really infinite, vast space and then bumps up against something that feels finite on the outside of that and says, "Oh, that's wrong. It's actually finite."

The Buddha actually cautioned us in that particular sutta about views that arise based on deep meditation experience. He said those are some of the most sticky views that we have. Based on direct experience we can really cling. This happens in daily life where we have direct experience, and it happens in spades in meditation practice. We think we found it, and then we try to recreate it, and we suffer. And we argue with people about it.

That was the whole point in the sutta of the Dīgha Nikāya—how much people argued about these different perspectives. They would just contradict each other: "You're wrong, this is not—I found this from my direct experience." "Well, you're wrong, I found this from my direct experience." Where does that go?

So the Buddha encouraged us not to cling to views at all. Now, views can be useful. Right view, for instance, is a useful view. And it can be potentially helpful, like the simile of the raft where we float across a flood using a raft, using the effort of our hands and feet to get across. In that example, the Eightfold Path is equated with the raft. The Buddha talks about putting the raft down when you get on the other side of the flood—it's not so useful to you there. So not to cling to it once you've crossed the flood. But while you're in the middle of the flood, you have to hold on to the raft, understanding this is skillful means, this is useful now—not somehow inherently true for all time.

In the simile of the raft, the Buddha asked: once you've crossed the flood, is it useful to pick up that raft and carry it around with you on your head? No, it's not. Put it down. Put it down. He's really encouraging us not to cling to views. We can use views in our practice.

We use views in our practice. We use views in our lives. They're helpful in our lives. There are many other examples of this kind of delusion, but I want to move on to the most insidious form of delusion—what I sometimes call human delusion. These are delusions we all share, views that cloud our perception of experience at a very fundamental level, distortions of reality itself.

There are three basic distortions, and these will be familiar to you. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable as a source of lasting happiness to be reliable as a source of lasting happiness. And we tend to take what is not self to be self.

This kind of delusion operates and functions even when we are aware. My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya says that delusion does not mask the object—it doesn't mask the experience. It masks the nature of the experience. So we may be aware of an experience and not be aware of its impermanent nature. This is the direction Vipassana practice moves us, helping us to begin seeing through these fundamental distortions.

These delusions, these mistaken perceptions, seem to happen often based simply on the way our bodies and minds work. The mistakes around these three areas occur because of how our bodies and minds are put together.

Take, for instance, perceiving what is impermanent to be permanent. Some of this happens because we tend to relate to experience through ideas about experience rather than through the direct meeting of what's actually happening. Concept can mask change.

Perhaps we can see this in terms of what we hold on to at a more ordinary level. We have an idea or a view about who someone is, and we hold on to that. It stays with us, and we don't tend to see when they change. We have an idea about them, and that concept masks that they can change.

This happens at other levels too. An example from my own practice: I was practicing at Shwe U Min monastery in Burma with Sayadaw U Tejaniya. Most evenings, as it was getting a little bit dark, I was meditating in my room, and I often heard this squealing sound. The squealing sounded like a pig to me. So I was noticing the squealing and seeing an image of a pig in my mind. This was a concept. Also, the sound seemed distressed to me. And so—pig, distressed—my mind leapt to create this idea that on the other side of the monastery wall was the local butcher, and that what I was hearing every evening was pigs being slaughtered for the market the next day. There was a lot of compassion, a lot of sadness.

Now, I knew that the idea about pigs being slaughtered was a story. I knew that I did not know that's what was happening. But I was not prepared for what I discovered one night when I was taking a walk instead of meditating in my room. I was walking up and down in the middle of the monastery, and there were all these bats flying around, and they were squealing.

The whole idea—not only the story about the slaughterhouse on the other side, but that it was even a pig—I knew that the idea about the slaughterhouse was a story. I did not have a clue that the idea of it being a pig was also a story. That one I believed until, fortunately, evidence to the contrary appeared. Seeing the bats and hearing them squeal, I actually believed that was what was happening.

This is how concept, when we glom onto it, obscures what's actually happening, and that can often obscure the changing nature of experience. Concepts are useful, and it's useful to recognize them as concepts. We're not going to live our lives, we're not going to be able to navigate even walking through this room, without concepts. If everything were just form and color, we wouldn't do a very good job of walking through the room. So concepts help us navigate the world, but we need to recognize them for what they are.

Concepts also come with baggage. Concepts often come with ideas, views, opinions.

So recognizing concept as concept is important. Concepts can mask change. Another thing that can mask change is simply that change happens so fast. Our system creates a continuity, puts things together so that it feels more stable and solid.

Sayadaw U Pandita used to talk about the fire stick. If you have a stick with a fire burning on the end of it and you whirl it in the air, you'll see a circle. It looks like that circle exists, but it's an illusion. It's an image that's created because our vision has a persistence—it holds on. And that persistence through our sense bases is one of the reasons that it's hard to see impermanence.

So the rapidity of change, that fast moving fire stick, is an example of how rapidity of change creates the illusion of stability. But this is happening all the time—this belief in stability, belief in solidity. We actually know through particle physics that there's way more empty space than there is solidity. It's really about how fast things are moving that things feel solid. And in our minds, when we look at our minds, we can start to see the rapidity with which things happen, the conditioned nature of what's arising, and how our minds put things together and then put a concept on top of it.

So the rapidity of change can mask change, and concepts can mask change. As we begin to meet experience directly—I heard that Annie talked about the Bahiya Sutta, the sutta of "just in the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard, the sensed is only the sensed"—that meeting of experience begins to take us below the level of concept and toward meeting the direct changing nature of experience. This is a main encouragement in our mindfulness practice: to begin to be curious about the impermanent nature of experience. We can begin to become aware of this by looking deeply at what seems to be solid. Look at what seems to be stable, what seems to be permanent. You'll find that it's not. It may not show itself as impermanent quickly, but it will reveal itself to be impermanent.

We also take what is unreliable to be reliable as a source of happiness. We take sense pleasure—our minds basically work this way. We get something we like, it feels good. Not only does it feel good to get the thing that we want, it feels good to have the wanting go away. So there's this double hit of happiness in the split second moment that we get something. And our minds don't quite understand that this is just a fleeting moment of happiness. We glom onto it, we create the idea, a concept arises around it, and we believe that this is where I get my happiness. Maybe it stays for a little while, maybe. But mostly what happens is that we are holding on to an idea, and it's the idea that is giving us that happiness—because reality does not hang around for very long.

We believe in some ways that sense pleasure is as good as it gets. But sense pleasure is so unreliable, so fleeting. Getting what we want, we get a moment of that, and it further conditions the idea that getting what I want is where I'll be happy. Our minds are really short-sighted, basically. We're designed to go for the quickest hit of pleasure. And then when that fades, we think: when was the last time I was happy? Well, when I got something that I wanted. So let me find something else that I want. And then I'll get that. And then I'll be happy again. And we're essentially in this cycle.

So this is greed at work. I talked about greed at the beginning. It's that leaning towards, that wanting. That wanting itself is the greed. That leaning towards is the greed. The delusion embedded in greed is that having the thing will make me happy. That's pure delusion—the belief that there is some reliable happiness to be had by getting that sense pleasure. Likewise with aversion; it's very similar.

We want to get rid of something unpleasant, something we don't like. The idea that separating myself from something unpleasant will make me happy—that is the delusion underlying aversion. The aversion itself is that wanting to separate, that pulling away. The delusion is the belief that forms its foundation. This is just useful information to know. Really useful to know. It's hard to take in, and yet we can start to see these patterns at work and recognize the unreliability of sense pleasure.

The Buddha gave us a simple teaching on this. He said, yes, getting what you want feels good—that's the gratification of sense pleasure. But notice how long it lasts. That simple teaching, noticing the impermanence of sense pleasure, begins to point to that underlying delusion. The belief that having the thing will make me happy is not a reliable way to move towards happiness.

So becoming aware: Where am I looking for happiness? Do I think that having that third dessert will make me happy? It's amazing to me sometimes when I look at this, really look in the moment. I mean, I know in my intellect that having chocolate is not going to make me ultimately happy. But in the moment of eating that chocolate—oh, does the mind believe it. Look at it. It's stunning how deluded our minds are, even when we know intellectually.

We begin to understand delusion by looking at these ways the mind does these things. We begin to move in the direction of non-delusion by understanding the delusion. So these various things I've pointed to: look at the views. What views are you holding? What beliefs are happening? What feels like it's permanent right now? How is a sense of self showing up? Get familiar with these perspectives that the Buddha pointed to as places of delusion. Start being curious.

Non-delusion is not something we can do. It's an insight. When we understand—when we understand—oh, the mind was clinging to that because it thought it was happiness, and it lets go. Insight is not something we can make happen, but we can incline our minds in the direction of curiosity for seeing delusion.

Another important piece is that sometimes we see through delusion. That experience of something falling away, a veil falling away, and it's so clear. I understand that clinging is suffering, and why would I ever cling again? It just doesn't make any sense. It seems so clear. And then, twenty minutes later, it's not so clear. We're clinging again. And it's like, wait, what? Didn't I know this?

When that happens, don't second-guess that understanding. It's not as obvious as it looks when the insight is happening. If it were, we would just live there. We would understand that and be living in that. We have to meet these truths over and over again. It's a slow process of unwinding.

And yet one of the beauties of that is this: if you can trust those insights, trust that understanding of yeah, clinging is not helpful, clinging to something that's impermanent is not helpful—when we see that and feel that directly and know that as a direct experience—then when we are clinging to something, we can know. This is the deluded mind working. We can directly recognize. We've known the clarity, and we can see: yep, this is confusion, the mind is just confused right now. We don't have to beat ourselves up for it, but simply recognize: okay, delusion is here, and I know delusion is here.

I'm aware that delusion is working.

Let's just sit for a moment.

I'll leave you with a quote from Nisargadatta: "Do not try to understand. It's enough if you do not misunderstand."

CHAPTER 72

Dependent Co-Arising (Paṭicca Samuppāda)

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this profound dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a clear and practical exploration of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent co-arising), one of the Buddha's most fundamental yet challenging teachings. She presents this twelve-link chain not merely as an abstract philosophical concept, but as a moment-to-moment process we can directly observe in our own experience. The talk illuminates how ignorance conditions mental formations, which shape consciousness, and how this cascade ultimately leads through feeling (vedanā) to craving (taṇhā), clinging (upādāna), becoming (bhava), and the arising of suffering.

Fella emphasizes the practical application of this teaching, particularly highlighting the critical junction between feeling tone and craving as a place where mindfulness can interrupt the habitual pattern. Drawing on the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11), she explains how suffering itself can become a condition for either continued ignorance or for faith and liberation, depending on whether it is understood with wisdom. She shares insights from her own practice, including how recognizing craving as suffering—rather than focusing on what craving wants—can be profoundly liberating.

The talk concludes with the encouraging teaching that every link in this chain can become an object of liberating insight. Referencing teachings from the Majjhima Nikāya, Fella explains that seeing the impermanent nature of any arising—whether contact, feeling, craving, or clinging—can lead to freedom. This understanding transforms dependent origination from a description of how we suffer into a map for awakening, showing how our meditation practice creates conditions that naturally break apart the cycle of suffering.

Sometimes I wish we could all just sit here in silence for the whole time. It's just so lovely, the stillness in this room. I so appreciate it. I appreciate your practice.

Tonight the topic is dependent co-arising, sometimes called dependent origination. It's a teaching on the conditioned nature of the arising of suffering—a foundational teaching of the Buddha, fundamental, and yet also quite challenging. We could say it's an elaboration or a detailed exposition of the second noble truth: with the arising of craving is the arising of suffering. The origin of suffering is rooted in craving. Dependent origination is a detailed unpacking of that—not only how craving leads to suffering, but how craving comes to be and what follows.

This is a complex teaching. There are twelve links in this chain of conditions that the Buddha described as leading us into suffering, and we will cover them all, so fasten your seat belts. And yet, as Winnie said the other night, you don't actually have to try to track everything and hold onto it here. It's about letting the teachings come in. Let yourself be still, receptive, and listen. Sometimes in that space, things will land in a particular way of understanding. I think this is why the Buddha repeated himself a lot—because it helps to hear these things over and over. You might hear one piece of it one time and another piece of it another time.

The complexity and profundity of this teaching was pointed out by the Buddha at one point to Ananda, who came to the Buddha in gratitude for the teaching of dependent origination. Ananda said, "It is wonderful, it is marvelous how profound this dependent origination is and how profound it appears. And yet it appears to me as clear as clear."

The Buddha's response to Ananda was, "Don't say that, Ananda"—to the "it appears as clear as clear" part. Because Ananda at this point was not yet an arahant. The Buddha said, "Do not say that, Ananda. This dependent origination is profound and appears profound. And it is through not understanding, not penetrating this truth, that this generation has become like a tangled ball of string, covered as with a blight, tangled like coarse grass, unable to pass beyond states of woe."

So this understanding—penetrating, directly seeing, not at the conceptual level but at the experiential level—understanding this teaching is equated with full liberation. The full understanding of this teaching frees the mind.

The other thing Winnie pointed out the other night, which I always like to remember when I'm giving a Dharma talk, is the number of times that in the suttas it's described that people awakened, that people experienced liberation while listening to a Dharma talk. This is one of the five ways that people can wake up—listening to the Dharma. Another one of those five ways is teaching the Dharma. We can wake up teaching the Dharma, so there's hope for all of us.

I hope to make this exploration of dependent origination tonight clear and practical—not just some concepts to think about, but pointing to ways you might be able to see this even in small pieces in your experience. I've found even just seeing little bits of this unfolding in my experience to be very powerful. I have found this to be very profound in my own practice. That's what I hope to convey: how can this teaching support our practice with looking at our experience?

This teaching is a very clear description of how suffering happens in our minds. It's a description of the unfolding of phenomena, and it's a human pattern. The Buddha is not saying some people experience this and others don't. So we can begin to understand our own suffering as conditioned. Just this is powerful. Even if we don't see how the conditions are unfolding, that understanding that it is conditioned can really support the mind to settle back and be willing to witness, to not take it so personally, to not think it's my fault that this is arising—to understand that this arising is conditioned. It comes about through past conditions of my life, past choices, choices and conditions of the mind right now. This is just the way things unfold. This description here is a general description of human suffering.

So we can begin to see the impersonal and human nature of this process and not feel like somehow we've been singled out to suffer.

The links in this chain traditionally begin with ignorance. With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. With ignorance as condition, thoughts, ideas, emotions—all of those mental tumblings come to be. I'll describe all of these links in a moment, but really what I want to point to here is that the foundation of this teaching is ignorance. This is where the Buddha begins.

Suffering arises in connection with ignorance—with not understanding impermanence, unreliability, and not-self, with not understanding the Four Noble Truths. This is a mental phenomenon. And this mental phenomenon of not understanding leads to other mental formations that are based in that not understanding: choices, actions, emotions, thoughts that are rooted in that lack of comprehension.

One important piece here is that suffering and its conditions are based in mental phenomena, not in the physical realm. Suffering arises in the mind. That may be hard to believe when we're experiencing a physical unpleasant experience. But we've been exploring this, looking at where the actual suffering is. There is unpleasant physical sensation, and then really, when we look at where the struggle lies, it's because we don't like that unpleasant sensation. We want it to go away, we feel like it's out of control. We are really reacting to the mind's relationship to that unpleasant experience.

The other important piece around this teaching is that this chain of conditions unfolding toward suffering describes conditions—we're not locked into a causal process here. There is causality, but it's conditions arising that tend to lead onward to other conditions. And a key teaching here, the good news, is that there are conditions that can support this process leading toward suffering to fall apart, to not lead to suffering but instead to lead to happiness, to the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion, to freedom, to love, to compassion, equanimity, and balance of mind.

So while this chain describing how suffering comes to be may sound depressing—it describes the typical human process when we are not aware of what's going on, and even sometimes when we are aware we just get to see this happen like dominoes falling—it is not the necessary result of these conditions arising. Up to a point, once craving arises, it's like the dominoes are tumbling toward suffering. But before that, noticing feeling tone, we can bring mindfulness to vedanā and not have the craving reactivity follow on from that.

This teaching points to the trajectory that our minds habitually take. But part of what it's pointing to is that it's not necessary for the mind to do this. It's just what it's been deeply conditioned to do. And the Buddha described conditions that can support a different trajectory altogether: hearing the Dharma—one amazing condition that supports the mind moving in another direction—mindfulness, wisdom, the practices that we're doing.

Let me read through these links without too much explanation, and then walk through them with you.

The traditional place it begins: With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. With mental formations as condition, consciousness comes to be. With consciousness as condition, mental and physical processes come to be—this is nāma-rūpa. With mental and physical processes as condition, the six sense bases come to be. With the six sense bases as condition, contact. With contact as condition, feeling. With feeling as condition, craving. With craving as condition, clinging. With clinging as condition, becoming. With becoming as condition, birth. With birth as condition, old age and death. And the Buddha says that this is the entire mass of suffering.

This chain is understood to have a cyclic nature. With this unfolding of the entire mass of suffering, what tends to follow is more ignorance. Unless that suffering is seen with wisdom, our tendency is to keep doing what we've been doing. This cyclic nature, we could say, is the wheel of saṃsāra, the round of rebirth.

This teaching is described at times as certain pieces of it representing a prior life leading on to the conditions in this life, and the conditions in this life then tumbling forward if not seen, if not understood—practiced with in the way that we're doing, tumbling on to a next rebirth. But the teachings and the suttas also speak to this teaching as a moment-to-moment unfolding. When ignorance is arising in the moment, the mental formations that arise with it tend to lead us on to crave when feeling is happening. This is the way I've explored this in my own practice, the way it feels very practical to me. And so this is the way I'm going to explore it tonight—to look at this as a process that's unfolding moment to moment.

I'd like to start our exploration a little bit in the middle of the chain, with some of the links that are easier to recognize in our direct experience. For me, in hearing this teaching, starting with ignorance, I was immediately confused. And so it helped me to think about starting with where we can actually feel this.

We have bodies and minds—this link of mental and physical processes. As conditioned, the six sense bases come to be. Based on this mind and body, we have these sense organs: eyes, nose, tongue, skin, ears, and mind. We've got these six sense bases. Based on the consciousness that we have, and on our mental and physical processes and these six sense bases, we receive experience.

We've been looking at this. This is a foundational part of Vipassana practice—to look at what the contact is, what we're actually experiencing moment to moment. This is the next link: with the six sense bases as condition, contact comes to be. Contact with the sense bases: sight, sound, smells, taste, touches, and things arising in our mind. We've been watching this, so this part of the chain is pretty familiar. We have our senses, and when there is consciousness—well, actually, even sometimes when we are asleep—there is contact with these sense bases. Whether we are mindful or not, this contact happens. We experience these sights, sounds, smells, tastes, and touches. And emotions, thoughts, mind states, moods arise through the sense door of the mind.

With contact as condition, feeling comes to be. This is a link we've talked about. Greg did a whole talk on feeling tone. Every one of these physical contacts, every sense impression that we have, has a feeling tone. It's pleasant, it's unpleasant, or it's neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

This feeling tone itself is based on conditions, as Greg mentioned the other night. What we've done in the previous moments may affect the pleasantness or unpleasantness of the sense object. For me, I found this interesting and fun to play with in eating—to see how the feeling tone changes in the same kind of food, taking a bite of the same food moment after moment, after eating other foods. One thing I've noticed for myself, something I did even as a child: milk after a cookie I experienced as pleasant. But milk after a pickle was unpleasant. Through this kind of example, you can see that the pleasantness or unpleasantness is based on conditions. It can also be based on moods or emotions in the mind, on things that have been going on. We'll get to this a little more in just a bit.

Each sense impression has a feeling tone. It is said that all beings—arahants and unenlightened beings alike—experience this pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Up to this point in what we're talking about now—the body, the mind, the sense bases, the contact, the feeling tone—the Buddha said that people who are awakened experience this, and people who are not awakened experience this.

And he actually points out, I think maybe one of us talked about this: What is the difference? He actually asked his disciples at one point, "What is the difference between someone who is awakened and experiences feeling tone and someone who's not awakened? Someone who is free from greed, aversion, and delusion and experiences feeling tone, and someone who is subject to greed, aversion, and delusion and experiences feeling tone—what's the difference between them?"

And he goes on to say: well, if somebody who is not awakened feels an unpleasant feeling, they beat their breast, they weep, they wail, they say, "Woe is me! Why me?" And they suffer. Basically, craving arises, clinging arises, identification arises, suffering arises—in dependence on that feeling tone. But someone who is awakened, someone who does not have greed, aversion, or delusion in their mind—when they feel a feeling tone, they feel a feeling tone. When they feel a pleasant feeling, they feel a pleasant feeling.

So this is the place where the tumbling on towards craving happens. Craving is the next link: with feeling as condition, our habitual response arises—not just because of how we've been raised in our families, but simply because of our humanness.

Our habitual response is when something pleasant happens, we like it, we want more of it. When something unpleasant happens, we want to get rid of it, we want to push it away. We've talked about this a lot too, so I'm not going to dwell on this part too much. It's simply the habitual nature of our minds to go in this direction.

It's like we're a simple automatic automaton that wants to maximize pleasant experience and minimize unpleasant experience. So we go towards pleasant, away from unpleasant. Even single-celled creatures do this. This is deeply evolutionarily natural—that we move towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant. Our minds add stuff to it: the desire for it, the holding to it, the craving, the clinging.

So we habitually—again, this is the habitual process in our minds—we habitually want to act on this wanting and not wanting, this craving. With craving as condition, clinging comes to be. We want to figure out how to keep it. The craving is a kind of leaning towards something. The clinging is the picking it up.

We could say that craving is the reaching out or heading in the direction of that pleasant thing, whether it's a physical pleasant experience or some idea of a kind of person we'd like to be. There's a leaning towards it. And then the clinging is when we've picked it up. We've reified around it. We have it.

Bhikkhu Bodhi talks about this distinction between craving and clinging as being almost a matter of gradation. He says the craving is like a thief reaching out to grab something, and the clinging is when they've picked it up.

The process of clinging also functions with aversion. It's the clinging to "not this." I was struggling with that at one point in my own practice. How is this clinging? How is this aversion clinging? And I realized I was clinging to anything but this. Just give me anything but this—a kind of holding to "this is not okay."

In fact, what I discovered in the way aversion works is that it's like, if I didn't like this table, the aversion is like being stuck to this table trying to get rid of it. Like I've got sticky glue on my hands trying to push it away. That's the clinging with aversion. We can't just let it go.

With feeling as condition, craving comes to be. With craving as condition, clinging comes to be. With clinging as condition, becoming.

Now, becoming—Thanissaro Bhikkhu had a great phrase for this. Becoming is kind of like the intention towards an identity, an intention towards the one who has control. Thanissaro Bhikkhu describes becoming as the intentions and actions that rally in the service of clinging.

So we've got this thing, and our whole being starts to shape itself around the having of this thing, the needing to control this thing, the idea that it's mine. Intentions and views come into being here. This experience is actually pleasant—it's a feeling. This is the place where it feels like we've got something, we've picked it up, and there's just this moment of "I figured it out. I've got this under control. I know how to get there."

So this is that becoming. We like it. We like the feeling that we know where we're headed, that we know how we'll get there. It's like the intention towards—we're not there, but we feel like we know we're going to get there. It's like anticipation or something. Pleasant, a pleasant feeling in that rallying of "I'm going to be able to control this thing."

This just came up—I just remembered this. In the stories of Winnie the Pooh, Piglet asks Winnie the Pooh what his favorite thing in the world is.

And Winnie the Pooh said, "Well, honey is a really wonderful thing, but there's a moment just before I eat it that's even better."

That's that sense—"I'm gonna, I'm gonna."

So this is becoming. Following on from becoming, there's a kind of reification. Birth is the next link in the chain—a reification of an identity. Things become much more solidly mine. This is mine. This is who I am.

This can be obvious or subtle. It might be something like, "This is my cup. This is my sitting spot." You find somebody sitting in it and you really feel how much it's my sitting spot. If you walk in and see somebody else sitting in your sitting spot, those feelings of congealing around mine, me, myself arise.

From this place—well actually, I think from craving, starting from craving—suffering is going to follow. When craving arises, there's already suffering arising. When we feel into the feeling of craving, there's already suffering there. When we're not paying attention to the feeling of craving, we may miss that it's suffering because we are focused on what the craving wants.

This was a very useful way for me to understand this in my practice. When I noticed craving and could feel the experience of "this is what it feels like to want"—doing walking meditation and watching myself want to look at people, the feeling of the pull, the instability—not following through on the wanting, but just feeling the wanting. Feeling that sense of tension and tightness. Watching to see how this wanting unfolded, I saw that there was suffering with the wanting. But when the person went out of my field of vision, the wanting to see them disappeared. And the suffering disappeared. So there was this really clear understanding that the wanting itself was suffering.

Noticing how these links unfold—the exploration of this process of sense impression, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, identification—wherever you notice yourself, wherever you notice what's happening in the present moment, you might notice it's in that terrain somewhere. And noticing what's here in that moment: craving is suffering, clinging is suffering.

Becoming has a pleasant feeling tone. This, I think, is part of how the cycle propels itself—why we get hooked here. First of all, we can get hooked in this cycle partly because, when we don't see the craving as craving, we are focused on what the craving wants. We're focused in the future. We're focused on this idea: "I will get this thing." We're focused on that idea of the thing that we're going to have. And that idea is pleasant. So we're missing the fact that we are suffering in the present moment because our mind is pleased by the idea that it might get the thing.

When we can actually begin to see craving as suffering, this is an insight. We don't like it—we don't like the unpleasantness of it—but it's an understanding. The Buddha pointed this out to us. Understand suffering, he said. See that craving is the cause of suffering. With craving, when the craving arises, suffering arises. So that's one reason why we tend to get caught in this cycle: delusion masks the suffering of craving. Delusion convinces us that getting that thing will make us happy.

And lo and behold, when we get the thing and cling to it, what happens there too is that the wanting ends when we have a hold of it. At that point we're kind of in the becoming piece. "Ooh, I've got it. I've figured it out." The becoming itself is pleasant—the idea of "I'm in control. I'm going to make myself have this happiness for the rest of my life."

So there's that pleasantness of becoming. There's also the pleasantness of the wanting going away. That's a huge piece of how this cycle perpetuates itself.

When we don't see that craving itself is suffering—when we don't recognize the suffering nature of the craving—and then we get the thing we wanted, the suffering goes away. What we come to believe is that the only way to make that wanting and suffering go away is to have the thing. That's what our minds believe, because that's what we've learned. That's how we've engaged for our whole lives. I get something I want, and it feels good.

And then what our minds do with that—because of the impermanent nature of what we've gotten, or the impermanent nature of the identity that was born there, the happiness of that identity of having something—how long does that last? Usually not very long. So there's a feeling of dissatisfaction when the pleasure of the becoming goes away. When the pleasure of having that thing gets less enticing, what does our mind say? Well, when's the last time I felt good? It was when I got something I wanted. So what do I want to want? We go searching for something to want.

You can feel this in spades. I sometimes call this "Google mind"—sitting in front of the computer, thinking, what do I want to look up? Just this feeling of subtle dissatisfaction, a sense of, I'll feel good if I get some information about something. What can I think of to get information about? Our minds only habitually know that getting something we want is what will make us happy, and so we're propelled on this chain.

Fortunately, there is understanding the Buddha offered that can help us step out of this cycle.

So these are the pieces of the chain we've talked about in many dharma talks. This is just putting them together in a different way.

Now I want to go back to the beginning of the chain. Since this is a cyclic pattern, there's a way in which ignorance is itself conditioned by suffering. We went through the cycle to the point of becoming, the birth, and then that birth leading to the entire mass of suffering—old age and death. Something that comes into being will fall apart. There's no way around it. Something that has a condition for arising cannot stay together forever. It will fall apart. And because we cling to what has come together, that falling apart is experienced as suffering—the entire mass of suffering. This pattern, this cycle we're in, tends to perpetuate the ignorance.

The Buddha points to suffering being one condition for ignorance. He said suffering results in bewilderment, which is essentially ignorance. When we're suffering, there's this sense of, why me? Why am I singled out for this? A kind of confusion. This is the terrain of ignorance, or it leads to search.

The main definition of ignorance is not understanding the Four Noble Truths—not understanding suffering, not understanding the cause of suffering, not understanding the possibility for the cessation of suffering, and not understanding that there is a way to the cessation of suffering. This ignorance is also defined by not understanding the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience.

So the basic condition for suffering to lead to ignorance is for suffering to not be understood. That first noble truth—the Buddha said suffering should be understood. I love that. There's the framing of this in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta: There is suffering. Suffering should be understood. That itself is an insight—when the mind turns and recognizes, this is worth understanding rather than just reacting to. Suffering should be understood. When suffering is not understood, ignorance arises.

On the other side, the Buddha said suffering can lead to search. If we meet teachings at this point, when we're in that space of suffering—if we meet teachings that talk about the possibility for freedom from suffering—this is one of the weak links in the chain. There's another teaching that says with the arising of suffering, suffering is not only a supporting condition for ignorance, but suffering is a supporting condition for faith. This understanding that there is a way, even at a reflective level, just that willingness to step in, to practice, that feeling of confidence, of capacity—that is a supportive condition for the unfolding of a different set of conditions leading to freedom, a natural unfolding towards freedom.

This is also the good news. What we're doing here is directly supporting this movement towards freedom. It doesn't happen on our timeframe. We don't get to control that process. But we cultivate the conditions, and the process naturally moves in that direction.

So we're going to continue talking about ignorance conditioning mental formations here, because we're talking about Paticca Samuppada, not the transcendent version of that.

With ignorance as a condition, mental formation comes to be. One of my understandings here is that ignorance in the propelling forward of this chain—when ignorance is arising, basically feeling will lead to craving. When ignorance is arising in the moment, feeling... I mean, it's not like ignorance arises and then feeling arises later. In every single moment, feeling is arising. When ignorance is arising in the moment, feeling leads to craving. Because the mind doesn't understand. The mind is caught by believing that something impermanent, unreliable would be permanent and reliable. So in some ways I feel like ignorance is kind of like the thing that would pick up all twelve links simultaneously. With ignorance as condition, this whole thing comes to be.

But ignorance comes and goes. In this practice we see that. Sometimes ignorance is arising. We feel the way that feeling leads to craving. We see that. But that very process of seeing it is helping to undermine the ignorance.

So ignorance shapes this not understanding suffering, the belief that there are things that are permanent, reliable, self. Taking things to be permanent, reliable, controllable, our mind kind of orients in the world towards choosing, acting, deciding based on those beliefs. Based on not understanding suffering, based on the belief that there's something permanent out there to hold on to, something reliable that will make me happy, a me that I can control navigating through this world in a reliable way. We choose things, we decide things, we act based on those beliefs. And these are mental formations. These choices, these actions, the emotions that follow—this is mental formation.

So due to ignorance we take the most obvious move to get rid of unpleasant and move towards pleasant, which simply leads us through this cycle over and over again. We think we're acting to alleviate suffering, but we're actually reinforcing the patterns of this cycle.

With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. Now, there are a lot of these mental formations. We each have our own personal mental formations based on our own conditioning. I talked about this when I talked about delusion, how we have our own views that arise based on our familial, our cultural upbringing, all of that. We have our own views that arise from what we've experienced. But there are also views that we just absorb, cultural views, a kind of collective misunderstanding. We don't go at this, we don't come at this all by ourselves. We are surrounded by people who also are misunderstanding things to be permanent, reliable, and controllable, also misunderstanding the nature of how suffering comes to be. And so there are views that come from our cultural background.

These views can be a big source of suffering—ones that we didn't opt into, but were just steeped in the soup of. Mental formations, for instance, around the concept of race. These are simply ideas, beliefs, views. There's quite good evidence in the DNA of our bodies that there's no reality to race. It's a belief, it's an idea. Mental formations. And here we can really touch into just how much suffering occurs based on ideas. This collective ignorance can condition a kind of collective picking up of mental formations. So it's not just internally that these mental formations are created. They're created in conjunction with how we live in the world. These are hard to see. These kinds of mental formations are hard to see.

With mental formation as condition, consciousness comes to be. This one is a little bit confusing perhaps. The way I understand this is that our views, our habits, all of these mental formations, what's arising in our mind—these mental conditioned patterns in our mind, whether views, beliefs, or emotions, thoughts—these shape what our consciousness picks out of experience to pay attention to.

You might get a sense of this from looking at what you've seen when you're caught in a particular emotion. For myself, I worked with a lot of anger. When there was anger arising in the mind, the mind would tend to look for things to be angry about. It would be like a filter on the mind. Or perhaps if I was angry, I would see somebody looking in a particular way.

They'd have a kind of funny expression on their face and I'd think that they hated me. Who knows, maybe they just had some gas. But the mind will interpret reality and pick out of reality all of the sense impressions, things that confirm or correlate to the moods, the views, the mind states, the emotions we're having, reinforcing them.

This is related to what I talked about the other night: confirmation bias. Our minds tend to find things in the world that agree with what we believe, maybe even based simply on an agenda. Our mind orients to picking out of experience what we need to see in that moment. It's a useful pattern, this kind of focused attention based on an agenda. And yet we need to understand it because this is really where delusion comes in. We think we are seeing experience, meeting experience as simply microphones and video cameras that are accurately taking in the information around us.

So these mental formations shape what our consciousness pulls out of the environment. And with consciousness as a condition, our mental and physical processes are shaped. The state of our consciousness affects our mental and physical processes. Flavored by anger, for instance, our body may become tense—the mind state shapes the physical body. We tend to experience things as unpleasant when we have anger arising; it shapes the feeling tone of experience. We perceive things as being directed against me when we're angry.

So now in this chain we're back to where we started: with physical and mental processes as condition, the sense bases and contact arise. The conscious body-mind organism experiences input from the six sense bases and there's contact with the world. But we see now that we are not starting from a neutral place. The mind is already flavored with mental formations that have been shaped by views, opinions, ideas, beliefs that are shaped by ignorance, confusion, misunderstanding. And so these filters, these views tend to reinforce our existing perspective. The cycle tends to reinforce itself.

Now we can be curious about all of this. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, offered a really simple way to explore this—you don't even have to think about all the links. He said, just see if you can understand what the job description of your mind states is. This is the mental formation. What do these mind states do? How do they act?

I just went through it with anger. Anger tends to shape our physical body to have tension, tightness, heat. Anger tends to shape our experience as being unpleasant—we could say that's part of the job description of anger. So how does anger affect us? Curiosity about that question, "What is the job description of this?"—that was a fun way for me to begin to explore. So what's the job description of depression? Let's watch this one for a while. How does this one function? What does it do in the body and mind?

Now the good news here is that the processes of mindfulness, what we're practicing here, creates conditions that break this chain apart. There's a big emphasis on looking at feeling tone. Over and over again in the suttas, the Buddha emphasized the feeling tone of experience. Notice the feeling tone—and that points to feeling tone being the place where, if you see it with mindfulness and wisdom, it short circuits that link to craving. This is a place where we can be very curious. Feeling tone is a hugely helpful tool in exploring where the mind tends to tip into craving.

And there are also teachings that point to this: we don't have to try to work our way back to "What's the feeling tone here?" If what you're experiencing in the moment is confusion or anger or a sense of identity, a sense of self, a feeling of becoming, there's a teaching that points to every single link of this chain. Seeing that factor...

The framing of it is like the Four Noble Truths—it's an understanding structured around that same pattern. So he says, for instance, if you're noticing clinging, you can see in that moment: this is clinging; this is how clinging comes to be; this is the arising of clinging; this is the ending of clinging, if you see it ending; and this is the path leading to the ending of clinging. He goes through that pattern with every single one of these links.

All of these links are simply arisings. Contact is an arising, feeling is an arising, craving, clinging, becoming—they are arisings. And so whatever arising you are seeing, it's not like we have to work back and say, "Well, where was the feeling tone? Let me go back to that and then I'll be able to be free." He points to the freedom that's possible just through clear seeing, right in whatever is arising.

This points to me too, to that kind of cutting through of ignorance. In the moment, seeing, "Oh, this is craving arising"—it cuts through the ignorance that believes that craving. And it gives that possibility of some freedom. You may even feel a shift, an insight, an understanding, a kind of taste of wisdom there. "Oh, this is just craving. I can be with this."

So in this teaching from the Majjhima Nikaya, seeing with each link, noticing the impermanence of each link essentially, is what he points to. One here and now makes the end of suffering. Seeing the arising of craving, understanding craving, the arising of craving, the ending of craving, and the way leading to the ending of craving—seeing the impermanent nature of any of these experiences. One here and now makes an end of suffering.

This is possible with the practices that we are doing here.

May the benefits of our practice together be the supportive conditions for the freedom of our own minds and for all beings everywhere.

CHAPTER 73

Non-Clinging and Freedom

Andrea Fella · 57 min

> In this profound dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella guides practitioners through the challenging yet liberating terrain of deep practice where the mind confronts the impermanent, unreliable, and not-self nature of experience. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's refrain about observing arising and vanishing, she illuminates how thoroughly seeing impermanence naturally leads to non-clinging and freedom.
> Fella unpacks the progression described in the suttas: seeing that the five khandhas are impermanent leads to nibbidā (disenchantment), then virāga (dispassion), and finally liberation. She acknowledges that this process isn't always pleasant—practitioners may encounter fear, boredom, feelings of oppression, or a sense of groundlessness as the mind grapples with having nowhere stable to land. These difficult emotions reveal deeper layers of human clinging, and the practice is to notice our relationship to impermanence rather than trying to escape these feelings.
> The talk beautifully distinguishes between the withdrawal from clinging and withdrawal from experience itself—when clinging falls away, intimacy with experience can actually deepen. Fella addresses the common misconception that freedom would be flat or emotionless, emphasizing that the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion opens vast space for love, compassion, joy, and wisdom to act in the world. Each person's expression of freedom would be unique, shaped by how non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion naturally manifest through them.

I'm feeling a lot of happiness sitting here and seeing you, knowing what you're doing. A lot of delight. Even if it may not feel delightful to you, there's a deep, deep appreciation and joy that you are here.

We've said a lot that this is not easy—this commitment to watching our minds, seeing what's happening, how our conditioning plays out, the patterns and habits of mind, orienting and attuning to the impermanent nature of experience.

Sometimes practice is delightful, when we see something clearly or when we settle back and mindfulness is just right there, easily seeing phenomena come and go. Sometimes it's joyful. Some of that joy is because in those moments the mind has that measure of freedom—those moments of temporary nibbana that Greg mentioned—largely absent of greed and aversion, and maybe with greatly weakened delusion. It's a very happiness-producing state.

And yet, as the practice deepens, as we start to see our minds more thoroughly and settle below the story level, the narrative of our particular lives, we start to meet the ways our minds as humans sometimes just don't want to see the truths of impermanent, unreliable, not-self. Just don't want to see that. It can be very unsettling to begin to taste the deeply impermanent nature of experience.

And yet this is the path for us. As we start to see the deeply impermanent nature of experience, resistance arises around that. Basically, the feeling of just wanting there to be somewhere to stop, somewhere to land. Can't we just stop for a moment? Can't I just rest somewhere? The deeply impermanent nature of experience sometimes points out that there's nowhere to land. Groundlessness. And so the path unfolds through noticing how we're relating to that. It kind of points out where the deeper levels of human clinging are happening.

We've talked a lot about impermanence and its connection to understanding the unreliable, the dukkha nature of experience, and the not-self nature of experience. The Buddha pointed so much to the teaching of impermanence over and over again. He encouraged us to cultivate the perception of impermanence in many ways, in different places.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, in that refrain we talked about earlier in the retreat, there's an encouragement with each of the foundations, with each of the exercises, to notice the impermanent nature of experience: "One abides observing in the body its nature of arising, or abides observing in the body its nature of vanishing, or abides observing in the body its nature of both arising and vanishing." And a few sentences later in that refrain, it says, "And one abides independent, not clinging to anything in this world."

There's a connection here between understanding impermanence and the release from clinging. This happens because seeing the impermanent nature of experience, our mind directly sees and understands that there's nothing to cling to, and that clinging will just produce stress and suffering in the mind. It directly understands, seeing that impermanent nature of experience, that it is unreliable. It is not a place where I could land and say, "I'll be happy here," because it's just going to slip away.

There's the understanding of not-self, the sense of self often being felt as a thing, something stable. The seeing of the impermanent nature of all experience reveals that what we take to be self is not what we think it is.

In one sutta, the Buddha more thoroughly emphasizes seeing the impermanent nature of experience. It's a teaching around the aggregates, and I'm going to condense this here into a fairly short paragraph: Seeing clearly that form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness are impermanent, one experiences disenchantment. Experiencing disenchantment, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, the mind is liberated.

Annie mentioned these words before—disenchantment and dispassion. I'd like to explore the process around what this part of the suttas is describing, what happens here. Seeing impermanence deeply, one becomes disenchanted. Becoming disenchanted, one becomes dispassionate. Let me unpack this a little bit.

Disenchantment is a translation of the Pali word nibbida. This disenchantment comes with a thorough understanding that the ways we usually engage in the world just don't lead to happiness. We see that the habit of clinging is based on an illusion or a misperception that there is something stable to cling to, something solid or stable to land on and hold on to.

The seeing of impermanence helps us recognize that the idea that I'll find happiness through clinging is a mistake, a misperception. It's an illusion. We become disillusioned, disenchanted with the idea that clinging and craving are going to somehow make me happy, do it for me.

We see this essentially through deep connection with directly seeing the impermanent nature of experience. This is not talking about an idea of impermanence. This is talking about the direct experience of impermanence.

Seeing, for instance, the arising and passing of sensation, sound, thoughts. Sometimes this experience of impermanence becomes quite strong. It becomes very rapid, and we're really directly experiencing the incredibly rapid nature of the arising and passing of experience. Sometimes we see mostly the arisings, sometimes the vanishings, sometimes both the arisings and vanishings together—as that sutta pointed to, the Satipatthana Sutta: "One observes the body in its nature of arising, in its nature of vanishing, or in its nature of both arising and vanishing." We can see impermanence in all of these ways.

When we see the arising of experience, we understand that it's coming into being as a conditioned phenomenon. It wasn't there before, and now it's here. So we understand that it has been conditioned. When we see the vanishing, we understand something else. Sometimes when I began really seeing things vanish, I understood that the mind actually believed in their permanence. It was shocking when something went away, because there was a way the mind had latched onto it, created an idea about it, thought of it as stable somehow—and then it's gone. What happened?

So the seeing of impermanence at this level deeply undercuts these misperceptions, these ideas. We've been enchanted by the notion that there are stable things out there, that there's a solid sense of self. This enchantment becomes revealed as a mistake, essentially. We see we've been caught in the spell of delusion, enchanted by delusion.

Sometimes we feel this too in our relationship with dukkha, even with senses of self that we know are not so helpful. I was talking to one of you the other day, and the image came up: it feels like a comfortable old shoe, this habit, this pattern. It just feels so familiar. The mind gravitates toward that familiarity, even as we see that it's not so helpful.

Knowing that we're caught by that spell is the first step. We can be in this old shoe of the sense of "me," and we know it's just an illusion. We can know that but still not be able to convince ourselves to step out of it. Just noticing the nature of that experience, knowing that it is a misunderstanding—that's where we begin to see through the delusion.

Bhikkhu Bodhi, the monk, scholar, and practitioner who offered us recent translations of the suttas—a truly amazing gift, putting all of the suttas into more accessible language—had this to say about the experience of disenchantment. He often wrote commentarial descriptions around various suttas, and around one that describes this word disenchantment, he wrote: "Nibbida signifies, in short, the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena which supervenes when the illusion of their permanence, pleasurableness, and selfhood has been shattered by the light of correct knowledge and vision of things as they are."

A serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena—that's how he terms this disenchantment. I would say that is perhaps the end result when the mind has thoroughly understood. But in my experience, at least in this terrain of seeing how the mind is enchanted and is becoming disenchanted, the process of becoming disenchanted doesn't feel as pleasant as this describes.

There's an image in the suttas describing this quality: a dog with a bone that has no nourishment left in it at all. The marrow is gone. It's such an old, dry bone that the dog looks at it and it appears useful, looks like something good might be there. But he picks it up and realizes—no, nothing there for me. That withdrawal, that sense of "there's no nourishment in this anymore"—that's perhaps where disenchantment has thoroughly penetrated.

But the process of becoming disenchanted has a lot more ups and downs to it. As we start to see the deeply unreliable nature of experience, our minds do not like this. We would rather it be any other way. We try to bargain with reality. We try to figure out some way to construct a little pile of something that we can land on. So there are many emotional flavors in the relationship to deeply seeing the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience.

I think this is actually revealing the deeper human forms of clinging to wanting things to be stable. There are different relationships we may experience as the mind begins to grapple with the fact that reality is not what we'd like it to be. Getting what we'd like—we can do that. We can be on that cycle of getting something we want and being happy for a split second or two. And then there's the dissatisfaction, and we wonder if we can get something else we want. But we see the uselessness of that. Even seeing the uselessness of it doesn't stop us from keeping trying. Maybe there's something I can land on here.

At one point in my long retreat, I think I was at the Forest Refuge, I watched the mind do this over and over again. At this point, the wisdom was strong enough to know it was not going to find anything to land on. No place solid or stable to land on to say, "I can rest here. I can finally just be okay with this experience." And I could see that the mind just kept going into this loop: "There's got to be somewhere to land, somewhere to land, somewhere to land."

And my mind was okay with it doing that. It was just like, "Oh yeah, you're welcome to look. You're not going to find anything. Have at it. Try." Because I couldn't stop it. It was not self. It was a deep, conditioned, human wish for there to be somewhere I could settle and be stable. And so I couldn't stop it, but I could see that it was a futile process.

There would be times where the mind would kind of let go of that searching. And there would just be this okayness with the not landing, okayness with things as they are—impermanent, unreliable, not self—this okayness with that. And there would be such a release and a feeling of ease. And three seconds later, the mind was at it again. I just watched it over and over again.

So this process of disenchantment, it's meeting our very, very deep conditioning. Seeing it once or twice is probably not going to do it. It's a process of seeing and understanding the relationships. In seeing the impermanent nature of experience, there are many different relationships we may have to seeing impermanence—a few of those flavors.

One of them is this experience of nibbida, which is sometimes translated as disgust or revulsion. I don't particularly like that translation. I much prefer disenchantment. But sometimes the emotional flavor of seeing impermanence at this level can have that quality. It can feel like revulsion. Just don't want to see that. Or how you might feel, for instance, if you see something dangerous. And you know that way is really dangerous, like seeing a snake. There's a kind of recoiling that we have if we see a rattlesnake—the body, the being will just pull back and recoil from it. It's out of a sense of danger, but there can be a feeling of revulsion, like "don't go there."

So this quality of nibbida can have that flavor. That's not the most common flavor that I've experienced, but occasionally that has come up—that feeling of just ohh with being impinged on by sense impressions, this continual impingement of changing sense experience.

Sometimes the relationship to seeing the impermanent nature of experience can be a feeling of oppression. There have been times where I've been sitting and just feeling like it's so much sensation—body sensation, seeing, hearing. It's like a chaotic experience of the being experiencing all the sense impressions, and just the wish for it to stop. Just, "Oh, this is too much." A sound feels like a screaming pain. A thought feels like glass going through the mind. Sometimes it just feels so intense, these sense impressions. Again, this is not the most common way that I've experienced it, but there are times when it feels very oppressive.

It can also bring up feelings of fear—as strong as even terror sometimes—to see how rapidly things are changing. Just the feeling of there's nowhere to land. That sense of things changing so rapidly. Fear can be a relationship that happens there.

Some of the easier, more tolerable ones include a feeling of homesickness. My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya pointed to this one—that the homesickness is like wishing you could go back to that delusion. It's homesickness for delusion. But you can't go back, because there's enough clarity in the mind that the only way through is forward, toward seeing this impermanent nature of experience.

Sometimes, as the impermanent nature of experience begins to get more familiar, and perhaps you've let go of or seen through the terror and fear, the practice continues to deepen. The encouragement here is to notice. You're noticing impermanence, and you notice the relationship to it. That's the basic instruction. The practice deepens by noticing the relationship to what is happening, because that relationship to impermanence reveals different kinds of clinging, different levels and layers of clinging.

At a deeper level of clinging, sometimes the impermanent nature of experience just starts to feel really boring. It's like, "Yeah, yeah, yeah, I know." Just really boring. The mind gets disinterested: "Yeah, it's another sense impression. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting—yep, yep, know that, yep." The mind just gets bored with it or disinterested. These are other flavors of the relationship to impermanence. It's really important to notice these.

Sometimes for me it's felt like, "I'm done. I don't want to practice anymore." When I first noticed that experience, that feeling of not wanting to practice, I felt betrayed by my mind. I thought I had to stop not wanting to practice, to transform that belief into wanting to practice. Then I actually heard somebody report their experience. I was with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, and the person before me was experiencing things a little ahead of me in the practice, so it was always inspiring to hear what was happening for her. One time she described, "Yes, not wanting to practice arose, and I noted it."

I was like, "You can do that?" It was eye-opening for me. So yes, you can do that. You don't have to convert not wanting into wanting. You don't have to somehow believe that the not wanting isn't there. You can just know that it's there—and you're back in the practice. Not wanting to practice.

There are many relationships that unfold as we meet the deep experience of impermanence. When you start to see some of these flavors of relationship, know them. Be aware of them. Recognize there's this sense of impermanent experience, and there's confusion, and there's fear, and there's boredom, disinterest, not wanting to practice. Know the relationship to the experience.

Knowing that relationship is what helps the mind let go, to become free from that. We've been talking about this all along. As soon as we attend to something that is a form of greed, aversion, or delusion, the conditions of mindfulness weaken it. So this is the medicine: noticing the relationship.

I'd also say, just recognizing that this terrain of becoming disenchanted is the terrain of practice where it doesn't necessarily feel very pleasant—and yet it is the deepening of practice. There are times when the deepening of practice is not pleasant. A little bit of a shock. We don't put that in the brochure. I don't think we have a brochure.

As the mind begins to let go and to understand that it is not worth clinging, it moves through that disenchantment to withdrawal. But withdrawal is a funny word. Bhikkhu Bodhi termed it a serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena. But really, it's a withdrawal from clinging. And that's where we get entangled.

The clinging is what ties us or tangles us to objects. What happens as the clinging falls away is that there are objects in the knowing and there's simply no entanglement with them. But it does not necessarily feel like withdrawal, in my experience. It can feel very intimate—in fact, even more intimate than being tangled with something, because the tangle, the greed, the aversion, the confusion, obscures some of the experience. So the falling away of clinging is a withdrawal from the clinging. The disenchantment is a withdrawal from the clinging. But the experience can be very intimate when the clinging has fallen away.

As this happens, the mind moves towards what's termed dispassion here. The Pali term for this is viraga. In this place, basically, the mind has thoroughly understood that holding on to impermanent, changing phenomenon makes no sense. The literal—the Pali literal definition, the word viraga—literally means "to fade out." I like that. The word is basically one that would be used about a piece of cloth that has been dyed a particular color and is set in the sun, washed, set in the sun, washed, set in the sun—the color fades out gradually over time.

So this term, viraga, for dispassion, speaks—even the use of the word here speaks—to the gradual nature of the process. It's a slow process, the way the mind begins to let go, to let go of clinging. And over the course of practice, we may experience deeper levels of letting go. The fading out is like the deepening of how the mind lets go of certain layers or levels of clinging.

At first, the first levels or layers of clinging might be the way the mind understands that attachment to sense pleasure is not really going to make me happy. We gain that understanding, and the major craving and aversion around sense pleasure may begin to get a lot weaker. Many of you have probably noticed this over the course of your practice—how certain kinds of reactivity that had been so familiar are no longer quite so strong. Some of you have reported this on the retreat too, things that happened earlier on where you're now noticing that reactivity isn't arising anymore. This is the fading out. Those kinds of reactions are not happening.

So the first level of fading happens often around the major things—the major habits and patterns, the main ways in which our minds have habitually oriented towards finding happiness in various ways. That first level might be deepening through craving around sense pleasure. And then we start to find we're craving around the practice. We want those states of concentration. We want that peace. We want that ease. We want to see things really clearly. And so this is attachment, another level of attachment.

Possibly—I think I mentioned this a couple of days ago in the morning—the mind may cling to the practice, it may cling to states of concentration as a support for letting go of greater reactivity. But at some point we start to see that attachment, that clinging. And then that begins to weaken. That begins to fade out.

This experience of the fading out of clinging can come and go—the gradual nature of it. There may be times when the mind is so clear and it's just so obvious that picking things up and holding on to them is creating suffering. And the mind just won't go there. It's like you can even think of things that you might want and it's like, "Nah." It just doesn't go there. It doesn't want to pick them up. And then, ten minutes later, there we are, picking it up again.

This is how it works. It's so deeply conditioned. We get to see moments of clarity like that, and then we get to see the mind get hooked again. It's noticing it's caught again. Explore the possibility of not judging that. There are periods of time, maybe the first few years of practice, where it's like, "I've seen this already—why do I have to see it again?"

And at this point it's like, oh yeah, there it is again. It keeps happening. And yet, what I've seen in my own experience is that not only is it easier because I'm not reacting to the fact that it's coming up again—that's huge. What a relief that there's not that extra level of suffering around habits and patterns re-arising. But there's also the understanding that there's something more to learn here. There's still clinging, there's still craving. I'm glad that this is arising because I get to see the clinging and craving again. And the being with it helps to weaken it—so much easier when there's not that sense that it's a problem that this thing is arising.

So the dispassion has this fading out kind of process. There may be disenchantment and dispassion, and then maybe we're back to being enchanted. Disenchantment, a little bit of a sense of that dispassion of the mind just releasing the clinging—the clinging just dropping away.

There's another aspect of dispassion that feels like freedom. Freedom is not about getting anything. One definition of freedom: "This is the peaceful. This is the sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana." So in this, dispassion is used as a synonym for nibbana—mind having let go.

Gil also mentioned another definition of nibbana that we've discussed before: the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion. Or we could say the non-arising of greed, the non-arising of aversion, the non-arising of delusion. And so another way to experience or understand dispassion is as the non-arising of craving, the non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion.

The experience of release that we have when the mind lets go—there's a kind of delight to that. It feels good when the mind lets go. We feel the release from a vice grip. And that's the mind moving towards dispassion, that release. And yet, the release itself, that experience of release—it's something beautiful, it's sweet in a way. And yet the deeper form of release is that there's nothing left to release. The mind just doesn't even pick things up to hold on to them anymore.

So you might get a flavor of this. Try to feel into this a little bit. Think back to childhood—did you have a favorite game or toy or something? Maybe just remember a favorite toy. I had a big teddy bear that was about the size of me. It was my favorite thing. I carried it everywhere. It had no fur left. Both eyes were gone. And yes, I was very attached to it. And over time, you age, you grow up, you don't need that teddy bear anymore, you don't need whatever your favorite toy was anymore. Maybe you go back to it every now and then, but you find it's not satisfying you the way it used to. You lose your interest in it, you lose your dependence on it.

So this losing interest—that disinterest flavor there is kind of the stage we might say is, in the analogy, disenchantment. Losing interest in that. And then dispassion—like as an adult, when was the last time you thought about that toy? I didn't even think about this teddy bear until just now. The mind just doesn't even think of picking this up anymore. There's no interest or disinterest. There's no interest or disinterest around this toy to arise. This is the flavor of dispassion. There's no movement to pick up things to hold to.

And the practice deepens by seeing the ways in which we're enchanted, to be present for how we're enchanted, to see how we hold, to notice those relationships, feel that fear of loss, feel the disinterest, the boredom—all of those relationships. The practice leads through seeing how we've been enchanted.

Bhikkhu Bodhi writes about realizing freedom.

He uses the language "realizing the unconditioned." This is a term—the unconditioned. The mind free from greed, aversion, and delusion tastes a flavor of the unconditioned.

Here's how Bhikkhu Bodhi describes this: "Though the realization of the unconditioned requires a turning away from the conditioned, it must be emphasized that this realization is achieved precisely through the understanding of the conditioned. Nibbāna cannot be reached by backing off from a direct confrontation with samsara to lose oneself in a blissful oblivion to the world. The path to liberation is a path of understanding, of comprehension, and transcendence—not of escapism or emotional self-indulgence. Nibbāna can only be attained by turning one's gaze towards samsara and scrutinizing it in all its darkness. The understanding of the conditioned is the way to the unconditioned."

This description of freedom in the suttas, in many places, is primarily described by what it's not. This freedom, this unconditioned—non-clinging, the ending of craving, the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. It's nothing to pick up or own. There isn't any picking up or owning here. It's the non-arising freedom.

There's a sutta in the Sutta Nipāta where someone has asked the Buddha to describe what a liberated person is like. The questioner says, "Having what vision, being of what character, is one called peaceful? Tell me about the Supreme Person."

The Buddha responds: "A person who is not angered, not frightened, not boastful, not fretful, who gives wise advice, who is calm, restrained in speech, who is indeed a sage. A person who is not attached to the future, who does not sorrow over the past, who finds solitude amidst sense contact and is not guided by fixed views. A person who is retiring, not deceitful, not covetous, not greedy, not impudent, not arousing contempt, who does not engage in malicious speech. A person who does not relish pleasure, who is not arrogant, who is mild and of ready wit, who is not credulous, who by nothing is repelled. A person who does not take on the training in hopes of material gain, who is unperturbed if they get nothing, who is not hampered by wishes and not greedy for flavors. A person who is even-tempered, ever attentive, who does not suppose that they in the world are equal, superior, or inferior, who is free of conceit. A person for whom there are no tethers, who knowing truth is not tethered in any way, and in whom no wishes are found for existence or non-existence. This is someone I call peaceful."

Most of that description is what they are not. It's interesting to me, this image of someone free from greed, aversion, and delusion. What is that? What does that evoke for you? This is someone who could be completely free, someone whose qualities the Buddha describes as free from greed, aversion, and delusion. There's a lot of room for different actions arising.

I think we sometimes have this idea that being dispassionate—even the word "dispassion" makes it sound like you don't care, almost. But free from greed, aversion, and delusion doesn't mean we lack feeling or action. Part of the issue here, around this idea that somehow being free would be a kind of boring place to be... There was a question in the bowl the other day about whether the Buddha sang or danced or laughed. And I don't know. I have no idea. But I think that question is based in perhaps this idea that what it sounds like we're talking about here sounds like it would be very flat. Freedom may sound like it would be very flat—completely chilled out, non-reactive in a way that just sounds flat.

I think that's partly because the vast majority of our lives have been guided by greed, aversion, and delusion. When greed, aversion, and delusion are running the show—get what you want, you'll be happy; get rid of what you don't want, you'll be happy—when they're running the show, they cannot fathom there's another way to live. Those qualities of mind do not have the imagination to understand that if greed goes away, the problem goes away. If greed goes away, the suffering goes away. These habits or ways we've typically lived our lives—greed, aversion, and delusion think experience would be very flat without them. They cannot fathom a life with love, compassion, joy, and equanimity running the show.

We've said this before, but compassion acts, wisdom acts, love acts in the world. Without greed, aversion, and delusion, there are sixty-eight different possible expressions of freedom in this room—all of us, a different possible expression of freedom based on how non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion manifest in us. Love, wisdom, compassion—how they manifest in us. I've met some amazing people up in the hills of Sagaing in Burma, and they're very different.

One teacher, very calm—you just want to sit quietly in his presence. Another teacher laughs all day. There's a lot of room for different expressions of freedom.

What might be your expression of freedom? What might you be like without greed, aversion, and delusion? Don't limit yourself to some idea that freedom must be flat or lifeless.

Dispassion, you know, sounds flat. Why would I want dispassion? But it's dispassion around the habitual ways in which we've clung to things. It's no longer clinging. The absence of craving for the world doesn't mean an absence of feeling. There's a huge heart that resonates in empathy with the world. With greed, aversion, and delusion, that heart is limited. Without them, it's vast.

I bow to your practice. Carry on. Keep going.

The Simile of the Cloth

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers an inspiring exploration of the Vatthūpama Sutta (MN 7), the Simile of the Cloth. The Buddha's teaching uses the image of a stained cloth being dyed to illustrate how the mind, when purified of its defilements (kilesa), naturally absorbs wholesome qualities. Andrea emphasizes that while initial work is required to understand and abandon reactive patterns—anger, ill will, contempt, envy, and other mental stains—the subsequent unfolding of the path feels more like sliding toward liberation than climbing a hill.

The talk traces the natural progression described in the sutta: from abandoning defilements, confidence in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha arises, leading to what Gil Fronsdal calls the "gladness pentad"—gladness, joy, tranquility, happiness, and concentration. Andrea connects this to the teaching on transcendent dependent origination, using the beautiful image of rain flowing naturally downhill to fill streams and eventually the ocean. She explores how this process is spiral rather than linear, with repeated cycles of seeing, letting go, and deepening understanding.

Particularly moving is Andrea's reflection on how our reactive patterns are actually entangled with a genuine wish for well-being—they're confused attempts to find happiness. Rather than cutting out these tangles with a scalpel, mindfulness acts as a lubricant that allows the threads of love and truth to untangle naturally. The teaching culminates in the brahmavihāras—mettā, compassion, joy, and equanimity—arising naturally in a purified heart, ultimately pointing toward complete liberation from clinging to any experience, even the most wholesome.

We're at a very interesting point in the retreat in that for about half of you, the retreat is coming to an end, and for the other half of you, you're right in the middle of it. So reflecting on what to share this evening, I thought of exploring a teaching about one way the arc of practice unfolds from one of the Buddha's discourses.

The discourse I'd like to explore this evening is called The Simile of the Cloth. It offers a description of how the path of practice can unfold. What I find inspiring about this teaching is that it points, at the beginning, to what we have to do to really get on the path of practice—how we engage—and then once we're there, it points to a very natural unfolding, a process that sounds almost more like you're on a slide heading towards release rather than having to climb up a hill.

This teaching on the simile of the cloth begins with the simile itself. The Buddha is talking with some of his followers about a cloth that has a lot of stains on it. He asks if that stained cloth—even if it's a white cloth—if it's been ground in the mud or has various kinds of stains on it, and you dip that cloth in dye, what happens when you take it out? The cloth takes up the dye, but in the areas where it's stained, the dye looks different colors. So the cloth does not look very purely dyed if it has stains on it.

Now the word used for stain, the Pali word, is kilesa. That word is often translated as "defilement," but it literally means stain. This is one of the main places where it's used—in this discourse where it's talking about this stained cloth. We can consider this word kilesa to be a simile for the mind having stains, which are not inherent in the mind, just as the stains are not inherent to the cloth but can be removed.

The simile goes on. The Buddha says, suppose a cloth is pure and bright, and a dyer dips it into some dye or other—it would look well dyed and pure in color because of the purity of the cloth. Later in the sutta, there's a reference to inner bathing, the kind of inner washing of the mind, which helps to release these stains.

One thing I want to point out about this simile is that there's some work that has to go into removing the stains from the cloth. You can't just put it in the vat of dye and wish that it would dye beautifully. You have to do the work of scrubbing, rinsing it with water, scrubbing again, rinsing it with clear water, and checking to see: is the cloth more pure in color? There's some work that goes into removing the stains.

But then, when you put the cloth into the vat—and you do have to put the cloth into the vat—once you put it in, the cloth absorbs the dye. Very little work is involved. You don't have to push the dye into the cloth. You put the cloth into the vat and it takes up the dye.

The Buddha points to wholesome qualities of mind, saying that when the mind is not stained, a happy destination may be expected. The analogy of the dye, in a way, represents wholesome qualities of mind. As the mind, through the work of the practice we've been doing, begins to release the hindrances, begins to release these reactive emotions and patterns and habits, very naturally it begins to take up the wholesome qualities of mind—especially when we incline our mind in that direction.

This sutta describes the progress of what happens over the course of a lifetime of practice, or lifetimes of practice. The Buddha starts by describing a whole list of different defilements. I'll read them out in a moment—it's a great list if you're looking for what might be going on in this mind. He says that once we know these are defilements—I'll give you a few of them: ill will, anger, resentment, contempt—once we know, recognizing that they're defilements of mind, one abandons them. We'll go into what these words mean and how this process unfolds. Knowing that they're defilements, one abandons them. Having known and having abandoned them, confidence in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha arises.

This points to part of how the practice works: once we see these reactive emotions and have experienced some of their letting go, we know this works. That's confidence. Confidence grows as we see this process of abandoning at work.

With confidence, the description begins to sound like a natural unfolding. With confidence in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, it is said that inspiration and gladness in the Dharma arises. From that inspiration and gladness, rapture, tranquility, and concentration arise. Again, this is described as a very natural process.

From there, it describes one abiding in the mind of mettā. With that mind of mettā and awareness, there's an inclination or pointing towards understanding the nature of all experience as impermanent, unreliable, not self. Because the mind is so stable, abiding in mettā with concentration, gladness, joy, and delight, the mind releases. Essentially, one turns the mind towards insight, towards understanding.

For me, this overall teaching about the direction of the path is inspiring because it means the path opens to us and invites us. It almost pulls us along. Wisdom pulls us along. We don't have to figure out the wisdom.

The other piece of this that I think is useful to remember: this is described as an arc of practice. It sounds like it happens with one stage simply following another. And in a way it does, but my experience of it is more of a spiral. There's some experience of letting go of the defilements, of the reactive patterns and habits of mind, an experience of freedom in that moment that brings in a lot of confidence, delight, joy, happiness resulting from that experience. So right there, there's this almost immediate tumbling forward in the process that's described. Sometimes the heart opens to metta in that space. And then something happens, another level or another layer appears. To me, it feels like this work of cleaning the cloth. We clean the cloth and it's as clean as we can see, but then as we go further, we notice, oh, there's actually a little more there. So there's more seeing, knowing, abandoning of the staining that can happen. It really is a spiral kind of process.

So this first part—what are the defilements or imperfections, the stains of the mind? Covetousness and unrighteous greed is a stain of the mind. Ill will, anger, resentment, contempt, insolence, envy, avarice, deceit, fraud, obstinacy, rivalry, conceit, arrogance, vanity, negligence—all imperfections that stain the mind. And then for each one of these, he says, "Knowing that ill will is a stain of the mind, one abandons it."

This is what we've been doing: looking at what arises in our hearts and minds, sometimes the reactive habits and patterns. When those arise, we observe them. Now this word abandon—often it sounds like an active kind of process. We may even have some relationship with this word based on our history with it. I think often the word abandon is used in a way that is not such a positive thing. We talk about children who have been abandoned. But the word also, in its definition—I looked up the definition and there are some definitions that really resonate for this teaching about what it means to abandon these stains.

One definition of abandoning is to leave a place because of understanding its danger. That would be like "abandon ship." When the boat is going down, you don't stay on the ship. You understand the danger. This is a natural movement of the heart, to remove oneself from a place of danger. And so we can sometimes see, with observing anger, ill will, contempt, greed, we can sometimes feel the danger of those in the way they produce suffering in our hearts and minds, and in the way they incline us to engage unskillfully in the world and potentially harm others. We can see the danger. And when we see it, when we feel into that danger, sometimes there's a very natural withdrawing from that. Not something we have to push away, but it feels more like the heart just says, "No, not going there."

Another definition for abandoning is to let go of something we understand is not valuable for us. And again, this is what we begin to recognize so clearly about these reactive states of mind. We feel, "This is not helpful, this is not valuable," given our history with these difficult states of mind. I certainly have seen in my own practice, especially in the first few months, really looking at anger—at some point I truly saw that my mind believed I was getting something out of it. It could believe that partly because it wasn't actually acknowledging the impact of it personally, here and now, on the body and mind, and also on how I engaged in the world and impacted others. It believed I was making myself happier by having that anger, and it was exposed as being a lie. The mind directly seeing: this is not valuable. Again, with that seeing, the mind begins to let it go.

It doesn't let it go once and for all upon seeing that once, unfortunately. It seems like the habits and patterns are so deep that the letting go, the seeing, needs to happen many times, because some part of our system says, "Yeah, but I know it really has to help"—that deluded part of our mind believing that anger helps us, that greed helps us.

So in our practice, this abandoning, this releasing, this letting go, can have a more organic feeling to it that comes just through understanding. If we look at this understanding—knowing that anger is a defilement of the mind, knowing that anger stains the mind—when we see that, when we understand that, there can be a natural abandoning. One abandons it.

And there's a big place right in the middle of practice where sometimes the mindfulness is not quite strong enough to see the danger or the lack of value directly in the moment, but our minds know this is not helpful. We may see ourselves getting pulled in, we may see the reactivity getting stronger, and in those cases we take some action to turn our attention to something else, to settle our attention, ground in the body again. So there can be the active form of abandoning here in the practice—and we've been doing this for five and a half weeks. This is a big place of what our practice is about, this understanding.

And really, in some ways, as the understanding gets strong, it's like that's the work of the practice: to understand the suffering. That's the enjoinder the Buddha gave us about the first noble truth. There is suffering. Suffering should be understood. And if we make that movement to understand suffering, the rest of the path just begins to unfold and the reactive habits and patterns begin to unravel.

The next piece of the text addresses what happens having known. "When one has known that negligence"—I'll pick one at random here—"when one has known that negligence is a stain of the mind and has abandoned it, one acquires unwavering confidence in the Buddha. One acquires unwavering confidence in the Dharma. One acquires unwavering confidence in the Sangha."

Now, this unwavering confidence that's described here is, I think, part of where the practice becomes more of a spiral. There is often, in the moment of seeing how reactivity can be released, a sense of, "Wow, there's a possibility here." There's a direct understanding of the direction of the practice, of the possibility. For myself, the first time I really saw and understood that the mind did not have to follow that intention towards anger, so much gratitude just coursed through me. My sense was, "Wow, this practice works. This is possible." There was a surge of confidence in the practice, and at that moment I think I knew I was going to be doing this for the rest of my life.

And yet, I would not say it was unwavering confidence. It might have been unwavering in that moment. But confidence has definitely wavered over the past twenty-five years of practice. It's definitely been a spiral—confidence growing and then wavering, confidence growing and wavering.

The unwavering confidence described here is a description of someone who has entered the stream, their first taste of awakening. There's a deep understanding and no longer any doubt in the possibility of freedom. With stream entry, freedom is not continually present, but there's been this taste of that possibility. And so this deep understanding of these reactive habits and patterns can give us this taste of freedom.

This confidence that arises—confidence in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha—gives us inspiration to continue because we see in those moments that it's possible. We understand it's possible, and we also understand we're not there yet. So there's a strong sense of spiritual urgency, and the arising of inspiration and gladness in the Dharma, that sense of gratitude. The Dharma—it's possible. This teaching is helpful. There's this inspiration.

The text says, "When one has given up, abandoned, and relinquished the imperfections of mind in part, one considers thus: 'I'm possessed of unwavering confidence in the Buddha,' and gains inspiration in the meaning, gains inspiration in the Dhamma, gains gladness connected with the Dhamma."

So the imperfections of the mind are abandoned in part. More work to do. But the gladness, the confidence, the inspiration propels us onward.

And the next part just lists this tumbling forward: "When one is glad, rapture arises. In one who is rapturous, the body becomes tranquil. In one whose body is tranquil, one feels pleasure. In one who feels pleasure, the mind becomes concentrated." Again, it just describes this as a natural unfolding.

This set of qualities—gladness, joy, tranquility, happiness, and concentration—appears in several places in the suttas, where these five qualities are linked and pointed to as arising naturally one from the other. My colleague Gil Fronsdal calls these "the gladness pentad." Five qualities related to and arising out of gladness. The gladness pentad—it's a lovely phrase. I don't know if he made it up. When I googled "the gladness pentad," the only places it came up were in connection with Gil and with his students who teach. Perhaps it appears in scholarly works, but I'm not certain about this term. In any case, it occurs multiple times in different contexts in the teachings.

I think it's worth taking a little time to linger here and reflect that based on the understanding, the abandoning of the defilements of mind, this process unfolds where these beautiful qualities of mind and heart—joy, delight, tranquility, happiness—are present. This path has a lot of joy in it.

The other day in one of my meetings, someone was asking about joy in the practice, and why isn't it more highlighted? In the wisdom teachings of the Buddha, he's talking about how to do the abandoning, how the defilements come to be, how the abandoning happens. But the process, when we engage in it, is very happiness-making, very joyful. Here in this teaching, and in a couple of others I'll point to, it describes joy as being a very natural result of doing this work of understanding.

I'm going to read a sutta that Tara read very early on, perhaps even in the first couple of nights of the retreat, called "The Lawfulness of Progress." In this you'll see these five qualities appearing. This one starts from virtue:

"For one who is virtuous and endowed with virtue, there is no need for an act of will: 'May non-remorse arise in me.' It is a natural law that non-remorse will arise in one who is virtuous.

For one free of remorse, there is no need for an act of will: 'May gladness arise in me.' It is a natural law that gladness will arise in one who is free from remorse.

For one who is glad at heart, there is no need for an act of will: 'May joy arise in me.' It is a natural law that joy will arise in one who is glad at heart.

For one who is joyful, there is no need for an act of will: 'May my body be tranquil.' It is a natural law that the body will be tranquil for one who is joyful.

For one of serene body, there is no need for an act of will: 'May I feel happiness.' It is a natural law that one who is serene will feel happiness.

For one who is happy, there is no need for an act of will: 'May my mind be concentrated.' It is a natural law for one who is happy that the mind will be concentrated."

And it goes on: "No need for an act of will: 'May I know and see things as they really are.' No need for an act of will: 'May I experience disenchantment and dispassion.' No need for an act of will: 'May I experience freedom.' It is a natural law for one who experiences dispassion to experience freedom."

In another place this gladness pentad arises, in a sutta that refers to the teaching of transcendent dependent origination. In that teaching, it gives an analogy for the unfolding of practice. Actually, in this sutta it starts from the very beginning of the chain of dependent origination—that based on ignorance there's volitional formation, and so forth, up through suffering. But then it says that with suffering as a condition, faith can come to be. Faith comes to be, and then rather than moving from virtue to non-remorse to gladness, it moves from faith, from confidence, to gladness. This whole teaching is described as a natural process:

"Just as when rain pours down in thick droplets on a mountain top, the water flows down along the slope and fills up the clefts, gullies, and creeks. These being full fill up the pools. These being full fill up the lakes. These being full fill up the streams. These being full fill up the rivers. These being full fill up the great ocean. So too, with faith as proximate cause, gladness comes to be."

With gladness as approximate cause, joy. With joy as approximate cause, tranquility. Again, this image of natural processes flowing downhill, water flowing downhill.

As I thought about this image, I realized that not all the water gets to the great ocean. Some of it gets absorbed in the ground, comes up in the plants. The plants transpire the water and oxygen into the air, which gets carried back and comes down as rain. Some of it simply evaporates into the air and returns as rain. So again, this kind of cyclic process is part of this natural unfolding. And I feel that the momentum of mindfulness and wisdom carries us in the direction of freedom.

The next piece of this teaching, after pointing to the concentration: one abides pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with loving-kindness. This chant that we've done is found in this sutta. One abides pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with compassion, with a mind imbued with altruistic joy, with a mind imbued with equanimity. One abides pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with equanimity, likewise the second, likewise the third, likewise the fourth. So above, below, around, and everywhere, and to all as to oneself, one abides pervading the all-encompassing world with a mind imbued with equanimity—abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will.

Reflecting on this point in the sutta, on this image of natural unfolding, the natural causes and conditions that lead us toward freedom, I noted that it says: when one is glad, rapture is born. In one who is rapturous, the body becomes tranquil. In one whose body is tranquil, one feels pleasure. In one who feels pleasure, the mind becomes concentrated. One abides pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with kindness. It doesn't say one has to work really hard to do that. Again, it's simply the sense of abiding—that word we explored at the beginning. Abiding is this natural opening to these qualities.

To me, this speaks to how, as the heart becomes more present, as the defilements have been abandoned, as there are those places and times of purity—the feeling of purity in the heart—mettā, compassion, joy, and equanimity become available.

Now this is the place where perhaps we can think about that image of the cloth in the dye. It may be that for some of us, we need just a little dip into the vat of mettā, the vat of compassion. For myself, I definitely needed a little tip—just a bit of checking in. What's here? How is the heart and mind, given this place of the mind having let go and finding some mettā? It wasn't obvious to me, not until I began to explore: What's here? What's here?

In this image, when the mind is pure, when the cloth is pure, and it's lowered into that dye, it's going to take up that beautiful color. It will take up the beautiful qualities of mettā, of compassion, of joy, of equanimity. Again, a very natural process. And we may feel this at times—the beauty of that. Let yourself feel it in those moments. Appreciate it in those moments.

I've spent some time reflecting on why these qualities of love, compassion, joy, and equanimity might follow from understanding reactive states of mind. Some of it is the intention we bring to that understanding. The intention we bring is one of kindness, of allowing. Early on we talked about allowing. That first talk I gave: relax, receive, allow. And how allowing is a very loving thing to do. It's one of the kindest, most loving things we can do for ourselves—to open to and allow what's here to be here. So that is cultivating the quality of mettā.

Mettā is the base quality for compassion and joy. The open heart, when it meets suffering, responds with compassion. The open heart, when it meets delight and success, responds in kind with happiness and joy. So the open heart, with that quality of kindness, begins to open us to all of these.

And equanimity—the practice of allowing—is also cultivating equanimity by not resisting, by cultivating that non-reactivity, just opening to, being with. So we're cultivating all of these qualities by exploring and understanding these reactive states of mind.

I've also seen in my own practice how it's not just the practice cultivating metta and compassion, equanimity and joy. It's not just the intention that we bring to the mindfulness practice. We can actively cultivate these qualities through formal practice of the Brahma Viharas. But there's also a way in which, as the very reactivity we're looking at starts to be understood, it can feel as though the metta—the wish for our well-being and happiness—is uncovered right within the midst of these reactive patterns and habits.

Metta itself is this wish for well-being: for our own well-being, for the well-being of others, for the well-being of both. And that wish gets distorted out of fear, greed, anger, confusion. I think there's an intimate connection between our suffering and this deep human wish for happiness, safety, well-being. This movement—this almost biological human movement in the direction of happiness—our minds are pretty short-sighted about it. The habits of mind that have been well conditioned, not only in our lifetimes but in our evolutionary experience, are conditioned to take the shortest route to feeling a little bit better.

So there's a deep, fundamental misunderstanding about how to find happiness, safety, well-being. Our minds, through aversion and greed, go for the quickest, most immediate gratification. Get rid of this unpleasant thing right here. Get this pleasant thing and hold on to it. We don't see the greed and aversion in the moment and how they affect us. Our minds and bodies are willing to let go of happiness here and now for the idea of some possibility of happiness in the future.

But these patterns are trying to make us happy. They're trying to create well-being. They just really don't know how to do it. They're so confused—that's the delusion. And I think this is why some of our habits and patterns have such a grip on us: because they are entangled with this very deep wish for well-being. It's just entangled with confusion and ignorance and delusion.

As we start to untangle that tangle, as the delusion begins to fall away, as we see directly in the moment—this is not helpful, this way lies danger, this is not valuable—then the delusion about that falls away and the wish for well-being and happiness can remain.

The fundamental confusion around the direction toward happiness gets tangled up with our relationship to the truths: the truths of impermanence, unreliability, uncontrollability. That's where the mind gets confused. With this sense of wanting to be safe, happy, healthy, and at ease, we are fighting against these truths that things are impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. And so we want control, we want to hold on, we want to fix, we want to change—or we experience fear.

In the middle of all this dukkha that we experience, we have the threads of truth and the threads of wishing for our well-being. There's a sense of wanting to be safe, but things are unreliable. And there's the tangle.

So what the practice begins to do is untangle the tangle. When I first started looking at some of my deeper habits and patterns of mind—anger, self-hatred—it was such a knot. I believed, I thought, that I needed to get the scalpel out. Cut that tumor out.

Wholly bad. Got to get rid of it. But it was not so easy to do that. And I think part of the reason it's not so easy is that the tangle is the anger. The tangle is the defilement. The tangle is the confusion. But the tangle is a tangle of threads of love and truth. And so if we take the scalpel and cut out the tangle, we get a hole in the cloth. Our hearts and minds won't seem to let us do that.

So the practice of mindfulness is like putting that tangle into a lubricant that slowly allows it to untangle. And then we can see the possibility, we feel into this possibility, that what seems to be a conflict between the wish for well-being and the unreliable, uncontrollable nature of experience is not a problem. It's more like a weave than a tangle—a strong weave of the mind that feels deeply the metta, the love, the compassion, and feels deeply the truths, the equanimity.

In many experiences when I've had this kind of opening around a particular deep habit or pattern of mind, as there's an opening there, there is a touching into those threads: the love, the wish for well-being, the wish for happiness, the wish for safety, right here.

And understanding these truths at the same time. Our practice can reveal that this love is not something to fear, and that the truths are also not something to fear.

The last part of this teaching: "Abiding with loving-kindness, compassion, joy, equanimity, one understands thus." Now this language is a little unusual—I don't know if it's used elsewhere. "One understands thus: there is this"—and by that I take it to mean this experience in this moment—"there is this, there is the inferior, there is the superior, and beyond there is an escape from this whole field of perception."

The commentaries say this means the understanding of the Four Noble Truths in the moment. There are times in the texts where the Buddha points to the Four Noble Truths not as a teaching simply to be understood, but as insights. I talked about that a little when I discussed dependent origination. Any place you are in your experience, there's a teaching that says you can simply see it from the perspective of the Four Noble Truths. You can see: this is craving, this is the arising of craving, this is the ending of craving, and this is the path leading to the ending of craving.

That's my understanding of what this passage is pointing to—that seeing in the moment, these states too, these beautiful qualities of heart and mind all the way up: gladness, joy, tranquility, happiness, concentration, metta, compassion, joy, equanimity—these are unreliable arisings of mind that are not to be held to. There is an escape from the whole idea of clinging to anything, including the wholesome states.

Again, this is described as being just the natural unfolding. But I think there is a possible tendency at times to kind of land in those wholesome states and maybe get stuck there a little bit. And so again, we might need a gentle inclining towards freedom—inclining towards the recognition that this too is just an arising conditioned experience. This too, like the raft, is not to be clung to.

This sutta, to me, speaks of an overarching practice that resonates with practice here on retreat, but also practice in the world. Because it starts in the place of looking at all of those reactive habits and patterns that are relational—looking at how we are in relationship to our families, our friends, the news, whatever's out there. Angry, contemptuous, envious, deceitful. It's pointing to looking at our relational world, internally and externally.

And then the transformation also speaks to not only the transformation internally, but this connectedness. These qualities of the brahma-viharas are relational. It's not just about what happens here internally. It's not just about what happens here on retreat. This is carried into the world.

Whether you are staying or will be leaving next week, this is an amazing thing that you're doing—offering for yourselves and for the world. We can't really just practice for ourselves. Even if we're trying to do that, it will spill out.

Thank you for your practice.

CHAPTER 75

Travelling the Eightfold Path Towards Insight and Liberation

Andrea Fella · 37 min

In this comprehensive talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the Buddha's central teaching on liberation from mental suffering. She begins by clarifying that while physical pain is unavoidable, the Buddha discovered complete freedom from mental distress is possible. Through an exploration of the Pāli term dukkha—literally meaning a "bad axle hole" that creates a rough ride—she reveals how suffering ranges from subtle dissatisfaction to profound anguish, all rooted in our mental relationship to experience rather than external circumstances.

Fella methodically unpacks the Eightfold Path as the Buddha's practical response to this diagnosis. She explains how Right Understanding and Right Intention reorient us away from the futile pursuit of happiness through getting what we want, toward the recognition that wanting itself is the source of suffering. The ethical factors of Right Speech, Right Action, and Right Livelihood harmonize our relationship with the world, while Right Effort, Right Mindfulness, and Right Concentration provide the mental cultivation needed to observe and transform our habitual patterns.

The talk emphasizes that this path is not merely conceptual but experiential—a spiral journey where each round of practice deepens our verified understanding of the Four Noble Truths. Fella offers reassurance that transformation is genuinely possible: by turning toward our suffering with honest awareness rather than acting on reactive patterns, the mind naturally begins to release what causes its own distress. This counterintuitive approach of meeting difficulty directly becomes the very doorway to freedom.

The Buddha realized something profound—he had a deep understanding of the possibility for freedom from suffering, that it is possible to become free from suffering.

What he realized first is that it's not possible to become free from pain, from physical pain, but it is possible to become free from mental distress. And so that is his orientation for us: How can he help us become free of any kind of mental distress? One of the definitions of freedom is experiencing no mental pain or grief. For me, that's a pretty inspiring sounding state—just the idea of experiencing no mental pain or grief. And that is essentially what the Buddha says is possible. He says he found it himself and says it is possible for us.

But after he discovered this, after he realized this idea, after he had this recognition of the ending of mental pain and grief in his own mind, he looked out at the world and he saw that people were living their lives in such a way that actually reinforced their own mental pain and grief. They weren't just living in a kind of neutral way, but actually they were living in a way that they thought would make them happy, but actually bound them more tightly to this cycle of being locked into patterns in our minds of mental pain and grief.

So what is this mental pain and grief? The term that the Buddha used is dukkha. The derivation of that Pali term is quite interesting. The first part of the word, "du," means something like "bad." And the second part of the word, "kha," has as its basic definition the center part of a wheel—the empty space in the middle of a wheel. So the term dukkha means a bad empty space in the middle of the wheel.

What does that mean? If we think about what that actually means, it means if you have a wheel that's got a bad empty space in the middle, perhaps that place where the axle goes through is too small. So it's too tight. It rubs. It's not an easy ride. There's resistance in that turning of the wheel. Or perhaps it's off-center, so that as the wheel turns, it kind of goes ka-chunk, ka-chunk, ka-chunk. Or maybe it's so loose altogether that as the wheel goes, the wheel falls off entirely.

These ideas give you a sense of the range of mental distress that's covered by this term. It can be a simple sense of something's not quite right—things are a little bit off here, just a feeling of not quite being satisfied with things the way they are. If it were just tweaked a little bit that way, it would be better. Could get rid of that, then things would be a little better. That's a kind of dukkha. The term is often translated as "suffering," but that seems a bit extreme for this definition of just a little bit of offness.

And this term dukkha goes all the way to what we do call extreme suffering—the times when the wheel is just falling off and we're not able to go anywhere, where we're experiencing massive suffering: loss of a partner, death of a family member, diagnosis of cancer in our own lives, a terminal diagnosis. These kinds of suffering—actually, from the Buddhist perspective, it's not the diagnosis of the cancer or the loss of the loved one that is the actual dukkha, but it's our mental response to it, our resistance to it, the sense that this is not the way it should be, and the fact that we suffer over that.

So the Buddha points to dukkha as being a problem in our own minds. It's not the things that are happening out in the world, but it's the way that we are riding with them. I think this is another reason why the wheel analogy is good, because it's the way that we're riding with the circumstances of life. Is there resistance? Is there a feeling of offness around it? That's where this problem of dukkha comes.

This is the problem that the Buddha was trying to solve. And he came to an understanding that it was possible to end this dukkha in his own mind. Fortunately for us, he also came to a recognition that there's actually a set of tools that we can use to help us free ourselves from this mental pain and grief.

The path that he offered us is the Eightfold Path. I'd like to speak a little bit about it—not in the kind of detail I might ordinarily do in a dharma talk, because I want to talk about how this path connects with this problem of suffering and how we can free ourselves, how this path supports freeing ourselves from this suffering. So I'll offer an overview of the Eightfold Path and then go back and talk about how it supports us to free our minds.

The Eightfold Path, as a kind of overview of the parts of the path: there's right understanding—I'll just name them first of all.

In offering these as a path, the Buddha is offering them as a set of practices that will lead us to the ending of dukkha. They're not something to simply read about—they're actually practices to engage with.

The path begins with right understanding and right intention. What this points to is basically that as the Buddha looked out and saw people engaging in actions, thinking it would make them happy, he noticed something. One of our main ways that we think we'll be happy is: "If I get what I want, I'll be happy." And engaging in things in that way, we do get a little bit of happiness from time to time. If we actually get what we want, there's a little bit of happiness. If we don't get what we want, there's immediate suffering—we recognize that as suffering. But if we get what we want, there's a little bit of happiness, and it's like, "Yes, that's the way it's supposed to be. That's how life is supposed to be. I'm supposed to get what I want, and that's how happiness comes."

So that's a kind of belief, a way that we operate in our lives, going from thing to thing, trying to get what we want. In a sense, we think that if we could line up a bunch of moments where we got what we want—because we know that having what we want doesn't make us happy forever—but we do think that if we can get what we want endlessly, that is what happiness would be. And if I'm not able to do that, then there must be something wrong with me, or I've got to work harder, or I've got to be able to fix it or control things. So we have this belief around getting what we want being how we'll be able to be happy.

The Buddha looked at that and realized that actually this action of endlessly getting what we want just conditions more wanting to have the next thing. If you actually look in your experience, it's not so much that when we're in a state where we don't have what we want, it's not so much the fact that we don't have it that is the feeling of offness. In that moment of wanting something that we don't have, the feeling of offness is the wanting itself. And this is what he pointed to: it's not the not having that causes our suffering. It's the having of the wanting that causes our suffering.

So he started to point us through a shift of our view. This view that we normally think of in terms of how I can be happy is not going to serve us very well for a deep kind of lasting happiness. But if we instead orient ourselves around letting go of wanting things—wanting to have things that we don't have, wanting to get rid of things that we have that we don't like—this endless manipulating of the world to make it just the way I want it for a few moments before it falls apart and changes and then we rearrange again... That's our life: endlessly rearranging the world and watching it fall apart, rearranging and watching it fall apart.

The Buddha proposes that if we let go of the wanting to do all that rearranging, that's where a deeper happiness will come. This is his directing us in this very first aspect of the Eightfold Path. He says: shift your orientation. And the definition of this shift of orientation is understanding the Four Noble Truths.

The Four Noble Truths are: there is suffering; there's a cause for suffering, and that cause is this wanting, this craving, this wanting things to be other than they are—wanting to have things we don't have, wanting to get rid of things that we do have. So there is suffering, and there's this cause of suffering. Then there's the possibility—which he promises us from his own direct experience—that this suffering, this dukkha, this very subtle kind of suffering, can end. And there is a path that leads to its end.

So this is the reorientation. The Buddha says we shouldn't live our lives so much trying to figure out how to get what we want, as much as we should figure out how to let go of the things that are causing us suffering. That's the orientation towards happiness.

It's no surprise that given his burning question was "How can I end dukkha?" his whole orientation around wisdom has to do with the framing of understanding this dukkha. The Four Noble Truths are set out not just as truths to be believed in, but as actions to be taken. With each of these truths, there's an action that the Buddha proposes.

We need to understand suffering. By "understand it," he doesn't mean to think about it—to think, "Well, why am I suffering? This pattern that's coming up right now, this anger that I'm experiencing, that's deep in my childhood. That comes from the time when my parents did this to me, and I know this is kind of how it's all formed." That kind of thinking about it is not what the Buddha means by understanding. He means understanding in the moment. What is this experience of suffering? His proposal is to turn towards the experience of this offness, this rub, this resistance, this feeling of catastrophe if it's that big.

What is the experience of suffering? What is it to be a human being experiencing this dukkha? This is the Buddha's proposal to us as part of our path: understand suffering, and let go of the cause of suffering—let go of this wanting.

This letting go may have an active quality to it. It may be that we can actively let go of something that we see isn't useful. But more often what we end up doing is hanging out with this feeling of suffering, this feeling of wanting things to be different. And in the very hanging out with it—if we hang out with it instead of acting on it—something shifts. If we act on that wanting, it just conditions the belief that the way to happiness, the way to satisfy that wanting, is to get what we want. If we take that action and get what we want, it conditions the belief that this is the way to happiness.

So this is a radical shift the Buddha proposes: to turn towards this feeling. What does it feel like to want something and not act on it for a change? What does that just feel like, this pull to want to get something or have something? If you watch it for a little while, you'll see that it ends. You'll see that it does pass. And when you see that, when you see that wanting end, you'll see that there's actually a very deep kind of relaxation in the letting go that happens. Once the wanting goes, there's no problem anymore. There's no dissatisfaction around not having that thing. It's the wanting itself that is the issue. It's the source of our suffering.

The third noble truth is the truth of the cessation of suffering—the possibility that the Buddha puts forward, the possibility that suffering can end. He says we have to realize this for ourselves. Nobody can do it for you. It has to be realized yourself. And the path to that is this Eightfold Path.

So this is our reorientation. Initially, as we meet this Eightfold Path, this wisdom that the Buddha offers us—this reorientation around letting go of the things that lead us to suffering and cultivating the things that lead us to a deeper kind of happiness—we have to take this somewhat on faith. We've heard this and perhaps massaged it a little bit in our minds, thought about it. And if there's enough of a sense of trust in the teaching, there may be a sense of, "Okay, I'm going to try this."

Because the Buddha is not proposing just a belief here. He's proposing actions. He's proposing practices. In putting forth this teaching of the Four Noble Truths, it's not simply, "Here, believe this and you'll be free." It's that if you believe this enough, you'll start to act on these truths, and then you will see for yourself the benefits of acting on them. Slowly, over time, a gradual letting go of our suffering unfolds.

Initially, it's out of hearing the teachings and reflecting on them that we begin to have the intention, the desire, the wish to engage in the practices. This is the second aspect of the Eightfold Path: the intention to follow through on this teaching. Right intention is this intention to engage with these practices.

This intention leads us towards a movement to act in the world in ways that will, as much as possible, not cause suffering. Suffering is our guide here. It's the orientation we look toward. Is there suffering happening? If there's suffering happening, then we need to understand it, see if we can find what it is that we're holding on to, and let go of that cause. The orientation is around looking at where suffering is happening in our lives, in the lives of others.

With this intention to follow these practices the Buddha is suggesting, we start to engage in the world in ways that will not harm people—with ethical conduct. This is the second aspect of the Eightfold Path, the next three components: wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. These lay out sets of practices that we work with in our relationships with others in the world.

They're all phrased in terms of abstaining—abstaining from certain things that would tend to cause harm. With wise action: abstaining from killing, abstaining from taking what's not given, abstaining from sexual misconduct. With wise speech: abstaining from false speech, from divisive speech, from harsh speech, from idle chatter.

Harsh, divisive, false, and idle. We look at where our speech and our actions are creating harm in the world. The Buddha points us to these areas. He says, if you find yourself getting ready to engage in harsh speech, it's a really high probability that it's going to cause suffering out there. So look at that.

These ethical practices aren't taught simply as "thou shalt not." They're really meant to be engaged with in a way of watching. When one of these things comes up—a wish to speak in a divisive way, perhaps saying "that person does this thing" to somebody else and kind of creating a division, us versus them—what's the motivation there? We begin to look at it when a desire for this kind of speech arises. The possibility of it causing harm is great, so what's motivating it? We begin to look in our experience at what's motivating that, so that we can, as much as possible, let go of behaviors, speech, and actions in the world that cause additional harm.

This ethical component of the Eightfold Path is really about harmonizing our relationship with the world. It's not about putting ourselves into a straitjacket, but really creating harmony, creating a peaceful living situation. With that intention towards nonharming, through the exploration of not harming others, we also begin to see how we engage in our minds before we reach out to harm others.

For instance, if you have anger in your mind and that leads you to want to speak harshly, you get to the place where you don't necessarily follow through on that harsh speech. Then you start to see that the anger burns. It burns us. As we begin to let go of the behaviors that cause harm, we start to see the internal states of mind that cause us harm.

This is where the third aspect of the Eightfold Path comes in. We start to cultivate our minds through the factors of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. This is mental cultivation. And this really comes back to the crux of where dukkha comes from. We see that largely this unhappiness, this dissatisfaction, comes because of how we relate to the world—how we want to arrange the world, wanting to have things that we don't have, wanting to get rid of things that we do have. It's the way that we relate to the world. It's in our minds. Our relationship to the world is something that's coming up in our minds.

You can see how, given a situation, some people respond some ways and some people respond other ways. So it's not the situation that is the problem—it's our response to it. Since the whole crux of this dukkha is something that's in our minds, this mental cultivation begins to get at that problem. The vast majority of our struggles is created by some reactivity: liking something, not liking something, wanting to have something, wanting to get rid of something. So we need to cultivate a mind that can start to look at that.

Sometimes when we experience habitual patterns—and I think all of us have habitual tendencies, habitual patterns that we engage in over and over again—we see that this isn't helpful. Why do I keep doing this? Why do I keep getting so angry? Or why do I keep telling myself I'm such a bad person? We have these habits of mind, and we don't quite understand why we keep engaging in them. Sometimes we think, "Well, I must just be this way. It's hopeless. I can't possibly change this. I've been doing this for so long, there's no hope of changing it."

It's not true. It's possible to change our minds. It is absolutely possible to change our minds.

This mental cultivation that the Buddha teaches—wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—these are the tools you need to change your mind. Wise effort is about looking at those qualities of mind that lead us towards unhappiness, towards this dukkha, this suffering, this off feeling. The three main qualities that lead us in that direction are a wanting to have something, a kind of greed; a wanting to get rid of things that we don't like, an aversion; and a kind of confusion around

Or a misperception around where happiness can actually be found. A misperception about how the world actually works, how reality is structured. That misperception is delusion—something I hope to explore a little more later.

We look at our minds and begin to see how they work. We begin to see that greed, aversion, and delusion lead us into this feeling of offness over and over again. And we begin to see that when we act out of non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion, this leads us towards more happiness in our lives, more peacefulness, more serenity.

So wise effort is about noticing when we're engaging in things that lead us more toward suffering or more toward happiness—cultivating those things that lead us to happiness and letting go of those things that lead us toward suffering.

This is beginning to observe in our minds, and this is the wise mindfulness aspect of the Eightfold Path: turning toward our experience, observing our experience. With a very honest approach—mindfulness brings great honesty to our practice, to our hearts—we turn and look at our experience and recognize when we're behaving in ways that are not helpful. The mindfulness allows us to recognize what our minds are doing, and the teaching on wise effort guides us in the direction toward more and more skillfulness.

The combination of these two—effort and mindfulness—means making the effort to keep staying connected, keep exploring, keep observing. What is this dukkha? This very First Noble Truth, understanding dukkha, coming back to that—this actually is one of our big practices. We bring wise effort and wise mindfulness to bear on our experience. Much of the time that experience feels off, and that very exploration of that offness begins to re-educate the mind.

It's so interesting that when we actually pay attention with mindfulness to the way our mind is engaged in anger or frustration or whatever your favorite pattern is—depression or fear—when we turn to actually look at it... I remember when I first heard this teaching of turning to look at your difficulties, I thought, "What good is that going to do? Isn't that just going to make it worse?" To my surprise, I found out that actually, no, it didn't make it worse. It educated the mind.

What we tend to do is act out of those habits. We reinforce them by somehow believing that if I act out of this anger, it's going to hurt that person over there, and that's what will satisfy me. If I see them feeling as miserable as I feel, that's what will make me happy. We act on that, but we're not really noticing the suffering that we're experiencing in our own hearts because we're focused outwardly.

So this reorientation—turn around and look at the experience inwardly—it's a radical shift. What happens is the mind begins to see: oh, it's suffering in here when I'm experiencing that. As the mind sees that, and sees that actually this is something happening in the mind—this anger is coming up in our own minds—and the mind sees that this thing coming up in itself is creating this feeling of suffering in itself, it starts to let it go. Because ultimately our minds don't want to suffer. They don't want to be in pain. But we radically misunderstand where that pain comes from. When we turn and actually look at this dukkha itself, the mind begins to understand how to let it go. It begins to understand how it's causing it itself.

This is something you may have to take on trust at first, but if you play with it—in my very first few months of practice, it became really clear that this was true. It did not take long before I realized how true this was: that this turning toward experience, understanding suffering, is the very way, the very path to the letting go of it.

Wise concentration is the last factor of the Eightfold Path, but concentration isn't the aim of the path. The promise of the Eightfold Path is that we will become free of our suffering, free of this mental reactivity, this mental not-liking things to be the way they are. The concentration and the mindfulness together lead us to what I've been describing—how turning toward experience is the pathway through the suffering. The mindfulness and the effort together bring the mind to a place of concentration, of stability, of being able to hang out with these feelings. That's the concentration: that ability to be stable with experience.

And that concentration and mindfulness together begin to show us the truth of those initial teachings from the very beginning of the path, where we started with wise understanding. I said we kind of had to take it as learning and reflection and then begin to engage. As we engage, as we actually connect with the practices, turn and look at our suffering and see that the way to end suffering is through meeting it, we get a verified understanding of these truths, of these Four Noble Truths.

The understanding of suffering is no longer some idea. It's a deep seeing of how suffering is created in our own minds. These practices come together to lead us back, in a kind of cycle, to an understanding of wise understanding and how the intention supports that understanding—at a deeper level. It's a verified understanding. And so we travel the path again in a kind of cycle: wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration lead us to a verified understanding of the wisdom the Buddha offers. It may not be the full verification of it, but it's a glimpse—yes, I understand how that works.

When I first saw how this all works, it was like, "Oh my gosh, this is incredible!" I could actually see how the mind was leading itself down the garden path to suffering. And seeing that, the mind started to just—poof—let it go. This is verification and direct experience of the first and second noble truths, and some of the third: the way the mind can let go of the things that are creating its suffering.

The deepening of wisdom—this path is traveled in a kind of spiral. I think of it as traveling in a spiral. The more that we understand through this engagement with our experience, turning toward our experience, willing to meet our suffering instead of reacting to it, acting on it all the time—the more we do that, the deeper our understanding of the Four Noble Truths goes. The deeper our understanding of suffering goes. The deeper our understanding of how our mind creates that suffering goes. The more we actually see that suffering let go, and the more we see the benefit of cultivating this path.

So we travel it in a kind of spiral, deepening with each turn.

CHAPTER 76

Wise and Balanced Effort

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of energy (viriya) and effort in Buddhist practice, beginning with the Buddha's teaching that "nothing is worth clinging to." She explains how clinging—our habitual attempt to arrange the world according to our preferences—both arises from and perpetuates dukkha (dissatisfaction), and how the practice of letting go offers a path to deeper happiness.
> Fella presents the four kinds of right effort (sammā vāyāma): avoiding unwholesome states before they arise, abandoning unwholesome states that have arisen, cultivating wholesome states not yet present, and maintaining wholesome states that have emerged. She offers practical strategies for each, including "guarding the sense doors," redirecting attention when patterns are overwhelming, and the transformative power of simply bringing mindfulness to difficult states. Notably, she describes how mindfulness functions like putting a car into neutral—not forcing patterns to stop, but withdrawing the fuel that sustains them.
> The talk emphasizes the art of balancing effort, using the Buddha's analogy of tuning a stringed instrument. Fella shares Joseph Goldstein's "secret teaching" of attending to just half a breath at a time, and offers her own scooter analogy for understanding how the frequency of mindful reminders should match our current energy level. She encourages practitioners to discover how little effort is actually needed in any single moment, while maintaining patience with the natural rhythms of energy throughout practice.

At one point, someone asked the Buddha to describe his teaching in brief. And he said, "Nothing is worth clinging to."

So what does this mean? Why would that be a succinct summary of the Buddha's teachings?

When we think about what clinging is—holding on to something, trying to stop something—when we think about clinging in our experience, it usually means that there's something we want to try to keep the way it is. It's like, "This is good this way. I think I'll keep it like this." Or we're clinging to some view or vision or idea of how we'd like it to be, and so we're trying to arrange our world to fit that vision. Essentially, we are working against the natural flow of reality by clinging.

In a way, I think of clinging as both born out of a sense of dissatisfaction and resulting in dissatisfaction. We don't like things the way they are, so we want to arrange things to suit us. Or we want to hold on to something—"This, I'll take more of this, please." And that very holding on is acting against the natural tendency for things to fall away and fall apart in their ever-unceasing flow of change. So clinging is both born out of dissatisfaction with things as they are, and it results in dissatisfaction. Maybe not initially, maybe not obviously to us initially, but it does.

In fact, I think part of the reason why clinging is so tenacious for us—why we do this over and over again, why we have these habits and patterns of "I'm going to fix this, I'm going to get this, I'm going to have this, and then everything's going to be okay," and when it starts to fall apart, "Well, then I'll get this next thing and then I'll be okay again"—part of the reason we have this pattern is because when we do manage to control, to fix, to manipulate, to arrange things to be, even for just a moment, the way we'd like them to be, there is some sense of "Ah, I've figured it out." Even if just for a moment, I figured it out. So there's a little bit of what feels like satisfaction that comes when things come into an arrangement we particularly feel satisfied with.

But this kind of satisfaction is inherently not very long-lasting, not ultimately terribly satisfying, because however we've arranged things, however we've held on to things or fixed things, it will fall apart. And so we're in this cycle, and we think that we'll get satisfaction by getting what we want, getting rid of what we don't want, manipulating the world to be the way we'd like it to be. And then we know that will fall apart, and so then we try again. We think that happiness is to be able to arrange the world successively so that we get more and more moments of things we like and less and less moments of things we don't like. We think that's happiness. We think that's basically as good as it gets for us.

I think that's part of why this clinging, this pattern, is so pervasive for us—because we don't have the vision to see what an alternative would be. What would be another way to happiness?

The Buddha has a proposal for us: that it's actually the letting go of clinging that will lead to a deeper kind of happiness. A coming into alignment with the way things are. A coming into alignment with the fact that things change, that there is this inherent quality of unsatisfactoriness to all experience. There's no experience we can have that will ultimately satisfy us forever. There's that kind of inherent unsatisfactoriness to experience. So the Buddha suggests coming into alignment with these truths, letting go of the clinging. This is a deeper kind of happiness that is possible for us, but it takes a really fundamental shift of our worldview to understand what this really means.

The term "let go" does appeal to us at times. There can be a nice sense thinking about it—"Oh, let go. Yes, I'll let go." But sometimes it's not so easy to let go of habits and patterns that have built up. We've practiced these patterns of getting what we want, getting rid of what we don't want, for our whole lives, starting from the moment we're born. But they're not ingrained. They're not hardwired. It is possible to change these patterns. It's not easy, and it does take this fundamental shift of worldview. And it takes energy, effort, and courage to make this shift.

So this is what I'd like to talk about this evening: energy and effort. How we engage with this practice. These two qualities are very intimately connected, very closely related, but they are slightly different, and I hope to be able to clarify the distinction between energy and effort.

the Buddhist texts, the Pali term is viriya, usually translated as energy, sometimes as zeal—this kind of movement to engage. This is what this energy is.

In its barest form, it's understood to be a neutral quality. It's the same quality that underlies engagement with cultivating wholesome qualities like concentration or self-discipline or kindness, as it is a quality that would be associated with engaging in acts of aggression or violence. There's just this energetic movement of expression that comes when we act and engage. So from one side of things, this viriya, this quality of energy, is simply a neutral quality.

But in terms of our practice, there are specific associations with energy that help us direct that energy in a skillful direction. In one of the Buddha's many lists, the quality of energy is found in a particular place—between wisdom and patience. I think this is interesting, because it actually points to an important teaching: in this particular list, each quality preceding the next supports the development of the next quality. So in this case, wisdom supports the development of energy.

What is wisdom? If wisdom is the ground out of which this energy that will support our practice grows, what is this wisdom? There are several different ways wisdom is described in the Buddhist texts, the suttas, the words of the Buddha. I'll talk about just a couple of ways this evening to point to some particular aspects I want to clarify around energy and effort.

One of the ways wisdom is defined is as understanding what is helpful, skillful, wholesome with respect to moving towards happiness and away from suffering—understanding what's skillful in terms of letting go of suffering, and understanding what is unskillful. Being very clear about what helps us and what doesn't help us.

The term suffering is quite broad. There are quite a few of you who haven't sat many retreats, so I want to take a moment to describe this term usually translated as suffering—the term dukkha. It's often simply translated as suffering, and that's how we speak about it. But when we use that term in English, it's a little intense. We don't necessarily think, "Oh, I'm suffering," when we're a little bit frustrated. The food that was offered tonight may not have suited your digestion. It may not feel so much like suffering—maybe just a little bit of frustration. We don't normally think, "Oh, I'm suffering because I'm frustrated they didn't have rice, they had something else." We don't think of that as suffering. But it is this quality of dukkha.

Dukkha has a very broad range of meanings. It can mean just a subtle sense of dissatisfaction, a subtle sense that things aren't quite right. The roots of that word tell us something important: the first part, du, means something like "bad," and kha refers to the center of a wheel—the space in the middle where the axle would go through. So basically, if you have a bad empty space in the middle of a wheel, what is your ride going to be like? Maybe the hole for the axle is too small, so there's a lot of friction. Or maybe it's a little off-center, so there's a wobbly feeling. Or maybe it's too loose, so the wheel falls off altogether and you crash and burn. This term dukkha covers the entire range—from just feeling slightly off to major suffering.

This is the problem the Buddha was trying to solve: Is it possible to be free of this feeling that things are just off all the time? It's more pervasive than we really recognize, this feeling that if only we had a little more of that, if only we could get rid of a little more of this. Again, our pattern of manipulating our environment masks this sense of dissatisfaction.

The skillful and unskillful—this aspect of wisdom—are intimately connected with what supports us in finding a way out of this dissatisfaction, this off feeling, this suffering.

Another main definition of wisdom in the Buddhist texts is the Four Noble Truths. Understanding the Four Noble Truths isn't simply believing in didactic statements meant to be put out there and accepted. The Buddha suggested these Four Noble Truths—the truth of suffering, the truth of the cause of suffering, the truth of the end of suffering, and the truth of the path leading to the end of suffering—as things we need to engage with. This is where energy comes in. He didn't put these out there saying, "Just believe these." He said, "Engage with these." He associated an action with each of these truths.

He said, we need to understand suffering. We need to let go of the cause of suffering. We need to realize for ourselves the ending of suffering, and we need to cultivate the path leading to the ending of suffering.

So this is how wisdom and energy are intimately connected. This wisdom of the Buddha is not just a wisdom meant to be believed—it's meant to be engaged with. The energy in our practice is energy directed towards a specific purpose. The spiritual faculty of energy has the purpose of awakening.

There's another definition of energy. Courage is sometimes used as another translation for this term, viriya. I looked up the definition of courage, the English definition. I normally think of courage as bravery or something like that, but the definition I found really describes what we do here: the inner strength of heart to persevere in the face of difficulty. That is a lot of what we do here.

Energy and effort are very connected. We need energy, in a sense, to make effort. This is our normal way of thinking about energy. If I have energy, I can do things. If I have energy, I can go for a run. Once I go for a run, then I need to rest, allow my energy to come back. So we think of consuming energy when we make effort. That's our normal model about energy and effort—we have energy and then we can make effort; making effort uses up the energy and then we need to do something to replenish it. Take a rest. Have some food. Something like that.

We carry this model into our practice of how energy and effort are related. We feel like to make effort in the practice, we use up energy, and when our energy is used up, we can't practice anymore. That is one way it is true—energy is needed to make effort. But there's also another teaching around this, which turns the whole thing on its head: making effort produces energy. When we make effort wisely, it produces a balanced kind of energy. A balanced effort will produce a balanced energy.

This turns things on its head. Is there a way that we can envision making effort such that energy isn't consumed but actually produced? One of the ways I understand how this works is that clinging—this process of holding on, manipulating, trying to arrange our world to be just the way we want it to be—takes a lot of energy. When in this practice we turn to attend to the clinging and the clinging begins to let go, energy gets freed up. I think this is one way that skillful, balanced effort produces energy.

I'd like to talk about effort, this wise effort, this balanced effort, from the perspective first of wise effort. There's a whole teaching that the Buddha offers about making effort in the practice, and this teaching about right effort, wise effort, takes as its foundation the same understanding of what's skillful and unskillful, what's wholesome and unwholesome.

The simplest way of describing wholesome mind states is that they are those states based in non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. Or to put it more positively: kindness, generosity, and wisdom. States based in kindness, generosity, and wisdom will tend to lead us towards happiness and away from suffering. Unwholesome, unskillful states are those based in greed, in aversion, in delusion—states like irritation, frustration, restlessness, boredom, laziness, smugness, wanting, pride. All of these states of mind lead us to this dukkha, this off feeling.

Right effort is said to be four kinds of effort that the Buddha put forth. He said there's the effort we need to make to avoid unwholesome states that have not yet come up in our minds—to avoid unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. Then there's the effort to abandon or let go of unwholesome states that have come up in our minds—to abandon unwholesome states that have arisen. On the other side, there's the effort to cultivate wholesome states that have not yet come up, and the effort to maintain wholesome states that have arisen.

You see that the whole understanding around wise effort requires that we understand what wholesome and unwholesome states of mind are.

This can sound somewhat obscure—the effort to avoid unwholesome states that have not arisen, the effort to abandon unwholesome states that have arisen. So I'm going to go through each of these so that we can get a sense of what it means to practice with each of these right efforts.

The first one is the effort to avoid unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. What does that mean? How do we avoid an unwholesome state that's not here yet? Basically, this is about looking at causes and conditions that land us in suffering, learning from our experience. We see over the course of looking at our experience that in certain conditions, certain situations, we end up struggling, we end up suffering a lot. So the practice around this kind of right effort is to notice those conditions and learn how to navigate around them—to avoid the conditions that lead us into suffering.

We have to be careful with this teaching because even just the term "avoiding" can have a flavor of aversion to us. We can think of it as meaning to push something away, to get averse and push something away so that we don't have to experience some kind of suffering. That is not what's being talked about here.

This term for avoiding can have some subtle meanings to it, though it can also be quite obvious. There's that teaching, a kind of autobiography in five chapters. Some of you may have heard this.

Chapter one: I walk down a street. There's a big hole in the street. I don't see it. I fall in. It takes me a long time to get out.

Chapter two: I walk down the street. There's a big hole in the street. I see it, and I fall in. It takes me a long time to get out.

Chapter three: I walk down the street. There's a big hole in the street. I see it. I think about avoiding it, but I fall in. I get out quickly.

Chapter four: I walk down the street. There's a big hole in the street. I walk around the hole.

Chapter five: I walk down another street.

This is learning from experience. We can learn to avoid the situations that land us in trouble. Sometimes it's that obvious. Other times there's a little bit more subtlety to it.

For instance, some of you may have noticed that when you're in line for lunch or dinner, there may be some comparing mind going on about what other people are doing—how much food they're taking, what they're putting on their plate, how they're putting it on their plate. At first glance, we might not even notice. We might not even see that this is suffering. It's like walking down the street and just falling in the hole. We just end up lost in comparing, and at some point, twenty minutes later, it's like, "Oh yeah, mindfulness—what's that?"

Other times we actually do begin to see this comparing mind and we sense, "This is not so helpful." As we begin to see that these kinds of states of mind are not so helpful, we might want to find ways to avoid the situations that create them.

At first glance we might think, "Okay, if standing in line watching people take food is causing this judgment, maybe what I do is wait. I sit in the hall for another fifteen minutes until there's nobody in the line, and then I miss out on the judgment." That's one way of working with it. But you might want to check in as to whether that particular way of exploring this has a little bit of aversion to the comparing mind itself.

Another way to explore this might be to really be mindful of what's happening for you in the line—noticing where this comparing comes out of. You see somebody taking a big scoop of something. What happens there?

Maybe it immediately goes to "they shouldn't do that," but see if you can see what's happening there. It might be something like a little bit of fear—there's not going to be enough for me. A little bit of fear that leads to some thinking, that leads to this judgment.

So if we can begin to see that it's not just the condition of standing in the line that's creating the suffering, it's kind of a more moment-to-moment process happening in our minds out of which this judgment is coming—then we can begin to use some tools of mindfulness to help ourselves not go down that path.

One way to explore this is something called guarding the sense doors. It's not putting blinders on, but using mindfulness to really recognize what's happening in this moment. Seeing is happening. Seeing is happening in this moment. Actually, this is one tool that Joseph Goldstein offers a lot on his retreats. He says when you go into the dining hall, if you see there's a lot of judgment happening, just as soon as you get in there, start to notice: seeing is happening, seeing is happening. That's a kind of way of guarding that sense door from ending up hooking into this chain of thinking that ends up proliferating into a pattern that leads to suffering.

I tried this for myself. I was finding myself judging in the dining room, and I went in and just started noting seeing—using that "seeing is happening, seeing is happening." And it was amazing. It stopped there. It didn't leap into subsequent unwholesome states of mind.

The second kind of right effort is the effort to abandon, to let go of unwholesome states that have arisen. This means when we find ourselves caught in some kind of struggle, dissatisfaction, frustration, some sense of offness—this dukkha—we make the effort to let go of it.

Now, this effort of letting go might have an active feeling to it. It might have a sense of, "Oh yes, I see this isn't so helpful to be engaging in this pattern. Maybe I can let go of it." We can kind of put it down a little bit.

The Buddha offers some tools for this active letting go. One thing he suggests is when we see ourselves caught in a pattern of unwholesome thought or mind state—if we find ourselves caught in anger or judging or comparing about a particular person—then see if we can replace the thoughts. Just actively use different thoughts in the mind. He actually suggests for fear and anger that replacing those thoughts with thoughts of metta will be helpful. This is one way that we can practice letting go of unwholesome states.

Now, this can't be done with an idea or an attitude of aversion towards the unwholesome states. It really has to be very neutral: "Okay, that's not so helpful. Let me try this. Can I let go of engaging in that thought pattern and try something else?"

Another way to work with actively letting go is to redirect the attention. I call this the "not now" practice. If you're finding yourself caught in some pattern that has an overwhelming quality—this happens to us a lot in meditation—you know, we find patterns and habits are so strong that sometimes they have much more momentum and strength than our mindfulness. When we try to bring mindfulness to some of these very powerful patterns, whether it's fear or anger or depression or loneliness, sometimes when the pattern is so strong, it can swamp the mindfulness. It's like the mindfulness just gets sucked into this black hole. "Where was I?" We just get completely lost.

So if you know that about a particular pattern, it can be really helpful to recognize that pattern coming up and think, "Okay, here's anger. Maybe I shouldn't even try to be mindful of this. I should turn my attention to something else in my experience."

I did this for quite a while around one particular pattern of anger. Just noticing when this person—it was one person I was angry at, and this particular anger just had a real hook to it. Every time this person came up in my mind, the anger started and just took off. So I began recognizing the moments when I was just starting to get angry and thinking, "Okay, not a good idea to put any kind of attention or energy in this at all. Don't try to be mindful of it. Just put my attention someplace else—into my feet." I tended to be walking when this would come up, so just feet on the ground, noticing the sensation, the contact. Kind of a "not now" to that anger. Not an aversive pushing away, but just recognizing it's not helpful to try to turn toward it right now.

I see you. I see that you've got an energy, a strong energy, and wanting to be seen. So for me, there was a kind of need to acknowledge that strong pattern, that strong habit with some kindness, and then redirecting the attention. This is another way of letting go of unwholesome states.

But often what's happening in our practice is that something's coming up, we can see it with mindfulness, it's not that it's dragging us down, but it just doesn't really feel like much is happening. I remember at one retreat, this deep pattern of clinging was so clear to me. It was like I knew I was holding on. I even kind of had a sense of what I was holding on to. But I had no clue how to let go. I could see that—I'd let go if I could. It just wasn't possible.

In that time, it wasn't as if that feeling of suffering, that feeling of holding, that feeling of clinging was drowning my mindfulness. It just really wasn't pleasant. It was a really unpleasant place to be. I really wanted to let go, but I couldn't let go.

So in that case, a lot of what our practice is, is just bringing mindfulness to the experience. One of the ways I think of mindfulness working, particularly in this kind of sense—this is the "let it be" approach with mindfulness—is that as these difficult patterns and habits are playing themselves out, sometimes what mindfulness does, or the way mindfulness works, is kind of like this: we're driving a car a hundred miles an hour down the freeway. That's the momentum of whatever that pattern is—the anger, the frustration, the loneliness, the depression. It's the mind in that pattern, traveling really fast.

Often the way mindfulness functions is not by slamming on the brakes on this pattern, but by putting the car into neutral. You're going a hundred miles an hour down the freeway, you put the car into neutral, and the car doesn't come to a stop immediately, but it will come to a stop because you're no longer feeding it. You're no longer giving it gas.

It's very similar with the mindfulness practice. With this kind of balanced, kind attention, it's like disengaging the gears. It's taking the fuel out of the pattern so that it can come to a stop in its own time. And what seems to happen, at least in my experience, is that we disengage for a while, and then we see it and engage again. We're winding it up again. Oh—remember—and we disengage, and then engage, and disengage. This is our practice. This is a lot of our practice: to notice when we're engaged and when we're disengaged. And when we're disengaged, it does tend to shift. We begin to sense a shift in our practice when there's that disengagement. We get the feeling—there's a kind of insight shift, in a way—that when I'm paying attention in this way, it's not increasing the suffering. In fact, it is allowing that pattern to wind down. And we begin to appreciate that this is the kind of direction that leads us away from suffering, even though it's not immediate.

The third kind of right effort is the effort to arouse wholesome mind states that have not yet arisen. This is basically cultivating the wholesome, actively working at cultivating wholesome qualities. Now, a lot of our practice seems to be in this territory of letting go of difficulty. But as that's happening, as we're working to let go of difficulty, we are also cultivating a lot of beautiful qualities—mindfulness being one of them. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita, said mindfulness is the most wholesome mind state. So engaging with paying attention to anger or frustration or depression or loneliness or whatever your pattern is, with mindfulness, strengthens that capacity of mindfulness. It strengthens the capacity for interest and investigation. It strengthens the capacity for concentration. As we are engaging, we are arousing and cultivating these wholesome states that have not yet arisen.

The other piece of cultivating wholesome states that have not yet arisen has to do with what we talked about on the first evening: working with the precepts. Essentially, we can cultivate, we help to cultivate wholesome states by avoiding unwholesome actions, situations that oppose those qualities of mind. Refraining from lying cultivates honesty and truthfulness. Refraining from stealing cultivates contentment. Refraining from killing cultivates compassion.

So these wholesome qualities go hand in hand—these two aspects come together. We can also cultivate these positive qualities through positive practices. The quality of metta, for instance: each evening at the nine o'clock sitting, we are practicing active cultivation of that quality of the open heart, the kind heart. We can also cultivate generosity through simple acts of kindness, simple acts of giving. So we can find our way to practice, find practices and ways to cultivate these wholesome qualities.

The fourth kind of right effort is the effort to sustain wholesome states that have arisen. This one was confusing to me at first. I thought, why would you need to try to do that? Wouldn't it just happen naturally? If there's something beautiful happening, wouldn't it be natural for it to sustain itself?

Well, when I started looking at my own mind, I found that actually, no. In my mind, at least, I would notice particular beautiful states of mind coming up—calm, for example. I was on a three-month course, and finally the mind really settled down. I'd been working with a lot of difficulty and pain in the body, and one sitting, the mind just calmed down. I noticed it: calm, it's calm. The very next thing the mind wanted to do was, "Oh, this is a really good time to pay attention to that pain in my back." I wanted to do something with the calm, not just notice it. And what did I choose to do? I chose to do something that would agitate the mind.

Another time I was really noticing a lot of joy come up, and the joy was very strong, almost overwhelming. There was a little bit of me that felt, "I can't handle this—it's way too much joy." There was a feeling of pushing it down or trying to suppress it. But some little wisdom thought went through and said, "It's okay, it will pass." With that, I kind of let go, and it got really intense—almost like a big geyser of joy. Then very quickly, it settled into a much more calm kind of happiness.

Just noticing these states, being willing to turn mindfulness to them—that has been my experience as one of the best ways to sustain these wholesome states that have come up. Turn to them with mindfulness.

So these four kinds of right effort may seem like four different things. But we can also look at them as four sides of a single process. Consider what happens, what's being cultivated, what's being let go of, as we turn with mindfulness to a difficult mind state like anger. As we turn with mindfulness to that anger, it supports the letting go of that anger. Turning to pay attention to that anger, we're letting go a little bit around that engagement I talked about. So it's releasing that unwholesome state that has already arisen.

Also, bringing mindfulness to that state avoids an escalation of that anger. I've seen this in my own mind: if I don't bring mindfulness to anger, it quickly gets worse and worse. When I bring mindfulness to it, it keeps it at a certain level. Bringing that mindfulness to it avoids the arising of more intense forms of that anger—that first kind of wise effort.

So bringing our mindfulness to experience automatically brings along these first two kinds of wise effort. And then it's also bringing along the cultivation of wholesome states. We're cultivating concentration. We're cultivating mindfulness. We're cultivating interest in exploring what's happening. We're cultivating and maintaining those states.

Really, with mindfulness, when we're working with mindfulness, we can trust these processes of the right efforts to be unfolding. But it helps to recognize when these wholesome states are being cultivated and when these unwholesome states are being released. It's a simple thing to actually acknowledge that. And it's very powerful—particularly acknowledging the wholesome, acknowledging the beautiful states that are coming along as we practice.

Another aspect of this teaching on energy and effort that the Buddha offers is around balancing the energy, balancing the effort. There's a fine line in our meditation practice—energy that lands between being too relaxed and too tense.

We're navigating this very narrow place. Energy that's too relaxed can tend to land us into dullness, sleepiness. Energy that's too tight can land us into restlessness, agitation.

The Buddha offered an analogy for this. He said it's kind of like tuning a stringed instrument. When the string on the instrument is too loose, it's not going to make beautiful music—it's going to go kind of thud. When it's too tight, when you pluck the string, it may break. So the tension on that string needs to be just right.

He points to this tuning of energy as being akin to an art form, because he's comparing it to the art of playing a musical instrument. And so really, this tuning of our energy is the art of meditation. The level of our energy changes continually—how much energy we have, how much energy is available. There's this continual flow of changing situations, and so we need to keep track of it, tuning our effort to the level of energy. We can balance our energy by making effort in a wise way, because balanced effort results in balanced energy. The way that we engage makes a big difference.

So this really is the art of meditation. There's an exploration that we make around how much effort to put into being mindful. And actually, in a moment, in a split second, it's not very hard to be mindful. Will was saying this last night—pay attention to your sensation of your butt on the chair or cushion or bench. Notice the sensations of your hands. Notice the sensations of your lips touching. How hard is it? In a moment, usually it's not very hard. What is challenging for us is to sustain it over time.

This, I think, is where our energy often gets out of balance. When we think, "Oh, I need to be mindful for the entire sitting," it's kind of like in that moment when we sit down, we're picking up the whole forty-five minutes in this first moment and thinking, "I need to bring in the energy, the effort to be mindful for this entire forty-five minutes right in this split second." And that is overwhelming. We can't do it that way.

But what we can do is be mindful just in this moment, and in this moment, and in this moment, over and over and over again. Just the light effort that it took for you to notice each of those areas I pointed out—that's the level of effort that needs to be made. It just needs to be made moment after moment after moment, without projecting into the future thinking, "Oh, it's so many moments, I'm never going to be able to do it." Just the next moment and the next moment.

There are a couple of tricks we can use to help us with this. Joseph Goldstein points to what he calls the secret teaching of breath meditation, which is that the only amount of effort you need to make to pay attention to your breath is just enough effort to pay attention to half a breath. Can you pay attention to the in-breath? It takes about a second, second and a half. Usually we can sustain the attention for that long. And then at the end of that in-breath, you do it again for the out-breath. Make the amount of effort you need to sustain the attention for the out-breath. It's kind of like pulling yourself along half breath at a time. And the mind will wander, and we recognize that, we relax, we come back, and we just do it again. Just this gentle reminding, over and over again.

We can do the same thing in walking meditation. I found at times when my mind is really scattered in walking, it's helpful to pick something on the path, like three feet out—that little change in the grain of wood, or that little spot on the carpet, or that leaf on the pavement. Pick that spot and then ask, "Can I be mindful until I get to that leaf?" Two steps. I made it. And then pick another spot, and another one. In this way, we can pull ourselves along and begin to sustain this quality of light touch to the effort.

Really, this art of effort has to do with learning how to make the appropriate amount of effort for the situation. And it's often much less than we think.

particularly when I feel like I'm struggling, trying so hard to be present, I ask myself, how little effort do I need to make right now in order to be mindful? It's actually quite a bit less than I've been making. Many times I find that I can let go of a lot of the effort, that just for this moment, it doesn't take that much.

When the mind is dull and sleepy and drifting a lot, it's not that we need to force ourselves to be more mindful in a moment. It's that we need to remind ourselves more frequently to have that light touch of mindfulness.

There's an analogy I'd like to offer. It's riding a scooter—you know, those scooters that kids have, those narrow ones with two wheels, a little flatbed. You put one foot on the flatbed and tap your other foot on the ground to get the momentum going. When you're at a standstill, you have to tap the ground pretty frequently to get going. But after a little while, the momentum builds and you don't have to tap so frequently anymore. You can ride for a while. And then you start to notice, you get familiar with what it feels like as the scooter starts to wobble, and you know you need to put your foot down and tap again.

This is kind of the way effort works in our practice. Initially, and at various times of the day when the energy is low, we need to remind ourselves frequently—just a gentle reminder more often, like that tapping to get us going. Then we begin to get a sense of what it feels like for the momentum of mindfulness to have some energy, some flow. When we sense that mindfulness has some momentum, we can back off the level of effort and just ride that wave of mindfulness until we start to get familiar with the wobbly feeling and recognize: okay, I need to remind myself again, just this moment, just this moment.

This is one way to tune the effort—looking at this frequency. It takes patience, a lot of patience. We need to learn to attune ourselves to the level of energy that's present, get familiar with what that feels like, and be patient with ourselves when the energy is low. Just making the best effort you can given the circumstances.

That was a relief for me at one point. I went into my teacher and said, "I'm so exhausted. How do I practice when I'm so exhausted like this?" And he said, "Just make the best effort that you can given the circumstances." Oh, okay. I can do that. Just try the best I can.

There are always going to be rhythms and change, cycles of our energy level. When our energy is strong, we don't have to work so hard—we can just notice what's going on. When the energy is low, we just make the best effort we can. It's not that forceful kind of effort. It's just: okay, mindful for this moment. Can I be mindful in this moment? And this moment? That really light touch, as much as you remember. And then you'll forget and you'll wake up again. Just making the effort moment to moment. Conditions will change, and if you're making this balanced kind of effort, then balanced energy will be the result.

One important piece I have to say here is that when we're making effort and directing our energy, we often have something in mind that we want to do with it. I want insight. I want freedom. I want to let go of this clinging. And the way it works in this practice is that we do need to head in a direction, but we can't demand particular results at particular times. That will just lead us into suffering—that expectation, that bargain we make with our practice: if I work this hard for this sitting, then I'll get this, and then I'll be satisfied. That's a recipe for suffering.

So we have to head ourselves in a direction without having an agenda about when or how the results come. This balanced effort creates a container, a skillful container from which insights can unfold. It's kind of like a fruit tree—we can't make the fruit ripen.

But we can support the conditions that will allow the tree's natural process to result in ripe fruit. We can support the conditions of the tree having water, having nourishment. We can take care of the weeds, making sure that there are good conditions for the tree to flourish in. And then we just have to settle back and allow the natural process of the tree to produce the ripe fruit. When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree. We cannot make that happen, but we can create the conditions. And this balanced effort is a key part of the conditions—creating the ground out of which insight will come.

I'll close with a quote from a Sri Lankan monk who is both a scholar and a practitioner. His name is Piyadasi Thera. He wrote:

"We must, by our own resolute efforts, rise and make our way to the portals of liberty, and it is always in every moment in our power to do so. Neither are those portals locked and the key in the possession of someone else from whom it must be obtained by prayer or entreaty. That door is free of all bolts and bars, save those that we ourselves have made."

CHAPTER 77

Opening Talk

Andrea Fella · 1h16

> In this opening talk from a small intimate retreat, Andrea Fella and Greg Scharf welcome practitioners to the desert setting and establish the foundational elements of retreat practice. Andrea speaks eloquently about the multiple containers that support meditation practice: the physical environment of the expansive desert landscape, the noble silence, the simplicity of the schedule, and the sangha support of practicing together. She introduces the central theme of examining our relationship to wanting and happiness, exploring how our deeply conditioned belief that happiness comes from getting what we want actually perpetuates suffering through the feeling of lack and insufficiency.
> The talk distinguishes between taṇhā (craving with stickiness to outcomes) and chanda (neutral desire that can be wholesome when paired with kindness and compassion). Andrea emphasizes that mindfulness practice allows us to observe how our minds respond to the world, revealing habitual patterns of reactivity and fundamental misunderstandings about where true happiness lies.
> Greg Scharf then offers a comprehensive explanation of the Triple Gem and the taking of refuges and precepts. He explores Buddha as wakefulness and our own potential for awakening, Dhamma as both the teachings and the truth of each moment, and Saṅgha as community and shared aspiration. He explains the five precepts (pañca sīla) as training rules rather than commandments, emphasizing their role in creating non-remorse, which naturally leads to gladness, joy, serenity, and deeper understanding. The evening concludes with the formal chanting of refuges and precepts in Pāli and English, marking the official beginning of the retreat container.

Welcome to our retreat here at this beautiful space. It's such a lovely space. We're actually really fortunate to have such an intimate setting with the twelve of you here. One of the early retreats I sat was about this size, and it remains one of my fond memories—having the container of the retreat be so intimate. So it's really lovely to have you all here with us.

I'm Andrea Fella. I've been teaching for a number of years now and teach at the Insight Meditation Society in Massachusetts, at Spirit Rock in California, and at various places around the country like this one who invite me to come. My dear friend and colleague Greg and I pretty much met when we were helping create a retreat together in Burma. We've got a lot of history together and time spent together, both teaching retreats and managing retreats. Greg also teaches at the Insight Meditation Society and in Burma. He's an international meditation teacher now, teaching all over the world. So we're very happy to be here with you for this retreat.

I'd like to say a few words about the schedule. There are a few of you here who have never been on a meditation retreat before. The schedules are posted around various places on the bulletin board. It's a regular schedule. We have a system of bells, and for those of you who aren't familiar with our retreats and the bell system, it's pretty simple. If you hear a bell in here when we ring it at the end of the sitting, it means it's time to go walking. If you hear a bell out there, it means it's time to come back in here. Around the meal times, you'll probably know it's around the meal times—your body will tell you. So it's pretty simple, and you can actually see if you can renounce your watch, renounce looking at your watch, and just settle into the container and the support that's provided here to structure our time together.

We're pretty much sitting and walking, practicing sitting and walking meditation all day, punctuated by our meals. There are three particular events each day. At the 8:30 sitting in the morning, we'll have instructions and some time for questions after that. At the 3 o'clock sitting in the afternoon, we'll have a metta practice, which is a guided loving-kindness, heart-opening practice. Then in the evening at 7:40 we'll have a talk. That's the structure of the day.

During the week, we will offer practice discussions, meetings with you individually. We'll both have opportunities for regularly scheduled meetings with you as well as a few spaces for sign-up interviews if you'd like some extra time to speak with us. We'll start those on Sunday. Tomorrow will just be a day to settle into the rhythm of the place and the schedule, and then we'll talk more about the individual practice discussions on Sunday.

I wanted to say a few words about basically what we're doing here. I'd like to start by recalling how I felt as I came up here today. I was on the Twin Hearts shuttle driving up through the gorge. It's beautiful in the gorge—the landscape is beautiful, and it's just so lovely. The raw beauty of the desert touches me so much. There's something about the desert that very deeply resonates with me. And then coming out of the gorge onto the plateau, it's just such an opening. Moving into that space, the vastness of the desert becomes so apparent. The vastness of the sky, the expansiveness of the sky. I felt like my heart just expanded with the land.

So there's this container of the environment, the desert that we're in, the raw beauty of the land, the expansiveness of the view, the space. We can look out quite a long way, especially if you walk a little bit up the hill. And then there's the sky and the purity of the air. It's just amazing. This kind of container that we're held in can support us. The beauty of the place, the expansiveness, the spaciousness can support us. If we feel like we get contracted in our minds or struggle and feel tight and held in our mind, we can go out into the space and just recognize that there's more to life and the world than our own internal struggles.

And then there's the container of the retreat itself—the silence, the simplicity. We'll be in silence here.

Just hold our days in silence. We'll talk—we'll be talking—but largely, you will be in silence.

Now, when you come into the interviews, the practice discussions, the meetings with us, it's fine to speak. You don't have to write out a description of your experience and hand it to us. If you're in your yogi jobs, it's fine to speak to Surya and to communicate functional speech. So it doesn't have to be a strict kind of silence in that way; we're not clamping down on our mouths for a week. But we are moving into a place of noble silence where we are looking at our minds, with the support of the silence to encourage us to move inward as opposed to outward. Letting go of this talking actually encourages us to move inwards. So the silence is one of the aspects of this container.

The simplicity—the schedule is pretty simple. We sit, then we walk, then we sit, then we walk, then we sit, then we eat, then we sit, then we walk. It goes like that. And so the simplicity here... I mean, our lives are not simple. Our lives are full of busyness. They're full of computers and gadgets and meetings and partners and excitement and the whole show of our lives. And here we have an opportunity to really let go of that, to let go of the busyness of our lives and settle into something really, really simple. Simplicity is a huge support for our practice.

The schedule is also an aspect of the container. It supports a kind of sustaining of this awareness, a sustaining of the attention. We practice. We learn that we can practice more continuously. We learn how to practice more continuously. This also greatly supports our settling.

And then there's the support of each other, the sangha support—another aspect of this container of the retreat. I think you'll find, and those of you who are experienced with retreats know this, that it's so beautiful. The silence is wonderful, and the fact that we're together in silence is really wonderful. The support that we offer each other in the silence is quite profound. We don't have to make eye contact. We don't have to gesture or communicate in any way. I've spent whole retreats where all I've looked at is people's socks and shoes and not looked up and looked at their faces.

While it may seem a bit awkward—for those of you who are new on retreat, it may seem a little awkward not to be making eye contact—it will also support this settling into the container of the retreat. We mention this partly because for some people new on retreat especially, it seems odd that people aren't looking at you, and you feel like this is really strange. I remember on my very first retreat, I felt like I didn't know if I was okay unless I could make eye contact with people. But by the end of that retreat, I really appreciated the fact that you're left alone, that you're with a community but left alone to just meet yourself. There's no need to be anything for anyone. It's a huge gift that we offer each other.

And the practice that we do is a support for each other. There have been times I remember—when I'd look across at somebody who was moving very mindfully. I remember getting up and walking out of the meditation hall one day and seeing somebody move their hands to shift their posture, and it was so clear to me the person was completely present. It just took me into a whole new realm of possibility for being mindful. So just seeing how we practice—and sometimes we can struggle, we feel like we're struggling, and we can see somebody just doing walking meditation, and there can be a sense of, if they can do it, I can do it. We support each other in this way. It's a very beautiful thing.

So allow yourself to be held by these containers: the container of the desert, the spaciousness, the beauty, the silence of the desert; the container of the retreat, the silence, the simplicity, the stillness, the support that we offer each other, and the schedule. Allow yourself to be held by these containers. If we just came here and allowed ourselves to be held by the container of the desert and were in silence and simplicity—that's all we did for the week—I think you'd probably find there was actually quite a bit of settling that happened.

So just the container itself can provide a place where the mind settles down. But we can actually go much further than this. The mind settles through simplicity, but we can also train our minds to settle more deeply—through letting go of our habitual tendency to think about the past and the future, and even about the present moment. We sit here thinking about the present moment as well. We find our mind running in commentary about what's happening right now.

Just letting go of these habits of mind to think. Not that thinking is bad—it's not so much that thinking is bad, but thinking does tend to take us out of the present moment. It is possible to be aware while we are thinking, to be mindful while we are thinking. But it tends to be that our thoughts send us shooting into other worlds and times and places. Whole worlds get created in our minds, and then we lose track of where we actually are. We lose track of our lives actually, of what's actually happening—the direct lived experience of the moment.

And so over and over again we let go of this tendency to think and come back to the lived experience of the moment. Over and over again we come back to this lived experience with a quality of kindness and friendliness to our attention. These two pieces—the coming back, the letting go of thoughts, and this friendliness, this kindness, this sense of open-hearted willingness to meet what's happening—these two pieces really allow a settling of the mind. They support an opening of the heart and a quieting of the mind.

That process then opens us to an even deeper possibility, a more profound opening to begin to learn and understand about our own minds. And this is really where this practice is so powerful. The settling is wonderful, actually. You'll find it can move to places of peacefulness and ease through the settling down of the mind. But this practice of mindfulness, the vipassanā practice that we do, is profound in that it allows us to explore how our minds respond to the world. And we find that our minds actually respond to the world in some not so helpful ways a lot of the time—very reactive. We have habitual ways that we get caught in reactivity.

So we learn through observing—and we'll talk about this during the week—learn through observing how our minds do what they do. And gradually through this observing, this watching, the mind starts to release and let go around these patterns, lets go of these habits. We also begin to understand, as we watch what's happening in our minds, that the usual perspective we have on the world is limited. It really kind of boxes us into a very narrow view. And not only is it limited, but many of the ways we view the world are actually completely mistaken. There's a fundamental misunderstanding that we have around how the world works, how our minds work, how things work.

One of the key ways that we misunderstand is around where happiness is to be found. Our usual notion is that happiness comes from getting what we want. This is one of our main notions. And as we move into more and more letting go of the things that we want, the more we practice, the more we see that a lot of the things we used to want have begun to fall away. But then we start to want particular meditative states. So the pattern actually keeps replicating itself. It's a deep pattern, deeply conditioned—that having what I want is the way towards happiness. Very deeply conditioned.

Another way that we think happiness comes is from being in control of our experience. Whether or not things are pleasant, if I feel like I'm in control, there's a sense of, "Okay, this is good. This is okay when I'm in control."

These are beliefs. "Happiness comes from getting what I want." These beliefs are deeply conditioned by our culture, by our upbringing, and also, I think, encouraged by evolution. Some of the ways evolution has unfolded have actually encouraged this notion: get what I want, that's where happiness lies.

Very deeply, we do know at some level that having a particular thing—while it feels good to have something that we want—we know that that is not the be-all and end-all. But we do seem to believe, deeply believe, that what happiness means is over and over getting the next thing that I want. That constructing a life strung together with getting things I want—that's happiness. And it's so deeply conditioned, so much a part of our lives, that we can't even envision happiness coming in any other way. It's just so profoundly conditioned.

So there is a happiness in getting what we want—I want to acknowledge that. There's a sense of pleasure in the having. There is a kind of happiness that comes from that. And the Buddha acknowledged that. He actually acknowledged that there are many levels and layers of happiness.

He talked about wealth that was righteously gained. Righteous wealth righteously gained is a happiness of a householder, of a person who has to be in the world. Money acquired by wholesome means, by skillful means, by right livelihood, is a happiness because we can then support our families, support the things that we love, support causes that we find important. We can use our resources as a kind of sustaining thing to support what we think is important, what our priorities are. So this is a happiness. The Buddha did talk about this as being a happiness.

But the flaw really comes in the strategy around having what we want, and over and over again having what we want. There are a couple of flaws to this strategy. One is that some measure of the time we don't succeed in getting what we want. And we think, because happiness comes from getting what we want, that somehow when we don't succeed, we're a failure. That something's wrong with us. That it's a problem. Rather than it simply being a natural part of the condition of the world—that sometimes conditions come together so that we get what we want, and sometimes they come together so that we don't. So we take it personally often when we don't get what we want.

There are various levels of this in your life. It may be that you don't get a chocolate bar that you like because somebody else took the last one. That's a small one. But you don't get the job that you really want—there's a little more investment in that, a little bit more suffering around that.

If we do succeed in getting what we want, there can be an anxiety at times, a fear that it will go away. So there's a kind of having to shore that thing up. Oh, I've got what I want. How do I keep it? And so there's a continual process around keeping it. Those are two aspects of this strategy that are mistaken in our minds in a way.

But the really fundamental mistake in this strategy is that while there is a happiness that comes from getting what we want, a lot of that happiness comes not from the fact that we have this thing, but from the fact that the feeling of wanting has gone away. For a few moments we have a release from that feeling of wanting something. That's actually quite significant. When we start to recognize it, it's quite a strong part of the happiness of getting what we want—the happiness of letting go of the wanting.

Wanting itself is not pleasant. We don't actually, until we start to pay attention to this experience, even think to look at the experience of wanting, because we're so focused on the idea of having the thing. We're projecting into the future, thinking about how great it's going to be to get that thing. And that idea, that fantasy, is pleasant. It obscures for us the actual unpleasantness of the state of wanting.

As soon as wanting comes up in our experience, there's a feeling of lack, a feeling of insufficiency. And we mistake this because we're focused on the idea of the having. We don't see this feeling of lack. We don't see that this is a fundamental state that we're actually encouraging by being on this cycle of wanting something and getting it—the wanting and then the getting and the having. By being on that cycle, we actually encourage more of this wanting. It actually encourages us to be in this state of lack, of insufficiency. It's quite amazing that our minds do this.

So when the feeling of wanting goes away, the feeling of lack goes away, the feeling of insufficiency goes away. This is one of the explorations that we make in this practice. We start to see that a lot of our struggle, our unease, our unhappiness comes because we are not satisfied with things as they are. We're always wanting things to be just slightly some other way. Things are just not quite the way we want them to be.

In that state of wanting things to be other than they are, we're kind of out of line, out of alignment with reality, out of alignment with the actuality of experience. So the practice begins to put us in alignment with truth, with alignment with reality.

Now sometimes, often actually, when I talk about wanting like this, people ask about desire. Is all desire bad? What about the desire to take care of my family? That doesn't seem like a bad thing.

In the Buddhist teaching there are two different ideas that are both often translated in similar ways. One is often translated as wanting or craving, and the other is often translated as desire. Wanting or craving is this term—the Pali term is taṇhā. And it has a real stickiness to it. It has a sense of needing to have things be a certain way. So it's often got a sense of stickiness to a particular result.

So that's this craving, this wanting that is not helpful for us. It's kind of like we're setting ourselves up to project into the future and say, "This is the way it has to be in order for me to be happy." And if it doesn't happen that way, what happens? We don't have that scenario come up. We struggle, we suffer, we feel dissatisfied, we feel like we have to fix things, we feel like we're a failure.

Then there's another side—the Pali term is chanda, which is often translated as desire. This is a neutral kind of desire. It can be flavored by whatever else is happening in the mind. So there can be an unwholesome kind of chanda, unwholesome desire that maybe is focused towards pleasure. It's not going to be something deeply wrong, but it's skewed towards pleasure. That's the first of the hindrances: kama chanda, the desire for sense pleasure.

But this chanda, this kind of desire, can also be associated with wholesome, beautiful qualities of mind like kindness and compassion, and letting go. This is actually an exploration we make during the week—to see when we're choosing to act. Are we choosing to act out of kindness and compassion, or are we choosing to act out of greed and aversion? The desire, the wish that comes along with kindness and compassion and letting go—that's a wholesome wish. We want to encourage those explorations.

So there's really a theme here that we're cultivating this week. There's a two-sided thread of awareness and wisdom, understanding, that comes from the practice of mindfulness. And then there's the kindness and compassion. Actually, the practice of mindfulness can be completely interwoven with this kindness and compassion. When we really start to resonate with the practice, we see that it is one of the most compassionate things we can do for ourselves—one of the kindest actions we can take by being present for ourselves.

I'd like to welcome you for my part as well. It's great to be here. It's a beautiful place, this lodge, and it's so quiet here. I just came back a week ago from spending a month in Burma—or Myanmar as it's called these days—which is a place that's dear to my heart.

I've done a lot of time practicing there. I lived there as a monk for a time some years ago. I've gone there almost every winter since 1997 to help with the retreat that Andrea mentioned.

It's not quiet there. A lot of the meditation centers, if this were Burma, there would be music playing and a lot of action going on outside—dogs barking. So we're really lucky. We have great conditions here to have this kind of real quiet.

Before I begin talking about the Refuges and Precepts, which is the next phase of this evening, I just want to acknowledge that it's great to have this small, intimate group. And it's an interesting group because we have people who have never been on a retreat before, who've maybe almost never meditated before. And some people have been practicing for nearly twenty-five years or more. So it's a real range, and that's great.

It made me think of my first retreat. My introduction to meditation practice was a ten-day retreat, and I had not meditated for even a second before I went to it. It was all really new, and it might be kind of how some of you are feeling. I'd never heard any of these words in this Pali language.

I remember hearing the word metta. There were these helpful little notes all around the place that said things like, "Don't bring any food into the meditation hall," signed "Metta." Or "Please be on time for the sitting," signed "Metta." And I thought there was some helpful busybody on the retreat whose name was Metta who couldn't help but leave these nice little notes around.

I survived that ten-day retreat. So if some of you are wondering if you might make it through the week, I think you probably will.

There will be a lot of words in this Pali language—spelled P-A-L-I. It's a variation on Sanskrit, an ancient language that exists because of the teachings of the Buddha. It's not used for anything else these days. The teachings were preserved in that language, and we'll be using some of the words. Try not to assume that you know them all.

And so I did pass out these chanting sheets. This is really the formal entrance into the retreat—taking the refuges and precepts, it's called. It involves doing some chanting in this language. We'll do it call and response, so you can get through it without any trouble. For some of you, this may be something really familiar, and for others, no doubt it's brand new.

This really is the beginning of the retreat. Andrea spoke about containers—the container of this place, the container of the silence here. You could say there's a container of our shared aspiration, whatever it might be that would inspire us to come on a retreat like this. This is not something that everybody does. You could have all gone on vacation, or you could have headed up to the mountains and gone skiing—I think there's a pretty good base up there. But instead, something got you to come and sign up for this retreat. So there's that shared inspiration. You could say it's the inspiration to explore what it is to be human, to undertake this cultivation of kindness, of love, of wisdom for this time. And then there's this container that we create through undertaking the refuges and precepts.

I want to say a little bit about these things. We don't think of the word refuge too much in our daily lives. Maybe some of us do, but we don't talk about needing a place of refuge that often. We might ask ourselves or look in our lives and think about what that word means. It's a place of safety. You could say a safe harbor. Sometimes it's said that refuge is likened to a safe place where we could rest our hearts, a safe place to put our hearts.

We might ask ourselves: What would be a place of safety, a place of real refuge in the world? In an uncertain, changing, unpredictable world, what's safe? What would be a true refuge? What do we turn to for refuge? It's really important to think about this and to make it real for each of us, for ourselves.

I'm not going to offer something that is then a system of belief to put on, a mantle of belief to adopt. That's not what this practice, what the teachings are about. There's this word, ehipassiko. It's one of the descriptions of the Buddha's teachings, of the Dharma. The word translates as "come and see for yourself." It's a really important aspect of what we offer here—this invitation. Try it on, put it into practice in a sincere way, and see: Does this lead to things that are helpful and useful? Does it lead to good things, to freedom, to peace, to ease in our lives? Or not? There's that invitation.

When we think about refuge, I was thinking tonight when I came into the hall and bowed to this statue here. You'll see me do that—when I come to the hall, I'm going to bow. And what would that be about? You might start asking, "What's up with that?" And you might be worried that you're going to be expected to start bowing to this statue back here. Don't worry about it—you're not expected to do that.

You'll see us put our hands in this posture called anjali, in this prayer posture at the heart. It's said to represent the bud of a lotus flower. It's a gesture of respect. You may see us gesture at the Buddha statue with that hand posture. And some of you might be concerned that by doing this chanting, you're becoming a Buddhist. I'd just like to let you know that neither one of us has any agenda about turning anyone here into a Buddhist if you don't want to be one. It's not about that. That's not something that's important. The Buddha wasn't a Buddhist—it's good to remember that. He was a human who lived and had a certain experience and then taught about it in the best way he was able to.

It's interesting to think that for hundreds of years after the Buddha's life and death, there weren't these statues. These came about when the Greeks came into northwest India and said, "You have no statues of your gods"—and they were used to having a lot of statues. So the early Buddha images were modeled after the god Apollo.

They look very Greek. And prior to that, there was either an empty seat or sometimes a pair of footprints. The Buddha called himself the Tathagata—the one thus gone. It wasn't about an image of a being. That wasn't important, and it came along much later.

So when I bow to this statue, what's that about? There's nothing holy or intrinsically wonderful about this casting in terracotta back here. We may find it beautiful, but we bow obviously to what it symbolizes. Maybe that's stating the obvious, but it's important to really think about what that might symbolize.

Traditionally, we could say it symbolizes what's called the Triple Gem—Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha. These three things are what we take refuge in. So then, what would be refuge in Buddha?

It's interesting—the word Buddha, budd in this language, means wakefulness, awake. After his awakening, his enlightenment, the historical Buddha was walking down the road and he looked pretty good. He was glowing, and he had a striking appearance by all descriptions. He was cruising down the road and someone saw him—a wanderer, an ascetic wanderer—and said, "Are you a god? What are you?" The Buddha said, "I am awake." This was his description of his state: awakened. The awakened one. Buddha.

So we can take refuge in wakefulness. We might think of the historical Buddha as a human who had this experience, who left this body of teachings for us, who said, "If this were not possible, I wouldn't ask you to do it." We can look at that and say, "Oh, okay—if he could do it, maybe I can do it too." This was the teaching: that it's possible for beings to have this understanding, to wake up in this way. We can take refuge in this possibility, in each of our own possibility for wakefulness, for wisdom to arise. That's real. That's the refuge in Buddha. And we can have this refuge—this is a place of safety no matter what's going on, no matter where we are. We can find a place of safety and wakefulness in the moment.

Then there's the refuge in Dhamma, or Dharma. This word has a few different meanings. It's used for the teachings—Buddha Dharma, the teachings of the Buddha. It means law, natural law. You could say the law of nature, because of natural conditions, the way things are, because of this and this. It also means the truth of things in any moment.

We can take refuge in that, because no matter what's going on, no matter how wild and crazy things are, in any moment we can know: right now, it's like this. The way it is now. We can know the truth of the moment. We can wake up into the truth of the moment. This is the refuge in Dharma—another place of safety for us. Another thing that is safe no matter what. We can always know it's like this right now. We can place our hearts on that.

And then there's the refuge in Sangha, the third aspect of the Triple Gem. In the most traditional sense, Sangha refers to the ordained community of nuns and monks. The reason we have these teachings at all is because of the nuns and monks who were alive at the time of the Buddha and memorized them. They weren't written down for several hundred years—they were memorized and passed down orally. And so they've been carried through time in this way, and then eventually written down.

Then we have those who practiced what the Buddha taught and realized what he was pointing at and show us the way. So there's that aspect of Sangha.

There's also the community of those who practice together—this is called the Sangha. We're creating Sangha here. It's like a shared aspiration, a shared vision. A teacher of mine once said that we create Sangha like windows looking into a common room. We each look from our own place, our own window. We look through our own conditioning, our own upbringing, our own backgrounds, our own understandings, whatever they may be at any moment. But we're looking into the commonality, the same room of this possibility of understanding. We're looking into what's universal and true for all of us.

So we create Sangha here—we're creating this as we come together for these days. And I also see Sangha as being, for each of us, our highest aspiration. Whatever that might be in any moment, and that might change over time. But we have an aspiration to understand, to cultivate love and wisdom. Some way that we relate to that, that would get us to come to retreat. And that's no small thing in the world—to hold even the possibility of any intention around cultivating love and wisdom. This is rare and beautiful in the world. And this is an aspiration that we can touch at any time. So that's another place of safety, a refuge.

We have the refuges, and then we have these precepts. The word here is pañca sīla. The word sīla is usually translated as ethical conduct, or moral conduct—some people don't like the word moral. This is stressed throughout the Buddha's teachings as the very foundation that the practice rests on. If we don't have some relationship to an ethical way of living, our practice will never unfold.

There's a simple way we can think of this. There's a beautiful teaching in one of the suttas that speaks directly to it, in a collection called the Aṅguttara Nikāya. The Buddha's attendant, Ānanda, was his cousin. He served as his attendant and also had this great memory—he memorized most of the suttas. Anything he heard, he had a kind of photographic memory.

Ānanda asked the Buddha a question once. He said, "What, Lord, is the benefit of virtuous ways of conduct? What is their reward?"

And then the Buddha went through this list. He said, "Virtuous ways of conduct have non-remorse as their benefit and their reward. And non-remorse has gladness as its benefit and reward. And gladness has joy as its benefit and reward." And so on—joy has serenity, serenity has happiness. He went through all these stages that led eventually to the highest understanding: joy and serenity lead to concentration, to dispassion, to letting go, to disenchantment, and to the greatest peace. And so he said, "In this way, Ānanda, virtuous ways of conduct lead step by step to the very highest."

When we undertake living in a way that's as harmless as possible, this leaves us in a state of mind, of heart, that is free of remorse. We're not worried that we're harming others. We're free of remorse and worry. This leads to greater tranquility and ease in our lives and allows for our meditation practice to unfold and progress.

It's important when we undertake these precepts that we have a sense of what's meant by the word precept. They're not commandments or laws. They're not "thou shalt nots." They're training rules, you could say. They're an exploration. They're something that we undertake as an exploration for ourselves, in the same way of this ehipassiko—come and see for ourselves. We see for ourselves what happens in our minds and hearts when we live a life of care, a life based on kindness and non-harming.

So we undertake these as an exploration, realizing that it's really hard, if not impossible, to live without harming some living beings. There are a lot of really tiny ones that probably get worked over every time we take a breath or every time we step, even if we're totally careful.

So it's intention that is the key here—to not intentionally harm, to not intentionally cause harm.

And this commitment to living as harmlessly as possible, to sincerely undertaking an ethical way of living, leads to one of the greatest of all possible gifts that we could offer to the world. That's the gift of fearlessness. If we can offer this gift—that other beings don't have to fear us because they know that we will not intentionally harm them—this is a huge gift. To be fearless in the world is a wonderful thing we can offer to one another.

So I'll just quickly go through the list of the precepts. The first one is panatipata in Pali—undertaking the training to abstain from harming living beings. This includes all kinds of living beings, including little ones that might like to bite you. This time of year we don't have mosquitoes, but there are ones that we just tend to disregard or see as getting in our way. We respect the right of all beings to live, and we try not to intentionally harm any beings.

The second one, adinadana, is undertaking the training to abstain from taking that which is not given, that which has not been offered. As part of the safety here at this place, we respect one another's property and we don't take things that haven't been offered to us. We could say we don't steal, but we also use care with the things that are offered. We look at how we use things. We respect what belongs to someone else, even if it seems harmless, even if it doesn't really seem to matter. But it lets us look and see—what's our motivation before we take something?

The third one is abramacharya. For us here on retreat, in lay life outside of retreat, the words are kamesu michachara. This precept has to do with sexual energy and our conduct around sexuality. For the time of the retreat, we undertake celibacy—that's our commitment for this time. It gives us a chance to really look at this energy that's so powerful in our lives in the world, that can lead to such connection and good things, and also causes so much harm when it's not dealt with mindfully. We get a chance to really look at this energy and how it manifests, how it operates in our lives and in our hearts and minds.

Outside of retreat time, kamesu michachara is the precept to refrain from causing harm with our sexual energy, to really be mindful of how this energy manifests. It can be in so many ways—just simple flirtatious energy and where that comes from. But here on retreat, we undertake the training to abstain. It's not a judgment about it, nothing like that. It's just part of how we create this container of safety here, and a chance for us to really look and explore what this energy is like and how it manifests in our lives.

The fourth one is musawadah—the training to abstain from false speech. The very simplest way you can think about it is to not lie. It's not a huge issue here because we'll be in noble silence and we're not going to be talking a whole lot. But it's really an interesting one to look at, the way we use speech in our lives. We can look at it here in terms of other ways that we might communicate, really refraining from anything that's not necessary to support one another in the way of noble silence. Putting away our cell phones and computers and things like that if we don't need them.

And finally, sura meraya majapamadatana—refraining from the use of intoxicants. Here it says intoxicating substances. Often it's phrased as substances that cloud the mind and lead to heedlessness. We're cultivating heedfulness here, mindfulness. This, of course, doesn't refer to prescription medications, anything that you might be taking for your health. You don't let go of those. But we let go of intoxicants and substances that lead to lack of clarity, to heedless behavior.

So these are the precepts. We've gone on a little longer than we planned, and it's late, and some of you have traveled a long way to get here, so we'll do the chanting now. At the end, I'll just mention there's a final dedication that really points to the fundamental and foundational aspect of these practices—of the refuges and the precepts as being the basis that our practice rests on. This dedication to undertake this, may it lead us to the highest and greatest understanding, to the knowledge of the path and its fruit, which is one way that the realization of the fullness of the Buddha's teaching is expressed.

Things are done in threes a lot in the Theravada tradition, so you'll notice we do things in threes. When we come to the refuges, I'd like to do them in both Pali and in English. We'll do the Pali, and then we'll speak the English together so that we really bring to mind in the language that we're used to what it is we're doing with these practices.

Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammā sambuddhassa.

Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.

Dutiyampi buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Dutiyampi dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Dutiyampi saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.

Tatiyampi buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Tatiyampi dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Tatiyampi saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.

Pāṇātipātā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi. Adinnādānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi. Abrahmacariyā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi. Musāvādā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi. Surāmeraya majjapamādaṭṭhānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi.

Idaṃ me sīlaṃ maggaphalañāṇassa paccayo hotu.

And we usually end this by saying sādhu, sādhu, sādhu three times.

Now let us speak the precepts in English, so that we bring them fully into our hearts and minds:

I undertake the training to abstain from harming living beings. I undertake the training to abstain from taking what has not been given. I undertake the training to abstain from sexual activity. I undertake the training to abstain from false speech. I undertake the training to abstain from the use of intoxicating substances.

It's late, and I know some of you are ready to call it a day, but let's take a few minutes in silence for a short guided meditation. First, let's stand up for a minute and stretch our legs, or at least shift posture, because we've been sitting for an hour already.

I'll mention that because it's a small group, there are enough places on the floor and chairs that you may have access to both, which is a rare and wonderful thing, especially for those of us who are aging. There is no stigma of any kind attached to the decision to sit in a chair. Avail yourself of them as needed. It's good to sit in more than one posture during these long days.

So we'll have a short and sweet session here to begin the retreat. Find a position that feels comfortable, where you feel the body at ease, the posture upright and alert but relaxed, with the natural curves of the spine present. Settle into the simplicity of the posture.

The simplest instruction I could give you would be to sit and know that you're sitting. Just feeling this whole body, knowing it's sitting. The feeling of the posture, the contact with the earth, the touching and pressure there. Earth sitting on earth.

Take a moment to run the attention quickly through the body. Notice the top of the head. Notice if there are places of tension or holding that you don't really need, especially perhaps the forehead and eyes. Sometimes we can find we're holding tension there. Let the eyes relax, soft in the sockets. We can find we're looking around even with our eyes closed. Let the eyes relax, the area of the cheeks, the jaw, the mouth, the back and the sides of the head.

Notice the neck and the throat. Let the neck be long. Feeling the shoulders—often we hold tension in our shoulders—just letting them be heavy and dropped. Let the intention go to the upper back, middle back, and lower back. Feeling this upright, alert, relaxed posture there in the spine.

And back to the shoulders and the upper arms. Down through the elbows to the forearms. And into the hands. Just let the attention rest in the hands for a moment. Whatever you notice there. Maybe the hands are touching or resting on the knees. Feeling of touching, warmth or coolness. Pressure, tingling, whatever you notice.

And coming back to the torso, the upper part of the torso, the chest, down through the ribs and the belly. Let the belly be soft and relaxed. You might notice the movement of the breath there, the diaphragm, the breath moving in and out of the body, this rising and falling movement. In and out, expanding, contracting as the breath comes in and out of the body. Down to the pelvis and the hips. Notice if there's any holding in the hips, the buttocks, through the hip joints, into the upper legs, thighs, and knees. Down to the calves and lower part of the leg, the shin, into the ankles and the feet.

This whole experience of body sitting. The simplicity of that.

Notice the mood of the mind. Notice if there's any mood there—feeling of anticipation or worry, or just dullness or tiredness that might be there. And coming back to the body and that simplicity of sitting posture.

Notice the breath moving in and out of the body. You might notice the sensations at the nostrils, the touching sensation as the breath comes in and out at the nostrils or the upper lip area. You might notice it in the back of the throat, or in the chest as the lungs expand and contract. You might notice the movement of the abdomen, the rising and falling or expanding, contracting movement there. Whatever way you can easily connect with the breath moving in and out of the body.

Receiving the breath. Letting it be natural, not looking for any particular special kind of breath, just however it's showing up.

Take a moment here, before I ring the bell, just to bring to mind some of your good qualities. Reflect maybe on some good deeds, some acts of generosity or kindness that you can think of. Or just bringing to mind your aspiration to come on retreat and to cultivate understanding and kindness. It's such a beautiful, good thing. Or the goodness of undertaking the training of the refuges and precepts.

The precepts—this is no small thing. If everyone in the world made even a half-hearted attempt to keep the precepts, we would have a golden age. There is a beautiful, great goodness in this. We can bring this to mind. We all have this goodness. We can bring it to mind and delight in it. The Buddha said one should frequently reflect on one's good deeds, one's good qualities.

We can dedicate this great goodness, the power of that, for our own awakening, for the happiness and liberation of all beings. May our practice be for the benefit of all beings.

I wish you a good night and deep, restful sleep and sweet dreams. The first sitting is at 6:15, and someone's ringing a wake-up bell—thank you to whoever's doing that. We're not going to take a roll for that first sitting. Please come if you're awake. It's been a long day for some of you traveling, so I'm giving you permission to sleep in a little bit. Tomorrow only. But don't miss breakfast.

That's one of the high points of the morning.

And if you happen to be awake, this room is always open. You can avail yourself of this place to sit any time.

So have a good night.

CHAPTER 78

Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 53 min

In this foundational talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of mindfulness (sati) and its essential role in Buddhist practice. She examines multiple definitions of mindfulness—from simple presence and witnessing to the working definition of "knowing what is happening while it is happening." Drawing on the Pāli etymology connecting sati to memory and remembering, she references Bhikkhu Anālayo's scholarship on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), describing mindfulness as the factor of mind that allows memory to function.

Fella emphasizes that ordinary mindfulness alone is insufficient for liberation—it must be paired with wisdom (paññā) to become "right mindfulness" (sammā sati) of the Noble Eightfold Path. This wisdom includes understanding the Four Noble Truths in direct experience: recognizing dukkha, its causes in greed, aversion, and delusion, and the path leading away from suffering. She introduces the crucial practice of noticing not just what we're aware of, but how we're paying attention—whether through filters of reactivity or with balanced, non-judgmental awareness.

The talk offers practical guidance for cultivating mindfulness, particularly the value of noticing when mindfulness spontaneously returns after periods of distraction. Rather than judging wandering minds, practitioners can use each return of awareness as an opportunity to recognize mindfulness itself. Fella uses the analogy of a scooter to illustrate how light, frequent touches of remembering build momentum, eventually allowing mindfulness and concentration to carry the practice forward toward deeper insight into impermanence and the selfless nature of experience.

When the Buddha taught, he emphasized certain qualities repeatedly, particular qualities that he really indicated were important if you want to practice and understand his teachings. Energy and mindfulness were two qualities he highlighted as very helpful to cultivate. Tonight I'd like to talk about mindfulness.

First, I'd like to explore definitions of mindfulness—what we think of as mindfulness. I think the simplest way we often think about it is just this sense of being present, this quality of presence. Another way we often think about mindfulness is as a witnessing of our experience, where somehow there's a distance between what we're experiencing and this witness. That's often how we conceive of mindfulness, that this witness is an aspect of it.

One definition I like to use as a working definition is that mindfulness can be thought of as knowing what is happening while it is happening. There are two pieces to this: the knowing quality, knowing what's happening, and then the awareness that you know it while it's happening.

I'm sure many of you have had the experience of sitting in a room reading a book or doing something, and you're focused on what you're doing—that's mostly what you're aware of, the reading of the book. But somebody comes in the room and walks out, and there's a vague awareness of that. If somebody comes up to you later and asks, "Have you seen so-and-so?" you might think, "Oh, yes, I think they came in while I was reading the book." But there wasn't that clear knowing of that experience while it was happening. That's not the kind of awareness we're talking about. We're talking about a clear knowing of what's happening at the moment it is happening.

The Pali word for mindfulness is sati, spelled S-A-T-I, and the root of that word is related to the sense of memory, of remembering. One of my teachers says mindfulness is about remembering—just remembering what's happening, remembering yourself. That's actually a way we can explore it. My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya says if you're struggling to be mindful, just remember yourself. Think about yourself. What am I doing right now? That can be a way into the exploration of mindfulness.

One of the preeminent Buddhist scholars of today, Bhikkhu Anālayo, has written a lovely book on mindfulness and the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, which is the Buddha's discourse on the four foundations of mindfulness—the Buddha's description of how to practice mindfulness meditation. It's a central discourse in the Buddha's teaching. In that book, Anālayo looks at this definition of remembering and offers the explanation that the quality or factor of mindfulness is a factor of mind that allows memory to function.

I played with that one day. After I read the definition, I spent the next day exploring it. What is the state of mind, what is the quality of mind that can remember? It's a state in which you are present and alert and aware while things are happening. That's another way to explore this quality of mindfulness: the factor that allows memory to function.

Now, this doesn't necessarily mean—I think there's a difference between a factor of mind that allows memory to function and memories actually being recorded and kept in our mind. Sayadaw U Tejaniya says that initially, when we start to practice mindfulness, if we think of mindfulness as being connected with having a good memory, what seems to happen is that as we move into the present moment, paying attention to the present moment, we seem to forget things a lot. It's like we don't remember what's happened to us.

His explanation is that typically the way our memory works is that we repeat things to ourselves over and over again. I think there's some truth to this—that when we want to remember something, we make an effort to remember it. What happens when we're paying attention right in the present moment is that we're not making that effort to repeat things to ourselves, and so that way of getting things into memory goes away. But then he said that when the quality of mindfulness is very high, when the mindfulness is extremely clear and very strong, then you will remember things.

And I have had that experience. There have been times where the mindfulness was just so clear. It was during times when I was particularly paying attention to my experience and something very clear unfolded. It's just seared in my mind—that experience is just seared in my mind because the mindfulness was so strong. So we can think of there being a connection between mindfulness and memory.

Another way I like to contemplate or explore this quality of mindfulness is to think about it as a reflective capacity of mind, a capacity that reflects what's happening in the moment. We have this capacity of mind that can know itself, essentially. This is part of the quality of mindfulness—it can reflect what's happening not only in the world but in our experience itself, in our mind itself. We can be mindful of being mindful. We can be aware of how our mind is working.

In this way, I like to think about mindfulness as being like a mirror. It just reflects what's happening in our experience. There are always things going on in our experience. There's always a kind of awareness happening, always a quality of knowing happening in our experience, but mindfulness is not always happening. When mindfulness is happening, it is simply reflecting everything else that's happening in our mind and body. It's a very simple kind of self-reflective process in the mind. In a sense, it's what makes us human—although they do say that some other animals have this self-reflective quality or capacity. But it is a capacity that we have as human beings, this ability to know ourselves, essentially.

This quality of mindfulness is an ordinary quality in our minds. It's something that we come with, something that we're born with. We all have this capacity, and moments of mindfulness come up for us whether or not we even know what it is. At times through the day it just spontaneously comes into appearance. But what we typically do with that moment—we don't usually notice the fact that mindfulness has appeared for us.

The way we've been trained, the way our minds usually work, is that when we become aware of something in the moment, we usually kind of leap onto it, start thinking about it, and doing things with it. For instance, we might notice something and then start relating it to who am I and what do I need to do about that? We don't actually notice so much the fact that we have been aware of something. It immediately moves into: How does it relate to me? What do I need to do about it? So we'll often take some action out of this. We notice something and then we take some action.

For instance, you're walking through San Geronimo Lodge and you notice a big spider on the wall. You might be aware of that, but often what happens with something like that is: Oh, spider, I need to do something about that. Maybe I'll get a cup and capture it and take it outside. We move from knowing to action without recognizing the fact that we have known something, without recognizing that there's been a little tiny moment of mindfulness there.

So this quality of mindfulness actually happens to us a lot, spontaneously through the day. It comes up frequently, but we don't actually notice it because of our habitual pattern of doing something with what we have noticed. We don't really stop or recognize, "Oh, there's been some mindfulness, there's been a moment of recognizing this thing." We may not even recognize the thing clearly; we may not even really be that clear that we've recognized something because we're moving into the action of what to do about it immediately. So not only are we not really registering the initial experience clearly in our minds, but we are not recognizing that there has been a split second of mindfulness.

We need mindfulness. This quality of mind—I don't think we could live without it. If we continually lived in a state of fantasy, we'd be bumping into things all day. We need this quality of mindfulness to help us get through our day, but we just don't recognize it as something that comes for us. We don't experience the mindfulness consciously. It's kind of under the radar for us.

I think it is part of the brilliance of the Buddha to have recognized this quality, this ordinary quality of mind that just happens for all of us, and for him to say, "Wow, this is actually a really interesting quality. I think it would be helpful to pay attention to this." I think this was brilliant—for him to highlight this as a very skillful quality worth cultivating, worth paying attention to.

And that kind of mindfulness may not really be enough. Even if we start to notice it, it may not really be enough to lead us to the kind of wisdom and understanding that the Buddha had, to the freedom from the way that we suffer, the way that we struggle.

He pointed to this quality of mindfulness as being essential in the movement to freedom from our reactivity, our struggles, our suffering. But this simple ordinary quality of mindfulness may not be quite enough. Sayadaw U Tejaniya says—one of the names of one of his books is called Awareness Alone is Not Enough. And he often uses the word awareness to be synonymous with mindfulness. So when he says awareness alone is not enough, or mindfulness alone is not enough, what he's pointing to is that the Buddha also brought mindfulness together with wisdom.

So what is wisdom? We often have this term, and wisdom has a kind of grandiose sound to it. We think, "Well, if I have to have wisdom to be mindful, there's little hope because I don't know how much wisdom I have." But the Buddha pointed to some very specific kinds of wisdom, and some of them are pretty straightforward. He's just pointing to what's helpful. Orienting our attention in this direction is helpful.

So bringing mindfulness—and in a sense this is another way that the remembering comes into play—he says it's helpful to remember to be aware of certain things. In particular, he pointed to, in a kind of simple way, that there are certain things in our mind that will lead us to suffering: the quality of greed, the quality of aversion, the quality of delusion. If we're engaged in acting out of those intentions, those motivations, we're going to head toward suffering. If we connect to non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—kindness, compassion, and wisdom—if we connect to those qualities instead, then we head away from suffering.

And so he pointed to this: part of the wisdom is understanding what is skillful and what is unskillful in our experience. What is unskillful is what leads us to suffering, leads us to struggle, leads us to distress. And he pointed to these qualities of greed, aversion, and delusion as being the root causes for that struggling. What leads us away from that? Non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion.

So this wisdom that supports mindfulness, he called wise attention. And it's related to the Four Noble Truths, really. It's related to seeing in our experience what is suffering, beginning to recognize in our experience where we struggle, how this suffering comes to be. That's the First and Second Noble Truths: understanding suffering and recognizing and letting go of the cause of suffering.

So we explore our experience through this kind of framework, essentially. "Oh, there's suffering. Can I understand this suffering? What's the cause of that suffering? And what leads me away from suffering?" This is the Third Noble Truth: the possibility of freedom from suffering. And what supports that? What supports moving away from suffering? The Fourth Noble Truth: the path leading to the cessation of suffering.

So there are really two key elements if we think about how wise attention is framed in terms of the Four Noble Truths. That's one of the main ways he talked about it—that one who attends wisely understands, "This is suffering." One who attends wisely understands, "This is the cause of suffering." So he's pointing us into the present moment here. He's pointing us to attending wisely in the moment to our experience through this framework of the Four Noble Truths.

And when I look at that, I see kind of two key elements to this wise attention. One has to do with understanding suffering, beginning to see in our own experience what suffering is, recognizing it. And the other has to do with beginning to understand and explore the cause and effect relationship in experience. How does suffering come to be? How does it end? How does happiness come to be? What supports that?

So it's not just understanding suffering, but the understanding of suffering leads us to seeing the causes and conditions, the things that create suffering. And as the mind sees that, as mindfulness witnesses the causes of suffering—one of the key pieces is that, as I said last night, one of the deepest causes of suffering is this wanting things to be other than they are. It is the wanting, it's in our own minds, that this suffering is produced.

This is actually good news.

It might not sound like good news that suffering is created by our own minds. But if suffering were created out there, and we had no input into it, it would be hopeless. As it is, the ways that we struggle, the reasons that we struggle, have to do with things that are happening in our own minds. And we can change the course of our minds by bringing this wise attention.

So that's one of the aspects of wisdom that supports mindfulness—or that makes mindfulness actually a liberating quality of mind, one that really supports us to move towards freedom from suffering, freedom from distress, freedom from struggle, freedom from dissatisfaction. Dukkha, the Pali term, freedom from dukkha. Dukkha is often translated as suffering, but it's a subtler term than that. It really has a very broad range of meanings.

I like to think about the etymology of that word as well. My understanding is that there are two parts to the word: the du part and the kha part. The du part means bad. And the kha part, my understanding is that it refers to the empty space in the middle of a wheel. So if you think about what it means to have an empty space in the middle of a wheel that's bad—there are many ways that could be. It might be off-center, so the ride you'd have would be just a little rough and uneven. Or perhaps that space is a little too tight, so the axle grips and it's not a smooth ride, it's a tight ride. Or maybe it's too loose, so it's kind of wobbly. Or maybe it's really loose, so that the wheel falls off and you crash altogether.

This term dukkha really covers a broad range of suffering, from the subtlest kind of unease to the grossest kind of suffering. And this path that the Buddha is offering, this tool of mindfulness paired with wisdom, leads us to freedom from this dukkha—the dukkha that is created through our mind not being willing to meet things as they are, but always wanting to adjust and fix and change.

So that's one aspect of the wisdom that supports mindfulness being a factor that really helps us to free ourselves from dukkha. Another aspect, perhaps a different way of framing it, is noticing how we're paying attention. I mentioned this morning in the guided meditation that how we pay attention is as important, if not more important, than what we are actually paying attention to.

We begin to recognize—and this is another one of the amazing capacities of our mind—that as we're paying attention to something, we can see the thing we're paying attention to, and we can also notice that we're paying attention. For instance, a pain in the knee, or an itch on the nose, or the sound of a dog barking in the distance. We can notice the qualities and texture of those experiences. That's part of what mindfulness does—it notices the qualities of experience. We'll talk more about this in the days to come, these different textures of experience.

So mindfulness can notice the qualities of the experience itself, but it can also turn and notice how it is noticing. The pain in the knee—you're noticing the pain, you're noticing burning, stabbing, aching, pulling, twisting, pressure. You may or may not be noticing an aversion in the mind with which you are paying attention. It may not be aversion; I'm just bringing that up because often when we're experiencing pain, there is a sense of not liking, of pushing away, that is also present in our experience.

If we are not noticing that, if we are observing that pain in the knee with this attitude of aversion, this hatred, this "I want to get rid of this, I want to fix this, I want to change it"—what we're doing is cultivating that aversion. So it's really important to begin to turn towards and recognize how we're paying attention to experience.

It's as if almost all the time we're seeing our experience through some kind of filter, some kind of lens. We've got the red lenses on or the blue lenses on. We've got the "I hate this" lens on, or we've got the "I want more of this" lens on. And if we don't notice that, then we're essentially reinforcing that filter. We're practicing that filter.

If you've got these red lenses on, one way to explore this is: can we begin to recognize, "Oh, I'm looking through red lenses"? If you wear them for a long time, you stop noticing the redness of things. So if you can begin to recognize that there is a tinge here, a tinge of something in this experience, you can start to recognize that you're looking through this filter. You can start to recognize that there's this quality of aversion in the mind that is part of this experience.

That is the first step towards moving to a more balanced attitude in the mind, a more balanced way of paying attention. From there, we may actually be able to take that lens or filter off and look at it, so that we're not looking through it anymore, but recognizing, "Oh, that's what aversion is like." We'll talk more in the coming days about how to turn and pay attention to the qualities in our mind—how to pay attention to aversion, how to pay attention to greed, how to pay attention to frustration and irritation.

For now, we can simply recognize: okay, I'm paying attention to that pain in my knee, and I don't like it.

Recognize that. The very recognition of it helps to create a little bit of balance in the mind. If we can recognize, "Oh yeah, not liking—that's what's happening," we can be aware of not liking with a more balanced attention, a balanced kind of mind.

Now, these things can have many layers to them. This is something that we begin to unravel through this exploration—the layers of our holding. We see, "Oh yeah, I don't like that. Okay, there's that aversion." Or "I hate that," and we start to recognize, "Okay, there's that hating. That's what's happening." And then we begin to see, "Oh, there's actually fear here. I see. There's some fear going on." Through this exploration we begin to uncover layer after layer of ways that we're holding and reacting.

So we're beginning to have a recognition of how we're paying attention. This morning I was encouraging bringing as much of a sense of friendliness and kindness to your attention as you can. That will support a letting go of any pushing away or resisting of experience. But if you can't bring a sense of friendliness and kindness, see if you can at least recognize, "Yeah, I don't like this." Just see if you can frame it in your mind with even that kind of relaxed quality to the recognition. "Yeah, I don't like this. That's what's happening."

In my own experience and exploration, the wisdom of the Buddhist teaching is really, really rich. It's really dense—the littlest tiny piece of it goes a long way. You don't have to understand the entirety of the Buddhist teachings to begin to practice and begin to experience benefits from the teaching. A little bit of this wisdom paired with a willingness to explore experience can be very freeing.

In my own experience, in the first few months of my practice, my friend Chris sent me a book that encouraged me—well, I read this book and I didn't understand much of it. One thing I got out of it, though, was: when you're experiencing a strong emotion, see if you can just notice that emotion as opposed to acting on it. This is a little bit of the Buddha's wisdom—instead of acting on your emotions, see if you can observe them.

I began practicing with that. I thought, "I don't know how this is going to help." But through the exploration of just that one little bit, I could connect with that teaching and bring mindfulness to my emotions. Some very deep unraveling happened in the first few months of my experience around some of my more difficult emotions. That was a very small bit of the wisdom, yet it led to very powerful openings, very deep seeing of how the mind was creating experience and recognizing, "Oh, I don't have to go there." Very, very powerful.

So as we explore our experience, we could call this pairing of mindfulness and wisdom right mindfulness—the mindfulness of the Eightfold Path. The Eightfold Path is this fourth noble truth, a set of practices that support our understanding of our minds, leading us towards happiness. Right mindfulness is one of the components of the Eightfold Path, and really this pairing of the quality of mindfulness with wisdom is what makes it right mindfulness.

This moves us in the direction of recognizing just what's happening in the moment without judgment, without reactivity, without an agenda that things have to be different—just the noticing of experience moment to moment. That's what right mindfulness moves us towards. It's a kind of attention that doesn't interfere with experience. It just recognizes what's happening. It's that mirror. A mirror simply reflects experience. A mirror doesn't care what the experience is; it just reflects it. It might be reflecting a beautiful landscape or it might be reflecting a decaying corpse. The mirror is unchanged by what it reflects.

In a similar way, mindfulness is unchanged by what it is experiencing. It is just knowing it, recognizing it.

So why is right mindfulness helpful? Why is it helpful to have this quality that can just meet experience without judgment, without reactivity, just knowing what's happening in the moment without a personal agenda?

The non-reactive mind can look at reactivity. It sounds like a paradox. How can it be possible that if our minds are reacting, we can be mindful of that and not be increasing or encouraging that reactivity?

This is what I didn't understand about that instruction when I first read it. Pay attention to your emotions instead of acting on them? I thought, well, if I pay attention to my anger, isn't it just going to make the anger worse? That's what I assumed. But I decided I would try it and see what happens.

There's something about the way that mindfulness functions. The neurological studies around this show that when the mind begins to recognize or acknowledge—even using this mental labeling that we talked about—when you use mental labeling around difficulty or reactivity, something shifts. Reactivity is often happening in the core part of the brain, what they call the limbic system, the old part of the brain, the one that has to react to experience immediately. And the mindfulness is happening in the newer part of the brain. So what's occurring is that we're engaging a different part of the brain with mindfulness. The looping quality of reactivity that reinforces itself is happening at that lower level. When we bring in this newer part of the brain, it breaks the cycle a little bit.

That's what I found in my own experience. I remember the first time I woke up to a difficult emotion. I had vowed to myself that I was going to pay attention when I got really angry. And I woke up in the midst of a rage, just like, "Oh, yeah, I said I was going to pay attention to this. How do I do that?" I had no idea. I'd had very little training—I had read this book, that was it. I thought, "Well, I see I'm angry. Okay, I guess I go back to work."

In retrospect, what I see is that in that first time when I woke up in that rage, I was frozen, unable to do anything but loop in that reactivity. And the very recognition—"Oh yeah, I'm angry, I said I was going to pay attention to that"—broke into that cycle enough that I could let it go enough to even go back to work. Because I hadn't been functional. That's actually one of the reasons why I brought mindfulness into my life—my emotions were making me non-functional.

So mindfulness can observe our reactivity, and bringing in a different aspect of our mind can begin to support an unwinding of that reactivity through not reacting further. When we break in with mindfulness to our reactivity, it can stop it at whatever level it has reached. Then slowly, over time—and it took months for me to unwind these difficult emotions I was having when I started my practice—they did unwind through this practice. Very powerful.

This is one of the main reasons that right mindfulness is helpful. It really helps us see our reactivity, and it helps to unwind it so that we're not at the mercy of our reactivity. We can respond rather than react.

We also can begin to notice with mindfulness when we're starting to go down a direction that's going to lead us into unfortunate consequences. Speech is a good example of this. We can begin to recognize, "Oh, I'm about ready to say something that maybe I don't want to say." So right mindfulness can begin to reveal when we're getting ready to take an action. This is a very powerful exploration—we can actually begin to see that we are intending to do something before it happens. We're about to do something, and mindfulness can see that.

In seeing that we're about to do something, we usually can see why we're going to do it. And in seeing why, we can have a sense—sometimes just at a gut level—"Hmm, don't know if I want to go there." Or, "No, this feels okay. I can do this." This mindfulness of intention can help us choose skillfully, to act out of wholesome intentions instead of reacting out of greed, aversion, and delusion, as we do when we are not mindful.

Right mindfulness also helps to create the conditions for deeper insight. What I've been talking about so far is more at the level of living life more skillfully, being more wholesome in our activities and letting go of the ways that we react to things. But it also begins to create the conditions for us to see deeply into the truth of reality.

Without filters, if we come to a place in mindfulness where we have seen through some of those filters and we're actually seeing clearly—without a filter of greed, a filter of aversion, or a filter of delusion—that mind, that kind of mindfulness, deeply understands and recognizes that everything happening is impermanent. It's just an unceasing, unending, impermanent flow of experience. And it recognizes, in seeing how unceasingly impermanent everything is, that it doesn't make any sense to try to hold on to anything in that flow, because it's all just like sand slipping through your fingers. There's no way to hold water. If somebody pours water into your hand, there's no way to hold on to it. And the mind recognizes very deeply that there's no way to hold on to experience—and that there's really no one here to hold on to it.

So these insights are the insights that really liberate us. These are the insights that deeply undercut our habit of holding on to things, of wanting things to be other than they are.

One of the things I'd like to explore in the last few minutes of this talk is a particular way of cultivating mindfulness. When we practice mindfulness in the early days of retreat, we're often encouraging you to cultivate it by paying attention to the objects of experience. You pay attention to the breathing. You notice the thinking. Over the days, we'll encourage you to explore more in the body and emotions. We cultivate mindfulness by being aware of these experiences as they're happening.

At the same time, we're also encouraging you to recognize the mindfulness itself. The main way we're encouraging this at this point is by inviting you to really notice when your mindfulness comes back. The moment when you remember that you have not been mindful—as I said this morning—that moment, you're already mindful as soon as you know that. Mindfulness has already returned. If you're not mindful, you're not mindful. There's nothing you can do about it. There's no way you can make mindfulness happen. It has to come back in that spontaneous way. And then, because mindfulness has returned, we have an avenue toward making choices. What do I do with this mindfulness?

But one of the things that's really helpful in that moment is simply to begin recognizing: what's the difference between being lost and being aware? Now, we can't really know the lost feeling in the moment of being lost. But in the moment of coming back into mindfulness, there's a lingering memory of what it was like to be lost. So we can, in that moment, get a sense of contrast in the mind. What's it like now to have that awareness back? What was it like a moment ago to be kind of lost in that fog?

This exploration was actually really productive for me, partly because it helped me let go of judging myself when mindfulness came back. If my mind wandered a hundred times in a forty-minute sitting, it gave me a hundred opportunities to explore this question: What is the difference between the mind being lost and the mind being present? It gave me a hundred opportunities to recognize mindfulness returning, that moment of spontaneous mindfulness returning. It's a really amazing moment. It happens effortlessly. You didn't do it. There it is. You're back.

This gives you a pointer to a possibility—initially, a kind of ease with mindfulness. Because the mindfulness that comes back spontaneously, if we can connect with that as it returns, is a pure, easy mindfulness. It takes no effort whatsoever. Just here we are. Connecting with that gives you a feeling, a flavor for what this mindfulness feels like.

One of the benefits of this exploration was that it really helped cut the judging—for me at least—around my mind wandering, because it became simply another opportunity to see: What is mindfulness? What does it feel like to be mindful?

As the mind gets more familiar with what it feels like to be mindful, those little moments I talked about at the beginning—the little moments of mindfulness that come back spontaneously throughout your whole day, which we don't usually notice—because we have now become familiar with this feeling of mindfulness, those little moments begin to point themselves out to us. We see them happening all the time: little blips of awareness through our day.

This feeling of mindfulness is actually a familiar feeling to us. Once we start recognizing it, paying attention to it, we see it's actually quite familiar. It's just that we haven't bothered to notice it before. It's kind of like the air we breathe. We don't really notice the air we're breathing very much. It's just so obvious.

It's so present all the time. And in some similar way, those moments, those little blips of mindfulness, happen to us so frequently, yet we simply don't pay attention to them. We don't recognize them. But when we start to attend to that feeling, we see—oh yes, I know what this is. I know what this is about.

So in that moment when you remember about mindfulness, just see if you can incline towards recognizing: mindfulness has returned. And then simply—especially in informal times, as I mentioned just before lunch—just notice what's obvious. See if you can connect with what is already happening. Wake up to what's already going on in your experience.

Continuity is a crucial piece of this. For mindfulness, for this right mindfulness to become a factor that really supports freedom, liberation, awakening, enlightenment—continuity of the mindfulness brings a deepening of the concentration. Continuity of the mindfulness itself will bring the quality of concentration along with it. We don't actually have to pay attention to one thing for the mind to settle down. While that's supportive, definitely supportive, it's actually the continuity of the mindfulness that brings the concentration.

This practice around continuity does not have to involve a heavy hand. In fact, just the opposite. I think it's really helpful to have a light touch around this mindfulness, around this trying to maintain moment after moment of noticing. There's no need to try to be more mindful in a moment. That's kind of what we attempt to do—oh, mindful! Oh yes, mindful! Let me try to be really mindful right now. That is just over-efforting, actually.

What's important, rather, is to just see if we can touch that lightly, moment after moment. Just moment after moment, meeting experience. That will create a momentum, and then mindfulness and concentration will carry together.

There's a little analogy I like to use about this. Initially, when we're cultivating this kind of continuity of mindfulness, this frequency of mindfulness, we have to encourage our mind to remember it a lot. It's kind of like those scooters that kids ride—little wheels, a little flatbed, and you stand with one foot on the rail and then tap the ground to get yourself going. When you first start on the scooter, you have to tap the ground a lot. Now, tapping down hard doesn't do much good. You could, but it's not that beneficial. It's just the light tap, tap, tap. It's the frequency that gets you going. And then once you're moving, you can tap less frequently.

It's similar with mindfulness. Initially, we have to remind ourselves frequently—oh, just this moment, just this moment. And it is just that light. How much effort does it take for you to be mindful right now of the sensation of your hands? The sensations of your buttocks on the chair or cushion or bench? The sensations of your lips touching? How much? It doesn't take much effort.

What is hard is to keep remembering—and this is again another aspect of this remembering—it's hard to keep remembering to do it. So this is where some of the effort has to come in. Just moment after moment: this moment, and this moment, and this moment.

And that continuity—this moment, this moment, this moment—will be like the momentum of that scooter. It will carry us, develop the concentration, and allow the mind to deeply see into the patterns of reactivity, see where the choices are, help us to make skillful choices, and to see deeply into the nature of experience. This leads us to the insights into impermanence, into dukkha, this dissatisfactoriness, this unsatisfactoriness, and this ephemerality—that there isn't anyone here experiencing or doing. It's just a process. It's really a flow, a process.

So let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 79

Guided Mettā (2)

Andrea Fella · 45 min

> In this guided mettā practice, Andrea Fella expands on the mechanics of loving-kindness meditation, emphasizing that mettā is fundamentally a practice of intention rather than immediately generating warm feelings. She shares from her own experience during a month-long mettā retreat, describing how connecting the phrases to bodily sensations in the heart center transformed the practice for her—revealing that even a small ember of goodwill can be kindled into genuine warmth through patient repetition.
> Fella explains that mettā is a practice of purification, often bringing up its opposites—anger, frustration, and ill will—which she describes using the traditional framework of "far enemies" (qualities clearly opposite to mettā) and "near enemies" (attachment or conditional love that masquerades as genuine caring). She offers practical strategies for working with these difficulties: allowing mild hindrances to remain in the background while continuing the practice, switching to an easier being when challenges arise with a particular person, or temporarily dropping into mindfulness practice when difficult energies become strong.
> The guided meditation includes working with both self and benefactor, emphasizing the practice of checking in with the heart after each phrase and eventually expanding mettā to all beings everywhere. Fella acknowledges that Westerners often find self-directed mettā surprisingly difficult—a cultural phenomenon that puzzled Asian teachers—and offers Gil Fronsdal's suggestion of occasionally "slipping yourself in" while generating goodwill for an easier being. She concludes by noting how mindfulness and mettā practices work together, as the nonjudgmental, nonreactive quality cultivated in mindfulness is itself a form of mettā.

So we'll continue the metta practice today at this sitting. I'd like to speak for just a few minutes to elaborate and expand on what Greg talked about yesterday.

Just to refresh or remind you about the mechanics of the metta practice: the practice is one of intention, actually. The phrases that we use—may I be happy, may I be healthy, may you be safe, may you live with ease—these phrases are expressing the wish for happiness for ourselves and for other beings. We're also trying to connect with a feeling of warmth, of kindness, of caring as we express that wish. But that feeling may or may not come naturally right away.

You may be sitting here doing the metta practice and not have a sense of that feeling of warmth or caring, and that's fine actually. What this practice is doing is through that expression of that wish—may you be happy, may you be healthy—as we express that wish, as we connect to that phrase and understand what it means, we're inclining our minds towards the feelings that are connected with that wish. We may not be feeling them right away, but we're beginning to incline our minds in that direction.

So be patient with yourselves if you're not finding that feeling of warmth or kindness or caring. There were times I did a period of extended metta practice of one whole month, and during that month, there were definitely times where I just couldn't find the feeling at all, but I could say the phrase in my mind and understand what it meant—just saying the phrase and understanding the meaning. And through that practice, the feeling began to kind of be kindled.

This actually brings me to another aspect I want to include today, which is making the practice connected to our bodily experience, in particular in the area of the heart. This was the instruction that actually made the metta practice finally come alive for me, because it's so much words—we're saying the phrase, we're connecting with an image or with a feeling of being with the person. There's a lot of wordiness going on.

But for me, when one of my teachers finally gave me the instruction: every time you say a phrase, take a moment to just come back and check in in the area of the heart and see what has been the impact of making that wish. So you express the phrase, you understand the meaning, and then check back into the body in the area of the heart and see what's happened. There's no right or wrong to what happens there, but just give yourself an opportunity to check in and see what has come, what has happened.

For myself at that particular period of time when it felt so dry, what I discovered was I could say the phrase and understand the meaning. I could bring up an image, a brief moment of an image of the person, and then it would disappear. And then I would say the phrase and understand the meaning, and then check in with the area of the heart. After some time, what I began to see was there's just a little subtle feeling of opening and just a subtle feeling of wishing well, of caring for this person. It's very small, almost like a little ember.

And then as I continued saying the phrases, understanding the meaning of what I was saying, and checking back in, it was as if every phrase was like—as Greg said last night with the chanting—the phrases were like a bellows that fueled that little ember of goodwill into a more broad and open feeling of what I understood to be metta, really the open connected feeling of kindness, caring, and well-wishing.

It doesn't have to be—one of my friends says it doesn't have to be like a Hallmark greeting card kind of feeling that we're going for. It can be just a really simple feeling of well-wishing.

As we do this kind of practice, the practice of metta is what's called a practice of purification. So it tends to bring up in our hearts the opposite of the direction we're kind of going for. You may notice sometimes when you're doing the metta practices that feelings of anger, of frustration, of ill will come up. And contrary to what you might think—you might think, well, this practice isn't working—actually it is working. This is how the purification works.

One of my metta teachers, Guy Armstrong, compared this practice to running a magnet, a metta magnet, over your heart. So the metta practice is like you have a big metta magnet and you're running this metta magnet over your heart. What do magnets do? They pull out their opposite. So what happens as we run this metta magnet over our heart is that the opposites kind of get pulled to the surface so they come into consciousness and we're aware of them.

So it's not a mistake if you find while you're doing the practice that feelings of frustration, of annoyance, of irritation, of anger are coming up. There are a few different things I'd like to say about that, because sometimes they can be mild and sometimes they can be strong. It's helpful to have a sense of how to work with those energies as they appear in the metta practice.

The first instruction around working with difficulties as they come up—and these kinds of difficulties, just to put it in the metta language, are what is called the far enemy of metta. They're experiences that come up that are not going to be mistaken for metta; they are kind of the opposite quality to metta. In working with these qualities, the first instruction that we try is just simply to keep going. Allow that feeling of ill will, of anger, of frustration to be there, but in the background. You don't have to get rid of it. You don't have to do anything with it. Just stay connected to saying the phrase, understanding the meaning of the phrase, and connecting with the being that you are wishing the metta for. It's very simple, just letting it be in the background.

When I did this month of metta practice, this actually was kind of a relief for me when I first understood how this worked. It was kind of like, oh, you mean I don't have to actually dive in and figure it out? I can just let it be and then just keep going with the metta?

And what happened often, when you can keep going with the metta and just let that feeling be in the background, is that the feeling runs its course. It passes away, and then you're just left with the practice of the metta—and perhaps a little bit of an opening of the heart as that feeling of ill will dies away.

So it was really quite a revelation to me to recognize the power of just letting something be in the background. We don't always have to turn and look at everything that comes up. It's not that we're repressing it. It's not that we're trying to fight it or push it down. It's simply that right now, we're going to keep going with this metta.

Now, sometimes these difficult energies are strong—much stronger—and they aren't going to stay in the background. They're going to come much more front and center. And if these energies seem to be connected in particular with the being that you're wishing well to—like, for instance, wishing metta for myself, saying "may I be happy, may I be healthy," and what comes up is all the reasons why it's not possible, or why I'm not worthy of it—those kinds of thoughts can arise in the mind. If they get really strong, then it can be helpful to move or shift the metta practice to an easier being. So if you find it easier to wish metta towards a benefactor or a very easy being, you can switch the practice and see if that allows those difficult energies to be held or to release.

And if they're even stronger than that—if they seem to have taken root, these difficult energies—then you can drop the metta practice for a short time and bring mindfulness to your experience. Just allow yourself to turn towards that feeling and explore: How does it feel in my body? How does it impact my mind? If the difficult feeling dies away with the mindfulness practice, then you can simply return back to the metta practice.

So that's working with the far enemy. And then there's also what's called the near enemy of metta, which is a kind of energy that is similar to metta—so it might be confused with this quality of connection and love—but it's got a little bit of clinging, a little bit of attachment to it. It's a quality of caring with an agenda, a quality of caring with an expectation of something in return. It's got this selfish attachment; it's just slightly not unconditional. The pure quality of metta has no conditions on it. It's an unconditional well-wishing. No need for anything in return.

So if there's a sense of "I'll love you if..." or "I hope you're happy, but I hope you make me happy"—that kind of hoping for some reciprocity—just notice that. Again, just notice that there is some attachment there. There's no need to try to push that away either. Just recognize that that energy is present for you.

So let's begin the practice.

It's helpful for metta in particular to find as comfortable a posture as you can, allowing your body to be relaxed—as relaxed and comfortable as you can. You might want to start by just allowing your attention to rest in your heart center. And just notice what's there. What's the experience there? No right or wrong—just getting a sense of how the heart feels right now.

Sometimes I find it helpful to have the sense of breathing through my heart. You can play with that. If it doesn't resonate, just let it go.

And then, allowing yourself to call to mind—choose for yourself whether you'd like to begin this afternoon with yourself or with an easy being, a benefactor, a being for whom it's very easy, an uncomplicated relationship, for whom it's easy to feel that sense of connection and well-wishing. Choose for yourself whether you'd like to start with the benefactor or yourself.

Calling to mind for yourself a sense of either being with that person, if it's the benefactor, or an image of that person—or for yourself, perhaps the felt sense of yourself sitting here right now, or perhaps an image of yourself at a time in your life when you were particularly happy, a time when you felt good.

And for this being—either yourself or the benefactor—call to mind things that you like about that being. Qualities that you appreciate, or actions that you've appreciated. It's said that seeing the beautiful, seeing these kinds of qualities, is the near cause or the proximate cause for metta to arise. So it can help to reflect for a few moments about these qualities.

And begin connecting to this being, either yourself or the benefactor, with the image or sense of the being. And begin expressing the wishes of kindness, of caring, of goodwill.

May you be happy, or may I be happy. With each phrase, take a moment after you've expressed it to come back and check in, in the area of the heart. Just check in again—what's happening there? And then the next phrase: May you be healthy. May you be safe. May you live with ease.

Continue the mental practice with your own phrases. I know that Greg suggested some alternatives and encouraged you to think of your own. Whatever phrases feel most congruent or resonant for you, continue with them and practice for this being. After some time, switch to the other—to self if you're doing benefactor, and to benefactor if you're doing self.

Now call to mind the other being. If you've been doing benefactor, switch to self. If you've been doing self, switch to the easy being. Again, start by connecting with qualities that you appreciate, kind actions, allowing your attention to rest in the heart as you recall this being. Begin to express the wishes of goodwill, refreshing and reconnecting with the feeling in the heart center with each phrase.

Now open out the metta to express the wish of happiness and goodwill towards all beings everywhere. For me, this initially felt kind of conceptual, but just say the phrase—may all beings be happy, or whichever phrases you have found that resonate for yourself. Then kind of relax and open your mind to perhaps senses or images of beings that may be around the planet, whether they're animal or insect or persons, whether they're struggling beings or happy beings, whether they're children or adults or teenagers. May all beings be happy.

Again, refresh the sense in the area of the heart, connecting with how it impacts the heart to make this wish. May all beings be healthy. Sometimes it's helpful to imagine waves of metta spreading out over the land and just meeting whoever's in its path. May all beings be safe. May all beings be at ease. Continue expressing the wishes of goodwill towards all beings everywhere.

I've left a few minutes in case there are any questions about this practice. Does anybody have any questions about the metta practice?

Someone shares: "I found that at times it was a little hard to breathe, and even my heart felt as if it was pounding."

All kinds of things will happen to us. Just see if you can accept that. Were you wishing metta for yourself or for the other? When was it happening? Did you start with yourself and then switch? And when you switched to benefactor, did it make it easier?

So that could be in the terrain of difficulties that come up—there's sometimes for ourselves a little constriction around this wish. This was a surprise to me. It seems to be a surprise to Asian teachers. The Buddha, in teaching this, treated it as the most natural thing in the world—that of course we all wish ourselves happiness and love. It's not even a question that this is easy to do. Our Western culture seems to have a different way of raising beings, because we seem to have this widespread sense of it being more difficult to wish ourselves well.

There can be a kind of contraction or tightness. I used to feel like there was a band of steel around my chest, this tightness whenever I tried to do the metta practice—not only for myself but for others. It was very, very painful, almost physically painful. So just notice that, breathe with it, breathe through it. If it helps, in practicing on your own, see if switching to the easier being allows it to release, to relax a little bit.

One thing you can play with—and this comes from my colleague Gil Fronsdal—he suggests that when you find a being that's pretty easy to wish metta for, if you have difficulty wishing metta for yourself, just from time to time while you're wishing metta for that being, slip yourself in there. Just once. Let yourself ride in that wave of goodwill that's generated for that being, and then go back to the benefactor again. Get the sense of the possibility of having that feeling of connection with yourself.

Greg offered yesterday some different ways to include this practice during the day. I'd just like to echo that: if you find this practice helpful, you can pick another sitting during the day in which to work with it, or perhaps begin each sitting with a little bit of metta.

And we'll end the day, every day, with the metta chanting that we do.

If you find this practice really challenging, if it's hard and you don't connect with it very much at all, you don't have to force yourself. I would encourage you to just come to this sitting and sit in the field of working with this practice for this period, but you can let it go for the rest of the time.

It was a number of years before this practice really resonated for me. It took a long time for my heart to really soften. And for me, the softening came through the mindfulness practice. These two—the mindfulness practice and the metta practice—really can work together. The mindfulness practice can be a heart-opening practice as well. And for me, that's how my heart began to open: through meeting experience, just being willing to meet experience in this nonjudgmental, nonreactive way.

A nonjudgmental, nonreactive quality of mind is a quality of metta. And so the mindfulness practice will be cultivating this quality of metta.

But if this practice does resonate for you, use it. Use it as much as feels appropriate and helpful for you.

CHAPTER 80

Questions

Andrea Fella · 11 min

> In this intimate Q&A session, Andrea Fella offers gentle guidance on working with common meditation experiences. She begins by encouraging practitioners to hold instructions lightly, sharing wisdom from her Burmese teacher: 'Nothing I tell you is anything for you to do—it is information that perhaps wouldn't have occurred to you.' This approach allows the mind to naturally explore experience without forcing or striving.
> Fella clarifies the relationship between the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) and the sense doors, explaining that mindfulness of the body (kāyānupassanā) as taught by the Buddha primarily concerns the touch sense—including breathing, posture, and elements—while the other senses are addressed in the fourth foundation. She emphasizes simplicity: just notice what is obvious in this moment.
> The discussion addresses practical challenges including working with dreaminess during meditation. Rather than viewing such states as problems to eliminate, Fella suggests acknowledging them with mindfulness and making gentle adjustments like opening the eyes slightly. She also explores how the mind creates visual recognition of experience, such as when feeling wetness triggers an image of a dripping spring. This perceptual process, related to saññā (perception), can be noted as 'seeing' without needing to suppress it. The key is recognizing these moments before they lead to extended mind-wandering.

Sometimes the instructions seem kind of complicated, and I want to just give you permission to not think about them or worry about them or try to do them too much.

One of my teachers, my Burmese teacher, says nothing he tells us is anything for us to do. But it is information that perhaps wouldn't have occurred to us. And having that information in your exploration of your experience, just as you are practicing, being aware—having that information can offer different ways that your mind will start to explore experience without you really having to do it.

So be really relaxed around the instructions. As we're offering them over these days, it can sound like a lot, but really it can be very simple. Just notice what is obvious in this moment of experience. As the mindfulness starts to get more continuous, it strengthens the power of our ability to see more and more. We don't have to try to find all of these things. Just do your practice. Just keep tapping on that scooter. Keep noticing moment after moment: Am I aware, and what am I aware of? Anchoring your attention to support this in your breathing, or in the body sensations, or in hearing—whichever is most congenial for you.

We have a few minutes for questions this morning.

Question about mindfulness of the body and the sense doors.

Mindfulness of the body is about being as aware as you can be in the moment of what's happening at all the different sense doors. The mindfulness of the body is actually primarily at the touch sense, the way the Buddha described it. He described many instructions around mindfulness of the body, but mindfulness of breathing, mindfulness of posture, mindfulness of elements are more about the touch sense. The other senses are included in the fourth foundation of mindfulness.

But don't worry about that too much. If you're noticing hearing, if you're noticing taste and touch—all those six things are going on, and the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral qualities associated with all of those. But this elemental piece I was describing, I wasn't describing the elemental nature of sight or of sound or of taste. There are different kinds of explorations in that realm. So primarily the instructions are around the touch sense of the body.

Question about drifting into dream states while using the breath as an anchor.

That's what's happening. So what we try to do is to wake up to what is happening. We don't try to change it so much, but we try to bring mindfulness to it.

What you're noticing is that there's a breath and then you may get lost into that dream state a little bit. There's probably some images coming, and there's maybe a little bit of getting lost. At some point you wake up into that dream state, and there's a recognition: "Oh, images or a dreamy quality is happening." At that moment, you can just acknowledge that—"Oh, dreaminess is happening"—and then you can choose to come back to the breath, because you're now aware again.

It's also possible to watch the mind kind of move in and out of that dreaminess and be completely aware in that dreamy space. So check in and see how aware you are. My guess is that probably what's happening is that you're waking up into that dreaminess.

That kind of state happens partly because the mind is settling down. The dreamy quality comes—it's kind of a subtler kind of thinking that arises when the mind settles a little bit, but there's not a lot of energy. One way you can play with that, one of the best ways I find when I get into that kind of state, is just open your eyes and pay attention to the breath with your eyes just open and down-focused. That gives just a little bit of energy into the system that will help keep you alert. You'll find that your eyes will close and you'll drift back into dreaminess.

None of it is a problem. We just wake up, we're aware when we're aware, and we make adjustments as we know is skillful. But to try to say "dreaming is bad, I need to be with my breath"—that's adding a kind of pressure and aversion to your meditation that's not necessary. So you notice, "Oh, dreaminess," and that's okay.

And then you may notice that two or three times, and if it feels like the dreaminess is taking over, open your eyes.

A question arose: "I was feeling the wetness you were talking about, the fluidity in my mouth, and I got an image of a dripping spring. Is that commentary? Should I note it as commentary?"

My guess is that this is your mind recognizing the experience in a visual way. It's probably in that realm of perception—like when you're hearing a sound and your mind registers "car." It's an identification of experience. Your mind is trying to create a recognition of what this is.

You don't need to stop it. You've just noticed that it happened. You can note it if you wish. Sometimes I find it really helpful to acknowledge that even though the eyes are closed, the mind is exploring experience through the visual field. Images arise. I find it helpful to use "seeing" as an acknowledgment when that happens—just recognizing the process of what's going on.

I wouldn't try to stop that kind of experience, but noticing that it happens is helpful, because that's a prime place where we recognize something. You said there was the image of a dripping spring. If you hadn't noticed that, what might have happened next is that you'd be off someplace looking at a spring in Hawaii, and then suddenly you'd be on the beach, and then you're gone.

So the fact that you see it gives you the opportunity to recognize: this is just the mind doing its recognizing process. Then you simply come back to the feeling of the wetness. And often when you recognize these images, they disappear. Did it disappear when you recognized it?

Yes.

This is how awareness works. We notice, we acknowledge, and the mind naturally settles back into direct experience.

So enjoy your day of mindfulness on this snowy day.

CHAPTER 81

The Hindrances

Andrea Fella · 56 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers detailed guidance on working skillfully with the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa): sense desire (kāmacchanda), ill will (byāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and anxiety (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), she reframes these challenging mental states not as enemies to be conquered, but as legitimate objects of mindfulness practice found in the fourth foundation.

Fella presents the Buddha's systematic approach to each hindrance: recognizing when it is present or absent, understanding the conditions that give rise to it, and discovering what supports its cessation. She shares the traditional analogies—water colored with dye for sense desire, wind-rippled water for restlessness—while offering practical contemporary guidance. A key teaching throughout is the importance of turning attention 180 degrees: rather than focusing on what we want or dislike, we observe the feeling of wanting or disliking itself in the body.

Particularly valuable is her guidance on discerning when mindfulness can meet these energies and when they overwhelm us like a tsunami. She offers skillful alternatives for overwhelming states, such as grounding attention in the feet or hands rather than trying to directly confront difficult emotions. The talk concludes with Rumi's "Guest House" poem, reinforcing the invitation to welcome all mental states as guides on the path to understanding dukkha and finding freedom.

Tonight I'd like to explore some energies that come up in our practice, some mental energies, some mind states that we can get caught in and that we can struggle with.

The Buddha identified five particular energies that are challenging for us. And in his usual way of creating lists, he gave this list a name: the hindrances. These are five mental energies, and they are sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and anxiety, and doubt.

The Buddha called them hindrances because they tend to hinder our ability to settle into meditation, to become concentrated. This name, hindrance, is a translation of the Pali term nivarana. But this translation often makes us think or feel that if it's a hindrance, it means we can't meditate when it's there. There's a sense that if we're experiencing one of these energies, it's a real problem that has to be gotten rid of, and that we can't meditate. So we tend to have an antagonistic relationship with these mental energies.

Yet the Buddha, while saying that they hinder our ability to get concentrated, at the same time said that they are perfectly valid, legitimate experiences with which to cultivate mindfulness. In his discourse on the four foundations of mindfulness, the Satipatthana Sutta, which we've been talking about, he mentioned these hindrances as experiences that we can be mindful of. They're found in the fourth foundation of mindfulness, where he described ways to be mindful of these difficult energies.

So not only is it possible to be mindful of sense desire, of ill will, of sloth and torpor—or sleepiness and dullness, as another way to put that one—of restlessness and anxiety, and of doubt. Not only is it possible, it's extremely helpful. It's very valuable for us to learn how to be mindful of these states of mind.

These states of mind are usually experienced as unpleasant, or when we begin to become aware of them, we usually experience them as problematic. We experience them as dukkha, as suffering. I talked about this word dukkha recently—that sense of unease, of our lives being off-center or out of kilter, an out-of-balance kind of feeling. The word suffering tends to make us think of large suffering, but the term dukkha is much broader than that. These mental energies, these hindrances, are usually experienced as dukkha. They are a form of suffering for us.

But the Buddha's whole exploration, his whole path, was around exploring this suffering. He said he found a way to freedom from suffering, but it wasn't through somehow magically transcending that suffering. It was through meeting it, going through it, understanding it. And so this is the recommendation with these hindrances. As a form of suffering, we meet them. We understand them. We explore them with mindfulness in order to understand them.

This is the key that the Buddha offered around dukkha: understand dukkha. This will lead you to freedom from dukkha.

Being mindful of difficult experience, being mindful of dukkha, means meeting it, being with it, but not indulging in it. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita in Burma, described this kind of meeting experience as being a rubbing—that we rub our experience as if we were polishing a bowl with a soft cloth. This image has been really helpful for me as a way to think about exploring and being with our experience. It's not trying to forcefully pick it apart. It's opening our hearts to and meeting our experience.

This understanding of dukkha that the Buddha suggested is observing experience directly—observing this unease, this dissatisfaction, all of the struggles that we have—not thinking about it, not analyzing it, but being willing to be with it. Almost as if you'd be willing to be with a small child who was in pain. That kind of being with.

This understanding that comes with mindfulness, with this willingness to be with, begins to allow these difficult energies to dissipate. It's kind of a magic thing in a way. It's the understanding that frees us. This is what the third noble truth is about: the possibility for freedom from suffering comes from the letting go of holding on to wanting things to be other than they are, this being the source of all of our dukkha.

The understanding that comes from being with allows us to begin—it's not that we let go of these difficulties; it's that they begin to let go of themselves as they are met with this mindfulness.

So I'd like to just offer you, briefly, the paraphrased version of the instructions the Buddha offers for the hindrances in the Fourth Foundation of Mindfulness. And just hearing these, I think, can be helpful. I'm not going to try to cover all of these in this talk—that would take several evenings—but I'd like to put them out there.

So he says, first of all, for all of these states—I'll just use sense desire as an example and then restate the pattern for the others so that you can get a sense of the structure. For sense desire, we recognize when sense desire is present, and we recognize when sense desire is absent. That's an interesting one to think about. Noticing when these difficult energies are not present actually supports us.

We begin to get familiar with the causes and conditions that lead to these hindrances, that lead to sense desire coming into being. What are the situations that you get into that make sense desire come up? And then we can learn the conditions that help sense desire to not appear. So essentially, in part by seeing the conditions that make it appear, we learn conditions that support sense desire not appearing. This also involves understanding and exploring what skillful qualities of mind, wholesome qualities of mind, serve to counter sense desire.

These same instructions are offered for ill will—noticing presence and absence of ill will, noticing what conditions allow it to arise, noticing what conditions support it not arising. Likewise for sloth and torpor, likewise for restlessness and anxiety, and likewise for doubt.

So he offered some very specific things for us to play with, to observe, to explore around these hindrances. Given that I can't cover all of these this evening, what I'd like to primarily talk about is what it means to be present for, what it means to explore and investigate these states when they are present. So that's that first instruction: recognize when the hindrance is present. We'll begin to explore that side of it.

The other piece that I'd like to bring in a little bit is what to do, how to work, some suggestions for how to work with these energies when they're kind of overwhelming—because we can't always bring mindfulness to these difficult energies. We can think about these energies as having a certain level of momentum or a certain level of energy. And our mindfulness, in meeting that—if our mindfulness doesn't have the same level of energy or cultivation or development as that hindrance does, it's like the hindrance is a tsunami and our mindfulness is just this little trickling stream. We can get swamped by these energies. So we need to become aware, cognizant of times when mindfulness is not necessarily the right approach for us and we need to do something else, to take some action to bring ourselves into some kind of balance around these energies.

So the first: sense desire. This is the desire to have pleasant sense experience at our five physical sense doors—seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching. This is that wish to be surrounded by pleasant experience. Generally this desire is fueled by a belief—I think I talked about this a few days ago—it's fueled by a belief that having this sense pleasure is how we can be happy. That being able to surround ourselves by pleasant sense experience is the road to happiness.

For each of these hindrances, the Buddha offers an analogy. I'll give you the analogy with each one that I talk about. And the analogy involves a bowl of water. They used to use bowls of water to reflect, so that they could see themselves—it was a form of mirror that they used. The analogy about sense desire is that the water has been laced with dye, colorful swirling colors in the water. Because of the swirling colors, we become entranced by them and can't see our reflection. We can't see clearly because we're entranced by the colors.

This is the way sense desire functions for us. We become entranced with this notion that pleasant experiences are what is going to make us happy, and we can't really see clearly. We can't see how that entrancement is actually keeping us on a cycle of just wanting to get something, wanting to get the next thing, wanting, wanting, wanting.

Sense desire keeps us from being present, keeps us from being in the present moment, because we are pulled out of the here and now in order to figure out how we're going to get that next moment of sense pleasure, even if it's only a few seconds away.

We feel like life is going to be better if we get that thing. But what's happening is that we're actually giving up peacefulness here and now for the possibility of a few moments of sense pleasure sometime in the future.

It's not really the sense pleasure itself that's the issue here. It's the desire that is the problem.

It's the desire that's fueling us out of the present moment to get the next thing.

Living our lives, we are going to have a stream of experiences. Some of them are going to be pleasant, some of them are going to be unpleasant, and some of them are going to be neutral. That flow is just going to happen. But we don't just let that flow happen. We try to stop it at the pleasant ones, try to get rid of the unpleasant ones. So it's not the pleasant experiences that are an issue here. It's this desire to create a world in which there is only pleasant experience. Or the belief, actually—it's the belief that that is the way to happiness.

So what does it mean to explore sense desire? Well, with sense desire our mind is turned outwards to the world. We are focused on things out there, trying to figure out how to maneuver the world to have the pleasant experience we'd like. The helpful instruction around sense desire is to see if you can let go of the attention outwards to the things that we want. Instead, it's like turning the attention 180 degrees around and looking at the experience of what it feels like to want something. This is bringing mindfulness to the experience of sense desire itself. We don't resist it, we don't try to stop it, and we don't indulge in it. This movement of turning towards the experience of sense desire is a way of not indulging it, because in the turning towards we're not acting on it. We're not trying to fulfill that desire. We're simply trying to watch: What is this desire?

This is the understanding that the Buddha talks about. Sense desire is an energy that pulls us into dukkha. It doesn't inherently seem like it would pull us into dukkha, but I mentioned some of the ways it does the other day. If we desire something and we're trying to get it and we don't get it, there's the dukkha right there. If we desire something and we get it, it doesn't seem like there should be dukkha there—but then we may be feeling like we have to protect it and defend it, and we get anxious and afraid that it's going to go. We've gotten something we like finally, and how can I keep it? How can I hold on to it? So there can be a feeling of anxiety around it. Or it could get lost. It could get broken. It could get stolen. No longer ours.

So we're not indulging in that sense desire, we're not trying to fulfill it—we're just simply trying to observe it, turning towards that feeling.

Now, sense desire, and actually most of these hindrances, come with some kinds of thinking. "This is what I need. This is how I have to do this. This is very important. This is what's going to make me happy." Those kinds of thoughts are going, and scheming—our thoughts are scheming how to make this sense pleasure come to us.

So there are two pieces to this exploration. One is seeing if you can let go of the thoughts and not engage in the thinking process around sense desire, and instead turn towards the feeling in the body. There's probably some kind of feeling in the body, especially when sense desire is strong. For me, it feels like I'm being pulled like a magnet towards something. That's one way it feels. Or if I'm really moving towards something, it can kind of feel like—I'll give you an image. When swimmers come to the end of a lap and they coil themselves up into a ball in order to shoot themselves out into the pool, that energy of coiling up and shooting out in a direction—sometimes that's the way sense desire feels. Eagerness. That's the feeling of eagerness: "Oh, yeah, that—that's going to make me happy." It has that feeling of propelling in a direction.

So getting a sense of what it feels like—what does this energy of desire feel like? We can play with simple desires, simple sense desires, as a way to explore this. The energies are the same whether it's a small desire or a large desire, and there's a lot of learning that we can come to by exploring even very simple sense desires.

One day I was driving to the meditation center to teach a class, and I got stopped at a red light. I was sitting there at the red light, and there was a Starbucks just across the intersection.

Seeing the Starbucks, the mind went, "Oh, latte—that would be nice." I felt the desire spring up at that moment. Having done a lot of this practice, I thought, "Okay, I'm just going to pay attention. Just going to pay attention to this feeling. Not going to act on it, just going to watch it."

What I saw was that once the light turned green and I managed to drive past the Starbucks without turning into the driveway, as soon as Starbucks was out of my field of vision, that desire was gone. This is a learning. While it was in my field of vision, my mind thought it was the thing that would make me feel really good. Then it was just forgotten when I drove past.

So explore in your own experience these little wantings. See if you can not act on them necessarily, and play with what you can learn about sense desire. What can you learn about your own mind? In that case, there was a learning that some sense desires—not all of them, but some—are fueled simply by having something in proximity. Once it's out of proximity, it's out of sight, out of mind.

Sometimes we do have some challenge with sense desire. It can get strong, and we need discernment to recognize whether we are actually able to be mindful of sense desire or whether we're indulging it. Sense desire can appear as a fantasy in our minds, and we can think, "Oh yeah, I'll just be mindful of this fantasy." We let the fantasy run. But what we're really doing is indulging the fantasy as opposed to being mindful of what's going on.

We need discernment to know when we're allowing and observing and when we're indulging. A key for this would be: if you're indulging the fantasy, you're probably getting lost in it and not terribly mindful. When we try to bring our attention to sense desire and find we keep getting lost in it, then it may be time to take some other kind of action—to learn a skillful ignoring. Just let that be to the side. Don't put your attention there. Actively put your attention somewhere else for a while—in your feet, perhaps. It's learning how to ignore something without aversion, without hatred. Just, "Nope, I'm going to put that aside and pay attention to something else."

The second of these difficult energies, ill will, is the sense of disliking things. It is rooted in a belief that our happiness depends on getting rid of unpleasant experience or getting ourselves away from it. It can have the impact of actively pushing something away, or we say, "I can't be here, I need to get out of here." It pulls us away from the present by making us feel we have to get rid of things in this moment. Again, it's that unwillingness to be with what's actually here because we think our happiness depends on changing it. "If only I could get rid of this state of mind, this knee pain, this pain in the back—then I could meditate."

As we begin to explore the energy of ill will, what we actually start to see is that it's the wanting to get rid that is creating the difficulty, creating the agitation. Being able to settle down to meditate doesn't depend on getting rid of that energy. It's just a reorientation.

This is very similar to sense desire in a way. With ill will, we're often focused outward on the thing we don't like, trying to fix it, change it, get rid of it, control it, or figure out how to remove ourselves. The movement is to turn toward the feeling of ill will itself. We take our attention out of the thing triggering the dislike and turn toward the feeling of ill will.

See if you can let go of the thoughts fueling the ill will—thoughts like "I can't stand this," "This has got to go," "This is a problem." All those thoughts reinforce the ill will. Turn attention away from them. See if you can let go of the thoughts and turn attention to the body. What does it feel like in the body?

Ill will does not feel pleasant at all. It's a difficult experience to learn how to be present for. But as we start to explore it, we actually see that it's easier to be with the feeling of ill will than to be caught in this state of being trapped by it, trapped by the belief that acting on it is the only way to happiness.

Now, I do want to say that what I'm talking about here—not acting on ill will and just turning to the experience—this we can always do in meditation. It's always helpful to refrain from acting on ill will in meditation. In our daily lives, we need to be careful about what we mean by that. Sometimes we can have the sense that if we don't like something, we should just sit there passively and not do anything about it.

That's not really the teaching. The teaching isn't about just being passively a lump on a log while unpleasant things are coming at you. We can take action to get ourselves out of the way of difficult situations or to take care of situations that are creating danger.

For instance, you see a child running out into the road. You're not going to just sit there observing, "Oh, fear is happening in the body." You're going to run out and try to stop that child. It demands some action. Now there may be some aversion happening, some ill will arising around the feeling of fear. But we can actually act out of compassion there. So the teaching on not acting out of ill will doesn't mean that we don't act when we see something difficult or wrong in the world. What we try to do is act out of compassion rather than out of that ill will. It's possible to change something and to want to change something without hating that thing. I just wanted to make that clear.

It's also important to recognize that with ill will, at least in my own experience, sometimes the experience can feel like a tsunami. We can get overwhelmed by ill will, and it feels very difficult to be mindful of it. A skillful way to deal with this is very similar to the overwhelm I talked about with sense desire, when we can't really meet it with mindfulness. Can you allow that ill will to be there, but not directly meet it?

Sometimes what seems to happen is that when we directly try to meet a difficult energy of ill will—and there are many flavors of this: anger, frustration, irritation, annoyance, rage—those emotions can get very strong, stronger than our ability to meet them with mindfulness. When that happens, we try to bring mindfulness to those emotions and we just feel like we get sucked into the black hole of them. That's a clue that it's not so helpful to try to bring mindfulness to those emotions directly.

So again, that kind of setting aside, "not now," is how I work with this. It's like, "Okay, I see you. I see you, anger, but you stay over there, do your thing. I'm going to put my attention in my feet. I'm going to do some walking, and I'm just going to pay attention to my feet." Learning when you're in a state of overwhelm and beginning to learn skillful ways to redirect the attention is key.

For ill will, I really recommend that people find or learn to cultivate some kind of experience that is outside of the main core of the body. Because if you try to use the breathing, a lot of people say, "Well, I just try to come back to the breathing when I'm noticing the anger, and I just get caught back in the anger." A lot of the feelings associated with ill will happen in the area of the torso. So if you're feeling a lot of anger and you're trying to pay attention to breathing in this part of the body, you're likely to get mixed up with the feelings of the ill will.

I like to suggest that people cultivate something else. Hearing is a good one for ill will—it takes you out of the physical body, and you can simply attend to sounds. Unless, of course, the sound is what's creating the ill will, which can happen. So hearing is good, or putting your attention in your hands or your feet. Something grounding—your buttocks touching the chair or cushion. Something to allow you to stabilize while you let that experience be in the background. Again, it's not repression. It's not pushing away. It's kind of a gentle "not now."

The third of these hindrances is sloth and torpor, or sleepiness and dullness. This often comes with low energy. The mind and body are in a low energy state—that's the sleepiness side of things, when the body has low energy. When the mind is low energy, it can just feel dull and foggy, or thick, kind of like pea soup. The mind feels unclear.

We typically get agitated around this state because we think, especially if we're trying to meditate—if we're going to sleep, it's not a problem. But if we're sitting in the meditation hall trying to meditate and we feel sleepy or dull, it feels like a problem. How many of you have had the thought, "I can't meditate because I'm too sleepy"?

What I'd like to propose is this: if you can have that thought—"I'm too sleepy to meditate"—then you have enough mindfulness to at least explore what it means to be mindful of sleepiness.

Let me offer an analogy I've found really helpful. I've talked about mindfulness being like a mirror that reflects what it experiences. It doesn't care what it's reflecting—it can reflect beautiful things or ugly things, and the quality of the mirror is not changed by what it reflects. Now think about that mirror after you've been in the shower, when it's all steamed up with fog. If you're trying to use that mirror to see your reflection, it's not going to work very well because it's covered with steam. But you know, just knowing how mirrors work, that mirror is doing its job perfectly. It is reflecting every drop of water perfectly. It's not doing what you want it to do, but it's doing its job.

What I'd like to propose is that when the mind is dull or foggy or sleepy, there can actually be enough energy to simply recognize: sleepiness is happening, dullness is happening. If you're trying to use that dull or sleepy mind to pay attention to the breath with all its different sensations, or you have some agenda about what you need to be paying attention to, it's going to be frustrating. But mindfulness can perfectly reflect that dullness, that sleepiness, that fogginess.

One thing I've discovered in exploring this is that when I play with it this way, not resisting the sleepiness, it's not actually a problem if you're sleepy or dull when meditating. It's only a problem because you think it's a problem. It's your idea that makes it a problem. When I turn my attention to the feeling of sleepiness without resistance, the experience transforms. But when I do resist it, trying to do something else, the feeling of sleepiness becomes really unpleasant. I think most of you have experienced that—sleepiness feels terrible when you're trying to meditate and pay attention to something. But if you don't resist the sleepiness and simply allow yourself to observe it, it's actually quite pleasant. It feels really good.

This is a little carrot for you, a way to hopefully get you interested in exploring sleepiness, because it can feel remarkably pleasant—just observing the feeling of sleepiness come over you. The body gets deeply relaxed. The brain goes into this lovely vibratory state. I explored this on one retreat where it became clear to me this was possible. I watched all these feelings descend through the body, this mind going into this state. And I got to the place where I could see right before the body dropped. I could know right before I was going to fall over. And in seeing that, I could just straighten up my body a little, open my eyes, let a bit of energy come in, then close my eyes and let the whole thing happen over again. It was like the best Disneyland ride. It was so much fun to play with sleepiness.

Now, there are times when the mind is too sleepy, when there's more sleepiness than mindfulness. It takes some kind of balance between the two. But it's possible more often than you think to be mindful of sleepiness. If you explore this and find that you just end up nodding off for ten minutes, well then, when you come back into awareness, stand up, open your eyes. Perhaps at the next walking period, do some faster walking, bring some energy into the body. These are ways to work with that energy when it's a little too much for our mindfulness.

There's another side to this difficult energy, and that's the thick mind—the torpor, the dullness, the pea-soup mind. It's possible to just know that pea soup. And again, without resistance, it's possible to see that state. One of the antidotes to that state is counterintuitive. If you find that state so thick that you just continually disappear into that fog, one remedy is to bring a little more precision to how you're paying attention. Try to notice the sensations at the very beginning of the in-breath. See if you can know the first sensations as the breath begins. See what happens. It's counterintuitive, but it works because making effort like that generates some energy. Just doing that can begin to clear up the pea-soupy mind.

The next of these energies is restlessness and anxiety. This too has both a physical and mental component, much like sloth and torpor has the physical sleepiness and the mental pea-soup quality. Restlessness in the body has a quality that's deeply unpleasant—it feels like jumping beans under your skin, like your nerves feel itchy. It's really uncomfortable. The agitated mind has the quality of feeling like it can't land anywhere. It touches something and then goes someplace else, and someplace else, and someplace else. It just feels scattered.

It doesn't feel like it can collect and attend to anything.

Oh, I've been forgetting to tell you the analogies! Let me share the one for this hindrance. You have a bowl of water, and you're trying to see your reflection, but the wind is blowing and the surface is rippled with agitation. So there's that constant disturbance on the surface.

With physical restlessness—that jumping bean quality—the thing I've found most helpful is to see if you can let the attention get really big. Allow that feeling of the jumpy bean body to expand as big as the room. Sometimes when we try to be mindful of something like restlessness, it's like we attempt to contain awareness within the body. This becomes almost like a pressure cooker, tightening down on the experience and making it even more agitated. But if you just explore with curiosity—what would happen if I allow this feeling of restlessness to get as big as it wants?—it's like giving it more space, so it doesn't have quite that agitated quality. Let your mind get really big and allow that feeling to expand as much as it needs to.

With restlessness in the mind—the mental kind—it's often helpful to check in and see if there's some emotion happening underneath. Because when the mind gets restless, when it's spinning in thought, there's often an emotion beneath those spinning thoughts. If you can just check in—what else is going on here? Is there some emotion present?—you may find worry, anxiety, regret, remorse, something stirring beneath the surface.

In that kind of situation, the movement is again about letting go of thoughts. See if you can release the thoughts associated with the spinning mind and ground your attention in the body—in how that emotion manifests physically. We'll talk more about this tomorrow morning: how to pay attention to emotions through our bodily experience.

So you feel remorse—how does that remorse impact your body? You feel fear—how does that fear impact your body? Tightness, constriction in the throat, a feeling of jumpiness in the stomach. Ground your attention in the body. When we ground our attention there, we're closer to the actual experience. We're not allowing attention to remain in the thoughts, which tend to fuel the whole cycle around the experience.

Again, there are times when restlessness can get too strong. If you're trying to bring mindfulness to this difficult state and you get swamped—you just feel lost in the restlessness—then it's probably helpful to take some other action. Open your eyes. Go for a walk. Go out in nature. These kinds of things are really helpful when mind and body are deeply restless.

The last of the five hindrances is doubt. The doubt referred to here is doubt around the practice, doubt around our ability to practice, doubt in the teachings, doubt in the teachers. It's not doubt like, "Can I go skydiving? Do I have enough courage?" That's not what we're talking about here. This is doubt specifically around the practice.

The description of doubt is that it creates a wavering—the mind wavers back and forth. There's an analogy: someone in doubt is like someone lost in a desert. You take a few steps this way, think, "Oh, that can't be right," go back and take a few steps that way, "Oh, that can't be right." It's that wavering, that vacillation—the quality of doubt. The mind can't decide what to do. Or it flip-flops: I should do that. No, no, I should do that. No, I should do that.

Or you find the mind spinning in logical arguments about the practice: "I should be doing this kind of practice. I shouldn't be doing this mindfulness practice. I should be doing some kind of dancing practice instead." Sometimes these thoughts can sound very wise. They have a rationality to them.

So the key with doubt is really learning to recognize when it's happening—because doubt is a great deceiver.

Doubt can completely trick us into thinking we are entirely rational and wise in our reflections. For me, one of the big clues that doubt is happening is that I'm having a lot of thoughts about the practice, about my ability to practice, about what kind of practice I should be doing at this moment. "Oh, metta right now. No, no, mindfulness of breathing. Oh, no, open awareness." If I'm thinking about what I should be doing, that's a form of doubt. And just as a small piece of guidance right there—if that's the kind of doubt you're having, just pick one. It doesn't really matter. Just pick one.

Then there are doubts about the teachings themselves. "The Buddha lived 2,500 years ago. How can what he learned possibly apply to the twenty-first century?" If you're having thoughts like that, if you can just recognize, "Oh, this is doubt," that is two-thirds of the difficulty. Two-thirds of the battle around doubt is recognizing that doubt is happening.

Often there are emotions underneath doubt as well—feelings of vulnerability, feelings of insecurity, a fear of failure. That was a big one for me. Fear that if I don't do it right, I'm going to be a failure. And so my mind kept asking, "How can I do it right?" There was a lot of doubt in my mind about doing it right, motivated by this fear of failure. Fear of the unknown can also lead to doubt.

So just recognizing that doubt is happening is huge. And then we can begin to see what's underneath. What else is happening here? What emotion is going on? What's fueling this doubt?

In one practice period at Spirit Rock, I noticed that one afternoon I was caught in doubt for several hours. Finally, after all that time, I came to the surface and thought, "Oh, doubt—doubt is happening. What do I do with this?" I was really caught by it. I thought I had to get rid of the doubt in order to practice. That was my mind state. Finally, it was like, "Oh, doubt's what's happening. Maybe I should practice with doubt."

Immediately I recognized that there was a feeling underneath it. In this case, it was a feeling of grief, because I felt like I had lost my way, lost my faith in the practice, my confidence in the practice, and there was this feeling of grief. Having recognized, first, that doubt was happening, that I could be aware of it, and then the emotion underneath it—it passed within fifteen minutes. Just the willingness to meet it. I had been stuck in it for hours, and when I finally came up to be able to watch it, it dissipated very quickly. So that is the biggest key with doubt—just learning to recognize it.

We do have this feeling that these hindrances are somehow in the way of our practice. As I said, in that case of doubt, it felt like I had to get rid of this doubt in order to continue. We'll have that feeling at times. But the wanting to get rid of is just another hindrance. It's simply the hindrance of ill will.

The Buddha has told us we can be mindful of these hindrances. He's given us instructions on how to be aware of them. He didn't say push them away. He didn't use that "bear down, grit your teeth, get rid of" kind of instruction. He said notice it, observe it. When these energies, these hindrances, are seen with mindfulness, when we can bring that quality of mindful attention to our hindrances, they are not in the way of our practice. They are our practice. They become the path. They become the unfolding of our path.

They become the learning that is arising in this moment. We can use suffering as a guide. When we're suffering, there's something that needs to be understood. When these hindrances are present, there's something to understand. The understanding of that is what leads to freedom.

Really, truly, these hindrances are not in the way. I have had deep recognition of impermanence, of not-self, through the exploration of hindrances. Just a real recognition: this thought that's arising in my mind, this self-hatred that's arising in my mind, is a construct. It's empty. It's quite amazing to be able to witness our deep patterns, our deep difficult patterns, with mindfulness and begin to see how they can release and fall apart.

So these hindrances are going to be with us for a long time. The Buddha talked about the path of awakening unfolding in stages. He talked about there being four stages to awakening. At each stage of awakening, there's more freedom, more releasing, more letting go. And some of the teachings map these hindrances onto these stages.

At the first stage of awakening, it is said that doubt goes away. It's not until the third stage of awakening that sense desire and ill will go away. And it's not until the fourth, the final stage of awakening, that restlessness and anxiety and sloth and torpor go away.

So get used to them. Make friends with them. And get interested in them. Really, the interest—if you can bring some interest to this exploration, you will have much to learn and much benefit.

So that's my wish for you: that you can bring an interest to this exploration of these difficult states.

Let's sit for a moment. I'm going to drop a poem into your sitting. It's a poem some of you may have heard several times, by Rumi:

This being human is a guest house.
Every morning a new arrival—a joy, a depression, a meanness.
Some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor.
Welcome and entertain them all.
Even if they are a crowd of sorrows who violently sweep your house empty of its furniture, still treat each guest honorably.

He may be clearing you out for some new delight.
The dark thought, the shame, the malice—meet them at the door laughing and invite them in.
Be grateful for whatever comes because each has been sent as a guide from beyond.

CHAPTER 82

Andrea Fella · 47 min

> In this guided mettā meditation, Andrea Fella introduces the practice of extending loving-kindness to the neutral person—someone we neither like nor dislike, such as a bank teller, postal worker, or grocery clerk. This represents a significant turning point in mettā practice because the vast majority of beings in the world fall into this category of people unknown to us.
> Fella explains that working with neutral beings helps us discover our shared humanity and breaks through the subtle barriers we may hold around wishing others well. She offers the transitional phrase "Just as I wish to be happy, so too may you be happy" as a skillful way to bridge the connection. The talk addresses common challenges practitioners face, including boredom or disconnection with neutral beings, while noting that some practitioners actually find this easier than working with intimates, where complicated histories can arise.
> Using the beautiful analogy of Hawaiian mountain pools that overflow into one another, Fella describes how mettā naturally wants to expand outward when cultivated. She emphasizes that happiness is not a zero-sum game—the open heart's capacity for well-wishing is unlimited and grows through sharing. The guided practice moves from self to benefactor or friend, then to the neutral person, before opening to all beings everywhere.

So today I'd like to continue exploring the metta practice, and in our progress or movement through this practice, we learn about offering metta to different categories of beings.

We begin by offering metta to ourselves and to an easy person, a benefactor, and then move towards friends and dear ones. Then we move into the realm of people that we don't know at all—what we call a neutral person—and then we'll move on to people that are challenging.

In the practice of offering metta to specific beings, we are picking representatives of the range of categories of relationships that we have. We have relationships with ourselves, relationships with people who are dear to us, relationships with people we admire and respect and love greatly, relationships with people we don't know very well, and relationships with people who are difficult.

In this expanding practice of moving to offer metta to all beings, essentially what we're doing is trying on or playing with offering these wishes of kindness and goodwill to specific beings. Because sometimes when we offer metta to all beings, it's easy to overlook the fact that we can kind of delude ourselves—we overlook that we're in our minds wishing metta to all beings except this person or except that person. The practice of offering metta to people that we don't know very well and people that we have difficulty with begins to break through some of the barriers around wishing people well, some of the ways in which we may hold back from wishing people well. This begins to highlight for us some of the ways that we may resist sending metta.

Today I'd like to explore the neutral person, and this is kind of a turning point in the metta practice in terms of exploring offering the wishes of goodwill, for a couple of reasons.

One is that the practice is moving towards offering well-wishing to all beings everywhere, and the vast majority of all beings are really unknown to us. They fall into this category of what we might call a neutral being—we don't know much about them, so we don't really have an opinion one way or the other. When beings are in that category, when they're neutral to us, there's almost a sense of not caring too much. They're out of our realm, out of our line of sight, and we don't think too much about offering them good wishes. So this practice is highlighting this kind of person that we don't know very well and beginning to offer the wishes of goodwill. That's one reason why it's a turning point: it's moving us in the direction of really being able to connect with what it means to offer this heartfelt wish of well-being to somebody we don't know.

The other part of it is that in this exploration, we're moving from beings that we actually have some connection with—where there may already be a sense of that movement of kindness and good wishing—to beings that we don't know, and beginning to see that we can connect with a kind of shared humanity.

When we bring up somebody in our mind that we don't know well, it might be a good idea to start thinking about somebody you could choose for this category—a person that you can create an image of or know who they are. A bank teller, a grocery store clerk, a postal carrier. Maybe one of the other people on retreat, although by this point in the retreat there may not be true neutrality between you; there may already be a sense of connection or a little bit of struggle. Just pick somebody that feels relatively neutral to you.

One of the ways we try to connect is this: with people we know, one way to explore the metta practice is, in each phrase, to envision the person a little bit. If you have a visual sense, you could call up that person—"May you be happy"—and envision them doing something they really love. If you know that person really loves cross-country skiing, you might envision them doing something they're genuinely happy doing. Or with "May you be healthy," if you know some ways that person works to make themselves healthy, you can call that image up in your mind, and it makes for an easier connection to that phrase.

When we move to neutral people, we don't have any idea what would make them happy in the specific. But we do know some general things that would make people happy, just from knowing ourselves. A human being is happy when they're surrounded by people that care for them, when they have nourishing food and can take care of themselves. So we move into a place where we're exploring our shared humanity with people. This is another really powerful aspect of this exploration of the neutral person.

As we do this practice with the neutral person, there can be some difficulties. One kind of difficulty that people often run into is a sense of not having a connection with that being. Think of your postal carrier—we kind of lose interest because there's not that connection. Sometimes there can be a struggle: we get a little bored or lost because we can't really connect to the feeling.

On the other hand, sometimes it can actually be easier for people to work with the neutral person. For myself, I found that in working with a dear friend or people that I know, the way my mind works—some of you may have noticed something like this—is that I'd be saying, "May you be happy," and then immediately the mind would pick up and remember, "But then you did this and this. You did these things, and that wasn't so nice." My mind would pick up on almost the opposite. I talked about that metta-magnet: it was picking up on the opposite of metta with people I knew well because of the intimacy of the relationship. No intimate relationship is all perfectly wonderful.

With the neutral person, you have the advantage of not having that complication. For me, it was actually kind of nice moving to the neutral person because I could just have the sense of, "Well, this is a human being that wants to be happy."

And I wish that for them, whoever they are, whatever they like to do.

Another piece to clarify is that in wishing happiness for people, if somebody gets happiness out of being cruel, that is not a true kind of happiness. So we're not wishing for them to be happy in a way that is unwholesome. I just want to make sure you're aware of that. In wishing happiness for somebody, you're wishing for them to have the most beautiful kind of happiness, the most wholesome kinds of happiness and health and well-being.

The way this practice can unfold is that we begin by cultivating this quality of an open heart—this heart that can wish well for ourselves and for beings we're friendly with, the places where it's hopefully easiest to have that sense of openness. There's an analogy sometimes used in exploring how this practice works. If you envision a mountain stream where there are different pools—I think of a place in Hawaii, on Maui, called the Seven Pools, where there's a waterfall with these pools—the water flows down from the top and fills that first pool. When that pool is full, it overflows and goes down to the next pool. Then that pool fills and flows into the next one. There's a kind of refreshing of the flow because it's always welling up and then overflowing.

It's a similar image for mettā. We connect with this quality of the open heart, this well-wishing. And when we can resonate with that, there's a natural way, as the practice deepens, in which that well-wishing wants to flow over. One of the first times I really got this sense, I was in Burma, practicing mettā for about twenty minutes at the beginning of every sitting. At one point there was a real sense of mettā and happiness in my own being, and there was just this immediate sense of, "Oh yes, this is such a lovely experience, this kind of happiness and well-being. Of course I want others to feel this." So it very naturally moved outward.

I think sometimes we have a mistaken notion—at least I certainly had a mistaken notion—about happiness before I really connected with this practice. I thought happiness was a zero-sum game: if somebody else had some happiness, I wouldn't have access to happiness, or if I had some, it meant somebody else didn't have it. But it doesn't work that way, actually, this deeper kind of happiness. Perhaps the happiness of having material goods works that way, because there's a limited amount of material goods in the world. But the happiness of the open heart grows and can be unbounded. The more you connect with that possibility in your own heart, the more you wish it for others. And the more you see that quality in others, the more you feel it in yourself. It really grows. It nourishes itself. I don't think it has a limit to its possibility.

So in moving to the neutral person, the way we'll do the guided meditation today is to start with self for a few minutes. What I found as I actually started to connect with the mettā practice and was able to do it for myself—which took a while—was that very naturally, as I began to connect with that feeling of well-wishing for myself, it wanted to move outward. If I spent too much time doing mettā for myself, it began feeling a little stagnant, because it wants to flow outward.

So we'll begin today by offering mettā to ourselves for a few minutes, then move to either your friend or benefactor, whichever feels most congenial to you, and then on to the neutral person. We won't do everybody today because I want you to have some time to spend exploring the practice with the neutral person.

And again, if you find difficulty at any point in this practice, I'll remind you of the ways to work with that. You can start by seeing if you can let the difficulty be and keep going with the mettā for whoever you're offering it to. If it's too difficult, you can shift the person you're offering mettā to, moving to someplace or someone that's easier. And if you find that the whole thing is too difficult, shift back to the mindfulness practice and do mindfulness on the difficulties that have come up. If that eventually allows that wave of struggle to pass through, then you can come back to the mettā practice.

So we'll start by finding a comfortable posture, allowing your body to relax and settle. Bringing your attention into the area around your heart, just noticing what you feel there. No right or wrong—just whatever you're experiencing in that area. I like to sometimes have the sense of breathing through the heart area, the heart center, as if each breath can soften and relax, releasing holding in the heart.

Calling to mind some qualities that you like about yourself. And if this is a difficult process for you, I'll offer you some qualities that we all share here: this interest and willingness to meet our experience, to meet our struggles, our suffering, opening our heart to our own difficulties, opening our heart to this practice of wisdom, of compassion. This is an amazing thing we are engaged in here. So that's something you can appreciate about yourself.

However it makes the most sense for you to connect with yourself as a being—you could envision yourself doing something that makes you happy, or perhaps just connect with the feeling of yourself sitting here, the bodily sense of being here.

In offering the wishes of kindness to yourself, there is both the sending and the receiving of that wish. You could almost think of it as sending out this wave of metta, perhaps a mist or fog of metta that simply envelops you, and you are being drenched and soaked by this mist of metta.

May I be happy. May I be healthy. May I be safe. May I live with ease.

Continue for a few minutes offering yourself these wishes of goodwill, in whatever phrases work for you.

Now call to mind either your easy being, your benefactor, or your dear friend—whoever seems most present for you. Take a moment or two to recognize and recall the good qualities, the things you appreciate about this being. Then begin offering the wishes of goodwill, of kindness, of friendliness to this being. Say the phrase, understand its meaning, connect with the being, and with each phrase, refresh or reconnect with the area of the heart, just noticing what's happening.

Now bring to mind a neutral person, someone you don't know well. It can be helpful to offer a kind of transition phrase with the neutral person: "Just as I wish to be happy, so too may you be happy. Just as I wish to be healthy, so too may you be healthy. Just as I wish to live with ease, so too may you live with ease. Just as I wish to be safe, so too may you be safe." Continue offering these wishes of goodwill to your neutral person.

For the ending of the sitting, open up to offer metta to all beings, all beings everywhere. I often find it helpful to recall in this part of the practice that each one of us is one of all beings. So we are receiving this wish as well as sending it.

May all beings be happy. May all beings be healthy. May all beings be safe. May all beings live with ease.

Continue for a couple of minutes wishing metta to all beings.

After this sitting, a question arose about staying with one neutral person. When others kept popping into mind during the practice, this meditator wondered if that was problematic. I asked whether there was an energy of kindness as these people appeared, whether there was a sense of connection to the metta. When they confirmed there was, I encouraged them to let that happen.

There are two sides to metta practice. One side is the cultivation of this quality of metta—that's primarily how we're offering it this week. The other side is that it functions as a concentration practice. You can use metta to allow the mind to get very concentrated, very still, very settled. If you're using metta as a concentration practice, we usually recommend picking one being for each category. Then when we move to all beings, we allow various beings to pop into mind. But for concentration, we let ourselves settle and stabilize on one being because it supports the quietness of the mind.

In this retreat, however, we're not primarily trying to develop concentration through metta. We're really interested in allowing the metta to flourish. So if people naturally arise and this supports the metta, go for it. That would also be a wonderful way to practice in daily life if metta resonates for you.

Sometimes what I do is simply let my mind pick up on somebody. I don't do it in categories—I just allow myself to remember this dear friend, and then by association there's another one, and another one, and another one. It's as if they're almost knocking at the door: "Me too! Me too!" And I just let them come. There is that sense of metta being a kind of spontaneous opening towards these beings that come knocking on the door. I would encourage that.

Another question came about whether a neutral can be a group of people. When we move to all beings, we do tend to work with groups—all men, all women, or even categories like all those who are in a state of suffering, or all those who are in prison.

We do kind of move into that. But when we're doing the first part, we tend to try to move to the specific, because we don't want to—I mean, even in a group there can be a way that we're deluding ourselves. "Oh yes, I wish well to all this group," but if you actually pick that one person out of the group, there might be a sense of some contraction. And so the practice is to look at the specific initially.

"So, you know, I'm finding once I'm in this state, it's nice to offer this out. And so maybe I'm not going deep enough in finding resistance into the images that I'm bringing to mind. Is that possible? Because you..."

So are you asking that you find yourself in this state of this well-wishing state and that it just is very natural for it to move outward? I would not worry about that. If it feels like that sense of—like I described for myself earlier—it's like, "Oh, of course I want other people to feel this way." I mean, why wouldn't I want everybody in the world to have this sense of happiness and well-being? If everybody in the world had this sense of happiness and well-being, what a different world it would be.

And so there's that natural movement out. Just keep going, but I would encourage you to be specific with the beings you're sending it to. And I wouldn't worry about trying to find the places of conflict, trying to bring up the conflict, because the metta is there in spite of the conflict. That conflict can be there and the metta can be there.

So we should move on to the walking practice. Enjoy your walk.

CHAPTER 83

The Eightfold Path and Freedom

Andrea Fella · 53 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines the Noble Eightfold Path as the Buddha's practical guide to ending suffering. She begins by contextualizing the path within the Four Noble Truths, explaining how the Buddha's awakening revealed that suffering arises from processes within our own minds rather than from external circumstances. The teaching unfolds the three sections of the path—wisdom (paññā), ethical conduct (sīla), and mental cultivation (samādhi)—showing how each addresses different layers of the mental defilements (kilesa) that cause our struggles.

Fella offers a particularly illuminating framework for understanding how defilements operate at three levels: transgression (acting out), manifestation (arising in consciousness), and latent tendency (underlying patterns). She explains how ethical conduct counters harmful actions, while meditation practice addresses arising mental states. However, she emphasizes that only deep insight wisdom can uproot the most subtle level—the latent tendencies rooted in fundamental misperceptions about reality.

The talk explores the three core misperceptions that constitute ignorance (avijjā): taking what is impermanent to be permanent, taking what is unsatisfactory to be satisfying, and taking what is not-self to be self. Through readings from the Pāli texts describing Nibbāna as "immediate, visible in this life," Fella offers an accessible vision of awakening—not as some otherworldly merging, but as the practical possibility of living without greed, aversion, and delusion. She concludes by describing how small moments of insight gradually shift our perspective, offering tastes of freedom that, while impermanent themselves, fundamentally transform our relationship to suffering.

When the Buddha left home at twenty-nine years old, he was in search of an answer to a problem. He felt the problem of our human condition. He framed it in terms of suffering—he saw that there was a great deal of this suffering in the world and wanted to understand it, wanted to understand if it was possible to be free from this suffering.

In his exploration over the next six years, he came to a very deep understanding. The night of his awakening, he found that it is possible to become free of this suffering. But he also saw that the understanding he had come to was very subtle. It was hard to see, hard to penetrate this understanding.

And yet out of compassion for human beings, he decided to go ahead and teach. Because when he looked out at the world after having this recognition, having this realization about suffering and happiness, he saw that people were engaging in activities trying to be happy. Most of our activities are in some way trying to make us happy and free from suffering. And yet they were doing the very things that led them into suffering over and over again. And so out of compassion he began to teach what he had understood.

The basic framework for his teaching is the Four Noble Truths, and it is framed in terms of this problem. The first noble truth is yes, there is suffering—the acknowledgement that yes, there is suffering. The second noble truth is the understanding that there is a cause for this suffering, and that cause is within our own minds. Suffering isn't coming at us from the outside world. The suffering that we experience is a result of a process in our own minds. And because it is created in our own minds, it is possible to be free of it. There is a path that we can follow that will lead us to this freedom from suffering.

This path, the Eightfold Path, is part of what I'd like to explore tonight. But I'd like to explore it in the context of how it leads us to the ending of suffering—what that means and how it is possible.

The Eightfold Path is really what we could call the practical side of the Buddhist teachings. It is a set of practices, things that we engage with and act on, to realize and understand for ourselves what the Buddha understood when he became awakened. Following this path is said to lead us to the ending of suffering.

I'd like to start with a brief overview of the Eightfold Path and then talk about how this path connects to freedom from suffering, to liberation. How does this path lead us to awakening?

The path that the Buddha described has eight components to it, as you would expect, and it's divided into three aspects, three different groups. There's the group of wisdom, which contains two factors of the Eightfold Path: wise understanding and wise intention. The second aspect is what we could call the ethical section of the Eightfold Path, comprising three components: wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood. The third section is what we could call mental cultivation or mental development, and it is comprised of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration.

The first two factors—wise understanding and wise intention, the wisdom aspect of the Eightfold Path—acknowledge that there's a radical shift of perspective that we need in order to come to the deep understanding that the Buddha discovered for himself. This understanding is around suffering, around this dukkha: how it's caused, how we can be free of it, and what it actually is.

We've talked about dukkha quite a bit during the week, so I'm not going to go over that too much more. But what I will say is that this wise understanding is essentially framed in terms of the Four Noble Truths, which is actually quite interesting. Wise understanding is the first part of the Eightfold Path, and the Eightfold Path is the last aspect of the Four Noble Truths. And the first aspect of the Eightfold Path is the Four Noble Truths. It has a cyclic nature to it, and I'll come back to that.

Initially, this wise understanding is a kind of intellectual understanding, an intellectual exploration. We hear about the teachings of the Four Noble Truths. We hear about this dukkha, how it's caused—we've talked about the wanting, the wanting things to be other than they are, as the source of this dissatisfaction in our lives.

This understanding begins with hearing about the teachings, hearing this new perspective on what dukkha is. It's not out there. There's something going on in here. When we are suffering, there's something going on in our minds. This is a radical shift of perspective, not something that most of us would have come up with on our own. The Buddha is offering this as a teaching for us.

So we begin with wise understanding as a teaching. And this teaching begins to inform us, perhaps, if we resonate with it. Those of you who are here, I think there is some connection with this teaching. There begins to be a sense of maybe there's something possible here. For me, when I first met these teachings, I was in a state of such despair.

It was kind of like my sense was simply, does anybody know some way out of this despair? And that's said to be the beginning of the search. The question that the Buddha proposes is that when there is suffering, the question naturally arises: does someone know a way or two out of this suffering? And the Buddha is proposing, "I have found a way."

So it's a bit of a leap of faith for us to take these teachings in and to have the sense of confidence that yes, this did work for the Buddha—maybe it will work for me. Initially we go on borrowed trust, borrowed faith, borrowed confidence. We begin with a kind of intellectual, perhaps reflective, acceptance—or at least curiosity and interest and willingness to explore these teachings.

And this perhaps begins to motivate us to engage with the practices. So this motivation touches into the second aspect of the Eightfold Path: wise intention. From the wise intention to engage in these practices, we begin to reorient our lives. We see that this suffering is not our own problem alone—it is widespread. Everybody has the same struggles. And we start to have a sense of connection with other beings and a wish not to add difficulty to their lives.

So this begins the movement into the next aspect of the Eightfold Path, which is the aspect of ethical conduct. The intention to engage in the practices and teachings also moves us into an intention to behave in ways that don't contribute to the suffering of the world. We start to act and be committed to non-harming, to peaceful conduct. This second aspect of the Eightfold Path—the aspect of ethical conduct—comprises wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood. It is about harmonizing our relationship with the world, coming into peace, living peacefully, with a heart that is open and connected to other beings, a heart that inclines towards non-harming.

The third aspect of the Eightfold Path, the mental development component, is comprised of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. And we might ask: why do we need mental cultivation? This comes back to what the Buddha said about dukkha. The understanding about this dukkha is that it is happening because of the way we relate to the world. We want things to be other than they are. We want pleasant things to stay. We want to get rid of things that are unpleasant. We think that if we could only arrange the world in the way that would suit us, that would be happiness.

And so this belief that we could arrange the world to suit us doesn't come into alignment with reality very well. It proves itself to be a mistaken notion. There's a poem that illustrates this beautifully—an excerpt from Rilke's Eighth Elegy:

And we, spectators, always, everywhere, turn toward the world of objects. It fills us. We arrange it. It breaks down. We rearrange it, then break down ourselves.

This is our life. And it is this belief that we can rearrange everything that is the source, in a way, of this dukkha. It is something in our own minds—a mental mistaken notion. And so the need for mental cultivation, which can begin to reorient our minds in a way that is more in line with truth.

So we look at our minds, we see how they work. This is really what we've been doing here. We have been practicing the sīla aspect of the Eightfold Path through the practices of the precepts and non-harming, and we are engaged with the cultivation of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. This is what we've been doing in our sittings, in our walkings. We observe our minds. We see the scattered, jumpy mind. We see the habits of mind that are propelling this jumpiness, this agitation.

The mental cultivation of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration begins to bring our minds into some settledness. It begins to allow us to see how these mental habits work. These three work together, as I hope you've been seeing over this week. There's the effort that we make—wise effort—which allows us to stay connected to our experience in the moment. Wise effort is connected to the motivation to cultivate skillful mind states and let go of unskillful mind states. Mindfulness is what allows us to recognize what's skillful and what's unskillful.

It allows us to stay in the present moment, connected with our experience, seeing our experience moment after moment. And these two together—wise effort and wise mindfulness—allow the mind to settle down. It is the bringing together of effort and mindfulness that leads to concentration, that leads to stability of mind. And this concentration begins to show us how our minds work.

So that was the briefest of overviews of the Eightfold Path. I sometimes do that in eight weeks.

The next piece I want to talk about is freedom. The Eightfold Path is a set of practices that are said to lead to freedom, to liberation. So what is this freedom? I've talked about it as freedom from suffering. The Buddhist understanding is that suffering results from unwholesome mental energies, and the Buddha boiled it down to three mental energies that are at the root of our suffering: greed, hatred, and delusion. He said all of our struggles come down to those three. The definition of freedom from suffering is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

I'd like to read you some texts about liberation, about freedom. The Pali term is nibbana, Sanskrit nirvana, which is the one more familiar in the English lexicon. This is really what we can think of as enlightenment, awakening, freedom, liberation—they all mean the same thing. These texts I'm going to read are from different sources in the Buddhist texts, but they flow together, so I'm going to read them as one:

The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called nibbana.

Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed with mind ensnared, man aims at his own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and he experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, man aims neither at his own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both. And he experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbana immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise.

And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and no more remains for her to do. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so neither forms, nor sounds, nor odors, nor tastes, nor contacts of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired, can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is her mind. Gained is deliverance.

This is peace. This is exquisite. The resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana.

I want to highlight a couple of pieces from this. One is where it says, "If lust, anger, and delusion are given up, man aims neither at his own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief." That description is essentially equated to enlightenment, to freedom—experiencing no mental pain and grief. Just imagine what it might be like to live with no mental pain and grief. It's not saying that there won't be unpleasant physical experience. But if there is no mental reactivity to that unpleasant experience, it's a completely different thing. This is part of the promise, essentially, of the practice. This is possible: no mental pain and grief.

The other thing that truly inspires me is where he says, "This is nibbana immediate, visible in this life." This is something that is possible for us to cultivate in this life—the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion. When I think of the word enlightenment, it seems like something I don't quite know what it means, like merging into oneness with all things. It doesn't seem like a place you would be living, going to work from. But the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion—I could envision going to work, perhaps, from that state. And that's what he's saying here: visible in this life. It's integrated into the world, this possibility for awakening. We don't have to remove ourselves.

The Buddhist texts also give a number of similes for nibbana. In one place, they're gathered all together, and it sounds like a poem, so I'm going to read them to you:

The unfashioned, the end, the effluentless, the true, the beyond, the subtle, the very hard to see, the ageless, permanence, the undecaying, the featureless, non-differentiation, peace, the deathless, the exquisite, bliss, solace, the exhaustion of craving, the wonderful, the marvelous, the secure, security, nibbana.

The unafflicted, the passionless, the pure, release, non-attachment, the island, shelter, harbor, refuge, the ultimate.

Since the source, the root of our suffering is understood to be greed, aversion, and delusion, we might ask how the Eightfold Path helps to bring them to their end.

These three are, as I said, the root causes for essentially all the states of mind that lead us into suffering. They are the three things that lie at the very bottom of all the reasons why we struggle. The Pali word the texts use for this is kilesa, usually translated as "defilement." These three are the root defilements of the mind.

Now, that's a somewhat unusual word—defilement. It doesn't sound very appealing. But then again, greed, aversion, and delusion are not very appealing either.

There's a teaching around these defilements that describes different layers to them, different ways they manifest in our experience. The most obvious or grossest layer—we could call them impurities of mind, or states of mind that lead to suffering—is when they create such a strong state of mind that we begin to act them out. This is called the layer of transgression. We actually act out of greed, aversion, and delusion, which means we may be breaking the precepts, engaging in harsh speech, being unkind to people, basically engaging in harming behaviors. That's the most obvious layer of defilement.

The next layer down is a little more subtle. It's called the layer of manifestation, where these defilements come up in our minds, come into consciousness, and we experience them—anger, frustration, aversion, annoyance, greed, eagerness, excitement, anticipation. We experience all of these things that keep us off-center, out of balance, off-kilter. But we don't necessarily act on them. This is actually where much of our practice lives. We sit in meditation and we notice what comes up into our minds.

The most subtle kind of defilement is called latent tendency or underlying tendency. This is where the movements toward greed, aversion, and delusion—and all their manifestations—are not present in the moment. We're free of them in the moment, and yet the tendency toward them still exists in our mind.

I'm sure you all have a sense of this. We all have patterns that are very deeply ingrained, things we get hooked into over and over again. It might be a pattern of loneliness or depression or anger. Whatever it is, we all have patterns we're hooked to. And we know there are times when we're not in that rut. It's as if there are ruts worn into our mind. There are times when we're not in those ruts, and we see, "Oh yes, I'm fine right now. That depression isn't here. That loneliness isn't happening." But we know, we have a sense, that if conditions were to change, that pattern would reappear. It's not active, but it's like there's that rut worn into our mind. And if conditions bring us close enough to the edge, we're going to drop right into that rut, and it's going to be hard to get out again.

We can think of this almost as neurological patterns—that's how I understand it. If that pattern isn't being fired at the moment, it's not active, it's not happening. But because the pattern is still there, it doesn't take much for causes and conditions to come together and activate it. Then we're caught again.

So the three sections of the Eightfold Path each address one of these layers. The most obvious layer is met by the ethical component of the path: wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. As we engage in those practices, we refrain from acting.

They tend to counter our movement to act out on these defilements. So they begin to counter those tendencies to act out. In this way, that grossest level of defilement is met by the ethical component of the Eightfold Path.

The mental cultivation aspect—wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration—this also counters the tendency to act out on our mental defilements, on greed, aversion, and delusion as they rise in our mind. Through the seeing with wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration, as we see these things come up in our mind, we see the movement. We can actually begin to see the movement to act out and recognize, "Oh, there's that intention to act, and I don't have to do that. I don't have to go there." So the practices of mental cultivation also support our not acting out at what they call the transgression level of the defilement.

The aspects of mental cultivation also counter the arising of these qualities in our minds. They begin to provide tools to support their letting go. And there are two ways that this happens.

There's the cultivation of concentration through which the mind gets more stable, and through that stability of mindfulness and concentration—just being with experience moment after moment—it seems like there's not room for these defilements, not much room for greed, aversion, and delusion to come up. What happens is that we move into a place in this concentration that is called the bliss of seclusion. When the concentration becomes quite strong, the hindrances I spoke about the other night don't have anywhere to have a foothold. And so we become free for periods of time when the concentration is strong—free from some of these strong defilements. The concentration supports this, at least for moments or times when we're free from those defilements.

And it feels really good, you know. When we touch in or taste that kind of concentration when the hindrances are at bay, it's like, "Oh yes." It gives us a taste. It begins to give us a taste of what it's like to be free from those defilements. The mind really likes it. It's very nice to not have those qualities coming up in your mind. You begin to get a taste of that freedom.

And that is a temporary kind of freedom. The concentration is a constructed state, and it falls apart. With it, we see that as the concentration falls apart, all of these difficulties, these defilements, will just come right back. So the mental cultivation helps us to get a taste for what it's like to be free from these defilements, but concentration alone is not powerful enough to really uproot the third level of the defilements—the level of the latent tendency, those patterns that are deeply wired into our minds.

For the subtlest level of defilement, it takes a radical shift of understanding, a radical shift of perspective—that shift of perspective the Buddha found the night of his awakening—to eliminate this underlying tendency toward greed, aversion, and delusion. Such a fundamental reshaping of understanding comes through wisdom, and it's not an intellectual form of wisdom. It can't come through thought. It comes through a direct understanding.

So I want to talk a little bit about that direct understanding and also about the deepest root of the defilements, which is ignorance. Deep at the base of these tendencies, this latent tendency for greed, aversion, and delusion, is this quality of ignorance.

Our usual understanding of what ignorance means is something like lack of knowledge—a passive lack of knowledge, just something we don't have. If we'd had it, then we wouldn't have that ignorance. But the ignorance that underlies these latent tendencies is actually a much more insidious kind of ignorance. It's actually an active misunderstanding of the nature of reality. We have some fundamental misperceptions that we are living with all the time, and they impact how we perceive things, how we view things, how we relate to things.

The three primary misunderstandings are: we take what is impermanent to be permanent; we take what is unsatisfactory as a lasting source of happiness to be a lasting source of happiness—or another way to put this, we take what is suffering to be happiness; and we take what is not self to be self.

So, taking what is impermanent to be permanent. We all think we know that things are impermanent.

We do know that at an intellectual level. And yet we don't behave that way. We don't act that way. At some level deep in our minds, we are functioning from the place that we believe things are permanent.

The grossest example of this is the delusion that many of us have—I know some people who didn't have or don't have this delusion—that essentially we are immortal. There's a famous quote in the Mahabharata, the Indian epic poem. In one part of the poem, one of the characters is asked, "What is the greatest wonder?" And the character responds, "That every day we see that beings die, and yet believe ourselves to be immortal. That is the greatest wonder."

And it is true. This delusion we have around our own mortality is the grossest example of how we take what is impermanent to be permanent. But there's an even deeper level to this, because our moment-to-moment experience—actually, there's nothing in our experience that lasts for longer than a split second. Nothing. Nothing lasts.

This kind of touching into impermanence is not something that is really possible at the realm of our ordinary perception, our ordinary daily life perception. It really takes seeing through a mind that is clearly concentrated and mindful to begin to perceive this truth of how impermanent things are. So as we train with wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration, we actually begin to touch into that truth much more experientially. We experience our lives as just being this ever-changing flow of experience, with nothing lasting for very long.

The second misperception is taking what is unsatisfactory to be happiness. This is closely related to the misunderstanding around impermanence. Because essentially, the impermanence of things, the fact that things are so in flux, means that there's no way we can find happiness by holding on to them, or by constructing or creating something, because it's just going to disintegrate.

In the belief that things have a kind of permanent quality—maybe not forever permanent, but at some level, some kind of permanence—we impute a sense that we can hold on to things. "I can hold on to this relationship, or I can hold on to this house." But the truth of impermanence makes the reality that there is nothing in our experience that could possibly be satisfying as a place to hang our hat and say, "This is what's going to make me happy."

As we observe this in our experience, again through wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration, we see that impermanence inherently means there's nothing that's going to be satisfying to try to hold on to. And actually, we discover something even more remarkable: what we are trying to hold on to—we see in our exploration of this misperception around suffering and happiness—we see that the suffering is created in our minds by trying to hold on to something. So we start to see that it is in our minds that the suffering is created.

But what's even more amazing is that we see that what we're trying to hold on to is also created by our minds. What we're trying to hold onto is concept. There's nothing out there in the world that can actually be held onto, because everything in experience is in such a constant state of flux. Our concepts create this illusion of permanence. And if you actually look at your experience of what you're holding onto, you'll see that it is an idea.

Now, this maybe sounds strange or unbelievable. What I'd like to suggest is that you don't have to believe this, but explore in your own experience: What is it that you are holding on to? What are you actually holding on to?

And this third one—taking what is not self to be self. This one's really hard to understand in a way, because it's so counter to what our experience seems to be. I'll try to shift your perspective a little bit on this.

There is a process going on in each of us. There's a process here, an Andrea process, and there are processes that each of you have. And there's a separation between those processes. It's not like I'm going to confuse this process here with that process there. So there is something happening. But we mistakenly impute a kind of solidity—again, it's back to that permanence notion. We mistakenly impute a solidity to the process. There's no thing that is inherently carrying through the entirety of that process. It is just a process, kind of like a river, just the flow of water, change. You can't really say what the river is. You can't take a bucket of water out of the river and say, "That's the river."

The water in the river is continually changing. You can't even say that the riverbed is the river. If there was a riverbed without the water, it wouldn't be the river. And the riverbed itself can change—if there's a flood, the ground of the riverbed can shift entirely. Our lives are like this river. There is a process, and after the fact, we impute a sense of "that's me." This idea that there is a solid me here is a mistaken understanding.

There are natural laws that govern this process—laws of cause and effect. If you think about a tree, how does it come into being? It starts with a seed. There are natural laws at work: that seed is planted, and if it gets moisture and sun, it will eventually sprout. If it's in a good situation—not going to get mowed over by a lawn mower or eaten by an animal—it has a longer time, perhaps, to grow into a tree. There are natural laws that govern the movement of that seed from seed to tree. There's no being in there doing that. This seems a little easier for us to see in terms of a tree—that it's just a process, a natural process governed by natural laws. And that's what we are. We are processes governed by natural laws. No particular being here.

As we explore our experience through wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration, these truths begin to penetrate. We begin to have insights around these misperceptions. We begin to directly recognize the impermanence of experience. We begin to directly recognize the unsatisfactoriness of anything as a reliable source of happiness. And we do begin to see this process nature of experience. The wisdom moves from being an intellectual understanding to an experiential recognition—what we could call an insight.

You might see a pattern in your mind, an emotional pattern of anger, for instance, arising in a moment. There's a way in which we impute permanence to that when it's happening. "Oh yes, I'm the angry person." We identify with it. It becomes me, becomes who I am. But when we're watching this pattern with mindfulness, with concentration, with those three aspects of the Eightfold Path, we might at some point actually see that pattern suddenly vanish. And then we see—it's startling when we have an insight like that. When something vanishes in our experience, it's like, "Wait a minute, where did that go? I thought it was such a real thing." These are actual moments of recognition: of impermanence, of unsatisfactoriness, of not-self. And these moments begin to wear away at the misperceptions, because for a moment we clearly see from a different perspective. We clearly see that there isn't anything we can hold onto.

This path is a gradual one. When I first got into this practice, I used to think there was going to be some mind-blowing insight and then ever after I was going to be happy. It's much more gradual than that. There are little moments of seeing clearly: "Oh, impermanence. Oh, that's dukkha." Or the recognition of just the process nature of experience—no one here. Just little tiny moments of that. And these moments have conditions that create the container for such insights to arise. Insights themselves are impermanent.

They are there for a moment, and when it's there it's like, wow, this is so obvious, how can I not see this? And then moments later—huh? There's this kind of disbelief. How could... did I really see that? There almost can be a disbelief in what we saw, because it seemed so clear and so obvious, and then yet suddenly it's not clear anymore.

So that space of insight is impermanent. When we have those little moments of insight, it's not like we live there forever after. We have a recognition into impermanence, and it's not like we live in that space of living that truth forever after. But there has been a kind of shift in our minds—a shift in that perspective, a shift in understanding that informs us.

We will get caught again in these very same misperceptions. Over and over again we'll get caught in these same misperceptions. And yet, having had those insights, there's a way in which an understanding has shifted underneath. Even if we're not experiencing it, there's a knowledge. Oh yeah. I'm caught by this belief that things are permanent, or I'm caught by this belief that there can be satisfaction in life. The misperceptions have been revealed to us, and so they don't quite have the same power to fool us quite so much anymore.

And so we can have a little more ability to just hang out with the struggle. Just, okay, I know this is dukkha. I feel this dukkha. And I understand that there's a misperception operating here, which the mind isn't quite able to really deeply see at this moment. So I'm just going to hang out here and see what I can learn. How is the mind holding on here?

These small insights begin to shift our perspective, begin to offer us the taste of freedom. Because in those moments of insight, there is a freedom. When there's that recognition—a true recognition of the process nature of experience—what a relief that there's no me here. No self, no problem.

We begin to get a taste of this: what it means to live with no mental pain or grief. For small moments, we get that taste.

So let's sit for just a moment.

CHAPTER 84

The Eightfold Path and Liberation

Andrea Fella · 58 min

> In this structured yet deeply practical talk, Andrea Fella offers a fresh exploration of the Noble Eightfold Path, examining not just what the eight factors are, but how they actually work to bring about liberation from suffering. She begins by contextualizing the Buddha's journey and his discovery that dukkha—the dissatisfaction pervading our lives—is created by our own minds through wanting things to be other than they are. This understanding, she emphasizes, is actually good news: since suffering is mind-made, it can be transformed.
> Fella divides the Eightfold Path into its three traditional groupings: wisdom (sammā diṭṭhi and sammā saṅkappa), ethical conduct (sammā vācā, sammā kammanta, sammā ājīva), and mental cultivation (sammā vāyāma, sammā sati, sammā samādhi). She then maps these onto the three layers of defilements (kilesa): transgressive behavior, arising mental states, and latent tendencies. The ethical practices address acting out; mental cultivation counters both behavioral and mental arising of greed, aversion, and delusion; while wisdom—initially borrowed but eventually directly realized—uproots the deepest latent tendencies.
> Particularly inspiring is her discussion of nibbāna as 'immediate, visible in this life'—not an otherworldly escape but transformation occurring within daily experience, characterized simply as freedom from mental pain and grief. She concludes with the Buddha's analogy of shipwreck rope gradually worn away by sun, sand, and water, illustrating how moment-by-moment mindfulness slowly shifts our misperceptions about where happiness is found, even when insights seem to fade.

I'd like to start this evening by following on from the comment this morning in the question and answer session about listening to Dharma talks. No matter what style the Dharma talk is, it's helpful to stay connected with your body during the talk. It's a practice. Listening to a Dharma talk can be a practice of hearing meditation—but not the kind of hearing meditation where we completely let go of content. Rather, it's the kind where we see how the content lands for us. So I'd suggest during this talk that you stay in tune with your lived experience while listening.

Because of the nature of my mind, the mind that I live with, this will be a fairly structured talk. But don't let that fool you. This kind of talk can take us a little bit more into our minds, and so I'd like to encourage you to stay in the body, stay in the lived experience, see how it impacts you. Dharma talks aren't so much about getting the whole thing, getting the whole flow. There may be one or two words or a phrase that resonates with you here and now. Or there may be a phrase that comes to you a year from now in your meditation, and suddenly that phrase makes sense and you can apply it in your practice. The experience of working with Dharma talks is not necessarily a linear process, even though this will be a fairly linear talk.

When the Buddha was a young adult, about twenty-nine years old, he had a sense that there was something he needed to discover. He had come into contact with suffering, what he considered to be the problem of our human condition—this fact that we struggle, that we live trying to be happy, and yet it seems as if happiness is endlessly slipping out of our grasp. So he left his home and his family at about the age of twenty-nine and went out in search of what he hoped would be an answer to this problem.

He spent about six years searching, studying with the teachers of his day, and finding that while their teachings led to very peaceful states of mind, they didn't answer his question. So he explored in his own experience: What is this suffering? What is this dukkha, the Pali term that we usually translate as suffering? And he came to a very deep, transformative understanding about this process at work in our minds. He realized for himself the possibility that this process of suffering could come to an end.

After he had this recognition, this realization, he looked out at how people were living. The story says that he surveyed in his mind how people were conducting their lives. He saw that people were living in a way oriented toward what they thought would make them happy. But from this new perspective he had come to, this new understanding around what suffering is and how it works in our minds and hearts, he saw that in their very act of trying to be happy, they were doing the very things that would keep them tied to this process of suffering. And so out of compassion he began to teach what he had understood, what he had learned—this transformative understanding.

In his awakening, he saw that there was a new orientation, a shift of perspective that could be brought to our experience. A fairly subtle shift. In fact, when he first contemplated teaching, the story goes that he thought, "This Dharma that I have understood is very subtle, very hard to see. I would try to tell people about it and they wouldn't understand, and that would be vexing. So maybe I'll just sit here and enjoy this peace." Then the story goes that a deva came to him and said, "No, for the benefit of all beings you should teach. There are beings with but little dust in their eyes that could understand your teachings." And so he began to teach what he understood.

The framing of his teaching, not surprisingly, is oriented around this question of suffering. The Four Noble Truths, which Mary spoke about the other night, are framed in terms of suffering and the end of suffering. Sometimes the Four Noble Truths are stated simply as truths: this is suffering, there is a cause of suffering, there is a cessation of suffering, and there is a path leading to the cessation of suffering. But as Mary Grace pointed to the other night, the Four Noble Truths are actually practices. There are tasks associated with each of them. The Buddha said we should understand suffering. We should let go of the cause of suffering. We should realize for ourselves the possibility of freedom from suffering. And we should cultivate the path leading to the ending of suffering.

This Eightfold Path is really the Buddha's prescription for happiness. He said that if you follow these practices—the Eightfold Path being comprised of eight factors that can be seen as practices, eight practices that support us in our journey—you can understand and solve this problem around suffering for yourself. It's not a problem anybody else can solve for us. The Buddha understood the possibility for himself, and in seeing the possibility for himself, he offered this path to us.

he could be free from suffering. He understood by inference that this was not something confined to him alone, that others could also understand this and have this same transformative realization.

In this talk, I'd like to explore the Eightfold Path, which as I said is a set of practices guided by wisdom to encourage us to act and train our minds in a certain direction. The Buddha said following this path will lead us to this same understanding that he had.

I like to talk about the Eightfold Path, but not in the standard way perhaps. This isn't going to be a standard Eightfold Path talk. I'm actually going to do a very brief overview, and what I'd like to do following that is explore how it is possible that this path does what the Buddha claims it will do. How can it lead us to the ending of suffering? That's the exploration I'd like to make this evening.

The Eightfold Path has eight factors in it, and one of the ways of exploring this teaching divides those eight factors into three groups or aspects. The first two factors of the Eightfold Path are in a group that we could call the wisdom group: wise understanding and wise thought, or wise intention. The second group is associated with ethical conduct, comprising the factors of wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood—ways to bring ourselves into harmony with the world. The third group is what I'll call the mental cultivation or mental development aspect, comprised of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration.

The Eightfold Path in its standard ordering begins with wisdom—wise understanding, wise intention. It starts from needing to understand something about this dukkha, this suffering. This is the orientation around what the Buddha was trying to solve, and so the wisdom he is offering us is wisdom about this dukkha.

I'd like to speak for just a few minutes about this because we haven't really talked too much about dukkha itself. This suffering that the Buddha said we can be free of is not the suffering of physical bodily pain. That, he said, will continue. As long as we have a body, there will be that possibility of unpleasant bodily experience. So that's not the kind of suffering he said we'll become free of.

But he did say that in his transformative understanding around suffering, what he realized was that mostly what we call suffering is actually a product created by our own minds. It largely happens to us because we are in conflict with the way things are. Gil talked about non-conflict being part of our path, being our path. Dukkha comes about because we're in conflict. Things are happening and we don't like them. We resist them. We want to get rid of them, fix them, change them. Or we want to hold on to them. We like them, we want to keep them.

Because of the nature of the way things are, trying to hold on to things leads to what somebody called rope burn. You're trying to hold on to something that is changing, slipping through your hands, and it burns to try to hold on to that.

One of our main delusions is that we think happiness comes from figuring out a way to arrange the world so that it's the way we'd like it to be. That's what we think happiness would be. And so we end up pinning our hopes for happiness on the world, on things that are completely unreliable.

Rilke, the great German poet, expressed this in one of his poems. This is an excerpt:

And we, spectators, always everywhere turned toward the world of objects. It fills us. We arrange it. It breaks down. We rearrange it and then break down ourselves.

That's the poignancy of our existence. We are endlessly trying to arrange the world, endlessly seeing it break down, and feeling the pain of that—taking it personally. What did I do wrong that the world changed and I couldn't arrange it properly? It's not personal.

It's the way it is.

One of the key turnings or shifts of perspective that the Buddha had—my understanding of the shift of perspective—is that he really began to understand this process of being in conflict with the world as the very cause for that suffering. When there's a sense of wanting things to be other than the way they are, in that very wanting, there is already dissatisfaction. It is the wanting itself that creates the dissatisfaction.

When we turn and see that, the mind begins to understand that it is its own doing that created that wanting. And it begins to understand that letting go of that wanting is a pathway towards freedom from suffering. We begin to see that the process of suffering is a process created by our own minds. The vast majority of what we call suffering—even suffering around physical pain—the vast majority of what we call suffering is created by our own minds.

This is actually really good news. It may not sound like it, but it is. Because it provides the opportunity for us to change our minds. If suffering was inherently out in the world, if it was something outside of us that created that suffering, there would be no hope. But it is a process in our minds that can be understood and freed.

This wisdom, this shift of perspective, is the wisdom that we need to have an understanding about. At first, just an intellectual understanding, just hearing the teachings. Very few of us, I think, would come to this understanding that wanting is actually the source of our suffering without having somebody point this out to us. "Look at this," he said. "Look at this process in your mind. See what happens."

The first two aspects of the Eightfold Path point us to this wisdom. At first it's a wisdom that we take in through hearing—hearing dharma talks, reading books about the Dharma—we start to learn some of what the Buddha offered. If that resonates for us, then we begin to think about it, think about how it resonates for us, think about how it might be understood. This is another form of wisdom. First there's this received wisdom or borrowed wisdom, and then we take it in and begin to massage it in our own understanding.

If it resonates for us, then we may begin to act on it. We may decide, "Some of this makes sense to me, so maybe I'll try this." Or if you're like me, it was more like, "Well, nothing else I've tried has made any sense. I guess I'll see what happens if I try this." So the intention is formed to explore these teachings. That sets us into motion, sets the path into motion. These first two aspects initially are about having us actually take the first steps. We hear, we understand, and we begin to act. We begin to engage with the teachings.

The second group in the Eightfold Path is the ethical section—harmonizing our relationship with the world: wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. We live in accordance with ethical guidelines, harmonizing our relationships with the world, living in peace with other selves, with other people, inclining the heart towards non-harming.

We've been engaging with these aspects of the Eightfold Path here on retreat. Every day you have been engaging actually with the entirety of the Eightfold Path. That's part of what I want to point to in this talk: that the factors of the Eightfold Path are lived. They're not just an idea. You're actually living them.

You hear the teachings right now. We're practicing wise understanding to some extent. I'm exploring my understanding of the teachings with you. You're exploring it in your own minds as you're listening. So we're exploring this first aspect of the Eightfold Path.

All through the day we are committed to the precepts—to non-harming, to refraining from taking life, to refraining from taking what's not given, refraining from sexual misconduct, refraining from false speech, refraining from intoxicants. These are aspects of the components of wise speech and wise action. And wise livelihood—we are living wise livelihood here on retreat. You're like temporary monks and nuns here. You've renounced your homes. You've come here to be secluded.

You are living a Dharma life. This is a beautiful thing. You are living wise livelihood every moment of your day here.

The last three factors of the Eightfold Path—the mental cultivation or mental development aspect—comprise the factors of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration.

So why do we need mental development? This connects to the understanding that the suffering we are experiencing... suffering is kind of a strong word in a way. The dukkha that the Buddha spoke about is usually translated as suffering, but when we think of suffering, we often think of something pretty big. Dukkha has a very broad range of meanings. It can mean anything from the most obvious suffering—losing a partner or being in an accident with great pain and misery—to the subtlest kind of feeling that things are just a little bit off. You know, that's not quite the way I like it here right now. That's dukkha also. We might not call that suffering, but it's dukkha.

From this understanding that dukkha is created by our minds, the Buddha's mental training helps to counteract the patterns we have around suffering. So we look at our minds. We begin to understand how they work. We start to see how this process of dukkha functions in our own experience. This is a lot of what we're doing here on retreat. Moment by moment we're looking at our experience. We see the way our minds are scattered or jumpy. We see when they're expansive. We see when they're contracted. We see when they're frustrated and angry and bitter and prideful—the whole range of emotional states that we go through. We watch the processes of our mind and we start to get familiar with the habits of our mind, the patterns of our mind. Especially those mental habits that are propelled based in not being aware—the habits and patterns that have been practiced over years in our lives. Patterns of anger or frustration or procrastination or disappointment, or pick your favorite.

So we get to see these patterns. The mental cultivation provides a container in which we can start to really see them, see how this suffering is created, see how our mental habits work.

These three aspects—wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—work together. Wise effort is the effort to stay connected with our experience moment to moment. It takes some effort. And we also, informed by wisdom, informed by this understanding of what dukkha is, of what suffering is, begin to see and understand that there are certain states of mind that tend to lead us towards suffering, and other states of mind that tend to lead us more towards happiness. The effort we engage with is the effort to cultivate those states of mind that lead us away from suffering and to let go of those states of mind that lead us towards suffering.

We make the effort to be present, and mindfulness is part of that effort. We're making the effort to be aware, informed by this wisdom, this understanding of what's helpful and what's not helpful. Mindfulness keeps us connected with our experience in the present moment. It also helps us to understand and recognize which states are helpful and which states are not helpful.

The combination of effort and mindfulness together creates a stability of mind, a kind of continuity of attention. It's that continuity of awareness—if you're just aware for just a moment, if you're just mindful for just a moment, there's not that much that you can really see very clearly. But when that mindfulness starts to be present for longer stretches of time, the mind starts to be able to clearly see into how things happen. That very continuity starts to reveal the process at work. We begin to understand that process through having the mindfulness be more continuous. And this continuity of mindfulness is the concentration.

So the Eightfold Path is a set of practices, and we're practicing them all here. Moment by moment we're engaged in these practices. It's not abstract actually. These practices support living with a little bit more ease. And there is the understanding that these practices go further than just ease in our lives. They actually can allow us to experience that deeper shift of perspective that the Buddha offers. Freedom. Freedom from suffering. A deep, deep kind of happiness and peace.

So what is this freedom? Sometimes we call it enlightenment. The Pali term is nibbana, Sanskrit nirvana. The Buddhist understanding of what this freedom is, what this enlightenment is—its simplest definition is actually really straightforward. The Buddha said that suffering is a result of greed, aversion, and delusion acting in our minds, and that freedom from suffering is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion in the mind.

I'll read you some texts from the Pali Canon about this quality, or this—what is this nirvana, nibbana? This is a set of different texts, but they flow together, so I'll read them all together:

The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called nibbana.

Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed, with mind ensnared, man aims at his own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and he experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, man aims neither at his own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and he experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbana, immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise.

And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and nothing more remains for her to do. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so neither forms, nor sounds, nor odors, nor tastes, nor contacts of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired, can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is her mind, gained is deliverance.

This is peace, this is exquisite—the resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana.

There are a couple of pieces in there that I'd like to point to that particularly inspire me. One is the possibility—the definition, essentially, of nibbana here as experiencing no mental pain and grief. If you can just imagine what that might be like. What that might be like—no mental pain or grief.

And the other piece: This is nibbana, immediate, visible in this life.

These two pieces together point to an understanding, a transformation that happens in the midst of our lives. When I first heard about this enlightenment thing, I kind of thought it must mean some big mind-blowing experience, and after that, then everything would be great. Maybe I'd just be drifting off in some beautiful space somewhere.

This definition—immediate, visible in this life, experiencing no mental pain and grief—is something I can envision having perhaps in the midst of work. This is inspiring to me, this possibility. To me these words say this isn't something otherworldly. This transformation happens right in this life, right in the midst of our day-to-day experience. That that's possible. That sounds like some of what is being pointed to here—the possibility of transformation within our lives, not separating from our lives. Transformation occurring through our lives.

So since this understanding of nibbana is that it's the absence or the releasing of, the cessation of, the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion, we might ask: How does the Eightfold Path help us come to the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion?

Greed, aversion, and delusion are understood to be basically the roots of all the kinds of mind states that proliferate, creating our experience of suffering. They're what we call the root defilements. Defilement is a translation of a Pali term, kilesa. Maybe defilement sounds like a kind of yucky word. But greed, aversion, and delusion—it would be nice to be able to let go of them. They're understood to be the things that defile the mind or keep it from purity, keep it from clearness. Defilement to me has that image of making something impure or not clear.

There's a teaching around the defilements that they're like different layers of how they manifest in our experience. The most obvious layer of how these defilements come up for us is in our behavior—that we act out of greed, aversion, and delusion.

They express themselves through hostility of speech or harshness of action—basically, in ways that cause harm in the world, engaging in harmful behaviors. So that's one level, one layer of how these defilements manifest in our minds, in our experience, through acting out.

The next, more subtle layer is when they arise in our minds but don't get expressed in action. This is the arising of greed, aversion, and delusion—the arising of anger, frustration, judgment, hostility, pride, exuberance, boredom in our minds—but where they don't somehow come out into our behavior.

This is largely where our practice actually lies. We commit to a stillness of posture so that we can see this level. Essentially, that's part of the practice—in the commitment to stillness, we begin to see this level of defilement before it comes out into our behavior. This is pretty powerful to be able to see.

The most subtle level of the defilements is something called latent tendencies. This is where these qualities arising from greed, aversion, and delusion are not being experienced in our present moment experience—they're not actually happening for us in the moment—but there's an underlying tendency for that pattern to erupt.

I think we all have a sense of this. Particular favorite patterns that we've practiced a lot in our lives. For me, it was anger. I cultivated anger very well. And at times when that pattern wasn't active, there was a sense—maybe you have this sense for yourself too—that its not being activated was partly a product of conditions. If something happened that I didn't like, it would be very easy for that pattern to be triggered.

So this is that level of latent tendency. It's not active in our mind stream at the moment, but it's mostly a matter of conditions whether it comes up or not. It could arise almost at any time, easily activated.

When we look at these three levels of defilement alongside the three aspects of the Eightfold Path, each aspect addresses one of those levels.

The most obvious level of acting out is met by the practices of wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood—committing to those ethical precepts. We counter the tendency toward acting out. In a sense, we use the precepts almost as mindfulness bells. If we start to see the tendency arise in our mind to break one of those precepts, it halts us. It's like, "Wait a minute, that's not the way I want to be living." And so the three aspects of ethical conduct support our not engaging in that level of defilement.

This is pretty powerful, actually. It has a rebound effect on our mind as we cultivate the precepts. As we cultivate wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood, there's a positive rebound effect on our mind. Cultivating non-harming rebounds on our mind as a kind of compassion. Cultivating not taking what's not given rebounds on our minds as honesty and contentment with what we have. So the practices of ethical conduct support reducing one layer of the defilements—the most obvious layer.

The aspect of mental cultivation—wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—also helps counter this tendency toward acting out. Because what happens as we start to observe our patterns and habits, our favorite habitual tendencies of mind, is that as we get familiar with them, we start to see them before they lead us into action. As we get familiar with those feelings associated with whatever our pattern is—anger, for instance—the feelings then become a trigger, a trigger to wake up.

That's what I've seen in my experience. The more I pay attention to those patterns, the more when the pattern arises, it starts to bring mindfulness along with it. And so that helps us recognize, "Oh, there's that pattern. No, I don't want to act on that." We also reduce the transgression aspect by cultivating wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration.

This aspect of mental cultivation also counters the tendency toward the arising of defilements in our minds. One of the ways it does this is through the cultivation of concentration. As we practice and begin to get a sense of the continuity of mindfulness, as the mind becomes more steady, we start to have periods when the hindrances—the qualities that John talked about this morning—stop coming up. And that's a really great experience. It feels really good when the hindrances stop coming up. So we get a taste, a little taste of what it's like to have that freedom from the defilements.

But that's a temporary kind of freedom, because it's conditioned on that continuity of mindfulness. It's conditioned on the concentration kind of holding those tendencies at bay. Still, it's very powerful for us to get a flavor, a taste of that freedom from the defilements.

The subtlest level of defilement—the latent tendencies—requires a kind of radical shifting in our mind, a turning. Because those tendencies, those latent tendencies, are underlaid by a very powerful force of ignorance. And ignorance is not uprooted simply by concentration. It takes wisdom to uproot ignorance.

This is where that first aspect of the Eightfold Path, the wisdom aspect, comes in. Now the wisdom that we bring at first, that wisdom of understanding and reflection, that's not powerful enough to uproot ignorance. That wisdom informs our practice of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. And as that wisdom and the mental cultivation come together, we begin to understand more directly for ourselves the truth of that borrowed wisdom.

So we see directly for ourselves these moments of freedom. We see a releasing, a letting go around how we've been clinging to these processes of suffering. Our view begins to change.

The path essentially begins and ends with wisdom. Initially it's an intellectual understanding, but that intellectual understanding, coupled with the path of cultivating mindfulness and concentration with effort, leads us to deeply understand the truth of those teachings—the teachings of impermanence, the teaching of unreliability, of not-self. The mind begins to understand that the way we've been trying to be happy... and this is not theoretical, this is not book knowledge.

We see in a moment—we may see wanting come up in our minds. We see that feeling of dissatisfaction that comes with that wanting. We feel the pull to satisfy that wanting, and yet we watch, we observe. We may see that wanting vanish in a moment. And seeing that vanishing, we directly understand—it feels like being let go from a vice grip. We see directly in that moment the truth that it is the wanting that has created that dissatisfaction. It's not the not-having of whatever it is that we wanted. That's not what creates the dissatisfaction. It has nothing to do with the thing that we think we want. It has to do with the wanting itself.

In that moment of actually seeing that, of having enough continuity of mindfulness and concentration, just observing our patterns, we see how they are put together. And in seeing that, the mind begins to release around them. We experience moments of insight, shifts of perspective around patterns.

We may see simple shifts, which I know most of you—probably all of you—have had: a kind of shift around some difficult pattern. "Oh, this is just anger." Rather than it being my anger, rather than it being something that I've done or need to fix or change—"Oh, this is just anger. This is just a process"—becoming much easier to hold. That kind of shift of perspective, seeing anger just as a process. We see little moments, shifts of understanding.

These moments help us to gradually turn our minds toward this understanding—the understanding of the Four Noble Truths, the understanding of suffering, the understanding that the cause of suffering is this craving. Turning our mind toward that understanding. Gradually, small moments, gradually turn our minds in this direction. It takes time.

There's an analogy—I know many of you have heard this analogy, it's one of my favorite analogies—the Buddha gave around our practice. He compared the practice of being attentive to our experience to a shipwreck. Think about the parts of the ship strewn around the beach. Day by day, the sun, the sand, the wind, the water work on those parts. Think of the rope, the rigging. Day by day, if you go back and look at that rope, you're not going to see much change. But come back after six months and try to pick up that rope, and it may fall apart in your hands.

Moment by moment, small moment by small moment, mindfulness, effort, and concentration, supported by wisdom, begin to wear away at the way we misunderstand how happiness can be found. It shifts our perspective.

And one thing that's helpful to remind ourselves about is that insights are impermanent. We have a moment of understanding, and in that moment—it may even be more than a moment, it may be a few minutes or even a few hours of being in a space where you can just see your patterns and it's not a problem. And it seems so obvious. How can I not see this? And then, a few moments later, suddenly there's your anger and it's like, "Oh, that person shouldn't have done—wait a minute. I'm caught again. What just happened?"

This is a phenomenon we all have to accept. It's not a mistake, actually. It's not that we've done anything wrong. And sometimes we can second-guess our insights. We think, "Well, it must not have been real if it went away." But it is. It is a moment. It's come together out of conditions, and you've been able to, for a few moments, see and be aligned with how things are, with the truth of how things are—not in resistance, not in conflict with the way things are. For a few moments you've been able to do that.

While it doesn't stay, while we can't live in that perspective for the rest of time—most of the time, I'd say, most of the time we have a shift like that and it goes away—what it has done for us is it has taken that borrowed knowledge we've learned and integrated it so that it is something we have actually understood. It's no longer borrowed wisdom. We may not be able to live out of that wisdom, but there is a knowing of that wisdom.

What I've seen in my own practice is that little by little, the accumulation of those kinds of openings has led me to be able to call on that knowledge. It's like, "Oh yeah, okay, I see this pattern coming up. I see I'm caught by this again." But I don't take it quite so personally. It's like, "Yeah, I know that there's a kind of misperception going on here. There's a confusion going on. There's a delusion happening in the mind that it is caught by this." The mind can be aware of that because it knows this alternative perspective is possible, even though it can't live from it.

And so we just meet our experience from that perspective. And over time, over time, it begins to be easier to see when we're caught by these misperceptions, by this confusion of where happiness is to be found. And slowly we begin to understand what it might mean to live free of mental pain and grief.

Let's sit for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 85

Using Dukkha as a Guide

Andrea Fella · 56 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines the Pāli term dukkha and its three distinct meanings in the Buddhist texts: the suffering addressed in the Four Noble Truths (arising from mental reactivity), unpleasant vedanā (feeling tone), and the inherent unreliability of all conditioned phenomena (sabbe saṅkhārā dukkhā). She emphasizes that the dukkha which can be transcended through practice is specifically the mental suffering created by craving (taṇhā) — our wanting things to be other than they are.

Fella offers practical guidance on working with suffering as a navigational tool rather than an obstacle to overcome. She describes how mindful investigation of dukkha educates the mind-body organism, eventually enabling spontaneous letting go of harmful patterns — much like the body instinctively withdraws from a hot stove. Drawing from her own three-month retreat experience with self-hatred, she illustrates how deep insight can arise precisely through patient, accepting awareness of difficult mind states.

The talk addresses the layered nature of suffering in practice, from obvious afflictive emotions to subtler forms of wanting embedded in our meditation practice itself. Fella counsels practitioners to meet whatever layer of suffering is currently obvious rather than trying to excavate hidden causes, trusting that deeper patterns will reveal themselves naturally when conditions are ripe.

Tonight I'd like to explore the topic of dukkha, of suffering, and how we can use this experience of suffering as a guide in our practice.

I'd like to begin by talking a little bit about this word dukkha. That's the Pali term which we usually translate as suffering. But that translation often, in our language at least, has a broad context, a large context sometimes. When we hear the word suffering, we think of catastrophe, disease, accident, tsunamis. We think of larger things. The term dukkha actually has a broader set of meanings, and I'd like to explore this broader set of meanings from a couple of different perspectives as a way to begin.

The main usage of the term dukkha in the texts is within the context of the Four Noble Truths: the truth of suffering, dukkha-sacca; the truth of the cause of suffering; the truth of the cessation of suffering; and the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering. In this context, the understanding in the Four Noble Truths is that dukkha is something that can be transcended, overcome. We can come to the end of this dukkha.

So what is this dukkha that we can come to the end of? There are three definitions in the texts that I know of, and I'll talk about all three just briefly tonight—three different ways that the term dukkha is used.

As it's used in the Four Noble Truths, this kind of dukkha is a result of mental reactivity. The second noble truth indicates that the cause of dukkha is wanting, craving—the Pali word tanha. So this kind of dukkha of the first noble truth is a specific kind of suffering that's related to the fact that we crave things. Basically, we want things. We want to have things that we like, we want to get rid of things that we don't like. When things are pleasant, we like them, we want more of them. When things are unpleasant, we want to get rid of them, push them away. In a very simple way, a very natural way—in fact, a very human way, a very biological way almost—we react to pleasant and unpleasant. This dukkha of the First Noble Truth is really about a kind of mental reactivity to our experience, and I'll talk more about this in depth tonight.

The other two kinds of dukkha that are talked about in the texts: the first is in the context of what's talked about as feeling, vedana—the way all experience, no matter what our experience is, has a quality of this feeling tone of being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant, which we sometimes call neutral. The term for the unpleasant feeling tone is dukkha. Just like our body feels unpleasant sensation when we cut it with a knife, or if we fall down and bruise our knee—there's unpleasant sensation that arises in our body. This physical unpleasantness is also used as the term dukkha in the texts.

The other place that the term dukkha is used is in a famous three-part phrase. The first is sabbe sankara anicca, which basically translated means something like "all conditioned things are impermanent." The second phrase is sabbe sankara dukkha—"all conditioned things are dukkha." This is often translated as suffering, but in this context, as I'll explain, "unreliable" is perhaps a better term. And the third phrase is sabbe dhamma anatta—"all experience is not self."

In this usage, sabbe sankara dukkha, any phenomenon that happens is understood to be dukkha, is understood to be essentially unreliable as a place or an experience around which true deep happiness can be found. Whatever experience we have—whether it's a pleasant experience, an unpleasant experience, a neutral experience—the very unreliability, the very impermanence of that phenomenon, indicates that it is not going to be a place where we can find lasting satisfaction. It's going to disappear. So there's no way that we can find lasting satisfaction out of that experience.

This three-part phrase is often described as the three characteristics of experience. I'm sure you've heard this: the three characteristics—all phenomena are impermanent, all phenomena are suffering, all phenomena are not self. In this understanding, it's actually all conditioned phenomena are impermanent, all conditioned phenomena are dukkha, all phenomena are not self. This is true whether or not there's any reactivity in our minds. The fact of change means that phenomena are unreliable just in their own nature. The fact of our clinging or not clinging, grasping or pushing away, holding onto those phenomena is irrelevant in terms of their having this quality or characteristic.

This, I think, is where the understanding comes from when people say, "Oh, the Buddha taught everything is suffering." Well, he did, in this sense, teach that everything is unreliable.

Everything has the flavor of, if clung to, it will produce suffering.

So these two kinds of dukkha—the dukkha of physical pain in the body, and this unreliability of phenomena—these are not kinds of dukkha that will go away with practice. Phenomena will remain unreliable whether or not we cling to them. It is not these kinds of dukkha that the Third Noble Truth is talking about transcending.

What can be transcended is our misunderstanding of experience, our misperception, our confusion around experience. This confusion leads us to be unable to accept these two kinds of dukkha. It's very hard for us to accept physical pain. It's very hard for us to accept the unreliability of experience. We want to push away physical pain. We want to hold on to experience, hoping that something—anything—will do it for us. Surely there's got to be some experience out there that will make me happy.

So it's our misunderstanding, our confusion around those two kinds of dukkha that can't change, that produces the dukkha of the First Noble Truth. Our reactivity to physical pain, our grasping onto phenomena hoping something will make us happy—this reactivity is the dukkha of the First Noble Truth. And this is the kind of dukkha that the Buddha said can come to an end.

The dukkha of the First Noble Truth has quite a broad range. It is far more than the major kinds of suffering we think of when we use that term in English. Some translators have used other terms. Thanissaro Bhikkhu uses the term "stress" to translate dukkha. There are ways that I appreciate this term, partly because stress, for us, is a mental phenomenon. When we hear the word stress, we usually think of something happening in our minds. This points to the aspect of dukkha of the First Noble Truth as being something that happens in our minds.

In fact, one definition of freedom from this kind of dukkha, the ending of dukkha—one way that the state of nibbana, of freedom, is defined—is as freedom from mental pain and grief. One can experience that state of no mental pain or grief. This really points to the fact that the dukkha of the First Noble Truth is a mental phenomenon. It happens in our minds.

Now, of course, it happens in reaction to bodily sensation. It happens in reaction to phenomena, to events in the world. It happens in response to things we see, hear, smell, taste, and touch. It happens in response to things we think or feel or perceive.

So this translation of "stress" conveys this sense of mental reactivity. It also conveys the recognition, the understanding, that dukkha can be pretty subtle. We can be a little bit stressed. We can have a little bit of clenching in our stomach as we sit and wait for a practice discussion. That's dukkha. We can have a little bit of anxiety about the last egg on the table. That's dukkha.

The range of dukkha traverses from the subtlest kinds of unease to the major sufferings of our lives. It includes all of our afflictive emotional states, as well as subtler states of unease—just a subtle sense of offness, things not quite feeling right, a sense of "hmm, if only I tweaked a little bit, things would be better." Dukkha includes all of these.

Understanding that dukkha is in our minds—that it's a mental phenomenon, a mental experience, a mental process—helps us see that the dukkha of the First Noble Truth happens in our minds. And the Second Noble Truth indicates that the cause of dukkha is this wanting, this craving, essentially this reactivity: not liking things and wanting to push them away, liking things and wanting to hold on to them. Reactivity around wanting things to be pleasant, wanting to get rid of things that are unpleasant. Not being aligned with, not accepting—I talked about acceptance a little bit yesterday morning—not accepting the way things are in this moment. Endlessly feeling like we want to negotiate and fix or change or alter or shift things.

Wanting things to be other than they are—the Second Noble Truth teaches us that this wanting, this craving (tanha is the Pali term), is the cause of our distress, our suffering. This wanting is the cause of the dissatisfaction, the unease.

We can explore this as a mental exercise. Think about something you might want to have. Maybe you want a different room, or more leftovers at supper. Maybe there's something you'd like to have.

And maybe it doesn't cause you much suffering, but just thinking about something that you might want here on the retreat. Then just imagine the possibility of that wanting going away. If the wanting goes away, the dissatisfaction goes away. Any kind of struggle or stress or unease goes away.

So the suffering, the dukkha, is caused by this craving, this wanting. And there are so many different ways that we want things. I'd like to explore this a little bit with you, just exploring how we want things.

I did an exploration myself of how I want things, and there are so many different ways. I was kind of shocked when I went through them all. I mean, there are the obvious ones—wanting to have things that are pleasant, wanting to get rid of things that are unpleasant. There's wanting to fix or change something. This is one that's very common for me. Rather than wanting to get rid of something that's unpleasant, I want to fix it, I want to tweak it.

We might want to be seen or recognized. We might want to be someone. We might want to be the one who's in charge. We might want to be the one who has a good meditation practice. We might want to be the one who can attain states of concentration. We might want to be the one who is peaceful.

We might want to know what to do. Something that seems to come up for us sometimes in practice is we're in some state, and the thing that comes up in our mind is, "What's next? What am I supposed to do with this?" And that's a kind of wanting. There's a feeling of, "It's not okay just to be with this. There's something I'm supposed to do with it." So wanting to do something.

All of these kinds of wanting, these ways that we want—as we begin to explore the connection between wanting and our suffering, we really begin to get it. Not only is the suffering created in our minds, the wanting is also created in our minds. And when we explore it even more deeply, we realize that the thing that we want is actually also simply something arising in our minds. We don't actually want that spot in the hall, or we don't actually want that thing that's out there. What we want is our idea of that thing.

As we really begin to explore this wanting-suffering connection, we begin to really get it that this process of suffering is something that happens in our minds. This is really good news, because the fact that it happens in our minds—and the fortunate fact that it's not hardwired—means something important. It's not automatic. It's not biologically wired that when there's something unpleasant, we have to hate it and want to get rid of it. It's not biologically wired that when there's something pleasant, we have to gravitate towards it and hold onto it. Fortunately for us, it's not biologically wired. It is created in our minds. This fact means that it's possible to shift, change, alter our relationship to experience.

When we see that the wanting is creating the suffering, and the more we see this in our own experience, the more we actually recognize this link between wanting and suffering, the more we recognize—it's not us that actually recognizes it, in my experience. It's like the training. We sit and pay attention to dukkha.

The first noble truth, the Buddha's instruction: understand dukkha. Understanding means not thinking about, not reflecting on, but turning towards, meeting the experience of dukkha. Being mindful of body and mind in this state. Anger is arising, a state of dukkha. Body feels like this, mind feels like this. This is understanding dukkha.

We get an education in the suffering nature of the experience—of anger in this case, of any kind of dukkha. When we're willing to sit with it, be with it, understand it in this way, the body and mind understands. We don't have to learn this. It doesn't have to be me that knows this. The organism begins to understand.

This is suffering. This is not well-being.

And as the exploration continues—as we continue to explore this dukkha, in this case anger, noticing body, noticing mind—we may begin to see the wanting that is tied up with that anger. The wanting to be right, whatever kind of wanting. There are so many different ways we can get into anger. So whatever wanting it is, whenever we see that kind of climbing towards anger, we begin to understand the wanting that's tied up with the suffering.

And then at some point, even further down the line—for me, this kind of exploration took months for this particular pattern, a dukkha pattern I was observing around anger—at one point I saw my mind inclining towards that anger. A thought arose about a person I was angry with, and I felt the mind kind of leaning in. There was this momentum of a freight train wanting to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry.

Because the organism had spent enough mindful time in this space of understanding dukkha for what it was, the mind itself recognized that intention towards anger: that way lies suffering. And the mind itself let that intention go.

This is part of how our practice unfolds. We explore our suffering, we use our suffering to help us understand ourselves. That mindfulness of the suffering helps our mind begin to understand how the wanting contributes. And then when the mind sees that wanting, the mind understands that it doesn't want to go towards dukkha, so the mind can let it go—almost the way your body lets go of touching something hot on the stove. Before we even really feel the pain of the heat, the body is already pulling back because it knows that way lies suffering.

So this exploration of understanding dukkha begins to educate this organism, this mind-body process. What is dukkha? Dukkha does not equal well-being. It's a very simple lesson the mind and body learns.

We can use this exploration of dukkha as a guide for us. The Four Noble Truths lays out the entirety of our practice, of our path, in terms of exploring this question of dukkha: exploring understanding dukkha, exploring how we might be able to let go of the cause of dukkha, exploring the ending of dukkha, and exploring the conditions and causes that support that ending of dukkha—the path of practice, the Eightfold Path.

The Buddha pointed out that this exploration around dukkha is our practice. And so we can look at dukkha as being a guide for us. Whenever there's any kind of dukkha, small or large, it points out that there's something happening in our mind—some extra holding, craving, pushing away. The dukkha is a signpost for us: there's something here to pay attention to. Anytime there is dukkha, there's some kind of wanting. So the suffering is a pointer for us that there's something that can be let go of. We can begin to explore these different kinds of wantings.

There's a kind of New Age saying, something along the lines of "life gives us the lessons that we need." And I believe this is true, but I don't think of it quite in the way perhaps that the New Age sense of it conveys—that life is out there somehow designing situations for us so that we meet these situations. We get the lessons we need because in every moment we are meeting our own minds. We are meeting our minds and how they are craving, wanting, pushing, pulling, liking, not liking. In every moment. This is what creates our suffering. This is what creates the lessons that we need. Life does give us the lessons we need. Our mind gives us the lessons we need, if we are willing to open to this exploration of dukkha.

So we really can use our suffering as a guide for us.

The second noble truth concerns letting go of craving. The first noble truth the Buddha recommends is understanding dukkha, understanding suffering. The second noble truth, the action the Buddha suggested we explore, is to abandon the craving, abandon the wanting.

That's easier said than done. That is not often something we can choose to do, in my experience. I remember sitting on retreat at the three-month course and feeling the dukkha, feeling the craving, feeling the clinging onto whatever it was, and recognizing: I have no idea how to let go of this. The mind was so tightly latched onto that experience. There was no way for me to consciously let go.

And so this instruction around letting go of the cause of suffering—a lot of our practice has to do with our relationship to this instruction. It's not so much about actively saying, "Oh, there's clinging, be gone clinging." That just doesn't happen very often. But we can recognize—actually what I found happens is that when we really see the clinging happening, we recognize the clinging, we feel the suffering of that clinging. And so the way to letting go of that clinging is to recognize that this very clinging is suffering itself, and this suffering needs to be understood.

So can I be with the suffering of the holding itself? This is a lot of our practice. It's basically a letting be of this craving. Can we let it be? Can we allow it with mindfulness—not allow it and encourage it, not allow it and act on it. The middle path is about neither repressing nor expressing our reactivity.

So that craving, that wanting to get rid of, that wanting to hold on to—it's fine for those to come up. If they've come up, they've already come up. They've already arisen. That's what I was saying yesterday. That's the acceptance of what has already arisen. Aligning ourselves with truth. Yes, this clinging is here. Can I meet that? Can I be with that?

Very gentle being with allows that clinging to take its own course. And again, we also learn from this exploration. We're understanding the suffering of that craving itself. We begin to understand viscerally that this craving itself is not conducive to well-being. So again, the body-mind organism gets an education: this craving is not the way to happiness.

So really I'm encouraging—hopefully encouraging you—to be willing and interested to explore the dukkha, explore the suffering. The willingness to meet it, to be with it, with the understanding that this education the mind and body are getting helps the mind learn how to let go. The mind will begin to understand how to let go of this clinging. It's often not something we can consciously choose to do, but the mind can let go of it.

As I described with that situation around the anger—my mind, the mind seeing itself propelling headlong towards anger, propelling headlong towards suffering, the mind knew. No. And it wasn't any kind of aversion or resistance to going to the anger. It was the mind going, "That way lies dukkha. Let it go." To the mind: let it go.

So this is a lot of how we practice with the second noble truth. This letting go of wanting, this practice around being with, letting be the clinging—the whole exploration of letting go of wanting is actually an interesting process in our minds.

I've described a little bit about how I've seen it happen: the mind beginning to get the education around dukkha, seeing how the wanting leads to the suffering, the mind seeing the wanting arise and simply letting it go. That's part of the process of letting go around wanting.

And then there's another kind of—almost stages of letting go—that happen in our practice. Our initial levels of dukkha are the more obvious kind. We have anger, hatred, frustration, desire, confusion, boredom, the kind of pride we have, the afflictive emotions we have, these emotions that feel off to us.

As we practice—kind of like my exploration around anger—as we practice with it, our mind begins to understand the suffering of that and begins to let it go. Those afflictive emotions, a layer of them, can begin to fall away or loosen. They don't catch us quite so much anymore. And as we practice, some of the more obvious forms of suffering can begin to let go, and underneath, a subtler kind of suffering can be revealed.

So there are layers of suffering, layers of clinging, very deeply layered in our minds. And in a way, we sometimes have this recognition in our practice or some kind of exploration around wanting that begins to arise around the practice itself. I'm sure that many of you—all of you—have experienced this wanting around the practice. We have a difficult state arise and we want to practice partly to get rid of that difficult state. So there's a kind of subtler wanting that's going on. There's the wanting that's locked in place around the difficult state—the wanting to be seen or heard or to be right. And then as we explore that, we begin to see that kind of wanting. We may begin to understand that inside, as we're exploring with our practice, there's also a wanting around doing the practice itself.

We often recognize this pretty early, actually. I've had somebody come up to me after one of my weekly classes in Redwood City, California, and he was talking about how his wanting to engage in the practice had been really helpful because it helped him get over some really unpleasant, unfortunate circumstances. But he sees now that this is wanting. "If I don't want that," he asked, "then how do I get over these unfortunate, difficult circumstances?"

Through this kind of exploration, we begin to understand intellectually first that there is a wanting involved in our practice. We begin to recognize: the fact that I want to practice—some of it is a wholesome kind of chanda, the kind of desire that can fuel wholesome states, wholesome practices. And some of it is also connected with wanting to get rid of all the difficulty. So we see this kind of mixed motivation. It's an intellectual seeing of that, in a way. We recognize, "Yeah, there's wanting in my practice."

In my very first week-long retreat—my very first ten-day retreat—I felt myself create this identity: "I am going to be a good meditator." I could see that this was happening, but I could also see it was a really useful thing to be doing at that time because there was so much of that more obvious kind of suffering happening.

In a way, this staged letting go of wanting works like this: we have this obvious kind of suffering, and in order to let go of that more obvious suffering, it's helpful to take a step onto a stepping stone. Can I land on the practice for a while? And landing on the practice, landing on exploring the difficult emotions, we begin to loosen our attachments to this stepping stone. Then we begin to land more fully on the practice.

At that point, when we're more into exploring experience and some of the larger layers of suffering have fallen away, we begin to actually experience the subtler levels of suffering around the practice itself—wanting to get rid of difficult states, wanting to find or construct states of calm, peace, or joy.

In terms of this question of using suffering as a guide, we can. This person who came and talked to me was confused. "I see that I want to do the practice in order to get rid of all that difficulty," he said. "So I'm not supposed to want to do the practice, but then what do I do? I just get mired in the difficulty."

I said, "Well, how about letting go of being stuck to that difficulty?" We use the wanting of letting go of suffering to help us let go of that more obvious suffering. Usually in that place, the more obvious suffering is obscuring the suffering around the practice itself.

The suffering around the practice itself, the wanting around the practice itself—I asked this person, "Are you experiencing the suffering of wanting to practice?"

He said, "No. It feels good to want to practice. I just know there's wanting in there."

This is a kind of intellectual knowing of that wanting. It's not an actual meeting of that wanting. And my rough guide for people in using suffering as a guide is this: when it becomes clear to you that you are suffering, that is when to begin to explore it, to begin to investigate it.

So the time to investigate that suffering around the practice, around wanting to get rid of difficult states, is when we start to feel the suffering of it. And you will, at some point, really viscerally feel the suffering of that—the suffering of wanting to construct a state we had yesterday. You will feel that. That is when to use that exploration, suffering, as a guide. Not when it's just an idea in our mind: "Oh, I want that state, I want that beautiful state, so I'm going to practice." If we're not feeling the suffering of that, that's not the time to try to let go of that wanting.

You'll feel this. Steve Armstrong has this great saying: "There's nothing like a great sitting to ruin your day." You have a sitting that's just so clear, so collected, and the next sitting isn't. And you spend the rest of your time trying to figure out what you're doing wrong. How can I get back to that? There, the wanting of that state becomes really clear. In the midst of that beautiful state of mind, there may have been some clinging. But that wasn't the time to begin to explore it.

It wasn't so obvious at the time.

In terms of working with these layers of suffering, I suggest simply meeting the outer layer—what's obvious around the suffering. Rather than trying to jump over it, or digging inside, thinking, "I know there's something deeper in there, and that's what I have to get to." That's just an idea. And generally, it's not helpful to have that leaping-over attitude or agenda in our minds, because our minds are great constructors of experience. If we're looking for something, we'll probably find it, whether or not it was actually there to begin with.

So meeting what is here now, what is obvious, what is clear, what we can touch in this moment, rather than digging and searching—this is investigation. My teacher Sayadaw U Pandita uses an analogy of investigation as being like polishing a bowl with a soft cloth. You take the bowl and you're polishing, rubbing, staying in contact with it. You're meeting the entire surface. That's investigation. Not trying to take an ice pick and pick the thing apart. Not trying to pull it open and see what's in the middle. Just meeting what's obvious.

I'd like to end by reflecting on this teaching of the Buddha around the Four Noble Truths—that the understanding of suffering, when suffering is arising, is our path. It's not something we have to get over in order to get to the real practice.

I held that delusion, that belief, for quite a long time. On one three-month course, I spent a great deal of time both being lost in and exploring, investigating with mindfulness, the arising of self-hatred. For a chunk of that retreat—the first few weeks, I don't know exactly how long—I thought, "Okay, this self-hatred is happening, but I need to get over this, I need to get past this, and that's when the practice will really begin." It was so pervasive. It was so strong. It was so much a part of everything. This was my self-hatred retreat. It was up in spades.

And at some point I had to surrender. I thought, "Okay, I guess this is not going to be the retreat in which I get enlightened. But maybe I'll learn something about my self-hatred." So I surrendered to this. If self-hatred is what's arising, that's what I have to pay attention to.

When I finally made that shift, there was much more willingness to be with the self-hatred, to watch it as it arose. It certainly didn't make it pleasant. And there were a number of understandings, insights that unfolded over the course of weeks.

Then one evening, I saw the whole pattern of self-hatred coming up, beginning to arise. After a dharma talk, I went back to my room and thought, "I'm just going to meet this." There was a strong sense of resolve. I'm just going to meet this. The moment I saw the mind shading towards that thought—"you're no good, you're a failure"—those thoughts that would come up in my mind, the moment I saw it, I would simply recognize: that's contact, and that's an unpleasant phenomenon. Just noticing that, over and over again.

And in that process, at some moment in this exploration, I saw very clearly: this is simply a phenomenon arising in the mind. It's just an empty thought. It is nothing. It's a thought.

In that moment, the pattern of self-hatred just crumbled and was replaced by bliss within a split second. Then there was this little thought that said, "Oh, never again am I going to feel that self-hatred." And immediately I recognized: no. This insight too is impermanent.

There were a number of really profound seeings in that split second. First, there was the seeing of the emptiness, just the corelessness of that thought. Then there was a recognition of grasping onto the insight itself, the recognition that that way lies suffering, the letting go of that, the balance of mind that resulted. Very deep insight.

And in terms of that pattern of self-hatred, that particular insight was like uprooting a tree. I didn't trust it for years that it was really so largely gone. It was a couple of years before I even noticed anything like self-hatred again. Then I began to recognize little bits coming up here and there—the thought "you're no good" arising. But it was like, "Oh yes, there's a thought." There was no belief in that thought anymore. That insight into the coreless, ephemeral nature, the fact that it was just a thought, had cut the belief in that pattern.

So very deep insight into anicca, anatta, while observing self-hatred. In that moment I recognized it just doesn't matter what's going on. What matters is that I meet it. The practice can unfold right in the midst of dukkha. It doesn't have to be something that we work our way through, that we chug our way through, and then finally we come to a space where we can sit in calm and peace and clarity and maybe at some point become enlightened. No—this exploration of dukkha is completely intertwined with our freedom.

It's not a problem. It is simply something to witness, to bring mindfulness to. Mindfulness and wisdom brought together. The wisdom of understanding the helpfulness of observing. This is just a phenomenon. Can I observe this phenomenon? Mindfulness and wisdom together bring this freedom, no matter what our experience is.

Suffering is kind of the way we navigate our minds. Clinging results in suffering. Subtler forms of clinging are what get revealed as we practice. We're not going to get through this practice without experiencing suffering. And we can actually have some lightness around it too.

CHAPTER 86

The Wandering Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella reframes the wandering mind from a meditation obstacle into a profound object of investigation. Rather than dismissing mind-wandering as a failure to overcome, she encourages practitioners to explore this universal pattern with curiosity, recognizing it as evidence of the Buddha's teaching on anattā (not-self) and the out-of-control nature of consciousness.

Fella identifies several flavors of mind-wandering: active thinking and planning, emotionally charged thought storms, low-energy drifting into dreamlike states, and pleasant spacing out. She references the Buddha's second discourse on the uncontrollable nature of the five khandhas, noting that if consciousness were self, we could simply command it to be otherwise. The talk also explores the Buddha's description of how sense contact leads to perception, thought, and mental proliferation (papañca).

Practically, Fella offers guidance for both sides of the wandering phenomenon. When mindfulness spontaneously returns, she suggests noticing what we've woken up into—the thoughts, emotions, and feeling tones present—while also appreciating the effortless quality of that returning awareness. She encourages familiarity with mindfulness itself, not just its objects. For observing the mind leaving the present moment, she describes how continuous practice reveals the cause-and-effect process of wandering. Importantly, she notes that increased wandering after periods of stability often signals a shift to subtler levels of experience rather than practice failure.

In our practice, it's often helpful to recognize certain patterns of experience that recur and then to explore those, getting familiar with them, beginning to recognize them, recognize the conditions in which they occur, how they come together, how they fall apart. We can learn a lot by observing phenomena that happen to us over and over again. Each time we see a familiar pattern, it's like we get a different perspective on it. We learn a little bit more about our minds.

Tonight I'd like to explore a particular pattern that we all share in spades, one that happens to all of us quite frequently: the pattern of the mind wandering out of the present moment. The wandering mind.

This is actually a pattern that we can be interested in, we can explore, we can learn something about. But it's often a pattern that we think is something we just need to dismiss in order to get back to the present moment. I'd like to share with you some of my own exploration around this pattern, some of the things I've learned, some of the things I've understood, and hope to encourage you to make your own exploration.

In this sharing, I'd also like to point to the fact that I'm just picking one pattern here, one particular pattern that we may not necessarily think is so interesting to explore. I want to encourage you that whatever pattern is common for you, whatever pattern is familiar for you, it is well worth exploring. There's so much that you can learn. With so many patterns in my own mind, I kept thinking, "Well, when I get past this one, that's when the practice will really start." What I've come to see is that it is through these very patterns, through understanding and exploring these very things that seem to be in our way, that our practice deepens.

The wandering mind is a term we often use for the mind that loses touch with present moment experience—a wandering out of the present moment. That's kind of the way we think about it, or almost the way it feels at times. There are many different ways this pattern manifests.

Some of the more frequent ones, especially earlier in our practice or earlier in settling into a retreat, involve active reflection, active thinking. The mind picks up on a theme and starts thinking about it—about the past, about the future, planning or remembering, or even describing the present moment.

Then there's the flavor of the wandering mind that is more of a charge out of the present moment. There may be some kind of emotional reactivity coming up, and the thoughts hook into that emotional reactivity and just run away into a pattern of frustration or anger or wanting or loneliness. Whatever the emotion is, often there can be a charge of thoughts related to it—a kind of mind storm.

There's another flavor of this wandering mind that is much less charged. It's more of a drifting out of the present moment. The energy perhaps is a little low, not quite connecting with experience, and the mind just floats out of the present moment. You may notice this in thoughts that don't have much particular meaning to you. They may be dreamlike, or they may be just strange words floating through your mind. Often this is a manifestation of the energy being a little bit lower.

And then there's another flavor that is a kind of spacing out. It doesn't necessarily have much thought connected to it, but the mind loses touch with present moment experience. We find ourselves almost in a zoned-out space. Again, probably not much charge to that, and in fact it may feel kind of pleasant, but there's not much connection with the present moment.

These are just a few of the flavors I've seen of ways the mind can leave the present moment. But a general quality of all of these is basically a state of very low or non-mindfulness. That's actually what's happening: the mind is in a state of low or non-mindfulness. The mind doesn't actually wander anywhere; it doesn't go anywhere. The state of mind shifts, and mindfulness is not arising in the moment. That's the flavor of what we traditionally or typically might call the wandering mind.

There's not much we can do when the mind is wandering. When we're lost in it, very little can be done about that. We can't make ourselves come out of that wandering. When we're in a lost state, we cannot willfully choose to have mindfulness re-arise. It has to re-arise on its own. Fortunately, it will re-arise on its own at some point. And when mindfulness re-arises, at that moment we can begin to explore our experience again.

I'd like to explore this phenomenon of the wandering mind from both sides of where we wander. The easiest place, the place I'll start with, is the places where we can wake up. Then I'd also like to explore the ways we wander, the ways that the mind starts to wander. There is so much we can learn by observing this process of the mind.

We learn about our own minds through this process. We learn about the personal patterns of our minds, how we get caught in certain patterns of thought. We get familiar with the flavors, the habits of our mind, the familiar ways it gets caught. One of the things we learn about is our personal proclivities, what we tend to get stuck to. We recognize this by recognizing the flavor of what we are waking up into when we come back, when mindfulness re-arises.

We also learn more deeply from this phenomenon that the mind is basically out of control. We sit down to meditate, we have the intention to be present, we choose an object perhaps, we bring our attention to the breath, and we have this intention to stay present. But our choice doesn't seem to hold much sway over our mind. The mind just does its thing and at some point will wander off. We have very little control over the fact that the mind wanders out of the present moment.

There is some ability, when we are mindful, to choose mindfulness. It's not us doing it, but the processes of our mind do have some small amount of choice in what happens when we are present, when we are mindful. I'll talk a little more about that part in a few minutes. So there's very little control we have over the mind wandering out of the present moment, but there is some degree of choice that can be made at that point. We have no control over how long our minds wander. We have no control over when that moment of mindfulness will spontaneously re-arise.

We often think of these things as problems, that we don't have control over our minds. We feel like we should be able to not have the mind wander. But this process actually points to a very deep truth: there's very little control. Our minds are out of our control. And if we explore this, we see that this is actually a pointer to the Buddha's teaching on not-self.

He pointed to this in the second discourse that he gave. He pointed to this aspect of being out of control. The processes of our mind and body are out of control. I'll just read you a section of this. He talked about the processes of body, of form, of feeling, of perception, of intention, of consciousness as all being out of our control. He restated it for each of these aspects. I'm going to read it with respect to consciousness:

"Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were the self, it would not lend itself to dis-ease. It would be possible to say with regard to consciousness, 'Let my consciousness be thus, let my consciousness not be thus.' But precisely because consciousness is not self, it lends itself to dis-ease. It is not possible to say, 'Let my consciousness be thus.'"

How many of us would choose, if we could, to say, "Let my consciousness be thus"? That would be wonderful. But consciousness does not lend itself to that.

We usually explore our experience, we often meet our experience and navigate our lives, navigate our world through a perspective of me, of mine, of I—the sense of self. Because we have this view of self, because we're seeing things from this perspective of self much of the time, it influences how we perceive our experience. We may not see things that don't conform with that belief or that view. We have the view, the belief of self, and so much of what we perceive, what we recognize, how we take it in, confirms this belief for us. We don't always notice things that don't confirm it. The wandering mind, the out-of-control nature of our experience, is just such a piece of evidence for not-self. This simple experience of the wandering mind can really point us to a very deep truth if we can take it in.

The exploration of the wandering mind can also support an understanding of cause and effect. We see something that triggers a memory. We start thinking about that memory and we're lost. This is a pretty common way to wander out of the present moment—through some sense experience that we start thinking about. This is a cause and effect process, a pretty simple process. There isn't anyone responsible for it, there isn't anyone here doing it. It is a process of mind, a natural process. In recognizing something, the associative nature of memory creates this effect of a memory arising. If we're present for this process, we can see this cause and effect relationship unfolding. We see, almost eerily, that it is just happening. It is simply a process unfolding—again, underscoring, giving us evidence for this teaching of not-self.

Through the exploration of the wandering mind, we can learn things about our personal patterns of mind. We can begin to recognize the out-of-control nature of the mind. We can begin to understand something about cause and effect. We can also begin to learn something, appreciate something about awareness itself, about mindfulness itself—begin to get familiar with the experience of what it is to be aware.

The easiest place to start this exploration, at least in my own experience, is in the moment when mindfulness re-arises. That moment when we remember, "Oh, I've been lost in thought," or "I've been spaced out, or disconnected from experience." Mindfulness has re-arisen.

Often in that moment there can be a little bit of judgment—sometimes subtle, sometimes really obvious—just a little bit of a sense of, "That's not what I was supposed to have been doing. I sat down to meditate. I sat down to be present. My mind was off. That wasn't what I was planning." And so we can have a little bit of that judgment come in when our mindfulness re-arises. You're all familiar with this.

But when we can really recognize and accept and truly acknowledge the out-of-control nature of the mind, we begin to see there's no point in judging the fact that our mind has wandered. Causes and conditions arose that made the mindfulness go away. Causes and conditions arose to make the mindfulness come back. In the moment when mindfulness comes back, it's already back. There's nothing to come back to in that moment. Mindfulness has already re-arisen.

Can you take an interest in that moment? What is that about?

One of the things about that particular moment that I find really interesting is the fact that mindfulness has re-arisen spontaneously. It didn't take any effort at all for that moment of mindfulness to arise. We so often find this practice of awareness, of mindfulness, to involve a lot of efforting and doing. And that moment when mindfulness comes back is a pointer to the possibility of an easeful quality of mindfulness.

Our usual instructions in that moment when mindfulness re-arises—the kind of familiar instructions we explore—are to notice what you're waking up into. Often it's thinking. Mindfulness has re-arisen. What are we aware of in that moment? Thoughts perhaps: planning, worry, judging, fantasizing, ruminating, arguing, describing. Whatever it is, acknowledging whatever it is that we have woken up into.

Sometimes I like to suggest that thoughts are pretty potent forces in our minds. They have a creative power that is quite amazing. So when we've gotten lost in thought, when our minds have gone off in thought, often they have not just created the world of thought but they've created a whole complex of emotions and body sensations as well. So when you wake up into thought, what has been the impact of that thinking on your experience? Taking a moment to recognize that. And to recognize that mindfulness is here already. There's nothing to come back to. If you can be aware of what you've woken up into, that is enough, if you're practicing mindfulness.

Of course, if you're practicing concentration, in that moment of coming back into awareness, recognizing that moment of awareness, the choice there can be, "Oh, I'm back. Okay, let me come back to my object of concentration." So that's the moment when we have some choice in our experience.

It can be really helpful to notice if there has been some kind of emotion that's been created because our mind has wandered off into thought. There's been a kind of charge out of the present moment—the mind going off into a pattern of frustration or desire may have generated the feeling of frustration or desire. So taking that in, recognizing, "Oh, that is part of the impact of that experience."

These things are helpful in terms of recognizing what we've woken up into. And as I mentioned yesterday morning in the reflection, sometimes when our mind wanders out of the present moment, it can wander into beautiful emotions, wholesome emotions. It might wander into thoughts of dear friends that you've spent time with recently, and the feeling that's been generated by those thoughts is mettā. Or perhaps the mind has wandered off into an offering that you made, and the joy and the generosity of that offering may be the impact of those thoughts. So sometimes the wandering mind can wander us into beautiful qualities as well. And in the waking up, it's really helpful to recognize those qualities.

Then we can explore the feeling tone—the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral aspect of our experience—when we wake up. If the mind has charged off into worry or frustration, the feeling tone is probably unpleasant. If the mind has wandered into fantasy, the feeling tone may be pleasant when you come back.

One thing I've found particularly helpful in this exploration around feeling tone and the wandering mind is recognizing that the very drifting itself—sometimes in that low energy state when the mind just drifts out of the present—can often be a very pleasant state in itself. Sometimes it's almost the pleasantness itself that we've gotten lost in. The mind has gravitated, in that low energy state, toward that pleasant experience and simply gotten lost in it.

So in the waking up, experiencing that pleasantness can bring energy into the present moment. We get the benefit of feeling the pleasant that the mind had gravitated toward, but now with awareness.

These explorations are looking at almost the content of what we wake up into—looking at the thoughts we wake up into, looking at the feelings, the emotions. What is present as we come back into awareness?

But there's another side of this waking up that I'd like to explore with you, and that is the recognition of the familiarity we can develop with the experience of mindfulness itself as mindfulness comes back. For me, this exploration has been about seeing if I can touch into the very moment that mindfulness returns.

At one point during a three-month course, this became my practice. I could see the mind wandered out of the present moment a lot, so I started getting interested in how soon I could notice that I was back. Initially, as I explored this, it felt like there was a kind of lag. When I consciously recognized that mindfulness had returned, it was as though there had been a little bit of fuzzy mindfulness preceding the clear recognition —the clear recognition of "I'm back."

Sometimes it feels a little like climbing out of mud. There's a little bit of mindfulness, and then we sink back into whatever we've been lost in. A little bit of mindfulness, and we sink back. A little bit of mindfulness. And at some point, mindfulness kind of recognizes itself. "Oh, I'm back. Here I am."

In that moment, what is the feeling? What is it like to be aware? When mindfulness re-arises, it's a great time to explore what it feels like to be mindful. We can't really know what it's like when we're lost—mindfulness isn't there to take that in. But in the moment when mindfulness re-arises, there's a lingering memory of what it was like just before, when we were hazy, disconnected, not present. And in this moment, there is the clarity of being aware again. We begin to get a sense of that clarity, of what it is to be mindful.

This feeling of mindfulness is actually quite familiar in a way. Once we start to recognize it, it's there in so much of our experience. We just don't notice because we're more interested in what we're aware of and not so interested in the awareness itself.

Our meditation practice gives us tremendous opportunity for this exploration. In a day, hundreds, maybe thousands of times, we have this moment when mindfulness returns. For myself, this exploration—getting interested in the re-arising of mindfulness, getting interested in mindfulness itself—was really helpful in letting go of judgment around the wandering mind. It didn't matter how many times my mind wandered. Every time it happened, I had this opportunity to notice this distinction and get a little more familiar with this feeling, this sense, this experience of mindfulness itself.

This familiarity with mindfulness serves you, because this moment of remembering, this moment when mindfulness re-arises, actually happens to us more than we consciously recognize. We get a very brief moment of recognizing something in the present, and then we move into recognition of that thing and start thinking about it or doing something with it. We very quickly move from recognition into response.

We're in the bathroom and hear a faucet dripping. There's been a moment of awareness—maybe not conscious mindfulness, but a moment of awareness of that phenomenon. And the mind immediately, very naturally, goes to take action: turn off the faucet. In this simple way, we are designed to respond to what we experience. But we're not so familiar with recognizing that we have become aware, that we have become mindful.

So this familiarity with the experience of mindfulness—with what it is to be mindful—begins to point mindfulness out to us more and more throughout the day. It's a very helpful exploration, one that encourages us to recognize more of these spontaneous, effortless moments of mindfulness, which happen a lot. And when those moments arise, when mindfulness returns, the processes of our mind have some choice. We can then choose to cultivate mindfulness more consciously.

We count on these spontaneous moments of mindfulness for the process of meditation to even begin. So the more we can recognize how frequently they happen, the more we can connect with this lighter touch to mindfulness and connect with our intentionality—be present when we are already mindful, bringing our attention more clearly to experience.

Then there's the exploration of the wandering mind, of looking at where the mind wanders out of the present moment. That place where we are aware and the mind kind of loses touch with what we're paying attention to and either drifts out or charges out. We can actually see this start to happen. It is possible to watch the mind begin to get familiar with the beginning of the wandering. It's a harder place to explore; it's much easier, much more obvious to us, the moment of waking up. The moment where the mind starts to lose touch with the present moment is a subtler experience. But a little bit of understanding about how this process can happen can raise some interest in this.

How does the mind wander out of the present moment? The Buddha actually has a very clear description of this in the suttas. He says it starts with sense contact. There's the eye, there's the sight, there's the contact, there's the eye consciousness—the meeting as contact. And with the contact there's feeling; what one feels, we perceive, we recognize. What we recognize, what we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we tend to start mentally proliferating about.

This happens to us all the time. We're sitting in meditation and there's a sound—a creaking floorboard. So there's been that sense contact, the sound, the recognition of the sound: a creaking floorboard. And then there may be some thoughts about it. The building's getting a little old. The floor didn't used to creak. Maybe I should offer some dana so they can fix the floor. I wonder if they really can fix the floor. They probably have to tear up the whole thing and shut down the whole retreat center. And the mind is off.

From sense contact, this is a very common way for our mind to wander out of the present moment. Mindfulness is not present for some part of this process—that's when the mind wanders. So we can watch this process happening. We can begin to recognize how this process unfolds.

Now, it's not that we can force ourselves to see this process. Actually, my own experience and exploration of this level of investigation is that usually it begins to be more apparent as the mindfulness gets more continuous. It's not something I can do. It's not something I can decide: "Oh, I'm going to look at how that process of perception leads to thought, leads to papañca, leads to that mental proliferation." But the more continuous, the more present we are, the more we can begin to see how these processes work.

I've worked with people on other retreats describing this process, and it doesn't necessarily resonate in the moment or it's not something they can see in the moment. But then a few days later suddenly they're recognizing, "Oh, I see—this is how the mind does this." So it's kind of like just putting this information in the room may help you to be able to see a new process in your minds.

This is seeing cause and effect at work. We see sense experience. We see a memory arise based on that sense experience. We see the thoughts arise based on that memory. We see perhaps an emotion created based on that. So we begin to see how things unfold: cause and effect, cause and effect, cause and effect. And at times it can really just be like dominoes falling. Not me doing it, but just one thing triggers the next, triggers the next, triggers the next. When the mind is more continuous, it can watch this process unfolding and gain a sense of the not-self nature of these processes of mind.

We can also wander out of the present moment on a feeling tone as well. I talked about wandering out based on perception leading to thought—some recognition of something. That's a really common way for our mind to leap out of the present moment. Concepts arise in the mind and we think about concepts. But we can also wander out of the present moment just based on feeling tone, without concept being involved necessarily. I mentioned this a few minutes ago: the mind kind of moves into a pleasant state and then just drifts into pleasant. Not so much thinking about it, but just the feeling of pleasant.

We can get lost in pleasant. You're paying attention to the breath, the breath gets really comfortable, the comfortableness gets really pleasant, and the mind just kind of drifts off into a pleasant zoned-out state. Not particularly thinking, but also not particularly present.

So we can see that the mind can wander out of the present moment when it gets hooked to a feeling. Another exploration I've had around wandering out based on feeling tone—and this is an interesting one—is when feeling tone gets kind of neutral. I've recognized in my own experience that when there's not much feeling tone happening, that can be a place where our habits are ready, where our patterns of mind are ready to just jump in.

For example, on one retreat I was starting to experience quite a bit of neutral experience—a neutral feeling in the body, a lot of calmness in the mind—so not much of either pleasant or unpleasant experience, just really balanced, calm, quiet body. By that point I had learned enough to have the idea in my mind that when things get neutral, maybe, just maybe, something really good will happen. That the neutrality itself is kind of like a doorway to something. And so a little bit of expectation would arise—a little bit of "Ooh, is something going to happen?"

And when nothing happened, the mind hooked into its habitual pattern of "Oh, I'm a failure. I can't do this right. I'm no good." The mind went from neutral experience, where not much was happening, to picking up on its habitual pattern—essentially self-hatred in this case. So being interested in how the mind does what it does around neutral experience is important. It's a very common place for the mind to leap into. It's like there's not much else happening, and the familiar patterns are very likely to pick up when there's not much going on.

We can also notice another exploration around the mind beginning to wander: we can begin to notice when the mind starts to lose a little bit of contact with what it's paying attention to. For instance, you're paying attention to the breath, noticing the experience of the breath, right with the breath. At some point you might begin to recognize that the mindfulness and the breath are right together, and then you might notice there's a little less contact between the breath and the mindfulness. The mindfulness is still present, but it's just not quite as connected to the breath—the mindfulness has let go of the breath a little bit.

On one retreat I could see this. I could see the mindfulness start to let go of the breath. When I noticed that, since I was paying attention to the breath, I noticed there was a little less clarity of the mindfulness, less clarity of the experience. So I began recognizing, "Oh, the mind isn't as clear with the breath—come back." I did that, and the mind kept letting go, and I'd think, "Come back, come back a little bit more closely."

After this happened three or four times, I finally recognized: well, the mind has let go of the breath, but I'm mindful of that. Let me see what the mind is doing, rather than having an agenda to bring it back to the breath. Let me just see. If I'm mindful of the mind leaving the breath, let's see where it goes. And the mindfulness opened into a kind of new, broad, more spacious awareness that was very new for me.

So being interested in where the mind is leaving the experience is valuable. Now, there were kind of two choices there. When you're aware, you can choose where to direct the attention, but you can also choose to follow the awareness, to stay present with what the mindfulness is naturally orienting to—watching essentially what the mind is naturally doing.

There are some conditions that lead to the wandering mind. The obvious ones are the defilements arising, thoughts reflecting on the past, reflecting on the future, thinking about the present. These are the obvious ways. But the mind can also wander for some other reasons.

I really want to put this out there because early in my practice, or at some point in my practice, I thought that if my mind was wandering, it meant that I needed to be doing something more—that I had obviously stopped being properly aware if the mind started wandering. But there can be times in practice, particularly if you've noticed there's been a period of pretty steady mindfulness, a period of time where the mind has been fairly present for the breath or present for experience—whether you're doing concentration or open awareness—just present without a lot of wandering. And then suddenly you notice the mind is starting to wander.

In my experience, it often doesn't mean that suddenly I've lost the effort. It sometimes means that the mind is settling into a new level.

For example, sometimes as the mind starts to relax and let go of the outer layers or familiar layers of patterns of mind, it's like the normal structures of our mind start to fall away. Sometimes there can be some deeper things that have almost been repressed by those normal structures. And when those structures have fallen away, it's like there's room for things that have been buried to begin to come up.

So this does happen to us. It's like we drop through a layer and another layer reveals itself. It's not that we've gone backwards. It's not that we've suddenly messed up. It's simply that the mind has opened up to a new layer of things that hadn't been so obvious before.

Or another way this can happen: the mind begins to get concentrated, settles into concentration, but the energy is not quite balanced with that concentration. The mind then almost slips or sinks into dreams, into a kind of dreaminess, into nonsensical thought. Again, this doesn't necessarily mean that you're doing anything wrong. It's like a little bit of energy imbalance.

For myself, in that kind of space, I've learned that it's often actually not a very great energy imbalance. If you're sitting there in meditation, fairly concentrated, and dream-like images are arising, and you're not actually falling asleep, the energy is just slightly off. What I've found is that it takes just a very little bit of bumping up the energy to have it come back into balance. Maybe simply opening the eyes or straightening the spine a little bit—some very small adjustments. Earlier in my practice I would think, "Oh, my mind is wandering. I really better try hard." And that would just send me into restlessness, because I was over-applying the effort. So often that place of low energy where the mind starts moving into dreaminess requires just a little bit of energy added to the system.

Then there's another interesting phenomenon that I find happening particularly with mindfulness, with awareness practice. As the mindfulness gets more continuous, I've noticed this several times in several different forms: there's a certain time where you're really recognizing, "Wow, the mind's pretty continuous. Mindfulness is pretty continuous. Really right there with experience, moment after moment after moment." And suddenly the mind starts wandering again. What's going on?

When that happens, can you get curious about it? Get curious about what's actually happening there, because what I've seen often is that as the mindfulness gets more continuous, it's kind of like the mindfulness begins to gravitate toward subtler experience. We can have an idea or an agenda about what we're paying attention to. It's as if our mind gets used to paying attention to experience at a certain level—we're used to experiencing this flow of body sensation, this flow of energetic experience, these kinds of ways thoughts appear. The mind gets used to that, and it's almost like part of our practice mind has this filter that says, "This is what we're seeing, this is what we're recognizing, this is what we're noticing."

But the mindfulness, being more continuous, is actually starting to gravitate toward something a little different—a subtler level of body sensation, a more refined recognition of thought. Because we have this kind of agenda or idea about what we're paying attention to, there's a mismatch. These are places where, when there's been a continuity of mindfulness and the mind starts to wander, I generally step back and ask, "Well, what is the mind actually paying attention to here? What's happening?" And I'll often see that the mindfulness has naturally touched into a subtler level of experience that I almost hadn't been aware of, that I hadn't recognized consciously.

So I'd like to encourage a curiosity about the wandering mind. There are so many different ways, so many different reasons that the mind wanders. And not always is it because we're not applying our effort enough. In fact, sometimes when the mind wanders, what I've begun to appreciate—especially on long retreat, like so many of you are here for a long time—on retreats of this length, when the mind starts to wander, it can often be a kind of hallmark that there's been a shift in the practice. Maybe one that you've not consciously recognized. Can you open up and recognize what is happening now?

Now, if you've been spacing out and going for walks and talking on the phone and doing that kind of thing, and you start noticing the mind wandering, well then it may be that your mind has gotten restless and agitated and you need to bring the attention back more closely. But if you've been practicing and suddenly, after a period of relative stability, the mind is wandering a lot, get curious about it. There's so much to learn.

Now I'd like to finish by saying that I've talked about many different ways I have explored this phenomenon of the wandering mind—things I've learned, things I've recognized. And what I'd like to say is that I'm not suggesting here that you try to do or try to see things in the way that I've expressed them.

Mostly what I'm hoping is that you'll be interested in this phenomenon of the wandering mind and become curious about it. Look at it for yourself. Maybe having heard something of my own deepening of practice through this exploration, it might help you to have a lighter attitude about the wandering mind, a more curious attitude.

If I've encouraged that, I feel this has been a worthwhile exploration.

And anything at all that comes up for you can be explored with this kind of attention—whether it's ordinary experience, feeling just like normal, everyday life, or whether it's self-hatred, frustration, anger, hostility, the wandering mind, states of bliss. Whatever is happening, that is where the unfolding of your practice is. Explore that. Meet that. Be with that.

CHAPTER 87

Wisdom and Insight

Andrea Fella · 56 min

In this talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of paññā (wisdom) as understood in the Buddha's teachings. She begins by examining the Buddha's fundamental insight: that suffering arises not from lacking what we want, but from the wanting itself. This shift in perspective—recognizing that happiness dependent on impermanent, unreliable conditions is inherently unsatisfying—forms the foundation of Buddhist wisdom.

Fella outlines the traditional framework of wisdom within the threefold training (sīla, samādhi, paññā) and its relationship to the Four Noble Truths. She explains the three levels of wisdom: sutamaya paññā (wisdom from hearing), cintāmaya paññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanāmaya paññā (wisdom from cultivation through practice). These three spiral together, each supporting the other in a deepening understanding. She emphasizes that wisdom isn't merely intellectual—it requires engagement and action.

The talk becomes especially practical as Fella describes how wisdom manifests in meditation: as shifts of perspective when we suddenly recognize "this is just anger" or "this is just wanting"; as the gradual recognition of cause and effect through repeated observation; and as the direct seeing of defilements not arising when mindfulness becomes continuous. She draws a meaningful distinction between psychological insights—which help us understand our conditioning but may not uproot patterns—and vipassanā insights into the three characteristics (anicca, dukkha, anattā) that can profoundly transform our relationship to suffering. Through her personal example of working with self-hatred, she illustrates how deep seeing into the ephemeral, not-self nature of thoughts can release patterns that psychological understanding alone cannot touch.

Tonight I'd like to talk about wisdom, the wisdom of the Buddha, which is actually quite specific because it really specifically addresses the question of dukkha, of how we suffer, why we suffer.

When the Buddha had his awakening, it's said that he looked out at the world and saw that while beings really are hoping for happiness, while beings are acting in ways that they think will bring them happiness, they're actually behaving in exactly the opposite way. Typically in seeking for happiness we tend to think that having things will make us happy, or that perhaps seeking to become someone will make me happy—a respected person, a liked person.

The Buddha recognized that this way of trying to find happiness is really depending on things, relying on finding our happiness in dependence on things that are really outside of our control. And so it's not a very reliable, not a very wise way to try to find happiness. If we're seeking to have things to make us happy, those very things are impermanent, unreliable, destined to decay. If we are seeking for happiness based on becoming someone or having respect or fame or good opinions of other people, that relies on the opinions of other people. How reliable is that?

And so in his awakening, the Buddha really had a shift of perspective about where happiness can be found. His proposal is that it's not so much the not having that makes us feel dissatisfied, that we're engaged in this dukkha, but rather it's the wanting to have. The wanting to have is the source of our struggle. And so this fundamental shift, the wisdom that the Buddha offers us, is around this fundamental shift: How can true happiness be found?

Within the teachings of the Buddha, there are a couple of different ways that wisdom is brought into the teaching. One explicit way it's brought in is in the threefold training: sila, samadhi, paññā. Sila is ethics, samadhi is concentration, paññā is wisdom. That threefold training, that gradual training, is understood to be overlaid on top of the Eightfold Path, where the wisdom is found in the first two aspects of the Eightfold Path: wise understanding and wise intention.

So what is wise view, wise understanding? This is defined in different ways, different perspectives actually of how we can look at what it means to have wise understanding. The most common way is framed around dukkha. No big surprise, because this is the problem the Buddha was trying to solve. And so wise understanding is the understanding of the Four Noble Truths: the truth of suffering, the truth of the cause of suffering, the truth of the cessation of suffering, and the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering.

That wisdom also incorporates the actions the Buddha suggested that we take with respect to those truths: that we understand suffering, that we let go of the cause of suffering, that we realize the cessation of suffering, and that we cultivate the path leading to the cessation of suffering.

So the wisdom of the Buddha in this teaching includes the understandings that we need to connect with—that there is suffering, how suffering is caused, that it's possible for suffering to end, and that there is a path. But also this wisdom includes that we have to practice. We have to take action on these truths. It's not about believing them. The belief in these truths doesn't do much for us, but the action, the cultivating the understanding of suffering, that supports us. And this is the way that wisdom grows in us.

Another way that wisdom is defined in the texts—there's quite a few different ways, but one very central way—is recognizing and understanding what is skillful in terms of leading us away from suffering and what is unskillful in terms of our actions. Those actions that are unskillful tend to cement, re-cement the process of craving in our minds. Actions that are skillful tend to help us to move away from that craving. So the actions that are unskillful are those that are based in greed, in aversion, in delusion. The actions that are skillful are those that are based in non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. And so again, this wisdom of the Buddha is pointing us to how we can engage. What are actions we can take that will support us? What are actions to let go of?

In this exploration of both these definitions—the teaching on the Four Noble Truths and this exploration of what's skillful and what's unskillful—there is an understanding that cause and effect underlies our lives. The skillful actions that we can take will be a cause that will lead to the effect of increasing happiness in our lives. The letting go of the unskillful actions will have that same effect. Skillful actions tend to lead us towards happiness; unskillful actions tend to lead us towards suffering.

And so this teaching, the wisdom that actions have consequences, is deeply embedded in the teachings of the Buddha. We begin to see this as we explore what it means to understand suffering. As we understand suffering, we begin to see the cause and effect relationship. Exploring suffering, we begin to see what causes it.

We begin to see this pattern of cause and effect. And as the mind begins to see this pattern, it begins to recognize that certain things help us, certain things are skillful, certain things are unskillful. So all of these teachings on wisdom are really interwoven. They're stated in different ways, but I really see that they are interconnected.

Another definition of wise understanding is stated in terms of this cause and effect nature of experience through the teaching on dependent origination, which is basically an elaboration of the Second Noble Truth that describes how suffering is created. The Second Noble Truth states that suffering has a cause, and its cause is craving. The teaching on dependent origination elaborates that teaching.

There's one sutta in which the Buddha is asked, "What is wise understanding?" And he says that in this world, mostly people are enamored either with the idea of existence or the idea of non-existence. But one with wise understanding, when things come into being, the idea of non-existence doesn't occur to them. And when things fall out of being, as things disappear, the idea of existence doesn't occur to them. He says that the teaching of the middle is that when this is, that is—things are dependent on conditions. And he goes through the teaching on dependent origination in that discussion. So this is another definition of wisdom. All these pieces—the understanding of suffering, what supports us to move away from suffering, what we need to let go of, the understanding of cause and effect—all of these pieces are the wisdom of the Buddha. The Buddha, exploring his own experience, came to articulate the wisdom in these forms.

There's another way that wisdom is described in the suttas, a teaching that says there are different kinds of wisdom or different levels of wisdom. There's the wisdom that comes from listening, reading, hearing information. They talk about this as a form of wisdom. The term for this is sutamayā paññā, suta being the term for hearing, paññā being the word for wisdom. So sutamayā paññā is the wisdom that comes from hearing. This is the first place where the wisdom comes from for our practice—we hear some teachings.

The second kind of wisdom is connected to our ability to think and reflect. This is called cintāmayā paññā. That learning we've experienced through hearing, through reading, we take it in. We start thinking about it, reflecting on it. Does this make sense to me? How does it make sense to me? And in the teachings of the Buddha, in what we've heard, there is this encouragement to engage. So part of this reflective process is asking: does this make sense enough to me to engage, to practice, to put these teachings into action?

At the beginning of our practice, and often throughout our practice, we need to hear teachings, we need to reflect. The teachings of the Buddha, the wisdom of the Buddha—I find them, at least, to be quite inspiring, this possibility of freedom. It lifts my heart, it makes me sense that perhaps this is possible. And initially there's a kind of faith that may happen, not necessarily based in anything tangible in ourselves, but the faith that somebody else has said this works. "Maybe I could try this."

And in fact, that's how it felt to me when I first met the teachings of the Buddha. Somebody had sent me a book. I was in a space of pretty severe suffering, and I read through this book and gleaned this little bit of wisdom out of it. Most of my suffering at that time was around afflictive emotions. And the little bit of wisdom that I gleaned, if I had to articulate it now, would be something like: rather than acting on those emotions, turn your attention and notice them.

My response to that was, "Well, how's that going to work? How's that going to do any good?" But I had really hit bottom. And so there was this teaching, and there was a statement in the book that this is helpful, this has helped—it had helped the author of the book. And I thought, "Well, nothing else has worked. Why don't I give this a try?" That's how it felt to me, that willingness to engage with the wisdom of the Buddha.

That's kind of how our faith might feel at the beginning—just a willingness, a willingness to give it a try.

So those first two kinds of wisdom need to be put into action. It's not just about taking in information and thinking about it. We need to engage. And it is that engagement that begins to lead to the third kind of wisdom: the wisdom of cultivation of mind, the wisdom of experiential understanding—bhāvanā-mayā paññā, a wisdom of insight.

These three kinds of wisdom, I've seen in my practice, spiral on each other. With some insight, with some recognition of the benefits of the practice, there's an interest in deepening the understanding of the teachings, which leads to further reflection, a further engagement, which leads to a deepening of the insight. So these kinds of wisdom support each other. It's not like we gain all the information first and think about it and then practice. It's really a spiral, a deepening spiral into the terrain of this wisdom.

I'd like to explore with you tonight some of the different ways we actually experience wisdom—not in the abstract, not just as ideas. I'd like to explore some of the things I've noticed, ways that I've experienced this wisdom arising.

The first thing that is helpful to connect with, or to recognize, or perhaps to open to, is that wisdom develops through contact with dukkha. When dukkha is happening, it's not a mistake. This is our learning. This is the place where wisdom can develop. We're cultivating, we're following the teachings of the Buddha, and the Buddha's teachings are about understanding dukkha. Joseph sometimes says that we want insight into dukkha, we want to see clearly into dukkha, but without experiencing the dukkha. This dukkha is not a mistake. It's the pointer to how we cling, as I talked about a couple of weeks ago.

There are different ways that wisdom functions, and those first two kinds—the wisdom of learning, the wisdom of reflection—can be helpful to us in our practice. There are times, if we're struggling, when it can be helpful to consciously reflect, to bring in, to actually allow wisdom thoughts to come into our mind. This might be as simple as remembering, consciously connecting when we're experiencing something—when we're experiencing a state of anger, consciously recognizing: this is dukkha. Or: this is impermanent. This kind of reflection.

So this is using wisdom. It's clearly not that we know it as truth for ourselves in that moment. But I've seen for myself, in bringing these kinds of reflections in, how helpful it is to create a little bit of space around the difficulty. This is one way we can use wisdom in our practice.

I encourage people to find language that really resonates with them for these wisdom reflections. We have all been practicing here, we've all been practicing for quite a long time, all have had flavors of insights, different kinds of insights. So how have those insights landed for you? You might be able to find a way to articulate that for yourself in a short phrase. One that I like, borrowed from my teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, that happens to really resonate for me, is: this is nature. What is happening right now is a very natural phenomenon. It's happening because of causes and conditions. It's already happening. It's like there's a tree growing in front of me—this tree is already here. I might as well not deny it. This is nature.

The three core insights of vipassanā are around: this is dukkha, this is impermanent or unreliable, this is not me, not mine, not who I am. This is a process of causes and conditions. There are various ways to phrase those core insights. Finding a language that works for you in bringing in this wisdom can be very helpful.

And wisdom can sometimes be more intuitive in a way. We can recognize, we can have a sense—for instance, if we have a decision to make and we're sitting with ourselves, feeling into that decision, perhaps trying on various scenarios—there can be an intuitive sense of: hmm, not quite right. Or: that lands, that resonates. That kind of wisdom takes in, or encompasses, our understanding of ethics, our understanding of suffering.

So it's a broader kind of wisdom. It can often be felt, I find, in the area of the chest. And then there's the kind of wisdom that we may tend to seek out or hope for—the really clear seeing where the mind just goes, "Wow, look at that! Oh my God, things are really impermanent." Suddenly the mind sees the impermanence in a split second, really clearly seeing into something in a moment. So there are different ways that we might experience wisdom.

Let me offer some specific examples. One that's very common, really common, is a feeling of a shift of perspective around an experience. We're caught in something, exploring it, trying to meet it with mindfulness, and then there's a little bit of a shift of perspective. "Oh, this is just frustration. This is just depression. This is just wanting." There's that shift when it suddenly becomes, "Oh." That's a time when the resistance falls away. Wisdom is operating in that moment.

What I'm partly exploring here today is to point to ways that wisdom arises in your practice, and the recognition of it as wisdom. We begin to see that this is not me doing this shift of perspective. We can't do that. I remember on some of my early retreats, after I'd had some shifts of perspective, I was like, "Wow, that's so amazing." Then I would sit down at my next sitting and get all upset and feel pressured that I had to do that again. And it's like, "Oh, I can't do that again." Well, of course you can't do that again. It's conditions that come together. I can't choose to make wisdom arise. It's not under personal control. It is, however, something that we can cultivate the conditions for. We can bring our attention to our experience, and wisdom can arise. We can see that shift. So the seeing of wisdom arising cultivates more wisdom. It's a support for the cultivation of wisdom to actually see and recognize wisdom.

This shift of perspective that we have—one way I think about it is that it's almost like putting a car into neutral. When we are engaged in some afflictive emotional state, it's like the gears are engaged. We've got our foot on the gas. Those thoughts in our mind about the difficulties are like our foot on the gas. The gears are engaged and the momentum is building. Then we recognize, "Oh, this is just anger," and it's kind of like the gears get disengaged.

Now when the gears are disengaged like that, it's not that the momentum of those gears stops immediately. When you think about being in a car going down the freeway at a hundred miles an hour and you put the car into neutral, the car doesn't stop. So with this shift of perspective, this form of wisdom, the car goes into neutral, the mind goes into neutral, but the momentum of that difficulty doesn't necessarily stop right away.

This is not to denigrate this form of wisdom. If we sit in a car after it's been put into neutral, it will come to a stop, because we're no longer giving it the momentum, no longer giving it the gas. Likewise, when we disengage the gears of our mind, perhaps that pattern, that difficult, afflictive emotion, doesn't stop right away. But we're looking at it from a larger perspective. And we can simply watch it wind down and watch the momentum of that pattern dissipate.

Another way that we can experience wisdom is in seeing the causes and conditions of a pattern as it unfolds. Looking at a familiar pattern, perhaps one that recurs for you—each time you look at that pattern, each time you recognize, "Oh, there it is again, there it is again," if we can look at that pattern again and again and again, the mind begins to gather data about that pattern. Each time that pattern appears, there's a little bit more data about it. And the wisdom of the mind begins to put that data together, begins to understand some of the consequences of that pattern.

In my early explorations around anger, for instance, I began to recognize that initially my sense of anger was that it was going to cause the person I was angry at suffering. I was completely oblivious to the suffering it was causing me. Each time I looked at it, each time I brought my attention to that pattern over and over again, the mind got its education that this is suffering, this is dukkha.

This kind of wisdom of the mind putting together these patterns—there's an analogy that I find resonates with this. I just imagine way back in the time of early humans, before we had any books about the stars, any shared knowledge about what's up there in the heavens. Every night, on a clear night, people might go out and look up at the stars. Each night you look up—that's the pattern. Over and over again, over the course of many nights, many years, many observations, the understanding of patterns began to develop. The understanding that there's a kind of background of stars, and then there seem to be some lights that move through that background pattern. Over the years, seeing how those happen in a regular pattern. It's phenomenal to me to think about how many observations it took to understand what we understand about the stars.

Our understanding of our own minds unfolds in this way. We observe over and over again. The mind begins to put together the patterns. The mind begins to understand the patterns. The mind begins to understand: these experiences are suffering, these are the situations that lead to that suffering, these are ways to move away from that suffering. Again, this is wisdom at work, the wisdom of the mind.

As the mind starts to see these causes and conditions, the recognition develops over time. This anger—this is suffering. Any afflictive emotion, grasping, craving. Craving is one that can be hard initially to recognize as suffering in itself. We're so focused on the thing we want and the idea that when we get it, everything's going to be great, that we don't actually see that in the process of that getting, there's a cramping and a holding. The very wanting itself is suffering.

The mind seeing this over and over again helps to explain, I think, why it takes so long for us to get it. Craving is suffering. The pattern has been so entrenched: get what you want, you'll be happy. Get what you want, you'll be happy. And we miss the suffering of the craving itself. The more we can see that, the more we recognize that, the more the mind begins to understand it. The mind knows viscerally—the body and mind know—that craving is suffering. And then as the mind sees itself heading in that direction, it begins to recognize: that way is not such a good way to go.

I think I said this a couple weeks ago—that the organism kind of inclines towards well-being, but it fundamentally misunderstands how well-being is to be found. This exploration with mindfulness begins to reveal much more deeply how true well-being can be found. Seeing the causes and conditions, seeing that this way lies suffering, the mind choosing not to go there—that's wisdom.

Sometimes it can feel like we bring in the wisdom of that. We see this habit, and we think, "I want that thing, but I've seen over and over again that it leads to suffering, so let me just not do that." It can sometimes feel like an intentional choice, and there is wisdom in that as well. And sometimes it's more like the mind just knows: no, we don't do that. We don't go there. That way lies suffering. Different levels of wisdom arising.

We can also see wisdom in the recognition that something happening in the present moment is just a phenomenon happening in the present moment. Many of you have reported this recognition—that a thought is arising, even a very charged kind of thought, and the recognition that that thought is just a thought in the present moment. It's just a phenomenon arising in the mind. In that seeing of thoughts as phenomena arising in the present mind, often there's a recognition that there's been a cause for that thought. Sometimes that recognition of "this is just a thought" comes with the understanding that it's just arising as a phenomenon—a set of causes and conditions have created that thought. And so that begins to point us to the recognition that this thought is not mine, it's not me, it's not who I am.

Another way we can see wisdom, and this one's a little different, is seeing the non-arising of defilement, of kilesa—mind states that are based in greed, aversion, and delusion. In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha talks about seeing the non-arising of the hindrances in particular. He says that one recognizes the non-arising of a hindrance. On one retreat somebody asked, "Well, how does one see the non-arising of something?" I reflected on it and came up with four different ways that I've explored in my own practice. This is actually an interesting thing to recognize—when something is not arising, especially when it's a hindrance or a pattern so familiar to you, a familiar pattern of depression or loneliness.

or of anxiety.

If you can recognize when it is not present, when it's not arising, that does a great deal—it really helps to undermine our belief in its "me-ness." When we see that it's not always there, we see that it's not me. So it shows us the impermanence of those states, and it begins to poke holes in the identity we have around them, to recognize when they are not present.

So how do we recognize when these defilements don't arise?

The first way I reflected on is through the teaching of right effort, which talks about a kind of skillful avoiding. With right effort, we cultivate the effort—I think the way it's phrased is—we cultivate the effort to the non-arising of unwholesome states that have not arisen. One way to explore this is to recognize that as we examine our experience, we see certain things land us in suffering. Perhaps it's a good idea not to follow through on those conditions. So we begin to see the conditions that take us to suffering, and we can actively refrain from going there. We learn through experience what leads us to the defilement, and we avoid that.

Now, you might think—for instance, this can be kind of subtle—you might find yourself getting annoyed in the lunch line. And you might think, "Well, the way to avoid that defilement of annoyance is to avoid the lunch line, to just wait for twenty minutes and go when it's empty." And that is one way to avoid that defilement.

Another way to avoid or protect—to put it in a more positive way, we protect our mind from defilement—is through mindfulness: standing in the lunch line and observing our minds, beginning to see what are the conditions for that annoyance. It's not just the standing in the lunch line; there are some other things going on. So using mindfulness as a form of protection there. We can acknowledge what things lead us toward a defilement and avoid those things. That's the simplest way of seeing the non-arising.

Another way is one that I think all of you can reflect on, and that is this: in your practice, you have had experiences. You are experiencing less suffering now than you did before. This kind of reflection—seeing some situation arise here and now in the moment, some suffering around a particular situation—you may be able through reflection to recognize, "Hmm, five years ago this would have been a far more serious thing for my mind." So essentially seeing there's less suffering now than there was five years ago. Again, this is using reflection, but it is a way of connecting with the fact that hindrances, defilements are not arising.

Probably the most direct way to see the non-arising of a defilement is when the mindfulness gets more continuous and the mind can begin to see intention—the seeing of intention in the mind before an action follows. We can begin to see the intention toward an outburst, or the intention toward even an emotional state, the intention to say something or do something unwholesome. In seeing the arising of that intention toward something unwholesome, if the mind is really clearly present to see that unwholesome intention arise, the mind can let go of it in that way I was talking about before. Knowing that that way lies suffering, the mind can simply let go.

And in that split second of seeing the arising of that intention and seeing the mind let go of it, you directly in that moment see the non-arising of that suffering. It does not arise. You see that if you'd not been there, if you'd not been present to see that unwholesome intention, the mind would have just picked right up on that intention and gotten on that train and done that thing and fallen into the suffering. So as the mindfulness gets more continuous, you can actually more directly see this non-arising as an actual experience.

The last way I thought of in terms of seeing the non-arising of defilement is essentially the knowing that defilement is not present in the mind when there is love, compassion, joy, or equanimity present. You recognize the mind is balanced. Defilement is not here. And that's a feeling as well—the mind is free of defilement in that moment.

I'd like to also take a few minutes to distinguish between different kinds of insights. I've been talking about the insights in our practice around seeing into anicca, impermanence; dukkha, unreliability; anatta, not-self. There are also psychological insights that we have. We begin to see how our personal patterns were created, our particular flavors of difficulty. And this can be one of the great benefits of our practice—that we begin to see into how our own minds have been trained.

For myself, I think I mentioned the pattern of self-hatred as one that was pretty predominant for me. On one retreat, I began seeing into that pattern from the perspective of my life, my history, my conditioning, and how it was related to relationships. And there was a really clear recognition at one point of the interplay of those relationships and a big opening. It felt like a big opening around the self-hatred, a feeling of compassion and forgiveness in terms of the various relationships that had been at play in its creation. I really saw this is causes and conditions in a way. I saw so much how, of course, the self-hatred is part of my life.

It was such a feeling of opening that I really felt like there'd been a big breakthrough around that self-hatred. An understanding had come there. That's what I would call a psychological insight, because it was a connection to understanding the history and how that history came into play around that pattern.

And there were a few days that I was without self-hatred after that particular recognition. But I was surprised when, some days later, the pattern of self-hatred came back just as strong. That psychological insight had given me some understanding of the conditions at play, but it hadn't really deeply undercut the pattern. I was surprised. I actually thought the mind had let go of that pattern. I saw that no, it hadn't.

But what I did see—the benefit of that psychological insight, a great benefit—was that it gave me a deeper understanding that yes, this is from causes and conditions. So it did take some of the identification out of that pattern. It took some of the personal sting out of that pattern of self-hatred. And so it was a little easier, a little less threatening, when that self-hatred arose. It was a little easier to meet the pattern every time it came up. And it came up again and again on that retreat.

So psychological insights have a role in our practice. They definitely support us.

The vipassanā insights came later. On that same retreat, I ended up having a deep insight into just the thoughts around self-hatred. After several more weeks of looking at this pattern, spending so much time with it, one evening I was just watching the pattern over and over again. And at some moment, I saw the very arising of the thought that was associated with that self-hatred—the barest little filament of that thought coming up. In seeing that arising, with mindfulness pretty present and continuous, the mind in that instant saw: this is just a thought. It has no reality.

That was really an insight into the ephemeral nature of the thoughts around that pattern. That insight was surprising, actually. In that very moment of seeing that this is just a thought, I went from self-hatred to bliss in a split second. And then there was this thought that occurred to me: "Oh, never again. I'll never feel self-hatred again." The next thought was: "No, this insight is for here and now. This recognition is the causes and conditions that come together in this moment to let me see this."

So it was an insight into the ephemeral nature, the anattā nature, of that thought. And it did have a very deep impact on that pattern. That recognition allowed a major uprooting of it. Not that it's completely gone, not that the thoughts are gone. What seems to be gone is the belief in those thoughts. And in a split second, that seemed to happen.

The vipassanā insights have this power—this really deep power—to loosen our holding, our clinging, our attachments. They can have that power. And there are many times when it is just seeing it again and again and again, like the wearing away of something. Over and over we see it, like looking up at the stars, and the mind slowly puts together the understanding, and the wisdom grows.

CHAPTER 88

Living the Eightfold Path

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this comprehensive talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the Noble Eightfold Path as the Buddha's practical prescription for liberation, beginning with a reading from the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11)—the Buddha's first discourse. She explains how the path's three sections address progressively subtler layers of mental defilement: ethical conduct (sīla) counters harmful actions, mental cultivation (samādhi) prevents unwholesome states from arising in the mind, and wisdom (paññā) uproots the deepest underlying tendencies.

Fella offers a particularly accessible explanation of how these underlying tendencies function like neural pathways—not always active, but easily triggered—and how only direct insight can transform them. She explores the three fundamental misperceptions that sustain suffering: taking what is impermanent to be permanent, what is unreliable to be a source of happiness, and what is not-self to be self. Through a vivid personal story of suddenly shifting from argumentative intellectual identity to childlike joy at a passing truck, she demonstrates how the sense of self constantly changes yet we fail to notice.

The talk emphasizes that retreat practice is not abstract—every moment of sitting, walking, and even service work actively cultivates the path. Fella grounds the seemingly transcendent goal of nibbāna in the Buddha's own definition: simply the absence of greed, hatred, and delusion. This freedom, she reminds us, is "visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

I'd like to start this evening by reading the first two paragraphs of the very first discourse the Buddha gave.

Thus have I heard. On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Varanasi in the deer park at Isipatana. There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus of the group of five thus: "Bhikkhus, these two extremes should not be followed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. What two? The pursuit of sensual happiness in sensual pleasures, which is low, vulgar, the way of worldlings, ignoble, unbeneficial; and the pursuit of self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble, unbeneficial. Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana."

"And what, bhikkhus, is that middle way awakened to by the Tathagata, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana? It is this noble eightfold path, that is: right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration. This is that middle way awakened to by the Tathagata, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana."

I like remembering that the first discourse of the Buddha, which is often remembered as being the discourse on the Four Noble Truths—which it is—begins with this enjoinder to practice the Eightfold Path. It is this Eightfold Path that leads to liberation. I think of the Eightfold Path as the practical side of the Buddha's teaching, or one of the practical sides. The teaching he offers is really a very practical one, and the Eightfold Path is his prescription for us to come to peace, to knowledge, to understanding for ourselves. As he says in this initial aspect of the discourse, this leads to nibbana—freedom, freedom from suffering, freedom from dukkha.

This is what I would like to explore tonight: a little bit about the Eightfold Path, just as a reminder of what these eight aspects are. You have all probably heard many teachings on the Eightfold Path. The key piece I'd like to explore is my understanding about how this path actually does its work on us—how, if we engage with it, if we practice these teachings of right understanding, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration, this will lead us to peace.

The Eightfold Path, instead of being seen as eight separate practices, is sometimes divided into three aspects: an aspect related to wisdom, an aspect related to ethical conduct, and an aspect related to cultivating our minds. The wisdom aspect comprises right understanding and right intention. The ethical conduct aspect comprises right speech, right action, and right livelihood. The mental cultivation aspect comprises wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration.

In this typical ordering of the path, beginning with wise understanding and right intention, the path begins with some kind of wisdom, some kind of orientation towards what we are trying to do. In this case, the orientation the Buddha offers us is how we can free ourselves from dukkha. The beginning stages of the Eightfold Path involve understanding this dukkha—beginning to understand what this stress, this dissatisfaction, this suffering, this unreliability is, and how it's caused.

The way we struggle in our lives largely comes about because we are resisting the way things are, or we're trying to hold on to things to keep them the way we'd like them to be. We think, "If only I could arrange my world so that I could have everything I'd like and get rid of everything I don't like." Endlessly we engage in this activity. I think we don't really believe that any one thing is going to do it for us forever, but we do believe there's some way we can just keep arranging, keep getting what we want and getting rid of what we don't want, and that somehow we can hold it together on this teetering edge and have happiness that way.

Rainer Maria Rilke expresses the condition we find ourselves in. An excerpt from his Eighth Duino Elegy: "And we, spectators, always, everywhere, turn towards the world of objects. It fills us. We arrange it. It breaks down. We rearrange it, then break down ourselves."

The Buddha recognized that this endless rearranging, this endless trying to construct, create, hold on to things we like and get rid of things we don't like—this very process of arranging itself, the mind that thinks it needs to arrange—this is the source of dukkha.

Wise understanding begins with a recognition, perhaps even just a hearing of this: that the way we suffer, the way we end up dissatisfied in our lives, is largely about how our minds are working, this idea that we can arrange things to suit ourselves. Initially, wise understanding begins with an intellectual understanding. I talked about this last week—the three aspects of wisdom. We begin by hearing knowledge, hearing wisdom, taking it in, and then reflecting on it. How do I understand this? Does this make sense to me?

Wise understanding is largely about understanding dukkha, understanding what it might mean to recognize that our minds create this. The primary definition of wise understanding is that we begin to recognize and understand the truth of the Four Noble Truths: that there is suffering, that suffering has a cause, that it is possible for this suffering to come to an end, and that there is a path for that. This teaching of the Four Noble Truths really addresses dukkha, the problem the Buddha was trying to solve. It addresses dukkha. It addresses the cause of dukkha.

and understanding that there's this cause and effect relationship in our experience—when we engage in certain activities of mind and body, certain results happen.

The Four Noble Truths expresses this cause and effect relationship. As we engage in that rearranging activity, inevitably we end up suffering. Either because we're not getting what we want, we're not able to succeed in that process of rearranging, and suffering hits us immediately. Or we do get what we want—for a while we have a sense of happiness, thinking "I figured it out, this is right, this is it"—and yet the inevitability of the decay, the ending, the dissolution of conditions will lead to struggle, suffering, sadness, loss.

And so the Four Noble Truths acknowledges this cause and effect relationship. The understanding is that if we let go of the cause of suffering, it is this very letting go that leads us to the ending of suffering. And the path, the Eightfold Path, is what we can cultivate that will lead us to this ending.

When we hear this teaching, perhaps it hits us at a particular moment. For myself, hearing something of these teachings at a moment when I had really hit bottom, there was a sense of "there's somebody out there who seems to have a sense that there's a way out of this suffering. Why don't I try this?" Even though I didn't really understand. Even though I didn't have a sense of how it would work. There was hearing the teaching, having some confidence in what I was reading, what I was hearing—that this is possible, this freedom is possible.

This engages intention—the intention to act, the intention to step onto the path, to begin the practices. This is wise intention, the second aspect, the wisdom aspect of the path.

So we find ourselves interested in, exploring, engaging with practices, and the next aspect of the Eightfold Path offers us some fundamental grounding practices in ethical conduct. Again, because the fundamental exploration is around non-harming, around not creating dukkha, leading away from struggle and suffering, it makes sense that this ethical conduct is oriented towards non-harming. If we find ourselves engaged in activity that's harming, we are creating suffering, whether for ourselves or for others. And so this aspect of the Eightfold Path encourages us to engage in behaviors that are skillful: wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood.

I think of the ethical conduct aspect of the Eightfold Path as harmonizing our relationships with the world—and also harmonizing our relationships with ourselves. Because as that sutta Akinchino read some days ago, the sutta of the acrobats, the young little girl acrobat says, "By protecting you, watch out for yourself and I'll watch out for myself, and that way we'll protect each other." And the Buddha took it a step further, recognizing that yes, when we protect ourselves we protect others, and when we protect others we protect ourselves. Through protecting others through this conduct of the Eightfold Path—through wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood—we protect ourselves. We protect ourselves from remorse. We protect ourselves from unwholesome states of mind through acting skillfully.

So we explore this possibility of engaging peacefully in the world, living with a heart that inclines towards non-harming.

The last three factors of the Eightfold Path, in the mental development section—wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration—the fact that mental development is considered part of the path is really necessary because it is in our minds that suffering is created in the first place. This is a real shift of perspective. Before we start training, before we meet the practice, before we meet this teaching, I think very few of us would question that having what we want makes us happy. So this mental training is about reorienting ourselves around where happiness actually comes from. And it takes some training.

This mental cultivation—wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration—we look at our minds, we turn and explore what's going on, how our patterns work. We begin to see dukkha, we begin to see dukkha arising, with the instruction to understand dukkha as the orientation for wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration. This is how wisdom comes into this aspect of the path. Our instructions for practice, how we apply wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration, is directly related to wisdom. Understand suffering. Look at your dukkha. See how it's created. Understand the cause. We begin, through the understanding of our dukkha, to really recognize how it's caused, that it is caused in our own minds.

This process of applying effort and mindfulness to our experience gives our mind an education. The organism itself begins to recognize, to learn that certain patterns of engaging, certain patterns of mind associated with wanting, with greed, with not wanting, with aversion, with confusion, with cloudedness, with misperceiving reality—that these things lead to or do not lead to well-being. And fortunately our organism wants to go towards well-being, so it starts to let go of those movements in that direction.

This very exploration—wise effort, wise mindfulness applied with this wisdom of the Eightfold Path—begins to lead us towards happiness. And the bringing together of wise effort and wise mindfulness begins to cultivate wise concentration. Continuity of our attention on our experience is one definition of concentration. And it is that very continuity of mindfulness that begins to reveal how our minds do what they do—how our minds get caught by anger, by frustration, how our minds get caught by desire, by pride, how we get completely confused.

And so the mental development factors—wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration—are the last three factors of the Eightfold Path, but they lead us back to wisdom. Not just intellectual understanding, but experiential recognition. I explored some of this last week: the ways we experience wisdom directly in our practice, the shifts of perspective, the seeing and the letting go. We experience for ourselves, and our organism begins to recognize what are the things we need to let go of, what are the things we need to cultivate to move towards happiness.

The Buddha pointed to this quite directly. He said, "Develop concentration. One who is concentrated understands things as they really are." So he's directly pointing to this last factor of the Eightfold Path, wise concentration, as leading to the ability to see clearly. And what does one understand as it really is? One understands as it really is, "This is suffering." One understands as it really is, "This is the origin of suffering." One understands as it really is, "This is the cessation of suffering." One understands as it really is, "This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering." Develop concentration. One who is concentrated understands things as they really are.

So this points to how the Eightfold Path is a cycle. We develop our minds, we cultivate our ethical conduct, we develop our minds, and this supports our being able to see more deeply, which gives us a deeper actual wisdom, an actual meeting of wisdom.

We are living this Eightfold Path here on retreat, moment after moment. It's not an abstract thing. Actually, every moment you are here, you are cultivating these factors of the path. Just your presence here is an expression of wise intention, of wise understanding. The fact that you've chosen to come here and engage—when you sit, it's an expression of wise understanding and wise intention. What you are exploring, the way you see things, bringing wisdom to bear on your experience, then beginning to see that—this is wise understanding and wise intention.

Wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood—sometimes we don't think about how these are actively being cultivated on retreat. When I was in Burma, my teacher Sayadaw U Janaka gave a Dhamma talk about how we were practicing the Eightfold Path in every single moment of our practice. I found this really inspiring, actually, to recognize that I am walking the path through being here on retreat.

His explanation of how we were cultivating wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood is that they are fulfilled through abstinence. Primarily, wise speech and wise action are defined in terms of not engaging in specific speech and actions. The precepts that we take reflect many of them: refraining from killing living beings, refraining from taking what's not given, refraining from sexual misconduct, refraining from false speech. Mostly we're silent here, so we fulfill our wise speech through silence. U Janaka expressed wise livelihood as being the fact that you're here on retreat—you're living the Dhamma livelihood, essentially temporary monastics here on retreat.

It's helpful, I think, to recognize that these factors are active in our practice. We don't often think about things when they're absent; they don't land on us too much when they're absent. So it can help to reflect, to recognize: yes, my ethical conduct is being cultivated here.

And I see also that there is a wholesome side of the ethical conduct being cultivated as we practice here. We're actively cultivating generosity as we engage in our service work, our yogi jobs. This center would not function if you all did not participate in this. The bathrooms wouldn't get cleaned. The floors wouldn't get swept and mopped. The dishes would pile up in the kitchen. It would be a mess. And so as you're engaging in that—even just keeping your own room clean is an act of service for the next yogi that will come to take your space. This is an active cultivation of generosity, of kindness. Reflecting on your service here as being an active cultivation of the path—not just something to finish up and get done with.

If you can recall this service aspect—this quality of generosity, kindness, and compassion in what we're doing here—it can truly support your practice.

The third cluster of the Eightfold Path comprises wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. This is the most obvious aspect of what we're cultivating here: moment to moment bringing wise effort, infused with wise understanding and wise intention, to bear on how we pay attention to our experience. Moment after moment we explore: What's happening now? What's my relationship to this now?

We are doing this not as an abstraction but as actual practice. And so what's the point? The Buddha expressed it clearly in that first discourse. He says practicing this leads to peace, leads to liberation, leads to freedom, to nibbana.

Cultivating the Eightfold Path in practical ways tends to make us more contented in our lives. We end up having a more easeful life, with less reactivity. This is one benefit of the path. And yet it's also understood to lead to the deepest kind of peace—not just having a little easier time at work or in relationships, but deeply letting go of the roots of suffering in our minds.

So we speak of freedom, enlightenment, nibbana. That word enlightenment is out there in the world. I certainly encountered it in my twenties before I ever met the teaching of the Buddha, and I had some idea about what it might be. Usually the idea involved some kind of mind-blowing something or other, and then forever after somehow being disconnected from everything—floating around, not really... I don't know what I thought, but it didn't have much to do with living life, my sense of what enlightenment meant.

The Buddha's actual definition of nibbana is quite different. He says it's the absence of greed, the absence of hatred, the absence of delusion. To me, that's an inspiring definition. It doesn't sound like it's necessarily disconnected from living life. I could envision living life without those qualities. This brings enlightenment right into the world.

I'd like to read you two texts on nibbana:

The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called nibbana.

Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbana—immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise.

Visible in this life. To me, that again brings it into the world, into something that is not abstract, not a transcendent kind of thing—although the description here does say one experiences no mental pain and grief. In some ways that does sound transcendent. And yet we can imagine perhaps, even now, what it might be like to experience no mental pain or grief. That's freedom.

Since freedom is understood to be the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion, we might ask: How does the Eightfold Path help us let go of these? How does this path help us come to the end of greed, aversion, and delusion?

These three are sometimes referred to as the three roots of suffering, the three root kilesas or defilements—the three root qualities, the activities in our mind that make us get caught, that lead us to suffering, to mental pain and grief. All the qualities of mind that put us into suffering are somehow rooted in these three.

The commentaries speak about the assorted kilesas as having a layered quality to them. Some are obvious, coming out in our behavior. Some are less obvious, arising just in our minds without manifesting in our behavior.

This is an interesting teaching to explore. The most obvious form of suffering comes out into our behavior—we act out through our speech, through our bodies. We perhaps actively harm somebody, we yell, we lie, we speak harshly, we harm with our sexual energy. These are ways we engage when we are not clear, when greed, aversion, and delusion manifest through our bodies. That's the most obvious layer of kilesa.

A bit more subtle is the layer of kilesa that, rather than manifesting in behavior, comes into our minds. We experience hostility, anger, frustration, pride in our minds but don't necessarily let it out into the world.

That's a subtler layer of kilesa, of defilement in our minds.

The most subtle layer of kilesa is called "latent tendency" or "underlying tendency." I think this is familiar to all of you. There's a way that some of our patterns, some of the most common ways we get caught, operate at this level. For myself, anger was one of those. I had a strong habit of anger, and it wasn't always operating—it wasn't always present. I wasn't always angry. But generally I had a sense that the anger was not present at the moment because conditions happened to be good for me at that time, and that it wouldn't actually take that much for it to arise. Somebody looking at me funny, or a computer breaking down—it doesn't take much before that anger flares up.

So this underlying tendency is like those ruts in our mind, or if you think of it neurologically, the patterns of neurons that maybe aren't being fired at the moment, but it might not take too much for something to trigger that pattern. We can think of the patterns in our neural circuits almost like these underlying tendencies—not active all the time, but there as a possibility. That's the most subtle kind of defilement.

Now, the Buddhist teaching addresses all of these layers—not just the layers that come out into our behavior and into our own minds, but actually this underlying layer as well. Each of the three sections of the Eightfold Path addresses one of these layers of defilement.

The ethical aspect of the Eightfold Path addresses the most obvious layer, the layer in which we act out. When we are committed to engaging with wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood—committed to refraining from acting out—this supports us not to engage with the defilements that impel us to act unskillfully. So this aspect of the training supports us to let go of those bodily and verbal unskillful actions. The ethical aspect of the path counters the tendency towards transgression, towards acting out. In a way, we can use the precepts as a mindfulness bell. If we find ourselves getting ready to hit a spider on the wall, it's like, "Wait a minute, I'm engaging with the precepts here. Let me use one of those bug catchers instead and take it out of the room."

The mental cultivation aspect of the Eightfold Path also counters this tendency towards acting out, because we begin to see the arising of these qualities in our mind. We begin to see, "Oh, there's anger coming up." And the very seeing of that unskillful mind state arising gives us a choice about whether to act on it or not. So mental cultivation—wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration—also supports not acting out of defilements. The seeing of the defilement as it arises in our mind gives us the choice. We turn towards the experience instead of acting on it.

Wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration also counter the tendency towards these qualities arising in our minds. We cultivate concentration, and as we cultivate concentration we begin to feel the bliss of not having the hindrances arise. Concentration holds the hindrances at bay—the qualities of ill will, of sense desire, of sloth and torpor, of restlessness, of doubt. As the mind moves into concentration, these qualities stop arising in our minds. So this counters the arising of these defilements in our minds. This feels really good—and it's temporary. Those underlying tendencies are not necessarily uprooted by simply resting in concentration. It puts us in a state where they're not active, but it doesn't necessarily alter the terrain underneath.

So the subtlest levels of defilement, these underlying tendencies—this is where the wisdom aspect of the path comes in. It really takes a radical shift of understanding to begin to loosen those underlying tendencies. And this fundamental shift, this shift of perspective, doesn't come just through thinking about the Four Noble Truths—reflecting on, "Well, this is dukkha, and this is what I did, and this is how it felt, and what I did last week, and maybe I should try this." It takes meeting dukkha directly, seeing the cause, allowing the release. It takes the direct experience. So effort, mindfulness, and concentration create the possibility, the ground from which wisdom can grow. And that wisdom begins to uproot these underlying tendencies.

These underlying tendencies are deeply connected with ignorance, with not understanding. Our usual definition of ignorance is something like a lack of knowledge—that we don't have some bit of information, a kind of passive state of just not knowing something.

The ignorance that underlies greed, aversion, and delusion is much more insidious than simply not knowing something. It's actually an active misunderstanding of reality. We walk through the world actively misunderstanding, misperceiving, misinterpreting experience through filters of perception.

There are three primary misunderstandings. We take what's impermanent to be permanent. We take what is unreliable to be reliable, as a place where we could actually find happiness. And we take what is not self to be self.

As we train the mind through wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration, we begin to see these misunderstandings. Little holes get poked through them. We begin to see at certain times that experience is in no way permanent—it is continually flowing and changing. There's nothing in our experience that could possibly be reliable because it's like sand slipping through our fingers all the time. Things don't even last for a moment. Because they don't last, they are inherently unreliable. We start to see this directly for ourselves, and this begins to undercut those misperceptions, those misunderstandings.

We take what is not self to be self. We misunderstand, we misperceive our own experience to be an enduring entity that has control over itself. And yet when we start to look at what we think this enduring entity is, we see that it doesn't last either. Look at what you are experiencing as "me." You'll find it doesn't last very long. We go through so many different iterations of "me" in a day, and we begin to see that they actually have very little relationship to each other.

One time on retreat, this seeing of how different selves have no relationship to each other became very clear to me. I was doing walking meditation in front of the retreat center and was replaying in my mind a scene from the morning question and answer period, having an argument with this person who was asking questions. I was noticing this. I could see it, and I was suffering over it too. This was not pleasant. I could really feel the identity around this, coalesced around being right. I was right. I was intelligent. I was analytical. I was argumentative. I was right. All of that. I could feel all of it, experiencing it, noticing it, recognizing it. I saw no way out of it but just kept experiencing it.

And then, as things happen, conditions changed. I was doing the walking meditation and a truck drove up—a big delivery truck that made a lot of noise. It banged and crashed, the door slammed, brakes squealed. In a split second, my mind shifted and said something like, "It's a truck! Oh my gosh, it's a truck!" The feeling was like I became a two-year-old, just reveling in the joy of truck. In that moment, there was simply no relationship between those two selves. It became very clear.

So explore what you take to be self. You'll see it doesn't endure.

We start the path with understanding, taking in knowledge, taking in teachings. We begin to apply them, seeing some things for ourselves—this wisdom, seeing some of the truth of the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. We see that for ourselves. The wisdom begins to become internalized. And yet these insights too are often impermanent. We find ourselves in a space of understanding.

We see thoughts arise in our mind and we recognize these are just thoughts. These have no bearing on anything really. They're just thoughts arising and passing. There's experience coming and going. We find ourselves in a space where we're not getting caught by things. Somebody jumps ahead of us and gets the last little bit of carrot in the salad and it's like, "Oh, look at that. Wow. Impermanence." We're in that space for a while.

And then maybe a day later, or even a few minutes later, something else happens and it's not there anymore. When we're in that space it can seem so obvious. It's just like, how can I not see this? How can I not recognize that the mind creates its own suffering? How can I not see this? It's so obvious. And yet, moments later, conditions change and it is no longer so obvious.

This doesn't have to be a problem. It's not a mistake. It is a change of conditions. And there is a way in which that wisdom has gone in. We've seen things from a different perspective. We have experienced it from a different perspective. And so we can now begin to recognize when we are not seeing it from that perspective.

It's kind of like we've seen things clearly. We recognize, "Yes, that's what white is. That's what white looks like." And then we begin to see when we're not in that space where things are flowing easily. It's like, "Oh, this is off-white. Or this is gray, even." So we begin to recognize that we're carrying misperception. We're carrying ignorance. We're carrying delusion with us.

Sometimes people ask me, how can you see delusion? Partly, you can start to see it as you move into these spaces of clarity. When you move back into a space of delusion, you now can see the difference. You now can recognize, "Yes, the mind is operating from a place of delusion right now. Okay, let me watch this. Let me take care here. I know that the mind tends to get caught when it's in this kind of space. So let me watch."

So it's not necessarily a problem. It's not a problem—we just continue. We continue, we continue, we engage with this path. When we've seen impermanence, unsatisfactoriness at a deep level, it gets easier to see through those misperceptions.

Living this path, exploring how to live this path, supports us to move towards that freedom—first in little moments, and then the promise, the direction the Buddha says this heads. It's like slanting, sloping towards the sea, this path. Leading towards freedom. Leading towards Nibbāna. In this very life.

CHAPTER 89

Wise Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this opening talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of what distinguishes wise or right mindfulness (sammā sati) from ordinary awareness. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), she carefully examines the Buddha's repeated instruction: "One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, clearly comprehending and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world." Each element of this phrase reveals a specific quality of attention that transforms mindfulness into a liberating practice.

Fella explains that "abiding" (viharati) suggests a receptive, restful quality—like dwelling at home—while "ardent" brings balanced, persistent effort. "Contemplating the body as a body" points to experiencing phenomena directly rather than through concepts and identities. "Clearly comprehending" (sampajañña) includes recognizing that feelings, thoughts, and perceptions arise, persist, and pass away. The phrase "free from desires and discontent" indicates we practice not to get or get rid of something, but to understand how the mind creates suffering.

Through a personal story of working with loneliness after a relationship ended, Fella illustrates how continuous wise mindfulness can reveal the construction of suffering and naturally dissolve reactive patterns. She emphasizes that mindfulness joined with wisdom—understanding impermanence and the unreliable nature of experience—is what truly frees the heart. This talk provides essential orientation for sustained retreat practice and daily life alike.

Your first full day on retreat. One day down, forty-one to go. One day down, eighty-nine to go. Sometimes it's like that in our minds. On these long retreats especially, we keep a calendar in our minds.

Before I begin the talk proper, I'd just like to express my great appreciation for the diversity of this group, and to say that my journey towards cultural humility began a few years ago. Much as with mindfulness practice—the more we see, the more we see that we don't know, the deeper we recognize that our understanding needs to deepen—in very much the same way, I have seen that the more I understand, the more I see I don't understand. This lesson in cultural humility is one of ongoing learning for me. I'm open to feedback, so if you're so moved, you're welcome to leave me a note.

Tonight I'd like to speak about mindfulness, a key aspect of what we're doing here. I'd like to spend some time exploring this quality: what it means, how we use it, how we practice with it, how it's helpful for us.

We all have a kind of intuitive sense of what mindfulness means. Most of us here have practiced for quite a while and have a sense of what it means for us. This quality in general evokes words like being present, being aware, perhaps witnessing, knowing what's happening while it's happening. That was my own working definition of mindfulness for quite a while.

I see mindfulness as a reflective capacity of our minds. It's a function that allows this mind-body system to be aware of itself. It reflects the processes happening in the body and mind, kind of like a mirror does. It's a perfectly ordinary process, a capacity that our minds have—this reflective capacity, this capacity to know what's happening in the present moment. It's just a normal capacity of our minds. It functions. We know what's happening.

But what we don't really recognize or pay attention to is the fact that it is a process in our minds. We're not really cognizant, at least before we meet this practice, of mindfulness as a quality. Mindfulness happens to us, we become aware of something, and then we start thinking about it or planning about it or deciding what to do about it or thinking about what should happen next. We get our agendas going, our decision-making processes going. We don't typically recognize that something interesting has happened—that we've become aware of what's happening in the present moment.

I think it really took the brilliance of the Buddha to point out that this quality is really interesting, that it's special and will help us. But he didn't simply say, "be aware." He actually encouraged us to be aware from a particular perspective—one that will support us in moving towards happiness, moving away from the way our mind gets caught in wanting things to be different, the way our minds get caught in wanting things to be reliable that aren't reliable, the way our minds construct identities and believe in them, the way we want things to be permanent. The Buddha highlighted a particular way of paying attention that supports this understanding, that supports a deepening of our understanding of how our minds get caught.

If you were to see somebody on the street who was angry, and you went up to that person—just a random person on the street—and said, "Do you know that you're angry?" they would probably say, "Yes, I know I'm angry. What do you think? Are you nuts? Of course I know I'm angry." And then if you were to say, "Well, notice your anger," they would say, "I am noticing my anger. I'm angry at this person or this thing or this situation."

Telling somebody to notice their reactivity, to be aware of their reactivity, isn't quite enough. The Buddha is pointing to an additional perspective, a shift of perspective, one that includes an exploration of what it feels like to be angry from the inside. What is the experience of anger? What is the experience of being a human being? What is that like? And recognizing with discernment—for instance, in the situation around anger—when anger is connected to a situation that is perhaps unjust and needs some addressing, but addressing it from a heart filled with compassion rather than a heart filled with hate.

The Buddha suggested these shifts of perspective: look at experience in and of itself; see if we can act not out of reactivity, but out of kindness, compassion, love. This points to the shift of perspective that the Buddhadharma offers us.

One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, has a kind of famous quote, the title of one of his books: awareness alone is not enough.

It takes wisdom joined with awareness to have mindfulness be a capacity that frees our minds and helps us to understand our minds.

So the Buddha actually recommended that we cultivate right mindfulness. And the definition of right mindfulness or wise mindfulness is often described as the cultivation of the four establishments of mindfulness. I'm sure most of you are familiar with this teaching. The four establishments of mindfulness being: established mindfulness on the body; established mindfulness on feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral; established mindfulness of knowing mind states; and established mindfulness understanding how experience either helps move us towards freedom or keeps us caught in the cycles of suffering. Understanding the patterns of our minds that lead towards freedom or towards suffering—these four foundations of mindfulness.

In this text, in the Buddha's main instructions to us on how to practice mindfulness, there's a repeated phrase that he repeats for each of these four foundations. He says, "One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, clearly comprehending and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world. One abides contemplating feelings as feelings, ardent, clearly comprehending and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world." And likewise for mind states and dhammas.

This phrase really encapsulates in a way what he means by right mindfulness. And so I'd like to look at this phrase, look at essentially each word in this phrase and see if we can understand what is this perspective. What is the perspective the Buddha is offering us with mindfulness? It's not simply awareness. It's not simply being aware.

The first word that I'd like to look at is "abides." Just allow that word to land in your experience. How does it land for you? Abiding. The word abiding is translating the Pali word viharati, which is related to the term used in the brahmavihara practice—the divine abidings, the divine abodes. That literally means something like home or dwelling. Dwelling, contemplating, dwelling, abiding. To me, this calls up or evokes qualities of rest, of being at home, of contentment, of receptivity. Abiding doesn't feel like a doing to me. To me, this points to the possibility of the open, relaxed, receptive quality to our mindfulness practice that Carol was pointing to during some of the instructions this morning. Abiding in mindfulness.

The next phrase is "contemplating," and in this case we'll take one: contemplating the body as a body, or contemplating feelings as feelings, or contemplating mind states as mind states. It's kind of a funny phrase, a funny framing for something. What does it mean to contemplate the body as a body?

Different translations can help to perhaps evoke some of the meaning here. Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates it as "contemplating the body in and of itself." To me, this brings in the sense of contemplating, directing our attention to—and that's one of the meanings. Step back for a moment to the word contemplating: contemplating means to observe, to look at. So here the Buddha is suggesting we direct the attention perhaps. It can be understood as directing the attention to the body. It also could be understood as receiving the experience of the body. I think the translation allows for both understandings.

This term for contemplating is encouraging us to look at experience in a particular way. And in this case, look at experience, observe experience, observe the body as a body, observe the body in and of itself. To me this points to observing, knowing, recognizing the body as simply a body—not me, not who I am, not any of the identities I may pick up.

The commentary actually says something interesting about this phrase. It says that this repetition—contemplating the body in the body, contemplating feelings in feelings, mind states in mind states—indicates that we need to precisely determine the object of contemplation and isolate it from objects with which it might be confused. That's an interesting statement. What is it that the body might be confused with? Actually, we easily confuse our body with concepts. We confuse our body with self. So the encouragement here is to look at the body as a body, not through the lens of our ideas, our opinions, our agendas, or identities around the body. And likewise with the other foundations.

The actual experience of body is sensation, vibration, pulsing, tingling, hardness, heat, coolness, tightness, pressure.

moisture, dryness. The actual sensation of body is just sensation. We conflate this experience with concept very easily though.

You can get perhaps a little taste of this right now if you allow your attention to rest in the experience of your hand. What is that experience? What is the experience in that part of the body? Tingling, pulsing, moisture, pressure. Just feel into the texture of that experience.

And now look at your hand. Pick your hand up and look at it. Think about it as a hand, what it does for you. It reaches for things, it picks things up.

And now—what's your experience at this point of those sensations? For me, at least, there's a kind of distancing from those sensations, partly because we're thinking about the concept of hand. We're seeing it through the lens of a concept. This kind of thing happens to us all the time. We don't necessarily actually experience our body; we think about our body.

Another aspect of this contemplating the body as a body, feelings as feelings, mind states as mind states, is that the instructions in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta are actually fairly non-interfering. The instructions on observing experience don't instruct us to do things with what we notice. They just say: notice it. Over and over again, these specific exercises in the text tell us simply to know things as they are. One knows, "This is a body." One knows, "This is pleasant. This is unpleasant." One knows, "This is greed. This is the absence of greed." One knows, "Joy has arisen." Not to do anything with it, but simply to know it.

The effect of this is really to encourage a non-interfering, non-reactive, non-judgmental awareness. This is a key to how the practice of mindfulness supports us in freedom.

So coming into your experience—what is it? Having explored those words a little bit: "One abides contemplating the body as a body." Or an alternative translation: "One abides observing the body in and of itself." Not a lot of doing in there. And yet it is directing us to a particular way of being aware.

The next word brings in some doing. "One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, clearly comprehending, and mindful." Ardency. This word brings in the energy, the effort component. We don't simply settle back and think, "Oh, if awareness is there, great. If not, well, it'll come back sometime." This is encouraging us to actively engage—alert, diligent, engaged, wholehearted. These are some words that people use to incline toward this quality.

It encourages a commitment to the practice. We have to do the practice. Bhante pointed to this last night: nobody can do it for us. This is the Buddha's encouragement—do the practice. He told Ānanda, "Practice now before it's too late. Be diligent."

So it's really pointing to a balanced yet sustained effort in our practice. It does have to be balanced.

Not too tight or too loose. The analogy that the Buddha used around balanced effort is that of tuning a musical instrument. If the string is too loose, it won't make beautiful music. If the string is too tight, it will snap. It's got to be tuned just right—just the right amount of tautness for the string to make beautiful music. So a balanced effort, not too tight and not too loose. This is an art, finding this balance. And I know we'll explore this throughout the retreat. It's a huge topic. I could spend an entire talk just on this one phrase: balanced, persistent effort.

This persistence also encourages continuity in our practice—moment after moment after moment. Something interesting here is that we now have two different words working together. We've got "abiding" and we've got "ardent." Abiding has the sense of settling back and resting. I asked one class to tell me what this word evoked for them, and somebody said, "The dude abides." I didn't know what this referred to until it was explained to me, but there's apparently this film, The Big Lebowski, and this is one of his mantras. The dude abides. Really a laid-back kind of place.

But we do have to engage as well. It's not just "the dude abides." It's possible—this is kind of a koan for our practice—to abide and engage. What does that mean? This has been a very interesting exploration in my own practice. They're not opposites. It's not either engage or abide. It's not either be diligent or be relaxed. What does it mean to be relaxed and diligent? That's the balance point of our practice.

We can settle back and see the mind receiving experience, kind of in the abiding mode. Settle back and receive experience. Carol was pointing to this this morning—just settling back and receiving sound. And yet, we can't just settle back. There needs to be that kind of meeting, meeting of experience. We can direct the attention. We can choose to pay attention, for instance, to the breath—directing the attention and then settling back and receiving. What is the experience of an in-breath? What is the experience of an out-breath? Abiding and diligent. Abiding with engagement.

The next word is "clearly comprehending." One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, clearly comprehending. This word, sampajañña in Pali—one of the more familiar places it's used is in the first foundation of mindfulness. There's a section called clear comprehension, and it refers to being engaged with knowing your activities throughout the day. Continuity of awareness again, continuity of mindfulness.

In the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, it encourages us to notice when we're walking, when we're standing, when we're sitting. It encourages us to notice when we're going to and fro. It encourages us to notice when we're reaching and bending our limbs. It encourages us to know when we're urinating and defecating—it's in there—when we're eating, when we're talking, when we're remaining silent. All of our activities, it's encouraging us to cultivate mindfulness. So again, this points to continuity in this word, clearly comprehending.

This word also has additional meanings in other places in the texts. There's another definition for clear comprehension that I particularly like. It says that one's clear comprehension is recognizing feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away. Feelings, thoughts, and perceptions are known as they arise, persist, and pass away.

That is one's clear comprehension. This is pointing to the wisdom piece. How do we want to be paying attention? What is it that we want to be attuning to? Clear comprehension is encouraging us to attune to the process nature of experience. Not what the feelings are, but that they arise, persist, and pass away. Not what the thoughts are, but that they arise, persist, and pass away. Noticing objects as objects, noticing that experience appears, stays for a while, and vanishes.

This is a perspective the Buddha is offering as important for our freedom. And this perspective encourages us again towards non-reactive awareness, because we are simply recognizing what's arising in the moment. It's a feeling arising, persisting, passing away. If we imagine or reflect on what that means—a feeling arises, persists, and passes away and is known to do that—where is the room for reactivity? Where's the room for wishing it to be a different way?

The commentaries also indicate that this word, clearly comprehending, includes noticing the purpose for which we are paying attention, noticing the purpose for which we're doing something. And the purpose that the Buddha pointed to was freeing the heart from suffering. So again, this brings in wisdom. The wisdom of the Buddha is intimately connected to seeing suffering, seeing how it's connected to the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience. Seeing how our minds—oh, do our minds wish things were permanent! Oh, do they wish they were reliable! And seeing how that very wish wraps us right into our reactivity, our suffering, our struggling.

So engaging with our experience in mindfulness, we notice: what is it that hooks us? We walk into the dining room. We see somebody putting food on their plate. How many times have I gotten hooked into that? How much food somebody is taking, or how little food somebody is taking. Comparing, judging, evaluating what I'm doing versus what somebody else is doing. It's just feelings as they arise, thoughts as they arise, persist, and pass away. Sights arising, persisting, passing away. Can we know that? Exploring, understanding where it is that we struggle. Where do we get hooked? We will talk about this over and over and over again. This is just an overview here.

The next word is mindful. Again, we've talked about this, and we all have a sense of what mindfulness is. One of my colleagues, Gil Fronsdal, has been doing some study on this term. He's been practicing for thirty-five years or so, and he says, "I don't really know what mindfulness is." Kind of shocking to him, in a way, to recognize that. In his study of this in the texts, one of the things that was remarkable to him was that the word mindfulness, as it's used, isn't used as something that we do. The words associated with mindfulness are words like abiding. We abide in mindfulness. We cultivate mindfulness. We establish mindfulness. So these words actually indicate that mindfulness may be a state of being rather than something that we do.

Gil equates mindfulness as more of a kind of samādhi, in a way. And like samādhi, we cultivate the conditions for mindfulness to become established. We don't do the mindfulness. We can recognize when mindfulness arises and know it is present. We can cultivate mindfulness by observing the body as a body. We can cultivate mindfulness by directing attention to particular experience.

So the active side of mindfulness practice is observing, knowing, understanding, effort. These activities—knowing the body as a body, knowing feelings as they arise, knowing this is pleasant, knowing anger as it arises, knowing anger as it passes away—these activities help to establish mindfulness. Abiding in mindfulness. So what we engage with are these activities of observing, of knowing, of understanding, knowing what arises, directing the attention at times.

The last phrase, "free from desires and discontent for the world," points to the development of concentration, of mental composure, of unification of mind. And the way it's framed—"one abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, clearly comprehending and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world"—it sounds like it has to happen first. We have to be free from desires and discontent before we engage with this practice.

Now that's not easy to do. Most of us see right away that we are not free from desires and discontent when we sit down. We want our pain to go away. We want our concentration to come back. We want the sitting to end sooner. We want the food to come sooner. We want different food. We want more of this, less of that. Endlessly we have desires and discontent. And so if it is the case that we have to be free of this before we engage, then one might think, "Well, I might as well go home. Why bother?" We're probably not able to get there right away.

Bhikkhu Anālayo, in exploring this text, points out that the way this word appears in the Pali—translated as something like "having removed" or "being free from" desires and discontent—the way that verb is used, that tense of the verb, can mean having completed something, but it can also indicate something happening simultaneously. So we engage in the practice of mindfulness, and simultaneous with that, we explore how to free our minds from desire and discontent.

This to me is another framing of the practice. We are not engaged in this practice in order to get something or get rid of something. This is another pointing to a perspective of our mindfulness practice: we're engaged to free ourselves from these desires and discontent. We may be able to set aside desires and discontent at times, or we may be able to recognize that a desire or discontent has arisen—that frustration has arisen. We may be able to recognize, "Oh, this is frustration." The Satipaṭṭhāna encourages us to do this: Greed has arisen. Anger has arisen. Confusion has arisen.

When we can recognize it in that way, it's as if we take a step back. It may be that we are frustrated, and when we are frustrated, it's like we're looking at the world through frustrated lenses. I was doing walking meditation in the basement here at IMS some years ago, and I knew I was having an aversion attack. This frequently happened to me while doing walking meditation, especially in a crowded room. I was doing the walking meditation knowing that the aversion was there, and I turned around at the end of my walking path. I looked down the path to the other end, and there were somebody's shoes sitting there. My mind exploded. "Who put those shoes there?" The filter of aversion was so strong that those innocent little shoes became the source of another aversion attack.

Sometimes when we have these reactive states in our mind, we're looking through those states as if through a filter of aversion or greed or confusion or anger or frustration or depression or loneliness—whatever it is. We may be looking through this filter.

And yet it's possible to recognize, "Oh, aversion is happening." Then it's as if, at least at times, we're now looking at that experience rather than looking through it. It's like taking the glasses off and looking at them rather than through them. The filter is no longer quite so potent in our minds.

This is how the setting aside begins. We're not necessarily able to be completely free of desire and discontent in our minds, but we can recognize that desire is arising with a balanced perspective, with non-judgmental, non-reactive awareness—knowing that aversion is arising, that desire is arising. We bring this perspective of being free from desire and discontent, as best we can, to the practice. And slowly, in a deepening cycle, in a deepening spiral, we begin to understand more and more what it means to be free of the more obvious levels of desire and discontent. Those levels fall away, and then we may feel, "Oh, things are good for a while." Then we start to see, "Oh, there are some subtler desires and discontent there." We deepen our understanding of what it means to be free from desire and discontent as we practice.

So: one abides contemplating the body as a body, feelings as feelings, mind states as mind states—ardent, clearly comprehending, mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world. This phrase brings together both the what and the how of our practice. What we are paying attention to: we bring our attention to aspects of body, body as a body, body in and of itself.

We bring our attention to feelings, feelings in and of themselves, feelings as feelings, feelings known as they arise, persist, pass away—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Mind states as mind states: anger, aversion, non-greed, non-aversion, non-confusion, concentration, distraction, contraction, all the different states of mind. What we are paying attention to are the body-mind processes happening.

From this perspective of body as a body, body in and of itself, feelings in and of themselves, clearly comprehending—these are just phenomena, empty phenomena rolling on, as Munindra said to Joseph so many times.

The what we are paying attention to, and how we pay attention: abiding, settled back, receiving, diligent, connecting, present, persistent, balanced effort, clearly comprehending, recognizing objects, experiences as just experience. With this perspective of recognizing we're not in this to get something or get rid of something, but to understand: how does our mind create struggle, create suffering? How does our mind get confused about the unreliability of experience?

Our mind gets confused about this and just endlessly tries to figure out some way to make things reliable, endlessly tries to make things reliable. And we feel like it's our fault, or something wrong with us, when we can't figure out how to do it. It's not our fault. It's just the way it is. This is the truth.

Wise mindfulness encourages us to open to the truth of experience and not be confused, not be deluded about trying to create happiness based on things that are unreliable, passing away.

So with right mindfulness, with wise mindfulness, we begin to see our reactivity. We begin to see how our minds create the struggle. This non-judgmental, non-reactive awareness—we begin to see loneliness, confusion, depression arising in our experience. We begin to understand how it's put together.

Pretty early in my practice, I had a really beautiful example of this, of just how powerful wise mindfulness was. I was in the Peace Corps at the time and had a relationship that had broken up—a ten-year relationship, so it was a pretty devastating experience, actually. The anger that was happening, the loneliness, the confusion—I was out of control. The mind was out of control. And I saw, wow, this is out of control. I can barely function here.

And so somebody sent me a book on mindfulness, and I just began trying to pay attention to this confused mind. I was noticing that I was going to bed lonely every night. This was something that was happening, so let's notice loneliness. It didn't particularly surprise me that I was lonely when I was going to bed at night, but I was interested. I had begun to be interested in my mind. I had begun to be interested in how does this mind do what it does?

So I started observing this loneliness every night as I went to bed. One night, some number of nights into this process of observing the loneliness, I noticed that the loneliness clearly began when I set my alarm clock. Now this struck me as very odd. I could not figure out why on earth setting my alarm clock would have anything to do with loneliness. I just kept noticing.

Some nights later—I don't even remember whether it was the next night or a couple nights later—I had noticed there was a pattern around the loneliness that I now recognized. It was clearly connected to this alarm clock somehow. And one night as I was again just observing—I actually had very little instruction in mindfulness practice at this point; it was just curiosity, what is this about, what is it like to be lonely—one night as I was setting my alarm clock, I noticed a memory. I was with my partner in this memory, with my partner in Disneyland, looking up at a clock on a marquee in Tomorrowland. And I could see that there was a connection between setting the alarm clock, the image of the clock here, and the clock in my memory.

And I could also in that moment recognize that the loneliness was something along the lines of a reaction to that memory: "Oh, that was so happy. I'll never be happy again. I'm always going to be miserable. I'll never have another partner."

I'm always going to be alone. That was where the loneliness had arisen from.

I was amazed, actually. This was some four months into my meditation practice—amazed that mindfulness could reveal the source, could show how this loneliness was constructed, how it was created in my mind. That was pretty amazing to see.

But what was more amazing was the next night when I went to bed. I looked at that alarm clock. I remembered the memory, of course, because it had become conscious in my mind. But the loneliness did not happen. It was as if having seen the hook between the memory and the reactivity had decoupled that reactivity.

Now, I'm not saying I didn't get lonely again—I'm not saying that. But that pattern of going to bed lonely every single night? That stopped. It was a very powerful recognition of how this practice of noticing what's happening in the mind and body brings freedom. I've had many, many experiences like that since then. You've had your own experiences like that.

So right mindfulness begins to create the conditions for insight—the conditions to actually see into how suffering is created, how struggle is constructed in our minds. And it gives us choice. This is another potent aspect of wise mindfulness, especially as it becomes more continuous. The more continuous the mindfulness gets, the more we see choice points, the more we begin to recognize moments where we can choose to act or not act on a particular mind state.

We begin to be able to choose to act out of compassion, out of love, rather than out of anger and hostility and hatred. We begin to be able to respond skillfully rather than react out of habitual patterns.

Continuity is the key here. It is what brings power to our mindfulness practice. Mindfulness is a factor of awakening—the first of the seven factors of awakening—the ground out of which all the other factors grow. In order to become a factor of awakening, mindfulness needs to be continuous. We need to have that sense of abiding in mindfulness, dwelling in mindfulness, with that perspective of not wanting something to happen or wanting something to not happen—being free from desire and discontent.

We bring this perspective, what my teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya calls wise attitude, skillful attitude for our practice. When we have wise attitude, it doesn't matter what we're paying attention to. It doesn't matter whether anger is arising or bliss is arising. I can't tell you the number of times that deep insight has arisen when I was finally willing to say, "Oh yes, self-hatred—yes, that's what's happening," and not fight it or try to sidestep it or pretend it wasn't there, but really decided: "Yes, self-hatred, here you are. I'm going to look at you."

That willingness to meet our difficulties opens us to insight. When difficulty is happening, that is our path. When bliss is happening, that is our path—knowing bliss is happening, not indulging in bliss.

When we join this power of mindfulness with continuity, it becomes concentration. Mindfulness and concentration together are what allow us to deepen into happiness, understanding, and wisdom. And the wisdom is what frees us. The wisdom is what opens our hearts, frees our minds, and takes us toward happiness.

CHAPTER 90

Investigation

Andrea Fella · 57 min

In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of investigation (dhamma vicaya), the second of the seven factors of awakening. She clarifies that investigation in Buddhist practice is not about thinking or figuring out why something is happening, but rather about exploring what is happening moment after moment in present experience.

Fella explains that the Buddha described wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) as the nourishment for investigation, which involves attending to experience through the lens of the Four Noble Truths: recognizing suffering, its cause, its cessation, and the path leading to its end—all in the present moment. Through vivid personal examples, including recurring memories triggering embarrassment and experiences with loneliness and depression, she demonstrates how suffering is constructed anew in each moment rather than being stored somewhere waiting to emerge.

The talk emphasizes a gentle, patient approach to investigation—like rubbing a bowl with a soft cloth rather than picking experience apart. Fella encourages practitioners to gather data about their patterns over time, allowing understanding to emerge organically rather than digging for assumed underlying causes. She addresses both difficult mind states and wholesome qualities, noting that mindfulness naturally supports the abandonment of unwholesome states while strengthening wholesome ones. The gradual nature of practice is honored through the Buddha's analogy of shipwreck parts slowly worn away by sun, wind, and water.

Tonight I'd like to talk about investigation, which is the second of the seven factors of awakening. As a factor of awakening, it is an important quality for us to cultivate because it is one of the factors that supports us in seeing things as they are—that yathabhuta that Carol was talking about the other night.

The English word "investigation" sometimes conjures up the meaning of thinking about or figuring out. Yet this is not what the Buddha had in mind with this quality of investigation, this second factor of awakening. In practice, in investigating our experience, looking at our experience, being with our experience, rather than trying to figure out why something's happening, we are encouraged to look at what is happening moment after moment after moment. This, I think, is one of the key ways we can recognize investigation: we are exploring what is happening in the present moment.

And yet again, as I was saying last week and as we've said all week long, it's not simply about being aware in the present moment. There's a perspective that we bring to make this looking at what's happening in the present moment a factor of awakening.

When the Buddha described this factor of investigation, dhamma vicaya is the Pali term, and it may be translated as "investigation of states." Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates it as "analysis of qualities." The word "analysis" also has that notion of figuring out and thinking about. I really think we want to look at this from the perspective of not figuring out but being with.

As the Buddha described this term, he offered for us what its nourishment is. He encouraged us to nourish the awakening factors, and he said that the factor that most nourishes this quality of investigation is something called wise attention. This brings the qualities of wisdom and awareness together, this wise attention.

One of the key definitions of wise attention is found in one of the suttas where the Buddha is talking about how one attends when one attends with wise attention. He says: One attends wisely, "This is suffering." One attends wisely, "This is the cause of suffering." One attends wisely, "This is the cessation of suffering." And one attends wisely, "This is the path leading to the cessation of suffering."

When I first heard this, I didn't really get it. I thought, well, he's just saying the Four Noble Truths. But the way it's phrased, when I read it and reflected on it, it's pointing to the present moment. He said, "This is suffering. This is the cause of suffering." And so I think what he's pointing to is that we explore the present moment experience, looking at what's happening from the perspective of the Four Noble Truths. Is what's arising in the present moment suffering? Is what's arising in the present moment the cause of suffering, the craving? Is what's arising in the present moment the ending of suffering? Or is what's arising in the present moment some of the beautiful qualities of heart and mind that support us on our path? Essentially using the Four Noble Truths as a framework for exploring our experience. He's pointing us into the present moment around exploring the Four Noble Truths.

The more I have explored this and reflected on this in my own experience, the more I have come to appreciate that this reflection—I'll just take one right now, "this is suffering"—is really a deep pointing to truth: that when suffering is arising, it's arising in the present moment. Suffering occurs in the present moment. It doesn't occur anywhere else. It may be that there is a thought of the past arising in the present moment and that reactivity has been constructed around that thought. But the actual experience of suffering is happening right now.

On one retreat, I kept having this memory come up. It was a repeating memory, one of those that came up over and over again. It was of a time that I had been acting in a play, and I had forgotten my line. The wall went down between myself and the audience, and I looked out at the audience and there they were looking back at me. Embarrassment arose. That memory—looking out at the audience and seeing people looking at me—embarrassment arose. On this retreat, that memory came and embarrassment arose over and over again.

Finally, I really began to clearly get it. Obviously there had been conditions in the past; I had been in that play and that had happened. But what was happening—this was on a three-month course, and seeing this over and over throughout that time—I really began to see that what was happening was that the thought was arising, the memory was arising for some reason, and there were conditions for that.

Things don't happen randomly, so the memory was arising. And the feeling of embarrassment was constructed all over again. It was being created right in the present moment. It wasn't as if there was some store of that embarrassment sitting there somewhere waiting to be dredged up. It was actually being recreated.

That's a pretty amazing thing. And it's pretty freeing, actually, when we really get that. Because the fact that it is constructed in the present moment means that there are processes going on in our mind that are putting it together right here and now. And when they can be seen, the mind begins to choose not to go down the route of suffering.

So this is suffering, arising in the present moment. Whether we're suffering, as Joseph said, over something in our past, or even more amazingly, something that we imagine out of whole cloth for our future, it's being constructed now. The cause of that suffering is also constructed now—the craving, the wanting.

Last week I talked about this story of noticing loneliness when I went to bed every night. I'll mention it again briefly in case some of you don't remember. My partner had broken up with me, and I was going to bed lonely every night. It didn't particularly strike me as odd that I was going to bed lonely. I thought I understood something about why. In my mind, it was something like, "Well, of course I'm lonely. I'm going to bed alone."

Yet through the exploration of the feeling of loneliness, as I described noticing that it arose when I was setting my alarm clock, and then seeing over the next few nights this memory of being with my partner in Disneyland looking up at the clock, I could see that the actual present moment cause of the loneliness had to do with the reaction to that memory. It had nothing to do with going to bed alone. The cause of that loneliness was created, again based on this arising memory, in the present moment. And as I described, when that connection was seen, the mind chose not to go down the path of loneliness. I couldn't have done that. I couldn't have said, "Don't do that anymore." But the wisdom that understood "that way lies suffering"—the mind let go of it.

Now it doesn't always happen that quickly, as I will describe going through some of these examples in investigation.

So suffering and its cause are happening in the present moment. Through the witnessing of what's happening in the present moment, the mind begins to let go of the causes. When the causes are released, the suffering is released. The fact that pretty much everything that we can know happens in the present moment really is encouraging us to do this investigation here and now, looking at what is happening—just what is happening moment after moment.

This is what we've been talking about almost every day. How do we look at what's happening in the present moment? We notice our bodies, what's happening underneath the level of concept. We notice the vibratory energy. We notice the hardness, softness, coolness, heat, pressure, tension, tightness, burning, aching, stabbing, pulling, twisting, tearing—all of these physical sensations. We notice our emotions, our moods happening. We notice how those impact the body. We notice thoughts. All of these arising.

And as these arise, we often see that there's a tendency in our minds to want to understand why something is happening. This is something to watch for. The tendency to try to figure out "why is that happening?" tends to take us into story, tends to take us away from the present moment, the what is happening moment after moment.

We can construct all kinds of reasons why we're feeling a particular emotion. We can go back to the causes from our past, our history. We can reconstruct, "Well, of course I'm feeling this way. This is like when I was a kid on the playground. This is the way people teased me. This is kind of reminding me of that." We can think about that kind of thing. And yet that's taking us away from what's actually happening moment after moment.

The more we are willing to actually explore what's happening moment after moment, we start to see that all the information we need to understand the suffering of this moment—how the suffering is created in this moment—all the information we need is found right in the present moment.

is the best way to uncover what we could call the "why" of the present moment.

In a sense, the more continuous our mindfulness gets, the more natural this aspect of investigation becomes. The more continuous our mindfulness gets, the more it reveals these causes in the present moment. We see a thought. We see that we are reacting to that thought in the present moment. It's actually quite amazing.

In the earlier days of my practice—like that example of the play, where the thought of forgetting my line came up—at first it seemed like there was no distinction, no possibility of that memory arising without the embarrassment coming along with it. They seemed intimately connected, as if one came packaged with the other. But the more I observed, the more I was with the present moment experience, the more I could see that there was the arising of the thought, and that was just thought. And then there was a reaction to that thought—the embarrassment was recreated all over again. It wasn't that the thought came with embarrassment as part of the package. There was a little gap.

So the continuity of mindfulness begins to reveal these cause and effect relationships, begins to reveal how our minds get hooked into the patterns of suffering. This exploration of looking at what's happening in the present moment, as opposed to trying to figure out why things are happening—this is one of the ways we can get confused about investigation, about that word "investigation." So I simply want to encourage you to have the interest to explore, moment after moment, what is happening.

Another way we may try to figure things out—perhaps a habit that at least some of us have around our experience—is that as we do hang out with our experience, as we start looking at what's going on moment after moment, we begin to see that certain patterns, certain habits, certain familiar conditioned habits of suffering and struggle—we all have our own favorites; one of mine was self-hatred—we see that they're fairly complex, rather layered.

We may have a sense that there are so many layers to this that what we really need to do, in order to have the whole thing fall apart, is to get right into the middle of it and see what's at the root. This may prompt us to go digging for what's there.

For example, there might be a feeling of resistance, and that resistance may be covering up—just to give an example of how this works—there may be a feeling of resistance, and we have a sense that there's some anger there and we're resisting the anger. Maybe we've seen in the past that often our anger is related to fear. So we may have a sense of, "Well, there's resistance. Maybe I need to go find the fear." Not really respecting or acknowledging that what is actually being felt right now is resistance. Instead, we try to dive into the middle of it, try to figure out what's there, assuming what's in the middle based on history, on things we've seen in our experience before.

I've seen in my own practice that this approach is actually not often helpful, because if we go looking for something, we can usually find it. It's almost like a self-fulfilling prophecy. We say, "Okay, I'm feeling resistance, so there must be fear underneath." And then we're scanning, looking for the fear.

In investigation, our practice is to—I think of it this way: if we've got a big mess of whatever it is, a big mess of self-hatred, a big mess of confusion, a big mess of anxiety, it's like we put our arms around the whole thing and simply ask, can we take in what is obvious about this experience? Rather than trying to dig for what's in the middle, just what's obvious? Rather than assuming there's something underneath to be found, we allow our wide arms to take in the entirety of the experience and simply notice what's obvious.

In my own experience, my own practice of exploring in that way, investigating in that way, what I've seen is that there's a very natural, gentle revealing. As we are able to put our arms around it and be with the most obvious thing, just being with that most obvious thing, sometimes the underneath pieces begin to show themselves.

Being with resistance, hanging out with resistance—"There's resistance. This is what resistance feels like"—and then there's a little flare of anger. "Oh, anger's here now." Now we can look at anger because it's here, it's in the present moment, it's clear, it's obvious.

One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita, offers an analogy for investigation—I think it may actually be for the meeting of experience, for the quality of mind that stays with experience. He talks about it being like rubbing a bowl with a soft cloth. That's a very different way of exploring experience than picking it apart, pulling it apart. It's more trusting that the mind's meeting of experience, the continuity of mindfulness being like that soft cloth, will reveal what needs to be known, what needs to be seen.

So it's helpful, I think, to not make assumptions about what lies underneath the outer layers. For instance, feeling a sense of depression arising, we might assume that a feeling of loneliness must underlie that depression.

I had a situation like this at one retreat. I was experiencing some low-grade depression, and I had some theories about what it might be connected to. I saw the depression arise when I was watching people walk together. So potentially, I thought, maybe it has to do with loneliness. But fortunately, at that point I was experienced enough to set that aside and say, "Well, maybe it has to do with loneliness." Rather than going and digging, saying, "Where's the loneliness?" I'm sure I could have constructed loneliness. But just being with the depression, noticing the obviousness of what was there, I learned a lot about my mind. I learned a lot about how that depression came into being. In fact, it was rather surprising—I found it came into being when the mind was really calm.

For several weeks, this was one of my main patterns that kept re-arising. Just willing to meet it, be with it, notice it. Noticing when it's present, noticing when it's absent, noticing when I felt caught by it and struggling with it, noticing when it felt like, "Oh, it's just depression, it's fine, it's no problem." Just being with it over and over again. Feeling my heart expand, feeling my heart contract, just being with it.

And then one day in the exploration of this, I felt like the depression began to get really big. I thought, "Oh wow, look at this." And there was absolutely no resistance at this point. There were bodily sensations associated with this feeling of depression, and the bodily feelings—it felt like my body got really big as I was exploring the physical sensations of depression and the mental state of depression. It felt like it was just expanding, expanding, expanding. And at some point in that process, the experience felt like it turned inside out. And what was there in that moment was a beautiful, expanded feeling of mettā, of loving-kindness.

Now that was not what I expected to find in the middle of that state of depression. The very next thought that came up was telling about what was perhaps going on, because the very next thought that arose in my mind was, in the midst of this beautiful, expansive feeling of mettā: "This is stupid, this is sappy, this is corny." That gave me a little clue, perhaps, as to the depression potentially being around not being able to connect with that feeling of expanded mettā.

So holding assumptions lightly about what is in the middle, the willingness to just meet what is happening—that was the key for me in that exploration. And more times than I can probably even recall, I've been surprised by what I found when I've been willing to just settle back and let go of the assumptions, let go of the ideas I have about what my mind is about, and instead just observe, just notice what is happening.

This exploration of what is happening is like gathering data. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, whom Carol has referred to a couple of times, has used this analogy of data gathering. He used this example: Think about people—the early, early people, probably as far back as caveman people—going out and looking up at the stars. The first time you go out and look up at the stars, if you didn't have all the history of stargazing behind us, the first time you look up, it's like, "Wow, there's a pattern. There's some pattern up there." And then the next night you go out and you see the pattern. And the next night you go out and you see the pattern. And each night you see the pattern, and probably you see little shifts as you go. You see little shifts in terms of when the stars are coming up. You may see shifts in terms of a few stars up there that don't seem to behave like all the others—they wander through the field of stars rather than being in fixed places.

So night after night, looking up at the stars, the understanding begins to grow of what is going on up there. It's similar here: we gather the data, particularly around patterns of experience, familiar patterns of experience. Each time something arises—like that depression, for instance—each time that arose was a new opportunity to gather some data. Each time we see it, we get a little new bit of perspective on the situation, and the mind begins to understand and put together the patterns. It can happen quite organically that the mind begins to understand the patterns just through the patient witnessing of our experience.

So one of the things we sometimes see when we observe our experience in this way, watching patterns over and over again, is a pattern vanishing.

On one retreat, I was feeling a lot of wanting when I was doing walking meditation—wanting to look at the people who were around me. Is that familiar? I had been keeping my eyes down, definitely looking at shoes, but I really wanted to look at faces. For the first few weeks of this three-month course, I was telling myself, "I'm not going to look." It was like I had blinders on. I was a good yogi. I was not going to look at people's faces.

After some weeks of this, finally it hit me upside the head: wanting is happening. Maybe I should look at wanting. I had not really been cognizant that wanting was happening. I had such an agenda of being a good yogi that I did not recognize or acknowledge the wanting itself.

So at some point I began being curious about wanting—wanting to look. I got really interested in the feeling. It actually felt like a magnet. When somebody was walking nearby, I was deciding not to act on the wanting, but to just feel into it. I would be there doing the walking meditation and someone would come into my field of vision and I'd feel this pull. And since I was not acting on it, I really got to feel that feeling of the pull—the unsatisfying feeling of wanting, the uncomfortable feeling that this isn't the way I want it to be. I want to be able to look. I got really familiar with that pull.

I also began to notice clearly when it arose. I had actually put myself outside away from people because I didn't want to be dealing with this all the time. So I was doing the walking meditation, and then somebody would pop into my peripheral vision. The wanting would spring right up. There it was. I'd feel that magnetic pull, like somebody described as a tractor beam from Star Trek—this pull to look. The person would walk in front of me, right in front of me, really tempting to look up. And then they'd walk past, go up the stairs, through the door, and the wanting would vanish.

That was an interesting moment. It felt like being released from a vice grip.

This is something we can begin to see—the ending of our struggles, our suffering. We can begin to see through investigation what the causes are that put it together, what the causes are that have it fall apart. This is in the terrain of that aspect of wise attention: seeing the ending of suffering. I'm not saying that was Nibbāna. I'm not saying that seeing the ending of that wanting was Nibbāna. But it is in the terrain of realizing how suffering falls apart. We can witness this in our observing what's happening.

Now, that experience continued, and there was an interesting lesson here too. For a little while, I really got into watching this because I would watch the suffering appear and then kind of wait for it to disappear. It was fun—I got to watch it go away when the person disappeared. At some point I realized an interesting thing: I was actually holding on to the wanting in order to watch it disappear. And when that became seen, the whole thing fell apart. The pattern of wanting to look at people just ended.

There's a lot we can learn from looking at what is happening in the present moment. In that example, seeing something disappear kind of quickly—that doesn't happen often, at least in my experience. Particularly with some of these habits or patterns that are really familiar, these multi-layered patterns that are so sticky, often we have to look at them over and over again. A lot of patience is asked of us to keep exploring these patterns.

This is the gradual cultivation that Joseph was talking about last night—this gradual cultivation. And in my own practice, this gradual cultivation has been the main way that the path has unfolded. I've had a few of those really big insights, seeing something kind of mind-blowing. But most of the insights, many of the insights, much of the freeing that's happened, particularly around the personal dukkha—the dukkha around personality and who I am and how I was raised—that has been a more gradual wearing away.

The Buddha offered an analogy for our practice that I love because it so speaks to me. He said that much of our practice unfolds in a gradual way, and he uses this analogy of a shipwreck—of a ship that's been strewn around the beach, the parts of the ship kind of all over the beach. And he said that over the course of months, the sun, the sand, the wind, the water wear away at the parts of the ship. Day by day—and this is an extrapolation from my understanding of the analogy—you're not going to see much change in any one part of the ship. A board sits there, you go look at it every day, you may even take a microscope to it, it's not going to look like it changes much day after day. But gradually, gradually, the wearing away is happening.

And imagine some of the rigging, the rope that holds the sails together. Day after day, you look at that piece of rope, it may not change at all. But a year later you go and you try to pick it up and it falls apart in your hand. Much of our practice unfolds in this gradual way. And sometimes I've seen that things fall apart without my knowing they fell apart—until kind of later.

So an example around this: there was a period of my practice where I was really exploring anger, anger at a particular person. And I began to notice at some point that my whole way of exploring the anger was kind of hooking me back into the pattern of anger. I recognized that the mind states and the thoughts were stronger than my ability to be mindful of them. And so I began bowing to my anger and saying, "I see you, and now is not the time to pay attention to you, but I'll pay attention to you when my mindfulness gets stronger." So I kind of said "not now" to that anger, and then just turned my attention to something else.

This was a skillful setting aside of the pattern. I just turned my attention—I was often walking when this came up—I turned my attention to my feet on the ground, just letting the anger be. It's like, "You do your thing. I'm not going to try to stop you, but I'm not going to pay attention to you either."

And in this way, I noticed the anger come up over and over again. "Oh, I see you. Not now. I see you. Not now." And I did begin to notice—I think in retrospect a little bit—I began to notice that it wasn't as much of a problem. It used to come up a lot, coming up every day. And then maybe it started coming up every few days, and then maybe every week. The bouts of that mind state got farther and farther between, at least with respect to that particular person—the anger at that particular person.

I didn't particularly think about it too much. It's like, well, maybe that person isn't coming up in my mind so much. It just wasn't arising; this anger wasn't arising as frequently. And then one day, I was walking up to my front door and I realized, wow, I haven't felt that anger in a really long time. And even thinking about it—thinking about it brought the person that I had been angry with into my mind—and I still didn't feel the anger. I was kind of like, wow. Where did it go?

And I didn't actually trust that it was gone. But it never came back. It had ended without my seeing it end.

So this is another way that—I mean, I had met it each time, kind of like, "I see you, not now. I see you, not now." I had met it each time, put it aside without aversion, and it just lost its momentum.

I don't know if some of you have seen the film What the Bleep?

It talks about these neural networks. And what the Buddha said: what we frequently ponder becomes the inclination of our mind. That's kind of what this film was pointing to—that when we engage in a pattern over and over again, the neurons shore it up. It's like, "Oh yeah, that one must be important. Bring more neurons in to support that." It fires again. "Oh, that one must be important. Bring more in." So that's the way our brains work. Whatever we frequently ponder becomes the inclination. It's a very natural process.

The interesting piece about this from the perspective of neurobiology is that when a pattern stops being engaged with, the neurons begin to rewire. Like, "Oh, that one's not important." When they're not used in that pattern, they begin to put their tendrils out elsewhere. A pattern can kind of fall apart in that way.

Another area that's important to investigate—I've been looking at the difficulty, but it's also really important to investigate the wholesome. To investigate happiness, calm, peace, equanimity, concentration. The investigation here is really about being with.

There's something beautiful about the factor of mindfulness. It has this amazing quality that... I'm going to take a step back for a second. You know, we talk about the four right efforts: letting go of the unwholesome, abandoning those unwholesome states that have arisen, avoiding unwholesome states that have not yet arisen, cultivating wholesome states that have not yet arisen, and maintaining wholesome states that have arisen. Winnie talked about this the other night. And that sounds very much like a doing. And it can be. We can actively cultivate wholesome states of metta, for example, using the metta practice that we've been doing.

And there's another way to cultivate wholesome states and abandon unwholesome states, and that is through mindfulness. Mindfulness itself is, as my teacher Sayadaw U Pandita said—I'll say wise mindfulness—the most wholesome mind state. And so cultivating wise mindfulness, we are cultivating a wholesome state. When it's not present, we're planting the seeds for it to be present, so we are cultivating that state of mindfulness.

And mindfulness has this beautiful capacity, this beautiful quality, that when we have that wise mindfulness, wise awareness of unwholesome, unskillful states, mindfulness of those tends to create the conditions for them to appear less frequently in our experience. And when we bring our mindful attention to wholesome states—to joy, to happiness, to love, to compassion—when we bring our mindful attention to those states, it creates the conditions for them to appear more frequently in our experience. And so the cultivation of mindfulness contains the four right efforts.

One of the most beautiful ways to encourage wholesome states is to be mindful of them when they have arisen. Be with them, recognize them. It's so easy to get lost in those beautiful states, to kind of bliss out or just be in the experience rather than really with it, aware of it. The awareness of those wholesome states—we can look at as being this other aspect of wise attention, the aspect of recognizing the path. Because these wholesome states are the path. They're pointing the way. Recognizing, cultivating the path. This is the path leading to the end of suffering.

This is one of the things about wise attention. Essentially, any experience that we're having in this moment can be seen through one of these lenses of the Four Noble Truths. Either what's happening in the moment is suffering, the cause of suffering, the ending of suffering, or—maybe these qualities, these beautiful wholesome qualities—the path leading to the end of suffering. So cultivating the path in this way, mindful of these qualities, these beautiful qualities of mind.

We do have a tendency to cling to some of these states. I'm sure you've noticed that. And so one of the helpful tools for us in observing these wholesome states of mind is to recognize our relationship to them. Not just settle back and kind of go into the bliss and think, "Oh yeah, this is really good." I mean, if you're noting, it's like, "Oh yeah, bliss, bliss." Okay, that note is going to give you a clue, right?

You know, a little bit of attachment going on. So noticing our relationship to these states—not to beat ourselves up about it, but to disentangle ourselves from the craving around these experiences.

Actually, in my own experience, when I'm feeling joy or happiness and wanting it to continue, having that kind of holding around it, it really doesn't allow the feeling and that state to flower fully. The clinging seems to dampen it down a little bit. I'm sure you've seen this with concentration. It's kind of a classic thing that happens: you're paying attention to the breath and noticing the experiences that are happening, and it's starting to feel really good. "Oh yeah, wow, this feels really good"—and then it's gone. That sense of "ooh, more of that, I want more of that" kind of gets in the way for us.

Sometimes the clinging to these wholesome states can be really subtle. It's kind of amazing how subtle it can be. I was at Shwe Oo Min, Sayadaw U Tejaniya's monastery, and at one point I had a state of mind that was quite peaceful—very spacious, very quiet, very tranquil. As far as I could tell, it was pretty pure. But I did think to ask, "What's my relationship to this experience?" And there was a very subtle leaning in, trying to make that state continue. Very subtle. When that was seen, the trying fell away. And then there was immediately wanting it to continue because I was no longer actively engaged in making it continue. "Oh no, wait, no, I want it to continue." There was fear it wouldn't continue. So boom, boom, boom—the mind saw these ways of clinging to this state. And the next thing that happened was that all this joy arose because the mind had seen the clinging. I think Joseph mentioned that: sometimes in the midst of seeing the clinging, the mind can get really happy because it is seeing things being released.

So sometimes the clinging to wholesome states can be really subtle. This tool of checking our relationship to our wholesome experience is really supportive, really helpful.

We've said, I think, many times already: it really doesn't matter what is happening in your experience. We can bring mindfulness to pretty much anything. Self-hatred, depression, loneliness, confusion, bliss, joy, happiness, calm, peace, ease, boredom, confusion. What's important is to know what is happening, to observe what happens to it as you observe it. This process leads us through to the discovery of the impermanent nature of experience, the unreliable nature of experience, seeing how suffering is constructed, seeing how it falls apart. Moment after moment: What is happening? What is happening? This investigation is a crucial tool that leads us towards understanding, towards wisdom that frees the mind.

Let's sit for a few moments.

Mettā Practice: Working with Difficulty

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this practical dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers detailed guidance on navigating difficulties that commonly arise during mettā (loving-kindness) meditation. She emphasizes the importance of the four-part mettā practice, particularly the fourth step of checking back in with the heart after each phrase—a technique that transformed mettā from an abstract exercise into an embodied practice for her.

Andrea explores the near enemy of mettā (attached love with conditions or requirements) and the far enemy (aversion, ill will, or competitiveness), explaining that these arising states actually indicate the practice is working. She uses the powerful metaphor of mettā as a magnet that draws its opposite to the surface, and as soap in a washing machine that attracts dirt so it can be released. She also addresses the subtle belief that happiness is a zero-sum game—that wishing others well somehow diminishes our own happiness.

For practitioners struggling with difficulty, Andrea offers several skillful approaches: returning to easier categories like the benefactor or self, alternating between categories, switching to compassion practice (karuṇā) when suffering predominates, or dropping into mindfulness practice altogether. She clarifies the distinction between mettā and compassion—while both arise from the open heart, compassion is the natural response when that openness meets suffering. The talk concludes with a guided meditation and a question-and-answer session addressing topics including concentration practice with mettā, adapting phrases, and working with overwhelming experiences of beauty.

For the metta practice today, we'll continue with the dear friend that Guy introduced on Friday. Before we go into meditation, I'd like to expand on and reinforce some of what the others have said.

Guy talked on Friday about what he calls a four-part metta: starting with the image and connecting with the sense of caring about the being, saying the phrase, and understanding the meaning of the phrase. The fourth part is to check back in, in the area of the heart, and see how it has been for you to make that wish.

For me, that fourth part was what really allowed the metta practice to begin to make sense to me. When we express the wish of metta—may you be happy—it's an intention, an expression of something that we may or may not be feeling. But intentions have an impact; they rebound on us. What I found is that if I'm willing to express that wish and come back and check in—how was that to make that wish?—it begins to allow the metta practice to become an embodied practice.

An example for myself: on one retreat I was doing metta for a month. Metta was the only practice I was doing for the month, and it went in and out of feeling juicy and able to connect with the experience of metta. I remember at one point I was in the dining room and it felt so dry. I reminded myself, well, all I really have to do here is say the phrase and understand the meaning of the phrase, then check back in. How did that land? How did that land in the heart to say the phrase and understand the meaning?

What I discovered was that the first time I made that wish and checked back in, there was just a subtle shift in the heart—a subtle shift of maybe a little bit of friendliness, the subtlest little shift. Then the next wish, and I felt back into the heart. I found that this practice of checking back in allowed the feeling to be nourished. It was almost as if the feeling in the heart was a little ember, and each phrase was like a gentle wind encouraging that ember to grow. So I really encourage that part of the practice that Guy described. For me, it was a huge shift to have metta begin to feel like an embodied practice.

Another piece I'll mention is that in moving to the dear friend in particular, we can start to have maybe a little bit of reactivity around wishing our dear friend metta. It can slip into what's called the near enemy, which I believe Guy talked about on Friday. The near enemy is a kind of love with a requirement—attachment, an attached kind of love. I'll love you if you'll do this for me, or I'll love you if you love me back. That kind of exchange feeling about metta. It's very natural for metta to a dear friend to have that kind of quality.

The reason it's called the near enemy is because it's an experience or a state of mind that could be confused with the quality of metta. It's similar, it's close. There's a sense of connectivity, but it's got some skew to it, a little bit of skew.

The far enemy of metta is a state of mind that is so different than metta that you're not going to confuse it with metta. The far enemy, which can come up as we're doing the practice, is aversion, ill will, even a sense perhaps of hatred, a sense of competitiveness, of not enough for me, perhaps.

When I first was doing the metta practice, it kind of surprised me, in doing metta for a dear friend, that these states would come up. I thought, well, I'm wishing my good friend to be happy and healthy and well. And what comes up in my mind instead of those wishes is, yeah, but they did that thing. The very bringing into the mind this wish—it's like it brings out the opposite.

Another thing that Guy sometimes says, and maybe he said it on Friday, is that the metta practice is like running a metta magnet over your heart. What a magnet does is pull its opposite to it. So the practice is working when these things come to the surface. It's not that we're not supposed to have these things come—the near enemy of metta, that attached love, the far enemy of metta. Having them come into consciousness essentially means the practice is working.

Another form of reactivity around the dear friend, which I think is probably the far enemy for me, was a sense of fear in wishing my dear friend metta—a fear that if I'm wishing her metta, it means I'm wishing myself unhappiness. Somehow my mind had believed that happiness was a zero-sum game: if my friend was happier, it would correspondingly mean that I was less happy. This belief is just an idea that there's only so much happiness to go around.

I think it may come a little bit from the material world. We associate happiness sometimes with material possessions, with having things, and maybe there are only so many things to go around. But states of mind are very different. It was quite a shift for me to recognize that actually, when I could take happiness in my friend's happiness, something opened.

It's like happiness can multiply—there's no limit to happiness.

So the fact that these states come up for us in our metta practice, again, it's not a mistake. And working with these difficulties, the first exploration would be simply allowing them. We can think of the metta practice as being like washing clothes. The metta is the soap. You're putting the soap into the washing machine. If you're washing clothes, the soap attracts the dirt. The soap pulls the dirt out of the clothes into the water, and then the water gets rinsed away.

So we don't have to have an adversarial relationship with these difficulties that come up. It can simply be, "Oh, okay, there's the near enemy. May it be washed away with this metta practice. Oh, there's the far enemy. May it be washed away with this metta practice." The first way to work with difficulty is simply to recognize that these other states are coming up along with the metta, and to just keep going, if that's possible.

For myself, when it gets difficult, at least for me, sometimes it feels like the heart begins to squeeze. If the near or far enemy is a little too strong, each phrase feels like it's adding a squeeze to the heart, and it gets harder and harder.

If it gets too difficult, there are some fallbacks. Perhaps the first fallback would be to shift to a person, to shift to one of the categories that's easier. Back to your benefactor, back to yourself if that's easier for you. Unlike vipassana practice, where we're meeting suffering and working with that, with metta practice we are encouraging finding where it's easiest. So it's not cheating. If it feels easier to go back to where the heart feels more open, where you can connect with another person, that's perfectly fine. Use another person for a while and then perhaps try to bring in your dear friend again.

And being playful around the categories—we don't have to say, "Okay, I'm on dear friend now, that's all I do." We can have it be a little more fluid. Maybe one or two phrases to your benefactor, then one round to your dear friend, then one round to your benefactor and one round to your dear friend. Alternating in this way and seeing if you can allow some of those near and far enemies to come into the wash and be released by alternating other people with your dear friend.

If that still feels difficult, there are a couple of different approaches you could use. For me, metta was not an easy practice. It took quite a while before I could really feel like I could connect with it and not just be torqued into pain. On one daylong retreat where I was doing metta, it was going okay for the morning, but by the afternoon it didn't matter which category I was trying to send metta to, which person I was choosing—every phrase brought so much pain in the heart that I couldn't even remember the metta phrases. It felt like this constriction, this steel band around my chest. It was so painful to even try to think of the phrases that I couldn't think of the phrases.

The teacher on that retreat suggested, "Try compassion practice for yourself." That was doable, because suffering was what was happening for me. The quality of compassion is the quality of the heart that can meet suffering. And so when I could express the wish, "May I be free from this suffering," that I could remember. I could connect with that wish.

So that's an option also—if it feels too painful, if the practice is bringing up so much constriction or tightness that it feels very difficult to continue with the metta practice, you could try switching to compassion practice. Compassion practice is really simple: one phrase, "May I (or you) be free from this suffering."

I don't know if Guy mentioned this about the dear friend, but it is helpful when doing the metta practice to pick a dear friend who is not undergoing a lot of challenge at this moment. Because when your dear friend is struggling with something in their life, as you recall them you'll probably recall that struggle, and it evokes more the sense of suffering. That evokes the quality of compassion. The quality of metta is the quality of the open heart, the connectedness, the free-flowing connectedness. When that open heart meets suffering, it shifts to compassion.

So in general, when picking a dear friend, pick someone who is generally feeling okay in their life at this point. And if you have a strong wish to bring a person who is suffering into the room for the metta practice, you may from time to time find using that compassion phrase to be more resonant with what's actually happening for you. The phrase "May you be free from this suffering" is the expression of the open heart meeting suffering.

And then, if none of those things is resonating for you in terms of working with the difficulty, you can always drop the metta practice and use mindfulness.

Just shift to mindfulness practice to work with whatever has come up in your own heart and mind in that moment. Simply be with it, allowing, accepting—this is what has arisen. Can I be with that? The same tools that we've been using.

So let's explore the practice. I'll do a little bit of guiding at the beginning, in a very light way. Use your own phrases. I'll suggest some phrases, very simple phrases to begin, but you don't need to feel like you have to use my phrases for yourself. We'll stay with benefactor or self—I'm going to suggest you just start where it's easiest. Then we'll switch to friend. At some point in the guided meditation I'll suggest a timing for switching, but if it feels productive and appropriate for you to stay with wherever it's easiest, just stay there.

Guided Meditation

Allowing yourself to be as comfortable as possible. Allowing the mind and body to settle. And allowing the attention to just take in, connect with whatever's happening in the area of your heart. No right or wrong there. Just how is your heart in this moment?

Allowing yourself to call to mind whoever's easiest—whether it's yourself or your benefactor—bringing that person to mind or bringing yourself into your heart. And allowing yourself to recollect some qualities that you appreciate about yourself or the benefactor. It's said that the proximate cause for metta is seeing the beautiful. Allow yourself to connect with the beautiful of yourself or the benefactor.

And begin expressing the wishes of kindness, of friendliness, of caring. May I or you be happy. May I or you be healthy. May I or you be safe. May I or you live with ease.

Continuing to express the wish of metta for yourself or your benefactor. With each phrase, checking in—how does it land in your heart to make that wish? Feel free to play with flowing between self and benefactor as it feels appropriate for you.

Bringing your dear friend into your mind. Allowing yourself to recollect some qualities you appreciate about your friend. Beginning to offer the phrases of goodwill to your friend.

Bringing up an image of your friend, if that's accessible. If not, perhaps a sense of being with your friend. Saying the phrase, understanding the meaning, and touching back in—how does the heart feel having made that wish?—with each phrase.

If difficulty arises while doing the metta, knowing it's a very natural part of the practice. If it's okay to keep going, just continue. And also knowing it's fine to change to another person, switch to compassion practice, or use mindfulness with whatever is arising.

End of Guided Meditation

Do you have any questions about your metta practice?

A practitioner shares about noticing attachment arising when practicing with their sister—wanting her happiness to look a certain way.

Yes, that is near enemy, I think, because it is that sense of really wanting something specific. In effect, it sounds like it's in the terrain of compassion, because compassion comes with that wish to help. So it sounds like your sister's perhaps in a little bit of struggle.

The practitioner clarifies: "Not right now, but I want her to be accepted. I want her happiness to look a certain way."

I see. Yes, so just notice that. Notice that it's not just wishing her happiness—it's happiness with an agenda. Yes, that is near enemy.

So yes, just notice that and allow that, but see if you can release the agenda in a way.

When you get into a state of concentration, do you continue with the words, or do you stay with something else? There are different ways to explore it. When I've done metta as a concentration practice, I have continued with the words. In fact, it felt like I got concentrated on the intention towards metta more than the feeling of metta. If you have more of the feeling of metta going, then you can let go of the words. But the words are kind of the engine that keeps it going.

It depends on how deep the concentration gets—at a certain point the words will fall away. But generally, you can keep going with the phrases. It actually supports the concentration to deepen, to keep going with the phrases.

A question about metta practice and compassion practice—are they different? And referring to the story I told about changing to compassion practice for myself on that daylong where it got so difficult to do the metta.

In compassion practice, there is a difference. In metta practice we're connecting with the quality of connectivity, of the open heart, friendliness, caring—those kinds of qualities. With compassion practice we're highlighting suffering. It's a similar quality of heart, and that quality of the open heart, when it meets suffering, resonates with compassion. So it's a different quality, and we may actually do some compassion practice later in the retreat.

In that case what we do is we actively bring suffering into our minds to cultivate that quality of compassion—the heart that can stay open in the face of suffering. And so when I did that for myself in that daylong retreat, what was coming up for me was suffering. It was much more natural for me to use the compassion phrase, which is very simple: may I be free from this suffering. That resonated. I did wish to be free from that suffering. It was a very natural wish, and it made the practice doable. So it felt different to me. It is a different practice because with compassion practice we're actively trying to meet suffering.

A question about pace, about staying with a category—the moving between benefactor and friend in a qualitative way. Sometimes if you go into concentration, it moves a lot more slowly.

I can speak from my own experience around this. There are probably many different ways. One thing I really appreciate about practice is that there are so many different doorways and so many different ways it works for different people. So the first thing I'd suggest is to notice what works for you. Trust your experience. If you find it's supportive to just stay with one category and that helps deepen the concentration, that's great—do that. If you find it's more helpful to switch categories, if you find the metta stays more lively when you're switching, play with that.

For myself, I've seen with concentration practice that it stabilizes—at least for me—to stay with one person for a while. The person becomes much more clear. The experience of directing metta towards that person is more clear.

About going more towards the pervading—we haven't really gotten to that yet in these instructions, but I have been playing with it in my own practice and actually find it fairly natural. When the feeling is present, you let go of the person, let go of the object, and allow the feeling to spread. That's also a possibility, especially for concentration. It does feel very natural to do that.

So I really would encourage you to discover what works for you, but those are just a few thoughts around that question.

For me, when I did that month-long metta practice, I stayed with self and benefactor for two weeks. I didn't even switch categories. I really allowed it to stabilize there, and that allowed the concentration to deepen.

It depends partly on whether you're using it as a concentration practice or not. When I'm not using metta as a concentration practice, and I'm more looking at just allowing the heart to vibrate and resonate in sympathy with people, I kind of just let whoever pops up, pop up. I'm not so concerned about stabilizing the mind with one particular person. So it partly depends on your purpose. Are you using it for concentration? And if you are, then I think staying with one person over sittings, over days, is helpful.

Someone mentioned adapting the phrases for themselves to very specific issues that were coming up in the retreat, moving far away from the standard phrases, and then when moving on to friend or benefactor, returning to the more traditional ones.

Again, the answer is different depending on whether you're doing it as a concentration practice or you're more interested in cultivating the quality of metta just for itself. Generally, I find if I'm just cultivating the quality of metta for itself, I explore what works. That may be different phrases for different people. It might be switching categories more quickly, allowing different people to pop in, being really creative, envisioning people in different situations that reflect what they're doing.

When you're exploring it as a concentration practice, generally simplifying the phrases is helpful. And then over time, when I was doing it as a concentration practice, even the whole phrase "may I be happy, may you be happy" began to feel like too much. And it was just, "Oh, happy." Just using that simple word. Having the phrases be able to collapse down to a simple word was helpful. But again, it depends.

Someone shared that what was coming up with these metta practices felt like beauty, overwhelming at times, with the body kind of contorting.

So what I'm hearing is that when you're doing the metta, something comes up that feels like beauty—a beautiful state of mind—and it's strong, it's overwhelming. This sometimes happens. I found for myself, in my early years of practice, aversive states of mind were really comfortable for me. I could be angry and know I was angry, and this was not too difficult. But joy, happiness, love—those were really hard. They felt overwhelming to connect with, so unfamiliar in a way.

What I'd suggest perhaps, if it feels overwhelming, is to switch to mindfulness rather than continuing with the metta practice. Switch to mindfulness and see if you can allow the feeling. For myself, the little bit of wisdom that was helpful when beautiful states would arise and I couldn't deal with them, when they were overwhelming, was this: "It's okay, this will pass." And that was actually really great, you know.

What would seem to happen was that the resistance to that state would let go, and then the state would get strong. It would even get more intense, but then it would be like a wave that flowed out. And then on the other side of it, it was much more tranquil. So that little bit of wisdom—it's okay, this will pass—allowed it to do its natural movement.

I would encourage mindfulness of that experience. Let go of the metta phrases for a while and just explore: how is it to allow this beauty? You may notice some contraction, some resistance, some fear, some confusion. Allow all of that, and perhaps this reminder: it's okay, it will pass.

So we need to stop. Thank you for your metta practice. It's such a beautiful thing to sit in a room where this is what's happening.

What great karma.

CHAPTER 92

Awareness of Awareness

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound exploration of mindfulness as an object of investigation rather than simply a tool we employ. Drawing on the Abhidhamma distinction between prompted and unprompted mindfulness, she encourages practitioners to notice the spontaneous re-arising of awareness—those moments when mindfulness returns without effort—as doorways to understanding both the nature of awareness and the not-self (anattā) characteristic of mental formations.

Fella shares personal stories from intensive retreat practice to illustrate how curiosity about where and how mindfulness gets lost can reveal deep patterns of mind. Whether losing awareness in specific activities, states of body like pain, or challenging mind states, she emphasizes investigation over judgment. The talk includes practical guidance on recognizing when the mind needs rest, when to redirect attention from overwhelming states, and how settling practice can open doors to subtler experience.

The teaching also addresses common assumptions about what meditation "should" feel like, pointing out that awareness can function in many ways—broad and panoramic, picking up individual experiences like popcorn, feeling separate from objects or intimate with them. Rather than constructing a particular meditative state, practitioners are encouraged to check: "Am I aware? What am I aware of?" This curious, non-judgmental approach to understanding one's own mind supports the development of wisdom that naturally leads to freedom.

Tonight I'd like to explore another area of experience, one that we've been talking about a lot and yet perhaps not talking about in terms of investigating, and that is investigating mindfulness itself.

I think it can be interesting to explore and get curious about the comings and goings of mindfulness. We're here practicing mindfulness, and sometimes in doing a mindfulness practice, we get a little bit identified with the mindfulness as being something that we're doing, and we don't necessarily think about it as something to investigate. When does mindfulness arise? How does mindfulness arise? Where does mindfulness get lost? Investigating it as a phenomenon can help us to loosen some of that attachment we have to the doing of mindfulness.

There's a lot to learn in this exploration, a lot to learn about how our minds get caught, how our minds do what they do. And so really, I like to encourage a sense of investigation and curiosity rather than judgment. In looking at the coming and going of mindfulness, we can get judgmental about our practice—aren't I supposed to be doing the mindfulness? But we can actually investigate this coming and going.

One thing I want to say here at the beginning of the talk is that I'm going to use the terms mindfulness and awareness kind of synonymously. We all, I think as teachers, use the word awareness somewhat loosely and perhaps differently. So I just wanted to clarify that from the outset.

The first thing I'd like to explore is recognizing mindfulness itself, recognizing what it is, how it feels. The Abhidhamma talks about two ways mindfulness happens for us, and they're called prompted mindfulness and unprompted mindfulness. Prompted mindfulness is what we typically think that we're doing, what we're typically engaged in during our mindfulness practice. Prompted mindfulness is when mindfulness is present, encouraging more mindfulness. We are mindful, and in being mindful, we can encourage ourselves: be aware, pay attention. And so that's prompted mindfulness.

The recognition of the experience of mindfulness itself, in my own exploration of this, I found coming in the exploration of what's called unprompted mindfulness, which is the spontaneous re-arising of mindfulness—something we're all really familiar with. We've been watching this for two weeks now. Mindfulness comes back. It comes back spontaneously.

Typically what we do in that moment is we start doing something with what we have become aware of, especially in our daily lives. These moments of unprompted mindfulness actually happen to us a lot more than we realize. This moment of mindfulness returning, the recognition of what's happening in the present moment, being aware of what's happening in the present moment—that returns actually quite a lot. But often what happens in that moment is that we get attached to or identified with or kind of stuck to the thing that we've become aware of, and we start doing something with it or thinking about it or trying to figure out what we're supposed to do about that. And so we rarely actually notice that mindfulness has returned, that this faculty of mindfulness has arisen. We're more attuned to recognizing what mindfulness has become aware of, and then often from that, getting lost.

Cultivating this recognition of mindfulness, this recognition of the spontaneous arising of mindfulness, I found to be a very helpful tool for getting familiar with what mindfulness feels like, what the experience of mindfulness is. Partly because there's some contrast in that moment of mindfulness coming back—a little bit of contrast in what the mind feels like now when it's present, aware, connected with experience, and what it felt like a few moments ago when it was not connected with experience, not aware. In that moment of mindfulness arising, there's an opportunity for us to begin to clearly notice the distinction between what it's like to be mindful and what it's like to not be mindful. There can be a lingering memory of the flavor of the mind lost in thought, confused, spinning, in that moment that mindfulness returns.

For me, when I realized this—that this was a great place to begin to get familiar with the distinction between being mindful and not mindful—I stopped judging myself for my wandering mind. If my mind wanders a hundred times in a sitting, that gives me a hundred opportunities to recognize what it's like to be mindful. It's a great tool to shift our perspective about waking up into mindfulness again. Curiosity: what's it like? What's it like to now be aware?

I would encourage this not to be a big project, but just in a light way, seeing if you can take some curiosity, some interest in that experience of awareness. What is it like to be aware?

We can also explore this when we are already mindful. I found that moment of awakening, of waking up, to be a beautiful place to explore it. And we can also explore it when we're already aware. Here, in this place, comes the question or recognition: awareness is here, I'm aware, awareness is present. There is awareness present. Now we may not be able to consciously tap into what that experience is, but we know it at some intuitive level right now. Do you know that you're aware? Usually the answer is yes.

What we are experiencing is another question entirely. Developing familiarity with that experience—awareness itself as distinct from what we are aware of—is part of this exploration. How do we begin to recognize awareness itself as distinct from what we are aware of?

Mostly in our early practice, we are more familiar with noticing what we are aware of and less familiar with noticing the awareness itself. And so this is really the whole subject of the talk today.

So back to this moment of waking up. One of the beautiful things about that moment of unprompted mindfulness, when we can begin to tap into that arising, is that we see it is a moment of awareness that didn't take any effort. It just happened. It begins to give us the sense, a flavor, of what it might mean to have that relaxed, non-striving mindfulness—that moment when mindfulness arises. Did you do that? Did you have to do anything to make that happen? It happens spontaneously.

Appreciating the quality in this moment of arising of awareness itself, and also the effortless nature of it, the spontaneous arising of it, is actually a pointer to the not-self nature of our experience. Mindfulness arises. Did you do that? It happened. It happened as a result of conditions. Causes and conditions came together for mindfulness to re-arise. There was no one who said, "I'm going to be mindful now." It just happened.

So this exploration of the coming and going of mindfulness begins to point us to this truth of not-self.

In that moment of recognizing mindfulness returning, first of all, just in a light way, recognize that you're now aware. Notice what's obvious. Wake up into what is already happening. There's no need to come back to anything because the mind is already present.

Now depending on what practice you're doing, what tools you're working with, you may in that moment—after you've become aware and recognized awareness and noticed what you are aware of—because awareness comes with an object. There's always the arising of awareness with something that it is aware of. So waking up to what's already happening. And then if you're practicing concentration, because awareness is back, you have the choice. You can now choose. And this is where prompted awareness comes in. We choose what to pay attention to. Or we choose to simply settle back and allow the next thing and the next thing and the next thing.

So this side of exploring awareness—noticing what it feels like to be aware. What does it feel like to be aware? And again, one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says don't look too hard for it. You know, if you know that you're aware, that's actually enough. Over time, the feeling of awareness or the experience of awareness, the experience of what it means to be aware, becomes more of a felt sense or it becomes more clear. But initially, at least for me, it was not obvious.

It's actually, in some ways, such a familiar experience. Being aware is such a familiar experience that it's like the air we breathe. We don't really notice it. It's the water we're swimming in. The fish swimming in water doesn't really know it's in water. The experience of awareness, of recognizing awareness, is kind of like that. It's so close to us that it's not obvious, even though we know that we're aware.

So it's kind of almost a koan for us to have that curiosity: What is awareness? What is this experience of awareness?

The next side of this that I'd like to explore is how do we lose awareness? Where and how do we lose awareness? Again, the comings and goings of mindfulness teach us a lot about our minds and inform us, give us some support for our mindfulness practice.

This side of exploring where we lose mindfulness really supports the practice of continuity, because as we get familiar with where we lose awareness—where awareness wanders out, where mindfulness wanders out the door into thought—as we get familiar with those places, those activities, those mind states, those times that mindfulness leaves, we can add a little bit of interest to those times and perhaps begin to watch the mind lose interest, begin to leave the object that it's noticing.

This exploration of noticing where the mind wanders out isn't intended to be a judgment.

It's more, again, curiosity to learn about our minds.

Now again, anattā, not-self. We are actually, moment by moment, all day long, presented with evidence for this truth of not-self. And we just don't recognize it.

One of the ways the Buddha talked about not-self in the famous discourse on the characteristic of not-self: he talked about our mind and body processes not being under our control as being evidence for not-self. He talked about this in respect to the five aggregates that Guy spoke about the other day. Body is out of our control. Body is not self. Feelings are not self. Perceptions are not self. Mental formations are not self. Consciousness is not self.

And mindfulness, the factor of mindfulness, is a mental formation. It is an arising, like concentration, like anger, like confusion, like all the various states of mind. It is a mental formation. It is created by causes and conditions and has some intentionality to it.

And of mental formations, along with all the other aggregates, the Buddha says: "Volitional formations are non-self. For if volitional formations were self, volitional formations would not lead to affliction. And it would be possible to determine of mental formations: 'Let my mental formations be thus. Let my mental formations not be thus.'"

Would you do that if you could? "May my mind be filled with bliss." And boom, the mind is filled with bliss. "May mindfulness be perfectly continuous." Boom, mindfulness is perfectly continuous. Would you do that? Can we do that? No.

And as the Buddha says, "Because volitional formations are non-self, volitional formations lead to affliction, and it is not possible to determine of volitional formations: 'Let my volitional formations be thus. Let my volitional formations not be thus.'"

So mindfulness leaves. If we had control over mindfulness, if mindfulness were under control of self, if there were a self that could control it, we would do that. So this fact that the mind wanders out—let's not judge it, let's explore it. Let's look at this phenomenon of mindfulness leaving.

We might lose awareness in specific activities in our day: washing dishes, going into our rooms. Investigate for yourself. What are the times that seem to be the mindfulness black holes? Doing your yogi job, maybe taking a walk on the loop. What are the activities that you tend to lose mindfulness in?

Now, I'm not suggesting that you stop doing those activities. Often we can't. We lose mindfulness going into our dorm rooms. That seems to be a place where it's like, "Oh, the door's closed. I can do anything I want. I don't have to be mindful here." But we have to go into our rooms to go to bed, to get our things, whatever. So this is not saying to avoid the activities where we lose mindfulness, but to be curious about the process by which we lose it.

When we become aware that we're losing mindfulness in certain activities, one of my teachers says it's like we can add a little salt to that activity. Be curious. Be interested. How does it happen that mindfulness gets lost when I go into my room?

How does it happen that mindfulness gets lost when I do my yogi job? Be curious about that.

At one point on a retreat, I began to realize that I got lost going into the bathroom. And at some point I realized that one of the key places I was getting lost was staring at myself in the mirror. I would wake up staring at myself in the mirror and think, "Wow, didn't notice that was in the field." I clearly was just waking up and finding myself staring at myself in the mirror.

So I began to get curious about this—just to explore what was happening that I wasn't able to be present in the bathroom. I started exploring, and it was kind of like I'd go into the bathroom thinking, "Okay, probably going to lose awareness here. Let's see if I can catch it this time." And it was a long time—this was on a month-long retreat—and it would be, "Ah, lost it again." I'd wake up staring at myself, and I hadn't caught it. "Ah, next time maybe." So rather than beating myself up about it, it was more like, "Ah well, I'll just keep trying. I'll just try next time."

And at some point, when I was washing my hands, I noticed the intention to look up. Guy was talking about intention the other day. Just being more continuously mindful while washing my hands, I noticed the intention to look up. It was kind of a habit to look at myself in the mirror while washing my hands. It wasn't some deep emotional thing of needing to be mirrored or see myself—it was simply a habit of mind. The curiosity began to reveal that habit, and it began to allow me to be conscious in a place where I had habitually gotten lost, because I got interested, because I got curious about it.

We also might lose awareness in states of body—with pain, or even with really pleasant physical sensations, which can come particularly as the mind gets more concentrated. That can be a doorway out of which the mind wanders. So again, investigating this, being curious about it.

I'll tell a story around my own exploration of this, around pain—getting lost in pain. One of the ways, one of the many ways that I got lost in pain... I found several different strategies my mind used to avoid pain by getting lost in various other states. And one of the states my mind got lost in when there was pain was singing. I would wake up seeing that I was singing a song in my head.

So I began exploring this. Rather than trying to double down, to be with the pain, to try to avoid the singing, I got curious. It was kind of like settling back: "Okay, I see that the mind is kind of leaving from this place of pain. Can I get curious about how this happens?" And in waking up into the singing, what I noticed was that when the mind moved to singing, it lost some of its grip on the pain. I recognized that the singing was actually a strategy the mind had to let go of the pain.

This is something to be curious about with our own relationship to pain in particular. The mind has strategies that it uses. It has ways it has figured out to let go of pain, or ignore pain, or not have to deal with pain. Often we have that capacity in our minds—it just clicks into some other state, maybe spacing out, or singing in this case.

What I noticed in that waking up is that the mind had lost its grip on the pain. And in the waking up and seeing that the mind had lost the grip, there were a few moments I could experience the pain without being so tight around it. That began to give the mind an education in the possibility: "Oh, it's actually possible to be with pain without this tightening and squeezing and bearing down."

The mind would then go into the gripping again. That was my habit around pain—when I wasn't checked out, I would kind of bear down on it, squeeze into it, force the mind into it. But because I had that opportunity in waking up into the experience of singing and seeing that the mind had let go of that grip, getting the sense or the experience of not being in the grip of pain while present for the pain, I could then begin to see the grip arise. Seeing that arising of the bearing down, the mind began to understand how it was involved in that gripping. And the gripping intensified the pain. It was very clear that that fastening to the pain intensified it.

The mind began to understand, on its own in effect. Without my having to try to stop what the mind was doing, the mind began to understand that when it grips down on pain, the pain is worse. And the mind began to learn how to not do that without using the strategy of singing. It began to be able to stay present for the pain without either the gripping happening or the ejecting into another state of mind.

So again, curiosity—curiosity about where we lose awareness and interest in exploring what's happening there. We might lose awareness in states of mind: boredom, confusion, thoughts of work, planning, fantasy. Here, often we notice what we have gotten lost in almost in retrospect, like in the description of losing awareness in places, in things we're doing. Often we notice after the fact. Like in the bathroom—I noticed after the fact that I had been lost in thought.

Likewise with states of mind, we may wake up and realize, "Wow, I've been gone for a while. The last thing I remember was that boredom was present." We may know in the waking up, recognize, "Oh, okay, I was trying to hang out with boredom and that's where the mind got lost." Recognizing what we wake up into can help us in that moment of waking up, that noticing we're aware and what we're aware of. In that moment of waking up, if we wake up into fantasy or boredom or confusion, the simple recognizing—"Oh, okay, I'm aware, this awareness is back, and the state of mind is confusion or boredom"—the familiarity with what we've become aware of begins to help us recognize the state more quickly.

An example of this from my own practice around anger. This was actually my very first meditation practice in daily life. Anger was kind of out of control in my mind, and I vowed to myself, "I'll wake up when anger happens." Just that commitment, because I had recognized anger was a big issue. I would just get lost in anger. And so that commitment to recognizing "anger is present" began to have an impact. Just that orientation—"I want to remember, I want to wake up when that mind state is happening"—began to change things. And I began to wake up in it.

The first few times I woke up into it, I was in a rage. I could notice, "Yep, well, this is anger." Unpleasant. It was pretty early in my meditation practice, and it was kind of like, "What do I do with this? I have no idea." At that point it was, "Well, I don't know what to do with this. I guess I go back to work." In retrospect, I saw that actually just that simple recognition gave me some space. It allowed me to go back to work. Before, I had been frozen at my keyboard—I was working on the computer, frozen, not able to do anything. The recognition—"Oh, anger, this is anger, this is rage"—allowed me to go back to work.

But this practice, over the course of several months, began to show something remarkable. I began to notice that the mindfulness woke up into the pattern of anger earlier and earlier and earlier in the process. There was much more of a kind of normal anger arising, much less challenging to be with, the more I practiced with this. And then, really beginning to be able to see the arising of anger—huge insights into the mind that kind of actually wanted to get angry. That was an eye-opening thing, to see a thought arise in my mind and sense the inclination of the mind to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry.

And in that moment of seeing that, having spent all of those months paying attention to anger arising, being present for anger in the moment, having spent all of that time paying attention to anger, the mind knew deeply that anger was suffering, anger was dukkha. And so when the mind saw itself headed towards anger, when the mind realized it was headed in that direction, the mind simply said, "I don't think so. That way lies suffering. Let's not do that." And I didn't have to do that, actually. That happened because of the awareness. Wisdom made that choice. Wisdom made the choice to not follow that intention, to jump on that thought and think more thoughts to get angry.

So this is the power of being curious about where we get lost. Now also, in terms of where we get lost in states of mind, there's sometimes—and we've talked about this, so I'll just drop this in to complete this area.

There are times when we get lost in certain states of mind where the state of mind has a gravitational pull on us. Someone used the word quicksand. Others often use the phrase "going down the rabbit hole" of that mind state. It's like there's no traction for mindfulness. And so that's another way we get lost, that mindfulness gets lost.

It's really helpful to know for yourself when you're entering that gravitational pull—like the black hole of that state of mind. The notion of a black hole is that when light gets to a certain closeness to that gravitational pull, it won't be possible for light to escape. It's kind of like that with certain mind states: if we try to bring mindfulness to them, the mindfulness just gets sucked into the black hole.

Recognizing that—recognizing the rabbit hole, the quicksand of the state of mind—means knowing when it's appropriate and helpful to say "not now." Just not even try to be mindful of that. With myself, I would kind of bow to that state of mind and say, "I see you. I see you, and I can't be mindful of you right now. I'll be mindful of you when my mindfulness is stronger, but you do your thing and I'm just going to pay attention to my feet right now." So just to redirect the attention rather than get sucked into that gravitational pull.

Another very interesting place that we lose awareness—and I think Carol mentioned this the other night—is as practice deepens, when the mind begins to get more stable. There's a kind of cycle that happens on retreat. We have a period of time where the mindfulness seems pretty stable and clear, and then suddenly it's like—it's crazy. There's a purification cycle that can happen. After a period of time of having a more continuous mindfulness, with the mind being in a more open state, sometimes what happens is that something that's been repressed or pushed down by the normal habits and structures of our mind—it's kind of like that thing goes, "Oh good, there's space. Let me out." And anger erupts, or confusion erupts, or whatever. So there's that possibility that as the mind settles, we go through these purification cycles.

Another way the mind gets lost as it settles—and this happens more frequently than I had realized when I first began recognizing it as a pattern—is this: when I've had a period of time when the mindfulness is pretty stable, and then suddenly I start to notice a lot of wandering mind, I get interested in what's happening. What seems to occur sometimes with the settling of the mind and the continuity of mindfulness is that as mindfulness becomes more continuous, it begins to gravitate toward somewhat more subtle experience. With our usual agendas—paying attention to this, noticing that aspect of experience—sometimes we don't notice that mindfulness is actually attuning to a subtler level of experience. And in not noticing that, that's a doorway for the mind to start wandering.

An example from my practice: I was sitting the three-month course and the awareness had gotten pretty settled, pretty stable. I could be pretty clear with the breathing, pretty much for an entire sitting. It was just right there. And then one morning I sat down and the mind was just all over the place. I thought, "Wow, what happened to my mindfulness?" I had developed enough curiosity to rather than doubling down with "I'm going to just stay with the breath," I got curious about where the mind was leaving, where it was wandering.

What I discovered was that within one or two breaths, when I actually got much more attentive to what the mindfulness was connecting with, as I observed the in-breath and the out-breath, within the space of one or two breaths, the sensations of breath almost disappeared. And the mind wandered. That was where the mind was wandering. The sensations were getting so subtle that the mindfulness wasn't quite sure how to meet it. Or I wasn't quite sure how to meet it with mindfulness.

One time this was happening on a retreat in Burma. What I had decided on that retreat, because I wasn't as skilled or familiar with this practice, was to turn my attention to something more obvious—some more obvious experience, like the sensations of my butt—rather than seeing if I could be with the subtle experience. I reported this to Sayadaw U Pandita, and I said, "The sensations of the breath are getting so subtle that I turned my attention to something more obvious." He said, "You don't have to do that. Just notice the subtle breath." I thought, "Oh, that's possible?" And I began playing with that, almost using that as my note: "Subtle breath is happening. Subtle breath is happening." That allowed the mindfulness to begin to connect with the subtler level of experience.

The mind can also lose awareness in places or mind states that we think it's not possible to be mindful of. Sleepiness, for example. Dullness of mind. Spacing out. Spacing out seems to be the quintessential non-mindful activity, right? How would it be possible to be mindful of spacing out? One day I was noticing my mind spacing out over breakfast.

And rather than having — well, at first actually, it was kind of like, "Oh, spacing out, come back." You know, eating breakfast. Pay attention to the breakfast — lifting, tasting, chewing — and the mind would space out. Okay, come back. This bringing back, bringing back, bringing back. This notion of can't be mindful while spacing out, so bring it back to what you can be mindful of.

At some point, I began to just get curious about this. Where is the mind leaving breakfast? Where is it leaving the experience of eating breakfast? And what I experienced was that I was paying attention to the sensations of eating, and then I felt this letting go happen from the sensations of eating. What it felt like was that the mind kind of went and just hung out up here somewhere — above and to the right of my head — just in a zoned out experience. And to my surprise, I could be mindful of that.

Actually, what I recognized in that moment of being mindful of that spacing out was that the mind needed rest. It was tired, and it was taking its rest. Whether I had anything to say about it or not, it was going to take its rest. And when I allowed the mindfulness of it, I noticed it lasted for maybe thirty seconds, a minute. And then clarity of other experience began to arise.

Sometimes when the mind is leaving the present moment, it's letting go. What I understood in that experience was that I had been kind of harsh with myself — "stay here, stay here, stay here" — when the mind actually needed a rest. And I could allow it to do that mindfully. I think it actually allowed it to rest more deeply because of the mindfulness.

This points to beginning to recognize when mindfulness lets go of an object. On another retreat, I was exploring the breath, staying with the breath, and I began to get very attuned to the quality of the mindfulness of the breath. I could see the mindfulness of the breath pretty clearly, and I began to see the mind lose a little bit of interest in the breath. The awareness and the breath were like this — the mindfulness and the breath were touching, right near each other. And then I began to get the sense of what it meant for the mindfulness to lose a little interest, to go into that not-so-mindful-of-the-breath experience.

Initially I was recognizing that and coming back to the breath. Then it would leave the breath. Come back, leave, come back. At some point I got curious, because I realized I was aware while the mind was leaving the breath. I thought, well, where does it want to go? Let's see where it wants to go. And that was the beginning of a deepening into a whole different domain of experience. The mind moved into a very spacious, settled, quiet place — a place I hadn't actually touched into before.

So curiosity around mindfulness leaving the object — sometimes it takes us deeper. Sometimes it educates us in how our mind has strategies to deal with things like pain. In any case, making this kind of exploration begins to reveal new things about the mind.

This also points to the way we sometimes think the mind has to be in a particular state in order to meditate. I think this comes with some familiarity around what it feels like when it's clear. When mindfulness is really clear and we know just exactly moment by moment what's happening — that happens from time to time. Maybe it happens for a few moments, maybe a little bit longer. But we all enter into that place where it's so clear, and we think that's what we're going for. We try to find that. And we may find ourselves trying to put ourselves into certain states of mind in order to construct that. I certainly found myself doing that.

On one retreat I was practicing in Burma, doing walking meditation. As I ended my walking meditation, I was moving to the dorm where I was doing most of my meditation in my room. As I approached my dorm, I found myself trying to put my mind into the meditative state. Seeing that, actually watching the mind do that — well, wait a minute, what's wrong with this state? Awareness is present. Does it need to be any other way?

What I recognized somewhat later, after feeling that happen a few times—that kind of movement toward what I thought the meditative state was—was that it was actually a subtle repression of thought. I was moving into a state where there was a kind of holding thought at bay.

There's no need to actually put yourself into a certain state to meditate. If you are aware, meditation can unfold. Checking back to that early part of the talk: Can you recognize that you're aware? Am I aware? And what am I aware of?

When I find myself trying to change the state of my mind in order to meditate, I ask myself if it's necessary. It may be. There are times when the mind needs a little bit more of a container, more of a sense of directing the attention, choosing the object, being with the breath, stabilizing the attention. There are times when that's necessary. Other times, check in to see that awareness is present. What is awareness aware of? It may be pointing to something new or unfamiliar. So try mindfulness first before assuming that you can't necessarily be mindful in a particular mind state.

There are also different ways that the mind observes. Again, if we have some idea of how it's supposed to be when I'm mindful, we may miss the fact that there are actually quite a lot of different ways that the mind pays attention.

One distinction I'd like to point to that we've talked about a little bit is a distinction between mindfulness and attention. Attention is a factor of mind that is essentially choosing an object or connecting with an object—choosing an object, let's say. Attention chooses what to pay attention to. And attention is an interesting factor of mind in that it is amenable to agency, to conscious choice around what we pay attention to. We can say, "I'm going to pay attention to the breath right now." We can choose where to direct attention. But attention is also happening in every moment, whether we're choosing it or not. If we're not consciously choosing it, generally our conditioning is choosing what attention is landing on. And this is the exploration of open awareness: What is the mind choosing to pay attention to?

Sometimes people have the sense, before they get familiar with open awareness, that if I'm not choosing an object, I'm not meditating. But we can be mindful of experience when we're directing attention or when we are allowing what we attend to be chosen by the mind itself.

So that's one difference in how we can pay attention. The mind can choose an object—there can be a conscious engagement with choosing an object—or the mind can be in a more open, receptive space. In that open, receptive space, there are also different ways that the mind can pay attention. It can be broad and panoramic, kind of like a wide-angle lens. The visual field or the auditory field can be an interesting way into recognizing the different ways the mind can pay attention. We can pay attention in the visual field by not focusing on anything, but just taking in a wide panorama. Likewise, in the auditory field, we can not land or settle down on any one sound, but just take in the whole symphony of sounds. That broad awareness, taking in the breadth of experience, is one way that the mind can be clearly aware.

Or the mind might pick up on individual experience. It might notice this, and then that, and then that, and then that in that open awareness. It might very clearly land on a sound, a body sensation, an emotion, a thought, a body sensation, a breath—just very clearly, like popcorn almost, the mind picking up on individual experience. It might feel like the awareness is jumping from thing to thing. It might feel like it's flowing from experience to experience. So many different ways that mindfulness can function. And to have any idea that it's supposed to feel a particular way may obscure the understanding of something new. This is something I have really begun to appreciate.

Sometimes the awareness feels like we're separate from the object. There's a distance between the knowing, the observing, and the thing observed. And it can be very clear that the mind is balanced and at ease in that time. Other times it feels like the awareness and the thing observed are just right there together. It's like the awareness is rising up right into the middle of the experience. Both, in my experience, seem to have that quality of ease, relaxation.

I reported this to Sayadaw U Tejaniya at one point. I said, "I recognize that there are these different ways that the mind can feel at ease when observing. Sometimes it feels like there's a separation with the object."

And sometimes it feels like the mindfulness is right in the middle of the object. His response was that these are two different perspectives on the same experience. In one case, the awareness is actually highlighting the difference between the object and the knowing. In the other case, the awareness is highlighting the fact that they're happening together. Neither one is right, neither one is better. They are simply different ways that mindfulness can meet experience.

Notice how it is. Notice how it is for you.

That is my main hope from this exploration with you this evening—that you will get curious about your mind. Get curious about what it pays attention to, how it gets lost, what it feels like to be mindful. This exploration I sometimes call "Your Mind 101." Get familiar with what your mind does. Rather than having some agenda for it to be doing something, simply ask: what is it doing? Know the skillful means of when it's helpful to ground the attention, to choose an object.

This exploration also opens us into a doorway of some of the fundamental processes of the mind, of beginning to see how the mind does what it does. It starts to illuminate feeling, perception, consciousness, mental formation. It starts to illuminate the processes of the mind and supports our understanding of them as processes—not something I'm in control of, but something that can be known and understood.

And that wisdom brings freedom.

Let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 93

Mindfulness of Feeling: Vedanā

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers an in-depth exploration of vedanā—the feeling tone of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant that accompanies every moment of experience. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and the Greater Discourse on the Destruction of Craving (MN 38), she explains why the Buddha devoted an entire foundation of mindfulness to this often-overlooked aspect of experience.
>
> Fella illuminates how vedanā serves as the critical junction point in paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination) where, in the presence of ignorance, feeling leads to craving, clinging, and ultimately suffering. She distinguishes between worldly feelings (sāmisa vedanā) connected to sense pleasure and unworldly feelings (nirāmisa vedanā) arising from concentration and insight practice. Through vivid personal examples—from eating apples with bean dip to investigating aversion during walking meditation—she demonstrates how much of what we perceive as physical pleasure or pain is actually mediated through mental processes and conditioned associations.
> The talk offers practical guidance for investigating feeling tone in both formal practice and daily life, including how to work skillfully with neutral experience and recognize habitual reactive patterns. Fella emphasizes that the path to liberation lies not in avoiding certain feelings but in comprehending their impermanent, conditioned nature—abandoning what she calls 'the path of agreeing and disagreeing' with experience as it arises.

Tonight I'd like to explore in some depth the topic of vedanā, of exploring our experience through this perspective of pleasant, unpleasant, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

This experience of feeling tone is common to every experience that we have. Every single sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, every single arising in our mind comes with this flavor of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. It's a natural arising based on just contact with our sense experience. In fact, our brains seem designed to operate with this valence in a way to protect ourselves from the unpleasant and to guide us towards the pleasant.

It's an aspect of experience that can be easy to overlook. The actual experience of feeling tone can be easy to overlook because we're so busy responding to it. When something pleasant arises, we tend to automatically try to get more of it, to hold onto it.

When something unpleasant arises, we tend to automatically try to get rid of it. And so while we're very attuned to the experience of pleasant and unpleasant, we're not necessarily conscious of it. Our bodies, our minds tend to react automatically, but we don't really consciously experience this flavor.

The Buddha pointed to this flavor of experience as a very important aspect of our experience to pay attention to, just because it is the springboard from which we react. In some ways we think that we perhaps like certain things—like certain flavors, or like the way certain things look, or like certain configurations of experience. But the Buddha points to something deeper: it's not necessarily the things themselves. For instance, I like chocolate ice cream. To me, chocolate ice cream is pleasant. And the Buddha says that's what we actually like—the pleasant. Our minds think we like the chocolate ice cream.

So the Buddha, in pointing to this, says this is the place from which our reactivity springs. Bonnie mentioned the other night this process of dependent origination and the way feeling leads to reactivity, which is very clearly laid out in this teaching. We'll probably talk about this more at a later time, this cycle of dependent origination. Tonight I'm just going to briefly go over the way feeling is embedded into this cycle.

Basically, as I just mentioned, every single experience that we have, every contact with our sense bases creates, produces this feeling tone. When ignorance is present—the whole cycle of dependent origination begins with ignorance and is predicated on ignorance arising—when ignorance, that is the not-seeing of how suffering is created, when ignorance arises with feeling, it leads to craving. From craving follows clinging, from clinging follows becoming, identification, selfing, and then suffering.

The key point I see in how feeling leads to craving is that it's not an automatic leap from feeling to craving. It seems pretty automatic in a way. When we're just going through our lives, we kind of automatically move toward the pleasant, automatically move away from the unpleasant. But this is happening in concert with ignorance arising in the mind, with not being clearly aware, with not understanding how suffering arises in the mind. When we are not seeing clearly, feeling leads on to craving, leads on to clinging, leads on to suffering.

It's a very familiar process and seems automatic in a way, but it's not fixed. It's not hardwired. This is why the Buddha highlights the importance of noticing feeling tone. Because with mindfulness and wisdom brought to that very experience, it can short-circuit the typical movement towards craving and actually lead in another direction entirely—towards freedom, towards liberation.

This highlights the importance of meeting feeling with mindfulness and wisdom. The second foundation of mindfulness is devoted to feeling. Out of four foundations of mindfulness, one is the body, attending to the experience of the body. The second foundation is devoted to this exploration of pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. It was that important for the Buddha to highlight it in a foundation of mindfulness.

I'm going to read you the first part of this, which many of you are probably familiar with: "And how does one abide contemplating feelings as feelings? Here, when feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel an unpleasant feeling.' When feeling a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling.'"

It's really quite a simple instruction, although not necessarily so easy to effect, to accomplish. Feeling tone can be quite subtle. And when it's not subtle, as I said a few minutes ago, it's often overlooked because we're kind of automatically reacting to it. So it can take some time to begin to attune ourselves to this quality, to begin to get familiar with feeling tones.

This pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality to experience is associated both with our physical experience and our mental experience. Every contact with the body, with all the bodily senses—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—there's the aspect of feeling that goes along with that. Every contact with the mind, every thought, every emotion, every idea, belief, opinion comes with a feeling tone.

Even physical experience, physical pleasure and pain, is mediated through the mind.

So we have the feeling tones associated with physical sensation, and we have feeling tones associated with mental experiences—emotions, for example. Anger is usually experienced as unpleasant. Happiness is pleasant. Grief is unpleasant. Equanimity, perhaps, as neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Although there is one place where the Buddha describes whatever is not felt as painful as felt as pleasurable, and in some ways describes the experience of equanimity, the absence of pain, as being pleasurable.

Getting familiar with feeling tone is, I think, one of the helpful explorations of our practice. Because as we get familiar with it, we can bring mindfulness and wisdom to it, beginning to short-circuit the kind of automatic movement towards reactivity.

The easiest place, actually, I think, is in exploring our physical sensations, physical contact. The touch sense of our skin is very attuned to pleasant and unpleasant. The nerve endings are quite attuned to pleasant and unpleasant. And so it's an easy place to really begin to sense and feel into this quality. We can explore the unpleasantness of an itch, the unpleasantness of a painful experience in the body from sitting. We can explore the pleasant experience of the smoothness of breathing.

Just beginning to attune to that experience right now—what's the most obvious experience that you have? Can you tune in to whether it's pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant?

In daily activities, exploring this quality of pleasant and unpleasant can be really fun. I found exploring it in eating to be a really enjoyable experience. Just watching how the flow of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral happens, and how long it lasts. You put something in your mouth, like a bit of orange, and start chewing it. At the beginning, there's the burst of perhaps liquid and juice, tartness and sweetness coming together—this burst of sensation in your mouth.

For some of you, that may be pleasant. For some of you, it may be unpleasant. But just recognizing that experience, noticing: is it pleasant for you? Is it unpleasant for you? How long does the pleasant last? It's actually pretty short, how long it lasts.

You sit here before lunch just envisioning the pleasure of lunch. This is a way you can begin to explore the impact of thoughts and how they affect feeling tone. You've got the thought of lunch. It makes you feel good to think about lunch. You envision how great it's going to be to eat, and the anticipation feels pretty good. But when we actually get to lunch and start eating it, we get these little tiny bursts. If you're actually paying attention, the actual physical experience of pleasure comes and goes pretty rapidly.

I found in exploring feeling tone while eating that it was a very interesting place to see the conditioned nature of feeling. I was here, I think it was maybe my first or second three-month course, and for tea one evening they served apples and bean dip. That was our evening meal. It was just about this time of year, early October, late September. So the apples were quite hard and quite crispy. I put a bite of apple in my mouth and I was almost overwhelmed with pleasant. It was pretty easy for me to tell that it was pleasant—a pleasant physical experience in my mouth that also produced delight. It produced delight in my mind, which created a kind of lovely bubbly sense throughout the whole body. Pleasant bodily experience, pleasant mental experience, both coming together.

Then I put the bean dip in my mouth, and that had a completely different texture and flavor. It was interesting. I mean, it was pretty good. And then I put the apple in my mouth again, and that second bite of apple after the bean dip was even more pleasant.

Something about the conditions on the tongue of having had something kind of pungent and smooth contrasted with the tartness and juiciness of the apple really highlighted the pleasantness of the apple for me.

So I kind of got into this alternating—bean dip, apple—noticing the pleasantness, eating several bites of apple, noticing it wasn't quite as pleasant. Just playing with it, exploring the experience. And the more I ate, the more diminished the pleasure became. I found that interesting too, perhaps getting acclimated to the food. But it really showed me that the pleasantness wasn't inherent in the apple or even the combination of bean dip and apple. It came as a result of various conditions coming together. And by the end of the meal, it was just kind of an apple. Just a more ordinary experience.

The mental feeling tone, which I've talked about just briefly, comes with every experience of our mind: ideas, thoughts, emotions. Sadness, perhaps, is usually unpleasant. Happiness is pleasant. Ideas, thoughts, views, and opinions also have a feeling tone, although I think most thoughts—the bare thought—at least in my exploration of this, and I can't say it's exhaustive by any means, but the bare thought itself, just the arising of a thought, seems to be pretty neutral. It's the associations that follow, the ideas, the opinions, the associations that come with it that may be pleasant or unpleasant, that seem to create the feeling tone around a thought.

So you may think of a friend that you dearly love. The thought of the friend itself, the initial thought, may be kind of neutral. But then the mind starts contemplating associations, starts remembering things. Perhaps sometimes, depending on your mood, the things you remember may be the things that you enjoy about that person, and a pleasant feeling tone arises. Other times, depending on your mood or state of mind, you may be inclined to remember, "Oh, but they did that thing. Why did they do that thing?" And then an unpleasant feeling tone arises.

So often I think thoughts and feelings will produce a kind of emotion that then has a feeling tone to it. I actually think thoughts, ideas, and associations are a kind of leading cause of our perception of feeling in our physical experience. Much of what we think we experience as pleasant or unpleasant actually comes because we have ideas about it.

There's actually a teaching in the Abhidhamma that refers to this somewhat, especially for the non-physical senses. The Abhidhamma says that the physical sense of touch has pleasant, unpleasant quality to it. In fact, that's pretty much the way our nerves are designed—to produce pleasant and unpleasant in our physical contact.

But the Abhidhamma proposes, and I'm just going to put this out there because I don't know that I completely believe this, but I found it to be an interesting exploration in my own practice. The Abhidhamma proposes that the feeling tone of contact with eye, ear, nose, and tongue—the bare contact—is neutral. Any time we experience pleasant or unpleasant sight, sound, smell, or taste, it's because there's a mental association, a mental process going on.

Now again, I don't know that I completely believe this. In fact, the suttas talk about there being pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral associated with all of the senses. So it's interesting that the Abhidhamma brings this up. But in any case, I've explored it myself a little bit, and I found it to be a very interesting tool for exploring feeling tone.

For instance, one evening I was having difficulty sleeping. When I have difficulty sleeping—it's the middle of the night, I woke up with difficulty sleeping—I just got up to meditate. That's what I tend to do if I'm having insomnia in the middle of the night. So I got up to meditate. This was not on retreat; it was at home.

While I was sitting there meditating, I heard this very quiet tapping noise, just a subtle tapping that seemed to be coming from my wall somewhere. My experience was that the tapping noise was unpleasant. It would come and go, and I would notice the tapping and just recognize, "Well, unpleasant. Unpleasant sound is happening."

As I kept sitting, this tapping noise kept coming and going. At some point I recognized that when the tapping started, there was a contraction that happened in the body. The contraction was unpleasant. The physical contraction—tightening, tensing in the body—that was unpleasant also. So I was noticing that. I was noticing the unpleasantness in the body as well as what I perceived to be the unpleasantness in the sound.

At some point when the tapping came back, because it would disappear for a while and I would just be meditating in the quiet, I noticed a flash of fear—just the subtlest flash of fear as the tapping started. The fear was clearly unpleasant. And as I continued to observe, having seen the fear and the unpleasantness of the fear, I could see that the tapping sound was actually pretty neutral. I even experienced it as slightly pleasant, that quiet tapping sound.

So that was a real learning for me, to see how the fear had colored the perception of feeling. I think this happens to us a lot. I think it happens to us a lot that we're in a particular state of aversion, or as this example from the researcher said, expecting a strongly unpleasant feeling and being presented with a less unpleasant feeling, the mind interprets experience in a different way based on the climate of our mind, based on what we're expecting, what our predispositions are.

In terms of exploring feeling, it can be very interesting to actually begin to find or look: What is it that we're actually reacting to? What is it that we are feeling as unpleasant or pleasant? I think much of our reactivity actually leaps off of mental feeling rather than the actual physical feeling.

On another retreat I had a strong physical experience in the body which seemed to be pretty unpleasant. I was just exploring: What is the unpleasantness here? What is unpleasant about this strong experience in the body? And it came to me in a flash: It's out of control. I don't have control over this. That was really unpleasant—that idea, that mental climate of feeling out of control. And when I could see that that was what I was really reacting to, I could tell that the physical experience, well, there was a strong experience there, but it was more the mind that was being reacted to, not the body.

This kind of exploration can be very interesting. The Buddha pointed to this in his famous story of the dart. He talked about how when an ordinary person is struck by an unpleasant physical sensation, they beat their breasts, they bewail, they moan. "Why me? Why am I having this unpleasant experience?" Thus adding a mental unpleasant experience to the physical unpleasant experience. And I'd actually say multiplying the physical unpleasant experience by the mental unpleasant experience.

So it can be a very interesting exploration if there's a persistent reactivity present for you. Check in and see if you can find what is being reacted to. What is it that the mind is either moving towards or trying to get rid of?

On another retreat, it might have been my second three-month retreat, I was doing walking meditation. I think I told a walking meditation story here earlier—this is a different one. I experienced so much aversion while walking that I really got to explore my aversion. I seemed to be averse to how close people walked to me. I was averse to the fact that other people were even there. I was just averse. But I used it. I used it as exploration.

I was doing walking meditation in the walking room right behind us, and I was pretty comfortable with the walking. People were spaced comfortably apart. Then somebody else came in and slipped in right next to me. Immediate aversion. Okay, there's aversion. What is it? I asked myself, what is it that I'm finding unpleasant here?

I went through all the senses. The person didn't appear unpleasant in their body or face or clothes, so sight wasn't unpleasant. They didn't smell bad, so smell wasn't the problem. I wasn't bumping up against them, so it wasn't touch. Taste was out of the question. I went through all the physical senses, and it was like—it must be in the mind.

So I was just doing walking, curious about what was going on in the mind. I really hadn't seen anything; it wasn't obvious to me what I was reacting to. I was walking back and forth, thinking there must be some thought in there, something. And suddenly this thought popped into my mind: "He's weird."

Well, that's a thought. I still didn't quite get it. A little bit later, two or three passes later, I saw that my mind had constructed "he's weird" out of the fact that it was December, freezing cold, and the person had bare feet. Seeing that—just the ludicrousness of it—the whole unpleasantness, the whole aversion fell apart. And in the next pass of walking, spontaneous mettā was arising.

It can be fun to explore this.

It can also be really interesting to explore neutral. I've been talking mostly about pleasant and unpleasant. One thing I want to mention: after I gave the instructions on neutral, Joseph pointed me to something in the Abhidhamma where neutral experience is described as such a subtle experience that often it's recognized in terms of the absence of pleasant and the absence of unpleasant. In my own experience, I have seen the felt sense of neither pleasant nor unpleasant, but it is rare actually to see that. I thought it was interesting that in the Abhidhamma they point to neutral as being recognized by inference—recognized in the absence of pleasant and the absence of unpleasant.

But in any case, as the practice deepens, we may find ourselves in periods where there is more neutral experience. I think this happens because our mental reactivity diminishes. As I was saying, much of the pleasant and unpleasant quality in our physical realm comes because we have ideas, opinions, views, judgments—underlying tendencies towards aversion and greed. As those begin to fall away, our experience becomes much more neutral.

But we're not simply unreactive to neutral. We have our own ways of responding to it. On one retreat at Spirit Rock, I was in a place where neutral was coming up frequently, so I was getting to spend time just noting, noticing—neutral is happening, neutral experience is happening. And I noticed that quite often, actually, when neutral experience would arise, the mind would get a little dull or lose interest in the neutrality. It would slip off into indifference or boredom.

So I could see that this was one kind of tendency of mind when there was neutral experience—just to disconnect, just to lose touch with the neutrality.

Another very interesting response I saw to neutral was this: I had heard in dharma talks that when things get more settled, experience becomes more neutral. So when neutral arose, I thought, "Oh, neutral! Maybe something good is going to happen." There was a little bit of leaning in—"Neutral... is something good going to happen? Is something good going to happen?" And when nothing good happened, my mind produced one of its most habitual tendencies: "You're a failure. You've messed up. You're no good as a meditator."

Out of neutral experience, my mind created one of its most habitual patterns—this kind of self-negativity, a kind of self-flagellation. Out of neutral experience.

Fortunately, on this retreat, I was seeing it. I could watch it go there, and I could smile at it. "Oh, look at that. Look what the mind is doing. Out of nothing, out of neutral experience, it creates this pattern."

I think neutral experience, as the mind starts moving towards it, can be a place where some of our most habitual tendencies kick in. Watch for yourself. What happens when experience is neutral?

The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta continues. After going through the beginning—simply noticing pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant—it says: "When feeling a worldly pleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a worldly pleasant feeling.' When feeling a worldly unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a worldly unpleasant feeling.' When feeling a worldly neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a worldly neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling.' When feeling an unworldly pleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel an unworldly pleasant feeling.'" Likewise for unworldly unpleasant and unworldly neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

The Pali term translated as "worldly" is sāmisa, which basically means something like "of the flesh." Nirāmisa, unworldly, means "not of the flesh." The basic distinction being pointed to here, as I understand it, is that the worldly feelings are the normal everyday feelings that come with our senses—pleasant experience related to the taste of food, sights, physical contact—and also the pleasant or unpleasant experience related to ideas about those experiences. This worldly pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral arises at all six of the sense bases, not just the five physical ones. So it's not simply a mental-physical distinction being made here.

The unworldly feelings, sometimes translated as spiritual feelings—Bhikkhu Anālayo says these are feelings associated with the path of practice. The unworldly, spiritual, pleasant feelings are, for instance, the feelings that come as the mind gets concentrated. They're not dependent on things of the world. The unworldly pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences are described in one text as related not only to the deepening of the mind in concentration, but also to the feelings that arise based on insight.

In the deep recognition of the impermanent nature of experience, there can be different feelings associated with that. Sometimes impermanence is experienced with very clear seeing—clearly seeing the arising and passing of experience—and that can bring a sense of joy, felt as pleasant. That would be an unworldly pleasant feeling.

Sometimes the experience of clearly seeing the arising and passing lands in a way that's almost like "enough already." Is all of this impingement never going to stop? And it can generate a sense of longing for freedom. This longing is understood to be an unworldly unpleasant feeling—not an unwholesome unpleasant feeling, but a longing for liberation that comes as part of the path.

Sometimes the clear seeing of impermanence generates a feeling of balance of mind, of equanimity, experienced as neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Again, a sign of the path deepening.

Bhikkhu Anālayo says that this distinction between worldly feeling and unworldly feeling points to an ethical dimension of feeling, where "ethical" refers to what leads us towards freedom, what's connected with the path, and what is not. The worldly feelings are not connected with the path—they simply arise, they happen. The unworldly feelings arise connected with the deepening of practice.

And so they can serve as guidance for us on the path.

Now I want to insert something right here, before you start thinking it's bad to have the regular kind of feeling. The Satipatthana Sutta says that whatever feeling is arising, it can be known clearly and serve as a vehicle for liberation. I think this distinction between unworldly and worldly feeling is pointing to the way that with worldly feeling, we tend to be caught in a cycle around it.

As I was describing earlier, with our feelings of reactivity in the mind, we can tend to orient towards seeing things as pleasant or unpleasant. If we're experiencing aversion in the mind—maybe you've noticed this—many things your mind lands on tend to be unpleasant. Out of that ground of aversion grows unpleasant experience.

There's a teaching that we have deep in our psyche these underlying tendencies to greed, aversion, and delusion. Even if they're not active in a moment, they are still in the mind in a way, waiting to connect, waiting for delusion to bring them to the surface. We talked briefly about personality types—some of us tend towards an aversive personality type, some towards a greedy personality type, some towards more of a delusive personality type. For me, I clearly see how that underlying tendency, that orientation towards aversion that this mind has, informs how I meet the world.

At one point, in my early experiences of choiceless awareness, I was doing a guided meditation with my teacher. He was asking me to just notice every experience—just notice the next most obvious experience, whatever it was, as we've done with some of you in meetings. What's the most obvious thing right now? Right now? Right now? The thing that stood out for me most at the end of that very first exercise was this: he said, "Well, that's choiceless awareness." And I said, "How can it be choiceless? It was all unpleasant." In my mind, I thought if it was completely choiceless, it would be a mix. Well, it was choiceless in that the habit of mind was choosing—and choosing unpleasant because of that orientation, that underlying tendency.

So the worldly feelings tend to be connected to those underlying tendencies and also tend to cycle back to them. If an unpleasant experience arises and it's not seen, it will tend to lead to aversion. If a pleasant experience arises and it's not seen with wisdom, it will tend to lead to greed. The worldly feelings cycle around with these underlying tendencies, feeding them and being fed by them.

Regarding the unworldly feelings, there's one teaching where a nun is talking to her ex-husband, and he's asking her detailed questions about feeling. Let me read this section to you. He asks: Does the underlying tendency to greed have to be abandoned in regard to all pleasant feeling? Does the underlying tendency to aversion have to be abandoned in regard to all unpleasant feeling? Does the underlying tendency to ignorance have to be abandoned in regard to all neither painful nor pleasant feeling?

And she basically says no. She points to this: When secluded from sense pleasure, one enters a state of jhana. This is accompanied by pleasure, and one does not have to abandon lust—the tendency to lust does not underlie that pleasant experience. One considers, "When shall I enter and abide in that base that the noble ones now enter and abide in?" In one who generates a longing for supreme liberation, grief arises with that longing as a condition. With that, one abandons aversion, and the underlying tendency to aversion does not underlie that.

So again, this points to the distinction between worldly pleasant, worldly painful, worldly neither pleasant nor unpleasant, and unworldly. This ethical distinction points to something important the Buddha recognized in his own journey. An important discovery was that not all pleasure was to be avoided. Pleasure naturally arises as we deepen in the path.

Some ways that it arises: the happiness and joy of giving, the happiness and joy of ethical conduct. There is also a kind of happiness that comes in the very simple meeting of sense experience. Taking a walk and seeing the light on the leaves, and just experiencing the joy of really seeing that—that's a joy that comes with being present. It's connected with the path, that kind of joy. The pleasure of concentration, the pleasure of insight.

The Buddha suggests: Relying on this, abandon that. Relying on the pleasure of practice, relying on the pleasure of concentration and insight, abandon the pleasure of seeking happiness through sense pleasure. In a way, this is how the practice can unfold. Our minds, our whole organism, is seeking happiness.

We're oriented in our very organism to find well-being. Only our minds are so confused about how that well-being is to be found. They're deluded. The delusion, the ignorance that covers our minds has us believe that having the next hit of some pleasant sense experience is where happiness lies.

As we begin to see more clearly, the mind begins to understand that that happiness is all bound up with wanting and aversion, and that wanting and aversion is not the way towards well-being. It begins to understand the happiness of concentration, the happiness of insight, and through that can begin to let go of our dependence, our neediness for that kind of short-sighted happiness that we've lived so much of our lives running around trying to create. We begin to see that the pleasure of the sense realm pales in comparison to the pleasure that's available through letting go.

And it's helpful, of course, to recognize that we can cling to that unworldly pleasure too. We have a good sitting. It's just clear and settled and the mind is at ease. And then the next sitting it's, "How can I get that back? How can I get that back?" Steve Armstrong has a famous quote: "There's nothing like a good sit to ruin your day."

This usually happens after the fact. We have that sitting that's really clear, and then afterward we remember it. It's a thought arising in our mind: "That felt good. I remember that felt good." What we're actually clinging to is not the actual experience of that sitting, which is long gone, but the idea of it. I've seen myself cling to the idea of being able to tell somebody I had a good sitting, even though I wasn't having good sittings—I mean, what I was thinking of as good sittings. I was having some image of how great it was going to be when I could go into that interview room and describe all the impermanence I was seeing. I had no idea what I was looking for.

So what we are clinging to often around this unworldly pleasure is the idea, an identity that we've created around it—the identity rather than the experience itself.

The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta suggests simply: recognize feeling is happening. Recognize what kind of feeling is happening and that it is happening. It doesn't say one feels a worldly feeling and then tries to get rid of it. It says one feels the worldly feeling and knows they feel a worldly feeling. It is the comprehension of that which is the important part—understanding feeling's nature.

I'm going to read you two quotes to finish that both point to how this exploration of feeling leads right to freedom.

The first one is from the Greater Discourse on the Destruction of Craving, Majjhima 38, and it goes through all of the sense bases. I'll just read it with respect to the eye: "On seeing a form with the eye, one does not become greedy for pleasant forms or averse to disagreeable forms. One abides with mindfulness of the body established and with an immeasurable mind. Having abandoned the path of agreeing and disagreeing, one experiences whatever feeling arises, pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant, just as it is."

I like that: having abandoned the path of agreeing and disagreeing. It's a very simple thing that we do around feeling—having abandoned the path of agreeing and disagreeing. One experiences whatever feeling arises just as it is. One is not delighted or pleased with those feelings and one does not appropriate them. Interest in those feelings ceases.

Now my understanding about what that means—"interest in those feelings ceases"—is that the interest in having certain feelings, the interest in "more of that please, less of that please," that's the interest that ceases. My understanding is that the interest becomes connected with interest in the impermanent nature of the feeling. So it's not saying don't be interested in your experience. I think it's pointing to a specific thing here: interest in having certain feelings ceases. With the cessation of interest, clinging ceases.

And then there is the famous teaching, which I think has come up several times, that the path in a nutshell is: nothing is to be clung to. That encapsulates the teachings. In a passage from the Aṅguttara Nikāya, the Buddha elaborates on what this means.

He's talking to Moggallana: "Here, Moggallana, one has learnt thus: nothing is fit to be clung to. If one has learned that nothing is fit to be clung to, one directly knows everything—directly knows all experience. By directly knowing everything, one fully understands everything. When one fully understands everything, whatever feeling is experienced, be it pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant, in regard to those same feelings, one dwells contemplating impermanence, contemplating dispassion, contemplating cessation, contemplating relinquishment. When one thus abides contemplating impermanence, dispassion, cessation, and relinquishment in regard to those feelings, one does not cling to anything in the world. Without clinging, one is not agitated. Being unagitated, one personally obtains Nibbana, freedom."

Understanding feelings' nature brings wisdom into the unfolding flow of our experience, leading the typical pattern of dependent origination to fall apart—freedom from suffering.

CHAPTER 94

Dependent Origination (Paṭicca Samuppāda)

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella unpacks paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), which she describes as a detailed exposition of the second noble truth—the cause of suffering. She begins by referencing the Buddha's conversation with Ānanda from the suttas, where the Buddha cautioned against underestimating this teaching's profundity, stating that it is through not understanding dependent origination that beings remain "tangled like a ball of string."

Fella walks through all twelve links of the chain—from ignorance (avijjā) through mental formations (saṅkhāra), consciousness (viññāṇa), mentality-materiality (nāma-rūpa), the six sense bases (saḷāyatana), contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), clinging (upādāna), becoming (bhava), birth (jāti), and aging and death (jarā-maraṇa). Rather than treating this as an abstract doctrine about past and future lives, she emphasizes its moment-to-moment relevance, using the example of "wanting to be a good yogi" to illustrate how identities form, solidify, and inevitably lead to suffering when they crumble.

The talk offers profound encouragement through a teaching from the Sammādiṭṭhi Sutta (MN 9), which states that wherever mindfulness and wisdom arise in this chain, freedom is possible right there. Fella shares her own transformative experience with self-hatred, where simply noting "contact, unpleasant" allowed a deep insight to arise, revealing the pattern as an impersonal process rather than a fixed self. The essential message is that we need not wait for difficult experiences to end—wisdom and freedom can arise in the midst of any experience we're willing to meet with mindful awareness.

The subject of this talk is dependent origination, one of the most complex teachings of the Buddha. The Buddha himself spoke to this complexity in a conversation with Ananda. Ananda was expressing his joy, his love of the Dharma, and in particular the joy and beauty of dependent origination. He said, "It is wonderful, it is marvelous how profound this dependent origination is, how profound it appears. And yet it appears to me as clear as clear."

The Buddha responded, "Do not say that, Ananda. Do not say that. This dependent origination is profound and appears profound. It is through not understanding, not penetrating this doctrine, that this generation has come to be like a tangled ball of string, covered as with a blight, tangled like coarse grass, unable to pass beyond states of woe."

Clearly the Buddha both acknowledged its profundity, its complexity, and its importance to us. He states that it is by not understanding this that we are stuck. Several of you in our meetings have talked about feeling all tangled up, tangled like a ball of string—just as he mentioned to Ananda, it is through not understanding this that we are tangled.

I understand the teaching of dependent origination to be a detailed exposition of the second noble truth, the cause of suffering. It goes into depth about what the process is by which suffering is created in our minds. I understand dependent origination to be a teaching as opposed to a practice. We don't practice dependent origination, but it is very helpful, very practical for us to understand how this process works in our minds, how suffering is created. It is eminently practical because it is through this understanding that our mind begins to comprehend how to let go of the causes of suffering.

This chain of dependent origination is described as a set of causal links explaining what causes suffering to come into being. Through understanding the causes, we see that it is not lockstep, not automatic—it is causal. There is a way in which when the causes are reversed, the whole process of suffering simply falls apart.

I hope to make this talk both clear and practical. It is a teaching that for me has been very supportive in understanding my moment-to-moment experience, understanding how suffering is created. I hope to share with you some of the ways this has supported me in my understanding and exploration of experience.

As the Buddha pointed to, it is through not understanding this that we stay caught in suffering. In that very statement, to some extent the Buddha is equating an understanding of dependent origination with full liberation. So we are probably not going to get there tonight. But I find the teachings work in a really iterative way. We hear about something, we massage it, we reflect on it, we may begin to explore it in our direct experience, and then we hear about it again so that we deepen progressively in our understanding.

Some motivation perhaps for understanding this: the key motivation for me is that it describes so clearly how suffering comes to be and that it describes it as a causal process. Through understanding this teaching of dependent origination, we begin to see how experience conditions experience.

Dependent origination could be most succinctly summarized as the statement: when this is, that is. When this arises, that arises. When this ceases, that ceases.

We begin to understand our suffering as conditioned—not as either random or foreordained. This is helpful for us to notice and recognize. We begin to see our suffering as the unfolding of an impersonal set of conditionality rather than either something that somebody else is doing to us or something that we have absolute control over. We begin to see suffering as caused by this unfolding chain.

The links in this chain are all related to processes in the mind and body. This is another piece I think is really helpful in terms of this teaching: it points to the arising of suffering being related to processes in our own minds. The other piece is that largely the impulsion through this chain of conditions relates to choice, to intention in our mind.

Essentially, we could say that when we are not mindful, when we are not present, when wisdom is not operating with mindfulness, our habits and conditioning are making our choices for us. And those choices tend to lead us down the garden path of suffering. When mindfulness arises, when wisdom arises, when we see it happening, the choice can be made to bring mindfulness and wisdom to our experience, which tends to lead us towards freedom, towards happiness, away from this chain, out of this chain.

So the other piece around this chain is that it begins to point for us to ways to redirect, to let go.

There are twelve links in this chain, and we will talk about all of them.

Let me name them all right now, put them out there, and then go back through them.

The chain begins, classically, with ignorance. With ignorance as condition, mental formations come to be. With mental formations as condition, consciousness comes to be. With consciousness as condition, mentality-materiality—mental and physical processes—come to be. With mental and physical processes as condition, the six sense bases come to be. With the six sense bases as condition, contact. With contact as condition, feeling. With feeling as condition, craving. With craving as condition, clinging. With clinging as condition, becoming. With becoming as condition, birth. With birth as condition, old age and death—or as the Buddha puts it, the entire mass of suffering comes to be.

One piece to point to here: the chain starts with ignorance and moves through to suffering in those twelve links. Yet it is understood that suffering, that last link of the chain, the arising of the mass of suffering, tends to feed back into ignorance, and thus the cycle perpetuates itself. So it is not simply a one-way chain. It is a cycle—a cycle of dependent origination.

Classical teachings from the commentaries break down this cycle into three stages, three parts essentially, talking about a former life, the present life, and a future life. They assign specific links to these various lives, basically saying that the ignorance and mental formations from our previous life will feed forward into this life and influence our experience here. The links of the chain in this life are laid out from consciousness through mentality-materiality, the six sense bases, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, and becoming. These are discussed in terms of suffering in this life, and that's a place where we can really see this process at work.

The understanding is that the ignorance and mental formations from a previous life have the capacity, the property, the forward motion essentially, to land and re-arise. The momentum of those can re-arise in this life and influence how we are here and now. Likewise, how we are in this life is said to feed forward into a next life—birth, aging, and death in the next life. The literal phrasing of the links supports this understanding. In particular, the phrasing around birth is understood to mean the literal birth of a being, so it seems fairly clear that it's talking about moving from one life into another.

There is also an understanding in the Pali Canon that this chain of dependent origination refers to the moment-to-moment arising of suffering—how in the present moment, ignorance feeds into our consciousness, conditions our consciousness, and impels us forward in this cycle. It seems pretty clear when we actually look into our experience that it's not just about previous lives. Whether or not you have a sense of previous lives, it seems pretty clear that ignorance in this life is influencing us in this life. And so we can explore the entirety of this chain here and now, which is how I plan to explore it this evening.

This is my own personal way of resonating most with this teaching. I have no personal experience or sense of former lives, so I can't connect that to my direct experience. Yet I think one of the powers of that teaching about a former life influencing this life is that we see how ignorance can go underground and operate in funny ways. You may have some kind of intention that was formed a long time ago, and suddenly that intention bears fruit in this moment. You might see this as the arising of a thought from long ago—an old habit or an old pattern produces a thought here and now, and then there's reactivity here and now. Part of what this points to is how conditioning works across time. Thanissaro Bhikkhu sometimes talks about the way this conditioning operates. We often think of conditioning as one moment to the next to the next. He indicates that the conditioning can also come in over time.

In this talk, I am going to mostly look at it from the perspective of this life. From this perspective, the term "birth" would refer to the arising of a sense of self, taking birth into an identity. We feel this. We feel this birth into "I am the one who has to be right," or "I am the one who owns this or controls this." There's a palpable sense of something arising into being, a sense of being born into an identity. And the term "aging and death" refers to the fading and passing away of all experience, essentially—that everything that arises falls apart.

I'd like to explore the chain in some depth here with you, and I'm going to start in a somewhat unconventional way.

As I said, the chain begins with ignorance, but I'm going to start in a somewhat unconventional way—right in the middle of the chain. I'm going to start where we are, with our senses.

One of the middle links of the chain is our sense bases. Let's start there. That's a pretty easy place to connect with our experience. We have these sense bases: eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body and skin, and our mind. Based on our sense bases, and because consciousness is present, we experience contact. Consciousness has to be present for us to experience contact, of course. If consciousness is not present—if we're lying there knocked out in surgery—we're not going to experience contact. So consciousness has to be present and the senses operating. Based on that, contact will happen. We will experience sight, sound, smells, taste, touch, and experiences in the mind: thoughts, emotions, moods.

Every single one of those sense impressions has a feeling tone to it. This is the next link. So we have the sense bases conditioning contact. Now we have contact conditioning feeling. Every contact has a feeling tone to it. Just the arising of that very simple aspect of whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—conditioned on contact.

Based on that feeling tone, craving tends to arise. In a very normal way, if something is pleasant, we like it and want it. If something is unpleasant, we don't like it and want to push it away. When things are neutral, sometimes we just don't even notice them. So in a very natural way, almost habitual, when feeling arises we respond by moving towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant. We want the pleasant; we don't want the unpleasant. This is craving. This is craving at work.

Usually when that craving begins, we automatically begin to act on it. It's almost hard not to once craving is set in motion—unless we're mindful. When we're mindful, we can explore craving. We can look at the feeling of wanting, feel that magnetic pull towards some experience, and simply observe it. Usually, in much of our life—and certainly before we began practicing—that feeling of wanting would quite normally lead to clinging: taking action to get the thing, essentially following through on the craving.

Bhikkhu Bodhi gives a beautiful analogy to show the gradation between craving and clinging. He says that craving is like a thief in a house who is reaching out to take something. Clinging is when the thief has picked it up. It's that kind of gradation.

Once an object is clung to, once we've got it in our possession in some way, shape, or form, the next link arises: clinging conditions becoming. The clearest description of becoming I've heard comes from Thanissaro Bhikkhu. He talks about becoming as the arising of intentions and actions that rally in the service of that clinging. The clinging has happened, and once the object is clung to, our intentions and motivations begin to congeal around how to serve that clinging. How do I keep this thing? How do I control this thing? How do I produce this thing? How do I maintain this thing? A whole host of intentions arise around that clinging. This is becoming.

We like becoming. Becoming actually feels really good. It's that moment when you have the sense of, "Oh yeah, I'm in charge. I can do this. I can accomplish this. I can figure this out. I know how to make myself happy."

That's becoming. Following on from becoming is birth, which is actually a taking of identity, a real solidifying, a kind of solidification of that identity. I look at becoming and birth this way: becoming is like the intention towards an identity, and birth is the identity itself.

Following on from birth, the Buddha actually says that suffering becomes inevitable. We've taken birth, and inevitably either the thing that we are trying to control or fix or hold onto is going to disintegrate and go away, or something is going to happen to undermine it. If we've taken birth into an identity like "I'm the one who is always right," well, something will come along to prove, of course, that we're not always right, and our identity crumbles. The identity may crumble. An actual possession or ownership of something may be taken away from us. Once we've moved into birth, the Buddha says, suffering will be inevitable.

I want to go back and touch into something around becoming being pleasant. The pleasantness of becoming is one way in which the cycle reinforces itself. This chain of dependent origination is sometimes called the wheel of becoming, and the pleasantness of becoming has a potency to it for us.

If we look at the links of the chain starting from feeling, we've felt something and wanted to get something, and that moves us into craving. When we think about or feel into the craving, we see that craving is actually an unpleasant experience. Often that unpleasantness is masked because we're focused outward on the thing and imagining in our minds how great it's going to be when we get it. We're not really noticing the suffering, the unpleasant quality of the wanting itself. Wanting has automatically—when we want something—a sense of lack. Something feels off. So wanting is unpleasant.

When we move to becoming and we have that sense of being in control, partly there's the appreciation of having gotten that thing now. The wanting has produced the result: we've gotten what we wanted. So we get a little hit of pleasantness from having gotten what we wanted. And not only that, we get the hit of the pleasantness of becoming, which I think largely has to do with the fact that it feels like we have control over our wanting, that we can affect and accomplish and get what we want.

A large part of the happiness that arises when we get what we want is actually the fact that the suffering goes away. This, I think, is a piece of why becoming feels good to us.

As we're going along in this cycle, we take birth, we suffer over the loss of something or the loss of an identity. And we think back, "Well, what was the last time I felt really good? Oh, it's when I had that control. That's when I felt really good." It kind of propels us back through the cycle. So to some extent, the pleasantness of becoming is one of the propulsions through this cycle.

I want to give an example of this part of the chain—just to talk about how this works in our experience. I'd like to do this through a more complicated example in a way. It's about a state of being rather than the simplicity of just something pleasant that we like and want to hold onto. I would like to explore how this works because many of the ways we suffer have to do with identities that we have.

Take, for instance, wanting to be a good yogi. We have this sense of what happens in our mind. Perhaps an idea comes into our mind—maybe this wanting to be a good yogi is born by thinking about describing some insight to a teacher or something like that. This contact with this idea. A thought arises in the mind about describing some insight to a teacher, and in that fantasy, that's a pleasant fantasy perhaps. You're getting some kind of affirmation from the teacher in the fantasy. So there's pleasure in that fantasy. The mind has created this fantasy and is delighting in it.

Then there's the desire—because of that pleasant feeling, there's a desire to have that fantasy become a reality. That's the wanting, that's the craving. The clinging is about a fixed attitude that being a good yogi is actually an important thing. We've created this idea, "Oh, I want to be a good yogi." So again, that movement from craving to clinging is a gradation. I want to be a good yogi, and that's really important. That's the craving and clinging pieces of it.

And then the becoming is all of the intentions that arrive to try to put that clinging into effect. You may have some ideas, some intentions around how you need to behave to be a good yogi. What does it mean? How do you need to pay attention? The mind gathers itself around what it thinks would be the intentions, the actions to create that into a reality. Perhaps sitting long hours in the hall, or moving really slowly—whatever it is that you've got, thinking about what it might be to be a good yogi.

So for simplicity, just assume that for at least a few moments you've gotten the sense that you are a good yogi. Birth. There's a distinct feeling: "Yes, I'm a good yogi." I'm familiar with this, as well as the opposite, which I'm getting ready to describe. The sense, for just a few moments: "Ah, I can do this. I am a good yogi. I know how to practice." There's that birth, that taking birth into "this is what I am."

In that birth, there tends to be an augmentation of the distinction between self and other. If I'm a good yogi, it often means there's some kind of comparison going on. It probably means I'm a better yogi than somebody else. There's that augmentation of self-other that happens in this process of birth, this taking birth into an identity.

The aging and death of this could happen in so many ways. In my own experience, often the aging and death of the sense of being a good yogi was a crash and burn. There would be something that would prove either that somebody else was a better yogi than I was, or that I would suddenly sit down and my mind didn't have control—I couldn't just choose to say "stay with the breath" and have it stay with the breath.

Sometimes these identities get born when conditions come together and we sit down and suddenly the breath is right there, there's an ease with it, and it's pretty easy to stay stable with the breath. All of this is conditions coming together to make this happen, and then we take ownership of it. "I did that. I'm making that happen." We take birth into that identity, and then two or three sittings later, we discover we can't do that. Actually, we can't control the mind at all—it's all over the place. In a way, what happens in that moment is that we take birth into "I'm a bad yogi." The ending of one identity, the arising of another.

Suffering happens here. The actual crash and burn of the good yogi is suffering. Sometimes we can have a sense of fear that arises around identities—a sense of somehow needing to continually prove that we're a good yogi, continually pushing ourselves harder and harder, suffering in that. Suffering both from the fear of "what happens if I can't keep this up?" I remember sitting down on some occasions and the mind would be seeing things changing so rapidly. Then I'd sit down the next sitting and think, "I can't do that. How do I do that?" A lot of fear came up because I couldn't figure out how to do what the mind had been doing before.

We suffer around these identities. This is the process, how identities lead us into suffering.

So that gives you a little bit of a flavor for some of the basic processes at work in dependent origination. Now I want to come back to the early links in the chain, the ones I haven't talked about yet.

This chain, as I said earlier, describes a cyclic pattern. The arising of suffering conditions the arising of ignorance. The Buddha said that suffering will condition or lead to bewilderment or search. Very often it leads to confusion, bewilderment. "Why me? Why is this happening to me? How do I fix this? How do I change this?"

So suffering, when not understood, leads to ignorance—the perpetuation of this cycle. And in fact, the main definition of ignorance is understood as not understanding suffering. The Buddha's definition of ignorance in this context is not about not understanding some random set of facts; it's about not understanding suffering. He says, "Not knowing about suffering, not knowing about the origin of suffering, not knowing about the cessation of suffering, not knowing about the way leading to the cessation of suffering—this is called ignorance."

So the basic condition for suffering to lead to ignorance is for suffering to be not understood. This is the usual way that so much of our lives unfold. In ignorance, we think we know what will lead to happiness. We think that getting what we want will lead to happiness. And this is a form of delusion—this belief that if I just get what I want, then I'll be happy. Well, we see how long that lasts, right? It maybe lasts for a few moments, a feeling of happiness. And when that dissipates, it's like, "Well, where's the next one? How can I get the next one?"

Acting on ignorance, not understanding suffering, and acting on the ignorance further deepens this cycle of suffering. If suffering is met with wisdom—with mindfulness and wisdom—it begins to lead in another direction. And this is the first noble truth. The Buddha suggested: understand suffering. So the first noble truth is essentially the practice that supports one way to get out of this cycle of suffering. Understand it—not intellectually, but how is it created? What is the process of suffering?

We're doing this. This is what we're encouraging you to do. You observe in your experience the arising of anger. You feel it in the body. You see how it shifts and changes. You notice there are thoughts; perhaps you can let the thoughts go and just stay with the experience. And you notice that the experience dissipates. We see how thoughts condition our body, how our body conditions thoughts. We see this back and forth process. In all of the work that we're doing here, we are exploring this.

With ignorance as a condition, the next link is mental formations. With ignorance as a condition, mental formations come to be. Based on ignorant patterns in our mind, based on not understanding suffering, we make decisions, we choose things, we decide things based on this misinformed idea that getting what we want will make us happy. Out of ignorance, we act in a very short-sighted way. Our minds are pretty short-sighted about happiness. It's like, "Yeah, just the next thing. If I can get that, that'll make me happy." And then when we see that that happiness is kind of short-lived, it's like, "Well, what's the next thing? What's the next thing I can get?"

We may not actually believe that having what we want will be ultimate happiness, but we do believe that we should be able to chain together a whole bunch of those moments and have no periods of not having what we want in there at all. And we think that would be happiness. There's a way in which our whole habits and patterns and choices are coming out of this misunderstanding.

Out of ignorance, we usually take the most obvious choice to get what we want, get rid of what we don't want. And habits and patterns form around this. These habits and patterns are mental formations conditioned on ignorance. We think we're acting to alleviate or end our dissatisfaction by getting what we want, but we're actually cementing—re-cementing—this process of wanting, getting, having, identifying, crash and burn. "When was the last time I was happy? When I had what I want. Let me find something to want." And we go through again.

So these are the mental formations conditioned on ignorance—the mental formations to choose to act based on this deluded understanding about happiness, about how happiness comes to be.

The next link: with mental formation as a condition, consciousness comes to be. Based on our views, our beliefs about where happiness comes to be, our mind picks certain things out of the environment and doesn't pick other things out of the environment.

This is consciousness arising based on our proclivities, our mental proclivities. We've talked about this in terms of filters, for instance. If anger is arising, we may, seeing through that filter of anger, pick out of the environment things that confirm why we should be angry. We selectively—it's not we doing it, it's not intentional in a way—it's the process. It's the process of our mind. There's that filter of anger, and the filter itself filters certain things in and not other things. So we see certain things, we hear certain things; we don't see, we don't hear other things.

This is a very powerful process in our minds, this filtering mechanism, how this works in our mind. It seems pretty potent and deeply embedded. It is possible to see through it, but I'd like to tell you a story about just how deeply embedded it is, because it's quite amazing.

Some of you may have heard about this study. It's on a factor of mind called selective attention—I think that's what it's called—something like that in psychology. They were researching selective attention, how the mind chooses to pay attention to things and not pay attention to other things. In this study, they gave a group of people a task, a pretty simple task: watch this video and count the number of times a basketball passes between people in a white shirt. So you watch this video. People are passing a basketball around, and you're counting the number of times people are passing the basketball. Simple agenda. People did it. By and large, people could answer the question: this is how many times the basketball passed between people in the white shirt.

A few people afterwards would say something like, "Was there like a gorilla in that video?" And there indeed had been—a guy in a gorilla suit that walked through the middle of the basketball game and actually stood there, really obviously stood there, and then walked off. The vast majority of people did not see the gorilla.

Now, that's one thing, right? The fact that, wow, that agenda—there was an agenda in the mind, do this task. That agenda kind of collapsed down the awareness such that the gorilla was not seen. That's one thing to recognize: okay, didn't see that. But the scary part—the scary part about the way this works—is that when people were shown the video, most of them said, "That has to be a different video. I would have seen the gorilla." The scary part is that we believe our senses to be an accurate, camera-like recording of experience. And it is just not that way.

Consciousness is influenced by mental formations. In this case, the mental formation of an agenda. This happens all the time. We really cannot say that we are seeing everything. Consciousness is present in some experiences, not in others. Mental formations condition consciousness.

With consciousness as a condition, mental and physical processes come to be. This is mentality-materiality. Based on the state of our consciousness, the state of our mind, this influences the other processes of our mind and body. Essentially, mentality-materiality—a simple definition—if we think about the five aggregates that Guy talked about the other night, consciousness is one of the five aggregates. And here we have consciousness conditioning mentality-materiality. Mentality-materiality is understood to be the other four of the aggregates. That's one way of understanding mentality-materiality: mind and body processes.

So consciousness conditions, the state of our consciousness conditions the mind and body processes. Having the mental formations influence our consciousness—seeing the gorilla or not seeing the gorilla—this informs the other mind and body processes. For instance, if anger is present in the mind, influencing how we perceive and feel experience, experience may tend to be unpleasant. We may tend to perceive things that confirm the anger, confirm our rightness in a situation. Our body may be impacted. There may be a kind of contracted expression on our face, or tightness, tension inside the body as a result of this anger.

So here we are, back at the place where we began—with mentality-materiality, and mentality-materiality influencing our sense bases. We're back where we began: eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body, mind, taking in experience.

And yet what we see now, coming back through it in this cycle, is quite different from when we started. Perhaps when we began, it sounded just like, "Well, of course we're taking things in." But now you see that coming back to this place, we are not taking things in in a neutral way. They're already coming in with a spin. We may not even be seeing certain things. Agendas may be pulling certain things out of the environment while leaving other things unnoticed.

The whole process tends to reinforce our attitudes, our beliefs, our views, because our filters will tend to confirm our views. And so this cycle reinforces itself.

That sounds perhaps rather hopeless. But fortunately, it's not hopeless. Because this chain describes conditionality rather than determinism, it's possible that with changed conditions, the cycle can be broken. The main supports for altering the habitual way this cycle unfolds are mindfulness, wisdom, concentration, and energy.

There's a beautiful teaching around dependent origination—one of my favorite teachings. It's found in the Majjhima Nikaya in a sutta called "Right View." In this sutta, the Buddha points to the possibility that wherever mindfulness and wisdom come into being, right there, we can have freedom.

For every single link of the chain of dependent origination, he says—and I'll read just one example, for clinging: "When one has understood clinging, the origin of clinging, the cessation of clinging, and the way leading to the cessation of clinging, one here and now makes an end of suffering."

Now you may notice that pattern is familiar. It's repeated: "When one has understood feeling, the origin of feeling, the cessation of feeling, and the way leading to the cessation of feeling, one here and now makes an end to suffering. When one understands ignorance, the origin of ignorance," and so on.

This pattern is repeated for every single link in this chain. No matter where you are, no matter where you wake up, bringing the practice of mindfulness to bear on whatever it is you wake up to, the possibility of freedom is right there.

It's often taught that there are weak links in this chain. People often say, "I have to break the chain of dependent origination at feeling. I have to see the feeling and then not have it lead to craving." But this teaching points to something more expansive: wherever you wake up, if you wake up in the midst of rage—that's a mental formation—the Buddha says you can understand the origin of mental formation. Understand the mental formation, the origin of mental formation, the cessation of mental formation, the path leading to cessation of mental formation, and here and now make an end to suffering.

This framing—essentially using the understanding of the Four Noble Truths with each link of the chain—connects to what I said earlier, that the Four Noble Truths are basically the opposite of ignorance. To me, what this sutta is saying is that ignorance is what we are working with in this chain. Ignorance is where we can get some traction.

We get traction by bringing mindfulness and wisdom to our experience—mindfulness and the understanding that happiness doesn't come from getting what I want. Happiness comes from letting go; the letting go is where happiness can be found. That understanding begins to undermine the ignorance present in any moment of experience.

It doesn't matter where you wake up. Mindfulness and wisdom can free us in this very moment.

Now, we may not necessarily experience this as full freedom in that moment. We may feel it as a shift, a sense of a little bit of letting go. Instead of "Wow, I'm really angry," there's "Oh, it's just anger arising." Just anger. That shift allows us to be more at ease with experience. That may be how wisdom is being experienced in the moment—and that is undermining ignorance in that moment.

So anywhere that we wake up, any experience we wake up to can be the place of freedom.

This gives me a lot of inspiration, a lot of confidence, faith, and joy actually. At certain points in my practice, I had this idea: "Okay, this is my self-hatred retreat. I guess I get to look at self-hatred."

And at some point, when the self-hatred is done, then I'll get to work with insight." That kind of belief was operating.

But being willing to meet the pattern of self-hatred, being willing to watch it in just this very way—self-hatred is arising—and in fact, using the links of contact and feeling. In this exploration of self-hatred, I had just heard one evening... I had been working with self-hatred for weeks on this particular retreat, and one evening Joseph did a question and answer session. He said, "If something's particularly sticky, try meeting it with a double note: contact when the experience hits, and then the feeling tone."

So this is highlighting those two links—contact and feeling. The contact of the experience of self-hatred arising. I was just noticing, okay, here's self-hatred. The movement of self-hatred, the movement of thought towards "you're no good, you're a failure"—being aware: oh, contact. And then noticing the unpleasantness. Contact, unpleasant. Contact, unpleasant.

And in a moment, in a split second, seeing that arising of self-hatred is just an arising at a very fundamental level. Seeing it just as some pattern arising in the mind. It's like watching some tree grow—there's the tree of self-hatred. Just seeing it in a completely impersonal way. In a split second, the pattern fell apart. And replacing that sense of self-hatred was bliss.

Then the next moment was something along the lines of, "Never again will I feel self-hatred." And the next moment was a little more wisdom. It's like, no, this is just this moment. And in that moment, there was just this kind of balance or equanimity of: it's like this right now.

That particular recognition into self-hatred actually was very potent in my life, in that it seemed to have the power to really cut through the delusion of that pattern. That pattern was seen for being just a self-creation. The pattern of self-hatred was seen as a fake. Essentially, my understanding is that it cut the belief in that pattern.

So right in the midst of being willing to be present for self-hatred, a very deep insight arose. Anything, anytime, anywhere—it's possible. If you're having a dukkha retreat, wisdom can arise in the midst of dukkha. Freedom in the midst of dukkha. It's not necessary to have it all end. That dukkha doesn't have to all go away before freedom, before the sense of understanding arises. Right in the midst of your experience, whatever is happening—meet it.

Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 95

The Path Reflects the Goal

In this profound talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella examines the Four Noble Truths as the Buddha's central teaching on dukkha—suffering, dissatisfaction, and struggle—and its cessation. She illuminates how the first two Noble Truths describe our usual entanglement in the cycle of suffering and craving, while the third and fourth proclaim the possibility of freedom through the Eightfold Path.

Fella offers a particularly illuminating perspective on the tasks associated with each Noble Truth: suffering is to be understood, craving is to be abandoned, cessation is to be realized, and the path is to be cultivated. She demonstrates how these tasks unfold sequentially—when suffering is fully understood through mindfulness and wisdom, craving naturally falls away, revealing the cessation of suffering. Drawing on Stephen Batchelor's insights and canonical sources, she explores the intriguing question of what it means for path cultivation to be the culmination of the Four Noble Truths.

The talk takes a beautiful turn when Fella shares passages from the Aṭṭhakavagga, one of the earliest Buddhist texts, which describes the awakened person in remarkably accessible, this-worldly terms—not frightened, not angered, not boastful, finding solitude amidst sense contacts. She reveals that the training instructions mirror this description of freedom, suggesting that the path reflects the goal. The Eightfold Path is not merely a set of practices but a description of how a noble life is naturally lived, both as we cultivate freedom and as we embody it.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the path and frame it within the context of the Four Noble Truths.

The Four Noble Truths are a central teaching that the Buddha offered. I think of it as really encapsulating the wisdom, the understanding that he came to on the night of his awakening. As he said, "It is only suffering that I teach and its end. Both formerly and now, it is only suffering I teach and its end."

It's no real surprise that because this question of suffering was what motivated the Buddha on his search, the framing of one of his core teachings is really centered around dukkha, this question of dukkha. Dukkha, of course, is usually translated as suffering, but has such a broader and deeper connotation than that word usually conveys to us. Some other translations help convey the depth and breadth of its meaning: dissatisfaction, unease, stress, struggle. Dukkha comprises the subtlest little sense that something's off, as well as the biggest struggles of our lives.

The Buddha looked out at the world and saw, with a kind of poignant seeing, that we are all struggling, and within that struggle, the very things we do to try to release ourselves from it just keep us enmeshed in it.

And so his framing of the Four Noble Truths—the truth of suffering, the truth of the cause of suffering, the truth of the end of suffering, and the truth of the path leading to the end of suffering—frames his understanding both of the struggle we get caught in and the way out. The first two Noble Truths I think of as our usual relationship with the world, the struggle, the cycle of suffering and craving. The first noble truth is the truth of suffering. The second noble truth is the truth of the cause of suffering, the craving. We usually live our lives in this cycle, the cycle of dependent origination, how suffering is created in our experience. Not the struggle of the pain of our circumstances, but the struggle of our reactivity to those circumstances—essentially what we're adding to our circumstances. This is what the Buddha saw that we could be free of: what we add to our situation.

So the first two noble truths really describe how we are usually caught in our lives. We've talked about this over and over, so I'm not going to talk about it much right now.

The third and fourth noble truths really proclaim the possibility of freedom: the truth of the end of suffering, and the truth of the path leading to the ending of suffering. First he proclaims the possibility of freedom, of the ending of suffering, the ending of our inner holding, our inner struggle. Then he offers the path leading to that ending. The practice is the Eightfold Path, the practices that we engage with to lead us to the end of suffering.

The Four Noble Truths are framed in terms of cause and effect, and this is a central aspect of the wisdom that the Buddha offers us. There is a cause to suffering: the craving in our minds, wanting things to be other than they are. Again, that wanting things to be other than they are is not the same as the wish to rid the world of injustice. But it is the inner railing, the inner sense that the mind cannot be at ease unless the world is different.

This is what the Buddha saw. He saw it's possible for the mind to be at ease even while the world is caught in its worldly winds. This blending between the ultimate and relative takes us to the place where we wish to alleviate suffering, wish to extend ourselves in the relative world to make change, and yet not be caught up in anger, aversion, greed, and delusion while we do that.

The possibility of that freedom is proclaimed in the second half of the Four Noble Truths. The Fourth Noble Truth, the truth of the path leading to the end of suffering, is the cause of freedom from suffering. In this framing, the Second Noble Truth identifies craving as the cause of our suffering. The way out is understood to be following the path, engaging with the practices of the Eightfold Path, which will lead us, step by step, to the ending of suffering.

The Buddha used, in a way, the medical model of his day in framing the Four Noble Truths. The first thing you state is what the illness is, what's the disease. The illness is suffering. Then you state the cause: what is the cause of that illness? The craving is the cause. And what's the prognosis? Is it possible to have a cure? Is it possible to be cured of this illness? He says emphatically, yes, it is possible to be cured of this illness. The Eightfold Path is the prescription, the medicine that we take, the activities that we do to free ourselves, to cure ourselves of this illness.

We are such a medical culture—we want pills for everything. Certainly if somebody came along and said, "Here's a pill, take this pill, you'll be done with suffering," most of us would do it. The Buddha is offering us the tools to do this, to free ourselves. And yet it is very difficult for us to pick up this path.

We do try. We let go. We try again. We let go.

So the path—the Eightfold Path—I'd just like to review it in very broad strokes: what this path is, this cure that the Buddha offers us, this prescription. The factors of the Eightfold Path are wise understanding, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. Really, they are all practices. Every one of them is an activity that we can engage in, and they work together.

I like the name "Eightfold Path" because it makes me think about folding. Imagine putting all the names of the Eightfold Path on a piece of paper and folding it all up—they all touch each other. If you're cultivating one aspect of the Eightfold Path, you're probably cultivating two or three of the others at the same time. It's not like you cultivate the first one and then move on to the second. As you're cultivating any one of them, you're engaged with the others.

So the path, in a sense, even though it is folded in this way with each of the parts connected to and touching all of the other factors, there is a kind of way we can look at it as being linear. And I'll talk about it in this way just briefly.

Wise understanding and wise intention, as the beginning of the path, point to the fact that we need to have some knowledge or wisdom of where we're going. We don't just start on a path, start on a journey, without some sense of what the journey is about. Our journey is about freeing the mind from suffering. And the very definition of wise understanding—one of the key definitions—is that someone who understands, understands the Four Noble Truths.

So this is kind of interesting because the Eightfold Path is the last element of the Four Noble Truths, and yet the Four Noble Truths is the first element of the Eightfold Path. There are cycles within cycles within cycles, all within the Buddhist teachings. Part of the way our path unfolds is through cycles.

We learn a little bit, and this is the way wisdom begins on the path. We start by hearing something, learning something. It's not a full-blown deep understanding when we step onto the path. Perhaps we've heard somebody say something, talk about something, and there's a little resonance for us. It's like, "Wow, that makes sense to me." I know for myself, when I kind of hit bottom in my life, the teachings of suffering began to make a lot of sense. And so there was a willingness to begin to listen.

We begin our path by hearing the teachings and reflecting on them. And then we begin to engage, if they make sense. If reflecting on them, these teachings begin to make sense—we hear something about suffering, we hear something about practice. For myself, the very first little bit of wisdom that I heard was: maybe it's helpful to, rather than act on your emotions, observe them. And that didn't make much sense to me when I first heard it. It made almost no sense to me. Anger was the main thing I was dealing with, and it's like, why would I want to pay attention to my anger? Why would I want to turn to that?

But as I said, I had kind of hit bottom, and so I was willing to try anything. And actually I pretty quickly saw the wisdom of turning to observe experience rather than acting out of it.

So we step on the path, we hear something, maybe even just a very small bit of wisdom. The wisdom of the Buddha, I see, is very dense. You just need a little bit of it—a little piece of that wisdom—and if it resonates with you, you can go a long way with just that. Because all the wisdom of the Buddha is so interpenetrating, so intertwined.

We hear the wisdom, we may start to act, engage. And this is wise intention, the second aspect of the Eightfold Path. We step onto the path with hearing some teachings and then begin to engage. Our intentions become oriented, aligned around those wisdom teachings. We start to be curious about what it might mean to engage with our reactivity in a different way.

So we have perhaps a little mental shift through the hearing of wise view, wise understanding, moving us towards a different way to engage in the world: wise intention. And one of the keys in wise intention is this—because our whole exploration is really around suffering and how suffering could end, one of the key explorations becomes: how can we not contribute to suffering in the world?

And so this points to the next three aspects of the Eightfold Path: wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood. The intention towards non-harming becomes a very beautiful and central part of our path, and that intention towards non-harming is expressed in these three factors.

Really, this aspect of the Eightfold Path is about harmonizing our relationships with the world, with other people—engaging in ways that don't create suffering, as best as we can. Living peacefully, cultivating this heart of non-harming. I think Joseph said it so beautifully last night, the quote from the Dalai Lama: as a practice, be kind whenever possible, and it's always possible. This really encapsulates the sense of the ethical component of the Eightfold Path.

The last three aspects of the Eightfold Path are about cultivating our minds. We can look at wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood as cleaning up our relationships with our fellow human beings. And the last three—wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—as cleaning up our relationship with our own mind, looking at how we purify and understand the ways our mind gets caught in itself.

Both internal and external events can create this suffering. We see this sitting here in the hall. It becomes easier to see the internal events that create suffering. There's not much going on here, and yet our minds—you sit in the hall and we see our minds create something. The mind picks up something that happened five years ago and starts chewing on it, and then we start feeling the frustration and the anger and confusion around that, and we're off in a storm. We see this over and over again.

One of my friends was one of the early practitioners at the Forest Refuge. She made the comment that the Forest Refuge is relentlessly perfect. It's just so perfect that you have no way to blame the environment. Now that may not be the case completely here, but we do get to see how we react to the things that are coming up in our minds. And there are also things that happen externally that we react to. Mental development helps us to see both how we react to the internal and the external, and to see how greed, aversion, and delusion—the reactivity of our minds—compounds our struggles.

The factors of effort, mindfulness, and concentration really work together. I don't think we can truly tease them apart. When you're cultivating wise effort, taking the effort to cultivate what's wholesome and let go of the unwholesome, it takes mindfulness to do that. It takes mindfulness for us to engage in effort wisely. It takes effort to stay connected to our experience in the present moment. To cultivate the skillful and let go of the unskillful, to recognize the skillful and unskillful—that's where the mindfulness comes in.

Bringing mindfulness and effort together cultivates concentration. Again, I won't go into this in detail, but those two together create the continuity of mindfulness that allows concentration to come into being. Concentration results in the sustaining of mindfulness over time, which takes both mindfulness and effort together.

Mindfulness joined with concentration and effort—this is really what we've been doing day in and day out here on this retreat. And you have all seen the value of this. You have all seen the possibility of understanding that comes when we bring the perspective of witnessing how our minds react, observing it rather than acting on it. We see how the mind is contributing to its own struggles, and the mind begins to let go.

In a way it feels kind of magical to me, this power of mindfulness and wisdom together, which comes with concentration. The wisdom of the practice is really revealed in the continuity of mindfulness. And the wisdom frees. The mind sees through the mindfulness and the concentration; the mind sees its own contribution. It sees how it adds to our internal climate a state of mind that is not necessary. And the mind, in seeing that—seeing that it's contributing to its own unhappiness—actually begins to understand how to let go of that struggle.

It's not actually something we can figure out how to do. At least in my experience, I remember sitting in this hall, suffering greatly over something or other, feeling so caught by the mind. And the mind kind of screamed within itself: I would let go if I knew how. And I had no idea how to let go.

In that place, our practice is to meet the suffering. The meeting of that suffering, the meeting of that struggle, is what gives the mind its education in how to let go. This is the teaching that Joseph so clearly and beautifully articulates: that we tend to want insight into suffering without experiencing suffering. It doesn't happen that way.

We gain understanding by meeting the suffering—not by reacting to it, but by meeting it. And this is what those three aspects of the Eightfold Path—wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—give the mind the stability to do.

As this unfolds, what begins to happen is that we see clearly, so clearly, how the mind can let go of what it adds: the wanting things to be other than they are, the wanting to get rid of things, the confusion in our minds. The seeing of that letting go itself is often experienced as a release—a shift of perspective, an ease comes into being. Sometimes the experience that's there—the anger, the confusion, the frustration, the pain in the knee—maybe that doesn't change. But the mind lets go of its grip on having it need to be some other way. And that shift gives the mind the recognition, the understanding: there's another way. That shift is a shift of insight.

This is how the Eightfold Path is itself a cycle. Because that wisdom we started with—the wisdom of understanding suffering and understanding the cause of suffering, seeing how the cultivation of the path leads to letting go—that becomes a lived experience, not an intellectual one. The wisdom of our practice becomes lived and real to us, not hypothetical, not intellectual, not speculative. It becomes understood in our bones.

To me, this is resonant with what Guy talked about the other night, although perhaps in a different context. He talked about clarifying the view—I believe those were the words he used. And to me, the Eightfold Path is the practice we use to purify, to understand our minds, to understand the truth of what's initially intellectual understanding of wise view, wise understanding. The teachings of the Eightfold Path, the teachings of the Four Noble Truths, the teachings of dependent origination, the teachings around greed, aversion, and delusion, the teachings around what's skillful, what helps us move away from suffering, what helps us let go of these unskillful states of mind—we cultivate these in our practice and the understanding begins to dawn: they're not just a good idea, they're a way to live. And we live from that perspective.

So the practice of the Eightfold Path deepens our understanding of the Four Noble Truths, deepens our understanding of perhaps aspects of dependent origination, deepens our understanding of greed, aversion, and delusion and how they catch the mind, deepens our understanding of what's skillful, deepens our understanding of what's unskillful, what we should let go of. With that understanding now being a lived experience, it kind of spurs us on to keep going. And so the path is a cycle. We gain some lived understanding of that truth and it sends us back into wanting to keep looking, keep understanding.

We're actually living the Eightfold Path here on retreat, all the aspects of it. Wise understanding and wise intention are being lived through the exploration of our conversations in the practice discussions, through the question and answer in the morning, through the talks. There is that offering of some of the wisdom of the Buddha in this first way I talked about—the intellectual, reflective understanding of the teachings. Also, another way to understand wise intention and wise understanding is simply this: you are here. You've been here for nearly six weeks. If that's not an expression of wise intention, I don't know what is.

Wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood here on retreat are cultivated through our engagement with the precepts. Essentially, we are living wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood here on retreat. Moment by moment, we can understand these as being fulfilled. As one of my Burmese teachers, Sayadaw Ujanaka, said, you're fulfilling the ethical component of the Eightfold Path by abstaining from wrong speech, wrong action, wrong livelihood. Your livelihood here on retreat is essentially being temporary monks and nuns. Your livelihood here is practice—the most beautiful livelihood.

Wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration—of course you're living those day by day, moment by moment. The most obvious aspects of what we're practicing moment by moment here on retreat are those three. And then there are the moments of understanding, moments of wisdom, insight that reveal the truth.

The Four Noble Truths are, as I stated, often talked about in terms of this cause and effect relationship where the second noble truth causes the first noble truth, the truth of suffering. Craving causes the suffering. The fourth noble truth, the truth of the path—engaging with the path, cultivating the path—leads us towards realizing the ending of suffering.

There's another way to reflect on the Four Noble Truths, I think, a slightly different perspective. And that comes with looking at the actions that the Buddha associated with the Four Noble Truths. Each truth has a particular task that we are encouraged to engage with. The truth of suffering is meant to be understood. The truth of the cause of suffering—craving—is meant to be abandoned. The ending of craving, which is the cessation of suffering, is meant to be realized. And the path is meant to be cultivated.

The tasks associated with the Four Noble Truths I see as a kind of map laid on top of the Four Noble Truths to give us a way out. The first two Noble Truths—understand suffering and let go of the cause of suffering—give us a way from the perspective of our usual life, which is caught in suffering, caught in the struggle, driven in effect by the cause of suffering.

So starting from where we are, from that place, the Buddha suggests: understand suffering. The way we understand suffering is by bringing the Eightfold Path to our moment-to-moment experience. As we apply the Eightfold Path, the task of applying the Eightfold Path is really to understand suffering, this First Noble Truth.

Something that's really struck me so many times in my practice is that as I'm willing to meet the suffering—almost a surrender, you know, surrender to "this is the way it is, I guess I need to observe it, I guess I need to be with it, meet it, explore it, get to know it"—as I let go of the resistance to the struggle and bring the factors of wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration joined with the wisdom of wise understanding, what I see is that when suffering is fully understood, when the mind connects without resistance, with mindfulness and wisdom, with effort and mindfulness and concentration, the wisdom coming to bear on it—when suffering is fully understood, the cause of suffering is naturally abandoned. It happens. It's not something our sense of "me doing something" has to do.

And so in this way, we can see that the task of the First Noble Truth, the understanding of suffering, leads to the Second Noble Truth, the abandoning of the craving. The abandoning of the craving—as the craving is released, that right there is realizing the ending of suffering, the Third Noble Truth. So our practice begins where we are, right in the middle of our suffering, bringing the Eightfold Path to bear on understanding suffering, and the rest of the path unfolds from there. First Noble Truth: understand suffering. Second Noble Truth: abandon the craving. That happens. Abandoning is a fruit of our practice. Abandoning is a fruit of the understanding. The realization of the freedom is a fruit of the abandoning.

And so looked at in this way, the tasks associated with the Four Noble Truths put a different spin on the Four Noble Truths—kind of sequential, one step to the next. Understand suffering, abandon the cause, realize the ending. So those first three make sense to me in terms of this kind of step-by-step unfolding.

And I have to point to Stephen Batchelor here because he's the one who really gave me the interest in exploring the Four Noble Truths from this perspective. It led me to think—and Stephen Batchelor pointed out—that it struck him as very odd that the Four Noble Truths, being one of the central lists of Buddhism, wasn't structured like a list in the normal way that Buddhist lists are structured. Most of the lists that the Buddha offered, many of the lists at least, have a kind of directionality to them where the initial ones are the early things that we cultivate and learn, and then they build on each other.

The seven factors of awakening, for instance. We cultivate mindfulness and investigation and energy, and then the interest arises in the settling of the mind—calm and tranquility and concentration and equanimity. And in a way, the equanimity of the factors of awakening is a kind of—I wouldn't say it's the goal of the seven factors, but it is understood as being a kind of deeper quality. And so often the lists in the way the Buddha offered them head in this step-by-step way. At least they can be understood in that way.

And so Stephen Batchelor said, but this one, the Four Noble Truths—what would it mean for the Eightfold Path, cultivating the path, to be the ending of the path? The ending, or the kind of penultimate, the ultimate result of the Four Noble Truths?

And so I reflected on that some and explored, thought about this. The first three I can really see, based on these tasks associated with the Four Noble Truths, how they lead step by step from one to the next. But cultivating the path, that last one—that's a bit interesting to think about. And my reflection was: what can I learn from thinking about this in this way?

I'm going to point to something that Bhante mentioned the other night. He talked about how in the first stage of awakening called sotāpanna, stream entry, there was a place where the stream meant the Eightfold Path. I looked up that reference. It is the Buddha and Sāriputta discussing what sotāpanna means, what stream entry means. The Buddha is quizzing Sāriputta. The Buddha says, "What is the stream?" And Sāriputta responds, "The Noble Eightfold Path is the stream." And the Buddha then says, "And what is a stream enterer?" And Sāriputta responded, "One who possesses the Eightfold Path."

So in this teaching, in this framing of what awakening is, one who has entered the stream, one who is awakened to that degree, possesses the Eightfold Path. That's in a sense the definition of, or what the awakened person is like—living the Eightfold Path. And so the Eightfold Path, while it definitely is described as the way that we engage, how we practice, how we understand suffering through cultivating the factors of the Eightfold Path—and yet the Eightfold Path isn't simply gone with awakening.

My understanding of that teaching—that someone who has entered the stream possesses the Eightfold Path—is that they're living the Eightfold Path. It's a natural thing. It's not something they have to try to do. It's a natural unfolding that one lives the path when one has let go of suffering. And so from that perspective, the letting go, the releasing, the realizing of the ending of suffering puts us in a place of simply living the path.

This is also described in terms of full awakening, where there are a few more pieces to what one possesses. The Buddha was asked, essentially, what are the qualities of an awakened person? And he responded that an awakened person possesses the right view of one beyond training, the right intention of one beyond training, the right speech, action, and livelihood of one beyond training, the right effort, mindfulness, and concentration of one beyond training, and the right knowledge and right deliverance of one beyond training. Those last two—knowledge and deliverance—are translating the terms jnana, which essentially means the realized knowledge, the insight knowledge, and vimutti, which means release.

So one who is free, naturally—my understanding of this—is naturally living the Eightfold Path.

One interesting way to explore what cultivating the path means from this perspective: We obviously cultivate the path in our engagement with our struggles. We are cultivating wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration, strengthening those capacities. But for one who is free, naturally living the Eightfold Path, one way we can understand that person as cultivating the path is to think about what a path actually is—think about the image of a path. There are all these paths here in the woods, and those paths are created because people have walked on them. It is the very walking on the path that keeps it clear and available.

And so we can appreciate those who have gone before us, who have realized the ending of suffering, who have walked the path, who are continuing to walk the path, are keeping the path clear for us. They're continuing to cultivate the path for our benefit.

There's a text—one of my favorite texts—that also points to this notion of how the path we're walking is the path we will walk if we become awakened. It's not different. The text is called the Aṭṭhakavagga. It's an old text found in the Sutta Nipāta. Most Pāli scholars feel that it's one of the earliest—both early in the sense that it hasn't been altered too much over the years because the language is quite archaic, but also that it seems to be a teaching from fairly early in the Buddha's teaching career. They think this because it's one of the few texts actually referred to elsewhere in the suttas. People will talk and say, "Oh, have you memorized that text? Do you know the Aṭṭhakavagga? Can you quote that?" The Buddha praises someone who's able to speak that text. So it was an early text, and it has a different flavor to it.

This text is basically sixteen poems about clinging—that's the main theme: clinging and letting go of clinging. The way it approaches this is by describing what somebody is like who's living in the world suffering and clinging, describing what somebody is like living in the world without clinging, and then describing the path of how one might get from one to the other.

The first thing I'd like to share with you is a description of how an awakened person is described:

"Tell me about the Supreme Person," a questioner asks.

"A person who is free of wishes before the body's destruction, who's not tethered to the past, who cannot be reckoned in terms of the present, and for whom there are no yearnings for the future.

A person who is not angered, not frightened, not boastful, not fretful, who gives wise advice, who is calm, restrained in speech, who is indeed a sage.

A person who is not attached to the future, who does not sorrow over the past, who finds solitude amidst sense contacts, and is not guided by fixed views.

A person who is retiring, not deceitful, not covetous, not greedy, not impudent, not arousing contempt, who does not engage in malicious speech.

A person who does not relish pleasure, who is not arrogant, who is mild and of ready wit, who is not credulous, who by nothing is repelled.

A person who does not take on the training in hope of material gain, who is unperturbed if they get nothing, who is not hampered by wishes and not greedy for flavors.

A person who is even-tempered, ever attentive, who does not suppose that in the world they are equal, superior, or inferior, who is free of conceit.

A person for whom there are no tethers, who knowing the truth is not tethered in any way. This is someone I call peaceful."

To me, something that stands out about that description is that it's very—almost normal. I don't mean normal in the sense that you see people like that all the time, but it's a description you can understand. It's very this-worldly. The description of someone who is awakened is given in terms of how they are in the world.

Not frightened, not angered, not boastful, doesn't imagine themselves to be equal, superior, or inferior. It's a description of how somebody is in the world—a description of the training.

Here is a description of the training. The question posed is: speak about the path of practice. And the Buddha responds:

A person should not have covetous eyes. She should close her ears to ordinary chatter. She should not be greedy for flavors. She should not cherish anything in the world. In whatever way he is affected by sense contact, he should not lament over anything. He should not long for continued existence. He should not tremble amidst danger. She should be meditative, not footloose. She should desist from worry. She should not be indolent. She should live in lodgings where there is little noise. He should not sleep too much. He should be devoted to wakefulness and keen endeavor. He should abandon laziness, deception, merriment, various kinds of amusements. One should not be a boaster, should not speak scheming words, should not cultivate impudence, should not utter quarrelsome speech. One should not be drawn into telling lies, should not be deliberately treacherous, should not despise others for their way of life or wisdom or precepts and practices. If ascetics or ordinary people irritate her with their talkativeness, she should not respond harshly, for the peaceful do not retaliate. Knowing the Buddha's teachings, an ever attentive person who investigates it should train in it. Knowing the extinguishing of the illusion of self as peace, one should not be negligent in applying Gautama's teachings. The unconquered conqueror realized the truth through his own insight, not through hearsay. So with regards to the sublime one's teaching, one who is diligent should constantly venerate it by following his example.

That, I think, is really the key: follow the example. Someone who is free is worthy of emulation.

The other line that I really resonate with is "should not respond harshly, for the peaceful do not retaliate." If you want to be peaceful, behave peacefully. The path reflects the goal. How we are supports that movement in the direction of peace.

The Eightfold Path is not just a set of practices—it's really a description of how a noble life is lived. I find that very inspiring.

Last night, Joseph also pointed to something that I thought captures exactly the crux of the matter: the Buddha's teaching in brief, which Joseph likes to highlight, that the Buddha said over and over again—nothing should be clung to as I or mine. That could be a summary of the path. Nothing should be clung to as I or mine. The result of the path, the freedom, is the not clinging.

The path reflects the goal.

CHAPTER 96

Unpacking Right Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 56 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella systematically unpacks the Buddha's definition of right mindfulness (sammā sati) as presented in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). She explores each element of the classic formulation: "One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world."

Fella illuminates how ordinary awareness differs from wise mindfulness through the example of anger—we may know we're angry, but right mindfulness involves a crucial shift in perspective, turning toward the experience itself rather than its object. She examines key qualities: "abiding" as a restful, receptive presence; "contemplating the body as a body" as knowing experience directly rather than through concepts; "ardent" as wholehearted yet balanced effort; and "clearly comprehending" as understanding impermanence and the purpose of practice.

Particularly valuable is her teaching on effort, comparing mindfulness to gently tapping a rolling hoop—not one forceful push but persistent light touches that build momentum. She emphasizes that wise attitude means being at ease with whatever arises, including reactivity itself. This non-reactive container is where mindfulness works its transformative power, gradually freeing the mind from unwholesome states while strengthening wholesome ones. The talk offers both philosophical depth and practical guidance for understanding how mindfulness leads to liberation.

As I was leaving my house this evening to come over here, I met somebody coming in who said I might want to go the long way around because there was a fire truck blocking the road. So I went the long way around, and there were fire trucks blocking the other end too. I went back, checked it out, found a way to get through, and I apologize for being delayed this evening. It added some alertness to the system.

What I'd like to talk about this evening is mindfulness. From the perspective of what we're doing here, what we're practicing, mindfulness can be described quite simply as knowing what's happening while it's happening, or as being present, aware, or connected to experience. Often our language for mindfulness includes the language of seeing, as Joseph mentioned this morning. And yet it can be helpful to recognize that mindfulness also includes a feeling into experience, a connected nature of experience, a meeting of experience.

The mindfulness of our practice is based on or related to a very ordinary quality of mind—this simple capacity of our minds to know what's happening while it's happening, this capacity to be self-reflective, to know what's happening in the present moment. We can know that we know. As human beings, we have this ability, and yet we're often not really consciously aware of it, this knowing that we know, this function or capacity of our minds. We take it for granted. It seems so ordinary that we don't really notice it.

I think it was actually one of the aspects of the brilliancy of the Buddha to highlight this quality and recognize that it's an important quality, a really helpful quality, particularly when it's cultivated and explored in a particular way. In the Satipatthana Sutta, he framed mindfulness with particular qualities, other qualities that accompany it to make it right mindfulness.

If we were to ask someone who has never encountered mindfulness as a practice, somebody who's dealing with a reactive emotion or in a reactive state—somebody's angry and we ask them, "Do you know you're angry?"—they're going to look at us kind of funny. "Well, yeah, of course I know I'm angry." So it's not just the knowing of what we are experiencing that makes mindfulness right mindfulness.

Right mindfulness includes a perspective that, in the case of a reactive emotion such as anger, has us interested and curious about turning towards the experience of the emotion, rather than being interested in what we're angry about. It's recognizing what's happening as an experience in the present moment, knowing that it is an experience in the present moment, as opposed to believing something about it, believing something needs to happen about it.

In the case of anger, for instance, we recognize that anger is something happening in the mind. It's related to something happening in the world, probably, often related to something happening out there in our world of experience. But not necessarily dependent on that. By that I mean that the same thing could be happening and we might not be angry about it.

This is really one of the key turnings of the mind around suffering, one of the turnings of the mind around our practice—recognizing that what's happening in the world can't directly make us react in a certain way. There's stuff happening in the world and it comes in and it's processed through our minds and bodies. It's a process within our minds and bodies that creates the reactivity.

This is really good news, actually, because it means there can be some possibility of changing our experience. If it were entirely a locked-in fact that something happens in the world and we respond with reactivity, there would be no hope. But with the recognition that it's not just what's out there—there's something happening out there and there's something happening inside that's creating the reactivity—as we turn towards the experience of anger, we start to learn this. We start to see the contribution that our own minds are making towards our inner experience, towards our reactivities.

Now, this doesn't mean that we're not discerning about taking action. Mindfulness, this turning towards our experience, doesn't mean that we simply don't do anything. Mindfulness brings along the qualities of discernment as well. This right mindfulness brings along the discernment that allows us to respond appropriately, from compassion, with metta, when circumstances require it in the world—when circumstances of injustice, for instance, or things happening that need intervention. There are definitely things in the world that need intervention, and yet we don't need to be angry there. In fact, we can turn towards compassion in that response.

The Buddha didn't just sit. He was very active in the world. At one point, there's a story that war was fomenting in the area where he lived, and he actually went and stood on the battlefield and told people, "Stop. What are you doing?" And while he was standing there, the war stopped. There is this place for compassionate action, and yet it comes because we know our own contribution.

And so, you know, simply being aware, simply knowing what our experience is—yes, I'm angry, yes, I'm reactive—is not quite enough. We need a shift of perspective that helps us to see more deeply, more clearly. My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya says awareness alone is not enough. By this he means that we need to have a particular perspective, a particular way of observing experience, for it to lead to freedom, for it to lead to wisdom.

And so the Buddha recommended that we cultivate right mindfulness, wise mindfulness. The key definition of wise mindfulness is the four establishments of mindfulness—the central sutta the Buddha taught around the practice of mindfulness. It includes four areas of establishing, exploring our experience to establish this quality of wise mindfulness: mindfulness of the body, of feelings, of mind states, and of dhammas—experience, relationship. That last one is complex to describe in a few words, so I won't try at this moment, and I'm sure we'll talk about it as we go through these weeks.

In that sutta, the Buddha actually lays out a definition of mindfulness. He repeats this definition for each of the foundations. Here it is from the foundation of the body: "How does one practice right mindfulness? One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world."

That's a package of qualities, things that come together to make right mindfulness. I'd like to unpack this a little bit and explore with you some of these words and my own investigation of how these qualities support right mindfulness.

The first part: "One abides contemplating the body as a body." Those first two words —"one abides contemplating." The word "abides" I like; it has a very lovely, settled-back quality to it. As you sit here, just think about what it means to abide in the body, abide knowing the body as a body. How does that land? How does it resonate?

The quality for me that it connects with—or set of qualities it connects with—is resting, easeful, connected, a receptive quality of meeting or being with experience. I had a workshop with a few people and was exploring this word with them in a very interactive way. I said, "So what does this quality make you think of?" One person raised their hand and said, "The dude abides." Which is apparently from a movie, The Big Lebowski. But it kind of captures that sense—the dude abides. We can be the dude abiding in our experience. It does generate that quality of restfulness.

And so the Buddha brings in this quality from the beginning. It's the first word he brings in for wise mindfulness: abiding.

"Contemplating" has a meaning of observing, to look at repeatedly, to closely connect with experience. The commentaries apparently connect this with contemplating or observing experience from a particular perspective—the perspective of impermanent, unreliable, and not-self. This aspect of the definition also brings in some sense of what direction we're headed in terms of what we're looking at. Whatever we're exploring, whatever we're recognizing in experience, it will be impermanent. We can recognize that aspect of experience as an important aspect to highlight in what we understand and what we know.

These two words together—"abides contemplating"—to me bring a sense of relaxed, open, receptive, close meeting of experience. They bring together both a relaxation and an interest. "Contemplating" carries that quality of looking, being with, meeting, closely knowing experience. This is an important balance for us.

And what is it that we abide contemplating? We abide contemplating the body as a body—or, for the other foundations, feelings as feelings, mind states as mind states, or dhammas, experience as experience.

This also, I think, brings in another aspect of wisdom into the definition. What makes mindfulness wise mindfulness is not only what we look at, but how we look at it. There's not only the what, but the how we are observing.

Observing the body as a body—what does that mean? I like that particular framing of the translation, "observing the body as a body." Sometimes it's translated as "observing the body in and of itself." The body as a body, to me, evokes the sense of knowing the body as simply a body. We connect with our experience of body very much personally. We connect to it as I, me, my body.

And this is pointing to a more simple recognition, just as the instruction from this morning: there is a body. There is a body. It's a framing, a different kind of framing of our meeting of experience than our usual way of meeting experience.

The commentaries—and I used that word a minute ago and didn't really explain what commentaries are—there's a whole collection of texts, words that were attributed primarily to the Buddha. There's a stack of those books. And then there's a whole other set of books that are people who have read those books, thought about them, and made a lot of notes about them. A particular set of those books, written early in the common era from the time of the death of the Buddha up until about 500 in the common era, is a collection of people who looked at the text and made comments on them. This is the collection of works called the commentaries.

So the commentaries, in looking at this phrase, also looked at this and said, "What the heck does this mean?" They explored and thought about it and looked at various places in the suttas that might help them understand it. And they came to the following understanding: that the repetition of "body as a body" indicates that there's a need to precisely determine the object of contemplation and isolate it from objects with which it might be confused. This is paraphrased from a translation of one of the commentaries.

So isolating the experience of the body, separating it from other experience that we might conflate or confuse with the experience of the body. I'll give you an example of how this might happen.

Right now, put your attention into your hand. Just let your attention rest in your hand and feel into the experience. Be with the experience of the hand. It can help to close your eyes with this. Just notice sensations. You might notice pulsing or tingling or vibration, stiffness, coolness or warmth.

And now, open your eyes and look at your hand and think about it as a hand and what hands do. They reach, they grab. What happens to the experience of hand? What happens to the experience? For me, at least, when I do that there's a distance from the immediacy of the actual experience that I was with just a moment ago. Some of you may have noticed something like that.

This is often how we relate to our bodies—through the ideas about them. With the hand, what our hands do, we look at our hand, we think about it, we have an idea of hand, and we relate to hand through that idea rather than through direct experience. This is a way that the experience of body is conflated or confused with an idea about body or a concept about body.

So this is a beginning to tease apart. We can start to drop below the level of concept into direct experience. Not to say that we get rid of concept—concept is actually an incredibly useful way to navigate the world. If I had to come in here every time and remember, "Right, these are people out there and those are mats and this is a floor and I walk on the floor and those are walls and I don't walk through walls"—if I had to think about that every time I walked into a room, it would take a lot of processing power. As it is, I walk in and I meet the world a lot through concepts.

And yet there's a big doorway there, when we are relating to the world through concept, for confusion to enter. Because we're not meeting direct experience; we're meeting our idea about what's happening. And that's where our reactivity can very often enter into the equation.

So meeting the body as a body helps us to connect with the actual experience of the body and begin to tease apart the actual experience of body from other experiences—feelings, thoughts, ideas. It's so easy for us to conflate or mix together various experiences and confuse them with each other. The practice of mindfulness helps us to tease them apart.

I think that this aspect of seeing the body as a body also brings in a sense of a non-interfering mindfulness. One knows this experience as an experience. This is a body. There is a body. I don't know if some of you were playing with that today, but it does have that power of kind of cutting through some of those ideas about the body. It's just: this is a body. There is a body. So it helps to bring in that non-interfering awareness.

The next word in this definition is ardent, sometimes translated as diligent. So one abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, with ardency. The word ardency in English brings in a sense of wholeheartedness.

I like that aspect of that word, wholeheartedness, because it brings our heart into the equation of mindfulness and not just our minds. Ardency has a quality of persistence, of effort, and yet with this wholeheartedness, it's not just about dragging our minds around. It's about bringing our whole being to this exploration of meeting experience. I think it brings a heartfelt interest and curiosity and connection to this practice of mindfulness.

So this is a place where balanced and sustained effort is included in the equation. This is some of what Joseph talked about this morning—this balance between relaxation and alertness. And I think there are several places where this comes into the definition. With ardency, we are including this quality of wholeheartedness, and yet remembering it's balanced by this abiding. We dwell ardently. We abide with our whole heart. Abiding with our whole heart. This is not the "more or less mindful" that Joseph talks about.

There is an art to this aspect of meditation—how we bring our effort is really the art of meditation. It's something we each have to explore. And it's never just one thing either. It's not like you get it and then forevermore have it, because it is an art. It's completely responsive to the state of your heart and mind, the state of what's happening in the world. It's a dance of how we bring our effort and meet experience. At times there's more of a sense of real commitment and meeting. And at other times it's more relaxed and settled back and just receiving.

I find in my own practice that this dance is really helped by a light touch of effort in the moment. The effort in mindfulness practice isn't about gripping or holding or trying or pushing. I think we sometimes, when we sit down or enter into a period of meditation—at least I know I, when I was early in my practice, I'd sit down for a forty-five-minute sitting and it would be like, "Okay, mindful for forty-five minutes." I'd pick up the whole forty-five minutes in the first second and try to generate the energy to be present for the entire sitting in that first moment of the meditation. But mindfulness doesn't work that way. The effort doesn't work that way. It's more of a light touch in this moment, which can be a light touch in this moment.

Right now—Joseph pointed to this this morning—right now, feel the sensation of your hand. Feel the sensation of your hips touching the chair or cushion or bench. Feel the sensation of your lips touching each other. How much effort does it take? How hard is it? As I name each experience, very often the mind is right there. It's not like it takes a dragging of the mind. It's not got that quality; it's much lighter of a touch. So the effort in mindfulness practice isn't so much about gripping or holding on, but it's that light touch again and again and again. That's where the effort is—to keep the light touch going. It's the persistence that really is the effort, a gentle persistence of light touch.

There's a game that people from all over the world, apparently as long back as we have records of people doing things, have played. Kids have played with hoops—round hoops rolled along with a stick. I think you all know what I'm talking about. You put a hoop on its end and then you tap on the hoop to keep it rolling. The game is to see how long can you keep it rolling.

If you were going to play this game, you wouldn't take the stick and give the hoop a big whack. You would lose the hoop, and there's very little control you have with that big whack. Instead, you give it a gentle tap, just enough so that you can keep up with it as you walk beside or run beside the hoop. And you can tune which direction it's going. If it's falling a little bit one way, you give it another gentle tap. With these gentle taps, a momentum gets going with the hoop.

Our mindfulness is very like that. As the momentum develops with the hoop, you might be able to run alongside or be right next to it and not give it a tap for a little while, just watch it roll because it's got some momentum. And then give it another little tap or two as it begins to wobble.

Again, as we practice with our mindfulness, we start with a gentle persistence. Moment after moment, light touch, light touch, light touch. And with that light touch, a momentum of mindfulness develops. Then we can kind of back off a little bit with the conscious doing of that effort and allow the momentum of mindfulness to simply receive experience, to know what's happening.

This exploration around effort—this light touch of effort and this gentle persistence—is going to be a lot of the practice. We will fall off on one side; we'll get a little bit tight around the effort, working a little too hard. We'll recognize that and back off a little. Then we'll go off on the other side, getting a little dazed and wandering off in spaced-out land. We'll realize that and add a little bit more intentionality.

I understand that with airplanes, when they're flying somewhere, there's a radar signal they're tracking. Apparently they're almost never right on that signal. They're always falling a little off to one side and then correcting back, a little off to the other side and then correcting back. Our practice is kind of like that too around effort. We don't just get it right. It's a continual dance of meeting the conditions and understanding an appropriate level of gentle persistence.

I find playfulness to be a really helpful quality around the practice as a whole. To not feel like it has to be done right. Be willing to experiment. Be willing to play. Play with how you're using effort. Sometimes I've sat in the hall feeling fairly present, and I thought, "Yeah, it feels pretty present. Let me see, am I making more effort than I need to?" So I explored whether I could let go of some effort. I noticed there could be some letting go and relaxing. "Oh wow, I wonder how much effort I can let go of." I could let go of an awful lot that I didn't even know was happening. And at some point the mind started to wander. "Okay, maybe that's a little too far. Let's come back, bring a little more intentionality." So be willing to play.

The next piece of the phrase—clearly comprehending, fully aware—has many different aspects, different ways it's described or defined in the Buddha's teachings. The one we're perhaps most familiar with is the section in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta sometimes called the domain of full awareness or clear comprehension. It talks about meeting experience—all experience. It describes being mindful while reaching and bending your arms, while going to and fro, while walking, while standing, while speaking, while remaining silent, while urinating, while defecating. All day long. That's one aspect of this quality of clear comprehension: the aspect of all the time. Mindfulness is all the time.

So that gentle persistence—we just keep with that. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says the practice is like running a marathon, so you need to pace yourself. That light touch of effort, moment after moment, is doable all day long. A squeezing down, a forcing into—the mind gets exhausted. Recognizing that is important. Continuity is a big aspect of wise mindfulness.

Another aspect of this word "clear comprehension" and what it brings into the definition of wise mindfulness is a clear comprehension of impermanence. There's a definition in one place in the suttas that says, "And how does one abide with clear comprehension? One understands feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, remain present, and pass away." So there's a clear connection of clear comprehension with the understanding of impermanence.

Now, that particular definition doesn't mention the body. It talks about being mindful of feelings, thoughts, and perceptions as they arise, persist, and pass away. And yet in that text, it also brings in mindfulness of the body. What does it mean to have these two together? There's no clear definition in the text, but as I practice with it, the way I explore this is that it brings in a broader frame for our mindfulness practice. When we're observing the body, it allows us to have a broader context for our experience.

Like, as we're observing the body, we may be observing some particular experience—a pain, for instance. That pain will come with feelings, with thoughts and perceptions. This is again the teasing apart of bodily experience from mental experience. There's a pain in the knee, and there's an unpleasant experience, and there are thoughts about the pain in the knee, and there are probably perceptions about it—what it means, what we need to do about it. So while we are experiencing the body, I think part of this is exploring what our relationship to that experience actually is. Clearly recognizing not only the experience of the body but the related mental experience that comes along with it. And to know that too as impermanent. To recognize unpleasant experience as unpleasant experience arising, persisting, passing away. To recognize thoughts about that pain as thoughts arising in the mind.

This is another aspect of clear comprehension. I really think of clear comprehension as being a real exploration of how we bring wisdom to our practice of mindfulness. It makes our mindfulness wise mindfulness.

The commentaries bring in another angle. They say that when we are clearly comprehending our experience, we really understand the purpose for which we're doing something. We understand the purpose for our mindfulness while we are mindful. The main purpose that the Buddha put out for wise mindfulness is to understand suffering. And so this is part of our exploration—understanding dukkha, understanding suffering. This again brings in wisdom.

There's a factor, a quality called wise attention, that's said to be the support for wise mindfulness. Wise attention is defined in the texts with certain statements. It says: one understands this is suffering; one understands this is the cause of suffering; one understands this is the end of suffering; and one understands this is the way leading to the end of suffering.

When I first heard that or reflected on it, I didn't quite understand what it was. I thought it was just stating the Four Noble Truths, which is what those four things are related to. But then I read it a little more closely. What I see is that wise attention is directing us to a particular perspective on understanding our experience. Whatever we are experiencing in the present moment can be understood as either suffering, the origin of suffering, the end of suffering, or qualities and supports leading us to the end of suffering. It's a framework through which we can understand whatever is happening in our experience. I may give a talk in more detail on this later in the retreat. But again, it's pointing our mindfulness towards understanding our experience in terms of what suffering is, how it's caused, what the contribution is in our own hearts and minds towards the experience of suffering, and how it might come to an end. Wise mindfulness is pointing the way to the ending of suffering.

The next word is mindful. "One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, clearly comprehending, mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world." And since I've talked about mindfulness earlier, I'll just move to "free from desires and discontent for the world."

You might think that's a funny thing. It's like, well, I'm doing this practice in order to free myself from desires and discontents. If I have to start there, is there any hope? How do I start there?

Well, fortunately, there are some aspects of the teachings that say you can set them aside temporarily. And there's another even more hopeful side to this. Bhikkhu Anālayo points out that the word translated from the Pali there can be understood in the active tense. So it might mean setting aside greed and distress for the world, freeing oneself from greed and distress for the world—essentially happening simultaneously with the whole process.

In my experience, that's very much what happens with mindfulness. We might be able at times to set aside our frustrations, our confusions, and just consciously put them to the side. And yet much of what we meet on this path is our reactivity. So to me, this brings in a sense of how we are meeting experience. Can we bring a non-judgmental, non-reactive mindfulness to reactivity? It's a step back, in a way.

There's that shift of perspective that we become familiar with as we practice. We're caught in something like anger, and we recognize: oh, this is just anger.

This is something that can be explored with mindfulness. And while the anger doesn't necessarily vanish in that moment, there is a way in which we can hold that anger in a larger container—a container that has some ease to it.

This brings a sense of how we are relating to what's happening. What's our relationship to our experience? In freeing ourselves from desires and discontent, can we bring in that perspective, recognizing that this is the direction we're headed? If we can bring in that sense—that anger can be observed like anything else—we're headed in the direction of freeing ourselves from reactivity, because we may no longer be quite so caught by that state.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya gives this definition for wise attitude: a way of observing experience that allows us to feel at ease with whatever is happening. And I'll add: including difficulty, including reactivity.

This perspective of wise attitude—as best we can, to be non-reactive to what's happening—this is the container in which mindfulness has its magic. Carol used that phrase last night, that mindfulness is like magic. It has the power, when we turn with attention to reactive states of mind, unwholesome states of mind, and are mindful of them with that non-reactive wise attitude, to create the conditions for those states to become less and less in our experience.

And when we turn with attention to our wholesome states—states of compassion, of love, of generosity, of mindfulness, of concentration, of ease, of peace—when we notice those with mindfulness, with this wise attention of knowing "this is peace," "this is generosity," it creates the conditions for those to appear more frequently.

This wise attitude is where the magic is. And we will see ourselves without wise attitude. Then can we recognize: can I be okay with that too?

This creates a staged process—this purification of the mind, this becoming free of desires and discontents. We see certain ways that we're caught, and we can step back from those. Hidden in that, there may be other ways that we're caught, and we step back from those. It happens in stages. It's not one big poof and you're suddenly enlightened. I used to think that's what was going to happen. I really thought that during my first few retreats. I kept waiting for some big lights and flashes or something, and after that I'd forever be happy. It's much more slow, much more gradual, and much more real than that. It's very much right in our lives that we wake up.

So: one abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world. This is right mindfulness.

It brings together both what we are experiencing—in this case, the body. The Four Foundations bring in the breadth of everything, of all experience. All experience that arises can be known with wise mindfulness. Nothing is outside the terrain of wise mindfulness, of what can be known with wise mindfulness. The body as a body, feelings as feelings, and so forth—what we pay attention to.

And very much, wise mindfulness includes how we pay attention: with a balanced effort, a light touch, an ease to our effort. Abiding. Resting. Meeting. Wholehearted, persistent, non-judgmental, non-reactive. Ease with experience—to see and understand our minds and our hearts. To recognize the impermanent nature, which has the power—the seeing of the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature—which is the power that mindfulness gives us: to see clearly.

Mindfulness has that power to help us see deeply into experience, into the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. And that seeing deeply releases holding in the mind, deeply frees us from the ways that we are caught and struggle.

Some of this may need to be taken on faith or trust. And yet you're all here for six weeks or three months, and you will all come to understand how this works for you. That's where the freedom comes—seeing it in your own minds.

There's a statement in the Dhammapada, one of the collections of poems of the Buddha, something along the lines of: you have to practice for yourself. The Buddhas simply point the way.

Wise mindfulness is the very heart of how we practice for ourselves.

CHAPTER 97

Body and Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a practical exploration of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā) as living processes rather than abstract concepts. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), she guides practitioners through experiencing the four elements (earth, air, fire, water) as the actual language of bodily sensation, helping distinguish between what is truly physical and what is mental overlay.
> Fella illuminates how suffering arises through the interplay of these aggregates: physical sensation gives rise to feeling tone (vedanā), which conditions mental formations (saṅkhāra) like liking, not-liking, and emotional reactions. Through personal examples—including confusing rapture with anxiety while waiting for an interview, and discovering fear behind an unpleasant sound—she demonstrates how clearly seeing these processes as distinct yet interconnected reveals their conditioned nature. She explores how perception (saññā) serves as a subtle gateway through which confusion enters, as we mistake our concepts about experience for reality itself.
> The practical wisdom offered here is profound yet accessible: when we recognize body and mind as streams of cause and effect rather than a solid self directing the show, disidentification naturally arises. The mind, seeing its own contribution to suffering, begins to understand how to let go. This teaching provides meditators with concrete tools for examining experience at the elemental level, revealing that happiness comes not from grasping at external conditions but from releasing our confused relationship with these ever-changing processes.

This morning in the hall there was a question about how to explore disidentification with pain. Bhante referred to recognizing that the body and mind are processes, that there are processes at work. He mentioned the five aggregates and said somebody would give a talk about that at some point. And that's tonight.

I'm not going to try to do a detailed talk on the five aggregates, but rather talk about them in terms of body and mind processes, and in particular how these processes come together to create suffering, to create our reactivity.

The five bodily and mental processes are form or body, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. I'm going to talk about these in a way that hopefully won't seem like they're just concepts, but rather how we can experience these or know these as processes in our direct experience. Because that's where the freedom comes—from actually witnessing our body and mind as processes. This is how disidentification begins to happen. When the mind understands that things are process, it begins to naturally disidentify with them.

While I'm exploring this from the perspective of reactivity and how reactivity is created in the mind, I want to be really clear that these five processes are at work all the time in our experience, whether wholesome experience is happening or unwholesome experience is happening. The experience of being mindful, knowing what's happening in the moment, the creation of concentration—all of this is the five aggregates at work too. And yet we do often identify through the process of reactivity, so that's where I'd like to explore this topic tonight.

In particular, I'd also like to come at this from the perspective of seeing if we can start to tease apart processes of body from processes of mind. I mentioned on the first evening that one aspect of wise mindfulness is to begin to tease apart or tease away things that might be confused with each other, so that we're very clear about what we're looking at. Sometimes when we're exploring the experience of body, it seems like we're exploring the body, but actually it's all mixed up with whether it's pleasant or unpleasant, whether we like it or don't like it. We get it all confused, and beginning to tease apart what body is and what mind is can be a really helpful doorway to understanding these mental processes.

When I first heard about the five aggregates, it seemed like something totally abstract. And yet these processes are very observable. We can know them and experience them and begin to see our experience in terms of these processes.

So the place I'd like to begin is with a familiarity with what the body is. Familiarity with bodily experience can help us sort out when we're experiencing bodily sensations and when we are relating through mental processes.

We've covered this a couple of times now, and Bhante talked about it this morning—the actual bodily sensations. We often relate to our bodily experience through ideas about the body, through concepts like hand or foot or shoulder. And yet what's actually happening is a much more elemental level of sensation. In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha described this elemental level of experience in terms of the four elements: earth, air, fire, and water.

Let me explore these sensations with you now, as a kind of guided meditation, to experience bodily sensations through these doorways of earth, air, fire, and water.

First, earth element. This is the aspect of experience that feels somewhat solid, that has a solidity to it. Sensations of earth are sensations like heaviness, density, hardness or softness. In your experience right now, you might notice hardness where your buttocks contacts your chair or cushion or bench. That's an aspect of earth element. You might have access to the sense of weight, just the sense of mass of the body—earth sitting on earth, that weightiness. There might be a sense of the solidity of the bones, the structure of the skeleton. In our direct experience, we can contact these sensations related to earth element.

Then there's air element, which involves sensations connected with movement—tingling, vibration, pulsing, movement, pulling, pushing, tension, expansion, contraction, any sensations associated with movement. As you breathe, feeling the movement of the chest or abdomen, that's air element. If you put your attention in your hands right now, you may have a sense of tingling or pulsing or vibration. You may be able to feel that more generally through the body as well. This quality of movement—sensations that have a quality of movement—is a manifestation of air element.

Then there's fire element: temperature, heat, coolness, everything all along that range. Just now, notice what is your sense of the temperature of your body. Sometimes it's interesting—by putting your hand on your cheek, you can get a difference in temperature. You might notice hands cooler and cheeks warmer, or vice versa. This aspect of our bodily experience, temperature, is fire element.

And then there's water element.

Any kind of moisture. This is most obvious perhaps in perspiration or in saliva. It can also be known in another way—you might blow into your hands and press them together. Blowing into your hands adds a little moisture. So press your hands together and then slowly let them pull apart, just really slowly. You may experience stickiness. That's an aspect of water element, that stickiness. If the moisture weren't there, the stickiness would not be there. So when you're walking, if you walk on bare feet and feel your foot stick to the floor, that's water element.

As we explore our bodily experience, the touch sensations of the body, we begin to notice this elemental level of experience. We're learning the language of the body in this way. This is how the body—one of the ways the body communicates with us—through this sensation level of experience.

As we get familiar with the sensation level of experience, we can start to, in counterpoint or in contrast to this actual sensation level, begin to distinguish and recognize that a lot of what's going on in our experience is mental. The physical and mental are so interwoven they're sometimes hard to tell apart. But as we get really familiar with this very bare elemental level of experience, we can start to tease apart body and mind. Body process from mental process.

Why is it helpful to do that? Why would it be helpful? Partly because it shows us that our body and mind are processes. And as Bhante mentioned this morning, recognizing experience in its process nature helps us to see and recognize that there is just this unending flow of cause and effect, cause and effect.

Experience in the body is a cause that produces a result, an effect in the mind. We stub our toe—physical experience of throbbing and aching—and the mind responds to that in various ways. I'm sure you all have your own way of responding to something like that. So the experience of the body is a process and results in something happening in the mind. This happens all the time.

Processes in the mind result in physical experience in the body. It's not a one-way street. We experience an emotion—anger, joy—and the body experiences sensation. With anger, in my experience, anger has a feeling of pressure, of increasing pressure and heat. Joy has a quality of lightness and kind of uplifting, bubbling or vibrating sensations in the body. Experience in the mind produces result and effect in the body.

So we start to see this interwoven set of processes. We begin to understand, watching this, seeing it as process—we begin to understand that it is simply a process. There's no one here particularly running the show. No one here deciding which process to start and which process to respond with. It's kind of running itself.

And we also start to recognize just how the structure of reactivity is put into place through watching these processes of body and mind work together. That's the exploration I'd like to look at tonight—how reactivity is created through the interplay of these processes.

Having the grounding in recognizing body sensation, we can start to look at what our responses to body sensations are. The most obvious area of mental process that's the easiest to see is emotion. We have an experience in our body—we're chopping vegetables and cut ourselves with a knife. There's that experience of the body. There is actual sensation happening there. And then the mind may react. It may turn into a berating or an aversive energy. It may be curious.

I remember at one point I was doing a self-retreat at home and I cut my finger pretty badly. I was kind of far into the retreat, and so I was like, "Wow, that's interesting. Looks like... hmm, better find somebody to take me to the hospital." So I wrapped it up, put pressure on it. It was five, six o'clock in the morning, but I rang my neighbor's doorbell.

I said, "I cut my finger really badly. I think I need to go to the hospital." And she said, "Don't panic." I don't know whether she was joking or not. But it was just like, "Wow, that's interesting what she's doing."

So, you know, sometimes it could be that the mind is actually pretty calm when something like that happens. There is the body sensation and a response. The physical experience can result in a mental response, and these are two different things. It's really helpful to recognize them as different things.

Often an unpleasant or painful physical sensation will result in an aversive reaction in the mind. And that experience—the physical experience and the mental reaction—are different things. It's really helpful to recognize that.

And likewise with emotions, the other direction of the relationship between body and mind. Really helpful to know the difference between the emotion and the impact that emotion has on the body, to not conflate the physical experience in the body with the emotion itself.

This is actually a really helpful exploration. At one point on a retreat—it was a three-month course, and I don't remember exactly when, probably fairly far in, I think in the second half—I was waiting for an interview. I had noticed that very often waiting for interviews, I became anxious. Is this familiar? It's a pretty common response. You haven't spoken in three days, you've got fifteen minutes, and it feels like a high-pressure situation in that context.

So I was waiting for my interview and feeling this quivering in the body. I was using noting at that point, noting the experiences: anxiety, anxiety, anxiety is happening, anxiety. I sat there noting that, and the interview ahead of me went on for a really long time, so I got to hang out with this for quite a while—ten minutes or so.

What was curious to me was that usually by that point in the retreat, when I really met something with mindfulness, things started to shift and change. Something happened as I explored it; it didn't stay static. But this experience stayed kind of static. I just kept noting: okay, anxiety, anxiety, wow, anxiety, anxiety, okay, anxiety.

At some point, noticing that there wasn't much shifting happening, I got more curious about the actual sensations in the body. I started exploring: what are those sensations? Wow, there's quivering, and it's like rapid movement up the body, this shaking, quivering feeling moving rapidly, rising through the body.

As I touched into the actual physical experience, I recognized that what was happening was rapture, not anxiety. The mind had confused the physical sensations of quivering and the context I was in—waiting for an interview—and had decided anxiety was what was happening. Because I was recognizing it through the lens of interpreting it as anxiety, I think it wasn't allowing the experience to really move. When I got more interested in what the actual sensation was, then it became more clear to me what was actually going on.

This is a case of really starting to tease apart physical experience from mental experience. Many emotions, actually—very early in my practice, one teacher mentioned something, and I didn't quite understand what he was saying at the time, but he said, "I've noticed that lust and rage have very similar bodily sensations." If you're in a particular situation, it can be easy to confuse or misassign a particular bodily sensation to a given emotion because there are some similar experiences. Sometimes it's helpful to just recognize what actually is the body sensation. Heaviness around the heart—that's an experience. We lay something over it like, "Oh, that means I'm sad." Maybe, maybe not. Be willing to enter into and explore the actual physical sensations.

I want to just remind you at this point that this aspect of the mental processes of emotions is in the realm of what in the aggregates is mental formation. Emotions are found in the aggregate of mental formations. Emotions, particularly reactive emotions, are found in this category—anger, confusion, frustration, anxiety—all of those are found in this category of mental formations.

But this is not all that this aspect of mental formations is. In fact, there are states of mind or processes of mind, I should say, in that category of mental formation that we wouldn't even call emotions. Things like mindfulness is a mental formation. Concentration is a mental formation. Tranquility is a mental formation.

I just want to broaden the lens here. I'm not going to talk about mental formations in detail tonight, and I think somebody else will at some point offer a more detailed five aggregates talk. But just to remind you that the five aggregates are not simply about looking at reactivity. A subtler level of mental formation is liking and not liking. This is still in the realm of mental formations, and yet it's a bit subtler than the emotional realm.

And sometimes liking and not liking is a little more closely intertwined with the sensation level of experience, counterpointing bodily sensation and mental sensation. The experience itself—the physical experience—and whether we like it or don't like it are different things. We suffer around liking and not liking, sometimes precisely because they're subtler. They're not the big reactive emotions. They're not anger and aversion and major wanting. It's more like, "Well, I like that. I don't like that." It's quiet enough that sometimes we don't actually recognize the liking and not liking as a separate thing happening in our experience. We may just brush by it. It might not even be clearly noticed. But it does cause suffering—particularly in my own experience, the not liking.

I was noticing this just yesterday. I was taking a walk and I noticed that I was walking and I didn't like to be walking. I was doing this for my exercise, so the walking was happening and not liking was happening. I've seen this before quite a bit, so it stuck out to me, and I began recognizing: okay, not liking is happening.

Before I began noticing that distinction—before I started recognizing, "Yes, walking's happening and not liking is happening"—I would be walking along in my neighborhood and notice a little subtle movement of mind when I realized I wasn't liking the walking. The next thing the mind did was, "Oh, but it's so nice out here. There are lovely trees. You can look at the sky. You can like walking." My mind tried to convince me to like the walking. What was actually going on was not liking, but the mind was trying to convince me I should like the walking.

I recognized that, and have seen in the past, that this is a trap. In some ways we think—and in mindfulness practice in particular we think—that in order to be doing something, we have to want to do it. We have to like doing it. So if we notice we're not liking something, like practicing for example, we might think we have to convert that not liking: "No, I really do like to practice."

What I've seen is that it's really, really helpful to just notice: not wanting to practice is happening. Not liking practice is happening right now. That's what's happening. It's really helpful to recognize that as a mind state.

What I noticed as I recognized, "Oh yeah, walking is happening and not liking is happening," was that when I stopped trying to convince myself that I should like to walk—when I stopped doing that and just watched the walking and the not liking—the not liking would fall away for a few moments. Then there'd just be walking, and there'd be such an ease as the not liking dissipated and fell apart. And then it would come back, and it would be, "Okay, not liking is happening," and then it would fall apart again. I was just watching this process of walking happening and liking or not liking appearing and disappearing. Knowing it when it was there and knowing it when it wasn't there. Just as the sutta described, recognizing the presence and the absence of that not liking. Very simple.

Another mental process at work, which I have tangentially referred to, is this process of feeling, feeling tone. I'll actually say a bit more about this tomorrow morning in the instructions. Feeling—the feeling tone, the aggregate of feeling—isn't about the emotional realm. It's about this much more basic realm of whether experience is recognized as pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

This feeling tone, when related to bodily experience, can often be very conflated with the bodily experience itself. It's so close. If we're experiencing a stabbing or a burning or a tearing or a searing sensation, the unpleasantness of that is going to be right there. It's hard to understand that unpleasantness as a mental experience, as a mental phenomenon. Yet it is understood in the Buddha's teaching that pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral are mental phenomena, whether they relate to the pleasant or unpleasant sensations of our bodily experience or of our mental experience. All experience, whether mental or physical, has an aspect that relates to this feeling tone. All experience has a quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant—one of those.

And so it's easy to understand how something like happiness carries a pleasant feeling tone. It's easy to understand how a mental experience would have a mental feeling tone, but a little harder to understand how a physical feeling would have a mental feeling tone. I'll just point you back to what Bhante talked about this morning regarding phantom pain in the body. From what I understand, neurobiologists point to this place of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral as being located in the brainstem. That's where it's constructed. If you do something to that area of the brainstem, the experience of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral goes away. That's my understanding from what I've heard about it.

Another way we become confused about feeling tone is that we often think the feeling tone—whether pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—is somehow inherent in the experience itself. But feeling tone is actually highly conditioned, based on the mental climate of our mind, on what expectations are present, on our culture, conditions in the world, and choices we've made in the past.

Here's a basic example. For me, comfort food would probably be mashed potatoes, something like that. As a child, it just seemed like the pleasantness of mashed potatoes was inherent in the mashed potatoes themselves. Then I got to go to the South Pacific. I was in the Peace Corps for two years on an island called Vanuatu. The comfort food there is something called lap-lap. It's created by mashing up an island yam, which is nothing like the yams we have here. It's very starchy, and when you grate it, it just oozes—this really gelatinous, oozy substance. They mash it all up, pat some fish into it, lay it out on banana leaves, and let it cook for hours. It turns into this very dense, chewy substance, which to me was very unpleasant. It was hard for me to eat this. But it was their comfort food. That's what they grew up with, just as I grew up with mashed potatoes. I could see their mouths watering as the lap-lap came out of the ground. And I'm thinking, "Okay, I have to eat this," because they so wanted me to enjoy it. This is pleasant and unpleasant depending on conditions and culture. Expectations in the mind condition pleasant and unpleasant. State of mind can condition pleasant and unpleasant too.

Here's another experience I had. One evening, quite a while ago, probably early in my practice, I had developed a habit of getting up to meditate when I had insomnia instead of lying in bed trying to fall asleep. So I got up to meditate one night, and while I was meditating, I started hearing this sound—this quiet little tapping that seemed to be coming from the wall. It would start, tap for a little while, then stop and be quiet. Then it would tap again.

My initial experience was that the tapping was unpleasant. I recognized that, and I was using the noting practice. I noticed the sound and recognized: unpleasant. It wasn't hugely unpleasant. I kept observing, kept watching, and at some point I noticed that when the tapping started, there was a contraction in the body. That contracted feeling was also unpleasant. Okay, so there's sound—unpleasant. There's contraction—unpleasant. I was just observing that. Then at some point in all of this observation, I noticed that just as the tapping started, there was a flash of fear. That was really unpleasant, definitely unpleasant. It wasn't major fear, but the body got flooded with this sense of "something's in the wall, it's going to get me." Maybe a rat—I don't know what my mind created there, but it created the idea of something dangerous and scary on the other side of that wall making that tapping sound.

As soon as that fear was seen, the next time I heard the tapping, the sound itself was pretty neutral. The sound had been colored—the experience of the sound as unpleasant had been because the mind was seeing it through this fear. A lot of our pleasant and unpleasant experience comes out of the climate of our mind.

This is really helpful to notice, how these two aggregates interweave. The emotion of fear—a mental formation—laying like a filter over experience so that physical sensation, or sound in this case, was experienced as unpleasant. The feeling aggregate. Seeing how these interplayed, then recognizing clearly the fear, seeing the difference.

It's not the sound that's unpleasant. It's the fear that's unpleasant. Seeing how these interweave and are intertwined can be a very interesting exploration. Through coming back to the body, noticing what's actually happening, recognizing—okay, there's body, there's feeling, and there's emotion or reactivity.

As we understand this difference, the way these three fit together—the bodily experience, the pleasant or unpleasant quality, the liking or not liking, and the emotional response—we start to see this whole show. Watching that, seeing fear creating the conditions of experiencing something as unpleasant, that's beginning to understand disidentification. Seeing that the fear was a process that conditioned how something was felt.

We begin to recognize another way to explore this. We begin to see that our aversion to physical pain conditions how pain is felt. When the aversion falls away, when we can know, "Oh, this is aversion"—here's the physical side of it, here's the aversion, here's the mental side of it. The mental side is the aversion. The physical side is the sensation level—the tearing, the stabbing, the twisting, the burning. And then there's the unpleasantness, which is another aspect. Seeing all of these as processes interweaving, we see it's just process—the cause and effect relationship between these areas.

Another aspect of the aggregates, another area to explore, is the aggregate of perception. Perception is an even more subtle mental process than either mental formations or feeling. It's a process in the mind by which we recognize what's happening. It's a very natural process. We couldn't live without it, so we're definitely not trying to stop perception from happening.

Perception is the mind's capacity to recognize experience through repeated exposure. We hear a bell over and over again. The very first time we hear something like that, it might be, "Huh, what's that?" And we really take it in. Then we hear it over and over again, and it begins to just be, "Oh, that's the bell." We begin to experience sounds, smells, tastes, touches—all of our experience—this way. "That's the bell." The actual sound is pitch and tone and frequency. And then in our minds, the idea or the concept of "bell" happens.

It's a really useful process. It's how we can navigate the world easily without exhausting ourselves every day. You know why babies need to sleep so much? They're creating their concepts. I think that's part of why it's exhausting to meet things new, to do this pattern matching and recognize, "This is what this is, this is what this is, this is what this is." Perception is kind of a shortcut in a sense.

So it's not a process we're going to stop, and yet it's a very helpful process to recognize and be clearly aware of as a process in the mind, because it's a doorway through which confusion enters. When we don't clearly understand that we're perceiving something and seeing our experience through that perception, confusion arises.

Just think for a moment of looking out in a room and seeing people. Your ideas about people have been formed through your whole life. The idea of "people" in your mind comes with a lot of stuff. Some of that stuff may be related to how your parents treated you, or how your teachers in school treated you. When we relate to experience through concept and don't recognize that we are relating to experience through concept, a whole host of conditioned stuff can come along for the ride. We often mistake the concept that we're relating to for reality. It doesn't even occur to us that we're relating through the idea of "bell."

There's a very quick movement from an experience to the concept about the experience. And from that concept, because concept is so close to thought, thoughts can come in that avenue. So we're sitting here in the hall and we hear a sound. First there's just hearing, and then pretty quickly there's a recognition of what that sound is—it's the sound of a car driving down Pleasant Street. And that idea of a car driving down Pleasant Street may appear in the mind as an image of a car driving down Pleasant Street, or it might appear as a word: "car."

And we say "car" in our mind, as a label almost. This is the process of perception at work.

You might notice this actually. Hearing is, I think, one of the easiest doorways where we can see or experience this process of perception happening, because there is often a distinction between our usual ways of thinking and the experience of hearing. The sound of the car going down the street is one thing, and then the image of a car in our mind or saying the word "car" to ourselves is another thing.

You'll notice that this process reveals another place to see the automatic nature of experience. You're probably not going to be able to stop yourself from saying "car" or from seeing that image. It's just the process of perception doing its job. We hear something and the mind recognizes it and identifies it in its own particular way. Playing with sound can be a very fun way to explore this process of perception.

So we're back listening to the car, hearing the car drive down Pleasant Street. We've noticed there's a car. We've seen—you know, we probably haven't clearly recognized the perception of "car" when we start thinking about cars driving down Pleasant Street and where they're going. That car might be going to Berry. There's a Dunkin' Donuts in Berry and they have cappuccinos. I probably shouldn't have mentioned that.

The mind goes off into thought from not seeing this perception at work. We hear, there's the perception of "car," and then we start thinking about it. Maybe we do recognize or remember that there's a place to get cappuccinos in Berry, and then we start thinking—but we're not supposed to leave, and oh, I'm captive here, and oh, this is a prison, and I hate this prison... Reactivity is born from the sound, a perception and a thought not noticed.

This is one of the prime ways the mind wanders—through not seeing that we've perceived something. It's also a way that reactivity can come in, another avenue for reactivity. In that case, the sound of the car was not particularly unpleasant; it might just be kind of a wave. But then there was the recognition that it was a car, and the not really seeing that the mind started to think about cars and where it might go and what you might have if you could escape here. And then realizing: what you're reacting to in that experience is a construction of the mind. The thought "this is a prison, I can't get out of here, it's another three months or six weeks, oh my gosh!"—it's an idea in the mind to which we are reacting.

This process of perception, and watching perception happen when we can—it's a pretty subtle process. It's not something to try to do. In fact, one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says, "Nothing I tell you is anything to do. It's just information." Having talked about this, it may open you to seeing something new in your experience.

Many times I've had people come into interviews and say, "I can't stop labeling experience. I'm trying not to note, but I can't stop doing it." When I talk to them a little bit further, I recognize that what they're actually seeing is the process of perception at work. Their mind is noticing car, bird, movement, and it's recognizing it in this kind of word-forming way in the mind. Hearing about this can help you see that this too is just a process at work in your mind. It's not something to do, but it is something you might recognize, something you might notice.

The fifth aspect of the aggregates, the fifth aggregate, is consciousness. Consciousness is the knowing faculty of mind. Every experience that we have comes with this knowing process. A physical experience is known. A mental experience is known. It's like two sides of a coin. Every experience we have—there's the experience in the realm of the physical: vibration, pulling, pulsing, tingling—and then there's knowing of it. There's the experience of breath, the dynamic changing sensations of breath, and the knowing of it.

The knowing is a pretty subtle experience, but it can be kind of clear once we start to recognize it. Like right now—do you know that your lips are touching? There's the sensations, and there is a knowing that that's happening. It's actually a pretty simple experience. One of the instructions in the Satipatthana Sutta around breathing: "Breathing in, know that you're breathing in." It can be that simple, actually—pointing to the knowing of experience.

Sometimes the sensations can be quite delicate and quiet, and we may find ourselves straining to perceive the sensation level of experience. Yet we can settle back and recognize that there's a knowing of breathing in. Just now, breathing in, breathing out. Do you know that you're breathing in? Do you know that you're breathing out? Don't look too deep for this. This is an ongoing process in the mind. Again, like with feeling, every experience comes with this knowing. Not something to look for, but you may at times recognize that the mind attunes to or notices that it knows something. Breathing in, knowing breathing in. Breathing out, knowing breathing out.

An exploration of these processes of body and mind can help us to disidentify, to not take these processes as I or me or mine. As we explore these experiences and see the cause and effect relationships, the interweaving of these experiences, we see there can't possibly be an "I" in there directing the show. There's not a "me." So it helps us to disidentify from what is happening.

Also helping the disidentification is seeing this simple process of reactivity—again, as a process. We see the process by which suffering is created. We see very clearly that we're clinging, we're holding on to something. Largely what we're holding on to is something created by the mind. And as the mind sees this, as the mind sees its own contribution to the reactivity, sees its own contribution to the suffering that we experience, the mind begins to figure out and understand how to let go.

Because the mind doesn't want to suffer. The mind doesn't want to suffer! It gets confused. The poor mind gets confused. It's tried for so long in certain ways to find happiness and thinks that it's got to be out there somewhere. And this exploration begins to reveal that the happiness comes from letting go.

So let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 98

Patience

Andrea Fella · 57 min

In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of patience (khantī) as a fundamental quality for meditation practice and the path to liberation. She begins by examining the different manifestations of impatience—the eager anticipation of future pleasant experiences and the aversion to present unpleasant ones—revealing how both patterns disconnect us from direct experience of the present moment.

Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu and others, Fella introduces the metaphor of the farmer's patience: understanding that results require time and sustained effort, not passive waiting. She emphasizes that patience is an active, engaged quality involving gentle persistence and willingness to meet experience moment after moment, like a naturalist observing the night sky without preconceptions. The analogy of fruit ripening on a tree illustrates how practice involves imperceptible sweetening—subtle shifts in understanding that eventually lead to release and insight.

Fella also addresses patience with difficult states and cycles of practice, noting that increased mindfulness naturally reveals more dukkha. She explores patience in the context of responding to injustice, drawing on Gandhi's philosophy and Martin Luther King Jr.'s teachings on meeting opposition with love rather than hatred. The talk culminates in discussing the deepest aspect of patience: radical acceptance of things as they already are in this moment, which paradoxically enables wise action. As the Burmese saying goes, 'Patience is the road to Nibbāna.'

I'm told that in the early days of IMS—been here 40 years now, that's pretty amazing, isn't it?—in the early days of IMS, they got mail addressed using that acronym in different ways. One of those was addressed to the Instant Meditation Society. That reflects the kind of culture we have. We expect instant gratification or, at least, results after two weeks. I mean, we've been here for two weeks and what do we have to show for it? Well, we've been sitting and walking.

So tonight I'd like to talk about the quality of patience.

One of the ways in to explore patience is to look at the different ways we get impatient. There are different ways we get impatient, and that can help us understand some of the different qualities of patience.

One of the ways we get impatient that I think is very familiar to us, perhaps from the time we were children, is that we get impatient waiting for something good to happen in the future. Birthdays, holidays, end of school. I remember being so excited about certain things coming. That quality of impatience is there from a very young age—that kind of expectation or anticipation of something good to happen in the future.

When we start to look at this, and this is what our practice asks of us—to look at these qualities, to look at what happens in our minds—think about how you feel when you get impatient in this way. There's often some excitement, some kind of leaning towards, a sense of how great it's going to be when that happens. That's how I was when I was a kid anyway. And that kind of mind state is believing—believing that something in the future is going to be better than something now. There's some future configuration of experience that will be so wonderful.

I just want to point you back to something Bhante said yesterday about how all that's happening is just these sixth sense experiences. That's all that's happening. And yet we are excited waiting for some configuration of sixth sense experience. That's what's happening when we get impatient like that.

So think about how you feel. There is the excitement, and if there's the kind of projection into the future, we're really in our thoughts thinking about how great it's going to be. We're anticipating future pleasantness, feeling happy about future pleasantness, and completely ignoring the fact that right now it's actually kind of agitating. There's a restlessness in experience when we have this kind of impatience. I could hardly sit still when I was a kid waiting for my birthday.

This kind of impatience for something good to happen comes into our practice. We get impatient for some good meditative experience. Perhaps we've had a taste of calm or ease or peace, and having had that taste, we want it back. We want more of it. There's an impatient quality. It's like, there's this experience happening now, but it's kind of like, "Yeah, yeah, yeah, I know I'm supposed to be paying attention to aversion and stuff, but what's really important, where the action really is, is where it's really calm." And so we get impatient for that experience to come.

I think Steve Armstrong coined the phrase: there's nothing like a good sit to ruin your day. You have a good sit and then you spend the rest of the day wanting it back.

So what do we do here? What's a helpful thing to do in this kind of situation? Notice the impatience. This is actually a helpful strategy. If we want to cultivate a wholesome quality—whether patience or love or happiness or kindness—we can look at what gets in its way. To cultivate patience, we can get familiar with impatience.

So what does it mean to notice impatience? To notice in particular this kind of impatience of leaning into experience, of hoping for something good to happen? The first thing is just to check in: What's this? What is this experience of impatience? It probably has an experience in the body; there's probably some agitation. There's often a lot in the world of thoughts and mind states going on around impatience.

On one retreat—I think it was my first three-month course—I remember doing walking meditation and I kept having all these thoughts about talking to my teacher. Any of you had that experience? What I realized was that in those thoughts there was this impatience for something good to happen. I was having a wanting, an impatience, for insight into impermanence. And this was manifesting by imagining I was having conversations with my teacher, telling him—that I was having all these amazing insights into impermanence. And as I explored this, as I looked at this whole process of what was going on there, I saw that what I really wanted was to tell somebody I had had these great experiences. Because I had no clue what an insight into impermanence actually looked like. I didn't even know what I wanted.

This is very interesting, actually—this happens to us in practice. When we're impatient for results, often we're impatient for some idea, because often we have no clue what it is that we want. What the result is, what we're hoping for. Freedom. Nibbana. We have no clue what that is. And yet we're impatient for it.

So when we look at that, when we look at the actual experience of impatience, we see it's an idea. And in this case what I saw was an idea about wanting to look good to my teacher.

So investigating—what is this experience of impatience?

Thanissaro Bhikkhu talks about patience, this kind of patience with something that we are expecting or hoping to happen in the future, as being the patience of a farmer. I'll read this little section to you from one of his books. One of his teachers, Ajahn Tante, talks about being patient like farmers. Those of you who've never lived on a farm, even you know that farmers don't have an easy life. They work hard, especially in Thailand where they don't have a lot of labor-saving devices. When the time comes to do what needs to be done, they have to do it quickly. In other words, when the rice grains are ready, you have to harvest them quickly before the mice get to them. You have to take care of them quickly, winnow the rice quickly before any late season rain comes to spoil it. So it's not a matter of being slow or casual, this patience of a farmer. The patience of a farmer is the sort that knows you can't plant rice today and expect to have the grains ripen tomorrow. It's going to take time, and during that time it's going to require work.

So patience, using this story, this example, doesn't mean passivity or slowness. There's an active quality to patience. Actually, I think sometimes we think about patience as being kind of sitting back and not doing. That's an idea we sometimes have about what patience is—like, "yeah, whatever." But the patience of our practice is a patience that is engaged. It's got a persistence to it.

So this brings in one of the qualities of patience: this gentle, persistent connecting with experience. This aspect of patience points to perseverance, diligence, steadiness, steadfastness. And one of the keys with this aspect of patience is patience with results—continuing our practice even if it seems like nothing is happening.

Sometimes in practice things feel like they're just in a flat place or an even place and it doesn't seem like much is happening. In those times we can feel like, "What am I doing wrong?" Nothing seems particularly wrong, but our instant gratification kicks in—where's the result?

Sometimes results ripen slowly. Think about the way fruit ripens on a tree. The apples are coming into season right now, and the apples are hanging on the tree and they may look really ripe. They look nice and red on the outside. And yet there's an imperceptible sweetening that happens on the inside. Day by day you may not notice any change as you look at that apple. But you may reach and try to pull on it and it doesn't release from the tree very easily. And so you know it's not ready, it's not ripe. Day by day you don't see much change. But there is an imperceptible sweetening happening. And one day you reach and the apple releases easily in your hand.

The practice of patience can have this quality where it seems like nothing is happening, and yet no moment of mindfulness is wasted. There can be these subtle shifts, subtle meetings—these meetings of experience that gently allow the connection to become more and more clear. And at some point the mind releases and understands something it didn't understand. But it's not just about that one moment.

It's not just about the moment when the apple falls into your hand. It's also about all those many, many moments of sweetening. And so in our practice, often we need to cultivate this quality of patience with that imperceptible sweetening, the imperceptible sense of understanding that's growing, that will allow for release at some point.

Kamala Masters has a story from her own practice around this. She was in a place of just feeling like not much was happening, and she went and talked to her teacher about it. Munindraji used this analogy of the fruit. He said, "When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree." I heard her say that and just used it over and over again. It became a little mantra for me: when the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree. A reminder that I don't have control over when the ripening happens. All we can really do is meet experience moment after moment. And when the time is ripe, when the conditions are ripe, understanding will happen.

As we persist in our practice with this gentle persistence, sometimes it seems that little more than will keeps us coming back—that place where it feels like not much is happening. We need to apply that persistence, connect, just meet this moment and this moment and this moment. But over time we do start to experience benefits in small ways and in large ways. In our meetings, you've all talked about even small ways of seeing how the mind can meet something challenging and be okay about it. There's a little shift of perspective around our usual relationship to the hindrances. Or we actually recognize happiness and feel it and know it, instead of grasping after it.

This was one of my patterns actually. At one point I realized I talked myself out of happiness. Happiness arose and rather than allowing myself to feel it, I began telling myself things along the lines of, "Well, yes, I'm happy now, but this isn't going to last. Besides that, I know most of the time I'm miserable." Or if I was connecting with the happiness, I might get lost in a story about how to keep it, instead of really just opening to it here and now. Sometimes we need patience to open to beautiful things too.

I remember one time I was sitting at my table having a meal. It was not during a retreat but in daily life, perhaps soon after a retreat. Some wave of joy arose in my experience, and it was a little overwhelming. The first thing my mind said was, "Whoa, I can't handle this," and it tried to shut it down. Then some wisdom in my mind said, "It's okay, it's impermanent, it won't last." That actually let me feel it more fully. It crested and got very strong, and then on the other side there was just this pervading happiness. So even patience with wholesome states sometimes, allowing ourselves to truly open to these beautiful states—it's not just about patience with hindrances.

These little shifts over time begin to encourage us. They begin to encourage the persistence, partly because we are experiencing the benefit of the practice. We are experiencing how the practice works. This generates confidence, it generates faith, it sometimes can generate a sense of curiosity. All of these qualities then in turn support more patience, and so it becomes a positive feedback loop.

Sometimes in this place of not seeming like much is happening, another analogy can be helpful: our job here is to meet our experience as if we were a naturalist looking at something new in our environment. Sayadaw U Tejaniya used this example. He said, think about the first people that went out under the stars at night, our ancestors way long ago. The first ones that actually looked up and had a cognizance of the stars in the night sky. There wasn't anybody to tell them what was happening up there. They just would go out each night and look at the sky. Over time they began to see patterns. They noticed perhaps over a very long stretch of time that certain of those patterns were present in the spring and certain of them present in the fall, certain present at certain times of year and others present at other times. Just noticing the patterns. Nobody there to tell them about it. Now we've got all these books.

You know, you can go out now and find out which stars are up at certain times of the year, and which ones appear at other times. In the Northern Hemisphere, you can always find the North Star and orient yourself from there. We have people to tell us these things. Our ancestors didn't have that. What did they do? They went out and looked at the sky over and over and over again. They began to understand something about it through repeated observation, through the repeated meeting of experience.

Our practice is like that. We explore our experience as naturalists, with no need to overlay an idea about what is there, but rather with a curiosity about what is here. The patterns begin to reveal themselves. That's how insight works, in a way—the patterns of our minds begin to show themselves just through the willingness to meet experience over and over again.

Another kind of impatience that may be familiar to you is the impatience to get rid of, get over, or get past something unpleasant. This is an impatience connected to aversion toward what's happening in the present moment. For me, this was a big part of my life, this aspect of impatience.

One of the early places it really showed up was toward the end of my first three-month course, about two weeks before that retreat was over. There was so much impatience. I saw that transitions were very uncomfortable for me, and I was really impatient to have that transition over with. There was the unpleasantness of uncertainty about the transition, but also there was the idea of transition—and I didn't like that idea. Get me out of here. It was very painful for those last two weeks.

Actually, I got to have a little wake-up call, because I was so impatient to get home. Some of it was wondering how much I had changed—how great was it going to be when I got home? What would my friends think? So there was the impatience about the unpleasantness of the transition, but also an impatience to check out what I'd learned on retreat.

At some point in those last two weeks, I got a very sore throat. I looked in my throat and saw some very odd-looking things there. I realized I should go to the clinic, so I made an appointment and went. I sat at the clinic, and there was all this music playing and people bustling around. I looked around and thought: this is what I was impatient for. This is life outside. This is what I was waiting for. Reality check—this isn't so great. Again, it's just the six sense bases happening over and over again.

So we are impatient at times about something unpleasant in our present experience. We can see this kind of impatience in small ways too—like the impatience standing in the lunch line, waiting for the people ahead of you to make their salad or cut their fruit. Or the impatience as you're opening a drawer in your room and it sticks a little bit—just a little flash of irritation. Sometimes through these small moments, we can get familiar with this quality of impatience about unpleasantness.

At one point in my practice, I recognized that impatience was a big mind state for me. It happened a lot, and mostly what I saw were the big impatiences—the impatience about the end of a retreat, the impatience about a major life transition, the impatience to know something so I didn't have to be in this in-between ground. So I decided to make a study of impatience. I began noticing when impatience came up in my life, exploring patience by getting familiar with its opposite quality.

And it was everywhere. I was impatient when I was brushing my teeth. I was impatient when my shower ended—impatient to finish drying off and get on to the next thing. I began to see that it was very helpful not to just brush past those small impatiences. Sometimes when little impatiences flare up, little aversions, we think, "Oh, that's not a big deal." We kind of overlay something on top of it—as I was talking about the other day—like "Oh, it's so lovely taking a walk," instead of recognizing the impatience for the walk to be over, knowing the not wanting to be walking. We can overlay and not clearly recognize that in truth there is this little flash of impatience. This little flash.

So it can be really helpful to get familiar with those little flashes. The skill that you develop in meeting the small ones supports you in being able to meet the pattern when it gets large. Because the pattern in the small is very similar to the pattern in the large—it's just not quite grown so much yet. And so there's a lot you can understand by looking at it in the small. It's not so hard to be with when it's small, so you can learn a great deal about that.

Sometimes in practice, small things can seem very large. We have a name for this phenomenon. We call it yogi mind. It seems to happen as we settle in retreat. We get more settled, more calm, and then small things become so huge. Like the way somebody uses their knife—it becomes disastrous.

The classic story of yogi mind comes from a retreat that happens in the desert in California each year. This must have happened in the 80s sometime, but somebody apparently left a note for the managers asking if they would mind calling the airport to get them to reroute the planes flying overhead. They obviously didn't know there was a retreat center happening there, and they could clearly reroute the planes so that they wouldn't disturb the yogis when the planes flew overhead. This is an example of yogi mind—something small becoming like, "This needs to be fixed now."

This is about the time in retreat when this kind of thing happens, so you might be noticing things like this, where it seems like the reaction is out of proportion to the actual event. If you're noticing something like that, it's very natural. It's part of the process. Just recognize: okay, yogi mind is happening. You don't need to believe the story that this is a major problem and we need to ask the managers to do something about it. Check in to what's actually happening. Sometimes there may be a bit of over-response, over-reactivity. Just remind yourself of yogi mind and see if you can be patient with the small things, partly by reminding yourself that they are small. But not repressing the response—that's not what this is about. There can be a big response. Know that response, but remind yourself of what's actually happening.

This kind of impatience—being impatient when something unpleasant is happening—we can also see in larger ways around issues of injustice, things that actually need to change in this society. There are two sides I'd like to explore around patience in this kind of scenario.

One aspect, when we think about this kind of patience, is that it points to qualities of forbearance, tolerance, patience under insult. How do we meet experience with a patient mind? And so one side of the exploration is to look at when it is skillful to act and when it is skillful to refrain from acting.

For instance, if there's a sense that something is wrong or off and there's real anger and aversion about it, a sense of hatred in the mind, it may be helpful to explore that in the mind and not allow the hatred to leak out into experience. Perhaps somebody says something to you and you realize that it's not fair or it's an injustice, and you have a flaring up. Maybe there's a recognition of the aversion or ill will in the mind at that point, and so you settle back. This isn't about repressing the feeling. There may be an exploration of what it's like to fully allow that feeling—that's wrong, that person is behaving unskillfully and causing harm, and I'm really mad about that. To not repress all of that, but also to explore not letting it leak out into our actions. Perhaps taking a pause before responding. So that's one side of the exploration: looking at whether this is the time for action, or the time to explore inwardly what's happening.

Another side—and there are probably more sides to this than I'm bringing up right now—is that there are times when definitely action is called for. The practice of patience itself doesn't necessarily mean passivity. It doesn't mean non-action. Gandhi had a beautiful phrase for his philosophy of engagement with the repressive regime of British rule in India. He had a philosophy of non-passive, non-violent, non-cooperation.

In this case, my exploration or my understanding is that the tolerance or forbearance here isn't about saying that it's okay that this injustice is happening. It's about forbearance with the process of change. Taking action and understanding, knowing that sometimes action doesn't create change immediately.

Martin Luther King had a beautiful way of expressing this, and he called it a philosophy of love. This is from his famous 1963 speech:

"There's another thing about this philosophy, this philosophy of love, that says you can stand before an unjust system and resist it with all your might and yet maintain an attitude of active goodwill toward the perpetrators of that unjust system."

He goes on to say that the ethic of love can stand at the center of the nonviolent movement. "In many instances we've been able to stand before the most violent opponents and say in substance: We will meet your capacity to inflict suffering by our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet your physical force with soul force. Do to us what you will and we will still love you. Throw us in jail and we will still love you. Threaten our children and bomb our homes and our churches, and as difficult as it is, we will still love you. Send your hooded perpetrators of violence into our communities at midnight hours and drag us onto some wayside road and beat us and leave us half dead, and as difficult as it is, we will still love you. But be assured that we will wear you down by our capacity to suffer, and one day we will win our freedom. We will not only win our freedom for ourselves, we will so appeal to your heart and your conscience that we will win you in the process, and our victory will be a double victory."

This bringing of the quality of love to action rather than hatred—in our practice, this soul force, this force of love to meet difficult experience, can be so helpful. We can cultivate patience with the difficulties of practice. And the more mindful we get, the more we see them. This is one of the ironies of our practice. It's not a mistake when you see mindfulness revealing more suffering. It's not that the suffering wasn't there. It's that the mindfulness is revealing it. I think it was Trungpa Rinpoche who said practice is one insult after another. That's what it feels like.

And so we can cultivate patience with our own minds. We've actually spent a lot of years cultivating our habits, our patterns of mind. We've practiced over and over again the ways that we react. And so it's not surprising that one three-month retreat, or two weeks of a retreat, or six weeks of retreat is not going to uproot a whole lifetime—if not multiple lifetimes—of habit. The first noble truth: understand dukkha. And for us in practice, this also means being patient with the cycles of practice.

Pretty much most of the people I've talked to have experienced some form of cycle in the practice where there have been periods of ease and peace followed by periods of chaos and confusion and hindrance attacks. This is part of the process. I think it was Sharon who talked about this using an analogy of firing a rocket. There's a lot of junk up in space—old satellites and parts of things. Apparently there's a big garbage dump up there. In order to fire a rocket, you need to know where all that stuff is, and then when there's a clear space, you can fire. It's kind of like that. The mind moves into a space where there's clearness perhaps, some ease, some peace. And parts of the psyche that haven't had their day in the sun yet are going, "Oh, my turn now!" Then you have some new thing arise, some kind of reactivity.

This is part of the process. One teacher, Michelle McDonald, called it the cycle of purity and purification. Purity and purification. It's a very natural part of this unfolding. And so it's not a mistake when, after a period of ease, it may feel more challenging or more difficult for a time. It's not a mistake. It's part of the natural unfolding of this process.

There are times when it's challenging to be with those difficult states. I appreciate one of Nyanaponika Thera's phrases—he was a German scholar and monastic who worked for the Buddhist Publication Society and wrote many beautiful things. One phrase he had that resonates with me, one of those mantras that comes back: "We aim for a peaceful penetration of the irrational regions of our mind." That's a good description of patience. A peaceful penetration of the irrational regions of our mind. We can think of Gandhi's non-passive, non-violent, non-cooperation with respect to working with these difficult states.

Non-passive in that we meet these hindrances, actively engage with what's happening when it's difficult. Non-violent in that we bring, or try to bring, a mind of kindness to that exploration. And non-cooperation in that we don't let the hindrance just run amok.

Running through the two kinds of impatience—impatience for pleasant things to happen, impatience for unpleasant things to go away—is a deeper pattern of non-acceptance with just how things are in the present moment. And this connects with another aspect of patience, which is a deep kind of acceptance. Acceptance for things as they are.

As we start to touch in and actually meet our experience, we see that what is here, what has arisen—here it is. It's here. It's already here. This anger, this frustration, this joy, this boredom. It's here already. You can't change that. It's already here. And so there's a patience with meeting what's here, and yet learning how to respond skillfully to shape the next moment of experience. This meeting of moment-to-moment experience really begins to show us this unfolding. When we taste this quality of acceptance, we really start to understand the depth of patience, what it's capable of for us in our minds and hearts.

Ajahn Sumedho says, "It's a great relief to accept things the way they are. Because the only real misery is wanting to see them in some other way." This is, again, pointing to this moment. This moment, what's already here. Accepting what is already here. And with wisdom, choosing to step forward.

It's again not about passivity, but about allowing, through the direct meeting of things as they are in this moment. As we meet things as they are, wisdom begins to emerge, and wisdom helps us act. Wisdom is not passive. Wisdom acts for the benefit of ourselves and others. So we can explore this aspect of acceptance. But we cannot rush the process of change. When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree.

Sometimes after we've had some kind of understanding or insight, we've seen into something clearly in a moment, and we have this little thought in our mind of, "Ah, figured that one out." I had that happen at one point on an early retreat when I was at Spirit Rock. I had a kind of shift of perspective around pain in my body. And that shift of perspective allowed me to be completely okay with quite unpleasant sensation. It was one of the first times—I think it maybe was the first time—I really had seen the way a shift of the mind could allow unpleasant physical sensation to be experienced with ease. And the thought that went through my mind—I laugh at this point—it's like, "Wow, I'm glad I don't have to go through that again." I actually thought that I'd figured it out.

And so sometimes—many times—we have an insight. That experience, that shift of perspective of being able to meet, of the mind being at ease with unpleasant experience—that's a moment of insight. It's an understanding in the mind. It's a letting go of something. It's a letting go of craving things to be some other way. An actual releasing of that in the mind in the moment.

Our insights aren't quite like knowledge that, once we've learned them, we can just decide to pick them up. "Oh yeah, I'm having pain right now. Let me pick up that insight I had three weeks ago and put that on." It doesn't work that way. And so sometimes we have to have patience after we've had insights, because insights are impermanent. Patience is actually needed at all points on the path, this quality of patience.

We may have had an insight into the way the mind clings and grasps around pain and seen it release. And yet at another sitting—I remember, I think I was sitting right about there—I was sitting with so much pain in the body, so much dukkha. And I could feel the clinging. I could feel the mind just squeezing down around the pain.

And my mind basically said, "I'd let go if I knew how. I'd let go if I knew what to let go of, how to let go of this." The mind was simply not in the place where it could do that in that moment.

And so we have to meet that experience. This is also not a mistake. This is part of the way the path works, the way the practice unfolds. At that point, the mind is learning about dukkha. It's not just something we say—it's actually true. As the mind really gets it, part of what has to happen is that it truly understands that craving equals dukkha. At very, very deep levels the mind has to understand this message over and over and over again. Some part of our mind just really wants there to be something—anything—out there that we can hold on to that will make us happy. And we have to learn this lesson over and over again.

Through patience with that process of meeting dukkha over and over again, the mind begins to understand. It's like the mind begins to understand how to let go. In that situation I described, I had no idea how to let go of that pain, and I could see that I had no idea. That's the beginning of the insight that this isn't about me doing it. It's about cultivating the conditions for the releasing to happen, for the wisdom to arise and the releasing to occur.

Sometimes we think if only we could get past all this dukkha and be in a state of ease or peace or bliss, that would be great. And so we do, perhaps at times, start to feel happiness or ease or peace—calm, wholesome, beautiful states of mind arising. And we also begin to see... well, we first might think, who would need patience with those? But over time we might find that we start to wonder, "What's next? Is it just about being calm? Is that what this is about? Is that what I signed up for—a life of everything being calm?" Maybe we think, "Is that really what I want? Is that really it?"

The Buddha actually made one reflection once. He said—and this is a paraphrase, I don't have the actual quote—something along the lines of: "The way I found freedom was that I wasn't satisfied with simply experiencing wholesome mind states." It's not just about experiencing wholesome mind states.

And so sometimes we also need the patience to meet this: calm is happening, ease is happening, peace is happening. Without the mind going, "And where's—whatever it is that I'm expecting? Some kind of mind-blowing enlightenment? Where's that?" Calm is like this. Peace is like this. Ease is like this.

There's a saying in Burma: patience is the road to Nibbana. It is through this quality of patient willingness to meet experience—whatever that experience is—to meet pleasant experience, unpleasant experience, neutral experience, to meet change in many forms, to meet dukkha. This willingness to be patiently in the moment—and it is a patience that's right in this moment—that is the quality that allows the unfolding of the practice to lead to freedom.

Let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 99

Mettā Practice: Self, Benefactor and Friend

Andrea Fella · 44 min

> In this guided meditation session, Andrea Fella offers practical instructions for cultivating mettā (loving-kindness) toward self, benefactor, and friend. She shares a key insight that transformed her own practice: treating mettā as an embodied experience rather than a purely mental exercise. The method involves saying each phrase, understanding its meaning, and then checking in with the heart area to notice how the wish resonates physically.
>
> Andrea addresses common challenges that arise during mettā practice, including dryness, hindrances, and the emergence of attachment or longing for loved ones. She explains that mettā is fundamentally a purification practice, using the analogy of a washing machine to illustrate how the practice naturally brings non-mettā qualities to the surface for healing. When attachment arises toward dear friends—what is called the 'near enemy' of mettā—practitioners can simply acknowledge it while continuing with the phrases.
> The talk also covers practical tools for working with difficulty: shifting to compassion phrases when suffering is predominant, returning to easier categories when one person feels too challenging, and the option to set aside mettā temporarily to investigate strong hindrances with mindfulness. Andrea offers guidance on when compassion phrases might be more appropriate than mettā phrases, particularly when a friend is experiencing suffering, and discusses how the context of concentration practice versus heart exploration might inform this choice.

For the metta practice this evening, we'll continue exploring metta for self, benefactor, and friend. I think you've already had quite a bit of suggestions about how to work with the practice, so I'll just offer you one particular piece that was the turning point for me with respect to having the metta practice make sense—what the key instruction was for me and how that worked.

The metta practice is a practice of intention, and we're using words to evoke a quality. Saying the phrase, understanding the meaning of the phrase, is essentially pointing the mind in the direction of metta. The way this works, at least in my understanding, is that words are pretty powerful. You may have noticed this in your meditation—if a thought arises about something, how quickly an emotion can be born in relationship to that thought. What this practice is doing is using thought to evoke this beautiful, wholesome quality of loving-kindness, expressing wishes of kindness.

For me, the key was when I began with each phrase to say the phrase and understand its meaning, so that it's not just rote saying of the words, but really understanding what the meaning of the phrase is. This is just simple dictionary definition; it doesn't have to go any further than that. Just know what the words mean as you say them in your mind. And then take the time to check in: How did that wish, how did that thought, resonate in the heart? I would put my attention in the area of the heart and physically check in. Did that wish have any kind of resonance or impact?

As I explored this, I really began to see metta as an embodied practice and not just a mental practice. Before that, it had felt so much in my head. Coming in with each phrase, checking out—how is the heart right now? What's happening? This also slows down the process of practicing metta, taking the time with each phrase to check in.

At one point, on a month-long metta retreat, I was going through phases in metta, much as you do in the vipassana practice. There was a period where the metta got very dry; there wasn't much going on. I was sitting in the dining room at Spirit Rock, and it just felt so dry. I remembered: I can say the phrase, understand the meaning of the phrase, and just check in. How did that land? How was that in the heart, to express that wish?

As I did that—said the phrase, understood the meaning, checked in—it was as if with each phrase there was the tiniest little shift of warmth or openness or connection. Each time I said the phrase, it was like a gentle blowing on an ember. And the metta just grew. With that experience, I began understanding how the practice of metta can be an embodied practice. That's when it began to make sense for me.

In the guided practice today, we'll start with self, and then at various times I'll suggest that you might want to switch to the next category—to benefactor, to friend. But remember that the metta practice is really a very personal thing, and so the timing I suggest may not be where you are. It may be appropriate for you to either move on more quickly or to stay with one particular category for a while.

Also remember the tools for working when it gets difficult, when the metta is feeling challenging. Challenging doesn't necessarily mean just that it feels dry. If it feels like there's a struggle with working with a particular being, with a lot of hindrances coming up, it's okay to just keep going with that being and let the hindrance be to the side. That was another big aha for me with the metta practice—it was almost a relief not to have to turn and focus on every hindrance that came up. They can be there; just let them wash by. That's a possibility.

But also remember that it's always okay to go back to where it's easier. If it's particularly challenging with one particular person, you can go back to a person where it's easier. Shift back to self or benefactor.

At one point in my practice, I found that even any of the categories—it was just so painful to try to do the metta for my benefactor, for myself. It was as if every phrase put a tightened clamp around my heart. If that happens, one tool you can explore is shifting the phrase to a compassion phrase. For yourself, for instance: "May I be at ease with this suffering," or "May I be free from this suffering." It's fine to shift to compassion if the suffering is what's really strong in your experience.

And of course, if a hindrance is very strong, it's fine to set down the metta, explore the hindrance with mindfulness, and as the hindrance dissipates, come back to the metta.

And just a refresher, a review of the tools for working with difficulty.

Finding yourself in a comfortable posture, allowing the body to be as relaxed as possible. Let the attention settle, rest, take in the experience—the actual felt sense of what's happening in the area of the heart. This area is very sensitive, the seat of feeling in a way. And however you are, whatever feeling is present for you in this moment, that's okay. It's simply like checking in: How is this being right now?

Since we'll begin with metta to self, allow yourself to reflect on, recollect qualities that you appreciate about yourself. If this feels challenging for you, as it was for me, I will offer you this reflection: you are here with the intention to open your heart to suffering, to understand your hearts and minds. What you're doing here is a very rare and amazing thing. Let yourself take that in. Appreciate that you're here. And if you can't appreciate it for yourself, borrow my appreciation. I appreciate you for being here.

Begin connecting with yourself in some way, whether as an image of yourself or perhaps just the felt sense of yourself sitting here. And begin offering yourself the wishes of kindness.

May I be happy.

Remembering with each phrase to understand the meaning of the phrase and check in the area of the heart. Not looking for anything in particular, but just noticing—how is it for you, having made that wish?

May I be healthy.

May I be safe.

May I live with ease.

Continue for the next few minutes to offer yourself thoughts of goodwill, noticing with each thought how it resonates, vibrates in the heart. If you don't notice anything in particular, that's okay. Just keep checking.

Now, allowing yourself to bring your benefactor to mind if it feels appropriate to shift to your benefactor. An easy being. Allow yourself to connect with the benefactor, perhaps using an image, or maybe using your benefactor's name. Sometimes I found the felt sense of sitting with that being helpful—having them sitting here right with me. There's a different quality to the experience when imagining another being in your field.

Reflect for a few moments on things you appreciate about your benefactor—kind things they have done, qualities you appreciate. And begin offering the wishes of goodwill to this being.

Sometimes I found it helpful to play with the perception of where the thoughts come from. We often feel as though thoughts originate in our head, but that's a perception. Thoughts don't really have a location. So you can play with that perception and have a sense as if the thoughts are coming from your heart. Keep your attention in the area of your heart and allow your heart to wish thoughts of goodwill for your benefactor.

May you be happy.

Noticing how the heart responds to that wish.

May you be healthy.

May you be safe.

May you live with ease.

Continue for the next few minutes to wish lots of kindness and goodwill to this being.

Now, if it feels appropriate for you, allow yourself to connect with your dear friend in whatever way works for you—whether with an image, a felt sense of being with them, or using your friend's name to evoke your friend. Begin exploring, offering the wishes of goodwill to your dear friend.

Remember that metta is a purification practice. It's not a mistake if something that feels counter to metta arises as we practice it.

It's part of the process.

For the last minute of the sitting, let's allow our wish for metta to expand to all beings. May all beings be happy. May all beings be healthy. May all beings be safe. May all beings live with ease. May all beings be free from suffering.

Do you have any questions about the metta practice?

One participant shared that she was experiencing very strong attachment and missing of the people she was practicing with. She wasn't quite sure how to work with that.

This experience of attachment and longing is related to what is sometimes called the near enemy of metta. The far enemy is what is so far from metta that you wouldn't confuse it for metta—anger, hostility, cruelty, that kind of state. The near enemy is more along the lines of attached love and stickiness, the expectation of "I'll love you if you love me," or that kind of thing. It's in that terrain of being close to the quality but having some clinging to it.

So it's a very natural outcome of the metta practice for that to arise. As we've said, metta being a purification practice will draw to the surface, will draw into consciousness, things that are not metta. The fact that it's coming up is not a problem, it's not a mistake—it's actually part of the way metta works, highlighting for us: "This isn't quite that completely open-hearted connection, that connection of love without any expectation or any need for anything in return." As we explore the metta practice, we begin to see the ways in which we are attached, the ways in which we are holding and clinging.

So first of all, it's not a mistake. And then you could explore it by simply knowing that it's there—continuing with the phrases while recognizing the stickiness that's happening.

Sometimes I use an analogy about the purification practice being like a washing machine. If you put clothes that are really dirty into a washing machine with soap and water, the agitation of the machine forces the water to go into the clothes. The way soap works is that it chemically binds with the dirt and pulls it out of the clothes and into the water. The water gets all dirty, but that's part of the process of how the cleaning happens.

It's kind of like what's happening here with metta. You're bringing up the phrases and it's like you're sitting in your little metta washing machine. It's allowing the things that aren't metta to come out into consciousness, which is like coming out into the water. So if you can just keep going and simply be aware—"Oh yeah, there's some wanting happening here. There's missing them happening. May you be happy. Oh, I wish you were here"—just knowing that that's going on. It's part of the process.

If it gets a little too sticky, if it feels like you get lost in the thoughts, you could try switching to another being for a little while, one that's a little less sticky for you. Remind yourself what that quality of the open heart without stickiness feels like, and then bring that being back.

But we're really not going to get through either our vipassana practice or our metta practice without this purification happening. So we need to find ways to be okay that it's happening. It's not a problem that it's happening.

Another question came up about a friend who is experiencing some suffering in their life right now. The person wondered about using compassion phrases instead of the metta phrases, or whether to simply switch to a different person.

There's no one right answer to this. Sometimes the metta practice is taught as a concentration practice, where we are using the quality of metta, cultivating that feeling as a doorway towards concentration. If that's the way you're exploring the practice, if that's what you're doing—using it as an avenue towards concentration—then I would suggest picking a friend who's not particularly suffering right now.

When you bring up that friend who is suffering, it changes the quality. When the open heart meets suffering, the natural response is compassion. So if you're really interested in cultivating the quality of metta in which you can become concentrated, bringing someone into your mind who is suffering will change the flavor of the metta, making it a little less of a stable object to get concentrated on.

If you are simply exploring the quality of metta in your heart and in your practice, and this is a dear friend you'd really like to connect with, I would suggest that it would probably be easier to stay connected if you switch to the compassion phrases for that friend. Often what arises when you bring up a friend who has some suffering is that the suffering becomes quite present. And the phrase that most directly connects with what's happening there is the compassion phrase.

So hopefully that was contextualized enough that you can decide for yourself what would be most appropriate.

Thank you for your metta practice.

CHAPTER 100

Investigating Mindfulness Itself

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound reframing of how we relate to the natural fluctuations of mindfulness in meditation practice. Rather than viewing the mind's wandering as a problem to be fixed, she invites practitioners to investigate mindfulness itself with genuine curiosity—exploring when it strengthens, weakens, and what conditions surround these changes.
>
> Fella emphasizes the moment when mindfulness spontaneously returns as a particularly accessible gateway for understanding awareness itself. This "unprompted mindfulness" reveals important insights about anattā (not-self), as referenced in the Buddha's second discourse on the five khandhas (aggregates). If consciousness were truly self, we could simply command it to remain present—yet clearly, we cannot. This direct seeing of how mindfulness arises and passes without our control becomes a doorway to understanding the conditioned nature of mind.
> The talk offers practical guidance for both formal meditation and daily life practice. Fella encourages investigating where mindfulness typically gets lost—whether in specific activities, bodily states, or habitual mind states like anger, boredom, or spacing out. Through her own examples, including working skillfully with pain and discovering the mind's need for rest, she demonstrates how curiosity rather than control leads to genuine transformation. The teaching culminates in an invitation to trust that mindfulness can be aware of anything, even states we assume impossible to observe, and to allow the mind to reveal wisdom beyond our conscious understanding.

We've been talking quite a lot about continuity of mindfulness as a support for the stability of mind and the ability to meet just what's happening in our experience. I'd like to explore this side of practice a little bit tonight—how to encourage this continuity by investigating mindfulness itself. In particular, I'd like to explore with you what we could call the comings and goings of mindfulness, framing it in a slightly different way than we usually think about it.

Usually we think about the mind getting lost or wandering off. Here I'd really like to emphasize the mindfulness piece. Mindfulness is stronger at times, weaker at times, and we can investigate that—investigate when that happens, how that happens, what's going on around it. We can be curious about the coming and going of mindfulness as opposed to feeling like this is a problem that needs to be fixed or changed.

There's a lot we can learn in this exploration. One big area we can learn about is where our minds get caught. What is it that hooks us such that mindfulness disappears? Where are our mindfulness sinks? Where are the rabbit holes of mindfulness, where mindfulness just kind of disappears? That's one big area we learn about in exploring this.

We also, in investigating this, if we are curious instead of judgmental about this process of seeing mindfulness as it gets stronger at times and weaker at times, get to see in our direct experience some of the teaching around not-self. Some direct understanding of not-self.

Many of you have probably reflected in this way. When we sit down to meditate, we attempt to be mindful. We try to pay attention to our experience, maybe choose the breath, pick an object to pay attention to. That's our purpose and our intention. And yet what happens? We maybe can stay with experience for a few seconds or a few minutes and the mind wanders. Mindfulness gets lost. Did you do that? Did you decide, "I'm going to have my mind wander right now"? Or did it just happen? This is a pointer to not-self.

And even more amazing, the mind's off wandering in thought and then it comes back. Who did that? You weren't even there to have any say in the matter. This points, again, to not-self.

One of the framings of the not-self teaching that the Buddha offered was to reflect on whether or not our minds and bodies are under our absolute control. In one of his famous discourses, the second discourse he gave, he reflected on this around the five aggregates—body, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. I'll say it with respect to consciousness because it really highlights this. He says, "Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were self, it would be possible to say of consciousness, 'May my consciousness be thus. May my consciousness not be thus.' But it is not possible to say of consciousness, 'May my consciousness be thus.' And it is precisely because it is not self that that is the case."

This exploration of mindfulness coming and going really begins to point this truth out to us. Our minds are not under our absolute control. We cannot say to ourselves, "I am going to sit down and be mindful for 45 minutes." Is anybody able to do that? Maybe at times, rare times, I've been able to do that, but it's not the common thing.

I want to point out here that in this talk I'm going to be using the terms awareness and mindfulness synonymously. Joseph talked about this the other night, but I wanted to state that very clearly. That is how I'm going to be using these two terms.

One of the avenues of exploring mindfulness itself is to begin to recognize it, to begin to recognize what it means to be aware.

What is the experience of being aware?

One of the easiest places to recognize this is the moment when mindfulness returns —that spontaneous awakening I just spoke of. That moment is one of the easiest places to highlight what the experience of being aware, being mindful, actually is. Because as Joseph said the other night, in that moment there's a little bit of a difference. In that moment of the mind waking up, there's a lingering memory perhaps, a little bit of a sense of what it was like just a few moments before when the mind was lost, and what it's like right now when mindfulness is present. And so you begin to get a sense of the flavor of awareness itself.

This is what we might call unprompted mindfulness. It's not mindfulness that we are consciously choosing to do. One of the great things about that moment, one of the really helpful things to recognize, is just how effortless it is, just how spontaneous it is. It doesn't take work to have that moment arise.

One of the things I've seen in my own practice is that highlighting that moment—beginning to recognize what it feels like when mindfulness returns—actually makes us familiar with what it feels like for mindfulness to return. If, rather than judging ourselves for the fact that we were lost in thought, we instead highlight the arising of mindfulness and bring curiosity about mindfulness itself in that moment, we begin to get familiar with what it's like to have that moment. And the familiarity with that experience starts to help us recognize it more often.

What we see as we start to get familiar with that moment of mindfulness arising is that it happens a lot. It happens a lot. Often what happens in that moment is that we start thinking about or orienting to the thing we've become mindful of, and we may—if we're not attuned to that moment, if we're not interested in that moment of arising mindfulness itself—have a moment of mindfulness returning and then quickly it gets swamped. We hear a bird and then we start thinking about birds. Or we hear the sound of a truck and we start thinking about what that truck is doing.

If we're interested instead in the actual reappearance of mindfulness, that very experience, that familiarity, starts to point out or highlight these moments to us.

This is actually one of my favorite practices for daily life. When people say, "I don't have time to do mindfulness, I don't have time to be mindful in my daily life," I tell them about this. This moment doesn't take any effort. It's just the recognition of it rearising.

When you notice that moment, the first thing is to recognize: what is the experience of being aware? What is that experience? Notice just what's obvious in that moment. There's the awareness itself and something that awareness is aware of. In that moment of recognition, highlight the awareness and notice what is here now. What is already here? What is the awareness, what is mindfulness, already aware of? Mindfulness has arisen. It's already attending to something. We don't have to pick anything to be aware of in that moment. It's already happening.

Another helpful thing to do in that moment, or to check into—and do this with a light touch—is from time to time, in that moment of arising mindfulness, you could also check in: what's my relationship to this? Very often, at least earlier in practice, especially at the beginning of retreats, the attitude when mindfulness returns is judgment. The mind shouldn't have been wandering. It's really helpful to recognize that attitude in the mind.

But as that judgment starts to fall away, we can start to see something important. When mindfulness disappears, the mind hasn't been switched off. We know this. When mindfulness disappears, the mind continues doing its thing, often going off thinking thoughts about various things. And in that wandering, the mind may have landed on something from our past, or some conversation we had with somebody before we came to retreat, and emotions may start to be generated.

Sometimes in that moment of mindfulness returning, if we don't check into the attitude, we may miss that the wandering mind has created a new terrain, actually, a new landscape. Opening to that, checking the attitude, can help us to see what was created in the wander.

We can also explore and get familiar with the feeling of awareness when we are already aware. In my own experience, my own exploration of this topic in my own practice, I did find the moment of remembering, the moment when mindfulness returned, to be pretty much the easiest place to recognize awareness.

When awareness is already present, when it's already kind of going, sometimes we know that we're aware, but we don't exactly know what the experience of awareness is. And that's okay.

So sometimes, if there is a period of time where the mindfulness seems to be strong, there's a little bit more continuity of mindfulness, you could just check in, drop in the question: What is it to be aware? What is it to be mindful right now? And don't go looking very hard for it.

Like right now, I think probably most of you are aware and listening to the talk. So just check in. Do you know that you're aware right now? Don't think about it. Do you know that you're aware? Just kind of acknowledge that you know you're aware. And then don't go looking any further than that.

Over time what I've seen is that just that simple acknowledgment—yeah, I know I'm aware—begins to reveal something. Now, can I point to what it means to be mindful or aware in that moment? Can I point to that and say, "Oh, that's it"? That's harder to do. But we can know that we are aware. And over time, that kind of reflection can help us to again land in the experience of knowing awareness itself, of being aware of awareness itself.

Now I'd like to explore this topic from another perspective. I've explored it mostly from the side of when awareness returns. And I'd like to explore what it means to pay attention to mindfulness in terms of noticing where we lose mindfulness.

Getting curious about this really helps to support continuity. It's not intended as a judgment to notice where we lose awareness, but more to support the sense of, "Oh, look at that, I see that's where I'm losing awareness, maybe I can be curious about that." Over and over I'm going to point to this quality of curiosity around this practice—curiosity around how we lose mindfulness, as opposed to, "Oh, I see I lose mindfulness, let me double down and really hold on to that mindfulness." Curiosity is really an ally for us in this exploration of mindfulness.

I'm going to talk about various ways, different avenues of exploring where and how we lose mindfulness. Some of the most obvious places for us to check in—and many of you have actually been reporting in the interviews noticing this kind of thing—is recognizing particular activities, times of day, things that you're doing in which you lose mindfulness.

You might begin to recognize that when you go to your rooms, you lose mindfulness. Or maybe when you're standing in the dish line, you're quite mindful, and then you go to do your dishes and you've done your dishes, you're drying off your hands, and it's like, "Whoa, wait a minute, where did that mindfulness go?" So you see you lose it in the actual washing of dishes. Or you might notice that you're losing mindfulness in your yogi job. There are so many different activities that we do during the day. You may have some favorite places for mindfulness to get lost. Be curious about that.

One of the interesting things about continuity of mindfulness is that the stronger mindfulness gets, the more continuous it becomes, the more it points out the gaps in mindfulness. It's not that you're less mindful—actually the mindfulness is stronger and it's able to see more where it's getting lost.

Take that example of standing in the dish line. You're standing there, very mindfully holding your plate and taking a step, very mindfully, and then it's your turn. And then maybe what happens is that you speed up a little bit, or you think, "Oh, I don't want to hold up the line." That might be one thing that arises: "I don't want to hold up the line. Let me do this really quickly." And it's not so much the speediness of washing the dishes that has you lose the mindfulness, but maybe the idea that you've taken birth, as Carol was saying, concocted this self of, "Oh, I need to be fast in doing this so that the people behind me have their turn quickly."

What I'd like to encourage here is that when you notice places or times or activities in which you lose mindfulness, rather than thinking about doubling down—standing in the dish line thinking, "Yes, I'm going to hold onto that mindfulness, I am going to be mindful all the way through washing those dishes"—rather than doing that, continue your practice as usual and see if you can add a little dose of curiosity. What happens in that situation that mindfulness gets lost?

When mindfulness gets lost, there's usually something we've missed. There's something that's arisen that we haven't seen, and our mind has exited—the mindfulness has exited right out that door. So adding some curiosity: What is it? What is it that's happening in that situation? Curiosity can help to reveal just what is going on, rather than trying to double down and hold on to mindfulness.

I did this exploration for myself. I noticed it was like—

I was pretty mindful throughout—this was at a retreat at Spirit Rock, a month-long retreat, I think. There was lots of continuity of mindfulness throughout the day. And what I began to recognize was that I'd be pretty mindful, and then when I was in the bathroom, I would be mindful going in and doing my stuff, and then washing my hands, and at some point I would find myself gazing at myself in the mirror. I had no recollection of doing that consciously. But I would wake up—it couldn't have been very long, maybe two or three seconds—and I got very curious about what that was. What's going on there?

So I began to explore, not trying to force myself to be mindful. If I was forcing myself to be mindful, that would probably mean forcing myself not to look in the mirror. Instead, I was curious about what was bringing up that activity.

It took a while to see what was going on. And it wasn't any deep, dark old pattern of wanting to be seen, nothing psychological—it was a habit. Just a habit. If mindfulness got weak for just a split second, the habit of what I did in the bathroom kicked in: looking at myself in the mirror. And after I saw that, I could begin to see the intention to look up, the intention to look at myself in the mirror. Then I could choose: Do I do that? Do I not do that? This supports the continuity of mindfulness.

Sometimes people attribute their mindfulness getting lost in a particular place or time to something they're trying to avoid. Sometimes it's as simple as habit. So let go of theories about why you may or may not be mindful at a particular time and just be curious about what is actually happening there.

You might also lose awareness in certain bodily states—pleasant states, unpleasant states. Sometimes as concentration develops and the body starts feeling very delightful, very pleasant, we can get lost in that pleasantness. We're just blissing out, not really clearly aware of the pleasantness. Or we get caught in states of pain. This is an interesting thing to explore: when you're paying attention to pain, observing it, and the mind gets lost or drifts out of the present moment.

What I discovered over and over again was that if I was noticing pain in the body, the mind had various strategies to avoid experiencing that pain. And most of those strategies involved not being mindful—I would say all of them, until I started noticing the strategies themselves. When I would wake up into that experience, whatever strategy the mind had employed, I would recognize that while it was off doing that thing—sometimes a fantasy, which can be common when there's a lot of physical pain—the pain wasn't bothering me.

I got curious about that. The mind understood that it didn't have to be bothered by that pain. It just didn't know how to do that with mindfulness yet.

One example from a couple of years ago: I was teaching a retreat and noticing a lot of back pain during the teaching and in the sittings. I would attend to the pain, noticing its changing nature, and then I would wake up to find the mind singing. At first it was like, "Okay, come back, be with the experience." But then I got curious about waking up into singing. And I noticed that in that waking up, the mind had let go of its grip on the pain. Before the mind had gotten lost, there had been this kind of pushing in, an "I'm going to be with this pain" kind of experience.

And the singing, waking up into the singing—in the first moment of waking up into the singing, the mind recognized that it wasn't gripped to that pain, and there was a different relationship that was possible to that pain. So in that moment, in being mindful that the mind was not gripped to that pain, I watched in the next few moments as the grip returned. But I had, for just a few moments, seen what it was like to be with pain without that clamping down on it.

So I just watched this. I tried to watch the mind's strategy of how it worked with pain. And as I explored that, the mind learned something about how to let go of clamping down, gripping to the pain, and be able to stay mindful of it. Actually, in that exploration, the need to do the singing disappeared, because the mind began to understand how to be present and not clamped down on the pain.

This was through curiosity. Sometimes the mind understands things. Singing itself wasn't—singing and being lost in thought wasn't necessarily skillful. But the mind knew. There was some wisdom in the mind that knew the way I was paying attention to that pain was not helpful, and it created this strategy. So exploring that strategy, I learned something about how the mind could let go of squeezing down around pain.

A similar kind of getting lost can happen around states of mind. I think we all have our favorite states of mind that we may get lost in—boredom, confusion, depression, planning, various states. You can begin to recognize, and this is another place where the moment of remembering will serve us.

If you're mindful, and then notice that the mind has kind of spun out or gotten lost—so the mindfulness has disappeared—in the moment of remembering, if we've gotten lost through a state of mind, often the mind will be hooked into that state as it's gotten lost. So as we wake up into mindfulness, there are remnants of that state. You may be aware, "Oh, boredom is present," or "Anger is present."

When I first started my mindfulness practice, the thing that was really spinning me out was anger. I was so angry at a particular person. And my very first mindfulness practice was to just notice when I was angry. Mostly what that meant was waking up after having been caught by anger for some time. The mindfulness had gotten lost and my mind was just spinning, and then I'd wake up into anger. I began to just say, "Okay, wake up, notice what's here. This is anger. Anger is present."

That moment of remembering and connecting with what's there—when the mind has gotten lost in states of mind, sometimes the mindfulness isn't so strong around that particular state of mind. And the place that we can begin to get familiar with that state of mind is in the moment of waking up. So for me, waking up into anger was like, "Yes, okay, yep, this is anger. Boy, unpleasant. This doesn't feel very good."

What happens as we do that, as we connect with the experience of remembering to a particular state that we've been lost in, is that the mindfulness begins to attune to that state, get familiar with that state, gets familiar with being mindful of that state. In my own experience with that very first exercise around anger, what I saw happening over the course of several months was that the mindfulness got more familiar with anger. Because it was becoming used to the anger, because the mindfulness was becoming interested in the anger and also familiar with it, the mind started waking up into the pattern earlier and earlier in the process.

You're familiar, I'm sure, with the way anger just cycles—it spins up, gets worse and worse. The first time I did this, I was in a full-blown rage by the time I recognized the anger. But over the course of several months, the mind began to get more familiar with being present with anger and began waking up earlier and earlier in the process. The mind wasn't in such a rage; it was more like normal anger.

And then at one point—this was a couple months into my exploration of mindfulness practice in daily life—I was just hanging out in my kitchen, doing stuff, and I saw a thought that would have led to anger had I not been mindful of it. In that moment, the mind was so attuned to anger, so attuned to the quality of anger, that it knew it was coming. And in the seeing of its potentiality—because it wasn't there yet—in the seeing of its potentiality, the mind let go. And it didn't get angry.

That was mind-blowing to me. That was a couple months into my practice, and I would say that was the moment I knew I would be practicing for the rest of my life. I could see the power of this practice to begin to reveal how these patterns are born.

So if you get lost into habitual mind states, be curious about what you're waking up into. That will attune the mind to that state, and it will help the mind to be able to wake up into that state more easily. It will help it to be able to be present for that state more easily.

The mind can also move into states where it is habitually not present. Spacing out, for instance. Spacing out seems to be the quintessential state of mind in which mindfulness is not present. It's like—spaced out. How can mindfulness be aware of spacing out?

Sometimes we have a belief that certain states of mind are impossible to be mindful of. Spacing out might be one of those. And again, we may have a sense of trying to double down and hold on to the mindfulness, trying not to space out. This is just one example of this kind of state. There are others in which the mind seems unreachable—there's a lot in the terrain of spacing out, low energy, dullness, sleepiness, and restlessness sometimes, where it feels like the mind is just spinning so fast that it can't land on anything. How can I possibly be mindful of anything when the mind is spinning that fast? Obviously I need to slow it down. Or the spacing out—obviously I need to clear that up.

One of the key tools in my toolkit is that I have come to recognize that mindfulness can be mindful of anything. If there's something happening in my experience where there's any idea that I can't be mindful of that, I question it. I don't believe it. Instead I get curious. How might it be possible to be mindful of that? At times it can take a while to understand, because very often, like with something like spacing out, there can be a very strong habit of not being mindful in that state of mind.

One of the best ways to explore this, again, is the moment when you wake up after you've been lost. Often we notice the places that the mind gets lost in retrospect. You're going through your day and you're kind of present, and then you wake up and remember, "Oh, I was just not present." So it's in retrospect that we often notice. With habitual states of mind where we get lost, we'll wake up recognizing, "Oh, spaced out. I was lost and spaced out." And then because we have this belief that we can't be mindful of being spaced out, we try to do something in that moment. We try to clear up the spaced out, or we try to bring our attention to something and pay attention to it really clearly.

But sometimes the mind is simply spacing out.

I was having breakfast one morning and kept noticing the mind just going into spaced-out mode. Initially, my habit of practice was, "Okay, we're eating breakfast, pay attention to the breakfast. Lifting, chewing, tasting, swallowing." So I brought my attention back to that when I noticed I was spaced out. Initially I did that. But it kept happening, over and over again.

This is another great thing to note. If something happens over and over again like that, really get curious about it. Rather than getting frustrated—"How come I can't control my mind?"—be curious about what the mind is doing.

It kept doing it over and over again. At some point it was like, "Well, I guess trying to pay attention to the breakfast isn't doing it, so let me see if I can notice what the mind is doing instead." So I was paying attention to eating and then began to recognize this feeling of the mind. It was like the mind was here in front of me eating, and then it felt like the mind just took a break and went sitting up here somewhere, like hovering over my head. And I could actually follow that, be with that experience. When I allowed the mind to do that, it felt very pleasant, actually. I was aware of this kind of buzzy, very relaxed state of mind. And in being in that state, what I recognized was that the mind was really tired. It was trying to take a break.

It was trying to relax. And I had kept trying to get it to do something, right? Pay attention to breakfast, pay attention to breakfast. But what was actually going on was that the mind needed a break. It needed rest.

And when I allowed it to rest with mindfulness—it was like, be aware, I watched the mind kind of go into that state, felt the buzziness of it—and at some point, all states are impermanent, it probably took thirty or forty seconds, the buzziness dissipated, and then the mind was very clear. It's like the mind took its rest, and that's what it needed to do.

Sometimes I find this exploration around curiosity more fruitful than thinking, "I know what's the best thing to be mindful of. I know it's best to be paying attention to breakfast, because that's what I'm doing, that's where I'm supposed to be paying attention." Instead of feeling like I have the right thing or I know what to do, be curious about what the mind is interested in paying attention to. Curious about that. In this case, exploring that territory, the mind took its rest and then was very present.

Sometimes we lose awareness as our practice deepens. This is counterintuitive in a way—we think that being more continuously mindful means we lose awareness less. But sometimes the very process and nature of the settling goes through periods where the mind wanders.

I'll describe this. One of the ways this happens is what I've called a purification cycle, where after a period of fairly continuous mindfulness, things that have not been seen for a while can come to the surface, and there's a kind of storm. So there's an alternation between periods of calm and quiet and a storm of something that hasn't really been allowed to be at the surface or allowed to be known before. That's one way this can happen as mindfulness settles.

Another way this can happen is that as the mind begins to settle down—and I'll give you the clue, the highlight, the sign or thing that I look for in this kind of situation—if there's been a period of time where the mindfulness has been fairly stable, I'm not saying one hundred percent stable, not one hundred percent present, but pretty continuous, a fair amount of ability to meet experience in the present moment, not so much reactivity, some amount of calm. If after a period like that, not too much getting lost, the mind suddenly starts to wander, get curious about that.

It often means that something isn't being seen. And a pattern that I've seen happen frequently enough in my practice that I've decided to talk about it, and that I hear enough in meetings with you that I've decided to talk about it, is that as the mind settles, it seems that the mind begins to get interested in things that our conscious awareness, what we know about—it's like beyond the scope of what we know about consciously. The mind starts getting interested in experience, phenomena, states that are not things we're familiar with.

I'll give an example of this. On one long retreat here at this center, I was at a place where for several days it was very easy to be present. I would sit down and the mindfulness was right there, right with the breath. And after a couple of days of that, I was like, "Oh great, I've figured it out." And then one morning, I sat down and the mind was just all over the place. Thoughts galore.

Fortunately, rather than trying to force myself to stay present, I got curious. What's happening? What am I not seeing? What is not seen here? And what I began to recognize is that I was paying attention to the breath, doing breath meditation, and within the space of half a breath, I would be right with the breath at the very beginning of an inhalation, I'd be right there. And within the space of half a breath, the breath would disappear. And that's when the thoughts would start.

The experience of what I was used to paying attention to in the breath, the sensations I was used to paying attention to—the mind was used to paying attention to a certain level and type of sensation. And then those sensations started to get more subtle. My habit of mindfulness was still looking around at that coarser level, and there wasn't much to find. So the mindfulness would go into thought.

This kind of thing happens as the mind settles down. Often the mind may start to be curious about or interested in something that we have never experienced before, don't even know about.

And if, again, we're trying to be in control—even at the subtlest level of trying to be in control, thinking "I'm going to pay attention to the breath in this way"—if we're trying to control that rather than being curious about what the mind is actually interested in paying attention to, we miss something important.

So if you see, after a period of fairly stable practice, that the mind starts to wander, often it's more of a drifting out of the present moment. It's not like the mind is charging out into emotional reactive storms. It's just that you're present, and then suddenly you're thinking about potato chips or baseball. The number of times I find myself thinking about something I know nothing about—people talking to me I've never met, discussing things I've never heard about or even been interested in. It's just this kind of drifting state.

If that's what's happening after a period of the mind settling, get curious about where it is that the mind is leaving. Another thing to explore is being attentive to the breath and noticing, "Ah, it's slipping out as the sensations get really subtle." Then as I saw that, I wondered, can I just be with that? At one point with Sayadaw U Pandita, I remember reporting to him that the breath was getting too subtle to pay attention to and I had to pay attention to something else. He said, "Just know that it's subtle. Just know that the sensations are subtle." And I was like, wow, what a revelation. So just recognizing, "Okay, sensations are quiet right now. Sensations are subtle right now"—that recognition can allow the mind to land on that.

There was another time I was exploring this question of seeing how mindfulness leaves or where it leaves. Again, I was doing breath meditation, and I had the agenda to be right with the breath. Every time I began to be right with the breath, I could see—and some of you may be able to start to see this at times—that the mindfulness was getting a little bit not so connected to the breath, becoming that more or less mindful place around the breath.

As I saw that—so again, breath, mindfulness, like they were right together—I would notice the mindfulness losing touch with the breath. My original exploration around that was, "Oh, come back, be with the breath." I would notice the mindfulness losing touch and think, "Oh, come back, be with the breath." At some point, watching this happen multiple times, I got curious. It was like, "Oh, the mind is leaving the breath. Wow, but I'm mindful of that. Let's see where it wants to go."

Instead of having the agenda that I think I know what the best thing to do is—that very focused attention—what I saw was that the mind let go of the breath and opened into a much more broad, receptive space, as opposed to a focused, directed mindfulness. It was a space I had never experienced before. I had never explored or touched into that. And I began to understand it through watching the mind do what it was doing. Mindfulness was leaving the breath. Just, "Oh, let's see. I'm aware of that. Let's see where it wants to go. I'm mindful. Let's see where it wants to go."

We often have an idea, I think based on some familiarity we have, about what it feels like when mindfulness starts getting stronger. Our first few tastes of mindfulness getting stronger may happen on retreat, may happen when we're slowed down. We see things in a particular way, things are really clear, we're seeing things very sharply, precisely, we're seeing a lot more detail. And we get the idea that that's what mindfulness is. So we may have that sense of what mindfulness is, and then what we do is we try to construct that. We try to find that state. Even when we're already mindful, we try to find that state.

I did this on one retreat. I was practicing with Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma, and I was exploring a lot of different ways the mind paid attention, so that may be why this began to be clear to me. As I was doing some walking meditation and then walked back to my dorm where I was doing sitting meditation in my room, I noticed that the mind was trying to put itself into a state of mind in order to meditate. And in that doing, I recognized—wait a minute, I'm already mindful. What's wrong with this state?

What's wrong with this state?

And what I saw was that the idea was that I needed to subtly repress thoughts. The state that the mind was trying to put itself in was a state of repressing thoughts.

So one exploration around mindfulness again here, this topic of investigating mindfulness: if I'm trying to change the state of my mind in order to be mindful, ask if that's necessary. I ask myself, is that necessary? Very often it's already mindful.

And again, there are so many different ways that mindfulness can be experienced. Sometimes it has that really precise, very clear quality—like you're seeing all this detail. Sometimes mindfulness feels so ordinary. You wake up in the morning and it's just so completely ordinary. I remember this happening on one three-month course. I woke up in the morning and thought, wow, I just feel so ordinary. And I had to check: am I being mindful? It just seemed like it was so ordinary.

Sometimes it can feel really ordinary. Sometimes it can feel really broad and vast and open. Sometimes it can feel very precise and directed.

Check the awareness. Are you aware? Are you aware? And be curious about what awareness is already aware of. Let go of any idea that it's supposed to be a certain way, and that will guide you to see so much that you could never even possibly conceive of.

We cannot find our way to the unknown by being with things we know. We have to allow ourselves to open to the unknown, to things we're not familiar with, being aware in ways we're not familiar with.

So I'm hoping this is encouraging you to be curious about exploring your mindfulness, exploring your experience. The curiosity, the factor of curiosity, is so helpful. And there's so much to learn.

As we explore this quality of mindfulness and it begins to become more continuous—which this exploration does—we see our own minds. We see how our minds get caught, how they get lost. And we also start to see just the processes of mind, the ways it works, the aggregates. We start to see how our minds function.

We don't have to create anything special to be mindful of. The five aggregates are happening all the time. Any moment we wake up and can just be with what's here begins to point us to the wisdom of impermanence, unreliability, not-self.

And curiosity—curiosity about this—be willing to go, be willing to let the mind point some things out to you. Sometimes it knows things that we don't consciously know.

Let's just sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 101

Perception and Papañca

Andrea Fella · 1h00

In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella examines perception (saññā) as one of the five aggregates (khandhas) and its intimate connection with papañca—the mental proliferation that the Buddha identified as a root cause of suffering and conflict in the world. Drawing from the Madhupiṇḍika Sutta (MN 18), Fella traces the chain from sensory contact through feeling, perception, thinking, and finally to papañca, showing how this process colors all subsequent experience with our past conditioning, opinions, and beliefs.

Using vivid personal examples—from mistaking bat squeals for a pig being slaughtered in Burma, to watching her mind construct a school bus from flashing lights at the Exploratorium—Fella demonstrates how perception functions like a mirage, reflecting something real but easily confused for something it is not. She explores the Buddha's famous parable of the blind men and the elephant to illustrate how we create solid concepts from partial perceptions and then cling to them as reality, leading to views, conflict, and suffering.

The talk offers profound insights into reification—treating ideas as concrete things—and how this process operates constantly in our experience. Fella emphasizes that liberation requires understanding papañca, which appears alongside the abandonment of greed, aversion, and delusion in the Buddha's teachings. Rather than trying to stop these processes, practitioners are encouraged to simply observe them clearly, allowing the mind to naturally release its clinging when it understands how it contributes to its own suffering.

Tonight I'd like to explore with you the topic of perception.

Some of you might remember this is one of the five aggregates, the process by which we recognize experience. Tonight I'd like to spend quite a bit of time looking at just this aspect of the aggregates, just this one process.

On the surface it might seem that it's a pretty simple process, just a simple recognition of experience. We see something and we recognize it. We see a chair, we know it's a chair. We see a cushion, we know it's a cushion. We see the wall, we know it's a wall. It's the process by which we recognize experience, and so on the surface of it, it seems perhaps kind of simple.

And yet the suttas, the teachings of the Buddha, point to not understanding this process as being one of the key reasons, one of the leading causes for suffering, for stress, for struggle, for conflict in our world. When we don't understand perception properly—when it's infused with confusion and delusion—it can lead to a lot of problems, struggles in our lives, and conflict in the world. Perhaps it bears some reflection and exploration. We'll spend some time this evening looking at perception itself: what it is, how it works, how we might be able to recognize it in our experience, and then ways that this process gets tied up with delusion—ways that we get caught by this process and it leads us to struggle, to suffer.

A little bit of recap about perception, since both Bhante and I talked about it when we each discussed the aggregates, but I'll just review what perception is. Basically, there's a kind of meeting or contact of experience with the eye, with the ear, with the nose, with the tongue, with the skin, with our minds. In that contact, there is the mind trying to recognize what the experience is. What is that sight? What is that sound? What is that smell? What is that taste? What is that contact? It's a natural function of the mind.

As I said in my talk last time, and I think Bhante also pointed out, this is a really useful process, this recognition. The way we wander through our day requires perception. It requires us to be able to recognize things. If we had to figure out every time we walked into a room that these are people and this is the floor and this is the wall and I shouldn't walk through a wall—if we had to figure all of that out every time, we'd be exhausted. This perceptual process is a very useful mechanism of our minds to help save energy. It's a kind of shortcut. From the time we're born, we're taking in sights, sounds, smells, tastes, and touch, categorizing, classifying, and organizing all of that information into concepts, into perceptions. It's a very useful process.

It's also a layered process. If we explore how our senses work, we can do this with a little bit of reflection. You can also see this in your practice as your mindfulness gets a little bit more continuous; I've occasionally seen this in my own practice.

The first thing that our senses meet is the raw sense data. Sight, for instance—the first thing that sight meets is form and color. That's what our eyes register: form and color. From there, the mind begins to recognize that particular shape of form and color is a chair, that particular shape of form and color is a person. It's like there's a layered process. This bell, for instance—there's the shape and the color of the bell, and your mind is perceiving that as well as what you know it to be: the bell. Our minds don't have to consciously go through these layers every time we meet a bell. We just see it and immediately it's bell. Immediately we know.

We can start to see this process at work. At one point on retreat I was sitting outside in California, and something caught my eye. I turned my head and my eye fell on a shape and a color, and the mind kind of named or noted what it saw. The mind first saw green, then it saw jagged, and then it recognized it as leaf. This layered process.

As I said the other day, often the perceptual process is about recognizing the objects themselves—recognizing this is a bell, that's a leaf, this is a flower. This is one aspect of perception: the identification of objects out of our field of experience. Sometimes in our practice, when the mindfulness is a little more continuous and perhaps when the situation or the environment is a little obscured—if the lights are dim, for instance—you might see as you walk into a room your mind trying to figure out what's in that room and where it is in the room.

On one retreat, I walked into a dim room at night with just a tiny bit of light around the edges, and there was this shape on a table. I watched my mind trying to figure out what it was. It came up with some very bizarre things. One of the first things it proposed was that it was a deformed being. I recognized pretty quickly that this was probably not the case. But the mind tried on a couple of possibilities before it actually recognized that it was a vase of flowers.

Sometimes we can watch our minds doing this—trying on various perceptions until it feels like it's found something that matches the situation, meets the conditions, meets what is here. We can think of our perceptual process as matching our experience against our history.

Perception not only includes this naming of experience—although this is the main aspect I'll explore and I think is one of the easiest to see, this recognition of experience. Perception also includes the recognition of space and location. The distance that I perceive in this room is a perception. When we look at the room and see that there appears to be space there, I'm not saying that there isn't space there, but the fact that we recognize it as that space is a function of perception.

This is perhaps a little easier to understand around hearing. When we experience sound, what's happening physically is that sound waves are hitting the eardrum. That's all that's going on. And the mind, through repeatedly having experienced sound waves hitting the eardrum, understands and basically creates the understanding of where that sound is located in space. That too is a function of perception.

When we walk upstairs, the distance that we step, the amount that we move our foot—it works because perception is working. The perception of distance and space, our seeing of that. There are many aspects to perception. Perception is our friend. We get through the world, we navigate the world because of perception.

The process of perception can get us into trouble when we don't understand that it is a process. We easily misunderstand and get caught by the process of perception, basically mistaking what we are perceiving as being the reality of the world.

For each of the aggregates, as Bhante mentioned last night, the Buddha offered an analogy. I'll only discuss the analogy for perception tonight, but the analogy related to each aggregate is said to point to the way that particular aggregate can confuse us—how it catches us off guard or leads us to misattribute something. The analogy for perception is that perception is like a mirage.

I actually looked up mirages a couple of years ago when I was reviewing this talk, and I discovered that a mirage is not completely something made up in the mind. The real definition of a mirage is that it's based on the way light gets refracted. If you're in the desert, for instance, the heat coming off the sand refracts the light in such a way that it creates a mirror effect—you see the sky reflected on the sand, so it looks like a lake.

A mirage is not a complete concoction of somebody dying of thirst, but actually a perception of something. It's a seeing of something that's reflected—the sky is there, but it's reflected on the ground. And the deluding nature of the analogy pointed to here is that we can easily confuse it for being something that it's not.

Perception functions in this way: we're taking something in. At least in my view, there is stuff out there. You are out there. I believe you're out there. You're not just a construction of my mind while I sit here giving a talk to myself. I actually think you're out there. And yet my experience of you is a construction in the mind. I can't actually experience you directly. I experience you through the perception in the mind. So it's like a reflection. Perception is like a reflection.

The way we can get caught or misunderstand the process is that we take that reflection to be the actual reality. With our experience of things coming through, moderated through our mind, there's a very large doorway through which opinions, views, and interpretations can enter—if we aren't aware that perception is a reflection of experience and not reality itself. This is a big piece of the deluding nature of perception.

That we interpret or view our perceptions as being reality, and in that process often drag in a lot of views and opinions. So that representation in our minds of what's happening out there is very often distorted by interpretation. If we can become aware of this process, there is a possibility that we may become aware that the interpretation is distorting our seeing. From this, you might begin to get a sense of why the Buddha says that not understanding perception leads to suffering and conflict in the world.

So let's start with recognizing perception itself. I did talk about this a little bit the other day, but I'll go into it again just to remind you. We can recognize this activity of perception: there is an experience, and then the mind recognizing the experience. In the naming kind of perception—which is the main one I'll talk about tonight—the identification of objects, this kind of perception often happens through language or through images. I would say it happens through our avenues of thought. Perception is often recognized as a very subtle level of thought.

The easiest place to recognize this, at least for me, is in the terrain of hearing. We hear something. The other day I heard the sound of geese. There was the sound, and immediately what my mind did—I was inside, I couldn't look up and see them—but in my mind I saw an image of geese flying in a V formation. That's perception. That recognition, the mind recognizing, "that's what that sound is." Sometimes it might come through a word in the mind. The mind could have simply said, "geese." Just saying the word in the mind. You'll see this; you can watch this happening in your meditative experience.

Because perception is so close to thinking—it's a subtle kind of thought—that simple recognition of "car" or "geese" or "itch," there's that recognition and it's recognized with some kind of thought, often. It's very easy, if we don't recognize perception happening, to move from the perception to thinking about what we've perceived. So we might go from hearing the geese, if we didn't recognize the perception of it, to thinking about times we've seen geese in our past. Memories might emerge. For me, actually, the other day, the memory of my brother when he was little, so proud having killed his first goose. That brought some emotional response, that memory.

So the perception leads to thinking, leads to emotional responses. This is a very normal process, and I'm not saying we should stop it. But we can recognize that it's happening and conditioned on the perception. It's important to recognize that we respond to our perceptions, that in experiencing something—like, for instance, the geese—there is potentially an emotional resonance with what we think we have perceived.

The deluding power of this becomes clearer when perception makes a mistake. And perception is very prone to mistake; I have to warn you about that one too. Perception can so easily make mistakes. We see something and misattribute it—like my mind saying, "Oh, it's a deformed being." That's a far-out one, but our minds do misattribute, misperceive, make mistakes in that recognition.

The classic example offered in the commentaries is walking into a dark room and seeing a coiled form in a corner and perceiving it as a snake. With that perception, fear may arise. Then somebody turns the light on and we see that coiled form is a rope. The fear disappears. The fear was conditioned on the perception of it being a snake. So again we can see how our perceptions of experience, and particularly when they are misattributed, can influence our experience.

The clearest example I had of this—I've told this story quite a few times, so some of you have probably heard this one before—the clearest example for me of this kind of mistake and the emotional response that happens is that there was a period of time I was meditating in Burma, and my room was pretty near the monastery wall. Lots of sounds came over the monastery wall. If any of you have practiced in Burma, you know that Burma is nowhere near as quiet as Barre, Massachusetts.

And so there were sounds. At one point, for three days, Burmese opera was playing nonstop, twenty-four hours a day. That was pretty intense.

But pretty much every evening during a particular stretch of the retreat, at the same time each night, I began hearing a squealing sound. Hearing that squealing sound, my mind perceived it—it heard the sound, and the identification it made was "pig." I had heard pigs squealing before, and this sounded like a squealing pig. So my mind perceived it as pig.

My mind didn't quite stop there. It went a little further, and I could actually see that the rest of what I'm going to describe to you was the mind constructing. Because I knew I didn't know this. But my mind had a sense that this pig was in distress, and it created the idea that what was happening each evening was that I was pretty near, in my place in the monastery, to a butchery just in the village. And what I was hearing every evening was the nightly slaughter of a pig. So compassion arose for this distressed pig. This went on night after night—feeling this, noticing this, hearing the pig.

And then one night, instead of sitting at that particular time of day, I decided to do a walking meditation. While I was walking, I began to be startled by these swooping forms that were coming very close to me. The swooping forms, I figured, must be bats. I mean, I hadn't really spent much time with bats, but that was the perception I had for those creatures. And those forms were squealing. It was bats that were squealing every night. There wasn't even a pig in the picture. The pig didn't exist. The compassion, of course, just completely vanished.

But again, we see particularly how prone to mistake perception can be. I did not question the perception. I knew that the whole story about the slaughtering of pigs was probably an idea in my mind. It didn't—it still generated this feeling of compassion. But I knew that part was a projection. The idea that I had misperceived entirely didn't cross my mind until I noticed these bats squealing. So the mental perception created conditions for our response. This kind of thing happens all the time.

And this takes us to this more deluding aspect of perception. The teachings connect this process of perception with another process in the mind called papañca. The suttas don't really describe or define what papañca is, but they give a pretty clear description of how it arises and what happens when it arises. And so it's pretty clear that it's really tightly connected with delusion—that papañca and delusion go hand in hand.

The other piece that the suttas say about papañca is that it's intimately connected with conflict in the world. Essentially, the suttas have a kind of step-by-step unfolding of why conflict arises, and it's traced back to papañca. Papañca as the root of conflict in the world. So it's a pretty important process to understand, to get to know. And it's intimately connected with delusion in our minds.

There's a description of how papañca comes up. I'm going to read this to you. This is a fairly famous quote from the suttas, so many of you may have heard it. This section goes through all six sense bases with respect to this process. It's a description of the process of how we go from contact with a sense door to papañca being created, and then what that papañca results in. It goes through it for all six sense doors. I'm just going to read it with respect to the eye.

"Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact." So the meeting of the eye, the form—the visible form that is seen—so the eye, the form, then there's eye consciousness.

The meeting of those three is contact. With contact as condition, there is feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. What one feels, that one perceives. So there's the contact, there's a feeling, and then there's the perception, the recognition of what it is. What one perceives, that one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one—I'm just going to put in "papañcizes" here—that one papañcas about.

It's translated in a couple of different ways. One of the ways it's translated is "mental proliferation." So this passage really clearly describes that process I was talking about. We hear a sound, we perceive it—I hear the sound of the pig, or the sound of the squealing—perceive it as pig, and then start thinking about it and mentally proliferating about it.

It's not just thinking. The thinking is kind of more at the bare level. It's like, "Oh, that's a pig. Wonder what kind of situation that pig is in. Sounds distressed." This is where it heads into papañca. "Sounds distressed. Maybe it's being slaughtered. Oh, there's a butcher shop over there. They're killing pigs every night." So this is a simple definition of papañca—the mind kind of running riot with thought. One of the most common ways that people talk about papañca is mental proliferation of thought.

The sutta goes on. This is then a description of how papañca impacts our subsequent perceptions. It says, "With what one has mentally proliferated"—this is complicated language, I'll unpack it for you—with what one has papañcized about, with what one has mentally proliferated as the source, perceptions and notions tinged by mental proliferation beset one with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye.

So basically this is talking about a process by which we see something, we experience it, we think about it, we start creating opinions, views, ideas about it. And then our experience is not like bare experience coming in. We are seeing that experience through those opinions, ideas, beliefs—through that papañca. Papañca becomes a kind of filter over our experience, leading us to perceive things differently.

Another example: you might be seeing somebody walk across the street. That might just be a very neutral kind of seeing—seeing a person. But perhaps in this case, this person has a body shape, height, or form that's similar to someone who has caused you harm in the past. And so there potentially becomes a reaction. The sight of that person reminds you of—in classical language, in standard language—the sight reminds you of someone, and that reminding drags in a whole bunch of history. And so seeing that person is now no longer so neutral. There could be a whole bunch of emotional response that's arisen from that simple contact based on—I'll read this again—based on papañca as the source, perceptions and notions tinged by that papañca beset one with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye.

So again you start to see how, when perception is not understood, delusion and perception begin to lead us around by the nose. Our past comes into our present through this process.

That exploration of papañca, the exploration of mental proliferation, is one way to understand papañca. But there's some other thoughts about the meaning of papañca based on how it's used in the suttas, the various places it's used in the texts, and how it is used.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu actually points out that the word papañca is used in Indian art to mean a repetition of a theme that gets represented by a certain object. It might be in art—a repetition of a theme based on a visual object that's repeated throughout a series of paintings or multiple times in a painting. He also says that in music, again, papañca is described as perhaps a series of notes that become repeated throughout a piece of music. And so it becomes kind of like a little object. Thanissaro actually translates papañca as "objectification," and I'll go into that a little bit more in just a bit.

I'm particularly interested in this term because of how it's connected with other terms. In certain places in the suttas, the Buddha actually points to the allaying of papañca as being very important for full liberation.

He talks about, for instance, in one sutta the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion—one cannot be freed without those. The absence of craving, one cannot be freed without that. And the absence of papañca, one cannot be freed without that. So in one list he placed it among the things that need to be released, understood.

To me, this actually indicates that papañca means something more than a lot of thinking. It has a deeper meaning, perhaps, than just the mind thinking about things repeatedly. And so I'd like to explore that a little bit—what else it might possibly point to, what other deluding aspect of experience it might illuminate.

To do that, I'm going to tell a story. Let's start with a story from the suttas. This is a teaching story that came about because a couple of his monks were wandering on alms round and they were hearing some other ascetics arguing. Those other ascetics were arguing, "The Dhamma is like this, it's not like this, you're wrong, I'm right, it's not like that." They were all entrenched in their positions. When his monks came back, he told them this story.

He said, "Formerly, bhikkhus"—and this is an abbreviated version of the story, so it won't take too long—"Formerly, bhikkhus, there was a certain king in this very Sāvatthī, and that king addressed a man. 'Come now, my good man, bring together all those persons in Sāvatthī who have been blind from birth.' 'Yes, your majesty.' 'Now, my man, show them an elephant.' To some of the blind people he presented the head of the elephant saying, 'This is an elephant.' To some he presented an ear of the elephant saying, 'This is an elephant.' To some he presented a tusk, the trunk, the body, the foot, the hindquarters, the tail, the tuft at the end of the tail saying, 'This is the elephant.'

"Then the king approached these people and said, 'Have you been shown the elephant?' 'Yes, your majesty.' 'Tell me, what is an elephant like?' Those people who had been shown the ear of the elephant replied, 'An elephant, your majesty, is like a winnowing basket.' Those who'd been shown the body replied, 'An elephant is like a storeroom.' Those who'd been shown the foot replied, 'An elephant is like a post.' And so on, saying, 'An elephant is like this, an elephant is not like that.' They fought each other with their fists."

So the story points to the way we perceive our experience. In this case, the people who were blind from birth, who'd never seen an elephant in their lives, were given a particular aspect of the elephant to feel. That's perception, right? They experienced the elephant with their own experience, their own hands. They weren't given the full picture. And yet from that perception—perception from direct experience, very strong—views got formed. Strong ideas about "this is an elephant."

For the person who was shown the leg, it's not incorrect to say this part of the elephant is like a post. But the view that gets created—and often this happens around perception—a view gets created that grows larger than the actual perception. We take things in with perception, we create an idea about that, we believe that idea, and then we block out other information, other ideas, and say, "It's like this. It's like this." We believe our ideas.

We do this actually a lot. This is not an uncommon experience for us—to create an idea and then hold to it. "It's like this. It's like this."

To take it out of the realm of a teaching story and into the realm of our world: there's the concept of race, for instance. The concept of race is well known, well understood to have no basis in biology whatsoever. No basis in DNA, none. The concept of race is completely a construction of mistaken perception.

And yet, that concept has been one of the most—has created some of the most horrible suffering this planet has seen. Because of beliefs in the concept of race, beliefs about the ideas of what various races are. Even though the idea of race is a complete myth, the reality lingers, continues to this day. The reality of oppression, the reality of suffering because of a concept. It's not just about people and stories coming to blows over an elephant. It's well worth getting to know, familiarizing ourselves with these processes of mind to understand how this works.

So in that story, we take a perception and create a thing out of it. This may be what is meant by papañca. Bhikkhu Ṭhānissaro uses the word objectification. The people touching the foot of the elephant, the leg of the elephant, create the concept "like a post." That becomes the reference point for elephant at that point. So we go from a perception to a thought to a belief. I think where the believing part enters may be some of what papañca is about—essentially, the process by which we conceptualize something and then take it to be reality. I started out by saying that's how perception is deluding, going back to that image of the mirage. We mistake the reflection for a reality. This is the deluding nature of perception, and where I think papañca fits in.

So Ṭhānissaro uses this term objectification—the creation of an object out of experience, out of a process. There's another term that I like, the definition of which is perfect for this. It's a philosophical term called reification. Some of you may have heard of this term. I wrote down the Wikipedia definition of reification this evening: "Reification is the error of treating as a concrete thing something which is not concrete but merely an idea." This is what happens all the time with us through perception. We relate to our experience through the concepts, taking them to be the reality.

One scholar, a Sri Lankan scholar, says: "This process of distorted perception, of placing every bare perception into a framework of emotions and beliefs that have come out of our past, our history, our conditioning, robs the freshness out of our experiences. But we are not aware of the constant interference of the past. Because of this unawareness, which is our ignorance and our delusion, we see humanity fragmented as me and others, us and them, and in various other stereotypes—skin color, ethnicity, language, and ideology included."

This is happening all the time. And so we can, through this exploration of perception, begin to see how everything that we experience is created and experienced through the mind. It's easier to see this with the world of thoughts—fairly easy. I remember at one point I had broken up with a partner and had gotten over that partner long ago. Yet at one point I was walking down the street, and my mind came out of this thought bubble which had created the world of being back in relationship with that person. We were going somewhere and doing something, and then pop—the bubble burst. It was a little bit confusing. Where did that come from? At that point the emotional attachment had long since released, and so there wasn't any feeling of "oh, poor me, I'm not in that relationship anymore." It was just seeing the delusion of the mind having created a reality for a minute—that relationship was existent again.

We can see this way in which we live through our thoughts, the creation of thought worlds, thought bubbles that we live in. It's a little harder to see that everything we experience—every sight, every sound, every smell, every taste, every touch—is mediated by the mind. What we experience through sight, for example, is just little pixelated bits of light and color, and it's our mind that puts together the images.

There was an example of this in California where I live. There's a science museum—it's mostly for kids, but it's fun for adults too. I took my ten-year-old nephew there at one point. It's called the Exploratorium. We walked in, and back in the back of the hall there's a big giant open warehouse, basically. Hanging on the ceiling, back in the back of the room, were long rods—probably about five or six feet long, maybe two or three inches around. Each rod, there were probably ten to fifteen of them, hanging about two feet apart.

And on each rod, there were flashing colored lights. I looked up at that and thought, huh, I wonder what that is. I'll have to check that out later.

My nephew and I wandered around the Exploratorium and stopped at one point to get something to eat and rest. He was sitting there eating his ice cream cone or whatever, kind of looking up, and he said, "Look, it's butterflies!" I looked in the direction he was looking, and he was looking at these rods. I looked up and said, "What are you talking about?" Then he said, "Oh, now it's a school bus!" I looked up and saw a lot of yellow flashing lights and a little red flashing light, and I said, "What are you talking about? I see yellow flashing lights. It's kind of the color of a school bus, but I do not see a school bus up there."

It took me quite a while, actually. We went off to do something else, but then we came back and I said, okay, I am going to see what on earth he is talking about. I stood there for a while and watched. At some point—it's kind of like Carol mentioned the other day, this trick of those 3D pictures where you have to look just in the right way to see dinosaurs pop out of the page—well, this is a similar thing. You have to look at it just in the right way. I think it involves a bit of a tracking technique.

What happened as I looked at it was that the entire area delimited by those bars became a screen. It genuinely looked like there was a projector, a screen that something was being projected on. And on that screen, I saw a school bus riding across. The perception was so detailed that I could read the name of the school district on the side of the school bus.

My understanding of how this works is that the flashing lights were timed just right, and there's a kind of persistence of vision that carried—in imagination, because it clearly was not happening out there. That was what was so amazing about this exhibit. It clearly was not happening out there. That school bus was in the mind. The persistence of vision put all those little bits of light together to create the image of the school bus.

This is another area where delusion can creep in. Because the concepts—that was really clear, that school bus did not exist anywhere. It wasn't even a projection of a school bus; it was completely in the mind. And yet the mind creates the object. It creates the solidity of a thing. This too, I think, is in the terrain of papañca—the creation, the solidification, the objectification of experience.

All experience is mediated through the mind. Clinging, of course, is a mental experience. I think you're probably all really familiar with that one by now—the experience of clinging. That's a mental formation, a present arising in the mind that has no inherent reality in the world. And not only that, but what we cling to is a construction of our own minds. What we are clinging to is created by our own minds. Mostly we cling to concepts. We cling to ideas. There's no way to cling to reality.

And so this doorway of perception and concept is very fertile ground for clinging. When not seen clearly, when perception is not seen for what it is, we create that object and we cling to it. Our perceptual process has been co-opted. Perception has been taken over by delusion to make us believe that there's something actually to cling to. But what we're clinging to is a formation of the mind, an idea in the mind.

When our minds start to see this, when our minds get it, begin to get that the mind is contributing to its own suffering—fortunately our minds don't particularly want to suffer. As our minds get the information about how suffering is created, they begin to recognize: well, that's not necessary. That can be let go of.

But it's not something we can necessarily just act to do. The mind has to see things clearly. And perception happens all the time.

We have abundant opportunity to watch this process. Yet it is not necessarily something to try to do. I believe I mentioned this last time—Sayadaw U Tejaniya often says this isn't something to do, but rather information that may help you see something new in your experience. Just observe. Very simple.

These processes can become apparent through the simplicity of meeting experience. And the ways that we are confused and deluded will also begin to be revealed. The mind will choose to let go when it understands.

CHAPTER 102

The Experience of Wisdom

Andrea Fella · 1h03

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines the nature of wisdom (paññā) as a conditioned factor of mind that can be cultivated and recognized in our direct experience. She explores the three traditional categories of wisdom: sutamayā paññā (wisdom from hearing), cintamayā paññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanāmayā paññā (wisdom from meditation practice).

Drawing from her own practice journey, Andrea offers practical guidance on using wisdom reflections such as "this is just anger" or "this is nature" to create space when caught in difficult mind states. She explains how wisdom operates within the Five Spiritual Faculties (pañc'indriya)—faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—and how these qualities mutually support each other's development.

The talk illuminates multiple ways wisdom manifests experientially: the simple shift that creates ease with challenging experiences, recognizing thoughts as present-moment arisings rather than reality, understanding dukkha directly, seeing defilements vanish upon clear observation, and recognizing the non-arising of unwholesome states. Andrea emphasizes that wisdom develops gradually through meeting dukkha with mindfulness, and that the mind's natural orientation toward well-being, when given accurate information through clear seeing, naturally releases what causes suffering. This purification process happens not through force but through wisdom's own momentum.

The topic I'd like to explore with you tonight is wisdom—what it is, how we cultivate it, and how we experience it. That last piece is really what I want to explore most deeply.

Following from Bhante's talk last night, he said a number of times that little by little we cultivate the conditions that allow us to open to the truth, to open to this freedom. And the conditions, this little by little cultivation, is the cultivation of wisdom. We've said so many times on this retreat, and it came up again in the hall this morning: wisdom is what does the work of freeing the mind. We can't consciously do that. Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, when asked why we practice, "We practice to cultivate wisdom."

This fits in very much with the Buddha's teaching. The Eightfold Path begins with wisdom—wise understanding, wise intention. And yet there are two framings of the Eightfold Path. The standard framing includes the eight path factors: wise understanding, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. In this framing, the path begins with wisdom, begins with what we can call the wisdom of learning. We have to start somewhere, right? We have to start somewhere from learning, from hearing teachings.

This is where our path begins. It begins by hearing the teachings of the Buddha, then beginning to reflect on them, which we can think of as the second kind of wisdom. So first we hear, we listen, we read, we take in wisdom and begin thinking about it. Does this make sense? How can I apply this to my own life? Do I want to apply this to my life? Does it make sense to me? This is the part where we begin to practice. When we reflect on the teachings, wise understanding—that first factor of the path—leads to wise intention, which carries us into action. And so the wisdom of the Buddha carries us into practicing wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, practicing wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration.

The second way the path is described, and some of you are probably familiar with this framing too, is the gradual development beginning with generosity, then leading to sīla (ethical conduct), samādhi (the cultivation of the settledness of mind), and paññā (wisdom). The understanding is that the gradual training unfolds in this direction. We begin with cultivating our hearts and minds in connectivity with the world through generosity and ethical conduct, and then begin cultivating the inner mind to let go of the ways that we cling. This creates the conditions to open to wisdom.

In many ways we can see the path both begins and ends with wisdom. At the beginning of the path, it takes the form of wisdom that is hearing, reflecting, understanding—this is sutamayā paññā in Pali. The wisdom we take and act upon is the wisdom of reflection, cintāmayā paññā. And the third kind of wisdom is the wisdom of insight, where we actually have the direct experience of wisdom: bhāvanāmayā paññā.

When I first started hearing the word wisdom a lot in dharma talks, I had this rather grand idea about it. I thought, "I don't have any wisdom," or "What is this wisdom?" I also had this idea that there was going to be some big mind-blowing insight and then after that everything would be different. But as Bhante said so many times yesterday, it's a gradual development of wisdom. Little by little, over and over, we cultivate our hearts and minds and wisdom grows.

Wisdom is actually a factor of mind. Carol mentioned this morning in answer to one of the questions that wisdom is a factor of mind, subject to causes and conditions. It's actually found in one of the key lists of the Buddha called the Five Spiritual Faculties. These five spiritual faculties are five of the really beautiful wholesome qualities that are cultivated as we practice. The other night Winnie talked about this—that as we practice, wholesome qualities are cultivated. This is one of the lists of wholesome qualities that are very active in the practice of meditation. Sayadaw U Tejaniya actually calls this list essentially the way the meditating mind works.

Those five factors are confidence (or faith), energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. You'll recognize them; we've talked about all of them. They are all factors of mind that are cultivated by conditions. They arise with certain conditions; they pass away when conditions are not present. Wisdom is a conditioned arising. We can cultivate conditions that will support its arising.

The wisdom of the Buddha was vast. At one point—I think somebody mentioned this in the hall—he picked up a handful of leaves from the ground and said, "Tell me, are the leaves I have in my hand greater than the leaves that are in the trees in the forest?" And they said, "Well, obviously the leaves in the forest are greater than the leaves you have in your hand." And he said, "In the same way, what I know, what I understand, is vast."

But what I teach is this handful of leaves. I teach just what you need to know to understand suffering and to end suffering.

And so the wisdom that the Buddha taught, the teachings of the Buddha, are really oriented around this question: How do we understand suffering, and how can suffering come to an end? It's no surprise, actually, that wisdom is developed through contact with dukkha. Joseph sometimes says that we want insight into dukkha without experiencing dukkha. And it doesn't work that way.

I'd like to talk about these three kinds of wisdom—briefly about the first two, and then more in depth about how we actually experience wisdom. Because you have all experienced wisdom, and it can be helpful to have it pointed out to us that wisdom is arising in our experience. It took me a while before I really understood this. It was very helpful to be able to acknowledge and recognize: yes, this is wisdom.

The first two kinds of wisdom—the wisdom of hearing, of learning—we're engaging with this one a lot. The meetings, the interviews, the questions in the hall, the dharma talks—we're offering support, teachings, information for you to take in and reflect on. And then we begin to reflect on that, apply it, look at it in our practice.

The practice of satipatthana, the practice of right mindfulness, is an exploration of wisdom. Right mindfulness, the way the Buddha offered that teaching, as we've been talking about and explored very early in the retreat—right mindfulness includes wisdom. The orientation of wise mindfulness is to understand that what's arising in the present moment is a present moment arising. It's really very simple: a turning of the mind to recognize that what's happening in the present moment is an arising in the present moment. That orientation begins to allow the whole of the Dharma to unfold.

Munindraji is said to have told Joseph a number of times: sit and know that you're sitting, and the entire Dharma will be revealed to you. It can be that simple. Know what's happening in the present moment as a present moment arising. That's our orientation. That's what we've been practicing.

This bringing of right mindfulness, hearing the teachings, bringing right mindfulness to our experience—this is a way of cultivating chintamaya pañña. We are reflecting on the teachings and beginning to act on them, exploring for ourselves.

We can also use reflection, actual conscious reflection, to bring wisdom in if things feel challenging or difficult. I've certainly had many experiences where I'm sitting, attempting to bring wise mindfulness to my experience, and still really struggling. Sometimes it can be helpful to use this second kind of wisdom consciously, actively, by bringing in wisdom thoughts. This is a practice Sayadaw U Tejaniya teaches quite a bit—just dropping wisdom into the mind if there's a sense of struggle.

I'll offer you some of the reflections I've found helpful: "This is just anger. This is just fear. This is just confusion. This is just sadness. This is just loneliness." It's a kind of reminder, pointing back to that recognition: yes, this is something happening in the present moment. If we're caught, we can bring some of these thoughts to bear on experience and see what happens. This is a conscious use of thought, a use of skillful thought in the practice.

Reflecting on the impermanent nature of experience: "This will pass. This will pass."

As I mentioned that, the memory that came to mind—I don't think I've shared this in the hall before. At one point I had a really strong orientation toward aversion. I still have that as a tendency, although it's shifted quite a bit. But early in my practice it was very strong, and it was hard to experience pleasant emotions. As I began in the practice to experience metta and joy, it was very uncomfortable.

At one point I was sitting at my table having breakfast, and a wave of joy just rose over me. I felt like, "Whoa, this is way too intense. I can't handle this." And a wisdom thought passed through. This one I didn't consciously bring in—it just passed through: "It's okay, it will pass."

That really helped. The joy actually got very strong for a few moments, like a big wave. And then I went to the other side of it, and it became this delightful happiness. I had been trying to hold it down because it was so strong, so intense, and I was not used to it. Reflecting on its impermanence was very helpful.

Another reflection I find really, really helpful—this one Sayadaw U Tejaniya taught me, and it requires a little explanation—is simply to remind yourself: this is nature.

Whatever's happening, this is nature.

On reflection, I really liked this reflection, because what it points to is that whatever is happening in the present moment, of course it's happening. Whatever's happening in this moment is a product of all of the choices from the past leading to this moment, all of the conditions having come together leading to this moment. What's arising right now is arising very naturally. It's like a tree growing—a seed has been planted and the tree has grown. Of course this is arising.

To me, saying "this is nature" encapsulates a whole understanding about the process nature of experience, the cause and effect nature of experience, and the vast number of conditions that come together to create this moment. It's just nature unfolding right now. This one has been really helpful to me when I've gotten caught in certain kinds of mind states. Just dropping that in has created some room in which mindfulness could meet the experience more easily. Instead of fighting against it, it helped to create the conditions for wise mindfulness, rather than the attitude of mind that was resisting or fighting the experience.

The Buddha himself recommended something similar. He actually uses this kind of reflection in some of the discourses. He says that what is arising you should understand: "This is not I, this is not mine, this is not myself." It's a kind of reflecting to yourself—this is not self. This is not I, this is not me, this is not mine. That's another version of "this is nature."

It can sometimes be helpful to find reflections like this that resonate with your understanding and make them your own. For me, having reflected on "this is nature," it has a very deep resonance when I drop that into my practice. You can find language for your own expression of wisdom.

At one point in my practice, Sayadaw U Tejaniya asked me to recognize the wisdom that was arising in my experience. At that time, wisdom still seemed pretty abstract to me, and I wasn't really sure what he meant. But I began exploring: what wisdom is arising in my experience? This was at a point when my practice was pretty settled, when there was quite a bit of continuity of mindfulness. I began exploring: what is wisdom?

It took a while for me to be able to recognize it, and then when I began to recognize it, I saw it all over the place. I saw it actually retrospectively all over the place. I saw that wisdom had been with me my whole journey, and I hadn't really recognized it.

This talk really grew out of that exploration—well, that exploration plus a question somebody asked me on retreat after I began using the word wisdom in my talks. Somebody raised their hand and said, "What are the symptoms of wisdom?" I thought that was a great way to put it. I reflected on it and gave an answer, but this talk really grew out of both the exploration that Tejaniya set me on and answering that question.

So I'd like to spend some time now pointing to ways in which wisdom is experienced, from very simple ways to some perhaps less familiar ways. These are just some examples. I cannot possibly be exhaustive here. As I have seen in my exploration of this topic, there are, I think, infinite ways wisdom can manifest. Your own experience will point things out to you in different ways, and you will begin to understand it yourself. These are just some examples of wisdom at work in experience.

Probably one of the first ways that we see wisdom at work as we begin to practice meditation is that simple shift around something challenging. We are meditating, perhaps struggling a little bit with a reaction to anger or confusion, and then suddenly there's a shift and the mind recognizes, "Oh, this is just anger." This is different from what I was describing earlier about using that as a reflection. What I'm saying here is direct understanding in the moment—a shift of perspective, a kind of space that's created.

I know you've all experienced this. There's been something happening and suddenly it's like, "Oh right, this is just happening right now." This is a situation where the experience doesn't suddenly vanish, and it doesn't feel like you've seen through it or understood it completely, but there's some ease with being able to meet it.

An analogy might be: if you're in a car going sixty miles an hour down the freeway, this kind of insight is like taking your foot off the accelerator and putting the car into neutral. The seeing doesn't stop the momentum of that pattern from continuing.

But it will stop because you're no longer fueling it. Just like the car will come to a stop because the car's in neutral.

So that's one way that we experience wisdom—that sense of "oh, this is just..." That shift is the shift of wise attitude that Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about, the attitude of mind that can be okay with whatever is arising. Okay that anger is arising. Okay that confusion is arising. It's just an arising.

This is another aspect of wisdom in the present moment: that mind that recognizes what's happening now is happening now. I started with that at the beginning of the talk—that recognition of "oh, what's happening is actually something that's happening right now."

There's a huge difference, and I think you've all seen this: there's a huge difference between thinking and being aware that thought is arising in the present moment. When we're aware that thought is arising in the present moment, what tends to happen is that the mind is not fooled by the thought. It's not fooled into thinking that the thought is something it's not. I talked about the kind of bubble of world that we get born into when we're not mindful of thought—we believe the reality that thoughts paint for us when we're not aware that thought is arising in the present moment.

And so this is a manifestation of wisdom. When we see thought and know "this is a thought happening in the present moment," wisdom is operating. It's helping us to not believe the creation of that thought as a reality, as a firm fixed reality. We understand it is something that is being created now in the present moment.

Another way that wisdom operates in the present moment, a kind of different perspective of how wisdom sees things, is when it sees things as causes and conditions, as you're seeing a pattern unfold. So you have something difficult, for example, and as I said early on, it's not an accident, it's not a mistake when we are meeting dukkha. It's how wisdom grows—through the meeting of dukkha.

And so we observe over and over again a difficult pattern. Around my example of anger—over and over again watching that pattern come and go. We see it over and over and over again.

This is where we get a little caught. Wisdom doesn't work like knowledge. Wisdom isn't something that you can necessarily just say, "Oh, I have that wisdom. I can use that now." We can do that a little bit with the use of the reflections that I mentioned. But I know you've all seen this too—that we have an insight into something, we see "oh, this is just anger," and we watch it dissipate. And then there's another time when we see "oh, this is anger," and it's not "this is just anger." We're caught in it. And we wonder, why is it I learned this lesson? I've seen "this is just anger." How come I can't do that now?

Wisdom isn't something we just pick up, like book knowledge. It has conditions that come together. Sometimes the conditions come together to help us see in this moment, "oh, this is just anger." And sometimes we get to watch the pattern unfold. We get to see the creation of the pattern. Instead of just watching it fade, we actually get to see how it gets perpetuated. Over and over again we get to see that. And so over time the mind begins to understand: this pattern is suffering.

This was a mind-blowing insight for me at one point when I was early in my practice. The practice of observing anger was my very first mindfulness practice. I wasn't particularly interested in meditating, but I was interested in understanding my mind and why I got angry. And so I practiced with exploring my anger in daily life. That was my first meditation practice, my first mindfulness practice—explore when I'm angry, be aware of that.

And over the course of months, reflecting back now, as I said, I didn't really understand this so much as wisdom until later. But at one point I recognized or realized that there was something going on in my mind. I was angry at a particular person and there was something happening in my mind—I was somehow believing that this anger was going to make them miserable. Does that sound familiar?

And in some ways, fortunately, this was very obvious to me because I happened to be in the Peace Corps on a South Pacific island, and the person I was angry with was 7,000 miles away in California. So after some weeks of observing the anger, I finally got it. Oh, this isn't making that person feel miserable at all. They have no clue that there's anger in the field. They have no idea. And what I began to see is, oh, and this anger makes me miserable. Duh! But the idea that it was hurting someone else or that it was going to make someone else miserable was obscuring the dukkha here.

That is an insight. It's wisdom to recognize this present moment arising—in this case, of anger—as dukkha. This is the first noble truth. The Buddha asked us to recognize "this is dukkha" and then to understand dukkha.

This morning in the hall, the question came up about looking at craving for becoming. And this is a similar example in a way, in that in our non-mindful mode, what we're typically focused on with craving for becoming is the idea of what we will become—the good yogi, the good meditator, the one who's seen, the one who's respected or admired. We have that craving to be that person. And that idea, the mind projecting, "Oh yes, that's what I'm going to be someday"—it's a pleasant fantasy, a pleasant thought. The mind is in that pleasant thought, and that pleasant thought is obscuring the suffering of the craving.

So this morning, the recognition in the question was, "I'm seeing the craving for becoming and it is suffering." Yes, that's an insight. It's wisdom that shows you craving is suffering. Again, it's not a mistake when clear awareness sees dukkha. Wisdom sees dukkha. Wisdom understands dukkha as being something arising here, and the deeper understanding is that it can be understood, it can be freed.

This is one of the ways that purification works. We've used that word a lot in the hall too. With clear seeing, the mind begins to understand the consequences of what it is engaged with, what it's engaged in doing. For me, with the anger, after several weeks of observing the anger come up over and over again, the mind began to understand the consequences of that, which was suffering here. Until the mind understood the consequences of that, it wasn't going to change its pattern.

Somebody asked me in one of the meetings today, "How does purification work? What's the mechanism of purification?" And I think this is connected. It's like our organism is oriented towards well-being. It wants to be happy. It wants to feel good. And in our typical way of meeting the world, the organism will go the quickest way to the quickest place of well-being, which would be having what I want and getting rid of what I don't want. Greed and aversion, basically. So without mindfulness and wisdom, the organism really fundamentally misunderstands how well-being is found, how well-being comes about.

With mindfulness and wisdom, the organism gets good information—the wisdom of "oh, craving is suffering." Yes, wisdom sees craving is suffering. That information points the mind toward understanding that this way of going about finding well-being doesn't work very well. It reveals the underlying unreliability of that approach to finding well-being. And so we experience the dukkha in mindfulness and wisdom. It's not a mistake.

This wisdom then begins to help the mind let go of that craving. When the mind really begins to understand that its own processes are contributing to non-well-being, the mind itself begins to understand how to let go. And this is what we mean when we say wisdom does the work of freeing the mind.

A few more ways of experiencing wisdom. Some of you might have seen at times, as the mindfulness gets stronger and as wisdom gets stronger, sometimes you turn to look at something challenging—there's that confusion or frustration, a sense of abandonment, a feeling of loneliness—and the mind turns towards it and it vanishes. This very quick disappearance of a defilement on being seen is another symptom of wisdom.

One of the first times this happened to me, I didn't trust it actually. I was on a three-month retreat, right in the middle of it, and there was the crossover where I knew I'd be getting new teachers. I felt abandoned by my teachers who were leaving. I bow to this. I know that some of this will be happening for you too. It's hard. I want to acknowledge that. It is hard.

So I was exploring that feeling of abandonment, and at some point I recognized, "Oh, I feel like a four-year-old little girl who's been left." There was part of me that felt that four-year-old little girl, and there was this sense of compassion holding the whole thing. I was exploring it in this way, and then at some point interest got strong. "Well, what is this feeling of abandonment anyway?" I turned to look at it, and it vanished.

The story I told myself in that moment—this is how far I was from really recognizing wisdom—was, "Oh, I must not know how to observe emotions. I don't know how to do this right, so I'm going to ask my teacher how to observe emotions." I went in and reported this to Carol, and she asked, "Was it your experience that there was any lingering sense?" I said, "No, it was gone!" She said, "Trust your experience." I said, "I thought I'd made a mistake." She said, "Trust your experience."

So sometimes wisdom can be strong like that. Interest gets high, the mind orients and observes something, and it vanishes. You can just notice that it vanishes. You don't have to go back and figure out what happened, like I tried to do. Just notice: that happened, that vanished.

Going back to the car analogy, in this case what happens isn't that the car goes into neutral or even that the car stops—the car disappears. It's kind of a funny feeling.

Another way wisdom can manifest is in seeing or recognizing that defilements are not arising. Bhante mentioned this reference in the Satipatthana last night—looking at the fetters. We see the fetters, we understand the fetters, we see as they arise, we see the conditions for them passing away, and we see the conditions for the future non-arising of that fetter.

This idea of the non-arising of something—somebody asked me, "How on earth do you see the non-arising of something?" In exploring this, much of the time seeing the non-arising of something is more of an understanding.

I've thought of four different ways you might recognize that defilements are not arising. The first is through the tool of wise effort. We begin to get familiar with what conditions create defilements, and we learn to avoid those situations. We recognize how not to engage in the conditions that create the arising of that suffering. We learn to avoid unhelpful conditions.

The second way is through reflection, looking back. "Wow, you know, if this situation had arisen five years ago, there would have been a lot more reactivity." So it's not that you're actually seeing the non-arising of the defilement, but you're knowing how in the past more defilement would have arisen. Is this familiar? Do you recognize that one? You know that after some time of practice we begin to see that we're not as reactive anymore.

So this is a way of recognizing the non-arising of a defilement.

The most direct way, or most experiential way, of seeing the non-arising of a defilement is as the mindfulness starts to get more continuous. We see in the mind stream, we begin to recognize—like for instance this exploration of anger that I did early in my practice. I watched anger for months. The mind got really, really familiar with anger. And at some point it got so attuned to the experience of anger that it actually began to recognize the just beginning of congealing of the state of anger. What in retrospect I can see was the intention to anger.

So this happened. I had been observing this pattern of anger for several months and I was just in my kitchen, doing something, cutting an apple. In that moment I wasn't really trying to be mindful, but there was a fair amount of mindfulness present. This was maybe two or three months into my practice, just practicing. I wasn't even doing sitting meditation at this point. This is the power of mindfulness and the power of practice even in daily life.

I was just cutting this apple in my kitchen, and because I had been exploring this quality of anger, I apparently had been fairly attuned to the conditions that led to anger. And I saw in my mind, as I cut that apple, a thought about the person I was angry with. And I felt in my experience what seemed like a freight train of, "Oh yeah, let's jump on this thought and think more thoughts to get angry at that person." This is all seen within a split second. I saw that momentum towards anger.

And in the next split second, the mind recognized—here I had been paying attention to anger for months. I had fully recognized, "Oh, anger is dukkha." And the mind, this is again the power of how purification works, the mind in seeing that freight train of intention to get angry, in that moment recognized: anger, that's dukkha. And the wisdom in that moment deconstructed, let go of that intention. And the anger did not arise.

That was the most direct seeing of the non-arising of something. Seeing how the mind was kind of poised to leap to anger, and the wisdom was right there, and the anger did not arise. So that's another way that we see the non-arising of defilement—through seeing the intention or the momentum of something. And basically the wisdom understanding, "Ooh, that way lies suffering."

The feeling was very much like, you know how if you put your hand on something hot, the hand will draw back even almost before you felt the heat? The body recognizes, "Oh, that's dangerous." It was that kind of seeing. The mind drew back from it. That way lies suffering. So this is another part of the mechanism of purification.

Another way that we know that wisdom is present is when we experience the balance of mind that is non-reactive. This is the experience of wise attitude. We see, we feel the stability. We feel that sense—and several of you in the interviews have talked about feeling rooted, like not buffeted around by things. That sense of equanimity is an indication the defilements are not present. So this is also the non-arising of the defilements.

Other conditions, other states of mind may be arising at this time too. Compassion, joy, metta, interest, curiosity. These also can be manifestations of wisdom.

As the mindfulness gets stronger and we really start to see the dynamic flow of experience, we land in the impermanent, changing, dynamic nature of experience. Wisdom. Wisdom creates the conditions for us to see that in the first place. And at times wisdom will be quite strong and clearly recognize—in that moment it's like there isn't anything to hold on to. Nothing to cling to. It's not even possible to cling in that moment. The mind is so attuned to the changing nature of experience.

Sometimes wisdom can operate kind of in the background, not obvious to us. It can be at work while we're not looking. And this is actually good news too. Wisdom can be a factor that develops its own momentum.

Wisdom develops its own momentum and begins to just do its thing.

One instance I had of this—still around the story of anger—this was some years after this exploration began. The investigation of anger was a several-years-long process. At one point I began recognizing that certain times when I tried to turn my attention to be mindful of the anger, to really get familiar with it, to investigate it, to look at it... When I was first starting to explore this stuff, I was really naive. I didn't know any of the tools of investigation. I was just like, "Oh yeah, anger, that's anger, okay. Oh, anger again, okay." I had no tools. Nobody had ever told me or taught me, because I was off in the Peace Corps. I had read books but hadn't had a meditation teacher to teach me. So I didn't have anybody telling me about how to investigate it in my body and feel where it was. I didn't know any of that.

After I learned all of that stuff, I started digging when the anger came up. "Oh, anger—ooh, let's put that under the microscope. Let's figure that out. Let's look at that." And what started to happen is that every time I'd do that, I'd go down the rabbit hole of anger. So at some point, I kind of got the idea: okay, trying to be mindful—at least in that way—trying to be mindful of the anger wasn't so helpful. So I set it aside. I would notice, I would see the anger. When it came up, I'd bow to it. "I see you, anger. And I'm going to put my attention on my feet right now. You can be here. I'm not going to tell you you're not going to be here, but you wait over there, and I'll be with my feet."

So I did that for a long time, actually. I don't even know how long—maybe several months, or maybe as long as a year—I explored the anger in that way. And over time, I began recognizing that the bouts of anger were getting further apart. In some sense I was seeing the non-arising of the anger, but mostly what I recognized was: wow, it's not bothering me as much anymore.

And then one day—I remember so clearly where I was—this was the wisdom being presented to me. I was walking up my sidewalk and it occurred to me: wow, I haven't experienced that anger in a very long time. And in that thought, of course, the person I was angry with came into my mind, and I couldn't conjure it up. It was gone. I didn't believe it was gone at first. It's kind of like, "Where did it go?" And yet, that moment, the recognition was: it was gone. And it has not come back since then. It vanished while I wasn't looking.

The wisdom showed me—that was a really great learning there—that moment of recognizing: okay, actually, my orientation of this isn't always the way. Sometimes things will let go kind of on their own in the background. That's another form of wisdom.

So learning to recognize these little bits of wisdom, these moments of wisdom, helps us to cultivate the wisdom. As we have been saying, when we are aware of wholesomeness, it creates the conditions for the wholesomeness. And so actually, when I first began exploring this with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, what I did—I mean, I didn't have the way to articulate the different ways I was seeing things like I do now—but what I started to do is when the mind was particularly clear, and there was a sense that there was a clarity of mind seeing things, I just said to myself, "Wisdom is here." And that's where I left it. I didn't go digging or try to figure out what the wisdom was. I just said, "Wisdom is here," and went on with my practice. Just a simple acknowledgment of the sense that wisdom was operating in that moment.

Since wisdom is a conditioned phenomenon, and insight—the manifestation of wisdom—paññā, insights are impermanent. Wisdom is impermanent. The conditions arise for clear seeing, and sometimes it happens that it is so obvious when we're in that state.

Is this familiar to you? It's like, how can I not see this? It is so clear. And in that place, when wisdom is very strong like that, the mind cannot comprehend the possibility in that moment of not seeing it that clearly.

And yet, maybe seconds, maybe hours later, something shifts. And it's like, wow, I guess it wasn't that obvious. You know, just seeing the changing nature of experience and how there isn't anything to cling to. A thought wafts through and it's like, oh yeah, that's a thought, oh there it goes. It seems so clear and so obvious. And yet, that's a very refined state of mind where wisdom is very strong. And it is, again, conditioned. It will fall apart. It's not a mistake that it falls apart. It's not a personal failing that it has fallen apart. Conditions have shifted.

And yet, having seen something clearly like that, there's a way in which the memory of that lingers. Maybe at some point you've had the clear recognition: yes, things are just arising in the present moment. And then another time when it's like, well, I can't see it that way anymore. Rather than second-guessing the insight, which sometimes we do—and I've done my share of that: Was that real? Did I really see that?—rather than second-guessing the insight, what we can recognize in that moment is that clearly delusion is operating right now.

When we're not seeing something clearly like that, having seen it clearly before, we can recognize that delusion has descended and simply be aware: ah, this is delusion. Delusion is operating right now. Having seen it without delusion, you begin to recognize delusion actively in the present moment. And this is very powerful, because we're no longer fooled by our delusion. We may not be able to see through it, but we're also not fooled by it.

So our insights, our wisdom, supports our confidence, our interest in exploring, supports our mindfulness, supports our continuity of mindfulness, which leads to further insights. Those five faculties that I mentioned at the beginning really spiral and support each other. A little bit of wisdom generates confidence, generates a sense of, yes, this is possible, I'm willing to try this. Generates the energy, generates the mindfulness and the concentration, creates the conditions for more clear seeing.

So it's a process, of course. And just a reminder: simplicity, simplicity, simplicity. We can see what we can see. It's often helpful not to dig, but rather to just notice, ah, this is what's obvious. Meet that. And meet the next moment that's obvious. Wisdom will grow. We don't have to make it grow. It grows because the conditions are there to support it.

So let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 103

Wisdom and Effort

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a nuanced exploration of how effort functions in Buddhist meditation, challenging the common assumption that forceful, goal-oriented striving serves our practice well. She begins by establishing the wisdom framework the Buddha offered: that dukkha arises not from the eight worldly winds (praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, fame and disrepute) but from our relationship to them—our tendency to grasp at impermanent, unreliable experience.
>
> Fella presents the four aspects of sammā vāyāma (right effort): avoiding the arising of unwholesome states, abandoning unwholesome states that have arisen, cultivating wholesome states not yet arisen, and maintaining wholesome states that are present. She explains how these four efforts are naturally contained within mindfulness practice itself—when we turn toward difficult states with awareness rather than reactivity, we simultaneously stop fueling them, allow them to wind down, and cultivate wholesome qualities like mindfulness, concentration, and compassion.
> Drawing on the Buddha's teaching to the monk Soṇa about tuning a lute—neither too tight nor too loose—Fella describes the art of calibrating effort. She encourages a light touch applied frequently rather than bearing down intensely, comparing it to riding a scooter that gains its own momentum. The talk concludes with the teaching that while we create conditions for awakening through wise effort, the fruit ripens in its own time: "When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree."

For those of you for whom this is the first retreat, I'd like to offer my joy with you that you have made it through a whole day of your first retreat. It's an accomplishment.

Tonight I'd like to talk about one of the things Pat talked about this morning—how our practice is kind of like an art. He talked about how we create our own canvas of our practice. All minds are different in so many ways, and certain practices work for some of us while other practices are more helpful for others.

In my own exploration of this art of meditation, there's one aspect of the practice that I feel is really helpful to highlight, and that is how we use our effort. So the exploration tonight will be about wisdom and effort.

The usual way that we approach making effort for whatever we want to do in our lives may not actually be the best approach for our meditation practice. We often have a kind of go-out-and-get-it attitude, bringing a lot of energy to what we're trying to accomplish, a lot of focus and drive to what we're doing. That approach may not actually be the best way to go about our exploration of our minds.

In a way, our minds are a delicate creature. It takes a very delicate kind of investigation to really begin to see into how our minds work. The sledgehammer approach doesn't get to the subtlety of what's going on.

So the Buddha encouraged us to apply ourselves with wisdom and with balance. I'd like to start by talking about the wisdom that he suggested we bring, because this wisdom frames the entire approach to our practice.

The Buddha offered a kind of worldview, a way of approaching our experience and our lives, that shifts our perspective and reorients us in terms of how we live in the world. Our usual worldview is given to us by our families, our parents, our culture, the television programs we watch, the radio we listen to. All of that influences how we see our world, and from that perspective we orient our activities in a certain way—in particular, around what we think it takes to be happy.

Our approach to being happy is basically one of acquiring material things or good opinions of people. We think that happiness will come from that acquisition. One of the teachings of the Buddha is that there are these eight worldly winds that blow through our lives: praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, fame and disrepute. The Buddha's perspective is that these are just like winds blowing through the sky. There's going to be winds coming from the north or the south, some days from the east or the west, and that's just what's happening.

But the way we normally approach our lives and happiness is to believe that it's possible to only have pleasure, praise, gain, and fame—that this is what happiness would be, to have only that in our lives. We somehow get the idea that it's possible, and that if it's not happening for us, we're the problem. If we haven't managed to construct our lives to be nothing but pleasure, fame, praise, and gain, something is wrong with us.

The Buddha's approach is this: if that's where you're looking for happiness, you are destined to be unhappy, because it's not possible to control those worldly winds. We don't have that kind of control.

So the wisdom that the Buddha offered largely has to do with this topic or concept of dukkha, often translated as suffering. I like leaving it untranslated because the term dukkha itself is much broader. It means everything from really catastrophic suffering down to the subtlest unease that comes with just being alive.

The Buddha, in his own journey, went out in his own exploration to see what this dukkha is about and whether it's possible to be free of it. In his exploration of his own mind, what he discovered is essentially that our struggle with the world is not caused by those eight worldly winds but by our relationship to them. We struggle because we are pinning our happiness on things that are impermanent and unreliable. That's what we're doing. It's the poignancy of being human.

One of the stories told about the Buddha's awakening is that after he awakened, he looked around at how people were engaged in the world. He saw them trying to be happy, looking for ways to find happiness, doing the best they could—and doing exactly those things that would ultimately lead to their unhappiness. Trying to hold on to things that are impermanent and unreliable. Living in a delusion that it's possible to control these worldly winds. Feeling like it's a problem when we don't have that control.

This is one of the offerings of wisdom that the Buddha has for us: that it is this holding to impermanent, unreliable experience that is right at the core of our struggle. And in that, he also saw that there are some key things that happen in our minds that keep us tied up with this—we could call it a program.

We are born with this notion—it seems to be very deeply ingrained in us. It's not necessarily just given by culture. The Buddha described this program of how we try to find happiness by controlling the world, by holding on to things that are impermanent and unreliable. He described this 2600 years ago. This is not a new program running in our minds. It's a very deeply embedded program.

But fortunately, it's not hardwired. This is one of the things he discovered: it's possible actually to shift how our minds work. And one of the key things he suggested we do is to look at certain states of mind. He said that if we take actions out of certain states of mind, we will tend to wind ourselves into the patterns and habits of suffering over and over again. He identified those as states that were based or rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion. Greed—wanting to hold on to things. Aversion—wanting to get rid of things. And delusion—confusion and misperception around our experience.

So this is another key piece of wisdom that the Buddha offers us: if we act, if we take action out of states of mind based in greed, aversion, or delusion, we will tend to perpetuate our struggles.

These states based in greed, aversion, and delusion, the Buddha calls akusala—unskillful states, unwholesome states of mind. I like the word "unskillful" because it points to a more practical ethics in what the Buddha was talking about. He really wasn't that judgmental about these states of mind. He simply said: if you want to be happy, these states are not going to lead to your well-being and happiness. So it's helpful to find ways to let go of those states, to cultivate states that are based in non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion.

These unskillful, unwholesome states encompass the whole host of afflictive emotions—and then some that we may not necessarily think of as afflictive, but when we actually begin to look at them, we see their agitating nature. States like anger, hatred, irritation, frustration, confusion, excitement, pride, lust—lust for power, lust for money, for fame—despair. All of these states are rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion.

Skillful states of mind, wholesome states of mind, are those that tend, when we act out of them, to lead us more towards happiness. These are states like joy, happiness, tranquility, peace, equanimity, mindfulness, generosity, love, compassion. When we act out of states like that, when those are in our hearts as we act, our actions tend to lead us more towards happiness.

So this is the wisdom that the Buddha offers us. If we want to free ourselves from the way we get caught, the way we struggle in our lives—and this is the full range of struggle, everything from the despair we feel when we lose a partner to the irritation we have at a co-worker who didn't finish their job.

I want to pause here, because sometimes saying something like that—saying that the despair we feel at the loss of a partner is dukkha—can feel challenging. And it is dukkha. It is. We feel it as dukkha, as suffering. And yet sometimes we feel, "Well, if I didn't feel that despair, I wouldn't be human." So we may resist looking at what we're holding on to there. We may resist seeing our participation in that despair.

But there's a way—and I think in my own experience and exploration of this—that loss, the experience of loss, will produce a form of sadness, a form of acknowledgment of that loss that is not flat. It's not like nothing. It's not like you're this robot, this automaton that just registers "oh, loss" with no reaction to it. There is a response in the heart and mind. But the heart doesn't contract around it. It's as if the heart is acknowledging that this is the way it is, without resistance. Feeling the loss fully, but without resistance, without clamping down around it, without getting stuck.

When I've experienced this kind of sadness, it feels very pure. It doesn't stick anywhere. It's like it's just washing through.

It doesn't have any kind of stickiness to it.

So this perspective of wisdom—that it's possible to begin looking into our minds and seeing how our mind is participating, whether these unwholesome states are acting in our minds—this is the way the Buddha suggests we apply our energy and make effort in our practice.

Energy itself is a kind of neutral quality of mind. The same energy could be connected with actions tied to hatred and despair. There's energy in the mind and body bound up with those kinds of states. And energy can also be directed towards freeing ourselves from the ways we get stuck. Energy itself is neutral, and the art and skill of our meditation practice is to orient that energy towards the wisdom the Buddha offers us—cultivating skillful qualities, letting go of unskillful qualities. This is essentially the Buddha's definition of what making skillful effort is.

I'm going to take a few minutes to talk about this teaching on wise effort. The Buddha said there are four ways of making skillful effort in this practice. And no big surprise, it's oriented around these qualities—whether we have skillful qualities or unskillful qualities in our mind. He said that we should work towards avoiding and letting go of unskillful states, and we should work towards cultivating and maintaining skillful states.

The first one, the actual wording of it as I'll read it to you, is: the effort towards the non-arising of unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. That's the way it's framed in the texts. The effort towards the non-arising of unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. Three negatives in that sentence. That one I had to think about when I first started reading this. Essentially, to change the wording a little bit, it's the effort to avoid those states that lead us to suffering.

Part of how this works is that we explore in our minds when we do find ourselves in states of suffering—what is it that's getting us there? We explore, we notice what goes on in our minds, and begin to recognize: these are the conditions that lead to this. The avoiding is to, in seeing those conditions, begin to not engage with them.

A simple example: you might think this teaching about avoiding unskillful states means something like noticing that every time you see a particular person, your mind gets really agitated. You begin to notice the connection—and this may be pretty obvious to you—between being in the same room as this person and the agitation. One way to explore this teaching would be to say, "Okay, that person is the cause of the agitation, so I should avoid being in their presence." And that would certainly help the situation.

Yet the avoidance the Buddha is suggesting we look at has a subtler exploration than that. A subtler way to explore it. Because again, remember that the Buddha said there's something in our own minds. Stuff is happening in the world—praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, fame and disrepute. And it's not that stuff that's the problem. It's our relationship to it.

So in this situation of having agitation arise whenever this person is in the room with you, the encouragement might be to look more closely, because that person doesn't have the power to agitate your mind. And that's actually really good news. That person does not have the power to agitate your mind. The worldly winds do not have the power to cause suffering. Your own mind is what has that power.

A deeper exploration might be to recognize that when that person is in the room with you, fear arises, or confusion arises. Maybe that fear or confusion is because the person has a body shape that looks like somebody who was very unkind to you when you were younger. You might begin to see those connections in the exploration of this. This deeper exploration of looking at the causes of agitation, the associations in the mind, how the actual agitation is constructed in that situation—as we meet those more direct internal causes, our mind begins, through wisdom, through seeing how that suffering is put together, to understand how to let go of it.

It's not necessarily something we can figure out how to do, how to let go of that suffering. But the mind, as it sees the workings of that suffering, begins to understand how to release and let it go. And so this would be a different way of avoiding that unwholesome state. We see into the deeper causes of that agitation.

This is more of what we explore in our meditation practice. As things arise, we turn towards them. And this is pointing to the second wise effort: the effort to let go of unwholesome states that have arisen. So we avoid unwholesome states, and we let go of unwholesome states.

Now, the letting go of unwholesome states that have arisen has some subtlety to it. We can at times, in seeing difficult states of mind—and actually Wes is going to talk quite a bit about working with challenging states of mind tomorrow, so this is just a preview—when we see that we're caught in some kind of unwholesome or difficult state of mind, such as anger, frustration, irritation, or wanting, when we see that we're caught by it, we may be able to actively let it go.

That's what it sounds like this exploration of wise effort is saying: we let go of unwholesome states that have arisen. So it sounds like I should be able to simply say, "Oh, there's anger. I'll let that go." How many of you have been able to do that? Our minds are just not that trainable immediately. Sometimes we can. Sometimes we can notice it, bring some reflection in, recognize that this isn't helping. We can see the drawbacks of the state, or we can actively bring in some reflections that help us to let it go. Or we may be able to actively redirect our attention.

There was one period of time in the first few years of my practice where anger was very strong—anger at a particular person. There was a very strong pattern. Whenever the thought of this person came up in my mind, anger would flare up. The causes and conditions there were pretty clear to see. But I also saw that as I tried to just allow the anger, be with the anger, trying to do that practice, the anger had way more momentum than the mindfulness did. I would just get sucked into the anger.

So I began doing a kind of setting aside. When the anger arose, I just bowed to it. I said, "I see you, but I can't be mindful of you right now. I'll be mindful of you when my mindfulness gets stronger. But right now, I'm going to pay attention to my feet." Just redirecting the attention—not with an aversive pushing away, but simply saying, "Yep, I see you. I'm going to put my attention over here." This is one way of letting go of an unwholesome state. What I saw happen as I did that is that by turning my attention elsewhere, it was like taking the gears out of the anger. It wound its way down, and I went on with my day. This is another approach for that abandoning of unwholesome states.

I think one of the main ways we work with this abandoning of difficult states when they arise is simply the mindfulness of them. When we can be mindful of them, when our mindfulness has the ability to meet them without getting sucked in, we just turn towards them, allow them, open to them. And this too is like taking the gears out of the pattern.

If instead of being engaged in the pattern—in this case, anger—if instead of being engaged in that program, which when we are in that pattern without clear awareness and clear mindfulness, we tend to be thinking thoughts about it. We think, "Well, that person shouldn't have done that. I've got to figure this out. I'm going to make sure this happens and that happens so that they're just as miserable as I am right now." Our minds just spin, and it perpetuates the anger.

When we, instead of allowing that pattern to run, turn towards the anger and feel into being with it—or with any of these difficult states—just turning towards them, it's also like taking the gears out, putting the mind into neutral. If a car is going a hundred miles an hour down a road and you put the car into neutral, the car doesn't stop immediately, but it will stop because you're no longer giving it fuel.

Very similarly in the mind, when you allow and open to these states of mind without any longer feeding or fueling them, those patterns may continue for a while. You may have to hang out in the space of feeling what it's like to be a human being that feels that difficult emotion. This is what it's like to be a human being that's angry. You may have to hang out in that space for a while, but if you can allow it as opposed to engaging with it, it will wind out. This is a huge part of our practice. This is much of how this abandoning of unwholesome states works.

Wholesome states of mind that have not yet arisen.

There are two basic ways to do this, and Pat touched on at least one of them yesterday when he talked about the precepts. One of the ways to encourage wholesome states is essentially to refrain from acting unwholesomely. This is part of the benefit of our engagement with the precepts. As we engage in refraining from false speech, we are simultaneously—whether or not it's obvious—cultivating the wholesome quality of truthfulness. When we refrain from causing harm to living beings, whether or not we're consciously aware of it, we are cultivating compassion.

This is one way to work with the cultivation of wholesome states: to engage with the precepts, to engage with refraining from harming. And as Pat said last night, it has this beautiful side to it. It's not just about "thou shalt not." It's really about cultivating some of these beautiful states of mind. We cultivate compassion through refraining from harming. We cultivate contentment through refraining from stealing. We cultivate truthfulness through refraining from lying.

We can also cultivate positive qualities through positive action. One of the practices we'll be exploring in this retreat is the practice of metta—actively cultivating the open heart, this feeling of a connected mind, a relational, non-sticky relationship, a kind of unconditional well-wishing. It's a very beautiful state of mind that we'll be actively cultivating by inclining our minds in that direction.

Another key way to work with this effort is to cultivate mindfulness—mindfulness with this perspective of wise effort. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita in Burma, said this kind of mindfulness is the most wholesome mind state. Actively cultivating mindfulness is cultivating a mind state that will serve you in your movement towards happiness.

Again, this is one of those things that's kind of hidden from us. We don't necessarily recognize or realize that as we're turning to pay attention to whatever difficulty we're paying attention to, we tend to be oriented toward the suffering. It's like, "Oh, there's depression happening. Okay, depression. This is what it feels like to be depressed. Unpleasant experience, heaviness, tightness." We're working with being with it. And yet we're not noticing that as this happens, we are cultivating wise mindfulness, wise effort, and wise concentration. They're kind of coming along for the ride, these beautiful states of mind, as we engage in our mindfulness practice, whatever we're looking at, whatever we are with.

So this is another major way we work with this aspect of wise effort—arousing wholesome mind states. The moment that mindfulness re-arises, that moment Pat was talking about this morning when mindfulness spontaneously re-arises, that's the opportunity to reconnect with that wholesome quality right there.

And then the fourth: the effort to sustain wholesome states that have arisen.

When I first heard this one, I thought, "Well, why would we have to make effort to sustain these beautiful states of mind?" Then I began looking at my own mind and saw a couple of things. I saw that my own mind actually felt really uncomfortable with joy and happiness. I was way more comfortable with aversion. So when joy arose, one of the patterns that happened is I kind of talked myself out of it by spinning myself into the future, thinking about how this was going to keep going, what I was going to do to make sure it continued, how this person has to know, what that person needs to understand.

There were times when I would wake up into a state of agitation. I remember one time in particular, I woke up into this state of agitation while I was driving my car. I thought, "Okay, come back. Steering wheel, hands on, be present, come back." Then the mind would spin right out again. It happened several times, and I'd just come back to my hands on the steering wheel. Eventually I wondered, "What else is going on here?"

When I opened up my attention to ask that question, what I discovered was that I was really happy. I had completely missed it because the mind had picked up on "How do I keep this going?"

So actually noticing, recognizing when happiness arises, when calm arises, when joy arises, when generosity arises—mindfulness of these states is really one of the biggest ways to sustain them.

In our practice, many beautiful qualities begin to come along. We cultivate attention to the breath and calm begins to settle.

Rather than having a sense of indulgence in that, clear knowing: yep, calm. There's calm and the breath. There's spaciousness and the breath. There's joy and the breath. Clearly recognizing these states rather than either missing them entirely, which was my pattern, or reveling in them.

Sometimes in exploring this teaching of right effort, people ask how it fits with being mindful, opening to what's happening, meeting our experience without trying to change it. They say, "Well, how does that fit with wise effort? In wise effort, we're trying to cultivate the wholesome. We're trying to let go of the unwholesome."

What I'd like to point out here is that when we practice mindfulness in this way of opening to and allowing experience, it already contains the four right efforts.

For example, if we are cultivating mindfulness of frustration—turning towards it, opening to it, allowing it—we are no longer feeding the anger or the frustration. We're no longer thinking it with our thoughts. We're no longer fueling that frustration with our thinking. And so we are essentially, in that activity of bringing mindfulness to our frustration, avoiding the arising of more frustration. There may be some frustration arising now, but it is not getting worse. It's not perpetuating. So we are avoiding the arising of future frustration, which is the first kind of wise effort.

We are working with the abandoning of the frustration that has arisen—the difficulty, the state that has arisen—by the very mindfulness of it, that disengagement of the gears that will eventually wind out, like the car coming to a stop as we put it into neutral. And we are simultaneously cultivating mindfulness, concentration, wisdom, and compassion.

One of the great things that develops as we watch our own minds is a kind of recognition: in seeing what our minds do, we clearly see that it's not just our own minds. This is the mind multiplied by—what is it now?—seven billion. Seven billion people in the world. It's just amazing. We see very clearly that it's not just our own mind. And with that, compassion is born. The poignancy of seven billion minds doing this same thing.

So right effort in our mindfulness practice is essentially four sides of a single process, four ways of being with experience.

The other aspect or avenue to reflect on regarding effort and energy is in how we bring our effort to our practice. I want to talk about one basic thing here. If we have a kind of curiosity or interest in our experience, if we bring to our experience an attitude of interest, of curiosity, of exploration—instead of, "Oh, frustration's arising"—it's like, "Okay, frustration." It actually doesn't matter what's arising in our minds. It really doesn't matter. We can cultivate these qualities of mindfulness, of equanimity, of compassion, of mettā with whatever is happening. So it doesn't really matter what's happening. What matters is how we are with it. What's our relationship to that?

If we can have this relationship of curiosity—"Oh, frustration. What's it like to be a human being that's frustrated?"—if we can have that approach, a very natural kind of energy follows. It doesn't feel like we have to drag up the reserves of energy and go, "Okay, let's turn it up. Let's bring that mindfulness to that frustration." That interest, that curiosity, that investigation naturally brings a very skillful kind of effort and energy to our minds.

You may be able to reframe or just drop in the attitude of curiosity into your experiences. It's like you're all out there running your own science lab on your own minds. What does this experiment do? Here's the experiment of depression—let's see what that's producing. Here's the experiment of anger—let's see what that's producing. Not taking it personally.

Again, recognizing these patterns—they're human patterns. So curiosity, interest, investigation.

The other piece is that sometimes we do need to bring in that active approach. Yes, we need to actually direct the attention, make some effort to connect. This is really where the art of effort comes in.

The Buddha actually used an analogy of art, of music essentially, in exploring this tuning of our effort. He said to one person who had been—the story goes that this person had "enlightenment or bust" on his forehead. He was going for it. He was doing walking meditation all night long until his feet bled. And the Buddha said, "You know, when you were a lay person, did you play a musical instrument? Did you play the lute?" And he said, "Yes, I did." And the Buddha said, "Well, when the string was too tight, did the lute make beautiful music?" And he said, "No." "And when the string was too loose, did it make beautiful music?" And he said, "No." "Likewise, in our practice, the amount of effort has to be tuned like that—neither too tight nor too loose."

The implication here was that Sona, the name of this monk, had his string tuned so tight that it had completely snapped. He was way overdoing it.

So it's helpful to recognize essentially some of the symptoms of overdoing it or underdoing it. Overdoing it, too much effort, often will manifest as a restless energy in the mind. Underdoing it will often manifest as a kind of dullness or sleepiness in the mind. We can balance the energy—this tuning—by the way we make our effort.

Sometimes our effort is too intense. This is like when Sona was doing the walking meditation until his feet bled. When our effort is too intense, we get exhausted. We get burned out on the practice and it feels burdensome. So those are also some possible signs to notice. If it feels burdensome to be practicing, sometimes our inclination is to think, "Oh, the practice feels burdensome, but I need to practice," and we double down. What actually may be called for there is to back off. If it feels burdensome, see what happens if you back off.

Sometimes what I explore when I'm feeling like there's that kind of charged energy—I ask myself, how little effort do I need to make to be mindful? Let me check out whether maybe I don't have to make this much effort. Let me just sit back and see. Oh, yeah, wow. No, don't have to make that much effort. Okay. And it's kind of like dialing back the level of effort. And at some point, it's a little too dialed back and the mind goes off. Okay, well, maybe that's too far. Let's add a little bit more intentionality.

When the effort is too lax, our mind won't stay present. The mind won't be connected to experience. There may be a sense of laziness or dullness in the mind. That may be when we need to add a little bit of connect, meet, sustain the attention on experience.

And yet, that way of connecting, sustaining, meeting experience—it's not like picking up something heavy. It's more like picking up something light and then doing it again and doing it again. In a moment, it actually doesn't take very much effort to be mindful. Right now, how much effort does it take to notice the sensations of your hands? How much effort does it take to notice the contact of your hips or buttocks on the chair or cushion or bench? How much effort does it take to notice the contact of your lips touching each other? It doesn't take much in a moment to be mindful.

What's hard for us is to sustain that. And typically what we think we need to do is to bear down and hold the attention there. It's like, "Okay, attention to breath. I'm going to bear down on it."

The approach that's more helpful to us is rather than bearing down in that way, trying to hold on, is to be with the breath for a second, for half a breath. Joseph Goldstein sometimes calls this the secret teaching of our breath practice. All the effort you need to make is to be present for half a breath. That's it. Half a breath. And then do it again. And then do it again. And then do it again. And again.

It doesn't take a lot of effort in a moment. It takes the light touch moment after moment after moment. And so exploring that light touch of effort and connecting moment after moment—effort in this practice is about the frequency of that connection. Every half breath, for example. Every one to two steps in the walking. Just reminding yourself.

I would do this in the walking. If I found my mind really wandering around, I would say, okay, I see a little spot on the carpet there. Let's see if I can make it to that. And it was like a step and a half. I could make it that far and be mindful. And then I'd pick another spot. Oh, I can make it that far. And in this way, just that light amount of effort, just like hand over hand, just a little bit of effort moment after moment.

So the effort that we make is a light touch many times. And then what begins to happen is that effort gains a momentum. It's like being on a scooter. Initially, if you're on a scooter, you have to tap the ground a lot to get it going. But once the momentum builds, you don't have to keep tapping it as much. You get familiar with the feeling of the momentum of that scooter going forward, and you learn when you need to put your foot down again.

It's similar with our meditation. We have to start by making that light touch like every half breath, every half breath, every half breath. And then we begin to see that there's more of a momentum, and maybe we see, wow, we can hang out for three or four breaths and we don't actually have to do much. But if we don't make that connection, that conscious connection every three or four breaths, we may find our mind wandering off.

And so this is really the art of meditation—getting familiar with essentially our mindfulness and energy getting wobbly, like the scooter gets wobbly. Get familiar with that state of being present, and we begin to recognize how much do I actually need to make that light touch of effort? How much do I need to tap? How much do I need to connect? Connect and sustain, connect and sustain.

The sustaining is kind of like riding that scooter. We get familiar with how long can I ride this wave of awareness? We get familiar with that feeling of awareness and learn to tune our effort to how that awareness is. If that awareness is actually naturally sustained and we're every half breath noticing, every half breath, every half breath, we're actually getting in the way of our mind's ability to get into that subtlety that I was talking about. The less active effort we employ, the more fine our understanding of our minds can be.

And so this skillful effort produces a skillful energy, and it begins to feel effortless over time. You may run into this in little bits. And it's not like you hit the effortless part of the retreat and it's like that for the rest of the retreat. It doesn't work that way, unfortunately. You may find that during one sitting, you find, wow, I can be with fifteen breaths without hardly doing anything at all. And that's a taste of that less effortful practice. And then something will happen—a neighbor sneezes and the mind goes reactive over that.

And then, oh, okay, every half breath now. Let me notice the agitation of how I was with that sneeze. And okay, that agitation's unpacked. Half a breath, half a breath, half a breath. And then, oh, every three or four breaths is enough now. So it's really tuning our level of effort to how the mind is in this moment.

We make the effort, we turn our attention towards our experience, and then we let go. Our other habitual way of being in the world is to make effort to get something, to get a particular result. On our schedule, usually—we want a particular result. And in this practice, we really have to let go of that.

Our exploration is cultivating the mindfulness and the wise effort. We cultivate those turning towards our minds, our hearts, meeting whatever's arising there. The wisdom, the insight, the freedom, the release—that happens on its own time. We can't make it happen. And so we make the effort and then we let go. We're not in control of the time frame of our practice.

Kamala Masters, one of my colleagues—I was in a retreat that she taught, this was probably ten or fifteen years ago. And she told a story of a time in her practice when things were fine, things were kind of going along. And yet there was an impatience. It just seemed like ordinary. Isn't something supposed to happen? And she went to her teacher and described what was going on and described all of the experiences that she was having. And his response was: "When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree."

And that, to me, was such a helpful teaching. Over and over again, I found myself with that attitude of making the effort in order for a result, and then reminding myself: I can't create that result. When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree.

Our effort in helping fruit ripen is to make sure that a tree has the nourishment it needs, to make sure that the tree has the water that it needs, the conditions that will allow it to have the fruit ripen. But we can't make that fruit ripen. And likewise in our practice, we create the conditions in which our minds can release. This wise effort and wise mindfulness are the conditions, the soil, the nourishment for the release. But that happens in its own time.

When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree.

CHAPTER 104

The Experience of Feeling (Vedanā)

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates vedanā (feeling tone), one of the most crucial yet overlooked aspects of Buddhist practice. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and the Buddha's teaching on dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda), she explains how every moment of experience carries a quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—and how our unconscious reactions to these feeling tones drive the cycle of craving and suffering.

Fella unpacks the mechanism by which feeling serves as a 'springboard' into reactivity: when something pleasant arises, we grasp; when unpleasant, we push away. She reveals the delusion embedded in both patterns—the belief that acquiring pleasant experiences or eliminating unpleasant ones will bring lasting happiness. Through vivid examples, including a fascinating pain study and personal retreat experiences, she demonstrates how much of what we think we're reacting to externally is actually constructed in our own minds.

The talk offers practical guidance for meditation, encouraging practitioners to investigate feeling tone in bodily sensations like itching or breath, and to notice how mental reactions multiply physical discomfort—the Buddha's teaching of the 'second arrow.' Fella also addresses the often-overlooked territory of neutral feeling, where boredom or habitual patterns can easily take hold. She emphasizes that the goal isn't to eliminate pleasant or unpleasant experiences, but to bring conscious awareness to feeling tone, allowing the automatic program of reactivity to naturally decondition itself.

This morning in the question and answer period there was a question about the experience of feeling—whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—and how to work with that, how to explore it. There's a lot to say about this topic, so I thought I'd take some time tonight to reflect on this theme with you.

This aspect of our experience we call feeling; the Pali is vedanā. The translation as "feeling" tends to confuse us with the notion of emotions, but the exploration of vedanā is much simpler than emotion. It is simply about whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

All experience, every experience that we have, has this quality to it—whether it's physical experience or mental experience. A very simple process happens in our minds and bodies where there's contact with the sense base, whether it's sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, or the sense base of the mind. Based on that simple contact, the organism feels it as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

This is an aspect of experience that happens every single moment, and yet it is often not consciously seen, not really consciously recognized. Part of the reason is that the programming in our mind—the human programming, or actually it's more like animal programming—is to maximize pleasant as much as possible and minimize unpleasant as much as possible. So we very quickly react to this feeling tone without being consciously aware of it. We move right into doing something when we experience something pleasant or unpleasant. We start to try to keep, hold on to, get more of the pleasant; to push away, get rid of, control, fix, change the unpleasant. We're fairly automatically reacting to this aspect of our experience, but not consciously knowing that it's happening.

One of the Buddha's teachings says that all experience converges on this quality of feeling. By that I understand that when we're responding to experience, we're pretty much responding on that point of convergence. We are responding to the pleasant or unpleasant aspect of experience; we're not really responding to the detail of the experience.

For instance, around food, we might think we like particular flavors or tastes or particular kinds of food like chocolate. We think we like chocolate. But what we actually like is the pleasant experience. What we're actually responding to is the pleasant. This is one of the points the Buddha highlighted—that we are responding to this aspect of pleasant and unpleasant, like automatons running around looking for more pleasant, trying to get rid of the unpleasant.

So this aspect of feeling is like a springboard. We leap off of it into judgments, views, opinions, liking, not liking, aversion, greed. It's a leaping point for us. The Buddha pointed to this aspect of our experience as being a really important place to pay attention to.

In his own understanding of his mind, as he explored and looked at his own mind, he described a process by which suffering, this dukkha, is generated in our minds, and this aspect of feeling plays a key role. He said this is really important—really important to look at this aspect, to be wise about it, to recognize that it happens to us. It's not that we're going to stop pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral from happening to us, but we can wake up to it.

The process the Buddha described, by which we end up in suffering, is a teaching called dependent origination, or codependent arising. The creation of selfing, the creation of suffering, is described in a set of twelve links—cause and effect processes in our minds. I'll explore just a little bit of this process because understanding how it works helps us see the benefit of exploring feeling, of exploring this aspect of our minds.

The Buddha recognized that based on our bodies and minds, we have these senses, and these senses receive sense impressions: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, contact in the mind. Every one of those contacts, every one of those sense impressions has a contact point, and with that contact with the sense organ comes a feeling.

Based on that feeling, he said, tends to arise craving. When something is pleasant, we like it, we want it, we want more of it. When something's unpleasant, we don't like it; we want to get rid of it. Based on that automatic programming, we act on that desire—trying to get more of what we want, hold on to it, feel like we've accomplished something when we've gotten it, or feel like we've failed if we don't manage to get it. We act on that wanting through a process of clinging and identification.

When we get the thing that we want, it becomes mine. Or if it's a state—for instance, we may have this idea that we want to become a good meditator, and that's a kind of pleasant idea in our minds for whatever reason—we act on that, trying to become a good meditator. Perhaps we have a good sitting and, lo and behold, we're born as a good meditator. There we are. That identification takes hold; we become a self there. We take birth into that identity. And then the suffering around that happens when the next sitting comes along.

And we're not so able to stay with our breath or notice what's going on. And lo and behold, we have ample evidence and proof that we are not a good meditator. And we feel like we failed. What have I done wrong?

So this process is generated, the Buddha says—this cycle, the leaping point of reactivity—begins from that feeling. That's a point where, when we can begin to see consciously how we are moving in this automatic program towards things we like, away from things we don't like, towards pleasant, away from unpleasant, when we see that feeling itself, there's that choice point. Pat talked about this choice point. And we can start to not have that program automatically react—that program of liking, of wanting, of needing, of creating, of holding on to.

So that program is a fairly automatic program, but it is not hardwired. Thank goodness it's not hardwired. The seeing of feeling with some degree of consciousness can help to short-circuit that program.

When we're not very conscious, we're in a kind of automatic mode with our experience. The Buddha says that delusion or ignorance is operating for us. We're not seeing clearly. We're not clearly seeing the nature of feeling. The ignorance, the delusion comes around a kind of belief. When there's pleasant experience, the delusion that gets activated is: having more of this will make me happy. That's how we're acting. So that delusion is operating for us when we're not clearly aware.

Around unpleasant, the delusion is that getting rid of this, fixing this, changing this will make me happy.

So essentially we're confused about reality because, as we've seen, as we're learning here in our experience and exploring what's going on, we're beginning to get, I think, that having what we want may bring some sort of happiness for a moment or two, but because of the inherent impermanent nature of pleasant, it's not going to make us happy for very long.

And with unpleasant experience—I think it was Wes who talked about the different personality types—I'll confess, I'm an aversive type. This is my mode of meeting the world. My way of meeting the world is to basically find what's unpleasant and try to get rid of it. That's how I find myself operating. And so the delusion around that, that it would make me happy, it's like: oh, look at this, here's this unpleasant thing, let me fix that, change that, organize it and get it just right—and whew, we're there for a moment. I got that fixed. But then what does my mind do? It goes and finds another unpleasant thing to fix. There's always something unpleasant out there. It's not possible to fix all the unpleasant things. So the delusion is that this will make me happy. It makes me happy for a split second.

This delusion that's typically present in feeling, in meeting our feeling—this is what propels us into this automatic reactivity. When we can bring some understanding, the basic understanding that nothing is worth clinging to, largely because everything is impermanent—things that are impermanent are unreliable, unsatisfactory, inherently unsatisfactory—and when that wisdom is joined with mindfulness, and mindfulness sees this quality of feeling tone, it naturally doesn't want to pick it up. It doesn't want to hold on to it. So that automatic program begins to decondition itself.

The Buddha talked about mindfulness of feeling, bringing our clear awareness to this aspect of experience. There's the teaching of the four foundations of mindfulness, which we've talked about a few times here. The first foundation is the body—all aspects of bodily experience. The second foundation is devoted entirely to this aspect of feeling tone.

It's a really simple instruction the Buddha offers us. I'll read the first part of this section: "How does one abide contemplating feelings as feelings? When one feels a pleasant feeling, one understands: I feel a pleasant feeling. When one feels an unpleasant feeling, one understands:

I feel an unpleasant feeling. When feeling a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands: I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling.

Really simple. Not so easy to do, but very simple instructions. Just recognize feeling as feeling—as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

Feeling tone can be quite subtle. That's part of why this is a challenging instruction. It's partly unfamiliar to us, as I said, because we're so quickly responding to it. So it's a subtle kind of experience, and yet once we begin to get curious about it and look at it, it begins to be more obvious.

Feeling tone is associated with all experience, both physical and mental. But the feeling tone itself is understood to be something that happens in our mind. The experience of whether something is pleasant or unpleasant or neither pleasant nor unpleasant is understood to be a mental experience.

Now this makes sense for us when we are thinking about something like happiness. The experience of happiness has a pleasant, sweet quality to it, and we can understand that as a mental pleasantness. The experience of anger often has an unpleasant quality to it. There's also a kind of feedback loop that happens—when there's happiness, there are often light sensations in the body that may feel pleasant. In anger, there's the mind state of anger that is unpleasant, and also probably some physical experiences that are unpleasant.

The physical pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences are also understood to be mental, though. So when we cut ourselves with a knife and there's physical pain, that unpleasantness is understood to be something happening in our mind.

How does that work? How does that make any sense?

In an everyday way, one approach to understanding this might be to think about how our experience of whether something's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral depends on context. Suppose you're standing on a busy street corner waiting for a friend. There are all these people going by, lots of noise, lots happening. Right around the time you've agreed to meet your friend, you feel a tap or a touch on your shoulder. That experience might perhaps be experienced as pleasant because of the context. You're waiting for your friend. You're expecting your friend. You turn expecting to see your friend with that tap on the shoulder.

Now imagine the exact same street corner, exact same situation, only you're not waiting for a friend, and you feel a tap on your shoulder. Might that be experienced as unpleasant? A kind of startle. You're not expecting to be tapped on the shoulder.

There's also a very interesting corroboration of this notion of feeling being mental in a recent study published in March of this year in the journal Pain. The study sought to understand how people perceive pain. I'll read a section of this.

The author of the study was Siri Leknes. To see how people perceived pain, Leknes and her colleagues hooked up sixteen participants to a device that applied variable levels of painful heat to their arms. At the same time, the researchers measured their brain activity using MRI scans—magnetic resonance imaging. In the first setup, participants experienced a series of either slightly painful stimulus (about as painful as grasping a slightly too hot cup of coffee) or no pain. So they were going to either experience a slightly to moderately unpleasant experience or no pain at all. In a second setup, the participants experienced a series of either moderate pain (that same slightly too hot feeling) or intense pain. It doesn't say what the intense pain was like, but on a screen the participants could see what type of pain was coming up in the next series.

In the first scenario, the participants rated the moderate pain—the slightly too hot cup of coffee pain—as unpleasant. And I understand from what they said later that it also registered as pain in their brains, registered in the brain regions associated with unpleasantness. But interestingly, participants rated the moderate pain in the second setup as actually pleasurable when the alternative was the intense pain. During the moderate stimulus in the second setup, the participants' brain activity also showed less activation in the pain region of the brain and more activation in a region in the middle of the frontal lobes that's associated with pain relief than during the same stimulus in the first setup.

The explanation they give is that the likely explanation is that the subjects were prepared for the worst and thus felt relieved when they realized the pain was not going to be as bad as they feared. In other words, a sense of relief can be powerful enough to turn such an obviously negative experience as pain into a sensation that's comforting or even enjoyable.

So even the scientists agree that pain is felt in the brain. Pain is a mental experience. We're responding to this mental stimulus. There's the feeling tone associated with physical sense, and the feeling tone associated with mind experiences—anger being unpleasant, happiness pleasant.

Getting familiar with feeling tone, getting familiar with this quality of experience—usually the easiest place to begin is in the realm of the physical senses. In fact, our touch sense is particularly designed, apparently, to be very sensitive to pleasure and pain. The nervous system there is particularly attuned, so it's easier to begin experiencing feeling tone there. We can start exploring this in our meditation practice.

When there is unpleasant experience—the unpleasantness of an itch, for instance—this is a great place to explore unpleasant. As far as I know, nobody has ever died of an itch. So while they drive us nuts, that sensation being something with a fairly strong unpleasant quality, we can remind ourselves that it's not going to hurt us to sit there and pay attention to the itch. We can remind ourselves of that. We just get to watch how insanely reactive our mind is with this particular stimulus.

We can begin to tune into the unpleasant aspect of that sensation. Sometimes tuning into the actual unpleasant quality is enough to begin breaking that automatic cycle, that automatic reactivity towards aversion, hatred, frustration. Sometimes a simple recognition of the feeling tone can be enough.

Exploring the unpleasantness of itching, of other body sensations, just looking at what the actual physicality of the pain is—we begin to see that the reactivity to our physical unpleasant experience multiplies the unpleasantness. So what's going on there? There's the itch, which has an unpleasant quality to it. And then there's aversion, which has an unpleasant quality to it.

As is explained in the suttas, the Buddha says it's as if a man, having experienced being struck by a dart—so that first itch is like being hit by an arrow—then picks up another dart and stabs himself a second time. There's the physical unpleasantness of the itch, and then there's the mental unpleasantness of the reactivity. That mental unpleasantness of the reactivity is far more the issue. It's a multiplying factor. It's far more the reason for our feeling like we just can't stand this—that mental reactivity.

Sometimes looking at what the physical pain actually is, turning and checking out: okay, my knee feels pain. What is it? Well, there's a little tightness there, a little squeezing. When we actually look at it, we may find that the actual physical unpleasantness is nowhere near as great as we believed it was, because we were seeing it through the lens of aversion. The aversion multiplies that experience.

We can also attune to and get familiar with pleasant experience in our sitting. There can be very lovely experiences with the breath. The smoothness—sometimes the breath can just feel very smooth and pleasant. If that pleasantness of the smoothness and delightful sensations with the breath is not noticed, it can become a doorway through which we slip out into la-la land, just drifting off in the realm of "that feels good." So again, consciously being aware of feeling tone helps us stay present.

I talked about the double arrow around unpleasant experience—when there's something unpleasant in our experience and how the feeling tone plays into that, the aversion having an unpleasant quality itself and the multiplication through aversion. Well, what happens on the flip side? Why do we like getting what we want? What's going on there?

There's the idea, the experience, the thing that we want out there. It might be a pleasant object—good food or some actual thing. Or it might be some pleasant state we're going for: having somebody see us or recognize us, having a good report to the teachers or something. I remember having whole fantasies about walking into the interview room and reporting these great experiences. I had no idea what I was doing, but I was really into those fantasies.

So there's this pleasant idea, this pleasant thing that we want to get. If we get that thing, actually mostly what's going on is that we've got an idea in our minds that we want it, and our idea is that we will feel good when we have that thing. That's a pleasant fantasy. So there's the thing itself, which may be pleasant, but there's also this pleasant fantasy going on about how great it's going to be when I get that thing. There's that kind of multiplication of the pleasant happening there.

And in that whole process, there's also a wanting going on—the desire to have that thing. Now, that wanting itself, and this is something we begin to see as we start to really closely pay attention to our experience, that wanting itself is unpleasant. It doesn't feel good.

Largely, we don't notice that the wanting doesn't feel good because we're so involved in our fantasy about how great it's going to be when we get it. So that's a delusion. That's a delusion operating. That's the delusion of wanting, actually. The delusion of wanting completely obscures the fact that we don't feel very good while wanting is happening. It gets us convinced that happiness comes from having the thing we want.

So there's that wanting. The wanting itself is an unpleasant experience. And yet the delusion of the fantasy is very powerful. This is largely why we stay caught in this pattern—because of that delusion, that fantasy multiplying the idea of the pleasant.

Now, when we get what we want, what happens there? We get the thing, perhaps. We get the hit of having what we want. That's pleasant. So we do get that bit of pleasantness. But what is that? Often it's quite a fleeting thing. Maybe we get that piece of chocolate, for instance. Check it out sometime: how long does the pleasantness of a piece of chocolate last? Not very long.

Check it out if you get, for a moment, what you want—somebody's good opinion. That feels good, to have somebody's good opinion. But how reliable are the opinions of other people? So again, the pleasantness of that is fairly fleeting.

What really does end up feeling good, the largest part of the pleasure of getting what we want—and check this out in your own experience—is the fact that the wanting goes away. The unpleasantness of the wanting goes away. When unpleasant ends, there's a pleasantness to that. And the pleasantness of wanting going away feels really, really good. We get hooked to that.

And so what happens to us is actually quite amazing. We get what we want and then it's like, "Oh, that felt pretty good. When's the last time I felt really good? It's when I got what I wanted. So what can I want?" Watch yourself wanting to want.

A good place to look at this is sitting in front of the Google box, sitting in front of the screen on the search engine. I find myself sitting there thinking, "What can I look up?" Trying to figure out something to get a little hit of "Oh, that's interesting information"—sitting there, trying to figure out something to want.

So this is how wanting works. And what wanting doesn't tell us, what the delusion of wanting doesn't tell us... I'll start on the other side first. The delusion of wanting tells us that you have to get the thing you want in order to have that satisfaction. The delusion of wanting won't tell you that if the wanting goes away, the suffering goes away. The wanting will go away because it's impermanent. If you have the interest enough to hang out with that unpleasant experience and not buy into its delusion, it will pass. And then you'll really get to see the freedom of that release, of that grip.

When wanting vanishes, it's like being freed from a vice grip.

So the whole process of how wanting and craving and the way we go about trying to be happy—it's all tied up with this pleasant-unpleasant aspect of experience. Getting familiar with this will really serve you.

So there's the feeling tone associated with our bodies, the physicality.

There's also feeling tone associated with ideas and thoughts, with beliefs. Something like "so and so doesn't like me"—often these beliefs, these ideas, these thoughts will generate some kind of emotion which has a feeling tone associated with it. The thought arises in the mind that this person doesn't like me, and a feeling of rejection arises, which is unpleasant. So thoughts, views, and beliefs can also be associated with feeling tone.

Actually, from my own experience, thoughts, beliefs, and ideas are a leading cause of feeling tone. Much of what we think of as physical pleasant or unpleasant, when we actually begin exploring the experience that we're reacting to, is not necessarily the physical but is something in our minds.

There's a teaching in the commentaries of the Buddhist texts that highlights this. I don't know if I completely believe this teaching, but I found it an interesting exploration. The teaching says that all of our physical senses, except for our touch sense—our touch sense, it says, does experience pleasant and unpleasant directly through the nerves, our skin will experience pleasant and unpleasant, the nerves are designed to experience pleasant and unpleasant—the other senses, this commentary says, sight, sound, smell, taste, are inherently neutral. If there's a sense of them being pleasant or unpleasant, it's because of an idea, of a concept, of a subtle reaction in the mind that's overlaid on that experience.

A simple example: if you see a rose, that might be experienced as pleasant. You see the rose and there's the noticing of pleasant experience. But what's actually happening at the eye door is blotches of form and color. The concept of rose is actually in our minds. And that's probably what we like—the idea of rose and what it represents.

I had a firsthand experience of this exploration through looking at my own experience. And this is largely what I want to encourage. Look at your own experience. What's going on? When you're feeling something is pleasant or unpleasant, begin to look at it, investigate it.

An example: one night I was having trouble sleeping, a kind of insomnia. So I got up to meditate in the middle of the night. While I was sitting there meditating, there was this really quiet kind of tapping sound, just a quiet, random little tapping happening. There was a sense that this was unpleasant. I certainly didn't like it. So there was an unpleasant quality that I was responding to, the feeling of not liking that sound. And I was just noticing it. I kept on noticing. It came and went, and when it came back, I got to watch the sense of reactivity arise.

I saw that when the tapping happened, there was a contraction in my body. The contraction was unpleasant. The physical contraction was unpleasant. Still I had the sense of the tapping sound being unpleasant. And then, again, just keeping watching it.

Now this kind of investigation, I want to highlight or point this out—this isn't digging. I wasn't trying to figure it out. I was just watching. How is it this time? Okay, here's this sound. What's happening in my body? What's happening in my mind?

The third time looking at this, there was the recognition of fear. Fear arose when that tapping happened. The fear was definitely unpleasant. There was a clear unpleasant experience. Now I hadn't seen the fear before. But when the fear was clearly seen and known, the mind recognized the tapping itself, the sound of the tapping, as being pretty neutral. The tapping itself wasn't unpleasant.

The idea of what it represented created some fear, which was unpleasant. And all of that became revealed through this kind of watching.

So this is again seeing how our minds create our suffering. How do our minds create the reactivity? Much of what we react to is constructed in our own minds. We think we're responding, reacting to what's out there, but actually what we're reacting to—what we're afraid of, what we like, what we don't like—is what's arising in our own minds.

It's quite freeing to see this. It sounds a little odd for that to be freeing, but it is freeing, and it's fortunate that this is the way our minds work. When our minds see—I was observing this—I didn't have to say in my mind, when the fear was seen, "Oh, now I can see that tapping is neutral." It just happened. So as the mind starts to see how it constructs suffering, how it's responding and reacting to this feeling tone, it also begins to understand how to find its way out of that reactivity.

You could play with this in the hall, recognizing what seems to be unpleasant for you. A rustling of somebody in the hall, somebody moving—what is actually unpleasant there? Is it actually the sound that's unpleasant? Or is it the idea that the person shouldn't be moving? Is that what's unpleasant? When there's something that feels unpleasant, check out what actually you're reacting to. You might come in and check out the sound. Is the sound actually unpleasant? Sometimes that can be a very helpful exploration if there's a kind of persistent reactivity. If you find yourself persistently reacting to rustlings in the hall, just begin to explore: what actually is the unpleasantness there? What are you reacting to?

On one retreat, I found a lot of reactivity when I was doing walking meditation—reactivity to the other people walking nearby. This was a huge part of my practice, exploring and understanding the aversion, the reactivity to the people walking nearby. And one time, after I had heard a talk—Carol Wilson had said, "If there's aversion happening in your experience, there's something unpleasant. You're reacting to something unpleasant. So what's unpleasant? See if you can notice what's unpleasant."

While I was walking, I was up in a hallway where there were a lot of people walking back and forth. We were all pretty well spaced in the walking hall. And then somebody else joined in right next to me, trying to narrow the lanes a bit. Aversion was born right there. Okay, there's the aversion. What's going on?

Having just listened to this teaching, I thought, okay, what's unpleasant here? Let's see. And I went through all the senses. Is it sight? Well, the person wasn't actually physically unpleasant to look at. Okay, it's not the sight. Sound? Well, they weren't making much sound, so it wasn't sound. Touch? They weren't bumping into me or anything, so it wasn't touch. They didn't have an odor, so it wasn't that.

I quickly ruled all of the physical senses out, and it was like, well, there must be something going on in my mind. Kind of obvious, but it was a revelation in a way. What's happening? And I didn't know what it was. I didn't see it yet. So just walking and watching—what's going on? There must be some kind of thought happening.

And so just walking back and forth. And then suddenly this thought appeared in the mind: "He's weird." Okay, there's a thought. And I still didn't quite get it. Kept walking, and then another thought exploded in my mind. This was at Insight Meditation Society in December, and the person was in bare feet. My mind said, "They're in bare feet and it's freezing cold." This was my justification for "he's weird."

Immediately seeing the ludicrousness of that, the whole thing crumbled. The mind actually saw that it was reacting to a thought. That was what was so potent and powerful about that insight—it had nothing to do with the person. It was all a construct of the mind. The aversion was born because that thought was experienced as unpleasant. And when it was seen just as a thought, the whole thing fell apart, and in the next moment I was feeling nothing but mettā for this person. It just shifted.

So checking in: if there's a persistent reactivity present, what is it that you're reacting to? It might surprise you what you're actually reacting to. A lot of what you'll find is that it's something happening in your mind. And what an amazing thing to see. It's not bad news, actually. We take it as bad news—we blame ourselves or something, thinking we shouldn't have those thoughts. But it's just the way our minds work. And when it's seen for what it is, the mind begins to let it go. That's the good news. That's the really good news.

I've mostly talked about pleasant and unpleasant tonight, but I want to say a few words about neutral, because exploring neutral—neither pleasant nor unpleasant experience—can be a very interesting place. Often when things are neutral, we space out. We don't consciously recognize when things are neutral. We'll maybe quickly slip into boredom, not seeing the neutrality of experience. We're attuned to the highs and the lows—that's where we want to go. Even to the lows. We'd rather be depressed than feel neutral. We'd rather feel angry than feel neutral.

So noticing that subtle sense of "not good enough" or "not feeling something"—sometimes we have a sense that either the highs or the lows have an energy there that makes us feel alive or something. The neutral experience can be something we either feel is basically wrong, not where we're supposed to be, or we get bored with it.

Neutral can also be a place where we slip into the habits of our mind. When not much is happening—actually, I'll back up for a moment. One of the things we begin to see is that not much is happening, there's not much in the way of highs or lows, not much in the way of either pleasant or unpleasant. And what's actually beginning to happen is that calm is arising. Peace is arising. This is a subtler kind of state. One of my teachers, Michelle McDonald, says we have to acquire a taste for neutral—acquire the taste for calm, for peace—because we're so attuned to the highs and lows.

In that place of neutrality, if we're not clearly aware of the neutral, it's very easy for our habits of mind to kick in, our habitual reactions and responses. For myself, one of my strong patterns was—well, it had a double side to it.

It either was "I'm doing really great" or "I'm failing." And I would go into that failure mode pretty easily. If I wasn't doing great, I was failing. What I began to recognize from that neutral place was that the habit of feeling like I was a failure could easily be launched.

So it went something like this. I was on a retreat and had learned enough about this neutrality to recognize and begin to sense—acquiring a taste for neutral—I'd begun to sense that this is a kind of deepening of the practice, when the mind begins to move into those more quiet places, the less reactive places. And so there was that sense of, "Ooh, it's neutral. Maybe something really good will happen."

So there I am, hanging out, and then there's this little leaning in. And when two minutes later nothing mind-blowingly amazing had happened, the mind said, "You failed." Out of neutral. Neutral experience. The mind would just construct its pattern.

This is a really great place to begin to see—when you're in this place of not much happening, watch what's coming up that's pulling you away from it. Watch what's drawing you away.

We're not trying to get rid of feeling. We're not trying to not feel unpleasant. We're not trying to avoid pleasant so that we don't cling to it. That seems to be something we think: "Okay, we see that pleasantness leads to that pattern of clinging, so I'm not supposed to feel pleasant." We get worried. We start getting afraid of pleasant experience because we see that we start clinging to it.

What we're trying to do here is bring consciousness to this experience of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. With wise attention, the habit of reactivity doesn't have a toehold, doesn't have a place to land.

I'll end with this poem from the suttas, slightly revised based on my own liking of particular words:

If one feels joy, but knows not feeling's nature, bent towards greed, one will not find release.

If one feels pain but knows not feeling's nature, bent towards hate, one will not find release.

And even neutral feeling, which is peaceful,
if in attachment one should cling to it,
one will not be free.

One who understands feeling's nature in this very life will be free.

CHAPTER 105

Understanding and Abandoning

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a profound reframing of how we work with the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) in meditation practice. Rather than viewing sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and remorse, and doubt as obstacles to be forcefully removed, she presents them as gateways to freedom when met with mindful understanding.

Drawing from her own recent retreat experience, Andrea explains that concentration (samādhi) develops not through effortful doing but through letting go—specifically, through clearly seeing and releasing what causes suffering. She unpacks the Pāli term 'pajahati' (to abandon), noting that true abandonment arises naturally when we understand that these states are neither valuable nor useful, much like abandoning a broken-down car or a sinking ship. This connects directly to the first noble truth: dukkha is to be understood, and that very understanding catalyzes release.

For each hindrance, Andrea offers practical guidance using the traditional bowl-of-water analogies from the suttas. She encourages practitioners to turn toward these difficult states rather than away—observing the felt sense of wanting, aversion, dullness, agitation, or wavering without resistance or indulgence. Through personal stories, including her transformative exploration of self-hatred on a three-month retreat, she demonstrates how the hindrances themselves become the path when met with non-judgmental awareness. The talk concludes with the invitation to approach practice with curiosity and even playfulness, recognizing that mindfulness of any experience—pleasant or unpleasant—contributes to the continuity that supports awakening.

This morning in the question period, someone asked about concentration and how it fits into the practice that we're doing. Greg talked quite a bit about continuity and how important continuity is in our mindfulness practice, and that actually the continuity, the moment-to-moment mindfulness, is really the ground out of which concentration can develop.

There's another exploration that we can make around concentration. It has a kind of different approach to it, and that is to look at what gets in the way of concentration—to explore letting go of what gets in the way.

Actually, on the retreat that I just finished this past month, my practice was almost entirely letting go. Whenever there was any suffering, any holding, any clinging, the practice was to recognize it. Not so much to try to do the activity of letting go, which can happen at times, but more often the letting go happens as a result of the clear seeing. As the mind would see suffering, see holding, see clinging and let go, let go, let go, the mind became very concentrated. This really gave me such a beautiful new perspective on concentration. It's not about doing. It's not about holding. It's really about letting go.

Some of the key states that happen to be in the way of concentration are some of the main forms of suffering, of dukkha. These are termed the hindrances: sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and remorse, and doubt.

Of these states, of these hindrances, the Buddha suggests that we abandon them. That's the term—the translation of the Pali term pajahati. Abandon these states, abandon the defilements, abandon the kilesas, abandon the hindrances.

While abandoning is a translation of this Pali term, I found it interesting to reflect on what that word means in English, and how that word can perhaps help us have a bit of an understanding of what we're doing here. My understanding of the way this word is used is not so much the kind of abandonment that we think of in terms of a parent abandoning a child, but rather in the sense of—like sometimes we talk about abandoning a car that dies by the side of the road. We abandon things when they're no longer useful to us. We understand that they no longer have value.

Another way this term is used—I checked in the dictionary today—is that we abandon when we understand there is danger, such as abandoning ship. Likewise, we can begin to understand the danger of these hindrances, and with understanding, we naturally begin to let go.

The letting go of these states, the abandoning, isn't so much something that we do consciously. We might think of it as pushing away, but rather the abandoning comes from the understanding that these things are not valuable, that these things are not useful. In fact, they can be harmful to us.

So there's a relationship in terms of abandoning the hindrances—a relationship to wisdom. We need to understand why these things are not valuable, why these states of sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and remorse, and doubt are not useful, why they are in the way. We need to understand that. And the understanding allows the mind to let them go. It's the understanding, the wisdom, that's the key. And to understand something, we need to study it. We need to get to know it.

This is related to what the Buddha says in terms of the First Noble Truth, the truth of dukkha. Guy, I believe, is going to talk about the Four Noble Truths tomorrow. The Four Noble Truths: the truth of dukkha, the truth of the cause of dukkha, the truth of the cessation of dukkha, and the truth of the path leading to the cessation of dukkha. Each of these truths has an action associated with it. The Buddha suggests that we understand dukkha, that we let go of the cause of dukkha, that we realize the release, and that we cultivate the path.

This understanding of dukkha—I look at this as being really a huge part of our practice. The understanding is what frees us.

The hindrances, these challenging states—"covering" is another translation of the term often translated as hindrances, nivarana. Coverings, things that cloud our mind, that are in the way of the settling into concentration, this gathering of the mind into non-distraction, unification of mind.

An image comes to mind around settling for me, and that's the image of scooping up a jar of water from a turbid stream. When I was a kid, I used to live in a place where there was a stream in the back, and we would always go gathering rocks and collecting water and looking for tadpoles. Scooping up that water from the stream was often cloudy because of all the mud and sediment that was in there.

And one of the most effective ways—or for a child, the most effective way—to let that water clear is to set it down. Set it on the shelf. Let the sediment settle on its own.

If you're running around with a jar, picking it up, shaking it, looking at it—is it going to clear? Can I see in it yet? Can I see if there's any tadpoles in it yet? If we're shaking it up and looking at it, it's not going to clear. But if we set the jar down on the shelf and just leave it alone, the mud will settle.

In a similar way, we can support the settling of our minds by not stirring them up—by leaving alone the stirring activity of thoughts and thinking, leaving alone the stirring activity of agendas, of confused or frustrated attitudes or wanting in the mind. All of these things are like taking the jar and shaking it up. And so one way to consider this possibility of settling our minds is to see if we can bring our minds into an attitude of simply observing and allowing our experience. Non-resistance to the hindrances, but also non-cooperation with the hindrances either. It's not like we're giving in to them, but we are stepping back and observing.

This kind of non-resistant, non-judgmental, almost impartial observer is a way that the agitated qualities of these hindrances can begin to settle on their own. And we learn a tremendous amount about our minds as we watch them. We begin to gain the understanding I was talking about. It's understanding that frees.

Understanding how these hindrances are put together in our minds—the way that sense desire works, the way we go after things that are pleasant and want to push away things that are unpleasant in the case of ill will, the way our minds get confused about things. Understanding the patterns in our mind that lead to these states arising—that's one side of the understanding.

The other side is understanding that these states, which very often—particularly in the case of sense desire and ill will—the mind seems to think acting on them is going to somehow make us happy. So mindfulness begins to unveil the deluded nature of that, and it unveils the fact that these states, in themselves, in the experience of them, are very far from happiness. We think we act on sense desire thinking it will make us happy. But in the very moment of having that sense desire, we are very far from happiness. Mindfulness begins to show us this. It shows us the suffering nature of these states in and of themselves. And this is wisdom.

It doesn't feel very good to see this. Hanging out with dukkha doesn't feel very good. But sometimes that's exactly the medicine our minds need in order to understand. And in that understanding, in the seeing of the dukkha of these hindrances, the mind itself begins to understand how to let go. The abandoning begins to happen. In a way, the abandoning is the fruit of the understanding. The abandoning is the fruit of our practice.

So we might think that looking at hindrances, observing hindrances—if we're to abandon them, how can observing them actually be of any value? I know this rose in my mind early on. One of the very first things I read about Buddhist practice was that if something is difficult, like if you're angry about something, see if you can notice the state of anger itself rather than acting on it. Just observe the fact that you're angry. I read that and thought, "How's that going to help? What good is that going to do?" But I was pretty much at the bottom of my barrel at that point, so I thought, "Well, okay, I'm going to give this a try."

And actually, to my surprise—as I think most of you know—that action of turning towards, letting go of the thing we're frustrated about or angry about or wanting, and turning towards the feeling itself, is a huge shift. That very shift essentially changes the hindrances from being something in the way of our practice to being the very deepening of our practice, to being the ground of understanding out of which our practice unfolds. In this shift from focusing outwards on the thing we think is bothering us to looking at the state itself, the hindrances become our path. They become our gateway to freedom.

This is true. This is completely true.

I remember so many times in retreats, especially long ones, I would be caught in something over and over again—self-hatred, loneliness, depression, despair. And some part of my mind, even though I'd been through this many times, would say, "Yeah, the teachers say this is the practice when it's happening, but really I know that the real practice is not going to unfold until this goes away. This self-hatred, this is the problem, and the practice is not going to—I'm not going to get to those bliss states until the self-hatred goes away." That seemed obvious. So there was that view, that belief. And in a way, a little bit of a repression of those states, like maybe I can just hold them at bay long enough to get concentrated, and then maybe I won't have to worry about that self-hatred.

When I finally surrendered—when I said, "Okay, this three-month course, this is my self-hatred retreat, this is the retreat where I really get to look at self-hatred"—the understanding, the learning, and the insights that happened out of that very exploration of a hindrance, of something so difficult, a state so difficult... Right in the midst of exploring a state like self-hatred came deep insight, deep understanding into impermanence, unreliability, not-self.

So these hindrances themselves are the path when they are present. They are not in the way; they are actually the very thing that will allow your practice to deepen in that moment. Meeting them, turning towards them.

In a way, we could say that when we are mindful of these states, these hindrances, when we are aware with this non-judgmental mindful perspective, they are no longer hindrances. They are simply any object. Like any experience, as Greg was saying—anything. It doesn't matter what we pay attention to. It doesn't matter where we are cultivating that continuity of mindfulness. If we are aware of those states, that very process of awareness of those hindrances is contributing to that continuity. And we are on the path. It may not be pleasant. Get used to that. Sometimes it's pleasant, sometimes it's unpleasant.

With all the hindrances, I think the basic exploration is to simply observe, allow, turn towards. And yet I think it is helpful to highlight some ways to work with each of them, because they each have their own ways of hooking us into their orbit. So I'll take a little bit of time to speak about each of these. Since there are five of them, it won't be very long for each one—just enough to get a flavor of different ways to explore each, and some of the different ways they tend to hook us.

Sense desire: the desire to have pleasant experience. Why is this a problem? Why is this a hindrance? How does this get in our way?

One of the ways it gets in our way is that when we're driven by sense desire, when we want that pleasant experience, we are essentially buying into a delusion that having pleasant experience is the way to happiness. And in buying into that belief, we end up in a kind of never-ending cycle of having to get the next pleasant thing. Because pleasant things don't last very long. So we're endlessly agitated, trying to find the next moment of pleasant. And in the moment of wanting the pleasant, even if it's only a few seconds away, we are not in the present moment.

We are pulled out of the present moment, inherently agitated, stirring that muddy jar of water, not settled because we are leaning forward, looking for something else, something other than what's actually here.

The texts offer analogies for each of these hindrances, and they're related to a bowl of water. The image is about looking into the water and seeing your reflection—can you see clearly? The sense desire analogy is when there is a lot of dye, someone has put drops of color in the water. What happens is that we get enchanted by the colors. "Oh, aren't those pretty?" We can't see the reflection clearly because we're enchanted by the colors.

In a similar way, we can't see clearly with sense desire because we are enchanted by the promise of a hit of pleasant experience. Part of the obscuration that happens is that we do not see the unpleasantness of the wanting itself. We are so enchanted by the idea of that moment of happiness we're going to get—or few moments of happiness—having bought into that delusion of sense desire that this is going to make me happy. And we're missing the fact that we're actually suffering in this moment. We're not cultivating that sense of well-being in this moment.

There are so many kinds of things that we want. A lot of it is around comfort and pleasant experience—having food that we like, drinks that we like, nice comfortable clothes and a nice bed, pleasant smells and pleasant sights. Those are the more obvious things. We also want to satisfy our curiosity. We want to look at people. Especially on retreat, this can become highlighted—we're inclining to not let our gaze wander on retreat.

And I found that to be a very interesting exploration, because just in not letting my gaze wander, I discovered how much wanting there was about looking at people. How much desire was there about wanting to see who was in the room with me, who was walking next to me?

So the exploration here—non-resistance to sense desire—doesn't mean giving in to the desire. It means seeing if you can let go of the thing you are interested in having and turn towards the experience of desire, the experience of wanting itself. What does wanting feel like? It's that shift, turning towards the wanting. Not trying to stop the wanting, but having a completely different relationship to it.

This is a shift of attitude around the wanting. We shift from believing it, from buying into the delusion of wanting—that having that thing will make me happy—to simply recognizing: this is what wanting feels like.

Often there's unpleasant experience when we actually turn towards wanting. It feels like a pull, a magnet, this sense of "gotta have that, gotta do that, gotta feel that." There's this kind of magnetic pull, an inherently unpleasant feeling of dissatisfaction. That's what wanting is about. As soon as there's wanting, there's dissatisfaction. And dissatisfaction is not a pleasant experience. Turning towards that feeling of dissatisfaction, of wanting. Watching it without acting on the desire.

Here there are so many opportunities to do this, to get familiar with this state of wanting. It'll happen all over the place in ways that are not so threatening—like looking at people while walking. That was an exploration for me for weeks on one three-month course: that feeling, that wanting of looking at people. Feeling how it was like the tractor beam from Star Trek, wanting to look at people, feeling that pull, watching it, then watching it spring into being. Finding a place where I could walk where there weren't too many people, and then seeing that wanting spring into being as soon as somebody appeared in my field of vision. Feeling it, watching it, not following through and looking, but feeling the wanting—and then seeing it disappear, just vanish when that person moved out of sight.

Feeling the wanting vanish like that feels like being released from a vice grip. That moment of seeing the release from wanting is such a clear demonstration of the freedom that comes from letting go. The ease, the peace that comes when the mind has let go of clinging.

There are all kinds of opportunities to play with this. I really think of practice as a big sandbox. Let's try this thing. Let's try that thing. Let's play with observing these states. Play with not going back if there's a dessert some night. Play with not going back for seconds. And watch your mind. It's something you want—just play with it.

We need some discernment with looking at sense desire, to recognize the distinction between allowing the feeling of desire and indulging the feeling. Sometimes the desire can move into fantasy of having that thing, and the fantasy is pleasant, and it will mask that sense of dissatisfaction. So we need to be honest with ourselves about when we are actually looking at the desire and when it kind of slips into indulging.

We also need to be compassionate with ourselves. Sometimes our mindfulness isn't quite strong enough to meet the hindrances. This is true for any of the hindrances, and in the case of sense desire, sometimes there's something we have such a pull towards, some habitual desire that we have such a pull towards, that when we try to bring mindfulness to it, the momentum of the desire is stronger than our ability to meet it. That mindfulness just gets sucked into the momentum of the desire.

So we also need to be honest with ourselves when we find that it's not so helpful actually to try to relax, observe, and allow sense desire—when we try to relax, observe, allow, and two seconds later we're caught back in that state of desire. Maybe it's time to pick some other experience. Not to repress the desire, but just kind of set it aside. It's like, "Yeah, not now. Not now. I'm just going to put my attention over here."

I'm going to put my attention on something else—I'll open my eyes and pay attention to seeing for a little while. So just placing your attention elsewhere, perhaps on something a little neutral rather than something pleasant in this case.

The second of the hindrances is ill will. This is related to the aspect of aversion—not liking things, wanting to get rid of things, wanting to push things away. Dislike of things, of people, of situations, of experience, of ourselves even. In this case, we are buying into a delusion. The story that ill will tells us is that happiness will depend on getting rid of this thing, getting rid of this unpleasant thing. The agitation, the stirring, happens with the feeling that we have to get rid of it. Again, the movement to fix, to control, to change. We're pulled out of the experience of the present moment in order to do something, to get rid of something. If only I could get rid of this thing, then I'll be happy.

It's essentially like we're stirring up that jar of water, trying to scoop out little bits of mud. Every time we stick the spoon in to try to get a little bit out, to get rid of it, we're just stirring it up more and more. So the wanting to get rid of is just contributing to the agitation. The bowl of water analogy for ill will is that the water is boiling. The heat agitates the water and we can't see clearly the reflection.

So again, non-resistance to this state—very similar in a way to sense desire, kind of the flip side of sense desire. Taking the attention away from the thing we want to get rid of and turning the attention to the feeling of ill will itself. What does it feel like to want to get rid of something? What is that feeling of pushing away like? Turning the attention to the body. Often it's really helpful to turn the attention to the body with this experience. Seeing if you can let go of thoughts around ill will—likewise with sense desire. Thoughts like "they shouldn't have done that" or "I have to have that"—thoughts contribute to the stirring. And so if you can take your attention and put it in the body, it helps to let the thoughts settle so that they're not stirring things up.

What is it like to feel that you don't want something? When we can turn to that feeling itself, we see that this feeling of ill will has somehow convinced us that the only way to happiness is to get rid of the thing we don't want. The delusion of ill will is not going to tell us that if the ill will goes away, it won't be a problem. Likewise with sense desire—the delusion of sense desire isn't going to tell us that if the wanting goes away, the problem goes away. The delusion of sense desire, the delusion of ill will, is focused on the thing we want, the experience we want, the state we want or want to get rid of. So can we turn towards that feeling itself? The state of the body—how does it feel? Just the simplicity of: what does it feel like to want to get rid of something? It's not so threatening actually when we can just be with that feeling. Oh, this is what wanting to get rid of feels like. This is what hostility, pushing away feels like.

As with sense desire, there are times when the state of ill will—which can take the form of self-hatred, can take the form of rage, really strong forms of that aversive state of mind—sometimes the energy of that ill will is stronger than our ability to meet it. When we try to turn our attention towards that anger, that self-hatred, we find ourselves sucked into the story of it again and again and again. So again, being honest with ourselves about when it's not so helpful to use that relax, observe, allow. Instead: not now.

That "not now" is a setting aside, a kind of skillful ignoring. The way I framed it to myself was this: I would see something like anger arise and recognize, yeah, not a good time to pay attention to this. And the little conversation in my mind would go something like, "Yeah, I see you. I see you're wanting some attention, but this isn't a good time. So you do your thing—I'm not going to stop you—but I'm going to put my attention on my feet. I'm just going to put my attention on my feet and walk right now."

So letting it be, essentially. Not trying to repress it, but also not engaging with it. That whole conversation I had with myself did get collapsed down to just: not now. With essentially that light tone. It wasn't "NOT NOW!"

It was not now. I'm going to put my attention here. A very, very skillful tool when ill will is strong in that way—kind of recognizing when we're overwhelmed by that state.

The third of the hindrances is sloth and torpor. In my meetings with many of you, you've mentioned this as being something that's present these days. It's a pretty familiar state for the beginning of retreat. Sometimes we call it "the swamp"—you know, the first few days of retreat just feel like we're trudging through sludge. And in fact, the analogy for sloth and torpor, the water analogy, is that there's algae growing on the bowl of water. So, kind of a literal swamp.

Sloth and torpor is a low energy state. It's the states of sleepiness, dullness, fogginess, being spaced out—that kind of state of mind. Sometimes actual sleep. The energy is low, and because the energy is low, it's hard to see clearly.

But much of the agitation around this state has to do with thoughts like, "I can't pay attention while my mind is this dull. This is a problem. This has to be fixed." The thought "I can't meditate if I'm in this state." How many of you have had that belief, had that thought come into your mind when you're in a state of dullness? "I can't meditate in this state."

I'd actually like to propose that if you have that thought, if you can be aware that you have this thought—"I can't meditate when my mind is this dull"—there's actually enough energy and mindfulness to meet the sleepiness and the dullness, to actually be aware of it. Now, if you're actually falling asleep, you're not going to have that thought; you're going to be asleep. But if you find yourself thinking that thought, question it. See if you can turn it around and say, "I've got enough mindfulness to think that thought. Let's see if I can meet the dullness and sleepiness."

Sleepiness is an interesting experience because it has this quality when we're resisting it—which we often do in meditation. When we're sleepy and we're meditating, we feel like we're not supposed to be sleepy. We're supposed to be alert. It's when we're alert that we can see things clearly, and that's when insights are going to come. So we have those thoughts, and we're resisting the sleepiness.

When we resist the sleepiness, the dullness, those states feel really unpleasant. It doesn't feel very good. We're fighting them. But often—not always, sometimes the thickness of mind itself has an unpleasant quality—but often the resistance to sloth and torpor is the largest part of the unpleasantness of it. And many times I've seen that as soon as the resistance stops—oh, does it feel good! It's a really pleasant experience to be sleepy.

That's a little carrot for you. When it feels good, it can be a little bit more fun to try to pay attention to. So even just the shift from resistance to non-resistance, if you can feel the sensations and recognize the pleasantness of it, that might be enough to keep you aware enough to be present for the experience itself.

On one retreat, one of my early retreats, I finally realized that I just couldn't resist the sleepiness, but I found that I could kind of watch it. And during one particular sitting, I let go—I just completely let go of the resistance to it. And I just watched it. I felt the sleepiness descend. The body first got really relaxed. The body was like, "Yeah." There was awareness, but the body was really relaxed. That felt pretty good. The muscles got all soft. The inside got all soft. I thought, "That's pleasant. That's really pleasant."

So noticing the pleasantness of that, and then watching the mind go into these really pleasant states—like just before sleep, the mind goes into these really pleasant, wavelike experiences. And then I would fall asleep. I was sitting, right? So this woke me up. Okay, I'm awake. Let's do it again. Just let the body get all soft and gushy. Let the mind go.

And do it again. It was so much fun—better than any Disneyland ride I'd ever been on. It was a really fun exploration, and something that surprised me as I did this. Through this exploration, in the period of a forty-five-minute sitting, my mind began to recognize the state just before I dropped. The mind knew the moment before I was going to fall asleep. And when it recognized that moment, all I had to do was straighten my spine a little bit. There'd be a little rush of energy, then I could let go and do it all again. That entire sitting was an exploration of mindfulness of sleepiness, mindfulness of that hindrance. And yet it wasn't hindering the mindfulness. It wasn't hindering the continuity. It wasn't hindering the cultivation of concentration. In fact, it was the very support for that cultivation.

I really encourage you to have fun with your hindrances. It's kind of amazing. We think there are certain states we cannot be mindful of. And if there's any state you think that about—I can't be mindful when I'm spaced out, I can't be mindful when I'm this or that—question it. I started to question that and got interested in how it might be possible to be mindful of spacing out, and I discovered that it is possible. So looking at this as a possibility for waking up.

Now again, there are times to use the antidotes—when if you try to be mindful of sleepiness, you fall asleep and you're out until the bell rings. If you're finding that level of sleepiness, it takes some honesty. It takes some willingness to look at what's happening and recognize, okay, mindfulness for sleepiness right now doesn't seem to be working. I would try mindfulness first and see what happens. And if you end up lost in the sleepiness or asleep for long stretches of time, then use some of the antidotes. Stand up, open your eyes, look at light, do some walking meditation, walk backwards. That's a great antidote to sleepiness. My teacher in Burma, Sayadaw U Janaka, taught me that one. Walk backwards. It's amazing how it makes the mind more alert.

The fourth of these hindrances is restlessness and remorse. This hindrance has both a bodily side and a mental side. Sometimes the bodily side is just the restlessness of body—feeling like jumping beans under your skin, or restless leg syndrome, like you just cannot sit still, like your body is going to explode. The restlessness of mind is the mind feeling like it can't settle, like the mind is so jumpy. The analogy for the bowl of water is that the water is rippled by the wind.

With physical restlessness, that jumping-bean quality, there are different ways to pay attention to something. Often we have a focused quality to our attention—we dive in and look at things closely. With restlessness, it's really helpful to have a wide-open lens. Almost like letting the restlessness get as big as this room. Let the awareness get as big as the room. Let the restlessness get as big as the room. It sounds a little scary to think of it that way, but when we're trying to contain that physical restlessness in the body, it's like a pressure cooker. We're holding it in this really small space, and it's like all this fast energy sparking around. Whereas if it's got a big container, that energy has much more space to be held. So that sense of having a big container of awareness can be very helpful.

With the restless mind, with the spinning in the thoughts, when the mind feels like it just cannot settle, just jumping from thing to thing to thing—sometimes there's an emotion underneath that. Anxiety, worry. We'll talk in a few days more about working with emotions, but one of the most helpful tools is turning toward how that emotion feels in the body. If you notice restlessness, you might just check in. Is there something else happening here? Some other emotion going on? Oh yes, there's worry. What does worry feel like in the body? Again, seeing if you can let go of the thoughts and turn toward the bodily experience. Sometimes this restless mind is the mind trying to work something out, trying to figure something out, motivated by this emotion.

And sometimes the restless mind is that emotion trying to get our attention. Pay attention to me. Something's wrong here. We need to do something about this. Hey, you got to fix this. So sometimes the restless mind is that emotion seeking acknowledgment. And when we actually turn to that emotion itself, the emotion goes, Oh, thank goodness you're paying attention to me. And it stops spinning out so much.

There's a lot more that we could say about restlessness, but time is limited this evening. I would really encourage exploring that broader attention for a restless mind. Restlessness is a very core hindrance. It's said that restlessness is one of the last hindrances to go before we get enlightened. So it's going to be with us for a long time. It's worth getting familiar with it, beginning to understand it, learning about it. The learning about it will allow the grosser forms, the larger forms, to begin to release and settle. And then we start working with subtler forms and subtler forms and subtler forms. Restlessness is embedded very deeply into our minds.

As for using antidotes, again, if it feels like the mindfulness just makes it explode—sometimes with restlessness, if we turn towards it, it's like a positive feedback loop and it becomes a screaming restlessness in our experience—it might be helpful then to take a walk, go outside, open your eyes, be in nature. Just take your attention off the restlessness itself and put yourself in a more spacious container. Allow for a spacious mind.

The fifth of the hindrances is doubt. There are so many different kinds of doubt in our practice. Doubt in ourselves is probably the biggest one that we meet. We also doubt the teachers. We doubt the teachings. The Buddha lived 2600 years ago. What on earth does he know about the kinds of suffering I'm experiencing here and now? It does happen to turn out that minds haven't changed too much, so the tools he offers us are completely applicable to our situation.

The analogy for doubt is water clouded by mud so that we can't see. It often manifests as a kind of wavering, a vacillation. In terms of our practice, sometimes we have doubt about what practice we should do right now. Should I do metta? Should I focus on the breathing? Maybe I should go take a walk. Or maybe I should do mindless gazing, useless gazing practice and have a cup of tea. We're caught in this what-should-I-do mentality. The mind walks two steps down the path of one practice. Well, let's do loving-kindness. May I be happy. Oh no, no, let's do anapanasati. Breathe in. Oh, let's take a walk. So we end up taking only a few steps this way, then coming back and taking a few steps that way.

The analogy is of being lost in the desert. We take a few steps this way. Maybe that's the way I'm supposed to go. No, no, that's not right. Let me go this way. No, no, that's not right. Let me go this way. Doubt has that vacillating quality to it—not being able to decide what to do. The mind can spin in what can sound like very logical, wise arguments, discussions in our heads. And yet those very thoughts are keeping us from being here in the present moment.

One of the most important tools with doubt is to get familiar with the stories of doubt. I can't do this.

What good is this? I should do another practice. What do these teachers know? Get familiar with the stories around doubt. When you recognize the mind caught in a story of doubt, there's hope. Then we can start to pay attention to it. Then we can turn towards the experience of doubt. What does doubt feel like?

Often there is some kind of underlying emotion with doubt as well. I find it often related to fear—some kind of vulnerability, a feeling of inadequacy, a fear of failure, a fear of the unknown. Often these kinds of emotions will lead us to doubt. But look for yourself. When you recognize doubt, when you recognize, "Oh, this is doubt"—I remember on one retreat, I was in a state of doubt. I was doing walking meditation in the courtyard out here when it hit me: "Oh, this is doubt. That's what's happening here." My mind had gone off into these thoughts—I shouldn't be here, this practice isn't for me, I'm obviously not worthy of this practice. And at some point it was like, "Oh, this is doubt. Okay."

What does doubt feel like? And I turned towards my experience. What's here? Doubt is here. And what's here? The feeling was a surprise to me. The feeling was grief. That was the feeling. And when I felt the grief, the whole thing collapsed within a few minutes. And I was just back in the practice.

Doubt feeds on non-mindfulness. When the mind is aware of what's happening in the present moment, doubt cannot get a foothold. The antidote to doubt is attention in the present moment. And so if you can recognize "this is doubt," that very recognition is the beginning of doubt falling apart.

Sometimes our doubt is intellectual. We want to understand how things work, how the practice works, whether it will work, whether it's worth doing this practice versus that practice. And so we think about it rather than actually doing it. There's a term that's applied to the Dhamma: ehipassiko. It means "come and see." Try it. Instead of thinking about whether something's going to work, run the experiment. Try it and see.

For me, this has been a great antidote to that kind of intellectual doubt. Like that question I had at the very beginning, when I read that book and it said to pay attention to your anger. "Well, what good's that going to do?" That was doubt. But as I said, because I had hit bottom, I was willing to try it and see. Somebody says it's useful. Maybe it's helpful. So there's the willingness to run the experiment, the willingness to try. Come and see. That willingness is the step of faith that also is the antidote to doubt.

I hope that you really have gotten a sense of the possibility of working with the hindrances—not simply because we need to get rid of them in order to get to the real practice, but that this is our practice, and the depth of what we can learn in the exploration of it. How much we learn about our hearts and minds in this exploration, and actually how much freedom is possible through that exploration.

Let's sit together for a moment.

CHAPTER 106

The Disappearance and Reappearance of Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 1h00

In this illuminating retreat talk, Andrea Fella invites practitioners to shift their attention from what they are mindful of to mindfulness itself. Rather than focusing on the content of experience, she encourages curiosity about the coming and going of awareness—how mindfulness spontaneously disappears and reappears without our conscious control. This investigation reveals the out-of-control nature of mind that the Buddha pointed to as evidence for anattā (not-self), as expressed in his teaching that if consciousness were self, we could simply command it to be as we wish.

Fella distinguishes between two forms of mindfulness: unprompted mindfulness, which arises spontaneously when we "wake up" from being lost, and prompted mindfulness, where we consciously direct attention. She highlights the moment of mindfulness returning as a precious opportunity—it's completely effortless, offers a clear contrast between being lost and being present, and helps us become familiar with what awareness itself feels like. This familiarity naturally pulls a thread of mindfulness through daily life.

The talk also explores where and how mindfulness gets lost: in particular activities, pleasant or unpleasant bodily states, familiar mental patterns like boredom or anger, and paradoxically, as practice deepens and experience becomes more subtle. Fella shares her own discoveries, including how investigating anger over months allowed mindfulness to catch the pattern earlier and earlier, eventually seeing the very intention toward anger arise and release. Throughout, she emphasizes approaching this exploration with compassion and curiosity rather than judgment, understanding that wisdom grows through direct experience and naturally facilitates letting go.

We've been spending much of our time here exploring and being aware of our experience. Tonight I'd like to reflect with you about mindfulness from a different perspective—not in terms of focusing on what we're aware of, but rather on mindfulness itself. Investigating mindfulness itself. Taking an interest in the coming and going of mindfulness.

Mindfulness as a factor of mind sometimes appears, sometimes disappears. We usually call this appearance and disappearance of mindfulness the wandering mind. I thought of turning this around. Rather than exploring how our mind gets lost, let's explore the factor of mindfulness and how it disappears and how it reappears.

We can actually do this. And this exploration, I think, supports us in a kind of disidentification with the act of mindfulness itself. We often identify with being the one who does mindfulness. Exploring how mindfulness comes and goes can help to begin to unhook us from the identification with the doing of mindfulness.

There's a lot we can learn in this exploration of how mindfulness appears and disappears. We can learn about how we get hooked, where we get out of balance. We also get a really clear recognition of just how out of control the mind is.

We sit down to meditate. We're going to be mindful. That's our intention. I will be mindful. And how long does that last? The mind wanders. We actually have very little control over that. We have a modicum—a small, tiny little bit of control when we are mindful. But there's a lot of habits, a lot of conditioning that tends to pull us away. Much of that comes from a subconscious realm. While we are sitting here trying to be mindful, our mind has other ideas about the matter.

And then there is how long we're lost for. We have no say over how long we're going to be gone. We have no say about when mindfulness comes back. Mindfulness comes back—who did that? You didn't decide, "Oh, I'm going to be mindful now." Mindfulness appears spontaneously.

This exploration around the coming and going of mindfulness really helps to point out just how out of control our minds are. And this is a pointer to the Buddhist teaching on anattā, not-self—this out-of-control nature of experience. The Buddha, in one of his key teachings on not-self, pointed to this aspect of our experience being out of our control as evidence for understanding the not-self nature of our experience. He said, "If consciousness were self, it would be possible to say of consciousness, 'May my consciousness be thus. May my consciousness not be thus.' But consciousness is not self, and so it is not possible to say, 'May my consciousness be thus. May my consciousness not be thus.'"

Likewise for states of perception, feeling, body—all of the states of mind that we go through. There's some level of choice from time to time that we have, but largely when we look at our minds as we are here, we really get it. There's not a lot of control. This is part of this exploration. We really start to see the out-of-control, not-self nature of our minds.

This can be unsettling, disturbing, frustrating, confusing. And so I'd like to offer this exploration with an attitude of compassion, of friendliness, of curiosity. Rather than judgment, what can we learn about our minds? What can we understand about our minds? As I said in the talk on the hindrances, the understanding—not an intellectual understanding, but an understanding that comes through meeting experience and seeing directly our experience—that understanding brings wisdom to our minds, which begins to replace the habitual conditioned patterns of our mind.

And so rather than habitually acting out of our conditioned patterns from childhood, or the patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion, our actions begin to be motivated from wisdom. It's still not self. It's still not me or I. And yet the whole process of the unfolding of our practice as wisdom develops through this direct experience is to move towards the letting go of that conditioning that ties us to suffering.

Another aspect of this exploration of mindfulness is to learn about awareness itself. As we explore the comings and goings of mindfulness and get interested in how the mind pays attention—interested in mindfulness itself—we start to learn not only about awareness, but about the functioning of the mind, how the mind works. All of this exploration brings wisdom, brings understanding to the mind, which helps to free us from those conditioned tendencies.

The first place this exploration began to unfold for me, in my own experience, was looking at essentially the comings of mindfulness—the times it re-arises. This happens countless times in the day. We're sitting here, our minds wander, and at some point, nothing that we choose to do, mindfulness returns. That moment of mindfulness returning is a really great moment. Not just because we're no longer lost, but because there's a possibility there of beginning to get familiar with what it feels like to be mindful.

This kind of spontaneous re-arising of mindfulness is one form of mindfulness that happens to us. The Abhidhamma calls this unprompted mindfulness. It arises without conscious choice, without conscious prompting. It arises without our consciously doing it. It happens spontaneously.

The other form of mindfulness is what we typically practice and think of as our practice: prompted mindfulness. This is where we're already mindful and we remind ourselves to be mindful. That kind of mindfulness is what we're most familiar with in terms of the feeling of what it means to be mindful. Often it includes a kind of choice about what we're paying attention to, and I hope to talk about that a little more later.

Unprompted mindfulness arises spontaneously, and we're not choosing what the mind is paying attention to. The mindfulness is just re-arising and it's already paying attention to something. Mindfulness always arises with some experience happening along with it. And in that moment, what we tend to do is get involved with the thing that we are mindful of.

We may be walking down the hill to the dining hall, maybe a little spaced out, in that more or less mindful place that Joseph describes. There's a kind of rustle on the side of the road and our attention's drawn to it. There's a brief coming out of whatever lostness we've been in, and we turn our attention—but then we get involved with what we've turned our attention to. It's a bullfrog by the side of the road. We get interested in looking at the bullfrog and thinking about bullfrogs. There's been just a little moment of coming back, of recognizing, of knowing experience for a split second, but then we tend to get involved again.

Beginning to cultivate this recognition of that moment of waking up is important, because actually that kind of moment happens a lot in our day—where we're kind of lost and then something happens and we are aroused a little bit out of our lostness, but then get sucked back into whatever we've become aware of.

If we get interested in this experience of mindfulness coming back, interested in the quality of mindfulness—what is it for mindfulness to return?—it's kind of amazing. In that moment when we go from being lost to being aware, what I discovered in my own exploration was that there can be a clearer recognition of what it means to be mindful, what the experience of mindfulness itself is. There's a kind of contrast in that moment between what it was like a few moments ago to be lost in thought and what it's like now to be aware. So the experience of mindfulness itself, the feeling of mindfulness, the quality of mindfulness is highlighted in that moment—if we are interested in exploring it, if we're interested in being aware of it.

There are a couple of great things about this kind of exploration. The first is that it begins to create a sense of familiarity for us about the feeling of mindfulness, what it is to be aware. And that very familiarity—what we're doing there is being mindful of mindfulness. We're recognizing the quality of mindfulness itself. So we're getting familiar with that: what does it feel like to be mindful? And that very familiarity begins to help us see it happening more often. Because that moment of remembering, that moment when mindfulness re-arises, actually happens way more often than we're consciously aware of. It happens and then we're lost again, for a split second, and we're lost again. The more familiar we get with that feeling of mindfulness, the more those moments when mindfulness re-arises spontaneously become available to us.

begin to kind of point themselves out to us because we're familiar with them.

And so this practice begins to pull a thread of mindfulness through the non-formal times of practice. There are so many moments of mindfulness coming back like that.

Another wonderful aspect of this exploration is that the moment of mindfulness returning is completely effortless. It doesn't take any work on your part for that moment to happen. And if we can connect to that quality of effortless awareness present in that moment, it gives us a pointer to the possibility—it shows us a little bit about what it might be like to be mindful without trying so hard. Just in that split second of mindfulness coming back, it's a light, completely effortless moment.

Another helpful thing for me about this practice was that it really cut the tendency to judge the fact that my mind wandered. Because what we often do in that moment, especially in sitting meditation, when mindfulness returns, is think, "Again! My mind wandered again." But if we are curious about the re-arising of mindfulness, what I began to feel was: it doesn't matter if my mind wanders a hundred times during a sitting—that gives me a hundred opportunities to look at that effortless mindfulness. Just turn it around. Rather than being frustrated about the mind getting lost, be interested in exploring the mind coming back, the re-arising of mindfulness.

It's very simple in that moment. This isn't exactly something to do—it's not something you can actually make happen, because in that moment of the spontaneous arising of mindfulness your mind will do what it's doing. So it's not exactly an instruction where I can say, "Do this." Rather, this is the kind of instruction where you put an intention in your mind. Just drop in: May I be aware when mindfulness returns. And when mindfulness returns and you find yourself judging yourself—"Oh, right, okay, well here I am, let's check in what's going on"—just remind yourself, and try again. Keep this intention to check into that moment.

On one retreat where I began to explore this moment of the arising of mindfulness, my mind got curious about how early I could notice the re-arising of mindfulness. Of course that's not something I could do deliberately. But that very curiosity began to investigate the phenomenon in its own way. So inclining towards curiosity is more how this practice will unfold.

In that moment when you remember—if you remember—it's simply recognizing that you are aware. The first thing is to recognize that you are aware. And then just notice what's obvious. Awareness is aware of something in that moment. There's awareness, and something that awareness is aware of. Just notice that.

Then, depending on what practice you're doing, that very awareness of the arising of mindfulness and the knowing of a tickle, or the knowing of peace, or the knowing of frustration—whatever it is that mindfulness is arising into—it may simply be that that's enough. The mind has connected back again with experience and you're present. No need to choose an object. And yet if you're doing a form of concentration practice, with the breath or with metta, in that moment, because you are now aware again, prompted mindfulness is possible. So you can choose an object if that's appropriate.

It's also possible to make this exploration around what it feels like to be mindful. For me at least, the arising of mindfulness was probably the easiest place to get familiar with that feeling of awareness or mindfulness itself.

Just one note: I'm going to be using the terms mindfulness and awareness synonymously in this talk. Some teachers don't really define the term awareness, and sometimes teachers use it in different ways. I'll just tell you straight out—when I say awareness here, I mean mindfulness, just to keep the confusion at a minimum.

So when you are mindful, when awareness is present, you can also check in. What is it like to be aware? For me, that moment when mindfulness returns was the clearest place to get a sense of that, because of the contrast between being lost and being present. But we can also begin to check into this in the moments of just the flow of our awareness, of our mindfulness, whatever we're paying attention to.

Right now, do you know that you're aware? If you are alert enough to hear me ask the question, the answer is probably yes. In fact, the answer is yes—you know that you're aware. What it is to be aware can be kind of mysterious. We don't actually really know what it means sometimes. It's not so clear to us. We know that we're aware, but we don't know what awareness is.

We don't know the feeling of mindfulness itself. It's such a familiar experience, so close to how our minds work, that it's kind of like the air we breathe. It's not something that's easy to recognize.

And yet, what I've seen is that just that kind of recognition—"Do I know that I'm aware? Yes, I know that I'm aware"—that simple recognition begins, over time, to help us understand what that experience of awareness itself is. That experience of mindfulness itself.

So another part of this exploration—I've been talking mostly here about the waking up side of the equation. It's also possible to get curious about where mindfulness gets lost. At one point I was in a sitting group and somebody said something like, "Well, I don't see how it's possible to see when mindfulness goes away. It's either there or it's not." In my own exploration of this, I began to see that actually it is possible to recognize where awareness gets lost. So there's a curiosity about what situations, what mind states—how and when awareness gets lost.

I'm going to go through some of them now, just an exploration of some of the ways I've seen awareness get lost in my own practice. Again, this isn't intended as a judgment. The exploration here isn't to notice where your mind gets lost and beat yourself up about that. It's to notice where your mind gets lost and get interested in it, get curious about that.

We might lose awareness or tend to find ourselves losing awareness in particular activities—our yogi job, washing dishes, eating, using the toilet, going to our rooms, or walking in the hills as opposed to doing formal walking practice. Just begin to see where mindfulness tends to get lost for longer periods of time. You go into your room and close the door and the mind kind of goes, "Phew, okay, don't need to be mindful here." So notice that, notice that tendency.

On one retreat I found—well, actually what often tends to happen with this exploration of noticing where awareness gets lost is that we're not actually seeing the mind going out. We're not seeing the mind leaving the present moment. What we notice is that the mind has come back after a while and we know, "Oh yeah, I've been in my room now for ten minutes and haven't been very mindful." We recognize it kind of late in the game.

So on one retreat I began to recognize that I would come back into awareness in the bathroom, staring at myself in the mirror. And it's like, "Wow, how did that happen?" This happened repeatedly enough that the awareness would return while I was staring at myself in the mirror. I didn't even notice that I was standing at the sink, much less looking at myself in the mirror.

So I began to get curious about that. If you notice an area or a place where mindfulness tends to get lost, you can add a little bit of curiosity. I would know that I was headed into the bathroom—"Oh, I'm headed into the bathroom. Maybe I'll see this time where awareness gets lost"—and go into the bathroom and then find myself staring at myself in the mirror again. "Okay, missed it again." Using a lightness. "Wow, look at that. Amazing." Emaho is the word the Tibetans use. Emaho—amazing. Amazing what the mind does.

So just the curiosity about it. And it took a while for me—every time I'd go into the bathroom it was like, "Yeah, maybe I'll see it this time." At one point I was pretty present through being in the bathroom and I was standing at the sink and it's like, "Oh, I'm standing at the sink. I know I'm standing at the sink." And then I saw the intention to look up at my face. It wasn't like some deep childhood pattern of needing to be seen. It was just a habit of looking at myself in the mirror that wasn't seen, just an unseen habit.

So that's another thing I'd like to throw out there.

Sometimes we put interpretations on our experience. We think, "Gosh, if I always get lost when I'm looking at myself in the mirror, it must mean something significant." So just notice where you get lost, and then get curious about how it happens, what happens there. Add a little interest to the exploration.

The point is not to stop the activity. Certainly I couldn't stop going into the bathroom. Sometimes you might think, "Oh, if I find myself getting lost taking a walk in the hills, maybe I shouldn't do the walk in the hills." That's not what I'm suggesting here. I'm suggesting that when you're getting ready to take a walk in the hills, get curious about how that getting lost happens. How does it happen?

Joseph Goldstein tells a story about himself—how when he would go into the dining hall, he found himself just getting lost. Every time he went into the dining hall, he got lost. And his exploration of that was as soon as he walked into the dining hall, he began recognizing: seeing is happening. He noticed, he recognized, that what was happening was his awareness was going out the eye door. It was the seeing that was pulling him out. And so he began to simply recognize: seeing is happening in this situation.

We can begin to expand the terrain, the field, the places where we are aware, by noticing where we lose awareness.

We also might lose awareness in states of body—either pleasant states or unpleasant states. Those would probably be the two main places we'd lose our awareness. If the body starts feeling really comfortable, the sensations of sleep arising, the pleasant experience that happens as the mind goes to sleep—the mind can get lost in that. The mind can kind of just hook into the pleasantness and lose touch with the awareness of the pleasantness. So exploring the feeling tone that Greg was talking about this morning becomes important—being consciously aware of pleasant quality or unpleasant quality.

Pain is another place where we tend to get lost. The mind tends to kind of go out. And again, the point isn't to force yourself to stay with an experience like a pain in the knee or a pain in the back, but rather to be curious about what does the mind do when pain is happening? There's the pain, there's the aversion, and then—poof—the mind is gone.

One thing I noticed is that a lot of times with pain, my mind had various strategies. I would wake up, for instance, in some kind of fantasy or singing a song in my mind. And in that waking up, I recognized: wow, in this moment, the mind is not really bothered by the pain. And so I got curious about that. Seeing that the mind had a strategy—sometimes our minds have strategies for how to deal with pain. Rather than trying to force ourselves to just hold in and grip and stay with the pain, get curious about those strategies.

When I began exploring the singing strategy, what I noticed was that in the singing strategy, the mind had kind of let go of its grip on the pain. It had let go of "this is a problem, this is something that needs to be fixed or controlled or changed." And the mind was just happily off singing its song. When the mind woke up into that and noticed both the singing and that it wasn't stuck, wasn't fastened to the pain, it began to understand a little bit about how that unpleasant experience could be there without aversion.

This is one of the questions from this morning: How can that unpleasant experience be there without aversion? That strategy of singing was one way to get there. It's possible to actually have that unpleasant experience arise without that grip.

So exploring that back and forth—exploring how the mind would go into that strategy of singing and lose its grip, then in the re-arising of mindfulness seeing the lack of the fastening or gripping to the pain—there were a few moments where there was just the pain and no aversion. And then the aversion arose. The grip arose. So I got to see the grip arising itself. And noticing, just the exploration of that, began to lessen the need for the strategy of singing, because the mind could see that the grip would kind of come and go. The mind could just be present for that.

We also might lose awareness in states of mind—particular familiar states of mind. Perhaps boredom, frustration, depression, planning. We all may have our particular familiar ways the mind tends to get lost. It's really helpful to begin to recognize the particular patterns. Guy talked about this the other day—recognizing the top ten ways our mind gets lost.

The moment that mindfulness comes back into those states—so the mind is wandering off and you wake up recognizing the thought and perhaps the state associated with it, planning or confusion or boredom, or maybe peace or ease (we can actually get lost in those kinds of states of mind also)—in the moment of waking up, of having mindfulness re-arise into a state of mind, the familiarity with that state begins to build, much like I was describing with mindfulness itself. It helps us become familiar with it.

At one point early in my practice, one of the main explorations I was doing was around anger. When I first started exploring this, the mind was pretty angry by the time it remembered that it was going to be paying attention to anger. The mind was pretty much in a rage. At that point it was like, "Wow, okay. Oh, anger. Yep, I said I'd be aware of this. Yep, oh boy, unpleasant." So it was about that level of awareness.

But that interest in exploring that pattern—this was a way my mind just took off. I would find myself frozen in anger, unable to even function. So I was curious: Is there some way that mindfulness can infiltrate this pattern?

Each time the mind woke up recognizing, "Oh, this is anger, this is what anger feels like"—I didn't have to do anything, this is just what unfolded. Over the course of months, each time I woke up I recognized that the anger wasn't as bad. It hadn't spun into rage by now. The mindfulness was picking up on the anger sooner, and I think this was because of the familiarity the mind had gained with it, and also the familiarity the mind had gained with the suffering of that anger. Because the mind really got it: anger doesn't feel good.

So the arising of awareness into the state of anger kind of backed up. I began to see just more like normal anger, and then waking up into just the beginnings of anger. And one time, actually seeing the inclination towards anger—seeing the mind want to get angry. That one kind of blew my mind. Why would the mind want to get angry? But seeing that, seeing the mind want to get angry, the mind also recognized from the months of having paid attention to anger: that way lies suffering. And again, I did not have to do this. The mind just let go of that intention towards anger.

This exploration of getting familiar with states of mind we get lost in—just a simple familiarity, in a moment, "Yep, there it is, there's depression, there's boredom, there's frustration"—that simple recognition begins to help the mind see it more quickly, even to the point where it may start to see it arise. And then we may not get lost in the state.

We also might lose awareness as our practice deepens. There are a couple different ways this happens, I think. As our mind settles down, becomes more still, more quiet, sometimes things that we have held at bay through conscious repression or even subconscious repression... it's like the loosening of the usual structures of our mind, the ways we hold things in. The mind begins to loosen like that, and some old deep patterns can just kind of erupt. It's as if they're saying, "Oh, finally there's some space for me to be seen. Thank you."

This practice can be an alternation of what Michelle McDonald has called the cycle between purity and purification—the settling into the space of calm and ease and peace, the purity of mind, and then purification. The purification is the allowing into consciousness or the coming into consciousness of habits and patterns that we've held inside.

Mindfulness functions similarly to how I spoke the other day about metta practice, how metta kind of functions like soap in the washing machine. The soap draws the dirt to it, pulls it out of the clothes into the water. It's similar with mindfulness practice. This purification part is where mindfulness is like the soap, pulling to the surface those things that are counter to the purity—those states of greed, of aversion, of confusion. It pulls them into consciousness, and that coming into consciousness is where they can be released.

It's not a mistake, this alternation between purity and purification. It's actually part of how the practice works.

And so, as the mind settles down, we may find suddenly there's an explosion of the mind going back into something that happened when we were ten—some memory that triggers a whole host of feelings. We might get lost in that for a while. When that kind of thing happens, when the purification starts to happen, we sometimes feel, "What did I do wrong? What happened to my beautiful, calm, settled mindfulness?"

It's just this purity-purification cycle. A sense of knowing that this is the way the practice unfolds really helped me to not be so judgmental about those eruptions.

Another way the mind can start getting lost as the practice deepens is this: as the mind settles down into more states of calm and clarity, sometimes experiences arise that are not very familiar, or experience gets more subtle. I've seen this pattern quite a bit—to the point now where if, after a period of the mind being settled, the mind starts to wander, I get curious about it.

The purity-purification cycle is pretty easy to recognize because we tend to be in story, in strong emotion. But this other kind of mind wandering—when there's something new happening, something unfamiliar, the mind touching into more subtlety—it tends to be that you're just really present, things are going quite well, and suddenly you wake up ten minutes later thinking, "Where did the mindfulness go?"

When this first started to happen to me, I thought I was doing something wrong. And then I began to get interested in where the mindfulness was going.

One of the first times this happened, I was paying attention to the breath. For a couple of days—this was on a three-month course at IMS—the mind had been pretty settled with the breath. I'd sit down and the mind would be right there with the breath. Just right there. Then one morning I sat down and within a second the mind was wandering. "What happened to my mindfulness?"

At that point, I was more curious about it rather than judging myself. So what I explored was: okay, here I am, I'm mindful. Let's see if I can notice where mindfulness gets lost.

The mind was attending to the breath. As I was being with the breath, I noticed that the sensations of the breath got very, very quiet. Within the space of one in-breath and one out-breath, the breath almost disappeared. There wasn't much to pay attention to, and the mind got lost.

When I noticed that—that the breath was disappearing, that there were no sensations—I understood what was happening. The mind was used to paying attention to a particular level of sensation. Then the level of sensation got more subtle. And the mind was still looking at the grosser level, not finding anything there, and wandered off.

Often, as the mind settles, sensations get quieter. There are also sometimes unfamiliar states of mind that begin to arise. And as these unfamiliar states happen, the mind can get lost.

What I'd like to encourage here is curiosity. If your mind has been settled and it suddenly starts to wander, rather than judging it as something wrong—rather than thinking you need to try harder—get curious. In that case with the breath, I found that paying attention to the subtlety required that I actually not try so hard. The effort to be mindful was in the way of seeing the sensations. When the mindfulness backed off that intensity of effort—oh, there's the breath again.

The meditation itself sometimes shows us how to deepen. And sometimes that doorway is revealed to us through the wandering mind. It's paradoxical, but I've seen it happen so many times that I want you to know about it.

The mind can also get lost in states where it holds the opinion that it's not possible to be mindful. Low energy, sleepiness, sloth and torpor, dullness, spacing out—that's like the quintessential example. "The mind is spaced out; it's not possible to be mindful of that."

It is possible to be mindful of spacing out.

The way into this kind of exploration, again, is through that recognition on waking up, on the re-arising of mindfulness. Mindfulness re-arises into some kind of space—like spacing out. In that moment you recognize, "Oh, I'm spaced out." And what we typically do there is say, "Come back." But in that arising of mindfulness, mindfulness has already arisen connected with that spaced-out state.

Can you touch into that? Can you be aware of that? Actually, the fact that mindfulness has re-arisen within that spaced-out state indicates yes, it is possible to be aware in that spaced-out state. But the view, the opinion that "spaced out equals not mindful, have to do something"—that's our typical approach. We bring our mind to some other object. We bring our mind to the breath, to the body.

One time I really began to see this. I was eating breakfast, and I had the agenda while eating to be mindful of the experience of eating—the movement of the hand, the lifting, the chewing, the swallowing, the tasting, all of that. I was trying to pay attention, bringing my attention to that. So that was a directing of attention, the prompted mindfulness directing attention to the meal. And then the mind would space out. I noticed that and brought my attention back to breakfast. That was what I was doing. That was my understanding of what it means to be mindful here: pay attention to breakfast.

At some point, I began to see the mind kind of leave the conscious focus on breakfast and move into spaced out. It felt like the mind was hanging out up here somewhere in a buzzing state. And rather than in that moment saying, "Let me bring myself back to something else," it was kind of like, "Oh, the mindfulness is actually aware of that state." Let's hang out here. Let's see what this is like. I'm mindful. This mindfulness is here. Why not?

So paying attention to that state itself, there was a recognition that actually the mind was resting. The mind actually needed some rest. And the mindfulness of that state kind of allowed that rest. Within thirty seconds or a minute or something like that—it didn't take very long—that state ended. And then I was present with whatever else was arising in my experience.

So again, I mentioned this with the hindrances, but just to reinforce it: if there's any state where you think you can't be mindful, question that. If you have enough awareness to know, "Oh, this state—I can't be mindful here," there's some mindfulness of it. See if you can kind of push the edges of that, where mindfulness can go. A lot of this talk I'm exploring what are the boundaries, what are the edges of where mindfulness can go. Begin to push the edges of that. See, can mindfulness begin to infiltrate the areas where we think it can't go or where it's habitually not arising?

We also often seem to think we have to be in a certain state to meditate, that the mind has to be in a certain kind of meditative state. I don't know what your meditative state is. Sometimes we have a sense of—I think this comes from familiarity with certain states that are particularly clear in our mindfulness practice. We get a sense of, "Wow, just seeing the arising of experience so clearly, a really clear sense of presence in a particular way." And we think, "That's it. That is what mindfulness is about. That is what I'm looking for." And then we try to recreate it. We try to find it.

What we can begin to see, what we can begin to recognize, is that there are many different ways you can feel when mindfulness is continuous or present. Sometimes it can feel really clear. Sometimes it can feel like the mind is broad and vast, taking in a kind of panoramic experience. Sometimes it can feel like the mind is precisely focused on one thing—just right there, clear—and then that thing disappears and another thing arises and the mind is right there.

Sometimes it can feel like there's no place the mindfulness can land—everything vanishing even as we see it.

So many different ways that experience can unfold. What this reveals is that mindfulness is attuning to different kinds of experiences. We tend to look for a particular state, a particular way of mindfulness, a particular kind of experience that we think is mindfulness. And that very looking for mindfulness to be a certain way will obscure the way it actually is now. How is it now?

I was once on a retreat in Burma, doing some walking meditation, and I'd been pretty present in the walking. But as I walked back to my dorm, I noticed my mind trying to put itself into some kind of special meditative state. I was getting ready to go to my room to sit, and I saw my mind try to put itself into a state in order to meditate in a specific way. Seeing that, it was almost amusing. It's like, why are you doing that? What's wrong with this state? Awareness is here. Let's be with this.

I saw that happen several times—the mind trying to put itself into a state in order to meditate. And what I saw was that it was a subtle repression of thought. The mind had attributed or decided somehow that that space where there wasn't so much thought was a better place to meditate from.

My hope here primarily is that you'll be interested—that this may encourage some interest in exploring the edges of your practice. Where you get lost, how you get lost. And to not have a sense that this is a problem at all. There's so much we can learn from exploring the places where mindfulness goes and from where mindfulness comes back. It's a huge place of learning for us.

Not only do we learn about our habits of mind—sometimes I call this kind of practice "Your Mind 101," getting familiar with your patterns of mind—we also begin to get familiar with what we might call "The Mind 101." The patterns or ways that our minds work, the ways our minds feel things, the conditioned nature of experience, the way it responds to pleasant and unpleasant. Things that we share as human beings. We also begin to see these insights into impermanence, unreliability, and not-self. This exploration takes us into that terrain as well.

And the understanding, the wisdom that grows from that—that is what frees us. We can't free our own minds. It's not a doing. We cultivate the conditions. The learning, the wisdom grows, and the wisdom allows the letting go.

So let's sit together for a moment.

CHAPTER 107

Wising Up to Delusion

Andrea Fella · 1h05

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of delusion (moha), the third of the three unwholesome roots alongside greed and aversion. She begins with the Buddha's concise definition of freedom as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion, emphasizing that this freedom comes through letting go rather than attaining anything.
>
> Fella examines delusion through three distinct layers. The first is simple disconnection—being lost in thought, spaced out, or enchanted by mental creations. Drawing on Shakespeare's observation of being "asleep with eyes wide open," she illustrates how we live in mind-created worlds without recognizing them as such. The second layer involves views, opinions, and agendas that filter our experience. Using the famous "invisible gorilla" study and the Buddhist parable of the blind people and the elephant, she demonstrates how selective attention and conceptual overlay create profound misperception. The third and deepest layer comprises the universal human delusions: perceiving the impermanent as permanent, the unreliable as reliable sources of happiness, and what is not-self as self.
> Particularly valuable is Fella's teaching on how delusion is embedded within greed and aversion—greed carries the delusion that obtaining something will bring lasting happiness, while aversion carries the delusion that eliminating something will do the same. She offers practical guidance for working with these patterns, including investigating what we're actually reacting to and exploring the process of believing itself. The talk concludes with honest reflection on how insights into delusion arise naturally through sustained mindfulness, and how even after seeing through delusion, conditioned patterns return—requiring patient, repeated observation.

The definition of freedom in the Buddha's words—one of the most concise definitions for freedom—is the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion.

On my recent retreat, this definition became very meaningful for me to take in. I really started to see that there is nothing we can get that will create or allow that freedom. There's nothing to get to drop into that freedom. It's the letting go. And so a lot of our practice is exploring these things that are in the way of freedom.

We've been exploring greed and aversion a lot. It doesn't take much to turn and look at your experience to start to see greed and aversion. They're really obvious at times—the obvious wanting, the obvious "get this out of here, get me out of here"—to the more subtle forms of greed, something more like perhaps expectation or anticipation, subtler kinds of wanting, leaning in, wanting to know. And aversion ranges from the more obvious kinds, which you're all quite familiar with, to the more subtle: dissatisfaction, feelings of boredom, a sense of "just by paying attention to this properly, I'll figure it out and it will go away."

We explore greed and aversion a lot and talk about it quite a bit. We mention delusion a lot but talk less about how it's actually experienced. What is delusion? How do we know delusion? Sometimes people even say, "How could it be possible to know delusion? By its very definition, wouldn't delusion be not knowable?"

Tonight I'd really like to explore this question. Can we get familiar with patterns that reveal how delusion works in our minds? I'd like to spend some time exploring various aspects of delusion, with a lot of stories from my own practice.

One of the more obvious ways we see delusion is that it can arise out of greed and aversion. If aversion is present, for instance—probably everybody has seen this kind of thing—if there's a state of mind of anger or frustration or some kind of dislike, often we see that it impacts the way we take information in. The state of mind can create a filter on our experience such that we take certain things in and not others. You're frustrated or angry, and then everything you see just confirms why you should be frustrated and angry. You're taking in the things that confirm that state and not taking in things that don't confirm it. This is a form of delusion. That filter creates a non-contact with aspects of experience or situation that perhaps would provide evidence to the contrary of the state.

So that's one way that delusion can manifest. And yet delusion is way more subtle than that. In fact, if delusion weren't present in our minds, greed and aversion wouldn't arise. Delusion is a component of greed and aversion, always. There's always a component of delusion within the very state of aversion, within the very state of greed. I'll come back to this piece later.

While delusion is at the foundation of greed and aversion, delusion can also arise in the absence of greed and aversion. So while delusion can arise from greed and aversion, greed and aversion may not arise when delusion is present.

Tonight's talk will basically offer some information that may help you uncover delusion in your experience. I want to talk about it from different perspectives—three main perspectives I'd like to explore, three ways that delusion comes up and is experienced.

The first is the most obvious form of delusion: a simple not connecting with experience, spaced-out states, things like that. The second is delusion based on our views, our agendas, our opinions.

And the third is a delusion that is, I'd say, based more on being a human being—the delusions we all share. So the middle level of delusion involves our own personal delusions around who we are, what we think, and what's important to us. And then this deeper level of delusion is a level of misperception that we all share.

The first kind of delusion, this disconnectedness, is simply not being here in the present moment. Not connecting to the present moment. Being spaced out, being lost in thought.

Shakespeare was a brilliant observer of humanity. In The Tempest, I found a couple of really beautiful quotes that point right to the state of delusion. One of them addresses this terrain of just being checked out, disconnected. In this part of the play, two characters are watching another character who's been enchanted by a magical being. In being enchanted, he's seeing all kinds of things that aren't there, fighting demons that aren't there. The two characters are talking about this person who's been enchanted, and they say: "This is a strange repose, to be asleep with eyes wide open, standing, speaking, moving, and yet so fast asleep."

This is actually a familiar state to us. How many times do we drive down the freeway and arrive at our destination with no memory of anything that happened? Standing, speaking, moving, and yet so fast asleep.

I like that in this scene from The Tempest, the person they're talking about has been enchanted. Because as I thought about this today, enchantment is essentially what happens to us. We get enchanted with our thoughts. We get enchanted with a world that's created in our minds, and we live in that enchantment. We sometimes wake up into a world of creation. This becomes obvious on retreat—we wake up into these three-dimensional worlds of mind creation. It's like, wow, where did that come from? The mind gets enchanted by them.

This term "enchantment" is actually significant in the unfolding and deepening of practice. The Buddha points to disenchantment—a letting go of being enchanted with the things we think will make us happy. We actually spend quite a bit of time in this enchanted place, so the moment of waking up, the moment of coming into mindfulness again, becomes important. I spoke about this the last time I talked. That moment of waking up—we begin to get a flavor of that kind of delusion as we wake up into these worlds of mind creation. You begin to get a flavor of what that space of delusion is and see it as mind creation.

That's where the delusion is powerful—when we're lost in the thought of it. Certainly before I started practicing, I would be lost in worlds of thought. I had a partner with whom I had a rather contentious relationship, and I would have all these thoughts about things he was going to do. I'd be getting mad about those things—creations in my mind of things he would do in the future—and I'd be getting furious with him in my mind. I'd come out of that, and it wouldn't even occur to me that this was a creation of the mind. I thought, no, that's something he might do.

This is delusion.

At least here and now, in watching your thoughts and seeing—and this was a great gift of the practice for me—the worlds that we wake up to, we recognize: this is a creation of the mind. It has no inherent reality. The belief in the reality of the thoughts, that's really where the delusion is. The belief in the... I don't quite know what the right word is, because thoughts can reflect reality. So I don't want to say that thoughts are inherently not to be believed. But there's a process of believing and enchantment with those thoughts. That's where delusion slips in—in the process of believing and then becoming enchanted.

We can know thoughts as thoughts, and there the delusion can't take root when we see thoughts arising as thoughts.

There are other ways this kind of disconnection delusion functions. Some very familiar states—sloth and torpor, restlessness—these have a delusive component to them because when we're not aware of them, they tend to make it difficult to contact present moment experience. Doubt also has this effect.

The wavering quality of doubt—What should I do? How should I do it? Is this right? Is this the right practice? Can I do this? I can't do this—this kind of mind state has the tendency to keep us disconnected from the present moment.

The second kind of delusion goes a little bit deeper, actually, because this delusion is based in views, agendas, and concepts. We may be completely aware of what's happening, we may actually be present for what's happening, but not aware that we are seeing experience through a view, through an agenda, through a belief.

The views I'd like to explore right now are our personal views—kinds of societal conditioning, views about who we are, what our roles are, what we're capable of, what our states of mind are. When we're immersed in views like this, we're relating to experience from a perspective. Again, very similar to what I talked about with respect to greed and aversion—there can be a filter over our minds. When we look out at the world, we're taking in information in a selective way. Other views function this way as well. We're immersed in a view or an agenda, something that we're pursuing, and we gravitate to experiences or evidence that confirms it, but don't see things to the contrary.

In psychology, this is called selective attention. And actually it's a very useful process in our minds—it helps us navigate the world. Yet it's fed by delusion. Where the delusion really slips in is that we believe our minds are accurately recording experience. We go through the world and assume that our eyes are like cameras and our ears are like microphones, just picking up everything. But they're not. We are picking things up selectively, often based on our opinions.

There's a study that really captures how delusion works with selective attention. People were asked to watch a video with people passing a basketball between players wearing white shirts. They were asked to count how many times the basketball passed between people wearing the white shirts. Most people could do that—they got the right answer. So they were pretty good at the task.

During that video, they had a gorilla walk through the basketball court. At the end they asked, "Did you see the gorilla?" What gorilla? They play the video back, and when you're looking with the idea there might be a gorilla there, there's no way you're going to miss it. This gorilla is as big as the basketball players. It's not on the corners or anything—it's walking right in the middle, stops dead center, stands there for a few moments, and then walks off.

Such is the power of delusion that a good number of people said, "That can't be the same video." That is delusion. Selective attention we can understand—oh yeah, my mind will focus, it's amazing it can focus so much that it's not going to see the gorilla. But to deny it—"that can't be the same video, my eyes would have seen that"—that's delusion.

This study really points to just how much we can miss, the big things we can miss. It's quite stunning what we can miss in our lives. To have the idea that we're walking through life with our eyes and ears and sense apparatus just being like recorders—it's not the way our minds work. This is really helpful to know about our minds.

At one point my friends teased me because I kept making assumptions about things. They called me "Andrea the Assumer" because I would see little bits of information and then put things together, and they'd say, "You need to look at all the information." We have this tendency to be selective about taking things in. When we can start to see this tendency, we can at least be open to the fact that if somebody says there was a gorilla there, we wouldn't say, "Oh, there wasn't a gorilla there."

We have views about ourselves—about who we are, what we do. And in a way, these views of ourselves, and we have views of others as well.

This is another big piece that we see—the judgments, the views, the opinions we have about people. And when somebody is putting a view onto us, we really feel that. "You're the one who is always X." It's like, well, wait a minute. No, I'm not that. I'm not always that.

But we do that to ourselves as well. "I'm the one who's always miserable. That's me." That was a view I had about myself. And the identification with that was so strong that even when I noticed evidence to the contrary—like some happiness—my mind would go something like, "Well, yeah, I'm happy now. But I know that what I really am is miserable." Just kind of almost dismissing that.

So this kind of view that we have about ourselves—again, that's delusion to take that as who we are. This is an interesting area to explore in our practice, the area of views and beliefs about ourselves. There can be habits of mind, like "miserable" was for me. That one actually disappeared fairly quickly after I started practicing. But there was another pattern for myself of self-hatred that was quite a bit stronger.

Observing that pattern of self-hatred a lot, and then at one point really seeing the belief in it as just a belief—"This is just a thought. This is just a thought"—that seeing through the believing aspect of self-hatred had a very potent effect on the whole pattern. The thoughts of self-hatred—"you're no good, you're a failure"—still arose. And yet the belief in those thoughts didn't arise.

So one way to explore these kinds of views is to, when you see an opinion about yourself arise, check in and see how much do you believe it. Not to try to tell yourself, "This isn't true." That's actually trying to overlay something that's not happening on the experience. Often when these strong views arise, telling yourself the opposite just doesn't work. If my mind were telling me "you're a failure, you're no good," to tell myself "well, that's not true, you're good"—it's like that energy of "you're a failure" is so strong. It's like trying to douse a fire with a few drops of water. It just doesn't meet that energy.

And yet, to acknowledge that what's happening is there's the thought "you're no good" arising along with believing—that is a pretty potent effect on the mind. "Thought: I'm no good. Believing I'm no good is what's happening right now." This opens the mind to recognizing that believing is also a process happening right now, in the moment.

With particularly strong patterns of views that we hold about ourselves, views that box ourselves in with this kind of delusion—"This is who I am. I'm a failure"—recognizing how strong the belief is begins to undermine the process of believing by simply recognizing, "Oh, this is a process. Believing is happening right now." Explore that, play with that. See what happens for you.

Another way views get formed that have delusion embedded in them and create struggle, difficulty, and challenge for us: views can be formed based on our direct experience. Some views are formed based on things we make up entirely—not really based on much reality at all. But some views are formed based on our experience. And yet that experience may be, again, selective. We have that selective nature to our minds. So we take in some information and form a view based on that limited information.

The classic teaching story from the Buddhist texts about this is the elephant and the blind people, where the blind people each touch a part of the elephant.

I'm sure many of you know this story. I was actually surprised to discover that it came from the Buddhist texts, this particular teaching story.

Some people touched the legs of the animal, some touched the side, some the tail, some the ears. And then when asked, "What's an elephant like?" some would say, "Well, it's like a post." Others would say it's like the wall of a storeroom. Others would say it's like a broom. Others would say it's like a hose—depending on which part of the elephant they had touched.

In describing it, the teaching story goes, they come to blows, disagreeing about what an elephant is like. And this again is delusion. We hold to our views, believe our views, rather than asking, "Oh, you think it's like a storeroom? Where do you get that idea?" Rather than having a conversation about it, we get entrenched in our opinions because we have some direct experience that we've created our view out of.

The Buddha actually cautioned in a very strong way about our creation of views out of our meditative experience in particular. He said these views that come out of meditative experience can be some of the most deeply entrenched.

The classic example is somebody who goes into a deep state of jhana and has an experience of the world being completely infinite. And somebody else going into a meditative experience has the deep experience of there being an edge to the world. In having a conversation back and forth, the one who believes the world is infinite says, "Well, you just haven't seen past the edges of your world." And the other who sees there are edges says, "Well, you just haven't seen far enough out to see the edge." So they get this entrenchment in their beliefs.

We can have views created based on incomplete information—not necessarily that we're misperceiving, but that we're forming views and then putting that interpretation back, seeing the world through that interpretation. "That is the way it is." That's delusion. Not the perception itself. Feeling the leg of the elephant and thinking, "That's like a post"—that's an accurate description of the leg of an elephant. I could agree with that. A correct perception, but not a correct extrapolation to the bigger picture.

Then there are views that get created just because we're told things repeatedly. Commercials and marketing do a good job of this for us. Society does this—the kind of cultural norm of the United States, something along the lines of "America is a land of opportunity. If you work hard enough, you'll achieve your dream." We believe that to the extent that if somebody isn't achieving their dream, if we're not achieving our dream, something's wrong, or we're bad, or we're wrong. This is actually the root of what we could call the delusion of white privilege—we look out there and say, "Opportunity is there," without recognizing the whole infrastructure in place supporting one race and class but not others.

Another way that delusion can manifest is more subtle than these other views I was talking about. It's where we relate to our experience through concept rather than direct experience. Our concepts are created based on the way our minds work. We perceive experience. I look out at this room and very naturally I see people. I see walls. I see candles. I see statues. I see zabutans. I see floors. I see wood. And yet that's all concept. Actually, what the eye is perceiving is form and color—straight, curved, brown, white, light, dark. The mind puts together the objects.

We begin to relate to our experience through our ideas because concept is so closely intertwined with our views and opinions. It's very hard for us not to relate to our friends just as they are—we relate to them through our concepts.

This can be quite subtle in ways. There was one time I was in Burma, and I had a dorm room that was pretty close to the edge of the monastery. There was a wall, and the village noises came over the wall into the monastery grounds. Most afternoons at a particular time—I was meditating primarily in my room—around four or five o'clock, mid to late afternoon, I would hear a squealing noise.

My mind recognized that sound as "pig." That was the concept the mind applied to that sound. Hearing this sound nightly, my mind also began to have the sense that this squealing had a very distraught quality to it. My mind created the idea that what I was hearing was the nightly slaughter of a pig for the village.

Now, I could see that this was an idea. I did not actually know that. I could see it was a concept. I could see that the idea of a butcher doing the nightly pig slaughter was just an idea. But at the same time, that squealing sound and the distraught quality of it—it's like, well, some being is distraught. There was this feeling of compassion that arose based on that perception, that concept. Night after night, the same experience.

And then one night, instead of being in my room at that time, I was walking up and down in the monastery and began noticing that there were bats flying really close to me. These bats were squealing. In that moment, the whole thing—all of this compassion—vanished. These bats clearly were not in distress. They were having a good time flying around.

This is again the way we meet our experience based on concept. Perception very easily makes mistakes. Our perceptual process is very prone to error. And one of the delusions is that we don't acknowledge or recognize that tendency of our perceptual process to be in error.

Concepts are really useful. We need concepts. But it's really helpful to know that they are concepts.

It can be very interesting to explore an experience, particularly around greed or aversion. What is it that you're actually averse to? A lot of the time—for instance, you might be sitting in the meditation hall and hearing a sound. Maybe the sound of somebody rustling or doing something. There's the sound, and we think perhaps that we're averse to the sound, that it's an unpleasant sound. But when we actually start to look at what's going on, what we see is that our mind has created an idea, often something along the lines of "that person shouldn't be doing that." We're relating to experience through the concept, not relating to the actual experience.

So this is a great question to ask yourself: when there is reactivity, what is it that is actually being reacted to? A lot of the time, it's a concept. A lot of the time. And the delusion is believing that we're reacting to something out there, when what we're actually reacting to is a creation of our minds.

This is really powerful to see. When we start to see that what we react to is largely a construct of the mind, there's not much place to hold that reaction anymore.

The third kind of delusion is the more human delusion, the most fundamental kind that we operate with. I think we go through and see delusion in a layered way, and this level of delusion is at the deepest level, the deepest structures of our mind.

There are some basic distortions to our experience that we all share, and you'll recognize these. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable as being a place where we could find reliable happiness.

And we tend to take what is not self to be self.

One of my teachers has a definition of delusion. Sayadaw U Tejaniya says that delusion doesn't mask the object or the experience—and "object" is kind of a funny word—but delusion doesn't mask the experience itself. It masks the true nature of the experience. So with delusion, we can be mindful of something but still seeing it through a deluded filter.

Here's another quote from Shakespeare. Two characters are talking about a third character, who is observing all of these details in the environment. They've landed on this island, and he's observing all these things about the surroundings. One character comments, "He misses not much." The other says, "No, he doth but mistake the truth totally." Again, this is a different form—this kind of delusion. We see things, but not in alignment with truth. Not as they actually are.

So, seeing what is impermanent to be permanent. The most obvious example of this is seeing ourselves, our lives, as permanent—just the difficulty we have believing that we will die. Things are changing actually pretty rapidly, and this rapidity of change masks impermanence. The rapidity of change masks the impermanent nature of experience.

Actually, if you read anything about particle physics and quantum mechanics, they talk about things being so rapidly changing that the very rapidity of motion is what makes things seem solid in our experience. Something like pain, for example—pain can have a very rapidly changing experience to it. When we get more mindful, we see how rapidly it's changing. But when we're not so mindful, it just feels like a block. It feels like a permanent, solid thing.

And so, exploring where we think things are solid—at one point, this was a big exploration for me. Anytime I felt like something was solid, I questioned it: Is it really solid? Concept also plays in here. Some of the solidity that we impute comes because we are seeing things through concept. Pain is an example of this as well. Check it out: if you are observing an experience like pain through the idea of pain, it has much more solidity than when you move into the actual experience and begin to see the dynamic, changing nature of that experience.

We see what's unreliable, unsatisfying, unsatisfactory as being reliable, being satisfactory. This is basically the belief that having pleasant experience is good—that this is where happiness will be found. The unreliability of sense pleasure doesn't really land on us. We may know that it's impermanent in a way, and yet as we're going for it, our mind is telling us, "Yes, this is what's going to make me happy."

I've seen this even with a piece of chocolate. I know how long chocolate lasts. Actually, on a recent retreat, I discovered the pleasure of chocolate lasted way longer than I thought it would. I put the piece of chocolate in my mouth and thought, "Let's see how long this lasts." And while it's there, it's like, "Wow, this is really good." It's really pleasant, feels really good. And even after the chocolate had fairly well vanished, there was a lingering pleasant feeling for like five minutes. I mean, it was amazing how long it lasted. And yet still—five minutes isn't very long. And yet while it's going on, the mind believes that yes, this is what's going to do it for me.

So that belief that this is where happiness can be found—in this world of sense pleasure—puts us on a never-ending cycle of having to get the next bit of happiness, the next bit of sense pleasure.

We end up trying to construct happiness by stringing together bits of sense pleasure like beads on a chain. And that's what we think of as happiness—that's as good as it gets. If we could endlessly get what we wanted and avoid what we didn't want, that's as good as it gets. And we believe that. At some level, we really believe that.

This is where the delusion lies. This is where delusion is enmeshed with greed and aversion. The delusion of greed is that having that thing will make me happy. The greed itself just wants that thing; the delusion is that it's going to make me happy. Greed is not going to tell you that if greed goes away, the release from that greed will be a deeper happiness. Likewise with aversion. The delusion embedded in aversion is that getting rid of this thing is what's going to make me happy. Aversion is not going to tell you that if the aversion goes away, happiness will follow. This is the delusion embedded in these states of mind.

So with this perception—seeing what is unreliable as reliable—we can begin to explore what we are relying on. What is it that we think is going to make us happy? Often this involves leaning into the future, even into just the next moment. "The thing that will make me happy is having an experience like I had in that last sitting." We're just leaning, leaning into the future like that.

The third misperception is seeing what is not self as self. We take so many aspects of our experience to be self. We take our bodies to be me. We take our moods and emotions—"I'm a miserable person" is an example of that. Yes, that was me. I am a miserable person. A little happiness comes along, but no, I am miserable. I am a miserable person. We identify with our emotions, with feelings, with our body. We can identify with knowing, with being the one who's choosing. This identification is like a creation of something solid within a flow of experience.

That example around being a miserable person—that was a creation of a solid idea that wouldn't admit the truth of impermanence or the flow of experience. Happiness arises? No, I am miserable.

With exploring our experience, we begin to really appreciate and see that there's nothing but a flow of conditions—causes and conditions, changing experience, one condition leading to a result. Cause and effect, cause and effect, cause and effect. It's a natural unfolding of process.

It's perhaps easier to relate to this in the natural world. We see trees grow based on natural law and conditions. There's an acorn that has the potential to become an oak tree given the right conditions. It's a natural law: if that acorn lands on ground where there's enough soil and moisture and proper sun, and there's not a deer coming along to eat the sprout, it will turn into an oak tree. It's a natural unfolding of cause and effect. There's not a being in there "treeing." It is simply a process.

Very similarly, the unfolding of our lives is a natural unfolding of cause and effect. Intention arises—something happens in the body, the bladder is full, there's pressure, unpleasant pressure. The recognition of what that is conditions the desire to relieve that pressure, which conditions the impulse to move. So one stands, finds one's way to the restroom. It's simply an unending flow of natural cause and effect. And after the fact, we impute, "Oh, that's me. I decided to get up and go to the bathroom." We impute the self to that process after the fact.

So exploring, investigating what feels like me, what feels like I. This kind of observation can be elusive. I think a good time to explore it is when the sense of self is strong. Self-righteousness is a good one to explore this with—a feeling of being right. "I'm right. I'm right."

This was an exploration for me at one point on retreat. It was a three-month course, and someone in the hall was asking questions. I had an aversive reaction to that person and argued in my mind endlessly with them about the questions and the answers. One day in particular, I was doing walking meditation, and I finally got to see: okay, this is a pattern. This is the analytical, argumentative, being-right Andrea. And okay, I'll watch this. I'll get to know this pattern.

So I watched this pattern, got to know it over many days. And one particular day, something interesting happened. I was observing it and thinking I was clearly recognizing this as a selfing pattern. And yet, as I was walking—I was doing walking meditation right in front of IMS where there's a driveway—a delivery truck drove up. Made a lot of noise, doors banged, brakes squealing. And the mind actually did something you wouldn't expect. I certainly didn't expect it. The mind went: "It's a truck! Wow!"

I flipped in a split second from being this argumentative forty-year-old, being right, to this awestruck two-year-old. "Oh, it's a truck! Wow, that's so amazing!" Just in this rapture, the sound reverberating through my body.

These two experiences had no relationship to each other whatsoever. There was no connection. And this is an interesting thing to see—seeing the discrete nature of these senses of self. We begin to see that they actually are constructions of mind, conditions coming together. It's pretty powerful to see that.

So the absence of delusion is wisdom. And yet we don't do wisdom, right? We've been talking about this. We can't just say, "Delusion, be gone." As that example of observing my argumentative, being-right self shows, I was doing the best I could with that. And yet the mind couldn't quite see the clinging involved there. So it stayed stuck until this other event happened, and then it was like it vanished.

Non-delusion isn't something we can do. It's not something we choose, saying "delusion be gone." But we can begin to explore how delusion operates in our minds. Seeing through delusion is an insight—recognizing the opening to the ephemeral nature of experience. Seeing the arising of a thought and recognizing "you're no good" is just a thought. The belief vanishing. Seeing through the delusive nature of our thoughts, the delusive nature of concepts. That happens as we begin to meet our experience, to touch into our experience with continuity of mindfulness. And it's an insight.

Insights, too, are impermanent. So that recognition—seeing that forty-year-old argumentative self vanish and realizing, "Wow, it was just an ephemeral construction of mind"—in the fact that it disappeared with that rapidity, didn't mean I never got caught in that pattern again. We can see through delusion at times. Sometimes we get that clear sense of seeing through and recognizing, "Oh yes, that's what it's like to not have that delusion operating." We see that clearly. And then the delusive pattern comes back because it's so conditioned.

And some of the deeper kinds of clinging—the clinging that there's got to be something out there that's going to make me happy—that one goes so deep.

The mind can see over and over and over again that there's nothing out there that's going to make it happy. But that's not going to stop it from trying. And we get to watch it try. We can try telling ourselves, "You're not going to find anything." And it just doesn't matter because the patterns are so deeply conditioned.

So over and over again, we see these patterns. And yet, having seen, having had those insights, having seen through the delusion at times, then we can really begin to recognize when delusion is operating.

That pattern of trying to find something that will make me happy—on this last retreat, that was something that happened over and over again. The mind would just search, search, search, search. And it's like I couldn't stop the mind. It's like, "Okay mind, if you want to search, if you want to find something, go at it. Have at it. See what you can find."

The mind was just so—I was watching at that deep, deep level, just the wish for something to be. "Oh, may there be something solid to hang on to, please." And the mind would create something that was better than the searching. It felt, "Oh, that's pretty peaceful." And then it would see the tension of that, and that would fall apart.

The ease and the peace of the falling apart was so peaceful, so easeful, that for like a few seconds the mind deeply understood: it's not about constructing anything. For like maybe a second the mind understood that—and then it was off again. "Oh, but there's got to be something."

Just watching that pattern over and over again. Seeing it, because the mind had seen the delusion of it, the mind could be there and just know: yes, this is a delusive pattern at work. And so the mind wasn't caught by that pattern. There was a way in which I didn't believe that I would find something. And yet it's like the mind just has to wear itself out trying to find something. It's got to figure it out for itself. I'm not going to be able to tell it that. I can know it up here, and the mind has got to see through that delusion itself. Over and over again.

So let's stop and sit for a moment. There's no need to remember anything that I've said. Just let it go. And meet your experience here and now.

CHAPTER 108

Factors that Hinder and Support Concentration

Andrea Fella · 57 min

> In this concentration retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers practical guidance on navigating the mental factors that both obstruct and support the development of samādhi. She begins by distinguishing how we work with hindrances in concentration practice versus vipassanā—rather than turning to investigate hindrances directly, the first approach is to gently set them aside with a quality of "not now," staying connected with the breath while allowing distractions to remain in the background.
>
> Fella then introduces the five jhānic factors (jhānaṅga): vitakka (directing attention), vicāra (sustaining attention), pīti (rapture), sukha (happiness), and ekaggatā (unification of mind). She explains how each factor directly counters a specific hindrance—vitakka opposes sloth and torpor, vicāra counters doubt, pīti dissolves ill will, sukha releases restlessness, and ekaggatā overcomes sense desire. The teaching emphasizes that while we can actively engage with vitakka and vicāra through gentle effort, the remaining three factors arise naturally as results of practice.
> The heart of the talk explores the art of skillful attention—using receptive rather than grasping effort, allowing the breath to come to awareness rather than hunting for it, and maintaining just enough energy to stay present with half a breath at a time. Through the metaphor of a kick scooter, Fella illustrates how gentle, repeated connection builds momentum that eventually carries the practice forward with less personal effort, leading toward the "bliss of seclusion" from hindrances.

I always like the second full day of retreat on the teaching side because I've had an opportunity to talk to you, to hear what's happening, and it really feels like the retreat begins to collect at this time. It was lovely hearing your experiences today and beginning to get a sense of what's happening. Sometimes as a teacher we're sitting up here speaking and not so sure what's actually going on. We can see you sitting out there and it can look so peaceful, but we know from the inside, from our own experience, it's not always that way on the inside. So it's really delightful to get to talk to you.

Tonight I'd like to talk about factors of mind that both get in the way of concentration and that support concentration. This is a lot of what people were talking about today, so it does feel like a fairly timely topic to be exploring with you tonight.

The practice of concentration is very much an expression of right effort—the classic understanding of right effort in the Eightfold Path, where we cultivate and maintain wholesome states of mind and we abandon and avoid unwholesome states of mind. This is what we're exploring as we sit down and explore being with the breath. We notice what gets in the way of that, what unwholesome qualities of the mind get in the way of that, and learn how to navigate that by cultivating and supporting the wholesome qualities. Exploring both sides of this supports our navigation of this terrain.

The Buddha was a great map maker, a list maker, and he did provide us with a list of things that tend to get in the way of concentration: the hindrances. I know you've all heard talks about the hindrances. Since we had attending Vipassana retreat as a prerequisite before this retreat, we partly wanted you to have some skill with working with the hindrances before coming here. So this is not going to be a standard hindrances talk—I'm not going to really touch on the specifics of hindrances. But they are understood by the Buddha as the five hindrances: sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness, and doubt. Classically, these are defined as the states of mind that hinder concentration. This is their function, in a way—to get in the way of concentration. They actively counter our ability to settle.

There's another list that is not so much defined as a list in the texts, at least in the suttas, but these qualities are mentioned: five factors that come together when concentration is present in the mind. These are called the jhānic factors, the factors of jhāna. These five factors of jhāna directly oppose and counter the hindrances. In the process of cultivating the collected mind, these factors of jhāna begin to grow in our minds, and they actively work to counter the hindrances. We'll explore both sides of the equation tonight.

In terms of exploring the hindrances, what I'd like to do first is highlight how when we work with hindrances in our Vipassana practice, it's a little bit different than our first line of approach with the hindrances in concentration practice. In Vipassana practice we often are instructed to turn directly and meet the hindrance. We explore the hindrance with mindfulness. Often we are taught in the mindfulness practice that any object can be used as a place to cultivate mindfulness—and it's definitely true, it's my experience. Any object can be used as a place to cultivate mindfulness, and we can cultivate mindfulness by meeting the hindrances. The hindrances are not our enemy in any way in the Vipassana practice.

In the concentration practice we have a little bit more of an agenda: to settle and stabilize the mind on the experience of the breath, in this case with our practice here. So while I wouldn't say the hindrances are the enemy, we have a slightly different relationship to the hindrances in concentration practice. I would say the first approach is to stay with the breath, if possible. If possible, set aside the hindrance and stay with the breath.

There are different levels of engagement with the hindrances depending on how strong the hindrance is and how strong our capacity for staying with the breath is. In talking to some of you today about the hindrances, sometimes it was pretty clear that you were able to just stay with the breath and let the hindrance stay in the background. This would be the level of meeting the hindrance that is the least engaged with the hindrance.

As hindrances arise, if it's possible—and we can just check this out—can sleepiness, for instance, just be in the background while you simply know the breath? There's the breath happening and just the sleepiness in the background, or thoughts, or maybe a little bit of aversion happening. It can be there, but you can stay with the breath. This can actually be pretty powerful to recognize this possibility.

On my first long metta retreat, I did a month of metta practice as a concentration practice, and got these instructions about how when aversion arises, you just stay with the metta. It was kind of a revelation, because in my Vipassana practice, it had been like, oh, there's aversion happening? Ooh, let's look at that. And it had been like zeroing in on the aversion. And while that was useful and I learned a lot, it was quite a revelation to recognize, oh, there's aversion happening? You mean I don't have to put it under a microscope? I can just set it aside and stay with the phrases? It was such a relief. Oh, wow, this is a completely different way to engage with the hindrances.

So this is a skill that we learn—essentially a skill of setting aside. Sometimes I call this the skill of "not now." We recognize and acknowledge that a hindrance is there. Sometimes I even bow to it and say, "Yes, thank you for showing up. And right now, you can stay in the room with me, but I'm going to pay attention to the breath." Or I'm going to pay attention to my metta, which is what I was doing in that case.

There's a skill to this. This setting aside cannot be done with aversion. It's not a pushing aside. It's not trying to get rid of or repress. It's more of just a gentle acknowledgment: "Yeah, I see you." It's kind of like how you might give a toddler a timeout. Let the aversion have a timeout. It can sit over there, but you're just doing your thing, paying attention to the breath.

How this works as a skillful means is that essentially the hindrances feed on unawareness, and they feed on a kind of spiral or cycle of reactivity. You're all familiar with this—with aversion arising, thoughts of anger arise, and it kind of fuels the cycle. This practice of setting aside and staying with the breath doesn't allow that cycle to continue because we're not engaged with the hindrance. But we are also actively engaged in cultivating mindfulness and concentration on the breath. And so the hindrance doesn't actually have much nourishment to feed it. Setting it aside is one way that the hindrance can begin to dissipate. This was quite a revelation for me to recognize: oh, you mean I don't have to actually zero into it and figure it out? Set it aside and let it dissipate as you stay connected with the breath.

This level of engagement—this "not now," setting aside, letting the hindrance be in the background—works either if the hindrance is not terribly strong or if your capacity to be with the breath is pretty strong. If the hindrance is a little stronger or your ability to be with the breath is a little weaker, there may need to be a little more engagement.

The next level of engagement is something along the lines of breathing with the hindrance. You know there's the hindrance arising and it's like, "Yes, I see you, anger, and we're going to breathe together here." Or "Restlessness, let's breathe together." The hindrance has come a little bit more to the foreground, but hopefully it can be at a place where there's a balance between being able to stay connected with the breath and just knowing that the hindrance is there. Allow the breath to include the hindrance. Envelop the hindrance with the breath.

This can also work with exploring pain. We talked a little bit about this this morning. If there's pain, often there is an aversive reaction to it. But we can also, if there's an unpleasant experience that's challenging, breathe with that unpleasant experience, breathe through it—even having the sense of allowing the breath to infuse that state of mind or the place in the body that's feeling pain.

Another tool that I use sometimes, one that's broadly useful in a lot of different ways but particularly helpful with the hindrances, is just to remind myself: "Okay, yep, there's that frustration—and the breath. There's confusion—and the breath." Just continually reminding myself: and the breath, and the breath. So that there's this touchstone, a way to stay with the experience of breathing even as we know other experience.

Something you might also explore—and I say this with a little more caution, as this needs a little more exploration or context setting—is to use a kind of inquiry. Perhaps you're finding it's hard, you know the hindrance, but it's hard to find a way to be with the breath skillfully while that hindrance is there. You're trying. You see the hindrance and you know the breath, but it just doesn't quite feel like it's settled in together.

Sometimes you can explore just asking for wisdom—essentially asking for the body and mind to support you in this exploration. This is something that comes from my teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, this kind of inquiry that I have found incredibly useful. You just drop a question in: "What might it mean to attend skillfully to the breath with this mind state?" Not trying to figure it out, but just putting that question into the whole mix and then continuing to be present with the breath.

I tried this just the other day. There was some mind state and I was struggling to find a way to be with the breath with that mind state. And this question arose spontaneously.

And as I just continued to be with the breath, it was like I watched the mind and the breath adjust themselves to have a more relaxed, receptive relationship with that mind state present.

So this use of inquiry or this use of questions—if you find it sends you into thinking or trying to figure out or searching for an answer, just forget about it. Don't even go there. But sometimes we can drop a question into a meditation and a kind of wisdom begins to show up. Because the more we actually settle into concentration, the more wisdom is actually available for us. Sometimes we can use this kind of question or inquiry to encourage that wisdom to arise.

If the hindrances are even stronger, then we might need to actually let go of the breath and work more directly with the hindrances using our familiar tools. For instance, when the mind is sleepy, opening the eyes or standing up. Or perhaps with the hindrances of sense desire or ill will, turning directly to meet the hindrance with mindfulness. But this is kind of our last line of approach with the concentration practice. Our approach first is to try to stay with the breath, to try to meet the hindrance with the breath, to breathe with the hindrance. And then if it's not possible, or it feels like the hindrance is growing and getting stronger, then it might be time to begin to use our familiar tools, a familiar approach.

This is not a failure, by the way. This doesn't mean that you failed. It's just that these are the conditions right now. Conditions change. Sometimes it's easier to be with the breath. Maybe you've had a good night of sleep. Maybe sometimes the morning is your easy time, and then the day goes on and the mind gets a little more tired. So conditions change, and our responses to the hindrances need to be flexible.

As we cultivate the practice of concentration—staying with the breath, connecting in this relaxed way with receptive attention—the factors of jhana, these five factors, begin to grow and begin to counter the hindrances directly, encountering those forces that keep us from being present with the breath.

The five jhanic factors are—I'm going to use the Pali here, and I will translate this for you, but we tend to use the Pali for these terms for some reason. So I want you to start to get familiar with the Pali terms for these jhanic factors.

They are: vitakka, vicāra, pīti, sukha, and ekaggatā. Vitakka is directing the attention, aiming the attention, connecting to experience. Vicāra is a sustaining of the attention. Then there's pīti, which is rapture—interest, delight, delighted interest, rapt interest, that kind of quality of mind. Sukha is the Pali for happiness, a kind of contented, sweet flavor to experience. And ekaggatā: unification of mind, balance of mind, collectedness of mind.

Each of these five factors directly counters specifically one of the hindrances. And so as we cultivate the concentration, very naturally the hindrances start to reduce. They're actually suppressed in a way. These jhanic factors counter the hindrances but don't uproot them. It's not the kind of uprooting that happens, not the kind of elimination of hindrances that occurs when something is seen very clearly and released through wisdom. So it's a form of suppression—a skillful suppression of the hindrances.

As these hindrances are released through the cultivation of these factors, the mind moves into that access concentration where the hindrances are fully at bay. As the concentration develops, these five factors grow strong and the hindrances grow weak. And this, as Philip said last night, feels really good. The term for this is the bliss of seclusion. We are secluded from the hindrances for a time. It's a really powerful learning to begin to recognize what it is for the mind to not have these hindrances at work. When we get a taste of this, it begins to encourage us to keep going.

So I want to talk a bit about each of these factors, primarily about the first two: vitakka and vicāra, the connecting or aiming of the attention and the sustaining of the attention. Because of these five jhanic factors, these first two are the only ones that we have any possibility of engaging in personal effort with. The other three—pīti, rapture;

sukha, happiness; and ekaggatā, unification of mind—are a result of the practice. Essentially, the last three jhanic factors are a result of how we apply vitakka and vicāra. And so it's useful to take some time to explore: How do those two factors work? What is a skillful way to engage with those two factors of jhana.

Essentially, this to me is the art of concentration practice—the art of any meditation practice, actually—how we engage with aiming and sustaining the attention. Can we cultivate a receptive, relaxed attention through the use of these two factors?

As a pair, these two work together. Sometimes they're described this way: the vittaka is like the hitting of the bell, and the vichara is the sustaining sound. As we connect with the attention, there's a kind of natural resonance or sustaining that happens as we aim and connect to experience. It depends on how we do it. If the connecting isn't done well, the resonance isn't quite as full.

And so that connecting—the way we connect—is actually one of the biggest areas of our exploration of effort. How do we connect? How do we aim the attention? The word "aiming" itself, the vittaka, the connecting to the object... often, at least when I first heard about this, I thought, "Oh, this means I go out to find the object. I grab onto it. I narrow my focus." That's the kind of idea I had in my mind about this factor, vittaka.

But there's a whole different way to aim. I've found through my own practice some perhaps gentler ways to aim the attention. So I'll share some of those with you, and some have already been mentioned. Sally mentioned the very first evening the notion of allowing the breath to come to you—settling back and receiving the breath. This is a form of aiming, but you're not going out to look for it. It's more a settling back, an intention: "I'd like to connect with the breath. May the breath come into the awareness."

Try that right now. Can you settle back? You can even use it as a request: "May the attention rest with the breathing." And then not so much try to do it. "May the attention rest with the breathing." Allowing the breath to come to you.

Sometimes when I'm exploring this receptive attention, I have a sense of wanting to counter that notion of narrowing. If I'm paying attention to something small—like the tip of the nostrils or in the abdomen—and we have this idea of the object being maybe the size of a quarter, then it's like we think we have to squish all of our awareness down into that little quarter-sized thing.

But a different approach might be: can you let that experience of the breath get as big as the awareness? Again, it's letting the breath come to you, but the awareness doesn't have a size or shape, really. Sometimes we can play with a sense of big awareness. Let the object get big. Let the breath get big to fill the awareness. This usually requires relaxation—relaxing the body, relaxing the mind—and then exploring this possibility: can the breath fill the awareness? Can I have the sense of the breath getting big in the awareness?

The breath can sometimes also be a delicate creature, kind of a shy thing. I've found sometimes that if I tried to turn and look right at it, I could hardly find it. But if I kind of snuck up on it from the side, then I could connect with it. It's almost like... I don't know if any of you have noticed with stars—I don't know what the stars are going to be like tonight—but if there are stars, you can check this out. If you look up at the stars, sometimes if there's a dim star, and you're looking right at it, it's hard to see. But if you look just off to the side, then you can see it.

Sometimes the breath is like that. If we're trying to zero in right on it, sometimes it's too much energy, and it just obscures the experience of the breath. If you just almost think of it as looking in the periphery of your attention for the breath—one way you might explore this right now: you're paying attention to what I'm saying. Notice you're hearing, but while you're hearing, let there be a little bit of a split attention. Be with the breath at the same time, but keep your attention on the hearing, and just notice—like from the side—you might be able to just kind of know the breath simultaneously.

Sometimes, and some of you actually reported this today, it's actually easier to connect with the breath when the mind also has another object in mind. If you find that, you can use it. You can connect to the experience of hearing, for example.

And then allow the attention to know that the breath is there. Again, a very gentle way of aiming—not this zeroing in kind of approach.

With vicāra, the sustaining of attention, I think with both vitakka and vicāra, we often have habitual relationships with those factors of mind that are bound up with our doing. "I'm going to get this done. I'm going to figure this out. I'm going to accomplish this." We have habitual relationships to these two qualities that often tend to be a little less effective in meditation than they are if we're doing something in our work, for instance.

Philip was talking about ordinary kinds of concentration, like holding a bottle under a tap. There we can focus in. But that kind of focus may not be the most skillful approach for concentration practice. It's possible—I certainly have gotten concentrated by grabbing on and holding on to the breath. But then I found that a kind of container was created that was tight and not so flexible.

So it's really well worth the time to be a little more patient with the vitakka and vicāra. Be a little more patient with this receiving of the breath and a gentle sustaining of attention. Let the way into the concentration be the kind of container in which concentration can naturally grow and deepen, as opposed to trying to hold on.

With sustaining also, we often have the idea of using force to sustain. We might sit down at the beginning of a sitting and think, "Okay, forty-five minutes, breath—let me be here for forty-five minutes." It's almost like we pick up the entire forty-five-minute sitting in that first second, trying to create and muster the energy to be present for that whole time right in the first moment.

Instead, a more helpful way to sustain the attention is just a very light touch. It's almost like noticing how that connecting or aiming of the attention—the way Philip was talking about connecting with the hand—we connect like this, and that connecting will have some lingering resonance, like hitting a bell. There will be some lingering sustaining of attention. We need to begin to get familiar with these two qualities together.

With just that gentle connecting, sometimes we need to simply connect, and there's a little sustaining, and then it's not that we're going someplace else, but the attention kind of floats a little bit, and you can just gently connect again. It sustains, then it floats, then you gently connect again. We use that gentle connection to create the sustaining.

It's just enough—just enough effort to stay with half a breath. When you sit down for that forty-five-minute sitting, that's all the effort you need to make in the first moment. Right now, half a breath. How much energy does it take to be with half a breath, an in-breath? And then do it again, an out-breath. And then enough energy for an in-breath. That's it. That level of energy is what constitutes a skillful sustaining of attention.

As we explore in that way, a momentum begins to build. We get familiar. We connect and we see, oh, there's a natural sustaining. We learn how to connect and have that sustaining naturally flow for a while. Then we don't have to keep connecting—we stay with the sustaining. We learn that sense of what sustaining is. And when it starts to weaken, we gently connect again.

I sometimes use an analogy for this pair, vitakka and vicāra. Kids sometimes ride these scooters, these Razor scooters—not motor scooters but kick scooters. You're standing on the bed of the scooter, holding on to the bar, and you have to put your foot down and tap the ground to get going. That tap is like vitakka. You're tapping, tapping, tapping. A gentle tap is very effective. You could put your foot down and push really hard, but mostly just a gentle tap, tap, tap.

And with that gentle tap, tap, tap, momentum builds. You can ride for a while. You get the feeling of what it's like to just ride—you simply hang out there and ride. And you become familiar with what it's like for that scooter to start feeling wobbly, sensing when you need to put the foot down again and tap.

It's a very similar experience with vitaka and vichara. We get familiar with that gentle connecting, receiving, that receptive, gentle connecting to the breath. We notice how long the vichara sustains, and then we learn essentially how frequently to keep that vitaka going. The more we practice, the more the sustaining begins to carry us. We don't need to put in so much personal effort. We don't need to aim so much.

Getting familiar with both of these qualities will support you in understanding the feeling of concentration as it begins to collect and gather.

The factor of vitaka, the aiming, counters the hindrance of sloth and torpor. If the mind is dull or sleepy, this is the factor that helps wake up the mind. You can actively use vitaka if you are sleepy. You can consciously use vitaka—consciously remembering. Connect. Connect. Maybe a little more frequently. Connect. Gentle connect. Maybe even a little more active. Sometimes it's helpful to use a little more precision to just track the breath. Just like, "Yep, there's the breath. Beginning, middle, end of the breath." Vitaka, vitaka, vitaka through the breath.

Vichara, the sustaining of attention, is the antidote to doubt. It counters the hindrance of doubt. Vichara is what connects us to the experience. We sustain the experience with the breath. Doubt feeds on being disconnected from experience, so as we sustain attention, there's no nourishment for doubt. The sustaining of attention supports the falling away of doubt.

With doubt, it's often helpful to just be willing to engage. Noticing, "Okay, yes, there's doubt here." If we're engaged with the questions of doubt—doubts in the teachings, doubts in the teachers, doubts in ourselves—then the mind is not connecting to experience. If we can simply say, "Yes, I see there's doubt, but I'm just going to see. I'm willing to run the experiment and see. How about if I just try staying connected with anything? Let me just stay connected with a foot on the ground or my butt on the chair. Let's just see what happens."

Being willing to see, willing to run the experiment—this willingness is a form of confidence, a form of trust, a form of faith. And that also is a counter to doubt.

So that's vitaka and vichara, the first two factors of jhana. I'll speak much more briefly about the last three.

Rapture, or piti, is a delight, a joy accompanied by interest in the experience. It's often felt as physical, pleasant bodily experience. It might be felt as tingling or goosebumps or waves—pleasant wave-like sensations crashing through the body, almost orgasmic. There could be flashes of energy, flashes of light. You might feel like you're filled with water, saturated, or very heavy. Lots of different experiences arise.

The physical experiences are often one of the signs of rapture, but rapture is a mind state. It's the mind of delight and interest in the experience. It comes about as vitaka and vichara keep us connected with experience. As the momentum of vichara begins to sustain, the mind becomes much more interested in the breath. It actually starts to feel good.

The mind wants to stay with the breath, interested and happy to be there. As the rapture starts to grow, the practice begins to feel less effortful. Less personal effort is needed to keep it going, as the vichara is sustaining the practice on its own.

Sometimes the feeling of rapture has a quality of nourishment through the body, a mental refreshment as well. It's a very delightful state. And yet sometimes it can also get quite intense—the physical sensations can become rather strong at times. I'll speak about that in just a moment.

We have a tendency, because the sensations of rapture are often so pleasant—the physical experiences being essentially a side effect of the mental state—to get pulled into them, or into some idea of "Wow, this is so great." We tend to get pulled toward the rapture itself. See if you can stay with the breath. Let the rapture, let the physical sensations, be in the background if possible. It's almost like working with the hindrances—let the rapture recede. You're not trying to push it away, but neither are you directing attention toward it.

The rapture has come about as a consequence of staying with the breath. The conditions for rapture arising are staying with the breath. If you take your attention out of the breath and start paying attention to the rapture, wonky things can happen, and you've removed the very conditions that were nourishing it. So it may just disappear entirely, or it can become unstable. See if you can let the rapture be in the background and stay with the breath.

The presence of rapture counters the hindrance of ill will. As the mind is contented, interested, happy to be with experience, ill will simply isn't in the picture. You can't even muster it up. Ill will? What's that? It's a very powerful counter. The mind just does not go there.

If the rapture becomes quite strong, the physical sensations can sometimes get intense. At one point, on a long concentration retreat, the rapture for me felt like being immersed in a bath of electrocution. That intense. Every single cell felt like it was vibrating.

Some ways to work with this: First, I reminded myself that this is a mind state, it's impermanent, it will pass. Then my teacher recommended allowing the energy of the rapture to flow down, putting attention in the hands and feet and letting the energy flow out through them. This was very helpful. I really suggest this practice. You might also use a request or exploration, as I mentioned before: What kind of breath would support calming this energy? What kind of breath would support tranquility? What would tranquilize the breath?

Sukha, happiness, the next factor, is a more purely mental pleasure. It does come with some bodily experience as well, but it's not so energetic. Sukha is very naturally a tranquilizing quality of mind. We really touch into the tranquility aspect of concentration through sukha. But it's also very, very sweet. I call it the "oh yes" state. It's like—why would the mind not want to be here? It feels like all my cells are aligned and pointed in the same direction. Just very sweet.

Again, both rapture and sukha, both piti and sukha, are not something we do.

We can support their arising through the aiming and sustaining of attention—these create the conditions for rapture and happiness to emerge. We can also incline in their direction by cultivating interest in the breath. Since interest is a component of rapture, we can simply incline toward being interested in the breath. If it's not possible, let it go. You don't want to be doing too much there. But sometimes we might ask ourselves: Is there a way to be interested in the breath? Then just let go of the question and see what happens.

We can also incline toward these qualities or create supportive conditions by encouraging a pleasure in the breath—breathing in a way that feels comfortable. This was one of the instructions my teacher gave me. Thanissaro Bhikkhu was my main jhana teacher, and he said, "Breathe in a way that feels comfortable. You're welcome to adjust the breath so that it feels comfortable." Sometimes I would ask myself, "What kind of breath would be most comfortable right now?" And then just let the breath breathe at that point. Can there be some comfort in the breath?

As the breath becomes comfortable, the mind naturally begins to want to stay with it. That's really what supports the rapture and happiness arising—the sustaining of attention. But encouraging a comfortable breath supports the resting with the breath, and the pleasure of that also becomes a support for the arising of rapture and sukha.

Sukha counters restlessness. The mind is just really contented in that state. It is not interested in searching around for other things. So the hindrance of restlessness falls away as sukha gets strong.

We do have a tendency to cling to sukha—it is so pleasant. This is an area where we have to recognize that hindrances can come in; desire can arise around sukha. Fortunately, the next factor is the one that counters desire: unification of mind, balance of mind, ekagata.

It's in the vicinity of equanimity, but the mind also feels contented, balanced. There's a stillness. This is where the stillness of the practice really becomes strong, as ekagata becomes strong. The mind feels like there is no problem. Nothing it wants to change, just very balanced.

This counters sense desire because there's nothing the mind wants in that place of ekagata. No problem. The mind understands there's nothing that would make this experience better—which is exactly what sense desire is trying to do, to go out and get something to make something better.

The experience of unification of mind, all five of these factors working together, creates the state of access concentration. It shows us a happiness, a contentedness, a pleasure that is far beyond any pleasure that sense desire has to offer. As we touch into this possibility, it becomes much easier to let go of sense desire.

From the Dhammapada: "If by renouncing a lesser happiness one may realize a greater happiness, the wise one renounces the lesser, having regard for the greater."

We basically see that the pleasure related to sense desire is an inferior kind of pleasure. And the mind naturally begins to let it go.

So the hindrances start to fall away with concentration. Again, they're not uprooted with concentration—as the concentration state falls away, they can return. You may notice this sometimes as we go through cycles of concentration. Sometimes we find that as a concentration state falls apart, we are just overwhelmed with hindrances.

I remember on a metta retreat doing dishes one evening when the metta was a little bit weaker. I was doing the dishwashing and I was railing at the machine: "Who designed this stupid machine?" It's like, wow, look at this. Sometimes the hindrances can come back with a vengeance after a period of being concentrated.

So it's not like you've done something wrong. It's just part of this process. But we learn so much as the mind goes into these states, as we learn the conditions for the cultivation of concentration. We learn about our minds. We learn how our minds tend to want to gravitate towards the hindrances. We learn how to release them, how to set them aside, how to keep our attention in a place that leads to a greater form of happiness, in the service of liberation.

We really begin to appreciate a mind that is free from hindrances. And we have this wisdom—the mind wants to head in that direction. And so it starts to do that, and we start to want to cultivate the conditions that support concentration.

Again, we can't create the concentration. We can engage with our effort, our light touch, our gentle, receptive effort that creates a container for concentration to arise. We cannot create concentration, but we can nourish the conditions that support it. And those main conditions are relaxed, receptive attention and gentle connection.

CHAPTER 109

Concentration in the Service of Liberation

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella traces the Buddha's spiritual journey from his training with concentration masters through his ascetic practices to his ultimate realization that concentration serves liberation rather than being liberation itself. She illuminates the Buddha's pivotal insight: "Cultivate concentration. One who cultivates concentration sees things as they actually are."
>
> Fella distinguishes between two forms of concentration—one-pointed absorption (jhāna) and moment-to-moment concentration where awareness remains stable while knowing changing experience. She explains how the jhāna factors of vitakka, vicāra, pīti, sukha, and ekaggatā manifest differently in each approach, and how insight requires attunement to change rather than the stilling emphasized in deep absorption.
> The talk explores the three characteristic marks that concentrated attention reveals: impermanence (anicca), unsatisfactoriness (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). Fella offers practical guidance on how to shift from stabilizing concentration toward insight practice—investigating the changing nature of the breath, opening to the flow of experience, and examining where we mistakenly seek lasting satisfaction. She emphasizes that this is a gradual path, comparing spiritual development to a rope slowly weathering on a beach, encouraging trust in small recognitions and the unfolding process of awakening.

When the Buddha left home to search for the answer to his question—why do we suffer?—he sought out the main teachers of his day to help him find an answer. He sought out the teachers who had the most skill and studied with them. The teachers who had the most renown at that time were masters of concentration. They taught the very deep states of absorption.

As he studied with them and mastered their teachings—actually two successive teachers—he realized, "This doesn't answer my question. Their teaching doesn't answer my question." He reflected, "This dharma, this teaching, does not lead to disenchantment, to dispassion, to cessation, to peace, to direct knowledge, to nibbana, but only to the reappearance in the base of nothingness"—which is essentially the kind of concentration he was practicing with this teacher.

And so he understood that his question was different than what was currently being sought after. Somehow his question was a little different, and so he began to explore other possibilities, other paths. As Eugene mentioned the other night, he explored the extreme ascetic practices—kind of almost as a counterpoint to the blissful states of concentration. He went the other direction and really mortified the body. And he is said to have discovered, "This isn't the way either." That beautiful quote Eugene read: "Might there be some other way to enlightenment?"

On reflection, as Eugene mentioned, he recalled sitting under the rose apple tree, watching his father perform a spring ritual in the fields. He spontaneously entered into the first jhana, a state of concentration. It is said that he reflected at that point, "Might this be the way?" And then he got the response, "Yes, this is the way."

That has always been a curiosity to me, because he had explored concentration so deeply in his early exploration with his first teachers. He had explored concentration so deeply and determined that wasn't the way. And yet after all of his ascetic practices, he came back and touched into this recollection of entering into the first jhana and thought, "This is the way."

What I've been curious about—and there's not a particular answer that I can see in the texts about this question—but my sense is that he understood concentration can be used in the service of freedom. Concentration is on the path to freedom, but is not itself freedom. The times he talked to his other teachers, he said, "Is this all you teach? Is this the height of your dharma, these absorption states?" And they said, "Yes, this is it. Come and teach with me. You've mastered it as well as I have." But for him, that wasn't the answer.

My understanding is that he really began to see there is a place for concentration, but that it's on the path—it's not the goal. He said to his monks, to his monks and nuns, to his disciples, "Cultivate concentration. One who cultivates concentration sees things as they actually are." This points to the purpose for concentration. He didn't say, "Cultivate concentration—it feels really good." He said, "Cultivate concentration. One who cultivates concentration sees things as they actually are."

I'd like to talk about this tonight: What does it mean to use concentration in the service of liberation?

To explore this, I'd like to start by reviewing these two forms of concentration. Sally introduced them in the talk on the seven factors when she talked about the concentration enlightenment factor. She talked about these like two ends of the spectrum on concentration.

One-pointed concentration is cultivated using a single point of focus, the body and mind becoming very peaceful, quiet—essentially cultivating a stillness both of mind and of object. This is what we've been doing. This is the orientation of the practice we've been exploring for these six or seven days.

The other kind of concentration is what is called moment-to-moment concentration. This is a concentration cultivated with a stability of awareness even as that awareness knows changing experience. There's not necessarily a stilling of experience, but there is a stilling of awareness. The stilling of awareness means that whatever it meets, it knows fully and is non-reactive. It meets it, knows it, and then knows the next thing, and the next thing, and the next thing. It might be a sight, a sound, a body sensation, a mood, an emotion, a feeling, a perception—just moment after moment, rapidly changing experience.

And typically with rapidly changing experience, we get hooked by some piece or other of that rapid flow. Some sight we see—"Oh, that's interesting, what about that?"—and we start thinking about it. Or we notice something we don't like: "How can I get rid of that?" And we start trying to control or fix or change. Our usual mind meeting changing experience is not terribly balanced. It's not very still. It meets something and shoots off. Philip talked about papañca the other day, this mind that is just proliferating around what we experience.

Moment-to-moment concentration is a kind of concentration where awareness meets what's happening and doesn't react to it, doesn't chase it, doesn't try to get rid of it. It knows it fully, meets it, understands it fully, and the next moment it's understanding the next thing, and the next thing, and the next thing. Stability of mind, able to stay present for this river of what it is to be a human being.

The factors of concentration that we've talked about—vitaka, vicāra, pīti, sukha, ekaggatā: aiming, sustaining, rapture, happiness, and one-pointedness—are all present. As the mind collects, as awareness gets stable in this moment-to-moment concentration, perhaps we can understand vitaka and vicāra, aiming and sustaining, not as aiming and sustaining at one thing, but as meeting experience, meeting changing experience. Moment after moment, the aiming and sustaining becomes more about cultivating the continuity of awareness itself, of mindfulness itself. We keep checking in: Am I aware? What am I aware of?

With this gentle momentum of vitaka and vicāra in moment-to-moment concentration, the stability of mindfulness arises because of its continuity. As the mind settles and is able to be present, the hindrances fall away, just as in access concentration. There's a form of access concentration in moment-to-moment concentration where the hindrances are at bay. Rapture arises, interest arises, happiness arises. And one-pointedness is understood as the mind fully meeting each new experience in a non-reactive way. Ekaggatā—what we translate as one-pointedness—is not a one-pointedness that meets the same object over and over again. It's a one-pointedness that fully meets whatever experience arises in this moment, and fully meets the next moment of experience. All of the factors of jhāna are present as the moment-to-moment mindfulness gets strong.

As Sally mentioned, all forms of meditation use both mindfulness and concentration. It's really a matter of where we are on a spectrum. Absorption practice, steady concentration practice, lies at one end, and open awareness lies at the other end of the practice spectrum. There are practices all through the range. So this is really just highlighting the two ends, but practices fall all over the place.

One of the most familiar practices that we have taught here at Spirit Rock and in this lineage is from Mahasi Sayadaw, where we direct attention to, for instance, the breath. When I practiced with Sayadaw U Pandita, I was taught to stay with the breath until I could remain with it for a full hour. Then I could open to all experience. But I was staying with the breath not in the way of stilling it—I was paying attention to all the little details, seeing the changing nature of that one object. To me, this kind of practice lies in the middle of the spectrum. It really cultivates concentration through focusing the mind on one object while getting genuinely interested in its changing nature.

This moment-to-moment concentration is extremely valuable, as you have all seen. I don't think I've talked to anyone who has said, "This is useless." Pretty much everybody sees just how useful it is.

The far end of the spectrum of one-pointed concentration—the absorption end, where we really enter into a stilled object and absorb into it—the understanding with that deep absorption is that while you're absorbed, there's not much room for insight to arise. There's room for insight as you go into that state and as you come out of it. But in the state itself, you're just absorbed. It's a steady state, no change. For insight to be possible, concentration needs to be attuning to change.

This is one of the key differences between concentration practices and mindfulness practices—whether the emphasis is on stilling or on noticing change. With the kind of concentration we've been practicing, to turn it toward being in the service of liberation, we need to begin turning toward changing experience. We allow the attention to begin picking up on change, as opposed to settling on the more stilling side. We've been emphasizing not looking at the detail of the breath, but more the rhythm or just a kind of flow, without a lot of detail.

So I'll talk in a little while about how to turn towards change, how we can take this practice and slightly shift direction. But first I'd like to explore what it is that we're opening to as we turn towards change. What is insight anyway? Insight into what?

The insight that is of interest here, in what the Buddha taught, comes back to the question he asked at the very beginning of his search: Why do we suffer? The insight the Buddha oriented towards, the exploration he undertook, was: How can I understand suffering? Is it possible to be free from suffering?

His exploration looked at that. And what he discovered—one way to frame what he said—was that one of the core reasons we suffer is basically because we want things to be different than they are. And we want things to be different than they are because we're not seeing things as they actually are. Remember, the Buddha said, cultivate concentration. One who cultivates concentration sees things as they actually are.

We want things to be different than they are. We don't like unpleasant experience. We want to get rid of it. We want pleasant experience to stay. We don't like it that pleasant experience changes.

The freedom that the Buddha found is most clearly described when he said: The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this is Nibbāna.

I like this definition. It's really simple. It's not describing some mind-blowing altered state. It's something I can envision living with in life. I can maybe have a kind of idea of what it might be like to live in this world without greed, without aversion, without delusion.

He goes on: Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims at neither one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and one experiences no mental pain and grief. This is Nibbāna. Freedom. Immediate. Visible in this life. Inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise.

Again, an emphasis on visible in this life. The possibility of waking up, of freedom here and now. Here, now—this possibility, here, now. Not some afterlife of freedom. Not some transcendent possibility, but it almost feels like a sense of transcending through or with, rather than above.

Freedom is the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion. The understanding is that what causes suffering is greed, aversion, and delusion. So the absence of those is what freedom is. Our exploration is looking into what creates, what holds the patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion in place.

Fortunately, we have some teachings of the Buddha to help us understand this. He pointed to a quality of ignorance, of not understanding, that is the root. I said a moment ago that we want things to be different than they are because we are not seeing things the way they are. This is ignorance—not seeing things the way they are.

Our usual definition of ignorance is something along the lines of not knowing something, a lack of knowledge. But the ignorance that underlies greed, aversion, and delusion is much more insidious than simply not knowing something. It's actually an active misperception.

The Buddha pointed to three primary misperceptions of reality that we could call human ignorance. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable to be a place where we might find reliable happiness. And we tend to take what is not self to be self.

These misunderstandings infuse the way we meet the world, inclining us—through the misperception of permanence—to think, "Oh, there's something that will make me happy. There's something out there I can hold on to that will make me happy." Really, the unsatisfactoriness of experience is a direct result of the fact that everything, everything, everything that we experience without exception is impermanent.

There is nothing in our experience that is stable even for a split second. And yet we misperceive this over and over again. We think we're finding something stable. We hang our hats on things. This misperception of permanence.

There are a couple of things that incline us as human beings to make this mistake. You're not alone in making it. One of the things that inclines us toward this error is that the change happening is occurring so rapidly. Our perceptual system is actually designed to piece things together so that there seems to be a coherence to what's happening.

We can perhaps do a thought experiment. Many of you may have seen, when you were younger, those Fourth of July sparklers. When I was a kid, we used to spin around in a circle with that sparkler and enjoy seeing the circle that appeared. We could create the illusion of a circle by waving the fire stick really quickly. This is the way our perception works—when something is moving and changing quickly, our perceptual system will tend to create something as if it's there. Now, with the fire stick we know there's not really a circle in the air, but our perceptual system is fooling us into thinking it might be there.

This kind of thing happens in so many ways. We don't generally touch into the rapidly changing nature of experience. But through meditation, through concentration, the concentrated mind has the kind of precision to start seeing the rapidly changing nature of experience. This is one of the ways that concentration serves us—to help us see this rapidly changing nature. And why is that useful? Because without that understanding that things are actually changing, we are inclined to want to cling to them. As soon as we deeply understand that whatever is happening is impermanent—deeply understand that—the mind is not inclined to pick it up and say, "Oh yes, that's going to do it for me." Because it understands at a very deep level that it's impermanent. It's changing even as we think we want to pick it up. And so concentration can begin to reveal just how rapidly things are changing.

It also begins to reveal another familiar, human way that change tends to be masked: we tend to relate to experience through ideas rather than through direct experience. When we look at our body or explore our body, think about our body—and you may have noticed this some in the settling into concentration, feeling your body in a different way, feeling the vibratory nature of the body, the earth element, the fire element, the wind element. The wind and fire elements in particular are very dynamic. And yet as we think about our body, we think about it in terms of hand or foot or knee. We think about pain in the knee. It becomes a block of solidity. When we relate to our experience through concept, it tends to create something more solid. Those concepts, when we for instance think about a pain in the knee—if we just think about it as, "Boy, my knee really hurts"—it can feel like this solid mass. And yet when we actually start with concentration to explore the actual experience of the body underneath both the idea of knee and pain, we see a very dynamic experience that is not at all solid.

This was one of my early real understandings of just how helpful it was to see change—that as I saw the dynamic, changing nature of uncomfortable experience, the mind stopped relating to it as a thing and began just understanding it as something changing. I could see that as soon as the mind congealed around it as a thing, the pain shot up through the roof. But when the mind was just noticing the rapidly changing nature of it, there was nothing for the mind to react to, because as soon as the mind felt one sensation, it was gone. And then another one appeared and it was gone, and another one and it was gone. So there wasn't anything to be averse to. It was changing so quickly.

The concentrated mind begins to see this rapidity of change. Because things are changing so quickly, the mind also begins to understand that there's nothing that can possibly be a lasting source of happiness. This sense of taking something as satisfactory, this "this will do it for me, this is what's going to make me happy"—it's completely undermined. Through looking at our experience, looking at what we're holding on to, asking where we think we're going to find happiness—it comes in small ways, and it's kind of amazing just how powerful that delusion of greed is. Greed saying, "Yeah, if you get that thing, you're going to be happy." We know that a piece of chocolate is not going to do it for us forever. But that's not the way our mind works in that moment. It has jumped on that greed bandwagon and says, "Yes, I believe that chocolate is going to make me happy."

It's stunning. It's really amazing to see just how much our mind buys into this delusion. It's fascinating to look at it in small ways—small cravings, small places where we find greed. Maybe a second... we haven't had many desserts here, but a second chocolate biscotti, perhaps. Avoiding that, not doing it, just watching the wanting and seeing what happens.

Another side of this exploration is to really investigate—and this is actually one the Buddha recommended—what we think is going to make us happy, what we think is going to really satisfy us. He said to look at just how far that satisfaction actually extends. Pay attention to that.

So yes, you think that chocolate's going to make you happy? That second cookie is going to make you happy? Well, have your second cookie, but pay attention. How long does it actually make you happy? Are you even there for the happiness of the cookie?

I was talking to someone recently and I had encouraged her. I said, "Don't try to not go for the chocolate, but be there for the chocolate." It took her a while to get there. And then she began to see—oh, actually, that chocolate, it's very nice while it's there. It's actually delightful to be present for the sense pleasure of that. And when we're really available, sense pleasures can be very heightened when we are truly here. But it's heightened partly because we are not clinging to it anymore. And so we can really be there for that sense pleasure.

I did this myself. I was at the Forest Refuge and I would have a piece of Dove dark chocolate with a cup of coffee after lunch. And I paid attention to just how long the pleasure lasted. It lasted for way longer than I would have thought, actually. I'm told there's something about chocolate that generally makes you feel good—endorphins or something. It did last for a couple minutes after I finished the chocolate. But it was a couple of minutes of happiness. The mind had bought into the belief that it would last longer than that.

When we start to look at this satisfaction, look at where we think we're going to find what we want, it's interesting not only to examine how long the pleasure extends, but also to ask: what is it that we're actually wanting? What is it that we actually want?

Sometimes we want a particular sense pleasure, like really wanting that chocolate. But when I really look at it, more often what I discover is that what I want is some idea. This was really clear to me at one point. I was sitting the three-month course and I heard descriptions of certain kinds of meditation experience—seeing things rapidly arise and pass away, sometimes called the arising and passing. I heard these descriptions, and I suffered a lot wanting that experience.

I could feel the wanting, I knew the wanting, I knew I was wanting it. And at one point I really just felt into the wanting. I was watching and observing that wanting. And at some point when I was observing it, what I noticed was that what was happening in my mind while the wanting was occurring was that I was envisioning telling my teacher that I'd had the experience. That's what I wanted. I wanted my teacher to recognize me for having had some experience. I had no idea what arising and passing actually was. I didn't know what I wanted. I just knew that I wanted to tell somebody that I'd had it.

This is the kind of thing—what we want is actually a construct of our own minds. That's rather amazing. When we start looking at this process of where we think we're going to find satisfaction, not only is the suffering of the wanting produced by the mind that's doing that, but what we want is created by our own minds. It's not any more substantial than a thought. Look at it in your own minds to see this.

And not-self. We take what is not-self to be self. We can do whole talks on this topic—it's huge. So I'll just say a few things briefly about this. Essentially, this is again a misunderstanding. We are interpreting

We're interpreting some experience, or some aspect of our experience, as being me or mine or I. There are many varieties of ways that we claim I or me or mine. Sometimes it's an aspect of feeling like I'm in control—I'm the one that decides things, I'm the one that chooses things. Or sometimes it's more a feeling of ownership: this is mine, this belongs to me. Or sometimes it might just be a sense of I'm the one who experiences things, I'm the one who feels things. Or it might be an identification with emotions—I'm the one who's miserable all the time. We identify with a whole range of things that are just processes unfolding.

This pointing to not-self is really a pointing to the fact that everything happening to us is a kind of tumbling of causes and conditions. There's something happening here. A process is unfolding—a very cohesive process is unfolding. It's like a tree grows. There's a very cohesive process about that tree growing. An acorn falls to the ground. It gets enough nourishment, water, light. The conditions are such that it's one of those oak trees down there with a cage around it, so a deer doesn't come along and eat it. It has conditions that allow it to grow. There's no entity directing the process of growing a tree. It's nature. It's just causes and conditions.

And very similarly, the unfolding of our human life is nature. It's a process of causes and conditions. I think that part of the reason why we attribute self is because of this very interesting process that's a part of human nature—that is self-aware, that is self-reflectively able to know what is happening in this process. This process is aware of itself. This is just a part of being a human being, that this process is aware of the process itself. But that very reflective kind of process aware of itself—that's where the belief in self enters in. And so there's no entity in here, in the control tower, guiding, deciding. It is a tumbling forward of process.

We can start to explore this too, just looking at what it is we take to be me. What is it that we take to be me? The teaching on not-self is sometimes used as a spiritual bypass. We might say to somebody, or somebody might say to us, "Oh, get over it, you're just identifying with it." That's not what this teaching is about. There's a very famous saying by Zen Master Dogen: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be enlightened by all things."

This path begins by studying what we think of as self—not by bypassing it and pretending we don't believe that we have this sense of self. We have to understand how that misconception happens, so that it's not an overlay of "Oh yes, I believe there's no self." That's not even what the Buddha said. Beginning to explore our experience, the changing nature of our experience, as we turn and direct concentration towards the changing nature, we begin to see into these core misperceptions, these human misperceptions.

I've talked in this exploration of these core misperceptions about how we turn towards—basically, we turn towards change. We turn towards looking at what we think should make us happy. We look at where we think we're finding satisfaction. We turn towards looking at where these misperceptions are operating. What is solid in your experience? Turn towards that and see: does solidity really hold up? Is it really solid? Turn towards what we think is going to be satisfying. How long does the satisfaction actually last? Turn towards what we think of as I or me or mine. What do we see when we do that? So we can begin, with a concentrated mind, to investigate these.

misperceptions and begin to understand for ourselves that they are misperceptions.

But more directly, I'd like to talk about what you've been doing here and how this concentration that we've been cultivating is used—has been used during this time—and can be, going forward, used in the service of liberation.

In my own exploration of concentration practice, I found that just in the creation of the state of concentration, there was a lot that I learned. So much. We learn about what we cling to, where we get stuck, what's hard to let go of, where we start clinging to pleasure. We learn about our habits of mind in the very first days of the practice of just coming to the breath over and over again. Learning about our tendencies, our own personal habitual tendencies of where our mind tends to go. This is an understanding, a learning that we're gaining about our own minds, the habits of our own minds.

Also, something that some of you have talked about is that as the concentration deepens, there's this cyclical nature to it. It's not like this ever-descending deepening or steadying of mind. We go through a lot of cycles. And sometimes what happens is what one teacher, Michelle McDonald, calls the purity-purification cycle.

The purity cycle is the settling into the stillness, the hindrances being at bay. The mind gets a taste of purity there. It's very beautiful. You've all touched into at least some measure of this purity. For moments, as Philip was talking about, for moments we get tastes of this purity. And sometimes what happens is we get long tastes of this purity and we think, "Oh, I figured it out." I had one time when I was sitting in the dining hall and had a kind of opening to concentration just while I was sitting there, and all my pain went away. I was in this great state of bliss and I thought, "Wow, I figured it out. I'm never going to feel pain again." I believed that. So we go through cycles—the concentration collects, gathers, unifies; there's that sense of purity—and then the concentration falls apart.

Sometimes what happens, and some of you have talked about this, is that the purity has created the conditions for something that's been deep and held, not able to be touched into or met. That purity gives space for that to come up and arise, to come to the surface. This too is a part of the learning. It's not a mistake. It's part of the process—the process of learning how our minds cling, learning where the holdings are, the old patterns of holding. Purity, purification. We go through these cycles.

On this retreat, you may have gone through one or two of these. On a long retreat, a six-week retreat, you go through it over and over again. It's not that you somehow lose everything. The first few times I went through it, I felt like I had to start all over again. And because I thought I had to start all over again, I did have to start all over again. It's the idea that we have to start all over again that makes us have to start all over again.

But if you're staying with the process, with the purification as it happens, actually as that begins to soften or loosen or let go, the presence with that can support you to just move right back into a purity cycle.

We've talked about malleability of mind. The mind is way more malleable than we think. And with concentration, we can move in and out of states of concentration way more quickly than we might expect. So if you have the idea, "Oh, it's going to take me forever to get concentrated again," just know that's just a belief. Check and see if it's that thought itself.

I remember one time during a three-month course—somebody had fallen down in the meditation hall on Halloween. They had pumpkins lighting the hall so it was really dark in there, and somebody had fallen over and hurt themselves. I was the only other person in the hall, so I went into the staff office to let them know that somebody in the meditation hall needed help. And they were having a Halloween party in the staff office. I walked into the Halloween party and it kind of blew me away, after six weeks of silence.

It did take me a couple days to settle down, but the reason it took me a couple days to settle down was because it went something like this: "Oh, breath. Oh, that party. It's going to take me forever to settle down." Breath. Breath.

Oh, why did I have to go into that office? It's going to take me forever to settle down. Over and over again, that thought arose. That was what was taking me forever to settle down—the insertion of that thought.

I now know that a concentrated mind can have a very dynamic interchange, very engaged, fully normal, and then within minutes be back to concentration. So we learn about this malleability of mind as well. We learn about cause and effect as we explore creating the state of concentration. We begin to understand the conditions. What gets in the way of concentration? What supports concentration?

We've talked about this. We've talked about the jhanic factors that support concentration, we've talked about the seven enlightenment factors, and the fact that we cultivate certain ones of these and the rest arise as results. We engage with vitakka and vicara. Piti, sukha, and ekagata are the results. We learn how to cultivate the conditions. So we begin to understand the cause and effect nature of the processes of the mind.

This is actually a pointer to not-self—understanding that our system, our organism, is this process of cause and effect. And there is agency in this system. This process that knows itself, this process can make decisions. This process can choose to cultivate mindfulness. This process hears about mindfulness and can choose to cultivate it, seeing the results of that. And then we attribute, "I did that." The sense of self is an afterthought, basically.

So in terms of shifting, tomorrow morning in the guided meditation we'll offer a guided meditation about this shift. And then it's your choice whether you continue over the next two days to deepen in the concentration, or perhaps from time to time explore the power of concentration to see into things as they are. There's a really unique opportunity you have here to see just how powerful the mind can be when it's concentrated.

We'll explore this a little in the morning, but just as a description: when we're in one-pointed concentration, we can shift to change in different ways. One of the most straightforward, perhaps the most comfortable given what you've all been doing—most of you have been really right with the breath—would be to shift how you are paying attention to the breath. Becoming more interested in the changing nature of the breath. Looking at what is the sensation that lets you know the in-breath is beginning. How do those sensations change? What are the changes of sensation as the breath continues? What about the ending of the breath? How do you know it ends? Just noticing the changing nature of the breath itself.

This is a subtle shift in the way you're paying attention. It doesn't have to be dramatic. But it begins to orient the mind towards this exploration of change, beginning to see the breath as a process.

The breath is a great object of meditation because it breathes itself, basically. We don't have to try to breathe. And in this process of witnessing, again, we see the not-self nature of breathing. There's this process going on, this process of breathing taking care of this life. That's really a beautiful thing—this process that breathes, that wants to breathe to keep itself alive. It's like metta in action.

So that's one way we can turn towards the changing nature of the breath. Another way would be to let go of the breath entirely. For moments, you could play with releasing the focus on the breath and just opening—perhaps to the whole body, or opening to the body and hearing, and just seeing what's changing. This flow of being a human being, the dynamic experience of changing sounds, body sensations.

Even just right now, let your attention be broadly connected to your body. What are you experiencing? Pulsing, tingling, hardness, coolness, softness.

Opening to the changing nature of experience, we also become aware that attention itself picks up on different experiences. Attention connects with something, and then that attention connected with that object goes away and another attention comes. We start to see that process as well.

So insight deepens over time. It starts from hearing a description—the Buddha's pointing. If the Buddha didn't point these things out, the likelihood that we would see them is so small. And so hearing this, we may start to be curious and investigate. We start to get little tastes, little tastes of insight, just as we get little tastes of peace and ease. We get little hints, little pointers to seeing clearly.

I used to think there was going to be some big mind-blowing insight after which I would be happy forever. And what I really have seen so much is that the practice and the insights are really gradual. The Buddha actually described the unfolding of practice through an analogy—practice unfolding very gradually. He said it's like a rope from a shipwreck, the rigging that lands on the beach. Day by day, the sun, the sand, the wind wear away at that rope. If you were to go to that beach and look at that rope day to day, you're not going to see much changing. But six months, a year later, you go back, you try to pick up that rope and it will have fallen apart.

And so with the small recognitions—sometimes we don't even see them. Sometimes we don't even see the changing understanding that's developing. So a lot of this involves trust. Trust on the side of the small pointings that Philip was talking about, the small pointings to peace, to ease, as being the indication that we're on the right path. And likewise with insight—just small pointings, small recognitions. Oh, I see how wanting a piece of chocolate actually isn't satisfying. Small things.

It really is a gradual path. And so, trust in that gradual unfolding.

CHAPTER 110

Satipaṭṭhāna and Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 54 min

In this opening talk for a monthlong retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive introduction to the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), the Buddha's detailed instructions on cultivating mindfulness toward liberation. She explores the mysterious quality of mindfulness itself—how it functions as both a mental factor and an embodied sense of intimacy with experience. The talk distinguishes between ordinary awareness and the transformative perspective shift the Buddha encourages: turning toward experience as phenomenon rather than reacting outwardly to change circumstances.

Fella examines both translations of satipaṭṭhāna—"foundations of mindfulness" (emphasizing what we attend to) and "establishing of mindfulness" (emphasizing how we attend). She guides practitioners through each of the four foundations: body (kāya), feeling tone (vedanā), mind states (citta), and dhammas, highlighting their progressive refinement from simple bare recognition to contemplating the conditioned nature of experience. The Buddha's instruction to know "the body as a body" points toward an impersonal understanding even while dwelling intimately in direct experience.

The talk unpacks the key phrase repeated throughout the sutta: "one abides contemplating... ardent, fully aware, mindful, free from desires and discontent." Each element reveals qualities essential to practice—abiding as relaxed dwelling, ardency as wholehearted yet balanced commitment, and the active process of freeing oneself from reactivity. Andrea emphasizes that this practice naturally leads to wise response rather than passive acceptance, opening practitioners to act from wisdom and compassion rather than automatic reactivity.

For the talks during this retreat, in the first portion, we as a team decided to explore primarily the Buddhist teachings on the four foundations of mindfulness, the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. This teaching includes some of the Buddha's most clear and detailed instructions about the practice of mindfulness. That's what we will be exploring for the first few weeks.

We'll follow that later in the retreat with talks on one of the lists that's actually mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna. Towards the ending of the sutta, there's a list called the Seven Factors of Awakening, which is a set of qualities that we both actively work to cultivate and that naturally grow and develop as we practice mindfulness—qualities that lead us towards freedom, towards awakening. In the second part of the retreat, we will go in depth into those qualities of supporting your cultivation in the direction of freedom and liberation.

Tonight I'd like to focus on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta itself, this teaching on the four foundations of mindfulness, and a little bit about mindfulness itself.

I think we all kind of feel like we know what mindfulness is. We've all been doing it a lot—you're here on a mindfulness retreat. And yet sometimes when we really start to explore, it becomes more mysterious. I've been practicing for twenty years, and the more I explore my mind and explore this quality of mindfulness, the more mysterious it seems. The more I'm not really sure I can give a clear definition. But we'll try. We'll explore that a little bit tonight.

There are some rough definitions we can work with. Often mindfulness is talked about as the state of being present or being aware, or an experience of witnessing what's happening, or perhaps the simple recognition of knowing what's happening while it's happening. Yet some of those definitions have a sense of a mental factor, a mental functioning. And it is mental—the quality of mindfulness is understood to be a mind state, a mental factor. Yet it can also create something more embodied, a feeling kind of experience of being connected with experience, intimate with experience. Those words—intimacy, connection—have a different quality to them than being aware or knowing what's happening while it's happening. So mindfulness has this quality of connectedness. Last night, Philip used the phrase "the felt sense of experience."

The mindfulness that we cultivate for our meditation practice, for the understanding of our hearts and minds and the exploration of what's going on in here—it's based on a completely ordinary, normal functioning of mind. It's just a natural part of being human: this self-reflexive capacity of the mind to know that we know. This is the basis from which mindfulness grows. The fact that we can know that we know. Be aware of our experience.

We have this capacity to know what's happening in the present moment while it's happening. Yet so often we are not aware of that. Actually, there are times when that simple quality of being aware of what's happening while it's happening occurs to us throughout the day, quite naturally. In fact, I like to think that without this simple capacity, we wouldn't even be able to walk out the door. There's some part of our mind that's aware of where our body is in space, some part that's able to navigate the world. Some of that has to do with this ability to recognize what's going on.

But a lot of times what happens when we become aware of what's happening in the present moment is that we immediately start to do something with it. We might see some trash on the ground, and rather than recognizing, "Wow, I've become aware of trash on the ground"—which is very useful, I mean, it's useful to recognize the trash and do something about it, to pick it up—we don't often recognize that we have recognized that. We don't notice that mindfulness has arisen.

This, I think, is one of the pieces I'm so grateful to the Buddha for. He talked about this really simple, ordinary quality of mind and said, "Hey, this quality is worth looking at. This quality is helpful to cultivate." And as Philip mentioned last night, it's helpful to cultivate in a particular way—towards this question of what it means to move towards freedom from suffering. I'd like to explore that question of the perspective we bring when we cultivate mindfulness on the path of freedom. What does that mean, as opposed to just being aware of what's happening?

If we think about perhaps the way we were before we started meditating, or just the way we understand an ordinary person we might meet on the street—if we meet someone who's having some kind of reactive emotion, say anger, and we ask them the question, "Hey, do you know that you're angry?"—they're going to look at you kind of funny.

"Yeah, I know that I'm angry." It's not a surprise to them. And yet, to ask them at that point to just notice that they're angry—it doesn't have a lot of traction. Either they don't quite understand what you mean, or just noticing that they're angry has the function of basically amping up the anger. Because for most people, noticing that you're angry means thinking the thoughts about what you're angry about.

This is the terrain of the perspective shift that the Buddha is asking us to make. We need a new perspective around our experience. Often when we have something arising—a reactive emotion—we may be oriented outwards towards whatever it is we're reacting about, thinking about that thing. What do we need to do about it? How do we fix it? How do we change it? And that very process, if we're not also aware that reactivity is happening right now, will fuel the reaction. It's like we've got our foot on the gas pedal of that reactive emotion, and so it exacerbates the reactivity.

What the Buddha is asking us to do—and what seems to be repeated throughout the Satipatthana, which I'll explore in a few minutes—is to see if we can turn towards just what we are experiencing, rather than being oriented outwards towards what we should do about it. Oh, there's anger happening. What is it? What is the experience of anger happening here and now? We recognize what's happening as happening in this body, in this mind, as a phenomenon, as experience arising here.

That perspective shift creates the conditions for something different to happen. You all know this. You've done quite a bit of practice, and you've experienced that shift. So I want to highlight this piece of mindfulness practice: it's not just about being aware. It's about being aware and understanding that what we are aware of is a phenomenon—a human phenomenon, let's say, because we are human beings. In exploring mindfulness, we are starting to explore what is the experience of humanness.

That includes the whole range of humanness: all of our reactivity, all of our beautiful emotions, the states of concentration that come as we collect and gather our attention, the bodily sensations that happen as we walk down the hill, the feelings that arise as we lie down in bed at night, the experience of coolness as we take a drink of water. Everything that happens to us, we can recognize: this is the experience of being human right now.

That shift—towards this recognition and away from "what do I need to do about this experience?"—is crucial. Because I think you're all familiar with the tendency, as we meet our human experience, to think, "Well, this flavor isn't exactly what I want right now. It's not the flavor I would really choose in this moment." And so we ask ourselves how we can go about getting something a little more pleasant, or how we can get rid of these unpleasant things, or how we can space out and just ignore the whole thing.

Rather than being curious and interested in the experience of humanness, we're trying to adjust it to be some other way. And that is where a lot of our suffering happens—in that wishing our experience were some other way than it already is in this moment.

As I talk about this, I always think it's important to clarify: turning towards the experience of being human, recognizing that anger is arising right now—this is not to say that we never act. Sometimes as we talk about mindfulness and being with experience as it is, people get a sense that meditators are just passive, that we don't take action, we just sit there and let experience flow over us without doing anything about it.

In my experience, what being mindful does—when we actually meet experience and open to the reality of being human with an open heart, not a contracted heart, when we meet experience with interest and curiosity—is that it creates the conditions for a wise response to arise, as opposed to an automatic reaction.

That automatic reaction is our usual approach. At least I know in my own life, that's been my usual approach when something happened to make me angry: I need to do something about this. And it's kind of knee-jerk—something unpleasant, got to get rid of it, got to figure out how to fix it.

With mindfulness practice, responsiveness actually grows. We begin acting from a completely different place. Rather than acting out of reactivity, out of confusion and greed and anger and aversion and frustration, we start acting out of wisdom and compassion and generosity and kindness. There's a whole host of beautiful qualities of mind that inspire action in our lives and in the world. Mindfulness opens us to that place where we can touch into being motivated by these beautiful forces of mind.

And yet, as we're exploring this, as we're practicing with this, of course there are going to be times when we feel that contractedness and yet we still have to act.

You know, if you're in a situation of danger or a situation of abuse, to just sit there and wait until you have a completely non-reactive response before you take action is not necessarily so helpful. And so we have to learn to navigate it—to honor the arising of our strong reactivity, to meet it, to recognize it, and in that simple recognition, at least we are aware that we may be acting from it. We have a little bit of a chance, a little bit of a choice point to perhaps bring in a reflection on compassion or wisdom even as we are recognizing.

Even just recognizing: yes, this is an abusive situation, and boy, do I hate that person, and yes, it is compassionate for me to get away from this. To recognize that it's a process of purification really—purifying our minds.

And so the teaching of Satipaṭṭhāna is really the Buddha's encouragement for us to cultivate this quality of mindfulness from a perspective that points us towards freedom.

Satipaṭṭhāna, this word, contains sati, which is the Pali word for mindfulness, and the second part of the word, paṭṭhāna, which is translated in a couple of different ways that I think shed some different light on what is being pointed to.

One very common way of translating Satipaṭṭhāna is "the foundations of mindfulness." There are four areas offered, and so often the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta is described as the teachings on the four foundations of mindfulness. In this way, the four areas are body, feeling, mind states, and dhammas—and I'll talk about that in just a minute in more depth.

This translation of "foundation of mindfulness" emphasizes that there are aspects of experience that are helpful to pay attention to. It emphasizes what we are paying attention to in order to support this cultivation of mindfulness. The term "foundations of mindfulness" encourages us to think about what we're noticing.

Another translation for this word Satipaṭṭhāna is "the four establishments of mindfulness." To me, this points a little bit more to the establishing of mindfulness—that we explore how to create the conditions to allow mindfulness to flourish. This points more to how we bring our attention to experience as opposed to what we are paying attention to.

Those two translations—the foundations of mindfulness and the establishing of mindfulness—I think it's important to recognize that both what and how we pay attention are important.

So if we explore what it means to establish mindfulness in these four areas, mindfulness of body is the first establishment of mindfulness. This is exploring, opening to the physical sensation level of experience. Philip was pointing to this in the guided meditation this morning—the feelings of heaviness and weight, and so many different sensations of pressure, vibration, tingling, pulsing, just this felt sense of the body.

This is a great foundation for mindfulness because it is so obvious in so many ways. Although I have to say, when I first started practicing mindfulness, it wasn't very obvious. It's kind of like I was experiencing my body from the neck up. I was really in my head, and even though I was a dancer and could control my body, when people told me to feel into the feeling of the body, I was kind of mystified as to what that meant. And so it took some time to begin to explore and feel into all the different sensations of experience. It's almost like we have to learn the language that the body is communicating with us with.

The exploration of the body is one of the more obvious areas. I can call your attention, for instance, to the sensations of your hands, and probably you can feel that. Or just noticing the sensations of your hips against the chair or cushion or bench. There's some obvious sensations in the body. And so as a place to begin mindfulness, to me this points to some of the wisdom of the Buddha—to start with something that's pretty easy. We start by connecting with experience that's obvious and easy.

It also begins to help us tease apart what is the experience of the body and what's the experience in relationship to the body. If there's pain in the body—this is a kind of unpleasant, strong unpleasant sensation in the knee or in the back—there's that sensation. There's unpleasantness in the body, and probably sensations of burning or sparking or aching or dullness or throbbing. So there's that sensation level of experience. And then there's the whole host of "I can't stand this, I hate this, I have to fix this, I have to change this." There's a whole host of reactivity to that experience.

What we see as we pay attention to our experience with mindfulness is that the juxtaposition of those two things—physical pain and reactivity—makes the entire experience way worse. It almost seems like the physical pain is worse when we are reactive. There's this really tight feedback loop between body and mind, and in ways that are surprising, we almost confuse an experience of the body with the experience of the mind.

So as we start to get familiar with the sensation level of experience, we can begin to recognize: oh yes, there's that burning sensation, and oh, I really don't like it, and ooh, feel how that burning gets stronger as I don't like it. We can start to see how the mind influences the experience of the body. This is an important part of beginning to recognize what the experience of the body actually is, as distinct from our relationship—our mental relationship—to it.

In particular, in the first three foundations of mindfulness, and especially in the foundation of the body, there's a strong encouragement to simply take experience as it is. There are places where it says: when you're breathing in, know that you're breathing in. Breathing out, know that you're breathing out. When you're walking, know that you're walking. When you're reaching, know that you're reaching. It's really simple—just a very straightforward encouragement to know what's happening with the body while it's happening. When there's the experience of pressure, know that the experience of pressure is there. It doesn't say notice the experience of pressure and do something about it. It says notice the experience of pressure and be aware of that.

Breathing in, know that you're breathing in. Breathing out, know that you're breathing out. That's actually a great meditation instruction to work with. It's so simple. You don't have to get all close and figure out what the breath feels like. It's like: yeah, breathing in—I know I'm breathing in. That's good enough. Breathing out—yeah, I know I'm breathing out. That's good enough. That's one of the first meditation instructions in the Satipatthana Sutta. Really simple, just this bare knowing of what's happening with the body. And that kind of simplicity is repeated for these first three foundations in particular.

The second foundation, the foundation of feeling, is an encouragement to recognize pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience. Just whatever's arising has some flavor of being pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. And this goes on all the time. While you were eating your meal, this was happening with every single bite. Flavors arising: ooh, tofu—hmm, not liking tofu. Ooh, tahini sauce—liking tahini sauce. There's that kind of fluctuation of pleasant and unpleasant all through our day. We walk down the hill seeing things, liking things, not liking things. We take certain things as pleasant, certain things as unpleasant. This is a feature of every moment of experience—it's got this flavor of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. And again, the Buddha's encouragement with this foundation of mindfulness is: when pleasant experience arises, know pleasant experience is arising. When unpleasant experience is arising, know unpleasant experience is arising. Again, very simple instructions.

The third foundation of mindfulness is mindfulness of mind states—being aware of what our mind is doing, essentially some of these relationships with experience. This section is again very simple. The teaching highlights a few straightforward areas: know whether aversion is present or absent, know whether greed is present or absent, know whether delusion is present or absent, know whether concentration is present or absent, notice whether distraction is present or absent. There are eight or nine states that are encouraged—notice whether these states are present or absent. Again, if aversion is arising, know aversion is arising. That's the instruction in the Satipatthana Sutta. It doesn't say notice aversion arising and then try to figure out how to get rid of it.

So these first three foundations in particular have a strong emphasis on the simplicity of noticing human experience, being aware that feelings are arising in the present moment, that body sensations are arising in the present moment.

Mind states are arising in the present moment. Just this simple. This is what human experience is.

This—what we might call bare recognition of what's happening right now—is a feature of this perspective of mindfulness that the Buddha offers for heading us in the direction of freedom.

The fourth foundation is a little more complex in its structure. It's called the mindfulness of dhammas, and I like to think about it as awareness of our experience through the perspective of the Dharma teachings. How do we apply what we learn in the Dharma to our direct experience? This foundation explores various lists, and one that we'll talk about in a day or two is the hindrances—those states of mind that tend to catch us up often: desire, ill will, doubt, restlessness and anxiety, and sloth and torpor. These are the states of mind that tend to get in our way.

There's an encouragement in the fourth foundation to notice if one of those hindrances is arising or if it's not arising. Even just that simplicity: Is doubt arising, or is doubt not arising in this moment? This very simple exploration covers every moment of experience. Either doubt is present or it's not. We can simplify and look at our experience in this way.

So the fourth foundation is asking us to explore these teachings of the Buddha. And in this foundation, there is an encouragement to begin to recognize that the hindrances tend to get in the way. We're encouraged to recognize what helps us let go of the hindrances. What is it that gets us caught? How do they come to be? How do they dissipate? We're encouraged to see the conditions that lead toward the creation of the hindrances and those conditions that lead toward their release.

There are other lists also in this fourth foundation—different Dharma perspectives through which we're asked to look at our experience and begin to explore how we might apply each teaching to this moment of experience. In particular, there's a lot of curiosity in this foundation about the conditioned nature of experience. How does this experience arise in the mind? What are the conditions that put it together? What allows it to fall apart? What supports the continuance of wholesome states? There's this encouragement to reflect on the conditioned nature of experience and the impersonal nature of experience.

In this fourth foundation, we are exploring whatever's happening in the present moment through the lens of the Buddha's teaching, the Dharma. We'll explore these foundations together over the course of the next few weeks. This is really just to give you a sense of the direction or the flavor of where this teaching as a whole points. It points to a kind of mindfulness that is a non-judgmental, non-interfering awareness of what's happening while it's happening—and yet an understanding, a curiosity about what states help me move toward freedom and what states are in the way of that movement.

Early in the sutta, the Buddha offers a phrase that gives a sense of the way it's helpful to bring our attention to experience. What I just went through was really about what we're noticing, and a little bit about that non-judgmental exploration of mindfulness around what we're noticing. This phrase that the Buddha offers at the beginning of each of the foundations gives us a flavor of the qualities of mind that will help support mindfulness.

The phrase is: "One abides contemplating our experience." It's repeated for each foundation. "One abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world. One abides contemplating feelings as feelings, ardent, mindful, fully aware, free from desires and discontent for the world. One abides contemplating mind states as mind states, ardent, fully aware and mindful, free from desires and discontent for the world."

This phrase adds a richness to what we're doing—how we're doing it, really. I'd like to look at this phrase a little bit. What does it evoke for us? These words are actually quite potent.

Even just the first two: abides contemplating. As you explore right now, what does it feel like when I say the word "abide" with your experience? What does that evoke? Abide with the body. To me it conveys a sense of dwelling, a sense of home, a sense of resting, of contentment. Abiding in the body. Abiding, contemplating.

The contemplating part is not just abiding and spacing off into the netherworld, but abiding and contemplating the body. We actually gather that abiding around an area of experience. To me, these two words together—abides contemplating—encourage a relaxed, Open, receptive meeting of experience. One abides contemplating the body.

How does that feel as you let that phrase land? Abide contemplating the body. Just with a simplicity—there is a body. Or abide contemplating an in-breath. Abide, knowing an out-breath.

One abides contemplating the body as a body. That's an interesting phrase. The body as a body, feelings as feelings, mind states as mind states. What might that mean?

I think this is bringing in some wisdom to this contemplation. We are recognizing the body in and of itself—recognizing the body as a body, not me, not my body, but just: this is a body as a body. So it begins to bring in something impersonal, even as we connect and dwell right in the middle of it.

There's almost a paradox just in the speaking of it. But as we feel into it—abide contemplating, there is a body—can there be a landing in that, and yet a knowing of the fact that this body is here? There are so many conditions for this body that are not my doing. Well, that's not completely true. We eat a certain amount and it influences whether we gain or lose weight, so it's not entirely beyond our influence. But the conditions for this body to come into being, this body made of the same stuff that the rest of the universe is made from—this is the perspective that the body is just stuff, elements.

There's one teaching that I love that comes from an unexpected source, perhaps—from Carl Sagan, the astrophysicist. He teaches us that every single atom in our bodies, every single particle of physicality, was forged in the heart of a star. We are star stuff. It's not mine. It doesn't belong to me. It's really just the universe expressing itself.

Abides contemplating the body as a body. Abides contemplating star stuff as star stuff.

Ardent. This word brings in several pieces. It brings in the heart quality—ardent has a sense of wholehearted, heartfelt connection with experience. It also brings in a sense of commitment and diligence to practice. So it includes both the heart qualities and the sense of "I'm going to do this." There's a level of needing to commit to being present, opening to abiding with moment after moment after moment.

This is a delicate balance, this area of ardency, of diligence, of persistence—because it's so easy to have that turn into forcing, pressing, overdoing it. There's a way that this teaching encourages us to abide with ardency. So it's bringing in both a sense of relax and commit. They're not opposites, those two. And so there's a delicate dance that happens right in the present moment. We commit to just enough ardency to meet this moment—no more than that, because that's all we can really do: meet this moment. And then we do it again and again and again.

Right now, how hard is it to notice the sensation of your hips against a chair or cushion or bench? How about now, to notice the sensations of your hands? How about now, to notice the sensations of your feet? Or your lips contacting each other?

As I name each thing, often it's pretty... it's not a lot, right? It's not a lot to notice that in that moment. There it is. That meeting of experience in that moment—for that moment, that's enough.

But we have to remember to do it in the next moment too. And so that's the dance—enough commitment to be present for this, and then do it again, and again, and again. And we'll forget. In the moment when you remember, it's just, okay, here I am. Can I be with this, and this, and this?

Joseph Goldstein sometimes talks about the secret teaching of the half breath. Just enough energy is necessary to connect with half a breath at a time. How hard is it to know an in-breath right now? Just enough—that's all you need to do, know this in-breath. And then this out-breath. That level of effort, repeated, is how the ardency is expressed.

The next phrase is "fully aware." Abides contemplating the body as a body, ardent, fully aware. Here too, I think the context in which this is used brings in the clear understanding of things as they are—fully aware that whatever experience is happening right now is impermanent. It's arising and ceasing. Experiences arise, they may stay for a moment or for a little while, they stay however long they do, and then they cease. Just knowing clearly, fully aware, that phenomenon is rolling on—the impermanent nature of experience.

Some teachings also include in this area being fully aware of the purpose towards which we are doing this practice. This really brings in the intention that Philip was talking about last night. Why are we doing this? It's not simply something we just do. It takes a lot of commitment to come here for a month. So you all have some connection with your purpose for this practice. Remembering that purpose infuses the practice with more heart. I think it infuses it both with heart and wisdom, to understand why we are engaged in this practice.

The last phrase, "free from desires and discontent for the world"—it sounds like you're supposed to be done with desires and discontent, the way it's phrased in this particular translation. And yet, we're not going to be able to get there right away. Whatever's arising, probably there are going to be desires and discontent arising around it. So there's pain arising in the knee and there's frustration. There's discontent with that pain. And yet, what we can do, what we can begin to do, is to recognize: okay, yes, there is the pain and there is the frustration. We recognize that mind state itself. Right there, we are starting to move in the direction of freeing ourselves from being caught by that frustration.

Actually, I believe it's been pointed out that this phrase "free from desires and discontent for the world" could be expressed not in the past tense but in the active tense: freeing oneself from desires and discontent. So we engage. We abide contemplating the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world. It's a process that we engage in, one that begins to allow us—this very process of meeting desire and discontent begins meeting it in this way of, "Oh, discontent is arising right now." That is the step that begins to move in the direction of freedom.

We're not going to be able to flip a switch. We see discontent arising. We see frustration, anger, aversion arising. We know it. We'd like it to stop. It would be great if we had a switch we could flip and say, "Oh, anger, that's not useful. Let me turn that off." How successful are we with that? I'm not very successful with it.

But what's really useful is that there is a kind of turning towards: "Oh, that's anger. What's that like? That's frustration. Ah, what's that like?" And the experience that we find in that moment—rather than being caught by it, tied up in knots wondering how to get rid of this—it's more like, "Oh, let me see what it's like." There's a huge difference in the experience there. And the felt sense of that is an understanding of how it does start to free us from that state.

So, this practice of mindfulness the Buddha points to encourages us to abide contemplating our experience with heart, with diligence, really understanding the impermanent nature of experience and exploring what it means to turn towards those feelings of desire and discontent rather than being driven by them. This process is the process that will very naturally lead us to freedom.

And that is the promise of the Satipatthana Sutta. It says at the beginning that this path is the direct path to freedom. At the end of the sutta, there's actually a kind of promise. It says if you engage in this for seven months, you will have freedom. Not to speak of seven months—if you engage with it for one month, you will find freedom. Not to speak of one month—if you engage with it for seven days, you will find freedom. Now, that's really continuous practice for seven days. But the Buddha points us right to freedom through this practice of mindfulness.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 111

Attitude and Delusion

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this talk from a month-long retreat, Andrea Fella offers a penetrating exploration of the third foundation of mindfulness (cittānupassanā), focusing on how we can investigate not just obvious mind states, but our underlying attitudes and relationships to experience itself. She introduces the practice question "What's my relationship to this experience?" as a tool for uncovering hidden mental attitudes that often operate below conscious awareness.
>
> Fella outlines four primary flavors of attitude we might discover: greed (ranging from obvious craving to subtle excitement or leaning in), aversion (from anger to subtle dissatisfaction or agendas to make things go away), delusion, and balance of mind (equanimity, calm, curiosity, loving attention). She emphasizes that mindfulness of unwholesome states naturally creates conditions for their weakening, while awareness of wholesome states strengthens them—making this investigation directly supportive of liberation.
> The talk offers an especially thorough examination of delusion at multiple levels: gross disconnection and non-mindfulness, the filtering of experience through unrecognized perspectives and views (including cultural conditioning), and the deepest level where we mistake the impermanent for permanent, the unreliable for reliable, and what is not-self for self. Fella shares a personal example of mindfully investigating spacing out during breakfast, discovering that even states we assume are inherently non-mindful can be known with awareness. This teaching connects directly to the Buddha's definition of nibbāna as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

Tonight I'd like to continue exploring the third foundation of mindfulness—mindfulness of mind states, mindfulness of mind. We've been exploring this for several days, but it just seems to me like there's so much there. I wanted to bring in a slightly different perspective, which I understand Nikki introduced yesterday morning in the instruction period.

This involves exploring the third foundation of mindfulness not only as kind of exploring the obvious mind states that come up as we meditate, as we meet our experience. Of course we're going to notice mind states of frustration or anger or confusion just as we're going through the day. Thoughts come by and we'll react to those thoughts, and of course mind states come up in that way. We've been exploring how to meet those states, explore them, open to them, and be with them—not with the agenda to get rid of them, fix them, or change them, but more with the curiosity of what is this? What does it mean to be a human being experiencing this state of mind?

Another way that this foundation can serve us is as an exploration not only of the obvious states of mind that come and go during our day, but also in terms of exploring how we relate to experience and how we are relating to practice itself. These kinds of mind states may be more hidden, below our conscious awareness. They may be in the background, hidden from us a little bit. I'd like to explore how we can use this teaching on mindfulness of mind states to begin to explore our relationship to experience.

Every single experience we have—whether it's seeing a sight, hearing a sound, or feeling a body sensation—there is some relationship that our mind has to that experience. Our mind has a relationship to all of the experience that comes through our physical senses and all of the experience that we have in our mind as well. We have a relationship to the experience of thinking. We have a relationship to emotions that arise.

A simple example, and this is an obvious one that you've all explored and worked with: if you're sitting here and feeling some kind of physical discomfort in the body—pain in the back or pain in the knee—the pain is one thing, the physical discomfort is one thing. It's an unpleasant experience with its elemental qualities of sensations—perhaps pressure, pulsing, burning, stabbing. So there's the experience of the physicality of it and then the feeling tone of it. But based on those experiences, there's usually some relationship that we have to that pain. Often there's an aversive relationship. Occasionally there's a balanced relationship. But in any case—and I've sometimes seen this as I get really into the mindfulness that can see things in detail—there can even be a greedy relationship to that pain. It's like, "Wow, that is so cool! Let me really dive in there and look at that and see all the sparking sensations." So there can be a kind of greedy relationship to it as well.

Whatever the experience is, there is always some mental relationship, some attitude that the mind has in relationship to that experience. It may be so subtle that it's not noticed at times. Sometimes we don't particularly recognize the experience of a balanced relationship, for instance. If we're exploring the way sounds come and go, we may be very interested in the coming and going of the sound but less aware that interest is arising in the mind, that there's a relationship of interest, a relationship of non-reactivity, a relationship of calm perhaps.

So the exploration I'd like to make tonight is beginning to look at what our relationship is to whatever is happening moment to moment. We are often not consciously aware of this relationship. If we are not consciously aware of a relationship of aversion, for example, or of greed—if we are relating to experience through a relationship of aversion and we're not clearly aware of the aversion—then there is a kind of reinforcement of the aversion happening. When we have a relationship to experience that is unseen, and it's an unhelpful relationship, we're actually tending to reinforce the habit of that unhelpful relationship when it's not seen. If it's a helpful relationship like curiosity or balance of mind and we're not consciously aware of that, we're actually missing the opportunity to strengthen it.

Mindfulness has this wonderful property: when we turn our mindful attention to states of mind that are not helpful—those states of mind based in greed, aversion, and delusion, three of the states clearly highlighted in the third foundation of mindfulness—when we turn our mindful attention to greed, aversion, and delusion, when we are mindful of them, it creates the conditions for them to be diminishing in our experience. We learn something about greed when we pay attention to it. When we bring our mindfulness to greed, when we bring our mindfulness to aversion, we see that it actually doesn't feel so good. That very mindful attention begins to help give our minds an education that greed, aversion, and delusion are not really the way to go in terms of heading towards well-being.

Very fortunately, when our system, our organism, gets good education, it wants to move towards well-being. It really just needs good information.

in our experience, our system begins to understand very viscerally that this is not helpful. And so it begins to create the conditions for a weakening of those states.

Likewise with wholesome states—helpful states of mind, states of curiosity, of kindness, of equanimity, of calm—when we turn our mindful attention to those states, it creates the conditions for them to strengthen. The very mindfulness of these qualities gives our system, gives our organism, the information that these states do lead towards well-being.

So mindfulness itself is a very supportive aspect of our minds that begins to help us let go of states based in greed, aversion, and delusion, and to cultivate those wholesome states. When we are unaware of what our relationship is, we're missing the opportunity to weaken the unskillful states. We're unwittingly strengthening those unskillful states and losing the opportunity to strengthen the wholesome ones.

Another way to explore this relationship to experience is through the question: How am I with this experience? My teacher, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, uses the question: What's the attitude of mind with respect to experience? For me, the phrase "What's the relationship to experience?" or "How am I with this experience?" feels a little more natural. We can actually use this question from time to time to begin to uncover attitudes and relationships of mind that may not be so clear or obvious to us.

This is a little technique, a tool we can use just from time to time. I would definitely say from time to time rather than making this something you're doing every few seconds—we can kind of make ourselves crazy with this question. But from time to time it can be very useful, and some good times to check in or ask this question are when it feels like there's some struggle, when it feels like you're butting up against something or fighting with something. That's a good time to check in: What's my relationship to experience right now?

Now, with the dropping in of the question, I have to be careful about this sometimes. It's not that you're trying to find an answer or figure out an answer or think about an answer. You're dropping in the question and then just continuing your practice. Often—or I'd say some percentage of the time—there can be a kind of response. It's almost like we're ringing a doorbell with that question, and then some mind state answers the door. We don't have to go looking for it. We don't have to find it. We just drop in the question and see: Is there some relationship that hasn't been obvious? Just by checking in, just by asking the question, sometimes those relationships can come forward, offering themselves to be seen more consciously.

When there's a feeling of struggle, that's often a good time to check the attitude, check the relationship to experience. Another really helpful time to check your relationship to your experience is if it feels like things are going really, really well. Because sometimes there's a little bit of leaning in, a little bit of greed, a little bit of "Oh, I figured it out, I've got it right." Again, that's a relationship that may not be noticed if we don't kind of open up and check in, ask that question.

So this practice question, used just from time to time, becomes a way to explore something that may be behind the curtain, behind the scenes. Sometimes we have mind states running the show that are having us engage in our exploration of experience without our being consciously aware of them. If you have a kind of attitude of resistance while you're looking at pain and you're not aware of that resistance, then that very resistance is informing how you are exploring the pain. It's influencing how you choose to explore that experience.

When we become aware—okay, there's pain and there's resistance to it—at least at that point there can be a sense of recognition: "Oh, there's pain and I don't like it, I'm resisting it." We can begin to see perhaps that we're bearing into that experience of pain, or maybe pulling back from it and bracing ourselves around it. We can just see that more clearly as we begin to open ourselves to this question: What's the relationship to experience?

There are roughly four flavors of attitude you might come across as you ask this question, and these connect very directly to the third foundation of mindfulness. There's the attitude of greed—of wanting something either to continue or wanting to have something, wanting to be someone. That movement towards, that wanting, that greed. There's the attitude of aversion—of not liking, of wanting to get rid of something, wanting to pull myself away from it or to actively push that thing away from me. There's the attitude of delusion, often experienced as a disconnection or a not-knowing. And then there's the attitude I'll call balance of mind—the relationship of "it's okay," the relationship of "no problem." This is in the terrain of equanimity, that beautiful quality.

When we look at the first half of the third foundation of the Satipaṭṭhāna, it talks about looking at the presence or absence of greed, the presence or absence of aversion, the presence or absence of delusion, and then contraction and distraction. Contraction and distraction I actually think of as flavors of delusion in a way. Noticing the presence of greed, aversion, and delusion—including contraction and distraction as flavors of delusion—and then the absence of those, which is essentially balance of mind.

When greed, aversion, and delusion are not present, the mind is not reactive. It's not doing a push-pull dance with what we're experiencing. It's okay with what's happening.

So I'd like to explore these flavors a little bit and talk more about attitude in general.

Let's start with greed. You're all familiar with greed—it's a common one that we begin to see as we look at our experience. It has obvious flavors: the really wanting, a feeling of neediness, a feeling of "have to have," that sticky pull towards some sense pleasure or some state of mind. We can crave states of mind. We can want and have greed about states of mind. We can have wanting about being seen, being mirrored, being heard, wanting to be seen in a particular way. These are the more obvious forms of wanting that we're familiar with.

Some more subtle forms of this flavor of attitude might be things like expectation, excitement, or even possibly amusement—subtler kinds of leaning towards something that's delightful or pleasant.

Now, one of the really important explorations with states of mind is to recognize and remember—remember, remember, remember—that when we see a state of greed, something subtle like expectation or amusement, we're not somehow trying to stop it or get rid of it. We're bringing mindfulness to it so that it can be known.

Subtler states of greed, like expectation, excitement, and amusement, often have a blend with joy or curiosity. There's a way in which those are beginning to move towards the wholesome states of curiosity, joy, interest, delight. And yet, as you begin to explore, just bring mindfulness.

Some of you have talked in our meetings about feeling excitement as you begin to recognize what's going on inside. It's pretty cool sometimes to start seeing things that are happening in there and be okay about it, to be non-reactive about seeing some of the stuff that's going on. This can bring some Dharma joy, and that Dharma joy can shoot into excitement, sometimes into restlessness or mental proliferation. "Oh wow, that's so cool! I'm never going to have to worry about that one again—I figured that one out!" The mind has moved from the pure rising of joy into a little bit of restlessness around it, a little bit of leaning towards it.

This isn't something to judge as "excitement bad"—like we should just cut it out, try to excise it. Rather, we want to be aware of it. As we open to "what's the attitude here?" and recognize that excitement is the attitude, we might begin to feel the rising of joy and its purity, but also feel something a little shaky or agitated around that joy. Excitement has a slightly agitated quality to it. And that part is extra—it has a little bit of the leaning to it.

But we're not going to understand which aspect of the experience around Dharma joy and the excitement that follows—which part is the beautiful, the wholesome, the Dharma joy side, and which part is the agitation—without just opening to it. "Oh, there's this recognition of understanding, and excitement is happening." The mindfulness and the interest together, the curiosity about what it's like to be a human being feeling excitement—this mindfulness begins to help us tease apart which aspects have a little bit of that gripping and which parts are the wholesomes.

A subtler form of wanting is a leaning in, a trying perhaps to make something continue, a wanting it to continue—just a subtle "ah, mmm," reaching toward experience. The subtlest kind of leaning in.

In my own practice, I have seen all of these flavors. And again, I want to emphasize that the learning comes with curiosity and opening to these flavors, not labeling them as "Oh, leaning in—it feels like I'm leaning in. Andrea said that was greed, so how do I get rid of that?" What I'm hoping to encourage is opening to it. "Oh, leaning in—that's what's happening. What does that feel like? What is that like?"

Likewise with aversion, there are more obvious and more subtle flavors. The more obvious ones include dislike, anger, fear, hatred—those more apparent forms of that quality of mind. Subtler forms might be just a state of discontent, dissatisfaction—just "meh." It's okay, but could be better. That subtle quality almost isn't something we recognize consciously because it doesn't feel like it's getting in the way of being present with whatever it is. And yet it's really helpful to acknowledge

Yeah, "it could be better." So I'm looking at this thing that's going on here, but it's really kind of boring. Or it's just not as interesting as it was yesterday. So it's okay, but... there's just a subtle dissatisfaction, a subtle sense of something being off, not quite what you want it to be. It's got a subtle feeling of not wanting this to be what's happening—a subtler flavor of aversion.

Or another level of subtlety: the thought that by paying attention to this thing, it'll go away. We can have a sense of interest in paying attention to something in order for this unpleasant experience to disappear. So again, these more obvious and less obvious states.

Checking the attitude like this, checking our relationship to experience, can reveal an emotional relationship to experience—something's happening and there's an emotional storm around it. But it can also reveal subtle agendas in the mind. Agendas around the meditation, like "If I pay attention to this in the right way, I'll get this great state." Or "If I pay attention in just the right way, this unpleasant thing will go away." These have less of an emotional quality and more of an agenda quality. These agendas can also be relationships to experience.

I'd like to talk about delusion in a moment—I'd like to cover delusion in a little bit more depth. So I'm going to skip delusion for now and come back to the fourth kind of attitude: this balance of mind, the relationship of balance of mind.

Sometimes when we check in—"What's my relationship to experience?"—it doesn't feel like there's much there. This might be because there are very subtle kinds of greed or aversion happening, or very subtle kinds of delusion. But you're present, and it doesn't seem like there's much going on. If it feels like nobody answers the door when you ring the doorbell, then don't go looking for anything. It might just be that what's happening is a little more subtle than you're familiar with. Or actually, it could be that you're not familiar with checking in and recognizing that calm is what's happening right now. Calm is a pretty subtle state. Peace is a pretty subtle state. Sometimes you check in and think, "Oh, nothing seems to be happening." You could try that on. You could just say, "Well, is it calm? Is it peace? Is it okayness? Is it no problem?"

This flavor of balance of mind as an attitude has many different possible manifestations, many different ways it might be experienced. Calmness, peace, a sense of "I don't mind this." One of my dear friends—she died a few years ago, but she had a really deep practice. I learned so much from her just talking about her practice. She said she was recognizing a subtle difference in this balance of mind shading into aversion. She said, "If my mind's going 'I don't care,' it's got a little bit of aversion. If it's saying 'I don't mind this,' that's more equanimity." That's the balance of mind. So checking into the attitude, if it's an "I don't care" kind of feeling, there may be just a little bit of aversion there.

This balance has flavors of "I don't mind this," calm, peace. It can also manifest as heart qualities. Philip this morning mentioned loving attention. It can have a feeling of love, of compassion sometimes, of friendliness to experience. Sometimes when we check in to our relationship, it might just feel friendly or loving or compassionate. It might have a flavor of delight, of curiosity, of interest—just subtly different ways that we experience these states. It might be a feeling of gratitude. Or it might have more of a sense of equanimity, of tranquility, or happiness.

So many different flavors when the mind is non-reactive, and opening to those flavors will support their nourishment. Actually recognizing, "Yes, happiness is here"—

This is the human experience of happiness. It's supportive for our movement towards freedom.

So I'd like to come back and explore delusion a little bit. Often when we explore this foundation of mindfulness and talk about delusion, people say, "But how do you see delusion? Is it even possible to see delusion?" And it is possible to see delusion. It's possible to know delusion, to know it's operating in our minds. What I'd like to do right now is take a little time to give you some information about ways that delusion functions, which may help you begin to see it.

Delusion often functions like a veil of some kind. We're seeing through a veil, and sometimes that veil is so cloudy that it feels like we're just disconnected—like we're not even connecting with experience. This is what I'll call the first level or layer of delusion: a flavor of lack of awareness. The non-mindful state is a state of delusion. A state when we're lost in thought is a state of delusion. And we can begin to get familiar with this.

Now, we cannot know what it's like to not be mindful in the moment of not being mindful. But in the moment when mindfulness returns, we can be curious about what that's like right there. In that moment when mindfulness returns—at least in my experience, when I've been really lost, when my mind has been in some constructed reality, lost in that world—as the mindfulness returns, there's a lingering memory of what it was like to be lost. We can begin to explore some of these disconnected states by being curious when mindfulness returns, curious about what's here when mindfulness returns.

Mindfulness can begin to connect with certain states that we think are inherently non-mindful. This is another piece I like to point out, because sometimes we have this assumption—like the state of spacing out, sleepiness, dullness, falling asleep. Often we think it's just not possible to be mindful there. But we can begin to be curious about those states, often in the moment when we're kind of waking up from being lost, being spaced out.

I'll give an example of this, because sometimes it's a little more helpful to tell the story. I was having breakfast one morning and trying to be mindful of eating—trying to pay attention to all of the eating, all of the movements, just trying to be particularly mindful of the physical sensations. And I kept noticing that I would be doing that and then suddenly I'd be spaced out. I would bring myself back to being mindful of the eating, and then at some point I'd be spaced out again. I would just recognize, okay, I wake up, I'm spaced out. And I would keep bringing myself back.

Then at some point, because I was trying so hard to stay with the experience of eating, I kind of noticed when the mindfulness—it's almost like it said, "Enough of this. I'm going to go someplace else." There was a sense of seeing the mindfulness leaving, letting go of paying attention to all the physical sensations. Rather than saying, "I've got the agenda, I know what I'm supposed to be doing, pay attention to those physical sensations," I explored: "Oh, okay, I'm seeing the mindfulness let go of that. Let's see where it goes."

At that point, I could watch the mind move into a state of spacing out, which felt like it was hovering up above my head, a little to the right, hanging out up there. And I just stayed with it, mindful in that state. In being mindful in that state, there was a recognition—not so much a verbal recognition, but just this knowing: "Oh, the mind is tired. It's needing rest. And it's taking its rest in this state of spacing out." I could do that mindfully. I could be present for that mindfully.

Then the next surprise was that within maybe thirty or forty seconds, that spacing out just kind of—it's like the mist cleared. And then I was present for my body and present for seeing and present for chewing. In some ways, I had been fighting that spacing out because I had some other agenda.

I had an agenda of what I thought I needed to be doing. And when I allowed, or got curious about, the state of spacing out itself, I discovered that spacing out is not inherently non-mindful. There are many, many states of mind in which we have a habit of not being mindful. But we can begin to be curious about them.

At this point, if there's any state that I think might not be possible for mindfulness to go there—some state of confusion or cloudiness, low energy or dullness—and my mind is telling me, "Can't be mindful right now," I just don't believe that thought anymore. I just get curious. Okay, let's just see. Is it possible for mindfulness to infuse that too?

So this kind of obvious level, this gross level of delusion—states in which we're habitually non-mindful—just being curious about the possibility of beginning to wake up in those states.

At another level or layer of delusion, that first layer is kind of a disconnected layer. That's the most obvious way that delusion manifests—we're just not attending to what's happening. At another level down, a more subtle level of delusion, we are knowing what's happening. We do know what's happening in our experience, but we know it through some kind of filter, some kind of perspective. And so that perspective influences how we take information in from the world.

A simple example of this: if we have some kind of an agenda to do something, to look at something, to find something. The way the mind works, when we get a project in mind, some kind of agenda, the mind organizes around that project and begins selecting things out of the environment that are useful to that project while ignoring things that are not useful. This is called selective attention in psychological terms. And it's a very useful function of mind. It allows us to focus on things and tune other things out.

When I was a kid, I had a very strong capacity for this. I would be reading a book in the living room, completely into that book. That was my world. And my dad would come up the stairs and say, "Hey, it's time for dinner." I would not hear him. I just did not hear him. He actually had to come up to me and touch me to get me to come out of my selective attention.

So sometimes we have this capacity to screen certain things in and other things out, based on an agenda, based on something that we're doing. This is a useful function of mind, and yet the place this shades into delusion is that we think in some way our minds are kind of natural—like our eyes are cameras and our ears are microphones, and they just record everything, and we're seeing the world out there as it is. That we're seeing what's actually going on out there.

But when we see the world, we are seeing certain things and not other things based on perspectives. And when we're not aware of those perspectives, we mistakenly think we're seeing things accurately.

So this is just the way our minds work, but we need to begin to recognize when we have agendas, even a simple agenda. Many of you have probably heard the story about the basketball and the gorilla study. I'll just briefly review it for those who haven't heard it.

It was a study where people were asked to watch a videotape and count the number of times a basketball passed between players wearing white t-shirts. During that video, a person in a gorilla suit walked across the stage, across the basketball players, stood there for a while—it wasn't like he was hiding—standing there in this gorilla suit, and then walked off.

After the tape was played, pretty uniformly people could accurately say how many times the basketball passed. But a good sixty percent of the people did not see the gorilla. There were a few people who were like, "Wow, was there a gorilla in that video? What was that?" A lot of people just did not see the gorilla.

Now, that's not a problem right there. That part is not a problem because that's the way our minds work. Certain people's minds can really focus in and really take in: "Okay, this is the agenda. Count the number of basketball passes."

That's what we're doing. The other information is simply not taken in.

The place where delusion comes in is that in that study, when people were told there was a gorilla and shown the video—and you can't not see the gorilla when you're looking for it—they denied that it was the same video. Some number of people were so convinced that the gorilla could not have been in the video they saw, because surely they would have seen it. This is delusion. This is the danger of the way we think we're seeing things accurately. This kind of thing happens all the time.

So that's a pretty subtle form of delusion. This kind of thing also happens culturally. We're told something over and over again, and we begin to believe it. "America is the land of opportunity. Anyone who works hard enough can achieve their dream." We start to believe that. This leads to, for those people in more privileged positions, basically not seeing that there are cultural conditions that support some to achieve their dreams and don't support others—conditions that actually get actively in the way of others achieving their dreams. That delusion of white privilege. Again, it's this perspective we're holding and not seeing, basically, that the system is rigged.

We can also create views based on incomplete information. I was thinking about an example around this, and I thought: every single one of us standing on this planet—it sure feels like we're standing still. It sure looks like the sun is moving across the sky. It sure looks like the moon is rising and setting. It doesn't feel like we're hurtling some massive number of miles an hour around the axis of the earth, and besides that, hurtling through space. That's not our experience, right? It sure feels like we're sitting still.

We know we're not sitting still. And sometimes I can even play with that—like when I watch the sunrise or the moon rise and know that it's the earth that's turning. But it's kind of effortful. We have to bring in the information we know. If we just operate with our physical senses, the feeling is that the earth is still and everything else is moving around us. That's incomplete information. And Galileo, when he said, "No, the earth is moving—the earth is moving really fast," the church said this was heresy and put him under house arrest for the rest of his life. This perspective of incomplete information has an impact on how we relate to each other. This kind of thing happens all the time. Delusion is shot through our day.

Now, don't despair. We can start to recognize—I think the first place to begin, since a lot of what I'm talking about here is views, perspective, views that we have—we can begin to recognize, "Okay, there's a view happening here." Some views are harder to see through, like the view that the planet is still. The feeling of the truth of that is much harder to penetrate when the information is not available. And yet many of the views we function with, we can begin to recognize—the views in particular that we function with interpersonally and within our own being.

When there's something happening in your experience and there's some kind of struggle, often there's some kind of "you" happening there. The question I like in those moments is: What's being believed right now? These beliefs, these views, are often not so obvious. But we can begin to be curious about what views we have. That question—what is being believed right now?—can begin to infiltrate this.

The third, most fundamental kind of delusion is another form of view, a deepest level of delusion. It's not so much the views that we deal with based on our culture or our families or just how we've navigated the world—those agendas and views that we live with in our daily life. Rather, these are human views that we share, partly because of the way our minds and bodies are put together. We tend to have views, we tend to misunderstand experience as being permanent when it's impermanent. We misunderstand it as being reliable when it's unreliable. We take what is impermanent to be permanent. We take what's unreliable to be reliable. We take what is not self to be self.

This is a whole dharma talk in itself, this exploration of delusion. But we can begin being curious. Again, not trying to somehow skip over or tell ourselves, "Okay, I'm taking this to be permanent. I'm feeling like this thing is really solid and I know it's impermanent." Rather, we investigate. When it feels like something is really stable, when it feels like something is rock solid, just begin to explore: What's the solidity there? Is it really solid? How does it feel solid? Curiosity about that.

And likewise with what we think is reliable—where we think, "Yeah, that's where I'm going to be happy. That's what's going to make me happy." Noticing the feeling of that, and what is it that we think is reliable about it? In general, this sense pleasure, this worldly pleasant we've been talking about, is so unreliable. And yet that's where we think we're going to find happiness.

So we investigate. One of the explorations, which Nikki touched into the other day, is this exploration of gratification, danger, and escape. When there's pleasant experience, we ask: How is this feeling gratifying? And then what the Buddha instructs is: How long does it last? How far does that gratification extend? So that we begin to be very consciously aware that this thing we think is going to do it for us has limits.

On retreat, we really can see this. I've actually recognized that the mind truly believes this piece of chocolate is going to do it for me—it's going to make me happy. And it does, for a moment, for thirty seconds. Actually, it lasted way longer than I thought, the happiness of chocolate. It was quite impressive. It lasted, I don't know, a couple of minutes. But it faded.

This is curiosity: How long does that pleasure last? I was playing with that. Okay, there is that feeling of, "Yeah, chocolate's going to do it for me," but how long does it actually do it for you? In doing that exploration, I discovered, "Wow, actually, I got to enjoy the chocolate for a really long time." And then it faded. It faded. And because I was there for it, there wasn't the sense of needing to grasp after another piece of chocolate or trying to find the next thing.

And then there's seeing what is not self as self. I'm sure we'll talk about this more as the retreat goes on. But just beginning to explore—it's not so helpful to try to put on the identity of not-self. We do that sometimes. What's much more interesting is to begin to look at what am I taking to be self?

Sometimes this is really obvious. Sometimes these senses of self come up quickly, obviously. And when that happens, you can just receive it. "Oh. Here's the argumentative self." That lasts for a while. "Here's the frustrated self." That lasts for a while. "Here's the interested self." That lasts for a while. And we begin to see this changing dynamic—no solid thing there.

So exploring, exploring the identities, exploring what feels like me.

As we become aware of these kinds of delusion, we can begin to notice when they're happening. We can begin to recognize, "Yeah, I'm feeling a sense of me here."

It may not feel like delusion, but you can know, okay, that's something to be curious about.

And then you might have a moment, or a few moments, where suddenly the sense of impermanence is so clear. Or the sense of the way that you had been holding onto something as reliable is suddenly so obvious. And it's like you see really directly: there's nothing that's reliable in the way I thought it was. Everything's just slipping through. And there's a moment where it's just so clear. It is so clear and it feels so obvious. Wow, there's nothing to hold on to.

And then a few moments later, we're holding on again. Delusion is back.

In exploring this, we have moments when delusion falls away and we see something clearly. But that's conditioned. That's an insight, and it's conditioned. And it's impermanent too. The conditions for the obscuring to return will arise again.

And yet, because you've seen it otherwise—because you've seen what it's like to not have that particular delusion—it's like then you can really clearly know: ah yes, this is delusion. The absence of delusion highlights delusion when it's present again.

The trick there is to not feel like you failed when delusion comes back. It's not a failure. It is simply the conditions.

So—noticing greed, aversion, delusion. Noticing the balance of mind. Checking the attitude. This is a direct pointing to what the Buddha said is freedom. He said freedom, nibbana—one of his clearest definitions—was the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion.

And so this practice is helping to reveal greed, aversion, and delusion that were kind of below the radar. It's good news to have it revealed. Because when it's below the radar, it's kind of reinforcing itself. When it comes into consciousness, there's a possibility for transformation and release and freedom. Even small tastes of that letting go can be really freeing.

CHAPTER 112

Wisdom is Happening

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this talk from a month-long retreat, Andrea Fella offers a deeply practical exploration of paññā—the wisdom that frees the mind from suffering. Drawing on teachings from her teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, who encouraged her to "notice when wisdom is happening," Andrea describes the three progressive levels of wisdom found in the Pāli Canon: sutamayā paññā (wisdom from hearing), cintāmayā paññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanāmayā paññā (wisdom from direct meditative insight).

Through vivid personal examples, Andrea illuminates how wisdom actually functions in experience—from recognizing that a thought is simply arising in the present moment, to watching reactive patterns weaken and fall away, to the startling moments when difficult mind states simply vanish upon investigation. She shares her transformative early practice experiences with anger and loneliness, demonstrating how mindfulness creates the conditions for wisdom to see the constructed nature of our suffering and naturally release it.

This talk offers encouragement for practitioners at all levels, emphasizing that wisdom grows incrementally and often works in the background. Andrea invites us to recognize and appreciate these small moments of freedom—when resistance drops away, when we see thoughts as just thoughts, when familiar reactive patterns simply don't arise—as pointers toward the possibility of liberation that can sustain us on the path.

It is so delightful to have this privilege to serve you, to sit here now just looking out and seeing your faces and feeling the collective momentum of practice that's in the room. The other night I explored the topic of delusion for a good part of the talk, and tonight I'd like to explore the other side—that quality of mind that we are cultivating here with the practice of Satipaṭṭhāna. The quality that dispels delusion. A quality that really does the work of letting go. And that is wisdom.

Whether you know it or not, whether you feel it or not, wisdom is growing in you. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says that the whole purpose of our practice is to cultivate this quality of wisdom, because it is wisdom that frees the mind. Sometimes we might feel like we do something that allows us to let go, but what we're exploring here are practices that support a perspective of mindfulness that creates the conditions for wisdom to blossom.

When I first started practicing with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, he used this word wisdom a lot. At one point he said to me, "Notice when wisdom is happening." And I thought, how do I do that? What does that even mean? Over the course of my time with him, I've developed an understanding through experience of what it means when wisdom is working. He would say, what does it mean for wisdom to be at work? This talk has really grown out of that exploration, and so I'd like to talk about wisdom in a very practical way tonight—to point to ways that you may already be experiencing this quality, seeing its growth, seeing its blossoming.

The word wisdom perhaps has some connotations in our language that may not necessarily connect with what it means in the sense of paññā, the Pali word usually translated as wisdom. We can have knowledge and wisdom about many things in our lives, but the wisdom of the Buddha, the wisdom that the Buddha was pointing to, the wisdom that frees our mind, is a particular kind of wisdom. It's related to dukkha. It's related to how we suffer, why we suffer. The understanding that we're cultivating here is the understanding around suffering.

This points to one of the great teachings from Joseph Goldstein. I love this one. He says we want to understand dukkha, we want wisdom in dukkha, about dukkha, without experiencing dukkha. And it doesn't work that way. So it's not a mistake in your practice if you're meeting dukkha. That's where wisdom grows.

When I first thought about this word wisdom, I thought of it as something really grand, big. I kind of thought, well, if I work and practice really hard, if I really pay attention to my experience, maybe someday I'll have that big bang wisdom. And then I'll be floating down the streets and people will know that she's enlightened or something—some silly image like that. That's what wisdom was, some big bang kind of experience. And yet what we come to understand with this practice is that there's an incremental development of wisdom. We can begin to recognize this incremental development and take some confidence in that, recognizing, "Oh, this is wisdom." That's what Sayadaw pointed me to—noticing when there's wisdom in the mind.

There are some classic definitions of wisdom in the Pali canon. The most common, perhaps, or most cited definition of what it means to have wisdom is to understand the Four Noble Truths. This is not an intellectual understanding but a deep practice understanding—that understanding of the Four Noble Truths that frees the mind. Understanding suffering, understanding that suffering arises, understanding that it's possible for suffering to cease, and understanding that there's a path of practice leading to the cessation of suffering.

There are some other definitions of wisdom I'll mention as well, other aspects of the practice and kinds of wisdom that relate to this waking up and freedom. Embedded in the Four Noble Truths is an understanding that there are certain actions of mind, certain qualities of mind that will keep us caught in suffering, and certain qualities of mind that will begin to loosen the clinging and craving, loosen suffering. There's an understanding of which states—those states that are keeping us caught in suffering—are often called unwholesome, unskillful states, and those states that help to move us in the direction of freedom are wholesome, skillful states. The path of practice can also be understood as expressed in the Eightfold Path of Wise Effort.

Finding ways to let go, exploring letting go, abandoning the unwholesome states and exploring the cultivation of the wholesome states.

When we follow through on a mind that is filled with wholesome qualities, it leads us towards more and more freedom, more and more happiness. If we follow through on those states of mind that are connected to greed, aversion, and delusion—those unwholesome states of mind—then that will create the conditions for us to suffer more. This is a very simple understanding about what qualities of mind are helpful to cultivate and what qualities of mind are not so helpful to cultivate. This too is an expression of wisdom in the Buddhist teaching.

Connected to this is an understanding that acting on wholesome states will lead in a certain direction, while following through on unwholesome states will lead in another direction. This is an expression of the lawfulness of the way our experience unfolds. Anushka talked about this lawful quality to our experience, and coming into alignment with this lawfulness helps us to relax. When we're fighting that lawfulness, we struggle.

There are these kinds of what we can think of as almost intellectual definitions of wisdom that we can talk about. We can talk about cause and effect. We can talk about the conditioned nature of experience. We can talk about greed, aversion, and delusion, and how acting on those leads to suffering. We can then start to explore this in our experience and start to find that it's not just a good idea, but that our practice, our experience, begins to bear out these teachings.

There's an understanding of wisdom as having multiple levels to it. What we could call the first level of wisdom is the level where we hear information, where we take in teachings of the Dharma. This is called sutamayā pañña—suta meaning hearing and pañña meaning wisdom. The wisdom connected with hearing the Dharma.

This is what we're doing here together—sharing the teachings, orienting the mind in the direction of noticing with mindfulness that experience is simply an arising in the present moment. The practices that we are exploring here, and all of the teaching that we're doing, but the simplicity of the practices already embeds a perspective that encourages us to move in the direction of wisdom. That simple practice of noticing in this moment what's present and knowing it as something that's present. A thought arising in the present moment. Knowing it as a thought arising in the present moment, as opposed to believing it.

We will believe our thoughts, we will follow through on thoughts, but there's a big difference between blindly following through on a thought because we take it to have a reality and understanding that a thought is arising in the present moment and then being able to have some discernment about whether it's a useful thought or an unuseful thought. Huge difference there.

That very simple practice around thoughts, around mind states, around bodily experience—right there, that practice includes a direction that heads us towards the cultivation of wisdom. Because we are curious about our minds, curious about what's going on in here, rather than simply blindly reacting to what's going on.

So there's this hearing the teachings, and then beginning to put them into practice. This is a second level of wisdom. It's called cintāmayā paññā—the wisdom related to or connected with reflection, or thinking about.

We hear the teachings. We take them in. This practice would never start—the likelihood that you ever would have discovered something in this direction without having heard something first is so small. And so the condition of your hearing the teaching already puts you on the path. That's a condition. Think back: how did you hear about this in the first place?

For me, it was somebody who sent me a book. I was suffering, and somebody said, "Hey, do you mind if I send you a book about something I've been finding really useful?" That was a condition that entered this mind stream and altered the course of my life. I'm forever grateful to that friend who sent me that book. It was just the right medicine at the right time.

So we hear the teachings. We take them in and start reflecting about them. Does this make sense?

Is this something to engage in? Because the invitation of these teachings is not simply to sit there and learn all the lists and memorize all the different factors of the Eightfold Path and be able to give a Dharma talk on the twelve parts of dependent origination. That's not what this teaching points to. The teaching points to: come and see. Try it for yourself. Engage.

And so the first place of that engagement is in reflecting about what you've heard. Is this something that makes sense to me?

Sometimes, in my own experience when I got that book—people often ask, and the book that the person sent me was Everyday Zen by Joko Beck, my first real entry into the Dharma. I read the book, and a lot of it didn't make much sense. I was not interested in meditating. She talked a lot about meditating in that book, and I thought, "I don't know, my friend's gone off the deep end here." She talked about going on daylong retreats and meditating for a whole day. I was sure she was in a cult of some kind.

So I didn't really trust the meditation side. But fortunately, the book was also exploring and interested in looking at: well, why does your mind do what it does? That I was interested in, because I felt like I'd hit bottom in my life—so much reactivity, so much just being whipped around by my mind states. I would find myself frozen in front of my computer, unable to function. Really pretty strong states of mind that were uncontrollable.

And the one bit of wisdom that I pulled out of that book, which actually didn't make any sense to me at the time, was: try knowing that a mind state is. Knowing that anger is arising and being aware of what that feels like. Just be aware that this is happening. Know what that's like. I read that and thought, "What good is that going to do? Be aware of my anger—isn't that just going to make it worse?"

But in this case, I heard this teaching, and I had hit bottom. Nothing else I had tried had worked. So it was kind of like, okay, my friend says this works, this book says it's a good idea, I have no idea how it's going to work, but I'm willing to try. And even that little bit of taking in the information and saying, "Okay, I'll try this"—that's what set me on the path, that willingness to try.

Hearing the information and then starting to engage, starting to explore, actually beginning to practice with the teachings—that's the second kind of wisdom. We start to pick up the tools of the practice and apply them to our experience.

This cintāmayā paññā can be in this terrain of willingness to engage and just beginning to explore the practice. It can also serve us—all of us here having done quite a bit of practice—this wisdom of reflection can serve us a lot of times on our path. We can use Dharma reflection as a skillful means, as Dharma wisdom when we feel at times that we're struggling or caught or confused, and yet we have enough presence of mind to recognize that. When we're caught in the midst of something, we can sometimes bring in some wisdom, some of the classic forms of wisdom that can support us in this way, as a reflection, actually dropping it into the mind.

"This is impermanent"—when you're caught in a kind of storm, just reminding yourself: this is impermanent. Or "this is unreliable." Or "this is nature." That's one of my favorite wisdom reflections to drop in, from Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He uses this one a lot. As he talked about this reflection—"Oh, it's all just nature"—what that began to point to was the understanding or the reflection that everything happening right now is just conditions tumbling on.

A tree grows because an acorn has fallen on the ground and the conditions have been right for that acorn—not eaten by a squirrel, not rotting out because it's gotten too much rain. Just right, just the conditions, just right. That acorn has the nature to become an oak tree.

But it won't necessarily become that oak tree unless other conditions are present. It needs to have soil and water and be protected from animals that want to eat the shoots—or just be lucky enough not to be eaten by an animal. So there, it's just conditions. It's conditions coming together for this tree to grow.

And whatever mind state is arising in this moment, whatever experience is arising in this moment—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, states of mind—whatever is arising in this moment is conditioned. That being caught frozen by anger in front of my computer, that was conditioned. I had practiced anger so much in my life.

So the reflection "this is nature"—to me, it brings that whole understanding of almost like, of course this is what's happening. These are the conditions that are unfolding, the conditions that are ripening in this moment. And just reminding oneself that the conditions unfolding are not self. They may create a feeling of self in that moment, but in and of themselves, they are just unfolding. That reminder—"this is nature"—I used that reflection a lot when I was practicing in Burma. So helpful.

So we can bring in wisdom reflections. Sometimes we have our own understandings. In talking with all of you, I've seen that you've had many understandings developing. And sometimes if we can articulate our understanding to ourselves, just that simple recognition—"Oh, it's helpful to just notice this is what's arising right now. It's just this, just this"—if we can find our own way to articulate the wisdom that we have known.

I think I said the other day that delusion falls away sometimes. And when delusion falls away, wisdom is present. Then conditions change and delusion re-arises. Wisdom diminishes. This quality of wisdom is a conditioned phenomenon too. It's a conditioned mind state. It comes and goes.

When wisdom is present—and I'm going to talk in a few minutes about different ways we might experience that—this third kind of wisdom, bhavana maya pañña, the wisdom of insight, the wisdom of direct understanding. That wisdom comes and goes. But when it's not there, sometimes it's kind of amazing. It's like we see something so clearly, and it's just so obvious. How can I not see this? And when you're in that space of seeing, that wisdom is so obvious and so clear, the mind just cannot even fathom not understanding it. Because it's so obvious.

And yet, the nature of delusion is that it comes back, wisdom diminishes, and then it's like, "What was it? What was it that I thought I knew?" And I guess maybe it wasn't so obvious after all.

So sometimes when wisdom falls away, one of the tricks, one of the things we have to encourage ourselves about, is to not doubt that wisdom was present. Not to doubt that we had that experience, but to understand these cycles of wisdom appearing and falling apart, delusion arising, delusion passing away. If we can understand this as cycles, then rather than feeling like we've done something wrong or made a mistake when wisdom goes away, we can draw on that wisdom through reflecting. "Oh, I understood. It was all conditioned. It was all just nature. Just things tumbling on." And as we're feeling ourselves caught in these conditions, we can remind ourselves, "Okay, that was an understanding. It's just conditioned."

Sometimes if we bring those thoughts in, those dharma understandings into our minds, it can create a little bit of space for the mind to be less reactive about that presence of delusion again, about that reactive mind state. So I encourage this use of wisdom consciously—consciously using wisdom to support a kind of relaxing with whatever is, whatever you might be struggling with.

So this third kind of wisdom, bhavana maya pañña, wisdom at work in the mind—this is when wisdom is arising and there's a direct experiential understanding of something. There are so many ways this happens. I'm just going to describe some that I've experienced. You may recognize some of these. And this is part of my hope—that you recognize these descriptions, some of them at least, and recognize that wisdom is already taking root, already growing.

I think one of the first kinds of wisdom to appear is when we, through this curiosity, this practice of mindfulness—of just asking, what is this right now? What is the experience? What is the human experience of frustration arising? What is the human experience of wanting arising?

As we start to turn and meet that experience with mindfulness, one of the shifts we can see is a dropping of resistance to a state toward which we've had some reactivity. Frustration, for instance—we don't like frustration. We want it to go away. It doesn't feel good. Frustration is unpleasant vedana, and we tend not to like unpleasant vedana. So we resist it.

But as we turn toward it, we recognize, "Oh, there's frustration and resistance." We might start to see, "Oh, it's just frustration." And there's some space. A little bit of space, and it's kind of like, "Wow. It's not a problem. It's just frustration." That feeling of "this is just some state of mind"—that's wisdom at work. Wisdom actually allowing the release of the resistance, opening to "this is what's happening."

Or it might also be, "Oh, there's frustration and there's resistance, and—oh, that's what's happening. There's frustration and I don't like it. Oh, that's what's happening." Again, some space around it.

I sometimes liken this to being in a car that's going really fast. You're in the driver's seat, your foot on the gas pedal, speeding down the freeway. That kind of momentum is what our minds do when they're caught in some state. And if we want to slow down, one of the most organic ways to do so—especially if we're on a freeway with other cars around us—isn't to slam on the brake. Someone would slam into us from behind. A safer way might be to simply take your foot off the gas pedal, put the car into neutral, and then steer, hopefully steering the car to a stop.

Sometimes wisdom functions in just this way—it puts the mind into neutral. Instead of keeping the foot on the gas pedal of frustration's momentum, where the gas pedal is all the thoughts about that frustration—"That person shouldn't have done that, and I'd better figure out how to tell them what to do and why they need to do it this way and not that way"—we can recognize it, step back, and know: "Ah, this experience here and now, this is frustration."

Taking the foot off the gas pedal doesn't mean that experience of frustration will just come to a stop—like taking your foot off the gas pedal in a moving car. But if you don't keep putting your foot back on the gas pedal, it will come to a stop. Just watching the momentum with this sense of "this is just"—the wisdom of "this is just"—can witness a pattern weaken, slowly fall apart, and maybe even end.

Another kind of wisdom we might experience is when we truly begin to recognize that something arising—a thought, perhaps—is just a thought happening in the present moment. Many of our thoughts, as Philip mentioned last night and this morning, relate to past and future.

The difference between recognizing a thought as just a thought is profound. A thought about the past—the past doesn't exist. All there is, is now. Our minds create the past by creating these thoughts and believing them. Our minds create the future by creating these thoughts and believing them. There's no more past. Now, there were conditions that led here, so certainly we're not living in an isolated moment. But the past doesn't exist anymore. It's gone. Those thoughts arising about the past are arising now. That's what's happening in the present moment—a thought of the past arising now. Or a thought of the future arising now.

So we see, we begin to see that what's going on—the only thing that's going on—is something that's happening now. This is kind of a mind-blowing version of reality. That is the truth. Wisdom helps us to see this.

And again, it helps us to then have a skillful relationship. Not to say that we're not supposed to think about the past and remember what happened, but that we recognize it's a thought happening now. That's the wisdom piece of it. When we recognize the experience as something happening now, there can be a more skillful relationship with it. There's some level of choice we have about how or whether to engage with that thought. So wisdom creates that space for us to know: this is just happening now.

And with that we also can start to see not only a thought happening now, but that a whole complex of stuff often arises based on something like a thought happening now—that creates whole patterns of suffering.

I had an example of this in my early days of practice, in my early months of practice. I don't think I was doing much in the way of meditating, but when I first started practicing I was interested in exploring the patterns of my mind, and so I started doing that in daily life. I started watching anger come and go in daily life. That was my very first mindfulness practice. And I started being curious about states of mind that were pretty habitual. Loneliness was a really powerful one for me.

So I noticed at one point that loneliness was arising every night as I went to bed. And I just got curious about it, just noticing it—okay, loneliness, that's what's happening now. After some nights of that, I began to recognize, to my surprise, one night I noticed when I picked up my alarm clock to set it, that's when the loneliness started. I was like, what does that have to do with anything? I just kept noticing. This pattern continued for a few more nights.

And then one night, while I was setting the alarm clock, I had a memory of my ex-partner who had broken up with me. This was the source of this anger—this ex-partner had broken up with me. I had a memory of being together with my partner at Disneyland, looking up at a marquee that had a digital clock on it in Tomorrowland. So there was a connection. I could see a connection between what I was doing, the physical experience of setting the alarm clock, and the memory that arose about being in Disneyland with my partner. And then I saw that the loneliness was arising in dependence on that memory. "Oh, I'm going to be lonely forever, the rest of my life. I'm never going to get to do fun things like that again. Nobody's ever going to love me again." The loneliness was coming up based on that thought.

So this is what we start to see—and actually that was mind-blowing to me, just to see that. But what was even more amazing was the next night when I set the alarm clock. I of course remembered that thought. It had been clearly seen. But the loneliness didn't come up anymore. It was like seeing that the mind had constructed the loneliness out of a thought that arose. The mind just stopped doing that. I didn't have to do anything. I didn't have to say, "Oh, I'm not going to be lonely," or "I'm going to try to let go of loneliness." That was wisdom. That's wisdom that does that. Wisdom had seen that the mind was reacting to a thought, constructing something based on a thought, and then feeling bad about what had been constructed.

This kind of thing happens all over the place. And we can start to see it. When we can start to see a thought arising—we're walking down the hill, we see somebody, we see a thought about that person—we might see that thought and then realize we get all kinds of views and opinions and agendas and ideas about that person based on that thought. When we see that, we can recognize: wow, maybe we're thinking that that person is thinking something about us. And we see, wow, that's all just constructed in the mind. We have no idea what's going on in their mind.

So seeing that—a moment of a thought arising and how our mind constructs things based on just arisings—that too is wisdom. We see the way human minds work. It's awesome. And it's humbling.

Sometimes wisdom operates in a really startling way. When mindfulness is particularly clear, or there's a certain momentum of mindfulness, we're present for something and we get curious.

I had this happen at one point. I was feeling abandoned by my teachers between part one and part two of the three-month retreat. My first-half teachers left, much as they do here, and the second-half teachers were arriving. I felt completely abandoned by my teachers from the first part.

So I was feeling that abandonment and noticing it, and I'd been taught that you can hold yourself with compassion for these feelings. I was envisioning myself as a four-year-old because it felt like a four-year-old kind of abandoned energy. I was holding myself in my mind with this energy, and at some point this curiosity arose: What is this feeling of abandonment anyway? I turned to look at it—and it was gone. It had just vanished.

When I went to describe this to my new teacher who had arrived, I said, "I don't know how to investigate emotions because here's what happened. I was holding myself with compassion and feeling that abandonment, and then I got curious, and I couldn't find it. So I must not know how to investigate emotions."

And she said, "Does that feel like you don't know how to investigate emotions? Or was that just what happened?"

I said, "Well, that's what happened."

She said, "Trust your experience."

That was a great lesson for me. Trust your experience. That was wisdom—the kind of mind that gets curious. What's this? Some of you may have experienced that. Wow, what's this? And suddenly it's not even there to look at anymore. That's wisdom at work. Unwholesome states of mind, met with strong wisdom, can simply vanish.

And yet I want to say, it's not that you're doing anything wrong if when you turn to investigate something—turn to investigate abandonment—it doesn't just vanish. There are many, many times when that happens too. I'm just describing some of the ways this can be felt, can be experienced.

Another way that wisdom functions, that wisdom operates in our mind, is by being present such that unwholesome states don't arise at all. We've talked about paying attention to the presence and absence of our states of mind. In the fourth foundation of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta, particularly in the exploration of the hindrances, it talks about noticing when the hindrances are not arising. So not only the absence—it says something like noticing the non-arising of the un-arisen state of ill will. Something like that. It's that quality of the state simply not arising. When wisdom is present, some of these unwholesome states don't arise, and we can begin to recognize the non-arising of these reactive states of mind.

So what are some ways that we can notice that? Sometimes the recognition of a reactive state not arising is more of an understanding than an actual experience. Keep that in mind here.

Sometimes we understand that a reactive state is not arising because we see conditions happening in our life—and some of you have talked about this. Conditions happen on retreat where, in a previous retreat or if this thing were happening in our daily lives, we know that we would be reactive. But it's not happening. It's that space of, Wow, this feels different. I know that if somebody had jumped in front of me in the lunch line last week, that would have been a problem. There would have been a lot of aversion. But now it's just—seeing is happening.

That too is wisdom at work. The wisdom is present, supporting the non-arising of reactivity.

defilement of that reactive state.

Sometimes we can also see more directly a kind of momentum towards a familiar habitual pattern, and then watch that momentum simply wither.

An example might make this easier to describe. This practice of watching my anger, noticing it early in my practice—I was spending a lot of time simply noticing the presence of anger, noticing when it arose. One day I was doing something quite ordinary. I wasn't even particularly trying to be mindful. I was in my kitchen preparing a meal, cutting an apple. At some point while cutting the apple, I noticed a thought about my ex-partner—being with my ex-partner at a fruit stand.

Again, noticing this connection, seeing the conditioned nature of experience, seeing that this thought was dependent on the fact that I was seeing an apple while cutting it. And when that thought arose in the mind, there was this urge to jump on it, to think more thoughts, to get angry. It felt like momentum, this force of habit—whenever my ex-partner had arisen in my mind, anger had been so close on the heels. There was so much connection that it was like a force of habit.

But the mind was pretty present, and it saw this momentum. In that moment there was a recognition: anger's not present, but there's this urge to get angry.

That itself was a kind of mind-blowing moment. Why on earth would the mind want to get angry? Because having understood, in the previous several months of noticing anger, wisdom had begun to recognize that anger doesn't feel very good. Anger is suffering.

So in that moment when the mind saw the momentum to get angry, and knew very deeply from all those months of paying attention to anger and feeling the suffering of it, the mind recognized: that way lies suffering. And it just let go. It was like reaching for a pot, feeling the heat, and withdrawing because you know it's dangerous. The body just knows. The body does that automatically. It was that kind of letting go. That way lies suffering. Don't go there.

Again, it wasn't something I had to try—"Oh, let go of that thought." It was wisdom itself that said, "That way lies suffering. Don't go there."

That was a very direct recognition of the non-arising of anger. That moment I just described—that was the moment I got hooked on this practice. That was a faith moment. Actually, I kind of sank to my knees. The mind can see that happen and let go, not be whipped around by that pain of anger? This practice can do that?

I'm in. I'm in. I'm in.

So again, that's wisdom. That's wisdom at work. Wisdom saw the anger not arise, very directly saw the anger not arise.

Wisdom can operate in these obvious ways—seeing something and watching it fall apart, or seeing and feeling space around it. And sometimes wisdom operates more slowly, in the background.

I've had experiences of simply working with a pattern. Again, anger—I worked with anger for years at the beginning of my practice. Years of noticing it. And for a period of time, I recognized that trying to bring mindfulness to that anger was actually sinking me into the quicksand of the anger. At some point I recognized: this isn't helpful, trying to be mindful of the anger. So I see you, anger, and I bow to you, but I'm going to put my attention somewhere else. You can stay in the room with me, but I'm going to put my attention on my feet.

I'm going to notice my hands, I'm going to notice here—just something to step aside from the anger.

I did that for a couple of years with this particular pattern, this anger toward a particular person. Very strong anger. And over those couple of years, that pattern just grew weaker and weaker and weaker. Every now and then the anger would come, and I'd notice it: "Oh, I see that anger." Okay, just set it aside. I did that over and over again for a long time.

And then one day I thought, "Wow, I haven't experienced that in a long time. I wonder what happened to it." And I couldn't find it. Even reflecting on the person I had been so angry with—it was gone. I could not even conjure it up anymore. It disappeared when I wasn't looking.

This too is a way that wisdom can work—this very gradual, almost in-the-background kind of wisdom. We don't have to bore into all of our patterns, figure them out, pull them apart. Sometimes we can just let them be, and wisdom can do its work that way too.

So these moments, these small moments of seeing, of wisdom—as we recognize them, they're a pointer for us. They're a pointer to the possibility of freedom. They're heading us in that direction. So let yourself acknowledge them. Acknowledge these patterns, these little moments of freedom. Appreciate them.

As we see this, it can begin to inspire a sense of confidence that yes, there is value to this practice. Recognizing the value of the practice is probably the single most important quality that will help you stay on the path. It can serve you when it feels like nothing's happening. Remembering, reflecting back—how was it five years ago, and how is it now? Wisdom has changed things.

These recognitions support us to carry on.

CHAPTER 113

The Mindfulness Factor of Awakening

Andrea Fella · 52 min

In this talk from a month-long retreat, Andrea Fella offers a nuanced exploration of mindfulness (sati) as the first of the seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga) as taught in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). Rather than discussing how to cultivate mindfulness, she invites practitioners to investigate mindfulness itself—recognizing its presence and absence, understanding how it arises, and noticing how it strengthens into a powerful force for liberation.

Drawing on insights from her teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya and the writings of Nyanaponika Thera, Andrea presents the seven awakening factors as an interconnected flow: mindfulness, investigation (dhammavicaya), and energy (vīriya) constitute the work of practice, while rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā) arise naturally as fruits. She distinguishes between "prompted" and "unprompted" mindfulness from the Abhidhamma, highlighting the spontaneous re-arising of awareness as a powerful doorway for investigation.

The talk offers practical guidance for daily life and retreat practice: using moments when the wandering mind returns as opportunities to feel mindfulness re-arising, noticing habitual patterns where awareness gets lost, and recognizing how deepening practice can create unfamiliar territory that temporarily destabilizes attention. Andrea emphasizes the nonjudgmental quality of the Buddha's instructions—simply noticing presence and absence—and how this curiosity about awareness itself naturally orients the heart toward freedom and well-being.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Fourth Foundation of Mindfulness, we've been talking about the various Dharma perspectives that are offered and the frameworks through which we can know our experience. These frameworks essentially help to point us in the direction of freedom.

One of the frameworks offered in the Fourth Foundation is the seven factors of awakening. This is a beautiful list of wholesome qualities that we could say are supports for awakening. The list consists of mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture—also sometimes framed as rapt interest—tranquility, concentration, and equanimity.

These qualities are cultivated as we practice wise mindfulness. We can see how some of this works in our practice: just the meeting of experience with wise mindfulness, exploring "What is this? What is this?" In some ways, this practice of mindfulness is a practice of equanimity—learning how to be balanced, non-reactive to things as they are arising. And this, of course, cultivates concentration, stillness of mind.

There are different ways these factors are understood. One that I particularly appreciate comes from my teacher, Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He says that they flow one to another. If we start with wise mindfulness, begin meeting our experience, we naturally investigate what's helpful and what's not helpful, what leads to ease and peace and what leads to more contraction and suffering. This is the second factor of investigation. And these two together begin to arouse energy in the direction of practice. A sense of confidence arises and the direction of our minds orients towards the Dharma. The energy that arises around practice directs us to the practice.

My teacher says that these first three factors are the work of our practice. We engage with mindfulness, investigation, and energy. The rest of the seven factors are the fruits of the practice. We can't make them happen so much, but very naturally, as we investigate and have energy directed to the practice, a sense of delight and rapt interest begins to arise around our experience. We get really curious about what's going on. The stability of mind begins to create a base of tranquility. But it's not that we necessarily say, "Be tranquil." We don't do tranquility as much as it arises. Concentration arises as a result of mindfulness and energy coming together, stabilizing mindfulness over time. And all of them together—the mindfulness, the energy, the tranquility, and the concentration—create the conditions for equanimity to arise.

So in a way, the first three factors are our work, and those three create the conditions for the others to arise. That's one way to understand the seven factors. Yet it is also possible to do practices to support all of them. Later in the retreat we will be exploring equanimity practice in the Brahma Viharas, consciously orienting the mind towards equanimity—in particular, equanimity around relationship. And Philip was pointing the other day to perhaps, for just short moments of time, being able to incline the mind towards tranquility, letting thought fall away for even a few seconds at a time. That may be a way to orient towards this enlightenment factor of tranquility. So both they are results of the practice, and we can incline and orient towards their cultivation.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the instructions around these seven factors are pretty simple. I'll read the section about mindfulness. As is usual for these lists, the instruction is repeated for each of the factors. So I'll read the instructions for mindfulness, and you can understand that this applies to all seven:

"There being the mindfulness enlightenment factor present, one understands, 'There is the mindfulness enlightenment factor in me.' Or there being no mindfulness enlightenment factor present, one understands, 'There is no mindfulness enlightenment factor in me.' And one also understands how there comes to be the arising of the unarisen mindfulness enlightenment factor, and how the arisen mindfulness enlightenment factor comes to fulfillment by development."

Basically: noticing the presence or absence of mindfulness, noticing its arising, and noticing how it becomes strengthened—how that enlightenment factor becomes powerful. I'll describe a little bit of my understanding of the distinction between simple mindfulness and the enlightenment factor of mindfulness.

One of my favorite authors is a monk who died some years ago, Nyanaponika Thera. He wrote an article called "The Power of Mindfulness." It was very inspiring to me that as mindfulness strengthens, it's not something we do so much as it becomes a state that we are living in, one that orients us towards the Dharma, towards understanding and wisdom. It really becomes a power in us. And to me, when it becomes continuous and stable, that is when it becomes the foundation for awakening.

And so these simple practices: Is the factor present? Is it absent? How does it arise and how does it come to fulfillment? Again, this kind of highlights the non-judgmental nature of the practice the Buddha taught. He says notice when it's present, notice when it's absent. The very noticing of that begins to instruct our hearts, really. Begins to teach our hearts what's helpful and what's not helpful.

As we sit here in this room practicing together, I think you all know when mindfulness is present and you are in the place of just witnessing. Maybe it's witnessing something really painful and challenging, and yet the heart doesn't clench necessarily around it when mindfulness is strong. When mindfulness is strong, when there's curiosity and balance of mind, the heart can feel relaxed, even if something difficult is happening. We can notice this.

And when there is a struggle, we can also be aware of that struggle and perhaps recognize, "Oh yes, this is caught. Caught is happening." We can be aware when the factor of mindfulness is not as strong as it sometimes is—not as a way to beat ourselves up or flagellate ourselves and tell ourselves we're a poor meditator, but simply to begin to recognize: What leads towards awakening? What leads towards freedom? And what leads towards dukkha?

The language in these texts is so balanced. Notice it's present. Notice it's absent. Very naturally, as we notice its presence and absence, the mind begins to orient more and more in the direction of freedom.

I think this is partly the way we just work as organisms. When we turn our attention with mindfulness to challenge and feel the heart relax around that with mindfulness, the heart moves in that direction because, I think very inherently, very deeply, our organism wants to orient towards well-being.

And kind of poignantly, our strategies—and Greg was talking about this last night—all of our strategies of how we are in the world, well, they're trying to get us to well-being. But because we're not seeing clearly, because delusion is present, we mistakenly think that these patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion will somehow be what leads us towards well-being. But when we with mindfulness begin to open, with wise mindfulness begin to open to what's actually going on, the heart begins to understand at a deeper level what lies in the direction of ease and peace and deeper well-being, and what lies in the direction of more suffering.

I think the instructions in this teaching on the four foundations of mindfulness are really counting on this very natural process—that as we turn our attention with mindfulness to our experience, our heart gets the lessons of well-being and begins to very naturally move in that direction. It's a wonderful thing. It's a really wonderful thing.

So tonight I don't want to try to go over all of these seven factors of awakening. I'd like to just explore the practice of mindfulness. What does it mean to recognize the presence of the mindfulness factor of awakening? What does it mean to recognize it's not present?

This is a different level, in a way, of a talk on mindfulness. Often when we talk about mindfulness we're discussing how we pay attention, how we cultivate this capacity to be attentive to our experience. Here what I'd like to explore is: How do we recognize mindfulness itself? How do we know this quality itself? This is what the Buddha is suggesting. Recognize mindfulness. Get to know mindfulness. Get to know what happens when it's not there. In a way, this is encouraging us to investigate mindfulness itself.

I will give a heads up on this talk, because very often in my own language—I'd say influenced by Sayadaw U Tejaniya—I often use the word awareness as synonymous with mindfulness. So I may slip between those two. In this talk, I mean the same thing. I'm not using them in a different way. When I say awareness, I mean mindfulness.

One of the ways to investigate or be curious about mindfulness in this way of noticing its presence and absence is to basically begin to explore both sides of a phenomenon that's really common. You have all experienced this many times today.

The wandering mind is essentially mindfulness going away. When the mind returns from wandering, mindfulness is back. And so we can look at the wandering mind—we can flip it around. Instead of thinking of it as an issue or a problem, we recognize that the wandering mind is helping us explore the presence and absence of mindfulness.

I've actually used this to my advantage. Anytime the mind wanders and I wake up again, I reflect, "Oh great, I've got an opportunity to see mindfulness re-arising." This is what the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta instructs us to do: notice mindfulness arising.

There's a lot we can learn about our minds as we explore mindfulness coming and going. First of all, we see the patterns that tend to stick us to them so that we lose mindfulness. We get familiar with the common ways that we get stuck. We also see—in spades—that the mind is out of control. It's not our fault. It's a process unfolding. Sometimes mindfulness is present, sometimes mindfulness is absent.

And yet there are conditions that can be inserted into this stream—one of them being sitting here in the room listening to a dharma talk on exploring mindfulness coming and going—that will create the conditions for curiosity, investigation, exploration of what's going on. And things change. It feels like I'm doing the practice, and yet really it's a process tumbling on, informed and conditioned by many other situations, conditions, phenomena.

We sit down to meditate and we try. "I'm going to be present." If there's an "I" in there, that "I" wants to be present, at least some of the time. When we sit down particularly, it's like, "Yes, I'm going to do this. I'm going to stay present." But how long does that last? If there were an "I" who had control, we wouldn't lose mindfulness. It's not self. And so we see this.

This exploration of watching mindfulness come and go—at least for me—has really helped to lessen the judging mind around the fact that the mind does wander. The moment mindfulness returns, that's an opportunity to see mindfulness re-arising. When I began reorienting around that as a practice—asking, "What does it feel like for mindfulness to come back?"—I found that moment to be really amazing. It's like, who did that? Again, that too is not self. You're just sitting there lost, and suddenly mindfulness comes back.

If there can be an interest in what it feels like for mindfulness to re-arise, then there's less of a tendency—at least I found for myself—to be frustrated or judge myself for having gotten lost in thought. It's like, "Oh, another opportunity! Can I see mindfulness re-arising? Can I see what happens?"

For me, this is one of the best places to begin exploring mindfulness itself: the moment that we remember. We've been lost in thought and we remember mindfulness. Actually, mindfulness remembers itself. It's not that we remember it. Mindfulness arises spontaneously, effortlessly. It's fantastic. We don't have to do it. It's just there.

In that moment, what is that like? I think I mentioned the other day that in the moment of mindfulness re-arising, it can take some time to attune to this investigation. When I started exploring this, I would be back, and I'd already be back with the breath before I even recognized that mindfulness had returned. It was as if there was this automatic thing happening—the mind came back into mindfulness, and some knee-jerk process of practicing mindfulness with the breath had already taken me back to the breath before I even noticed, "Oh, I'm aware." That's kind of an amazing thing too, isn't it?

So I began being curious. Wherever it was that I woke up, recognizing mindfulness is back, I was just curious: What is it? What is it like to be aware now? What is that experience?

And as we explore it, particularly in the moment when mindfulness comes back, the more we get curious about that moment itself—that moment of mindfulness coming back—there's a contrast between what it's like now for mindfulness to be present and what it was like just a moment before when we were lost in thought. We can begin to get a flavor of the difference, that difference of the light coming on, of mindfulness re-arising. So just beginning to notice that, getting a sense of that quality of awareness, of mindfulness itself.

We usually cultivate mindfulness with what I might call prompted mindfulness. There's a phrase in the Abhidhamma, the Buddhist psychology, describing two different ways mindfulness operates. One is called prompted mindfulness, and one is called unprompted mindfulness.

Prompted mindfulness is when we're already mindful and we're reminding ourselves: be aware, pay attention, know what you're paying attention to. That's a lot of the way we think cultivating mindfulness happens, and it's a lot of what we do here. When we are aware, we gently incline towards continuing awareness, often by attending to some specific experience like the breath or connecting with an object of attention. We prompt, we remind ourselves to be aware. The noting practice is a kind of prompting practice in a way, just reminding ourselves: aware, being aware. Sayadaw U Tejaniya uses those reminders: Am I aware? What am I aware of? Those are prompts for mindfulness. We don't even remember to ask the question unless we're already aware. So there's this prompted mindfulness.

Unprompted mindfulness is the spontaneous arising of mindfulness. And this is a way that we can begin to also cultivate mindfulness—to recognize this quality of mindfulness re-arising. What we see as we start to get familiar with that, what I've seen in my own practice around this, is that getting familiar with the moment of mindfulness returning begins to point out to us that it happens way more than we think it does. It's happening all over the place. It's just that frequently what happens as those little bubbles of mindfulness come up is that mindfulness will re-arise and then it'll land on something. We see a bird and then we start thinking about birds and what kind of bird it is. There's been a moment, a little flash of awareness, and then very quickly it goes because we're not so attuned to feeling that moment of mindfulness arising. Yet when we can start to get attuned to it, the familiarity with it makes it kind of point itself out to us.

This one practice is my favorite daily life practice: simply noticing mindfulness returning over and over and over again. As we begin to see how much that actually happens, it weaves a thread of little blips of mindfulness throughout our day. And here, we actually have an opportunity to really string those together into a strong, powerful continuity of mindfulness—the awakening factor of mindfulness.

So in that moment of remembering, just see if you can be curious about awareness. What is this awareness? Get familiar with that.

It's also useful, I find, to explore when you know that you're aware, being curious about what that's like. You could play with this from time to time. If you are in a place where you're with the breath or attending to a flow of experience, you're knowing pretty clearly that there's a momentum, just check in. What is awareness? There's awareness and there's what's known in awareness. These are different sides to the equation: the awareness and what's known. Often in our mindfulness practice we can emphasize what's known and not be quite as familiar with the awareness itself.

And so the practice that Sayadaw U Tejaniya suggests of just asking, "Am I aware?"—as I said, if you ask that question, you are already aware. When I teach this, I often get the question: what's the point? Why bother? You're already aware, why bother asking the question? The point of asking the question is to highlight or be curious about awareness. What is aware? We don't often get curious about what awareness actually is.

We're oriented to be curious about what we are aware of, not that we are aware. And that question—"Am I aware?"—highlights or encourages a curiosity about awareness itself. So you could play with that. Maybe the question could be something like, "What is awareness?"

Or sometimes I just use the simple word: aware.

When I first started practicing with this, I knew I was aware. It was clear—I knew I was aware. But I did not know how I knew I was aware. What I'd like to suggest, and this may happen for you also, is that you not try to figure out how you know that you're aware. Rather, simply know that you're aware and take it in. "Yes, I know I'm aware." It's kind of mysterious. I know that I'm aware. Just take that in—that you know that you're aware.

If you explore this over and over again, there begins to be a recognition or an understanding of what awareness is over time. I often suggest it's not like turning around and looking at awareness. It's not like turning back. It's more like stepping back. "Aware—what is aware?" Stepping back and knowing that you are aware, and just getting familiar with that experience.

Right now, do you know that you're aware? Just know that. That's enough right now. Do you know that you're aware?

So the exploration of mindfulness itself can happen in that moment when we recognize mindfulness returning. We can also be curious about the other side of the equation: Where does mindfulness get lost? Where does it go out? Where does it get hooked? There are so many ways that we get lost. We probably each have some very familiar, habitual ways that mindfulness gets lost.

Getting curious about how you lose awareness—how it happens, where it happens, when it happens. This curiosity is not about trying to force some kind of continuity. In fact, it's very different. It's more about recognizing, "Oh, I'm losing awareness in that situation. Let's see if we can understand what happens there, that awareness goes away." A kind of curiosity about how we're mindful and then the sand dribbles out of the bucket. How does that happen?

We can start to recognize perhaps places or locations. One thing I began noticing in my retreats is that there seemed to be particular activities or places where I would lose awareness. Washing dishes, maybe, or going into my room. If I had a single room—if I had a double, it was actually an incentive to continue mindfulness in the room because my roommate might walk in at any moment. But when I was alone, I could close the door and go, "Whew!" What's that about? What's going on there?

You may find that the bathroom is a mindfulness drain, or your yogi jobs, or if you decide to take a walk instead of doing the formal walking meditation. Just notice for yourself what aspects of your day you tend to lose mindfulness. Not to judge it, but rather as we start to notice the areas or places or ways that we lose mindfulness, then as we're heading into that activity or place, we can bring some attention.

I'll tell a story from my own practice. On one retreat, I was doing this kind of practice—where do I lose mindfulness?—and I kept noticing that I was waking up staring at myself in the mirror. I had lost mindfulness, but I was waking up while staring at myself in the mirror. Okay, for some reason I lose awareness here.

So I just started being curious about that. Not trying to force myself. This is not about doubling down and trying to force yourself to stay present while you're in front of a mirror, or wherever it is, in your room. It's more about curiosity. What is it that happens here?

I just explored this, and it took a long time—well, a long time on a month-long retreat. It probably took a week or so for me to really begin to see what was going on. And it wasn't some deep-seated longing to be seen or anything like that. It was just that I had a habit of looking at myself in the mirror and I was unaware.

At one point I recognized the place where I really saw this, as I was being curious about being in the bathroom where the mirror was. And of course the mind will blame things. At first I was blaming Spirit Rock for putting mirrors everywhere. It's their fault that I'm losing mindfulness! And then I began to just recognize, okay, this is in the mind here. What's going on?

I would notice that I was washing my hands and I hadn't yet looked up at the mirror. And then I would notice I was staring at myself in the mirror. Oh! Wow, look at that. Missed it again. Wow, isn't that amazing? So again, it was just the curiosity, the amazement of seeing that within a space of three seconds, I could lose mindfulness.

And then one day while I was washing my hands, I noticed the intention to look up. That was where I just saw this was a habit—just a habit to look at myself in the mirror while washing my hands. When I saw that, when I was able to see that intention, I don't know exactly how it worked, but it just created the conditions for more continuity in that place.

So curiosity about where you lose awareness, what happens there—this is powerful practice. We also often lose awareness in states of mind: boredom, depression, anger. I think we each have our favorite patterns that we tend to get lost in. And again, there's a possibility of being curious. The pattern of exploration here is to begin to see: where do we go out?

First, the practice is noticing where do we wake up. We learn about our familiar patterns of getting lost because we find ourselves waking up over and over again—in a fantasy that was meant to counteract boredom, or in a low-level grade of depression, or fighting with somebody in our minds. We see our patterns over and over again as we wake up. Just that beginning to get familiar—waking up into depression, or waking up into a fantasy that's pulling us away from boredom, touching into the boredom—as we get familiar with those states of mind through waking up into them, then we can start to see how they have a sticky quality. We can begin to see them arising.

This is in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta: the teaching around the hindrances is to notice when they arise. And so getting familiar with the way boredom arises—one of the things I found around boredom in my own practice is that sometimes experience would get really ordinary. It's not so special anymore. Kind of neutral. And the mind would just sink a little bit.

When we notice we're in the terrain of one of these familiar states, we can increase the curiosity, kind of like I did with the practice around the mirror. Just increase the curiosity. What happens? Why is this so sticky? Investigating where there's a pull to get lost in this. And as we get more familiar with what it's like to be mindful, we can begin to feel mindfulness weakening. We can get curious about that. What's happening there when mindfulness is weakening?

Let me offer one more example of exploring mindfulness getting lost. This one I really want to bring in because at this point in the retreat, this is happening for some of you.

I've heard you talking about this in the meetings. As the practice starts to deepen, sometimes awareness gets lost—not because we're losing interest or motivation to practice, but because the practice is deepening. Sometimes the conditions become unfamiliar enough that mindfulness gets lost. I'd like to describe a couple of ways this can happen.

One is what we sometimes call the purity-purification cycle. There are times, and I know several of you have described this, when you have a few hours or an afternoon, maybe even longer, of just this flow of awareness and open heart. It's one of those great stretches where you think, "How can I not just see this? Why would the mind do anything else?" You're just in that flow. And then suddenly anger comes back. Something happens in the dining room and everything explodes. What's going on?

This kind of pattern is very common, so if you've experienced it, you're right on track. One of the things that happens is that as the heart opens, it sometimes creates the conditions for those more latent tendencies underneath to arise—things that we've had a lid put on for a while. They sense that there's some room to come out. In effect, the purity has created the conditions for something that's been buried to come into our awareness. And we've been learning that it's the mindfulness, the coming into consciousness, where it can be freed, where it can be released. So it doesn't have to be a problem. This is simply the flow: purity, purification.

Another way I've seen mindfulness get lost as the practice settles is that we become familiar with how mindfulness feels with particular kinds of experience, particular kinds of objects—like being in a flow where you're effortlessly noticing sights and sounds and smells and body sensations, and another sound. It's a nice flow of experience, and there's a flow of mindfulness there.

Yet what often happens as mindfulness gets more continuous—and I'm going to use a hand gesture here, so if you have your eyes closed you might open them—is that mindfulness is meeting objects, and as it gets more and more continuous, it seems as though the mindfulness gets interested in new things, a different set of stuff, maybe some subtler level of experience. The mindfulness has actually dropped down to be interested in something else. But our agenda has us up here, looking for those familiar things, remembering how much fun it was being up here. Mindfulness will get lost because we're not tracking what it's connecting with.

I'll give an example. I was paying attention to the breath, and I could see that the attention was right with the breath. Then at some point I began feeling like the mindfulness weakened and left the breath. There was enough presence of mind, seeing the mindfulness weaken, that I thought, "Oh, come back to the breath." It would weaken again. And again the agenda: "Oh, come back to the breath."

This happened quite a few times, this weakening of the attention to the breath. At some point I recognized the attention was weakening with the breath, but the mindfulness was there. I didn't know exactly what it was doing, but I knew I was aware. Instead of having the agenda to say, "Okay, come back to the breath," it was like, "Well, I'm mindful—let's see what it's doing." And it dropped into a different level of experience. Until that point, I had been mostly attending to and knowing very simple, precise objects like breath and body. What this opened me to was vastness—a different kind of experience the mind was being drawn to in that continuity. And my agenda had me wanting to come back, come back, come back.

So sometimes, as the mind begins to weaken its attention to something, we can be curious: What is it doing? What's happening there?

There are different experiences we can have when mindfulness is strong. And this is another piece: if we find our way to a certain kind of clarity of mindfulness, really clear and precise knowing, we can have the sense or idea that that's it, that's what we're supposed to be doing. And that's one way it feels when mindfulness is continuous. I don't know how many ways there are that it feels as mindfulness is continuous, because I've experienced many different ones now that I've let go of trying to find a particular state. Rather, I've become curious: "Oh, awareness is here. What's this? What's this?"

Those vast states or foggy states or states of low energy—awareness can be very clear of something that is very fuzzy. And so it can have a very different feeling than what we might normally think of as clarity.

Exploring the mindfulness itself, the coming and going of mindfulness, getting familiar with the quality of mindfulness itself, really begins to support the continuity. It supports that stability of mindfulness, which is what creates the power of mindfulness. That's where it becomes an enlightenment factor—mindfulness joined with wisdom, steady. The steadiness of that.

And that is onward leading, because the perspective of wise mindfulness has that kind of alignment with our organism of wanting to head towards well-being. It's onward leading to these other factors of awakening and to freedom.

There's so much to see. Sometimes Joseph would say, "The Dharma is vast." It's amazing what we can see if we let go of our ideas of what it's supposed to be like, or how I'm supposed to be doing anything, and just be curious. Aware of what? What's here?

So let's sit for a moment. Are you aware? What's awareness?

CHAPTER 114

Deepening Trust

Andrea Fella · 46 min

In this profound talk, Andrea Fella examines the evolution of trust (saddhā) in meditation practice, drawing on Gil Fronsdal's teaching that "the present moment is trustable if we are present for it." She frames this exploration through the five faculties (pañca indriya)—faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—showing how they form not a linear progression but a deepening spiral where each quality reinforces the others.

Fella traces how trust transforms through practice: beginning with "borrowed faith" from teachers and teachings, moving to trust in our own direct experience of wisdom, and eventually expanding toward trusting the unknown itself. She explores several edges of trust that practitioners encounter—the shift from doing practice to simply being present, the challenge of watching mindfulness slip away without doubling down on effort, and the willingness to open to vague or unfamiliar experiences rather than clinging to what feels known and precise.

The talk offers practical guidance for navigating the waves of wisdom and delusion that characterize practice, emphasizing the importance of discerning when the mind is trustable (when mindfulness and wisdom are present) versus when we need to step back to more foundational supports. Fella concludes with the image of standing at the edge of an abyss—each moment unknown—and the discovery that as we step into not-knowing, we simply arrive at the next moment's edge, ready to trust again.

This morning, the question came up about trust and how perhaps the practice can be seen as ever-expanding circles of trust or widening spheres of trust. And that was precisely the topic that I had in mind for my talk this evening, so that is what we will explore together.

Fairly early in my practice with, at that time, my teacher Gil Fronsdal—now my colleague—he said something about trust and the trustability of practice that has been an ongoing exploration for me. This ended up in his book, so I'll quote it from there: "The present moment is trustable if we are present for it."

For me, early on in my practice, this wasn't so intuitive. And certainly for many of us at various times in our practice, the present moment doesn't feel terribly trustable. If we're caught in anger, caught in confusion, it doesn't feel very trustable. And yet the full quote says, "The present moment is trustable if we are present for it."

Exploring that, what we do begin to see is that if some kind of reactivity is arising in the mind, if we bring wise mindfulness to it—this pairing of sati and pañña—to whatever is arising in the present moment, then the experience is trustable through the mindfulness. It's the wise mindfulness, the mindfulness and wisdom together, that carry the trust. And yet this is an evolution in our practice, an evolving understanding, and not necessarily in a linear way.

Philip was talking the other night about practice unfolding in uneven ways. Sometimes we gain some wisdom in one area and not in another. It's similar around trust. There are ways that we learn to trust some aspects of our practice at certain times, and then at other times we have to begin to discern when the mind is not so trustable. Exploring this evolution of trust, I like the sense of a deepening trust—that the trust gets more and more rooted in us.

There's a teaching the Buddha offers where trust—the Pali term I'm using is saddhā, sometimes translated as faith, confidence, or trust—appears at the very beginning of a list called the five faculties. These are five qualities of mind that in a sense describe the evolution of our practice, the arc of our practice. And yet to me, it's more of a spiral than an arc.

The first of these five qualities is faith. The very way we step onto the path begins with some kind of faith or confidence or trust in something that we've heard, a teaching, some wisdom. We hear that, some part of it resonates with us, and that inspires us to engage with what we've learned.

This is the second of the five faculties: energy. A sense of confidence in some aspect of the teaching inspires an energy to engage with these teachings. And that leads to the cultivation of mindfulness, which is crucial in the wisdom. The wisdom teachings of the Buddha really are framed around understanding our experience through mindfulness practice. So the engagement is towards mindfulness—we engage with becoming aware of what's happening in the present moment.

As we do that, that's the third of the five faculties: faith, energy, mindfulness. Energy and mindfulness together with a sense of direction to the practice lead to the fourth of the five faculties: a stability of mind, concentration.

With that stability of mind, again from the perspective of the exploration that we started with, we had to start from somewhere—hearing some kind of teaching. Turn towards your experience and see what it is like to be a human being having that experience. Perhaps this is a very basic way to frame some of the fundamental wisdom of the Buddha.

As we explore faith, energy, mindfulness, and concentration, then the wisdom—the fifth faculty—begins to arise not as an idea, not as something that somebody has said to us, but as direct experience. We start to really get it. Oh, I see why it's useful to do this. I see why it's helpful to turn and watch anger, to watch confusion, rather than just being lost in the story of it. We directly experience some sense of release or freedom around that state, even as it's continuing to arise. This is some of the wisdom that I spoke about a few talks ago.

We begin to directly experience the wisdom, and this supports our sense of trust in the practice. It encourages us to engage more, which leads to more energy, more directing the mind towards mindfulness, concentration, and more wisdom. These deepen in a spiral. We begin somewhere—we have to begin basically from just hearing the teachings. Yet as we engage, which is so crucial to our practice here, faith is what inspires that engagement. Faith is a stepping onto the path, a sense of trust that, well, maybe this will be useful.

And so this is a kind of description of how our practice evolves through these five faculties—faith being the seed from which the practice really flowers.

It can be helpful perhaps to explore a little, to reflect on this quality of trust or faith or confidence. I know for myself that the word faith was not so evocative. In my upbringing, it was connected with believing in something that was not possible to know. And that just didn't really work for me. So the word faith has been something I've had to play with for a while. The word trust is a little more evocative for me.

What is it that we trust? In our usual lives, what is it that we trust? We trust so many things that are not so reliable. We place our trust on having things—that's what will make me happy, that's what will be reliable. If I have things, if I've accumulated things, if I can arrange my world to be filled with what I want and arrange it to not have things I don't want, that's what will be reliable. But that's not such a helpful place to really place our trust. As we see here, things are quite unreliable.

We place our trust on being someone, on having things, on having people hold certain opinions about us. We try to live our lives such that people will think a certain way about us. And we've seen our own minds—how reliable is it for somebody to have a certain opinion about you? It's not very reliable.

Sometimes we place our trust in our emotions. Not that we'd necessarily do this consciously, but in effect, as we are living our lives and perhaps lost in a reactive emotion, when we're acting out of that reactivity, some part of us has placed trust in the beliefs of that emotion—that acting on this is what is going to bring happiness in some form or other.

It's quite humbling to see what we place our trust in, how unreliable it actually is.

And so the exploration of trust in the practice is beginning to look for perhaps a place that might be a little more trustworthy. This takes some honesty in our own exploration of where we place our trust, beginning to recognize that the usual ways we have approached finding trust, placing our trust in the world, are not reliable.

In my own experience, I was in such a state of dukkha, of suffering, and at some point someone sent me a book that gave me some orientation around the teachings. This was my first real opening to the Buddha's teaching, even though I had read some of the Buddha's words fifteen years earlier.

It's interesting, I think, how the conditions of suffering—at least in some of us—are really needed to be able to hear the hard medicine of the Buddha: that placing our trust in things of the world is not reliable, and that turning to experience, cultivating mindfulness with a perspective of what's this?, with the understanding that stress and suffering are not inherent in what we're experiencing but that the reactivity of the mind is what creates most of our suffering.

There is going to be unpleasant phenomena in the world, of course. And yet the way we've been engaging so much before we really step into the practice is through adjustment—trying to adjust the world for our own minds to be at ease. And thank goodness that's not required to have the heart really at peace.

Yet as we've said over and over again, that heart at peace doesn't mean that we don't then step into action in the world to address injustice, to address things that cause suffering. In fact, that very opening of the heart leads us to want to act to alleviate suffering in the world. And yet this medicine of turning toward our own heart, seeing where we are clinging, where we are struggling—we have to hear this teaching. And sometimes we have to be suffering in order to hear it.

That was the case for me at least. I had read the teachings of the Buddha fifteen years earlier and thought, "Oh, that's a good idea. I'll try that." And it just never really landed. Then when I was really struggling, when I felt like—as it says in the suttas sometimes—"Does anyone know a way or two out of this suffering?" At that point, when you hear something that points you in the direction of freedom, you might be willing to actually engage with it.

And so that's a kind of beginning level of trust in a way—that we hear the teachings, and whether or not they make sense to us, whether or not it makes sense to think about paying attention to anger, bringing attention to reactivity, whether or not that makes sense, perhaps we're willing to try. We're willing to run the experiment, willing to engage. And that is really the place where trust begins.

All of you here on this retreat, I would say, are well beyond this level of trust. You would not come on a month or two-month retreat without this sense of willingness to engage. And so there it is—there is some sense of trust in the practice.

And yet, there are times when we forget. We forget about why we're doing this. Breathing in, breathing out—what does that have to do with anything? We forget. And then we remember. And we forget, and we remember. So even this level of trust is not always so even. We have to remind ourselves: this is the value, this is the purpose of the practice.

Something calls us to engage, something calls us to explore, to try to put these teachings into practice. And this is where the next level or unfolding of trust begins to happen. We start to engage. We begin to see little moments of wisdom arising, like I described a week or so ago—the seeing of how turning towards experience with mindfulness, a reactive experience, leads to a sense of, "Oh, this is just frustration. I can watch this." And what a difference in experience between being caught by frustration and knowing it. Or we see the arising of a pattern, a conditioned pattern, a habitual pattern. And just in the seeing of it start to get put together, the mind understands that way lies suffering, and it lets it go.

So we see directly, very experientially, the value of what we've been engaged in. The wisdom starts to grow. And this back and forth—actually, I see this deepening of trust, this ever-expanding trust, as a kind of flow between wisdom and trust, wisdom and trust, wisdom and trust. As trust deepens, wisdom can deepen. And then trust can deepen and wisdom can deepen.

The direct experience of understanding the value of this practice begins to deepen the wisdom, which inspires trust. We have a direct recognition: it's not just words, it's not just a good idea. It's actually useful. It's actually helpful.

At this point, trust can become less about a sense of a leap of faith. And there are times in this practice when I think faith is an appropriate word for this quality of trust, especially early on at the beginning of the practice. There's a sense of not being sure how this is going to work, or why this is valuable, but we've heard somebody that we respect say, "Yes, this has been really helpful to me." Or we see in a teacher something, and they say this transformation in this being has come from this practice. And so we think, well, there are some examples out there. Maybe that's worth trying.

At first it is a kind of borrowing the faith of others—borrowing that sense from my friend who sent me that book in the first place. She said, "This has been really helpful to me. Try it. It'll help." It's like, okay, I don't know, but she said it worked. So just kind of borrowing that trust.

And yet it doesn't take very long once we actually turn to engage before there's a sense of understanding directly how it's useful, how it's helpful. Trust begins to be more in our own system. We understand. We trust our own experience. We're no longer having to borrow from somebody else.

And yet that deepening of trust, that unfolding of wisdom—as I talked about in the talk on wisdom, those wisdoms come and go. Wisdom, then delusion returns. We have a deepening of trust and then suddenly it's like, "What? Did I really experience that? I must not have experienced that. I must be fooling myself." At that point, we may need to draw not only on the trust from our friends and our teachers, but we can begin to draw on something else. We can begin to recognize coming in and out of that wisdom-delusion cycle. When we've seen that cycle happen multiple times, we begin to recognize: oh yes, wisdom comes and goes.

And so when delusion has come back, we can borrow trust from ourselves. We can remind ourselves, "Yes, I know this is being caught by a reactive emotion right now. That's what's happening. It's impermanent. It's unreliable. It's causes and conditions. It's not forever." So we begin to recognize the coming and goings and can draw on our own experiences of trust to help us continue the practice.

In a way, over time, the trust in practice shifts from trusting what others say, to trusting our own sense of capacity to engage, to trusting wisdom—a kind of letting go of even identity in the trust. We begin to trust wisdom itself.

There are some edges to trust. Some of my own edges I'll explore with you; you may have different edges. But I have found that there are places or times where it's like, "I've trusted this far, but I don't know if I can go any further." There are places at the edges of our practice where we wonder, "Can I really? Is that really practice?"

As the mindfulness starts to get more continuous, as there's a steadiness and a sense of capacity for the practice itself, we learn: I can sit. I can pay attention to my breath. We start to trust some of our own capacity for practice. And yet at some point, we even have to let go of that. We have to shift. There's an edge around practice where there's a shift from engaging with the practice, the doing, the picking up of practices to create states of concentration or to have experiences heading us in the direction of wisdom.

This is very familiar to us in a way—we engage with the teachings, we begin to see things in a certain way, certain clarity of mindfulness helps us see patterns clearly. We see how things are constructed, conditioned. We may start to recognize a very clear unfolding of experience. And we think that's what the practice is. That's what's trustable. And it is trustable, but it's not the only way. Sometimes we have to let go of what we know we trust in order to expand and open into new terrain, to open to the not-known, to what's unfamiliar.

So we start by beginning to explore what it means to trust just what is arising right now. Just this moment. Not needing to or trying to necessarily do the practice, but shifting more towards being. Just knowing what's here right now. We begin to trust the wisdom to know experience, rather than feeling like, "I have to do it." This is a kind of weakening of the sense of self around the practitioner, a trust that wisdom and mindfulness know their way.

This is not an easy edge of trust. It can be rather ragged at that edge, where we may at times be able to let go of the doing and simply witness, simply know any experience. It doesn't matter what's happening. It absolutely does not matter what the experience is. Mindfulness and wisdom can know it. Dhamma understanding, Dhamma wisdom can arise with any experience, any time. It's not just about sitting in silence on the cushion with our eyes closed. Dhamma wisdom can arise while cutting an apple, while flushing the toilet, while sitting anywhere.

This trust that Dhamma wisdom is available at any moment supports our engagement all the time. Greg the other day mentioned a poem from the Therīgāthā, one of the nuns' verses. It's a beautiful image. This nun is sitting on a hillside looking out over the fields. She's sitting near her kuti, watching farmers plowing, doing their work. And it raises a reflection in her mind. She says, "Just like the farmers work in their fields, I have been working for years on this practice. Why am I not free? What am I doing wrong? I've been following the Buddha's teachings and I'm not free." And then she remembers that it's not about thinking about it, but just about the experience in any moment.

She washes her feet. The water runs down the hill and she watches the water run down the hill. She gets up, aware of getting up, walks to her room, aware. Aware, she sits down on the bed. Aware, she takes a pin and pushes the wick and the lamp down. As the light goes out, her mind is freed.

Any moment, it's possible. We have no idea when that will happen. And yet, we have to be available, present for it to happen. So that's an edge of trust for us—beginning to let go of some level of control over the doing of the practice and opening to just what's here.

Another edge of trust: as our practice gets more continuous, as the mindfulness gets more continuous, sometimes it can start to show us actually more gaps in the mindfulness. Sometimes people describe, after being on retreat for a few weeks on these long retreats, "I'm way less mindful than I was when I got here." And it's probably more likely that what's happening is that you're more aware of when the mindfulness slips out.

This slipping out of mindfulness, as mindfulness gets more continuous, can be an edge for us. We can doubt. We doubt ourselves. We feel like we need to double down. That's our usual response when we see the mindfulness slip—I must not be trying hard enough. Double down, make sure I stay continuously mindful. And that can be helpful at times. I'm not saying that's never a good idea. It can be helpful at times.

And yet there are times when doubling down, that bringing up of effort in order to do the practice, actually gets in the way. I talked a couple of talks ago about the level of mindfulness and seeing certain experiences, how sometimes as mindfulness gets stronger, it's like mindfulness is searching out subtler experience, or new experience, or unfamiliar experience—and that's where mindfulness can slip out. If we double down at that point, that added energy or effort is a grosser experience. It gets in the way of seeing where the mindfulness is trying to go.

And so this is a place of trust. It's not about trying to stay mindful, but rather, instead of bringing the effort up, bringing the interest up. Where does the mind go as it slips out? Where does it go? If we can be interested there, instead of just trying to hang on to mindfulness with what we're used to being mindful of, then it's possible that we might be able to open into something new and unfamiliar that we've not seen before.

This takes some trust—the willingness to let the mind slip out and just keep trying. Oh, there it goes again. Can I be curious about that? And that may lead to being able to open into these perhaps new, unfamiliar experiences, maybe even things that we wouldn't even think were related to being mindful.

So often we have this idea about mindfulness looking a certain way—more and more clarity. That's what more and more mindfulness would look like, we think. More sharpness, more preciseness, just bits of seeing very clear pieces of experience. And in so many ways the deepening of the practice often happens through experiences we're completely unfamiliar with. They may be vague experiences, they may be diffuse experiences, and not this clear, precise kind of thing.

And so learning to trust—again, we begin to trust: Am I aware? And not judge or decide the quality of our awareness based on what is known, on what the experience is. Aware. Aware and have no idea what I'm aware of. You're aware. That's enough. Aware and not knowing.

This movement towards not knowing, I think, is a direction of the deepening of the practice and the deepening of trust. It's hard to trust letting go into not knowing, into unfamiliarity, into vagueness, into we don't know what. And so this is an edge of trust for us. We cling to anything that feels familiar. We cling because we can't fathom what it is we're letting go into.

And yet that is a direction this practice is asking of us. We have no idea the depth of letting go that has to happen. We don't know what's on the other side of that letting go. And yet we slowly learn to trust—at least in my own experience, slowly learn to trust this experience of release. Feeling the unconstricted heart that follows from release. We slowly begin to trust that.

So over time, we begin to trust this right mindfulness. We trust mindfulness and wisdom. We begin to recognize when they're present, when they're not present. We begin to recognize when the mind is actually trustworthy—when mindfulness and wisdom are present, the mind is trustworthy. There's nothing to fear from anything that arises. It's a great experience of safety, that place of having mindfulness and wisdom so established that there's just no fear. Anything can arise and it's known.

And yet, this seeing of when the mind is trustworthy, when mindfulness and wisdom are present, also comes with recognizing when mindfulness and wisdom are not present. So we begin to discern when it may be appropriate to step back to other levels of trust. To step back and acknowledge: this mind is not capable in this moment of just being with, just watching the arising of this habitual pattern. That habitual pattern is taking me down the rabbit hole. The capacity of mindfulness and wisdom in this moment is not able to just watch it and remain trustworthy.

We need to discern that. We need to discern when it's time to step aside, maybe turn our attention away from a particularly tangled pattern, or just bring in, draw on some of those borrowed wisdoms from ourselves. This is impermanent. This is not self. Can I just know this as best I can?

So again, it's not this continual, ever-deepening, one-direction movement toward trust. Mindfulness and wisdom have waves to them. We need to learn to ride those waves.

In the deepest letting go, we really just—it's such a stepping into not knowing. If we really start to look at our experience, we recognize we have no idea what's going to happen next. The next split second is unknown. And this is an edge of trust for us too. It can create a sense of fear when we recognize that. It feels like we are standing on the edge of an abyss, and we're asked to step into the abyss. It's that level of not knowing in the next moment.

This can be hard to trust, hard to live in that space. And yet what we see is that as we step into the abyss, trusting that step into the abyss, we land at the edge of the abyss, having to take the next step into the abyss.

CHAPTER 115

Qualities of Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 55 min

> In this foundational talk from a month-long retreat, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of the opening passage of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), which she describes as the Buddha's definition of mindfulness practice. She unpacks the phrase "one abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world," examining each word to reveal the depth of the Buddha's instructions.
>
> Fella distinguishes between ordinary awareness—the simple human capacity to know that we know—and wise or right mindfulness (sammā sati). Using the example of a thief moving carefully through a house, she illustrates how awareness itself is neutral and can be directed by either wholesome or unwholesome intentions. The key difference lies in being curious about experience as experience in the present moment, rather than awareness aimed at achieving some goal rooted in craving.
> The talk illuminates how the qualities embedded in the sutta's definition work together: "abides" (viharati) evokes resting and receptivity; "observing" brings directedness and intimacy; "as a body" points to bare attention free from views and opinions; "ardent" contributes energy and commitment; and "fully aware" (sampajañña) involves recognizing what is skillful versus unskillful and perceiving the impermanent nature of experience. Fella emphasizes that this practice requires only a light touch of effort—"small moments, many times"—and that the freeing from desires and discontent is not a prerequisite but rather the natural result of sustained, curious attention.

So as Philip said last night, we'll be exploring the Satipatthana Sutta with you for these first days of the retreat. In the beginning of that text, the sutta offers a pretty succinct definition of what mindfulness is. This definition, which I'll read to you in just a few moments, takes a few sentences to describe what the basics of the mindfulness practice are. I think of the rest of the sutta as being an exposition on these few sentences. It really sets up in a few words what the Buddha means by mindfulness practice—what we attend to and how we attend to it. So that's the piece I'm going to look at: what might be called the definition of mindfulness, where the Buddha begins this sutta.

But to start, I want to explore a little bit what we think of as mindfulness conventionally. We might use words like being present, being aware, being with, witnessing, awareness, observing. One that I sometimes use as a working definition is knowing what is happening while it's happening—just that simple kind of awareness of what's happening while it's happening.

This quality of mindfulness that the Buddha points to as being crucial for our understanding of our hearts and minds is based on a pretty ordinary quality in our minds. It's based on a human capacity that we have: just this simple capacity to know that we know, this self-reflective capacity of our minds. We can be aware of ourselves; we can know ourselves. But this simple capacity is not what the Buddha meant by wise mindfulness. It's the basis of this quality of wise mindfulness, but wise mindfulness uses that quality of knowing ourselves while aiming the interest of exploration in a particular way—being curious about experience happening in the present moment as experience happening in the present moment.

That may sound like nothing. What's the difference between that and just being aware of what's happening in the present moment? Here's an example to tease this apart. A thief walking through a house may be very aware of exactly what they are doing, aware of every step, every movement, especially if there's somebody in the house that they don't want to wake up. They may be very aware of what they're doing in the present moment. But the aim of that awareness is greed. The aim of that awareness is not, "Oh, what does it feel like to take a step?" It's not, "What is the experience of wanting this thing?"

So that's the difference I'm pointing to: the interest in experience in the present moment as experience in the present moment. What is the experience of taking a step? What is the experience of feeling an emotion? This is beginning to point at what the Buddha meant by wise mindfulness, by right mindfulness.

The suttas actually do point to, in a few places, the wrong Eightfold Path. It's not a widely used phrase, but the suttas mention that we don't want to be on the wrong Eightfold Path, motivated by wrong view, leading to wrong intention, leading to wrong speech, action, and livelihood, to wrong effort and wrong mindfulness and wrong concentration. So in the suttas, it's pretty clear that mindfulness is a kind of neutral quality that can be aimed one way or another depending on what's going on in our minds. The Buddha pointed to this quality as being crucial, but aimed in a particular way—aimed at this interest of exploring our human experience.

It's worth cultivating this awareness from a particular perspective. For example, with reactive emotions like anger or frustration or irritation, what it means to be mindful in this way is to be curious about what the experience of anger is in the present moment. What is it like?

Not "What do I do with this?" or "What do I need to change about this?" But just really connecting to what is this experience. What is the human experience of irritation, anger, frustration? Turning towards the experience and experiencing it from the inside—Philip used the phrase "felt sense." With our reactive emotions, we can explore what's the felt sense of this experience, curious about that.

That's a very different experience than having a reactive emotion and acting on it. Very different. And you all know this difference. You've felt this difference. And yet there are times that our emotions do point to—or a component of our emotions is—a kind of discernment that something needs to be changed in the world.

What I'd like to suggest is that this practice of being curious about what's happening in the present moment, turning inward to explore that reactivity—anger, for instance—exploring that experience, may be connected to witnessing injustice in the world. I don't believe the teachings simply say, "Oh yes, just notice that you're angry about this and just notice this is what's happening in the world." Because there are so many places where the teachings point to action following out of compassion.

As we explore and see what's happening in the world, our mindfulness begins to tease apart the discernment of what's happening from the reactivity about it. When the reactivity falls away and the discernment remains, there's room for other things to arise with that discernment—like compassion and wisdom and patience and kindness and generosity. Action out of wisdom instead of out of greed or aversion or confusion.

This exploration of being aware and curious about our experience as experience opens the doorway for more responsiveness to experience as opposed to reactivity. That's a piece of this perspective the Buddha is pointing to: this curiosity revealing, opening us to freedom, wisdom, compassion, and love. The emotions of the brahmavihāras and the wisdom of understanding suffering are really joined together. They're like two sides of a coin. The more clear the discernment, the more availability and room for the arising of these wholesome, responsive emotions.

So this phrase I'd like to explore with you begins to unpack what the Buddha means by wise mindfulness. All translations carry a kind of interpretation to them, and I have chosen a particular translation that I resonate with—the words have a flavor of what resonates for me in this teaching.

This phrase at the beginning of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta reads: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world."

That phrase is repeated four times, with "body as a body" replaced by "feelings as feelings," "mind states as mind states," and "dhammas as dhammas"—phenomena as phenomena. This fourth foundation of observing the dhammas is a little complex to explain, so I'll set that aside for now. In this exploration, I'll just use the first phrase: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world."

These words the Buddha puts together—each one adds a slight perspective on what he is encouraging us to observe and how he is encouraging us to observe it. The phrase points to both the "what" we are exploring and the "how."

The first word: abides. This word really resonates for me. What does it evoke? Abide. The word in Pali is viharati, which means to dwell, to live. "Abide" is a fitting translation. It evokes a sense of being at home, resting, contentment, perhaps a sense of intimacy, a familiarity of being with, connected. Abide.

Sometimes words can be very evocative for us. They carry many associations, and when we bring a word into our mind, we may find that just bringing in that word—abide—

Maybe there's a kind of collecting or settling or gathering.

Abide.

So this word brings in a quality of rest, of receptivity—that receptive quality to the practice.

The second word, observes. "Abides observing." This brings in a little bit more directedness, a kind of connection. The word anupassati is said to mean to look closely at, to observe repeatedly, to closely observe, to see closely. And so we're not just abiding—like, "Oh yeah, let's just chill." We abide connected, close, intimate with. There's a strong sense of meeting the experience.

So there's a relaxed, receptive connection. Those two together.

I like the phrase "being with myself." That phrase helps me to land with experience. Can I be with this? Can I be with this?

So we abide observing the body as a body. I want to linger with this phrase for a little while. The body as a body. Feelings as feelings. Mind states as mind states.

This is pointing to what I said earlier—that we are curious about our experience in the present moment as experience in the present moment. The body is what we explore; as a body is how we explore it. It's a body. It's a human body.

This phrase brings in an aspect of wisdom, bringing in some of the wise mindfulness, bringing in some of the wisdom to the way we observe. Exploring the body as a body. Exploring perhaps some of the impersonal nature of the body. There is a body, this is a body. Not my body—a body. Not as a person or an identity we might hold.

And also I think it points to noticing the body in and of itself. Not our ideas about it, our thoughts about it, our opinions about it, our agendas about it—but just the body as it is. Pointing to what we might call bare attention. Just the body as a body.

This particular exploration helps us to disentangle some very common ways that we get caught up. Views about our body. Opinions about our body. Sometimes, almost below the surface, we are relating to our experience through these views and opinions and ideas, rather than through just the connection of: well, what is this experience of the body?

So this kind of exploration begins to help us tease apart what is the physical side of experience from what are our views and opinions, our feelings, the mental aspect. We are really starting to explore the body as the physicality of the body—the actual experience, the felt experience. As Philip was mentioning, the felt sense in the moment. When he used the phrase "real-time awareness" of the body, of the breath—that connection with experience.

I think this phrase also encourages a non-interfering awareness. The interference in awareness often comes in through our views and ideas and opinions. Agendas of meditation. How we want the body to be, how we want to be paying attention to it. This is encouraging us to just notice—well, let's set those aside, or notice perhaps that they're there.

We're not trying to stop those things from happening so much, but just noticing: can I know that those opinions and views are there, those agendas, but see—can I actually connect with what's actually here? What are the sensations happening?

Philip talked about exploring pain in that way yesterday. The sense of the actual sensations of maybe hardness and sparking and burning and pulling and twisting, versus frustration and dislike and anger and all of the emotional responses to that. When we overlay the emotional responses onto the physical sensation, often it kind of solidifies, and we're not so much seeing the actual body as a body, the experience as experience.

And so this kind of exploration begins to help us be curious about a non-interfering awareness.

Just attuned to this experience as experience.

We might think of this non-interfering awareness as the wisdom side—a kind of equanimity, just observing things as they are. And yet that very activity, if we can open to this part of it, we could also use the word allowing. We are allowing the experience to be as it is. Just allowing it to be. Allowing all aspects of our experience to be present as human experience.

This brings in the perspective of kindness and care and love. In a way, we could say that the mindfulness we bring to that curiosity is a loving attention—a kind attention, friendly, caring awareness. This allowing quality is intimately connected with this loving attention.

I was speaking earlier about wisdom and the brahmaviharas—the love and compassion and sympathetic joy—being like two sides of a coin. As we explore experience in this way, allowing ourselves to be just as we are, this is the very definition of love. When we want or are looking for love from somebody else, isn't that what we want? For them to allow us to be exactly as we are? To be accepted for who we are? Allowed to be? That's what we're exploring doing for ourselves.

Last night we talked about belonging as community. This is an inner belonging. The Buddha didn't use these words, but the effect of this practice is that we more and more allow all the parts of ourselves to belong. And paradoxically, that allowing transforms things. Parts of ourselves that tend to be twisted up in knots, tight and contorted and constricted—those begin to loosen. Greed, aversion, delusion begins to weaken and just fall apart. Transform, really.

So this allowing aspect—the body is a body, just allowing the body to be a body and being curious about that—this allowing is about recognizing that what is happening is already happening.

I like the word allowing as opposed to acceptance, at least in my mind. You may not have the same perspective with the word accepting, but when I say accepting to myself, I feel like I have to agree with it. If I'm going to accept something, then I have to sign up for it. I can't disagree with it. But allowing is about acknowledging that what is here is here. You don't have to agree or disagree with it. It's just stating the truth: this is what's here. And so allowing is connected intimately with truth. This is what is here. We might as well allow it because it's already here.

That allowing then opens us to a more skillful response instead of a reactive response. And so we hold this possibility of allowing what is here to be here.

But I don't know about you—a lot of times I find the mind is in resistance to what's here. And so sometimes we have to take a step bigger. If there's a sense of "no, it's not okay for this to be here"—I see that it's here, but my mind is rebelling against this, this is not okay—then can we allow that? This is here and I don't like it. That's what's happening. It's like making the container a little bigger to include the resistance itself.

Can we allow the not allowing? Our minds can do this.

Creating a bigger container.

So we abide. Abide observing the body as a body, body in and of itself. Maybe the breath in and of itself. Maybe sensations in the body in and of themselves. Maybe the broader sense—there is a body. One abides observing the body as a body.

Ardent—the next word, ardent. This word brings in some energy, wholeheartedness, diligence, connection, alertness, heartfelt interest. Ardent maybe even has the quality of the word "heart" in a way—ardency, heartfelt connection to. To me, this brings in some of the sense of committing, standing here. The phrase of Satipatthana that Philip talked about: standing close to what mindfulness stands close to. This is that kind of commitment to, "Yes, I'm going to be with experience." It brings in a quality of energy, of commitment, of persistence, of effort. This word brings these in—continuity, ardency, staying connected with our experience.

So this brings in the importance of that staying connected moment after moment. We will emphasize continuity a lot during this time together. It is such an important part of our practice. And in a month-long like this, we really get the opportunity to cultivate mindfulness everywhere, even in our rooms. When we go in and close the door and it's like, "Nobody's looking, I don't have to practice anymore." You can get through maybe a five-day or ten-day retreat kind of on-off the cushion. A retreat of this length, it's so much easier, actually, when we just sign up. Just sign up. You'll forget—of course you'll forget. You'll close the door to your room and you'll forget. At some point, though, you'll remember. And just reconnect at that moment. Like Winnie said, to have that moment be a celebration. I don't remember exactly the word she used, but it's positive reinforcement. Oh, I'm back. I'm back. Here again. Aware again. Awareness is back.

So that ardency isn't about trying to force ourselves to stay mindful all the time, but is more that intention to stay connected. And that intention to recognize when mindfulness returns.

In this definition, we have both abiding and ardent. So these two are kind of balancing each other in a way—both dwelling and ardent. Dwelling gives that sense of resting, stepping back, relaxing, receiving, receptive, at home. Ardency carries more a sense of engagement.

What does it mean to hold both of these? Relaxation and alertness are not opposites. They can come together in a moment, right now. How hard is it for you to be aware of the sensations of your hands, wherever they are, however they are? Just the naming of that. Do they kind of pop into your awareness? Often, if you're listening, if you heard me, often that moment—just for a moment—it's pretty easy. You just notice that sensation.

It's kind of the level of effort or energy we need. It's not hard to be mindful for a moment. What is hard, what's harder, where we tend to get tied up in knots, is in sustaining that mindfulness.

We tend to try to pick up a whole bunch of moments, thinking to ourselves, "Okay, I'm sitting down for 45 minutes. I'm going to be present for all 45 minutes." And it's almost like we pick up the whole sitting in that first two seconds and try to bring in the effort in that first two seconds to stay present for the entire sitting. Well, our minds don't quite work like that.

We can be present for a moment, a split second. Just enough effort to be present for a moment. And then do it again. Just enough for the next moment. Half a breath at a time. Just enough effort to be there for half a breath. That's all you need to do. Those thoughts about the other 700 breaths in this 45-minute sitting—let them go. Just this half breath, that's all you need. And then at the end of that half breath, do another half breath. It's almost like hand over hand, a little bit of pulling yourself along with the lightest touch of effort.

We can do this in the walking too. At certain points in my practice, I found that when the mind was kind of scattered, I didn't want to try to force myself to be mindful even for one walking path. I would pick a spot on the ground—that little spot there, that leaf on the ground that's about two feet in front of me. "Can I make it to that spot? Can I make it to that leaf?" Lifting, moving. Yep, made it. "Okay, how about the next one? Can I make it to that spot?" Just enough effort.

"Small moments, many times," Joseph says a lot. Small moments, many times. That level of effort can be both relaxed and engaged—that way of practicing.

And the thought will come in: half a breath, an in-breath, "only 27 more days." And that thought will bring in some heaviness. That's what's happened. Notice that as idea. That's not what's actually in the direct experience of the body. That's a thought in the mind with a kind of resistance or a picking up of that. Although sometimes it can be, "Oh, 27 more days—yes!" But just notice that.

So this light touch of effort, moment after moment.

"One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware." The next phrase: fully aware. This phrase translates the Pali sampajañña, which is often translated as "clear comprehension." The place many of us first hear about this word, this teaching, is in the first foundation of mindfulness. There's a section on being fully aware in all activities, and I think Eugene is going to talk about this in a couple of days—though I don't want to promise that; talks can change. But this is the way we often think about it: fully aware while walking, while going and coming, while bending and stretching. So the term "full awareness" is used there.

In this particular context, I've done some research about the word, and there are a lot of different contexts in which this particular phrase—"clearly comprehending" or "full awareness"—is used. I'll just bring in two in particular that I think begin to point to what the Buddha is wanting us to explore here at this point in the instructions.

There are some places where the phrase "clearly comprehending" or "full awareness" is pointing to recognizing when what is arising is skillful and helpful, and when what is arising is unskillful and unhelpful.

There's a place in the suttas where it talks about when a hindrance is arising, one is fully aware the hindrance is arising. This is not about being lost in the hindrance, but it's also not about judging the fact that the hindrance is there. It's about recognizing: the hindrance is a hindrance. This is something that catches the mind, and we feel this in the way the hindrance expresses itself. The felt sense of a hindrance—those manifestations of greed, aversion, and delusion—tends to be constricted. Our system understands this is not helpful. This distinction is pointed to in certain places in the suttas around clear comprehension: understanding the body as a body, clearly comprehending when the views, the ideas, the states arising in connection with what's happening in the body are helpful and when they're not.

Another definition of clearly comprehending points to recognizing the impermanent nature of experience. The phrase in one particular text says one exercises full awareness when experience is understood as it arises, as it persists, and as it passes away. This is pointed to specifically regarding thoughts, feelings, and perceptions, but I think we can also include physical sensations—noticing, knowing physical sensations as arising, persisting, passing away. Noticing the impermanent nature of every aspect of our experience.

This brings in some of the wisdom the Buddha is pointing to. The distinction between what's skillful and what's unskillful represents an almost ethical dimension of the teachings. What's unskillful takes us into suffering. What's helpful takes us away from suffering. Beginning to distinguish these two, having a clear awareness of when the mind is caught by unskillful states, creates the conditions for learning. As we witness these unskillful states, the system begins to understand them as constricted, as unhelpful.

We are fortunate in a way: when our human system gets information about what is not helpful, it actually wants to move in the direction of ease, of well-being. But we've been so fundamentally confused about what leads us in that direction—really fundamentally confused. Partly because we're caught by the views and ideas embedded in those unhelpful states. We're caught by the view embedded in aversion that says, "I need to get rid of this thing in order to be okay." Caught by that view, we buy into some possibility of being okay at some point in the future when we get rid of this thing. And we are not noticing that right now, in the present moment, the experience of aversion is already painful, already not well-being.

The reactive states are willing to give up well-being here and now for the possibility of well-being in the future—the idea of well-being in the future. But as our organism begins to get more accurate information about what is actually happening, recognizing that this aversion is happening in the present moment, and this is what aversion feels like as a human experience, our system begins to recognize: no, that's not well-being. And it's like our system begins to find its way, to navigate its way to letting that go.

On the other side, with the wholesome qualities, the helpful qualities, our system understands them right as they are seen, as they are witnessed. When we feel the experience of patience, of loving-kindness, of compassion, of wisdom, when our minds taste equanimity, our system understands in the moment: yes, this is well-being. We may even be experiencing a reactive emotion with some balance of mind—a container of equanimity holding aversion, for instance. If we are really connected to that container of equanimity, we will feel the well-being of that, even as the reactivity is still there, still being unwound.

It's been quite a surprise for me in my practice. I've worked a lot around anger, self-hatred, aversion—those states were very strongly conditioned in my life. And when I began to be able to feel delighted, thinking, "Oh, I'm seeing anger again! Wow, that's so cool!"—that was a different relationship to anger. This is possible with this perspective of mindfulness the Buddha is encouraging us to cultivate.

"One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, mindful." I talked about mindfulness earlier, so I won't go into that word again. The last section reads: "freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world." Often this phrase is translated as something like "free from desires and discontent for the world," and that, at least in my mind, set up a problem—as if desires and discontent meant I couldn't practice this mindfulness as the Buddha was instructing. I took some comfort from the fact that the list of hindrances is found in the fourth foundation of mindfulness, where it says when the hindrances are arising, one knows the hindrances are arising. In the foundation of mindfulness of mind states, it says one is aware: when aversion is arising, one knows aversion is arising; when non-aversion is arising, one knows non-aversion is arising.

And to me, that points to the fact that this statement, this part of the phrase, can't mean that we have completely freed ourselves from desire and discontent just to begin. Because there's this encouragement to notice desires and discontent with mindfulness.

Bhikkhu Anālayo offered what was an aha moment for me. He pointed out that the Pali verb being translated as "free from" has an active quality to it—what we call a gerund in English, with the "-ing" ending. It's an activity. It's happening.

So we could think about this part of the phrase as describing what happens as we do this practice. This exploration of abiding, observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful—it creates the conditions for the mind to become free from desires and discontent. It frees the mind from... it's the process of freeing the mind that is part of this practice.

And that speaks to what I was saying earlier about holding reactivity with equanimity. Right in there, we can sometimes even watch the freeing happen. Sometimes we just kind of watch something go on for a while, then we lose interest and go off to pay attention to something else, and later we realize, "Oh, that thing I was so caught up in before —it's gone." So we see that it goes away. But sometimes we actually get to see it disappearing. We witness this freeing from, witness a kind of release from our greed, aversion, confusion.

One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, mindful, freeing oneself from desires and discontent for the world.

If any of those words particularly land for you, let yourself rest with them. Abide. Being with. Observing. Body as a body. Body in and of itself. Engaged, ardent, wholehearted. Fully aware. Mindful. Aware. Present.

This is our work, our practice. The results come in their own time. We practice for the sake of practicing, for the sake of observing the body as a body. And the learning, the understanding, comes along with that curiosity and interest. We don't get to decide, as Philip said yesterday—we don't get to decide when we have our insights.

We can stay connected with a light touch, moment after moment. This in-breath. This out-breath.

CHAPTER 116

Feeling Tone (Vedanā) - Retreat at Spirit Rock

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this retreat talk from the March Monthlong at Spirit Rock, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of vedanā—the second foundation of mindfulness from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). She explains how feeling tone serves as a bridge between body and mind, present in every moment of experience as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.
>
> Fella draws on the Buddha's teaching of the two arrows, illustrating how an untrained person experiences both the initial unpleasant feeling and the additional suffering of their reactive aversion—multiplying rather than simply adding to their pain. She shares personal insights about discovering her mind's habitual orientation toward the unpleasant, and recounts a powerful moment of seeing the split-second pleasantness at the very beginning of anger that keeps the mind returning to it.
> The talk includes practical guidance for recognizing feeling tone in bodily sensations, eating, daily activities, and mental states. Fella introduces the distinction between worldly and unworldly (sāmisa and nirāmisa) feelings—those connected with sense pleasures versus those arising from the path itself, such as the joy of concentration or the longing for freedom. She emphasizes that pleasant and unpleasant are not inherent in objects but are shaped by our views, expectations, and mental constructions, offering this understanding as a key to loosening the grip of habitual reactivity.

I'm really appreciating hearing the frogs right now, watching these clouds, the sunset earlier. Just appreciating this land, the space that we're in together. It's truly such a gift to be here together—a rare gift, a rare opportunity. And it's been so wonderful meeting with you, hearing about your practice. Such an appreciation for your practice. Everyone is so engaged. It's really a privilege to sit in this seat and witness this unfolding. So thank you for your practice.

I'm going to continue with reflections on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta tonight. We've been exploring mindfulness of the body quite a lot, but also touching on some of the fourth foundation—the hindrances, the Four Noble Truths—and using those as practices, as experiences to notice. Today, we'll reflect on the second foundation of mindfulness: the mindfulness of feeling tone, vedanā.

This is the simple aspect of experience of whether there is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience arising with whatever is happening. As a second foundation of mindfulness, in some ways it feels a little like a bridge from the body to the mind. The first foundation of mindfulness is clearly mindfulness of body. The third foundation is mindfulness of mind states. And feeling actually lies somewhere in the middle, in that it's accessible through bodily experience.

Every physical experience—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—all of our bodily experience is associated with a feeling tone. Contact of touch may be pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Contact with the ear, the same. And so through our bodies we can begin touching into this aspect of experience, this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral aspect of experience.

But this aspect of experience is also associated with every mental experience that arises. Every thought, every mood, emotion, mind state also has a feeling tone. So this feeling tone is understood to be a universal aspect of experience. Every single moment of our experience, this feeling tone is present in one of these three flavors.

My understanding of vedanā is that it is actually defined as a mental experience, even when it's associated with physical sensation. Vedanā is, we could say, mind made. I'll get to that a little bit more in just a minute. I wanted to say that because it's a nice bridge in a way to help us begin to be curious about a mental quality, a mental factor in our mind, a mental process in our mind—this process of whether experience is being felt as pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

The Sutta instructions about this are, I think, the shortest section in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Mindfulness of mind states is just a little bit longer. It's a very brief section, and I'll read to you the first part of it. But first let me remind you of that definition section that we explored right at the beginning of the retreat with respect to this foundation:

"One abides observing feelings as feelings, ardent, fully alert, fully aware and mindful, setting aside desires and discontent for the world."

And how does one do that? That is the question the Buddha begins this section of the Satipaṭṭhāna with. "And how does one abide observing feelings as feelings? Here, when feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel an unpleasant feeling.' When feeling a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling.'"

It goes on to elaborate a little bit more, and if I have time, I'll go into that elaboration. Let's just start with that. It's a really simple instruction. Not a lot extra to it. When feeling a pleasant feeling, we understand, "I am feeling a pleasant feeling."

This is that pointing back to understanding experience as experience. Pleasant experience is arising in this moment. Unpleasant experience is arising in this moment. And it's understood as experience rather than as a problem, something to fix or change or hold on to.

So the Sutta describes for this mindfulness of feeling a very simple non-judgmental awareness. When feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel a pleasant feeling." When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel an unpleasant feeling." It doesn't say, "and try to fix it." It just says one understands that. That's a really simple non-judgmental awareness of this experience.

And yet, as with many of these very simple instructions, the Satipatthana Sutta as a whole is encouraging us to explore the entirety of our experience through what I'd call a few simple perspectives. This is one of those perspectives through which we can explore our experience. Every single moment of experience, this is arising. And so any moment we can be aware of this aspect of experience in this simple way—really simple way.

And yet the feeling tone itself is an aspect of experience that, until we come to retreats and hear dharma talks about it, we are very unlikely to be interested in experiencing as an experience in this way. Really unlikely to be recognizing, "Oh, this is an unpleasant experience. That's what it's like to feel an unpleasant experience." Most of the time we are going to be trying to fix it or change it or escape from it in some way, find something else to be with, flee from it into fantasy or whatever. We are not trained so much in becoming aware, in knowing this quality of mind.

It's actually a pretty subtle quality, although once we become attuned to it, it's mostly subtle because we haven't really thought to pay attention to it. But once it's pointed out to us that this is a really useful aspect of experience to pay attention to, it actually becomes pretty easy to recognize, at least in certain areas of our experience. Part of this exploration this evening is to attune you to this quality, to attune you to this experience.

Feeling arises as a result of contact with the world—contact with the sense bases contacting their sense objects. For our five physical senses, there are the physical sense objects of the world that make contact. The eye receives sight and there's contact with the eye. The ear receives sound and there's contact. I read a section of a sutta this morning that speaks to this: "Based on the eye and sight, along with eye consciousness, the meeting of the three is contact." With the eye and sight, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact. The next piece that the Buddha pointed to is: "With contact as condition, feeling arises." And so this is with every sense experience.

With our minds too, there's the mind door—the aspect of our minds that receives experience—and then there are mind objects: thoughts and emotions and mind states, moods, beliefs. These also contact the mind door, and there's a feeling tone at that point of contact. The feeling tone is a conditioned arising in dependence on that contact.

Often what happens with this contact and the feeling that arises is that there's a very habitual, almost nearly automatic response that is also deeply conditioned. And it's more deeply conditioned than something we learn from our parents. This seems to be—it's not hardwired into us as human beings, but, well, I was a computer person, so I'll call it firmware. Hardware is the actual hard components of a computer. Firmware is what you program into that hardware, the particular things that hardware can do. You burn it in. But you can burn something else in there too. It's more like that level: when we experience something as pleasant, we tend to like it and want it. It's human. This is a human response. It's not something we learn culturally. It's not something we learn from our families. It is a human response. It's actually more than human—it seems to be a living being response. When there is something pleasant, living beings tend to go towards that. When there's something unpleasant, living beings tend to move away from it.

In our human experience, this tendency to move toward the pleasant and away from the unpleasant tends to be accompanied by greed for the pleasant and aversion for the unpleasant, and it happens really quickly. Even before the greed or the aversion fully forms, there may be a subtler kind of response—when there's something pleasant, we like it. It's not quite full-on greed, but there's a preference. When something's unpleasant, we don't like it.

That's the real firmware level of our experience. But it's not hard-coded into our system to automatically like and want something just because it's pleasant. It is optional. There is this possibility of knowing pleasant experience as pleasant experience without having any inkling of leaning toward it. It's possible to experience unpleasant experience as unpleasant experience and just be completely balanced, with no tendency to pull away.

This is equanimity—this non-reactive mind, a mind that can remain balanced no matter what comes: pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

But this very human response the Buddha calls an underlying tendency. It's an underlying tendency for us as human beings to want to move toward the pleasant, to want to move away from the unpleasant, and to be disconnected from the neutral, unaware, ignorant of neutral experience.

And yet the Buddha points to something remarkable. In one particular sutta that many of you have probably heard about, he says that a person who is awakened, somebody who is completely free, somebody who has that non-reactivity, someone who is free of craving, will still experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feeling.

This is something to recognize. Freedom doesn't mean freedom from unpleasantness. The Buddha clearly says this in this sutta—that people who are fully awakened will still experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. And he says the ordinary person, the person untrained in this path, also experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience.

So what's the difference between these two?

He says that when an ordinary person is touched by a painful bodily feeling, they worry and grieve. They lament, beat their breast, weep, and become distraught. They thus experience two kinds of feelings: a bodily feeling and a mental feeling. It is as if someone were pierced by a dart, and following that first piercing is hit by a second dart. That person will experience feelings caused by two darts.

This tends to be what happens to the ordinary person with an unpleasant experience. They don't like it, feel put upon, feel like the world is against them. Why me? So the aversion is another experience that arises in conjunction with that unpleasant experience. Now you have not only the first unpleasant experience, but you also have the aversion, which is itself an unpleasant experience.

Have you been noticing that?

I like what Bhante said this morning about multiplying, because that's what this extra reaction does to the painful experience. It's not just adding one plus one to equal two darts. It's more like multiplication, many-fold. The mental reaction greatly exacerbates the feeling of unpleasantness, which is why we then feel aversion to the aversion. Because we see how unpleasant that is, and we want to get rid of it. But that adds another arrow—a third arrow.

This is our habitual way. This is how the Buddha says an untaught or ordinary person responds to feeling. With the unpleasant, we tend to become averse. With the pleasant, we tend to hold on. That also has pain to it—it's a little more subtle in some ways, although when we really start to turn toward the experience of that wanting, we feel the suffering of that too. We feel the unpleasantness of that.

The sutta continues: "But for a noble disciple, when touched by a painful feeling, the noble disciple does not worry nor grieve and lament, will not beat their breast and weep nor become distraught. Only one kind of feeling is experienced, a bodily one, not a mental feeling. It is as if someone were pierced by a dart but was not hit by that second dart."

So he points to this as possible for us. He's saying in this teaching that this nearly automatic leap from feeling to reacting is optional. It takes training for us to begin to see—first of all to recognize the pleasant feeling and see the greed, to recognize the unpleasant feeling and see the aversion, to see that the reaction to feeling is happening as a relationship to the feeling.

That's part of what we explore. As we start to see that there is unpleasantness, and that the unpleasantness and the aversion are different, that the pleasantness and the greed are different—this is really useful to recognize. For instance, if you're experiencing a physical pain in your body, very often you might notice the aversion to that.

When you are curious about what the aversion is actually relating to—what is the unpleasant thing that the aversion is in relationship to?—sometimes we see that multiplying factor of aversion and how much more unpleasant it makes the entire experience. We see that what we're actually reacting to is a small twinge, and it has proliferated into a huge idea: "I can't keep sitting here anymore because I'm not going to be able to walk at the end of this forty-five minute sitting, and I'm going to have to go have surgery on my knee." The mind has just gone out.

So seeing what the actual unpleasant experience is can be really useful. We begin to notice the difference between the unpleasantness of the first experience and the unpleasantness of the aversion—and notice that they're different. Notice that they're different things.

This practice of mindfulness of feeling begins to help us do that: to recognize the actual experience of pleasant and unpleasant and neutral. The first thing that's useful, I think, is to begin getting familiar with feeling tone, attuning yourself to this quality so that we can have this recognition of these things being different. Before I started meditating, I don't think I knew there was a difference between hating pain and pain. They just seemed completely the same thing. And so we can start to explore these qualities of experience.

The easiest place to explore feeling tone is related to bodily experience. In our sitting postures, in our sitting, in our walking—just being curious about whether the experience is pleasant or unpleasant. You might feel some pleasant sensations associated with breathing. You might feel unpleasant sensations associated with an itch, tightness, or pain. Just being curious about that.

Right now in your experience, what's the most obvious experience in your physical body? Whatever's most obvious may have some kind of flavor of pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. With the most obvious experience in your physical sensation right now, see if you can tune in to pleasant or unpleasant. How about picking another one? Just the next most obvious. Is that one pleasant or unpleasant? Or neutral—maybe neutral, could be. How about another one? Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral.

So how many of you, in those three, felt that each of those three experiences was the same kind of feeling tone? A few of you. That was my experience too. And that actually points to another piece: some of us tend to have a particular habitual tendency of orienting toward a certain flavor. Sometimes it's talked about as almost being a personality type.

If you walk into a room you've never been in before, just do this mind experiment for yourself: What is the first kind of thing you're drawn to? When you first came into this room, what was the very first thing you noticed? For some people that might have been, "Gee, the front of the room looks pretty messy." For some it might have been, "Wow, look at this space! Look at that ceiling, it's so beautiful." For some it might have been, "What's going on here? Where do I sit? How do I get a cushion?"—kind of looking around, not quite so sure about what to do.

We tend to have certain flavors of patterns and habits in our mind. Some people are more balanced, equally spread between greed, aversion, and delusion. But many of us have a particular flavor that is more predominant. For my mind, aversion was definitely the predominant flavor. And with that predominant flavor, the Buddha offers a succinct version of conditionality in his teaching: whatever one frequently ponders, that becomes the inclination of the mind. And so this mind—boy, it was really pondering aversion a lot, and that became the tendency. What my mind tended to do when it walked into a new space was look for something to be averse to.

It would seek out the unpleasant. It's almost like my mind would orient to the unpleasant and think, "Okay, if I can fix all the unpleasant things, then I'll be okay." Somebody else might have more of the motivation of wanting, of greed, and that person might be drawn to what's beautiful in a room, looking for where the pleasant is. So we do have some tendencies there that are useful to recognize.

This exercise that I just did with you, one of my teachers did with me. I did it for a little bit longer than you did, and he was instructing me to just notice the next thing, don't choose, just whatever arises—make it choiceless. After that experience, he asked, "Well, what did you notice?" And I said, "I don't see how that could have been choiceless. I was trying to do it choicelessly, but everything was unpleasant. I know that the entirety of my experience is not unpleasant, but that was everything the mind landed on."

That was a huge learning for me—to see the orientation of my mind, its habitual tendency to orient to the unpleasant. So this can be a useful reflection and exploration for yourself. Do you have a tendency towards one of these? Almost a preference to fuel or fulfill the underlying tendency of greed or aversion or delusion?

So we explore in our physical experience this pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. Another great place to do this is in between times—just beginning to pick a few times in the day. In mindfulness practice, we're not particularly trying to find experience, and yet with certain practices it can be useful to take some time to orient towards a quality or experience that we haven't had much familiarity with, in order to gain some familiarity. So it can be useful to spend some time during the day being curious about this particular aspect of experience, just to familiarize yourself with what it's like to touch into pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral.

A great place to do this is in eating practice. Just noticing the flavors, the tastes as you put food in your mouth—is the first sense of it neutral? Pleasant? Unpleasant? Just curiosity about it. How does it change? Doing your yogi jobs, there's probably a great stream of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral going on there. Just attuning to that, getting familiar with the experience. And it's really helpful to start noticing our habitual relationship to the feeling tone.

So as you're doing your yogi jobs, for instance—"Oh, this is unpleasant, this part's unpleasant"—and then the constriction, the tightening, the aversion, the pushing away, the wrinkling of the nose at extra food in the pots that you have to scrub. Just the experience of the unpleasantness and the relationship to it. Beginning to recognize the difference between those.

It's also useful to explore and get familiar with the feeling tone associated with our mental experience. Every experience has a feeling tone associated with it—thoughts, moods, emotions. Something like sadness might have an unpleasant or heavy quality to it. Joy, a pleasant quality. Grief, unpleasant. Fear can be unpleasant. Anger, perhaps unpleasant.

Although in doing this exploration for myself around anger, I was exploring on one particular retreat, watching the arising of anger. The mind got very attuned to the experience of anger. This was my anger retreat. I was really watching it every day, many times a day. I would see a thought in my mind and feel the anger in conjunction with that thought. Largely the experience was unpleasant—it was pretty clear that anger was unpleasant.

But then one time I got to see the very beginnings of anger, just the moment of "they done me wrong, I'm right." And that experience at the very beginning—that was pleasant. That was a real shock to me. It almost immediately shifted; it only lasted a split second that it was pleasant. This feeling of—it was like a feeling of power and engagement. A welling up of energy towards a kind of protecting of this being in some way.

There was a pleasant quality to that. It lasted about a split second before it became pressure and heat and unpleasantness. But the learning there—it was kind of the big aha. Oh, that's part of the hook. That's why my mind keeps going for this anger over and over again. It likes that little split second of feeling powerful.

This can be eye-opening as we explore how feeling tone changes. It's not static. It shifts from pleasant to unpleasant to neutral, to more pleasant, to less pleasant. It's very dynamic.

Emotions perhaps more obviously have a feeling tone associated with them. But thoughts, views, and beliefs also have feeling tone—and it may be neutral, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Although thoughts and beliefs may seem like neutral things in the mind, they have a very powerful shaping effect on our experience of feeling. They're one of the key conditioners, one of the key aspects determining whether we experience something as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

There was a study done about the experience of pleasure and pain. Subjects were exposed to either a non-painful experience, a slightly painful one, or a moderately painful one. They were told beforehand—given a little flash indicating which they would experience first. When the moderately painful sensation came, they reported it as unpleasant, and their brains confirmed this through EEG monitoring.

Then came the second part of the experiment. Now the alternation was between moderate pain and much more severe pain. Again, subjects were warned what was coming. This time they reported the moderate sensation—which they had previously called painful—as pleasant. And the experimenters were surprised by this result. They expected subjects to report it as less painful than the severe one, but they did not expect it to be reported as pleasant.

Their hypothesis was that the warning created a kind of expectation, a moment of relief in the mind: "It's not going to be so bad this time." That view, that expectation, that anticipation—which is a mental experience—shaped their experience of the painful sensation as pleasant. And not only did they report it as pleasant, but their brains responded as if it was pleasant.

This is a very important thing for us to understand. Pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral are created and shaped in our minds by our expectations, by our views, by our thoughts, by our beliefs. The feeling tone is not in the object. It's not inherent in the object. The same experience at different times might be experienced as more pleasant or less pleasant, as pleasant sometimes and painful sometimes.

So this becomes a real exploration for us around what is happening in our minds when we're experiencing feeling tone.

Sometimes in this exploration—around hearing, for instance—there's an interesting teaching from the Abhidhamma. It's not a sutta teaching, and I offer it with some caution because I don't know that I completely believe it. But the Abhidhamma says that the bare experience in our non-tactile senses—sight, sound, smell, taste—is neutral. Any sense of it being pleasant or unpleasant, a sight being pleasant, a sound being pleasant, arises because of an idea in the mind.

Now, again, I don't know if this is really true. But hearing this teaching has prompted me, when I notice I'm taking a sound or a sight to be pleasant or unpleasant, to get curious. What is the actual physical experience? And what is the mind attributing as unpleasant?

For instance, you're sitting in a room and you hear a cough or a sneeze. The sound itself—it's just a sound. It's not physically painful. It's airwaves hitting the eardrum, a particular vibration understood as a sneeze or a cough. The mind, understanding it as a sneeze or a cough, has some views about that. Quite likely, if you experience the sneeze or cough as unpleasant, it's because of those views rather than the actual experience of hearing itself.

This has been a very interesting investigation in my own practice—a lot of learning, a lot of understanding about how our minds work through exploring this particular aspect of experience with a little bit of investigation.

I would say the vast majority of our reactivity, when we're reacting to something with aversion or greed—the vast majority of the time—it's not about something actually in the world.

It's relating or reacting to something in our own minds.

That was another big "aha" for me—watching the mind be averse to somebody doing walking meditation nearby. I decided to go through the senses and try to figure out where the unpleasantness was. This was an instruction that Carol Wilson had offered in a talk on aversion. She said, if there's aversion happening, there's something unpleasant in your experience. What is it?

So I'm doing walking meditation and this person's walking next to me. Okay, it's not sight—the person is not disturbing my eyes. They're not making noise, so it's not sound. They're not touching me, it's not that. I'm not smelling them. I'm not tasting them. Okay, it's got to be something in the mind.

I finally did get to that—it had to be something in the mind. But I didn't see what it was in the mind. I didn't understand. I couldn't see what was unpleasant. I was really curious. I was like, well, what is unpleasant here? So I just continued to do the walking, kind of curious about what's unpleasant.

And then suddenly this thought erupted: "They're weird." That's a thought. I still didn't quite get it. After another exploding thought of "They're in bare feet and it's freezing cold outside," I realized that this was my justification for thinking they were weird, and that the whole aversion was related to this subtle, almost unconscious relationship to that feeling of this person being weird that I hadn't even seen consciously. And then to see that the whole thing was based on bare feet—it was just so silly that the mind let the whole thing go. The aversion disappeared, and in the next pass I was just wishing the person well, just feeling that mettā for them.

So this is a useful tool. If you're experiencing some kind of ongoing reactivity, you can apply a kind of curiosity—go through the senses. Where's the unpleasantness? Most of the time you'll find, and this was the other big "aha," it's like, oh my gosh, I'm averse to a thought. That's what the aversion actually is. I'm averse to this idea. I'm averse to something my mind made up. This is completely optional. And that's what helped it to fall apart.

Doing this kind of exploration, most of the time if you look, you'll probably see that it's something constructed in our own minds where the actual leaping-off point is, what we're actually reacting to.

Just briefly in the last few minutes we have, I want to explore this last section of the sutta, because it points to a further distinction around feeling tone that's useful, particularly on long retreat, for us to at least be aware of. Again, I offer this not as something to dive into and do. My teacher, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, when he gave teachings, he would often say, "This isn't something to do. This is information." It can go into the back of your minds, and having this information bubbling in there, like dharma rain filtering through your system, at some point the teachings or the reflection on this might arise in your practice. Perhaps that is the time to begin to explore it.

So there is a place and a time for some exploration of this, but mostly I offer this as information and inspiration—hopefully some inspiration about how helpful this can be to begin to see this leaping point, the springboard from feeling tone into reactivity. It's a key for understanding how our minds suffer. When we can see the feeling tone itself and just know it in this simple way—"oh, this is a pleasant feeling"—often that simple mindfulness almost short-circuits the leap. We experience the feeling tone in a different way.

This further refinement on feeling brings in a distinction between worldly feeling and unworldly feeling. It goes through the three feelings.

When feeling a worldly pleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel a worldly pleasant feeling." Likewise with worldly unpleasant and neither pleasant nor unpleasant. When feeling an unworldly pleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel an unworldly pleasant feeling."

The key here is to begin to understand what is meant by worldly and unworldly. There are a couple of different ways this is translated. In various translations, Bhikkhu Bodhi uses "worldly" and "unworldly," but another version he uses is "carnal" or "bodily"—of the body—and "spiritual"—of the flesh, not of the flesh. I believe that's the most literal translation for the Pali terms sāmisa and nirāmisa.

Bhikkhu Anālayo points out that this kind of feeling serves as a help for us to distinguish feelings that guide us on the path from feelings that tend to catch us in suffering. These spiritual feelings, these unworldly feelings, are feelings connected with the path of practice. This might include, for instance, pleasant feelings associated with generosity, the pleasantness associated with concentration, the bliss of blamelessness associated with engaging in ethical conduct, the delight and joy that come when we understand and see something clearly. These are all pleasant feelings associated with the path.

Now, just because they are associated with the path doesn't mean that we can't cling to them and make trouble for ourselves. We feel those pleasant experiences in concentration, have a sitting that we call a good sitting, and then we spend the rest of our day trying to get back to it because we think that's where it's at—that felt so good, I want that back. As Steve Armstrong says, there's nothing like a good sit to ruin your day. Because we cling to it.

The worldly feelings tend to be those associated with sense experiences—the feeling tones associated with sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch, the food that we eat, and then in our mind, the thoughts about the things that we see, smell, hear, taste, touch, and consume. Those are the places where worldly feeling lands. And there's a lot of habitual clinging around that. Partly because we like the feeling of pleasant, we also tend to cling to these unworldly pleasant feelings. But they do point us in a direction. As we begin to understand or recognize the difference between this unworldly feeling and the worldly feeling, it helps us to understand we're on the path.

Fortunately, even clinging to these things—which we will; I don't know of anyone I've ever spoken to about their meditation practice who has not done this—is self-correcting. Because we feel the suffering of it. We get the dukkha. As soon as we try to start going for that state or that experience, we're all tied up in knots again and we feel the suffering of it. So we understand that clinging to these states is not helpful. It's not to say, "Gee, I shouldn't try to get concentrated because I cling to it." It's more like, "Oh, if I get concentrated and I cling to it, I get to feel the suffering of that." The mind does begin to wind its way out of that habit of clinging. Over time. It takes time.

What I'd also say is that there's an important aspect of this unworldly feeling, particularly around the unworldly pleasant feeling: it helps us to let go of the clinging to worldly pleasant. The pleasure of concentration, the pleasure of equanimity, the pleasure of insight is so superior to any satisfaction we get out of worldly pleasant. So this is almost like a stepping stone. It helps us to let go of our more habitual ways of clinging, our habitual ways of responding and relating to the world. And then at a certain point we get to notice the clinging to this.

There's a teaching: by relying on this, abandon that. By relying on the unworldly pleasant, we can abandon the worldly pleasant. But we'll cling to this, and then we have to begin relying on something else—equanimity, the recognition of insight and understanding—to help us let go of that clinging to the worldly pleasant, to the unworldly pleasant.

Many of the feelings on the path are pleasant. And it was an understanding of the Buddha the night he recognized the path, the direction—there was the understanding: "Why am I afraid of the pleasant states of concentration? Maybe those are on the path." I think they are on the path. But there are also some unpleasant, unworldly experiences.

One of the key experiences the suttas mention is the longing for freedom. Some of you have mentioned this in your meetings, expressing it as a kind of desire. And often there is a greed associated with that—"When am I going to be free?" or "How can I get to this freedom?"

But this teaching actually points to this longing as being a wholesome, on-the-path wish. We can cling to it. We can get greedy about it. But we must recognize that they're probably tangled up—that longing for freedom, together with the greed. We can't throw out the whole thing, because that longing for freedom is keeping us on the path.

So it's time to stop. Let's just sit for a moment. Maybe when I ring the bell, you can notice whether there's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling, and whether it's associated with any idea or view.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 117

Brahmavihāra Practice - Equanimity (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Andrea Fella · 40 min

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a nuanced exploration of upekkhā (equanimity) as the fourth brahmavihāra, distinguishing true equanimity—rooted in understanding and insight—from indifference or delusion-based detachment. She explains how equanimity is intimately connected to the understanding of kamma and conditionality: recognizing that what arises in this moment comes from past causes and conditions, while our present relationship to experience shapes the future. This understanding allows for agency without self, offering a middle way between determinism and helpless reactivity.
>
> Fella illuminates how equanimity serves as the quality that allows the heart to hold both joys and sorrows without being shattered or becoming indifferent. Rather than creating distance, equanimity enables a more intimate connection with experience. She shares a personal story about her journey from wisdom-oriented practice to discovering compassion, illustrating how these qualities are truly two sides of one coin—wisdom meeting suffering becomes compassion, while compassion that doesn't shy away from dukkha cultivates understanding.
>
> The talk includes a guided meditation exploring the interplay between compassion and equanimity, using phrases like "May all beings be free from suffering" alongside "Things are as they are right now—may I accept this as it is." This practice is offered in the context of collective difficulty, demonstrating how these brahmavihāras support practitioners in meeting challenging conditions with both an open heart and balanced mind. The session concludes with Ñāṇaponika Thera's teaching that equanimity's perfection comes not from emotional emptiness but from fullness of understanding.

So I would like to offer a few reflections about equanimity.

Equanimity is a quality of balance of mind. Other words that may resonate: non-reactivity, impartiality, acceptance, ease, non-contentiousness. It's a balance of mind that is connected to understanding.

It is said that there's a kind of equanimity based in delusion. In one of the suttas it talks about equanimity based on the household life, which is basically where you're equanimous because you don't understand what's going on. That's not what we're pointing to here. This equanimity is fully aware of what's happening, and the mind is balanced.

And yet that balance of mind is not indifference. My niece would sometimes, when she was being corrected about something, say with a roll of the eyes, "Whatever." That sounds like it should be equanimity, but with the roll of the eyes, it's not equanimity. It's not indifference; it's not "whatever" in that way.

This equanimity is fully understanding the situation. Understanding that what is here is arising based on causes and conditions. The conditioned nature of experience—the classic teaching of equanimity is really tied to the teaching of karma, the understanding that our happiness and unhappiness is connected to our actions, our choices.

In this moment, in this actual moment, what's arising right now, what we are experiencing right now, is a consequence of choices and conditions, of causes and conditions from the past, but is also related to how we are relating to it right now. This is really where the possibility for non-determinism comes into this whole cause and effect chain. How we are in this moment radically affects what is shaped going forward.

The same thing could be arising based on past conditions, and our relationship to it now can be very different—one of greed, aversion, and delusion, or wisdom, compassion, and kindness. These shape very different futures.

The classic reflection on equanimity is connected to that understanding that things are unfolding in a lawful manner. It's not a mistake, and there is some possibility of choice in the moment—stepping into how we are in this moment, stepping into the future. There is some agency, not an agency of self, but agency of this being in this moment to make a choice based on skillful tendencies, based on wisdom.

So this equanimity is rooted in understanding, rooted in insight, rooted in this deep understanding of conditionality.

The mind of equanimity allows the heart—it kind of ties the other brahmavihāras together in a way. It allows the heart to hold, deeply hold, all the joys and all the sorrows without being shattered by them, sucked under by them, drawn in, but also not indifferent, not stepping back like, "Oh yeah, no problem."

There's a way that equanimity creates a more intimate connection with what is happening. Compassion isn't really complete without equanimity. Equanimity is what's needed for the heart to fully open to suffering without resistance. Equanimity is what's needed for the heart to fully open to all the joys that are happening. Sometimes it's hard to hold the joys and the sorrows together, but that's what equanimity helps us to do. We celebrate the joys and feel the sorrows more deeply with equanimity. So it's definitely not a "whatever" or an indifferent kind of quality of mind.

In classic equanimity practice, we do it very much the way that we've been guiding in the mettā and in the compassion. The classic instructions around the brahmavihāras say that you start where it's easiest. In mettā, we tend to start with either self or the easy being. With compassion, we start with someone who is suffering, because compassion depends on our meeting suffering, and so we pick someone dear to us perhaps, where it might have an easier inroad.

In equanimity, it's said that the neutral person is the easiest person to have equanimity about. We explore the possibility of having equanimity about the unfolding journey of that person, that being. Your actions are dependent upon your choices. All beings are the owners of their actions. Your happiness and unhappiness depend upon your choices. It's that kind of reflection.

And so when we come to all beings, reflecting on that, it's almost like we're looking at the collective karma of beings. We can think of it that way—kind of collective choices that have been made. And the practice of equanimity is a recognition that whether beings are happy or unhappy is not so much about what is happening, but again, the relationship, how you are, the choices you're making.

In reflecting on this situation right now, and for me again, maybe we can play with this a little bit in our meditation, but just reflecting on the conditions of where this arose, how it happened—it's conditioned. The transmission of the virus is conditioned. It's not personal. It's just causes and conditions unfolding. And how are we with these causes and conditions? Do we become distraught, add a second, third, fourth arrow? Or do we explore opening to it with some wisdom?

In opening to the situation with wisdom, when the heart is really open, when we're exploring this possibility of being open to the conditions, the unfolding of conditions, the response of the heart that is open in that way will respond with compassion when the situation is of suffering. And will respond with joy when the situation is connected to success or well-being or happiness.

And so I think we can explore this blending—at least today that's what I'd like to see, how it works—just explore this blending of particularly compassion and equanimity, because they're not really so separate. True compassion has got to have equanimity in it. And true equanimity will meet suffering with compassion.

When we come in, some hearts are more attuned perhaps to wisdom, or some hearts may be attuned more to the brahmaviharas. But they meet. Whichever doorway you come in, there's a bridge to the other quality.

For me in my own journey, wisdom has definitely been my doorway. And the brahmaviharas were pretty difficult for me in the early years of my practice. I didn't quite understand what the feeling of compassion was about. And yet, I just kept practicing and exploring, understanding the conditioned nature of experience. When I would sit down with people and talk to them about their practice or about their experience, I was meeting them from that place of just conditions unfolding. And so that was my experience—this sense of really being able to hold, not being afraid, not shrinking from whatever conditions were in front of me.

I was surprised when people said to me, "I so feel your compassion." This went on for a while and I kept thinking, "That's not my experience. I don't know what compassion feels like." When I talked to several of my colleagues and other teachers about it, several of them just said, "Oh, it's there, don't worry about it." That didn't work for me.

And then I had a conversation with Philip. He was so perceptive. He said, "Your mind is orienting towards wisdom and emptiness when you're meeting with people. Try orienting to the relationship, the connection."

It was stunning. The next time, and I had an opportunity ten minutes later to try it, it wasn't hard. I understood what he meant when he said I was orienting towards emptiness. And when I sat down in front of this other person, it was really simple. All I had to do was think, "I'm sitting in front of Julie. I'm sitting with Julie." The compassion was there.

That was a lesson for me around the connection of wisdom and compassion. It was there, but it was important to understand and feel that it was there.

I think the same thing can happen on the other side. If we cultivate compassion and really can hold with compassion what is happening, equanimity is being cultivated. Wisdom and understanding are being cultivated as we explore compassion, because compassion is meeting suffering. That meeting of suffering, the not shying away from suffering, the understanding of suffering—it's the first noble truth. It's intimately connected with wisdom. These two are just two sides of a coin.

So I'd like to explore—I've never done this before, tried a guided meditation like this—we'll see how it goes. Let's just settle into our postures and body, finding as comfortable a position as possible.

And letting your attention rest in the area of your heart, in your body, in this general region of your torso.

We'll begin with ourselves, holding ourselves—whatever sense of yourself is available, whether a physical sense or perhaps an image of yourself. Since we're going to start with compassion, the instruction is actually to connect to some aspect of your experience that is a little tender or challenging. Something that's not so easy. Bringing or calling dukkha into mind.

And exploring with that, calling that to mind, exploring the possibility of the wish—I'm going to change the language here instead of using "I"—may this being be free from suffering. Free from this suffering.

You can be more specific at times with the practice. It doesn't have to be "free from suffering." It can be "free from this struggle," or "may I have ease with this struggle." Holding yourself with that wish for freedom from dukkha, suffering, stress.

We'll do this in a radiating way now. Simply allowing your attention to radiate outward and take in that there are other beings near you. And knowing the kinds of things going on in your experience these days, we can extrapolate—there's some struggle going on in the beings around us. May we be free from stress.

Remembering it's the wish, not the result here. That's the piece of exploration. May we be at ease with this stress. If being free from seems impossible at this moment—we certainly cannot wave a magic wand and have the coronavirus disappear—and yet, if it were in your power, would that be your wish? That's the depth of the connection to that wish of compassion. It's the wish, not the expectation that the wish be fulfilled. It's the heart that's open to that wish. May we be free from suffering.

Allowing attention to take in all of us together in this room. Perhaps expanding to include the other retreatants who aren't here at this moment, and the managers and staff who are on the land. All of us human beings facing these concerns and uncertainties. May we be free from suffering.

And expanding further, allowing your heart to get as open as it can to take in all beings. Let's start with human beings—all human beings on this planet. Those all over the world struggling and suffering with this worldwide situation. We are joined together by this, intimately connected.

Recollecting the families who are losing people, or people in quarantine finding difficulty with food, or who are lonely and isolated. All different flavors of struggle around the planet. People in physical distress with difficulty breathing. People in fear, afraid they'll become ill. Can the heart open and hold that with this wish? May we be free from suffering.

Remembering it's the wish, not the result.

And while you're holding that—all beings, including yourself, with their struggles, stress, suffering—see what happens if you bring in an equanimity phrase: Whether I understand it or not, things are unfolding according to a lawful nature. Things are just as they are right now. May I accept this as it is. May all beings accept this as it is.

Noticing for yourself what happens with that wish. The heart may become more contracted, or it may relax a little, or maybe not much is happening.

And now bringing back the compassion phrase: May we all be free from this suffering. Notice how the heart feels with that wish.

Things are as they are right now. May I accept this as it is.

May all beings accept this as it is. May all beings be free from suffering. May we all accept conditions as they are. May all beings be free from suffering.

I'll fall quiet for a while and let you play with this alternation of the compassion phrase and some version or flavor of the equanimity phrase. Explore this alternation, being aware of how the phrase lands or affects your heart, your body, your mind. If one or the other is more resonant for you, you're welcome to linger with that one for a little while, and then maybe just sprinkle in the other every now and then. See what happens. Just be attuned to how these wishes land.

When I'm exploring practice for all beings, I often find it helpful to hold the idea of all beings while letting images of beings come to mind—imagining situations with beings around the planet, specific beings—which helps me connect more fully. You could play with that as well, not just keeping it at the abstract level of "all beings," but allowing the mind to circle the globe and land somewhere, considering what might be happening there. Let an image come in and express the wish with that representative of all beings.

I'll close with a quote from Nyanaponika Thera about equanimity:

"Equanimity is a perfect, unshakable balance of mind, rooted in insight. But in its perfection and unshakable nature, equanimity is not dull, heartless, and frigid. Its perfection is not due to an emotional emptiness, but to a fullness of understanding, to its being complete in itself. Its unshakable nature is not the immovability of a dead, cold stone, but the manifestation of the highest strength."

Thank you for exploring this today. May our practice be of service and support for the happiness, well-being, and freedom of all beings everywhere.

CHAPTER 118

Four Noble Truths

Andrea Fella · 46 min

In this talk, Andrea Fella offers a fresh perspective on the Four Noble Truths (cattāri ariyas-accāni) by examining them not merely as doctrinal statements but as direct insights the Buddha experienced at his awakening. Drawing from Majjhima Nikāya 4, where the Buddha describes directly knowing "as it actually is" the nature of dukkha, its arising, cessation, and the path leading to its end, Andrea distinguishes between intellectual understanding and the transformative insight that leads to liberation.

A key teaching from this talk is that suffering arises now—in this present moment—rather than being stored from the past. Using a powerful personal example of working with anger, Andrea illustrates how the mind can witness the non-arising of suffering when wisdom is present, showing that the conditions for freedom are available in each moment. She explores the Pāli term samudaya, typically translated as "origin," noting that it more accurately means "arising," pointing to the co-arising of craving and suffering rather than a causal sequence.

Andrea also expands the traditional introspective focus of the Four Noble Truths to include understanding suffering in community and relationship, referencing the Buddha's teaching to his son Rāhula about reflecting on whether actions cause harm to self, others, or both. She emphasizes that the peace of the Third Noble Truth does not mean non-action but rather action arising from compassion and wisdom rather than craving—a freedom that naturally moves toward alleviating suffering in the world.

Thinking about this freedom, the possibility of freedom, it can be perhaps interesting or useful to look at what the Buddha described as the experience in the moment of his awakening. It's described in different ways, and I'm just going to pick one of those tonight to look at. We're going to basically be spending the week looking at a variety of different ways to explore this: What is this freedom? What is this awakening?

In one description the Buddha gave of his awakening, he described that he had four insights: "I directly knew as it actually is, this is suffering. I directly knew as it actually is, this is the origin of suffering. I directly knew as it actually is, this is the cessation of suffering. I directly knew as it actually is, this is the practice leading to the cessation of suffering."

In this framing, insight is being described here—directly knew as it actually is. This is a little different than the framing of these statements which are typically understood to be the Four Noble Truths. When the Buddha had the insights, the way I kind of think of it in my own understanding, there was some insight that was born in him. And it's no surprise actually that the insights were framed in this way around suffering, because his whole path, the whole exploration, was around this question of what is suffering. This was a question that motivated him. What is suffering? Is it possible to be free of it? How does it come to be? How does it end? These were the kinds of questions that motivated his search.

And so the understanding that arose and the freedom that arose with that understanding, framed in terms of suffering—it kind of makes sense. But the way he expresses it is a direct understanding, a direct insight, a direct knowing. "This is suffering." It's different from "this is the truth of dukkha, birth is dukkha, aging is dukkha, death is dukkha." That's a kind of teaching, perhaps. Maybe my understanding of this is that there was some insight that he had around dukkha in these four ways, and the rest of his teaching career was trying to help us understand that—help us understand how we could see that for ourselves. The framing of the Four Noble Truths was one of the ways that he spoke to help us begin to look at our experience from this perspective, from a different perspective.

So this question of whether it is possible to be free from suffering—I think this first insight, "this is suffering," in some ways speaks to a probably radical reframing of what even the idea of suffering is. The possibility to be free of suffering, ending suffering, doesn't mean that we somehow finally figure out how to arrange a life to our liking. That whole notion that we might—actually it's great news that freedom from suffering doesn't depend on that, because it doesn't seem to be possible to arrange a life to our satisfaction.

Pleasant things will happen, unpleasant things will happen. There'll just be this stream, this flow of pleasant and unpleasant experience happening. And fixing or changing that flow is not what is meant by the ending of suffering. The suffering the Buddha discovered—what suffering is that's possible to be free of—is a suffering that is in relationship to that flow. The flow of unpleasant, pleasant, neutral experience is going to continue.

The unpleasant experience in particular, from a kind of unenlightened or unaware perspective, unpleasant experience is dukkha, unpleasant experience is suffering. And the understanding that actually, no, unpleasant experience itself is not suffering, and pleasant experience that disappears is not inherently suffering—this, I think, is a new understanding that the Buddha brought for us. This insight, "this is suffering," was a kind of radical reorientation of the mind around what suffering actually is.

This question of our relationship to pleasant and unpleasant, our wanting it to be pleasant, our wanting to get rid of the unpleasant—it's pointing to the second noble truth, the framing of the second noble truth: that the possibility for ease and peace with this flow of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral comes with the ending of wanting it to be some other way, that craving for it to be some other way, that constriction for it to be some other way.

The Buddha offered, over the course of his teaching, an understanding of the Four Noble Truths. In some ways I like to think about the Four Noble Truths as put firmly at the beginning of the Eightfold Path, right view—the understanding of the Four Noble Truths, right there in Right View. This is the intellectual understanding. The beginning of our path has to come with some kind of rethinking of what we think of as suffering, beginning to reframe our understanding of the possibility for freedom from suffering.

freedom to arrange the world the way I want it to be.

The framing of the Four Noble Truths in that first discourse the Buddha gave—I think of it as the perspective he wants us to explore, to bring to our practice. And this is what we've been looking at for the whole course of this program: How do we bring this perspective to our lives?

I want to explore the Four Noble Truths in a somewhat different way this evening—from the perspective of there being insights, and from the perspective of there being a framework through which we can directly meet experience.

This pattern that I described, the Buddha said he understood as it actually is: "I directly knew as it actually is, this is suffering. I directly knew as it actually is, this is the arising of suffering. I directly knew as it actually is, this is the cessation of suffering. I directly knew as it actually is, this is the practice leading to the cessation of suffering."

In various places in the texts, it points to this pattern: "I directly knew" or "I directly understood" X. "I directly understood the origin of X. I directly understood the ending of X. And I directly understood the practice leading to the ending of X"—where X is replaced by many things in the teaching. This pattern of the insights around the Four Noble Truths was not just applied to the word dukkha.

It was applied to the five aggregates: "I directly understood form, the arising of form, the ending of form, the path leading to the ending of form."

It was applied to the sankhāras, the formations: "I directly understood mental formations. I directly understood the arising of mental formations. I directly understood the cessation of mental formations. I directly understood the path leading to the cessation of mental formations."

It was applied to the six sense bases. In short, it was applied to our experience—all of our experience.

And this, I think, is what the pointing is in the Fourth Foundation of Mindfulness. We're encouraged to look at the Four Noble Truths in the Fourth Foundation of Mindfulness, and there it uses suffering. But I think we are encouraged to understand experience itself. The five aggregates, as we talked about in the last retreat, encompass all of our experience—it can be understood through the arising of the five aggregates in various configurations. All of our experience can be understood in terms of the arising of senses, of this meeting of experience at the six sense bases.

And so we can explore not just around suffering, but anything. Whatever's arising, we can be curious about: What is it? What is its origin? How does it arise?

This is another way to frame this language, because the word here in Pali—often translated as "the cause of suffering" or "the origin of suffering"—is samudaya. This is the word used for the second noble truth, the origin or the arising of suffering. At least as I understand from Gil Fronsdal's research, in other places in the suttas when the word samudaya is used, it means arising.

So what is the arising of suffering? The arising of suffering happens with the arising of craving. It's a subtly different framing of the second noble truth. Craving is not the cause of suffering, as if craving happens and then suffering happens. When craving arises, suffering arises with it. It's a co-arising.

As we learned in dependent co-arising: with the arising of craving is the arising of suffering. With the ending of craving is the ending of suffering.

So the exploration might be: What's the origin of something? Or we could simply explore: How does it arise? What's here? What's arising? What's ending?

This can be some of what we look at in our practice. And this is what I think the Fourth Foundation, this teaching in the Fourth Foundation, was pointing us to.

In another place, in Majjhima Nikāya 2, he describes this same pattern—looking at suffering, the arising of suffering, the ending of suffering, and the path or practice leading to the ending of suffering—not so much as insight already realized, but as an orientation or framework through which we look at our experience. This is a teaching on wise attention.

Here the Buddha says that in order to learn how to free oneself from suffering, one needs to attend wisely. How does one attend wisely? One attends wisely: "This is suffering." One attends wisely: "This is the arising of suffering." One attends wisely: "This is the ending of suffering." And one attends wisely: "This is the practice leading to the ending of suffering."

So we can look at our experience through this framework. In a way, what this points to—one way I understand this teaching, at least—is that whatever is happening in our experience can be seen through one of these four perspectives. It's either suffering that's already here, suffering that's coming into being, suffering that's ending, or we are cultivating tools and practices. We're cultivating the pāramīs. We're cultivating mindfulness. We're cultivating concentration. We're cultivating the path that heads us in the direction of freedom. Whatever is arising in our experience, whatever's happening, we could know it from this perspective.

And this is important to recognize: it's not about "this is unpleasant experience." The suffering is about the contraction, the constriction, the craving that comes along with it—the wish that it were some other way. Either the wish that unpleasant experience were not here, or the wish that pleasant experience would not be disappearing, or the wish for something more exciting than neutral experience. Or the suffering that comes with unawareness, with just spacing out around experience. So it's not the unpleasant experience itself; it is that relationship, that wishing it were some other way, the craving. I think you're all familiar with what this means, to understand suffering when it arises. And I think you also understand the distinction between unpleasant experience just as unpleasant experience and feeling into the ease and peace that's possible even in the face of unpleasant experience.

Another thing I appreciate about this particular teaching, this framing of wise attention—"this is suffering," "this is the cause of suffering"—this is the operative word. What's happening now, in this present moment. In this teaching the Buddha is encouraging us to look at the now. Not what happened five minutes ago or two years ago or eight years ago, but what's happening now. Suffering happens now.

This was a really important recognition for me when I began exploring this perspective. On one retreat, this got highlighted for me. I was experiencing a lot of suffering—embarrassment was the experience—that came up as I remembered an incident from several years before. This memory kept popping up; it was a particularly embarrassing memory of being on stage and forgetting a line. There I was, standing looking out at the audience, not having a clue what to say. That moment arose in my memory over and over again.

What I got to see was that while the suffering was arising in dependence on that memory coming up, the suffering was being recreated in this moment. It wasn't that somehow the old embarrassment from years before was being dredged up, or that it was sitting in some little storeroom and I'd opened a trap door to find the embarrassment waiting there. The memory arose, and in that moment—I got to see this so clearly on retreat—the memory arose and the reaction to that memory was embarrassment. The suffering, the embarrassment, was created in that moment.

Suffering arises now. If you are experiencing suffering in this moment, the information you need to understand it is arising now.

Whatever you can know about this moment will help you to understand what will lead to freedom from that suffering.

Likewise, the cause of suffering arises now. In that example, the reaction to the memory was some kind of wanting that not to have happened—some kind of craving for that not to have happened. Again, arising in the mind, in the moment. This craving for that not to have happened.

So again, suffering happens now. The craving that leads to that suffering happens now. This is hugely freeing when we can start to watch it. And this pointing to seeing the suffering happening now, seeing the arising of suffering happening now, leads us to the place where we can see the suffering ending now also.

We learn about our experience through this framework of looking at experience. This is suffering. We begin to see how suffering arises now. It arises in dependence on things that have happened, yes. It arises in dependence on memories and things that we've done in our past and conditions from the past. But those conditions are like all pulled together here again in this moment. And the suffering arises now.

As I began to witness this over the course of watching the mind, I began to see thoughts that would arise that had habitually triggered particular reactivity—those thoughts could simply arise. That was a bit of a shock to me. I had kind of thought that certain memories inherently came with their baggage. Memories are pretty habitually connected to the baggage. It's like our baggage is floating around with us. It doesn't weigh anything, though, unless we pick it up.

So the thoughts can arise, memories can arise, moods can arise, and the subsequent habitual response does not have to arise. This is experiencing the freedom from suffering—watching, seeing that in the moment.

Sometimes this third noble truth is experienced as watching something release, seeing a clinging and feeling it let go. That feeling of seeing the clinging let go has a particular quality of release. We recognize that contraction releasing. That's one way that we sometimes experience this third noble truth, this ending of suffering.

But sometimes we experience it in a different way. We sometimes might experience it as suffering that doesn't arise—the non-arising of suffering.

The best example I have of this is one that I've given a lot, so some of you may have heard this story. One very particularly clear example from my practice: I had spent quite a bit of time watching anger in my life in my early days in practice. It was my very first mindfulness practice—watching anger in my daily life. And I got really familiar with the dukkha of anger. Really familiar with that.

As I look back on this story, I see how the mind was applying the Four Noble Truths to experience without consciously knowing what it was doing. I had learned enough about the teachings to be curious about what is anger. Okay, well, this is what anger feels like. That right there is the curiosity of "this is dukkha." Okay, here's anger. This is dukkha. What is the human experience of anger? That's dukkha.

In this exploration of watching anger for a couple of months, I really got it that anger is dukkha. Really got it. Completely.

And so one day I was just in my kitchen doing some things, cutting an apple, and as I cut that apple a memory arose. I was not trying to practice here. This was just the fruit, really, of being available for anger and being available to watch and be curious about experience. In that moment, I saw the arising of a thought of being with the person that I was angry with. We were together at a fruit stand.

So in that moment I could see there was a connection between what I was doing—cutting the apple—and the memory that came up. And I could see the memory coming up. With this particular person, I had a lot of associations. Pretty much just about anything I would do would find a pathway to some memory with this person. So this one, cutting an apple, brought up a memory with this person.

And in that moment, the mind saw that memory and saw this kind of urge—this urge to jump on that thought and think more thoughts and get angry at him. Think thoughts to make myself angry. There was a strong urge in that direction. It takes a while to describe this, but this all happened in about a second, or a split second.

In that moment of seeing that urge, that heading in that direction, the mind wanting to get angry, I could see that I wasn't yet angry. Anger had not arisen. And in that moment the mind thought, Don't pick up that thought. Don't go there. And again, this wasn't something I did. It was the mind. Actually, my understanding came in retrospect. And so much understanding, I think, happens in retrospect, as Temple was saying earlier. We see how we've become free as we reflect back on things.

In retrospect, I understood that the months of looking at anger and realizing it was suffering—the mind recognized in that moment that wanting to get angry was headed right towards suffering. And because it understood that it was headed towards suffering, the mind said, We don't want to go there. So the mind did not go there.

This was not something I could have tried to do. In fact, I stood there waiting to get angry because it seemed impossible in my mind for this person to arise in my mind and anger not arise in my mind. And yet it didn't. I stood there waiting for myself to get angry and I didn't get angry. At that point I kind of sank down to my knees. It was like, Wow. This is possible.

That moment was a real moment of seeing. That was the seeing of the non-arising of suffering. It wasn't seeing the ending of suffering; it was seeing it's not happening, it's not arising. That was a very powerful moment in my practice. I really credit that moment with having me commit to this practice for the rest of my life.

So this third noble truth we can see through this releasing—the sense of feeling the clenching and the craving and watching it. Sometimes we can see it let go. And sometimes we can simply see it's not arising. That non-arising of suffering might be experienced in different ways. I'm not going to go into those; I'm hoping you'll explore some of those in a few minutes when we have an exploration of this.

Whatever is happening in our experience is a possibility to understand it from this perspective. Each noble truth in the first discourse of the Buddha—which I think we assigned to you recently—each noble truth in that discourse is associated with a task, an action that essentially turns those understandings of the Four Noble Truths into practices. Suffering is meant to be understood. Craving should be abandoned, released. The ending of suffering should be realized. And the path leading to the ending of suffering should be cultivated.

In that discourse, there are three ways each of those insights is explored. Around suffering, the first insight is simply to recognize, This is suffering—that same recognition, that same insight that we just talked about. What actually is suffering? This is an insight when we recognize, Oh yes, anger is suffering.

This is an insight. Maybe it doesn't feel good, but this is an insight. So this is suffering.

The second insight is that suffering should be understood. It's useful, it's valuable to turn towards suffering and begin to get curious about it. This is the second insight. Again, we can see ourselves in this teaching, I think, because we spend a lot of time when practicing being curious, turning towards. Anytime we recognize, "Oh right, frustration is happening," and ask, "What's the experience of frustration?"—that's an expression of this second insight around the First Noble Truth. Suffering should be understood.

The third insight: suffering has been understood. This is the realization, the recognition of what it actually means to understand suffering. Suffering has been understood. To me, these three right here are a kind of description of the whole path. In some ways, I think each of these three insights around any one of these truths is a whole path of practice.

So suffering is arising. It should be understood. We turn our attention towards it and begin to be curious about it. When suffering has been understood, we are already beginning to understand the Second Noble Truth. When suffering has been understood, we understand something about why it arises. We understand something about the craving that has conditioned it. When suffering has been understood, there is a release from that craving. And so in some ways we can look at these actions associated with each noble truth as leading onward to the next.

Understanding suffering leads us to recognize that craving is the cause of suffering, and that it should be released and can be released. Probably not by saying, "Oh, I'm going to let go of you, I'm going to do the letting go," but more along the lines of curiosity, exploration, creating the conditions for the letting go to happen.

That letting go happening—that's the Third Noble Truth. As we allow craving to be released, the abandoning occurs. Craving is abandoned with the abandoning of craving. And again, these three framings: This is craving. Craving should be abandoned. Craving has been abandoned. When craving has been abandoned, what's the experience? This is the ending of suffering. This ending of suffering needs to be realized, and has been realized. So each of these noble truths leads onward to the next, just as we do this simple path of turning towards our experience, recognizing our experience.

Another piece I want to bring in around "suffering should be understood" concerns the First Noble Truth and the Third Noble Truth. The teaching around this, often in the way we talk about it, is very much internal. We are looking at suffering as it's arising here, exploring what the human experience of suffering is. And this is a piece of what the Buddha encouraged us to explore. But he also encouraged us, with respect to suffering, to look at suffering in community, in relationship.

In a teaching he gave to his son—and we've talked about this teaching, but I want to point to it here again—he encouraged us to look at suffering in community. He said to his son, before you do an action of body, speech, or mind, reflect: Is this going to cause suffering for yourself, for someone else, or for both? So right there he brings community in. Exploring and understanding suffering is not just about suffering that happens here, but also understanding when suffering is happening based on our actions, based on other people's actions in our communities.

And so this is an avenue for the exploration of the questions we've been looking at around suffering in our systems, in our cultures—around race and homophobia and ageism and sexism, the suffering that comes around war, around jealousy, around hoarding, around using resources. Looking at how actions impact self, other, both. This is part of the exploration of suffering too. And I think we are really, as a community of practitioners, bringing that piece into our practice. I think it's been left out of our practice, but we're bringing it in. What is suffering, not just in here, but in our communities as well?

And then the Third Noble Truth: peace is possible. Peace is possible.

The ending of craving leads to peace. Again, a peace that's really useful to recognize—and just to say over and over again—that peace around letting go of craving does not mean that we let go of action.

We may recognize there are situations and conditions in the world, and we've lost our sense of constriction around the wanting for that to not be there. So the constriction's not there; the heart's not clenched. And yet that very heart not being clenched—it feels the suffering way more strongly.

We think perhaps peace means non-action because what does it mean to act when we don't want? If we're not wanting, why would we act? That's our question. If I didn't crave something to be another way, why would I act?

Well, the heart wants to act to alleviate suffering. The heart wants to act in resonance with suffering, with joy. And so the heart at peace, to me, is the heart of non-constriction, but it's not the heart of non-action. The action comes from compassion, from joy, from kindness, from wisdom—instead of from craving.

The third noble truth, peace is possible, doesn't mean that we end up floating on some cloud somewhere. I think this brings us into engagement. It brings many of us into engagement.

I was pointing earlier to the way that the expression of a free mind and heart can take so many different forms. I've met monks who seem very free who are sitting in caves, kind of removed from the world. And other people who seem very free who are deeply engaged in the world. The expression of freedom will have your flavor. Look for that. What is your flavor of freedom?

CHAPTER 119

Non-clinging Part 1: Exploring the Aṭṭhakavagga

Andrea Fella · 1h15

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella introduces the Aṭṭhakavagga ("Chapter of the Eights"), a collection of 16 poems from the Sutta Nipāta that scholars consider among the earliest Buddhist teachings. Unlike later systematized teachings, this text notably lacks references to the Four Noble Truths, the Eightfold Path, or detailed dependent origination, instead offering direct pointing to non-clinging as the essential path to liberation.

Fella explains that the text can be understood through three perspectives: the ordinary person caught by clinging, the liberated person free from clinging, and the training that bridges these two states. The teaching particularly emphasizes two forms of clinging—to sense pleasures and to views—exploring how both lead to suffering and conflict. Drawing on translations by Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu and the doctoral thesis of Grace Burford, Fella highlights how this text presents liberation not as a metaphysical achievement but as a practical way of living free from anger, fear, and attachment.

The talk addresses challenging questions about how to engage with views skillfully—particularly relevant in times of social conflict—without falling into either rigid attachment or spiritual bypass. Fella explores the apparent paradox of the Buddha speaking truth while teaching non-attachment to views, and examines the Simile of the Raft to illuminate how clinging to the Dhamma itself must eventually be released. This teaching offers practitioners a direct, non-metaphysical approach to freedom that emphasizes recognizing and releasing clinging in everyday experience.

This morning I wanted to structure the teachings around one particular text. It's a relatively lesser-known text in some ways, found in the Sutta Nipata, which is one of the smaller books in the smaller collections of the suttas. Until recently, there hadn't been very many translations into English. In fact, Bhikkhu Bodhi is coming out with a translation of the Sutta Nipata—I think that will come out next year. So this text hasn't been too accessible in English translation.

I first got interested in it maybe six or seven years ago, when Gil, my colleague at IMC, said, "This is a really important text, and I think we need to give a daylong on it, but I don't have time to do it. Would you do it?" I said, "I don't even know what that text is. I've never even read it. What is it?" He told me a few things about it, and I said, "Well, that sounds interesting, but I'm not ready to give a daylong on something I've not even looked at." He said, "Well, let's put it on the calendar." So I said, "Okay, let's put it on the calendar in six months." I spent those six months studying this text, and it was a really powerful time for me.

I mention this because in talking about orientations to practice, some of you have mentioned wanting to pick up a theme for a while and explore it. Sometimes we can enter into a study and just see where it goes. Don't give yourself a limitation on it. In my case I did have a deadline—I had to have something to say in six months—but really giving yourself time to explore a teaching can be valuable. I found this particular text to be very, very rich.

There are a couple of interesting things about the Aṭṭhakavagga. One is that scholars generally understand this particular text to be an early teaching of the Buddha. A couple of things indicate this. One is that it's one of the few texts referred to in other places in the suttas. There's commentary about it, with people saying, "Have you memorized the Aṭṭhakavagga? Can you repeat that?" So it is mentioned and held up as a revered teaching in the suttas themselves.

Another indication is that the Pali in which this particular text is recorded is a more archaic form of the language. The text is written in poetry, however, and Thanissaro Bhikkhu points out that poetry in the texts—when the Buddha breaks into verse or people use poetry in the suttas—tends to be in this more archaic form of Pali. So he says it's not necessarily a good argument for it being an early text simply because it uses this earlier form of the language.

But there's another quality about this text that strikes me—this is more my sense rather than something from scholars. The picture it gives of the Buddha is that of a solitary monk. It's the Buddha wandering around without a big retinue of people. He's not sitting there talking to five hundred monks. He's wandering around the countryside, running into people and having conversations with them. That's the flavor of this text. As I read it and let myself settle into it, I got a very visceral sense of what some of the early teaching years of the Buddha might have looked like.

The other thing I find interesting about this text is that it doesn't refer to most of what we think of as the Buddhist teachings. The Four Noble Truths are not mentioned. The Eightfold Path is not mentioned. Transcendent dependent origination is not mentioned, although there is a place where a kind of conditioned chain appears that is very much like transcendent dependent origination.

The theme of this particular teaching is suffering resulting from clinging. How clinging leads to suffering is a key theme. Non-clinging as the path to freedom is a key theme. So really, this text points to perhaps some of the early teachings of the Buddha directly pointing to non-clinging—simply, don't cling.

Temple mentioned Joseph's quote the other day: "Nothing should be clung to as I, me, or mine." That particular quote is not in this text, but the orientation is the same—don't cling. Don't cling to anything. Keep looking at where you're clinging and release that, release that, release that. Freedom is the result of non-clinging. That's the direction this teaching points.

The text itself is relatively short—sixteen poems, about two hundred and ten verses. The title, the Aṭṭhakavagga, means something like "the chapter of the eights" or "the chapter of the octads." It's a little mysterious why it's called that, because the first couple of poems have eight verses or eight sections to them, but after that there's no connection to eights as far as I can tell. So we don't know why it's called this, but that's the name it's been given.

Because it's relatively short—though long enough and deep enough—all we're really going to be able to do in this session is get a sense of how this teaching teaches, what it points to, and I hope to give you some interest in exploring it. To me, it has the flavor of direct pointing—direct pointing to liberation, direct pointing to freedom. It uses almost koan-like teachings at some points to shake the mind up, particularly around views, around clinging to views.

We're not going to be able to go through the entire teaching in detail. What I'd like to do is give you a flavor of it and hope that some of you find this teaching of interest and pick it up for study. It is complex in some ways—because of this koan-like nature, it deserves time. You read something and you go, "What?" You read it and go, "I'll just sit with that for a while." Not trying to figure it out intellectually, but just letting yourself sit with it. So I hope this inspires some of you to look at this text.

Now, the way this set of poems teaches—I spent six months studying it, and I used a couple of key sources. I used one PhD thesis on the topic by Grace Burford, if any of you are interested in going into an academic study of it. I think it's called Desire and... I'll get the reference for you. So she wrote a PhD thesis on the topic. And then I also used Thanissaro Bhikkhu's comments, his notes on this text. He's translated it, and that translation is on Access to Insight.

I found as many translations as I could while doing this study, and that's another thing I'd point you to if you want to study a particular text—it's useful to find as many translations as you can. I searched the internet and found several others. One of the key ones I found that I use a lot here is a version by Bhikkhu Varado. So Thanissaro Bhikkhu has a translation. Saddhatissa has a translation. Norman has a translation. There are some out there. Gil Fronsdal is coming out with a translation later this year with commentaries, so that may be a great source if you're interested in studying it.

Primarily I used this PhD thesis and Thanissaro Bhikkhu's notes on the text. One of the key points he made that really helped me in the study of this teaching is that there are three key perspectives this teaching looks at. You can look at any of the verses and basically see it's coming from one of these three perspectives. As you read this text, he said, see which of the three perspectives this teaching is coming from.

Those three perspectives are: first, the perspective of an ordinary person, someone who's caught by clinging—that perspective. Second, the perspective of someone who's free—what does it look like when somebody is not clinging? And third, how do we get from one to the other? What's the training?

So the structure is very simple. If you see this overarching structure, it's really simple: What's it like to be caught?

What's it like to be free? And how do we become free?

I'd like to explore some of these verses with you. I have made selections, and I took the liberty in putting this handout together to edit these translations for gender neutrality. It began to feel a little heavy to me, hearing "he, he, he, he" everywhere, so I changed them. These are not the direct translations, but I have modified them for gender neutrality.

This first one, Sutta 1, the Kāma Sutta on sensual pleasures, is a description of somebody who's caught by clinging—clinging to sense pleasure. There are key ways that we cling, and in later teachings, the Buddha codified the four kinds of clinging. I think another interesting thing about this teaching is its absence of lists. It doesn't say, "Here are the four kinds of clinging." It simply talks about clinging. But in later teachings, the Buddha spoke about clinging to sense pleasure, clinging to rites and rituals, clinging to identity view, and clinging to views separate from identity view. These are the main four kinds of clinging. This particular text focuses on sense pleasure and views as the real exploration of clinging.

So this first one looks at what it looks like when we're clinging to sense pleasure. How does that appear?

If one longing for sensual pleasure achieves it, yes, they're enraptured at heart. The mortal gets what they want. But if for that person, longing, desiring, the pleasure diminishes, they're shattered as if shot by an arrow. One who is greedy is overpowered by weakness, is trampled by trouble, for pain invades them as water a cracked boat.

This points to the drawbacks of sense pleasure. We all know that this is something which takes some practice to really begin to understand. When we achieve what we desire, yes, we get that moment of "this is good." And yet, because of the law of impermanence—the truth, the reality of impermanence—the getting of that is not lasting. So there's this cycle: "Oh, that didn't last. Where else can I get something? Let me find it." And when we lose the things we've gained, the Buddha talks about that pain invading us like water leaking into a cracked boat.

Another discourse on this, the second one I've included, is the Discourse on the Cave:

Longing for what's over or for what's to come. Yearning for pleasures in the present and pleasures of the past. Those who are greedy for pleasure, hunting for it, deranged, selfish, have entered the wrong road.

Again, this points to the sense that there may be some pleasure or gratification we get from obtaining what we want, but that ultimately this is not the road to a deeper happiness, a truer happiness, a more free kind of happiness—one that's not dependent on the conditions of the world.

And then verse 777 says:

Look at them floundering amidst their cherished possessions like fish in a dwindling stream.

That image came to me in my meditation. I think the Buddha's analogies are very evocative. I was sitting in meditation at one point during a long retreat, just watching my mind flipping around—where can I get happiness, where? And it felt like this flopping, this fish flopping around. The mind is flopping around looking for something to make it happy. This image came to me of the fish in a dwindling stream, and I laughed. That's what he's talking about. That's the sense of the mind just grasping for someplace to find pleasure. The dwindling stream.

So those are some of the drawbacks, what happens as we cling to sense pleasure. We have to have the understanding that there's a drawback to clinging to sense pleasure, or we're never going to look at what else might be possible.

Now the next piece I want to look at: we've examined clinging to sense pleasure, and now comes the second piece—what happens when somebody clings to views? Because this is the other key element of this teaching on clinging.

These verses describe the drawbacks to clinging to views:

Abiding by fixed opinions and pleased with themselves, they say, "My opponent's a fool, they're no expert."

Upon whatever basis they regard their opponent a fool is the same upon which they regard themselves an expert. To the extent to which they rate themselves expert, they despise anyone else who makes the same claim. And one of my favorite lines of this whole text: "Those attached to perception and views roam the world offending people."

We see this. We see this daily right now in our political primary season.

"Those who maintain a view and dispute, saying this alone is true—is criticism all they experience?" This question comes from someone in conversation with the Buddha. It's one of those suttas that describes the Buddha just talking to somebody. He's having a conversation with this person about views, and he's said, "Clinging to views isn't helpful." And this person responds, "But when they maintain a view and dispute, saying this alone is true, is criticism all they experience? Don't they also get something useful? Don't they also receive praise?"

The Buddha responds: "What they receive is trifling—not enough to bring any peace of mind."

Again, here we're pointing to what is possible. The whole notion of clinging to views bringing some kind of praise, the value that people put on praise—thinking that's what I want to go for—the Buddha says that's trifling. That's like this tiny benefit. It does not bring them any peace of mind. "I say there are only two consequences of dispute: praise and criticism. Seeing this, you should not dispute. Regard instead non-dispute the grounds for peace."

Now, this can challenge us—this particular kind of statement, in some ways. When we have people holding up a particular perspective that is oppressive, a certain political candidate holding up the perspective of "let's build a wall"... To just let that sit in the world, it kind of feels to us like if I don't dispute that, aren't I letting that go forward? Aren't I letting that take over?

And I think to some extent, when we look at what's happening in this text, there are times—I don't have an example in the handout, I don't think—but there are times when the Buddha is saying something quite different. I can remember one where somebody says, "Aren't there many kinds of truths? Doesn't everybody have their own truth?" And the Buddha said, "No, there is one truth." So it's not that the Buddha doesn't come forward and say this is what's right, this is what's true, this is what's valuable, this is the direction we should go.

But I think non-dispute is around the clinging. The clinging that I'm right, you're wrong—the clinging is where we get caught. Not through the recognition of "this wholesome direction needs to be put into the world."

The Buddha didn't just sit there when people said things he felt were inappropriate. He didn't just sit there. He said, "No, that's not the way it is." And so this is a little bit of a paradox. The Buddha said non-dispute is the grounds for peace, and yet when we read this text, it sounds like he's disputing. So what is that? What does that mean? How can we understand non-dispute within what seems to be dispute?

That's what I'd like to encourage us to explore in our own lives. I want to get out there and say building a wall is not the way. Kicking out all the Muslims is not the way. This is not what's helpful, this is not what's wholesome. I want to get out there and say that—but what does it mean to do that without hating, without constriction?

That's the exploration here. Non-dispute is the grounds for peace. It doesn't mean not saying what's in the direction of the wholesome. But how can we do that without the constriction? And if we do it with the constriction, know that. This is our practice. We feel, "Oh, I hate you for saying that." That doesn't feel good, but that's where I am. Okay, can I know that? Can I know the suffering of that hatred? I'm not at the point of being able to let that go, but I can know it and know that it's suffering.

That begins—and I think so many times as we explore suffering, this speaks to some of that spiritual bypass.

If we were just to say, "Oh, I shouldn't hate," well, that's not what's happening right now. If I were to step aside from that feeling of not liking what's being put out into the world, that doesn't feel good. I constrict around it. I get angry about it. Can I open to that?

Through that opening, my sense and understanding of how the practice works is that as I open to that constriction, wisdom begins to tease apart the piece of that which is wisdom from the piece of that which is aversion, greed, confusion. And so if I were to just step aside from it entirely, I would miss the wisdom that needs to be revealed in that exploration. So open to those places of constriction, confusion. Don't be afraid of them. They open us to wisdom and compassion and understanding how to hold on.

You know, this is a koan for me—that non-disputing dispute. But can I hold that? Can I hold that possibility and explore where it feels like it's not happening?

So, clinging to views. The next way this teaching teaches is by showing us what it looks like to be someone who is liberated. Liberation in this text is interesting. Let's read some verses from the Aṭṭhakavagga describing someone who is free.

The questioner, again a solitary person the Buddha is having a conversation with, asks: Having what vision, being of what character is one called peaceful? Gautama, tell me about the supreme person.

The Buddha responds: A person who is not angered, not frightened, not boastful, not fretful, who gives wise advice, who is calm, restrained in speech, who is indeed a sage. A person who is not attached to the future, who does not sorrow over the past, who finds solitude amidst sense contact and is not guided by fixed views. A person who is retiring, not deceitful, not covetous, not greedy, not impudent, not arousing contempt, who does not engage in malicious speech. A person who does not relish pleasure, who is not arrogant, who is mild and of ready wit, who is not credulous, who by nothing is repelled. A person who does not take on the training in hopes of material gain, who is unperturbed if they get nothing, who is not hampered by wishes and not greedy for flavors. A person who is even-tempered, ever-attentive, who does not suppose that in the world they are equal, superior, or inferior, who is free of conceit. A person for whom there are no tethers, who in knowing the truth is not tethered in any way, and in whom no wishes are found for existence or non-existence. This is someone I call peaceful. They are indifferent to sense pleasure. In them bonds are not found. They have overcome attachment. The sage, free of greed and selfishness, does not speak of oneself as among those who are superior, equal, or inferior.

A couple of pieces about this. Mostly what it describes is not "someone who is peaceful has attained this refined state of nibbāna." It describes them living in the world and what that person looks like living in the world. Primarily, it reads as a description of what they are not—not angry, not frightened, not boastful, no blind faith. There are a few areas where it points to qualities of mind that are present: wise, calm, even-tempered, attentive. This may also be challenging for us to some extent.

But I think the fact that it points to what we are not—what is a free person? It doesn't say what that person is; it says what they're not—this speaks to a really radical direction of the Buddhist pointing. He wasn't talking about freedom as something we get, as something to have. He was speaking about what needs to be released for freedom to happen.

This to me speaks to something important. The Buddha didn't say, "When somebody is free, this is what they do, this is what they look like." He said, "This is what's not happening." Someone who's not angry, not boastful, not frightened, not clinging to blind faith—how that person is in the world, what they do, can look many different ways. There's not one result of freedom. So to me, while it's a little unfamiliar to hear about what somebody is not, it leaves space for a lot of different expressions of freedom.

One thing that is kind of absent in this teaching, and I need to hold this a little bit—I'm not sure how to live with this or be with this.

It's a question I hold, a kind of koan in my heart. This text does not speak of the brahmavihāras as much. It doesn't say this person has love, is compassionate. It speaks of the absence of suffering, the absence of fear, the absence of hate.

We often speak about how, as those things fall away, the natural result of the heart—and we have been speaking about the brahmavihāras in this practice—is the natural expression of the heart that's free. This is how I hold this in the text. The Buddha isn't saying you have to go out there and find love. Rather, with freedom from all of these constricting qualities, what results? What happens? Maybe certain beings have an expression of it that looks like just equanimity, just wisdom. Maybe other beings are more active in the world, expressing compassion and love. So again, this is something to hold in our hearts.

Elsewhere in this text, aside from what I've read, liberation is described in terms of qualities of someone who's free. And again, it brings in wisdom, silence, calmness. They're mindful. They see, they know. They're equanimous. So the liberated person is described in terms of what's released and certain qualities that are present. To me this is actually inspiring, because the picture of freedom in this text is one that I can envision living in the world. It's one that I can envision walking around and acting and speaking and being in the world.

This text emphasizes freedom in this life. There are a few places where the Theravada tradition has said, "Oh, here's where it's talking about freedom in the next life," or "Here's where it's talking about the transcendent quality of liberation." But as I read those verses, I think, I don't know—it sounds like it's just describing not clinging to future existence. It doesn't say whether future existence exists or not. So the transcendental quality of liberation, of freeing ourselves from the cycle of rebirth, is not particularly found in this teaching.

This teaching, in some ways, contrasts pretty strongly with the standard Theravada description of one who's liberated—that being who has freed themselves from the cycle of rebirth, the transcendent quality of Nibbāna that breaks the bounds of rebirth. Here the teaching is: don't cling to either rebirth or non-rebirth. Just don't cling. Clinging is the issue. Let go of clinging.

To me, this is a direct pointing teaching. Clinging is the exploration. When there's clinging, can I know that? Can I not do a spiritual bypass and say, "Oh, I shouldn't cling here," but can I open to that? Can I know that? As clinging releases, certain wisdom is understood. There are deeper and deeper levels of clinging that get revealed. As the grosser kinds of clinging to sense pleasure are released, we see how we're clinging in other ways. And then those we explore and release.

My inspiration here is that I don't know what Nibbāna is. I don't know what full liberation is. I don't know. I know the freedom that comes from the non-clinging I've experienced. That direction—it's like, yes, I'm heading that way. I trust that way lies more and more peace. What it looks like with full non-clinging, I have no idea. But I'm willing to go there. I trust that is a good direction to go.

So the overwhelming majority of teaching in this text, the Aṭṭhakavagga, points to freedom in this very life, primarily as an unselfish, non-clinging, non-desirous way of living in the world. That's a description of someone who's free.

Grace Burford, the scholar who wrote the doctoral thesis, said: "The Atthakavagga is exceptional even within the earliest Buddhist literature in its non-metaphysical presentation of the highest good achievable by humans. It is significant as an example of how the Buddhist ideal goal can be presented without all the usual problematic cosmological and metaphysical accessories that accompany it in its traditional Theravada doctrine." This teaching presents a coherent understanding of liberation without resorting to multiple lives.

Another scholar, Gomez, says: "The Atthakavagga sets out to find a practical solution to human sorrow—not merely the abstract sorrow of rebirth, but the everyday sorrow of strife and aggression."

Then there's the path to freedom. Let's read a few of the verses that describe the relationship to views from the perspective of liberation:

"One who is pure has no preconceived view about anything in the world. Having abandoned delusion and pride, they remain without attachment. Therefore, by what view would they go? One who is attached argues over religious teaching. But how and about what can you argue with one who is without attachment? There is nothing that they either take up or throw off. They are indeed free of every view in the world. Abandoning what they have taken up, free from any basis of attachment, they do not rely even upon knowledge. Amongst those in dispute, they do not take sides. They do not revert to any grasping of opinions whatsoever."

Again, some challenging words about views, which I hope you can hold as a koan, as a question.

So now the next piece is the training. The other set of teachings in the Atthakavagga describes the path of practice—what does it actually look like? Clinging is the place where suffering is born, so how does one move from clinging to non-clinging? Here are some descriptions of that:

The questioner says, "Now venerable sir, speak about the path of practice." The Buddha responds: "A person should not have covetous eyes. One should close one's ears to ordinary chatter. Should not be greedy for flavors. One should not cherish anything in the world. One should be meditative, not footloose. One should desist from worry. Should not be indolent. Should not live in lodgings where there is little noise."

Skipping down a little: "One should not be drawn into telling lies, nor be deliberately treacherous. One should not dispute others for their lowly way of life or wisdom or precepts or practices. If ascetics or ordinary people irritate one with their talkativeness, one should not respond harshly, for the peaceful do not retaliate. Knowing the Buddha's teaching, an ever-attentive person who investigates it should train in it. Knowing the cooling of desire as peace, one should not be negligent in applying Gautama's teaching. With regards to the Blessed One's teaching, one who is diligent should constantly venerate it by following his example."

What's interesting to me about this is that as you read it, some of it may resonate with the description of someone who is free. In the basic path of practice here, instead of describing how one who is free naturally has no greed for flavors, has no worry, is not indolent—instead, this says one should practice this. The path, especially in terms of our engagement in the world, is described as modeling the behavior of those who are free. What does that look like? It's a kind of practice I sometimes explore.

Now this is important. In my exploration of this—for instance, around patience—I did a practice for a while on patience because impatience was huge in my life. A big, big pattern. And what I discovered around this modeling piece is: what does it look like when I'm feeling impatience to act as though I were patient? The key to this practice is not to sidestep the impatience. You have to be completely, deeply honest with yourself about where you are in doing this modeling practice.

In cultivating or practicing patience, at one point I was in a drugstore walking through the store, and I was really impatient. I noticed the impatience, and I noticed that this impatience expressed itself by picking up things off the shelf and throwing them in my basket. There was a physical manifestation of the impatience expressing itself through the body.

So I began to look at this teaching of modeling patience. And that exploration of fully acknowledging—yes, impatience inside—it's not about trying to create the mind of patience. But what I did is I began to smooth out my behavior. I felt fully that urge to throw things in the basket. I felt it completely, and yet I just moved, and I gently placed things in the basket, feeling into that impatience all the while. It's almost like this practice of fully knowing the impatience inwardly and seeing if it cannot leak out through any pore. What does that mean?

As I explored that, it was actually shocking—and this is a small example. I encourage you to try this in the small, because in the large ones, if you're in the midst of a very charged situation, trying to model that is probably going to create the spiritual bypass. I don't think that's useful. But in the small places, it can be useful to explore this—the little places like impatience in the drugstore.

So that practice of exploring: here's the feeling, and here's how I might act if I were patient. Within about a minute, the impatience had released, and I was patient. That very modeling had a rebound effect on the mind. By not repressing—I think if we're repressing, it's not going to have that same impact. This is a delicate practice. I found it interesting and inspiring to play with, but it's very easy for this to be interpreted as spiritual bypass. So I really want to be careful in how we pick up this teaching of how the Buddha encourages us to model. But to me, this speaks to the sense that the path of practice and the goal of practice are not so different. We cultivate the path of practice by modeling, heading ourselves towards where we end up—the non-clinging.

I want to talk about views, because this too is a major aspect of the teaching in the Aṭṭhakavagga. There's a lot of teaching on clinging to views here, and in this place it gets a little more nuanced in terms of how the path of practice works around views—at least that's my understanding.

What kinds of views are there? There's the view "I am"—the identity view, the sense of identification. There's views around metaphysical reality that are clung to. A lot of the various debates that happened in the time of the Buddha were debating: Is the world infinite? Is the world finite? Only this is true, everything else is wrong. The world is transcendent. All of these different views about the world—speculative views about the nature of reality, essentially. And then all other views, opinions, and beliefs, views that we have in our cultures and our societies around everything.

The Buddha pointed to views and clinging to views as one of the key ways suffering happens in our world. This is expressed through the results: clinging to views leads to dispute, to conflict, to war, to contention. And we see this. The view of race—this is clearly a concept, an idea, and how much suffering, conflict, sense of better, less than, equal to comes out of this perspective. The Buddha pointed to any clinging to views as leading to strife and suffering.

We may not be able to know what views we're clinging to. Often views are in the realm of delusion, below the surface. Views are created in dependence on our culture, on our society. The paper that Larry offered really points to that—how our sense of self, our sense of identity is conditioned by our culture. The views that we pick up, the beliefs that we pick up are so deeply embedded.

Views from family, views from culture, views from who we spend our time with as a child. Views that are created as we move into ourselves as an adult. The whole mind we're swimming in is often views that are not consciously articulated. And so views are often in this realm of not seeing. We're swimming in our views—it's like the fish in the water not knowing the water. We're swimming in our views and we don't know them.

And so in our relationships with each other, rather than having the notion or the idea of "I'm right, you're wrong," it's more like, "Oh, different views are happening." Let's see—what view does this expose when there's conflict? We can be curious about that. When there's conflict, what views are being held to? This is an exploration.

Beginning to look at this, anytime there's suffering, my understanding is that some view is being clung to. Some view is operating. We may or may not be able to recognize the view immediately, but this can be a question we explore. So there's suffering happening here. We can feel into the suffering of that, feel into the constriction, the pain, and use this wisdom or this question—not necessarily to find the answer, but simply to ask: there's suffering here, what's being believed? Just to begin to burst those bubbles of delusion, to recognize what's being believed, as opposed to the sense of that suffering coming from the conviction that this is true. We begin to recognize our beliefs as beliefs. This is really powerful, this exploration, as we begin to recognize, "Oh, this is a belief." Maybe we can't immediately let go of it, and I would not encourage a spiritual bypass of saying, "Well, I shouldn't believe that." Instead, acknowledge it: "Ah, this is what is being believed." Let's explore that, look at that, get to know what's happening there around that belief.

In the Aṭṭhakavagga, it's interesting that the attachment to beliefs is really singled out as the issue. There's a statement at the top of page five: "A person who associates themselves with certain views, considering them as best and making them supreme in the world—they say, because of that, all other views are inferior. Therefore, they are not free from contention with others. In what is seen, heard, cognized, and in ritual observances performed, they see a profit for themselves. Just by laying hold of that view, they regard every other view as worthless."

This statement apparently applies to views whether they are true or not—that we should not cling even to views that are true. The Buddha actually said in one place in the text that yes, there is truth, there is a single truth. It's hard for us, from our perspective of our usual way of relating to views, not to see that as clinging to views. That's a koan, another koan in this teaching to me. What does it mean for the Buddha to say, "Yes, there is a single truth," and not be clinging to that? I don't know what that means. But I do know that when I see myself clinging to views, I feel the suffering of that, and so that can be explored. What did it mean for the Buddha to say there is a truth and not be clinging to it? I don't know, but I'm willing to explore it. Willing to explore not by sidestepping it, but by recognizing, "Okay, this is belief. Belief is happening."

I'm going to skip over some of what I was going to talk about here and move on to the question: given that this teaching says we should not cling to any views, what about right view? Where does right view come in? Again, another koan in this teaching to me. There are questions, actually, whether this particular teaching holds the perspective that using any kind of view is not the path. Essentially, the question is: does this teaching point to a non-path path?

Some argue that yes, this text teaches the training where the path itself includes not holding any view at all. This might be in the flavor of: not holding any view is the path as well as the result of the path. Not holding to any view whatsoever is the path as well as the result of the path. To some extent, this is the flavor I get when I read some of the Zen teachings. There's no path. Freedom is just there. It's like, well, how do you do this? I don't know.

My sense is that when I look at the passages in this text that refer to one who does not hold any views at all—and this came from the encouragement by Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu to look at it from these three perspectives—we need to ask: who is this verse describing? Is it describing someone in the training?

Not holding any view—or is it describing someone who's free, not holding any view? And my read of these teachings is that whenever it's describing someone not holding any view at all, that person is liberated. And so the Aṭṭhakavagga, to me, does not point to "don't hold any view at all." How would we get there? The whole teaching is a direction, a pointing for us.

So perhaps some people might say, "Well, we're not supposed to cling to the teachings." Well, good luck. Here's another text—the very first mentioning of views in the Aṭṭhakavagga. And I think this is a teaching that points to two sides of the question. You can take this teaching from two angles:

How would one, led on by desire, entrenched in their likes, forming their own conclusions, overcome their own views? They dispute in line with the way that they know.

This points to when we are entrenched in our views—we hold to those and we don't let other things in, or we dispute in line with that. But this speaks to all of our predicament in the world. We can't usually simply say, "I'm not going to cling to the Dharma." That would be spiritual bypassing again. It's like, "Well, yeah, I am going to cling to the Dharma."

And in fact, there is a teaching that I think speaks to this. I have some teachers that don't like my talking about clinging to the Dharma. But at the same time, there's this teaching—the simile of the raft. Many of you, I know, are familiar with the simile of the raft. That description talks about the path of practice moving from being caught on this side of the stream, to crossing the stream—the stream representing the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion—and landing on the far shore, free from clinging.

The analogy talks about building the raft on this shore. And I like the fact that it's a raft—something we build out of sticks and mud and stuff that we find around us. The analogy says that the raft is basically the Eightfold Path. The Buddha points to the raft being the Eightfold Path. But it's put together out of our sense experience. It's put together with what's around us—sight, sound, smells, taste, touch. Our orientation towards that through the Eightfold Path. We build the raft and we cross over the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion.

The raft, you know, I'm envisioning this raft—it's pretty rickety. It barely keeps me above the water. This is a piece I love about this analogy. The flood is said to be the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion. We're on this raft. We're going to get wet. So the path of practice is about being in contact with greed, aversion, and delusion with this support of the path of practice.

I don't think the Buddha would teach, "Let go of the raft in the middle of the river." We have to hold on to the raft. We have to make the effort with our hands and our feet to cross the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion. And so the analogy goes on. When we get to the other side of the flood, the Buddha asks his monks, "Is it useful at that point to say, 'Oh, this raft has been really useful to me. I think I'll carry it around on my head'?" At that point, no, that's not useful. You've crossed the flood. You can set it down.

And at that point, in that analogy, the Buddha says the Dharma is not to be clung to. Wholesome states are not to be clung to—and how much more so unwholesome states not to be clung to. And yet, that analogy points to letting go of clinging after we've crossed the river. Letting go of the clinging to the Dharma after we've crossed over.

And so there's probably some transformation over that time. We start out gripping onto the practice.

I remember sitting there, thinking, "Oh, I really have to work to do this. I have to try to be present for this difficulty." Just clinging to the Dharma, creating an identity around being the meditator. And it served. It served.

At some point, I began to experience the suffering of that clinging. And then that's the time to begin to look at it. When the suffering becomes obvious, we begin to see the clinging that's there and let it go.

I understand the path of practice as being an uncovering of subtler and subtler forms of clinging. And as we reach them, that's when we work to let go of that clinging. If we're clinging to sense pleasure, that's not the time to let go of the identity of the meditator. So it's a staged kind of release that can happen.

There's also another perspective on views. This is one of my favorite suttas too, for several reasons. It points to what kind of views are helpful, views that allow us to move in the direction of transcending views. One of the reasons I love this teaching is that it's given by Anāthapiṇḍika, a householder. So this teaching is given by a householder to monks from other wandering sects.

The monks see Anāthapiṇḍika and they say, "Oh, let's talk to Anāthapiṇḍika. He's a follower of that Gautama, so let's see what he has to say." They come up to him and say, "Tell us, householder, what views the contemplative Gautama has."

Anāthapiṇḍika, being very honest, says, "You know, I can't tell you what views the Blessed One has." The monks think this is a little strange—if you can't tell us what views he has, then you obviously don't know his teachings. So they say, "Well, if you don't know what views the contemplative Gautama has, then tell us what views the monks have."

He says, "Well, I can't tell you that either."

"But I can tell you what views I have."

They say, "Okay, tell us what views you have."

And he says, "Okay, I'll tell you what views I have, but first tell me what views you have."

They start spouting off their views—those speculative views I mentioned before. Things like, "The cosmos is eternal, only this is true, anything else is worthless." "The cosmos is not eternal, only this is true, anything else is worthless." You can see these different opinions: the cosmos is finite, the cosmos is infinite, each holding this perspective that only this is true, anything else is worthless.

When they were done, Anāthapiṇḍika said—and he goes through this for every view they've stated—"As for the one who says the cosmos is eternal, only this is true, anything else is worthless, this is the sort of view I have: that view arises from their own inappropriate attention, or in dependence on the words of another."

This is how views are formed. Views are formed from our own meeting the world with our experience. We contact the leg of an elephant and think, "That's an elephant." We contact the trunk of an elephant and think, "That's an elephant." Perhaps not seeing the entirety—I'm referring to the teaching story about the blind people and the elephant. Creating views out of our own direct experience, but perhaps not the entire picture. When views are created out of our direct experience, we tend to cling to them very tightly. Or we create views based on the opinions and views of others. Somebody has said, "This is what's true." Oh, then that must be what's true.

And again, a koan here, because the Buddha says the Eightfold Path is what we need to follow. It's like, "Okay, I'm going to pick that one up." This view has arisen in dependence on his words.

So here's what Anāthapiṇḍika goes on to say: "The views arise from their own inappropriate attention or in dependence on the words of another. This view has been brought into being, is fabricated, is willed, dependently originated. Whatever has been brought into being, is fabricated, willed, dependently originated—that is inconstant. Whatever is inconstant is stress. The venerable one holding this view adheres to that very stress, submits himself to that very stress."

Here Anāthapiṇḍika is pointing to the holding to that view.

The holding to something that is inconstant, something fabricated, creates stress. So again, it's the holding. It's the "this is true, everything else is wrong." It's the holding to the view that Anandapindika is pointing to as creating the stress. The view itself is there—it's fabricated, it's inconstant. Clinging to something that's inconstant is stressful and will create suffering.

After Anandapindika has responded to all of the views of the other monks, they say, "Okay, now tell us what view you have." And Anandapindika says: "Whatever has been brought into being is fabricated, willed, dependently originated. That is inconstant. Whatever is inconstant is stress. Whatever is stress is not me, is not what I am, is not myself. This is the sort of view I have."

They try to pull the same argument on him: "Well, you submit yourself to that same stress. You're just holding to that view." And Anandapindika responds that when he sees the stress of holding to the view, he understands it is fabricated. He understands that it is inconstant and that it creates stress to hold to it. And there is release in that understanding.

When this was said, the wanderers fell silent, abashed, sitting with their shoulders drooping, heads down, brooding, at a loss for words. Then Anandapindika went to the Blessed One and reported this exchange. And the Blessed One said, "Well done, householder. This is how you should periodically refute the wanderers of other sects."

This teaching points to the using of view in a particular way. In a sense, the view that Anandapindika pointed to is a view that leads us in the direction of understanding that clinging to views is not helpful. So we can keep recognizing that. And I think this is some of the paradox of the teachings—we have to keep deepening, keep deepening. Oh, clinging to that. Oh, and there's suffering there. And clinging to that, and clinging to that. Clinging even to the teaching of non-clinging. Okay, let go of that too.

CHAPTER 120

Awareness of Hindrances: It Is Possible

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella reframes the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa)—sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness, and doubt—not as obstacles to eliminate but as opportunities for deepening practice. Drawing from the fourth foundation of mindfulness in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), she explains that when we shift from being caught in these difficult states to being with them, they become gateways to understanding rather than barriers to concentration.
>
> Fella offers practical guidance for each hindrance: stepping back from the object of desire to feel the wanting itself; recognizing that aversion is an experience of separation that can be witnessed rather than believed; exploring sleepiness and dullness as vague but knowable states rather than failures of meditation; giving restlessness space by expanding awareness; and recognizing doubt's characteristic wavering and the emotional undercurrents beneath it. She introduces James Baraz's playful metaphor of being an alien reporting on human experience as a way to cultivate curious investigation.
> Sharing her own transformative experience with self-hatred during a three-month retreat, Fella illustrates how sustained investigation of a hindrance can lead to profound insight into impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā). The talk emphasizes that meeting hindrances with mindfulness is not "second-class practice" but the very path itself—developing skills that serve both formal meditation and daily life.

It really is a privilege to sit up here and see you all, feel you all—really more than see. Just connecting to the energy of your practice. It is so inspiring to have the privilege to spend so much of my year with people who really want to look at their hearts, their minds, to explore what it means to understand what's happening and to purify, to move in the direction of love and compassion and equanimity and joy, and to begin to release the tendency to move towards greed, aversion, and delusion. It's a rare thing in this world, what you're doing.

Tonight I'd like to talk about some of the mind states, the difficult energies that tend to get in our way, that we tend to get caught in and struggle with as we practice. The Buddha highlighted five particularly challenging mental energies that tend to unsettle our minds, to get in the way of concentration. These are the five hindrances: sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness, and doubt. Anybody experiencing those?

They manifest in so many different forms. They can be very obvious, screamingly obvious—"Get me out of here!"—ranging from a really strong energy to a very subtle form. Each of these hindrances has a range of strength. Along the line of aversion, it might go from the strength of screaming rage or anger or fear all the way down to the subtlest kind of "not that," or a kind of "I can put up with that"—not in a balanced way, but just a slightly resistant way.

Wherever you are in the course of your retreat, whether you're at the beginning or halfway through a three-month course, these energies will be arising. They are worth being familiar with in both their subtle and obvious forms, because they tend to represent the edges of our practice. When they are arising, there's something asking to be seen, something asking to be known.

The word "hindrance" gives us a particular sense. The Pali word nivarana literally means something like "covering," but it's often translated as hindrance, and the Buddha does speak of these qualities of mind as getting in the way of concentration in certain forms. That word tends to make us think, "All right, how do I get rid of these? How do I figure out how not to have these come up?" After all, if they're hindrances, we should want to not have them. That's the way we relate to that word.

And yet, in the fourth foundation of mindfulness, in the Buddha's meditation instructions, the list of these energies is right in there as a way we can cultivate mindfulness and wisdom. When we shift our perspective on these states of mind, when we explore what it means to be curious about them and understand them rather than be lost in them or believe them, instead of hindering our path, they actually become the way our practice can deepen.

You may not believe me. I certainly didn't believe the teachers when they said, "Yes, you can be mindful of aversion, and it really doesn't matter what you're mindful of. If you're mindful with this curiosity, with a wise attitude, then it doesn't matter whether aversion is arising or sound is arising." I thought they were just saying that to be nice or something. I went through a large part of my practice believing that if the hindrances were arising, I was doing something wrong and needed to figure out how to get rid of them.

But it really wasn't until I began to open to them as teachers that things shifted. They really are teachers for us. They point out places where we have something to learn. Often these hindrances are experienced as suffering, as dukkha. They're unpleasant. And the Buddha's instructions for us around suffering, in the First Noble Truth, say: there is suffering, and when suffering is arising, we understand that suffering is arising. Our task around this arising is to understand it—not in an intellectual way, but in an experiential way. This is our work, our practice around these difficult states: to explore what it means to open to them, to understand them experientially.

I think the other morning I spoke about having the stance of a naturalist in our receptive awareness. As we explore meeting our experience, receiving our experience, rather than going out and trying to figure out what's going on, we can have this stance of a naturalist who sits quietly and watches what's happening, or feels into what's happening. A naturalist in the world tries not to get in the way of the natural unfolding but simply to witness it. That can be our exploration in observing all of our experience, including the hindrances.

One language I like to explore in this receptive stance, particularly around the hindrances, is the language of being with experience.

What does it mean to be with anger or frustration or desire or sleepiness or restlessness or doubt? To me, that language of "being with" is supportive in my own experience. It may or may not be for you, so check it out. See if it's supportive for you to think about what it means to be with experience.

There's a difference between being with aversion and being averse. We know this difference. We understand and recognize a kind of shift that can happen when we explore moving from being averse to being with aversion. When we are being averse, we're caught in the midst of that difficult state. But we might be able to shift into, "Oh, aversion is happening." That's a kind of being with—aversion is happening.

That shift represents a vast difference between being averse and being with aversion, between being averse and understanding that aversion is happening. There is a kind of space that opens around the experience when we understand that shift. In that place where we can be with experience, that's where we can begin to be curious about what it means to know the human experience of this difficult state.

This exploration of human experience is another way I like to think about exploring the hindrances in general. The hindrances are human experiences. You are not alone when you experience them. The causes and conditions that arise in your mind leading to hindrances—very similar patterns are going on in everyone's mind. It's not just you. And so what might it mean to look at it as a human experience rather than my anger, my aversion, my sleepiness?

James Baraz has a fun way to explore this perspective of being with and being a naturalist about our experience, especially around difficulty. He says there were times in his practice where he decided he would pretend he was an alien that took up residence in this human body. His job as that alien was to report back to the mothership what it was like to be in a human being. This is what it's like when they feel anger. This is what it's like when they feel happiness. This is what it's like when they feel sleepiness. It's a humorous way, perhaps a light-hearted way, to put us into that stance of curiosity about the human experience of these states of mind.

As we meet hindrances from this stance, as we meet experience from this stance, hindrances are no longer hindrances. They just become another experience that can be known, that can be understood, and around which wisdom and understanding can arise.

So I'd like to take some time with each of the five hindrances, to offer some thoughts and suggestions about working with each of them. Actually, more what I'd like to explore is ways that I have found helpful for meeting these experiences—opening to them, exploring them with mindfulness—so that they aren't something I'm battling with, trying to somehow get rid of them, but rather something I'm curious about. What is the experience of sense desire? How does it work in a human being?

Sense desire is a desire to have sense pleasure. Very natural, as Greg mentioned the other day. It's a natural movement. We all move in that direction, towards surrounding ourselves with things that feel comfortable, things that feel pleasant. Having comfortable things around us, having pleasant experiences, is not in itself particularly an issue. But what happens is that our mind begins to orient towards having to have things in a certain way, trying to construct our lives such that they're a string of pleasant moments, like we're stringing beads—pleasant moment after pleasant moment after pleasant moment. And if we miss and don't get a pleasant moment in there, we feel like we've done something wrong. We are driven by this desire, this urge to satisfy that wish for pleasant experience.

As Greg said the other day, this kind of pleasantness, this kind of having pleasant experience, it's a form of happiness, and the Buddha spoke about that. He said that kind of happiness isn't particularly a problem. But he did point to it as a lesser kind of happiness. The happiness of concentration, the happiness of understanding, the happiness of release, the happiness of equanimity, of being okay with things as they are—these are much deeper forms of happiness. And we do have to explore what it means to let go of this lesser happiness in order to move ourselves in the direction of this greater happiness.

So we are driven by this desire, this wish, this wanting to surround ourselves with pleasant experience. Again, it's not the pleasant experience that's inherently a problem, but this wish, the wanting to have it be a certain way. This is what we need to look at. The energy of desire kind of keeps us out of the present moment when we're not aware of it. When we're not present for desire as it's arising, we're believing it, buying into it.

We believe we have to fulfill desire. The story of desire is, "I need this thing, this experience, this state of mind, in order to be happy." That's the belief that stands behind desire. And when we're caught by a desire, when we're in that belief, it's like we do not see any other possibility than satisfying that desire.

So the first exploration around desire is to see if we can recognize that desire is happening, instead of buying into the belief of desire. That takes a little bit of a step back. One of the first explorations when we recognize that desire is happening is to see if we can perhaps take a step back from the thing we're desiring. When desire is running rampant, our attention is on the thing that we want—that cookie, that state of mind, that fantasy, that state of life. Our minds are kind of pulled out, thinking about how great it's going to be when that happens or when we get that thing. So our minds are projecting forward, not in the present moment, not aware of what's happening in the present moment, and not particularly aware of the experience of desire itself. Because the story of desire is putting us into the future where we would have that pleasant thing.

And so sometimes we think that desire feels good, because it's connected to the wanting of something pleasant. But if we take a step back, let go of putting the attention on the thing that we want, and feel into the experience of desire itself, we quickly see that desire itself actually doesn't feel good. It's an unpleasant state. As soon as desire springs up, there's a feeling of lack in our system. As soon as there's desire, there's a feeling that something's off, that it has to be fixed, it has to be changed, I need that thing. It really is this pattern around desire that has us believing that getting that thing is what's necessary. That's the story of desire.

Some of the process by which desire unfolds, some of the reason why this is such a potent force for us, is that when we get the thing that we want, when we act on that desire and we get the thing that we want, there's some measure of happiness that comes from having that thing, that state, that experience. Some measure of happiness comes from the having of the pleasant. And at the same time, there's a measure of happiness that comes from the relief of that unpleasant wanting. So we have both the release of an unpleasant and the getting of a pleasant—a very potent force in our minds.

Desire believes that it has to get the thing that it wants in order to have that release. Desire is not going to tell you that if you just let go of wanting that thing, if you just explore the experience of desire and see desire disappear, that release will bring a deeper kind of happiness than the having of that thing. That's what's quite amazing as we step back, as we see if we can let go of having our attention on the thing that we are wanting and step into the feeling of desire.

We feel into maybe the pull. Sometimes it feels like—if any of you are Star Trek fans—a tractor beam, you know, kind of the pull to something. That's sometimes the feeling of desire. It's like, "Ooh, need to have that thing." A cookie. It's like the feeling of the cookie is pulling. That feeling is kind of a feeling of being off. There can be a physical sense. We can come into the body and feel into the physicality of what it feels like to want something. There's a mind that feels constricted and tight around that particular thing that we need. And so we can explore that state itself. What does it feel like? What is that experience?

I have spent a lot of time on retreat watching this experience. Sometimes as I watch it, I commit myself to not follow through—not always, but sometimes I would pick something and say, "Okay, I'm not going to follow through on that. I'm just going to watch it." At one point I spent quite a bit of time watching the wanting to look at people, especially in walking meditation. People walk by, I really want to see who's walking by, but I just decided I was going to explore the wanting instead. That feeling of that pull to look at somebody, just watching that, not looking but feeling that pull. And then watching as that person walked up the stairs of the front door here and disappeared into the building—the wanting vanishes.

Seeing that wanting vanish in that moment was like being released from a vice grip, really giving me the understanding of just how potent and how actually painful wanting is. And that that wanting didn't need the satisfaction of knowing who that was in order to be released.

And so being curious about exploring wanting itself. Letting go of the thing that we want, stepping back, exploring the experience of wanting itself. Seeing if you can let go of thoughts around wanting that particular thing. Let go perhaps just means not putting so much attention in them. You may not be able to stop them, but see if you can connect with the experience, the understanding the Buddha was talking about—the experience of wanting.

In this exploration of meeting wanting, we need to have some discernment about when perhaps the wanting is stronger than our capacity to meet it with mindfulness. And then we need to learn some skillful means. This is true with all the hindrances.

There are times in exploring them where the power of the hindrance is stronger than our capacity for mindfulness. It's almost like the hindrance is this swamping wave and our mindfulness is this trickle of a stream. We need to recognize that.

Sometimes we might see that in trying to be with a particular desire, we just get pulled into it over and over again. Maybe that's not the time to try to be present with that. Maybe that's the time to step back, to use another strategy—such as coming to your anchor, perhaps consciously putting your attention on something else, learning some skillful means. And also recognizing if the allowing is turning into indulging.

If we are looking at a fantasy arising and thinking, "I'm just going to explore being with this fantasy and watching the desire," it's possible. We can do that. But we can also just get into the fantasy. So we need some honesty in this exploration. Are we really exploring being with it, or are we indulging it?

The hindrance of ill will has many similarities to how desire functions. Ill will has a range—many states of mind are in this terrain, from irritation, resistance, anger, frustration, annoyance, hatred, rage, resentment, to dislike. A real range of states in this hindrance. It's basically an aversion, a dislike of what's happening.

In this case, the story of aversion is that happiness depends on getting rid of this thing—either through some kind of lashing out, a movement of annihilation to get rid of something, or in the terrain of fear, getting myself out of the situation. Happiness will come if I get out of here. There are different flavors of this quality of ill will in our experience. Sometimes it has a quality of lashing out, sometimes a quality of withdrawing.

This pulls us away from the present moment when we're not aware of it, by being oriented around trying to fix, change, figure out how to get rid of things, figure out how to control something, figure out how to get myself out of a situation.

Very similarly to desire, as soon as ill will springs up, there's this feeling of necessity around following through on its energy. I need to control this thing, I need to fix it to change it in order to be happy. Whatever it is that we have that feeling of aversion about—maybe a pain in the body, maybe what somebody else is doing, maybe a sound, maybe a mind state, maybe just what's happening that feels like it's not right at this moment, that it should be something else—see if you can take the attention out of what you don't want or don't like, and put it into that energy of aversion itself. How does that feel? What is that experience? Again, perhaps feel it in the body. Does it feel like pushing away?

In my experience, the nature of aversion is to separate—whether that separation comes through getting rid of something, kind of annihilating it, or whether it comes through moving myself out of it. What is that state? What is this experience of wanting to separate?

Sometimes it feels like a contraction in the body, in the heart, around the heart—a closing down of the heart, a pressure. Sometimes it feels like heat and pressure pushing away, lashing out. Various flavors of what this experience feels like.

Often many thoughts come along with ill will—what somebody should have done, shouldn't have done, what I should have done, how I should have responded. See again if you can take your mind out of the thoughts and into the experience. What is the actual experience of aversion? The thoughts are often a kind of fuel.

And so if we're thinking about the thing we don't like, it's like our foot is on the gas pedal and we are revving up the emotion associated with those thoughts. We don't like something, and thinking about it—"I really hate that thing, that's just such an awful thing"—is going to increase the aversion and the ill will, the experience of ill will. And so, again, taking the attention out of the thoughts, away from the thing that we're averse to, and coming into the experience of aversion itself.

Now, aversion is an unpleasant experience, and sometimes we end up with aversion to aversion. Sometimes we may simply be able to recognize, "Oh yes, there's aversion, and I don't like it." That's what's happening. Sometimes it can be that simple. And sometimes it has a kind of snowball effect. We have aversion to something, and then we're angry at that aversion, and then we get afraid of our anger, and then we're frustrated by our fear—it's just this incredible piling of reactivity, a multiple hindrance attack around aversion. Hindrance of hindrance of hindrance of hindrance.

If it feels like, when you explore what it means to take up residence as the alien—what does it feel like to be a human being experiencing aversion?—and it feels like the aversion just runs out of control, sometimes I use this analogy of going down the rabbit hole. If that happens when you try to explore being present for aversion, that may not be the time to try to explore that. So again, there are strategies we can use to take our attention away from that and put it on something else.

One of my favorite approaches is this: when strong aversion arises and I recognize that right now is not the time to explore it—aversion is my favorite hindrance, one that I have spent a lot of time with—I would recognize it and bow to it. I'd say, "I see you, anger. And right now, you can stay in the room with me. You can walk next to me," because I was often walking. "I see you, and I'm not going to try to stop you, but right now I'm going to put my attention in my feet." And I would just pay attention to that. It was a kind of turning to something neutral, without aversion, without resistance to that state, but also without repression. A kind of meeting it, bowing to it. Not now. And I'm going to put my attention on something else—in a very friendly way. "I see you, and you can hang out with me, but I'm going to put my attention someplace else." Just redirecting the attention to something neutral.

If it's a strong aversion attack, the breath may not be the best neutral experience, because often with strong aversion the breath is involved. Have you noticed, when there's a lot of difficult emotion, how the breath can be ragged, how the breath can be caught up in that emotion? And so picking something outside of this core area of the body as a place to ground—hands, hearing, feet on the ground—something neutral and something simple can be really helpful as a strategy.

Sometimes I also find it helpful to consciously broaden the container. If something is magnetizing the attention, especially something unpleasant like a pain in the body, where the mindfulness feels magnetized to it, then that experience becomes your whole world. You're embedded in that place, and that's all there is. So we use some reminder that we know that isn't all there is. While the attention is magnetized to that right now, there are also thousands of other things happening in the present moment. We consciously broaden the container. Maybe we open our eyes if we're in the hall and just recognize, "Yes, there's that difficult state, the aversion, there's the pain—and seeing is happening, and hearing is happening." Going through the sense doors: seeing is happening, hearing is happening, body senses. "Oh, there's the aversion again. Okay, that's happening. And seeing is happening." Just keeping stretching the container to help the mind recognize that it doesn't have to be stuck to that. This can be an action that begins to balance the mind if it's not possible to just meet and be with the aversion as it is.

This does take some honesty to recognize when we are overwhelmed, and to use that wisdom to shift to a skillful means, a skillful strategy to balance the mind.

The third of the hindrances is sloth and torpor. This is in the terrain of sleepiness, dullness, low energy, thick mind. Often the mind is not clear because of the low energy, because of dullness. And often the mind gets agitated around this state—something like believing or thinking, "I can't meditate if I'm dull or sleepy."

I have to fix this. I have to change this.

So what I'd like to explore here with you—how many of you have had the thought, "I'm too sleepy to meditate"? When you have that thought, if you're thinking it and you know you're thinking it, what I'd like to propose is this: if you can recognize that you're thinking that thought, you actually have enough energy to know the experience of sleepiness itself, or dullness itself—maybe just for a few moments. But you've already recognized sleepiness. You've already been aware of it. There's been a moment of noticing it, to have that thought. So this is a possibility I'd like to encourage.

Often sleepiness and dullness feel unpleasant in meditation, partly because we're resisting them. Sleepiness is usually this way—if we're resisting it, it feels really unpleasant. But if you decide to explore what the actual experience is, what's the human experience of sleepiness, that reporting back to the mothership, you'll find it's actually very pleasant.

There was one sitting where I finally realized there was just so much sleepiness that this was all I could do—just be mindful of the sleepiness. So I would feel into it. I was sitting up straight, and I encourage this when you're sleepy: find a posture in which if you fall asleep, it will wake you up. If you're sitting in a chair slumped back, it may not wake you up. So I was sitting up straight, and I would feel into it, and not resisting it, the body got very heavy, lots of pleasant sensations. And then the mind went into this lovely vibrating, pulsing, and then... that woke me up. So I sat up and did it all over again. It looked like this—nodding, dropping, waking. But the mindfulness was there for all but those dropping moments. It actually was a very present sitting.

And by the end of that sitting, I had recognized, I had seen it enough, I had watched that process of dropping enough, that I knew in the mind the moment before I was going to fall asleep. And instead of dropping, I just sat up a little straighter, which gave a little bit of energy. Then I'd relax and do it all over again. So then it ended up looking something like this—a gentle rising and settling. And again, quite a bit of mindfulness.

One thing that happens with dullness and sleepiness is that we often have some idea about what we want to be paying attention to. We want to be with our breath. We want to be noticing sound. We want that clarity where everything is sharp and delightful and we know every single moment of experience. Having fogginess or dullness in the mind is kind of like having a mirror coated by steam. The job of a mirror is to reflect experience, much as mindfulness reflects whatever is happening. The job of a mirror is to reflect what's in the room. And if we're standing in front of that mirror and there's fog on it, maybe we can kind of see our shape, our outline. We may feel like the mirror's not doing its job. But the mirror is doing its job perfectly. It's reflecting every drop of water on that mirror. It's just not doing the job we want it to do.

Very similarly with sleepiness and dullness. Often our resistance to these states is because when the mind is thick, when it's low energy, it's hard to direct the attention and pay attention to the breath. It's hard to notice other experience. But can you come in closer? Can you notice just the low energy, reflecting those drops of water on the mirror? That's what the mind is most naturally doing in that moment. And that's what I'd like to propose is possible for us when we think, "Oh, I'm too sleepy to be mindful, too sleepy to meditate." See if you can know the experience of sleepiness or dullness or thickness of mind, low energy.

These states of fogginess, of dullness, of sleepiness—they're kind of vague. There was a question this morning about vague experience, and exploring things like sleepiness and dullness begins to give us a sense of what it means to meet vague experience. Another way to explore this: if it's really foggy outside—there was some fog here the other day—and you're looking out at the fog, you're not going to be able to see the trees clearly, or maybe even at all if it's a really thick fog. But the fog is there. You can know the fog; we can know that. It's not precise. We can't point at it and say, "That's the fog."

It's more vague, more diffuse. This might be similar to the experience of hearing a kind of static noise in the background—you can't just point at it and say, "Oh, that's that noise." It's more of a diffuse sound. And then sometimes there are specific sounds like a cough or a sneeze. But that vague, diffuse sound, even the sound of the amplifier—it's a broader kind of sound. And so sleepiness and dullness are a more vague kind of experience. We know them, but we can't point at them and say, "That's what it is."

This exploration of recognizing vague states is a very helpful direction in our practice. There's a lot of experience that happens as our practice deepens and unfolds that's not very precise and not very specific. And if we are constantly wanting things to be precise and specific, we are going to miss huge areas of our experience. In my own practice, this exploration around low energy and dull mind has been a great learning ground for being with these broad or vague states of mind.

Restlessness is also a vague or broader state of body or mind. There can be both physical restlessness, which can be experienced as jumpiness in the body, almost like there are jumping beans under the skin—a state of agitation. And there's a mental side of it too, the experience of a mind that just feels like it's swirling or spinning, not particularly wanting to land anywhere, or just landing on one thing and then another and then another.

So again, we can open to what the experience of restlessness itself is. One exploration, much like with sleepiness, is broadening to the vaguer side of it rather than trying to pin it down and say, "What are all these sensations in the body?" Just let the awareness get broad. Don't try to be so precise about knowing the restlessness. Don't try to know every little thing the mind is landing on. Just have a sense of the spinning energy or the experience of restlessness in the body. Just stepping back.

I sometimes have the feeling with restlessness of almost allowing the awareness to expand rather than feeling like I'm holding it in here. It feels like a pressure cooker with restlessness if we're trying to just observe inside the body. But if we allow the awareness to get as big as the room, or to expand into space, into the vastness—let the restlessness get as big as that. It can be a little scary to think about. But when the restlessness has more room, it's kind of like the analogy some people use of giving a wild horse a bigger pasture to run in rather than this tiny little pasture where it's running up against the fence every two steps. Give it a larger pasture. A sense of giving the mind space when there's restlessness.

It can also be helpful, if it's not so easy to be with the restlessness, to use some antidotes. Find some ways to work with it—sometimes a faster walk can be helpful, or opening the eyes, or getting into nature, feeling the breeze, just putting yourself in a different situation. Being outside can often support the mind when it's restless.

And then there's doubt, the fifth of the hindrances. Two nights ago, Greg talked about faith quite a bit, and doubt is kind of the flip side of faith. We have doubts in ourselves and our ability to do the practice. We have doubts in the teachings, doubts in the practice itself, doubts about the teachers.

The description of doubt in the suttas is one of wavering. The Buddha says doubt is kind of like being lost in a desert. You take a couple of steps this way and think, "That can't be right," and go back, take a couple of steps that way, "Oh, that can't be right." It's got that quality of wavering—a feeling of wavering. The mind can't decide what to do. It spins often in logical arguments about what we should do, or think about what would be the best thing to do. Sometimes doubt can sound very wise. "Oh, I should do this. Oh, this isn't a good thing to do right now."

In terms of familiarity with doubt—doubt often comes about, or we recognize it, because of the kinds of thoughts happening in our minds. It can manifest as thoughts about the practice: "I can't do this. What good is this? I should do another practice. What do these teachers know?"

"How does what the Buddha said 2,600 years ago have anything to do with my life now?" Those kinds of thoughts—if you find yourself thinking about the practice in ways that take you away from the practice, that may well be doubt. Sometimes practice thoughts arise and actually bring us into the present moment. But if thoughts about the practice are things like "I can't do this" or "What good is this practice?" or perhaps "Maybe I should try this practice... no, not that one... maybe this one... no, maybe that one would be better"—if we find ourselves caught in that kind of thinking, it might be doubt.

Recognizing doubt is the most powerful tool we have with this hindrance, because doubt basically takes us pretty far from presence of mind. Often with the other hindrances, there's some measure of awareness involved. We know we're averse. We know that we want something. There's some measure of awareness possible even in sleepiness—"I know I'm too sleepy to meditate." But with doubt, we are often removed from even the possibility of awareness because we are so caught in the story. And so the recognition that doubt is happening is the biggest support for us.

When we can notice, "Oh yes, these are doubting thoughts," that's a first step. What I've found helpful next is not just to recognize that doubt is happening—which can be very helpful in itself. Sometimes when doubt is seen, it simply goes away. Sometimes that's all that's needed: turning the light of awareness and mindfulness onto doubt, and it withers in that clarity.

But sometimes doubt is related to deeper questions, deeper feelings of worthiness. I've had doubt related to feelings of vulnerability, feelings of inadequacy, feelings of failure, fear of failure, fear of the unknown—different emotional tones underneath thoughts like "I can't do this" or "I'm a failure" or "What do the teachers know?" So when I recognize those thoughts, it's like, "Okay, doubt is happening. What does doubt feel like?" Sometimes doubt feels like grief. Sometimes doubt feels like fear. And when we can be present for that, we're back. We're mindful again. We can explore what it means to be present with grief, what it means to be present with fear.

Mostly I hope this exploration of the hindrances has given you some interest and curiosity about investigating these states of mind. When the hindrances are arising, they are our path. Meeting them, being with them, opening to what's there—wisdom can grow, can arise.

I used to believe that being mindful of the hindrances was second-class practice, that the real practice would begin when I was completely free of hindrances. At one point, on one long retreat, I was looking at self-hatred quite a bit. I call it my self-hatred retreat. It was a three-month course, and I spent a lot of time with self-hatred. At first there was this feeling of it being a lesser practice. But at some point I thought, "Okay, well, I guess this is my self-hatred retreat." There was a little bit of surrendering to it—still some judgment, but at least I started to be more interested in investigating it, more curious about it, willing to witness it.

I learned so much during that retreat about the conditions that put it together, the beliefs that were operating in the mind. And then at one moment, during a late-night sitting, just watching very rapid little flits of self-hatred coming up in the mind, simply noticing them—

Oh, there it is. And I was using a practice that Joseph had suggested. As soon as I noticed it, I would recognize it and know: contact, unpleasant. Contact, unpleasant. I was just recognizing the very moment of the arising of self-hatred.

Watching that, in one moment the mind saw the arising and recognized in that moment very clearly—not as a reflection but seeing in the moment—this is just a thought. It has no basis in anything. It's constructed in the mind. It is a construct.

And in that moment, seeing that self-hatred was a construct, the mind flipped from self-hatred to bliss. For a split second, the mind went to, "Oh, I'll never feel self-hatred again." And then there was a recognition: no, actually that moment of understanding was that moment's understanding. And so the mind moved into more of a balance, into equanimity after that.

That moment of understanding didn't get rid of the self-hatred forever. But it was a deep understanding into the nature of self-hatred as a belief in the mind. And that belief was undermined very deeply in that moment. Not only seeing something about how self-hatred works, but how belief works, how the mind congeals a sense of self around it—right in the midst of watching self-hatred, there was very deep understanding of anicca, impermanence; dukkha, suffering; and anatta, not-self.

That moment was important for me because I realized: it doesn't have to be that the self-hatred is gone for the practice to really have deepening, for there to be deep understanding.

And so these hindrances are the path when they're arising. It's not lesser practice. So much of our minds are caught by these kinds of states in our lives. And learning skills to be curious about them will serve you not only here, but in your life.

So let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 121

Crossing The Flood

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this richly layered dharma talk, Andrea Fella unpacks two of the Buddha's most evocative water analogies: the simile of the raft and the crossing of the flood. Drawing from the Alagaddūpama Sutta (MN 22) and the Ogha-taraṇa Sutta (SN 1.1), she explores how these images illuminate our spiritual journey from the dangerous near shore of identification to the far shore of Nibbāna—defined simply as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

Fella examines each element of the raft analogy with care: the near shore represents our clinging to identities and strategies we believe keep us safe; the flood symbolizes the four āsavas (sensuality, becoming, views, and ignorance) that keep us submerged in dukkha; and the raft itself is constructed from our present-moment experience bound together by the Noble Eightfold Path. She emphasizes that crossing the flood means getting wet—we don't transcend suffering but rather meet it directly, allowing wisdom to grow through contact with dukkha.

The talk offers profound practical guidance on effort in meditation, using the image of a kick scooter to illustrate how we build momentum through light, frequent touches of attention rather than exhausting bursts of willpower. Fella also explores the paradox from the Ogha-taraṇa Sutta: the Buddha crossed by "neither tarrying nor hurrying"—meeting each moment fully without grasping or rushing past. This teaching invites practitioners to honor every moment of experience while recognizing its passing nature, trusting that even when progress seems invisible, each moment of mindful attention contributes to eventual liberation.

The Buddha is said to have been an extremely skillful teacher. The other day, I mentioned how he was tracking someone during their meditation and could give them just the right instruction at just the right moment—a kind of example of that understanding of the Buddha as such a skilled teacher.

One of the ways I think this manifests for us at least—since we don't have the luxury of being able to stumble into the Buddha in a potter's shed—is in exploring the teachings he offered. He often used analogies for deepening someone's understanding of the teachings. Analogies are useful because they can provide something familiar from our lives that, as it's connected with the teachings, that sense of experience becomes something we can recollect, and the teachings come alive for us through that example.

The Buddha was really a master of analogies. As I reflect on his teachings and explore the analogies in some depth, I find more and more layers that can help us unpack some of his wisdom. Tonight I'd like to take a couple of analogies and explore them with you—to unpack them and look at all the different pieces and how the teachings relate to those pieces, and what we can learn as we reflect.

The two analogies I'd like to explore cover similar terrain. The Buddha actually often used analogies about water in his teachings. In this particular case, he used the analogy of a flood or a large expanse of water, and the idea of crossing that flood as being what our journey is—crossing a flood of greed, aversion, and delusion.

In one of these flood analogies, the Buddha equates this large expanse of water with what he calls the four floods: the flood of sensuality, the flood of existence or becoming, the flood of views, and the flood of ignorance. My understanding of why they're called floods is because they keep us submerged in dukkha. They keep pulling us back to our habitual ways of orienting in the world, making it challenging for us to cross to freedom. This understanding that we have to cross this terrain is what these analogies point to.

The Buddha pointed to these four aspects as being the floods, but in a simpler way—and for me it's meaningful to think of this expanse of water we're trying to cross as really the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion. These are very familiar forces of mind that make it really hard for us to navigate our lives with ease. We keep getting caught by them, stuck by them, pulled into eddies, pulled into whirlpools, swept downstream by these states of mind. There can even be that sense of being swept away as one of these sticky states captures us, being pulled by a current. This imagery of the flood has some connection to what happens in our minds, being swept away by greed, aversion, and delusion.

The first of these two similes is a very famous one—many of you have probably heard of the simile of the raft. I'd like to look at each piece of this simile because as I began exploring it again, it really began speaking to me in different ways.

"Suppose someone in the course of a journey saw a great expanse of water whose near shore was dangerous and fearful, and whose further shore was safe and free from fear. But there was no ferry boat or bridge for going to the far shore."

This sets the stage for our analogy. Looking at these various pieces, there's the near shore, which is dangerous and fearful. In another sutta that uses very similar imagery, the Buddha says the near shore is how we identify. It's these identities that we connect to, that we hook to, that we get stuck to.

Identities are often strategies for us, familiar ways of navigating our lives, navigating what's challenging. We have familiar habitual strategies that have been conditioned for us, that at times—in many ways as we grew up—helped us to navigate challenging situations. Yet even though they may have been helpful during our lives, they have an inherent suffering to them. There's an inherent kind of what the Buddha calls danger on this near shore of identity, of identification. We try to make ourselves feel stable and secure through identities. "I'm the kind of person who..."—that landing in an identity is often a way of finding safety or security. We think it feels safe and secure, but actually it's anything but.

As we cling to identities—and we can cling to different kinds—I've certainly seen myself cling to identities such as self-hatred. In seeing it and seeing how I'm clinging to it, I think, why on earth do I cling to this? But that kind of identity, which we do cling to—those kinds of identities of "you're no good, you're a failure"—they're inherently suffering. We know the suffering of those immediately when they come. As to why we cling to them, the mind thinks it's getting something out of it. That's a whole talk in and of itself, but look in your own mind. There are often beliefs in there. For me, in a way, that self-hatred was a way to make myself do the right thing—like if I hated myself enough, I would behave properly. So sad to see that in our own minds. And then there are other kinds of identities we hold to, identities of being someone who knows what they're doing, someone who...

does certain things in a certain way. Often with those kinds of identities, we are invested in making sure that other people see us that way too—that others hold that same identity of us. We spend time trying to convince people: "No, that's who I am, that's me, that's who I am." It's an endless project, trying to make sure others see us through that identity. And we suffer when they don't.

So this is the near shore the Buddha points to—this sense of self, the identities, the congealings of ourselves.

And then there's the expanse of water. In this analogy we have the near shore which is dangerous, and the expanse of water where there's no bridge, no ferry boat to cross it. But the far shore, we know, is safe and free from fear. We'd like to try to get across this expanse of water.

In this analogy, the expanse of water is the flood—the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion. As I reflected this evening about this analogy of the near shore being identity, and the flood being what's difficult to cross, what keeps us from reaching the place of safety, I contemplated these four floods: of sensuality, of existence or becoming, of views, and of ignorance. These are the activities of mind, the patterns of mind, the habits of mind we could say, that make it difficult to let go of these strategies of identities. They keep sweeping us back. The views that we have, the beliefs, the ignorance—they keep sweeping us back, thinking, "Oh, these identities are how I feel safe."

The strategies of identities are hard to let go of because of views, because of ignorance, because we're drawn to sense pleasure. These make it hard for us to realize the possibility of release from the perspective of identification.

The far shore in this analogy the Buddha equates with freedom, with Nibbāna. The most succinct definition of Nibbāna that I have heard through the teachings of the Buddha is the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion. It's a letting go of greed, aversion, and delusion that is the ultimate safety.

In this analogy, the far shore seems like a place or something. But the definition of freedom in the Buddha's teachings is freedom from. Freedom from greed, freedom from aversion, freedom from delusion. It's not having anything.

I like this for a couple of reasons. One is that greed, aversion, and delusion are things we have a handle on. We know what they're like. Through our meditation, we begin to really touch into these qualities. The fact that the Buddha defines freedom as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion makes it seem like something that might be possible in this very life.

Every now and then I've had a taste, perhaps, of a mind that lets go of greed, and that's a pointing to this possibility. When I first started practicing and heard this idea of enlightenment—or even before I started practicing, when I was in my twenties—I heard about enlightenment and had some idea of it being some transcendent thing that you have to get to or attain or have. But this teaching about Nibbāna being the release of greed, aversion, and delusion makes it seem like something possible in this very life. And in fact, that is what the Buddha says: Nibbāna can be touched, freedom in this very life.

I can imagine, perhaps, what it might be to walk around in my daily life—I can kind of imagine, I can't really imagine—but it doesn't seem too far-fetched to me that I could walk around in my daily life and interact with my family and friends in that place of freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion. Whereas whatever this idea of mind-blowing enlightenment was, that wasn't anything related to being connected with my friends and family. At least that was the case for me. This really brings the teaching of freedom into the realm of possibility. It's inspiring for me. It brings it into the possibility of living freely.

So the next part of the analogy. This person, seeing this expanse of water—the near shore dangerous, the far shore safe—thought: "There is this great expanse of water whose near shore is dangerous and fearful and whose further shore is safe and free from fear. But there's no ferry boat or bridge for going to that far shore. Suppose I collect grass, twigs, branches, and leaves and bind them together into a raft, and supported by the raft and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore."

And so the person collected grass, twigs, branches, and leaves and bound them together into a raft, and supported by the raft and making an effort with hands and feet, they got safely across to the far shore.

This is the raft, the piece of the analogy that's the raft. This whole talk was really inspired by a reflection from Ajahn Sumedho about this raft. In one of his essays he wrote: "The Buddha referred to his teaching as a raft, which you can make out of the things around you—the grass, the twigs, the leaves. You don't have to have a special motorboat or submarine or luxury liner. A raft is something you make from the things around just to get to the other shore. We're not trying to make a super-duper vehicle. We're just able to use what's around us for enlightenment."

I like this reflection. What's around us? On the near shore it's twigs and leaves and grass, but here, what's around us? Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, things happening in the mind. That's part of what we build the raft out of—our present moment experience. That's what's available. That is our raft: our present moment experience, our sense experience. We also build the raft out of the teachings.

The Buddha, in his own exploration of this analogy, said that the raft is the Noble Eightfold Path. I think of that as being the binding that holds the grass, the leaves, the twigs together—maybe the twine or the mud that cakes it all together to make it into something that can float across the river.

And then we think about being on that raft, in the swirls and eddies of this vast expanse of water. It's a raft. It might be falling apart as we're going across. We are definitely getting wet. We are in contact with the flood. We are touching the flood. We are touching all of that greed, aversion, and delusion, with the Eightfold Path keeping us afloat. But we are getting wet.

It's not a mistake. It's not a mistake when in our practice we turn to our experience—our sights, our sounds, our smells, our tastes, our touches, the things going on in our minds—and we notice this hurts, this is unpleasant, this is painful. The mind of aversion, the mind of greed—it's not a mistake. It's meeting the flood. We're right on that raft.

We don't cross the flood by magically transcending it, as if we've built a hovercraft to float across, fly across above the flood. We are in touch with the flood. And so we meet dukkha.

The other day, Alexis in his talk said that it's not a mistake that we meet the dukkha. In fact, the purpose of meeting the dukkha is that wisdom grows; understanding happens as we contact the dukkha. He mentioned Joseph's famous quote: we'd like to have insight into dukkha without experiencing dukkha. But it doesn't happen that way. The contact with the dukkha is where the wisdom grows, as we're contacting it with the Eightfold Path as our support.

With the path, with the support of wise view, of wise intention, of understanding the perspective we bring to practice—which we've been talking about, particularly with the hindrances—we understand that if we are bringing mindfulness to a hindrance, if anger is arising and we are knowing anger in the present moment with mindfulness, it's not functioning as a hindrance. It's functioning as our path. When we're lost in anger, the Eightfold Path isn't supporting us. But when we bring wise understanding, wise intention, ethical conduct, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration to whatever's arising—maybe it's as simple as sights and sounds, but maybe it's a hindrance attack—when we're bringing that perspective, we are crossing the flood. And yet we're getting wet.

Then the sutta mentions making effort with hands and feet: "Supported by the raft and making an effort with the hands and feet, they got safely across to the far shore." This speaks to the reality that we don't just get on a raft and hope for the best. We know basically the direction of the far shore, though in the midst of that vast expanse of water we may not quite know where it is. We have to have other guides. We may use the feeling of the moisture in the air as a guide, or we may use the stars to help guide us toward the far shore.

In our practice, we use wise view and wise intention—this perspective of recognizing what's wholesome and what's unwholesome. Essentially, we explore cultivating the wholesome and letting go of the unwholesome, or being aware of the unwholesome. When something unwholesome is arising and we bring awareness to it, it's like it turns us back toward the far shore, back in the direction of crossing the flood. Because that unwholesome state of mind is no longer driving the mind or running the show. Instead, wise mindfulness, wise effort, and wise concentration allow us to meet it and learn something about that challenge, that difficulty—heading us toward freedom through the growth and development of wisdom and understanding.

Thinking again about this analogy, about making effort with hands and feet, about the way a vast expanse of water or a flood works: sometimes in crossing a river or going across a body of water, the conditions may be the wind in your face or the current going against you, and you have to work. You have to really paddle. You have to work hard with your hands and feet to keep the raft going in the right direction. Sometimes it feels like—as the Red Queen says in Alice Through the Looking Glass—"it takes all the running you can do to stay in one place here." Sometimes it feels like that, like we are working really hard and not making a lot of headway.

And yet, no amount of effort, when it's connected with this perspective of wise view, is wasted.

There's an analogy that my colleague Gil Fronsdal uses around this sense that you're not getting anywhere sometimes. He uses the analogy of chopping a big piece of wood. You have this big piece of wood and you take a hatchet and you come down on the piece of wood with that hatchet—pretty unlikely that piece of wood is going to split the first time. So you keep trying, keep making that hatchet movement. And at some point, as you do that, you bring the hatchet down and the log splits.

I know that when I did this—I really loved splitting logs when I was a teenager. Whenever we went camping, I would ask to do that. I just loved that feeling of hitting the log and feeling it split. And I always thought it was just that I hit it right that time. But Gil points out that each time you hit that log, it's weakening the fibers inside. You don't see it from the outside. You don't see that weakening happening. And then at some point you hit it and there's been enough weakening and the log splits. Every single moment before, when you hit that log and nothing seemed to happen, contributed to the possibility that it split the last time.

It can be like that with our practice. We look for progress. We look for how we know that we're doing okay. We look for those log-splitting moments. But so much of our practice has this gradual nature—this gentle wearing away, gentle weakening of greed, aversion, and delusion. And then sometimes there's a moment where we see aversion just drop away, or we see, as I mentioned the other day, the arising of the thought of self-hatred and knowing: this is just a thought. This is the mind thinking this thought and believing it. It has no reality other than what the mind is constructing. Seeing that in that moment was like that log falling apart. But I'd spent weeks watching self-hatred, feeling the pain of it, feeling the struggle of it, understanding little bits and pieces of it. All of those moments contributed to that moment of really understanding how self-hatred is simply a construct in the mind—a thought being believed.

This is a lot of our work. We really just have to keep a steady kind of effort even in the face of it seeming like we're making no progress. In that way, this touches into faith and trust. If we are meeting our experience with mindfulness and wise effort and concentration, if we're able to stay with our experience, whatever is unfolding is heading us in the right direction. So it does take some trust at times—the confidence to not keep checking. Not thinking, "I've been mindful for three minutes, have I understood something yet?" Rather, just patience. A lot of patience with that process of wisdom developing.

Sometimes I've seen wisdom kind of developing and presenting itself after the fact—like recognizing that a pattern, a very strong pattern of anger, had disappeared. I had been watching this pattern of anger over the course of weeks, maybe even months, maybe even years. That was a long time. And just seeing this anger come, recognizing how hard it was to be with that anger. "I need to just be with my feet right now." Setting it aside over and over again, setting aside the anger. And then beginning to recognize over the course of those months that the anger started happening less often. It was getting weaker. It was clear to me because it wasn't happening so much.

And then one day I noticed it hadn't happened for a really long time. In thinking about it, I thought, "Wow, I haven't experienced that anger for a long time." In that moment of realizing this, of course the person—it was a particular person I was angry with—that person came to my mind. But I could not even call up the anger. I couldn't find it anywhere. I didn't believe it. I thought, "It's got to be there somewhere. It's got to be there somewhere." It had disappeared without my knowing when it disappeared. I understood in retrospect that it had released.

So sometimes we don't even get to see the release. We just get to experience the benefits of it sometime later.

So there are very different ways that wisdom grows as we meet the flood. We make the effort to just stay present. Sometimes when we're crossing a stream, or we've got the wind at our back, it's kind of smooth sailing. It may be that there's just a little bit of directing we need to do—making sure we're not getting caught on that rock or that branch—but only a little steering is necessary. So sometimes in our practice, the effort can be lighter.

There's an analogy I sometimes like to explore around making effort in our practice. We have a habit, I think, of making effort in our practice in the way that we tend to make effort in our lives. If we have to do something really hard, we gather all our strength and apply it right at the beginning. Sometimes we may have that sense of sitting down in our meditation, thinking, "I'm going to sit here for 45 minutes, and I'm going to stay present for the whole 45 minutes." It's like we pick up the entire 45 minutes in that first second and try to gather the effort we need to stay present for the whole time. But it doesn't work that way. We can be present for a moment, and then we can do it again, and again, and again.

The analogy I like to explore for this is that of riding on one of those little kick scooters that kids ride on—Razor scooters, I think they're called. You have one foot on the scooter bed and the other foot you use to tap the ground to get the momentum going. You could, at the beginning, make one really gigantic push, but it's probably going to be pretty wobbly if you do that. It's not going to lead to stability. So it's much more skillful to just do these little taps—tap, tap, tap, tap—let the scooter gain some momentum. Then, after there's some momentum, you can just ride the scooter. You get the feeling of that scooter riding, and you get familiar with when it starts to feel a little wobbly. Then you put your foot down and tap again.

Applying effort in the practice is more like that. At the beginning, we connect frequently. If you're practicing with the breath, every half breath: Can I be with this half breath? Just enough effort to be with half a breath. And then another half a breath. Just enough effort—that much. Right now, be with an in-breath. How hard is that? And now an out-breath. Just enough. That's all you need. And we just keep that tap, tap, tap going.

As we make enough effort to stay with an in-breath—or if you're doing another kind of practice, open awareness practice, it may be just enough effort to be with this experience, asking, "Am I aware of what? And now, am I aware of what?"—just connecting moment after moment. Light touch, just enough to be with this moment of experience. As we explore that light touch of being present, a momentum of mindfulness starts to build. We can get familiar with that experience of what it feels like to ride that wave of mindfulness.

At that point, we don't have to keep tapping. We don't have to keep reminding ourselves every single breath. Perhaps we can just sit here and be with four or five breaths without really much effort at all. We get familiar with when it feels like the mindfulness is getting a little soft or mushy, and then we bring in another connection, really connect—just like tapping the scooter.

So this is how we can explore this light touch of effort. It's a light touch, but there's a commitment to it. It's not commitment like bearing-down commitment. It's commitment to keep going. In the walking meditation, we can do this too. There have been times when my mind is really scattered in the walking meditation, and I'll pick a spot like two feet out on my walking path.

Find a little stone or a little leaf there, and I'll think, okay, can I make it to that? It's like two feet—a step, two steps. Can I be mindful for two steps? Yeah, I could do that. Okay, now pick another spot. That spot on the sidewalk—can I be mindful until I get there? It's like hand over hand, gently, gently pulling yourself along in the mindfulness. Just enough effort to be present, ride that wave of mindfulness, and then do it again and again.

And then sometimes we have the wind at our back on this stream, on this raft, and the current is heading us right in the right direction. All we need to do is just let go and let the current carry us. Sometimes in our practice, mindfulness and wisdom are strong enough that it doesn't require a personal effort. We don't need to remind ourselves to be mindful—it's just happening. And if that's happening, then making that effort is actually getting in the way of the unfolding of wisdom and mindfulness.

There are so many different ways of making effort, and the conditions require us to make different kinds of effort at different times. As we're crossing a flood, we're not always going to have the wind at our back, and we're not always going to be able to just flow with ease. Sometimes there may be moments where we can flow with ease, and then conditions shift—there's an eddy, a whirlpool—and we have to work to get through that.

I think there can be a sense sometimes with effort in the practice that it functions something like effort in our normal lives—that when we've learned how to do something, like ride a bicycle, we don't forget, and we can just do it. We don't run into the same problems we did when we first learned. But with practice, the conditions are so varied. We may have stretches of time where the flow seems very natural and easy, and it's like, "This seems so easy—how can I not just do this all the time? It's so obvious! It's so obvious that something arising is just something arising. And anger's not a problem; it's just a fleeting thing and it vanishes as soon as it's seen. How can I not see this all the time? Of course I understand this now." We think we've figured it out.

And then conditions change, and we discover that actually maybe it's not so obvious. Conditions change and we're caught again. So the level of effort that we make doesn't progress from making a lot of effort, to making a little less effort, to just riding the wave of mindfulness and wisdom. It doesn't tend to just head in that direction. Sometimes it's very simple, and sometimes we really have to apply ourselves—to not get pulled under, not get pulled into the whirlpools, to not go down the rabbit hole, to not get sucked under the waves. Sometimes we really have to make effort. Recognizing the conditions—we've talked about this over the course of these weeks—we've talked about skillful means for meeting challenge, when there's an overwhelming state of mind or something where we really have to take some care to be with it.

The second analogy I'll read as well. This is a different crossing-the-flood analogy. This one for me just had a real resonance as I touched into the language.

The Buddha was meditating in a grove, and a deva, a heavenly being, came to him and asked, "How, dear sir, did you cross the flood?" The Buddha responded, "By not halting, friend, and by not straining, I crossed the flood." "But how is it, dear sir, that by not halting and by not straining, you crossed the flood?" The Buddha responded, "When I came to a standstill, friend, then I sank. But when I struggled, then I got swept away. It is in this way, friend, that by not halting and by not straining, I crossed the flood."

The commentaries point out that this image of neither tarrying nor hurrying—that's the translation I particularly resonated with, the one that kept coming back to me in my mind. Here Bhikkhu Bodhi translates it as "by not halting and not straining." For me, "not tarrying and not hurrying"—by not tarrying and not hurrying I crossed the flood.

The commentaries say that this is meant to be a little bit paradoxical, because typically if you're crossing a stream with rocks in it, you find a foothold, you pause there, you get your balance, and you search for the next foothold. You go to the next one, so you kind of halt and then you move, halt and then search and then move. The commentaries say this is supposed to jar the mind a little bit—oh, it's not the way I would think about crossing a flood or crossing a stream. It's different. It's got a different quality to it, by neither tarrying nor hurrying.

One of the pieces that I'm inspired by in this particular analogy is that the Buddha says—

When I came to a standstill, I sank. And when I struggled, I got swept away. So basically, the Buddha struggled. He sank. He got swept away. He had to experiment. He learned through his own practice how to cross the flood. He made mistakes—he tarried and he sank, he hurried and he got swept away. The Buddha had to experiment. He tried different things, noticed what was helpful, noticed what was not helpful. We need to do this in our own practice: understand what's helpful and what's not helpful.

For me, this image of neither tarrying nor hurrying is one of meeting every moment of experience. That's the visceral feeling it gives. Neither tarrying with the moment—think about this flood as just the stream of moments. Neither tarry with the moment, holding on to it, trying to keep it or understand it or fix it or change it, nor do we hurry past it trying to get to the next moment. Each and every moment receives its full due, its full honoring, whatever it is. And then we realize that that moment is passing, and we meet the next moment. Moment after moment, really meeting every moment.

Sometimes I would use that language in my mind when I found myself in a struggle, or during a period of time where I felt I needed some inspiration. I would use this language: neither tarrying nor hurrying, neither tarrying nor hurrying, meet each moment. It helped me to just settle and connect. Connect with this. Not connect and hold and try to keep it. Sometimes I find with certain kinds of experiences it's like we hold on to them in order to look at them, rather than recognizing they're already changing as we're looking at them.

It's like a handful of sand. We can hold on to a handful of sand and try to understand a handful of sand in that way, and there's some things we can learn about it that way. And we can also relax our hands and just feel the sand slipping through our fingers and learn something different about the sand in that way. Neither tarrying nor hurrying, meeting each moment.

At the end of the simile of the raft, the Buddha says: "When this person got across and arrived at the far shore, they might think thus: 'This raft has been very helpful to me since, supported by it and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore. Suppose I were to hoist it on my head or load it on my shoulder and then go wherever I want.'" The Buddha asks, "Now, do you think that person is doing what should be done with the raft?" And his disciples said no.

The Buddha went on: "When that person got to the far shore, if they thought thus: 'This raft has been helpful to me since, supported by it and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore. Suppose I were to haul it onto dry land or set it adrift in the water and then go wherever I want'—it is by doing that that the person would be doing what should be done with the raft. So I have shown you how the Dharma is similar to a raft, being for the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping. When you know the Dharma to be similar to a raft, you should abandon even the teachings—how much more so things contrary to the teachings."

This is an interesting piece: abandon the teachings. The Buddha is pointing out in this part of the analogy that the raft is abandoned when one has reached the far shore. We can't let go of the teachings, we can't let go of the practices too soon. If you try to let go of the raft in the middle of the expanse of water, you'll be drowned. We need to use the raft, we need to use the teachings to navigate the flood.

And sometimes we do have this sense of realizing that we're kind of holding on to mindfulness, or holding on to being a meditator, having that identity of being a meditator. In my very first ten-day meditation retreat, it was pretty clear to me that I was constructing an identity as a meditator. I was like, "Yeah, I'm going to be a meditator and I'm going to be good at this. I'm going to try to really do this." There was a construction of identity, and I did recognize that this was something new. And I did hear the teachings that said clinging to identities is suffering.

And yet, somewhat to my credit, I decided and realized that this seemed like a useful identity. I don't think I'll let go of this one just yet.

And indeed, this is partly how our practice can unfold. In some ways, we hold to the teachings. We may even cling to them, holding on for dear life to mindfulness and wise effort. If we're holding on for dear life to mindfulness and wise effort while being battered by greed, aversion, and delusion, that holding to the wholesome qualities of mindfulness and effort—yes, there's some suffering there, but it is helping us let go of a much greater suffering.

This is how much of our practice unfolds. It happens in stages over time. We meet great challenges, the grosser and more obvious forms of greed, aversion, and delusion, by perhaps clinging to mindfulness. Maybe craving being a meditator. Maybe that happens. Helping us to let go of a more unskillful state, we construct another identity.

At some point, however, as those more obvious forms of suffering begin to fall away, our mind begins to get attuned to subtler forms of suffering—including the suffering of clinging to mindfulness. In my example of having that identity of being a meditator, I wasn't in that first retreat, or even the first few years of retreat, suffering over that identity. I was suffering with anger and suffering with self-hatred. That connection to the identity of being a meditator was helping those to weaken. And then, as those patterns began to weaken, yes, I had to look at the suffering of that identity. Oh yes, I want to be the best meditator in the room. Oh, it's so painful to be comparing myself to everybody—comparing myself to my best friend who's on retreat looking so concentrated. Her mind is so concentrated, and look at mine, all over the place. I'm never going to be as concentrated as she is. All of that identity of being a meditator being felt at that point.

When we feel the suffering—I sometimes say, let suffering be your guide. When you feel the suffering of a clinging, when we feel the suffering of holding to mindfulness, feel the suffering of wanting to understand something, that's when we begin to explore the suffering of it. Not to let go and say, "Oh, I should stop being mindful now," but to explore the tightness, explore the suffering of that. That's our path. We meet the suffering; that's the flood at that point. We don't let go of the raft before we're across the flood.

And yet the Buddha says that we let go of the teachings. My understanding of that, based on my readings and study and a little bit of my own experience, is that the more greed, aversion, and delusion fall away, the more the mind naturally gravitates towards living with wise view and wise understanding, with ethical conduct, with wise mindfulness. The effort becomes less necessary to exert. There's even one sutta that describes someone who is fully awakened as being someone who just lives the Eightfold Path. It's not necessary to hold it. It's not necessary to think about it. It is the natural manifestation of someone for whom greed, aversion, and delusion have fallen away. And so there's no need to hold to the teachings. They're being lived.

CHAPTER 122

Compassion Practice

Andrea Fella · 44 min

> In this guided meditation session, Andrea Fella introduces the brahmavihāra of compassion (karuṇā), describing it as a flavor of mettā that naturally arises when the open heart encounters suffering. She explains that compassion has an active quality—a momentum toward alleviating suffering—while remaining free from aversion, fear, or confusion. The traditional Pāli phrase "dukkha muccantu" (may you be free from suffering) serves as the foundation for the practice.
>
> Andrea skillfully addresses the near and far enemies of compassion: pity, which maintains a subtle separation from those who suffer, and cruelty, which wishes harm upon those perceived as causing suffering. She emphasizes that our mindfulness practice itself cultivates compassion, as we continuously meet our own suffering—the hindrances, fears, and aversions—with an open, non-resisting heart. This reveals how wisdom and compassion are deeply interwoven.
>
> The guided practice begins with self-compassion, inviting practitioners to receive compassion from loved ones before expanding outward. Andrea offers an alternative phrase—"may you be at ease with these conditions"—which brings wisdom into the practice by acknowledging the conditioned nature of suffering. The meditation gradually expands from self to near ones, to all beings in the room, and ultimately to all beings everywhere, while remembering that the practitioner remains at the center of this field of compassion.

This evening during this period we will explore the brahmavihara of compassion.

The quality of metta, that open-hearted connection with other beings as well as with ourselves, has the feeling of connection and non-constriction—at least to me, those are some of the qualities of metta. When that open heart, that unconstricted heart, meets suffering, the natural response is compassion. And so we can say that compassion is a flavor of metta—the flavor of that open heart when suffering is present, whether our own suffering or the suffering of others.

Some describe the feeling of compassion as the quivering of the heart in response to suffering. And that quivering, to me, points to one of the qualities of compassion: it is very active. It wants to do something. It has this momentum or direction of the heart to alleviate suffering. So it is not a passive state of heart and mind; it is quite active. That wish, that movement of the heart to alleviate suffering, is not tied up with aversion or fear or confusion or desire. It is the simple heart that wishes for beings to not suffer and to participate in supporting that direction.

The proximate cause, one of the conditions that supports the arising of compassion, is seeing the helpless state of someone in distress. Perhaps you can evoke this quality for yourself. Just imagine a child that you know, one perhaps closer to you or perhaps not, but one for whom you feel some affection. Envision yourself going into their room one evening and seeing them sobbing. You ask them why they are sobbing, and they respond that the spider in Charlotte's Web has just died in the book. From the perspective of wisdom, from a perspective of age and experience, you can understand both the conditioned nature of that distress and also feel the heartbreak of it—without aversion, without pity, and without a feeling of lashing out. That is the kind of quality of this heart of compassion.

It connects to suffering. It does not resist connecting to suffering. Our work in compassion practice is to explore that connection with suffering and to recognize that the practice of compassion involves watching the heart that has some struggle in that connection—the heart that says no, that insists it is not okay for that to be happening. We also watch the heart that disconnects a little bit, that feels a kind of pity instead of really connecting. Pity is one of the near enemies of compassion. It is in the neighborhood of compassion, but it has a separation to it. It is kind of an "oh, poor you" with a little bit of "doesn't involve me" in the background. So there is a separation there.

The other side, the far enemy of compassion, is cruelty—the wish to lash out, to harm. Perhaps in the context of seeing someone suffering, it is the wish to lash out and harm the person or situation we see as responsible for that suffering.

In the exploration of compassion we will feel both of these energies. This is how our practice unfolds. We do not expect to find our way to the perfect balance of wisdom and love immediately. We head in that direction by seeing where we get caught, opening to that, opening to the feeling of pity with some measure of compassion for ourselves, opening to the feeling of cruelty with some measure of compassion for ourselves.
