CHAPTER 1

What Versus Why

Andrea Fella · 53 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella draws a crucial distinction between two modes of understanding our experience: the intellectual exploration of 'why' things happen versus the direct investigation of 'what' is happening in the present moment. Drawing from the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), she explains the Buddha's teaching on wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), showing how attending to present experience through the framework of the Four Noble Truths differs fundamentally from ruminating about past and future.
> Through compelling personal examples—from embarrassment over forgotten lines in a play to the discovery that loneliness was triggered by a digital alarm clock—Fella illustrates how suffering and its causes arise in the present moment, not in history. She demonstrates that witnessing these present-moment conditions can powerfully decouple our reactivity from habitual patterns, sometimes more effectively than years of intellectual analysis.
> The talk culminates in Fella's account of working with deep-seated self-hatred during a three-month retreat. While psychological insight into the historical origins provided some relief, it was the precise moment-to-moment observation using the 'contact-unpleasant' technique that finally undermined the belief structure supporting this painful pattern. This teaching offers practical guidance for practitioners struggling with entrenched mental habits, emphasizing that freedom comes not from understanding why we suffer, but from directly witnessing the impermanent, not-self nature of present-moment experience as it unfolds.

As human beings, we seem to be very curious about why things happen. Many good things have come from this tendency. Civilization itself really owes its origin to this quest for why—science, technology.

We also seem to be particularly curious about why things happen to me. And we have a lot of experience, especially in this culture, I think, of exploring, intellectualizing, thinking about why things are happening to us.

Looking at our experience, looking at our life through this framework of why things are happening can yield some intellectual understanding about our experience, about the causes and conditions leading to our experience. And this can be helpful. Sometimes, if we're reactive—for example, if somebody says something that we feel is hurtful to us—we may know this person and know that it wasn't intentional. Having that understanding can mitigate our response, at least our outward response to the situation.

But sometimes we mistakenly think that this intellectual understanding will actually change our response, change our feelings about the situation—that we can, through intellect, through reason, tell ourselves not to feel a certain way because we see that it doesn't make sense. Actually, often this kind of intellectual understanding doesn't really cut through to the deeper aspects, the roots of our experience, what we might call—what I think the Buddha calls—the underlying tendencies of our experience, the latent tendencies.

It can help to tap into a different way of being, a different way of understanding our experience than through the thought process, through thinking back, understanding why things are happening. We have so much experience with the thinking, with the understanding of why, with the intellectualizing. We're very practiced at that. And we are much less practiced at an exploration of understanding through what is happening as opposed to why.

The Buddha taught wise attention as a way to understand our experience. I'll read you a little bit from one of the suttas about wise attention.

First he discusses attending unwisely. He says, "An untaught ordinary person does not understand what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he attends to those things unfit for attention and does not attend to those things fit for attention."

This is how she attends unwisely: "Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future?" Or else she is inwardly perplexed about the present thus: "Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where will it go?"

All of those questions—we could look at them as forms of "why is this happening to me?"

The Buddha goes on to talk about wise attention: "A well-taught noble disciple understands what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he does not attend to those things unfit for attention, and he attends to those things fit for attention."

She attends wisely: "This is suffering." She attends wisely: "This is the origin of suffering." She attends wisely: "This is the cessation of suffering." She attends wisely: "This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering."

When I first read this—this is one of my favorite suttas—I didn't really understand so much what this wise attention through the Four Noble Truths meant. I thought it was just a reflection on the Four Noble Truths. But then in looking at it a little more closely, I saw what he said is: "This is suffering."

This is the cause of suffering. This, what I am experiencing right now, is suffering. What I'm experiencing right now is the cause of suffering.

So I think the sutta is saying that we can use the Four Noble Truths as a framework for exploring our present moment experience. Suffering occurs in the present moment. It doesn't occur in the past or the future. If we are suffering over something that happened in the past, what's going on is that thoughts are arising right now, in the present moment, creating the suffering right now, in the present moment.

Some years ago, I was an actress in a play. And one night, I forgot my line during the performance. I tried ad-libbing, saying other things so that the other actors would realize, "She's forgotten her line, I need to jump in and help." After a few attempts, I realized they weren't picking up the cue. And I ran out of things to say.

There was this gaping silence. The wall between the audience and the actors broke down. I looked out and saw everybody staring at me, waiting for me to speak. It was a very embarrassing moment. Very embarrassing.

For many years afterward, when something triggered that memory, I would feel the embarrassment all over again. And on one three-month retreat, I remembered that moment many, many, many times. I got to really see what was happening. The thought would appear—I was on the stage looking out—and the feeling of embarrassment would come over me.

I began to recognize that the suffering, the embarrassment happening there in my room in the gym, was happening right now. The conditions for it had happened in the past: I had been on that stage, I had forgotten my lines, the embarrassment had happened in the past. But the suffering I was experiencing on the three-month retreat was happening right now. It was being constructed all over again, right in the present moment.

So not only does suffering occur in the present moment, but as the Buddha teaches, this is the cause of suffering—the cause also occurs in the present moment. The why occurs in the present moment. Why we are suffering, the direct cause of why we are suffering, happens in the present moment. When we can see this direct cause, the direct why, in the present moment, our suffering can start to fall apart. We see it as just conditioned phenomena arising and passing. As Carol said this morning, "empty phenomena rolling on"—which Munindraji said many times.

Another example: in the early years of my practice, one of my main practices was observing my emotions in daily life. At one point, after the breakup of a long relationship, I was observing a lot of loneliness. In particular, I noticed that when I went to bed at night, I was lonely. This didn't particularly surprise me. I figured I understood why I was lonely going to bed at night.

But I was in the practice of observing my emotions, so I just started noticing this loneliness as I would go to bed. I would just notice it. And one night, as I was getting ready for bed, I noticed that the loneliness began when I set my alarm clock. I thought this was kind of odd. But I just kept going, kept on getting ready for bed. For the next several nights I observed this same pattern: as I set my alarm clock, the loneliness appeared.

One night, as I was setting my alarm clock—a little digital alarm clock—I noticed a thought pass through my mind. I was with my ex-boyfriend in Disneyland, looking up at a marquee in Tomorrowland where there was a digital clock. I could see the connection between what I was doing and the memory. There was an associative link between the digital clock and the memory. And I could also see that the cause of the loneliness was a reactivity to that memory: "Oh, poor me, all of those good times are over."

It didn't actually have anything to do with, "Now I'm single, now I'm going to bed by myself," which is what I had assumed the loneliness was about. The actual cause of the loneliness in that moment was the reactivity to a memory triggered by a physical experience—seeing the clock.

Now, the loneliness was there anyway that evening. But I was kind of amazed at the way the mind could see how things were triggered, how things were caused. What amazed me even more was the next night when I went to bed—

I was setting the alarm clock, and of course the memory came back. The thinking about my ex-boyfriend returned. But what really surprised me is that the loneliness did not come back. And in fact, that regular every-night going-to-bed-lonely simply stopped. It was as if the seeing of the link—the loneliness being a reaction to a thought—had somehow decoupled the reactivity to that memory.

I had thought the cause of the loneliness was the whole history of the relationship and the breakup, but it was really just a reaction to a thought. That's all. That was the cause of that loneliness. Witnessing in the present moment what is happening, seeing that directly, can have a powerful impact on the deeper roots of our conditioning.

There's an important distinction between the "why" of history and seeing the "why" of the present moment. As I hope this example about the clock shows, the "why" of history had to do with a lot of "poor me, I'm single, I'm never going to be happy again, I'm never going to have a relationship again." But the "why" of the moment was seen in the experiencing of the moment itself. It was a thought, a reaction to a thought, the arising of an emotion—just this empty phenomenon rolling on.

So how do we look at what is actually happening? We've been talking a lot about this in the instructions. This is investigation—investigating our experience, investigating the present-moment phenomenon of our experience. What is happening right now? Emotions, bodily sensations. Often we want to understand why these are happening, but again, looking at what is happening in the present moment reveals a lot of information that we're not as often attuned to.

We have this wonderful opportunity on retreat to really attune ourselves to what is happening in our experience. Looking at the bodily sensations, looking at the emotional responses, noticing what thoughts are triggered, when things happen, when they arise, when they pass away. Paying attention to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. This is a wonderful place to explore what is happening in the moment and seeing how reactivity is born out of leaping off of pleasant or unpleasant.

A student came to one of my introductory classes a couple of years ago. It was the very first or second night he had come, and he told me that he was having panic attacks—a lot of overwhelming feelings of panic at just random times, not particularly traceable to any reason as far as he could tell. He was diagnosed with agoraphobia and severe panic attacks. Someone in his support group had suggested he go to an introductory meditation class, so he appeared at my intro class.

He told me about his experience. He was a scientist, trained in this exploration of cause and effect, in asking why. Why are things happening? He could see that the panic attacks didn't really have any kind of rational root. So he would talk to himself and say, "Why is this happening? There's no need for this to be happening," trying to use his intellect to help him ride out his panic attacks.

After listening to his story, I suggested, "I'd like to give you another question to explore. Rather than asking why or looking at the experience from the 'why' side, see if you can just notice what is happening. Ask, 'What is happening right now?'"

He was quite remarkably able to do this quite quickly. He said that he noticed the tension in his neck, the tightness, the constriction of the breathing. And just staying with the sensations, the panic did not build. After a very short time—a matter of a couple of months—the panic attacks lessened dramatically. He told me about a year ago that he hadn't had panic attacks in quite a while and has been free of them since then, through exploring what is happening as opposed to focusing on why.

When we look at the present-moment experience, this "what" of our experience, often the cause—the "why" of the present moment—reveals itself, as it did for me in the example of the alarm clock. Sometimes there can be many layers of present-moment causes underlying a particular experience that we have.

On one long retreat at Spirit Rock, I was experiencing a lot of doubt in myself, doubt about doing long-term practice. Why am I here? Why should I be doing this? I was doing walking meditation, and this was plaguing me. The thoughts were just overwhelming me.

Why? Why? Why am I here? Why? And I decided to see if I could just notice what was happening. It was primarily coming about through thinking. This overwhelming doubt attack was coming about through thinking.

So I would set myself in the walking to just do the walking meditation, focusing on my feet. But as soon as I saw a thought, I would stop and just notice what was happening in that moment—what the thought was, what the emotional response was. I did this for some period of time, maybe twenty minutes, and I saw a number of different layers through this process of exploring the what.

I started out with just this feeling of doubt, and then I noticed a fear of not measuring up somehow, of not being a good enough yogi. And underneath that—each time I would notice one of these thoughts, I would just notice it, in that case stop, feel the fear, and then go back to walking. Settle the thoughts and go back to walking. Then as soon as the thought would arise, I would stop again. Often I wouldn't get more than one or two steps before the next thought would hit me.

After the fear, underneath the fear was this feeling of unworthiness—that I wasn't worthy to be dedicating my life to this practice, having given up my job to devote my life to this practice. Under that was an insecurity about my financial situation. Under that was an aversion to that insecurity. And then there was a vulnerability. Just this feeling of vulnerability. And when I hit that feeling of vulnerability, it was like, wow, this is truth. And I could stay with that feeling. Just rest in that space.

This was a way to explore the layers of our experience through just looking at what is happening. What is happening right now?

Sometimes in this kind of exploration, the why of history is revealed. It's shown to us. A thought will appear that clearly connects a historical incident with the present moment experience. And that can be interesting, but it's actually not necessary. It's not necessary to uncover the historical reasons. What's necessary is to see what is happening right now. How are the causes and conditions coming together in the moment to create our experience?

Actually, if we look for a why, if we think about or try to find a why of our experience, it can lead us to conclusions that may or may not be true.

There's a strong interconnection between mind and body, particularly where emotions are concerned. Emotional changes often produce strong changes in sensation in the body. And strong sensations in the body can trigger or produce an emotional reaction. It goes both ways.

As an aside, just as an interesting confirmation of this, there's a study done by Paul Ekman and Richard Davidson. Paul Ekman is a great student of emotions, and Richard Davidson has done a lot of research on the neurological basis of experience. This is what they said about the connection between the body and the mind: "In the course of our research, we found something that surprised us. If you intentionally make a facial expression, you change your physiology. By making the correct expression, you begin to have changes in your physiology that accompany the emotion. This was seen in both work on bodily physiology and some work with Richard Davidson on changes in the brain. The face is not simply a means of display, but also a means of activating emotion."

In other words, simply putting the face into a smile drives the brain into patterns typical of happiness, just as a frown does with sadness. Bodily experience can produce emotional responses.

I've often noticed when certain physical experiences come into the body, the mind starts trying to figure out what is happening and why they're happening. There's an inclination or a tendency to understand the meaning. I've discovered in my own practice the tendency to assign an emotion to physical experience. Our minds scan our history to figure out, to assign, based on this bodily experience, what emotion we're having. And this habit of scanning, I found, sometimes assigns the wrong emotion.

I had one experience with this on another three-month retreat. I was waiting for an interview with Joseph, and as usual, I thought at least, I was feeling anxiety.

The body was quivering. That seemed to be proof enough, and also I was in a context where I had been anxious in the past. You know, that familiar pattern: it's been three days, I haven't talked to anybody, what am I going to say? Is it going to look good? All of those things that go through the mind. But mostly I was experiencing this quivering in the body.

So I was noticing this quivering, and I was noting "anxiety." I was using the note "anxiety." And the interview ahead of me went on for a long time, so I got to observe this for quite a while. And I noticed, oddly I thought, that the anxiety didn't change much. That struck me as unusual because typically when I'm actually noticing what's happening in the moment and observing it with mindfulness, there's some shift around it. A little space opens up. But that hadn't happened in this case, and that made me curious.

So I started just opening up to what was actually happening in the experience. There's quivering in the body. And I very rapidly discovered that what was actually happening was rapture, not anxiety. After that, the sensations got very strong. The quivering became much more rapture-like.

So the body can produce sensations, and based on habit, we can scan and assign an emotion. We're in that mode of looking for meaning, asking why is this happening? It's helpful to just notice what is happening.

Sometimes a certain constellation of physical experience can be a habit in and of itself. We're so habitually attuned to a particular state that the physical experience becomes habitual, whether or not an emotion is actually present. So, for instance, a feeling of contraction and heaviness around the heart—it might be sadness. Maybe, maybe not. It might just be a habitual pattern of the body without the sadness actually being there. So be willing to explore what our experience is without necessarily rapidly assigning a meaning or a "why" to what is happening.

There's a beautiful poem that speaks to this, by Fernando Pessoa:

The mystery of things, where is it?
Why doesn't it come out to show us at least that it's mystery?
What do the river and the tree know about it?
And what do I, who am no more than they, know about it?
Whenever I look at things and think about what people think of them,
I laugh like a brook cleanly plashing against a rock.
For the only hidden meaning of things is that they have no hidden meaning.
It's the strangest thing of all,
stranger than all poets' dreams and all philosophers' thoughts, that things are really what they seem to be, and there's nothing to understand.
Yes, this is what my senses learned on their own.
Things have no meaning. They exist.
Things are the only hidden meaning of things.

We can also get seduced by looking for meaning around meditative experiences, not just emotional ones. Something happens in our practice—suddenly the mindfulness seems elusive. Why is that? What did I do wrong? We feel like we're a bad meditator, or maybe a good meditator, depending on what we're experiencing. As if it somehow means something about us.

The way through any experience is simply to notice what is actually happening. I had an experience with this at my first three-month course where for a period of time the mind got very settled, and it was pretty easy to be with the breath. The mind wasn't wandering much. Then one day I started noticing that suddenly the mind was wandering all the time. What's happened? Why is this? What's gone wrong? But I'd had enough experience by that point to recognize: well, this is what's happening.

Just notice what is happening. Paying close attention to my experience, what I saw was that when I first sat down, the mind connected very easily with the breath, and very rapidly the breath became very, very subtle, very quiet. So quiet, in fact, that it almost disappeared. And it was when the breath got that quiet that the mind would wander.

I began to see that the mind had settled to a point where the subtlety of experience was deeper than the mindfulness actually knew how to connect with. So I would simply stay with it as long as I could, as long as I could stay with the breath. Then I'd notice the mind had wandered, and I'd come back and just notice again. Over time, the mindfulness caught up with the subtlety of the experience.

So it wasn't necessarily a problem that the mind had started wandering. It was an indication of something shifting in the practice. No matter what is happening, that is the instruction: What is happening right now?

I'd like to talk a little more about the cause and effect that becomes apparent as we look at what is happening in the moment—the why of the present moment getting revealed to us. As we see what is happening, it's almost automatic that we start to see the cause and effect nature of our experience. An image arises, a reaction to the image, an emotion following the reaction, another emotion following that emotion—and there is a chain. There's a clear link between them. The arising of one experience leads to the arising of the next experience.

As we start to see this cause and effect relationship, we see that it's really just impersonal experience, impersonal phenomenon. No "I" doing anything, no "me" actually creating the reaction, but just an experience followed by another experience.

This chain of cause and effect in the present moment is not deterministic. In the present moment, we also have the opportunity for choice—choice of how to be with our present moment experience. And one of the most powerful choices we can make is to simply observe the chain of events that are unfolding, simply witness what is arising with mindfulness. This witnessing can start to have a deep impact on these underlying latent tendencies, on the stream of unfolding experience.

I have another example that I'd like to share, one that ties together many of these different things I've been talking about this evening—the different kinds of whys of experience, the why of history, the why of the present moment. It concerns one of my deepest habits, one of my deepest ruts in my mind.

I'm sure most of you have this sense of some pattern that's so deep, so deeply conditioned that it's like a rut in our mind with a magnetic pull to it. If we get anywhere near this rut, the little ball drops in there, and it just rolls around, and that rut is so deep it seems impossible to get that ball out.

For me, one of these deep ruts was self-hatred. Through years of therapy, I had seen or understood to some extent that this pattern of self-hatred was connected with a particular relationship in my life. So I understood that to some degree, although I hadn't seen any direct evidence of it. It just made sense—kind of like it made sense to me that when I was going to bed at night alone, I would be lonely. Yes, that makes sense. This is why this pattern is there. But the years of therapy hadn't really touched the pattern or the habit, that rut.

On one three-month retreat, something happened. I had noticed this feeling of self-hatred arise on many, many retreats. But on this particular retreat, it was very prevalent, and I began to see the more direct connection, the more direct link between that relationship and the present moment experience of self-hatred. As I described a little while ago, sometimes as we're observing our present moment experience, we can see an image or a thought from history that makes a clear link to our experience.

I could see that this relationship was central. I actually experienced the centrality of that relationship to the self-hatred. And I felt a huge opening around that. A lot of compassion came up for this person and for the suffering they experienced—suffering that made them treat me in such a way that I would end up with such low self-esteem. There was a huge release around that, and I actually thought it would have some effect, some impact on that rut in my mind.

But the rut was just as deep. It actually surprised me. The next time the self-hatred came up, it was just as strong. Because I felt like, wow, I had this real huge release around this—shouldn't this have done something?

What it did do—I would call that a psychological insight, that recognition of the connection in our present moment experience to a historical event. What it did do for me was allow me to be a little less threatened by the experience of self-hatred. I could see that it was a pattern of conditioning. So it was less threatening. There was less resistance to the self-hatred because of that psychological insight. That was a benefit of that psychological insight.

But I still got to experience that self-hatred over and over and over again during that retreat. I would see it come, I would be in it, and sometimes it would be so painful that I couldn't do much with it but just feel the self-hatred. But I would see that it came and went. There'd be times when it just wasn't there at all, and then I would experience that it came back. Just watching it come and go, seeing that it was impermanent.

And then one evening in the hall, I think Joseph was doing a question and answer, and he talked about a technique for when we get really stuck in something. The technique when we get really, really stuck, when the experience we're having is really sticky and hard to see through—he talked about using a double note. The double note is contact and then feeling tone. So for me, in this experience, the self-hatred was unpleasant, and so "contact unpleasant" would be what I would note.

I just heard this instruction in the hall that evening. As I left the Dharma Hall, I wasn't particularly in that mode of self-hatred, but as I walked up the stairs, I felt it descend. And I felt powerless. It was so strong, and again, that rut is so deep—it's like there's almost no way to pull yourself out. But having just heard this instruction, I went back to my room and just started seeing if I could notice the moment I felt any additional movement towards that self-hatred. Just contact unpleasant, contact unpleasant. I tried to have that note come right at the moment when I felt that movement of "you're no good."

I usually used a little alarm for myself to tell me when a sitting was ending. My beeper went off at some point, but I was right in there just noticing the movement towards this self-hatred. And I just realized, this isn't the time to get up. I'm just going to keep looking at this.

Maybe about ten minutes later, noticing contact unpleasant, seeing "this is just a thought"—the ephemeral nature of that thought was shown by looking at it just so precisely. Contact unpleasant. The next moment, there's this moment of seeing the ephemeral nature of that thought: this is just a thought. The next moment, split second, the body was flooded with bliss. The next moment, the mind recognized: ah, this too is impermanent. There was a recognition that even though I had seen this, it didn't necessarily mean that the self-hatred was gone. The feeling of the bliss was "oh, never again—I figured this out." But the next moment was just this: this too is impermanent.

That recognition, that seeing into the ephemeral nature, the anatta nature of that thought, cut really deeply into that habit of self-hatred. It was like the rut went from this deep to that shallow in the space of an instant.

I didn't trust it for years, actually. It was a long time before I felt self-hatred again.

But what I began seeing after a while was simply this: the thoughts are still there. You're no good. But the belief is what's been undermined. There are still tendrils of the pattern hanging about, and I think we need to watch for those tendrils. They can take root again.

So looking at what is happening, no matter what is happening—we often need courage to stay with present moment experience. It can be really frightening. It can feel very counterintuitive to stay with something that feels so threatening, like self-hatred. But we can witness suffering and its cause in the present moment.

Looking at what is happening in the moment can decondition our deep habitual tendencies, the deep patterns in our mind. And it can open us, no matter what we're paying attention to. It doesn't matter what we're paying attention to. We can be paying attention to self-hatred. We can be paying attention to the most sublime states of bliss. What's important is noticing what is happening to them—what it is, and what happens to it as you observe it.

This leads us to the discovery of impermanence, of unsatisfactoriness, of not-self. This is the path to freedom from suffering.

Let's sit for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 2

Exploring Vedanā - Feeling Tone

Andrea Fella · 51 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates vedanā—the feeling tone of experience—as one of the most pivotal yet often overlooked aspects of Buddhist practice. She traces the chain of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), showing how every sense impression passes through the gateway of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling before triggering our habitual patterns of craving and clinging. The Buddha identified this link between feeling and craving as a "weak link" in the chain where mindfulness can interrupt the automatic movement toward suffering.

Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), Fella explains that vedanā constitutes an entire foundation of mindfulness, highlighting its importance in the Buddha's teaching. She offers practical guidance for recognizing feeling tone in physical sensations, emotions, and even thoughts, noting how easily we skip past this subtle quality into reactivity. Through personal retreat experiences—from discovering unexpected pleasantness in anger's initial arising to exploring how neutral feeling can slip into boredom—she demonstrates the rich territory available for investigation.

The talk includes illuminating passages from the suttas, including one stating that "all things converge on feelings" and another describing how seeing the impermanent nature of vedanā leads through disenchantment and dispassion to liberation. Fella concludes with the poetic observation from a dialogue between a bhikkhunī and her former husband: pleasant feeling is pleasant when it persists but painful when it changes, while neutral feeling is pleasant when there is knowledge of it. This teaching offers practitioners a precise tool for understanding how suffering arises and how freedom becomes possible in each moment of clear awareness.

Tonight, I'd like to explore a quality that we've spoken about quite a lot in the last weeks, and that is the feeling tone of experience. In Pali, this is called the vedanā of experience. It's whether our experience has this quality of being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant, often called neutral feeling tone.

The other night, Guy spoke about the second noble truth, the truth of the cause of suffering, the truth that craving is the cause of suffering. But in his discovery of this second noble truth, the Buddha discovered something that went beyond this simple statement that craving causes suffering. He actually discovered an entire chain of causal conditions that lead us through our typical reactivity in our lives. Sally spoke about this some last night—the chain of dependent origination, or sometimes called dependent co-arising.

I won't cover this in complete detail tonight, but I really want to go through the links of this chain that are relevant to tonight's talk on the feeling tone of experience.

Basically, because we have a mind and a body, we have these six sense doors: the five usual physical senses and the sense base of the mind. Through these sense doors, we experience contact with objects. We experience sight, sound, smells, taste, and touch with our physical senses. And we experience emotions, moods, mind states, and thoughts with the sense door of our mind.

Each of these sense impressions has a flavor to it. This is the feeling tone of experience. Each of our sense impressions is either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. So this is the feeling tone—very simple, very basic in our experience.

Based on that feeling tone, when something is pleasant, we typically like it and we want it. We want to get more of it. When something is unpleasant, we don't like it; we want to get rid of it. If something's neutral, we probably don't even notice it.

Eating ice cream is pleasant. We tend to like to eat it. We eat more and more of it, and then at some point we get full. If we start to overeat ice cream, our experience becomes unpleasant, and we tend to stop to avoid the unpleasant. It's kind of like we're this simple automatic machine, this very simple automaton that tries to increase pleasant experience and decrease unpleasant experience.

Based on the feeling tone, this wanting arises—either wanting to have or wanting to get rid of. And we often automatically react to that wanting, reaching out to either grab onto what we want to have or to push away, to actually move out of our experience the thing that we don't want to have. This is called clinging. Whether it's the movement to hold something to us or to push it away from us, it's called clinging.

Once an object is clung to, typically some kind of identity forms around it. It becomes mine, or it becomes me. This might take an obvious form such as "this is my sitting spot," or it might take a more subtle form such as "I'm the kind of person who likes to hike in the woods." It can take a range of manifestations, this quality of becoming.

In terms of this chain of causal conditions, we like becoming. There's something about that crystallization around something that feels good, that feels right. There's something we like about a sense of knowing who we are or what kinds of things define us. We like this brief moment of satisfaction, this becoming. Sometimes it takes the form that we feel like we're in control or that we know something.

From this point of becoming, according to the Buddha, even though we've just experienced this moment of satisfaction with this becoming, from this point suffering is inevitable. That suffering might result from the obvious form of separation from something we consider mine. Like if you have a beautiful vase that you're very fond of, and it breaks—there can be a feeling of sadness or loss, or perhaps anger if somebody else has dropped the vase. There can be that kind of suffering that results when something that we think of as ours goes away. We might experience a feeling of loss if a relationship ends or at the death of a loved one.

But the suffering can also result from the fact that the moment of satisfaction we get when we crystallize around something doesn't last very long. It fades. And then there's this sense of wanting more, that "wanting to want" that Joseph talks about. We actually think that happiness in our lives consists of stringing together these little moments of happiness, these little moments of satisfaction. But that's what we think happiness consists of. And this is a form of delusion. It's a form of ignorance.

So in our untrained minds, suffering—this kind of suffering that results when a moment of satisfaction ends, or a separation from something we love—usually leads us toward ignorance, which conditions our habitual patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion. And these patterns then condition how our mind perceives other experiences. The cycle goes around and around.

Basically, mind and body conditions our sense bases, which conditions contact, which conditions feeling, which conditions craving, which conditions clinging, which conditions becoming, which conditions suffering, which conditions ignorance, which conditions these habitual patterns of mind. And so this goes round and round in our experience.

Sally talked last night a little bit about this chain of dependent origination, and she mentioned that it is not deterministic. It's possible to move out of this cycle, this habitual cycle of samsara, this wheel that keeps samsara going. It's possible to exit this chain. She talked about one way of breaking the chain between suffering and ignorance—that with wise attention to suffering, with the understanding of suffering, we can move away from ignorance toward faith and on toward the chain she spoke about last night: the transcendent dependent origination.

But there's another link in this chain that the Buddha recognized as a weak link, and that's the link between feeling and craving. This is the movement of the mind from pleasant to wanting, from unpleasant to wanting to get rid of, from neutral sensation to not noticing—or maybe we could say, not wanting to notice.

If we bring mindfulness and wise attention to the feeling tone of experience, just to whether it's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, we can actually short-circuit this movement of the mind toward wanting. It's possible to experience something as pleasant without wanting it. It's possible to experience something as unpleasant without wanting to get rid of it. If we can just notice this pleasant or unpleasant without the movement toward wanting, the suffering will not arise. This is the movement away from suffering. But the only way this can happen, the only way we can see this cycle break, is if we can actually see the feeling tone of experience—to bring mindfulness to the feeling tone, to whether in our experience there's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

The Buddha described mindfulness of feeling most prominently in the Satipatthana Sutta, the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. The feeling tone of experience, this vedana, is the second foundation of mindfulness. It's given an entire foundation all to itself. I think that highlights the importance the Buddha put on this quality of mind. This very fine, very simple quality of mind is an entire foundation of mindfulness.

I'll read you part of the instructions the Buddha gave. He's speaking to his monks here, so he's addressing bhikkhus. But in other places in the commentaries, it says that the term bhikkhu refers to anybody who is practicing the Dhamma. So this is speaking to all of us:

"And how, bhikkhus, does a bhikkhu abide contemplating feelings as feelings? When feeling a pleasant feeling, a bhikkhu understands, 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' When feeling a painful feeling, he understands, 'I feel a painful feeling.' When feeling a neither painful nor pleasant feeling, he understands, 'I feel a neither painful nor pleasant feeling.'"

It's that simple. But it's not easy.

The part that's not easy is that we really need to recognize that we're feeling pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience. Usually when we experience something pleasant or unpleasant, we're quickly either moving toward it or away from it. We've hardly noticed there's an experience of pleasant or unpleasant before we're moving to get it or moving to get rid of it. We quickly spin into thoughts of planning—how to get it, how to have more of it, how to get rid of it, how to never have it again in our lives. So stopping this momentum from the pleasant to the movement toward wanting, and all of the thoughts around it, is very difficult. To actually see the pleasant itself is challenging.

But it's helped by simply knowing that this is a really good quality to pay attention to. Until I heard these teachings, nobody ever told me it's a really good idea to notice in your experience when something's pleasant or unpleasant. Nobody said that to me. But it's a crucial place to highlight in our experience.

This feeling tone can be quite subtle. As I said, it's not something we've been trained to notice. Typically, we've been trained to react to it. That's how we've lived our lives—reacting to pleasant, trying to get it, pushing away the unpleasant. But when we start to actually pay attention, and when it's been highlighted for us that this is a quality useful to pay attention to, it can become quite obvious.

For instance, if you fall down and bump your knee, it's unpleasant. If you're attuned to checking out pleasant and unpleasant, it will probably be pretty obvious that that's an unpleasant experience. When we eat a food that we like, there's often quite a bit of pleasant experience. Again, that's quite easy to see once we've gotten attuned to actually noticing the pleasantness.

What's hard to do is to stop there, at that moment of pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. We're trained to respond to it. But if we start seeing the feeling tone and seeing our response to it, we're beginning to see deeply into how the mind functions.

Every experience we have, as I mentioned in talking through the chain of dependent origination, whether physical or mental, has this quality of feeling tone. This is usually most obvious or easiest to see in our physical experience. It's pretty easy to know when we're experiencing unpleasant bodily sensations—unpleasant sights, sounds, smells, tastes, physical contact. But mental experience also has a feeling tone. Anger, for instance, typically has an unpleasant quality to it. Joy has a pleasant quality. Thoughts themselves also have a subtle feeling tone.

More often, though, when we think we understand the feeling tone of a thought, it's because there's been a subtle reaction in the mind to that thought. For instance, right now, just imagine that you're lying on a warm, sunny beach. Is there some kind of pleasant experience? Most likely it's the reaction—the emotions and moods that were called up by that thought—that created the pleasantness. Now imagine somebody running their fingernails on a blackboard. If you're like me, that's an unpleasant thought. But when I feel through it, when I examine what's happening in my experience, there's a visceral feeling through the body that's unpleasant—a reaction to that thought.

Actually, this type of reaction underlies the belief that certain physical sensations are unpleasant as well. For example, often if I wake up in the middle of the night and have trouble going back to sleep, I'll get up to meditate. One night, I woke up and went to meditate, and partway through the meditation, I heard a tapping noise. My experience of the tapping was that it was unpleasant. But I just kept paying attention, noticing, being mindful. I began to notice that when I heard the tapping noise, there was a contraction in the body, and that contraction was definitely unpleasant. When I further paid attention to that contraction as I heard the tapping, I felt a very subtle fear arise. The fear was clearly unpleasant. And as I paid attention to the fear, when I heard the tapping sound again, I realized that the tapping sound itself was neutral—actually even slightly pleasant. It was the reaction to the sound, the subtle fear, that made me think the sound itself was unpleasant.

This can be a very interesting exploration of our experience.

The fact that all experience, mental and physical, has a feeling tone also explains a little about why it's so hard to break out of this cycle, why it's so hard to break out of this chain of dependent origination that we cycle around. In the cycle, feeling leads to craving, which leads to clinging, which leads to becoming, which leads to suffering or dissatisfaction. But if we attend to the feeling tone of the links themselves, we notice that wanting is an unpleasant experience. Wanting feels like a deep sense of being unsatisfied. Our typical movement is to want to satisfy that desire, to get rid of this unpleasant feeling. We want to satisfy the desire—that's the way we've been trained. We satisfy the desire, and the unpleasantness of the wanting goes away. In that satisfaction of the desire, we also have that brief moment of becoming, that crystallization, that pleasant experience.

So we learn through repeated experience that when we get what we want, we get a double hit: getting rid of something unpleasant, and getting that feeling of becoming, which is pleasant. The cycle tends to reinforce itself.

There's one sutta I like that points to this fact—that feeling tone is a weak link in the cycle of dependent origination. I'll read it to you; it's relatively short. It's a kind of chain of events, although not a causal chain, but it describes a way our experience can move as we pay attention:

All things are rooted in desire. They come to actual existence through attention, originate from contact, and converge on feelings. The foremost of all things is concentration. All things are mastered by mindfulness. Their peak is wisdom. Their essence, liberation. All things merge in the deathless, and nibbana is their culmination.

There are a couple of things I like about this sutta. One is that it highlights how all things converge on feeling. I think that wording emphasizes the importance of understanding this feeling tone. In our experience, we encounter a wide variety of sense impressions—color, sight, sound, smells, tastes, and an endless stream of thoughts, moods, and emotions in our mind. We think we respond to the sense impression itself. We think, "I like blue," or "I don't like the way hot roofing tar smells," or "I don't like it when my partner says that to me." But all sense impressions converge on feelings.

For some of us, blue is pleasant. Hot roofing tar is unpleasant. The example of not liking what our partner says to us is a little more complex, but it might unfold something like this.

When our partner speaks to us, there's the sound of the voice. Depending on the tone of the voice, that might be pleasant or unpleasant. But if what the partner is saying brings up an idea in your mind or a belief, there may be a reaction to that idea or belief which might be unpleasant. In that case, the unpleasantness of that belief or idea is why we don't like what our partner says to us.

So from the wide variety of sense impressions, our reactions to those sense impressions actually just comes down to this very simple quality of whether the sense impression is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. It's like a springboard, a narrow gateway through which we react to all of our experience. All things converge on feelings.

The other thing I like about this sutta is that it talks about all things. All things converge on feelings. The foremost of all things is concentration. They are mastered by mindfulness. All things converge on feeling, and through concentration and mindfulness on the feelings—on whether they're pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, on how they are coming and going—through this we find that feelings are impermanent. With mindfulness, we can break this movement towards wanting. The concentration and mindfulness on the feeling leads to wisdom. All things have liberation as their essence, merge in the deathless, and culminate in Nibbāna.

All things. It doesn't matter what we're paying attention to. It might be the pleasantness of our hands on a mug of hot tea. It might be the unpleasantness of the cold as we walk outside. It doesn't matter. All things culminate in Nibbāna.

There's another sutta that offers a more causal link, showing how attention to feelings leads to liberation. I'll read this to you as well. This passage highlights attending to the impermanent nature of feelings as being the key to our liberation:

"Pleasant feeling is impermanent, conditioned, dependently arisen, subject to destruction, vanishing, fading away, and ceasing. Painful feeling too is impermanent, conditioned, dependently arisen, subject to destruction, vanishing, fading away, and ceasing. Neither painful nor pleasant feeling too is impermanent, conditioned, dependently arisen, subject to destruction, vanishing, fading away, and ceasing. Seeing thus, a well-taught noble disciple becomes disenchanted with pleasant feeling, disenchanted with painful feeling, disenchanted with neither painful nor pleasant feeling. Being disenchanted, he becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, his mind is liberated. When it is liberated, there comes the knowledge, 'It is liberated.' He understands: birth is destroyed, the holy life has been lived, what had to be done has been done, there is no more coming to any state of being."

This is the typical statement of liberation of mind—the attention to feeling leading through some of these same links that Sally talked about last night: disenchantment, dispassion.

So the key really with mindfulness of feeling is to become familiar with what this feeling tone is. I'd like to talk for a while about how to engage with an exploration of feeling tone.

Probably the easiest place to attune to this quality is in our physical experience. Our touch sensations, particularly the contact of our skin, seem to be highly attuned to the painful, pleasant, and neutral aspects of experience. So simply exploring in your physical experience whether it is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral can be very illuminating. You can do this any time of day. It's actually a really great exploration through the non-formal part of our meditation—doing the yogi jobs, brushing our teeth, getting ready for bed. What parts of the experience are pleasant? What parts are unpleasant? You'll notice a flow of changing experience. Washing the dishes, the warmth of the water, the weight of the dishes—are they pleasant or unpleasant?

One commentary to the suttas, the Visuddhimagga, states that while this touch sensation, the physical experience of touch, can be pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, the other four physical sense doors—sight, sound, smell, and taste—actually produce contact that is all neutral. Any sense we have that the experience at those other sense doors is pleasant or unpleasant has to do with a kind of reactivity in the mind, a very subtle movement of reactivity.

I'm not sure if I completely believe this, especially where taste is concerned. I kind of think that there may be some tastes that are revolting because they're not good for us to swallow. But I do find it to be a really interesting exploration.

To look and see when I am seeing something that appears pleasant—is there some kind of reactivity in my mind? A thought, a construct, causes and conditions that have come together to create that pleasantness?

I had an exploration of this on one retreat. It was tea time here at IMS, a very simple tea. I had bean dip and an apple. I took a bite of the bean dip—it was kind of tart and creamy. Then I took a bite of this apple, and it was the most pleasant apple I'd ever eaten. Really, really delightful. It was like these bubbles of delight came up through my body while I ate this apple.

I thought, "Wow, that's cool," and I took another bite. It was pretty good too, but not quite so delightful as the last one. Then I began exploring—maybe it was the bean dip. Maybe it was the bean dip before the apple. So I took a bite of the bean dip and then a bite of the apple, and yes, that was pretty pleasant. But over the meal, I began to realize that the apple kind of lost a little bit of its allure. Even alternating it with the bean dip, it wasn't as delightful as it had initially been.

I could see that the causes and conditions coming together to create the quality of delightfulness, the level of pleasantness essentially—it's not just a valence, an on-off kind of thing where it's either pleasant or not pleasant. There are gradations of these pleasant and unpleasant experiences. So feeling often comes about as a result of these causes and conditions.

An excellent place to play with mindfulness of feeling is with eating, because it engages all of our senses. We see our food—it may be beautiful on our plate, the different colors. We smell it before we eat it. We taste it, the texture on the tongue, the sound as we're chewing and swallowing, and all of the thoughts that we have around the food. It's a great place to play with this mindfulness of feeling, especially if what you're eating you enjoy.

Another good place to pay attention to feeling tone is when there are strong emotions present. Just see if you can recognize whether the emotion is pleasant or unpleasant. What feeling tone does anger have? What feeling tone does lust have? Happiness, sadness. It can actually be kind of surprising when we pay attention.

I had one experience on retreat where I was paying attention to anger quite a lot. Something had come up that had made me angry, and this thing kept coming back up in my mind over and over again. So I kept experiencing the arising of anger. Generally, the experience of anger was unpleasant. But at one point, I saw the very beginning, just the very beginning of that feeling in the body. And it was a feeling of warmth and fullness. And it was pleasant. It really quickly went to heat and pressure, but that initial hit was pleasant.

I was kind of shocked. But I thought, "Wow, I wonder if this is part of the hook of anger—this initial pleasant feeling." So explore in your experience. There can be some surprises, not necessarily what you'd expect with pleasant and unpleasant.

On my first three-month retreat, Carol was here as a teacher, and she gave the instruction: if you're feeling aversion in your experience, if you're experiencing aversion, there's something unpleasant in your experience, probably unnoticed.

On that particular retreat, doing walking meditation, I was experiencing a lot of aversion to the other people who were walking nearby. I don't know if you've had this experience, but it was very common for me in doing walking meditation to have strong aversion to the people walking near me. So that evening, not too long after hearing that dharma talk, I was doing walking here in this upper walking room and somebody came up and started doing walking meditation right next to me.

Immediately this feeling of aversion arose. And I remembered Carol saying, "Okay, aversion—there's something unpleasant in your experience." So I started exploring. What in my experience is unpleasant? I checked my sight—the person did not particularly look unpleasant. Nothing unusual about how they looked.

They didn't smell bad. And they weren't bumping up against me, so there weren't any unpleasant physical sensations. I thought, well, there must be something in the mind then. Something's going on in the mind.

I didn't particularly notice any thoughts that were unpleasant. The mind felt pretty quiet. But I just attuned my attention toward noticing what might be happening in the mind while continuing the walking back and forth. And then this thought erupted: "He's weird. He's weird."

I thought, well, that's a thought. But I didn't quite get the connection between unpleasantness and that thought. It didn't sink in. So I kept doing the walking. At some point, another thought erupted: "He's got bare feet on, and it's freezing cold outside." This was my justification for the fact that he was weird. And I could see that a whole complex had been created in my mind—one that I thought was unpleasant, that I was reacting to. When I saw that, on the next walking path, the whole thing fell apart, and I was spontaneously doing metta for the person. It was quite remarkable, exploring feeling tone in this way.

It's also really interesting to explore how we react to neutral—the neither pleasant nor unpleasant experience. This can be more difficult because neutral feeling is pretty subtle, and often we just skip right over it. We don't even notice it. But as the mind settles down, we start experiencing more of that neutral quality. And in that space of the neutral, it's a really interesting place to see how identification gets created.

On one retreat, I was experiencing quite a bit of time in this neutral place, so I got to explore it extensively. Most of the time I could be there right in the neutral, but I would begin to see it slipping off into boredom or indifference. The feeling tone of those was slightly unpleasant. So it was a nice exploration in that neutral to see when it just tipped, just slightly tipped off. Because in that neutral place, often not much is engaging us, and we'll either get bored or space out into that kind of indifferent place.

Also on this same retreat, I was experiencing the neutral feeling tone and noticing sometimes a subtle leaning into that experience, or waiting for something to happen. Because I had the idea that this neutral place was a good place in practice and that something was supposed to happen from it. There was this leaning into the neutral, this waiting, this expecting something to happen. And when nothing happened, the mind got judgmental: "You're a failure."

This has been one of my strongest habits. I talked about it in my last talk—this self-judgment and movement from "You're a failure" to self-hatred, to this feeling of unworthiness. And here it was being created out of nothing, out of neutral experience and an idea that something was supposed to be happening. So this place of neutral can be a really interesting place to explore how our identity gets constructed out of this very balanced place.

Another really interesting place to explore feeling tone is around the wandering mind—when the mind goes off and when it comes back. Often I find that there are a number of ways the feeling tone operates here. We can leap off of an unnoticed pleasant feeling tone into "Oh, this is so nice, I'm going to come back next year to this retreat, and I'm going to have a nicer shawl next time." We construct a whole fantasy because we didn't notice that subtle feeling of pleasant.

So the wandering mind can go off of pleasant feeling tone, or neutral feeling tone—it can just space out when things get neutral, drift off because there's not much holding our attention. Or an unpleasant experience. Sometimes with unpleasant experience we launch into fantasy to experience something pleasant. We construct a pleasant thing in our minds in order to avert, to get rid of the unpleasant experience in our bodies.

Noticing how the mind goes from feeling tone to wandering off can be a really good place to explore this. And likewise, coming back—waking up from being lost in thought. Is the feeling tone pleasant? Is it unpleasant?

I often find that the drifting of the mind, if it's just drifting, if it's not an actual fantasy or a judgment of some kind—I don't know if you're familiar with that, where the mind just isn't thinking about much in particular, just drifting—that can be a kind of pleasant experience that perpetuates itself because the pleasantness is not noticed. So when you come back from the wandering mind, check into the feeling tone. I found that when I started doing this, it actually helped the mind keep from wandering, because I realized I was missing the experience—particularly in that drifting, that pleasantness of drifting.

I wasn't noticing the pleasant. It wasn't apparent. It was just kind of lost in the fog of the drift.

As you become more familiar with feeling tone, you'll start seeing it more naturally rather than having to actively look for it, as I've been suggesting in this discussion. But it's helpful initially to actually attune yourself to this quality because it can be difficult to see. It's so subtle, and we so quickly move off of it into reactivity. But as we start to get attuned to it and familiar with it, it becomes much more obvious, and then we can practice as the Satipatthana Sutta instructs: when something is pleasant, we know that it's pleasant; when something is unpleasant, we know that it's unpleasant; when it's neutral, we know that it's neutral.

When you can notice this feeling tone, you have the opportunity to actually witness the birth of reactivity—to see your mind moving from pleasantness to wanting, from unpleasantness to the desire to get rid of. This begins to really show us how suffering is constructed. We start to understand the nature of suffering as that movement of reactivity from pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. And in that understanding of suffering are the seeds of freedom.

The last thing I'll say about feeling tone is that it can have this yin-yang quality to it. In the pleasant are the seeds of the unpleasant, and in the unpleasant are the seeds of the pleasant. When pleasant experience ends, it's unpleasant. When unpleasant experience ends, it's pleasant.

The way neutral fits into this is quite interesting. I want to read you the sutta that describes this. I particularly like this sutta because it's a woman speaking—a nun—and the man talking to her is her ex-husband. He's asked her a number of very detailed questions, and he comes to questions about feeling:

"Lady, what is pleasant and what is painful in regard to pleasant feeling? What is painful and what is pleasant in regard to painful feeling? What is pleasant and what is painful in regard to neither painful nor pleasant feeling?"

"Friend, pleasant feeling is pleasant when it persists and painful when it changes. Painful feeling is painful when it persists and pleasant when it changes. Neither painful nor pleasant feeling is pleasant when there is knowledge of it and painful when there is no knowledge of it."

Let's sit for a few moments in silence.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 3

Practice In Daily Life

Andrea Fella · 59 min

> In this practical and personal talk given during a transition point in a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella addresses one of the most common concerns practitioners face: how to maintain mindfulness practice when returning to daily life. Drawing from her own experience of beginning meditation practice while working as a Peace Corps volunteer, she offers concrete strategies for cultivating awareness outside of formal retreat settings.
> Fella introduces the technique of choosing specific "mindfulness projects"—both neutral activities that occur regularly throughout the day (like switching between computer programs) and challenging emotional patterns (like working with anger). She describes how consistent resolve to notice these chosen activities gradually brings mindfulness closer to the present moment, eventually transforming ordinary activities into "mindfulness bells." Her powerful account of observing the arising of anger while cutting an apple—and discovering she had a choice not to engage with it—illustrates how daily life practice can lead to genuine insight into the nature of suffering and freedom.
> The talk explores working with the pāramīs (perfections) as daily life practice, including creative approaches like using a grocery store as a "mettā monastery" or placing written reminders of qualities like truthfulness and patience in relevant locations. Fella also introduces a reflective meditation practice taught by Ajahn Amaro for contemplating one's relationship to these qualities. The teaching concludes with an emphasis on mindful speech—using the practice of pausing before speaking to observe intention and motivation—and working with the five precepts as opportunities for awakening compassion and wisdom in ordinary moments.

We're at a real transition point in the retreat right now. I noticed as I came into the hall that there were quite a few yogis huddled around the board looking at the schedule change for tomorrow. This is the outward manifestation of the shift that's happening. The schedule is going to be changing. Speaking is going to begin after three months or six weeks of being in silence. That's a huge shift.

It's an interesting time in the retreat. I'm sure many of you, if not all of you, have seen your thoughts shift to what's going to be happening next—future thoughts, planning. What are the next few days going to be like? What is it going to be like when I go home? Often at this point in retreat, people wonder: How am I going to take this practice home with me? How can I bring some of what I've learned here into my daily life?

The structure of retreat is ideal for cultivating mindfulness. It's ideal for the concentration and continuity of mindfulness. And our daily lives are not that way. The other night, Sally talked about the eight worldly winds, and we get blown around by all of those conditions—the conditions of praise and blame, gain and loss, pain and pleasure, fame and disrepute. Truly, this practice is going against the current of our culture. So it's challenging to bring this practice into our life outside of intensive retreat.

That's what I'd like to talk about this evening. This is a topic that I really love. It's been a very integral part of my own practice. In fact, when I began my practice, I wasn't at all interested in sitting meditation. I didn't even think I would ever do that. I thought, why would anybody do that?

But I was having a great deal of difficulty, particularly with some overwhelming emotions, and I was very interested in understanding my mind. As I began my practice, I started looking at my mind in my daily life using mindfulness techniques that I read about. After about three months of this, as I began to have some real insights into how my mind functioned, I realized maybe the reason they call it practice is because it helps to practice sitting on a cushion, and then you can take it more into your daily life. So that's why I began sitting. Daily life mindfulness was my first practice.

I'd like to share with you some of what I've learned about bringing this mindfulness practice into daily life through examples of ways that I've practiced myself. It's going to be a really practical talk.

In those first few months of my practice, I read a book by Joko Beck called Everyday Zen. I had another one by her around that same time called Nothing Special. In one of those two books, she talked about working at bringing our practice into daily life and said it's not such a good idea to think that you're going to be able to be continuously mindful throughout the day. Don't even try for that because it's just setting yourself up for failure. She suggested instead picking a few projects, mindfulness projects to work on where you could begin to see yourself connecting with those things, giving you a sense of progress.

I really connected with this idea of not trying to be mindful throughout the day. In my early twenties, I had read a book which many of you have probably heard of: Thich Nhat Hanh's Miracle of Mindfulness. I loved this book. I read it every evening before I went to bed and thought, wow, this sounds so cool, this mindfulness stuff. I'm going to do this tomorrow when I go to work. And the next time I would remember would be when I picked up the book the next night. After some nights of that, I thought, well, obviously I can't do this. I put the book aside and didn't meet mindfulness again for another fifteen years.

When I did meet it again, I was in a highly motivated state because I was in some very difficult emotional states that were making me almost non-functional at times. I was very motivated to see what could be done. How could I meet these states of mind?

After reading these books by Joko Beck, I decided to pick two projects in my day. One was an emotion that was just completely out of control for me, one that was making my life quite difficult at times—a very strong anger I was experiencing. The other was a very neutral experience that happened throughout my day. I was a Peace Corps volunteer at the time, working at the development bank in the country where I was assigned as a computer volunteer.

One of the things I did regularly throughout my day was to switch between DOS and Windows on the computer. So I picked this as my other project. I'm going to notice. I'm going to be mindful when I switch between DOS and Windows.

Now, I didn't know much about mindfulness at this point. I had had no instructions, no teachers telling me what to do. I had read this book. So I didn't have a lot of tools for these projects, but just this idea of being mindful. I didn't actually know much, but I began working with this.

With this neutral event, initially I often found that I remembered long after the events had happened many times. I would be going to bed at night and I'd remember: I had told myself I was going to pay attention when I switched between DOS and Windows, and I didn't remember it once today.

Well, fortunately, to my credit, this time I didn't say, "Obviously I can't do this." I just said, "I'm going to try again." And this is one of the keys to practice in daily life—this "I'm going to try again," just noticing when you have not been mindful and making the resolve to try again. So fortunately, I had this somehow. This resolve came up, and I just continued saying to myself, "I'm going to notice this. I'm going to pay attention to this."

And when I look back on it, actually, that moment of remembering—that's the first moment of mindfulness beginning around that particular thing. So even though I didn't remember right while I was switching between DOS and Windows, even though I remembered when I was going to bed at night, that was the beginning. The mindfulness was starting in that moment of remembering. It's just like coming back to the breath. Just like waking up and realizing, "Oh, I've forgotten. I'm not with the breath." In that moment, there is mindfulness, and we come back.

In this case, I couldn't come back to switching between DOS and Windows because I was going to bed at night, but I made that resolve: I'll keep trying. And what happened is that over time—over days, even weeks—of making this resolve, I began to notice that I was remembering closer to the event. I would remember at the end of the morning, for example, right before lunch. "Oh, I forgot." And then it got to the point where I'd remember a few minutes after it happened, and I could begin to see: this resolve is actually getting me closer to the event.

At some point, I remembered right after it happened. Just right after. "Oh, it just happened." The other thing I was doing in this whole exercise was that when I remembered, I was just noticing: I'm mindful now. I remembered now. What's happening right now? Just taking that in, in a very light way.

And at some point, right as I was switching between DOS and Windows, I remembered. Right around that point, that event—the switching between DOS and Windows—became like a mindfulness bell for me. As I switched between DOS and Windows, it triggered the mindfulness to just do that activity.

So this is one technique that I really like to suggest to people in practice in daily life: picking something neutral that happens regularly throughout your day and resolving to pay attention to it. Bringing the mindfulness to that over and over again. It will begin to function as a mindfulness bell for you. And as you are in that experience of whatever your chosen activity is, just in a very light way, notice what's going on. What's the attitude in the mind? What's the bodily posture? Is there tension? Is there tightness?

This is not something to try to hold on to. It's not like trying to grasp onto the mindfulness at this point and say, "Okay, now I'm going to stay mindful." Just in a really light way, noticing what's happening right now. If you pick something that happens regularly throughout your day—I picked something that was happening every fifteen or twenty minutes for me during my workday.

It begins to bring a thread of mindfulness throughout your day—just a few brief moments of check-in, check-in, check-in to what's happening. So that's one way I worked with one of these projects.

The other project I picked was working with my strong anger. This unfolded quite differently. In this case, the anger was so powerful, so strong, and I was really out of control around it. Basically, the anger would just get stronger and stronger until at some point I would remember, "Oh, I said I was going to pay attention to this." And by the time I remembered, I was in a full-blown rage.

I remember the first few times I did this. It was like, "Oh yeah, I said I was going to pay attention to this. What am I supposed to do with this? Wow, this is really unpleasant. Yeah, I'm angry." I had no tools for paying attention to the body. I hadn't had any meditation instruction at all, but I knew I was angry. I could tell the unpleasantness of it. But beyond that, I didn't know what to do. "What does it even mean to be mindful of this?" I really was kind of clueless.

But simply that recognition—anger, I'm angry, this is anger—just that simple recognition actually ended up being extremely powerful. Because over the course of several months of continuing to resolve to wake up for this anger, I noticed an interesting pattern. I began to wake up a little bit earlier in the process.

I'm sure most of you are familiar with the escalating nature of anger—how it can kind of start and then, if we're caught in it or hooked in the story, it just gets stronger and stronger and builds. It's like the snowball effect of anger rolling. I began to notice that I was waking up a little earlier in the process, that I would remember I wanted to pay attention to this anger before I was in such a full-blown rage. I remembered when I was more at a normal state of anger. And I could at that point again recognize, "Okay, I'm angry." I also noticed it wasn't quite as unpleasant as the full-blown rage.

Just keeping that vow to come back, come back, I began breaking in earlier and earlier until it was more like just an irritation. Simply beginning to see how the mindfulness was giving me some space around this anger—it was huge. It was huge for me not to be in a rage when thoughts around this particular person I was angry with came up in my mind.

And then one day, a few months into my working with mindfulness in daily life, I was cutting an apple in my kitchen. I was fairly present. I think the techniques I had been using—noticing the switching between DOS and Windows, paying attention to the anger—had created a kind of base of general mindfulness. I was cutting the apple, and I noticed a thought appear in my mind. The thought was being with the person I was angry with at a fruit stand. I could see the connection between what I was doing, the cutting of the apple, and the memory.

And I could also see in that moment that I was not angry, that anger hadn't come up. But what I felt was this—it was like a freight train of wanting to jump on that thought and think more thoughts to become angry. I was kind of amazed. "Wow, the mind actually wants to be angry." But I also saw in that moment that I had a choice. I don't have to get on. I don't have to think those thoughts.

And I stood there waiting to get angry. Because I had never had this—in the last several months since I started this practice, I had not had this person arise in my mind and anger not arise. I thought there was no way to decouple them. I stood there waiting to get angry, and I didn't get angry.

I was so blown away by that moment. That moment is the one that really convinced me of the power of mindfulness. This is a path. This is a path that we can use to free ourselves. It was so clear to me in that moment—the freedom from suffering that was apparent.

This can happen in our daily lives. This kind of mindfulness can free us from patterns. We don't actually have to always be sitting on retreat for this kind of work to happen. It can happen in our daily lives.

I teach what I call a householder retreat, based on the model of the sandwich retreat taught at the Cambridge Insight Meditation Center. In this retreat, we meet Sunday and Saturday for a half day and a day long, then morning and evening every day during the week to support this practice of daily life mindfulness. I encourage people in this retreat to pick some projects to pay attention to. I definitely encourage them to pick something neutral that happens throughout the day, and some other kind of project—something that might be up for them, something they have some juice for, or just some other kinds of activities.

There are so many things we can bring into our practice. And it's helpful to make them practices, to pick things, to actually choose practices to do, as opposed to just saying, "Oh well, I'm going to be mindful." In losing the structure of retreat, it's helpful to create some kind of structure in our daily life practice. So choosing some projects.

There are so many different things you could use. I've used quite a few of them over the course of my practice. I'll mention a few. Noticing getting up from my desk at work, the act of standing. Waiting for three rings of the telephone before picking it up—this one is good. I got it from Thich Nhat Hanh, and it's good because when you actually pick up the phone, you're mindful and there for the person on the other end. It's a nice practice.

The whole process of going to the bathroom. You do that probably four or five times a day at least. Three or four minutes of paying attention to that whole process—from the getting up, the knowing, the awareness of needing to do that, to the whole process of walking into the restroom, doing everything, washing your hands, coming out. I did this at work for a while. I had noticed that when I went to the restroom, my mind was racing as fast as it had been before when I was doing my job. I realized that it wasn't particularly necessary. So I started doing this practice, and I began to see that when I connected with my experience, in that three or four minutes after I came back from the restroom, I felt like I'd had a little mini vacation. Three minutes. I didn't actually need to be thinking about my work in that time. It's a great thing, this mindfulness.

Chores are a really great place to bring mindfulness practice to. And again, it's really helpful to pick something, to choose it, to actually say, "Okay, for the next two weeks, this is going to be my daily life practice activity." Chores—chopping vegetables, making your bed, brushing your teeth—all of the things we do here in daily life that we've become familiar with bringing mindfulness to. It will dissipate as you leave the retreat. That's not anything you've done wrong; it's simply the way it is. But we can consciously choose to bring mindfulness to certain things. And with a resolve, with a determination, with patience, we can cultivate this mindfulness.

I found that the yogi jobs here on retreat were a great support for the transition to daily life practice. Whatever yogi job you've had here—chopping vegetables, cleaning the bathrooms, vacuuming, sweeping, whatever it is—when you go home, that might be one of the tasks you choose to have be one of your projects. I've learned so much about mindfulness in daily life through the yogi jobs, just ways to be present.

It doesn't have to be the kind of really detailed, precise mindfulness. Sayadaw U Tejaniya speaks about a fifty-fifty mindfulness: fifty percent of your attention on what you're doing and fifty percent of your attention on the awareness of what you're doing. It can be really light. Know what you're doing while you're doing it. It doesn't have to be broken down into the impermanence of every single movement. Just knowing you're pushing the vacuum cleaner while you're pushing it, and a sense of whether there's tension or ease.

I'd like to restate one of the pieces I said a little bit earlier. When you choose to do some of these practices, you're not going to remember right away. You're going to forget.

When you first remember that you've forgotten, that doesn't mean you've failed. That's the first moment of success. That's the first moment it begins. So just resolve again: "I'm going to do this. I'm going to keep trying."

For me, this practice of cultivating mindfulness through these projects has been very helpful. You can pick something for a couple of weeks or even a month and then move on to another thing. I find it helpful to keep refreshing or picking new projects because the old ones get a little stale. We kind of think we've figured it out and then it gets a little bit lost. So picking something new keeps things fresh, but I find that when I pick new projects, the old ones don't completely go away. If I picked going through doorways for one week and turning on light switches another week, when I'm turning on light switches, I'm also noticing the going through doors. It begins to thread this mindfulness throughout our day. This has been the foundation for me of just beginning to get mindfulness into daily life.

Another area I have worked with for practice in daily life has been around the paramis. We've mentioned these a couple of times. These are qualities of mind that we cultivate as we practice the path—the qualities that the Bodhisattva was said to have cultivated for many, many lifetimes before he became the Buddha. The stories of the Buddha cultivating these qualities are told in the Jataka tales, a few of which you heard last night. These qualities are cultivated as we practice, and they are also said to be necessary for awakening. They are also the qualities of the awakened heart: generosity, virtue, renunciation, wisdom, energy, patience, truthfulness, resolve, loving-kindness, and equanimity.

In Asia, these practices are considered to be the realm of daily life practice. So these are really good qualities to look at in our daily lives. There are several ways we can work with these qualities—kind of two basic approaches to working with any quality of mind. One way is to find ways to practice cultivating the quality of mind, the parami itself: the generosity, the virtue, the loving-kindness. Another way is to look at what's opposite to it—what gets in its way. Look at when we're not feeling kind, when we're feeling impatient. So we look at it from both sides.

One of the main ways I began working with these qualities was just to help myself remember to pay attention to them, to remember the qualities themselves and to highlight them in places where I might otherwise forget them. I took little pieces of paper and wrote the qualities, the paramis, on these pieces of paper and put them around my house in places where they might be helpful. Truthfulness went on the telephone. Generosity went on the door as I walked out, to remind myself to bring a generosity of heart to the people I met. Equanimity went on the computer. Patience went on the bathroom mirror because I noticed that impatience arose frequently when I was brushing my teeth. Little things just to help me remember the qualities in places where they would serve me.

With the paramis practice, I find creativity is really wonderful. For instance, loving-kindness has a very formal practice of cultivation with the phrases. We have been working with some of those practices—the loving-kindness practice, the mudita practice, the compassion practice, the equanimity practice. We can use these practices in our daily life, not simply on the meditation cushion but moving out into the world. At one point, I decided that I would use the Safeway as my metta monastery. Every time I walked into the Safeway, I would just start wishing loving-kindness to whoever I saw. There's a lot of suffering in the grocery store. It felt like a really good thing to do, to bring that quality into the grocery store. So we can be playful and creative with these paramis.

Come up with your own practices.

Generosity. My teacher Gil Fronsdal likes to suggest putting a twenty dollar bill in your pocket with the intention of giving it away, and watching what happens around that exploration. See where there's resistance, what the judgments are that come up around it. When you finally choose to give it away, what is that inspiration? What is the motivation?

So creativity—we can get really playful with coming up with ways to cultivate these qualities. And then again, sticking to them for a little while. When I practiced the Safeway meditation, I think I probably did that for a couple of months, just using that practice.

One of my favorite practices that brought both mindfulness and loving kindness into my day regularly is taking a walk. I take a walk most days when I'm at home in California. I've not been able to do that here so much—the weather is not quite so friendly as it is in California. On this walk, I would tend to take it at about the same time of day, and I saw the same people. I would try to be generally mindful on my walk, but I really wanted to be present when I passed somebody. So that was my practice: to be present and to connect with whoever I met.

Sometimes the person clearly didn't want to say hello or look me in the eye or anything. I certainly didn't want to push it or make them uncomfortable. So in those moments, I would just do metta for the person. But over the course of the weeks and the months, as I took the same walk and began seeing the same people, they began to get familiar with me and I began to get familiar with them. We began exchanging a smile and a hello. Just practicing with that connection, that kind of kindness, openness, the metta quality of simply connecting with somebody—I began to experience a lot of happiness in that connection.

It was quite astounding, actually. I remember this one older man who had to shuffle along, kind of unsteady on his feet, and he had the most beautiful smile when I met him. Just radiant when he smiled. As I did this practice, when I would see him, I would begin to feel happy just in anticipation of his smile. And then I began to check into how long does the happiness last? Not trying to hold on to it, but just curious. I noticed that it lasted like thirty or forty seconds after seeing him—this great upwelling of joy and appreciation and happiness and connection. Thirty seconds for a smile. It was such a joy to bring that into my day.

Observing the opposite quality of mind is also very interesting in terms of looking at these paramis. For a time, I noticed, as I was paying attention to these paramis, that patience was one I did not seem to have very much of. So I started looking at impatience—just noticing it, noticing when it came up, noticing what it felt like when it happened.

I began to see there were kind of two flavors of impatience. There was the impatience to get over something unpleasant, and the impatience of wanting to have something pleasant that I was expecting or anticipating. There was an impatience around brushing my teeth, a sense of, "I've got better things to do than to brush my teeth." It was everywhere, actually. When I began looking at it, I began to see how pervasive it was throughout my day, coming up over and over again. It could be just little tiny things, but this movement of impatience.

And one day, about two months into this practice of looking at the impatience, I was walking down the street and I felt this surge of impatience come up about—I don't know what at the moment—but just the surge of impatience. And the very next moment or thought was, "I've been looking at this impatience for two months. When is it going to go away?" Oh, there it is again. More impatience.

I just had to laugh. It's like, oh well, this is just the mind. So looking at all of these things from both sides—very helpful in our daily life.

Another practice I'll describe now involves working with the paramis, but it's more generally applicable, actually.

It's a reflective practice. We can use it to reflect on our relationship to these qualities, our relationship to these parami qualities. But it can also be used to reflect on pretty much anything in our daily lives in a meditative way. So it's an actual reflective practice, but it uses a meditative stillness to hold the practice. This practice was taught to me by Ajahn Amaro.

The practice is to basically settle and still the mind for five minutes or so. Quiet the mind. Pay attention to the body, the breathing. And have a topic before you move in, before you sit down. Pick a topic that you want to reflect on. Have a phrase in your mind, a word that you want to use as the seed for that reflection.

So if you want to reflect on these qualities of the paramis, at one point I did this with the quality of virtue, of sila. I wanted to understand or to reflect on what the benefits of sila were. So that was the phrase I chose, the question I chose in my mind: What are the benefits of sila?

Settle your mind for about five minutes and then drop the question into the meditation. Simply ask the question in words in your mind. And then the practice is to not think about the answer, but to simply see what bubbles up. It's kind of like dropping a stone into a clear, settled pool and watching the ripples. Drop the question into your meditation and see what happens. What does the body do? Do thoughts appear? Just notice what happens. And then let go of that. Don't chain off of that. Don't think about that in the moment. Just come back to the silence. Come back to the breath. Come back to the body. Drop the question in again. See what happens.

When I did this with sila, I chose to do this for about ten minutes a day, asking this question about what the benefits of sila are. After that ten minutes, I had a pad of paper next to me, and I wrote down what I had experienced. No thinking about it particularly, just noticing, writing down what I had noticed. I noticed loneliness. I noticed contraction. I noticed an opening. I noticed a feeling of flow. Whatever it was, I just wrote down what I had experienced. Then after a couple of weeks of that, I reviewed my notes and began actually thinking about what I had seen, bringing the thinking process in.

This kind of practice can be used to explore our relationship to the paramis, or it can actually be used to explore our relationship to anything that we want to bring a meditative, reflective quality to—a choice that we have to make. This kind of practice can be very supportive for that.

So, cultivating mindfulness in our day, bringing awareness of the paramis. The third piece I'd like to talk about is intention. We've talked about intention here quite a bit. It's that subtle movement or energetic impulse that precedes any act of body, speech, or mind. We can know we're going to move before we move. We can know we're going to speak before we speak. We can know we're going to think before we think, or know that we're inclining to an emotion before the emotion appears—as I described in that example of the anger, the apple, seeing the memory, seeing the inclination towards the anger, and seeing the choice.

We can see this in our daily lives as well as on retreat. It's more difficult, I grant you. It's quite a bit more difficult, but it is possible. So it's a really good place to explore.

Now the intention itself, as we've mentioned, is neutral. It's a neutral event. But accompanying it are the factors of mind that give it its direction and its momentum.

Whether wholesome or unwholesome, these accompanying factors give the intention its direction. The karmic results of intention are determined by whether there are wholesome or unwholesome factors in the mind accompanying that intention, and whether we act upon it.

As we get in touch with intention, as we develop the capacity to know what's going to happen before it happens, we can see motivation as well. In that moment of knowing "I'm going to get up to get a glass of water," I can know the motivation. It might be many things—it might simply be because thirst has arisen, or it might be because I'm really frustrated with what I'm doing and just want to get away from my computer. So in that moment of seeing "I'm about to get up," we can see the motivation. This is very, very helpful information.

One excellent place to practice with this is in the area of speech. I imagine everyone in this room has had the experience of wishing they could take something back that they had said—of realizing just after something came out of their mouth, "Oh, I shouldn't have said that."

Paying attention to speech is a vast area we can work with in daily life, and it has come up in questions several times—bringing awareness to our speech. It's extremely challenging. At least for me, this has been one of the most challenging places to bring mindfulness. Much of the time, we speak almost automatically, without even knowing what we're going to say, much less having any sense of how it will impact the person we're speaking to or understanding the motivation behind our words.

One of the most powerful ways to break into this pattern is to pause before you speak. That in itself is challenging—simply remembering to pause. If you can remember to pause before you speak, you have caught the intention to speak. You know you're going to speak before you speak. In that pause, you will probably know what you're going to say before you say it. And you will also probably have a sense of why you're going to speak. This simple practice of pausing can reveal many things about our speech.

Getting in touch with our motivations for speech can be quite humbling. We really begin to see how often we speak out of wanting to make ourselves look good, or wanting to subtly put somebody else down, or even outright hurt someone. Most of the time, though, at least in my experience, it seems to be this little bit of me, me, me, me—this motivation to present myself, to make myself seen.

Beginning to see this through the pause, just noticing this pause—when you break silence tomorrow, I highly recommend this practice. You have enough mindfulness to do this. I highly recommend it. You can even remind each other about this when you start talking. "Let's try this. Let's try doing this pause."

As I mentioned, it can be humbling. The first time I tried this with a friend, we sat down for a meal together and decided we were going to work this way with each other in our speech. I saw a thought, saw I was going to say something, and saw the motivation. I thought, "No, I'm not going to say that. Unwholesome motivation." The next thing arose—nope, not going to say that. The next thing—nope, not going to say that. At some point I had to tell him, "I'm sitting here ruling out things to say because of unwholesome motivation."

It can be quite interesting. It's helpful to do this with another practitioner when you try it, because it can put some gaps in the conversation.

Speech is one powerful place to examine intention. But if you're doing some of the other practices I've recommended—like picking something you do regularly throughout the day, clicking send for an email, opening doors, extending and bending your arm—if it's some kind of action that you perform regularly, you can begin to see the intention associated with that action.

When I was playing with standing up at my desk at work, I reached the point where I knew I was going to stand. I could see that I was going to stand before the standing happened. I could see the intention to stand. I could see why I was going to stand.

Most of the time it had to do with just something around work—I need to go get a copy from the printout. But we can begin to connect with this intention on a regular basis and connect with observing the motivation that goes with it. So this is not simply a practice that is accessible to us on retreat. It is possible to experience and see these things in our daily lives.

Another large area of practice in our daily lives is around sīla, around ethics. And this is one way to work with motivation, to work with seeing our intention. The way I like to work with the five lay precepts in my daily life is to use them as mindfulness bells, kind of as I was describing these other activities. If I'm making a movement towards wrong speech, if I'm making a movement towards killing an ant, looking at what's going on—it's kind of like a wake-up bell. What's happening? So looking at the motivation if there's a movement to break one of these precepts.

Working with these precepts, I'm sure you've all noticed that they're stated in the negative—actions to avoid. Refrain from killing, refrain from stealing, refrain from sexual misconduct, refrain from lying, refrain from intoxication. But they're also paired, I think Guy mentioned this, they're also paired with a positive quality, a wholesome quality that is cultivated as we refrain from the action.

So refraining from killing is paired with compassion. Refraining from stealing with honesty and contentment. Refraining from sexual misconduct is said to be related to fidelity. Refraining from lying to truthfulness. Refraining from intoxication is cultivating clarity of mind or heedfulness.

There's a mutual connection between our mind and our body. The act of abstaining from certain actions through the precepts has like a rebound effect on our mind. And the point of interconnection between the mind and the body is this intention and the qualities of motivation that go with it. So in the intention to refrain from killing, there can come along this intention towards compassion.

And I saw this myself, actually. At one point, I was really working with the ants in my kitchen and not wanting to kill them, and so I had this elaborate way of working with the ants when they came in. I would corral them with soap so they wouldn't go outside the line, and I'd slowly work them back to the hole that they were coming from. After a while, I noticed I got a little impatient, and I'd start scooping the ants up and putting them by their hole so that I could move them along a little more quickly.

I began observing the ants pretty carefully as I was doing this. And I saw at one point near the hole where they were coming in, one of the ants on its back legs, with its front legs up in the air, doing the scanning of the environment like this. I could just see the panic. Maybe this is anthropomorphizing, I don't know, but it seemed like there was this kind of alarm going on in the ant population around this event. And I just felt so much compassion. It was quite startling to see that. Just this act of wishing to not kill them brought a connection between me and these beings.

Sometimes people question, particularly in California where I live, why are these precepts stated in the negative? Why can't they be stated positively? California is a really happy place. We talk about vowing to cultivate love and generosity. So sometimes there's that question about why they are stated in the negative.

I read a wonderful response to this question that I'd like to share with you to close this evening. It's written by Bhikkhu Bodhi, who is one of the main translators of the suttas. He is just a wonderful, thoughtful being.

"One reason why the precepts are worded in terms of abstinence is that the development of positive virtues cannot be prescribed by rules. Rules of training can govern what we have to avoid and perform in our outer actions, but only ideals of aspiration, not rules, can govern what we develop in ourselves. Thus we cannot take up a training rule to always be loving towards others. To impose such a rule is to place ourselves in a double bind, since inner attitudes are just simply not so docile that they can be determined by command. Love and compassion are the fruits of work we do on ourselves inwardly, not of assenting to a precept. What we can do is to undertake a precept to abstain from destroying life and from injuring other beings. Then we can make a resolution, preferably without much fanfare, to develop loving kindness and apply ourselves to the mental training designed to nourish its growth."

Wise and Balanced Effort

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this comprehensive talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the Buddha's teaching on wise effort as essential support for the practice of letting go. She begins by acknowledging that while letting go may sound simple, our deeply ingrained habits of clinging require substantial effort to unlearn. Drawing on the Pāli term vīriya (energy/courage), she defines it as "the inner strength of heart to venture, persevere, and withstand difficulty."
> Fella systematically explores the four aspects of sammā vāyāma (right effort): avoiding unwholesome states before they arise through mindful sense restraint, abandoning unwholesome states that have arisen through mindfulness and skillful techniques, cultivating wholesome states through practices like mettā and ethical conduct, and maintaining wholesome states by appreciating and resting with them. She emphasizes how mindfulness itself encompasses all four efforts simultaneously—when we mindfully attend to anger, for example, we prevent further reactivity while cultivating concentration and equanimity.
> The talk offers practical guidance on balancing energy, using the Buddha's analogy of tuning a stringed instrument—neither too tight nor too loose. Fella shares the Buddha's teaching from the Ogha-taraṇa Sutta: "Without tarrying and without hurrying did I cross the flood." She encourages practitioners to focus on just this moment rather than overwhelming themselves with thoughts of sustained effort, comparing practice to lifting progressively heavier weights. The teaching concludes with the liberating reminder that we cultivate conditions for awakening but cannot force results—when the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree.

The other night, Annie talked about letting go as being the whole of the path. And the Buddha, in fact, said all phenomena are unworthy of attachment. Or another translation: nothing is worth clinging to.

Why is that? Why is nothing worth clinging to?

Well, with clinging, when we cling to something, we are essentially trying to hold it in place, trying to stem the tide of ever-changing experience, ever-changing phenomenon. Even if for just a moment, we're trying to hold something into place, and things change. So when we cling, we suffer.

But it's not so easy to simply let go. Letting go sounds like such a lovely thing. Oh, yes, just let go. But how easy is that to do?

Our strong habits and patterns of holding onto things, trying to manipulate, to change, to fix, to control the world—these patterns have from time to time given us a sense of control, given us a sense of security, and have given us a sense of what feels like some kind of satisfaction. And so they're very deeply ingrained patterns, these patterns of holding on, the ways that we try to find happiness. We are fighting against, in a way, or struggling against very strong ingrained tendencies—maybe not ingrained but practiced, very practiced tendencies to hold on.

So it takes quite a bit of effort to learn to let go. Letting go sounds like something that should be easy, but no. We need to train our minds so that we can let go of clinging. A key aspect of this training is wise and balanced effort. We need effort, courage, energy to walk this path of letting go.

This is what I'd like to talk about this evening: effort and energy. These are two very closely related qualities of our practice. I'd like to start by talking about energy.

The Pali term for energy is virya, usually translated as energy. This energy itself is a neutral quality of mind; it takes on the flavor of however we are directing that energy. So this energy can be directed towards unwholesome states of mind, such as resentment, anger, frustration, pride, desire for power or money. Or it can be directed towards wholesome states such as generosity, kindness, happiness, and concentration. The flavor of the energy comes with how we are using that energy. So it's really important in our practice to understand and know how to direct that energy.

The quality of energy appears in quite a number of the Buddha's teachings. I'm sure that many of you are aware that the Buddha was a great list maker. The quality of energy is actually in more lists than, I think, any other quality of mind. It may be equal to the number of lists that mindfulness is in, but I actually think that energy is in more lists than mindfulness. So it's a really important quality to cultivate, to understand.

In one of those lists, the list of wholesome qualities to cultivate on the path to awakening called the paramis or the ten perfections, the quality of energy follows the quality of wisdom. In one way of understanding that list, it is a kind of sequential progression, where each one supports the cultivation of the next and helps perfect the next quality. And so it's a really interesting teaching, I think, that energy follows wisdom in that list.

So what is wisdom? There are actually several definitions of wisdom in the Buddha's teachings. I'm going to offer a couple as a frame for how I'm going to talk about energy and effort in this talk.

One of the definitions of wisdom is a very simple understanding of what qualities of mind support our movement away from suffering and towards freedom—a simple understanding of what is skillful with respect to moving away from suffering, and understanding also what is unskillful, what qualities move us towards suffering. Essentially, we want to cultivate those qualities that move us away from suffering. So it's important to understand that energy as a quality, as a spiritual faculty on the path, is energy directed towards cultivating wholesome qualities, energy directed towards letting go of unwholesome qualities.

Another definition of wisdom is the understanding of the Four Noble Truths. And this is very similar in a way to the definition around understanding what's wholesome and unwholesome, what's skillful and unskillful. The Four Noble Truths: understand suffering; let go of the cause of suffering; realize the release from suffering; and cultivate those qualities of heart and mind that lead to the ending of suffering. So the definition of wisdom is very connected with understanding what leads us away from suffering.

This was the problem the Buddha was trying to solve. How can we be free from this dukkha, this suffering, this dissatisfaction, this endless sense of wanting things to be other than they are, wanting to hold onto things, wanting to fix, to change, to manipulate?

So the energy of our practice, the spiritual faculty of energy, is energy directed towards the purpose of awakening. It's the fuel of our practice. There's one text, I believe it's the Treatise on the Paramis, in which the author says that it is entirely through the spiritual faculty of energy that all the requisites for enlightenment succeed. So we need energy. We need this skillful energy that is imbued with wisdom to lead us away from suffering, away from this dukkha, this dissatisfaction with our experience, our lives.

This understanding of the spiritual faculty of energy being directed towards freedom from suffering brings me to another translation for this term virya, which is courage. Tonight as I was preparing this talk, I looked up the English definition of courage. I typically think of it in terms of bravery, but I came up with two aspects from two different dictionaries and put them together into one definition that I feel truly captures the sense of this quality of virya. And that is: courage, the inner strength of heart to venture, persevere, and withstand danger, fear, or difficulty. The inner strength of heart to persevere in the face of difficulty.

That's what we do here. A lot of the time, that's what we're doing—meeting our suffering, not running from it, not turning away, not rejecting it, but meeting it with that inner strength of heart.

Energy and effort are very closely connected. Effort might be thought of as the application of energy. One way in which energy is described is as the factor behind right effort—this energy directed towards moving away from suffering, towards cultivating the wholesome, letting go of the unwholesome. That energy is the factor behind effort, and so we use energy to make effort.

There's an interesting two-way link between these two, because not only do we use energy to make effort, but making effort creates energy. In fact, the suttas describe this. The Buddha says, "What is the faculty of energy? The energy that one obtains on the basis of the four right efforts. This is called the faculty of energy."

This can be a little counterintuitive. We usually understand the notion of using energy to make effort, and we think about energy getting used up as we make effort. Sometimes that's the way it feels. There's precedent for that in terms of our physical energy. We use energy to make effort to go for a run, for instance, and we can only go for so long. Then that energy runs out and we need to stop and rest. We carry that model into our practice and think we need to accumulate some energy, then we use that energy up, and then we have to rest and stop practicing for a while because we're too tired to practice.

This teaching turns that on its head. It says actually, if you make effort, if you make wise effort, it creates energy. Part of the way I understand this is that there's an awful lot of energy bound up in clinging. When we direct our energy towards the letting go of that clinging, it frees up a whole lot of energy. So there's this connection between energy and effort: making effort cultivates energy.

I'd like to talk about the Buddha's teaching on wise effort. Many of you are probably familiar with this teaching. The teaching on wise effort also takes as its foundation this aspect of wisdom—the understanding of what is skillful and unskillful with respect to suffering. The simplest definition I know of skillful or wholesome qualities of mind are those qualities that are based in non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion. Those qualities of mind that are not based in greed, aversion, and delusion are wholesome qualities of mind. These are states like compassion, kindness, joy, tranquility, peace.

Unwholesome qualities of mind are those states that are based in greed, aversion, and delusion—states like anger, frustration, pride, boredom, restlessness, desire, despair. These are the states of mind that lead us into dukkha, into suffering.

The teaching on right effort uses this understanding as a foundation. The Buddha talks about four kinds of right effort: the effort to avoid unwholesome states that have not yet arisen, the effort to abandon unwholesome states that have arisen, the effort to arouse or cultivate wholesome states that have not yet arisen, and the effort to maintain wholesome states that have arisen.

Now, if some of you are unfamiliar with this teaching, this probably sounds a little confusing or complicated. So I'm going to go through each one of these and talk at some length about each.

The first is the effort to avoid unwholesome states that have not arisen. This is basically about understanding, learning through the process of observing our experience with mindfulness. We cannot look at this quality of wise effort without also including mindfulness.

Understanding and looking at our experience with mindfulness, we start to see that certain causes and conditions lead us into suffering, into distress. As we begin to understand that certain causes and conditions lead us to distress, we can learn to avoid the suffering by avoiding the causes.

This is an interesting teaching, and we have to be really careful in applying it. Because at first glance, it might sound like a kind of aversion—avoiding things that will lead us to suffering as a kind of aversion. So we need to be really careful that this avoidance isn't coming out of aversion, isn't coming out of the desire to get rid of something or out of a fear of that suffering. This definition of avoiding can have some subtle meanings.

For example, if you notice that you find yourself judging and comparing when you're standing in line for the meal—which I think happens quite a lot—looking at how much other people might be taking, what they're taking, all of the judgments that arise in proximity with other people. You notice that this judging mind comes up while you're standing in line in the dining hall.

At first glance, you might think that this teaching would mean something like: well, if it's standing in line that's causing the judging, maybe I should wait until everybody else has gone through so I don't have to stand there and watch what other people are doing. That is one way to avoid that kind of judgment. But that might be motivated out of aversion to the judging mind.

Another way to engage with this would be to get interested in understanding not just the simple causes and conditions of that judgment arising—the fact of standing in line—but with a little more depth, understanding how it comes to be in your own mind.

Perhaps you see somebody taking a very large serving of something and have a moment of fear: there's not going to be enough for me. And then the judgment follows: they're taking too much food. Noticing that fear, noticing the underlying causes, observing very carefully what the causes are so that we can begin to understand them. As we begin to understand the causes, the meaning of avoiding changes for us.

Perhaps the meaning of avoiding, while standing in that line, is rather than just reacting to what happens to us, we start to notice: we see somebody taking some food, and then we notice that we start thinking about it. The initial seeing of somebody taking the food isn't where the judging comes from. The judging is coming out of the thinking. It's coming out of the belief that there might not be enough food. It's coming out of the proliferation of thoughts. And so if you can be mindful of the seeing and just know that you're seeing, that proliferation of thoughts might not arise—which would avoid the arising of the judgment.

This is a teaching on sense restraint. Often we think of sense restraint as just blocking our senses off—not looking, not hearing, putting earplugs in, or looking down at the ground two feet in front of us to avoid seeing people. Another way to engage with sense restraint is to restrain the senses through mindfulness, through knowing: seeing, knowing hearing. It's restraint in that you know seeing is happening, and in that knowing there is less opportunity for the mind to, in its habitual way, leap out of that situation and start to think, start to proliferate, judge, become frustrated, angry, hopeless. So using mindfulness, we can avoid unwholesome states that have not arisen.

The second kind of right effort is the effort to abandon unwholesome states that have arisen. This means that we notice when we're caught up in some kind of difficult, unwholesome mind state, and we make the effort to let go of it.

This letting go can have a kind of active quality where you actively recognize: wow, this state of mind—this anger or despair or loneliness—isn't very helpful. Maybe I can let go of it. It can have an active quality in which we see the unskillfulness of that state of mind and begin to let it go. Sometimes even just through simple recognition: Oh, this is happening again. I don't need to do this. Sometimes it can go away.

Often it's not quite that simple. There are some techniques we can use to support a kind of active letting go of difficult states of mind. One technique the Buddha taught is replacing the thoughts that surround a difficult state of mind with more wholesome thoughts. If you're angry at someone, for example, or finding a lot of judgment arising, there are thoughts that go along with that state of mind: they shouldn't be doing that. If you can recognize those thoughts and replace them with thoughts of mettā—may you be happy, may you be at ease—actively replacing thoughts is a way of abandoning, of letting go of that anger. It can lead us out of the anger. Again, this can't be done out of aversion to the anger.

Another way to let go is to redirect our attention. Sometimes when there's a difficult state happening like loneliness, if it's a strong state and you find it difficult to be mindful of it, if it feels overwhelming, sometimes it can be helpful to set it aside. Not with aversion, not with the sense of "this is unacceptable," but with a sense of compassion.

I see that this difficult state of mind is overwhelming my mindfulness. So I'm going to turn my attention to something else right now and let that be in the background. This is a way that supports our letting go of difficult states that are sometimes overwhelming for us. This is what I call the "not now" mode of ignoring our experiences.

I had a time in my practice where I found that anger was particularly overwhelming for me—an anger at a particular person. And when I tried to bring mindfulness to that anger, I found myself just spiraling down into the pattern of anger over and over again. I began to realize it wasn't the time to try to be mindful of it, that my mindfulness wasn't strong enough to meet that anger. So I began to recognize this, and not out of aversion but really out of compassion for myself. I began to acknowledge: there's the anger. I see you. This is not the time. Not now. I actually made a kind of bargain with it. I said, I'll pay attention to you when my mindfulness gets stronger. Meeting it and saying, I see you. I see you're asking for attention, but this is not the time. Not now.

That's a way of letting go. It's a letting be, but not a letting be with the experience right in the field of our attention. It's a letting be in the background, just letting it be.

This letting go of the second kind of right effort can also be this turning our attention to experience with mindfulness. Mindfulness itself helps to disengage us from the way we're stuck to these difficulties. I think of it this way: when we're engaged in spinning in some kind of difficult state, it's like the gears are engaged, and they just keep each other going, fueling the cycle. When we bring mindfulness into the picture, if we can be mindful of the difficult states, it's like disengaging the gears. It doesn't stop the gear from spinning, but it's no longer adding to that momentum. What mindfulness does is allow that state to wind down on its own in a very natural way through simply meeting it with this nonjudgmental, nonreactive mindfulness that Rebecca talked about so beautifully last night.

Meeting these difficult states with mindfulness, using this energy, this courage, the inner strength of heart to meet difficulty—this is actually a movement towards the abandoning of that unwholesome state of mind. Because we're no longer fueling it, we're no longer encouraging it, and it will settle out in time. This is a true letting be of the experience.

This is much of our practice. This aspect of wise effort is a lot of where our practice lies. We see difficulty come up. I remember sitting in this very hall suffering with so much pain and distress and seeing that the mind was doing it, that it was clinging in the mind. And I remember saying to myself, I'd let go if I knew how to. Sometimes we don't know how to let go. But we can be mindful of that experience and it will let go. This is much of where we practice.

So fortunately in his teaching on wise effort, the Buddha didn't just say it's all about looking at suffering, abandoning suffering, avoiding suffering. He also talked about the beautiful states of mind, as equal partners to this practice. The third kind of right effort is the effort to arouse wholesome states that have not arisen. This is a practice of cultivating those states that we know are skillful with respect to leading us away from suffering—cultivating states of kindness, of compassion, of patience, of concentration.

To cultivate wholesome mind states that are not present, we need to first of all—and I think this is why the Buddha puts the first two right efforts first—abstain from those states that oppose those wholesome states. If we're trying to cultivate kindness, we need to abstain from anger and hostility. And we need to learn how to put ourselves in situations that will cultivate the conditions for that state, cultivate those qualities of mind.

Abstaining from situations, abstaining from qualities of mind that oppose wholesome states of mind—the precepts, the ethical component of our practice, is a big part of this. If we think about the precepts as just being about avoiding—avoiding killing, avoiding stealing, avoiding lying—it can give us some sense of joy to be engaged in that way, knowing that we're not harming. And each of those precepts also supports the cultivation of a wholesome state of mind. Refraining from killing cultivates compassion. So we can recognize and appreciate the precepts from that perspective as well.

Refraining from lying cultivates honesty and truthfulness. Refraining from stealing cultivates contentment. So when we engage with these practices of avoiding and abstaining from unwholesome states, we can also recognize that they're supporting the growth of these beautiful states of mind. Recognizing that helps to nurture those qualities. It's like planting seeds—to recognize, yes, this is cultivating compassion. It's kind of like planting a seed of compassion.

We can also cultivate these wholesome qualities through active practices. The practice of metta is one of these—the practice of loving-kindness. We actively direct our attention towards cultivating thoughts of goodwill. This is an aspect of right effort: cultivating wholesome states that have not yet arisen.

We also cultivate mindfulness. My Burmese teacher Sayadaw U Pandita has said that mindfulness is the most wholesome mind state. And so the act of bringing mindfulness to our experience is cultivating mindfulness. As Rebecca said last night, each moment of mindfulness cultivates future moments of mindfulness. By being mindful now, you are creating the conditions for mindfulness to arise in the future where it may not have come up if you had not been mindful. So this is also a big part of our practice of right effort—cultivating mindfulness, cultivating the wholesome quality of concentration.

The fourth kind of right effort is the effort to sustain wholesome states that have arisen. When I first heard this teaching, I thought, why would you need a teaching about that? Wouldn't this be natural? Why would you have to try to sustain wholesome states that have arisen? Well, when I started looking at my mind, I realized that I actually did have to work at this.

I found myself sitting at one point in my first three-month retreat, finally getting to a place of calm. The mind was settled, it was quiet, and the first thing I did with that was like, "Oh, calm—that's nice. This is a perfect time to pay attention to that pain in my back." So rather than resting with the calm, I agitated the mind by trying to use it to do something. I began to understand that it does take some inclination and effort toward sustaining wholesome states that have arisen.

Another time I found myself feeling joy arising, and it was getting very strong. There was a sense of it being almost overwhelming—like, whoa, I can't handle this. And there was a kind of movement to try to push it down. This is the opposite of cultivating that wholesome quality of joy. Fortunately, a little bit of wisdom passed through my mind, and it said, "Don't worry, it'll pass." With that the mind let go and the joy got really intense. But then it crested and moved into a place of just peaceful happiness.

Allowing these wholesome states, being mindful of them, is actually one of the most powerful ways to cultivate them. Mindfulness is an interesting quality. It has the power, when we pay attention to unwholesome states, to make them less likely to occur in the future. And when we pay attention to wholesome states, it makes them more likely to occur in the future. It's as if the unwholesome states shrink in the brightness and clarity of the light of mindfulness, while the wholesome states bask in its warmth and light. Mindfulness is a very powerful tool in this practice of right effort.

So be mindful. Appreciate these wholesome states when they have arisen. That actually supports maintaining them, supports their cultivation. It's also really helpful to recognize the beautiful qualities of mind that come from the practice. Sometimes as we are practicing, we're in the midst of attending to some experience—a pain in the knee, or a feeling of loneliness or frustration. And we're not really recognizing that along with that attentiveness of mindfulness is coming perhaps some confidence that we can engage, some concentration through the ability to sustain attention, some cultivating of interest in exploring our experience. All of these are wholesome, beautiful qualities of mind that almost come along for the ride as we pay attention to our experience. Recognize these beautiful qualities. It will support their cultivation.

So we can look at right effort in another way. We've talked about four different aspects, but they can actually also be seen as four sides of a single process in our minds.

So for example, if you are cultivating mindfulness with the object of your attention being anger, you're paying attention to anger with mindfulness. This supports the letting go of that unskillful quality of anger—that letting be the second kind of right effort. It helps prevent the arising of further reactivity to that anger. If you're mindful of the anger, it's helping to keep it from spiraling out of control. This is avoiding unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. It is also cultivating and supporting the mindfulness, the concentration, the equanimity. Many beautiful qualities are both cultivated and maintained as we bring mindfulness to this practice. So being mindful encompasses all four right efforts in the very act of mindfulness.

The other aspect of the Buddha's teaching on effort is that it needs to be balanced. Energy and effort both need to be balanced. When there's too much energy in the system, there tends to be restlessness. When there's too little, there tends to be dullness, sleepiness. So we need to monitor our energy, know when we have too much energy, when we have too little energy, and find ways to balance that energy. This energy will change from day to day, even from hour to hour or minute to minute. So it's a continual kind of tracking in a way. It doesn't have to be an intense kind of project, but we need to have a sense of where our energy level is.

In one teaching, the Buddha compared the quality of energy needed for practice to the tuning of a musical instrument. If you're tuning a stringed instrument and the strings are tightened too tight, they'll break, they'll snap, and won't be able to make music. If you're tuning that instrument and the strings are too loose, there won't be enough tension in the string for it to make a beautiful sound. In a similar way, our energy needs to be neither too tight nor too loose.

Another teaching along this way that I love—one that for me has been a beautiful metaphor and an inspiring thought to help me when I'm either pushing too hard or falling behind—is this: Somebody asked the Buddha, "How did you cross the flood?" The flood being the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion, the flood of suffering. And the Buddha responded, "Without tarrying, friend, and without hurrying, did I cross the flood." The person responded, "But how did you, without tarrying, without hurrying, cross the flood?" The Buddha said, "When I tarried, I sank. When I hurried, I was swept away. And so without tarrying, without hurrying, I crossed the flood."

To me, this is a great metaphor for just meeting this moment. So often we are tumbling ahead, trying to be mindful of future moments before they've come. That's hurrying, pushing too hard. Or we're sleepy, we're dull, we're not connecting. That's when we sink. I had this image almost of just walking on water. And without tarrying, without hurrying, just at the right pace—just this step, just this step—that is the pace that allows for that balance of energy.

So one way to balance the energy is through balancing our effort, because of that connection between effort and energy. Effort makes energy. So a balanced effort supports a balanced energy. This is really what you might call the art of meditation: learning how to navigate moment by moment, to meet each moment, to just meet each moment, to not push too hard into it and to not disconnect from it, but just to meet it.

In a moment, it's not too hard to be mindful right now. Can you feel the sensations of your buttocks on the cushion or chair or bench? Can you feel the sensations of your hands? Can you feel your lips touching? How hard is that to do as I mention each thing? Usually it's not too hard. It's not very hard to be mindful for a moment. What's difficult is to sustain it over time. That's where we lose that balance of effort. We push, trying to gather up moments and be mindful of multiple moments at a time. At least that's the way I see my mind working.

I'm going to be mindful of this whole sitting. But it doesn't work that way. You can only be mindful of a split second. That's it. That's all the effort that needs to be made—enough effort to be mindful of this moment, and then do it again. And again. And again. Over and over.

That "over and over" part seems overwhelming if we think about it. But if we just do it, it's not overwhelming. It's just this moment. It's just meeting this moment. And it's not very hard to meet this moment. So it's best not to think about trying to sustain effort and sustain mindfulness over a long period of time.

Another of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, talks about the practice of mindfulness. He compares it to lifting weights. We start with light weights, the ones we can handle. If we start by trying to pick up fifty or a hundred pound weights, we're not going to be able to do it very easily, and we'll strain ourselves. We start with one pound weights—that's not so hard. Do one pound weights for a while, then we can pick up two pound weights, then five pound weights. With mindfulness and effort, we start by just being mindful for a moment. Mindful for half a breath, and then another half a breath, and then another half a breath. Just enough energy to make it through half a breath. How hard is that? And then do it again. And then do it again.

This is really a powerful way to practice—letting go of the idea of the future and just meeting now. That's all there is anyway, is now. The future is an idea in our minds. So just meeting this moment.

We can do this in walking practice as well. I've found sometimes when my mind is very scattered during walking practice, if I pick a spot—say two steps out on the ground—and say, "Okay, that little spot, that grain, that place in the wood, maybe I can be mindful to that place." I'd take those two steps, and I could be mindful for two steps. And then I'd pick another spot and do it again. It kind of felt like pulling myself along, just gently pulling myself along. The mind could stay for a very short time. If I tried to force my mind to be present for an entire length of the path, I would invariably lose it. But if I just tried to be present for a step and then again, that helped with the continuity of mindfulness.

With this kind of practice, we need to learn how to monitor ourselves and learn just how frequently we need to make that reminder. Essentially what I'm talking about here is reminding yourself: pay attention, just be aware. Can I be mindful for a moment, and another moment, and another moment? At some point, mindfulness begins to gain momentum. And if you're continuing to remind yourself at that point, it's going to get in the way.

There's an analogy I like to use about this momentum that builds. It's like riding a scooter—those scooters that kids ride on. You start on the scooter and you have to tap your foot on the ground frequently in order to get that momentum going. But after tapping for a while, you can ride for quite a ways. You don't have to tap so frequently. Less effort is needed to move because the momentum has built up. And as you're riding that scooter, you begin to get a sense of when it's wobbling, when you need to tap again. It's like that with our mindfulness practice. As the momentum builds, you begin to get a sense of how frequently you need to remind yourself, how frequently you need to engage with that efforting.

Sometimes as mindfulness begins to gain momentum—and my own pattern is a habit of strong effort, of over-efforting—I began to ask myself: how little energy, how little effort do I need to make to be present right now? This was a great counter to that over-striving pattern. The counter to the opposite tendency, to the tendency to just lay back in laxness, is reminding yourself: can I be mindful for this next breath? Mindful again. So, how little effort do I need in order to be mindful in this moment? Backing off, backing off. At some point the mind will wander.

Then you know you need to bring the effort back in.

Another aspect of this balanced effort that has been very helpful for me in my own practice is to remember that there are times of the day when the energy seems to get lower. We all go through cycles of energy. Practice isn't so much about trying to push when that low energy is there, but rather making the best effort that you can given the available energy. It may not feel like the mind is very clear. It may feel like the mind wanders a lot. But you're making the best effort that you can—just keeping trying to be present, just reminding yourself to be aware, reminding yourself to be mindful as best you can given the circumstances.

As the energy levels naturally shift and change, if you have been making that effort, the practice will naturally come together again. If you let go of trying to make effort in those places where there's low energy, you'll have to work harder as the energy cycles through the day. So just make the best effort that you can given the circumstances. No need to berate yourself for not having a strong level of energy all the time. None of us do. We all go through these cycles. So we need this patience.

A key piece around making effort is realizing that what we're doing is cultivating the conditions for freedom. We have to use the energy skillfully to cultivate the conditions for freedom. We cannot make freedom happen. We cannot make insight happen. We cannot make concentration happen. We can use the energy and the mindfulness to cultivate the conditions, and then let go. The results are out of your hands.

One way to look at this is through an analogy of ripening fruit. One teacher said that her teacher told her, "When the fruit is ripe, it will fall from the tree." We can create the conditions for supporting a tree's growth—giving it light, water, nourishment—but we cannot make that fruit ripen. That's a different process, a natural process of nature that has that fruit ripen. But we can support the conditions for that fruit to ripen.

And that's how our practice works. We make the effort to support the conditions towards cultivating the wholesome and letting go of the unwholesome. And then we let go. The results naturally occur in their own time.

I'll finish with a quote by Piyadasi Thera, a great Sri Lankan scholar monk and practitioner: "We must, by our own resolute efforts, rise up and make our way to the portals of liberty. And it is always, in every moment, in our power to do so. Neither are those portals locked and the key in possession of someone else from whom it must be obtained by prayer or entreaty. That door is free of all bolts and bars, save those that we ourselves have made."

Body and Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this guided meditation and instruction from the Three-Month Retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of the intimate relationship between body and mind, particularly as it manifests through emotions. The session begins with a systematic approach to relaxation—scanning through the body's muscles, relaxing the core and internal organs, and even treating the brain as a muscle that can soften and release.
> Fella provides detailed guidance on working with emotions in meditation practice. She explains how emotions, thoughts, and bodily sensations form interconnected cycles: emotions produce thoughts (often as a way of seeking attention), thoughts generate emotions, and emotions manifest as physical sensations. She offers practical advice for the noting practice, suggesting that precision isn't necessary—simple notes like "emotion," "chaos," or "confusion" suffice when experience is complex or unclear.
> Particularly valuable is her instruction on distinguishing between physical sensations and their associated emotions. When attending to the bodily correlate of fear, for instance, one should note "contraction" rather than "fear," recognizing that the physical sensation is not identical to the mental experience. The talk also addresses the common question of self and choice-making, suggesting that choices arise from conditions—either from greed, aversion, and delusion, or from wisdom—rather than from a fixed self. Fella briefly touches on the seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga), noting how mindfulness supports investigation, and how energy can arise through spiritual urgency and reflection on impermanence.

Settling into the present moment, allowing your body to relax.

It's often helpful to begin a period of meditation by checking in to see if the body and mind are relaxed. It can be helpful to scan through your body, checking for areas of tension and consciously relaxing the muscles—particularly in places where you may hold tension, around the eyes or the jaw, in the neck and shoulders, throughout the torso. Check into whether there's any tension held in your buttocks and hips. Sometimes we unconsciously tighten that area. See if you can relax those muscles, scanning through and checking into whether there's any obvious or subtle muscular tension in the body.

Having relaxed the muscles of the body as much as possible, I often find it helpful to relax the core of the body, allowing an opening to relaxation behind your eyes. Relaxing inside your throat. Relax your heart and your lungs. Let go of tension in your stomach, your intestines, all the organs inside your abdominal cavity.

And see too if you can relax your mind. One way to approach this is to think of your brain as if it were a muscle. See if you can relax your brain, letting go of thoughts of the past, the future, even thoughts of the present moment in favor of connecting with actual felt experience here and now. There's nowhere to go, no one to be, and very little to do right now.

Having relaxed your body and mind as much as you have access to in this moment, allow your attention to open to the experience of hearing. Receiving the sounds—subtle sounds and obvious sounds, distant sounds and sounds nearby. Allowing the sounds to come and go. Receiving them almost as if you were listening to music.

Letting go now of directing the attention to hearing, allow the attention to settle into the body, connecting to the sense of the body sitting here, receiving the sensations in the body almost as if you were listening to them. Within the body, connect to your anchor—the breathing, the sense of the whole body, hearing, whatever your anchor is. Receiving, relaxing, and allowing the anchor to come to you rather than having a sense of going out and looking for the experience. Settle back and see if you can allow that experience to find you.

As you rest with this anchor for your attention, other experiences will arise and be known. Other body sensations—pressure, heat, tension, coolness, tightness, lightness, heaviness. Thoughts, sounds, smells. There's no need to hold tightly to the anchor as if that were somehow a better object. Any experience can be used to cultivate mindfulness. We can open to any experience. So as other experiences arise, allow mindfulness to connect with those.

One experience that may come up from time to time is emotion. When emotions arise, it can be helpful to acknowledge them with a gentle, soft note—whatever the emotion is: happiness, fear, loneliness, sadness. Just a quiet whisper in the mind, acknowledging the emotion.

You might recognize an emotion because of a strong pattern of thinking. We often understand emotion through thought. If you notice that a strong pattern of thinking is recurring, check in and see if there's an emotion underneath. Often if that emotion is acknowledged, the thoughts will diminish.

When emotions are strong, it's very helpful to recognize how the emotion feels in the body. There's a very strong connection between the mind and the body, especially around emotion. So if there's an emotion, check into how the body experiences it. Emotions will come and go as all other experiences come and go.

Being open in your meditation to whatever arises for you—sights, sounds, smells, moods, emotions, thoughts. And if ever it seems helpful, use the anchor for attention to ground and connect with mindfulness.

I have a few more thoughts to say about emotion. If you're using the noting practice and using that to support your mindfulness, it's not necessary with emotions, if you don't know what the emotion is, to figure it out or to have a precise label for the emotion. If you know that you're having some kind of an emotion but don't really know what it is, a simple note of "emotion" or "feeling" is fine. You don't need to figure out what the emotion is, and I encourage you not to try to figure it out, in fact.

Sometimes too we have experiences with emotions where it feels like there's a chaotic flow of many different emotions—anger and frustration and fear and loneliness and sadness. It can feel just like this chaos of emotions.

And it feels a little odd to try to pick out one of those to name that complex of emotions with the noting. So you could just use "chaos." Chaos is happening right now. Or "confusion." It's not necessary to have a precise note.

Actually, for the noting in general, if you're experiencing hearing, or in daily practice seeing, it's not necessary to be detailed about what you're hearing or seeing. Just a simple note of "hearing" or "seeing" is sufficient. Simplicity with the noting—whatever is obvious for you is helpful as a note.

I wanted to say something about how thoughts and emotions work together. There's a very tight connection between thinking and emotions, it seems, at least in our culture. When we have strong emotions, they often produce a lot of thoughts. It seems as though the emotion is trying to get our attention through producing thoughts. So there's a very tight connection. If we're having strong emotion, thoughts will manifest.

If you're having a strong pattern of thinking, you may well have an emotion underneath it—especially a pattern of thinking that comes up repetitively. There may well be an emotion underlying it. A lot of planning thoughts, for instance, may have some anxiety underneath. If you can, in noticing a pattern of thinking, recognize an emotion beneath it, the emotion may be trying to get your attention. Actually bringing the attention to the emotion in that moment is what the emotion wants. And then it doesn't need to rattle the cage and start producing all these thoughts. The thoughts can often quiet down if you attend to the emotion itself.

So emotions produce thoughts, and thoughts produce emotions. You may notice this in your sitting. You're sitting quietly and suddenly a memory arises—this often happens. A memory arises in our experience, and we react to that memory, as Joseph was mentioning last night. If a thought arises that we have a feeling about, that feeling can arise because of the thought. There's a very strong link between the two. So explore this in your experience.

There's also a fairly strong link between emotions and bodily experience. I don't know that I'd go so far as to say that all emotion is experienced in the body, but there's often a physical correlate to emotion—very, very often. Anger perhaps feels like pressure and heat. Loneliness may feel like heaviness. Sadness may have constriction in the throat or in the heart. So there are often physical sensations that come along with emotions.

This is a great place to ground our attention if the emotion is strong. It helps to bring us out of the mental world into the physical. It's very grounding to bring the attention into the body when we're paying attention to emotions.

If you are using the noting and you bring the attention into the body when attending to emotions, I encourage you to let go of the note of the emotion. If you're noting fear, for example—noting fear, fear, fear is happening—and then you notice there's a contraction in your abdomen associated with the fear, when you turn to that experience, use the note "contraction" rather than "fear." The physical sensations are not the emotion. They are the physical sensations. Contraction is contraction. The fear is a mental experience, and you're attending to physical experience. It's very helpful to clarify what you're actually paying attention to—to use the note of the physical sensations you're experiencing as opposed to the emotion.

This also points to another cycle that happens for us. Body sensations arise because of emotion. When emotions arise, there's a physical correlate. But physical sensations can also arise in the absence of emotion. A contraction in the throat, for example, can arise just because a contraction in the throat is arising. And if there's a familiarity with contraction in the throat being linked to a particular emotion, sometimes what the mind will do is feel that contraction and then start to assign an emotion to it, actually constructing the emotion.

So it's very helpful to be attuned to the difference between the body and the mind here. If you're feeling heaviness and pressure in your heart, maybe it is sadness, maybe there's a sadness there—maybe not. Hold an open mind about the fact that an emotion may or may not be present with particular body sensations.

I often find that if I end up with a particular sensation in the body—a feeling similar to frustration, for instance—I will notice the mind starts scanning the environment to find out what I'm frustrated about. So be aware that this kind of cycle also happens in our minds and bodies.

A question arose about the sense of self around decisions, choices, and actions. The questioner could see that there's an intention arising and then action taken on that intention. But in the teachings, we're told we have a choice whether to refrain from unwholesome actions or negative actions, and that still feels like "me." It still feels like somewhere along the line, "I'm the one who's making the choice."

This is a very common question, particularly around choice and intention. This is a very powerful place where we identify. The way I'd suggest working with it is simply to notice that there is a feeling of "me" or "I" doing that. At least in my own experience, the way to begin to study no-self is to study the self—to study what feels like self. So anytime it feels like there's a sense of self, get familiar with that. What is it that you are calling self there?

The other piece about who's making the choice: I've had times in my practice where I've seen choice being made, choices are made, and it's clear that the choices are coming out of conditions. Those conditions either have the habit of greed, aversion, and delusion behind them, or wisdom behind them. So choices are made by greed, aversion, and delusion, or choices are made by wisdom. There's no "I" making the choice. The choices are made by the confluence of patterns and mind states that are arising in the moment.

If it feels like you have a choice, choose skillfully.

Another question arose about the seven factors of awakening—specifically about the proximate causes for investigation, energy, and also the joy that leads to concentration. Aside from the order they're listed, what conditions support the arising of these factors?

This is a huge topic. The main thing I would encourage is to remember that the seven factors are in that order because they do each support each other in that sequence. When we bring mindfulness, it supports interest and investigation. Investigation can also be generated through a little more precision of attention—bringing closer attention to experience, but not a tight attention.

Energy arises through the application of our energy. Energy can also arise from a sense of spiritual urgency. For instance, a reflection on your own impermanence can bring energy into the system. There are many, many factors that support it.

In your own experience, as you're noticing the arising of these factors, can you notice what is supporting that arising in the moment?

CHAPTER 6

Not Self and Selfing

Andrea Fella · 57 min

> In this talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of anattā (not-self), the third of the three characteristics of existence alongside anicca (impermanence) and dukkha (unreliability). Drawing from the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta—the Buddha's discourse on the characteristic of not-self—Fella explains how the Buddha systematically examined each of the five khandhas (aggregates) to demonstrate that nothing within our experience can be identified as a permanent, controllable self. She illuminates how our inability to command our body, feelings, perceptions, mental formations, or consciousness to be as we wish serves as evidence for the not-self nature of experience.
> Fella distinguishes between psychological insights about our patterns and the liberating insights into the three characteristics, noting that while impermanence can feel unsettling when directly experienced, the insight into not-self actually brings relief. Using analogies of rivers and rainbows, she illustrates how what we call 'self' is actually a process—a flux of conditions arising and passing—rather than a fixed entity. She references the Kaccānagotta Sutta to explain how correct wisdom transcends both existence and non-existence, seeing instead the dependent arising and cessation of phenomena.
> The practical guidance offered includes studying what we take to be self, particularly during moments of suffering or when our views meet resistance from reality. Fella shares personal examples of observing the 'good yogi/bad yogi' pattern and witnessing rapid shifts between different senses of self. She concludes with the Buddha's teaching to Bāhiya: 'In the seen is only the seen'—pointing to how simple, direct awareness of experience, without adding a sense of self, leads naturally to liberation.

As we practice meditation, we begin to see our experience more directly. We've been talking a lot about this in the instructions, encouraging you to meet the elemental nature of our physical experience, just meet the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality of the experience. Meeting the emotions, thoughts, just as they arise without getting caught by the content of those experiences. So the meditation instructions encourage us to drop below the realm of concepts to meet our experience more directly.

We begin this exploration and start to get familiar with this more direct experience. That's part of the meditation instructions that we suggest: learn how to meet this experience more directly. In getting familiar with our experience, we get familiar with what we might call the specific characteristics of our experience. We get familiar with the pressure, the vibration, the tingling—we get familiar with all of the sensations.

The other part of the meditation instruction, another aspect that we offer, is to not only pay attention to that level of experience, what is happening in that sense realm, but also to start noticing what happens to it when you pay attention to it. This part of the instruction begins to point us not to the specific characteristics, the wide variety of characteristics of experience, but the more common characteristics of experience. By noticing how our experience changes, we begin to recognize that all of our experience is impermanent.

As Joseph talked about last week, not only is it impermanent, all of our experience is also unreliable as a place for lasting happiness. Some of you may recognize these two—anicca, impermanence, and dukkha, unreliability—as being two of what are called the three general characteristics of all experience. The third being not-self, anatta.

Tonight I'd like to talk about these three as characteristics and discuss how they interrelate. But primarily I'd like to talk about this third one, the characteristic of not-self, and also a little bit about how we might begin exploring this directly in our experience. Directly connecting with these three fundamental characteristics of experience, directly realizing not just the idea of impermanence but the direct recognition of seeing things change in our experience. Directly seeing the unreliability—how because it's impermanent, it is unreliable. And directly seeing the insubstantiality, that's another way to express this not-self nature, the insubstantiality, the transient flux of experience. These have a deep impact on our minds when we directly experience them.

These three characteristics, seeing these three characteristics, actually perceiving them in our experience, is insight. And this is what gives insight meditation its name: the seeing into these three characteristics.

There are different kinds of insights. Sometimes we can, in meeting our experience, come to some understandings about how our psychology came to be, some of the patterns and habits that we are very familiar with, how those came to be for us. Those kinds of realizations I would call psychological insights, and they are very powerful also. In my own experience, that kind of recognition—seeing that my own patterns are just impermanent and subject to causes and conditions, just created by causes and conditions, and seeing how they formed, the patterns from history that put them together —that kind of recognition has allowed me to more easily meet those patterns. There's not so much fear, so much identification. There's not so much investment in those patterns. So they can be simply met with mindfulness.

The insights into these three characteristics are the insights that really liberate us. They not only teach us something about how our psychology is put together, but they deeply change our mindstream. When the mind deeply understands that things are impermanent, it won't bother to pick things up. It won't bother to cling to them. When it deeply understands the unreliability of our experience, it knows that clinging will lead to suffering. And when the mind deeply recognizes that there isn't anyone here to defend or protect, no self to defend or protect, there's no need for reactivity.

In the Buddha's second discourse called the Anatta-Lakkhana Sutta—the words meaning anatta, not-self, and lakkhana, characteristic, so the Discourse on the Characteristic of Not-Self—in this discourse, the Buddha described these three characteristics in terms of each other. I'd like to go over this discourse with you a little bit.

The discourse is primarily aimed at helping us understand this not-self characteristic. The first way the Buddha goes about pointing to this for us is to point to the aspect of control. Often as we consider or relate to a sense of what we think of as self, there's an aspect of having some kind of control around it—the one who chooses, the one who decides. That's often a place where we feel like our self is, that there is someone who chooses, there is someone who decides, someone who seems to have some sort of control over this being, and that is what self is.

So the Buddha begins the discourse by speaking to that. He does this exploration through the framework of the aggregates that Joseph talked about last week also. Essentially, looking at our experience through this framework of the aggregates, we see as we begin to look that there's nothing in our experience that lies outside of this framework. Everything that we experience falls into one of these five categories. Sometimes this term "aggregate" sounds like a complicated technical term, but the Pali term is khandha, and it simply means something like heap or bundle. It's a very non-technical word in the Pali.

And so these five heaps of things—heaps of stuff, as Guy Armstrong sometimes says, five heaps of stuff—describe all aspects of our experience. Nothing falls outside of them. When we look at our experience, everything we encounter falls into one of those five categories.

The Buddha uses this framework as a way to help us deconstruct this idea of self. He says, "Form is non-self." In this translation, Bhikkhu Bodhi renders anatta as "non-self." "Form is non-self. For if form were self, this form would not lead to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of form: 'Let my form be thus. Let my form not be thus.' But because form is non-self, form leads to affliction, and it is not possible to determine of form: 'Let my form be thus. Let my form not be thus.'"

This is referring to our body. He's saying the body is not self because we cannot command it: "Body, be this way. Body, don't age. Body, don't have that pain." He offers this as evidence for the not-self nature of the body.

So we might think, "Okay, well, body isn't self, but surely there's something else in there that qualifies as self." And so he goes on. Feeling is not self. Perception is not self. Volitional formations are non-self. And finally, consciousness is non-self. "For if consciousness were self, this consciousness would not lead to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of consciousness: 'Let my consciousness be thus. Let my consciousness not be thus.' But because consciousness is non-self, consciousness leads to affliction, and it is not possible to determine of consciousness: 'Let my consciousness be thus. Let my consciousness not be thus.'"

How many of us would, if we could, say, "Let my consciousness be calm, peaceful, at ease"? We can't do that. The Buddha points to this as undermining the belief we hold around this aspect of control—this sense of "being who I am."

He goes on to speak about the other two characteristics, pointing out that everything in our experience is impermanent. Form is impermanent. Feelings are impermanent. Perception is impermanent. Volitional formations are impermanent. Consciousness is impermanent. And because these are impermanent, they are unreliable.

The question he then poses to the monks, to the practitioners he's addressing, is this: Is something that is impermanent and unreliable worthy of being called self? Does it make sense to call something self when it is impermanent and unreliable?

This brings us back to the question of what we mean by "self." As we reflect on it, there is often a sense that something we call self has stability, some kind of permanence. In the time of the Buddha, one conception of self was a transcendent self that was permanent and blissful. This teaching directly challenges that notion—the idea that such a self can be found anywhere in our experience.

We can certainly, through meditation, attain states that are blissful. But they are impermanent. They come and go. They arise based on causes and conditions; they fall apart based on causes and conditions.

In this part of the sutta, the Buddha is really encouraging us to look at what we call self and to explore whether it makes sense. There is something that we call self—but does what we call self actually stand up to investigation? Does it prove to be what we think it is when we examine it closely?

We'll return to that question. But it can sometimes help, in exploring this concept of not-self, to consider some analogies that illuminate what is being said. As I mentioned earlier, one way to understand this idea of not-self is to recognize that what we think of as self isn't a thing at all. Rather, it's a flux, a flow, an ever-changing stream.

Experience. We impute, essentially impute, a concept to that ever-changing flow of experience, and that concept is what we are identifying as self. But we don't see it as a concept. We don't see it as a process in the mind that is creating this concept—we see it as a thing.

I'll offer a couple of analogies. The first is the analogy of a river. I like this analogy. It's fairly apt because our experience, when we meet it with mindfulness, feels kind of like a flow, a stream, a river of experience.

So what is a river? The water in the river is continually changing. We can't take a bucket of water out of the river and say, "That's the river." We can't even point to the flow of water in the river and say, "That's the river," because that water is never the same water. It's always different water. Instant by instant, it's different water.

Perhaps the riverbed? Maybe the riverbed might be the river. Well, the riverbed without the water doesn't seem like much of a river. And even the riverbed changes after a flood. The actual course of that riverbed can change depending on causes and conditions. The river's name doesn't seem to be the river either.

And yet there is something that we understand to be river. We can give a river a name and we can talk about it. Actually, I think that process of giving something a name so that we can talk about it is part of what cements this idea of thing in our minds. The process of perception, misunderstood essentially, creates this idea that there's something there—as opposed to it being a convenient shortcut.

And so the sense of self, like the sense of a river... there is something that makes up what we would call a river, just as there is something that makes up what we would call us, what we would call me or myself. There's something going on here. A process is happening, a process that is related moment to moment by a chain of cause and effect. And yet the thing that we think of as self doesn't exist in the way that we think of it. It's not that there's nothing there. It's not that nothing exists. But it doesn't exist in the way that we think of it existing.

There's a sutta that speaks to this—one of my favorite suttas:

This world, for the most part, depends upon a duality—upon the idea of existence and the idea of non-existence. But for one who sees the origin of the world as it really is, with correct wisdom...

The Buddha elsewhere refers to the world as being this fathom-long body. "In this fathom-long body lies the world." So he's talking about the world of experience here.

For one who sees the origin of the world—one who sees the arising of experience as it really is, with correct wisdom—there is no idea of non-existence in regard to the world. And for one who sees the cessation of the world as it really is, with correct wisdom—that is, for one who sees things passing away out of experience, experience ending, with correct wisdom—there is no idea of existence in regard to the world.

So when one sees that experiences are constantly arising, there's no idea that things don't exist. And when one sees that things are constantly ending, there's no idea that things do exist.

The Buddha goes on to say that rather than existence or non-existence, there's a process of things coming into being and falling apart—and that this process is a causally arisen process. Things arise dependent on causes and conditions. Experience arises in dependence on causes and conditions, I should really say.

What we experience as self comes into being through a process of conditions coming together. And we fundamentally misunderstand it to be something, to be a thing.

Another analogy that points to this—conditions coming together to create something, to create an experience—is the analogy of a rainbow. A rainbow seems like a thing. You can see the rainbow. There's some kind of existence within the rainbow—it's clear, we can see it, we can talk about it. And yet with the rainbow, conditions have to come together just right in order for that rainbow to be seen. There needs to be water in the sky. There needs to be sun at an angle through which it can pass through the water and meet an observer. These three things have to be in relation to each other: the observer, the water, the sun—all have to be in the correct position with respect to each other. If one of those three is in some other place, if the observer is a few miles further on, they may not see the rainbow because the orientation is incorrect.

So does the rainbow exist, or does the rainbow not exist? We can't really talk about it that way. It comes together based on conditions.

When I speak about this teaching of not-self as being a pointer to the flux of experience, sometimes the question comes up: what's the difference then between impermanence and not-self? Isn't flux just another term for impermanence? I'd like to explore this a little bit.

In my own experience, there's a kind of difference—I have seen a difference in how the recognitions of impermanence and not-self are felt. With impermanence, it can feel like you're watching something come into being, and you're watching something go out of being. It's kind of startling.

I remember on one retreat in Burma. It was a room that had some large posts, and people were doing walking meditation while others were sitting. At one point I was sitting, and they were doing walking meditation. I opened my eyes and saw this person move behind a post so that I could no longer see them. And they vanished. In my mind, they vanished. That person just was not there. It's startling. There was a person there, an object, something—a thing. And then that person was not there. That person disappeared.

So with the insight into impermanence, there can be a sense of there being something that appears and disappears. The insight into not-self, in my experience, is the recognition that there isn't anything there. There's not actually a thing there. As things come into being, they're already falling apart. So it has a different flavor to it, this insight into not-self. There's nothing actually there. There's no thing there. There is a process happening. It's not that there's nothing, but there isn't something.

It's not uncommon for people to express or feel a sense of discomfort around this teaching—to have almost a feeling of fear around this idea. Listened to from the perspective of self, this teaching doesn't make any sense at all. And from the perspective of self, there can be a sense of, "Well, what's going to happen to me?"

This is certainly familiar to me. I've experienced this sense of fear. And that fear usually is not around the experience of not-self, but around the idea of the teaching of not-self.

I find it interesting to contrast the way we relate to impermanence and the way we relate to not-self from the intellectual standpoint. Everybody knows things are impermanent. It doesn't seem to bother people too much when you're just thinking about it. You go out and talk to people on the street: "Are things impermanent?" "Yeah, sure, things are impermanent." It doesn't disturb people. But when we start talking about this concept of not-self, it feels a little disturbing. And it also just seems completely wrong on top of it—like, this cannot be right.

So with impermanence, there's this matter-of-fact, casual acceptance: "Yeah, that teaching, no problem, I understand that." And with not-self, there's this kind of fear that happens.

But when we actually move into the experiential world of these insights, it kind of gets reversed. Because when we start seeing things—particularly when we start seeing things disappear, when we start seeing things vanish—things start to feel really unstable. That insight into the ending of things, the impermanent nature of things, everything ending, ending, ending—that experience brings up quite a bit of discomfort. The actual experience of impermanence is not one where you can just say, "Oh yeah, no problem."

The insight into not-self is a relief.

When we really see that there's no one here to defend or to protect, there's no problem.

I find it interesting, this way that the idea creates so much distress, and yet the insight is so relieving.

It seems to us that there's plenty of evidence for self. When we think about what self is, well, it's just kind of obvious to us that there's a self there. That feeling itself is the confirmation that self exists. The feeling seems to be a good part of the evidence for self. It's like, of course self exists—I feel it.

And not only that, the view or the belief, the idea in self is so powerful that it filters how we view our world. There is actually a lot of evidence for not-self out there, but because we view our experience through this lens of self, we conveniently ignore all of the evidence to the contrary. This is a fundamental way our mind deludes us. This is a capacity of delusion: when we look at experience through a certain lens, that's what we see. What we see then confirms our belief.

Some of that evidence, I pointed to a little while ago—the Buddha actually mentioning that consciousness is not self. If consciousness were self, it would be possible to say, "Let my consciousness be thus."

I'll point to a really concrete example here. When you sit down to meditate and put your attention on your breath or in the flow of changing experience, with an intention of choosing to be present with that experience, the mind wanders. Who did that? Who did that wandering? If you did the wandering, then were you the one that decided to stay put?

And even more amazing, even more mind-blowing, is the fact that out of that spaced-out place where it seems like there's not much choice or control—the mind in autopilot, doing its thing, running on habits and patterns—suddenly mindfulness reappears. Who did that? Causes and conditions came together for mindfulness to reappear. It's as simple as that. There's no one there doing this.

So exploring this—how do we explore this actually in our practice? I've mostly been talking about the idea, the concept so far. But what does it mean to actually begin to recognize this in our actual experience?

The teaching that the Buddha gave, the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta, points us in this direction. There he's suggesting we look at our experience for what we call self and begin to investigate it. Does it really hold up to that investigation?

There's a famous quote—I know many of you are familiar with this quote by Dōgen: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be enlightened by all things."

So to study this teaching, we study what feels like self. When we study this, when we get familiar with this feeling, with what we are calling self, we begin to see—and I think Rebecca said this very beautifully the other morning—that as we study this, as we look at what we're calling self, we may see at some point that it falls apart. And then we get a taste of what this not-self teaching means. Or we may, through studying self, begin to see it arising—see that out of causes and conditions, a particular pattern or habit of selfing comes to be. The angry self or the frustrated self comes into being out of these habits and patterns. It wasn't there, and then there it is. We see this self coming into being. Or we might start to see, as we explore what we are calling self, that what we call self actually changes quite rapidly from one to widely different experiences.

I'll go through some of these ways.

First, just some reflection. You might go through this with me, in your own experience, asking yourself: What is it that you call self? What in your experience is it that you identify as self?

Sometimes it includes a sense of solidity, a sense of thingness, a sense of continuity—often a continuity from past to future, from past to present, where memory plays a big role. Essentially, because of memory, because I can remember things, there must be someone who remembers. That sense of continuity.

It might be the sense of the one who's in control, the one who decides, the one who chooses. It might be the sense of being the one who feels or knows.

At one point in my practice, I could really clearly see that I wasn't doing the knowing, that I wasn't choosing what to know. Knowing was happening, and yet it felt like I was the one experiencing what was known. I think that's a pretty common, deeper kind of sense of self—being the one who experiences.

So it's often a vague kind of feeling. Actually, when we start to look at it, it's a vague kind of feeling, and it's hard to actually pin it down, to pin down what we mean by self. It's more of a feeling in a way. But there's something there that feels really solid.

I'd compare it to the way we observe pain. When you first start to meditate and observe painful experience, it feels like a solid thing—some thing there, a block of some kind. And then when we turn our attention into it, we realize there's no thing that we call pain. It's actually a lively, changing process, an experience of flux and flow. You can't really say, "Well, that's the pain," because when you find that one point, it vanishes, and then the experience moves over just a few inches. There's no one thing that is the pain.

It's kind of similar as we start to observe what we call self. It seems solid until we start to look at it, and then it shifts and changes. We can't quite pin it down. This too is evidence for not-self.

And yet what we seem to do, because that view is so strong, is think, "Well, I must just not be looking at it right. I must just not be seeing it right." Or if somebody points out a contradiction to us—like the Buddha saying, "Go through all of these aspects of experience: it's not there, it's not there, it's not there, it's not there"—we think, "Okay, I can agree it's not there. But it must be someplace else," because that view is so strong.

So the encouragement is to actually turn towards this feeling. What is it? Sometimes this feeling can be really clear—this is a good time to really start to play with this teaching. Actually, this seems to happen when some of our beliefs about self are challenged. That seems to be when the feeling of self gets really strong.

When we're going along and everything corresponds to our views of how things should be, how I am, how other people should behave with respect to me—as long as things are moving along in line with our views, we don't particularly notice. That sense of self is more vague. It's like, well, there's no problem, so there's no sense of that solidity. But as soon as there's something that points out to us that our belief or view may not be in line with reality, then the feeling of self kind of hits us in the face. The feeling of self-righteousness, for example—I'm right, you're wrong. This comes because there's some kind of rub between our view of how things should be and how things actually are.

So this is a good time to explore this sense of self. I'll give you an example from my own practice of this kind of exploration.

On one retreat, I was suffering from the "I'm a failure" pattern quite frequently. I felt like I couldn't meditate. I felt like everybody else could meditate, and I was a failure. I was a bad yogi. I would notice that, and there was a lot of suffering around that pattern.

At some point on that same retreat, it began to become really clear to me in very short time—because I was suffering from this feeling of "I don't know how to practice, I can't be mindful"—and I would take a step and feel the sensations of the foot on the ground. Mindfulness! I'm a good yogi. And then suddenly, "Oh, I can't feel anything. I'm a bad yogi." And it was like, whoa, wow, this is interesting. I'm a good yogi. I'm a bad yogi. This "I" was in my face. This "I am" was in my face.

So, exploring it.

What is it? What was I feeling? What was really happening? I think much of what was going on around self was these ideas, views, and beliefs. This is a large part of where self comes into play. We have views, we have beliefs around how things should be. And from the perspective of my ideal, I should be a good yogi. When my own experience didn't measure up to how I thought it should be, I was a failure.

One thing this experience pointed out so clearly to me was that when I felt like I was a good yogi, it didn't feel like there was a problem. That was how things were supposed to be. When I felt like a failure, that was where the problem seemed to be. But at some point I began to recognize that the feeling of failure was intimately tied to the idea I had about what being a good yogi was. That sense of "I'm a good yogi" was actually a setup.

So in exploring this process of self around this issue, what I really saw I needed to do was look at that self-praise I was engaging in. I did also need to recognize when I was telling myself I was a failure—both sides of it are equally nonsense. But the conditions for the arising of that failure were directly connected to the attachment to that feeling of being a good yogi.

In this exploration, this is where the rub comes in. This is where our views don't meet reality. My idea of being a good yogi was something like continuous mindfulness. This doesn't happen very often. The mind wanders. Every time the mind wanders—oh, I'm a failure.

So the rub of our views of self, our view of who I am or who I want to be, when that meets reality and there is suffering—this is a great place to explore the sense of self. This is a pointer for us. Actually, whenever there's suffering, there's some kind of sense of self, some kind of "you" there.

The process by which self is created, by which the experience of self is created—that selfing process, the process by which that comes to be—is the same process by which suffering comes to be. So you're already doing this. You're already exploring this in your experience. When you're exploring and meeting the experience of unsatisfactoriness, of dukkha, you're exploring this process of selfing, whether or not it feels that way.

You can also notice when this feeling of self arises. Sometimes we get into places where things are pretty quiet. There's not much grasping, not much clinging going on. Things feel pretty stable, pretty calm. And then suddenly something happens and there's our self, right in our face.

On one retreat, I was in a place where things were relatively neutral for quite a good stretch of time. I was beginning to notice there was subtle reactivity to that neutral experience, just being in walking meditation, noticing neutral experience. There would be this little bit of leaning into the neutral experience, a little bit of expectation—ooh, maybe something will happen—a little bit of wanting there. And when nothing happened: I'm a failure.

Out of nothing, the mind was just creating this pattern. Neutral experience, a little bit of wanting, that expectation doesn't get met, and I'm a failure. This is self arising right in the moment. I saw it in that moment and I actually smiled at it. It's like, look at that! Wow! Out of nothing, the mind created a failure.

We can also see a rapidly changing sense of self sometimes. As we start to feel into what we're calling self, we begin to see that we've got a lot of different selves in there. There are committees in there, all different ages.

I was doing some walking meditation out here on one three-month course, and I had some reactivity to some of the questions in the hall. I was arguing in my mind with how things were being discussed and described in the question and answer period. I noticed that I was arguing in my mind, and I could feel a sense of—I remember feeling a sense of the forty-year-old, analytical, argumentative me. I was feeling into that, trying to be with it, trying to understand it.

And it felt so sticky. I didn't really see how to tease it apart. It just was so complicated and so me.

I was doing the walking meditation, and this truck drives up. Big, loud brakes squealing. The doors bang open. And instantly, the mind switched from that argumentative 40-year-old to a "It's a truck! Wow, that's amazing!" And I felt like I was two years old. Just like that.

That was quite a startling lesson for me—seeing how these senses of self change. So look: What are you taking yourself to be in your experience? What is it that you think of as self?

The last piece I'll explore about this teaching is another teaching of the Buddha that Greg mentioned yesterday morning in the instructions. He talked about the teaching to Bahiya, and this is actually a very beautiful teaching.

Bahiya came to the Buddha and asked him for the teachings in brief. And the Buddha responded: "You should train yourself thus. In the seen is only the seen. In the heard is only the heard. In the sensed is only the sensed. In the cognized is only the cognized. This is how you should train yourself."

So he started there. And that's the training. That's what we do. We meet our experience. This is where I began the talk—just meeting our direct experience underneath the level of concept. In the seen is only the seen.

And the Buddha goes on in this teaching. He says, so this is the practice. The simplicity of just meeting experience is the practice. And then the Buddha goes on to state what the results of this practice are. He says: "When for you in the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard, in the sensed is only the sensed, in the cognized is only the cognized—then, Bahiya, there is no you in terms of that. When there's no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there's no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor in between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

The Buddha points to this as a result of practice. It's an insight. We don't have to believe it even. Just come back to the simplicity of experience. In the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard. Underneath the level of concept, in the cognized is only the cognized—recognizing concept as just another construction of the mind, as opposed to believing it as a thing. When for you this is the case, there is no you in terms of that, no you there.

So we don't need to believe this teaching. We don't even need to think about it. You can really let this whole talk go out of your minds and just come back to the simplicity of meeting your experience moment to moment. Trust in that. The insights come out of that.

Let's sit together for a few moments.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 7

What versus Why

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this profound talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella examines our deeply ingrained habit of asking 'why' we are the way we are—a tendency reinforced by Western psychological frameworks. While intellectual understanding of our history can provide some relief, she argues it rarely touches the deeper roots of our suffering. Drawing from the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), she contrasts unwise attention—ruminating on questions like 'What was I? What will I become?'—with wise attention that meets experience through the lens of the Four Noble Truths: 'This is suffering. This is the origin of suffering.'
> Through vivid personal examples—including a theatrical mishap that generated years of embarrassment, a surprising discovery about nightly loneliness triggered by a digital clock, and a transformative encounter with deep-seated self-hatred—Andrea demonstrates how suffering is always created fresh in each present moment. The causes and conditions from our past only become active through present-moment reactions to memories. By carefully observing 'what' is happening layer by layer, rather than making assumptions about underlying causes, the mind naturally reveals its own conditioned patterns.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with thoughts as arising phenomena (using notes like 'hearing' or 'seeing'), checking in with our attitude toward experience, and meeting sticky patterns with patient, continuous contact. Andrea shares how a moment of clearly seeing 'you're no good' as simply a thought—an empty phenomenon arising in the mind—cut deeply into a lifelong pattern of self-hatred. This same practice of meeting what is happening, moment by moment, not only frees us from reactivity but opens the door to liberating vipassanā insights into impermanence and not-self.

As human beings, we seem to have a pretty strong habit or pattern around wanting to understand why things happen. This is a pattern that has actually served us quite well. So many things have arisen out of this quest for understanding why.

And yet we seem to be particularly curious about why things happen to me. We're very practiced at this particular exploration. It seems especially in Western culture, with the way psychoanalysis has permeated into our way of thinking, we all—or many of us at least—have a pattern of wanting to understand why we are the way we are, particularly through thinking about our history, the causes and conditions from our history.

The way we have practiced this tends to be through thinking about, through reflecting on, through intellectualizing. Why am I the way I am? Why do I react the way I react? Why do I have these habits and patterns? And we understand that through thinking back to our childhood, or to ways that we related to people, or situations that we were in.

This actually can be quite helpful at times. I'm not saying this is not helpful. For instance, if you're in a situation where you're meeting someone and there's a little bit of an emotional charge around this meeting, you might reflect on the fact that this person reminds you of somebody you have a charge about, and that there's no need to have that reaction with this particular person. So you can mitigate some of your reactivity through this kind of reflection, through this kind of thinking back about and understanding how our patterns and habits have come to be.

And yet we sometimes, I think, perhaps mistakenly feel that we should be able to control these reactions just through this intellectual process. Often this doesn't work very well. We think that because I know this person isn't the same person that I have the charge about from my history, I shouldn't have this feeling about that person. And yet we still do. We still have these reactions.

So often this reflective process, this thinking back on why we are the way we are, doesn't touch into the deeper roots of our suffering, of our reactivity. It can help to explore a different way to do this, and this is what we're doing here—exploring a different way to meet our suffering. Not through thinking about, but through meeting moment by moment what we're experiencing. Essentially, rather than thinking back about why we are the way we are, we look at what is happening moment to moment and come to an understanding through that process of looking at what is happening.

That's what I'd like to talk about this evening. I'd like to explore some words of the Buddha, who suggested that wise attention is one of the ways to meet our experience, using this tool of wise attention. I referred to this sutta the other day, but I'll just read some of the words to you.

He says: "An untaught ordinary person does not understand what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he attends to those things unfit for attention and does not attend to those things fit for attention. This is how he attends unwisely: Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future? Or else he is inwardly perplexed about the present thus: Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where will it go?"

So these questions—the way the Buddha is saying the untaught ordinary person reflects unwisely—this is reflecting through the framework of who am I? What am I? How have I gotten here? What are the causes and conditions that have brought me here? How did I get here? It's reflecting through the framework of self and this penchant to ask why. Why am I the way I am?

The Buddha goes on to say that a well-taught noble disciple understands what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, she does not attend to those things unfit for attention and attends to those things fit for attention. She attends wisely: "This is suffering." She attends wisely: "This is the origin of suffering." She attends wisely: "This is the cessation of suffering." She attends wisely: "This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering."

I spoke about this in terms of looking at experience through the framework of the Four Noble Truths. Not just thinking about—not the thinking-about process here—but the way this is phrased in the sutta, "this is suffering, this is the cause of suffering," is pointing us directly to look at the present moment and understand what is happening here and now. Is it suffering? Is it the cause of suffering? Is it the ending of suffering? Is it qualities being cultivated that lead to the ending of suffering—the path leading to the ending of suffering? Looking at what is happening in the present moment through this lens of the Four Noble Truths, the Buddha says, is wise attention. Rather than reflecting on "why am I the way I am," look at what is this, now? Is it suffering? Is it the cause of suffering?

This is pointing us directly into the present moment and is a great teaching for us. Suffering occurs in the present moment. It does not occur in the past or in the future. If we are suffering over something that happened in the past, what's actually happening is that there is a thought in the present moment about that past incident, and the suffering about that incident is being reconstructed right here and right now.

I had a great understanding into this at one point. Some years ago, I was an actress in a play. One night on stage during a performance, I forgot my line. I tried ad-libbing so that the other actors would know I'd forgotten and hopefully at some point would jump in and rescue me. I said a few ad-libbed lines, and at some point I ran out. Nobody jumped in. There was this gaping silence. The invisible wall between the audience and the actors just dissolved, and I looked out and saw all these people waiting for me to say something. It was very embarrassing.

For years after that, whenever that memory arose, the embarrassment came back with it. They were completely tied together. Then, on one three-month retreat, that memory arose many, many times. I really got to watch the process of this embarrassment. The memory arose, and there was a reaction to that memory in the moment. It became clear to me that the memory and the reaction and the embarrassment were different things. It also became clear that the embarrassment wasn't somehow intimately or integrally related to that memory. There was a definite sequence in the mind.

This was a great revelation—to see actually that the embarrassment wasn't somehow lurking, just waiting to pop up. It was recreated in the moment. Suffering is created in the moment. The conditions for experiencing that embarrassment did occur in the past; I was in the play, I forgot the line. But the suffering occurring on that three-month retreat was completely new—not unrelated, but created in the moment. And I can think about that now without feeling embarrassment. The embarrassment wasn't permanently connected; there was a process by which it was created from that memory.

So not only does suffering occur in the present moment, but as this example points to, the cause of the suffering—the wanting—also occurs in the present moment. Even though some of the events we may be reacting to happened in the past, the direct cause of the suffering in the present moment was the reaction in the present moment: the reaction to that memory, "I shouldn't have forgotten that line," the not wanting to have forgotten, the clinging to wishing I had been a different person at that point. The craving, the wanting—it also occurs in the present moment.

At one point in the earlier days of my practice, I had come to meditation through the breakup of a relationship and the strong emotions arising around that experience. The practice I engaged with was very much attending to my emotions in daily life—simply noticing how my emotional world was being experienced.

One of the emotions that seemed to come up regularly was loneliness. No particular surprise there. And one pattern I noticed was that every night when I went to bed, loneliness arose. Again, this didn't particularly surprise me. I thought I understood why I was lonely at that moment—it seemed so obvious why this feeling would come up when going to bed at night. I wasn't even thinking about why it was arising. And yet I was just observing the emotions, just observing. That's what my practice was at that time.

At some point during this weeks-long exploration of looking at the loneliness, I began to notice that the loneliness arose—it began—while I was setting my alarm clock. I thought that was rather odd. It was so clear: I was setting the alarm clock, and boom, the loneliness. There seemed to be some connection, but I didn't know what it was. So I just kept observing, noticing the pattern of loneliness arising when I set this alarm clock.

One night, I think because my interest was somewhat piqued, I was setting my alarm clock—a little digital alarm clock—and while I was setting it, an image arose about my ex-boyfriend. We were together in Disneyland, looking up at a marquee that had a digital clock on it. I could see there was a link between the memory and my physical sense impression. And I could also see that the loneliness arising was a reaction to that memory—something along the lines of, "Oh, poor me, I'll never have such wonderful times as we had at Disneyland."

The loneliness arose that night, but I was kind of amazed. What amazed me about seeing this was that the why of why I was lonely was not related to what I thought it was at all. It didn't particularly have to do with going to bed alone at night. It had to do with a reaction to a memory about my ex-boyfriend, triggered by a physical sense impression.

That was remarkable to me—that the mind could see this so clearly. But what amazed me even more was that the next night when I went to bed, setting the alarm clock, the memory obviously came back. It had become conscious to me. But the loneliness didn't come back. It was as if seeing how the loneliness had been created through this process had somehow dismantled it.

I didn't know how that worked or why it had happened, but it seemed to be related to having clearly seen the links and the causes in the present moment—how the suffering of the loneliness was created. I'm not saying I didn't get lonely again, but the regular every-night-going-to-bed-lonely stopped. That was a great relief, this little moment of seeing.

So in the present moment we can see how suffering is put together. We can see how our reactivity is created, the causes and conditions for it arising. And this seeing of the present-moment causes of our suffering—how it's created right here, right now—seems to have a deeper impact on the underlying tendencies toward suffering.

I hope this distinction between the why of the present moment and the why of history is clear. There are causes and conditions from history—things that happened. But present-moment suffering is occurring directly in the present moment through things happening directly in the present moment. And these things can be witnessed simply by looking at what is happening.

This exploration of what is happening—this is our path, this is our practice: to have the courage to meet what is happening. This is much of what the instructions we've been discussing point toward—meeting experience directly, underneath the layer of concepts. Meeting our body sensations, meeting our emotions, the feelings. These are things we often want to understand the why of. An emotion arises: Why am I feeling that emotion? But here and now, in this retreat particularly, we have this great opportunity to just look at what.

Let go of the why and just look at what is happening. Images, thoughts, emotions also arise in the present moment and can be experienced as simply what is arising in the present moment.

There's a distinction between seeing an arising of a thought or arising of an image or a mind state as something that's just happening in the present moment, and seeing our experience through that thought, seeing our experience through that mind state.

In terms of supporting our ability to see thoughts and images as arising experiences in the present moment, one of the tools that has been most helpful for me is to acknowledge the arising of that thought through a noting of how that thought is appearing. What I mean by that is thoughts will appear to us through some experience that we consider a thought. Sometimes it sounds like we're talking to ourselves—we hear our voice in our minds. Sometimes it sounds like somebody else is talking to us. Sometimes it sounds like there's a radio playing and it's somebody else we don't even know, and they're talking about things we don't even care about.

In these experiences, the thought is arising automatically, almost as if it's being heard. And so we can use that to support us connecting with the how of that thought, how that thought is being known. Note "hearing." Or sometimes thoughts arise as images—we see an image. I have found that using "seeing" as a note when I'm experiencing thoughts in that way directly points to the process by which that thought is coming into being through the seeing realm. Even though I know it's not that I'm actually seeing, even though I know it's not that I'm actually hearing, using that note seems to point to the thought as an arising experience, as a what is happening in the moment, as opposed to the content of the thought or believing the thought. This can help us connect to that part of our experience also as just an arising what—what's happening right now? There's an image arising: seeing.

Another way to look at what's happening in the present moment addresses something we can miss. The attitude that Rebecca was speaking about the other morning—the attitude with which we are looking at our experience—is sometimes a major part of what is happening that goes unnoticed by us. We're looking at our experience through a lens of frustration, or we're looking at our experience through a lens of wanting, and it's not really noticed that we're doing that. A tool that can support us in helping to reveal other things that might be going on is to simply check in: What's the attitude? What's my relationship to this experience? This serves as a means to help us widen the lens to see more of what is happening in the present moment.

This points to seeing an additional lens through which we're looking at experience, or a kind of larger layer of experience that perhaps hadn't been noticed. It points to the way that we do sometimes recognize that our experience is layered—that habits are layered on top of other habits, emotions on top of beliefs and other emotions. There's a layering process that often we experience and begin to really see in the present moment. We see this layered nature of our experience.

For instance, you might notice a common pattern arising: you see that there's a kind of fear very deep, and then there's anger on top of that fear, and then resistance on top of that anger—layers of our experience. Having a sense that there are these layers, we often think that the way to meet that experience, the most important part of meeting that experience, is somehow to get to that middle layer. If there's fear in the middle, and then anger outside of that, and then resistance outside of that, what I really need to pay attention to is the fear right in the middle—that's the way we think, because we understand that's kind of at the core.

But jumping over the other things that are actually happening in the present moment—the resistance, the anger—diving into the middle is jumping over what's actually going on. It's not so helpful to dive into the middle, even though we might have seen this pattern many times and know that there's fear underneath. If we are doing that and ignoring these other things in the outer layers, it's almost a violence to our minds to try to force ourselves into something when there are these other things actually happening.

So it's helpful to just notice the obvious of what is happening in the present moment. Just what is obvious. What's obvious in the body, what's obvious in our thoughts, what's obvious in our emotions. What's obvious is resistance. Resistance is what's happening right now. There's no need to push in to some idea of what we think is happening underneath.

Sayadaw U Pandita talks about investigation as being like a process of polishing a bowl—rubbing. Taking a soft cloth and rubbing is how you polish a bowl.

So this is how we explore our experience. We meet it with this kind of gentle, soft contact rather than with a chisel trying to chip it apart. The continuous contact of our mindfulness with our experience, the continuous contact with what is happening, begins to melt the layers and can reveal layers underneath other layers. Just noticing moment by moment what is happening.

I had an experience of this, seeing how these layers can be so layered, on one retreat at Spirit Rock. I was doing walking meditation, and during this retreat—it was a long retreat, and I had been doing quite a number of long retreats at that time—I was experiencing a lot of doubt, a self-doubt about whether I should be doing this. Should I be doing all of these long retreats? And the story was kind of like, "Well, I'm not worthy here somehow," something like that.

During one walking meditation, this pattern, this doubt, just kept coming up. Should I be here? Should I be doing this? And it was so strong that I realized I needed to explore it. So in the walking, I began by stopping and recognizing, "Okay, the thoughts are not present right now. I'm just meeting the experience." My intention in this walking was to stop as soon as I saw any thoughts arising. As soon as I noticed a thought coming up, I'd stop and kind of take note of that thought.

As I did this, several layers were revealed to me as I just kept looking at what's the thought that's happening right now. Notice that, keep going. And then, what's the thought that's arising?

I started by noticing these thoughts about doubt—doubt about doing these long retreats. And then the next kind of thought that was obvious when I stopped and checked in was fear somehow that I'm not good enough, that I'm not measuring up, that I'm not a good enough yogi to be doing all of these long retreats. And then underneath that, or the next thought that came up, was something like, "I'm not worthy to be dedicating my life to this. Not worthy to leave my job to do this." I had taken a long sabbatical; I was living on savings. Not worthy to leave my job for this.

The next thought was my insecurity: What's going to happen about my financial situation? And underneath that was an aversion—it's like, "This is not acceptable. I have to have control over my finances." And underneath that was this sense of vulnerability. When I hit the vulnerability, I could just be there with that. It's like, "Yeah, this is true. This is true. We're vulnerable."

So I didn't really know that this whole pattern of thought around "I shouldn't be doing long retreats" had anything to do with thinking about my financial situation until I started looking moment by moment at what is happening, what thoughts are arising, what's going on moment by moment, looking at experience.

Having this sense of these layers of experience, it's often helpful to not make assumptions about what might lie underneath the layers. That is kind of getting into the territory of "why" again, in a way. What's happening? I'm feeling disconnected and lonely. And what underlies that? Why am I feeling disconnected and lonely? Making assumptions about that is generally not so helpful. These assumptions may or may not be true.

It's quite amazing how our minds, if we make assumptions about things and believe them, will start finding out that they are true. We will gather the evidence to prove that they're true, whether or not they actually are true. They become self-fulfilling prophecies in a way. If we are looking at our experience through assumptions, we see what we expect to see.

So if you notice assumptions in your experience, at least try to hold them lightly—kind of like the assumption that I made about going to bed lonely at night. I thought I knew why that was happening, but I was willing to just meet the experience as it arose.

We do have a tendency as human beings to create meaning, and I think this is where this tendency to create assumptions comes from. We want to understand what things mean. "I'm having this emotion and this means..." "I'm having this thought and this means..." And again, this can be a self-fulfilling prophecy, this kind of creation of meaning.

There's a beautiful poem about this, the way we tend to create meaning. This is a poem by Fernando Pessoa, a Portuguese poet who wrote under various heteronyms. He created different identities and wrote under those different identities, and this particular poem comes from his Alberto Caeiro identity:

The mystery of things, where is it?
Why doesn't it come out to show us at least that it's mystery?
What do the river and tree know about it?
And what do I, who am no more than they, know about it?
Whenever I look at things and think about what people think of them,
I laugh like a brook cleanly plashing against a rock.
For the only hidden meaning of things is that they have no hidden meaning.
It's the strangest thing of all,

stranger than all poets' dreams and all philosophers' thoughts, that things are really what they seem to be, and there's nothing to understand.
Yes, this is what my senses learned on their own.
Things have no meaning. They exist.
Things are the only hidden meaning of things.

We also have a strong tendency to create meaning about our practice. Things happen in our practice, and we think, "This means..." We find ourselves not wanting to practice, and we think, "This means I'm a failure. This means I really don't want to practice. This means I'm not serious about practice." But not wanting to practice is simply a mind state that's arising in the present moment. That's all it is. It was such a huge relief to me when I recognized, "Oh, not wanting to practice is arising." It doesn't have to have any meaning attached to it. It's just not wanting to practice. It's a really great mind state to learn to recognize and simply note.

Another thing we make meaning about is our wandering mind. We're going along and practicing, and suddenly our mind starts wandering way more than it did yesterday. And we think it means something like, "Well, I must not be trying hard enough. This means I'm not being diligent enough."

I had this experience on a three-month course where the practice had been moving in the direction of more and more clarity, more ability to stay connected with the breath. It had been going quite well, I thought. And then one day I sat down and all I was doing was thinking. I was like, "Wow."

Fortunately, I had had enough experience not to make the meaning, "This means I'm a failure, this means I'm not trying hard enough." I decided to just look at what was happening. What is actually happening? How are these thoughts coming to be? And what I began to notice was that I would sit down, pay attention to the breath, and I could connect with the breath very clearly for about a second. Then I noticed that the sensations of the breath got really subtle—so subtle that I could hardly notice them anymore. And that's when the mind would wander.

This kind of thing actually happens to us a lot, I think. As our practice begins to deepen, we're holding an assumption about what we're paying attention to: "This is what my breath feels like, and this is how I pay attention to it." And yet, as we pay attention to the breath or other experience, that experience can shift. It can change. And if we are trying to pay attention in a certain way, there's going to be a disconnect and the mind may wander.

This is what I found in this experience—just trying to meet that subtlety of experience. What I learned in subsequent retreats was that it doesn't have to be a problem. I was actually trying to touch those subtle sensations, asking, "What is that? What is that feeling? How is the breath so subtle?" I was trying to force the mindfulness into that, and that wasn't so helpful either.

But at some point, one teacher—I think it was Sayadaw U Pandita—when I reported that the breath was getting so subtle that I couldn't notice it, he said, "You can just notice subtle breath." I was like, "Oh." I hadn't thought of that.

So I began using that as the note: subtle. Breath is subtle. I didn't actually have to try to figure out what the subtlety was. It's just subtle experiences.

Sometimes when the mind is wandering, it may mean that you're getting caught in something or other—check into your own experience. But sometimes, if the mind has been settling for a while and suddenly starts wandering again, at least in my experience, it has signaled a shift in the practice. There's something new to connect to, something new that's happening that the mind just isn't quite familiar with connecting with.

So letting go of the idea that it means something—either that it means the practice is going well or the practice is going horribly—and just noticing what is happening. Be on the lookout for "this means" in your thoughts, and just connect with what is happening, no matter what. The way through our experience is just to notice what, what, what is happening. It's very simple. It's not so easy, but it's very simple.

This practice—there's really only one instruction. That's all we do. Wherever we are in our practice, just meeting what we are noticing in the present moment and noticing how we're relating to it. It can be that simple.

Looking at the moment, looking at what is happening, as I pointed to earlier, begins to reveal the cause and effect nature of the unfolding of our experience. And this happens kind of automatically in a way. We don't have to try to see the cause and effect. Just by seeing a thought arise—a memory arises, a thought about that memory, a belief about that memory, and a reaction to that—just by watching what is happening, we understand how the causes and conditions are in play in the present moment. So we don't really have to try to see the why of the present moment. We just need to connect with what, what, what is happening.

I'd like to give an example from my own practice that ties a lot of these types of whats and whys together—the different kinds of whys, the why of history, the intellectualizing why, the why of the present moment. It's a pattern that for me was very strong, one that happened repeatedly. I think it came from very long ago in my past: a pattern of self-hatred and unworthiness.

I had a sense, a kind of intellectual understanding—I had done some therapy and talked about this a lot, done the intellectual thinking about why this pattern of self-hatred was there. Through that process, I had come to the understanding that there was a particular relationship it was probably connected to. I didn't have any direct evidence for that, but it just made sense. It made sense based on what the therapist said and what I had said. It just seemed to make sense. So that's the intellectual understanding that we often meet our experience with.

Then, on one three-month course, I got to watch this pattern. I had been watching the pattern on many retreats, but on this three-month course it was particularly strong. At some point I realized I didn't want this. I fought it for a while. I mean, you've got a long time on a three-month course, right? You can think, "Yep, I don't need to pay attention to that. I'm going to pay attention to arising and passing. I'm going to pay attention to just physical sensation. I'm not going to pay attention to this feeling of self-hatred."

But it was pretty strong. It kept really coming back. So finally it was like, okay, I surrender—I'm just going to accept that this is what my retreat is about. Somehow I had the belief, a meaning I had put on it, that this was a lesser kind of retreat, this retreat about self-hatred. But I did just start observing it, watching the experience as it arose.

At some point—and I don't even remember clearly how this connection was made—there was a very clear connection made to that relationship. Perhaps it arose as a thought in the moment, clearly linking. This is sometimes how this connection can get made. We can see how a history is connected to a present moment pattern through an arising of a memory in the present moment, seeing so clearly that pattern unfolding as a result of that memory. I don't remember exactly how it happened for me in this particular case, but I did see very clearly that the pattern of self-hatred in my experience was directly related to this relationship.

And in that moment there was a huge release and opening of compassion for this person and their relationship. There was a kind of understanding that happened. Now I would call this a psychological insight. It was really clear to me how my history connected with the arising pattern in the present moment. And there was an opening around it. It did feel like there was a shift somehow.

And actually I thought, oh, maybe that's taking care of the self-hatred. I was actually shocked when it came back the next time. Oh, I thought I was done with this. And actually, that psychological insight—the strength of the self-hatred was just as strong. I was shocked.

But there was a shift, and the shift was that what I think that psychological insight had helped me to see was that the pattern in my own mind, the pattern of self-hatred, was related to causes and conditions. It wasn't my fault. It was kind of just a product of the relationship—me and that person and the way we interacted. And so there was a little bit of a lessening of the me in the pattern, but the pattern kept coming up very strongly.

The shift that I noticed after that point was that it was no longer quite so scary to be with it. So I could actually meet the feeling much more clearly. I could start really looking at the what of that self-hatred without flinching.

One night—the pattern would come and go on the retreat, it would be there sometimes, it would not be there sometimes—on one dharma talk, actually it was a Q&A Joseph was doing, he answered a question about particularly sticky patterns. And he gave an instruction that had been helpful for him that I had not heard before. The instruction was that when there's a really particularly sticky pattern, it can be helpful to make a double note on the arising of the experience. And the note would be contact—that is the actual meeting of the experience—followed by the feeling tone of that contact.

I had heard this instruction, and as I was leaving the meditation hall that evening and walking up the stairs out of the walking room, the self-hatred descended. And I felt powerless to do anything about it. But I had this really strong determination to just meet it. So I went back to my room and I sat. And I just paid attention to that experience. I used this double noting that Joseph had suggested in the talk. Every time there was any kind of movement towards a "you're no good" thought arising in my mind—contact, unpleasant. I just noted it as soon as I could, just trying to meet the arising of that experience with contact, unpleasant. Just noting it, noting it, noting it.

At some point that evening, the arising of that experience, noted clearly, was just seen as a thought. This is just a thought. This is just an empty phenomenon arising in the mind. In that moment, the self-hatred vanished and bliss flooded the body. The next thought was, ah yes, and this too is impermanent. And the bliss diminished and there was just much more of a sense of balance, a recognition in that moment that there had been an insight, but that it didn't necessarily mean the pattern was gone—that it had been seen through in that moment.

And yet that moment actually had a very deep power of cutting into that pattern. I would have described it as a very deep rut in my mind before that moment. After that moment it was more like the rut was a wide bowl. It was very easy to get out of it. I attribute this to that moment of seeing "you're no good" as a thought and a belief arising in the moment. There's the thought "you're no good" and there's a belief in that thought.

This is actually an interesting phenomenon to check into—thoughts versus beliefs. The thought "you're no good" can arise in the mind, and without any belief, that thought vanishes. That's what's happening now. That's the way I experience this. Those thoughts still arise, but there's not belief in them. And that, I think, is what allowed that rut to become more of a wide bowl.

So looking into the what of experience can cut very deeply into these conditioned patterns that we have.

It can take a lot of courage to stay with our present moment experience in the face of strong suffering. And yet this is the way that the mind can understand and let go of that suffering.

This same practice of just meeting what is happening not only frees us from the reactivity that tosses us about, but also allows us to see deeply into the nature of experience. That moment of seeing, "this is just a thought"—that was a vipassanā insight. The insight into just an arising experience. That's the insight. Those are the insights that cut into our patterns and habits. Those are the insights that free us.

And it doesn't matter what you're paying attention to. It really doesn't matter. We think we have to somehow get rid of all these patterns of self-hatred. I certainly thought I did in order to have a deep insight. I thought self-hatred had to be gone first. But no, insight can come in the midst of that pattern. Deep recognition into impermanence, unreliability, not-self—these are the insights that free us, simply by noticing what is happening moment by moment.

So let's sit for a few moments.

CHAPTER 8

Dependent Origination (Paṭicca Samuppāda)

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this comprehensive talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a clear and practical exploration of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), one of the Buddha's most fundamental yet challenging teachings. She presents it as a detailed exposition of the Second Noble Truth, explaining how craving leads to suffering through an intricate chain of twelve interdependent links.
> Drawing from the Kaccānagotta Sutta (SN 12.15), Andrea explains how dependent origination represents the Buddha's "middle teaching"—a description of reality that avoids the extremes of existence and non-existence. Rather than beginning with the traditional first link of ignorance (avijjā), she starts in the middle of the chain where experience is most accessible: contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), clinging (upādāna), becoming (bhava), and birth (jāti). She illustrates these links through concrete examples, including attachment to sense pleasure and identification with being "a good yogi."
> Andrea emphasizes that this teaching can be understood as describing moment-to-moment experience rather than solely as a multi-life model—noting that the Abhidhamma itself devotes far more attention to the momentary interpretation. She identifies two particularly "weak links" in the chain where mindfulness practice is especially powerful: the junction between suffering and ignorance (where suffering can lead to faith rather than bewilderment), and between feeling and craving. The talk concludes with an inspiring passage from the Aṅguttara Nikāya affirming that all things, met with concentration and mindfulness, culminate in liberation.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination.

This teaching is one of the most fundamental and most challenging—in a way, most difficult to understand—of the Buddha's teachings. It's basically a detailed exposition of the second noble truth, the second noble truth being that the cause of suffering is craving. The exposition of dependent origination goes into great depth about how craving leads to suffering, describing a whole set of causes and conditions that lead us into suffering.

Sometimes this teaching is called the Buddha's middle teaching. I think we're most familiar with the middle way, the middle path that the Buddha taught. The middle teaching is not so much a practice but an understanding, a description of the way things are for us usually in the world. The middle path, by contrast, is the set of practices that implement a way leading to an understanding of the middle teaching.

So I'm going to reread a sutta that I read part of the other day:

"This world, Kaccāna, for the most part depends upon a duality, upon the idea of existence and the idea of non-existence. But for one who sees the origin of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no idea of non-existence in regard to the world. And for one who sees the cessation of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no idea of existence in regard to the world. 'All exists,' Kaccāna—this is one extreme. 'All does not exist'—this is the second extreme. Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathāgata teaches the Dhamma by the middle.

"With ignorance as condition, volitional formations come to be. With volitional formations as condition, consciousness. With consciousness as condition, name and form. With name and form as condition, the six sense bases. With the six sense bases as condition, contact. With contact as condition, feeling. With feeling as condition, craving. With craving as condition, clinging. With clinging as condition, existence. With existence as condition, birth. With birth as condition, aging and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, dejection, and despair come to be. Such is the origin of this whole mass of suffering."

So he teaches this as a middle teaching between the understandings of existence and non-existence. Things don't exist in the way we normally think of them existing, but there is a chain of conditions that leads to a kind of stream. And if we think of things as not existing, that's also not correct, because there is this stream.

This teaching of dependent origination is a complex teaching, as you may have heard from that long list—twelve links in this chain that he described. And I will go through them tonight, so buckle your seat belts.

The complexity of this teaching was underscored by Ānanda in an interchange with the Buddha. One day Ānanda came to the Buddha and said something along the lines of, "This teaching on dependent origination seems so clear to me." And the Buddha said something like, "Say not so, Ānanda. This teaching on dependent origination is very profound. It seems profound, and it is profound. One who understands dependent origination understands the entirety of my teaching."

So essentially, a penetrative understanding of this teaching is equated with full liberation. We probably won't understand it entirely tonight—but there's always a possibility. There's one sutta that I love to contemplate where there was a discussion between a monk and another group of monks. They were talking about a topic, and in the course of that discussion, which was basically a Dhamma talk, both the person who was speaking and the whole group of listeners became fully enlightened. So there's hope for all of us tonight.

I hope to make this talk both clear and practical, because this teaching can be kind of obscure at times. But there are some ways that in my own practice I have seen this to be very useful.

On the practical side, just to begin: why talk about this? Why go through this very detailed description? Well, partly it is a very clear causal description of how suffering comes to be. And because it describes how suffering comes to be as a chain of causes and conditions, and describes it in a very impersonal way, we can begin to understand our own suffering as being an impersonal phenomenon—not something that is particularly due to who I am, but just because of the fact of being alive. We can see the impersonal nature of this unfolding process of suffering through understanding a little bit about this teaching.

We can also understand that through this description of the causes of suffering, when we understand how suffering is caused, we may be able to connect with choices that will lead us out of this chain. In understanding the causes of suffering, we can make skillful choices that will help to unravel this chain.

So I'll go through these twelve links again. Ignorance is typically the first link—ignorance leading to mental formations.

Mental formations conditioning consciousness. Consciousness conditioning name and form—mentality and materiality is another translation of that; nāma-rūpa is the Pali. Name and form conditioning the six sense bases. The six sense bases conditioning contact. Contact conditions feeling. Feeling conditions craving. Craving conditions clinging. Clinging conditions becoming. Becoming conditions birth. Birth conditions aging and death—and thus the entire mass of suffering.

Now, a couple of things to point out about this. One is that this is generally taught as a cyclic chain. It's not a one-way path; it actually loops back on itself. So suffering is understood to in turn further condition more ignorance, leading through the cycle again.

The other thing is that it is a causal chain. The typical way we think about causality is that A causes B—B happens because of A. And that is one of the kinds of causality described in the Abhidhamma, the text on Buddhist psychology. I believe in the Abhidhamma there are something like twenty-four different kinds of causality described with respect to this chain. I'm just going to mention three of them, and I'll try to point to these a little bit as I go through the more detailed description of the elements of the chain.

There's the one I just mentioned, what we might call inducement—that because of something, something else happens. A causes B. Another one is what we might call mutual conditioning, where A conditions B and B conditions A. It's a back-and-forth relationship. The most obvious example of this kind of conditioning is the chicken and the egg. You have a chicken, and because of the chicken, the chicken can produce the egg, and then from the egg comes a chicken. So it's mutual conditioning. You're not going to have the chicken without the egg, and you're not going to have the egg without the chicken.

And then there is what is called arising together—two things arising simultaneously. Co-arising, it is sometimes called. This may be two things being caused by something else, but you're not going to have those two things apart from each other. One of the standard examples of this in the texts, at least in my understanding, is that when there is some kind of contact with the sense bases, there is an arising of a moment of consciousness that contains feeling and perception. Feeling and perception arise together. There's not one without the other, and there's not really a sense that feeling causes perception or perception causes feeling. They arise together. This is co-arising.

I think the fact that there are all these different kinds of conditionings is part of what makes this teaching so complex. I'm not going to try to go into all of the complexities; I'm going to try to keep it basically pretty straightforward tonight.

The classical teaching on this chain breaks it into three lives. Basically, there are conditions from a previous life that led into how we are in this life, and the conditions in this life will in turn impact how we are in the next life. In this form, the first two links—ignorance and mental formations—are understood to be part of a past life. Then the middle links of the chain, from consciousness through to becoming, are understood to be in this life. And everything that happens in this life is said to then lead into birth, aging, and death in the next life.

Now, it's obvious that this is a pedagogical tool, because in the previous life we have birth and aging and death; in this life we have birth and aging and death. We don't have to wait until our next life to have birth and aging and death. So it's obvious that this is a pedagogical tool—though the literal phrasing of the links does support this kind of multiple-life interpretation.

The terms used do support this multiple-life interpretation—birth does seem to indicate the birth of a body, aging and death the physical aging and death of the body. But the suttas also support an understanding of this process of dependent origination, this full cycle, as describing moment-to-moment experience.

In this case, the term for birth, jāti, is understood to be the birth into an identity, the birth into a state of selfing, basically. And the term for aging and death is understood to be the decay, the cessation of that state of being—the aging and cessation of moment-to-moment experience.

As an aside, I found something very interesting regarding these interpretations. I had heard the multiple-life model as the primary way of teaching this many, many times, with the understanding that the moment-to-moment interpretation was also possible. But I had understood that moment-to-moment reading as a more modern interpretation, something laid on top of the suttas rather than actually present in the Pali Canon.

Then I read an article by Venerable Payutto, who actually pointed out that in the Abhidhamma, which is part of the Pali Canon, there are two descriptions given of dependent origination. One is this multiple-life model of understanding how causes in a past life impact us in this present life, and how causes in this present life impact us in a future life. The other teaching is about moment-to-moment arising.

In the Abhidhamma texts, there are only five pages devoted to the multiple-life model. And there are seventy-two pages devoted to the moment-to-moment model.

In the commentarial tradition that followed the suttas and the Pali Canon, this emphasis is reversed. In the commentaries, the multiple-life model receives much more attention, and the moment-to-moment model receives much less. Our Theravāda tradition draws heavily on the commentaries, so it makes sense to me now that this multiple-life understanding is what I was mostly taught. But the moment-to-moment teaching is there. It's in the Pali Canon.

This second view—that dependent origination describes a moment-to-moment arising of experience—is one that I have personally understood, at least in parts. It has meaning for me. There's a clarity to it that helps illuminate my moment-to-moment unfolding of experience. I don't have any personal experience of previous lives or any intimations of future lives, so that teaching makes it more difficult for me to connect with dependent origination.

I'm going to approach this teaching this evening from the moment-to-moment understanding. I'll talk about it as a process that describes the moment-to-moment unfolding of suffering in our lives.

I'm going to do this in a slightly unconventional way. Typically, people begin talks on dependent origination by starting with the first link in the chain, ignorance. But I'm not going to do that. I'm going to start somewhere in the middle, where I think it's actually a little easier to understand.

Basically, we have a mind and a body. We're conscious, and we have this body and mental processes going on. Because of that, we experience input from the six sense bases. These six sense bases are the eye, the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body or touch sense organ, and the mind. We receive sense impressions through these six sense bases.

Through these sense bases, through contact with things in the world—sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch—we experience contact. This is the next link in the chain. So we have consciousness, mind and matter, the six sense bases, and because of the six sense bases, we have contact. We experience contact.

This is all relatively straightforward. It's just biology at this point. There's contact with the sense base. Based on that contact, each sense impression in all the sense doors has a flavor to it. It's either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. This is the feeling tone of experience. So based on contact, conditioned by contact, feeling arises.

Based on this feeling tone—and we've talked about much of this in various talks—based on this feeling tone of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, if something is pleasant, we like it. We want it. We want more of it. If something is unpleasant, we don't like it. We want to get rid of it. If something is neutral, we often don't connect to it or notice it at all.

So based on this feeling tone, there is wanting—wanting more of the pleasant, wanting less of the unpleasant, perhaps not wanting to connect to the neutral. We're kind of like a simple machine that tries to maximize pleasant and minimize unpleasant.

We usually act on this process of wanting automatically. Something pleasant arises, there's liking, there's wanting, and we move out to get it, to grab it, to hold onto it. We take some kind of action to grasp that object. This is clinging. Craving leads to clinging.

Once an object is clung to, our intentions and actions rally to serve that clinging—to produce or control things, to maintain the sense that we have control over what we have clung to. These intentions and actions that operate in the service of clinging are what we call becoming. We actually like becoming. We like feeling like we know where we're headed. We like feeling like we have some sense of control, like we know something.

Following on from becoming—the intention toward control, the doing around our clinging—birth arises. This is birth into some kind of identity. Things become "me" or "mine." This might take an obvious form: "This is my thing, this is my shawl." Or it might be something more subtle, like "I'm the kind of person who likes to walk in the woods." Birth is where there's a sense of identity, a sense of one separate from another. When there's self, there's other.

This chain of dependent origination can be understood not only as a description of how suffering is created, but also as a description of the process of identification, the process of selfing that we've explored in past weeks. From here, once there is this birth, the Buddha says that suffering is inevitable. Having taken birth into an identity, there is the inevitable falling apart of that identity—evidence that we don't have the control over that identity that it feels it should have.

Let me offer a couple of examples to give you more of a flavor for these links in the chain. The first example concerns sense pleasure. There's contact with a sense object—say, the sight of a beautiful flower. There's contact with the eye, and then a feeling of pleasure arises based on that contact. Based on that feeling of pleasure, wanting forms—this desire to have this pleasant thing. Then comes clinging, the actual taking possession.

There's sometimes a question about the distinction between craving and clinging. Bhikkhu Bodhi, the great translator of the Pali Canon, offers a helpful description. He talks about craving as the movement of a thief reaching out to take something, and clinging as the moment he has grabbed it. They lead from one to another along a continuum, from craving to clinging. So clinging is actually taking possession of the thing we want.

Becoming comprises the intentions and actions designed to control things according to that clinging—to keep the thing protected or safe. Birth is the clear sense of identification or possessiveness: "This flower is mine." It's feeling that one owns or controls or possesses that thing. And then aging and death: one who possesses something must ultimately be separated from it, whether through the loss of the thing or through the death of oneself. All accumulation ends in dispersal. This is one of the teachings around impermanence. Whenever one has something, there will inevitably be separation from it.

So there's suffering in this. If there's attachment to having, there's going to be suffering in the loss. There's also suffering in the fear of loss. The suffering we experience is in direct proportion to the intensity of attachment, the intensity of clinging, and the intensity of identification—that feeling of "I am the one who has this thing."

That's one example. Now another, somewhat more complex, is what we might call a life-state example. This is actually more along the lines of how we typically suffer, because we largely suffer over things that we think we are. We do sometimes suffer over loss of possessions, but I think we really suffer more over some kind of identity that we hold.

"I'm the kind of person who doesn't make mistakes." When we hold such an identity and then make a mistake, there's a conflict with reality, and we really suffer from that.

Let me go through an example of this as well. The contact with the sense door is with the mind—some kind of an idea of being, perhaps an idea of being a good yogi. There's the contact, that contact with the sense door. And then there's some kind of feeling around that. This is probably fairly complex, actually, but for the sake of this example, let's just say that the idea of being a good yogi creates a pleasant feeling. There may be a kind of fantasy around being a good yogi that creates a pleasant feeling tone.

The craving is the desire to have that fantasy, that idea of that pleasurable state, become a reality. The clinging here is around a fixed attitude. It's an intensification of that desire—the desire to become a good yogi becomes intensified to the point where it becomes a fixed attitude: "I need to become a good yogi. I need this to be happy. I will accomplish this." The clinging has more of an intensification to it.

From those fixed attitudes, those beliefs, patterns of behavior arise that serve that belief. We are in the process of becoming at this point. When those intentions arise to serve those beliefs—the intentions to behave in a certain way in the meditation hall, the intention to follow the schedule, the intention to sit long, whatever it is—those intentions are the process of becoming.

Birth is the sense of taking the identity of that belief. One has the feeling that one is a good yogi. Perhaps everything confirms this. You can sit longer than anybody else, or you eat slower than anybody else, and you walk more slowly and open the doors more carefully. Everything is confirming to you that you are a good yogi. This is the birth. There's this distinct feeling of self that has arisen around this pattern.

Aging and death: whenever there is a sense of a self occupying a position, sooner or later there will be something that happens that deprives that self of that position. There's a sitting where you find you can't stay mindful for two seconds together. This runs counter to the identification, to that birth into that identity, and there is suffering. In my experience, there now becomes some kind of belief: "Oh, I'm not a good yogi." And this is very painful, because what I wanted was to be a good yogi.

Now I'd like to go back to those parts of the chain that I haven't gotten to yet—the ones at the beginning: ignorance, mental formations, and consciousness. But first I want to make the point that because this chain is cyclic, it is understood that suffering leads to ignorance. In fact, the Buddha has a famous quote that suffering either leads to bewilderment or to search:

"And what is the result of suffering? There are some cases in which a person overcome with pain, her mind exhausted, grieves, mourns, laments, beats her breast, becomes bewildered. Or when overcome with pain, her mind exhausted, comes to search outside: 'Who knows a way or two to stop this pain?' I tell you that suffering results either in bewilderment or in search."

So this suffering leads to ignorance. A main definition of ignorance is not understanding the Four Noble Truths—that's one of the main definitions in the texts. One who does not understand the Four Noble Truths, his mind, her mind is clouded with ignorance. Ignorance means that we don't understand suffering. We don't understand what leads to suffering. In ignorance, we think we know what will lead to our happiness. We think that having what we want will lead to our happiness. But as you have seen, I think, in your own experience, actually having what we want doesn't go very far. It actually just takes us deeper into this cycle of suffering.

Deeper into this cycle of dissatisfaction, we begin to see that actually having what we want doesn't go very far.

So the basic condition for suffering to lead to ignorance is that suffering is not understood. What causes suffering is not understood. If suffering is met with wisdom and understanding instead of ignorance, this chain leads in a completely different direction. It actually leads out of the chain of suffering and into a chain of liberation. This is one of the places where we can really bring our attention. Understanding suffering with wisdom begins to break this cycle. But mostly we don't meet suffering with wisdom, and ignorance results.

So the next link: with ignorance as a condition, mental formations come to be. Based on ignorance, based on this not understanding suffering, intentions and actions are formed about how we choose things, decide things, do things, behave. These intentions around how we are going to engage in the world—this is mental formation. Mental formations are essentially the habits and patterns that lead us forward in this cycle. We often take the most obvious step to get rid of our unpleasant sensations and to hold on to our pleasant sensations, moving us into this chain of pleasant leading to wanting leading to clinging. This is ignorance leading into mental formation. Because of ignorance, we intend and act in ways that run in line with ignorance, that run counter to wisdom.

With mental formations as a condition, consciousness comes to be. We can think of these habits and patterns, our choices, our intentions, as conditioning the nature of our consciousness and what we experience. For example, if you have a habitual pattern of responding with anger, if there's a habitual inclination towards anger, then that becomes a kind of filter in our consciousness. We tend to pick things out of the environment that confirm or support that anger. We have an orientation towards a pattern. Mental formations are basically an orientation in our minds, and because of that orientation, our consciousness picks certain things out of our environment and doesn't pick other things. Certain things come to consciousness, other things do not come to consciousness, because of those mental formations.

We've talked about this in past weeks, about how filters have us choosing certain experiences out. We filter things in and out of our experience. There's one amazing study some of you may have heard about that really highlights this ability of the mind to filter experience. People were asked to view a short video clip of people passing a basketball to each other. They were told to count the number of times the basketball passed between various people on the team. That was their task while watching this video. The vast majority of people could count the number of passes, but they neglected to see that during the course of this video, a person in a large gorilla suit came out, walked onto the basketball court, danced around for a while, and then walked off. When they were asked about this, they said they hadn't seen it. In fact, they didn't believe it when they were told that it had happened. They didn't believe the gorilla was in the video. This is an example of how a perception can filter in and out experience. Our mental formations, what we are intending to see and do, impacts what we experience, impacts our consciousness.

So consciousness leading to name and form, or mentality-materiality. This is sometimes a confusing term—mind and matter, different translations render it differently. Basically, the materiality part refers to the processes of our body. The mentality part refers to most of the processes of our mind: the process of perception, the process of feeling, the process of mental formations. One very clear definition I've seen is that mentality-materiality is the four aggregates excluding the aggregate of consciousness. We've talked about the aggregates several times—the five aggregates of consciousness, feeling, perception, mental formations, and form, or body. These two links, consciousness and mentality-materiality, are the entirety of the five aggregates: mentality-materiality being those four—feeling, perception, mental formations, and body—with consciousness being separate.

Now this link is interesting because there is an understanding that these two are mutually conditioning each other. I mentioned the chicken and the egg before. In one sutta, the Buddha described that he saw consciousness conditions mind and matter. When he went back, trying to go further back, he thought, "Well, what conditions that?" Mind and matter conditions consciousness, and consciousness conditions mind and matter. It goes back and forth.

Based on the state of our consciousness—for example, if our consciousness is flavored by anger—then our body may respond, may become tense. We tend to perceive things as unpleasant. We experience things as unpleasant. So at this point we're back where we started: we have a mind and a body. And because we have a mind and a body, there's contact, feeling...

craving—and you can see how, with a mind that is already flavored by ignorance, with mental formations inclined to screen certain things out and certain things in, how this pattern of unfolding conditions will tend to lead us through this cycle over and over again. It's a pretty potent cycle. It tends to reinforce itself.

But it can be broken apart. It can be unraveled with mindfulness.

This chain describes conditions that support and lead to suffering. If the conditions are changed, we can change the course of our minds. And the main way to change the conditions is through mindfulness, understanding, and wisdom. Attention to understanding any of these twelve links will support its unraveling.

So this is good news. Anywhere you are in your experience, wherever you wake up, whatever moment of experience you are waking up into—if you're connecting to it in that moment with mindfulness and non-judgmental awareness, you're working to unravel this chain. You're working to understand the craving, if that's what you've woken up into, or perhaps the feeling of an identification, a strong sense of identity around a beingness of something. You wake up there, you bring the mindfulness there, and it begins to unravel this chain.

There are some particularly weak links to this chain that the Buddha highlighted. I've already mentioned one of them, but I'll come back to it. Two main weak links: the link between suffering and ignorance, and the link between feeling and craving.

As I mentioned before, many of us come to spiritual practice through meeting suffering. And the Buddha said that suffering leads to bewilderment or to search. If that search is lucky enough to hear a liberative teaching, there is the possibility that instead of leading from suffering to ignorance, suffering met with an understanding of a liberative path—instead of leading to ignorance—suffering will lead to faith. Faith that there's a way out of this, that there's a teaching that proclaims a way to work with suffering to become free of it.

And then there's another chain, called the transcendent dependent origination, which takes us from faith to gladness, to rapture, to tranquility, happiness, concentration, knowledge and vision, disenchantment, dispassion, liberation. In the same kind of causal chain that this chain of suffering leads us step by step into suffering over and over again, this chain leads us step by step to freedom.

The work at this link from suffering is to understand it, to bring mindfulness to it. The first noble truth says suffering should be understood. This has been a huge part of our practice here in these weeks and months—understanding our suffering, not judging it, but understanding how it comes to be in our present moment experience. You've all seen this. You've all seen, even in small ways, how understanding suffering leads to a release from that suffering. It may simply be a small movement of mindfulness that can hold suffering and not be reactive. And in that non-reactivity is a clue, a hint of freedom.

The other link I'd like to mention is the link between feeling and craving. The Buddha emphasized this in many places in the suttas, that paying attention to feeling is a very powerful practice. Part of the reason it's so powerful is because it's the link before which we leap into reactivity. Feeling leads to craving, but that link is relatively weak.

Some of the links, like contact leading to feeling, that's a strong link. I hear that it's possible to see between them. I don't think I've seen that. But I have clearly seen the feeling to craving link and seen that a modicum of mindfulness at feeling just short-circuits that movement to craving entirely. When we can clearly recognize, "Oh, this is a pleasant experience, this is an unpleasant experience," the craving may be completely abandoned. It may not arise at all. This is an extremely powerful practice.

There's a sutta that addresses this. This isn't exactly another chain, but it is a list. I'll read it. This is from the Anguttara Nikāya: "All things are rooted in desire. They come to actual existence through attention, originate from contact, and converge on feelings."

This part maps onto those first links of dependent origination in a rough way. Basically we've got contact and feeling as clear places where they link together. Things are rooted in desire, come to actual existence through attention, originate from contact, and converge on feelings. And then it goes in a different direction—kind of like the link from suffering to faith goes in a different direction at that link in the chain.

It says: the foremost of all things is concentration. All things are mastered by mindfulness. Their peak is wisdom, their essence liberation. All things merge in the deathless, and Nibbana is their culmination.

This isn't a causal list like dependent origination, but it does point to the link at feeling being mastered by mindfulness and concentration—the moment-to-moment mindfulness of the flow of our experience, the concentration that results from that. The foremost of all things is concentration. All things are mastered by mindfulness. Their peak is wisdom, their essence liberation. Clearly seeing and knowing our experience moment to moment, wherever we are in that chain, is the path towards the dismantling of that chain.

The other thing I appreciate about this sutta is that it refers to all things. All things have liberation as their essence. All things merge in the deathless. All things culminate in Nibbana with mindfulness and concentration. This is all things the Buddha is talking about. The touch of a doorknob, the state of anger—all things culminate in liberation if we attend to them with concentration, mindfulness, and wisdom. It does not matter what we bring our attention to. It doesn't matter where in that chain of suffering we've woken up. It does not matter.

Mindfulness and concentration, combined with a little bit of understanding of how this process works, can lead us out of this chain of suffering to the end of suffering.

All things are rooted in desire. They come to actual existence through attention, originate from contact, and converge on feelings. The foremost of all things is concentration. All things are mastered by mindfulness. Their peak is wisdom, their essence liberation. All things merge in the deathless, and Nibbana is their culmination.

CHAPTER 9

Equanimity

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of upekkhā (equanimity), one of the four brahmavihārās and a quality present in every wholesome mind state. Drawing from the Lokavipatti Sutta (AN 8.6), she explains how both ordinary people and well-instructed disciples experience the eight worldly winds—gain and loss, praise and blame, fame and disgrace, pleasure and pain—but differ fundamentally in their response to these conditions.

Fella clarifies common misunderstandings about equanimity, distinguishing it from flatness, indifference, or non-action. True equanimity, she explains, allows us to touch life more deeply, supporting compassionate engagement with the world while maintaining balance around results. She describes equanimity's near enemy (indifference or the "equanimity of not knowing") and far enemy (the reactivity of greed and aversion), offering practical guidance for recognizing each in meditation.

The talk details multiple pathways for cultivating equanimity: studying reactivity through mindful attention to vedanā (feeling tone), developing concentration that suppresses the hindrances, and deepening wisdom through understanding kamma and anattā. Fella shares personal examples of working with wanting and judgment, illustrating how mindfulness can meet reactive energy like "jumping on a wild horse" and redirect it skillfully. She concludes by describing equanimity towards all formations (saṅkhārupekkhā) as the final stage before awakening—not cold detachment, but the manifestation of highest strength rooted in complete understanding.

As we live our lives, we inevitably encounter conditions that blow us around—conditions of praise or blame, gain and loss, status, disgrace, pleasure and pain. These are known as the eight worldly winds. They are an inevitable part of our worldly life. Even here on retreat we experience these qualities, these winds blowing through.

Typically we react to these circumstances. We like the praise, the pleasure, the status or fame, and the gain. We don't like their opposites. And there's some part of us that thinks—and we've been told endlessly by our society, by the mass media—that happiness consists in having the praise, the gain, the status, and the pleasure. So we somehow think there's something wrong with us, something wrong with our lives, that we've done something wrong if we're experiencing their opposites.

The Buddha had a different view of them. Words from the Buddha: "For an ordinary person, there arise gain, loss, status, disgrace, censure, praise, pleasure, and pain. For a well-instructed disciple of the noble ones, there also arises gain, loss, status, disgrace, censure, praise, pleasure, and pain."

So if you thought enlightenment was going to make you endlessly feel pleasure, gain, and the rest, the Buddha says otherwise. What's the difference, then, between the ordinary person experiencing these things and the well-instructed disciple experiencing these things?

He says, "For an ordinary person, when gain arises, he does not reflect, 'Gain has arisen for me. It is inconstant, stressful, and subject to change.' He does not discern it as it actually is." Likewise for all the others. "His mind remains consumed with the gain. He welcomes the arisen gain and rebels against the arisen loss. He is not released, I tell you, from dukkha." Likewise for all the other seven.

"Now gain arises for a well-instructed disciple of the noble ones. She reflects, 'Gain has arisen for me. It is inconstant, stressful, and subject to change.' She discerns it as it actually is. Her mind does not remain consumed with the gain. She does not welcome the arisen gain or rebel against the arisen loss. As she thus abandons welcoming and rebelling, she is released, I tell you, from dukkha."

So the difference seems to be in one's response to these things, not that they stop happening to us. There are many stories in the suttas of people coming to see the Buddha and heaping praise on him or heaping blame on him. Even the Buddha was not sheltered from these worldly winds, but his mind was sheltered.

The quality that shelters our mind from these winds is equanimity. It is a beautiful quality of mind that we cultivate, that is cultivated as we practice. It is a balance of mind, a mind that doesn't react to pleasant or unpleasant. It's a mind that accepts things as they are, understands things as they are—non-reactivity, spaciousness, ease.

The quality of equanimity, along with several other qualities, is understood to be in every wholesome mind state. Equanimity, along with mindfulness, non-greed, non-aversion, faith, and quite a few others, are said to be in every wholesome mind state. So we cultivate these wholesome mind states, and equanimity is cultivated along with them.

Sometimes when we hear about equanimity, one of the descriptions is that it leads to a neutrality towards beings—there's not reactivity one way or the other towards beings. When we hear that it's a kind of neutrality, we think of flatness, of non-responsiveness. But equanimity is not a flat emotion. I do think of equanimity as an emotion, one of the beautiful emotions of an open heart, along with the other brahmaviharas: metta, karuna, and mudita—kindness, compassion, and sympathetic joy. These four form the emotional map, in a way, of the heart that is free from clinging.

So this emotion of equanimity is not one of flatness or indifference. It is the emotion that allows compassion and mudita to deeply experience the joys and the sorrows of this world without being swept away by them. Equanimity allows us to touch life more deeply. It's anything but flat and indifferent. It is not indifference or apathy.

Another misunderstanding about equanimity is that it means simply settling back and being with things as they are—that one doesn't take action. But equanimity is not necessarily associated with non-action. The quality of compassion engages us to act in the world, engages us to meet suffering and do something about it. Equanimity supports that action and allows us to be balanced around the results of that action. Causes and conditions come together in this world from so many different directions that we cannot guarantee our actions will produce the results we are aiming for. Equanimity allows us to be at ease with this.

The quality of equanimity is not something we can cultivate directly in a way. It's supported by conditions. It grows out of the practice. It's a result of the practice. I'd like to talk about some of the ways that equanimity does grow out of the practice.

The first way is by studying what gets in the way of equanimity, what counters it. This is one way we can study equanimity—by understanding its opposite. We can also cultivate conditions that directly support equanimity, cultivate wisdom that supports equanimity. And then there's the formal practice of equanimity, which we'll talk about perhaps briefly tonight, but then again on Tuesday night.

The practice of cultivating equanimity really does begin when we first sit down on the meditation cushion and start to see how reactive our minds are. We study what gets in the way of balance of mind by studying reactivity—reactivity to things as they are. This is one of the things the Buddha pointed to as the difference between an ordinary person and a well-instructed person. The ordinary person does not discern gain, praise, status, and so forth as it actually is. The well-instructed disciple discerns gain as it actually is.

This term, "as it actually is," is a translation of the Pali term yathā-bhūta, which means something like "as it actually is" or "as it has come to be" or "things as they are." The present moment is given. It is as it is. It is things as they are. And in meeting the present moment, we rebel against it. We either want it to be different in some way, or we want it to stay. We want to hold on to it. We often struggle with things as they are, wishing they were some other way.

From Ajahn Sumedho: "It's a great relief to accept things the way they are, because the only real misery is wanting to see them in some other way."

So we push away things as they are. We're averse to them. There's that kind of reactivity. Or we hold on, wanting it to stay a certain way, trying to keep things arranged so that we can maintain the gain, the praise, the pleasure. That holding on, that clinging, actually obstructs the true meeting with that experience. In some way, that clinging actually separates us from the experience. It obstructs the balance of mind that understands this is a phenomenon that will arise and pass away.

So much of our practice has to do with meeting this reactivity. And we are cultivating equanimity every moment when we're meeting this kind of reactivity. Sometimes this is hard to see. It's hard to really take in. We're so often oriented around looking at our struggles as being what we're paying attention to that we're not noticing that along with that mindfulness of the difficulty, mindfulness of the struggle, beautiful qualities are being cultivated—the quality of mindfulness, the quality of faith, the quality of equanimity.

In fact, you might even say that during the times of difficulty in practice, the mind is actually growing much stronger. When we meet those difficulties with mindfulness, there's much more cultivation of wholesome qualities going on than when things are easy. Kind of like that story Will talked about last night—the story of the mistress and the servant, where the servant wanted to test her mistress's patience of mind. Without those tests, we don't meet the difficulties that allow us to expand our capacity for equanimity.

So we practice by meeting this, meeting these difficulties. And as we practice this, we get little glimpses of what equanimity means. We notice in observing some kind of reactivity, a wanting, that as we bring our mindfulness to it, there's a little bit of space around it. And it's not such a problem. Seeing that difficulty through a spacious mind, there is balance in the mind. And there's a shift. I know you've all experienced this kind of shift. This shift is a movement towards equanimity.

It's a beginning of seeing that quality of equanimity. Or perhaps in observing reactivity, you actually see in a moment when the reactivity vanishes. And then you get a deeper taste of this quality of equanimity, the vanishing of that reactivity. The mind opens to that space of non-reactivity.

On one retreat, I was exploring wanting, the quality of wanting in the mind, particularly when I was doing walking meditation. I was doing walking meditation out front here a lot in the early part of the three-month course, and I really noticed, as many of you have probably noticed, that I really wanted to look at people while I was doing walking meditation. Initially, I was being a good yogi and just had blinders on—I'm not going to look—just forcing myself not to look.

At some point I realized that wanting was arising, and that since that was what was coming up, I should observe that. It took me ages to actually realize that that was what was happening and that's what I should be doing, as opposed to trying to force myself to stay with the walking while wanting was arising.

So I began to explore the wanting, to explore that quality in my mind and in my body. I didn't look—I still refrained from looking—but I began to get interested in how it arose and how it operated in my mind. I would notice that as I was doing the walking meditation, if somebody appeared in my peripheral vision, the wanting would arise as soon as that person appeared. I wouldn't look up, but I just felt the wanting. It felt like this magnetic pull. Oh, I want to look. I so wanted to look at that person. But I didn't. I just watched them in my peripheral vision, so I couldn't really tell who they were. And then they walked in front of me, up the stairs, into the building. As soon as the door closed, the wanting was gone.

That was pretty cool—to see that release from the wanting. And so for some number of days, I kind of got into watching this wanting, feeling the wanting and almost waiting for the person to disappear from my sight so I could watch the wanting disappear.

After some days of this, I finally realized that I was actually holding onto the wanting in order to see it disappear. Somebody was walking, and I noticed there was just this subtle holding onto the wanting in order to see it disappear when they walked around the corner or whatever they did. I saw in that moment that there was no need to hold onto the wanting, and the wanting vanished like that. It felt like being released from a vice grip.

This release, seeing this release from reactivity, feeling like you've been released—this is a taste of equanimity.

Through the practice of observing reactivity, as this example demonstrates to some extent, the mind begins to learn its own contribution to the reactivity. Partly we are blessed in a way because our minds actually want to move towards happiness; we just fundamentally misunderstand how that happiness is to be found. When we bring mindfulness to our experience, when we bring mindfulness to reactivity, the mind begins to understand that the reactivity is created in its own place, that the mind itself is creating that reactivity. It sees that the reactivity is the source of the suffering and that it is creating its own suffering. When it sees that, when the mind sees that, it lets go.

As the mind starts to understand this through the mindful attention to wanting and aversion, it begins to let them go slowly. It's a slow process. Over time, what we might call the gravitational pull towards greed and aversion, towards the habits and patterns that we have around pleasant and unpleasant—that gravitational pull begins to weaken. And instead, the gravitational pull to balance of mind, to non-reactivity, grows stronger.

I remember feeling this. It was almost like feeling a rubber band at one point. I was walking back to my room on one retreat, and I saw somebody over in the woods on the side. There was an immediate sense of wanting to look at them and judge them. Even though I had no idea what they were doing or who they were, there was this feeling arising of wanting to judge them, this pull to look at them and judge them. As that pull happened, there was a stronger pull back that was like, don't need to go there. A pull towards non-reactivity, non-judgment. It just felt like a rubber band was pulling me back to center.

The practice of bringing mindfulness to reactivity is one that you're all quite familiar with at this point. In my daily life, this practice of noticing when the mind starts to move into reactivity is a huge part of my practice.

Mindfulness is relatively at a low level operating much of the time. And so if there's any movement towards reactivity, the mindfulness is often right there. What's begun to happen is that it feels almost like there's a rising of energy around the reactivity—a sense of a welling up of something. "This isn't right. I've got to change this. I've got to do this. I've got to fix this." There's a rising of energy.

And the mindfulness, it feels to me, kind of moves in and connects with that energy, like you might jump on the back of a wild horse. That energy is just a very strong movement towards reactivity. The mindfulness can meet that like jumping on the back of a wild horse—like an Aikido move in a way. The mindfulness meeting that energy and then, with a quarter turn, redirecting the energy elsewhere. The mindfulness meeting that reactivity can then be fed by the energy of that reactivity, and the mindfulness can grow and strengthen. It's quite an interesting exploration. It takes not being reactive to reactivity—just the willingness to meet that reactivity, to jump on it like jumping on a wild horse, to simply connect with the reactivity.

One powerful support for the cultivation of equanimity is mindfulness of feeling—attending to whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. We've talked about this in various ways. Joseph talked about the qualities of feeling in one talk, and I referred to it in the talk on dependent origination, in which when we pay attention to feeling, we can short-circuit the seemingly automatic movement to craving. If we can bring our mindful attention to feeling tone, we can greatly support this non-reactivity, the movement of non-reactivity or non-movement of reactivity.

This is a really beautiful place to explore in our practice. It can short-circuit the movement in that chain of dependent origination. And in that seeing of feeling as it actually is—meeting pleasant, meeting unpleasant, meeting neutral with mindfulness—craving does not arise. When craving doesn't arise, clinging doesn't arise. When clinging doesn't arise, becoming doesn't arise. When becoming doesn't arise, identification doesn't arise. And nor does suffering. This is a very powerful place to practice—a direct cultivation of the quality of mind, the meeting of feeling tone that supports non-reactivity.

When we neither reject what is unpleasant nor try to hold on to what is pleasant, we are beginning to come into alignment with the truth of things as they are. And this alignment with truth allows us to simply be at ease. When we actually settle into the truth of the way things are, there's a way in which our whole system just relaxes. It's not a problem.

We can also begin to explore the terrain of equanimity through noticing what might be called its near enemy. I've just been talking about its far enemy—the far enemy of equanimity being the reactivity of greed and aversion. The near enemy of equanimity is something like indifference.

Indifference may result from a slight disconnection from experience, from just not really being there with experience. Indifference might result from a kind of not knowing, or it might result from a slight aversion to the experience. One of my friends, in exploring this in her own experience, said to me, "I've come to the understanding that the quality of equanimity isn't one of 'I don't care.'" She said, "If my mind is saying 'I don't care,' there's a little bit of pushing away there." She said the feeling of equanimity is more like, "I don't mind this." I thought that was a beautiful way to understand the distinction between indifference and equanimity.

Exploring this in your own experience, it can be subtle at times—equanimity versus indifference. Delusion can be a great mask and have us think that we're equanimous when actually there is a cloud in front of our minds. Sometimes this is called the equan-imity of not knowing. In the Visuddhimagga, this is the term used for the near enemy of equanimity: the equanimity of not knowing. This not knowing is not knowing the truth of impermanence, of unreliability, of ephemerality—of anicca, dukkha, anatta.

For instance, we might feel like we're equanimous about some of our possessions, but that equanimity, that feeling of equanimity, might be based in a subtle or not so subtle feeling that we have control over our possessions. And if something happens to point out to us that we don't really have control over our possessions, that equanimity will be revealed as false equanimity.

Another way to explore this—think of it as an analogy. You have a relationship with somebody, and you feel like you're pretty balanced around that relationship. And they die. They're killed in an accident. And you don't know this.

You're still feeling a sense of balance, of peacefulness, of calm around your relationship with that person. Then say a week later, you find out that they have died. There may be a shift in your feeling to one of grief, frustration, sorrow, perhaps anger. In the week intervening, that equanimity was the equanimity of unknowing. It was not based in understanding the truth of things as they are.

What I've been exploring has been the things that are in the way of equanimity—exploring the reactivity, exploring the indifference. Now I'd like to talk about another way to cultivate and explore equanimity, and that's to understand the conditions that help bring about equanimity and to cultivate those conditions.

One of the main supports for equanimity, for the quality of equanimity to arise, is concentration. If we look at the list of the seven factors of awakening that Greg talked about, concentration precedes equanimity. So let's explore this a little bit. How does this work? How does the practice of concentration support the understanding and the experience of equanimity?

As the mind gets concentrated, settled, stabilized on experience, one of the hallmarks of the concentrated mind is that the hindrances are suppressed—the hindrances of sense desire, of hatred, of sloth and torpor, of restlessness, and of doubt. Those reactive qualities of mind are at bay when the mind is concentrated. This is one of the reasons why concentration feels so good, because those qualities of mind are not present. The mind without hindrances is a mind that is not reactive. And so you can get a taste of that flavor, the taste of equanimity, through concentration.

Now, this is a constructed kind of equanimity. It's not the equanimity of understanding. It's the equanimity of conditions coming together such that the hindrances are suppressed for a time. But it gives you a flavor of what it's like for the mind to be non-reactive. So cultivating concentration supports this quality of equanimity.

The cultivation of mindfulness also supports equanimity. As I mentioned earlier in the talk, wholesome consciousness includes—every wholesome consciousness includes—mindfulness, non-greed, non-aversion, equanimity. So the cultivation of mindfulness brings along this quality of equanimity, the continuity of mindfulness. This is perhaps talking more about the open, spacious awareness, the choiceless awareness, not necessarily about the concentration that comes from one-pointed attention on a single object, but the stability of awareness over time. With continuous mindfulness over many moments, the quality of equanimity will begin to be felt more strongly.

In a way it's kind of like this: you're experiencing just moment after moment of arising experience—a pressure, a sight, a breath, a sound, an emotion, a thought—just moment after moment of rapidly changing experience. With the mind right there with each changing experience, there's no room for reactivity. So you can get a taste, a flavor, of this balance of mind.

Some of the key supporting conditions for equanimity are wisdom and insight. There are two main understandings that are said to really deeply support equanimity, and they are an understanding of karma, which Rebecca talked about a few nights ago, and the understanding of not-self. I'd like to briefly talk about each of these and how these understandings support equanimity.

Karma, just to remind you or review a little of what Rebecca said the other night, is a natural law of cause and effect. When our actions are motivated by skillful intentions, it leads us towards happiness, towards non-suffering. When our actions are motivated by unskillful intentions, it tends to lead us towards suffering. When we choose skillfully, happiness tends to follow. When we choose unskillfully, suffering, dukkha, tends to follow.

We have these moments of choice, and oftentimes, if we're not able to be mindful, these moments of choice are not seen. Habits and patterns make our choices for us. Greed arises and makes the choice to do something. Aversion arises and makes the choice to do something. As we become more and more mindful, we begin to see that there can be a kind of insertion of wisdom into these choice points, and we can steer the ship—or rather, wisdom can steer the ship. It's not really us steering the ship, but wisdom can steer the ship in a different direction.

So how does this understanding support equanimity? I think there are two parts to how it supports equanimity. First, there's the understanding that essentially how we are experiencing the present moment—the feeling of the present moment—arises as a result of our past choices. The feeling tone, the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality of the present moment, is determined by our past choices. We can't change the past. So this is part of the understanding of karma that supports equanimity.

At first glance, it may not seem to. It may seem like if I'm experiencing something in the present moment that's unpleasant, then regret would be the result of understanding karma. I made bad choices.

We seem to think that beating ourselves up in the present over something we did in the past is somehow an effective way to help us not do those things in the future. But the understanding of karma is an understanding that we can't change the past.

The second piece of it is that our response to the present moment is what creates our future. The response to the present moment is how we step forward into the future. So we have some degree of agency. As I said, wisdom can arise. When wisdom arises in the present moment and responds to that moment of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral with balance of mind, without reactivity, we are moving towards happiness instead of unhappiness.

When we deeply understand how karma functions, it supports equanimity. It's a deep recognition that it's like this due to causes and conditions.

So that's one understanding around how the understanding of karma supports the movement of equanimity in our own arising experience. There's another understanding around equanimity towards beings. The equanimity about other people, other beings, is supported by understanding that all beings are subject to the same law of cause and effect, the same law of karma, and that their happiness and unhappiness also depends upon their own choices. We can't make their choices for them. We cannot choose to make them happy. They need to make that choice. And with that understanding also comes a sense of balance of mind around the happiness and unhappiness of other beings.

It's interesting to think about and reflect on how the causes and conditions between people interweave. I had a really clear example of this on one retreat. I was doing a lot of meditation in my room, and because of my back problem, I had put a futon on the floor. I was doing most of my meditation lying on the futon. I was in a single room with my bed there, and the futon took up most of the rest of the space.

About halfway through the retreat—it was a month-long retreat—I opened my door, and there was somebody sitting on the futon on the floor in my room. There was instant confusion. I closed the door. I looked at the number on the door. Yep, it's my room. I went back in, and she said, "This is the room they assigned me to. The retreat must be full."

I said, "There's some mistake." Indeed, the manager had told her she was in my room. She had gone into my room, seen the futon on the floor, and thought, "Wow, this retreat must be really full. They're putting two people in single rooms." And she decided to move in. She had unpacked all of her things and made the bed.

I got it straightened out because I had been a manager at Spirit Rock, so I knew where to find her room assignment. The manager was off for the afternoon, so I found her correct room and got her settled.

But I kind of reflected on the amazing confluence of events that had led to this. If I hadn't been doing lying meditation on my floor, she would have walked into somebody else's room, seen there was somebody there, and gone back to the manager saying he gave her the wrong room number. If the manager had been a little more diligent and careful, he would have written down the right room number. If she hadn't been so open and willing to sleep on the floor, she never would have moved in. It just stunned me. It was like, wow, look at all of these pieces that came together, all of these threads that created that experience.

I was pretty balanced around it. I wasn't angry. I wasn't reactive. I was just amazed at how these threads interweave. Our reactivity around circumstances—typically what we do is blame somebody. Somebody else is at fault for these things. But the happiness and unhappiness of our experience, the reactivity or non-reactivity, is entirely in our own minds. It doesn't have to be at the mercy of other people's choices.

This is really the good news of karma, and the reason it supports an understanding of equanimity.

Then there's the understanding of not-self, which supports equanimity. As we begin to see very clearly that there isn't a continuous being here that chooses, decides, feels, but rather a process of choosing that chooses, a process of feeling that feels, a process of knowing that knows—we see that there is no one to defend, to protect.

There's no reason to defend or protect. There's no need for reactivity when we see that it's just a process unfolding.

The degree to which we understand this truth of not-self is the degree to which we experience equanimity. Equanimity unfolds in degrees for us. At times we feel more equanimous than others. Our practice can be looked at as an unfolding or a deepening of this understanding of equanimity. We get little tastes of it at first, begin to get a flavor, an understanding of the flavor of equanimity. We may get some more extended periods of time of equanimity.

These wisdom teachings—the teachings of karma, the teaching of not-self—can support the cultivation of equanimity through reflection. Before we have the full understanding of these teachings, they can be used as reflections to support a movement toward equanimity. The Buddha actually teaches this. One of his main reflections is on not-self. He says often that things should be understood as they are: This is not me. This is not mine. This is not who I am. To me this seems to be encouraging this as a reflection, and I've used this in my practice at times. An emotion arises: this is not me, this is not mine, this is not who I am. We can bring in this wisdom as a reflection and it can open a little bit of spaciousness around the experience, allowing us to meet it with a little more balance of mind, a little more equanimity.

So we can use reflections on these teachings to support the cultivation of equanimity —reflection on causes and conditions. One of my favorite reflections was offered by Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "This is nature." To me, this encapsulates both karma and not-self —the process of seeing an arising experience just as a natural phenomenon. This anger is arising as a result of causes and conditions. It's simply a process, a flow of change. The seed of anger had been planted and the tree of anger is growing. This is nature. When I used this on my first retreat with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, I found it quite supportive for opening the mind to this quality of equanimity, just creating some space.

So we can use the reflection on these teachings to support equanimity. And the insights into these teachings—when we actually see clearly karma unfolding, how it works in our direct experience, not as a thought, not as a thinking about, but the direct experience of the unfolding of karma; or as we see in our experience the truth of things just being a flow of change, a flow of changing experience, no one here doing anything, choosing anything, experiencing anything, just experience experiencing—that too, that insight leads to equanimity. It opens to equanimity.

The final stage of vipassanā meditation before full awakening is said to be equanimity toward all formations. This quality of equanimity, this place of balance of mind—this is the place where, non-reactive, just meeting experience from that balance of mind, the mind can release into freedom.

I'll close with a quote from Nyanaponika Thera: "Equanimity is a perfect, unshakable balance of mind rooted in insight. But in its perfection and unshakable nature, equanimity is not dull, heartless, and frigid. Its perfection is not due to an emotional emptiness, but to a fullness of understanding, to its being complete in itself. Its unshakable nature is not the immovability of a dead, cold stone, but the manifestation of the highest strength."

CHAPTER 10

Relax, Receive, Allow and Learn

Andrea Fella · 54 min

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers practical guidance on cultivating the conditions that support wise mindfulness—the kind that leads toward freedom rather than simply enhanced focus. She begins by distinguishing right mindfulness from wrong mindfulness as described in the suttas, explaining that the difference lies in the underlying view: mindfulness grounded in understanding suffering versus mindfulness serving greed or self-centered agendas.
> Fella introduces four interconnected supports for practice: relax, receive, allow, and learn. She emphasizes that relaxation of body and mind creates the foundation for natural awareness to arise, offering the practice of dropping gentle requests into the system rather than effortfully trying to relax. She then explores the crucial distinction between attention (which selects objects from experience) and mindfulness (the capacity to know what's happening while it's happening), noting that we can direct attention to a specific experience like the breath while still maintaining a receptive quality—like tuning a radio to a frequency and then simply receiving what comes through.
> The teaching on allowing addresses how this quality creates space for genuine learning about suffering to occur. When mindfulness holds reactive emotions with an allowing attention, the mind naturally begins to understand that reactivity is painful in the moment. This understanding, arising from direct experience rather than conceptual knowledge, supports the natural release of unwholesome patterns. Fella acknowledges that allowing isn't always possible, offering the skillful alternative of allowing the not-allowing, or simply changing channels when the mind is too caught to hold experience with equanimity. Throughout, she uses the analogy of riding a kick scooter to illustrate how gentle, repeated efforts build momentum in practice more effectively than forceful striving.

On a retreat, any retreat, we spend a lot of time cultivating the conditions that support mindfulness. Tonight I'd like to explore some of the supports for us in this endeavor.

Mindfulness itself is, at least in my understanding and what is in the suttas, a quality or capacity of mind that basically creates the conditions for us to be aware of what's happening in the present moment while it's happening. And yet that quality itself is kind of neutral, because this capacity to be aware of what's happening in the present moment while it's happening can be applied to this practice, to curiosity about what's happening in the present moment. It can also be applied to something like being really quiet while sneaking through a house in order to steal things.

So what's the difference?

Part of the understanding—and the Buddha actually speaks in the suttas of this, though not in many places—is that there are references to what is called wrong mindfulness. Wrong mindfulness in the wrong Noble Eightfold Path is based in wrong view. That's how it's described: in one of wrong view, wrong intention arises. Wrong speech, wrong action, wrong livelihood, wrong effort, wrong mindfulness, wrong concentration arise in one who has wrong view. The view of somebody sneaking through a house to steal things is one of greed, one of self-motivation. This is not what we would call directing the capacity of mindfulness towards understanding.

Understanding in particular what the Buddha pointed to—the freeing quality that mindfulness can point us toward, the freedom that mindfulness can guide us toward—comes when we are curious about understanding suffering. If that thief were curious about understanding suffering, the thief might recognize that the actual activity of mind happening in that moment of wanting to take something that belonged to somebody else is painful. That in the moment it is not conducive to a heart that feels free, a heart that has love and compassion.

From this perspective, the Buddha pointed us to understand that the foundation of our path is right view. In the Four Noble Truths, he pointed us to understand suffering, let go of the cause of suffering, realize that the letting go of suffering results in a release of freedom from suffering, and recognize that there is a path that can be used to cultivate this freedom.

The mindfulness of the Eightfold Path is this mindfulness of being aware of what's happening in the present moment, but it's mindfulness from a particular perspective. I'd like to describe this perspective in some really ordinary ways this evening.

One way to think about this perspective of how we bring this capacity of knowing what's happening in the present moment while it's happening is to consider curiosity about what is happening in the present moment as being something that is happening in the present moment.

That sounds like nothing. In mathematical terms it sounds like a tautology—if you're aware of what's happening in the present moment, you would be aware that it is happening in the present moment. And yet, actually, if we look at our minds, this is not what's going on usually in our habitual perspective, especially before we meet the practice.

Typically when something arises in our minds, even if we're aware of it, we are often at least somewhat caught by the energy of that, thinking we need to do something or follow on. If you were to go out into the world and notice somebody was angry and ask them, "Do you know you're angry?"—some stranger on the street—they would probably look at you like you're kind of nuts. "Yeah, of course I know I'm angry." But are they aware of anger in the moment as an experience that's happening in the moment? What the experience of anger actually is? What is the human experience of anger? Not "Are you angry, and what are you going to do about it?"—which is how most of us before we meet the practice would know anger.

This perspective, this shift in the use of mindfulness to be curious about experience happening in the present moment as phenomena, as experience happening in the present moment—whether that's the experience of the breath, the experience of a reactive emotion like anger, confusion, desire, or frustration, whether it's a beautiful quality of mind like love, compassion, patience, joy, ease, or peace—the perspective of mindfulness is curious about something along the lines of: What is it like to be a human being having this experience? What is it like to be a human being experiencing love, experiencing fear, experiencing anger? Opening to that side of the equation.

This is a simple shift, and yet it's a profound shift. There's a vast difference—and you all know this—between the experience of being with some reactive state of mind, being with frustration, versus being frustrated. We feel the difference. There's more spaciousness when we are with an experience.

So that's another way we can hold this perspective of mindfulness: Can we be with our experience? Can we keep ourselves company in an experience?

With something like a reactive emotion, fear for example, when that is arising, we get curious about what the inner experience is. How does it affect the body? How does it affect the mind? What is the human experience? What is it like to be a human being experiencing this?

In this practice of mindfulness, we are exploring all of our human experience. No part of our human experience is fundamentally antithetical to being mindful. There are certain experiences, of course, that make it more challenging to be mindful, but there's no particular state—except perhaps for non-mindfulness itself—no particular arising experience of which it's fundamentally not possible to be mindful. Even a state like spacing out, even a state like sleepiness—it is possible to be mindful of those experiences. Nothing is left out. And yet there will be things that are challenging, so we'll speak about how to work with those experiences as well.

I'd like to talk about some of the supports that I've seen in my own practice that really help with this—holding this perspective, finding our way to this perspective, which is what supports us to move in the direction of freedom. As I said, being caught in reactivity basically reinforces those patterns, those habits. When we are feeling frustrated, feeling angry, that tends to reinforce those patterns of mind. But we can create a larger container in which mindfulness can hold frustration or anger or confusion—any experience. Mindfulness can hold it. And that creates the possibility for something different to happen: transformation around that reactive emotion, release around reactive emotions, and support for the growth of wholesome qualities.

If we're holding love in a container of mindfulness, it creates the conditions for love to strengthen. If we're holding frustration in a container of mindfulness, it creates the conditions for that frustration to transform and release. Mindfulness has this great, amazing capacity to strengthen the wholesome and allow a weakening and releasing of the unwholesome. This perspective that we're exploring to bring to our mindfulness is crucial for mindfulness to lead us towards freedom.

I'd like to describe some of the supports I've seen and speak about them in a really simple way. The first support is: relax.

When I first began meditating—probably for the first couple of years of my practice—I didn't hear this instruction. I don't think it was because it wasn't said, but I picked up on other parts of the instruction, and my personality, my mode of being, my usual habits of mind applied those habits to the meditation, which of course it would do. I thought that the way to freedom was to hold on to the breath as long as I could, to tightly hold on to experience, and to push my mind into experience so that I could see it as closely as possible and track it all. My mind was really busy.

When I finally really heard this teaching of relax, I began to understand that relaxing—relaxing the body as a start, as a place to begin—supports a very natural capacity to be present, to be aware in the present moment, to be aware of what's happening while it's happening. That capacity is supported by relaxation. As we relax the body, it supports the mind to be able to relax a little bit. And as the mind relaxes—well, basically a non-relaxed mind is one that is caught up in its ideas, its agendas, its opinions, its views, its worries and concerns about the past and the future. A mind that is not relaxed is usually not in the present moment, or if it is in the present moment, it's thinking about the present moment: What do I need to do about this present moment? How can I get the thing I need, get rid of the thing I don't want?

A relaxed mind puts us in a place where there's much more natural capacity to recognize what's here. When we relax, we can check in. So just relax the body—play with this a little bit right now, just relaxing the body, relaxing the mind. You can explore this through consciously relaxing. You can scan through the body and consciously find areas where there may be tension and see if there can be a softening or relaxing around those areas. You can do that consciously.

I also like to offer an analogy that my colleague Gil Fronsdal offers for relaxing the mind. If you've consciously relaxed the muscles of the body, spent some time doing that—just as if your brain were a muscle—maybe the brain can relax too. There can be a conscious inclining towards relaxing, letting go of tension in our system, in our body and in our minds.

Another approach I've found really useful, especially the further I got into retreat: the more it felt like trying to do something was a little bit agitating. So what I began exploring was a kind of requesting—just sitting in my posture and then dropping a request into my system: May the body relax. And then seeing what happens. Not trying to do the relaxation, but just dropping that request in when you sit.

May the body relax. Try it right now.

May the body relax.

Is there any effect as you drop that into your system? Sometimes I found that that request actually created—or released—something that I didn't even know was being held. It's almost like our system, our organism understands in a way. When given a request like that, especially the more stability and the more settled the mind is, the more those requests are likely to have an effect. At times our system seems to have an understanding of things that we don't have conscious access to. And so sometimes we can use that.

May the body relax. May the mind relax. Don't even think about what that means. Just drop that in and see what effect it has on the body and mind. May the mind relax.

As the mind relaxes, there can be a kind of recognition that very simply, there is awareness. First of just this experience of relaxation. But then of just perhaps the body sitting here. Maybe the breath. Maybe hearing. Relaxation places us, puts us in a space where we can be more receptive to knowing what's happening while it's happening.

This is a second piece that I'd like to explore with you a little bit—this sense of receptive awareness. There's a quality in our attention where, when we are mindful, we can choose what we're going to attend to. We can direct our attention. We do this quite a bit in meditation at times, choosing to attend to the breath, for example. I would call that directing the attention. With mindfulness we can choose to direct the attention.

We can also, with mindfulness, choose to not consciously pick what we are paying attention to—to not choose, "Now I'm going to pay attention to the breath," but rather settle back and receive what's obvious. Letting go of controlling the choice to direct the attention. We can receive, almost like we can settle back and let experience come to us.

Right now, for instance, we'll play with these two just briefly. Let your attention rest in your hands. Notice the sensations of your hands. You can do that. And maybe now a breath. Let yourself be aware of a breath. We can choose to direct the attention and be aware of that experience.

And then just play a little bit right now with letting go of choosing. Essentially just settle back and see what's obvious, what wants to come to you, what experience. Maybe it's hearing right now. Or maybe it's the breath, or body sensations, or an emotion. Letting go of choosing what wants to come into awareness.

A piece of this pointing that we're doing here is another support that was really helpful for me to begin to articulate to myself, especially again the deeper my practice went. The more practice I did, it began to be very useful to recognize and understand that there's a difference between attention and mindfulness.

Attention is that capacity of mind that picks something out of experience. It is amenable to conscious control, as we just explored there. We can choose to direct the attention to the breath, or to sounds, or to the body. So it's amenable to a conscious choice. And yet if we're not consciously choosing, that factor of attention is essentially being conditioned. Something will be brought into attention, and it will tend to be something that would come from the conditions that were here in the immediate preceding moments. When we're not choosing to step in and say, "I want to pay attention to this," the conditions give rise to something being brought into attention.

That's kind of that settling back and asking, what wants to come to you? What wants to come into attention? Something is picked up in attention there. But that factor of attention—of choosing something out of the environment to notice, essentially that's what I'd say attention is—is different from this quality of mindfulness, which is this capacity to know what's happening in the present moment while it's happening.

I'll give an example of how you all already know this distinction. If you are walking down the street or doing something that requires you to move through the environment in some way, you may be mindful of that—and you may also not be mindful of that. How many of you have walked to your room, forgotten mindfulness, but navigated the halls, the stairways, the turns, the doors? Something was attending. Something was attending to the experience. Attention, perception, knowing—the five aggregates, which we'll talk about at another time. But these processes of body and mind were attending to experience.

Mindfulness may not have been there, but attention was functioning. Attention was helping you to get to your room in some fashion. And yet, you've all experienced this. It's not like when mindfulness goes away that we start walking into things or tripping over things or losing our way.

So we all understand this difference, and yet somehow in my practice I thought that if I wasn't in charge of what object was being attended to, it meant I wasn't being mindful. I had conflated these two in some way.

It is possible for mindfulness to be present and we are not actively choosing what to pay attention to. This we could call choiceless awareness—choiceless in the sense that we are not consciously choosing. I like to call that receptive awareness, because we are simply settling back and receiving. So I appreciate that distinction between receptive and directed awareness.

Another helpful piece for me was recognizing that I originally thought about these two—directing the attention and receiving—as being different things. If I was choosing to pay attention to the breath, I was kind of doing the whole thing. I was doing the tracking, I was doing the latching onto. But there's a way in which we can explore even as we direct the attention. What we could say is kind of allow the attention to come in on a particular area of our experience. We can direct attention to some aspect of our experience, and then receive that experience.

It's almost like how a radio works. A radio is a receiver. We tune to a particular frequency on a radio, but then the radio isn't going out and grabbing that frequency—it's still doing its job of just settling back, taking what comes in to that frequency. That's a kind of analogy for how we can direct the attention. For instance, right now, allow yourself to attune to the breath. But then receive what's there. You don't have to dive in and find anything or push the mind into it. What's obvious in the breath? What's naturally available to be received in the breath?

This receptive attention, relaxation, receptive attention—these are tools that are supports for any form of meditation. Even metta practice, for myself, began to become really alive when I shifted from looking for something and instead would just drop the phrases into the heart. "May you be happy." And then settling back and receiving. How does that phrase land? It's a kind of tuning to the heart channel and seeing how these phrases drop into the heart. What happens? How does it land?

So again, receiving—any practice we can explore this dynamic of directing and receiving. Sometimes the directing will be more helpful. Sometimes the receiving will be more helpful. There's kind of an art to this. It's not that we can tell you, do this for the first two minutes and this for the next five minutes. It really is very dependent on conditions. But it's worthwhile to explore this possibility of receiving experience—whether it's receiving in a directed way, attuning to the breath, attuning to the field of hearing, and then receiving that field, or whether it's a broader receptive awareness without choosing to ground with a particular object.

There's a blend, a way that it's helpful to explore these two together: relaxation and attention. This is another area where I found supports for the practice.

And this points to something Winnie talked about last night when she said, you're not either in the middle of a three-month retreat or at the beginning of a six-week retreat. You are here to meet this moment. So right now, just notice your hands. Notice the sound of my voice. Notice a breath. Often it's not very hard to do that for a moment. What tends to be more challenging is to sustain that over time.

And continuity is a really supportive tool for the establishment of mindfulness. We'll talk a lot about continuity. And yet again, in my own practice, I thought I needed to really grab onto the present moment and hold onto it for dear life, creating a lot of tension in that attention.

And so the practice of what Joseph sometimes says—short moments, many times—just enough effort essentially to stay present for this moment, for this in-breath. That's all the effort you need to make. You do not need to sit down and say, "I need to sit here and be present for the entire forty-five minutes." What is often helpful is to recognize, "Oh, this in-breath." And then do it again—an out-breath. And then again, an in-breath. Just enough effort for half a breath.

Another secret teaching from Joseph. He said, "I'll give you that secret teaching: just enough effort for half a breath." And then do it again, and again, and again. And notice when the mind jumps in and creates the experience of time stretching out in front of you. When the mind jumps in and says, "But that's for another six weeks, I can't..." That's a thought. That's all that is. It's a thought. And notice that thought arising.

I have an analogy that I like to use around this—short moments, many times—and that is about getting the momentum of mindfulness. This momentum will build actually in the short moments, many times. This is again part of the art of our practice: as we explore an in-breath, and again an out-breath, with enough effort to be with the in-breath, over time the momentum of mindfulness begins to build. And then it's almost like we don't have to remind ourselves—or it is that we don't have to remind ourselves as often. So we may be present for two or three breaths very easily and then need to remind ourselves. We need to start getting familiar with that experience of the mindfulness lingering for a little while and begin to notice when it starts to wobble a little bit.

The analogy I like is that of riding a scooter—those little kick scooters, not a motor scooter, that kids ride. A little two-wheeled scooter with a platform you stand on. To get the scooter going from a standstill, you need to tap on the ground: tap, tap, tap, tap. You could probably put the foot down and push really hard in the hopes that you'd go a long way, but that can create some instability for the momentum. Gentle, light taps give you the possibility to balance and get the momentum going. You get balanced and you get the momentum going with the taps, the gentle taps. Then you begin to get familiar with what it's like for that momentum to grow, and you can ride for a little while. You don't have to put your foot down. In fact, at certain points, when the momentum is going, putting your foot down will slow you down.

So you get the momentum going, and then you start to get familiar with what it's like for the scooter to get wobbly. And you put your foot down again to get the momentum back. That kind of experience around the gentle, light touch—reminding yourself, "Can I be with the in-breath? Can I be with the out-breath?"—light touch, and then beginning to get familiar with that experience perhaps of a little bit of momentum of mindfulness. And when it feels supportive, reconnect with a gentle reminder again. "Oh right, mind's starting to drift"—kind of a feeling of the attention pulling away. Bring it back, bring the attention, connect again. Light touch, many times.

And the third tool—so basically it's relax, receive. That receiving may happen in directed or receptive attention. Relax, receive. And the third one, which Greg pointed to this morning too: allow. Cultivating an allowing attention to whatever is happening in the present moment. This morning Greg used "kind attention." We could say "loving awareness." It's an important part of our wise mindfulness, of this mindfulness that points us in the direction of freedom, because it supports the possibility of the mindfulness holding whatever is happening, of supporting the curiosity around what is the human experience of whatever is arising.

When the mind can explore and incline towards this attitude of allowing, it creates the conditions for us to be okay with whatever is happening in the present moment—which allows us to learn from it.

When we can notice and begin to recognize what's happening here in the present moment, we begin to understand the conditions that are at play in creating what's happening—the conditions that are at play in creating our reactivity, the conditions that are at play in creating mindfulness and concentration and love. And so our mind begins to understand. As the mindfulness is joined with this allowing, it creates the conditions for our minds to deeply understand itself, and to understand suffering—that first noble truth that the Buddha talked about.

Those four noble truths come with actions. Each of them comes with actions. The first is meant to be understood. And to me, this is where the whole thing begins. We cultivate this capacity of mindfulness and explore the possibility of allowing. When that is in place, when the mind can allow what is arising, it creates the conditions for that understanding of suffering.

As the mind begins to understand suffering, basically what happens there—I kind of pointed to this earlier—that thief going through the house, if that thief were looking at their own mind in that moment, they would find pain in the experience of wanting to take something from somebody else. If they could actually notice the human experience, which they probably can't because there's a lot of delusion going on for them to be in that situation, but if they could step below that layer of delusion and open to the human experience of what was actually going on there, they would find pain.

When we open, with this allowing attention, to reactive emotions, our system, our organism, basically begins to understand: this is not helpful. This is not conducive to well-being in the moment. And because of that learning—because the mind itself, it's like we don't have to consciously do that learning, we don't have to figure that out—the conditions of mindfulness and allowing support the mind, the organism, to understand that. Our mind can begin to understand that reactivity is suffering in the moment. And because of that learning, our system essentially, inherently wants to move in the direction of well-being.

Our practice of mindfulness, we could say—this mindfulness coupled with allowing—is giving our system new information. It's giving our system an education into our habits of mind, our habitual tendencies, showing us that they don't serve us in the way that we thought they did. And as the mind sees that they don't serve us, the mind itself begins to understand and begins to find its way to releasing them.

There are definitely times when consciously we can help that along. There are times when it's really supportive for us, recognizing that we're caught in a storm of anger, to turn the attention to something else, to bring in some mettā, to use some of our tools that support us in balancing the mind there. And yet, if the mind can hold that reactivity with that experience of, "Oh, this is the human experience of anger. I can be with this. The mindfulness can be with this," then the learning is happening there already. You may not need to apply those antidotes if the mindfulness and the allowing are holding it.

And yet, of course, it's not always easy to allow. Might it be so? I wish it were so—that when I'm caught in some kind of reactive state and the mind is really caught by it, I could just say, "Oh, just allow this." Sometimes we can't do that. And so sometimes we have to hold, or step back, perhaps see if there can be a bigger container that allows the not-allowing. That allows, "Wow, there's all this anger, and I hate this." Oh, can I know that? Can I know there's anger and hate? Can I be with that? Can I allow the resistance to the anger and hate to be there and be known—to allow the not-allowing? Is it possible to create that bigger container, to step back and recognize that maybe we can allow the not-allowing?

And if that does not seem possible, that's a good time to change the channel, to turn your attention to something else, to bring in some of the tools that we know help to balance our mind when we're really caught by something.

And so... relax. May the body relax. May the mind relax. And can you, in that relaxation, recognize something of an ease of being with this moment? Maybe there's a little more possibility of knowing, "Oh, this, in the present moment"—maybe the body, maybe the breath. If you're exploring a more open awareness, just whatever's arising. If you are exploring the breath, attuning to the breath, or attuning to the body and then exploring receiving the breath. Just enough effort for this moment.

And what's here now, receiving the next moment and the next moment. Opening to the possibility of allowing your experience to be exactly as it is.

Allowing is not about agreeing or disagreeing with experience. We don't have to agree with something or like it in order to allow it. Allowing is more this sense of recognizing that what has arisen is already here. Might as well allow it, because it's already here.

And that allowing isn't necessarily about non-action, but opening to recognize that what has arisen has arisen. This creates space in the heart. That allowing creates space in the heart for—rather than reactivity being the next moment, rather than reactivity being how we meet what's here—skillful responsiveness to be how we meet it. And maybe skillful responsiveness is just holding it in that allowing. And maybe skillful responsiveness means choosing another experience to attend to.

Relax. Receive. Allow. And let the learning happen.

CHAPTER 11

Knowing A Mind Affected By Delusion

Andrea Fella · 1h06

> In this dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers an in-depth exploration of delusion (moha), the most fundamental of the three root poisons alongside greed (lobha) and aversion (dosa). Drawing on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's (MN 10) instructions on the third foundation of mindfulness, she examines how we can recognize "a mind affected by delusion as a mind affected by delusion" and "a mind unaffected by delusion as a mind unaffected by delusion."
> Fella presents three levels of delusion: the most obvious form of simply being unmindful or lost in thought; a subtler level involving personal views, beliefs, and conditioning that filter our perception without our awareness; and the deepest human delusion—our tendency to take what is impermanent (anicca) to be permanent, what is unreliable (dukkha) to be reliable, and what is not-self (anattā) to be self. She illustrates these with vivid examples, from the famous "gorilla basketball" study on selective attention to her own meditation experiences of watching the mind search desperately for something reliable to land on.
> The practical heart of this teaching emphasizes that we cannot simply tell ourselves to stop being deluded, but we can recognize delusion when it operates. By studying our views, noticing when something feels solid or permanent, observing how long happiness lasts when we get what we want, and tracking the arising of the sense of self, we create conditions for wisdom to gradually transform these deep patterns. This patient, curious investigation—rather than forced correction—is the path toward the cooling (Nibbāna) that the Buddha described as the extinguishing of greed, aversion, and delusion.

The possibility of our practice here is freedom. The Buddha used the term Nibbana, which literally, I understand, means cooling. He used this image of cooling a fire and talked about the patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion being like a fire burning in our hearts and minds. This image of cooling the fires of greed, aversion, and delusion is one of the simplest and, for me, one of the more inspiring definitions of freedom in the suttas: the extinguishing of greed, aversion, and delusion. That's the letting go of something. The Buddha also said that the experience in this very life of that extinguishing was a state of peace, free from mental pain and grief.

Now, that doesn't mean that the heart is not open and connecting. This is an important recognition and understanding—that the dropping away of greed, aversion, and delusion doesn't leave us as indifferent beings. In fact, it leaves room for a different kind of connection: the connection of a heart that is not contracted, that feels more deeply, that resonates in this world with compassion when there is suffering, that empathizes and experiences a resonant joy when there is joy, and that has this deep sense of connection.

We may not quite understand this freeing from greed, aversion, and delusion at first. Yet over time we may get little tastes of what this means and begin to trust that this direction is the direction of freedom.

Our work here, as we've been describing, is to get to know our minds, to get to know the entirety of our human experience. It's the getting to know part that creates the conditions for wisdom and understanding to transform greed, aversion, and delusion, to release them. From time to time, we may find ourselves in this space of non-constriction. Yet the way to that is by getting to know the constriction really well.

The Buddha called greed, aversion, and delusion the three root poisons of the mind—the three root fires, we could call them with our analogy this evening. Greed and aversion we have some experience with and have some degree of ability to recognize them, in their many different flavors. Yet delusion, by its very nature, is much harder to see. It is much harder to get to know delusion because it obscures itself.

Greed and aversion are more in the business of co-opting our minds to go along with them. With greed, there's this notion that getting what I want is going to make me happy—getting what I want, getting rid of what I don't want. Those energies are more clear to our minds because they're essentially trying to make us see things or do things or behave in certain ways. Yet the nature of delusion is to obscure, and so it is much harder to see.

In the Third Foundation of Mindfulness, which Jill read the other day, it points to simple instructions. I really love the simplicity of the Third Foundation. The first half of it basically asks us to look at or recognize a mind affected by greed, understanding that a mind affected by greed is a mind affected by greed, and a mind unaffected by greed is a mind unaffected by greed. A mind affected by aversion is a mind affected by aversion. It's really just pointing to recognizing the experience of greed, the experience of aversion as an arising, as a phenomenon happening in the moment. And the absence—a mind unaffected by aversion is a mind unaffected by aversion. So we notice the presence and absence.

Likewise, one understands a mind affected by delusion as a mind affected by delusion. Right there it points to the possibility of recognizing delusion, of seeing it at work in our minds. And then recognizing a mind unaffected by delusion as a mind unaffected by delusion.

Delusion is the most fundamental of these three fires because it basically underlies greed and aversion. Greed and aversion don't exist without delusion. Yet it is possible to be deluded without greed and aversion being present. Greed and aversion can also create delusion. One form of delusion is seeing things through a particular perspective—not that we're not aware, but that we are aware with a particular perspective and are unaware that the mind is holding that perspective. We might be in a state of aversion and...

our mind becomes affected by aversion and then we see things through that lens.

At one point, one of my teachers asked me to scan through the body and notice what was obvious. What's the most obvious thing? And then what's the next most obvious, and the next most? I just let the mind land randomly on these experiences. When my teacher asked me to describe what I'd noticed—because he'd asked me to let it be choiceless, not that I was choosing, but just noticing what's obvious, what's the first thing that's obvious—when I reported to him, I said, "Well, I wasn't choosing, but it's clear to me that this wasn't choiceless, because every single experience that the mind landed on was unpleasant."

It was clear to me—I knew that my body was not nothing but unpleasant experience. And yet the mind was choosing unpleasant, highlighting unpleasant. This is the way my mind works. This is the habit of mind based on years of practicing aversion. You may have your own flavor of this.

This is a kind of filter, an unseen filter that biases the mind towards seeing things in a certain way, taking in certain things and not other things. Greed and aversion in particular create this kind of filter for us. This is a form of delusion that arises out of greed and aversion.

But greed and aversion themselves are based on a more fundamental kind of delusion—basically, believing that in the case of greed, if I get this thing, I'll be happy. And happy not just for a moment, but something in our minds believes that we'll be happy for a good stretch of time. This is a fundamental perspective, a view underlying that movement towards wanting to have something, wanting to get rid of something.

This evening what I'd really like to explore is offering you some information about how you might begin to recognize a mind affected by delusion as a mind affected by delusion, and a mind unaffected by delusion as a mind unaffected by delusion. Information to describe different ways that delusion works.

This information—it's not so much something to try to do something with. As we've been saying, sometimes just... and Sayadaw U Tejaniya really pointed to this. He said so much of what he offers is information that it's like what I'll call Dharma rain. It's just landing on the landscape of your system and filtering in to your minds, to your hearts. That itself is a condition. Hearing the information is a condition that may allow you to see something different, see something new. We may not even be conscious we're taking in this information.

At one point I was sitting a three-month retreat here and I had some insight about something—I don't even remember at this point what it was—but what I do remember is that there was this sense of, "Wow, that's really important. They should be telling us about this." I was thinking of writing notes: "Really, you need to talk about this in your talks, it's so important." I didn't write those notes, thank goodness. In the next three Dharma talks, I heard it. It was there. It had been there.

This is a form of delusion in a way. Sometimes it happens that because we have a certain perspective on experience, we take in information and don't take in information that doesn't match our views—or we don't consciously take it in. And yet my sense is that it was going in like that Dharma rain. It was going in, and that's what supported the seeing of it. It wasn't conscious that I saw it or heard it. It wasn't conscious, but... And then it was stunning to me that I hadn't heard it. I realized, "Wow, this is something they must say all the time. Three Dharma talks in a row it's been said, and I didn't hear it before."

This is part of the way our minds function. We take in information that's in line with what we already know, or in line with perspectives or views that we have. This is one way that delusion works.

I'd like to offer some information about different levels or different depths of delusion. The most obvious form—I'm going to talk about them in three different levels—the most obvious form is basically when we're not mindful. It's just being disconnected from experience. That's the most obvious kind of delusion, and we see that when we wake up from being lost in thought.

The second kind of delusion is more related to our own personal views, opinions, ideas, beliefs, agendas—the conditioning that we've had from our childhood, our family culture, our wider culture. These views come in through our conditioning and shape how we see things.

And this is the second layer of delusion—not that we have views, but that we are unaware that we have views. We take our perspective and we don't even know it's a perspective; we just take it to be reality. This is the second level of delusion. I'll talk about each of these in a little bit more depth.

The third level is different from the second, which we might call personal delusion because it's based on our own personal conditioning—our culture, the family we've been connected with, our school, our own personal experience. This third level of delusion is what I will call human delusion. It's delusion that we all share, the most insidious deep patterns in our minds. We seem to come into the world with these perspectives, and yet they are perspectives, and we can see them as perspectives.

This first kind—not connecting—is basically being lost in thought, not aware of what's happening in the present moment, just disconnected from experience. The moment we can begin to see this, the moment when mindfulness returns, in that moment we can get a sense that mindfulness is back. Also in that moment, because our minds have been functioning, perceiving, knowing—those processes don't stop when we're not mindful, as we know—when mindfulness returns there's a way that we can have a sense, a kind of lingering smell or lingering taste of what that state was like before mindfulness came. Maybe a sense of a fog, or of being sunk underground, or just that feeling of being separated from experience.

And so when mindfulness returns there's an opportunity to notice the difference between non-delusion and delusion in that simple way, in this kind of most obvious way. Every time your mind returns from wandering, that's an opportunity to notice the non-delusion of waking up into mindfulness again. That's probably not complete non-delusion in that moment, but it's in the terrain of that distinction between a mind unaffected by delusion and a mind affected by delusion.

Other forms of this kind of delusion can manifest as sleepiness, dullness, restlessness, heaviness of mind, doubt, a wavering mind. And yet we begin to see that while these states of mind are probably habitually deluded, habitually non-mindful, they're not inherently deluded, not inherently non-mindful. It is possible to be aware of sleepiness. It's possible to be aware of spacing out. You might think that spacing out is almost the definition of delusion, and yet I began to be curious about the state itself.

I noticed one day while I was having breakfast that the mind kept spacing out. While it was spaced out, I wasn't particularly mindful for most of the time, but then I'd wake up, notice that mindfulness was back. And I had an agenda at that point, because I was eating breakfast. My mind said, well, what I'm supposed to do here is pay attention to the process of eating. And so I turned my attention to noticing all the sensations of eating, and then the mind would space out again. This happened a bunch of times.

Finally, I decided to kind of just check out. This is a tool we've talked about in some of the meetings I've had with you—just widening the attention. It's like, well, what's going on here? Maybe the mindfulness can follow or know what's happening as the mind is spacing out. Instead of trying to hold on to paying attention to something in particular, I explored the possibility of allowing the mind to let go. And it kind of felt like the mind hovered up above my head and to the right a little bit, just hovering up there. And yet I discovered that it was possible to be aware of that state, that experience of the mind hovering.

In that place I recognized that the mind was resting, that it actually needed rest. This movement to come back to attending to the eating process was making the mind tired. The mind needed some rest and it was going to take its rest whether I gave it permission or not. And so I began to be curious about that and discovered that it is possible to follow the mind into that state, to allow the attention, the mindfulness to broaden and take in: oh, this is what it's like for the mind to do this. In this case what it became was not spacing out and disconnection from experience, but resting—resting and aware.

In this exploration around things that we might think are habitually disconnected, I really want to emphasize what I'm hoping you hear. It's not that when there's a sense of disconnection from experience you should try to connect to something—oh, there's disconnection, let me pick up hearing, or let me pick up body sensation. What about exploring instead: what's this? What's this feeling of disconnection? What's this feeling of sleepiness or low energy or boredom? What's this? And in that we see that we can be connected to states that we habitually think of as non-mindful.

This is exploring that edge of being aware. In a sense, what this does is convert delusion to non-delusion.

This curiosity of "what's this?" allows us to explore that edge of awareness. In that example of spacing out, there was the recognition of a certain quality—almost like the mind looping in itself. That was the delusion. And the resting, while the mind just hung out, didn't have that same looping quality.

The second form of delusion—delusion based on views, agendas, and concepts—is a little more insidious because it can mean that we are aware. It's not that we're not aware, but that what we are unaware of is a filter or a view. We are unaware of the view that's happening.

We take in views from our family, from our experience. We can have perspectives based on our culture, based on our own personal experience, based on an agenda. Even something as simple as an agenda can create a filter where we take in information related to our agenda but do not see information unrelated to it. There are so many different ways this kind of delusion works, and I'm just going to go through a couple to give you some flavor of this.

This one about agendas is kind of fun to explore. Many of you may have heard about the study on selective attention—when you give somebody an agenda, our minds, when they have a task to do, will miss things that are pretty obvious in experience. This is the famous gorilla basketball study. People were shown a video and asked to count the number of times the basketball passed between the players in white shirts. There were people with dark shirts and light shirts, and they were asked to count only the passes between players in white. Most people could do that accurately. And then afterward they were asked, "Did you see the gorilla?" About half the people saw the gorilla or something like it, but half did not.

Now, that itself is not inherently delusion—that's a natural functioning of our mind. It narrows attention to take in something we're oriented towards. We had a task, and we focused on it. And yet some number of people, even when told afterward what had happened, said, "Well, I would have seen that gorilla had it been in the video." Now that is delusion. That belief that what we are taking in is an accurate representation of reality. It is not an accurate representation of reality. It is a representation of our views, opinions, agendas, and what's important to us in this moment.

There's a lot of information our minds don't take in, and this is not inherently a bad thing or a problem because essentially there is so much information coming in that it would overwhelm us if our minds didn't filter certain things. And yet what is an issue is our belief that our eyes function like cameras, accurately taking in everything that's happening.

Views are a huge source of this kind of delusion—a huge source of these filters that operate in our experience and have us taking in some information but not other information. We have views about ourselves, views about other people. Essentially these views can box us in. And we notice when somebody else is doing this to us. "Oh, you're always like that." "No, no, I'm not always like that. I know I'm not like that." But it's harder for us to see when we do it to other people or when we do it to ourselves.

I started reading Remembrance of Things Past a few years ago. I didn't finish it, but the first 150 pages had some amazing observations of humanity and the way the mind works. Proust says: "Our social personality is a creation of the mind of others. Even the simple act of what we call seeing a person we know is in part an intellectual one. We fill the physical appearance of the individual we see with all the notions we have about them, and of the total picture about others that we form for ourselves. Those notions certainly occupy the greater part."

This is more true than we know—that when we see somebody, mostly what we are seeing are our views, our opinions, our ideas about them. We have concepts, ideas, views, and opinions about our friends, about our family members. About somebody we do not know, we have views and opinions. You've seen this—views and opinions about how somebody's reaching for a spoon, or the way they put food on their plate. All kinds of things we have views and opinions about. It's rampant.

We form these views and opinions, and we may not even see that we have them. Then we start looking for things that confirm those views and opinions. This is called confirmation bias in modern psychology—we tend to look for information that confirms what we already believe, and we don't recognize, or we actively ignore or discount, information that does not confirm what we believe.

Another one from Proust: "Facts do not find their way into the world in which our beliefs reside. Facts did not produce our beliefs. They do not destroy them. They may inflict on them the most constant refutations without weakening them." We're seeing that these days.

And so we can begin to see how this form of belief, this form of delusion, is not neutral. It creates so much suffering—the way we hold to our views, the way we believe our views to be true. Our views about ourselves, our views about other people, our views about the world, our views about political systems.

It gets more complex in some ways, or layers get added on, because it's not just views about individuals. We also have views about groups of people. When we're relating to people who are similar to us in various ways, we tend to see them through our views of them as individuals, and so there's still those views operating. But when we see people who are a little different from us—perhaps a different race or gender or sexual orientation or different ability—we don't tend to see them just as an individual. We tend to see them with a whole bunch of baggage about what we see as a category or a group they belong to.

So this is where racism, ageism, sexism, homophobia—all of these are in this terrain of carrying baggage about people with respect to group identities or group connections. This causes so much suffering in our world. Not seeing this baggage. Not knowing that we are carrying along views and seeing, relating to the world through views.

Again, we're probably not going to get rid of views entirely. But what we can begin to do is recognize that views are operating. Views are operating all the time. And this is something we can remind ourselves of.

I was just talking to a dharma friend the other day, and that friend said, "I knew there was a gorilla in the room, but I didn't know what the gorilla was." There was some kind of state of recognizing that something was confusing, but they couldn't quite identify it—"Oh, it's the gorilla in the room." But that person could recognize, they could say, "Yep, there's delusion here. I don't know what it is, I can't name how the delusion is working, but I know there is delusion happening." Knowing there's some kind of view going on that's creating some kind of relationship to experience, but not quite even able to see what that belief or view is. But knowing that it's there. This is a beginning of a way of recognizing delusion is affecting the mind.

Here's a question we can ask ourselves at times. Anytime there is suffering—anytime there's an experience of something feeling just not quite right—there is some kind of delusion at work. There's some kind of view or belief at work. And so it can be useful to just ask yourself that question sometimes: What's being believed?

It won't always pull that delusion or pull that view, pull that belief out of the subconscious mind and reveal it to us. But it can give ourselves the chance to recognize, "Okay, there is some kind of belief happening here," and even that is powerful.

Views about ourselves, views about... At one point I encouraged somebody to notice a very particular strong belief they had about themselves, a strong, conditioned belief. And the person recognized it was strongly believed. In exploring this, noticing it as belief, this person said, "But I can't stop believing it."

So that's another way of noticing how strong delusion can be sometimes—that we can see that there's a belief and that we still believe it. And yet it's helpful in that kind of situation not to try to convince yourself to stop believing it, especially when it's strong in that way. What's useful there is to recognize, "Wow, yeah, there's that belief, and boy, strong believing is happening. That's what's happening right now."

Even that basically opens the mind, because when a belief like that, a strong belief, is operating below the level of our conscious awareness... For myself, I had a strong belief in my unworthiness. Self-hatred was kind of the emotional tone there, a strong belief in my unworthiness. And recognizing it as a belief—sometimes I could recognize it: "Oh, that's that belief." And there are gradations of how much belief there is. We can kind of recognize, "Oh, this is strongly believed," or "not so strongly believed."

We can recognize how strong the belief is around some view that we're holding. And if it's very strong, it's useful just to even recognize, "Okay, strong belief is happening." You don't have to convince yourself to not believe it, but recognize that it is a belief, because that begins to crack. Just recognizing that it's a belief begins to crack the mind's taking it to be truth. It's at least recognizing that it's belief, and that's what's going on in that moment. In that moment, you are aligning yourself with what's actually happening: strong belief, that's what's happening right now. And potentially recognizing, "This is the mind affected by delusion, affected by this belief. This is the mind affected by belief."

The third kind, the most insidious kind of delusion, is what I call human delusion—delusions that we tend to share as human beings. These are basically forms of views, but they're such deeply held views that you could go to any culture in the world and these views are operating. They're kind of independent of culture. They seem to come into being with our birth as human beings, these views—basic distortions of how we meet experience.

These will be familiar to you as I name them, because what we tend to do as human beings is we tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable to produce a lasting kind of happiness to be reliable, to produce that lasting happiness. And we tend to take what is not self to be self.

These three root misperceptions are also an understanding of what is seen through when the mind becomes free. Essentially, this is the deepest delusion in our minds: that we tend to take what's impermanent to be permanent, what's unreliable to be reliable, what's not self to be self.

In this kind of situation, again, it may not be that we're not aware, but we are seeing experience through this very deeply conditioned perspective. Sayadaw U Tejaniya said delusion—this kind of delusion—doesn't mask the object. It masks the nature, the true nature of the object.

And so we see our friends and we see ourselves, and we, in some interesting way that I spoke of this morning, tend to take ourselves to be immortal. We may know that we're going to die, but not today. Or we may understand at some level that we're going to die, but we don't wake up in the morning and recognize, "This day—this day may be my last day on the planet."

In terms of exploring these three areas, there's a lot that can be said. I recently gave a series of, I think, eight dharma talks on delusion, so this is just the top layer. But I want to offer a few reflections on how we can begin to see this.

The Buddha encouraged us in this terrain to cultivate the perception of impermanence, to cultivate the perception of unreliability, and to cultivate the perception of not-self. In my understanding, this means to look at, recognize, and orient towards noticing that things are impermanent, that there is unreliability, that things are often uncontrollable—not me or mine or I to control.

With respect to taking what's impermanent to be permanent, at times you might notice that something in your experience feels solid. At one point in my practice, I was just noticing where the mind was creating solidity and got curious about that. A solid experience of a block of pain, for instance—what's that like? And then exploring it, being curious about it, I began to see that it's not solid but kind of a rapidly changing, dynamic experience. Looking at what we are taking to be solid, we can notice its changing nature.

This may happen over a longer stretch of time. For instance, one day I was a veggie chopper in the kitchen here. You walk in and there are all kinds of vegetables, often in buckets, and the cook will put a new bucket out. Well, one day, the cook—I don't know, the cook seemed like he had a kind of sense of humor—because what we had on the table was all of the chard in a huge mound. To me, it was like four feet high. It was this huge mound of chard. I felt like I couldn't see the person on the other side of the chopping table.

My mind created solidity around that mound of chard, and it said something like, "We are never going to finish that in the hour." And yet I just started working. I noticed that sense of "it's a thing."

And then I started chopping and chopping and chopping. About half an hour later, I looked up and the mound was gone. It startled me. It had simply disappeared. So that's the kind of exploration we can make—noticing that things change. We can let that be a highlight for us: notice change. And notice what we are taking to be reliable, what we are looking for to be reliable. Sometimes it's something simple or small, like getting my seat in the dining hall or having two pieces of chocolate. What is it that our mind is grasping for? What are we looking at thinking, "Oh, that's going to make me happy"?

The Buddha offered a very simple instruction around this. He said, yes, it's a form of happiness when you get what you want. Notice how long it lasts. So this teaching on unreliability is directly connected to impermanence, to the impermanent nature of experience. Our mind imputes a more lasting kind of reliability to something that is fleeting. And so the Buddha encouraged us to notice.

Okay, you have a bit of happiness from having some chocolate. How long does it last? What happens? Chocolate is actually pretty interesting. I was surprised when I investigated this. I put the chocolate in my mouth and it was pretty happy, pretty good. Lots of sense pleasure happening with the chocolate. And then the chocolate was gone. But I just kept investigating, and there was a lingering happiness. It probably lasted about a minute. That's a lot longer than I thought it would last, but it did fade. So noticing—how long does it last?

The mind sometimes, especially deeper into retreat, may find itself desperately searching for something reliable in experience. The more we see just how fleeting experience is, how rapidly things are falling apart, some part of our mind rebels. This is some of the deeper undoing, the deeper noticing of how strongly our mind rebels against this truth of impermanence, of unreliability. As we see experience arise and vanish, arise and vanish, at certain points that can be delightful, but sometimes it's like there's nowhere to land. Where do I land here? And the mind desperately starts searching for somewhere to land.

This is a manifestation of that delusion—the belief that there's got to be someplace to land for happiness. There must be. Our minds believe at some very deep level that there must be someplace to land for happiness, where I can rest. And so you might notice the mind searching, looking for something to land on. Can't I find something? That's a form of delusion at work, that belief that there would be someplace to land. And again, you don't have to stop that from happening, but recognize it. Searching. Searching for somewhere to land. This is delusion affecting the mind, believing there's someplace to find happiness.

At one point on a long retreat at the Forest Refuge, I noticed this process happen repeatedly. There would be a kind of space where the mind was searching for someplace to settle. And sometimes the mind would actually create a state of ease or peace and land there for a little while. Oh, I can rest here for a while. Then that would fall apart.

And there would be a kind of an even deeper peace that happened as the mind could be okay with even the falling apart of peace. But then the mind picked up the search again. "Oh, but there must be someplace, someplace to land." And by this time, I had watched this happen over and over again, and I just felt very tender towards this pattern. It's like, "Oh, search away. You're not going to find anything. But I'll be with you while you look. Okay."

It's like some part of our system just has to do that. We cannot tell ourselves to not be deluded. But we can begin to recognize this. "Searching, okay, searching is happening."

And then seeing what's not-self as self. This is a big topic, and we might do a whole talk about not-self and noticing the sense of self at some point. But this is actually the key piece I just want to point to here. Along with all of these other things that we've been pointing to—whatever experience is arising, notice it.

There's a famous quote by Zen Master Dōgen. He said, "To study the way is to study the self." I would say, to study the way, to study our minds and hearts, is to study this sense of self. "To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be awakened by the ten thousand things."

And so our practice isn't somehow trying to find our way to not-self, but is to study—to get to know all the ways that we take up self. So notice: When does it feel like I'm a me? When does it feel like that? And there are some really obvious times. I wouldn't so much encourage trying to find it everywhere—the sense of self is probably operating a lot and very continuously below the level of our conscious awareness. I'm pointing more to those times when it just kind of stares us in the face. Sense of self-righteousness. "I'm right!" Oh, there's a good one. There's Andrea. Okay.

So noticing that—what does that feel like? At one point, I was noticing a sense of "I'm right, I'm smart, I know my stuff, and that person is wrong, and they shouldn't be doing that." So a lot of selfing there. And then something else happened in the situation. I was doing walking meditation and noticing very much this congealing of a sense of me—this analytical, argumentative, "I'm right" Andrea was really present.

And then a big truck drove up. And my mind just... I mean, it was amazing, this truck. And the whole forty-year-old Andrea just vanished, and it was replaced by something that felt more like a two-year-old. "Wow, it's a truck!" Bang, crash, boom, squeal of the brakes. There was this sense of delight of a two-year-old. Immediately this shift—seeing how a sense of self turns on a dime. And what I took to be me is now gone. Something else is there.

So noticing that, noticing how these interplay, how they come into being. Studying the sense of self. And then at times you may notice a weakening of that. At times you might notice just taking in experience. Not me, not mine, not who I am.

And in terms of cultivating the perception of not-self, which the Buddha encouraged us also to do at times, I think that this is the avenue that he pointed to—using this reflection. This sense of self that's happening is a conditioned phenomenon.

It isn't me. It's not me. It's not who I am.

The Buddha used that phrase extensively. One understands one's experience: This is not me. This is not who I am. This is not myself. Using that as a kind of reflection, we begin to let wisdom infiltrate our habit of the sense of self.

And so delusion—seeing delusion. At times we see through something. Insight arises, and our minds open into clearly recognizing the unreliable nature of experience. At one point I was seeing everything as just an arising, and I understood: this is unreliable, this is unreliable. And the mind was so happy in knowing that. It was not experiencing suffering; it was knowing the unreliability and not picking up experience, knowing that unreliability. It was not clinging to experience.

I thought I'd figured it out.

Conditions change. The next day, what I was experiencing was picking it up. And that's what I got to be with. It's not a mistake and it's not a problem.

Sometimes we see through—it's like the veils part and we see through some delusion. Oh, things are unreliable. There's no point in picking anything up. And then habit of mind returns. Conditions change. The mind picks things up, holds on to them, and—oh, this hurts, it suffers.

It's not that we've somehow lost that understanding. In fact, the next day when I was picking up experience, clinging to experience, it was much clearer to me that this was the mind doing it. That this was a habit of mind. This was delusion at work—this picking up of unreliable experience and clinging to it.

Having seen it clearly not picking it up, when the pattern came back, that's a way we can now really begin to recognize: Ah, this is the mind affected by delusion. Before the delusion falls away—for moments, maybe for a minute or a few seconds or perhaps a few hours—a delusion might fall away. Having seen that difference, the mind unaffected by delusion, the mind affected by delusion becomes much clearer.

And so this is the opportunity—not to beat yourself up for not seeing it the way you saw it yesterday, but rather: Oh, here's the opportunity to see how delusion works. This is delusion at work.

And so again, the path is mindfulness of what's arising.

CHAPTER 12

The Five Aggregates

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā) as presented in the Fourth Foundation of Mindfulness. She begins by contextualizing this teaching within the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), explaining how contemplating experience through the lens of the aggregates helps us understand the truth of our existence.
> Fella systematically examines each aggregate—form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhārā), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—using accessible examples like drinking tea to illustrate how these processes interweave in every moment of experience. She draws on Bhikkhu Anālayo's framework showing how we locate self in each aggregate: body as where I am, feeling as how I am, perception as what I recognize, mental formations as why I act, and consciousness as the medium of experience.
> The talk pays particular attention to mental formations as the constructive engine that shapes all other aggregates, and how perception creates delusion when we mistake our mental constructs for reality. Fella shares personal anecdotes, including mistaking bat sounds for pigs in Burma, to demonstrate how the mind constructs experience. She concludes with the Buddha's teaching that our lack of complete control over the aggregates serves as evidence for not-self (anattā), pointing toward liberation from clinging and the suffering it creates.

This morning Jill responded to a question around the fourth foundation of mindfulness and explored how that foundation can really be seen as seeing experience. The foundation is mindfulness of dhammas, and as she pointed out, the word dhammas has multiple layers of meaning. It can mean simply experience or phenomenon, and it can mean the Buddhist teaching, the Dharma. It can also mean truth. And so in this exploration of the fourth foundation, we're exploring the phenomenon of our experience, what arises through the perspective of the lens of the Dharma, to begin to understand the truth of our experience.

As she said this morning, we don't have to wait to do the fourth foundation until we've mastered the first three. They're all at play in our practice pretty much right from the beginning. We sit down and meditate and try to stay with the breath, and the mind goes off into wanting or thinking. Right there, in observing wanting, observing aversion, we are exploring this fourth foundation—the hindrances—noticing how they come to be, noticing the conditions that put them together, noticing what makes them fall apart. This is an aspect of the fourth foundation. We can open to and begin to explore our experience from these Dharma perspectives.

Tonight I'd like to explore one of those perspectives offered in the fourth foundation: the five aggregates. The word "aggregate" itself, in English at least, is not a very friendly word. It doesn't have a very experiential quality; it sounds rather technical. The word in Pali, khandha (or skandha in Sanskrit), has a much more ordinary sound, apparently. My understanding is that word basically means something like heap, bundle, group, or collection.

And yet this word "aggregate" is actually, as I reflect on it, a pretty good translation. These khandhas are described both as the what of our experience—what's happening in our experience—and as the processes that happen in our experience. They're both nouns and verbs in a way. The word "aggregate" can function similarly: as a noun, it means stuff made of other stuff, which is a pretty good translation for what we're talking about here.

These aggregates of form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness—these five aspects or areas of experience—are how the Buddha divided up our human experience, pointing out that all experience falls into one of these heaps or collections or bundles. And yet they're also understood to be processes: the process of body, the process of perception, the process of feeling, the process of knowing. The word can also be used as a verb—we aggregate, we pull things together.

Let me describe these five aggregates briefly. Form refers to our bodily experience, the physical aspect. The other four aggregates are mental processes, mental experience. Feeling is this recognition of experience as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—or as the Buddha says, the process responsible for that recognition. Perception is the process of recognizing what's happening in experience, related to memory, learning, and understanding what objects and experiences are. Mental formations encompass a whole range of emotions, thoughts, and mind states that have a volitional component—the volitional aspect of our experience. And then consciousness: the simple knowing aspect of our experience.

We can think of them as the building blocks of our experience. Any experience we have, we can begin to recognize as these processes or experiences unfolding, intertwined.

Having a cup of tea, for instance: there's the bodily experience of the warmth, the moisture on the tongue, the taste—perhaps sweetness if you put sweetener in, or bitterness, whatever the flavors are. That's all part of form. Then the feeling tone: some aspects might be pleasant if the warmth is soothing, or unpleasant if it's too hot and burns your tongue. The taste itself might have pleasant and unpleasant aspects. Then perception: the recognition of chamomile tea, or Earl Grey, whatever it is—the acknowledgment of what this is. And then mental formations. We have mental formations about everything.

We'll either like this tea or we won't like it, or it will remind us of some other cup of tea we had when we were sitting in some cafe in India one time, comparing and contrasting that tea to this. Our minds will do this forming, this mental formation. Or perhaps the mind is simply present and mindful for this experience—mindfulness itself being a mental formation. And then there's the knowing. We are aware. There's this basic quality that we know this experience.

So these processes make up our experience. Any aspect of our experience can be found in these five aggregates, in these categories. This is simply the way the Buddha divvied up experience. It's perhaps a different divvying than we might expect. And he divvied it up in different ways—he also divvied it up in terms of the six sense bases, a different kind of dividing of the human pie of experience. So there's not just one way, but he pointed to this particular way for certain reasons, and I'll get to that in just a minute.

First I wanted to read to you the section of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta where it gives the instructions about this foundation. It's actually pretty simple. I'm going to read this translation using different words for dhammas so that it will give you different flavors. Sometimes I'll use the word dhammas, sometimes phenomena, sometimes experience.

So these are the instructions: A practitioner abides contemplating experience as experience in terms of the five aggregates affected by clinging. And how does one abide contemplating experience as experience in terms of the five aggregates affected by clinging? Here one understands: Such is material form. Such is its arising. Such is its disappearance. Such is feeling. Such is its arising. Such is its disappearance. Such is perception. Such is its arising. Such is its disappearance. Such are mental formations, such are their arising, such their disappearance. Such is consciousness, such is its arising, such is its disappearance.

A practitioner abides contemplating phenomena as phenomena in terms of the five aggregates affected by clinging. A practitioner abides contemplating dhammas as dhammas in terms of the five aggregates affected by clinging.

I like this translation—contemplating our experience in terms of the five aggregates. Beginning to understand our experience from this perspective.

Initially this can take some navigation or understanding, looking at experience and recognizing, "Oh, this experience—that's body. This experience—that's feeling." Sayadaw U Tejaniya points to the study of the five aggregates as being kind of like learning to read. As we learn to read at the beginning, we learn to recognize the shapes of letters. We have to recognize the shapes of letters and associate those with sounds. At first we need to learn the letters: this shape is a C, this shape is A, this shape is T. Then we learn the sounds associated with them, and we learn that it becomes "cat." But once we've learned this, once we've begun to understand how to read, we don't have to do that breakdown anymore. We just see the word and it's "cat." We understand it fully just from the contact with it.

He says it's kind of like that with the study of the five aggregates. Initially we may need to actually spend some time with each of these aggregates, getting familiar with them, like we get familiar with the alphabet. And then after some time we don't have to do that work anymore.

So this section of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta—the instructions are actually pretty simple. Notice each aspect of experience. What kind of experience? Notice such as feeling. Notice its arising and disappearance.

And so that's the main emphasis I'd like to look at tonight—just exploring how to begin to recognize these aggregates in our experience.

But why? Why recognize these in particular?

The emphasis partly in this exploration is on clinging, to begin to recognize how we tend to cling, how we congeal around these aspects or areas of experience. There's a way in which the Buddha pointed to these five aggregates of clinging as being central to the process of selfing. This is another aspect of the question Jill addressed this morning, looking at the sense of self and how to begin to explore it. Well, this is the main tool that the Buddha used for exploring the sense of self—exploring how the sense of self is created.

In many places where the Buddha talked about this selfing process, he used these five aggregates as a way to help us see through it as just another process in our mind. Again, as Jill said this morning, it's not that we're trying to stop this process of selfing, but we're trying to see it for what it is, which is a process of mind constructing this sense. Seeing the process at work begins to weaken the clinging and weaken the ways in which that process leads to suffering. And so this exploration of the five aggregates is one of the ways in which we can begin to explore this teaching of not-self.

Bhikkhu Anālayo has a simple way of describing how a sense of self is associated with each of these aggregates. I like this because I think we can all resonate with it as a way of locating a sense of self with each one. He says body or form, this experience of body—the sense of self tends to locate it as where I am. The body is where I am, kind of located in the body perhaps. Feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—is how I am. Perception is what I'm recognizing in the world. Mental formations are why I'm doing things, that sense of volition or agency, why I am acting. And consciousness, the knowing aggregate, is whereby I am experiencing—the medium through which experience is recognized or known.

And so to begin to get familiar with these aggregates can help us see our experience in a different way. Not as I or me or mine, but as just these processes of body and mind interweaving, interconnecting, influencing each other. No need actually to have an ongoing I controlling anything. It's doing itself; these processes are doing themselves.

While the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta doesn't point explicitly to this teaching on the connection to the selfing process, there are many other teachings in the suttas that point to this. And if I have a chance tonight, if I have some time, I may talk about one of those, but we'll see how far we get here.

So, body, form. We've talked about this quite a bit already, so I won't spend too much time here. Brian spoke about it last night in mindfulness of the body. Really, I think this foundation, this aggregate, is looking at the physicality of our experience in its basic form. Just beginning to recognize the language of the body. How does the body communicate with the mind? It communicates through the touch sense, through these elemental experiences of feeling tingling, pulsing, vibration, hardness, softness, moisture, dryness, heat, coolness—these areas of physical experience that come through our touch sense.

And then through the other physical senses: we experience through the eye, for instance—we look out into the world and we think we're seeing people and walls and windows and zabutons and zafus and chairs and lights. But all of that is actually in the perception aggregate. What comes into the eye, what the bare experience in the eye is, is form and color. That's the basic experience in the eye. In taste, the basic experience—we bite into pizza, we taste pizza—but we're tasting salty, sweet, bitter, savory, sour. That's it. That's the language of the tongue. Pizza, cheese—those are concepts, ideas, learned through time, learned from exposure.

So beginning to recognize what our actual bodily experience is. This helps us, as I think I said—it seems ages ago now—when I gave an instruction on the body in the morning. I talked about how as we begin to recognize the language of the body, we begin to tease apart these processes, to recognize that in fact there is a difference between the taste of salty and the idea of pizza, the pleasantness or unpleasantness of that, and all of the ideas and associations that we have about it. We begin to recognize that there are processes going on in the mind. And so beginning to get familiar with this language of the body helps us tease apart these five different processes, these five aggregates.

I think one of the key ways that we identify with the body, in addition to this sense of locating ourselves in the body—I think that's a pretty common feeling, though it may be cultural to some extent, this sense of "I'm in the body"—because the Buddha also talked about different ways that this could be experienced. He said it might be that the body is in me. Or, I am part of the body.

Or the body is mine. That's another one that's very familiar—this body is mine. We carry it around with us like it's something we own, as opposed to being a process that's integral to our being. The way Brian spoke about it last night was so beautiful, this very integral nature of embodiment, how experience comes through this body. And somehow we feel like we own it. So we can begin to recognize the ways in which we congeal a sense of self around each of these areas.

Then feeling, this second aggregate, we've also spent some time on already. Feeling is understood to be a mental experience—it's a mental aggregate. Now this may be fairly easy to understand in terms of mind states. The feeling of happiness is pleasant; we understand that to be a mental pleasure. The feeling of anger is often unpleasant. But even physical sensations—feeling associated with the physical body, feeling associated with sight, with sound, with smell, with taste, with touch—is also understood to be mental.

I want to give you a bit of an understanding of this. I think we all know this to some extent because we do recognize how a state of mind can influence what we feel. Someone touches us by surprise, and perhaps if the mind is in a certain state, that would be experienced as unpleasant. If the mind is in a different state, it might be experienced as neutral or even pleasant. With mindfulness too, as the mind becomes really present for experience, sometimes we're surprised at just how beautiful things are, how pleasant some experiences can be—things you wouldn't expect to be beautiful or pleasant.

At Spirit Rock one time, I was sitting one of the long retreats and doing walking meditation in the upper walking room. The bell had rung, and I turned to leave the hall. My gaze just glanced out the door, and my perception was that there was a picture hanging on the wall just outside. That picture seemed very beautiful to me—really simple but incredibly beautiful. Just these three squares, offset in a way that created a feeling of great pleasure and beauty.

Now, I'm fairly nearsighted, so I was curious to look more closely at this beautiful painting. I walked closer and discovered it was a fire extinguisher. Not something I would have normally thought of as pleasant or beautiful.

This points to how feeling tone is constructed by the mind. The feeling tone, the process of feeling—and so the feeling tone itself is what we would call the "what" of our experience, that things are pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. Yet this process of feeling, the verb side of this, is that our feeling is conditioned. The conditions of our mind—views, opinions, ideas, attitudes, state of mind, whether we're in a state of concentration and equanimity, of mindfulness, or a state of aversion—all of this influences how the process of feeling unfolds. The mental climate of our mind affects feeling.

We can also start to see—and this is a hugely important area in our practice—just how our reactivity operates when we are not mindful, when we are not clearly knowing, "Oh, this is a pleasant experience. This is an unpleasant experience." How the mind will tend, based on its habits, to spring into wanting to create conditions for us to have the pleasant, to get rid of the unpleasant. The seeing of feeling tone helps create the conditions for us to recognize that tendency to leap off of feeling tone into reactivity.

Play with this in your sittings at times. It is really helpful. Just begin to track a little bit—again, not all the time. I don't want this to be a big project. But from time to time, especially if you find your mind in a state of reactivity, it can be really useful to recognize or reflect on what the mind is actually reacting to. What is unpleasant in my experience that the mind is moving into this? What's pleasant in my experience that the mind wants to hold on to? Sometimes we can be surprised.

What we think of as what we're reacting to and moving towards or moving away from—it may not be what we think. And so it can be a very interesting exploration.

I think a sense of self, in addition to this sense of feeling being how I am, there's this strong sense of self motivated around feeling—to maximize pleasant and minimize unpleasant. Kind of an underground sense of self that feels like it cannot be okay unless it's in control of maximizing pleasant and minimizing unpleasant at a very deep level.

And then the process of perception. Perception being that aspect of experience where we recognize what's out there. This is a really useful function of our minds—thank goodness for perception. If I had to come in here every time and figure out that this was people and chairs and floor and stairs and wall, it would be exhausting. And so this is a useful kind of shortcut in our minds to quickly recognize what's happening and recognize how to navigate things.

The way this works is basically our minds contact some experience—a sound, for instance—and then the mind kind of goes into its memory banks and looks for the closest match. What's the closest match I can find to that sound? And then perceives or recognizes it as that. Many times perhaps during the day you have heard the sound of a car going down Pleasant Street. That sound is one thing. And then the mind will label it or recognize it as car, perhaps, or truck, maybe. So that is perception at work.

I think in the realm of hearing is one of the easiest places to begin to recognize this process, because it's fairly easy to see or recognize the distinction between the vibration in the eardrum, that thing coming into the ear, and the mind in some fashion identifying it. That identification of the experience might come as labeling it, if we're talking to ourselves—oh, car or truck. Or it might come as an image, or even as a feeling. It can come as a feeling in the body. Maybe, for instance, as if you're riding in a truck, something like that. That could be a way that perception would work.

So this process of perception does a pretty good job for us, but it is not perfect by any means. It easily makes mistakes. I'll give an example from my own experience, an example that uses sound. I was in Burma, practicing in a monastery. I was meditating in my room primarily, and my dorm was in a place near the wall of the monastery. The village sounds came over the wall fairly easily—the loudspeakers, the sounds of the farms, and all the things that were going on. So there was a lot of noise.

At a certain point each day, I began noticing a squealing sound, and my mind perceived it as pig. That squealing—I mean, I had heard pigs squeal, and that's the closest thing my mind came up with. Okay, it's a pig squealing. But my mind didn't quite stop there. It also added a little bit more, because it sounded to me like this was a distressed squealing. And so I kind of created—this image appeared in my mind—that what was on the other side of that wall was the butcher shop of the village, and these were pigs being slaughtered for the next day. That was what my mind created.

I knew that was a creation. I knew that I did not know if that's what was going on. But still, that's what was coming up. And so I just noticed it and I felt compassion for the pigs.

Then one day I was doing some walking meditation instead of sitting meditation. There were bats flying in the air, coming really close to me, and they were squealing. This was what I had been hearing. And of course, the compassion vanished. There was no need for that compassion. There were no pigs being slaughtered. I knew—I knew that I did not know there were pigs being slaughtered. I knew that was a construction of the mind, a mental formation. But what I was not prepared for was that it was not a pig. That it was a bat.

That was a kind of real eye-opener—just how much was constructed out of that idea that it was a pig.

And so we can see that we create the idea. I heard the sound, I believed it was a pig, and that itself was a place where the mind slips into delusion. Now, the misperception of it as a pig is not necessarily delusion. That's just the mind making something like the closest match it had. I don't think I'd ever known that bats squealed before, so that was the closest match it had. But believing that what I was hearing was a pig—that is delusion. Believing that my mind was accurately experiencing and knowing reality through its perceptions, that's a form of delusion.

This is one of the main places that delusion enters in our mind: taking our perceptions to be reality, to be what's out there. We take our experience as if our eyes are cameras, seeing actually everything, every little bit of information that's out there. But that's not the way our minds work. We see some things, we don't see other things. Our minds perceive things and not other things. This is a really important area of recognition.

To come back to feeling tone, because there's a real blend here, an interweaving between perception and feeling tone: that example around believing it was a pig being slaughtered, the feeling of the ache in the heart around a being being killed—all of that was constructed by the mind. When we are responding to something and take it to be pleasant or unpleasant, it can be really interesting to check in. Is it actually a sound or a sight or a smell that we're taking to be pleasant or unpleasant? Or a touch? Or is it an idea that is happening in association with that sound or sight?

Very often our pleasant and unpleasant experience is connected more to the perception and associated ideas, mental formations around that perception, than it is to the actual sense contact. This for me has been a really fascinating exploration—useful and eye-opening to see what is actually being reacted to. The vast majority of the time, it is something my mind makes up. It can be a pretty close match to reality, but it is not what's actually out there that the mind is reacting to. It is something that the mind has constructed. This is a really useful understanding.

And so a sense of self around this: "I am recognizing what I am recognizing." I think the sense of self here is, "And I'm doing it accurately. I'm seeing things correctly." This is a piece of that selfing there.

Mental formations is a huge aggregate. It includes all of our mental activities that have a kind of volitional or intentional effect. This includes all of our emotions. It includes our mind states like calm, concentration, mindfulness, boredom, confusion. It includes the emotions of anger, patience, impatience, frustration, irritation. It includes bliss, joy, calm, pride, conceit. Thoughts are in this realm of mental formations. Beliefs, agendas, views—also mental formations. It's a lot of what we observe in our minds.

So that's kind of the "what" of our experience, but in this realm of mental formation it's really helpful to recognize the process nature of mental formations—even more so than some of the others, in a way. Not only are mental formations formed, they are formed. We see that, we recognize that anger, for instance, comes into being in dependence on conditions. It's shaped by conditions, by history, by our state of mind in the moment, by something that's being met in our senses. It's shaped in that way. It comes together based on conditions.

But mental formations also have this nature: not only are they formed, they form. They construct. This is the process of mental formations.

mental formations in the suttas that points to this. I'm going to read this just as it is here, and then I'll talk about it a little bit.

"Why are they called volitional formations? They construct the conditioned, therefore they're called volitional formations."

Now, there's a note here that this doesn't translate into English very well, because in the Pali, the word for volitional formation, the word for construct, and the word for conditioned or constructed are all based on the same word. So you might say something like, "Why are they called volitional formations? Because they form things that are formed." That would be kind of what it sounds like in the Pali.

But they construct the conditioned—therefore they're called volitional formations. And what is the conditioned that they construct? They construct conditioned form as form. They construct conditioned feeling as feeling. They construct conditioned perception as perception. They construct conditioned formations as formations. They construct conditioned consciousness as consciousness.

This is the engine. This is how the aggregates tumble on. This process of mental formation is constructing them, continuously constructing feeling, perception, knowing, form, and mental formations.

For example, with anger as a formation: the volitional formation of anger affects our body. It can be experienced as pressure and heat internally. It can affect the face—we may have a scowl or distorted muscles in our face when we're angry. This is how anger shapes or constructs the body in some ways. It tends to construct feeling as unpleasant when we're angry; things tend to be unpleasant. It tends to construct our perceptions in terms of that anger, so we perceive things through that lens—perceiving things in ways that justify our feeling that anger. Anger tends to construct more anger. And our consciousness is affected and directed by this filter.

I talked about this in the delusion talk—how when we have a filter, our consciousness will land on certain things and not others. So it shapes what we know. Again, it's not that we are taking all experience in; what we know is shaped by our mind state.

This points to the power of our minds to construct our experience. This is a really important exploration: looking at how experience is affected by our minds. What is the state of this mind having this experience?

Something like anger potentially has more obvious ways in which it affects our aggregates. Other mental formations are a little less obvious, perhaps, but still have incredible power to shape our minds. Views and beliefs are very powerful mental formations, often below the level of our conscious awareness.

In this country, in this culture, we tend to have this belief that America is the land of opportunity—that anyone who works hard enough can achieve their dream. This belief pervading our culture creates a kind of blindness on the part of the dominant culture, a failure to see how the power structures, the institutions, the organizations support people with white skin and not so much people with darker skin tone. This not-seeing—essentially the blindness of white privilege—views shape our minds in this way. Not seeing that the whole structure of how institutions are put together creates an inherent imbalance.

So much suffering comes from these kinds of views and beliefs when they are not seen as views and beliefs—basically just taken to be true. "America is a land of opportunity. If you're not achieving your dream, you're not working hard enough." That can be the belief there.

So a lot of suffering comes in this terrain of mental formations. And essentially what we're doing in our practice is exploring how to shape wholesome mental formations—bringing in mindfulness and concentration, peace and patience and equanimity. This has a transformative effect on our minds, and it begins to reveal the way this all works.

Then there is the aggregate of consciousness, of knowing. This is the bare experience of knowing. Every single moment of experience, whether we're mindful or not, there is a knowing. I think I mentioned at one point that we can walk down the street, completely lost in thought, and yet we're still not walking into trees and falling off the edge of the road. Something is knowing where we are, what we're doing. So whether we're mindful or not, this knowing is functioning—this simple, very simple aspect of every contact with the sense base.

There's the eye, and there's form and sight, and then there's the knowing of that. There's the ear and sound and the contact, and there's the knowing, the consciousness. Each sense base has this consciousness aspect to it: eye consciousness, ear consciousness, nose consciousness, tongue consciousness, body consciousness, mind consciousness.

Every experience, whatever experience there is—a sound—there's the sound and the knowing of it. There's the sight and the knowing of it. There's a mind state and the knowing of it. And it's possible in mindfulness for mindfulness to recognize this knowing side of the experience. We tend to gravitate, especially before we start looking at our minds, toward the object, toward what is known. That seems to be the way our minds are basically oriented. And yet we can know the knowing itself. We can be aware of the knowing itself. It's possible to distinguish between sight, the seeing, the object of sight, and the knowing of it; the sound and the knowing of it.

One of the places this became most obvious to me, one of the early places I could really begin to see this distinction and recognize that the mind was actually landing on the knowing side of the equation—I was sitting one time and having a real unpleasant experience, an unpleasant physical sensation, a lot of strong bodily energy. There was some aversion there. So there was the aversion to the physical sensation, and I was recognizing the aversion and noticing the unpleasantness. Noticing the unpleasantness of the unpleasant sensation, and noticing the unpleasantness of the aversion—both of them.

And then at some point the mind kind of got interested and actually shifted its orientation. I don't know if I did this intentionally or not, but the mind began recognizing, "Oh, aversion is known. Aversion is known." And with that, the mind kind of settled back. It was more interested in the knowing of the aversion. The feeling tone—the thing that was so clear to me in that moment—was that the feeling tone was neutral. The entire experience felt completely different because it was no longer unpleasant. The mind was interested in knowing. Aversion is known. Wow, knowing is happening. And when it was paying attention to the knowing, the feeling tone of the knowing was neutral.

So sometimes we can be curious about the knowing. I invite you at times to explore experience in this way. Seeing is known. Hearing is known. Frustration is known. Just see what happens in your experience with that.

This last little piece I'm going to drop in as a forward pointer—not so much something I'm going to go into right now, but probably in a week or so, the next time I get to give a talk, I'll explore this in a bit more depth. This is an exploration of how we can begin to understand these processes as not-self. It uses something that we can actually really recognize in our experience.

So I'll read this to you. This is the Buddha speaking: "Form is not self. If form were self, this form would not lead to affliction. And it would be possible to have it of form: 'May my form be thus. May my form not be thus.'"

But because form is not self, form leads to affliction, and it is not possible to have it of form: "May my form be thus. May my form not be thus."

Wouldn't that be nice? "May my face be thus. May my age spots be thus. May my arthritis be thus." Wouldn't that be nice?

And the Buddha points to this as evidence for not-self—this lack of control, that we cannot say, we do not have agency over, we do not have complete agency over our five aggregates.

I can have some agency. I think this is where we get confused. I can say, "I'm going to move my hands like this," and I can do that. But that's a very limited aspect of control. And so the Buddha is pointing to this—that we do not have control—as being a pointer to, or evidence for, not-self.

And so with mental formations, to get specific here: wouldn't it be nice? The Buddha says, "Concentration is not self." I'm putting concentration in where mental formations is what's used, but this will give you the flavor. "Concentration is not self. If concentration were self, it would be possible to have it of concentration: 'May my concentration be thus. May my concentration not be thus.'"

Wouldn't that be nice?

With respect to all the aggregates, the Buddha points to the fact that they are not inherently controllable, and therefore that is evidence for not-self.

And so this is a piece of the exploration—recognizing it's not a mistake when we can't control our minds. It's not a mistake. It's the nature of the mind.

So let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 13

Wisdom at Work

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella responds to a practitioner's question about the nature of wisdom (paññā) in Buddhist practice. Drawing from her training with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she presents wisdom not as some distant, grand achievement, but as an active mental process that can be observed working in our minds in subtle and profound ways.
> Fella outlines the classical Buddhist framework of wisdom: the Four Noble Truths as orientation, understanding skillful and unskillful mental states, and recognizing causes and conditions (paṭicca samuppāda). She explains the three levels of wisdom development—sutamayā paññā (wisdom from hearing), cintāmayā paññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanāmayā paññā (wisdom from direct meditative insight)—showing how practitioners progress from intellectual understanding to embodied realization.
> Through personal anecdotes, including experiences of thoughts bursting like bubbles and anger simply not arising, Fella illustrates how wisdom operates moment to moment. She references the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's instructions on knowing experience as experience—breathing, feeling, mental states—as wisdom already at work. The talk illuminates how even small recognitions, like seeing a thought as just a thought, represent wisdom functioning in the mind, gradually conditioning it toward freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion.

Sometimes it seems very hard to improve on the silence.

This morning I was looking through the questions in the bowl, and one of those questions struck me. My talk is something of a response to a question about what wisdom is—what is the nature of wisdom?

We can have knowledge and wisdom about many things, and yet the wisdom that the Buddha offered is fairly specific. It's not the wisdom about everything we could possibly know—about how to cook or drive a car or program a computer. It's the wisdom about understanding suffering, understanding how our minds are caught, how we suffer, why we suffer. Ultimately, this wisdom that the Buddha offers becomes not just something that we learn or hear about, but actually becomes understood in our system. And that wisdom is what frees us. Wisdom in understanding what suffering is, how it functions—that understanding allows the suffering to release.

My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya uses this word wisdom more than just about any other teacher I had practiced with. He uses it as an activity. He speaks about wisdom doing things: wisdom acts, wisdom understands this. And it is an activity. In the terrain of the five aggregates, it's in the terrain of mental formation. It's an activity of mind. Much as other mental formations, other activities of mind, impel us in particular directions—anger impels us in particular directions, confusion impels us in particular directions—there's an activity that we can see. We can see these forces arising in the mind, creating and shaping our minds, impelling action that follows from those activities. Love is an activity of mind that shapes our mind. And so is wisdom.

When I heard Sayadaw U Tejaniya talking about this word, using this word, initially I thought of it as something that was out there—some big grand thing—and I was sure I would know it when it hit. But in my own exploration of this, I've seen that wisdom actually shows up in some small ways that we might not even consciously notice unless it's kind of pointed out to us. And so my understanding of wisdom began to be more of a process at work in the mind. Just as other mental formations are sometimes weaker or stronger, so too wisdom is sometimes functioning in very small, almost imperceptible ways, and sometimes in very obvious ways.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya also says that the purpose of our practice, the whole motivation, the whole aim or direction of our practice, is to cultivate this wisdom—this wisdom that frees the mind from greed, aversion, and delusion, that frees the mind from suffering.

In the Buddha's teaching, in the Pali Canon, there are a number of classic definitions for wisdom. The first factor of the Eightfold Path, wise view, is a framing of the wisdom that supports us as we orient towards the path. There's a reason why it's at the beginning of the path. We need to know—it lays out the map for us. In the beginning of a journey we need some kind of a map, and wise view, wise understanding, lays out that map for us.

The classic definition of wise view is: there is suffering; suffering arises with the condition of craving; it's possible to free the mind from this craving, which will free the mind from suffering; and there is a path. One aspect of the map is these sets of steps: wise view, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration. This lays out the map of where we're going and how we might orient our exploration of our minds. It's a map of how to explore our minds to free them from suffering.

So that's one classic definition—the Four Noble Truths. The Four Noble Truths define the orientation of the wisdom that we aim towards. We aim towards understanding suffering. This first noble truth has an action associated with it: understanding suffering. That teaching points to how suffering manifests in our minds, and it manifests when greed, aversion, and delusion are present.

Hidden or embedded in the Four Noble Truths is an understanding of what states of mind actually move us in the direction of suffering, keep us caught, and what states of mind move us away from suffering. This understanding of what is skillful and what is unskillful—Jill talked about this over a series of talks on the wise efforts—learning what is skillful, learning what is unskillful, cultivating the skillful, abandoning or letting go of the unskillful. This is another aspect of wisdom: that we begin to see and understand what in our minds creates suffering.

This becomes very experiential. Through the practice of mindfulness we observe our minds. We observe what's happening in our bodies and our minds. And pretty quickly, when we turn with a kind of perspective—another way to frame wisdom in a very practical sense—there is this curiosity about experience in the present moment as experience in the present moment.

I mentioned this framing in the very first talk I gave. This is a perspective for mindfulness: simple curiosity about what's happening. "Oh, this is happening right now—what is this?"

And so something like anger arises, or confusion arises, or greed arises, and we see, "Oh, this is the arising of greed. This is what the human experience of greed is." We begin to directly understand this human experience of greed, this human experience of aversion. This is suffering. This hurts. This does not feel like it's leading to well-being.

This stands in stark contradiction to all the stories that aversion and greed tell us—stories that insist this is what's going to make me happy. But when we actually come into the experience of those states, when we feel what the arising of anger actually is, our system understands: this is not leading to well-being. This is wisdom. This is the experience of wisdom. When the mind understands that directly, it's getting an education.

So this is another aspect of wisdom: understanding the skillful and unskillful. As states like compassion and love arise in our hearts, we feel directly in the moment, as we are aware of them, present with them, how they open our hearts, how they connect us to others, how they lead to well-being. And so again, the mind understands directly: this is skillful.

There's no question in the moment when we're experiencing these states from this perspective of "what is this human experience?" No question at all. "Oh, this is unskillful. This is skillful." Our systems actually seem designed to help sort this out. This is a great thing. Our human organism seems designed to show us what suffering is and what not-suffering is.

We have simply been so confused that we haven't been noticing it. We've been caught by our views, our beliefs, our ideas—conditioned by culture, conditioned by being in this human body, never having learned about this very simple but very profound tool of looking at experience from such a direct perspective. Instead, we look at experience more often as "how can I use this to get ahead?" or "where is this leading me?"

Understanding the skillful and the unskillful—this is another big piece of wisdom. And then also understanding causes and conditions: that experience is conditioned, that there is a cause-and-effect nature to experience.

This was actually another question I pulled out of the bowl: "What does this phrase 'causes and conditions' mean anyway?" Let me unpack that a little. This is my unpacking, so take it for what it's worth.

Conditions, for me, are the many, many factors—everything that's happened up to this point. Everything. That includes all the conditions of weather, all the conditions of health, all the conditions of nature, the conditions of culture, the conditions of family.

Some of those fall within what we typically call human conditioning: how our families operated, how we learned to treat others, how we were treated on the playground, all the various ways we affect each other as human beings. That's part of the conditioning.

And yet we are also born with a particular body, with genetics, as Winnie was talking about—the genetics of our particular system. That affects us and affects our experience. It affects what things are pleasant and unpleasant at times.

For instance, this body has a very strong sensitivity to bell peppers. When I eat bell peppers, I basically have to spend the next two hours very close to a bathroom. It's a pretty unpleasant experience. So that affects my time here. I've noticed that IMS uses a lot of bell peppers, which affects how I choose my meals. I do not want to have bell peppers if I'm going to be teaching a dharma talk. This is not a good plan.

So it affects me. And yet it's not quite the same kind of conditioning as how my parents treated me or what my culture infused my mind with.

It's more of a physical thing. And then there are simply the conditions of nature itself. Our bodies are made up of stardust. Carl Sagan points this out beautifully. Let me see if I can find this quote: "The nitrogen in our DNA, the calcium in our teeth, the iron in our blood, the carbon in our apple pies were made in the interiors of collapsing stars. We are made of star stuff." And so in a very real way, we are also conditioned by the Big Bang. Everything from the beginning of the universe until now is a condition.

The Buddha talks about conditions being so vast that we cannot possibly grasp them all with our minds. He said that to try to do so, you'll go mad. So don't try. And yet they affect us. Conditions affect us. This is an important piece to understand with respect to wisdom—that experience is conditioned, and it's not personal. It's not personal that I have this reaction to bell peppers. It's just this body, this configuration of nitrogen and calcium and oxygen, having this effect. That's not personal. It's a really useful reflection to recognize that so much of our experience is shaped by conditions.

The causes piece, for myself, I think of as being more in the moment—what is happening right now for this experience to be arising? In my own exploration, in my own understanding of how it's useful to explore causes, I'm looking at what's going on in the mind right now that is contributing to this experience. In particular, this question around what causes are arising in the mind to create suffering, or to create the release of suffering.

The Buddha in the Second Noble Truth pointed to craving as what arises in the mind and leads us in the direction of suffering. Another teaching, the teaching on dependent origination, points to ignorance. The whole teaching on dependent origination is an exploration of the conditions that give rise to suffering. And the same set of conditions give rise to becoming and selfing. It's the same process being described—these conditions that give rise to suffering.

Within that teaching, there are links we've talked about quite a bit. We talk in particular about the link between feeling and craving—how when pleasant arises in the mind, we tend to like it, we lean towards it, we want it, we want more of it. When something unpleasant arises, we tend to lean away from it. Aversion tends to result. These are conditions—things arising that are pleasant or unpleasant. And yet those conditions will not necessarily cause craving, clinging, becoming, suffering. Not necessarily.

But if ignorance is present in the mind, my understanding is that dependent origination teaches: when ignorance is arising, feeling leads to craving. Unpleasant leads to aversion. When ignorance is arising in the moment, that's what happens. So that's a cause—that's my understanding of a cause in the moment. Ignorance being a cause. And ignorance being basically not understanding this wisdom.

So here we are, back at the question: What is this wisdom? When ignorance is present, or when wisdom is not present, feeling tends to lead us onward to suffering—that reactivity, that kind of immediate reactivity.

In terms of cultivating wisdom, there's a lovely exploration around three levels of wisdom. The first is sutamayā paññā—paññā being the word for wisdom, and suta being the word for hearing, the suttas. So this is the wisdom that comes from listening, hearing, reading—taking in information. This is a form of wisdom, and we could say this is really where we start our path.

Somebody pointed out in one of the talks how the Buddha understood the path on his own. And that's one of the hallmarks of a Buddha, essentially—that they don't need help. They figure it out through their own experience, this path, this wisdom. And yet the rest of us need help. And so the help is these teachings. This is the first kind of wisdom: listening to the map, hearing the teachings, taking in the teachings. This is a form of wisdom.

Essentially, here in the Dharma Hall, we're just steeping in the teachings. A retreat like this, we just get steeped in hearing and reflecting on—this is the second kind of wisdom—the wisdom of reflection, chintamaya paññā, the wisdom of using our thought, using our minds, using our rational capacity of mind to think about the teachings, to reflect on them, how they make sense, to incorporate thought into our system, into our practice.

And the third kind of wisdom is the wisdom of direct understanding, bhāvanāmaya paññā, the wisdom of insight.

These first two kinds of wisdom—the wisdom of hearing, the wisdom of reflecting—are kind of where we start our practice. You all have a story of the first time you heard the teachings and felt something. It made sense to you in some way. That's wisdom landing in your system. And then there were reflections about it, thoughts about it. Maybe a kind of intuitive sense of, "Hmm, this makes sense." Or maybe a not-so-intuitive sense—not-self? I don't know about that one. But this suffering thing, that makes sense to me. And so this is using our reflection, thinking about it, reflecting on it, using our minds to support us.

And then we begin to practice. Those two kinds of wisdom—the hearing and then the reflecting—kind of lead us or impel us into action. This is the way wisdom acts. At the beginning it feels like I'm acting. At the beginning, that sense of self, still very strong, stays very strong for a long time, comes and goes, different kinds of self. And yet certain kinds of senses of self pick up this teaching and this understanding and get interested and want to act. And yet it really is wisdom impelling that sense of self. There's a kind of wisdom that's part of that action. It may not be so apparent in that time. It more feels like I'm thinking about this, I'm doing this. And yet something has entered and is creating the conditions for different choices to be made. And that's wisdom.

And so we begin to practice. We begin to explore and start to understand some of these teachings for ourselves. It's no longer just something that we're hearing and thinking about, but direct experience. And yet we can often still use these first two kinds of wisdoms even as we're engaged in active practice.

Here on this retreat, sitting in the hall, Greg gave a beautiful description of sitting and taking in Dharma—not with the mind, not with the intellect, not with our usual conception of mind, but more just almost letting it be like Dharma rain. How does it land? How does it feel? So that's taking in the suttamaya pañña.

In my own experience with the practice, especially with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, I would go and practice and sit in the interview room with him, and I'd describe my experience. He would say something to me about some aspect of experience I hadn't noticed. And then I'd go off and I'd try to look for it. I'd go do something with that information. And I'd come back, maybe saying, "I got a real headache as I tried to understand awareness itself." He said, "Were you trying to do that?" I said, "Yeah, I thought that's what you told me to do." He said, "No, nothing I say is something to do. It's just information. Just do your simple practice. That information goes in and it changes the conditions. You do your simple practice, the conditions are different now. Different things get seen."

You don't have to do that. What a relief.

And so that's a way that the Suttamaya Panya can work in our practice. I have said this to many of you—this is a refrain of mine. I talk about how you might be able to see this or that, and then I say: don't do it. Don't try to do it. You might notice it. You might see it.

And then there are ways we can also bring in Chintamaya Panya, the wisdom of reflection, in the midst of our practice—bringing in wisdom reflections that might help balance the mind when we're caught in something. Sometimes, in the midst of being caught in some kind of storm, we can just remind ourselves, dropping in some wisdom phrase: "This is impermanent, it's not going to last." Or: "This is not me, not mine, not who I am." We bring in wisdom that we have either heard from teachers or read from Dharma books—or sometimes wisdom that we have experienced ourselves already.

You have noticed, I think, at times that you experience some kind of insight, an understanding about something where it's like, "Wow, I really see—it doesn't make any sense to cling. It's all changing. There's no point in clinging." And then the next hour, the mind is grabbing on. "Wait a minute, didn't I learn that?"

Well, this is the way the mind works. At times wisdom is active, strong and arising, and we have access to the direct understanding that there's no point in clinging. And then delusion comes back. Ignorance comes back. And we don't see that there's no point to clinging. In fact, our mind is telling us just the opposite: "Cling! That'll make you happy. Cling."

And so in those moments when we see that the mind is caught, and yet we have seen it not be caught, there's an opportunity essentially to borrow wisdom from ourselves. We can borrow wisdom from our teachers, we can borrow wisdom from books to help us. When we haven't had an understanding, we might just drop in: "Well, the teachers say it's all unreliable and impermanent and it will change. Okay, maybe I can hold that possibility." But when we've seen it for ourselves, it can be easier in a way to borrow that understanding—just to remind ourselves: "Yes, I do know. I do know that things are impermanent. The mind is deluded right now. It's not seeing things as impermanent. And yet this is impermanent."

And so we can drop in wisdom reflections at times, like phrases in our mind that sometimes can help us to balance. This is a way of using wisdom in the practice.

And then there's the experience of wisdom—the actual wisdom operating in the moment, creating the conditions for some kind of release, some kind of understanding. You have all experienced this kind of wisdom. Even just the simple curiosity, as I said earlier—this curiosity about what is the human experience of this, what is this—that curiosity and that perspective of observing experience already contains wisdom. Because our habit is not that. And so it begins to shape the mind in a new way.

An object is just an object. Over and over again in the Satipatthana Sutta it points to this kind of thing: when breathing in, one knows one is breathing in; when experiencing aversion, one knows one is experiencing aversion; when experiencing love, one knows one is experiencing love. Actually, that's not in the Satipatthana Sutta.

But non-aversion is in the Satipatthana Sutta. When experiencing non-aversion, one knows one is experiencing non-aversion. Just that simple. Recognition. This is the experience that's happening. This is a pointer. This is wisdom operating in the mind.

When we are curious in this way, wisdom is active. Now, it doesn't feel like any big mind-blowing kind of wisdom. But it grows. It accumulates.

We also might begin to notice a little bit more surprise around this simple understanding of, "Oh, this is an experience arising in the present moment." For instance, around a thought. Thoughts are so potently delusive. They contain such power to fool us into believing them. When we see that a thought is just a thought, when we recognize that these thoughts I'm thinking are about the past, we wake up into this recognition: "Wow, I am not there. I'm not in that situation right now. I'm sitting in a meditation hall, breathing in and breathing out. And that is arising in the mind." That thought, that situation—it's like a bubble bursts. We see that bursting of the belief in the thought and recognize, "Oh, this is a thought of the past happening in the present moment." That kind of surprise or recognition—that's wisdom. That's wisdom at work, opening our eyes to recognize that's not what's actually happening, that scenario or content or story.

At one point I had a very powerful recognition of this, a seeing of that bursting of the bubble. I had been in a relationship for a very long time—ten years—and we'd broken up several years before. I'd done a lot of work on the anger and reactivity about that person, and by this point, when thoughts arose about them in my mind, I no longer experienced distress at all. There was no anger, no sadness, no confusion. Well, confusion—there was confusion, as I'll tell you about. But there wasn't that kind of pain anymore when thoughts would arise. It was clear, it was clean.

And yet one day I was walking down the street and I woke up from being lost in thought—a thought about this person I had been in relationship with. In the moment of coming out of that thought, I realized I had been lost in it for a fair amount of time. Basically the mind had constructed that I was back in that relationship. What are we going to do next week? When are we going to go? This whole world was born, and I was born into that world.

And then the bubble burst. Wait, what? That was two years ago. What? I'm not in relationship with that person anymore. So there was confusion. And yet in that moment of seeing, it was like seeing just how much the mind had believed that thought. The bursting of that, that feeling of clarity—"That is just a thought"—that's wisdom.

So sometimes just seeing, "Oh, this is just an arising in the present moment" is kind of like, "Wow, this is just an arising in the present moment. Oh my gosh." It can have these gradations of intensity around this wisdom arising.

And sometimes as that wisdom arises in the moment, we can feel a kind of shift that happens. We might experience this recognition around a mind state that we're caught in and notice, "Oh, this is anger arising in the present moment." Instead of being caught by it, we recognize it as a phenomenon. It feels like there's space, a feeling of space around the experience. "Oh, this is just anger. This is just impacting the body in this way—a feeling of heat and pressure. Oh, and here it's beginning to disperse."

So the first experience of the feeling of space—that too is wisdom at work. Holding that state of mind in a completely different way. No longer confused or buying into the deluded power of that mind state, but just noticing: this is a mind state. This is wisdom at work in the mind.

And then sometimes the wisdom is even stronger. Many of you have come in and described being caught by something, some state of mind, and then suddenly you got curious about it, began to just observe it, and then it's like—it's gone. Where did it go?

The first time I experienced that, I did not believe it. I thought I'd done something wrong, actually. I went into my teacher and said, "I don't know how to observe emotions." That was what I led in with. "I want some instructions on observing emotions."

And she said, "Well, what did you experience?" Wonderful teacher, Carol. "What did you experience?" Yes, you hear us asking this a lot.

And I said, "Well, I was experiencing a feeling of abandonment. And at first I was feeling some compassion for myself about it, but then I got curious about the abandonment. And it's like I turned to say, what is this anyway? And it wasn't there."

And she said, "Well, did it feel like you were still feeling abandoned, or did it just feel like it disappeared?"

I said, "It felt like it disappeared."

She said, "Trust your experience."

That was such a lesson for me. I had all of these ideas about practice and what it meant. And the curiosity of the mind turning to look at something—basically that curiosity itself created the conditions for wisdom to hold that experience, and it just vanished. It didn't wither; it was gone. I couldn't find it anywhere. I was like, "Oh wow, I feel pretty good right now. I guess I'll just go..." But what happened to that abandonment? I'll ask Carol about it. I must not know how to observe emotions.

Well, wisdom took care of it. That is wisdom at work.

So when we turn towards experience and see a shift, maybe see a releasing, see something fade and wither and maybe even vanish—that is wisdom at work.

We also start to see at times this conditioning process. I'm revisiting some of the pieces of wisdom that I named at the beginning: the seeing of suffering, the understanding of it as suffering. Part of that seeing it as suffering is part of how and why wisdom begins to release it. Because wisdom understands what leads to well-being.

So seeing causes and conditions at work, seeing how the mind is conditioned, how action follows from intention—we can start to see this. Maybe you're outside taking a walk and feel a kind of cold breeze on your cheek. You feel the unpleasantness of that but don't quite notice it as unpleasantness. But then it's like, "Oh, that's unpleasant. I want to stop walking." And that tumbles into the intention to go inside and have a cup of tea.

When the mindfulness is more continuous, you might actually see that unfolding. In a moment, you notice the plan, the intention in the direction of "stop, time to stop walking, time to get a cup of tea"—and you've barely taken another step and that has happened. If you've seen it, then you're seeing how conditioning unfolds in the mind.

Often what happens is our direction simply changes; we go inside. When we're not mindful, we'll just follow through on that conditioning. But we can start to see the conditioned nature of experience as a process. Rather than "I'm doing that." Rather than "I'm the one that's choosing." We see that choice is conditioned by a whole series of ripple events leading up to it.

And then there's another way that wisdom can work that's a little more—it feels a little more mysterious at times.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the fourth foundation refers to noticing the non-arising of the unarisen hindrance. What does that mean—that we can notice the non-arising of the unarisen hindrance? Basically, this points to the fact that we can recognize when something is not arising. A hindrance is not arising.

The first way we might start to see this is by noticing the absence of a hindrance, which is pointed to in the third foundation: noticing the presence and absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. Yet we can also begin to recognize this more directly. In some ways, knowing the non-arising of a hindrance can be more of an understanding than a direct experience. There is a way that we can see a non-arising, and I'll describe an experience of my own where that happened. But much of the time, this understanding of the non-arising of unwholesome states is more of an understanding than a direct experience.

We can know, for instance—and many of you have talked about this—seeing over time that these things aren't bothering us so much anymore. This thing that used to happen, something that used to spin us out completely, now it's barely a ripple. We're noticing that the reactivity is not arising, but it's more of an understanding in terms of contrast over time.

At times we may see much more directly the mind heading in the direction of a defilement, heading in the direction of reactivity. And then almost as if—you know how when you reach out and accidentally touch a hot pan on the stove, your body withdraws on its own? Well, sometimes that kind of thing happens in the mind too. The more we understand that anger is suffering, that it is not well-being, the more we understand that actually in our direct experience, then we may start to recognize the mind heading in the direction of some kind of reactivity. And the mind, in seeing that, may just go, "I don't think so," and simply redirect.

At one point, after having spent quite a bit of time observing anger, getting to know it really well, getting to know the suffering of it, I was cutting an apple in my kitchen. In that moment, I wasn't really trying to be mindful. There was just a kind of field of continuity that I had cultivated over some time of practice. This was not very long into my practice—maybe three months—so this kind of thing can happen in daily life. I had been using a lot of mindfulness in daily life, orienting around seeing anger, noticing it when it arises.

So I was cutting this apple and I saw a thought arise in my mind about a person I was angry with. I noticed there was a connection in the thought because I had been at a fruit stand with that person. There was a connection between what I was doing, cutting the apple, and the memory. I was seeing the associative nature, the conditioned nature of that arising. That was wisdom, seeing that conditioned nature.

And then I saw this urge, this impulse—it felt like a freight train of desire to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry at that person. I was not angry in that moment, but that urge was so strong. Yet it was seen, that desire to get angry. All of this took place in about a split second. The mind recognized, "Ooh, that's not a good idea." I didn't decide that. The mind understood that way lies suffering. There was wisdom in the mind that understood: jumping on that freight train, not a good idea. The mind just said no, not going to do that. And that urge just kind of collapsed.

I stood there with this knife in my hand, waiting to get angry—because I had not had this person arise in my mind without anger also arising. And I did not get angry.

Now, that might have had a certain life to it. It was maybe a couple of seconds that I didn't get angry. But what happened in the next moment was mind-blowing: "Oh my gosh, this practice works! Wow!" That amazement took over my mind.

At this point in my practice, I have less of that kind of mind-blowing amazement sometimes. My sense is that sometimes you get a little break from the anger, and then the thoughts keep going, and then you pick one of them up, and anger arises. I've seen that happen too. But in that moment, this was really—I think that was the moment I stepped on the path.

I was like, yes, I'm doing this for the rest of my life. This is good stuff.

That is wisdom at work. The seeing of that—and in that case, it was really seeing that anger didn't arise. That was the gift of that moment. I had been made non-functional by the arising of anger. And to see that it didn't have to arise, what a gift. This too is wisdom, wisdom at work.

So these moments of seeing wisdom at work—hopefully my description of various ways that you can see this will help you recognize, oh yes, wisdom is working. Wisdom is growing. Wisdom is being cultivated here in this mind. All of you are already cultivating so much wisdom.

And these moments of seeing, they're a pointer. The moments of sensing a little release. I can be with this. This is just whatever it is. Or the moments when we see something let go, or see the mind simply recognize, that way lies suffering. These moments are a pointer. They're a taste, a little taste of non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. A little tiny taste of the direction of freedom. Just a taste.

And these insights too—the wisdom that arises in that moment to create the conditions for seeing in that moment—wisdom too is a conditioned arising. It is impermanent. The conditions to see through something, to understand something, you know that experience of, "Wow, this seems so obvious. How could I not see this? I must be enlightened because it's just so obvious. I'm never going to suffer again." And then a few minutes later, we're caught again. It's like, wow, I guess it wasn't so obvious. When we're in the midst of that wisdom being there, it seems very clear. It can seem so clear at times.

And yet, as I pointed to in the delusion talk, those moments of seeing through delusion—really, in a way this talk is the flip side of the delusion talk. Because those moments of wisdom arising are moments of seeing through delusion, of seeing clearly in a moment. And when delusion returns, when the wisdom passes away, it's not that there is no lingering effect. That wisdom has a conditioning power on our minds. We understand something that we didn't before. And so now we can know, oh, this is delusion. This being caught by this mind state—oh, maybe this is just a thought. A thought is creating this state of mind. Having seen maybe a thought just being the kind of trigger for the arising of a whole complex of self-hatred—in that moment seeing through it, but then not seeing through it at other times—we can bring that wisdom in, remind ourselves, oh, this is just a thought. So there's a way in which that wisdom is available to be borrowed from ourselves even as it's not actively present in the moment.

So there's a trust that begins to grow as we begin to recognize wisdom, how it works, and that it leads us in the direction of well-being and towards letting go of the states of mind that create so much struggle and suffering and stress. We begin to trust this practice more and more.

And so it's kind of a spiraling—we get a little taste of wisdom and a little bit more trust grows. And that impels us to work, to explore, to investigate. Sometimes that means settling back and just receiving. But we gain some wisdom, some understanding, and that impels us further on the path, deepens our understanding, which gives us more trust, which gives us more understanding. And so there is this spiraling nature of the unfolding of the path, and it becomes very organic at some point. And we can begin to trust wisdom to lead the practice.

CHAPTER 14

Disenchantment and Dispassion

Andrea Fella · 1h04

> In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the teaching of transcendent dependent origination (lokuttara paṭiccasamuppāda), which describes the conditions that support liberation rather than suffering. While the traditional twelve links of dependent origination explain how dukkha arises, this parallel teaching reveals how suffering itself becomes the first supportive condition for freedom—when met with wisdom and the willingness to practice.
> The talk traces the natural unfolding from suffering through faith, delight, rapture, tranquility, happiness, and concentration to knowledge and vision of things as they are. Andrea then offers an intimate exploration of nibbidā (disenchantment) and virāga (dispassion)—two crucial links often misunderstood or glossed over. She candidly describes how disenchantment can manifest as groundlessness, fear, disgust, homesickness, boredom, or even aversion to practice itself, emphasizing that these difficult experiences are not signs of failure but natural responses as the mind releases its habitual ways of seeking security.
> Drawing from her own practice experiences and the commentarial tradition, Andrea explains that dispassion represents a gradual 'fading away' of attachment—first to sense pleasures, then even to meditative states—revealing freedom not as an acquisition but as relinquishment. The talk concludes with Bhikkhu Bodhi's insight that nibbāna is realized precisely through understanding the conditioned, not by escaping from it: 'The understanding of the conditioned is the way to the unconditioned.'

We've been talking a lot about conditioning and the conditioned nature of our experience, particularly the conditioned nature of suffering. The Buddha offered a description of the conditions that lead to the arising of suffering. Many of you are probably familiar with this teaching—the teaching of dependent origination. That is not the topic of this talk, and yet it's close.

This teaching of dependent origination describes a process by which suffering comes to be: conditions that basically support the arising of suffering. Feeling leads to craving, leads to clinging, leads to becoming or selfing, leads to birth, leads to aging, sickness, and death, leads to suffering.

Yet this teaching of conditioning, the conditioned nature of our experience of dependent co-arising, has a more general form, a more general frame. In one place the Buddha said that this teaching of conditioning could be described something like: When this is, that is. When this arises, that arises. When this isn't, that isn't. When this ceases, that ceases.

This understanding about conditioning—especially this part about the ceasing, "when this isn't, that isn't, when this ceases, that ceases"—allows us to recognize and understand that if there are conditions that come into play to create suffering, then when those conditions cease, suffering ceases. This is one way to understand how conditions might lead to freedom. The ceasing of the conditions that create suffering can lead to the ceasing of suffering. When we let go of the conditions that create suffering, suffering doesn't arise.

For example, in the chain of dependent origination, one of the ways I really understand it is that the head of that chain is ignorance. Sometimes this chain of dependent origination is called dependent co-arising, and we could say that when ignorance is arising, all the conditions co-arising with ignorance means that suffering is arising. So when ignorance is arising, suffering is arising.

We often think about this chain as: this happens, then this happens, then this happens, in a kind of causal link. But I actually understand it more as a co-arising. When ignorance is present, suffering is happening. When ignorance is not present—when feeling, for instance, when pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral is met with mindfulness and wisdom rather than ignorance—then the conditions are different, and feeling doesn't lead to craving. The craving not arising means the clinging doesn't arise, means the becoming doesn't arise, means the suffering doesn't arise.

This is one way to understand how the conditions and this teaching of conditionality can support us in freedom. In that exploration, the work is really to understand suffering and understand the ignorance, creating different conditions so that that chain of suffering doesn't happen. It really is a kind of letting go of the conditions that lead to suffering. A lot of what we've been talking about here is how to cultivate conditions that support letting go.

This is actually another framing of dependent origination. The traditional teaching of dependent origination talks about how suffering is created. There's another teaching of dependent origination called transcendent dependent origination. This is the topic of the talk. It describes the conditions that support freedom—another way to look at it, the conditions that support the mind releasing, letting go.

The Buddha actually asked this question. At times he asked, what is it that makes suffering arise? There are teachings where he describes how he came to understand this chain of dependent origination almost by working backwards: when suffering arises, what needs to arise in order for suffering to arise? Birth needs to arise for suffering to arise. And what needs to arise in order for birth to arise? Becoming. He worked his way back to understand ignorance at the root of that chain.

But he also asked the question: what are the supporting conditions for freedom? He did a similar kind of reflection and exploration, working his way back, and came up with twelve links—at least in this framing—that lead us to freedom. Freedom has supporting conditions.

One of the things I find most interesting about this is that the first link in this chain is suffering. Suffering is a supportive condition for freedom. It's not just that suffering in and of itself will support the movement in the direction of freedom—we know that.

We see the world not naturally heading in the direction of freedom. And so understanding this as a supporting condition, there are some other things that come into play to create the conditions for suffering to be transformative, for suffering to lead in the direction of freedom.

The first piece is really meeting it, acknowledging it as suffering. Really understanding: yes, this is suffering. And the second is hearing some teachings, hearing essentially that there may be a path that would lead us to freedom, to the release of suffering.

The Buddha is said to have said that suffering leads to bewilderment or to search. And if it leads to search—if it leads one to, as in his own journey it is said, ask the question, "Does anyone know a way out of this suffering?"—if it leads to that kind of reflection, we begin on a journey to look for perhaps teachings or supports to help us find a path. And if we encounter a teaching, if the mind is receptive and able to hear that teaching, then suffering becomes a supporting condition for faith. And this is the first link in this chain.

Now, I'm not going to approach this talk on transcendent dependent origination in a typical way where I might go through all of the links in some detail. I'm actually going to skim over many of them and focus on two in particular in the later part of the chain. But I'm going to give you the broad brushstrokes, the big picture of this teaching.

So just to begin: suffering is a supportive condition for faith to arise. Faith supports delight. Delight supports rapture or joy. Joy supports tranquility. Tranquility supports happiness. Happiness supports concentration. That part is really what we've been doing on this retreat—those six links. Concentration supports knowledge and vision of things as they are, seeing experience clearly. This knowledge and vision of things as they are supports disenchantment—basically disenchantment with our usual ways of finding happiness, seeing that they're not really very reliable methods or ways to find happiness. Knowledge and vision of things as they are supports disenchantment. Disenchantment supports dispassion. Dispassion supports release. And release is followed by basically understanding that one has been freed.

The sutta in which this teaching is described offers an analogy about how this process works. It says, just think about a mountain. When rain runs down the mountain, it will naturally run downhill and find crevices and gullies. Those crevices and gullies will fill with the rain, and they will overflow and then run further down to the streams, to the rivers, to the ocean. Inexorably, the water landing on that mountain runs downhill because that is the nature of things.

Similarly, this unfolding of the path, this unfolding of these conditions, is a natural unfolding. As the conditions for faith arise, as suffering is met with some wisdom, some hearing of a teaching, and that hearing of that teaching inclines one to engage—that's really where faith begins, with the willingness to put these teachings into practice.

And so while there is a natural unfolding, it's not a natural unfolding where we sit back like a lump and let something happen. Because part of the natural unfolding is engagement. That hearing—yes, there is a way; here are some teachings; here are some practices; put these practices into place. As the Buddha said, "Here are the roots of trees. Sit, meditate, lest you regret it later." There are actions that we are encouraged to take up, and an inspiration that this heads us in the direction of freedom.

Some of us hear that and begin to engage. And so this path, this very natural unfolding—part of the natural unfolding is that our system responds and engages. It's not a path of non-doing. There is engagement. It doesn't mean that we don't do any work.

And yet as the path unfolds, as these conditions unfold, we can start to see how these conditions are like feedback loops between some of these links. Every pair essentially can be looked at this way. For instance, faith supports delight. When we have faith, delight can arise partly from the sense of, "Oh, maybe there's a possibility for freedom." So there can be some inspiration, some willingness to engage. And with that delight, and perhaps a little bit of engagement, it can feed back to support more faith. These kinds of feedback loops are everywhere in this teaching.

The first time we touch into really seeing something clearly—the other night I described that experience of cutting the apple and seeing how the mind was, how the memory arose and the mind was inclined towards jumping on that thought to think more thoughts, to get angry.

But then, seeing that that way lies suffering, the mind just dropped it and let it go. That moment was a very powerful confirmation of the power of the practice. I think I said I was kind of blown away. It's like, "Wow, this stuff works. I'm going to do this." So that experience really supported faith, supported more engagement. And there are multiple feedback loops in this process.

This first part of transcendent dependent origination describes the wholesome states that condition opening to understanding: faith, delight, rapture, tranquility, happiness, and concentration. Suffering supports the arising of faith when wisdom is applied, when wisdom is heard. That arising of suffering can lead to the arising of faith, and with that faith there's the willingness to engage, a delight perhaps in finding the path, the engagement in ethical conduct. The delight of seeing how being engaged with care with our fellow human beings in this relational field—as Brian was talking about—being engaged with care and love creates delight, non-remorse. The delight of non-remorse.

As we begin to engage more in the practice, joy can arise as we start to experience moments—maybe sometimes short moments, sometimes longer—when we recognize the hindrances are not so strong. Sometimes they fall away completely. This experience of the hindrances falling away is said to be—there's a term for it in the suttas—it's called the bliss of seclusion. We're secluded from those unwholesome states of mind, and very naturally in being secluded from those unwholesome states, there is joy.

And yet I've seen in my own experience of the practice that there are times when the wisdom of meeting experience, just the mindfulness and wisdom meeting experience, there's a joy in the engagement. Sometimes I've seen something arise like, "Wow, there's impatience. Wow." So much delight in seeing the mind able to hold this—joy in being able to meet what we previously got pulled under by. So it's not always that this sense of joy comes when there aren't any hindrances in the mind. Sometimes it's the ability to hold those hindrances with wisdom and mindfulness that can bring joy also. Amusement, delight.

And then, as the mind settles further, it begins to recognize that sometimes that joy, that rapture, has kind of an energetic quality to it that feels just a little bit agitating. As the mind begins to get more attuned to even a subtle agitation—the subtle agitation contained in joy—the mind just... it's not that it's agitated by hindrances, but it's just agitated by energy, maybe slightly restless with energy. Then the mind begins to release that, and tranquility follows. The mind settles even further, and then very naturally happiness arises—a sweetness of being present. These three together can interconnect in our practice.

One time I was sitting at my kitchen table, just having a meal and present for what was happening, and there was this upwelling of joy, a really powerful upwelling of joy. My mind was like, "Whoa, that's intense. I don't think I can handle that." There was a little bit of trying to hold it down because it was so intense. A little bit of wisdom just whizzed through my mind in that moment, which said something like, "Well, it's okay, it'll pass." At that point, the mind that had been pushing down to try to contain that joy just let go. Then the joy got really strong—it was like this huge wave—but in not being either repressed or fed, it just arose and then ebbed. That ebbing was experienced as a releasing and a tranquility, and on the other side of that was just sweet happiness. So these three—rapture, tranquility, and happiness—can have this kind of interrelationship at times.

Another thing I really love about this teaching is how much it's pointing to the conditions leading to freedom. It starts with suffering, and yet faith, delight, joy, and happiness are part of our journey, part of our path. Jill talked about the brahmaviharas the other day. This is similar terrain in a way—this terrain of beautiful wholesome qualities. They're a very natural part of our path. Sometimes they come as we incline the mind towards the qualities, and sometimes they're just naturally arising as a consequence of meeting experience with wisdom.

Sometimes minds will tend to orient more towards the cultivation of the beautiful qualities, the brahmaviharas, and the wholesome qualities of love and joy. That's an easy doorway for some. For others, the doorway may be more the wisdom doorway. But all of the doorways that lead into this teaching meet somewhere in the middle. The path of orienting around love and joy can point us towards wisdom, and the orientation from wisdom can also point us towards compassion and love. They're not so separate.

And then happiness is the supporting condition for concentration.

This is useful to remember. It was certainly not what I had in mind when I started my practice. I thought the supporting condition for concentration was simply slogging effort—forcing my mind to stay put. But it's much easier for the mind to gather and collect when it's experiencing a kind of delight in being present.

This happiness of the path is not our usual kind of happiness. It's not the happiness of having something that we want. It's more a happiness related to wholesome conduct, ethical conduct, to letting go, to relinquishment. It's a pleasure that arises in the mind as disturbance is released. And the release of disturbance in the mind creates the conditions for happiness—a different kind of happiness. Sometimes it's a flavor of happiness we have to acquire a taste for.

But that non-disturbance, that condition of non-disturbance in the mind—one way of understanding concentration is as non-distractedness. And non-disturbance supports non-distractedness. So this is concentration: the non-distracted mind.

Different kinds of concentration are possible in this practice. There is one-pointed concentration, where the mind allows itself to connect with one experience and other experience falls away. The teachings talk about this form of concentration as a supportive condition for freedom, but not sufficient in and of itself. It is the power of that mind that can settle and stabilize that can then see things as they are. The concentrated mind is turned towards noticing things as they are.

The other form of concentration is moment-to-moment concentration—noticing just this moment, this moment, this moment, the continuity of mindfulness that we've been talking about. The term for this in the Pali is khanika samadhi, moment-to-moment samadhi. It's a samadhi where the mindfulness is not pulled out of the present moment, so in that way it's not distracted. Each moment the mind lands on experience and it's not distracted to start thinking about it and proliferating about it. The next moment there's an experience and it knows that one, and the next one, and the next one.

Sometimes this kind of samadhi feels unfamiliar to people if you've been mostly doing one-pointed concentration, and it may feel like the mind is distracted because it's not staying with one thing. But the question there is: Are you aware? Is the mind stable in awareness? Moment after moment, is there an awareness of what is happening?

This kind of concentration essentially develops the next link in the chain: knowledge and vision of things as they are. The moment-to-moment concentration develops through meeting moment after moment, and it is developing that capacity to know and see things as they are.

In the one case, where the mind settles into one-pointed concentration, at some point in order to continue on the path towards freedom, there needs to be a turning of that concentration towards understanding experience in its changing nature. Essentially that's the shift we make to transform a concentration practice into a vipassana practice.

We turn that mind that's been stable to noticing changing experience. In the moment-to-moment concentration practice, we're already noticing changing experience. So both of these forms of concentration can be used in the service of liberation.

That framing—those words—were very supportive for me at various times in my practice, particularly when I was doing concentration practice and wondered, why am I doing this? Then I remembered: right, this is in the service of freedom. This is in the service of liberation. That is the purpose here.

The concentrated mind, when turned to changing experience, begins to reveal the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. This is the mind beginning to touch into knowledge and vision of things as they are—understanding the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience.

All those first conditions—faith, delight, rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration—they're creating the mind in a place, in a state where it can meet experience, where it can meet impermanence, it can meet dukkha, and be interested in understanding it rather than trying to fix it or change it.

This is a key tipping point in this chain of transcendent dependent origination: the shift to knowledge and vision of things as they are. The next several links in the chain begin to point to how suffering is released. Knowledge and vision of things as they are supports us in beginning to be disenchanted with our usual framing of living our lives.

This is the next link in the chain: disenchantment. I'm going to spend a little more time on these next two links—disenchantment and dispassion.

Disenchantment is a natural consequence of beginning to recognize at a very deep level the impermanent and unreliable nature of experience. We also see the conditioned nature of experience—that there's no one doing, choosing, deciding. There are decisions made, there are conditions arising. And so we become disenchanted with our sense of self, and we become disenchanted with the habits and patterns associated with that sense of self that have been our usual way of engaging in the world.

I like this translation. The term is nibbidā, and I like the translation "disenchantment" because it really does point to how essentially our minds have been caught up in some kind of magic show, believing its story, believing delusion's story that getting this is what's going to make me happy, or getting rid of that is what's going to make me happy. As we see with our own direct experience, that is not very reliable. That kind of happiness—yes, there is a kind of happiness that comes from getting what we want—doesn't last very long. And we see that. We see that unreliability very directly.

We see that we have been caught in this illusion, this enchantment essentially. Ignorance, delusion, creates an illusion that we can be happy in these ways. And the clear seeing, knowledge and vision of things as they are, begins to burst that bubble. We clearly see: yeah, that's not the way. That doesn't seem to work very well.

Bhikkhu Bodhi has a description of the experience of disenchantment that I'll read to you: "Nibbidā signifies, in short, the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena when their illusion of permanence, pleasure, and selfhood have been shattered by the light of correct knowledge and vision of things as they are."

That makes it sound pretty peaceful—a serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena. In my experience, it's not necessarily so serene, nor does it even feel very dignified. It can feel pretty messy at this point in practice. This is the point where the mind begins to see the ways that it had been used to finding things to land on, ways to find happiness. When the rug gets pulled out from all of those, the mind is not very happy about this.

In another teaching, and primarily in the commentaries, there's discussion of a whole range of experiences that happen around this point—a whole range of relationships to seeing that things are impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable. This is the terrain of disenchantment. It's not simple, like: "Oh, see things as they are. Oh, I'm disenchanted." Deep, deep inside of us there's this deep response: "No, it can't be that way. No, there's got to be some place to land. No, I need my security." Some of those come from a very non-verbal place. And so sometimes at this point in the practice, when we're starting to see just how unreliable things are, our mind goes through something like clinging on to the cliff with our fingernails. No.

There are many different emotional flavors described in the teachings around how the mind responds—these last gasps of deeper clinging around the release into deeply letting go into the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience. Sometimes this experience, starting to feel into that—and I've heard some of you talk about these things—some language that gets used here is: it feels like there's just nowhere to land, nothing to cling to, nothing works, groundlessness. That kind of language comes to us as we recognize that the way we had landed on things is not really a landing. It's not really reliable.

There are different ways the mind relates to this. Groundlessness, nothing to land on, nowhere to cling. Sometimes it can be experienced as disgust or revulsion—that's another translation of the word nibbidā. So that can be an emotional flavor that happens at this point, this flavor of "ugh." Sometimes this can have physical effects. Nausea, for instance.

The main work is in the mind, to begin to recognize. And what I will say here is that in this phase of disenchantment, it's not so helpful necessarily to try to say, "Oh, okay, well, yeah, this disgust is happening, but I need to just be with this feeling of groundlessness or this feeling of being nowhere to land." The path here lies in recognizing the relationship. In this place where we really start to have emotional responses to impermanence, reactive emotional responses to impermanence, the path is actually just the same.

Notice the relationship. Notice that reactivity. It's like revulsion to nowhere to land is happening. That's just another phenomenon in our mind. It's a phenomenon—it's kind of deeper forms of clinging that are related to the letting go around impermanence. And so with all of these different relationships, the path is: notice the relationship.

Sometimes the relationship to seeing this impermanent, nowhere-to-land quality is fear. The feeling of security is gone. We've had this illusion of security—I can create something to land on and I'll land there. We've had that as an illusion. And when that illusion is burst, when we see that there isn't anywhere to land, our mind isn't just ready to say, "Oh, nowhere to land." It gets terrified at times. Terror can be a response here.

There can sometimes be a sense of overwhelm at how fast we're seeing things change, and that can also lead to fear. It's like, I can't keep up with this. Fortunately, you don't have to. The mind will do it. That was one exploration for myself in that place—I felt like I had to somehow try to keep up with the fast pace of the change. I can't do that. And then stepping back, it's more just recognizing: wow, instead of trying to remember or recognize all the different things that are changing, there's more just, wow, this is the experience of change. It feels like streaming. It feels like popping. It feels like dissolving—different flavors of that. And so not feeling like you have to keep up with all the things that are dissolving or popping or streaming, but just this experience of streaming. That was helpful for me in this kind of place.

Another experience, another relationship that can happen at this point, is something like homesickness. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Janaka, named it this way. He said you can feel homesick. And my understanding of that is we're homesick for the familiar, for the way our mind was used to being. It's like that's not there anymore. We're not home in our familiar home. So there can be that sense of feeling a little bereft. Again, notice the relationship. Notice the relationship. Homesickness is arising. A feeling of bereftness is arising.

This point of practice is not pleasant. And this is partly why I'm talking about it, because we do sometimes believe that if we were doing it right, it would always be pleasant—or at least it would feel like the mind was balanced. But this point in practice can feel spectacularly unbalanced.

Another flavor of relationship at this point can be boredom. Like, enough already. Had enough of this seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching. Just feeling like you're constantly being impinged upon. It can have a flavor, initially perhaps, of oppressiveness. Seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching. Ugh. Ugh.

At one point I was on retreat and I was in this terrain, and it was like every sense impression was so strong, so overwhelming. And a frog—this is at Spirit Rock—the frogs were out. One night a frog started croaking. At first there was one frog, and it felt like this screeching through my whole system. And then another frog, and then another frog, and then it was like a whole chorus of frogs. I could barely hang in there.

It was so unpleasant, so oppressive. And I didn't really know at that point to notice that oppressiveness is happening. I was trying to stay with the frog sound, which isn't so helpful. But recognizing "Oh, oppression—the feeling of oppressive experience—that's what's happening" changes everything.

After that kind of feeling of oppressiveness passes, sometimes what remains is just boredom. It's just more seeing, smelling, hearing. Is this everything? Is this all there is? Seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, stuff in the mind? Yes. And as Joseph says, only six things ever happen. That's all that goes on. At a certain stage it can feel like there's disinterest—the mind loses interest in phenomena. That's another flavor of relationship at this point.

What can arise here too is not wanting to practice. The mind just gives up. If you notice that, that too is just an arising. When I finally recognize, "Oh, not wanting to practice is arising," I can practice with that. What a relief! The mind might believe "not wanting to practice." It's just a thought. But if it believes that thought, at least initially in my mind, I felt betrayed. I felt like I either had to change that state—because if I didn't want to practice, it meant something, it meant that my mind was betraying me somehow—or it meant I should stop practicing. The middle way is recognizing that "not wanting to practice" is happening. That can be known.

So the mind goes through this variety of relationships at this point—a variety of relationships to the impermanent, unreliable, uncontrollable nature of experience. As our minds get more balanced around this, the mind comes into more of a sense of equanimity. Then a deeper letting go can happen. This is where the mind moves into dispassion.

The Buddha talked about how this kind of fades—this word viraga, translated as dispassion, actually means fading away. It's a fading away of our desire, of our clinging, of our craving. The Buddha talks about this: "I abandoned craving for sensual pleasures. I removed the fever for sensual pleasures and I abide without thirst, with the mind inwardly at peace. I see other beings who are not free from lust for sensual pleasures being devoured by craving, and I do not envy them. Why is that? Because there is a delight apart from sensual pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, which surpasses even divine bliss. Since I take delight in that, I do not envy what is inferior."

This points to some of the ways that the fading can happen. He points to the fading away around sense desire—that craving toward wanting to have pleasant and get rid of unpleasant in the sense realm. That attachment to sense pleasure begins to fade. And that may be replaced by a little bit of attachment to meditative states, to the bliss, the delight, the joy, the happiness—those first parts of this chain of dependent origination where there may be some attachment. It's almost like we can let go of the attachment to sense pleasure by picking up this attachment to these wholesome states.

And yet the whole of the practice leading to non-attachment points us at some point to also letting go of those wholesome states—the fading away of attachment to any state. When the Buddha said there's a delight apart from sense pleasures which surpasses even divine bliss, that's what he's pointing to. The divine bliss is the delight of concentration. There's a delight that surpasses that, which is the letting go of attachment to any state. This is the fading away, this dispassion. And even the term "fading away" points to how this might be a gradual process.

Cloth fades when left in the sun. The dye in the cloth fades gradually. And so this fading away—maybe initially there's a fading away of certain levels of attachment or clinging. Perhaps we do pick up an attachment to concentration or happiness that helps us to let go of attachment around sense pleasures. And so there's this kind of fading happening almost in a staged fashion—not necessarily, again, just like, "Oh, disenchantment, dispassion, done, done." It's not like that in my experience. It's much more gradual, this awakening.

And sometimes the fading away experience, the sense of understanding that letting go—even that can come and go. There might be times where we recognize, "Yeah, nothing to cling to," and we feel, definitely recognize, a kind of sense of balance and equanimity around that. A clear seeing of that. The mind really lets go. But then delusion returns. At a later time we might find ourselves caught in the grip of wanting again. And so my sense of this unfolding isn't that it's like a continually deepening linear progression. It has much more ebbs and flows.

This dispassion is understood really as being the release of attachment. Bhikkhu Bodhi, in a commentary about this sutta, says this is really the taste of freedom—this mind opening to releasing attachment. And this word dispassion is sometimes used as synonymous with nibbana, with freedom. There's one definition of nibbana: "This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana." And so there are these similes for nibbana: the destruction of craving, dispassion, the relinquishing of attachments.

Another definition for freedom is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion—we could say the non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion. And to me this points to the fact that freedom is not an acquisition. The releasing, all of these descriptions—relinquishing of attachment, the destruction of craving, the non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion—freedom is not about acquiring anything. It's all about letting go.

We might feel into this a little bit, this quality of dispassion. Very naturally as we age, we become dispassionate about things that we used to be very passionate about. What was your favorite toy when you were five years old? Maybe when you were seven, you held onto it a little bit. But at this point, until I mentioned it, there wasn't interest or disinterest in that. It just didn't arise, this idea of that favorite toy. This is the kind of dispassion.

The other piece of this is that it's not about non-feeling either. That word dispassion maybe evokes for us a sense of not feeling. But dispassion—the releasing of greed, aversion, and delusion—leaves space for compassion, for love, for joy.

I'll end with this quote and one little comment about it regarding freedom, realizing freedom. Another framing for this—and this is kind of a paradox of this teaching—is that we are looking at conditions that support the arising of freedom, conditions that support opening to freedom, I should maybe say, as a better way to frame it. Conditions that support opening to freedom. Because freedom is understood to be unconditioned. Nibbana is sometimes described as the unconditioned. And so there's a kind of paradox here: we are creating conditions that allow us to open to the unconditioned.

Here's how Bhikkhu Bodhi speaks of this: "Though the realization of the unconditioned requires a turning away from the conditioned, it must be emphasized that this realization is achieved precisely through the understanding of the conditioned. Nibbana cannot be reached by backing off from a direct confrontation with samsara to lose oneself in a blissful oblivion to the world. The path to liberation is a path of understanding, of comprehension and transcendence, not of escapism or emotional self-indulgence. Nibbana can only be attained by turning one's gaze towards samsara, towards suffering, and scrutinizing it in all its darkness. The understanding of the conditioned is the way to the unconditioned."

We turn towards suffering.

That is the path to freedom. Suffering itself becomes a supportive condition for liberation—when met with wisdom.

Let's sit for a minute.

May our practice together be the condition that supports our own freedom and the freedom of all beings.

CHAPTER 15

Practicing Freedom

Andrea Fella · 58 min

> In this reflective dharma talk, Andrea Fella shares her deep appreciation for the Aṭṭhakavagga, a collection of sixteen poems from the Sutta Nipāta that scholars consider among the oldest strata of Buddhist teachings. She explores how this text presents freedom not as an abstract metaphysical goal, but as recognizable qualities embodied by liberated beings—calmness, wisdom, gentleness, and freedom from anger, fear, and attachment to views.
> The teaching examines three perspectives woven throughout these poems: the ordinary person caught in clinging, the practitioner in training, and the fully liberated sage. Fella highlights the text's emphasis on how attachment to views creates conflict and suffering, noting the Buddha's teaching that even true views should not be clung to. She also explores the Diṭṭhi Sutta (AN 10.93), where the householder Anāthapiṇḍika demonstrates a view that contains within itself the seeds of its own transcendence.
> Particularly practical is Fella's exploration of "modeling freedom"—the practice of acting peacefully while fully acknowledging inner irritation, not through repression but through conscious intention. Using her own experience with impatience in a drugstore, she illustrates how this practice can interrupt the feedback loop that sustains unwholesome mind states. The talk offers an inspiring vision of liberation as something achievable in this very life, grounded in everyday experience rather than cosmological speculation.

There is a story about a Zen teacher who was giving a dharma talk in English, though English was not the teacher's first language. In the spaces between the words, while searching for the right English expressions, the teacher fell asleep while giving their own dharma talk. The colleague who told me this story, Gil Fronsdal, said, "I aspire to be so relaxed that I could fall asleep while giving a dharma talk." I have that same aspiration, and today my colleagues actually reminded me of this as we walked in here, because I have very low energy today. I even commented that I can't muster the energy to have any adrenaline before the talk, which is really unusual. So we'll see how this goes. The laughter helps to brighten my energy, which is partly why I told the story—to help lift the energy for myself.

Tonight I wanted to share some poems, in particular one text composed of sixteen poems. The text is called the Aṭṭhakavagga, found in the Sutta Nipāta. It's a favorite text of mine. I was asked at one point when I was in teacher training to teach a daylong retreat on this text. Gil asked me to do this, and I said I didn't know anything about it. He said, "Well, study it." So I spent six months studying this text, and it has become one of my favorites. I won't be able to go over the entire thing tonight—I'm not even going to try—but I'd like to offer some of the flavor of the teaching.

The title itself: Aṭṭhaka basically means "eight" and vagga means "chapter" or "book," so the English title would be "The Book of the Eights." There's some question about why it would be called that, because there are sixteen poems and none of them are limited to anything like eight verses. They're not about sets of eight or anything, so there's no particularly clear reason for the name. And yet that is what they're called.

There's general agreement among scholars who study the Pali texts that these suttas are fairly old within the strata of the Pali canon. They have a different flavor to them. Many of the teachings in the canon are very codified, with a lot of repetition and lists. In this teaching, it's much more organic. You get a picture of the Buddha as somebody wandering around India, meeting up with people who ask him questions, and he responds. You get a different picture of the Buddha in this teaching.

Another reason scholars think this is an older text is that the Pali used is more archaic. Some scholars say the fact that they're poems might account for that. But the real indication that they're an older stratum of the teaching is that this is one of the few teachings referred to elsewhere in the texts as a text. There are places where monastics are asked, "Have you memorized the Aṭṭhakavagga?" So it's referred to as teaching poems—poems to memorize and allow to infuse and inform your practice.

The main theme repeated throughout virtually all the poems is a reflection on clinging and its drawbacks. Clinging to sense pleasure and clinging to views are both highlighted. The teaching covers these from different perspectives. Some poems come from the perspective of an ordinary person who's clinging, someone not exposed to the teachings—the perspective of someone who hasn't particularly practiced. Then there's a set of poems relating to how somebody on the path works with these teachings. And finally, there's a set describing someone who's free from clinging.

When I started studying this, the comments by Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu were particularly helpful. He said it's really useful to recognize which of these three flavors is present as you read a particular poem: Is it about the ordinary person? Is it about the person in training? Or is it about the liberated person? You get slightly different teachings from each angle. Then there are verses that describe the training itself—how to move from being an ordinary person to being a liberated person.

Let me share some of these with you. For an ordinary person and their relationship to clinging—clinging to sense pleasure—here is one verse. All of these poems have been translated differently by various scholars; some I've taken from Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu, some from Bhikkhu Varado, others from Sadātissa and other translators. But in all cases, I have altered the translation slightly to be gender neutral:

If one, longing for sensual pleasure, achieves it, yes, they're enraptured at heart. The mortal gets what they want. But if for that person, longing, desiring, the pleasures diminish, they're shattered as if shot with an arrow. One who is greedy is overpowered with weakness and trampled by trouble, for pain invades them as water a cracked boat.

Longing for what's over or for what's to come, yearning for pleasures in the present and pleasures of the past—those who are greedy for pleasure, hunting for it, deranged, selfish, have entered the wrong road. Look at them floundering amidst their cherished possessions like fish in a dwindling stream.

Some of these images have actually come to me directly. At one point, this image of fish in a dwindling stream—my mind actually felt like that. In one retreat I was sitting there watching my mind flopping around, looking for something, looking for something that would satisfy it. And the image of the fish flopping arose in my mind, and it actually brought some humor into the experience. Look at this mind flopping around looking for pleasure. I think this may be some of the reason why we're encouraged to memorize these verses.

And then there's something about clinging to views—some of the drawbacks of clinging to views and how an ordinary person relates to them:

Abiding by fixed opinions and pleased with themselves, they say, "My opponent's a fool, they're no expert." Upon whatever basis they regard their opponent a fool is the same upon which they regard themselves as an expert. To the extent that they rate themselves expert, they despise anyone else who makes the same claim. Those attached to perception and views roam the world offending people.

And then a questioner asks the Buddha: "Those who maintain a view and dispute, saying 'this alone is true'—is criticism all they experience? Do they not indeed also receive praise?"

And the Buddha responds: What they receive is trifling, not enough to bring them any peace of mind. I say there are only two consequences of dispute: praise and criticism. Seeing this, you should not dispute, regarding instead non-dispute as the grounds for peace.

So this points to several things about views. One of the key pieces is attachment to views, which is highlighted in several places. "Those attached to perception and views roam the world offending people"—attached and regarding oneself an expert. It's not necessarily saying, at least here, that views are bad, but that attachment to views is something to be on the lookout for.

One of the ways to be on the lookout for this attachment is by noticing whether there's dispute, whether there's quarreling. The ground for conflict, the Buddha points to here and in some other places in the texts in general, but also elsewhere in the Aṭṭhakavagga—the Buddha points to this attachment to views as being the root source of conflict. Any conflict in the world comes back to attachment to views. "This is what's true. Anything else is wrong." That framing is often used in the text to describe attachment to views—when somebody says, "This is what's true, everything else is false." It really highlights that distinction of picking something up as truth, as opposed to recognizing, "This is a view."

I hope to have more time to explore some of the ways this teaching talks about views. But I'd like to go back to the overarching direction of this teaching and then explore a little bit: What does this teaching have to say about, or how does it describe, someone who's free? How does it describe a liberated person?

What I found in exploring this and in reflecting on the descriptions here—the poems about liberated people—is that liberation is described in terms of the person who is free, the qualities of that person, and descriptions of how they are in the world. It's not described as something separate from the one who is free.

Here are some verses describing someone who's free. A questioner said to the Buddha: "I want to ask you about the perfect person. There are these people, those people we call one who is calmed. Can you tell me how they see things and how they behave?"

The Buddha responds: One who is calmed, who has extinguished all cravings before the time the body disintegrates into nothing, who has no concern with how things began or how they will end, and no fixation with what happens in between—such a one has no preferences. They have no anger, no fear, and no pride. Nothing disturbs their composure and nothing gives them cause for regret. They are wise who are restrained in speech. They have no longing for the future and no grief for the past. There are no views or opinions that lead them. They can see detachment from the entangled world of sense impressions. They do not conceal anything and there is nothing they hold onto. Without acquisitiveness or envy, they remain unobtrusive. They have no disdain or insult for anyone. They are not full of themselves or addicted to pleasure. They are gentle and alert, with no blind faith, and show no aversion to anything. The sage, free from greed and selfishness, does not speak of oneself as among those who are superior, equal, or inferior.

The sage regards nothing in the world as one's own and does not grieve because of what does not exist. Not blindly following religious teachings, such a one is called peaceful.

To me this is a description that's very recognizable. We can imagine someone being calm and peaceful and wise. The descriptions are largely about what they are not, how they do not behave. They are not angry, not fearful, they don't have pride, they're not fixated, they have no preferences, they don't have blind faith, they have no aversion, no comparisons, nothing relied on. It's what they're free of that comprises much of the description, and we've been exploring this understanding that freedom is not about acquiring—it's release. Freedom is release.

There are a few positive descriptions here of how the mind might be experienced, the qualities of the mind: calm, wise, gentle, alert, composed, peaceful. And elsewhere in other parts of the teaching there are additional descriptions. They're mindful. They see and know. They understand. They are equanimous.

This is actually quite inspiring to me—that the description of liberation in this teaching portrays the liberated state not in terms of some abstract idea, but in terms of the qualities and actions of people who are free. One of the things I also find inspiring about this teaching is that the whole flavor is very much what I would call a this-worldly teaching. The descriptions of freedom, the descriptions of the practice are very grounded in what seems recognizable. It's not a metaphysical teaching of some kind of freedom from rebirth.

There are a couple of places in this text where it could potentially refer to freedom from rebirth, but it could also just refer to letting go of clinging to the future. The flavor of this teaching actually contrasts quite strongly with the standard Theravada perspective of liberation, where there is this metaphysical alteration of being that means one is no longer subject to taking birth. In this teaching, that's not what is of interest. It is a teaching interested in looking at what freedom means here and now. What does it mean in this very life? And how can this happen in this very life?

One scholar, Grace Burford, reflecting on this particular aspect of this text, wrote her graduate thesis on it. Her thesis was published as a book, and that was one of my main resources during my six months of study. She wrote: "The Aṭṭhakavagga is exceptional even within the early Buddhist literature in its non-metaphysical presentation of the highest good achievable by humans. It is significant as an example of how the Buddhist ideal goal can be presented without all the usual problematic cosmological and metaphysical accessories that accompany it in its traditional Theravada doctrine."

Another scholar, Luis Gomez, says: "The Aṭṭhakavagga sets out to find or describe a practical solution to human sorrow—not merely the abstract sorrow of rebirth, but the everyday sorrow of strife and aggression."

This is one of the flavors of what I really love about this text. It points to freedom in this life, this possibility. What does it look like?

And then there are the poems that describe the path to liberation. These include poems about how someone in training should be. The path to liberation is basically describing how one should engage while being on the path. I'll read some of one text—there are several that do this kind of exploration. As I read this, listen to see if it sounds familiar.

The questioner asks the Buddha: "Now venerable sir, speak about the path of practice."

And the Buddha responds: "A person should not have covetous eyes, should close one's ears to ordinary chatter, should not be greedy for flavors, one should not cherish anything in the world. One should be meditative, not footloose. One should desist from worry. One should not be indolent. One should live in lodgings where there is little noise. One should not sleep too much. One should be devoted to wakefulness and keen endeavor. One should abandon laziness, deception. One should not fear blame, nor be conceited when praised. One should drive out greed, selfishness, anger, and malicious speech. One should not be a boaster, nor speak scheming words."

One should not cultivate impudence, nor utter quarrelsome speech. One should not be drawn into telling a lie, nor deliberately be treacherous. One should not despise others for their lowly way of life or wisdom or precepts and practices. If ascetics or ordinary people irritate one with their talkativeness, one should not respond harshly, for the peaceful do not retaliate. Knowing the Buddhist teaching, an ever attentive person who investigates it should train in it. Knowing the cooling of desire as peace, one should not be negligent in applying the teachings. With regard to the Blessed One's teaching, one who is diligent should constantly venerate it by following his example.

A couple of pieces stand out here in this description of one who is in training. It sounds a lot like the same kind of language we saw in the previous sutta describing somebody who is free—only here it is "should be" as opposed to "is."

And then these last two verses are particularly striking: "If ascetics or ordinary people irritate one with their talkativeness, one should not respond harshly, for the peaceful do not retaliate." And: "With regards to the Blessed One's teaching, one who is diligent should constantly venerate it by following his example."

To me this points to a teaching that is encouraging us to model freedom. In the process of training, when we see that there is irritation, we don't respond with irritation but instead model peacefulness.

I want to talk about this for a little bit because for me this has been such an amazing teaching, especially in daily life. It points essentially to the notion that the path and the goal are not so different. If you want to be peaceful, act peacefully. If you want to have love, act lovingly. If you want to be loving, act lovingly. It's pointing to this modeling—and all of these "shoulds." As I said, it's almost like this sutta could have been taking the previous one and changing "is" to "should be."

I've explored this in my own practice and found that there's a very powerful edge of practice around this kind of teaching. It takes a lot of honesty and a lot of integrity to explore, because it could sound like: if people irritate one with their talkativeness, repress the irritation and pretend you're peaceful. That's not what works.

What does seem to have some power is to acknowledge and recognize, "Oh, there's irritation." Really fully knowing there's irritation, and yet exploring the possibility—I sometimes use the language of seeing if you cannot let the irritation leak out of any pore. Completely, fully knowing in the mind, in the heart-mind, that this irritation is happening, and yet exploring the possibility of behaving in a way that is peaceful.

This calls on intention. It calls on the intention to cultivate peace even as we are feeling irritation. We're drawing on that wisdom, that wish, that aspiration: may there be peace. Not through repressing the irritation, but also exploring—how might this irritation be leaking out of my system? It can be in very subtle ways: just a gesture, or an expression on the face, or a quickness of movement. Exploring what it might be. Modeling.

This is where there was great fortune for those who lived at the time of the Buddha, when there were many enlightened monks walking around. You could see how they were. You could explore modeling their behavior. We might have to conjure it up in our minds a bit, or model it after people we do admire—such as the Dalai Lama, or others. Greg mentioned the monks in Burma that we met: the deep peace of one Sayadaw that our colleagues named "the Angel Sayadaw," or the happiness and delight of the other monk we sometimes called "the Happy Sayadaw."

One practical example from my own practice: I was practicing this kind of thing around impatience. I had taken on a study of impatience because I noticed it was a major force in my life. So I began to get curious about it—looking at it, seeing it whenever it arose, noticing it with curiosity.

At one point I was wandering around a drugstore, shopping, and I noticed that I was moving quickly, picking up things and throwing them in my basket. That gave me a little bit of an "Oh, what's happening here?" I noticed that I was impatient. It was a kind of wake-up—the way my body was acting.

My body was acting impatient.

And so I picked up this exploration around modeling patience while fully recognizing, yes, there is impatience—but what might it mean to act as though I were really patient? And so I slowed down. I reached slowly out to the shelf, picked up the bottle of shampoo, and placed it very carefully in my basket. I did this with several things, really resting at this edge of knowing the feeling of impatience while holding the intention to see what it might mean to know that and to behave as if I were patient.

What surprised me—and this was one of the first times it really dawned on me how this works and how powerful it can be—within about thirty or forty seconds the impatience had vanished and the mind was patient. The impatience had gone away. And I understood that it wasn't repression of the impatience, but rather that in very subtle ways the impatience had been reinforcing itself through the action. That was how it was feeding itself. When I recognized the impatient quality in the mind and created the conditions for not letting it leak out into my behavior, it was like the foot came off the gas pedal and that state of mind could simply release.

This is a practice we can do when we're in the grocery store, when we're walking down the street, when we're driving. What mind states are arising? And how is that leaking out in how you are engaging? It's really important—I can't emphasize this enough—not to repress the inner state in doing this. It's not about repression. It's about connecting to that intention. The intention has a rebound effect on our minds when we engage in a way that follows it.

Now, a little more dive into what this text has to say about views and clinging to views. There are different kinds of views. The deepest level is the view "I am"—that's a form of view. Then there are views about what we take to be metaphysical reality. This was a major category at the time of the Buddha. People explored and thought that wisdom and understanding would come by knowing the nature of the cosmos. There were views about the cosmos being infinite or finite, stretched in one direction or another.

And we may have views like this too. They may not be so common in our culture, but even something like your views about rebirth are in the realm of metaphysical views—something beyond what we can actually directly know in this experience.

Then there's a whole other terrain of views: our ordinary views in daily life, the views connected with greed, aversion, and delusion that keep us engaged in those patterns. Clinging to views is understood to be one of the key ways we suffer. They're almost at the root of how we suffer, because even sense desire—clinging to sense desire—is based in a view that having that pleasure or getting rid of that unpleasantness is what's going to make me happy. It's based in that delusion.

As I mentioned earlier, clinging to views is also recognized as one of the main reasons we live in conflict, why we have wars. It's rooted in the human mind. Seeing this was actually a very powerful moment in my practice. At one point, watching my mind around anger and noticing what it did with that anger, particularly when there was anger at a specific person, I noticed this arising of a wish that the other person suffer.

That was a painful recognition. And yet it also opened my heart to compassion, because there was the recognition that the seeds of war are right here. An arising of anger connected to that wish that the other person suffer—that's where war begins. This understanding isn't just personal; it reveals how these states condition dispute, quarrels, anger, the picking up of weapons, and harming each other. The Buddha points to views as being the source of this conflict. So views are really worth examining.

One thing that's interesting in this teaching is that a liberated person is described as someone who does not cling to any views at all—maybe even something deeper than that. One description in the translation suggests something profound, though it's hard to know exactly what the original conveys. I don't read Pali, so I don't know the exact words. When I study a text, I read multiple translations to try to get a sense of what's being said.

But there's one place in describing a liberated person where it says there are no views or opinions that lead them. That's a pretty strong statement. "One who is pure has no preconceived view about anything in the world. Having abandoned delusion and pride, they remain without attachment. Therefore, by what view would they go? One who is attached argues over religious teaching. But how and about what can you argue with one who is without attachment? There is nothing they either take up or throw off. They are indeed free of every view in the world. Abandoning what has been taken up, free from any basis of attachment, they do not rely even upon knowledge. Amongst those in dispute, they do not take sides. They do not revert to any grasping of opinions whatsoever."

One of the teachings in the Aṭṭhakavagga around this non-attachment to views—one of the keys in terms of the training—interestingly, I did not see anywhere in there where it said one who is in training should not hold the view of the teaching, or that one who's in training should not hold any view whatsoever. It does not say that. There's some debate about this particular aspect of the teaching, whether the teaching around freedom from views is something that should be modeled on the path.

But in my read of this text—this is my own looking at it—when I read through it from this view that Thanissaro Bhikkhu suggested, distinguishing when it's describing someone who's attached or an ordinary person versus when it's describing someone who's liberated, the places where it talks about freedom from views, freedom from all views, that's when they are liberated. The training around freedom from views looks more like: one should refrain from quarrels, one should refrain from retaliation.

What's interesting too, however—and I think this is an important piece—is that elsewhere in this text the Buddha acknowledges yes, there is truth. But the instruction around not clinging to views points to basically this: whether or not a view is related to truth is irrelevant. It still should not be clung to.

Here's what it says: "A person who associates themselves with certain views, considering them as best and making them supreme in the world, they say because of that that all other views are inferior. Therefore they are not free from contention with others." So regardless of whether it's true or not, the Buddha encourages us not to cling to it.

To me this points to something very profound about wisdom and what wisdom is interested in. Our culture—and not just our culture, I think human culture broadly—is often interested in propositions and whether propositions are true or not. Interested in statements. Is this statement true or false? We feel like it's important to know whether it's true or false, that that's where wisdom will lie.

And yet the wisdom that we are cultivating here, the wisdom that frees us from greed, aversion, and delusion, that moves in the direction of liberation—that wisdom is not interested in the objective truth or falseness of a proposition. It's interested in the fact that a thought is arising in the mind, and it's a thought. And a thought is ceasing in the mind. This wisdom is interested not in the objective truth of our thoughts or our beliefs, but in the fact that they arise and cease.

This is a different kind of approach to truth. What is true about any experience is that it is arising and ceasing.

There's another text, another one of my favorites—I've got a lot of them, a lot of favorite texts—that points to the kind of view that might be useful to hold while one is in training. It's a text called Views, the Diṭṭhisutta, in the Aṅguttara Nikāya 10.93, for those of you who are interested in these things.

One of the other things I love about this sutta is that it's a layperson having a conversation with ascetics from other traditions. This is Anāthapiṇḍika, the Buddha's patron, who is a householder, not a monastic. Anāthapiṇḍika was wandering one day and came upon these ascetics from other traditions. They had been talking and chatting with each other, and when they saw Anāthapiṇḍika coming, they hushed each other, saying, "Be quiet, don't make any noise. Here comes Anāthapiṇḍika the householder, a disciple of the contemplative Gotama. He's one of those disciples clad in white who lives in Sāvatthī. These people are fond of quietude and speak in praise of quietude. Maybe if he perceives our group as quiet, he will consider it worth his while to come our way." So the wanderers fell silent.

When he approached them, they said, "Tell us, Anāthapiṇḍika, what views does the contemplative Gotama have?"

And Anāthapiṇḍika, holding to sīla, says, "Venerable sirs, I don't entirely know what views the Blessed One has."

And they seem to think this was rather telling, saying, "Well, so you don't know what views the contemplative Gautama has. Perhaps you can tell us what views the monastics have then."

"I don't even know entirely what views the monks have."

"So you don't know what views Gautama has, and you don't know what views the monks have. Well, maybe you can tell us what views you have."

And he says, "It won't be difficult for me to tell you the views I have, but please let the venerable ones first expound your positions. Then it won't be difficult for me to expound to you what views I have."

When this was said, each of them—there were about ten—said something different. One said, "The cosmos is eternal. Only this is true; anything else is worthless. This is the sort of view I have." Another: "The cosmos is not eternal. This is the only true view. Everything else is worthless." Others proclaimed: "The cosmos is finite." "The cosmos is infinite." "The soul and body are the same." "The soul is one thing, the body is another."

These metaphysical views were what they were debating, each one insisting this is what's true. And clearly they can't all be true because they directly contradict each other.

After they had all expounded their views, Anandapindika gave the householder's little teaching. He said, "As for the venerable one who says, 'The cosmos is eternal, only this is true, anything else is worthless—this is the sort of view I have'—that view arises from one's own inappropriate attention or in dependence on the words of another. Now this view has been brought into being, is fabricated, willed, dependently originated. Whatever has been brought into being, is fabricated, willed, dependently originated—that is inconstant. Whatever is inconstant is stress, suffering. This venerable one adheres to that very stress, submits himself to that very stress."

He was pointing out how holding to views—holding to something that is simply a construction of mind, that has the nature to arise and pass, holding to something that is inconstant—is suffering.

Then they said, "Well, we've told you our views. You tell us yours now."

And this is what Anandapindika says: "Whatever has been brought into being is fabricated, willed, dependently originated—that is inconstant. Whatever is inconstant is stress. Whatever is stress or suffering is not me, is not what I am, is not myself. This is the sort of view I have."

They tried his same argument on him, saying, "So that view has been brought into being and fabricated, so you're adhering to that stress."

And Anandapindika replied, "Venerable sirs, whatever has been brought into being is fabricated, willed, dependently originated—that is inconstant. Whatever is inconstant is suffering. Whatever is suffering is not me, is not what I am, is not myself. Having seen this well with right discernment as it is actually present, I also discern the higher escape from it as it is actually present."

He was basically recognizing that clinging to view also needs to be released. This view holds in itself the possibility for transcending views—that possibility of recognizing, "Oh, a view is arising again." In some ways we would say this view is pointing to truth. And yet, even holding to that would be stressful, would be suffering. And so seeing, "Oh, this is a view that's arising, this is a view that's ceasing"—understanding it as a view, as an impermanent, inconstant phenomenon.

I offer this reflection this evening. For me this is inspirational, this teaching, this text around the freedom possible in this life. Teachings given by householders that contain deep wisdom pointing to freedom in this very life. Not sometime in the future. That possibility—the poems that Greg mentioned, the enlightenment poems of the nuns. In any moment, putting out a candle, the mind can be free. Right now, in this life.

Let's sit for just a moment.

Thank you for listening to the Dharma.

CHAPTER 16

Qualities Of Wise Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of the opening definition from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), examining what it means to practice wise mindfulness. She breaks down the Buddha's instruction—"One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, and mindful, putting away desires and discontent for the world"—revealing how each word points to essential qualities of practice.
> Fella distinguishes between ordinary self-reflective awareness and the transformative quality of wise mindfulness, which involves curiosity about experience as experience rather than focusing on content or self-reference. She explores the meaning of key terms: "abides" (suggesting ease and relaxation), "observing" (connected to the root of vipassanā, meaning close engagement), and the phrase "body as a body" (pointing to direct experience below the level of concept). The talk clarifies the important distinction between mindfulness and attention—how attention can function even when mindfulness is absent, as in the common experience of driving on autopilot.
> The teaching addresses "ardent" (atāpī) as engaged curiosity and "fully aware" (sampajañña) as clear comprehension of impermanence. Fella explains how understanding the changing nature of experience naturally releases craving, making space for wholesome motivations like compassion to arise. She reframes "putting away desires and discontent" not as a prerequisite but as an ongoing process of allowing experience—including our reactions to experience—to be known as mental states rather than remaining caught by them.

It's so quiet in here. Sometimes it feels like it would be nicer to just sit quietly. And yet my task here is to give a talk, and so I will break the silence.

The main practice that we're exploring here together is mindfulness. The Buddha offered instructions for us. One of the main teachings in the texts, called the Satipatthana Sutta, explores how we establish mindfulness and the kind of experiences that we attend to.

The Satipatthana Sutta describes four establishments of mindfulness. Sometimes the word Satipatthana is translated as "foundation of mindfulness," but Bhikkhu Analayo has made a case for the word "establishing" or "establishment." To me, that has a more resonant feeling, because what these practices do—these descriptions of these practices—help us to cultivate this quality of mindfulness so that it becomes established in our minds, stable in our minds. That kind of stability, establishing stability, is another way we could look at what a foundation is. But to me, the word "foundation" sounds like a noun, and "establishing" feels more like an activity. And that's what we're doing: we're establishing mindfulness.

These four areas, which I'm not going to go into this evening in detail, I'll just briefly name. The Buddha explores establishing mindfulness of the body, which is very much what we're looking at in these first few days. Then feeling—whether experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant—the second foundation, mindfulness of feeling, or feeling tone as we sometimes say. The third foundation is mindfulness of mind states, qualities in our mind, wholesome qualities, unwholesome qualities. Particularly in this foundation we begin to understand the difference between wholesome and unwholesome qualities of mind. Such an important exploration for us in our practice.

The fourth foundation is a little harder to describe. It's called the foundation of Dhamma. Dhamma can be translated simply to mean experience, so basically mindfulness of experience or mindfulness of phenomena. But that particular part of the text explores mindfulness of phenomena—one of the definitions of the word Dhamma—through various Dharma lenses, some of the various lists that the Buddha talked about. In a way, this fourth foundation is exploring experience in terms of the Dharma.

So this is a little bit about what we explore in our mindfulness practice. But at the beginning of this teaching, at the beginning of the sutta, there are a few words, just a few sentences, where the Buddha encapsulates the teaching in summary before he goes on to elaborate it. There's one phrase that gets repeated a few times that basically defines what our mindfulness practice is. I'll read that to you.

This is repeated four times, one for each of the four foundations. The first time I say it, I'll use the body: "One abides, observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware, and mindful, putting away desires and discontent for the world." And he repeats that: "One abides, observing feelings as feelings, ardent, fully aware, and mindful, putting away desires and discontent for the world." And likewise for mind states and for phenomena.

I want to explore this sentence. What is it pointing us to? It really begins to help us understand what we're doing here—not only what we pay attention to, but how. How do we pay attention? What does wise mindfulness mean?

This definition includes the word "mindful." The establishment of mindfulness, the definition of how mindfulness is established, includes the word mindful, which is kind of interesting. I'll start with that word since it's the one we're most familiar with, just to make sure we're all on the same page around what mindfulness is.

Actually, the more that I practice, the more mysterious mindfulness seems to me. It seems more like a state than something we do. And yet there is a way in which we begin to get familiar with what it's like when we know that we're aware. Maybe that's a good working definition for mindfulness: knowing that we're aware, being aware that we're aware. Other words that evoke what this quality often means to us include "presence." Awareness is a good word, actually. I love the word awareness for mindfulness. To me, it's much more evocative of the quality of the feeling that's present when mindfulness is strong. The word "mindfulness" is such a technical kind of term, and it sounds mental. Mindfulness, when it's established, has much more of a...

It doesn't just feel like it's up here in the head at all. It feels much more pervading. And awareness has that quality for me—a sense of... it's got a softer feeling to it. The word awareness has a softer feeling. It feels more evocative to me of the experience that I've come to understand is mindfulness.

Sometimes we explore mindfulness through words like witnessing or observing. Other ways to touch into it more at the sensory level: the feeling of being connected with, feeling into, being with experience. These kinds of words evoke what we mean by mindfulness. And perhaps we could say in a more simple definition: we know what's happening while it's happening. In real time—he keeps using that phrase—in real time we know what's happening while it's happening.

Mindfulness, the quality that the Buddha talks about in the Sutta of establishing, points to a kind of mindfulness that supports us to understand what is skillful and what is unskillful, what leads us to suffering and what leads us away from suffering. This quality of wise mindfulness is based, I think, on an ordinary capacity of our minds—this capacity to be able to know that we know, this kind of self-reflective capacity that we have. It's a human capacity; not all animals have it, though apparently some do. But this is one of those things that really makes us human: this capacity to be aware of ourselves, to be aware that we are aware.

And yet this simple reflective capacity, the ability to know that we know—while I'd say that wise mindfulness is based on it, it's not the same thing. Wise mindfulness is more of a perspective, a way of turning that capacity to know that we know, to observe, to be with experience in a particular way.

To reflect on this a little: this morning when he brought up the example of somebody being angry, and they know that they're angry, that kind of knowing isn't exactly what we're talking about. Much of the time, if somebody's angry and you go up to them and say, "Do you know you're angry?" they'll say, "Duh, yeah, I know I'm angry." But what they are focused on, what they are attending to, what they are aware of is the content of why they're angry. It's focused on the situation about which they're angry. It is not generally curious about what does it feel like to be angry. That's the shift of wise mindfulness. We get curious about experience as experience.

Another simple way to reflect on what we're doing here: looking at experience as experience, as experience happening right now. It sounds like nothing. But this is not our usual perspective. This is not usually the way we go about relating to experience. Mostly we relate to experience from the perspective of: What does it say about me? What should I do about this? How can I do something with this?

Much more rarely—at least for me, until I actually met this teaching—and it was kind of not intuitive to me. I got this book; I was experiencing a lot of anger, and a friend of mine asked me if she could send me a dharma book. I said, "Well, nothing else has worked, sure, go ahead." I read this book and basically what I gleaned from it, in terms of my anger, was: try being aware that you're angry when you're angry. And I thought, what good is that going to do? Isn't that just going to make me more angry? But I had nothing else better to try.

So I tried it. And the first moment of waking up into it, it was like: oh, I told myself I'd be aware of this. And wow—this hurts. This doesn't feel very good. In just that simple instruction of knowing that you're angry when you're angry, it pointed out to me something very fundamental about that anger: it's painful. And in that experience, in that particular moment, what happened was: wow, I have no idea what to do with this. I guess I go back to work.

That actually, in retrospect, was a pretty powerful shift for me. In previous times when the anger had been running, it had just been running. The mind had been caught in the anger, thinking about the person I was angry with, spinning it up, and it was just amping up. It wasn't even possible to go back to work. I was just sitting frozen in front of my computer.

And so this simple, simple tool, the very first time I tried it, allowed me to recognize: wow, that hurts. Okay, don't know what else to do—I guess I go back to work. What a difference in experience.

To be curious about your experience as experience. We could say being curious about what it is like to be a human being experiencing whatever's happening right now. What's it like to be a human being feeling knee pain? What's it like to be a human being feeling vibratory energy in the body? What's it like to be a human being hearing? What's it like to be a human being experiencing frustration or confusion? This turns us towards the experience in and of itself.

The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta has these categories of what we pay attention to. It points to establishing mindfulness of the body, establishing mindfulness of feeling, establishing mindfulness of mind states, and establishing mindfulness of phenomena through a Dharma perspective or lens. We might think that this limits us in terms of what we pay attention to, but this set of descriptions of things to notice encompasses everything in our human experience. There's nothing you experience that is left out of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Whatever is coming up for you, there's a way in which we can attend to it from this perspective—being curious about it as experience.

The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta points to both what we attend to and how we attend to it. Being attentive to experience as experience is a key piece of this. In the definition itself, this comes out in the phrase that says "aware of" or "abides observing the body as a body, feelings as feelings, mind states as mind states." This, to me, is what the Buddha is pointing to, and I'll get into that in more detail shortly.

I want to think about the words associated with this phrase: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, mindful, fully aware, putting away desires and discontent for the world." The first word there—abides—I love that word. It has an evocative feeling for me. If you're told to abide with something, how does that feel? Abide with your breath.

I was teaching this at one course, a kind of interchange—not a long silent retreat but a study course. I invited the room to offer phrases or words that the word "abides" evokes. Some folks said things like relaxation or home. These are some of the meanings of abide. Ease is a quality this word evokes for me. And somebody said, "What it brings up for me is 'the dude abides,'" from that movie The Big Lebowski. Well, yes, that's kind of what it's talking about! The dude abides at ease. No problem.

Now, it may not be that laissez-faire feeling of just "yeah, whatever." It's not that. But it is this quality of ease and relaxation. I love that this is the first word in this sentence. It has been a long time coming for me that relaxation was really understood to be a foundational part of the practice.

Our system, our organism, is kind of designed to be aware. This natural quality of mindfulness I spoke about earlier, this being aware in the present moment—a baby is born and that's what they are. They are just aware. You can see it in their eyes, how curious they are, alert and interested in what's going on. That's a natural quality in our system. What gets in its way is our mind being caught up in thoughts or worries or concerns. Tension in the mind gets in the way of this very natural capacity. And tension in the body affects tension in the mind. So if we can relax the body, we may find that it supports an easing of the mind, a relaxing of the mind.

I was talking to somebody in the last couple of days about how the face is so closely connected with the mind. The expression on the face and the feeling in the mind are very closely connected. There have even been studies about this. Just try it now: take in how you are in this moment. And now let the corners of your mouth turn up in a little smile and see what happens.

The studies show that the expression on the face can influence the state of the mind. Relaxing the face can help relax the mind. Relaxing the body can support relaxing the mind. And then there's more access to this natural capacity for being aware in the present moment.

We can begin to aim this awareness in the direction the Buddha is suggesting. So we don't just abide—this is where the Dude is not quite right. The Dude abides, full stop. The Dude abides. But the Buddha goes on: the practitioner abides observing the body as a body.

This word "observing" is significant. The root of the word is the same as what's in the word vipassanā. The passanā part means "to see." And the full word is anupassanā—that's the word translated as "observing." The commentaries say it has this feeling of being closely connected to, really engaged with. So: observing, seeing, connected with, closely connecting with. To me it's kind of like a meeting—meeting experience. There's abiding and meeting, connecting.

And what do we connect with? The body as a body. Feelings as feelings. Mental activity, mind states as mind states.

So what does this phrase mean—"body as a body"? I've explored it a little bit. To me this really points to what we almost think of as mindfulness. It evokes one of the more famous suttas, the Bāhiya Sutta, which perhaps one of us will speak on in more detail as the retreat goes on.

That sutta contains a famous instruction, a short instruction from the Buddha to someone who wasn't a follower but just kind of showed up and said, "I hear you've got good things to say. What do you have to say?" And the Buddha responded with a very pithy teaching: "In the seen is only the seen. This is how you should train yourself. In the seen is only the seen. In the heard is only the heard. In the sensed is only the sensed. In the cognized is only the cognized. This is how you should train yourself."

The teaching goes on to explore the ramifications of that exploration, which are understanding and freedom. But this seeing or observing the body as a body—to me this is pointing to something similar. In the sensed is only the sensed. In the seen is only the seen. It's not things added, extra ideas or concepts. It's coming to what we might call the bare experience, closer to it. What's actually happening?

We are often relating to experience through concept. At a very deep level in our human system, this is how we navigate the world in so many ways—through perception. We look out at the world, we look out in this room, and we see people and walls and fans and light and zafus. That understanding of what is seen happens because we have a lot of experience from the time we're born. We begin to be taught what things are. This shape is mom. This shape is food. We begin to make these associations.

And so perception at work helps us identify what's going on. But perception is a mental object, a mental formation. Perception doesn't happen at the eye.

Perception happens in the mind. And so in a very real way, as we're navigating the world, we are relating very much through concept—and we need this. There have been times when I've been meditating that the concepts around seeing fall away. And I do not want to get up and try to walk across the room when that's happening, because what remains is pretty much just form and color. The mind is not landing on the concepts.

So what is it in our experience? We get closer and closer to this. And in my experience, this is something that unfolds gradually. We don't start there, and we cannot try. Don't try to see things as just form and color—you will get a headache. But over time, we begin to recognize that perception is working, that ideas come in with perception.

And so we're not just seeing a person. We're seeing a person and we've already got, even before we meet somebody, a whole bunch of ideas about them. We have ideas about them based on how tall they are, how much they weigh, what their gender is, what their sexual orientation appears to be, what their skin color is. We have ideas about them that we're bringing along because, again, this is the conditioning of being human. And it's natural for this to happen, these conditionings. What we don't often recognize is that they're happening.

And so "in the seeing, in the seen is only the seen" is recognizing, well, there's seeing. And "in the cognized is only the cognized"—wow, there's all these thoughts and ideas and attitudes and views happening about that seeing. We're not even trying to stop necessarily all the things that are going on, but it is helpful to recognize that these things are going on as experiences in the present moment, instead of simply being swept along by the beliefs and views that we carry.

There's a difference between believing something and acting out of that belief. That often happens—the beliefs are kind of undercover for us, oftentimes. They're hiding under the surface. When we don't know that they're there, we are just acting on them as though they are truth. We just assume that this belief is true, that that's the way everybody sees things—or everybody should see things that way, at the very least.

And so there's a big difference between believing something and acting on that belief, following that belief, and being aware, "Oh, there's a belief arising in this moment." Huge difference between those two. And so that's "in the cognized is only the cognized." Awareness in this phrase "mind aware of abides observing mind states as mind states"—a view is a form of a mind state. So that's knowing that mind state as a mind state: "This is a view that's arising." This is not our usual perspective.

And so we explore our experience. Right now we're focusing to some extent on the body. As Winnie said this morning, this is an easier place to begin to get a sense of what this kind of attention is like—being curious about body experience as body experience. The human experience of tingling and vibration and pulsing. Not so much in reference to I or me or mine. That's another piece, I think, of this instruction. Body as a body. Not my body, but a body. What is the actual sensation level of experience right now in your experience?

Abide observing the body as a body. And maybe just like the whole body—one place in the sutta says it's kind of sufficient to just know there's a body. Abide observing. There is a body. There is a body.

These two words together, "abides observing"—I like that they're combined because it to me brings together the kind of relaxed and alert quality we've been speaking of. It's connected and relaxed. Observe the body as a body. Abide observing the body as a body. And it also points to two aspects of attention, two ways of exploring attention. There's choosing what we pay attention to.

This is directing the attention. We've talked about this a little, and I've used the analogy of the radio—tuning the channel, tuning the station. So that's the aiming or directing. We're choosing which channel to listen to. Maybe for the anchor, for instance, we're choosing the breath, and so we tune to those sensations. That's the observing part, that attunement. We're directing the attention, aiming it in a particular way.

But then how do we meet that experience? With abiding—receiving the experience. To me, that word abiding also points to this receptive quality. Mindfulness can have a very receptive quality.

I'm going to get a little technical here, but I think this is a useful distinction to understand in our experience. There's a quality of mindfulness which is just this simple capacity to know that we know. And we're working on establishing a wise form of that knowing—one that is aimed towards or curious about experience as experience in the present moment. But mindfulness itself is just this simple knowing that we know.

Attention is a factor of mind that selects what we know. And this factor of attention can be directed. We can choose. We have a capacity—there's an agency in our system that can choose to aim the attention somewhere. So right now, I can suggest: attend to the sensations of your hands. Maybe you can attend for a moment to the breath. This is a function of our minds. We can choose to direct attention.

And yet this factor of attention is also something that, if we're not choosing where to put our attention consciously, our habits and patterns—how we've been shaped, how our conditioning has unfolded to this moment—will choose something for us to pay attention to.

In some ways it's similar to how the breath works. We can choose to breathe in and breathe out. We can control that to some extent. We can decide, "Okay, I'm going to breathe in now. I'm going to breathe out now." And yet we don't have to do that. If we don't, the breath will just breathe—fortunately. It's similar with this factor of attention. We can choose where to put our attention, but if we're not consciously choosing, attention will be connecting to something regardless.

So that's a little bit about attention. Now, how does that connect to mindfulness? Mindfulness and attention are not the same thing. We can know this through a simple remembering of experience we've all had—walking down the street, lost in thought, not consciously aware of our surroundings.

Recently I was driving to teach a class at the center where I teach in California. I was driving down the main road near where the center was, and I was tracking where I was and noticed, "Oh, the street that I need—I saw it. The street I need is coming up. I'm going to be turning left soon." Then mindfulness went away. Completely. And the next time I woke up, probably thirty seconds later, I was sitting at a stoplight. My eyes gazed up at the sign and it was like, "Oh, that sign says Whipple. I've gone too far."

There was no awareness of where I was during that time. In that moment, as mindfulness came back, I remembered what I'd been thinking about. So there was a kind of awareness of where the mind had been, what it had been wrapped into. But even in reflecting back, there was no remembering at all of seeing. I did not remember having driven past the intersection where I was supposed to have turned. I could remember what I'd been thinking about.

And yet, that absence of awareness, that absence of mindfulness—because it was absence of mindfulness—did not mean that attention was absent. Because I didn't crash the car. I managed to get through the stoplight and through the intersections and stop at the stoplight. I had no memory of seeing that stoplight and stopping there. I woke up sitting at the stoplight. And so attention was continuing. Perception was continuing, even though mindfulness was not there.

We can tell from this kind of example—and I'm sure you all have stories like this, where you're walking down a street lost in thought and suddenly it's like, "Wait, where am I?"—that mindfulness is this capacity to wake up into what's happening. And yet our system takes care of us. Perception goes on, mental formations go on, attention continues. Attention and mindfulness are not the same thing.

And yet early in my practice I confused them, because I thought that if I was not consciously choosing where my attention was, then it meant I wasn't being mindful. Paying attention to the breath, choosing that, being with the breath—I was being mindful. But as soon as my attention shifted to hearing, I thought I'd lost mindfulness. But that's just a shift of attention, and we can be mindful of that.

Mindfulness is kind of like a mirror. It's just reflecting all of these processes tumbling on—including attention, including perception, including all these body sensations.

One experience that often happens in the style of practice that we're teaching right now: we're encouraging you to rest, or have a preference for the anchor. And while you're doing that, a very common experience is we're with the anchor and then suddenly the attention is on the sound of a car going by. We didn't choose to have that happen, but it happened. We may feel like we lost mindfulness—"I didn't choose to do that, so that was not mindful." But what often is going on there, if you see that, is you're seeing a shift of attention. You're seeing the attention shift. And then because you're mindful, you can choose what to do next.

When the attention just shifts like that, it usually means that something strong is pulling the attention. And so we can be aware of that, as Winnie was describing this morning. When the attention is pulled to something else, we just practice being aware of that.

Sometimes this has been described as, if the attention is drawn to something else, you let go of the breath and turn to that. Well, but you've already let go of the breath. The attention has already shifted. It's more about having that "abides observing" quality come in with whatever it is—that hearing. "Oh, hearing. Abide observing hearing right now. Hearing as hearings."

For me, this was an important thing to begin to understand: that it didn't necessarily mean that mindfulness was lost when the attention shifted to something else. Sometimes it did mean that. It's a very common avenue for mindfulness to get lost. We're paying attention to the breath, or whatever our anchor is, and the attention shifts to something else. But our mind is kind of attuned to the breath, and then the mind goes off to that car, and thinks about cars, and thinks about driving down Pleasant Street, and what's at the end of Pleasant Street, and what maybe I can get in the store at the end of Pleasant Street—and we're gone. Because we didn't notice that attention shift. When we notice that, we just say, "Oh, it's hearing. Hearing is happening." And maybe recognizing the perception that comes with that hearing, seeing an image of a car in our mind.

I wanted to bring this in because for me, this phrase "abides observing" conveys both the receptive and directed qualities of awareness. We can attune the attention to an object and then receive. Just receive that.

The next word is ardent. The word itself doesn't have a juicy quality for me. Maybe it has a little bit of harshness or something, I don't know. For some people, it really evokes something. We're just using translations here. But what it points to is engagement, connection. Ardency—even the word "ardent" may have a connection to heart—so maybe it's heartfelt. A heartfelt connection to experience. This is, again, about how we attend. How do we attend to experience?

It also brings in something of energy. Attending with a persistent quality—engaged, diligent, wholehearted, heartfelt, interested. That word really resonates for me: interested. Interested in what's happening. Curious about what's happening. This is a quality that supports witnessing, observing the body as a body. Can we get curious about how this being actually works?

So ardency has this quality of energy and engagement and curiosity—an engaged quality. But remember, the instruction includes "abiding." Abide ardently. This brings a different quality to it for me. Abide with interest. There's a kind of relaxation and alertness again. One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, curious.

One abides observing the body as a body, curious, interested, fully aware. This next word, sampajañña, is sometimes translated as "clearly comprehending." One of the main ways this is spoken to—the way most people are familiar with—is in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, in the Foundation of the Body. There's a section on clear comprehension, full awareness, where the instructions are to be aware of all your activities. When walking, know that you're walking. When standing, know that you're standing. When walking back and forth, know that you're walking back and forth. When carrying something, know you're carrying it. When eating, know you're eating. When being silent, know you're being silent. Simply an awareness of what's happening, of all activities.

Elsewhere in the suttas, however, clear comprehension is defined in a more subtle way. It's defined as experience being understood as it arises, remains present, and passes away. Essentially, being curious about the impermanent nature of experience. Fully aware that experience is not stable—it's arising, persisting, and passing away.

To me, this phrase brings in some of the wisdom component. Several of these elements have brought in the wisdom component. "The body as a body" brings in some wisdom because we're encouraged to drop below the level of concept. We begin to recognize how much we often overlay onto our experience through the concept of self, through ideas and views and beliefs. That brings wisdom into this definition. But this phrase also speaks to some of the understanding that begins to happen as we attend to our experience in this way. We begin to understand its impermanent nature.

As we begin to understand this impermanent nature, the whole project of the way we usually go about our lives—holding onto things, hoping that we can arrange our lives, get things we like, get rid of things we don't like, construct a world in which we'll only have pleasant experience—we realize that whole project is hopeless. It's not useful. And so this begins to help the mind let go of craving and clinging.

Yesterday Rebecca talked so much about dukkha dukkha, the craving around unpleasant experience, the craving to get rid of it. As we begin to see the impermanent nature of experience, the holding on to something or trying to control it or manipulate it—the mind begins to understand that this project actually creates stress. The craving itself is already stress in our system. Not useful.

Now, that doesn't mean we don't take action. There are times in our experience when we see things that are unjust, harm being caused in the world. Becoming aware of that, yes, there might be craving or aversion. And yet there is also the possibility of being motivated by compassion to alleviate that suffering. This is a kind of understanding that begins to happen as we explore our experience in this way.

The Buddha at one point heard that in his home country there were warring factions fighting over water. He went and stood in the middle of the battlefield and tried to stop the water war. He took action—but not out of anger, not out of hatred. Out of compassion.

When we're hooked into the view or belief that craving has—the delusion embedded in craving—we think we've got to do this thing, and we've got to do it on our terms, otherwise everything's going to fall apart. What can happen as craving begins to fall away is that we discover a whole host of different reasons to act that are based not in greed, aversion, and delusion, but instead in wisdom, generosity, kindness, compassion. These qualities are active. Craving is a mind state that motivates action—it tends to motivate us to do things dictated by that craving.

Compassion is also a mind state, and it motivates action too. Wisdom acts. Compassion acts. As the craving begins to fall away, we find there are other reasons we would engage in the world.

When we're caught by craving, craving has no clue that there are other possible motivations for acting in the world. It has us caught in that belief that if I weren't angry about this, why would I do anything? If I weren't angry about it, I'd be like, "Yeah, the dude abides." But that's not what happens.

Through this kind of training, as the heart releases greed, aversion, and delusion, beautiful qualities—the Brahma Vihara qualities of love, compassion, joy, and equanimity—begin to arise as the emotional map of a heart that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion. And these are what motivate us to act in the world.

This full awareness, this attuning to the changing nature of experience, begins to support the understanding that craving is not the only motivator out there. It supports the mind releasing craving and beginning to see that there are other motivations that take us through the world.

There's one more phrase which I'll say something briefly about—the last phrase. I'll read the whole thing again: "One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, curious, interested, mindful, fully aware, putting aside desires and discontent for the world."

Sometimes this is translated as "free from desires and discontent for the world." That's a pretty high bar. I'm not there yet. Bhikkhu Anālayo points out that the Pali term can actually be understood as an active verb—so "putting aside" or "setting aside." That's how I chose to speak it: setting aside desires and distress for the world, freeing oneself from. It can be understood as a process that happens as we engage in this practice, not something we have to accomplish first, but something that unfolds while we practice in this way.

To me, this points to what we've been exploring about allowing what's happening. "Free from desires and discontent for the world"—the phrase "the world" often points to the world of experience. The Buddha says, "What I mean by world is this fathom-long body, the experience of this fathom-long body." So free of desires and discontents in relationship to experience, the experience that's happening.

Freeing oneself from desires and discontent often unfolds as we begin to recognize and explore the possibility of allowing what's happening. Whatever's happening, we've said this many times, it's okay. The breath can be as it is. Body sensations as they are. Can we explore this possibility of allowing it to be as it is?

And yet it's not always possible. There's body sensation arising and the mind doesn't like that body sensation. There's aversion. Can there be an allowing of both of those? What's happening right now is unpleasant body sensation—that's the body in the body. Feelings in feelings. And there is aversion arising—mind states in mind states. Can that be allowed?

For me, at a certain point, it was kind of like, "Oh, that's what's happening. There's an unpleasant sensation and I don't like it. Of course, of course I don't like it. Okay, I can allow that to be what's happening." And there we are, stepping into freeing ourselves from desires and discontent. Because when we're caught by aversion—this is pointing to the difference between being caught by aversion and knowing that aversion is happening. Maybe the aversion doesn't go away in that moment, but the relationship to it becomes very different.

Caught by the beliefs around aversion—"I've got to fix this, I've got to get rid of this"—versus simply recognizing, "Oh, aversion is arising." There is a huge difference between these two.

And so, can it be allowed? That's how this process of freeing the mind from desires and discontent unfolds. When there's discontent about something that's happening—oh, discontent is arising. Can I allow discontent? Freeing ourselves from being caught by discontent, we come to know it simply as an experience. We abide observing discontent as discontent—curious, fully aware, mindful.

Let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 17

Mindfulness of Feelings (Vedanā)

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this dharma talk from the three-month retreat at IMS, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of vedanā—the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality present in every moment of experience. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), she explains why the Buddha considered this simple aspect of experience important enough to constitute its own foundation of mindfulness, particularly due to its intimate relationship with craving and the arising of dukkha.

Fella illuminates how feeling tone functions as a mental process, not an inherent quality of objects themselves. She shares contemporary neuroscience research demonstrating that the same physical stimulus can be experienced as painful or pleasurable depending on context and expectation—findings that align remarkably with early Buddhist psychology. Through personal examples, including her vivid experience with freshly picked apples and her investigation of aversion during walking meditation, she shows how views, beliefs, and expectations profoundly condition our experience of pleasant and unpleasant.

The teaching emphasizes the crucial distinction between vedanā itself and our reactive responses to it—the difference between the "first dart" of unpleasant sensation and the "second dart" of aversion that multiplies our suffering. Fella explores the neutral feeling tone as territory that becomes increasingly accessible as meditation deepens, while also cautioning about the mind's tendency toward boredom or habitual patterns when pleasant and unpleasant fade. Understanding feeling's impermanent and conditioned nature, she suggests, naturally supports the mind in releasing its grip on craving and aversion.

Happy Halloween.

This is a tradition here at IMS, the pumpkins. And it's a real act of love on the part of the staff. In the last few days they've been in the staff dining room carving pumpkins. It's been so much fun to see just how engaged they are, and how much they do this for you and for themselves as well, partly because the act of generosity feels good. It's a delightful part of the tradition here. I hope you all got to see them in the dark. But if you didn't, you get another chance at the chanting tonight.

This morning Greg spoke about an aspect of our experience that is present in every moment: whether our experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. The Pali word for this is vedanā. As Greg mentioned this morning, it is the second foundation, the second establishment of mindfulness.

This very simple aspect of experience—the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality—the Buddha found important enough to emphasize that it gets its own foundation. He emphasizes it a lot in his teachings, this noticing of the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral aspect of experience, partly because of its relationship to craving.

When the mind is caught or doesn't understand the nature of suffering—when there is a kind of ignorance or delusion about how suffering comes to be—then when pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling arises, it will lead to craving. In the case of pleasant experience, it will lead to liking, wanting, greed. For unpleasant experience, it will lead to not liking, not wanting, wanting to get rid of—aversion. Neither pleasant nor unpleasant experience we often miss entirely. Or we space out around it. Or we get bored. We think it's unimportant in some way. We crave something other than that neutral experience, or we crave a kind of follow-on. I'll speak more about that later.

The Buddha pointed to vedanā as a very important part of our understanding. When we can start to be aware, when we can be mindful of the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality, then that awareness can short-circuit the seemingly automatic movement to greed, aversion, or delusion.

I want to read a little piece of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta on this aspect. I'll remind you of the phrase I spoke about last week: "One abides observing feelings as feelings, ardent, fully aware and mindful, setting aside desire and distress for the world."

This section of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta continues: "And how does one abide observing feelings as feelings?" This is acknowledging that the earlier phrase is shorthand, and with each of the establishments of mindfulness, the Buddha goes into more detail.

The instructions in this part of the text are really simple. I think Greg said it this morning, but it bears repeating: "And how does one abide observing feelings as feelings? Here, when feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel an unpleasant feeling.' When feeling a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands, 'I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling.'"

Pretty simple instructions. And yet the feeling which is arising in every moment of experience—every contact with the senses, every sight, every sound, every smell, every taste, every touch, every experience arising in the mind—has a feeling tone that arises with it. The feeling tone is conditioned on that contact. If the contact doesn't happen, the feeling tone doesn't happen.

Every moment of experience, this feeling tone is there. It's understood to be a universal aspect of every moment of experience. There's always a feeling tone present. And yet we often miss it, partly because it can be a subtle aspect of experience.

The neutral, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant, is a particularly subtle aspect of experience. And there's a range, at least in my experience. It's not like an on-off switch with pleasant. There's a range—maybe subtly pleasant or very pleasant, slightly unpleasant or extremely unpleasant. These feeling tones tend to bubble into our consciousness on the ends of the spectrum as they get stronger.

Partly too, we don't notice the feeling tone. "Feeling tone" is often the way we translate vedanā, partly to distinguish it from the word "feeling." It's not feeling as emotion; it's just this very simple aspect of feeling.

In our usual way of navigating the world, we are responding and reacting to feeling tone, essentially trying to create conditions where we accumulate pleasant and get rid of unpleasant. When we don't understand how suffering arises, when we're not clear about the process by which we get caught, then our usual tendency is this: when there's something pleasant, we like it and we want it. We want to hold on to it. There's greed around it. When there's something unpleasant, we don't like it, we want to get rid of it. There's aversion there.

Very often, with our habitual tendencies, we miss the actual experience of pleasant and unpleasant because we're so busy responding or reacting to it—trying to hold on to it if it's pleasant, trying to push it away if it's unpleasant. We leap over the pleasant or unpleasant in favor of doing something about it.

The Buddha pointed out that not only is this feeling tone a universal experience, happening with every sense contact, but it is also present for everyone, including people who are fully awakened. This immediately puts a damper on the idea that if we become fully enlightened, we'll never experience anything unpleasant again.

The Buddha says: "An untaught worldling"—someone who hasn't met the Dharma or is caught in the views of needing to get what I want, needing to get rid of what I don't want—"experiences pleasant feelings, unpleasant feelings, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant feelings. A well-taught noble disciple likewise experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant feelings. So what's the difference between them?"

He goes on to say: "When an untaught worldling is touched by a painful bodily feeling, they worry and grieve, they lament, beat their breast weeping, and become distraught. Thus they experience two kinds of feelings, one bodily and one mental. It is as if someone were pierced by a dart, and then following the first piercing is hit by a second dart, so that person will experience feelings caused by two darts."

This is our habitual response to feeling before we learn the Dharma, before we learn about the value of wise mindfulness.

"In the case of a well-taught noble disciple, when touched by a painful feeling, they will not worry nor grieve or lament, will not beat their breast and weep nor become distraught. Only one kind of feeling is experienced, a bodily one, but not a mental one. It is as if someone were pierced by a dart but was not hit by a second dart following the first one."

What he's pointing to is this: when someone who hasn't met the Dharma is touched by an unpleasant feeling, they react with aversion—"woe is me, this is a problem, got to figure something out, got to fix it, got to get rid of it"—or they collapse in despair. When a person who has understood the Dharma experiences an unpleasant feeling, they simply experience an unpleasant feeling. It doesn't ripple on.

This teaching points to the difference between the unpleasant experience, or the pleasant experience, and our response to it. We might think that the unpleasant and the not-liking of unpleasant are the same thing, that aversion would automatically be there with the unpleasant. Likewise with pleasant—there's often a very quick follow-on of liking and then wanting. But that liking is different from the pleasant itself.

It is possible to experience unpleasant and have zero ripple in the mind of not-liking. It is just unpleasant feeling. It is possible to experience pleasant feeling and not have a ripple of liking in the mind. It is just pleasant feeling.

This points to our habitual movement from feeling tone—a kind of leaping. When our mind is in its ordinary state, carrying the view that pleasant is good and unpleasant is bad, that we need to have pleasant and get rid of unpleasant, we leap past the feeling itself.

When there is feeling arising in a mind state of ignorance and craving, the mind will leap off of that unpleasant or pleasant experience right into greed and aversion. When the feeling tone is not seen, it becomes almost like a launching pad into dukkha. So it's really worth starting to be curious about it. When that feeling tone is met with wise mindfulness, there doesn't have to be this automatic, habitual movement from feeling to craving to clinging to identification to suffering.

The feeling tone is understood to be associated with every experience that we have. Every physical experience, every mental experience, every sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, everything arising in our mind—there's a feeling tone associated with it. This feeling tone itself is understood to be a mental process.

The aspect of vedanā is understood to be one of the five aggregates, the five processes of body and mind that make up the whole of our sense experience. These five aggregates include the bodily processes or physical form, then there's feeling—this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral aspect of experience. Then there's perception, the recognition piece we've talked about a little. There's mental formations, the intentional and motivating aspect of our experience. And then there's consciousness, the quality or aspect of our minds that knows things.

The Buddha divided up our experience this way. Everything that we experience will have these five threads coming together in some way. Every experience is a kind of weaving of these five threads. In the five aggregates, one process is bodily; the other four are understood to be mental processes. Feeling, the experience of feeling something, is understood to be put together by the mind. Perception likewise, mental formations likewise, consciousness. These are all mental functionings.

Feeling is understood to be mental, even the feeling associated with physical sensations. This might not be so intuitive, so let's explore that a little bit, because it points to something pretty important about feeling tones. The feeling tone is not in the experience. It's not inherent in a sense contact. There's a sense contact, and then processes in the mind, out of conditioning, put together the feeling.

Here's a study. I want to just say that the current psychological and neurological research agrees with the Buddha here—that feeling is mental. There was a study done about the feeling of pain, and the lead-off is: pain isn't always a pain. Sometimes it can feel good.

The way they did this study is they had two parts to it. In the first part, people were exposed to a series of stimuli that were either moderately painful or not painful. They rated the moderately painful stimulus, like a mild electric shock, to be painful.

In the second part of the experiment, they were exposed to either a moderately painful or a more strongly painful experience. They were warned ahead of time—shown a screen that told them what kind of stimulus was going to be coming up. And in the rating of this part of the experiment, the moderately painful sensation was rated as pleasant.

I'll read a little bit about this because the researchers were surprised by this result: "Interestingly, participants rated the moderate pain as actually pleasurable in the second setup, when the alternative was the intense pain. During the moderate stimulus in the second setup, participants' brain activity also showed less activation in the pain region of the brain, the brain stem, and more activation in a region in the middle of the frontal lobes that's associated with pain relief and pleasure."

So it wasn't just what they were reporting. Their brains were actually experiencing pleasure with this moderately painful stimulus. The researchers said, "The likely explanation is that the subjects were prepared for the worst and thus felt relieved when they realized the pain was not going to be as bad as they feared. In other words, a sense of relief can be powerful enough to turn such an obviously negative experience as pain into a sensation that is comforting or even enjoyable."

This points to how conditioning affects whether we experience something as pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. I experienced a little bit of this myself on one three-month retreat—I think it was my first three-month retreat. It was during part one, where they had cut some of the apples, taken some of the apples off the tree.

They were freshly picked apples, and I had not had many freshly picked apples before. When I put this apple in my mouth, it was incredibly pleasant. That experience was very strong. The taste was there, but the pleasure was like bubbles of pleasure throughout my whole body.

That evening they had apples and bean dip, and there was something else—I can't remember what else there was. So I had a taste of bean dip. The bean dip had a completely different flavor to it. It was kind of pleasant, but nowhere near as pleasant as the apple. And then when I had a bite of apple following the bean dip, it was even more pleasant. Something about the contrast of the bitterness of the bean followed by the tartness and sweetness of the apple—it was like the pleasantness was even stronger.

And then as I went on, I noticed that more exposure, that expectation part—like in the experiment, something about the expectation affected the feeling tone. In this case, the expectation of pleasant seemed to diminish the pleasant. Over time, the subsequent bites of apple, the last slice of apple, it was kind of pleasant, but it was not that burst of rapture. It was like, "Yeah, that's a pleasant apple." A different experience, same apple, same tongue, different expectations, different conditions.

The feeling tone is not in the experience. It's not in the object. It is created in dependence on that contact, along with a whole host of other things going on—views and conditioning and beliefs.

So it can be useful to play with feeling tone, to begin to get familiar with it. The other day in the morning instructions I mentioned that sometimes when we give instructions, it's helpful not to try to do it too much because it might tie you into knots. I would say in this case, you probably don't need to spend the entire day looking at whether you can feel pleasant or unpleasant—that probably will tie you into knots. But on occasion, it can be useful to just be curious: What is the feeling tone here? What's going on? Is this pleasant or unpleasant? Spend some time familiarizing yourself with this aspect of experience, because it does tend to be a subtler experience that we don't have much practice being aware of. It can be useful to take a little bit of time and check in: Can I know the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral aspect of experience here?

Probably the easiest place to begin this exploration is in our physical bodies, especially the touch sense. The nerves of our skin are very wired into this part of the brain that feels pleasant and unpleasant, or interprets things as pleasant and unpleasant. So that can be a good place to check in. Maybe we particularly gravitate toward or notice unpleasant experience in the body. Or maybe we're starting to notice a quality of pleasantness with the breath.

A great exploration around unpleasantness is if you have an itch. An itch is one of those experiences that is almost universally felt as unpleasant. It's a buzzing experience, in my experience. It comes and goes as I've explored and investigated it. It's like a little zinging experience in a very small location that goes zzz and then stops and then zzz. It's almost like a little mosquito underneath the skin. But from my knowledge, nobody has ever died from observing an itch. So while it can drive us nuts, it's a great place to begin to explore pleasant and unpleasant, and also to explore how it's impermanent, how it comes and goes with the sensation. The itch, at least in my experience, has this on-off quality. If we're exploring the unpleasantness of it, we'll see that when the sensation stops—that itch sensation will be on for a few moments and then off, then on and then off—if you are aware of the unpleasantness there, you'll feel also that the unpleasantness stops when the sensation stops. Just exploring that.

And then also exploring the relationship to unpleasant. This is another big piece of the exploration—not only to get familiar with the experience of pleasant, unpleasant, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant, but to get familiar with our habitual responses. When there is that unpleasant experience, what does our mind do with it? Usually it's averse. It wants to get rid of it.

It wants to reach up and scratch. It wants to fix it, to change it.

So noticing the aversion, and noticing too an important piece which, as I mentioned earlier, is that the aversion and the unpleasantness are different. They're not the same thing. The aversion is a response to, a reaction to, the unpleasantness.

What we might notice as we explore this is how, when the aversion is strong, there's a multiplicative effect. It's like the two darts. There's the unpleasantness and the aversion, and it's like they multiply each other. It's like ten times ten equals a hundred. The unpleasantness becomes ten times ten—a hundred.

Then you might see that when the aversion weakens, maybe down to three or four, then instead of being a hundred, it's like thirty—the experience of unpleasantness. We can see how with the shifting of the aversion, the overall experience of unpleasant changes. And how we attribute, in effect, that multiplication of the aversion with the unpleasantness—we attribute the entire thing to the sensation itself.

But as we see that shifting of aversion, we might begin to recognize: oh, actually the experience of unpleasantness here is not as strong as I thought it was. We begin feeling how the aversion amps it up. If we can actually connect with the actual experience of unpleasantness, we might find that it's almost an anticipation, or it's the idea of the unpleasantness, that adds to or multiplies with that sensation.

Sometimes it's the idea that this is going to last forever. So not only are we feeling the unpleasantness of this split second, but our minds are picking up: this is going to last for the rest of the sitting. We're picking up the additional forty minutes and multiplying all the unpleasantness by forty minutes, experiencing that multiplication.

So noticing the experience, the unpleasantness, and then what the response is. The aversion and the greed tend to be in relationship to the pleasantness and unpleasantness. We might think that we're reacting to the itch, or we might think we're reacting to some actual quality of the object itself. But our system, our minds, are reacting more to the pleasantness or unpleasantness. It's a very basic part of our minds. It's a kind of normal or natural part of our minds too, evolutionarily. Even single-celled creatures move towards nourishment, towards food, and away from noxious chemicals in their environment. Single-celled creatures have this kind of movement towards what we would call pleasant and away from what we call unpleasant. It's in our evolutionary DNA, this relationship to pleasant and unpleasant.

And yet in our system, in our human system, a single-celled organism doesn't have any choice in this matter of moving towards pleasant and away from unpleasant. In our case, this is not a hardwired reaction. It is constructed in the mind. We can begin, in experiencing the pleasant and unpleasant, instead of reacting automatically out of aversion and greed, to act with wisdom and compassion.

It's not necessarily that we just sit there and let a painful experience continue. In sitting, sometimes we talk about how if there is a painful experience—if you're experiencing a kind of pain where there's numbness that continues for quite a while after you get up—that's probably damaging a nerve. We encourage people not to physically damage themselves. But that experience of unpleasantness, of feeling the pain, and the recognition that this is a painful sensation that is not helpful for the health of the body—the decision can be made to shift posture, not out of aversion, but out of understanding and compassion.

This teaching might be misunderstood to suggest that all we're supposed to do is sit there passively experiencing this flow of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. That's a training we do to begin to understand how our aversion and our greed are reactions to the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. And yet there is this possibility—the Buddha, as he said, experienced pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. There are stories of the Buddha telling Ānanda, "I'm not going to give the dharma talk tonight. My back is in too much pain. I'm going to do some lying meditation. Would you give the dharma talk, Ānanda?" And I have to understand and assume that this was not coming out of aversion, but just out of understanding.

So noticing the experience, the physical experience, and what's the feeling tone. Noticing the relationship to it. You can also recognize and be aware of the feeling tone associated with mental experience. Some of these are easier than others. Happiness, for instance, does have a pleasant quality to it. A lightness, and the mind feels delighted, and that's got a pleasant quality to it. Fear also often has an unpleasant quality to it. Anger often has an unpleasant quality to it. So we can also be aware of the feeling associated with our mind states. Thoughts may have a subtle feeling tone associated with them.

Maybe not. Some thoughts may or may not carry a feeling tone. The feeling tone might be pleasant or unpleasant, or often, particularly with thoughts, the feeling tone of the thought itself might be neutral. What often happens is that a thought turns into an idea or a belief or a view, and then emotions come in with that, and then there's a whole collection of feelings that arise in association with the thought. So thoughts can have very complex layers of different feeling tones associated with different threads of what's happening in connection with that thought. Sometimes in our exploration, we can't necessarily say that in this moment it feels only pleasant or only unpleasant. Maybe it feels like it's flickering between pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral with these experiences in the mind—our views, what we're thinking, what we're believing.

This is actually a big part of the conditioning associated with feeling tone. What we believe, what we're thinking, what's in our minds at the time something happens has a significant effect on how we experience something as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. The study I mentioned—the expectation of moderate pain versus very painful experience, the expectation of less pain creating a sense of relief—affects the feeling tone. So views, beliefs, agendas, and expectations are one of the leading causes of feeling tone, one of the leading reasons why we feel something as pleasant or unpleasant or neutral.

As an interesting exploration, I heard this teaching from the Abhidhamma, which is an early commentary on the suttas. The Abhidhamma gets very precise about things; it chops experience into little bits. It says that the feeling tone associated with our physical touch sense will be either pleasant or unpleasant, but will not be neutral. So our physical touch sense—the feeling that's constructed in dependence on our physical touch sense—the Abhidhamma says, is going to be pleasant or unpleasant. Now I have to say, right off the bat, that I don't know whether this teaching is true. I don't fully believe it myself. But I found it to be a very useful and interesting exploration.

So physical touch sense: pleasant or unpleasant. The other physical senses, the Abhidhamma says—sight, sound, smell, taste—neutral, will not be pleasant or unpleasant. And then there is the mind, where there is the full range of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. The understanding in this teaching is that any time we see something and interpret that sight as pleasant, it is not the sight itself that we're experiencing as pleasant. It's something going on in our minds—a subtle belief, a view, a perception that we interpret as pleasant or unpleasant.

Hearing this, I thought I'd explore it a little bit. Intellectually, it made sense to me in some way, because I know how the eye works. What happens in the eye is that light hits the retina and there's form and color. That's all the eye actually sees; the only contact that's actually there is form and color. There are no objects there already. The objects are created through perception, that mental experience. So if we're perceiving something, looking out and seeing a beautiful flower or seeing a decomposing corpse, from the eye's perspective—the pure sight—it's just form and color. It takes the mind recognizing it as a beautiful flower, as a decomposing corpse, before there is that quality of pleasant or unpleasant. The form and color is just going to be neutral.

This became an interesting exploration for me. When I'm taking some sense experience to be pleasant or unpleasant, what's going on in the mind? What's happening there?

There was a time, one night, when I woke up in the middle of the night and was having trouble sleeping, so I decided to meditate. This was at home. I had a spot in my room where I would get up and sit to meditate. I often found that if I sat and meditated for half an hour or forty-five minutes, when I went back to bed, the mind would be very relaxed and fall back asleep easily. So I got up and sat.

This one night, as the meditation went on, sometime into the sitting I began hearing a very quiet noise. It sounded like it was in the wall, just a little scratching noise—that kind of sound. My experience was that it was unpleasant. I noted that as unpleasant and went back to my breath or paying attention to whatever was present. Then the sound would come back and I'd notice it as unpleasant. At one point—the sound came back many times during the sitting—I noticed a subtle flash of fear. And the fear was definitely unpleasant. As I watched that and kept watching it, I began to see there were maybe some thoughts, even images, like the image of a rat in the wall. This was unpleasant. As the mind began to see all these different components—when the sound came back and I recognized that the mind was reacting to the idea that it was a rat in the wall with some fear—when I heard the sound again, I realized the sound itself was pretty neutral.

What was going on was that the interpretation of the sound was what the mind was reacting to.

This kind of exploration can be very interesting for us. What are we actually reacting to? You're sitting in the hall and you hear a noise. If there's aversion with that noise, is it the noise? Is it the sound itself? Maybe you're exploring, experiencing that sound as unpleasant. But is it the sound itself that's unpleasant? Or is it some idea that your mind has created that's unpleasant?

This was mind-blowing to me. I began to see that when I was averse to things, I was not averse to what was actually out there. I was averse to something my mind created. I started to feel so amused by this. The mind creates something and then hates it. Does it have to do that?

I would say that most of our reactivity—though I don't know whether this teaching that taste and smell and sound are inherently neutral is entirely accurate. Particularly with taste, I think there may be something in the taste itself, like those taste buds at the back of the tongue that kind of gag if something bitter passes over them. Maybe there's something inherently unpleasant there. I don't know. But I have found this teaching interesting in terms of curiosity about what I'm actually reacting to. What is actually unpleasant when there's aversion? When aversion is happening, there's a kind of curiosity: what is the mind actually reacting to?

At one point I was doing walking meditation in the hall just on the other side, the upper walking room. I experienced a lot of aversion in walking meditation. I had aversion to the people around me. Greg mentioned the other day that he appreciated when people moved over and let him squish in. Well, when that kind of thing would happen, my aversion would go through the roof. I probably looked fine, but I was working intensely with my aversion.

One time a person came in and squeezed right next to me. This mushrooming of aversion happened. I thought, okay, Carol said that when there's aversion happening, there's something unpleasant going on. What is it? So I started getting curious. I went through all of the senses. Looking at the person—they were not unpleasant physically. Check, that's not it. They didn't smell bad. They weren't touching me. I went through all the senses. None of those physical senses was where the unpleasantness resided. Well, it must be something in the mind. But I didn't see it. I didn't really see what was going on there. So I just kept walking back and forth, asking: what's going on in the mind that there's something unpleasant there?

And then I saw a thought. The thought was: they're weird. My justification for that was that it was the middle of winter, freezing cold, and they had bare feet. As soon as the mind saw that—saw that this was what the aversion was about—the whole thing just collapsed. And in the next pass, there was mettā for the person.

Curiosity about this can be so powerful.

Exploring neutral is also tremendously helpful. Neutral is that place where we often don't even notice it. We kind of blow right over neutral experience. But as our meditation deepens, as our mind becomes more balanced with greater equanimity, there tends to be more neutral available. Partly this is because our minds, in their habitual reactivity, are constantly searching out pleasant and unpleasant. I definitely noticed this at one point.

One of my teachers asked me to just close my eyes and let my attention roam through my body, choicelessly allowing it to land on something. And he said, "Okay, and do it again. And do it again." I was doing this in silence, and he just kept guiding me. "What's the next thing your attention lands on? And the next thing?" He used the word "choiceless" there—just don't have it be a choice, just let it land.

When he stopped me in the exercise and asked what had happened, I said, "Well, you know, I wasn't searching anything out, but it couldn't possibly have been completely choiceless, because every single thing my mind landed on was unpleasant." Every experience my mind picked, every most obvious thing it oriented to, was unpleasant.

I understood in that moment that it was a conditioned kind of habit of the mind. This mind has had a tendency towards aversion. And what does an aversive mind do, actually? It searches out the unpleasant so that it can get rid of it, so that it can fix it. That was like a revelation to me—to see that this mind is not just receiving information neutrally, like a camera and a microphone. It's filtering things in based on habit, based on a habit of aversion in this case.

Some of you may have more of a habit of greed. You might walk into a room and immediately think, "Oh, I like that plant. Look at these pumpkins—they're so cool!" There might be a tendency to gravitate towards the pleasant. We all may have an underlying tendency in one direction or another. But as the mind gets more equanimous, these underlying tendencies weaken, and we start to be more in contact with the neutral. This begins to be a whole new terrain to explore.

A couple of things from my own experience exploring this terrain of neutral. One thing I began to see is that when the mind got more into a place where there was neutral experience—not a lot of pleasant or unpleasant—if the mind was present, able to be with it, there was quite a bit of continuity of mindfulness. But if the mindfulness weakened from that place of neutral, the mind would orient to its most familiar habits.

I was doing walking meditation and experiencing quite a bit of neutral, just noticing the experience. I'd also heard my teachers say this is a sign of equanimity. So I was thinking, "Ooh, this is good." I was leaning into the experience, anticipating that maybe something really good would happen—something I was looking for as proof of something or other.

I was just experiencing neutral and more neutral and more neutral, and nothing "really good" happened in the way my mind expected. When nothing really good happened, the mind immediately went into, "You're a failure. You screwed up. You don't know how to do this." This was one of my big patterns—this self-negativity, a self-hatred kind of pattern. "You're a failure, you're no good." Out of nothing, out of neutral experience, this is what the mind created, partly because that was a strong habit of mind.

Fortunately, this time I did see it. I saw that first thought—"you failed"—and I could see the movement towards the whole pattern of "I'm no good, I'm a failure" that would cycle into self-hatred. But seeing it, it could fall away.

So exploring what's happening around neutral is valuable as well. Sometimes neutral can lead to boredom. Nothing's happening, and we want something more pleasant—or even some highs and lows. That's what we've been attuned to. As experience gets more neutral, there can be a sense of, "Is this all there is? Is this what I'm supposed to be doing? There must be something better that's supposed to be happening."

So the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta suggests simply recognizing what kind of feeling is happening. When feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands when feeling a pleasant feeling. When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands feeling an unpleasant feeling. Simple. It doesn't say try to get rid of unpleasant feelings. Judge unpleasant feeling. Just know it. It's there.

It's said in many places in the suttas that there's an emphasis on understanding the impermanent nature of feeling. This is understood to lead to freedom—understanding feeling as it arises, persists, and passes away. So that's another piece of the exploration, to be curious about. Notice the impermanent nature of feelings.

We can also, through that, understand that it's unreliable—this kind of attribution of reliability to pleasant and unpleasant. As an aversive type, I would get stuck to unpleasantness, trying to get rid of it. It would be like if this table were something unpleasant, I'd be stuck to it with superglue, trying to push it away. Other people may have a different response to unpleasant. They may, knowing unpleasant, kind of go, "Oh, this is unpleasant. Let's find something pleasant." So there are different responses.

But as we begin to understand the impermanent nature of feeling, the very kind of attachment with superglue to something unpleasant almost creates a solidity to it. The aversion is creating a kind of solidity to that unpleasantness. If we actually look at the unpleasantness itself, we'll see it's coming and going. It's not a reliable place to stick to something trying to get rid of it. Likewise with pleasant—it's coming and going. It's not a reliable experience upon which to hang our hopes for happiness. It is just a fleeting experience.

So familiarity with feeling tone, noticing its conditioned nature, noticing its impermanent nature, its unreliable nature—this will support the mind letting go of its habitual activity of craving the pleasant, craving to get rid of the unpleasant.

Let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 18

Relying On This, Abandon That

In this continuation of her exploration of vedanā (feeling tone) in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), Andrea Fella examines the distinction between sāmisa (worldly/carnal) and nirāmisa (unworldly/spiritual) feeling tones. She explains how worldly feelings are connected to sense experience and keep us bound to habitual patterns of craving, while unworldly feelings arise from wholesome states such as concentration, insight, generosity, and the brahmavihāras. Importantly, she notes that unworldly feelings can be pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—the distress of renunciation and the longing for freedom are themselves wholesome unpleasant experiences that motivate practice.

Andrea draws on the Buddha's own journey, describing how he discovered that the pleasure of concentration and wholesome states provided an alternative to sense pleasure, leading to his teaching "by relying on this, abandon that." She explores this principle through the famous simile of the raft, illustrating how we must hold onto the Eightfold Path to cross the flood of suffering, yet eventually release even our attachment to the practice itself. This teaching acknowledges that some clinging to wholesome states may be necessary while working with deeper patterns of suffering.

The practical wisdom offered here is that suffering itself becomes our guide—we work with the most obvious suffering first, and as that releases, subtler forms of clinging become apparent. Andrea emphasizes that this letting go happens not through force of will but through the mind's natural movement toward well-being when it receives clear information about the nature of craving and its consequences.

Last week in talking about feeling tone, I ended up getting about halfway through the talk, so this week I'm going to finish that and then we'll see how far I go.

The halfway point was basically about a third or halfway through the section of the Satipatthana Sutta that describes the practice of working with feeling tone. Perhaps that's surprising because it's such a simple section of the sutta. I read last time that the section begins: "When one feels a pleasant feeling, one understands, I feel a pleasant feeling. When one feels an unpleasant feeling, one understands, I feel an unpleasant feeling. When one feels a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, one understands, I feel a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling." We explored what that meant and how that might be helpful.

The sutta continues to further distinguish types of feeling tone by what the text calls —the word in Pali is a little hard to translate, apparently—samisa. There are two sides of it: samisa and niramisa. Roughly it means "of the flesh" and "not of the flesh." So the sutta distinguishes feeling tones into feeling tones of the flesh and not of the flesh. There are different translations for this: worldly and unworldly. Bhikkhu Bodhi in one version of his translation uses "worldly and unworldly," and in another version he uses "carnal and spiritual." One teacher describes it as feeling tones associated with the path of practice or not associated with the path of practice—the "of the flesh," the worldly feeling tones, not on the path, not associated with the path, and feelings associated with the path of practice.

I'll read this in one of Bhikkhu Bodhi's translations: "When feeling a worldly pleasant feeling, one understands, I feel a worldly pleasant feeling. When feeling a worldly unpleasant feeling, one understands, I feel a worldly unpleasant feeling." You get the drift. "And when feeling an unworldly pleasant feeling, one understands, I feel an unworldly pleasant feeling," and so forth.

So what is this distinction? Bhikkhu Analayo points to it as possibly being a kind of ethical distinction around feeling tone, with ethical meaning what supports the path of practice, what is onward leading. This begins to ask us to explore the kinds of feelings that we have in terms of what kinds of feelings are supporting the path of practice and what feelings are perhaps keeping us more habitually hooked in our usual modes of experience, our usual ways of wanting things to be a certain way.

This worldly or "of the flesh" feeling tone, my understanding is that it's basically feeling tones associated with our sense contacts: sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch—things associated with our usual sense experience. Also with ideas that arise in the mind, thoughts about things. For example, there might be pleasant sensation associated with the taste of food. That would be a worldly pleasant experience. There might be a pleasant experience associated with the thought of food. That would be a worldly pleasant mental experience. These are the kinds of feelings that we're familiar with in our everyday lives, and they tend to be what drives us to stay hooked into the sensory realm, the sense experience.

That teaching Rebecca pointed to on viparinama dukkha, the dukkha associated with pleasant experience—the gratification, the danger, and the escape—is a way for us to understand that the danger, the viparinama dukkha, is the danger hidden in pleasant experience: that tendency we have to crave it, to get hooked to it, to want more of it.

That very being hooked to it, that very wanting, keeps us on this wheel of just having to get more of what we like and get rid of what we don't like. This is one way perhaps to understand what the worldly feeling tone is.

The unworldly feeling tone, my understanding, is feeling tones associated with wholesome emotions, those wholesome states of mind that lead us towards freedom, that lead us to let go of greed, aversion, and delusion. These are feelings connected with the path of practice, feelings associated with concentration, understanding and insight, feelings associated with generosity, the brahmaviharas. We're speaking about the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral aspects of experience, and many of these wholesome states —which Winnie spoke about the other night, the cultivation of the wholesome states— many of them have a pleasant feeling tone.

Happiness has a light and uplifting, very pleasant feeling. Happiness, joy—these are pleasant experiences. Concentration creates a kind of unified state where the unification is pleasant, and the happiness and joy that come with that unification are pleasant. The seclusion from the hindrances is very pleasant—the "bliss of seclusion," as concentration is sometimes called. The experience of being free from the hindrances is very pleasant. These would be understood as being the pleasure of the path.

The Buddha, at one point in his journey, is said to have discovered and said to himself that he had gone through this exploration around indulging in pleasure, being indulged in pleasure as a child. Then in the path of meditative practice, he learned the concentration states and experienced a lot of pleasure there. But that wasn't what he was looking for. Those states of concentration weren't what he was looking for in terms of freedom from suffering, because he found that when coming out of them, the suffering was still there.

It hadn't transformed anything just to go into the states of concentration.

And so he began trying different practices. He began trying mortification practices—extreme, unpleasant practices—depriving himself of food, refraining from breathing for long stretches of time until, it is said, he felt like his head was splitting open.

He experimented with these different practices that were available at the time and found that they weren't the answer to his question: Is it possible to be free from suffering? Is it possible?

It is said that as he was practically nearly dying—the description of his body after doing these mortification practices tells us that he could touch his stomach and feel his backbone, that's how thin he was—he realized, "This is not the way either. I'm going to die before I find whether it's possible to be free of suffering."

And so he began nourishing himself again.

After he recovered his health, he was reflecting on his life and on some of his experiences as a child. I think they arose spontaneously. He remembered this experience when he was a child, sitting under a tree watching his father, and he apparently—I don't know how old he was—spontaneously went into a concentrated state.

His reflection in that moment was: Is that kind of concentration something to avoid? Is it something to fear? Is that pleasure—that kind of pleasure—a kind of pleasure that is not supportive of the path?

And his mind answered the question: No, actually that kind of pleasure feels supportive, it feels helpful.

And he said, "I wonder if that's the way—exploring that kind of pleasure." And the answer he got was that he thought it was.

So he began a new kind of journey and exploration.

These wholesome qualities are on the path. We find them, along with the pleasantness that comes with them, as we practice. And we find, as Winnie was describing, that they are cultivated as we explore working with our difficulties. Even exploring being with anger and frustration and confusion—the quality of being present can create an almost pleasantness.

I've experienced seeing anger arise and feeling joy in the seeing of it. And that joy is this kind of unworldly pleasure, because the heart and mind are resonating with "this is the way, this is the direction towards freedom"—this kind of understanding, this kind of relationship to experience.

There are many kinds of unworldly pleasant experience associated with many of these wholesome emotions: the pleasure of generosity, the pleasure of ethical conduct, the recognition of the bliss of blamelessness, the gift of fearlessness.

And then there's even the simple happiness that comes—a delight, a pleasure—as we come into present moment experience. I know many of you have talked about this. Some of you have described it as the world seeming to sparkle. Just to open your eyes and take in your sense experience—there's pleasure.

This may seem like the pleasure of sense experience, but I think it's really connected to the wholesomeness of being present. We can be walking and see a pile of dead wet leaves and be in awe of that. That's probably not because dead wet leaves are inherently pleasurable to look at, but because the mind is so present that it's experiencing things in a different way.

This too is a kind of unworldly pleasure—the pleasure of being present. Things that wouldn't normally be what we would be drawn to become sources of wonder.

Sometimes we can tell the distinction here because—well, it can go either way. I have been on retreat and seen something like that, and it's like, "Wow, I need to take a picture of that"—grabbing onto it, feeling like I need to hold onto that.

We can and we do cling to these unworldly feeling tones. The unworldly feeling tones do not make us immune from craving and clinging to them.

Many of you have also described how, having some kind of experience—a sitting where things are particularly clear, for instance—the next sitting or the next day there's this craving to get it back, trying to make it happen again. "What did I do? How did I do it? I can't make it happen. I'm doing something wrong."

What's wrong with me? And so we cling. We can cling to these wholesome thoughts and these unworldly pleasant states. And then we suffer, and so we get the feedback that it's not helpful to cling to those either.

But this unworldly feeling, as the sutta describes, it's not just pleasant. What would unworldly unpleasant feeling be? I've wondered about this. I've explored what it might be. What are wholesome emotions that are unpleasant?

There's a little hint in the suttas. There's one place where it describes what's called the distress of renunciation. It says something like there's a kind of longing for freedom from suffering, that kind of movement or wish to be free from suffering as we experience dukkha. And maybe we've had a taste. Sometimes it comes particularly after we've had a taste of a different way, after we've had a sense of meeting dukkha just as it is and having that recognition of, "Oh, this isn't such a problem. It's just unpleasant experience happening," and the mind kind of settling and relaxing around it. There's an understanding that there's a different way to meet experience.

Having had that taste, sometimes when our minds go back to their habitual ways of relating to experience—the ways in which we are clinging instead of recognizing, "Oh, it's just something arising, it's just a thought arising, that's all that's happening"—that recognition is a place of insight, that kind of understanding. "Oh, it's just a thought arising." No reactivity in the mind around what's arising. When there's no reactivity in the mind around what's arising, that's a state of insight. And it doesn't last often. It's impermanent. And so we find our way back to our ordinary, usual way of relating to things. We start to experience again the habitual ways in which we cling, and we feel like we've done something wrong.

Partly because we have tasted it. Sometimes when we've tasted that flavor of release from suffering, when the habit of suffering returns, this kind of longing can arise. I've heard some of you talk about it. And while it can be mixed up with aversion or greed, there is often a piece of it that is connected with the wish for our own well-being, with the movement towards freedom. And so this is described actually as a wholesome unpleasant experience—this longing for freedom, the pure longing for freedom.

This is connected in a way with the state of mind of samvega, the motivation. This longing for freedom motivates the practice. And so that's a piece of its wholesomeness, its motivation for keeping us on the path, as opposed to throwing up our hands and saying, "Well, I think I'll go back to watching all those movies instead."

There's another description of unworldly pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience based in insight, based in understanding the impermanent nature of experience. Three different descriptions, very similar at the beginning. It says understanding things are impermanent and unreliable, understanding their nature to decay and end—sometimes joy arises. So understanding the impermanent nature of experience, sometimes we experience joy in that place. Sometimes we experience that, as Rebecca pointed to, when there's an ending of something that's unpleasant, there can be joy in that just because of the ending of the unpleasant.

But there can also be a kind of delight just in the seeing of—not because it's pleasant or unpleasant, but just in the seeing of this being doing its thing, witnessing this being's nature, the nature of the experience to be coming and going. It can sometimes be a very delightful experience when we touch into that.

And at other times, touching into that deep impermanence, that things are falling away, this recognition that there's nowhere to land, no place where there's a reliability where the mind can land there and say, "Oh yeah, that's where I'll be. That's where I'll be happy." Sometimes the seeing of the impermanence takes us to this place of longing for freedom, takes us to a kind of distress about the unreliable nature of experience, the impermanent, unreliable nature of experience.

And so sometimes the experience around impermanence can be received and felt as pleasant, sometimes as unpleasant, and sometimes as neither pleasant nor unpleasant—the place where sometimes we touch into that impermanent changing experience and the mind is just balanced.

There's equanimity in the mind—no particular feeling tone, just the understanding of the impermanent nature of experience.

As the mind moves into insight and understanding, different feeling tones can arise connected with these understandings. This is simply something useful to be aware of: unpleasant feeling does not always mean you're not on the path.

There's a teaching in one sutta that connects these feeling tones to a different way of expressing them. I mentioned it briefly earlier around the distress based on renunciation. Bhikkhu Bodhi makes the connection between worldly and unworldly feeling tones and another expression, which speaks about the joy, distress, and equanimity based on the householder life, and the joy, equanimity, and distress based on renunciation.

In that teaching, there's a fascinating way in which they're all linked together. In the Satipatthana Sutta, the text basically encourages us to notice when unworldly unpleasant feeling is arising. So this teaching in the Satipatthana, to me, helps us begin to distinguish those feelings on the path from those not on the path—those feelings that tend to keep us stuck in the usual habitual ways of relating to the world, versus the feelings related to the onward-leading nature of the path. The Satipatthana Sutta offers just a distinction, an understanding of the difference between them.

In another text, the Buddha begins to explore what sounds to me like a stair-stepping process of how we learn to let go, how the mind learns to release its clinging. The sutta says that when we're experiencing worldly pleasant experience, we can transcend it by relying on unworldly pleasant experience.

What does that mean? The Buddha describes his own experience: "Before my enlightenment, when I was the unenlightened bodhisattva, I clearly saw how sensual pleasures provide little gratification, much suffering and much despair, and how great the danger is in them. But as long as I had not attained to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sense pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, or to something more peaceful than that, I recognized that I could still be attracted to sense pleasures. But when I clearly saw, as it actually is with proper wisdom, how sense pleasures provide little gratification, much suffering, much despair, and how great is the danger in them, and I had attained to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sense pleasure, apart from unwholesome states, or to something more peaceful than that, I recognized that I was no longer attracted to sensual pleasures."

So that phrase in the sutta—by relying on the pleasure of concentration, by relying on the pleasure of wholesome states, or something more peaceful than that even—I think he's referring to the pleasure of Nibbana, of freedom, but also to the pleasure of insight, the pleasure of understanding, the pleasure of being present and seeing things as they actually are. By relying on that pleasure, abandon. By relying on this, abandon that. By relying on unworldly pleasant, abandon the attachment to worldly pleasant.

There's a whole stair-stepping that he does in the sutta, and I'm not going to go through the entire thing. I simply want to reflect on this phrase: by relying on this, abandon that. And perhaps describe some of the ways in which I've experienced this.

The joy of renunciation, the joy that comes with understanding, the joy that comes with concentration—these provide a deeper kind of pleasure that helps us understand that the joy and delight of sense pleasure pales in comparison. And so it becomes easier to let go of that neediness. When we've tasted something different, it becomes easier to release the less wholesome ways our mind has been relating to the world.

And yet then we may crave the concentration. This is what I was just speaking to. By relying on concentration or understanding—there are different ways in. I've seen in my own experience that sometimes, just by relying on mindfulness and wisdom and the understanding that comes from meeting dukkha, being with anger, being able to watch it and see it fall apart, a deep sense of ease and peace enters the mind connected with that seeing and understanding.

Yet then we get attached to that kind of doing. Steve Armstrong, I believe, coined this phrase: we have a particularly good sitting, and the next day we're really struggling to get back to it. He said, "There's nothing like a good sit to ruin your day." That's the craving for that state. So that's not helpful either.

What we start to see is that there are times when we may be holding on to some kind of practice in order to let go of something more painful—picking up the metta practice, for example, when anger is really strong. Perhaps there's a recognition of clinging to the metta practice for dear life so that we can navigate, balance the mind around the anger. Then maybe the anger begins to weaken and fall away. There may be some clinging to that metta. Yet the clinging to a particular practice that helps us let go of some reactive, unwholesome state of mind—perhaps that clinging to the wholesome state, to the metta, is partly what allows us to release the unwholesome state.

By relying on this, abandon that.

But then we're going to at some point have to work on the clinging to the practices, the clinging there.

My own experience with this is that my early practice was so much around exploring anger and self-hatred. And there was some clinging to the practice, clinging to being a meditator. The very first meditation retreat I sat, I could see myself beginning to create an identity as a meditator. But there was a real usefulness to it for years—it helped the mind learn to work with and let go of those really deep patterns and habits around anger and self-hatred.

I wasn't at that point experiencing any suffering around the identity of being a meditator. I mean, I could see that I was identified. I heard the teachings about not being identified. And fortunately I didn't say, "Oh, I shouldn't do that. I shouldn't be identified with being a meditator," because then I wouldn't have done anything. Sometimes we may have to hold onto something in order to meet or work with much more challenging experience.

And then there was a certain point in my practice where that identity of being a meditator—where that sense of investigation was really a big place around the identification, the capacity that this mind has to look into experience and pull it apart and understand all of the different things going on. There was a lot of that kind of putting things under a microscope in my early years of practice.

That putting things under a microscope was helpful for some time. But then there came a point at which that putting it under the microscope was actually experienced as suffering—that sense of, "Oh, there's something happening. Let me find it and look at it and figure it out." That was experienced as suffering because what was being observed was not the bigger, more major kind of suffering. That larger suffering had been obscuring the subtler suffering of the identification with being a meditator, the identification with being someone who could investigate well. But at a certain point, when a certain level of suffering falls away, we get to look at subtler levels of suffering, such as the suffering around the practice itself.

So sometimes I say we can let suffering be our guide. If you find yourself clinging to the practice a little while observing something very difficult, it's possible that this is serving you in that moment. If you're not experiencing the suffering in the practice itself, and the suffering is more in whatever you're working with—the anger or the self-hatred, the confusion or the fear—then that subtle clinging to the practice may be a kind of craving that helps you overcome craving.

There's actually a phrase in the suttas that says exactly this. I was really happy to read it because it matches my experience. I'll paraphrase, since it uses words we haven't defined yet. It's Ananda speaking to a nun, and he says to her: "It is by relying on craving that craving is to be abandoned. There is a case where one might hear that such and such a person has become completely freed of suffering. And hearing that, one may have the thought, 'I hope that I too one day will become completely free of suffering.' And then at a later time, one abandons craving, having relied on craving."

By relying on this, abandon that. In this case, relying on a kind of craving toward wholesome states—that wish for freedom being a wholesome wish—the teaching here acknowledges that craving. When we rely on something in that way, because of how the practice is framed, as the bigger craving gets abandoned, we start to see more clearly. We're looking at craving. We feel the suffering of craving. We've abandoned a bigger craving—oh, here's some smaller craving. And we may even feel it more strongly. This exploration of where the craving is takes us deeper and deeper into subtler and subtler kinds of craving. We may be craving the practice, craving holding on to the practice, craving freedom, craving liberation.

There's another analogy that really speaks to this principle of "by relying on this, abandon that." Many of you have heard this analogy—maybe even all of you—the simile of the raft. In this simile, the Buddha describes coming upon a flood of water, where the near shore is dangerous and you need to get to the far shore to find safety. In order to cross this flood, he says, you can build a raft. Build it out of what's around you. Just build a raft. And using the raft, floating on the water, using your energy, paddling with your hands and feet—I've got this image of lying on the raft, paddling with hands and feet to get across to the far shore.

In this simile, the Buddha describes that the flood is basically the flood of suffering, the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion, and that the raft is the Eightfold Path. He describes that the raft is like the Eightfold Path, and so we use the Eightfold Path to cross the flood. By relying on the Eightfold Path, we manage to float on the surface of the water instead of drowning in the suffering, instead of drowning in the greed, aversion, and delusion.

We manage to stay afloat. We can't let go of the raft in the middle of the river. And perhaps we even have to hold on tightly to that raft. If there are rapids or big waves in the water, we may have to hold on tightly, even cling to that raft to get across. It's not useful to say, "Oh, clinging to the raft—I better not do that. Let's throw the raft away while we're in the middle of the river." So by relying on this, we can abandon that. By relying on the practices of the Eightfold Path, we can get across the flood. We do get across the flood.

And the teaching goes on. As you cross the flood, as you get to the other side, the Buddha asks: is it useful to pick up that raft and say, "Wow, this raft has been really helpful. Let me carry it around with me on my head"? No, that's not useful. There is a point at which we put down the raft when it's no longer needed to support us in crossing the flood. And so the Buddha at the end of this teaching says that we need to abandon clinging even to wholesome states—how much more so to unwholesome states? And yet this analogy points out that we have to hold on, at least, maybe even cling to wholesome states while we're crossing the flood.

I think partly this is pointing to not picking up the teachings as a thing, carrying them around with us, saying, "I am a Buddhist. This is what I do. This is who I am." That's not relevant or necessary at a certain point. So by relying on this, abandon that. Eventually the teachings let us know there's a possibility of complete release of clinging.

As I mentioned earlier, I feel like we do have to recognize the suffering of clinging to wholesome states. That will be something we need to work with at some point. We'll recognize it. The whole way the teachings are framed is so beautiful because we're always looking at where the suffering is, where the clinging is, where the most obvious suffering and clinging are. Initially it's at this grosser level, and then it becomes subtler. And yet we're always looking at that and exploring the possibility of letting go. That letting go happens not because we decide to let go necessarily, but because understanding develops as we observe what it's like to cling. So that's the practice.

We recognize that clinging is happening. That experience when we're suffering from having had a good sit—a good sitting that has somehow ruined our day—what's the clinging there? The mind having an idea that this experience isn't good enough. Some agenda that something else should be happening. There's this idea that the sitting yesterday meant something, and that its not happening now means something else. All different ways in which our mind is tying itself up in knots, trying to get back to something, as opposed to recognizing in the first place: this is what's happening. There's clinging happening—wanting that state back. And if you look, you're not clinging to the state. You can't cling to that state. It's not here. You're clinging to some idea in your mind. You're clinging to a thought. It's amazing what our minds will cling to.

So we can see what's happening right now. There's a thought in the mind that some other thing would be better, and the mind is holding on to that. Being with that, noticing that, we feel the suffering of it. And it's not a mistake to feel the suffering of it. This is part of how the learning happens.

It kind of feels to me that there's this movement, this direction our system—our organism—wants to move in: the direction of well-being. Very naturally. And there's just been a fundamental misunderstanding about how that's possible.

The mind has all kinds of ideas and views and opinions that obscure or get in the mix in terms of this movement toward well-being. It's as if the system is moving toward well-being, and our thoughts interject: "Oh, this is how we should get to well-being—get what we want, get rid of what we don't want." Our thoughts, habits, and conditioning co-opt that natural movement toward well-being into a set of behaviors that actually keeps us caught in suffering.

Our minds are fundamentally confused. Really.

As we start to turn toward experience and look at it directly, we see: this is the experience of suffering. When I'm wanting something to hold onto or wanting to get rid of something, the experience of the wanting or the aversion—the greed or the aversion—is already suffering. We fundamentally jump over that to: "It's going to be great when I get that thing. It's going to be so great when I get rid of that thing." And we are missing completely that we're suffering right now.

What the practice does is point out that suffering right now, in the greed and the aversion. This is not a mistake. This is actually how the practice works. As our system gets better information, it starts to recognize: "That's not helpful. That way lies suffering. Let's let go of that." The wisdom of our system begins to help the mind let go of the suffering. We don't do that ourselves.

There are times in our practice where we do have a sense—we see, "Yes, that's catching me up. Maybe I should set that aside." But this deeper kind of letting go happens because the mind is understanding at a very deep level: that way lies suffering. It's just not going there. This is a movement of our system, our organism, wanting to move in a wholesome direction. When it gets the information about greed and aversion and delusion, it starts to let that go.

The path of letting go eventually releases all of these ways in which we cling. The Buddha expressed the possibility that it's possible to be completely free from clinging, completely free from craving, completely free from suffering. And in that place, there's the putting down of the path.

It's an interesting image, the putting down of that raft. Our normal minds might think, "Well, if we put down the raft, how do we do anything? How do we orient our minds?" The understanding is that wisdom, love, and compassion will orient the mind toward wholesome action, naturally.

There's a teaching in one of the suttas that describes how someone who is fully awakened possesses the Eightfold Path—actually, the Tenfold Path. There are two more factors that relate to freedom: right understanding and right liberation, right release. This possessing of the path is understood to be simply the natural effect, the natural consequence. We don't have to try to be ethical at that point. We don't have to pick up the path. It's living us, we could say.

The expression of someone who has crossed the flood, released greed, aversion, and delusion, is to live a wholesome, ethical life with freedom.

CHAPTER 19

Neither Tarrying Nor Hurrying

Andrea Fella · 51 min

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella shares reflections from her own three-week retreat practice, centering on a powerful teaching from the very first sutta in the Saṃyutta Nikāya. The Ogha-taraṇa Sutta (SN 1.1) presents the Buddha's paradoxical response to how he crossed the flood of suffering: "By neither tarrying nor hurrying did I cross the flood." Fella unpacks this evocative simile, explaining how the flood represents not external circumstances but the internal flood of greed, aversion, and delusion in our minds.

The talk explores how tarrying—getting stuck on experience—can arise from both greed (clinging to pleasant states) and aversion (obsessively trying to fix or remove what's unpleasant). Similarly, hurrying can manifest as grasping after the next pleasant experience or rushing away from discomfort. Fella connects this teaching to the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's (MN 10) instructions on knowing contracted and distracted mind states, suggesting these energetic qualities offer a simple way to check our mental balance.

Drawing on her meditation imagery, Fella describes how she came to understand that the tarrying and hurrying themselves create the flood—without them, there is simply experience arising and ceasing, moment by moment. She connects this insight to the understanding that all experience is dukkha in the sense of being unreliable and impermanent. This teaching offers practitioners a fresh way to investigate balanced awareness: rather than analyzing whether greed or aversion is present, simply notice if the mind is stuck to something or rushing past it.

Earlier this year I had the opportunity to sit a three-week retreat. That's the longest stretch I've been able to do this year. I appreciated it when Greg said the other day that we could think about how, a couple of days ago, we were starting a three-week retreat. It was great—a lovely stretch of time to settle into practice. I hope you're settling in here in the first few days of your three-week retreat.

When I'm on retreat, often some snippet of poetry or phrase from the suttas can arise in my experience, much as Jaya was describing last night—how our mind can connect or resonate with texts or poems that we've been exposed to. Sometimes it can seem like those arise at just the right moment, almost like an instruction appearing in the mind.

On this three-week retreat, there were a couple of phrases—not whole poems so much, but really just a few very succinct phrases—that kept coming up. Each time they came up, they would illuminate something in my experience, some way in which I was holding or grasping after something, and they supported a letting go. So I thought I would share with you some of those reflections that came for me, partly on that three-week retreat that I sat in May.

This particular phrase that I'd like to explore with you is from a very brief sutta. I'll actually read most of the sutta to you tonight. It just kept resonating for me over and over on the retreat.

The sutta I'd like to share with you is the very first sutta in the collection of discourses known as the Connected Discourses of the Buddha, or the Samyutta Nikaya—the very first sutta you run into there. It's very short and succinct, and it's a simile. The Buddha often taught in similes and analogies, and I've of late, in the last few years, really appreciated diving into the similes because they are so evocative.

This is a way in which a particular piece of this simile arose for me as an image in the mind. Similes often evoke images for us, and I think the teaching power of similes is that they can connect to us on many different levels. They can connect to us on the intellectual level, through meaning, and they can also connect with us on a very evocative level through the imagery that's created. This is mostly how this particular simile came for me during this retreat.

This simile is of water—a flood simile. I mentioned the flood last week in my talk. I talked about the simile of the raft a little, and how we cross the flood by using the Eightfold Path. We build a raft out of what's around us, cross the flood on the raft, and then let go of that raft once we've crossed over.

In this simile, there's a flood again. The flood is understood to mean the flood of our suffering, as it is in the simile of the raft. But in this particular image, the Buddha does not have a raft. It's like he's crossing a flood with just his body, walking across the flood.

The imagery of the flood resonates for us. Unpacking the simile a little bit, looking at the various pieces of it—the flood of our suffering, the flood of the ways that we struggle—that language even resonates for us. We talk sometimes about feeling like we're drowning in our emotions or moods, feeling like we can't get our head above water. This imagery speaks to us of a flood of struggle.

In thinking about this flood and its imagery, it seems like something in the conditions of the world. In our experience of suffering, we often connect to stuff happening. Stuff does happen in the world. People engage in certain ways that feel harmful, or there are circumstances or conditions that feel out of our control. Things happen in the world that are a part of why or how we are suffering.

And yet the pointing in the Buddhist teachings, over and over again, is that it's not the stuff. It's not the stuff that is the real suffering. That's actually really good news for us, because if it were the stuff, it would be hopeless. We couldn't become free from suffering. We cannot control the conditions of the world in the way that we'd like them to be.

Yet fortunately, in this teaching the Buddha says it's not necessary to fix the world to be the way we'd like it to be. Instead, he points to this relationship in our mind—how we are with that stuff that's happening is the crucial part of whether or not we suffer. If we are reacting to it out of greed, aversion, confusion, or delusion, we will be drowning. We will be struggling. We'll be feeling like we're swept away, like we can't get our head above water.

This is the flood that's being referred to.

Not the flood of stuff happening in the world, but the flood in our minds of greed, aversion, and delusion. The Buddha offered a very succinct definition of freedom: the ending of greed, the ending of aversion, the ending of delusion—this is Nibbana, this is freedom.

With this simile of crossing the flood, I think the first thing to take in, having understood a little bit about what this flood is—this flood of greed, aversion, and delusion in our minds—is that it is possible to cross the flood. There is hope.

The sutta begins with the Buddha meditating in a grove. A deva came to him and asked, "How, dear sir, did you cross the flood?" The Buddha responded, "By not halting, friend, and by not straining, I crossed the flood." The deva asked, "But how is it, dear sir, that by not halting and by not straining you crossed the flood?" The Buddha replied, "When I came to a standstill, friend, I sank. But when I struggled, I got swept away. It is in this way, friend, that by not halting and by not straining, I crossed the flood."

There is a little more to the sutta, but this is the bulk of it—a pretty succinct and brief teaching. And yet it can evoke quite a bit for us, so I want to take some time this evening to unpack this simile with you.

One thing I like to do when I reflect on a sutta is remember that it's a translation. I find other translations because different language lands for us in different ways. Certain words have more of an evocative feel, resonate more fully for us. Sometimes different translations pull out different subtleties of meaning.

The translation I read for you today was Bhikkhu Bodhi's, and it is not the phrasing that resonates most with me. There's another phrasing by a translator, Jnanananda, that uses the words: "How did you cross the flood?" And the Buddha responds, "By neither tarrying nor hurrying, I crossed the flood." That language is what came up during my retreat, and it was very evocative for me. For this mind, for the way my own mind works, that language lands more with how my mind functions in terms of clinging to things or sticking to things—holding on, tarrying with something, spending excessive time with it, or hurrying, rushing past it. That language is very evocative for me.

Another translation from Thanissaro Bhikkhu: "Without staying in place and without pushing forward, I crossed the flood. When I stayed in place, I sank. When I pushed forward, I got swept away."

What this describes is a kind of what we've been exploring in some of the teachings here. This is a description of how the Buddha met suffering. He's walking across the flood—not hurrying, not straining, not tarrying, not hurrying.

The commentaries say this imagery is meant to be a little paradoxical for the mind. When we normally think about crossing a flooded stream, what would we do? We would stop. We'd search, look for a place to get a toehold. Put our foot down, make sure it's stable, hold it there, and then maybe quickly move the other foot to get to that spot. Then do the same thing—look for another toehold. In actually crossing a flood, we would probably do exactly the opposite of what this teaching tells us.

The commentaries say it's meant to startle the mind a little bit. It's like a koan: What does he mean, "By neither tarrying nor hurrying I crossed the flood"?

This speaks to how we are on the path. It's really a succinct description of how to be connected with experience. It's not so much about what we're experiencing, although the flood is understood to be the flood of suffering—and that's what we're meeting in each moment. Neither tarrying nor hurrying, neither stopping nor straining with this flood, just very calmly moving on.

This is about how we meet experience. It's the attitude of mind that Sayadaw U Tejaniya refers to: How are we in relationship to experience? This neither tarrying nor hurrying speaks to a balanced attitude of mind. In Sayadaw U Tejaniya's words, this kind of balance means being at ease with whatever arises moment after moment, not reactive.

checking in on our experience, checking our relationship to experience. And we've encouraged you to do this at times. It's like, what's arising? And then how are we in relationship to it? If we're looking at a pain, for example, and there's aversion in the mind, that aversion needs to be acknowledged. If there's a thought pattern going on and the mind is reactive to it, if we're not noticing the reactivity and we're trying to observe the thought, probably that reactivity is driving how we are being aware of the thought. And so this checking into the relationship is an important piece to recognize whether the mind is balanced in relationship to what's happening.

So being at ease with what's happening moment to moment, Sayadaw U Tejaniya speaks about checking in. Is there greed in the mind? Is there aversion in the mind? Is there delusion in the mind? The three roots of all of our suffering. And so this balanced attitude is one where there is not greed, aversion, or delusion in the mind.

And yet here in this sutta, the Buddha is not using that language. He's using a different imagery around what it would mean to be on this path with a balanced mind. Neither tarrying nor hurrying, I cross the flood.

Another piece of this teaching that I find inspiring, that helps me in reflecting on my own experience, is the next phrase. How, dear sir, without tarrying, without hurrying, did you cross the flood? And the Buddha responds, "Well, friend, when I tarried, I sank. And when I hurried, I got swept away. So without tarrying, without hurrying, I crossed the flood."

Now this is the Buddha describing his own practice and acknowledging, when I tarried I sank. The Buddha acknowledging he sank, he drowned in suffering in his practice. The Buddha acknowledging he got swept away in his own practice. So to me this is somewhat inspiring because it's like, oh yes, I'm not alone when I'm drowning. The Buddha drowned too. And he didn't give up. He looked at his mind. He began to check in. What are the conditions here? What's going on? And from this teaching, what he's saying is that he understood that the tarrying and the hurrying were the cause of the drowning and the being swept away. It's not the flood that's the culprit. It's the tarrying or the hurrying.

And so beginning to look, well, what's the possibility? What's the possibility in the practice? Is there some agency here? There's not so much agency about the stuff that's happening in the world. Sometimes we can change things that are happening in the world. But where is there some capacity for this being to act? Maybe not about how other people are behaving towards us, but maybe about how we are in relationship to it. Agency in our practice.

He was looking at the conditions of the experience and seeing that certain aspects of the experience were possible to work with within this being, and other parts of the experience weren't something that could be changed. And so looking at what, based on the conditions, what can we do? This is what we're doing here. We're looking at the conditions and exploring how we can learn about the conditions that lead to suffering and how we can learn about the conditions that lead to freedom. It's looking in our experience.

And we've talked a little bit about how this works. Mindfulness and wisdom paired together make this work for us. As we observe our experience, we get to know what's happening. And everything that's happening in this hall is conditions. The dharma talks are conditions that plant seeds in your experience. What's arising in your experience is a piece of what you know and what you learn. The instructions to be present and aware are there, and the mind has interest to act on them.

None of this takes an entity, none of this takes a self to do this. It's simply the way that mindfulness and wisdom inform us.

We've talked about how with mindfulness and wisdom watching anger or frustration or confusion or greed—when we watch that with mindfulness just as an arising, recognizing "this is what's arising in this moment"—the mind learns something different about it. We begin to understand the vast difference between being caught by a reactive mind state and being aware that a reactive mind state is arising. In that difference, the mind learns something fundamentally different about that experience and how it is contributing to its own suffering. Wisdom begins to support the mind in letting go. And so mindfulness is a huge support for us in navigating these conditions.

This is what I believe the Buddha was doing. He was looking at the conditions and seeing that this aspect of tarrying and hurrying was somehow participating in the drowning and being swept away.

There are many different ways tarrying and hurrying come up in practice. As I reflected on these words and the feeling of the experience—because that's what was happening in this particular retreat this past May—the feeling of tarrying and the feeling of hurrying was what was being pointed to as this phrase arose in my mind: "By neither tarrying nor hurrying, I crossed the flood." Sometimes it was an image of the Buddha walking across the flood that arose in my mind—just very calmly, with that calm abiding, walking across this mass of flooding water.

As I explored these words, there was a clear felt sense of this quality of being stuck to something, of tarrying with something—or a felt sense of skipping over, rushing past something. These experiences seem to be a different way into exploring that balance of mind than reflecting on things as greed, aversion, or delusion. In some ways it felt simpler. Is the mind stuck to something or is it rushing past something?

The mind being stuck to something could be greed, having us stick to something pleasant. "Ooh, this is really pleasant. I think I'll hang out here for a little while." Tarrying with something pleasant. Or it might be aversion. In my mind at least, the aversive nature of mind when there's something unpleasant happening—I would get completely stuck to it, trying to figure out how to get rid of it. Tarrying with the unpleasant, with the difficult. The aversion sticking me to the experience with a tarrying quality.

So the tarrying could be greed, it could be aversion. It might also be a kind of overemphasizing some experience, putting it under the microscope with excessive investigation. That too could come from greed or aversion—aversion if it's "How do I figure this out? Can I pull this apart so I can get rid of it?"

One of the things that really began to intrigue me was getting a sense of familiarity with the quality in the experience of tarrying, recognizing that this was a clue the mind is a little bit—or a lot—out of balance.

Likewise with hurrying. Hurrying can happen out of greed, rushing to get the next thing, grasping after pleasant, after pleasant, after pleasant. Or maybe it's connected with aversion, the wanting to rush away from something unpleasant.

One quality that was perhaps a little subtler in my experience was the experience of searching for something. As the mindfulness got more subtle and there was less clear experience, my mind was whirling about. "Where is there something to land on? I want to find something to land on." A kind of searching, a rushing.

We might be able to get familiar with these qualities of tarrying and hurrying as a different way to explore what imbalance of mind means, and be led toward balance of mind. This is largely how we find our way to balance. Sayadaw U Tejaniya often says that we get to know a wise attitude, a wise relationship with experience, by getting really familiar with unwise attitude. We get familiar with the way our mind wants things to be a certain way, the way our mind doesn't want things to be a certain way.

And that very familiarity begins to help the mind let go. It's that shift of relationship—rather than buying into or observing experience through greed or aversion, we are knowing it as a phenomenon, as an arising in the mind.

The same thing holds true here: by getting familiar with the experience of tarrying and hurrying, the mind begins to understand how to not tarry and how to not hurry. Tarrying and hurrying can have other flavors too—the qualities of the hindrances of sloth and torpor and restlessness seem to map very well onto these qualities.

Tarrying—the sinking into laziness or indulgence, just spacing out, sinking into oblivion. Or restlessness, where the mind is popping all over the place, very much like that quality of hurrying.

In my own practice, as this phrase arose in my mind—"by neither tarrying nor hurrying"—it served as a little reminder. Oh, there's some subtle quality here, maybe even very subtle, like landing on something and holding onto a concept or an idea. Just a little feeling of that, one that didn't even necessarily feel like greed or aversion. It had more this quality of creating or holding onto something—a view. More in the realm of delusion, perhaps. But there was a quality of sticking, a little bit of sticky quality to the concept. This phrase pointed to: oh, maybe we don't have to keep sticking. By neither tarrying nor hurrying.

And so we explore the way to neither tarrying nor hurrying by being curious about tarrying and hurrying. What is that experience? We can know tarrying, sticking to something, with a mind that is neither tarrying nor hurrying. Oh, sticking to something is what's happening. That's what's happening. It's that shift from believing or being bought into something, bought into the perspective of a view, versus knowing: oh, this is a view that's arising. This is being believed right now.

Another teaching feels resonant for me around this exploration of tarrying and hurrying. It comes from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the Buddha's Discourse on the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. In the third foundation, it asks: "And how does one abide contemplating the mind as the mind? Here one understands a mind affected by greed is a mind affected by greed. And a mind unaffected by greed is a mind unaffected by greed. One understands a mind affected by aversion as a mind affected by aversion, and a mind unaffected by aversion as a mind unaffected by aversion." Likewise with delusion.

Here the Buddha points to those three root states and simply knowing, being aware: Is the mind affected by greed, or is the mind not affected by greed? There's the possibility of a balanced mind knowing: oh, this is a mind affected by greed. This is a mind unaffected by greed.

Then, continuing in this sutta, the piece that feels very resonant with respect to tarrying and hurrying: "One understands a contracted mind as a contracted mind, and a distracted mind as a distracted mind." He points to a different way into looking at what might be going on in the mind. Contracted—tarrying, perhaps. Or distracted—the mind bouncing around, hurrying, perhaps. The contracted mind pulling inward. The distracted mind jumping around.

And again, there's almost an energetic experience that can be very simple to check into. Is the mind pulled in, or is it bouncing around?

In this teaching from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, it says one understands a contracted mind as a contracted mind, and a distracted mind as a distracted mind. We see that possibility of balance no matter what is arising. Even contraction and distraction can be known. So tarrying and hurrying can be known with a mind that is neither tarrying nor hurrying, with a mind that is balanced. It's just that tarrying is happening right now.

I love that in this sutta it says, "One understands a mind affected by greed is a mind affected by greed." It's not "one understands a mind affected by greed and does something to get rid of the greed." It's just the understanding. It's pointing to the power of that mindfulness, the power of mindfulness and wisdom to support the mind understanding something about greed, which then creates conditions for learning to happen.

We have to acknowledge, and we've been talking about this, that it's not always possible for us to simply understand a mind affected by aversion is a mind affected by aversion, or a mind affected by greed is a mind affected by greed. But it is possible, actually, perhaps more often than we think it's possible. What happens often for us is: oh, there's greed arising in the mind, that means I'm not paying attention properly. We think that. Rather than: oh, there's greed arising in the mind, and the mind can know this. That shift to simply being curious is more available for us than we might realize, especially the further into retreat we are. This deep into retreat, it's much more possible than you might think.

And so give yourself a chance to see: is it possible to neither tarry nor hurry around the fact that greed is arising? Just a moment of greed arising, the mind neither sticking to it nor rushing past it. What happens with that kind of attitude of mind?

Sometimes we can't do that, and so we do need to use our skillful means—to change the channel, to put down some experience and redirect the attention because there's too much agitation in the mind, or to find ways to balance the mind. We all have been working with this; you all have your own tools at this point to help you balance the mind. And that's not a problem when that happens.

For me, this image of neither tarrying nor hurrying is really one of great patience. But it's not a patience that is inactive, because it's not tarrying. Maybe we have the idea of patience as being that quality of tarrying, but it's not tarrying. And it's not impatience. It's not a hurrying. It's meeting each moment of experience—this flood that the Buddha is crossing, the imagery of the flood, the Buddha crossing the flood.

And in this case, as much as in the simile of the raft, there's this notion of contact with the flood. The image for me is the Buddha walking on water, contacting the flood. And somehow, as this image evolved in my mind, as the mind explored this phrase through the imagery, as the Buddha was crossing this flood, touching the flood, touching the suffering—this is a meeting, meeting experience. It's not somehow floating above the flood. This neither tarrying nor hurrying is not about growing wings and floating above the flood. We're in contact with it, learning about the flood as we are connecting.

But in the image for me, it's the Buddha walking across this flood. Instead of hitting that piece of the flood and sinking underneath it, it's almost like somehow in that landing on that spot, a little bit of stability grew in that place where the foot lands. And then the next foot lands, and there's just a little place for there to be some way for the walking to continue—without tarrying, without sticking to it, and without hurrying past it. It's almost like these magic stepping stones appeared in my image of the Buddha crossing the flood. These magic stepping stones growing out of neither tarrying nor hurrying. Just that patient quality, walking, walking across the flood.

And then the image evolved further in my meditation. It became just an image of the Buddha calmly walking, no flood in sight. And that one startled the mind a little bit. The understanding that arose there with this imagery was almost a shock. It's like, oh—it's the tarrying and the hurrying that make the flood. Without the tarrying and the hurrying, the flood vanishes. The tarrying is what's drowning us. The hurrying is what's sweeping us away. It's not separate. And then as we neither tarry nor hurry, there's nothing to drown us or sweep us away. It's just moment after moment of experience.

Another phrase arose during this retreat that felt connected in some way. I wasn't completely clear on the connection, but this other phrase kept arising in my mind. And this evening, as I was reflecting back on the retreat and on the phrases that had been coming to my mind, I understood maybe something different there.

The other phrase that kept arising in my mind was: "One has no perplexity or doubt that what is arising is only dukkha arising, and what is ceasing is only dukkha ceasing."

This phrase, to me, is referring to dukkha in the sense of unreliable experience—dukkha having that meaning at times. Unreliable. What is arising is only unreliable experience arising. And what is ceasing is only unreliable experience ceasing.

The word dukkha means unreliable. It also means suffering. And so this evening I kind of connected: oh, that flood, that flood of suffering—maybe we could think of it also as just the flood of experience. It's the experience, everything we experience. Nothing in our experience is reliable. It's all impermanent. It's all coming and going.

So whatever is arising is only impermanent, unreliable experience arising. Nothing in our experience has the quality of being stable, permanent, lasting—someplace where we could land or tarry. Nothing is permanent or reliable. Everything that's arising is only unreliable experience, impermanent experience arising.

That's it. Everything that's ending, every experience that's ending, is only unreliable experience ending.

With this phrase, this reflection, my mind kind of settles. What's arising is only unreliable experience. Why tarry with it? It's just ending. What's ceasing is only unreliable experience ceasing. Why hurry to it? It's just unreliability arising and ceasing.

Neither tarrying nor hurrying is the way to relate to that unreliability without suffering happening.

How did you, dear sir, cross the flood?

Without tarrying, friend, and without hurrying did I cross the flood.

But how did you, dear sir, without tarrying, without hurrying, cross the flood?

When, friend, I tarried, then I sank. When I hurried, I was swept away. And so, friend, un-tarrying, un-hurrying, did I cross the flood.

CHAPTER 20

Disenchantment and Dispassion

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the progressive path from recognizing impermanence to experiencing freedom, drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and teachings on the five aggregates (khandhas). She explains how the Buddha's refrain—observing the arising and vanishing nature of body, feelings, mind states, and dhammas—leads naturally to non-clinging. The talk unpacks the Pāli terms nibbidā (disenchantment) and virāga (dispassion), exploring how these qualities arise as the mind sees through its fundamental misperceptions: taking what is impermanent to be permanent, what is unreliable to be reliable, and what is not-self to be self.

Fella addresses the often-bumpy terrain of disenchantment with honesty and compassion, acknowledging that this phase of practice can include fear, homesickness, boredom, and even feelings of disgust—all natural responses as deeply conditioned patterns of clinging begin to release. She uses the image of dye fading from cloth to illustrate the gradual nature of virāga, emphasizing that the return of delusion after moments of clarity is not a mistake but part of the path's unfolding.

The talk concludes with profound definitions of nibbāna as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion—visible and attainable in this very life. Drawing from the Sutta Nipāta's Aṭṭhakavagga, Fella offers a portrait of the peaceful person and reminds practitioners that freedom doesn't mean absence of feeling, but rather creates conditions for greater connection, compassion, and authentic personal expression.

Earlier this week, Greg spoke about impermanence and how the seeing of impermanence is such a crucial part of how the mind lets go.

The instructions in the Satipatthana Sutta, which he read and reminded us of, appear in the refrain part of the sutta—a section that is repeated for every single exercise, for every single mindfulness practice the Buddha offers. A part of that refrain is recognizing the impermanent nature of experience.

I'll read it again. It's repeated for the exercises in the body, then for feeling and mind state, and then four or five times in the section on dhammas. So this refrain gets pounded in, and as Joseph said at one point in his reflection on the sutta, when the Buddha says something that many times in that space of time, we should pay attention.

A piece of this is around observing impermanence: "One abides observing in the body its nature of arising, or abides observing in the body its nature of vanishing, or abides observing in the body its nature of both arising and vanishing." Likewise for feelings, for mind states, for dhammas. "And one abides independent, not clinging to anything in the world." So there is this connection between the seeing of impermanence and non-clinging.

In another sutta, the Buddha is a little more clear about how this connection between freedom and the direct recognition of impermanence works—how they're related and what the unfolding of that process is. In this teaching, the Buddha uses the teaching on the five aggregates that Jaya mentioned last night: form, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and consciousness.

The Buddha says: "Form is impermanent, feeling is impermanent, perception is impermanent, mental formations are impermanent, consciousness is impermanent. Seeing thus—seeing the impermanent nature of form, feeling, perception, volitional formations, consciousness—one experiences disenchantment towards form, disenchantment towards feeling, disenchantment towards perception, towards volitional formations, towards consciousness. Experiencing disenchantment, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, the mind is liberated. The mind is freed."

This passage points to the recognition of impermanence leading to disenchantment, disenchantment leading to dispassion, and dispassion leading to freedom. It is essentially describing a natural unfolding process. The nature of seeing impermanence is that disenchantment follows. The nature of disenchantment is that dispassion follows. And the nature of dispassion is freedom. It describes a path, a sequence of unfolding that happens in our practice.

These words—disenchantment and dispassion—are what I'd like to explore with you this evening.

The Pali for disenchantment is nibbida. I like the translation "disenchantment" because it points to how the mind has been enchanted by delusion, enchanted by the views, the ideas, the usual ways of relating to the world as permanent, as reliable, as self. Disenchantment comes about as we begin to thoroughly understand that the normal ways we've been approaching happiness, the normal ways we've been engaging in the world, are not a very reliable way to find happiness.

As we look at our experience with mindfulness, part of this rub of the dukkha that we feel—we start to see that dukkha is related to how we've been engaged in wanting things to be a certain way, wanting to get rid of things, to have things, to hold things. Our minds start to recognize that this has been useless. It's not been an appropriate or useful way to find happiness.

This teaching around impermanence points to how important impermanence is in helping to undermine those usual ways that we relate to experience. These are the three characteristics of experience, three ways that we tend to misperceive experience. Jaya mentioned them last night, using the word vipalasa—misperceptions, misunderstandings that we carry. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable to be reliable. We tend to take what is not self to be self.

This is the misperception that begins to be undermined by the perception of impermanence. And these three misperceptions are connected. Because we take things to be permanent, because we take things to have some kind of lasting quality to them, we assume them to have some kind of reliability.

As we open deeply to the impermanent nature of experience, we begin to understand very directly that these experiences that are changing, that are impermanent, are not reliable. They're not a place where we can find lasting happiness. The mind begins to open to that understanding of unreliability. All conditioned experience is impermanent. All conditioned experience, because impermanent, is unreliable.

Somehow the sense of believing that holding on to something will make me happy—the views or beliefs underlying these misperceptions—begins to be exposed. That sense of "me" is exposed as a misperception, partly through seeing what we take to be me. When we take something to be solid or stable as "me," we discover there isn't anything solid or stable in there.

What we take to be "me," when we start to look at it, it just falls apart. And so the nature of seeing impermanence is that it begins to undermine these misperceptions, helps us to begin to let go. We see basically that our habit of clinging is based on misunderstanding and illusion, and so we become disillusioned.

Another word perhaps for nibbidā, another translation we could use, is "disillusioned." We become disillusioned, we become disenchanted. Disenchanted with what we had been enchanted with—the idea that I can find some kind of lasting happiness through this manipulation of my world.

So we see that we've been caught by the spell of ignorance. Ignorance is basically that weaving of illusion, ignorance about conditioned phenomena, believing it to be permanent, reliable, and self. And so seeing that ignorance is happening is one of the steps towards this disenchantment.

We may not necessarily be able to see ignorance directly at first. Actually, the first times we can really clearly see that ignorance had been happening is when it falls away. We get a sense of a different way of experiencing things, and sometimes it's like, "Wow, this seems so clear. How could I miss this? How could I not see this—that holding on to things is suffering?" It just seems so obvious. And then, two minutes later, we're clinging again.

The first few times I experienced this, I thought, "I guess it's not that obvious." Because here I am clinging again, believing somehow that this is useful, that this is helpful, even as it's painful.

When that illusion falls away and then comes back, sometimes we get really frustrated. In my experience, having said, "Gosh, it seemed so obvious. How can I not see it now?"—we almost try to tie ourselves up in knots trying to get rid of that ignorance. But one of the things about that difference when ignorance falls away is that we've seen a different way of being. When it comes back, now we can know it's ignorance. We can see delusion working right there. We can feel the way it creates suffering.

And so this is the first step. Sometimes we see how we're clinging to something, taking it to be permanent and reliable, and yet having seen perhaps—and almost everybody, I think, has been reporting—that there have been times of seeing things in a different light. But then, of course, the delusion comes back. This is not a mistake. It's part of the way this gradual path works. The seeing of the delusion at work helps us to understand why the delusion is not so helpful and how it creates suffering.

In a way, if we use this enchantment analogy, what we start to see here is that we've seen the magic. The curtain's been pulled back and we've seen the magic. And yet now it feels like the curtain's drawn back again. But we know it's magic now. Even if we can't see how the levers are being pulled, we know it's magic. This is a difference. This is a step in the direction of disenchantment. Even though we're caught or woven in the spell, we at least know it's a spell.

Bhikkhu Bodhi has a description of the experience of disenchantment: "Nibbidā signifies the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena which follows when the illusion of their permanence, pleasure, and selfhood has been shattered by the light of correct knowledge and vision of things as they are."

That sounds like a nice description of disenchantment—the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena which happens in seeing the illusion. Well, in my experience, and certainly in the experience I've had talking to yogis, to retreatants, this terrain of disenchantment is often not a smooth place in practice. Becoming disenchanted, it turns out, is kind of painful. There are so many different levels of enchantment, and so the road is bumpy for a while.

Basically, this disenchantment—in terms of looking at things from the perspective of impermanence and the unreliable nature of experience—touches very deep levels in our system, in our organism. Not just at the intellectual, obvious, day-to-day levels, but at very deep human-conditioned levels, deep in our makeup. Our system does not like this truth of impermanence. And when it starts to see it and really get the depth of that impermanent, unreliable nature of experience, our system kind of rebels. It goes, "No, no, that is not how it is. It should not be that way." And it's not happening at our rational level. It's happening much more deeply.

This "no" happens. And so there's a lot of exploration in the practice, on the path of practice, as we start to open to these levels of impermanence in experience. There are many different emotional or relational aspects to meeting impermanence—different flavors of our relationship as we start to see this truth.

I think it's connected to deep forms of resistance to seeing that truth. There's a real screaming from deep inside that says, "No, there should be some place to hang on to. There's got to be some place to land, some place where I can feel safe." So many different flavors of relationship seem to happen for a lot of us on the path.

One of the translations for nibbida is "disgust" or "revulsion"—sometimes it's translated that way. That's not my preferred translation because those words for us often have a sense of aversion in them. But the feeling of nibbida can sometimes have that quality. When we start to see the ways in which our minds are grasping after this impermanent, unreliable experience, our minds kind of shudder at that. Our minds go, "Ugh, don't do that." There can be a quality of almost revulsion or disgust. We start to recognize there's nothing for me in this experience, nothing worth clinging to in this experience. And the deeper part of our system that still wants to cling—this part that's starting to see—just feels this sense of "no," a sense of "there's nothing there worthy of clinging to." So it can have this quality of disgust.

But there are other flavors of what happens as we're in the terrain of disenchantment. Sometimes the flavor can be one of fear—with seeing just how fast things are changing and that there isn't any place to land. Sometimes the mind can feel like it's in free fall, and there's a sense of fear there, sometimes as strong as terror.

Sometimes the quality is what one of my teachers in Burma, Sayadaw U Janaka, named as a kind of homesickness that can happen in this place of disenchantment. That resonates for me because the ways that we used to be at home in greed, aversion, and delusion—those don't work anymore. So there's a kind of wishing that we could go back there sometimes, in this place before we've really understood the freedom of non-clinging. There's a wobbliness to the experience, a sense that there's nowhere really reliable to land and yet our mind still wants to land. So there's this homesickness: "I wish I had that delusion back. I wish I had that ignorance back so that I didn't see that this was the way things are." Homesickness can be a flavor we might see.

Disinterest can be another flavor. Sometimes, with the quality of rapidly seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—things happening in the mind, just these six things happening over and over again—it's like, "Okay, enough already. I've seen this before. Do I have to keep watching this? Do I have to keep watching these six things over and over and over again?" The mind starts to get disinterested.

Some of that flavor of disinterest, at least in my own experience, is the loss of our old interest—related to that homesickness. We used to get really interested in these highs and lows, and it's like those aren't doing it for us anymore. The pleasant isn't giving us a kick, and the unpleasant isn't making us want to snap into control anymore. The mind isn't interested in engaging in the ways that it has. So the quality of disinterest can come in, sometimes feeling like boredom, sometimes feeling like wanting to pack up and go home. "I'm done. There's nothing to see here anymore."

So many different relationships arise as our minds begin to unhook from these very deep levels of clinging. And the practice unfolds through the noticing of these relationships, through the seeing of all these different ways in which we're feeling like, "Oh, I wish I had that back"—that quality of feeling homesick, or this feeling of disgust. This is not a mistake. This is the mind beginning to learn about letting go of something that it had held on to very deeply, very tightly. Our practice deepens through seeing these kinds of attitudes in the mind around becoming disenchanted.

And as the mind more thoroughly lets go of those habitual ways of clinging, it moves in the direction of this other word: dispassion. "Experiencing disenchantment, one becomes dispassionate." Dispassion—again, it's useful to unpack the word a bit. Because dispassion, on the surface of it... would I want to not have passion?

Do I even want that? If that's what freedom is about, is that what I want?

Again, the dispassion is connected to the loss of ways in which we had been passionate. We had been passionate about greed, aversion, and delusion. There's a weakening and a loss of that.

In this place of dispassion, basically the mind is really thoroughly starting to understand that holding on to impermanent, unreliable experience just doesn't make any sense. And so the old patterns of craving and attachment begin to weaken, to fade out. This term "fading out" is sometimes used as a translation for dispassion, because the term itself, viraga, actually has this literal meaning of fading out. I believe it's used in a more ordinary way to refer to how the dye in a cloth fades over time.

And so that image of a cloth fading—when we think about how a cloth fades, we wash it in soap, some of the dye comes out in the water. The cloth is just a little bit less bright than it was, but initially we don't really notice the difference. Then a second washing, a third washing, some exposure to the sun. We might start to notice that it's not quite as rich of a color as it was. A very gradual process, this fading out of dye.

I think this is meant to point to us that the process in our practice is also gradual—a gradual fading of these attachments and accumulations and cravings. There are perhaps even different levels of attachments we have that may fade at different times in our practice. The talk I gave on "relying on this, abandon that" almost speaks to this, where we can let go of something more painful by potentially holding on to something that's more wholesome and more helpful. And that fades by relying on this. There can be a fading of that. But then we start to feel the rub or the suffering or the holding or the attachment here. And perhaps there's another "relying on this, abandon that." So there's this gradual releasing of various levels of attachment.

The Buddha spoke about this in his own experience. He said, "I abandoned the craving for sense pleasures. I removed the fever for sense pleasures and I abide without thirst, with a mind inwardly at peace. I see other beings who are not free from lust for sense pleasure, being devoured by craving for sense pleasure, burning with fever for sense pleasure, indulging in sense pleasure—and I do not envy them, nor do I delight therein. Why is that? Because there is a delight apart from sense pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, which surpasses even divine bliss." And by divine bliss, I understand him to mean the very deeply concentrated states. So there's a delight that surpasses even that. "Since I take delight in that, I do not envy what is inferior."

This passage points to these different levels of attachments that can fade: the attachment to sense pleasure, the attachment to states of concentration, the attachment even to any kind of state of insight or understanding—pointing to that teaching on the simile of the raft, where we let go of the Dharma even. Non-attachment to anything.

So this fading away happens in a gradual way, but it's not even just that. With dye, there's a kind of continual weakening over time. It doesn't maybe quite feel like that in the practice. It can sometimes feel like this dispassion or this sense of understanding—oh yeah, nothing to cling to here—but then the delusion comes back. There can be times within a day or even within an hour of a particular sitting when the mind shifts from being clearly disinterested and just not attaching to things, to being caught again, caught in the grip of wanting.

This speaks to the power of delusion, the power of ignorance, how deeply conditioned it is in us. But again, as I pointed out before, having seen some of that fade, when it comes back, there's a different relationship to it. We can understand it now as being caught—being caught in that web, the web of ignorance, enchanted again.

We can go from feeling like there's nothing to pick up, just deep freedom, to being back completely caught again, struggling with aversion. This is the nature of the unfolding of our practice. And it's not a mistake. It's just how our minds work. It points to the power of our conditioning, and so we really have to respect that—to not somehow feel like it's my fault that this aversion has re-arisen. It is the nature of that conditioning, the strength of that conditioning.

The text says, through dispassion the mind is liberated.

Liberation, freedom—actually, in certain texts the word for dispassion is almost equated with liberation, with Nibbana. There's one text that says: "This is peaceful, this is sublime, that is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, Nibbana." All of these can be seen as synonyms for Nibbana, different ways of expressing that freedom—the freedom from, the relinquishing of all attachments, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, Nibbana.

Another definition for Nibbana, which we've mentioned quite a few times here, is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. This is one of the most succinct definitions of freedom offered in the texts. We can experience this absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. Maybe first we experience it through the ending—we really clearly see the ending of greed, or we watch a craving fall away, or we see the ending of an aversion. We see a delusion and it just falls apart; a belief in our minds simply crumbles when it's seen as a belief. We can sometimes feel the release from that craving, release from wanting, release from aversion. It can be a lovely experience, that release—feeling like we're being released from a vice grip, let go of by that craving, by that clinging.

So that's sometimes some of the first ways we really feel that sense of the ending or the absence of greed, aversion, or delusion—when we see it ending. We see greed, aversion, or delusion falling apart, feeling that freedom as it ends.

And then, as the mind more thoroughly starts to understand the uselessness of clinging, more thoroughly starts to understand through recognizing the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience, that any kind of picking up is already suffering—the mind begins to understand this absence of greed, aversion, and delusion in another way. Not through seeing it end directly, not through seeing the cessation or the ending of greed or aversion, but through understanding the non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion. The non-arising, the not picking up of craving.

Freedom is not about getting anything. It's not even about getting that experience of release.

Maybe we can start to understand this non-arising through a little thought experiment. Think back into childhood. When you were young, in the three to six age bracket, what was your favorite toy? Remember how attached you were, how much connection you felt, carrying it around with you everywhere, or however you related to that toy. I had a teddy bear that was about the same size as I was. I think I rubbed all the fur off of it and it lost its button eyes, and I still carried that thing around with me everywhere.

There's a period of time in our childhood where we begin to maybe forget about it sometimes, leave it, but then we go back to it. There was another favorite toy I had when I was a little older—a dollhouse with these little dolls and furniture. I loved arranging the furniture and making up stories about what the dolls were doing in the various rooms. I spent hours with this thing.

And there was a period of time where I had to hide that because the rest of my preteen friends, the twelve-year-olds, were starting to look down on dolls. It was a painful kind of transition. I still loved playing with my dolls, but it wasn't quite as satisfying as it had been when I was eight or ten. A little bit of fading out there, a little bit of disenchantment with it, not quite as engaged in the stories anymore.

So for you, remembering back to some toy from your childhood that you really connected with, recall the slow kind of letting go of that. That's the disenchantment place—at a certain point, losing interest. That's the disenchantment place in the letting go. It's like we still see it in the corner of our room and it's like, yeah, not so interested anymore. There's that quality of disinterest.

Dispassion, the quality of dispassion—it's more like this: as an adult here now, how long has it been since you thought about this toy, this thing from your childhood? As adults, we don't even think about picking up that toy. There's neither interest nor disinterest in it. It's just not relevant anymore. That's the quality of dispassion. It's not interested or disinterested. There's just no relevance to picking it up. There's no bearing on the unfolding of life.

In hearing Jaya's talk last night, she quoted from one of the Mahamudra poems that she read the other week. I want to read a line from that because as I heard it last night, it resonated for me very much in this place of neither interest nor disinterest: "The noble way of Mahamudra never engages in the drama of imprisonment and release."

It's not even interested in release anymore—that feeling of letting go. There can be a place in time and practice where we're almost looking for the clinging to see it let go. And the mind starts to just realize: not picking it up.

Not to pick anything up.

So this practice that opens us to disenchantment, to dispassion, takes us right through all the ways in which we are enchanted. We don't get to be disenchanted by not seeing how we have been enchanted. We have to see how we've been enchanted for the mind to begin to release. We have to feel the enchantment, feel the unsatisfactory nature of that enchantment. Right in the midst of our suffering is this lesson on how we're holding on, how the enchantment is working, and how the mind can free itself from it.

Bhikkhu Bodhi has another beautiful quote about realizing freedom. In this quote, he uses the phrase "realizing the unconditioned"—the unconditioned being another way of speaking to nibbāna:

"Though the realization of the unconditioned requires a turning away from the conditioned, it must be emphasized that this realization is achieved precisely through the understanding of the conditioned. Nibbāna cannot be reached by backing off from a direct confrontation with saṃsāra, with suffering, to lose oneself in a blissful oblivion to the world. The path to liberation is a path of understanding, of comprehension and transcendence, not of escapism or emotional self-indulgence. Nibbāna can only be attained by turning one's gaze towards saṃsāra, by turning one's gaze towards dukkha, and scrutinizing it in all its starkness. The understanding of the conditioned is the way to the unconditioned."

So it's not a mistake, this struggle in the terrain of disenchantment. It's the nature of the path.

Freedom, then—the realization of the unconditioned, the relinquishing of attachments—there are some quotes I'd like to read about nibbāna. But primarily I want to highlight that nibbāna is primarily described in terms of what it is not. It's the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. It is non-clinging, the ending of craving. It's not described as something, as some state or something we get. It is the absence of, the ending of, suffering.

Here are some quotes about nibbāna:

"The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called nibbāna."

"Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed, with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is nibbāna—immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

"And for one thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and nothing more remains to be done. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so neither forms, nor sounds, nor odors, nor tastes, nor contacts of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired, can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is the mind, gained is deliverance. This is peace."

Another definition of nibbāna: experiences no mental pain and grief. That sounds pretty good. Visible in this life. Attainable here and now. Not some transcendent kind of state—visible, possible to experience in this very lived experience. That's how I take that: visible in this life.

There's another poem I want to read to you, a description of a liberated person. These last quotes have described liberation—the absence of greed, aversion, delusion. This one is from the Sutta Nipāta, a set of sixteen poems called the Aṭṭhakavagga. I'll read a portion of one of those poems, which describes what a person is like when they're free. A different perspective on freedom—not describing the qualities of liberation, but what a person is like.

A question comes to the Buddha: "Having what vision, being of what character, is one called peaceful? Tell me about the Supreme Person."

The Buddha responds:

"A person who is not angered, not frightened, not boastful, not fretful, who gives wise advice, who is calm, restrained in speech—who is indeed a sage.

A person who is not attached to the future, who does not sorrow over the past, who finds solitude amidst sense contact and is not guided by fixed views.

A person who is retiring, not deceitful, not covetous, not greedy, not impudent, not arousing contempt, who does not engage in malicious speech.

A person who does not relish pleasure, who is not arrogant, who is mild and of ready wit, who is not credulous, who by nothing is repelled.

A person who does not take on the training in hopes of material gain, who is unperturbed if they get nothing, who is not hampered by wishes nor greedy for flavors.

A person who is even-tempered, ever-attentive, who does not suppose that in the world they are equal, superior, or inferior, who is free of conceit.

A person for whom there are no tethers, who knowing truth is not tethered in any way, and in whom no wishes are found for existence or non-existence.

This is someone I call peaceful. They are indifferent to sense pleasure."

In them bonds are not found. They have overcome attachment. This is someone I call peaceful."

So again, this is a description of a person, but it's described largely by what's not happening. There are a few positive qualities mentioned here—mild and of ready wit, attentive, even-tempered—but mostly we hear what is absent: not deceitful, not covetous, not greedy. What's not here?

One of the things I appreciate about this kind of description is that it leaves room for personal expression. The absence of greed, aversion, and delusion doesn't mean that we lack feeling. It doesn't mean that we lack inspiration and connection to the world. In fact, it seems to be just the opposite. Greed, aversion, and delusion tie us up in internal spinning and knots. A tremendous amount of energy gets consumed by these forces. As greed, aversion, and delusion fall away, there's a tremendous release of energy toward connection, compassion, care—toward the expression of non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. Expression through compassion, wisdom, love, generosity.

Greg mentioned, and Rebecca has mentioned, these monks in the Sagaing Hills in Burma that we've come across. I don't know whether I've met fully enlightened beings or not up in those hills, but the expressions of their freedom were remarkable. Two in particular come to mind in this moment.

One monastery we walked into—just entering the grounds, it felt like I was walking into an ocean of tranquility. It tranquilized me simply to enter the gate. And then I met the monk who lived there. I just wanted to hang out with him. He was so still and content. Michelle McDonald named him the Angel Sayadaw.

And another that Greg mentioned the other day, whom Michelle McDonald named the Happy Sayadaw—he was continually laughing. One day we would go to visit. I was the manager on the retreat, and we would take hikes in the afternoon to visit the monks. One afternoon several of us went to visit, and one of the people I was with asked Myatong Sayadaw if we could take his picture. He agreed and wanted to go outside, so he went outside and one of the people aimed the iPhone at him. Now, in Burma, monks are not supposed to smile for photographs. He couldn't do it. He kept having to cover his mouth. He just could not stop smiling.

Really happy. Very different beings, both expressing freedom in their own way.

So the absence of desire from the world, this dispassion, doesn't mean a lack of feeling. I think the release from greed, aversion, and delusion actually creates the conditions for more connection, more love, more care, more compassion, more joy, more tranquility, more peace to express.

So what's your expression of freedom? What's your expression of freedom?

The sage regards nothing in the world as their own and does not grieve because what does not exist. Not blindly following religious teachings, such a one is truly called peaceful.

CHAPTER 21

Aṅgulimāla's Journey

Andrea Fella · 1h02

In this evocative dharma talk, Andrea Fella narrates the complete story of Aṅgulimāla from the Aṅgulimāla Sutta (MN 86) and its commentarial backstory, using this ancient tale to illuminate timeless aspects of human psychology. The story traces how a promising student named Ahiṃsaka ('Harmless') was transformed into a murderer through a cascade of unwholesome actions—beginning with his fellow students' jealousy, their deliberate lies, and his teacher's confirmation bias that led him to believe the falsehoods.

Andrea draws striking parallels to modern psychological research, including studies on confirmation bias and the famous Milgram experiments on authority and obedience. She examines how views become established in the mind with alarming speed, how we actively seek information that confirms our beliefs while dismissing contradictory evidence, and how authority figures can lead us to act against our own ethical principles. The talk emphasizes sīla (ethical conduct) as a crucial safeguard against delusion—a warning system that alerts us when we're being guided by greed, aversion, or ignorance.

The story's redemptive arc offers profound hope: even after killing 999 people, Aṅgulimāla's encounter with the Buddha's wisdom teaching on 'stopping'—ceasing both harmful action and the deeper ignorance that drives it—awakened his capacity for transformation. Andrea explores how his subsequent struggles in meditation, his opening to compassion through witnessing suffering, and his reconnection with ethical truth eventually led to his full awakening. The talk invites practitioners to reflect on how we influence one another, the importance of remembering our own goodness, and the ever-present possibility of redemption.

Tonight I'd like to tell a story from the time of the Buddha. Some of you may be familiar with at least parts of this story. It's the story of a mass murderer at the time of the Buddha. His name, his first name was Ahimsaka, which meant "harmless." And then he gained the name Aṅgulimāla—the literal meaning of that phrase is "finger garland"—because he is said to have cut off the little fingers of all of his victims and strung them on a garland around his neck. This was a horrific figure, a murderer at the time of the Buddha.

The basic story that most of us are familiar with comes from the suttas. There's a whole sutta in the Majjhima Nikāya, the middle-length discourses, about this person. But there's also in the commentaries a kind of backstory of how Ahimsaka changed from being harmless to being a mass murderer. To me, that backstory is very moving in many ways—moving in the way of opening our eyes around ways in which we affect each other.

The other night, when Gil spoke about the Buddhist teachings on social and communal harmony and how the way that we engage in the world, if we're acting out of greed, aversion, and delusion, it's not only affecting our own minds, it's affecting those whom we meet. This story demonstrates that part of life. I think you may also notice some resonances in this backstory in terms of things that go on today, and you may reflect on how little our minds have changed in 2,600 years and how applicable the teachings of the Buddha still are to us.

Some aspects of this story seem almost magical or mystical or mythological. We don't actually know how much of this story is true, but it does seem that at least some aspects of it—just as there was probably the historical person of the Buddha—there was probably this historical person of this mass murderer. This story is ultimately a story of redemption. For myself, I find some inspiration in it. There's a way in which, at times in my practice, thinking about this story, I've thought, "Well, if Aṅgulimāla can do it, maybe I can too."

So the backstory. I'll read some of it and summarize some of it.

At the Buddha's time, at the court of King Pasenadi of Kosala, there was a learned Brahmin who held the office of royal chaplain and was thus one of the kingdom's highest dignitaries. One night, his wife gave birth to a son. Soon afterwards, the father cast the boy's horoscope and to his consternation found that his son was born under the robber constellation. This indicated that the boy would have within him a tendency to commit robbery.

On that same day of the child's birth, there was another disquieting event. All the weapons in the armory in the city of Sāvatthī had suddenly begun to sparkle. In the morning, the Brahmin went to the palace as usual and asked the king how he had slept.

"How could I have slept well?" replied the king. "I woke up in the night and saw that my auspicious weapons lying at the end of my bed were in bright sparkle, and so I was afraid and perturbed. Should this mean danger to the kingdom or my life?"

The Brahmin said, "The same strange thing happened in the entire city, and it does not concern you. Last night my wife bore a son, and unfortunately his horoscope had the robber constellation. This must have caused the weapons to sparkle."

The king asked, "Will he be a lone robber or the chief of a gang?"

"He will do it alone, your majesty."

"What if I were to kill him now and prevent further misdeeds?"

So the father was actually proposing, willing to sacrifice his own son for this. But the king responded, "As he would be a loner, let him be raised and properly educated. Then perhaps he may lose those evil tendencies."

There's this nature-nurture question alive even here at the time of the Buddha—the idea that a loving home and a good family and education and ethics would support a mind moving in a wholesome direction. This is why the boy was called Ahimsaka, harmless, to incline his mind in that direction.

He grew up. He was quite well-behaved, very strong in body, but he was also studious and intelligent. His parents had good reason to think any evil tendencies had been removed by good education and by the religious atmosphere of the home. This made them very happy.

In due course, his father sent Ahimsaka for the traditional studies to Takkasilā, the famous university of India. He was accepted by the foremost teacher of that university and continued to be studious, so he surpassed his fellow students. He also became his teacher's favorite.

This made his fellow students very jealous. "Since that young Ahimsaka came, we are almost forgotten. We must put a stop to it and cause a break between him and the teacher."

So they began trying to slander Ahimsaka. This didn't apparently work very well because his conduct was so upstanding. They decided they had to alienate the teacher from his favorite student.

And they realized they couldn't accomplish this through simple means—they had to create a plot, a plan. So they decided to form separate groups of people who would go to the teacher independently, as if they were unconnected to each other, and tell the teacher that they had heard or sensed that Ahimsaka was plotting against him.

The first time this happened, the teacher dismissed it out of hand. The second time it happened, again, he dismissed it out of hand. The third time, the group cunningly added—and I have to say that whatever they were claiming, this plotting, it was all fabrication. There was no truth whatsoever to this. They were lying to his teacher. Fake news.

With the third group, they not only told the same lie to the teacher, but they added this little extra bit. They said, "If you don't trust us, examine it for yourself. Check it out for yourself."

From this poisonous seed, a suspicion took root in the teacher's heart, and he came to believe that Ahimsaka actually wanted to push him out. Once a suspicion is roused, one can always find something that seems to confirm it.

I'm going to stop there with the story because that's something to explore and reflect on in terms of our own minds—how views affect us.

So far what we've had is the jealousy of the students, an unwholesome mind state that clouds our minds. Probably an equal mixture of greed, aversion, and delusion comprises jealousy. Aversion to not having the relationship with the teacher that they'd once had. Envy of Ahimsaka's close relationship to the teacher. And delusion that this was all a problem, that they had to fix this somehow, change this somehow.

From this jealousy, they felt they had to create a separation. And the only way they knew how to do it was through lying, through falsehoods, through unethical behavior—through propaganda essentially, because they consciously crafted this message: "We hear Ahimsaka is planning to harm you, planning to throw you out, plotting against you." And it came in three different ways from seemingly three different directions, unconnected.

This points to how views can begin to develop in our minds. We hear something multiple times and that seed of doubt, that "hmm, maybe it is true," begins to take root. We become more likely to believe it.

The story even points to how once suspicion is roused, one can always find something that seems to confirm it. This is really that function of our minds given the name these days of confirmation bias. If we have a particular view or belief, the way our minds tend to work is not rationally taking in information and weighing it impartially. Our minds actively search out things that confirm our beliefs and actively ignore things that don't confirm our beliefs. This is well researched and documented—how our minds bias themselves toward our views and beliefs, discounting information to the contrary as unreliable while feeling that information supporting our own view is reliable.

This dynamic of people holding different views and how that plays out—this has been happening for thousands of years in human minds. It's not new what's happening in our own minds, in our cultures. It's not new that people try to sow dissent between others out of jealousy or greed or hatred. These are tendencies of the human mind.

In some ways, it's a frightening aspect of our minds, this confirmation bias and the almost willful ignorance. It's not consciously willful ignoring of perspectives that don't support our own view, but it is a function of how our human system tends to work. And it particularly tends to work that way when we aren't aware that it works that way.

There are studies that point to how, if people are given the chance to reflect on their perspective, asked questions about it, and begin to recognize that maybe they don't know as much about something as they thought they did, then they begin to have a more even-handed approach to taking in information. Knowing this about our minds, knowing this piece of information about our minds, is really useful. It's a powerful function, really connected to delusion, this confirmation bias. It's connected to how our minds obscure things.

The creation of views itself is quite a thing to reflect on as well. In this case, the story talks about multiple sources coming at the teacher. But there are studies—I was reviewing an article called "Why Facts Don't Change Our Minds," which seems to certainly have some truth to it—pointing to how quickly views become established in our minds.

There was a research study done, and I just have the barest outline of it, but students were given one of two packets of information containing a story about a firefighter who was either a risk-taker or a risk-averse person. In some packets, the risk-averse firefighter had won accolades for his skill, described as a successful and good firefighter. In the other packets, the firefighter was always failing to save lives, had been written up, and hadn't been a very good firefighter.

So there was just one story the people were given in this study. And then, almost immediately, they were told that the entire thing had been made up. They were given this packet of information and then told, "Oh, by the way, that was just a completely fabricated story, no truth to it whatsoever."

Later—I don't know how much later they asked this question—they asked how much participants thought being risk-averse or a risk-taker would affect someone's performance as a firefighter.

And the answers were split right exactly along the lines of the packets they had been given. The ones who'd been told that the risk-averse person was a good firefighter believed that being risk-averse would make someone a good firefighter. The ones who'd been told the risk-taker was successful believed that would lead to somebody being a good firefighter. So one exposure to information, told immediately it was made up, and still it influenced the view.

That to me brought quite a bit of pause. It's almost as if our minds may be predisposed to believe the first thing they hear. And so if that's the case, we really ought to take care with that understanding—that beliefs are happening. This is really a big area of delusion: beliefs are operating and we are not aware they're beliefs. We simply take them to be the way it is.

The more we can be curious about whether we're acting out of beliefs, the more we might ask ourselves: what belief is motivating my action right now? Even if it's just exposed—"oh, this is a belief happening"—that at least gives a little bit of space in the mind to not simply take it to be truth.

So in this story, the information was false, but repeated with confidence, it created that seed of doubt in the teacher's mind. And given that, starting to look for evidence with that kind of proposal—"well, you check it out"—the mind began to overlay that view onto Ahimsaka's behavior and to find things that were evidence of him trying to overthrow the teacher. He found this supposed evidence.

And he decided this was dangerous, that this strong student of his was trying to overthrow him, was a danger to him. The teacher's suspicion grew into conviction: I must kill him, or get him killed. But he considered, it will not be easy to kill such a strong man. Besides, if he's slain while living here as my pupil, it will harm my reputation and students may no longer come to me. I must think of some other device to get rid of him as well as punish him.

So the teacher is taking action now. And he does not know at this point that he's acting on falsehood. He thinks he's done an independent investigation, unaware that his mind was clouded and skewed in the gathering of information. Unaware that the evidence he thinks he's gathered has already been biased from the view that was looking for it.

The students told the lie knowing it was a lie, wanting to get rid of Ahimsaka, wanting to separate the teacher from him. The teacher is acting on what he thinks is truth, and yet his actions too are beginning to be motivated by aversion and hatred, by anger.

I think a big piece of this story—at least one thread that runs through it—is the thread around sila, around ethics. Because at each step, if the students had reflected on the action they were taking as being unethical, as being a lie, as not a wholesome way to engage, then they might not have done that action.

The teacher, behaving based on what he thinks is truth—he had no reason to believe that the students were lying after he confirmed it himself. And yet his actions too are based in anger and motivated by anger. He's looking for ways to harm his student, looking for ways to get rid of his student. Feeling justified perhaps because there is danger.

This happens all over the place. We may feel like we are acting in self-righteousness or self-defense, that the action is justified. And yet this is a place where the teaching of ethics grounds us: these actions are not wholesome. Is there some other kind of action that might be taken? There were many other actions the teacher could have taken—talking to Ahimsaka to find out what's going on, for instance.

The next part of the story is the teacher creating this plot, this scheme. Ahimsaka's course of studies was coming to an end, and the teacher used that as an opportunity. At that time in India, there was a kind of honoring of the teacher at the end of your course of studies. And he points to this.

"My dear Ahimsaka, for one who has completed their studies, it is a duty to give a gift of honor to the teacher. So give it to me."

"Certainly, Master, what shall I give?"

"You must bring me a thousand human little fingers of the right hand. Then you'll be concluding your ceremonial homage to the science you have learned."

Ahimsaka is horrified by this suggestion and says, "I can't do that. My family has never been engaged in violence. My name is Harmless. My family has always been harmless."

The teacher simply said, "Well, if you don't do this, the studies that you have done will yield no fruit."

And with that, Ahimsaka consented.

This is a kind of odd piece of the story.

And yet, if we reflect on the situation here, in this place of the story, the commentaries pause and ask: Why would Ahimsaka do this? Some of it is pointed back to his underlying tendencies—the fact that it's said he was born under this robber constellation, that he had these deep underlying tendencies that might not have been fully redirected by his upbringing. That's one explanation.

The other explanation is the guru devotion aspect that was often a piece, I understand, of the teacher-student relationship. Your teacher asks you to do something, and it's an honoring of the teacher to do it, to trust in the teacher. If we think about how this can play out, it's not only a teacher-student relationship, but there's also a power dynamic there—someone who has more power, more authority, asking you to do something. Almost like there's something in our makeup, our social hierarchy makeup, that gives over our authority to somebody in power.

This is not only true at the time of the Buddha in this kind of teacher-student relationship, but seems to be true now, today. There were questions after the Second World War: How could people do all of these horrible things? Imprisoning and killing the Jewish people—how could that happen? Scientists were curious about this authority piece.

One very famous set of studies, which many of you have probably heard of, were the Milgram experiments done in the early 1960s at Yale University. They were looking at how people would relate to authority and whether they would do something when an authority figure told them to that they wouldn't otherwise do.

The experiment was set up so that a person came to the lab—actually two people came, but one of them was a ringer, an actor. That person always became the one who would be the recipient of a set of shocks. This was supposed to be a study on learning, where questions would be asked, and if the person got the answer wrong, they would be given a shock—supposedly testing the use of negative reinforcement for learning.

The person being experimented on was asked to turn up the voltage on the shock when the "student" kept getting wrong answers. The voltage readout started at 15, marked "mild," and went up to 450, with a big red indicator that said "Danger."

When the person giving the shocks expressed hesitancy—when they didn't want to continue, didn't want to turn up the voltage—the experimenter standing in the room would say things like, "No, please continue," or "You must continue," or "The experiment requires you to continue," or "You have no choice but to continue."

In these studies, two-thirds of the participants gave the highest level of shock. Two-thirds. Everyone gave a substantial level of shocks.

This is what Milgram wrote: "I set up a simple experiment at Yale University to test how much pain an ordinary citizen would inflict on another person simply because they were ordered to do so by an experimental scientist. Stark authority was pitted against the participant's strongest moral imperatives against hurting others, and with the participant's ears ringing with the screams of the victims, authority won out more often than not. The extreme willingness of adults to go to almost any lengths on the command of an authority constitutes the chief finding of the study and the fact that most urgently demands explanation."

So this kind of power, this authority, may have played a big role in Angulimala's acquiescence.

Variations on this study revealed that even simple modifications made a difference—like whether the experimenter was wearing a lab coat or not. When they didn't wear the lab coat, the willingness to continue dropped from two-thirds of the people to only 20%. Another variation had the experimenter remind the participants that they bore the ethical responsibility for any harm that would come to the other person. With that reminder, almost nobody followed through.

A simple reminding that our actions are our own ethical responsibility—that reminder was very powerful. Just remembering: "Yes, some authority figure tells me to do it, but it's my responsibility."

So this is maybe what Ahimsaka did not remember—that he was bearing the responsibility for the harm that would come to these victims.

Again, with this story, we see the playing out of ethics. Ethics is about non-harming. In so many places along the way, harming is generating more harming. This influence we have on each other, the conditioning nature we have on each other, the way ignorance and delusion are running the show. And there's a piece here about how grounding ourselves in ethics can help us recognize when we are being guided by delusion.

This is why, I think, the Buddha emphasized sīla so much. It really helps us to recognize: Is this going to cause harm? Basically, I think he's saying, if your action is going to cause harm, there's delusion there. There's danger there. There's greed or aversion there. So take care.

And so the story continues.

Ahimsaka went out and marauded the neighborhood, killing hundreds of people. He reached 999 victims. He started in the forest, but after he had killed people passing through, travelers stopped coming that way. Unable to find more victims in the forest, he began going into the villages, grabbing people from their homes, killing them where they lived. The villages became abandoned, and the people in this area went to the king, pleading, "You must take care of this man. He is creating havoc. He has killed hundreds of people." And so the king sent out an army to find Angulimala and kill him.

At the same time, his mother heard about this murderer roaming the neighborhood. Her suspicion was piqued. She had the intuition that this was her son. No one had identified him—the name given to this person at this point was Angulimala, not Ahimsaka—and yet she had this intuition. Her son had never returned home from the university. There had been that foretelling at his birth that he would become some sort of bandit. And so she was suspicious, and she went out to investigate, to see for herself.

The king was heading there, his mother was heading there, and then the Buddha comes into the story. With his awareness—and this is one of the mystical or magical parts of the story—he surveyed the world with his mind and saw this situation playing out. He apparently had many lifetimes of connection with Angulimala and knew from this surveying that a terrible situation was about to unfold: the mother was going to try to stop her son from getting his thousandth finger, which would have fulfilled Angulimala's duty to his teacher.

According to Buddhist psychology, Buddhist metaphysics, if you kill a parent in this life, there is no way your mind would ever be able to become fully free in this lifetime. And yet one thing about the teaching around freedom is that there is no one who is beyond redemption—there is always the possibility for freedom. What I'm pointing to here is that in this life, the action of killing a parent is so agitating for the mind that there would be no way that mind could ever settle, could ever let go into complete surrender, complete release from clinging. It would always be holding on to that action in some fashion—denying it, pushing it away, regret, remorse, self-justification, whatever. The mind would not be able to let go in this lifetime. That's not to say that over the course of many lifetimes a person could not eventually become free, but in this lifetime, it would not be possible.

And yet the Buddha also saw in his surveying of Angulimala's mind that even having killed 999 people, his mind had so much wholesomeness from his stream of previous lives, previous actions, that he had the capacity to fully awaken in this lifetime—if he did not kill his mother.

And so the Buddha decided to intervene, to put himself in the picture. He thought, "If I go there, if I go into the forest, Angulimala will see me and try to kill me instead of killing his mother."

These three scenarios were playing out simultaneously. The Buddha entered the forest and saw Angulimala. Angulimala, from his lookout, saw the Buddha. Though recognizing his mother, still the thought arose to complete the thousand fingers by killing her. At that moment, the Buddha appeared on the road between Angulimala and his mother. Seeing him, Angulimala thought, "Why should I kill my mother for the sake of one finger when there is someone else? Let her live." And so he turned towards the Buddha.

At this point, the Buddha performed a feat of supernormal power. The bandit Angulimala, going as fast as he could, running to catch up with the Buddha, was unable to reach him. The Buddha was walking at his normal pace—a slow, mindful walk through the forest—and Angulimala, running as fast as he could, could not catch up. Confused by this, he yelled out, "Stop, monk, stop!"

The Buddha responded, turning and saying over his shoulder, "I have stopped, Angulimala. It is time for you to stop."

This shook Angulimala because the Buddha was still walking while Angulimala was standing still. He said, "What do you mean? You're still walking. I've stopped. How have you stopped and I have not?"

The Buddha responded, "Angulimala, I have stopped forever, forswearing violence to every living being. But you have no restraint towards things that breathe. So that is why I have stopped, and you have not."

At this point, Angulimala experienced a turning of the mind. It was almost as if his childhood with love and care—or perhaps previous lives—came back to him, and he remembered something of his other nature.

This is a wisdom teaching here, and it's a teaching on ethics, pointing to the stopping of harm. But it's also a pointing to, in some ways, the stopping of ignorance. Ignorance leads to unwholesome behavior, leads to unethical behavior, leads us to harm others. It also creates harm for ourselves. And so I think that this stopping the Buddha is pointing to here is not only about stopping unethical actions, but the deeper stopping of ignorance—the deeper stopping of the root of what leads to that unethical action.

Angulimala felt like he'd found a new teacher. He asked the Buddha if he could study with him, and the Buddha agreed. Angulimala decided to keep his name, Finger Garland, to help him remember that tendency of mind towards delusion.

I'm not quite sure how all these pieces come together, but Angulimala and the Buddha headed back to the Buddha's monastery. Meanwhile, the king was still looking for Angulimala, intending to kill him. The king, knowing where the Buddha was staying, stopped at the monastery with his army and paid respects to the Buddha.

The Buddha asked, "Why do you have the army?"

King Pasenadi replied, "I'm looking for Angulimala."

The Buddha said, "Great King, if you were to see Angulimala with shaven head and beard, clad in yellow robe, gone forth from the home life into homelessness—that he was abstaining from killing living beings, from taking what is not given, and from false speech, eating only one time a day, living the life of purity and virtue and noble conduct—if you saw him thus, how would you treat him?"

"Venerable sir, we should pay homage to him, invite him to accept the four requisites of a monk, and arrange for his protection. But how could such an unvirtuous person of evil character have such virtue and restraint?"

Then the Buddha extended his right arm and said, "Great King, this is Angulimala." Because Angulimala was sitting right next to the Buddha.

The king was greatly alarmed and his hair stood on end. He entirely lost his composure—so terrifying was Angulimala's reputation. But the Buddha said, "Do not be afraid, great king. There is nothing for you to fear."

When the king regained his composure, he asked Angulimala for his birth name. And he realized that this had been the child born years before, that night when the weapons were sparkling. He knew that this was a child he actually remembered. And so he offered him protection. He offered him robes.

To me, there's an interesting counterpoint that happens here in the story. The Buddha is with Angulimala, the king comes, and the Buddha says, "You have nothing to fear." The teacher, the one in power, the one with elevated authority, tells the king, "Trust me."

This is an interesting counterpoint because it's the flip side of the teacher telling Ahimsaka, "Trust me, this is what you have to do." So what's the difference here? This question comes to my mind: How do we know that the king can trust the Buddha?

And again, the story points back to ethics. Ahimsaka was being asked to do something that caused harm. That should be a warning sign. The Buddha was asking the king to not cause harm. So again, we're pointing back to ethical conduct in teachers and what teachers are asking of us.

This also points to the possibility of redemption for Angulimala, because he has become ordained. And the king is believing in this possibility of redemption at this point. Perhaps we can use ethics as a touchstone, heading back into our lives, remembering how important ethics is for us to combat ignorance and craving, letting it be a kind of warning sign for us.

This part of the story up until now has been very much about the relational dimension of life—how we influence each other. In the first part of the story, we saw how greed, aversion, and delusion generate more greed, aversion, and delusion. In the part where the Buddha comes in, we see how kindness and compassion generate kindness and compassion in the king, supporting Angulimala to take a new direction.

This interweaving, this way in which we impact and affect each other, has been a big part of this story so far. And I think it's a big one for us in going back home—to recognize not only how we are affected but how we affect. What we put into the world is not a small thing. It has ripple effects that we cannot possibly comprehend, rippling out from us.

But there's also an internal dimension to our experience, and the next part of the story picks that up. Because Angulimala sits down and tries to meditate. He goes out for alms rounds and is not very well received in the neighborhood—because at this point, they know who he is. But in his practice... I mean, can you imagine having killed 999 people and sitting down to meditate? The kinds of things that might arise in the mind.

The story proposes something profound about what Angulimala faced in his practice. He had not been able to focus his mind on the basic meditation subject he had received, though he tried day and night. Before his mind's eye appeared the place in the jungle where he had slain so many people. He heard their plaintive voices imploring him—"Let me live, my lord, I'm a poor man and have many children." He saw the frantic movements of their arms and legs in the fear of death. When faced with such memories, deep remorse gripped him and made him get up from his seat and leave.

And so this was a struggle. The practice for Angulimala was not easy. And that makes sense to me—it makes a great deal of sense to me.

There's also a piece of this story where, in going on alms rounds, he's not receiving much in the way of alms. But he continues to do this each day, going through the village. And one day he hears a woman in the pain of childbirth, really experiencing the pains of labor, and his heart is broken open in compassion. He said, "Oh, beings experience so much suffering," and felt compassion for this woman—and also a broader compassion for all beings who suffer.

This is a transformative moment for Angulimala, I think—that moment where the heart is able to take in the suffering of others. When we're behaving unethically, we have to close our hearts to the suffering of others. We have to close our hearts to the harm we cause. Our hearts don't want to feel that when we're behaving unethically, and so it creates a kind of block for us. This part of the story points to the softening of the heart that's happening—the transformation taking place. Feeling the pain of the world.

In response, the Buddha suggests that Angulimala could go to that woman experiencing pain and say—and he actually suggests two things, which is a bit odd. He says, "Angulimala, go to that woman and say: 'Since I was born, I have never purposely deprived a living being of life. By that truth, may you and the infant be safe.'"

Perhaps this was a way of testing Angulimala's willingness to follow blindly what the teacher said. But Angulimala responded, "I can't do that. That is not true. I cannot do that."

And so here is another kind of counterpoint in the story where the Buddha asks Angulimala to do something—but in this case, what he's asking him to do is to lie. And Angulimala says no.

So the Buddha changes the statement. He says, "Then Angulimala, say to the woman: 'Since I was born with the noble birth, I have never purposely deprived a living being of life. By this truth, may you and the infant be saved.'"

This Angulimala felt he could say truthfully—that since he ordained, since he started on the path that the Buddha taught, he had never purposely deprived anyone of life. And the story goes that the woman had an easier childbirth because he said that to her—one of the mystical, magical teachings in the suttas.

But the other piece of it, and perhaps a piece that points back for us, is that it seemed to create conditions for Angulimala to remember that those actions he had done—the memories of the murders rising in his mind—those were in the past, and he was no longer in danger of doing that. The statement was a reminder to Angulimala of his ethical conduct. And the text says that not long after that point, Angulimala's mind settled and he became one of the arahants—as all good Buddhist stories end, with the person becoming fully enlightened.

But this is also something we can reflect on. Through the reflection on sila, remembering your own goodness—if you're finding your mind struggling with things from the past, or just struggling to settle—perhaps recalling your own goodness, remembering your own ethical conduct, bringing to mind what you've been cultivating here, the wholesome qualities, can create conditions for the mind to be able to settle.

I'll end with reading a couple of the verses that Angulimala composed after his awakening:

Who once did live in recklessness and then is reckless no more shall illumine the world
like the full moon set free from a cloud.

Who checks unprofitable deeds, who checks the evil karma,
shall illumine the world
like the moon unveiled from a cloud.

Oh, they are fools who have no wits, who give themselves to recklessness.
But those of sense guard diligence and treat it as their greatest good.

Oh, give not way to recklessness nor harbor love of sense desires, but diligently meditate so as to reach the perfect bliss.

I stayed in forests, at the root of a tree, in mountain caves—
but with an agitated heart.
Now I rest and rise in happiness and happily spend my life, for now I am free of Mara's snares.
Oh, for the pity shown me by the master.

free of craving, without grasping, with guarded senses well restrained. Eliminated the root of misery, the ending of all taints attained.

CHAPTER 22

Words of Encouragement

Andrea Fella · 59 min

> This opening session for the second half of a three-month retreat at IMS brings together continuing practitioners and newly arriving yogis. The teaching team—Andrea Fella, Greg Scharf, Tuere Sala, Jaya Rudgard, Marjolein Jonsson, and Brian Lesage—introduces themselves and welcomes participants into this precious time of intensive practice.
>
> Brian Lesage offers the main reflection, drawing on the Zen tradition of Niwazume—the ritual of monastery entrance where aspiring monastics must demonstrate their sincerity by waiting persistently at the gates. He connects this to the Pāli concept of ātāpī (ardency) found in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta and the quality of dhammachanda (zeal for the Dhamma). Rather than being stern or rigid, true sincerity arises from a soft heart filled with ease and kindness. Brian emphasizes that sincerity—not success or failure—is what truly matters in practice, and that this quality has already carried each practitioner to this retreat.
>
> The session includes a guided reflection to help practitioners connect with their heartfelt sincerity, followed by the traditional chanting of refuges and the five precepts. Jaya Rudgard offers the beautiful image from the Majjhima Nikāya of the Saṅgha as rivers flowing together toward Nibbāna. The evening closes with a meditation on being both alone and together—walking one's own path while sharing the journey with others in this unique form of community practice.

Hi everyone.

Many of us here in this hall tonight are new for the first time during this retreat—all of us on the stage and those of you arriving today—and so we all feel welcomed by those of you who've been here already for six weeks.

This evening we are going to introduce ourselves to start, just so you know who we are. Then Brian will offer a talk, and then we'll also have the Refuges and Precepts together. It will be a simple evening, but we hope that it will be the beginning of joining the energy of those of you who've been here with the energy of those of you who are arriving, including us.

My name is Andrea Fella. I've been teaching this retreat for about twelve years or so, most years. I'm happy to be back here this year with this team, particularly my friends here, and just really looking forward to getting to know you and to exploring your hearts and minds together in this form, which is so precious—this time here. It's so precious. The moment of time in this country really, I feel, needs this kind of energy. So I bow to you all for being here at this time. Thank you for your practice. It's really a great gift to the world. And I look forward to getting to know you over the coming weeks.

I'll add my welcome to Andrea's, to those who've just arrived, including my colleagues up here, and greetings to those of you who have prepared this space so beautifully for us. We get to piggyback on your weeks of practice, and it's a great gift to us to be able to come into the energy that's already been established here over these days.

My name is Greg Scharf and I've been teaching this retreat most falls for fifteen or more years now. I've kind of lost track, but around that many, which is hard for me to believe. And I've been spending the fall in this hall often for well over thirty years now, sitting where you are quite a bit—which is a better place to be sitting than up here, I promise you.

I've just come from my home in Flagstaff, Arizona, in the northern part of that state at the foot of a sacred mountain there, a beautiful part of that southwest part of the country. I've been associated with IMS for a long time in different capacities, including time on staff. I've spent a lot of time, and still do when possible, in Buddhist countries in Asia, a lot of time also in India, and especially in Burma or Myanmar, which is a place that's very deep in my heart. I have spent time there practicing as an ordained Buddhist bhikkhu, so I have that in my background, and a deep love of long retreats. I feel just deeply honored to be here with you, to be entering into this next six weeks of practice together. It's a great honor and privilege to spend this time with you.

I want to briefly introduce Eowyn Ahlstrom, who's a dear friend and will be teaching movement on this retreat. She will be here tomorrow morning and can introduce herself, but I wanted to include her as part of the team this evening. So you'll meet her tomorrow.

I want to echo Greg and Andrea's words. I am so honored to be here with you. I see so many of your sweet faces that I've seen before. We sat these long retreats—it's beautiful, it's unique, something special. For those of you for whom this is your first time, it is special to do this. Difficult, but special. I appreciate both the times I've sat here in this hall on long retreat and the times I've taught here, and I just feel very honored to be here with you, to walk this path with you.

I'm a guiding teacher at Seattle Insight and one of the co-chairs for the Guiding Teachers Council at Spirit Rock. That's where I spend the bulk of my short retreats, but the long ones are here and at Spirit Rock.

I guess the only thing else I would probably want you to know is that I have been practicing sitting for over thirty years. There is nothing—nothing—that you are going to go through or have gone through that I haven't gone through too. So somehow I think we can work through whatever arises.

Good evening. My name is Tuere Sala, for those who don't know me.

So, good evening. Likewise with the others, I really warmly welcome you and appreciate those of you who are welcoming us into what probably has been feeling like your space, as all these new energies are coming in.

My name is Jaya Rudgard, and I'm from the UK. I've been sitting and teaching on these retreats here at IMS for over the last ten years. I'm on the teacher's council at Gaia House Retreat Center in the UK, and my background is that I was a nun in the Thai Forest Sangha in the UK for eight years. That was my foundation.

I will confess that this is my favorite retreat in my favorite retreat center, and I'm so happy to be here with these wonderful colleagues, all of whom I've taught with one or many more times before. I really love this team, and I hope some of that vibe will flavor our retreat.

At this particular time, more than ever, I feel acutely how fortunate we are to have this opportunity. It's something I don't take for granted. Every time I come here to IMS, I realize we don't know what's going to happen in the world. This could be the last time I ever get to be here. It could be the last time I get to teach here or share Dharma here or practice here. And so I really want to make the most of this. My personal intention is to enjoy it as much as possible, and I really hope that you too will enjoy it. I don't think enjoyment and deep practice are opposed—I think they go together. You don't have to suffer too much. You will, and we all will. But I'm really hoping that we can enjoy ourselves also.

Good evening. My name is Marjolein Jonsson. I also want to welcome you all. I'm so very happy to be here and very grateful to get this opportunity. I'm originally from the Netherlands and now live in Richmond, Virginia with my wife. I'm the guiding teacher at the Insight Center in Richmond and also teach retreats on the East Coast.

I'm here in the role of assistant teacher, which means I'm here to support you all as much as I can, as well as the team. I'm also here to learn and grow as a teacher—I'm actually in teacher training with Andrea and also with Gil Fronsdal. Part of the assistant role is that I'll be offering sign-ups most days of the week, and I might sit in with practice discussions some days so that I can learn and grow in my development as a teacher. I'll also be offering some talks sometimes. I'm looking forward to this retreat with you all.

My name is Brian Lesage, and I'm coming from actually the same town as Greg. We probably live about five or ten minutes away from each other, even though we see more of each other here than there.

What I'd like to share with you about my background might be a little different. I'd like to share what I was doing just a week and a half ago, because it seems like it fits with this retreat. I was on a self-retreat with my partner in a wilderness area outside of Flagstaff—a juniper pinyon forest with no trails in it. There's nobody around, and there can be a real vast, potent silence on this land.

While I was on retreat, what inspired me was the sense that I would be coming here to be on retreat together with you in this role. Because for me, there's something about the silence itself on this retreat that has such potency for one's heart. So you've already inspired me before I've even met you, while I was on retreat.

And it feels so beautiful to be here now at the beginning of this retreat. For me, it really is an honor and delight to get to support you on this journey, whether it's your journey of three months or a journey of six weeks.

As Andrea said, what I'd like to do now is share with you some reflections to begin this retreat together, to begin this journey together. And as a way of beginning, I want to share a ritual that's more in the Zen tradition than this contemporary Theravada tradition—one that's also about the beginning of a journey.

There's quite a striking tradition called niwazumi in the Zen tradition that marks monastics' entrance into the monastery. In particular, in Japan, monasteries have different sections to them, and there's a section called the sōdō. The sōdō is the place where monastics enter into a life of intensive practice.

What happens in this ritual is the monk goes to the monastery, often with papers from their home temple. They're in their robes. They go up the stairs to the monastery, show their papers, and formally ask to enter. And when they ask to enter the monastery, somebody comes and says to them, "No, you can't enter the monastery. There's no room for you here. What are you thinking? You need to go away, leave."

Then the monastic walks down a few stairs, sits down, usually puts his head in a bowing posture, and stays there.

The midday meal comes. The guest monk comes out and says to this aspiring monastic, "Didn't I tell you we don't have any room? What are you doing here? I told you to leave." And then they'll say something like, "But since you're here, I'll give you some food."

Day goes on, night comes. Somebody from the monastery comes out, exasperated. "Didn't I tell you to leave? There's no room here. But since you're here and it's night, I'll let you sleep in this room for the night. But once the sun starts to come out, you need to get out of here."

So then, sun rises, the monk goes back on the stairs, bowing. And usually this dance, this ritual, goes on for two or three days. At the end of the third day, there's another ritual called tangazumi or tangario, where it's basically the same process, but then the monk at least gets a room inside the monastery. And then eventually after that, they enter into the sōdō, they enter into the community.

Don't worry, we're not changing things. You don't have to do that.

What's up with this ritual? What is this ritual getting at about beginning a practice period? What comes of this?

For me, when I slow down with the feeling sense of what is kind of now formalized, it's pointing to a particular heart quality: the heart quality of sincerity. The monastery wants to make sure—oh, is this heart that's in front of us, that's on the stairs, is it sincere? Is it really sincere about Dharma practice?

For me, sincerity is the necessary foundation for my Dharma practice, especially for long retreats, whether that's three months or six weeks. To be sincere.

I want to be clear: at least for me, sincerity doesn't need to be stern or rigid. Yes, Zen has that kind of culture to it. But when I sense inside, real sincerity arises for me from a soft heart. A soft heart filled with ease and kindness. A soft heart that says, "Oh, I'm sincere about this."

In the Theravada tradition, there are a couple of Pali words that come to mind that seem similar to the sincerity that this ritual is pointing to. For example, in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, there's this word that's part of the refrain that gets repeated again and again: ātāpī, which is often translated as "to be ardent"—to be ardent to practice. Or this other phrase that you find: dhammachanda—this zeal, this love, this sincerity, you could say, for the Dhamma.

What I want to point out about this sincerity at the beginning of this retreat—for some of you, the part two yogis, and at the midway point for the three-month yogis—is that all of you already have this sincerity. I find it so important to start to sense into this sincerity that you already have.

For both the part two yogis and you here for three months, it's actually sincerity that carried you here to IMS. You may think that what carried you was a plane or a car, but that's not really what got you here. What really got you here was your sincerity.

And for you three-month yogis, it's your sincerity that carried you through the first six weeks. It's there, even if it's not acknowledged or recognized. Because sincerity has that quality—it carries me forward in these ways towards the Dhamma.

If I were to ask all of you about what you're sincere about, it would be quite interesting, because I think all of you would probably articulate that in very different ways. And there's something beautiful about that. What makes one person feel the sincerity might be different than another person, and yet we're all practicing this path together at the same time.

Maybe for some of you, you are sincere in your aspiration for healing or for awakening. Or you're sincere because you aspire to discover a deeper way of being in this world. Maybe you're sincere about wanting to learn how to truly love yourself and to truly love others. Or perhaps because you're simply in love with the Dhamma, or maybe for the benefit of all beings.

What I'd like to invite you to do right now is to take a moment in the silence to sense into your heart so you can touch your heartfelt sincerity. Notice what comes—how you articulate that sincerity, what you're sincere about, to yourself. Share that with yourself, feel that in the silence for just a minute or so.

Thank you for taking a few moments here to touch your sincerity. I invite you during this retreat to find ways to keep in contact with that sincerity. Because what I've discovered in my practice, especially on long retreat, is that when I'm connected with that heartfelt sincerity, it actually doesn't matter what happens on retreat. It doesn't matter if it's a bad retreat or a good retreat or whatever. What's important for me is just to be sincere about practicing. That's it. That's all that's needed—just to be sincere in your practice. Maybe sincere in your intention to be kind. Sincere in your intention to be present.

And when I'm connected with this sincerity, it doesn't even matter how much of my time I am kind or present. Because it's the sincerity that's important. And that's quite significant, because I'm not in complete control of how often I'm going to be kind and how often there's going to be presence. Have you noticed that, especially the three-monthers? It's not like you get up in the morning and say, "This morning I'm just going to be present every single moment, and then the afternoon I'm going to decide to slack off for a while, and I'll get back to it in the evening, and then I'm going to switch it up tomorrow." That's never happened for me on retreat. If it has for you, please leave me a note—I'm so curious if that's possible. This mind, it's wild. So I can't completely control, but I can be sincere. And this is the whole art that I'm sure many of my colleagues and I will talk about.

I also find this connection with my sincerity helpful because on retreat, especially long retreat, I've noticed how subtle and sometimes even unconscious notions of "success" can be percolating in my mind, often unbeknownst to me. These are like subtle forms of craving that can creep into this mind. I want to point out that those notions, if you've noticed them creeping around, those notions of success are not the same as sincerity. Sincerity is something deeper. It's not swayed by success and failure. Those words don't even mean anything to my sincerity.

So I invite you to stay close to your sincerity, to keep it close to your heart. And as all of you enter this community of silence together, I want you to stay in contact with your sincerity in a particular way for this transition time. For those of you on the three-month retreat, I want to acknowledge—this isn't always the case for everyone—but this transition time can feel so bumpy and disruptive in so many different ways. You have all these new teachers up here on the stage. Part one, there weren't as many yogis, there was more space, and now there are all these new faces, more of them all around. The heart can be so sensitive. So important, the sincerity, especially around kindness and compassion for oneself and for others.

And for you coming into the middle of this retreat for six weeks, the same thing—being in contact with that sincerity of kindness and compassion as you transition into retreat time. When I'm in contact with sincerity that way, and recognizing that other yogis are doing the same, it allows me to have a sense of kindness not only for myself but for those around me as well. And it's in this way that we can offer each other the needed silence and solitude for the unfolding of this path.

I'd like to end by sharing with you this quote by the poet Rilke, where he's talking about solitude, which I liken so much to retreat. And interwoven in it, what I hear are these threads of him pointing to sincerity. He says, "What is necessary after all is only this:

Solitude. A vast inner solitude. To walk inside yourself and meet no one for hours. That is what you must be able to attain.

To be solitary means as you were when you were a child, when the grown-ups walked around involved with matters that seemed large and important because they looked so busy, and because you didn't understand a thing about what they were doing. And when you realize that their activities are shabby, that their vocations are petrified and no longer connected with life, why not then continue to look upon it all as a child would? As if you were looking at something unfamiliar out of the depths of your own world, from the vastness of your own solitude—which is itself work and status and vocation.

Why should you want to give up a child's wise not-understanding in exchange for defensiveness and scorn? Since not understanding is, after all, a way of being alone. Whereas defensiveness and scorn are a participation in precisely what, by these means, you want to separate yourself from.

So for this retreat, remember, as Rilke is pointing to: you don't have to be like those grown-ups. You just need to be sincere.

I love this idea of vast solitude. It really speaks to so much of what I feel is precious about this retreat. And it also seems precious to me that we get to experience this vast solitude at the same time in the warmth and the structure and the support of community. To me, that is a very powerful combination.

I'm very aware that those of you who are continuing have lost some of the community you've probably become quite fond of this morning. You probably did some kind of ceremony that we often call "parting of the ways." It's as if a river that was flowing together forked—one fork left, another fork flowed on. This evening there's another confluence, and a new river is joining our stream. We continue to flow on, merging these energies together.

We're going to do that in a ritual way, a traditional ritual way, by chanting the refuges and the precepts together. This will be our chance to blend our voices as this particular community—blend our voices and our sincerity and our intentions.

The refuges and the precepts give us a sense of direction: putting our trust in the Buddha, in awakening; in the Dhamma, the teachings, the truth of the way things are; and in Sangha, community. How each of us imagines and experiences those refuges—again, there will be nuances of difference, and it will unfold for us in the course of the retreat. But we're all here because we have some trust in this, or we wouldn't be here on a six-week or three-month retreat.

And then this common intention of ethics—the precepts by which we practice harmlessness towards the world and towards ourselves. They give us a kind of structure. The riverbed is safe and secure, the practice energy is not going to leak, and it's going to move in the right direction. We will look after one another by keeping to the refuges and precepts.

We're also flowing with the tradition and the momentum of everyone who has been practicing in this way, who is practicing in this way, and who will practice in this way in the future. We can tap into some of that energy as we align our intentions with skillfulness—skillful behavior of body, speech, and mind.

And then the piece at the end: Idam me sīla.

SĀDHU SĀDHU SĀDHU

I'd like to share a quote from the Majjhima Nikāya about these rivers that we're joining together:

Just as the river Ganges inclines towards the sea, slopes towards the sea, flows towards the sea, and extends all the way to the sea, so too the Buddha's assembly with its homeless ones and its householders inclines towards Nibbāna, slopes towards Nibbāna, flows towards Nibbāna, and extends all the way to Nibbāna.

May it be so.

We're going to have a little sit here to close this session. But before we do, I always think of this little reflection that Ian McCrory wrote in his book, The Moon Appears When the Water is Still. He said there were two monks walking together on a long journey. At some point, one of the monks said to the other, "I really like walking alone." And his companion responded, "I like walking with you too."

That's sort of what we're doing here. Each one of us is really walking your own path, your own practice, your own unfolding. It unfolds in its own way based on your own karma and your own life circumstances, causes, and conditions. It unfolds on its own. And at the same time, it's truly beautiful and special to walk that path with other people. We're kind of walking together here, and I really appreciate that we're all going through whatever is in front of our path. We're doing it together, and yet we're doing it alone.

This is the nature of this practice. It's the nature of Sangha that we are alone and together at the same time.

So let us begin this retreat. Our opening ceremony is sitting together, alone.

You can start by just getting a sense of the room itself. Even if you don't close your eyes, you can sense into the room and the people in the room. The sounds. The silence. Your ears have been hearing the same sounds and silence since we came into the room, but now we're turning our attention towards that also.

You can have a sense of just arriving here in the room. It's not a really big effort. You don't have to make the mind go anywhere. You can just let the ears do what they're already doing and hear the sounds that are arising here in the room, and the silence, and the ebb and flow of that—my voice coming in and out of that silence. You could actually sit here, just here. And as Brian was so beautifully reflecting, the sincerity of just being willing to hear the sounds is enough.

You could feel your body's posture sitting here. You could feel the weight of the body on the cushion or the chair. Weight from the underside of the legs or the back of the arms. Feel the hardness of the bones. It doesn't matter that it's soft tissue or flesh—you can still feel hardness, heaviness, pressure. You could feel the tingling sensations of movement that has been moving since you came into the room, but now you're inclining your attention towards it. You could sit here and just feel that movement.

Or you can let your attention rest on the breath and just feel the body sitting here breathing. No big effort. Not needing to go anywhere, do anything. It's really just these simple few moments of sitting here together with each other, and alone with your own breath, body, sounds.

Just have a sense that this is enough. For right now, this moment, this is enough.

CHAPTER 23

Skillful Supports for Mindfulness

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of the opening passage of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), unpacking how each word serves as a practical support for cultivating mindfulness. She begins with a reflection on the transformative potential of mindfulness—our ordinary human capacity to know what's happening while it's happening—when directed toward understanding experience itself rather than pursuing worldly agendas.

Fella examines several key terms from the sutta's foundational instruction. The Pāli word 'viharati' (abides) points to relaxation and a sense of coming home to present experience. 'Observing' suggests both directed attention and receptive awareness—a paradox she resolves through the image of a radio receiver that can be tuned to a channel and then simply receive what arises. The phrase 'body as a body' (and similarly for feelings, mind states, and phenomena) encourages experiencing sensation directly without conceptual overlay, fostering an impartial, allowing relationship with experience that she describes as inherently loving.

The teaching emphasizes 'ardency' (ātāpī) as wholehearted engagement balanced with ease—a light touch of effort applied moment by moment rather than straining toward continuous awareness. Drawing from her own journey with anger and years of practice in Burma with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Fella offers practical guidance for both newcomers and those with established momentum, including the liberating question: 'How little effort do I need to be mindful?'

In the Sutta, the Establishment of Mindfulness, are collected a number of instructions about how to practice mindfulness. And so that really is the topic this evening: the topic of mindfulness. In particular, I want to offer some of the supports for the cultivation of mindfulness that I have found really useful in my own practice. I'm going to do that through exploring some of the words of the Buddha and then talking about how they inform me, how they resonate for me, and how that has supported me in my practice.

So starting with mindfulness—I'll get to the Satipatthana Sutta in a bit. Mindfulness is a word that we're all so familiar with. It's used in our everyday culture a lot, and even the flavor of mindfulness from this Buddhist tradition has entered into the broader culture to some extent. And yet it's such a profound thing. It's an ordinary word, and in many ways it's based on a very ordinary capacity of our minds—this simple capacity that we have as human beings to know what's happening while it's happening, a kind of self-reflective capacity.

And yet that capacity, when cultivated in a particular way—and this is an important piece—can be aimed or directed towards many different ends. Imagine a thief in someone's house going around trying to be very careful not to disturb anyone, very quiet, knowing what they're doing, very aware of their movements, very aware of where they are. But the whole motivation for that is greed. The motivation is not "What does it feel like when I'm stepping? What does it feel like when I'm reaching?" This is the perspective the Buddha encouraged. And it was really a brilliant thing that he recognized the power of that.

Because it sounds like nothing. Know what's happening while it's happening. Be curious about experience as experience, as a human experience. What does it feel like? What is the experience of stepping while stepping? What is the experience of a breath while breathing? What is the experience of the arising of an emotion while it's happening? It sounds so nothing, but it is profound. It's a profoundly different way to orient to our present moment experience.

We usually orient—even when we know, when we are aware, even when we are engaged—with some agenda in mind, something we need to do or to get. We're kind of in the agenda rather than recognizing what this experience is actually like right here and right now.

Take the arising of a reactive emotion, for instance. Often, at least for me before I started practicing—always—when a reactive emotion arose, I was more interested in the relationship to something happening in the world rather than what was going on in my mind. We think of it more in terms of how we are in relationship to the world.

So that's how it was for me before I started practicing. When I noticed anger, I knew I was angry. If somebody had come up to me and said, "Do you know you're angry?" I would have looked at them like they were nuts. Of course I know I'm angry. But did I feel it? Did I actually know the experience of anger while I was angry? I did not. I was more interested in how miserable I was going to make the person I was angry at feel.

I have to say that when I got the instruction to notice my emotions, to notice what's happening in my experience when those reactive emotions arise—that was the very first meditation instruction I worked with. It was in daily life, and at that point anger was really ruling my life. I thought, well, let's look at anger, because anger is kind of ruining things for me right now. This practice of mindfulness says it will help me if I start to get to know these things, and this one is really driving me nuts, so let's look at that one.

The very first time I really noticed I was angry while I was angry, I was shocked, because it was so painful. I had never noticed that before. I had been so focused on thinking the other person was going to be miserable that I had not actually seen or felt that deeply painful experience of anger right in the moment.

So this is the shift of mindfulness. We understand, we know what's happening in the present moment as it's happening. There is a big difference between carrying an agenda or an idea or a belief along with what we know in the present moment and simply knowing: this is what's happening in the present moment.

associate with mindfulness—presence, awareness, witnessing, observing, being with. But again, the importance lies in observing the experience as experience in the present moment. And that's actually very close to something the Buddha said in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Knowing what's happening while it's happening, we could say, is a kind of working definition for mindfulness.

It's kind of mysterious, actually. We think we know what it is, but do we really know what mindfulness is? We get familiar with the observing side, but what is awareness? What is mindfulness itself? We'll probably talk more about that as we go.

The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the Buddhist teachings on wise mindfulness, exists within the context of the Eightfold Path. Wise view is at the head of the Eightfold Path—a perspective. And I've been kind of talking around a perspective that will support our path. The classic perspective of wise view is that we need to understand suffering. In my own experience, that exploration carries us through the whole path. Because as we really understand suffering, the mind begins to let go of the causes of suffering—the second noble truth. And as it lets go of the causes of suffering, we experience the release from suffering—the third noble truth. And this whole journey of understanding suffering, experiencing the letting go, and realizing the release is the cultivation of the path—the fourth noble truth.

This perspective of wise view is what supports mindfulness to be skillful. Understanding suffering—that description I gave of knowing anger as anger arising in the present moment. Now, anger is a kind of obvious form of suffering. The word suffering in the Buddhist teaching is more nuanced than just our obvious suffering. But in this case, anger was a pretty obvious form of suffering. When I really felt it, it was clearly suffering. And as I worked with that over years, I began to really understand it—understand what happened, how it arose, what the conditions were for its arising. I saw at times the mind let go of it completely and felt the release from that suffering. My journey around witnessing suffering helped me to understand that that's really a lot of where the practice is. We understand our suffering, and through that understanding, the mind will release the dukkha, the suffering. Wisdom will release the suffering. It's not something we do.

The cultivation of the conditions, the path of practice, creates the conditions for the understanding to arise. And suffering will release. We will experience the letting go. We will experience the freedom. And all of that is the cultivation of the path.

The instruction that I got—the very first instruction that I got, which was no more than "just see if you can know those hard emotions arising while they're arising"—that kind of encapsulated the instruction of wise view. Because the encouragement there was to understand the suffering of those challenging emotions. The way we encourage you to practice sometimes sounds like we're talking about technique, but it embeds the wisdom. The very way we talk about attending to experience is infused with the wisdom of the Buddha.

The Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta has language in it that carries this wisdom. It offers teachings on the establishment of mindfulness. How do we establish mindfulness? The establishment of it is one important piece to recognize. One way to think about the establishment of mindfulness is that it becomes established in our minds. It's not just coming and going—the establishment of mindfulness is when the mindfulness begins to gain continuity and momentum. That's where we explore in our practice.

For those of you who've been here for six weeks already, there's probably quite a bit of momentum of mindfulness. Some of what I say tonight, I can point to the recognition of that momentum as a skillful way to begin, as a skillful way to navigate this establishment of mindfulness. Recognizing when it's easy. Sometimes we over-effort. Sometimes when the mindfulness gets established, we're trying too hard.

At one point, I went in to talk to Joseph and told him how I was practicing, and he said, "You know, when the light is already on in the room, you don't have to keep trying to turn on the light switch. Let go of that."

I am going to be talking about the establishment of mindfulness for those of you who are here just in the first days.

And yet there's some aspect of what I'll say too that's relevant to those of you who've been cultivating mindfulness for these weeks, beginning to feel that momentum of the mindfulness.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha points to areas of experience. When we look at this sutta, these four areas of experience really encompass the entirety of our human experience. Actually, when I look at any single instruction in the Satipatthana Sutta, I can see that any experience can be found in any one of those instructions. It's kind of like a hologram. If something is arising and you're exploring it through one particular aspect of the Satipatthana, you can find your experience in every single instruction. So we don't have to think about it as being that we do this kind of practice and then we do that kind of practice. There's a lot of interweaving and intertwining of the instructions in the Satipatthana Sutta.

The four areas, however, are the body—the physical body. Feeling tone—the experience of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Mind states—the recognition of what's arising in our minds, and in particular, the Satipatthana Sutta encourages us to notice the presence or absence of greed, aversion, and delusion, and the presence or absence of concentration. So right there in that instruction, in any moment of experience, whatever's happening, if you're looking at that foundation, there will either be the presence or absence of greed. There will either be the presence or absence of delusion. Concentration will be present or not. And the instructions are: know when there's aversion arising in the mind; know when there's not aversion arising in the mind. It's quite simple. All of the instructions have this flavor of a simple pointing to something of our experience.

The fourth foundation is a foundation of Dhamma. This foundation is a little more complex to describe, so I'll just give a high-level perspective on it. In this foundation, there's the encouragement to notice experience through the perspective of several of the Buddhist teachings. We're encouraged to notice experience through the perspective of the six sense spheres, through the perspective of the hindrances—which we'll talk about over the coming evenings—through the perspective of the five aggregates, and through the perspective of the seven factors of awakening. Again, the instructions are quite simple. For the seven factors of awakening, with mindfulness being one of them, the instruction is to notice when the enlightenment factor of mindfulness is present and when it is not present. It will always be one of those two things. So there's a very wide inclusivity in the instructions of the Satipatthana Sutta.

These four areas encompass all aspects of our experience. The entirety of the Satipatthana is an encouragement to get to know all of it—all of our human experience. No part left out. Including the reactivity, including the joy, including confusion. All of it.

We start here, especially for those beginning, with an establishment of the body as a foundation. This is quite helpful. As we begin to explore the body, we'll begin to see the difference between the body and all of these other areas. We begin to distinguish body from mind. We begin to recognize that some things we think of as happening in our body are actually going on in our minds. So we begin to really attune to what is the actual experience of the body, and that begins to highlight: well, what's the difference between our bodies and our minds? What's happening in our minds? We begin to see the conditioned relationship between body and mind.

Early in the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha has four sentences that briefly describe what Satipatthana is—how we establish mindfulness, in four brief sentences. There's one sentence for each of the four foundations, and they have a similar flavor, with each of the four categories put into the sentence in one place.

The sentence is—and I'll read it four times, once for each of the four establishments: How does one establish mindfulness? One abides observing the body as a body, ardent, fully aware and mindful, setting aside desires and discontent for the world. One abides observing feeling as feeling, ardent, fully aware and mindful, setting aside desire and discontent for the world. One abides observing mind states as mind states, ardent, fully aware and mindful, setting aside desires and discontent for the world. For the fourth foundation, I'm going to translate the word Dhamma, because Dhamma has different usages. Small-d dhamma, which is how it's used here, basically means phenomena. One abides observing phenomena as phenomena, ardent, fully aware and mindful, setting aside desire and discontent for the world.

Each word in this phrase is a pointing to a quality that supports the cultivation of mindfulness. He's offering, in this sentence: this is what we have to do.

And so I've spent quite a bit of time with these words. That's what I'm going to reflect on with you tonight—these words and how they inform my practice.

I think the first word in the sentence is one of my favorites: abides. Even just that word creates a sense of relaxation for me. Abide. The feeling of the word creates almost a dropping and a relaxation. The word itself is translating the Pali viharati, which literally means living, a place to live, or an abode. It's the same root as the Brahma Viharas, the divine abodes. And so there's this sense of abiding at home, a sense of coming home. And really, this is what it feels like as mindfulness becomes established—there's a deep sense of coming home.

So there's this intimacy, this being with experience. Thinking about being at home, that's where we can be most intimate, most ourselves, perhaps. There's this sense of relaxation again. For some of you, this imagery of home may have different connotations.

But I believe the word here is intending to point to relaxation, receptivity, resting, contentment. I feel like this word itself—abide—sometimes I can just use that word, abide, and I feel a kind of settling. Yeah, abide. Just be with this. Abide.

I once asked a group of people—it was a conversational teaching I was offering—what does the word abide mean? How does it resonate for you? Some of what I've just shared was what came up. And somebody said, "The Dude abides," from The Big Lebowski. I hadn't seen the movie, but it made me laugh. And I think, in a way, that was the same kind of encouragement. Yeah, the Dude abides. You can bring some humor into the word.

So for me, this really points to the quality of relaxation. And relaxation was not what I thought mindfulness and meditation were about when I first started. I really thought it was about going for it, striving. And the whole container of meditation—that it's really fundamentally based in relaxation—was kind of not on my radar. But it is so important.

When the body relaxes, it can be useful to check in at the beginning of a sitting. How is the body? Is there tension? And if there is tension, you could take a few moments to relax, perhaps do a body scan, just relax the body. I found this useful in the middle of long retreats at times. Weeks into a retreat in Burma, I sat down one day and it was like, wow, this body is so tense. And I spent the entire meditation period just exploring relaxation. By the end of that period, I was so grateful for that teaching. I was practicing with Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma, and he really emphasizes this quality of relaxation as a foundation for our practice.

As we explore relaxation of body—which is possible to do consciously—the consequence is that the mind starts to relax. Body and mind influence each other. And when the mind relaxes, it quite naturally is aware. It knows what's happening in the present moment. When the mind is relaxed, when it's not caught up in thoughts of the past or the future, that's what relaxation of mind is. It's just this arriving. And so relaxation is so important.

Sometimes that word abide can invite that relaxation. Abide. What does it feel like? Whatever your anchor is, whatever your primary home base of practice is—whether it's breath or body, hearing—abide with that. Can you be with the breath with relaxation? Can you be with the body with relaxation? In fact, relaxation supports our ability to be with the breath and the body.

I will often start a walking practice by just finding a pace that feels really relaxed. It may be sometimes faster, sometimes slower. But allowing the relaxation in walking to support the mind's ability to be present. So that's a wonderful way to begin walking practice—just walking back and forth until you find that pace of ease and relaxation. And then, when there is some measure of relaxation, turning towards the movement, wherever you're noticing it.

So "one abides observing." This word observing has the flavor of looking closely at, meeting, seeing carefully, experiencing carefully. This pairing of relaxation with observation—of abide and observe—to me, it's almost a paradox of the practice that we can be interested, closely attentive, and very relaxed.

This brings in the notion of receptivity. The two together: abide, observing. Those two words together. Observe feels like a going out and digging and looking at and finding. Abide feels more like settling back. So how do they come together? What does it mean, this sense of abide and observe? This is the investigation I've explored.

Mindfulness can just know. The quality of mindfulness is the quality that knows what's happening in the present moment while it's happening. Attention is another function of our minds. It's the function that picks something out of experience to know. I used to think if I wasn't choosing what the object was, if I wasn't choosing the experience, if I wasn't directing the attention, that I couldn't possibly be being mindful. So I was equating mindfulness and attention, thinking they were the same thing.

But just a little mental reflection can point out to us that they're not the same thing. If you're walking around completely lost in thought, not mindful at all—and I know you've all experienced this, where you kind of wake up and it's like, "Wow, I did not know my last five minutes of walking"—and yet you were still walking. Possibly you were still going on your path, stopping and turning around and stopping and turning. Something was experiencing sight and sound. Mindfulness not present. But the functions of mind that perceive and recognize and attend to experience were happening.

So attention is one of those functions that's happening in every single moment. The mind is attending to something whether or not we are mindful of it. And I think we can see that through recognizing when mindfulness is not there. The return of mindfulness is like, "Yep, well, I had that experience at one point." I found myself driving somewhere and knew I needed to turn and then lost mindfulness completely, and found myself about two streets further than my turn, stopped at a red light, waking up into mindfulness, having had zero recollection of the last two blocks. I could remember what my thoughts were. I knew what I'd been thinking about, but zero recollection. It's like, "Wow, thank you, attention, for stopping at that red light. I did not know that red light was there." So something was paying attention. Mindfulness was not there.

This factor of attention is amenable to our choice, our conscious control, and this is very much how we practice here. We shape our practice through choosing, at times, our object, our anchor object. We attend to the experience, and then we allow mindfulness to kind of ride with that experience. So there's a choice that we can make to attend to experience.

But if we don't choose that, there's a kind of more receptive quality to awareness, to mindfulness, that we can recognize at times when we're not choosing what to pay attention to. And there are whole practices based on this form of receptive awareness—just noticing that you're aware and what is obvious, not choosing to direct the attention.

So those are two different approaches to using attention in meditation. We can use attention to direct the mind and then allow mindfulness to come to that. Or we can step back, and then it's kind of like following where the attention goes, because attention is just a conditioned phenomenon. It will attend to something based on our history, our conditions.

It'll attend to something based on just the simplicity of our sense bases. You might notice sometime when you're walking and paying attention to the walking path, noticing the movement, that maybe a bird flies by. And instantly, without your even doing it, you are looking at the bird. That's the shift of attention in dependence on conditions, because movement is something that will draw our attention. It's not a failure. It's natural for this to happen.

And so sometimes we can recognize that. In these instructions that we're offering, we haven't quite gotten to what happens when the attention shifts. But this happens in meditation. This is a lot of what we explore. We are attending to the breath or the body, aware with that, and suddenly a sound happens. Without our choosing it, attention goes to the sound. And we're instructed to recognize hearing, to note and recognize that hearing is happening—to acknowledge that that is where the attention shifted. Not to have a contentious relationship with it, but to just recognize the shift of attention. And then with this practice, we say, "Okay, yep, that is happening, and can I incline? Can I prefer to be with the breath? Can I prefer to be with my primary object?" So then we use our capacity to direct the attention back to the breath.

But this process of the attention shifting—it doesn't mean that you failed in any way. It's just conditioned. You're seeing attention at work. You're seeing the conditioned nature of attention happening there when you see that the attention has shifted from the breath to something else.

And so this quality of receptivity—we can settle back and be curious about what is being received. What is the attention connecting to? That's a receptive quality. There's the side of directing the attention, and then receiving what the attention is already paying attention to.

To me, this phrase abides observing can bring these two together. We may be aiming our attention, curious, directing the attention to the breath, for instance. But then rather than continuing to look and find and ask "What is that?"—that's one way we can explore—there's this other way: "Okay, there's the breath. And what is the breath like? What is obvious about the breath? How is the breath being received?"

We can think of the receptivity of our mindfulness through an analogy like a radio receiver. The radio is available to receive all of the radio waves, and we have this tuning device so we can tune to a specific channel. When we've tuned to that channel, we can kind of sit back and just take in what that channel has to offer—classical music, perhaps. The receiver is just receiving there. It's like there's a narrowing of the bandwidth, but then it's just received with that narrowed bandwidth.

Quite similarly with aiming the attention: aim the attention to the breath, but then step back and see how the breath is showing up. Narrow the attention to the field of hearing and then receive—how is hearing showing up? Narrow the attention to the field of the body—what's obvious in the body? You don't have to always be looking.

So this blend of aim and receive. Aim and receive. What would that mean with the breath right now? A sense of relaxation with the breath, and abide observing the breath—relaxed receiving of the breath.

The next phrase begins to bring in wisdom, the perspective of satipaṭṭhāna. I think of these first two, abides observing, as kind of supports for sati, supports for mindfulness. This phrase: "One abides observing the body as a body. One abides observing feelings as feelings. One abides observing mind states as mind states."

One abides observing phenomena as phenomena. Phenomena in and of itself. Body in and of itself. Breath in and of itself.

In this phrase, the repetition of "body"—observes the body as a body—encourages an impartial perspective on the body, a less attached perspective. Just as a body. Body is what we explore; body sensations. "As a body" is how we explore it.

So what is the actual experience of body? In our normal everyday lives, we often feel like there's this outline of body—yes, there's my foot and my hand and my shoulder. But what is the actual experience? Foot, hand, shoulder—those are actually concepts.

Put your attention in your hand for a moment. What's the actual experience of hand? Tingling? Pulsing? Vibration? Heat? Stiffness?

This is the body as a body. The actual sensation level of the body. How our body communicates with us through these sensations. What is the actual experience of the body?

And what's the actual experience of the breath? Again, that receptivity of receiving can help us to feel the actual experience. Feel the rising pressure and expansion. Feel the collapse of the lungs. Maybe some tingling in the nostrils or throat. What is the actual experience? This is the body as a body.

We get to know body as human experience. It begins to take the "me," the sense of "I am," out of the experience. Just recognizing the body doing what body does. Sensing. Feeling. This encourages a kind of non-interfering awareness of experience. This is really where the instruction lives: notice experience as experience. Be interested in what it is like to be stepping. What it is like to be reaching. Not the motivation behind doing it, but just that experience. Noticing experience as experience.

This brings in another word that's very resonant for me—one I think is implied in this phrase, this wisdom perspective of non-interfering attention to just know the body as a body. And that's allowing. The perspective or attitude in the mind that allows us to see the body as a body is by allowing the body to be the body. Not needing it to be any different. Just allowing.

There's a flavor in this. Even though it's phrased as wisdom—know the body as a body—the experience of this feels very intimate. Very heartfelt. Very kind. The experience of this instruction, "know the body as a body," has love in it. Even though it's not explicit, the experience of exploring in this way brings that flavor.

The quality of allowing experience to be as it is is love. Just imagine if you have a friend sitting with you, and you're having your worst day, and your friend says, "I'm here with you. You be you right now. I'm just going to be here with you, and it's okay—you can be as messy as you like."

Most of us would feel that as love, as care. And that's what we can do for ourselves. We can let ourselves be messy and hold it.

It takes a little bit of a bigger container, in a way. We're not always going to feel like we can allow experience. We're going to be reactive to what's arising. This unpleasant experience is happening, yes, and there's aversion to that unpleasant experience. And that aversion can be also held. So maybe we can't allow the unpleasant experience, but can we allow the aversion? Can we allow the not allowing?

There's always room to expand the container and allow whatever feels like it can't be allowed. Like, yep, that too. That can be allowed. That can be allowed.

I'm not going to get through the entire phrase tonight, but I will end with the word ardent, because this one too brings in an important quality, and Brian spoke to it the other night. He even used this word. Atapi is the word in the Pali, and it's often translated as ardent. But some other words that resonate with this are engaged, wholehearted, sincere, heartfelt, interest, connection to experience. This is a kind of wholehearted engagement that encourages a continuity, a gentle persistence, a gentle commitment to practice, balanced and sustained effort.

This ardency has to be paired with "abides." Relaxation and ardency, this sense of engagement, relaxation and alertness—these are not opposites. They can coexist quite nicely. But it's a little different sometimes. When we're really engaged, there's tension that creeps in habitually. It's our natural habit to pick things up and be tight around them. So there's some learning around this process: what does it mean to be engaged, to practice with a continuity and commitment to moment-to-moment awareness, and not be tight? How to be relaxed with that?

The light touch of effort is really the key here. I invite you right now to notice your breath, however you're noticing it. Just this moment. And that moment when I mentioned that, could you feel it? That is enough effort. So that breath. And then the next moment. Okay, and how about now? Can you feel the next part of the breath? Just enough effort to meet this. To meet half a breath. That's enough. And then you do it again. Light, light, light touch, over and over again.

Now, we pick up the idea of "over and over again" and get tight around that, but that's just an idea. The amount of actual effort that's needed in a moment is really light. If you're holding onto a helium balloon with a string, you need a little bit of remembering to keep the pressure between the fingers to hold that string. But it's not a lot of pressure. You don't need to clench your fist around that string to keep track of the helium balloon. You just have to remember that light connection. That's enough. Just remember.

And you'll forget. It's okay. You'll forget. You don't have to beat yourself up when you forget—not if you forget, because you will. And then when you remember—and you will remember too, that's the great thing about mindfulness, you will remember—when you remember, right there, mindfulness is receiving something already. What is that?

And then reconnecting with your primary object. Light touch, over and over again.

This is useful in walking meditation too. Where he was talking this morning about each step—one thing I found useful in walking practice at times when my mind was really scattered: I would find something on the ground, like half a step out or two steps out. "Oh, that leaf. Can I be mindful till I get there? Yep. Okay. How about that patch on the ground? Can I get there?" Not trying to do the whole path at once, because that created too much tension in my mind. Just enough, just enough effort to take this step, to get to that little patch. Okay, then I can let go and do it again. Just that light touch of effort, over and over again.

That has been so important in my practice. Just remembering the light touch, and noticing when I was too tight, letting go. Sometimes I would ask the question: How little effort do I need in order to be mindful? Because especially those of you who've been here for a long time, you may be in that camp where you've got enough momentum to really just ride the wave of momentum. Let go of the effort, and begin to recognize when the mindfulness gets a little wobbly. Then connect again with that light touch of effort.

Sometimes that question—how little effort do I need to be mindful?—I could back off so far, so much further than I thought.

So I'll repeat the whole phrase now. And just for yourself, whatever is apparent for you—the sound of my voice, body sensation—one abides observing experience as experience, ardent, fully aware and mindful, setting aside desire and discontent for the world.

Thank you for your practice.

CHAPTER 24

Supports for Continuity

Andrea Fella · 58 min

> In this talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of what supports the continuity of mindfulness—the very essence of satipaṭṭhāna practice. She begins by emphasizing that moment-to-moment mindfulness is itself a form of concentration, and that this continuity reveals the three characteristics: impermanence, dukkha, and not-self nature of experience.
> Andrea introduces the evocative analogy of a child's scooter to illustrate the light touch of effort needed in practice—gentle taps rather than forceful pushing, allowing momentum to build naturally. She then offers a profound investigation into the comings and goings of mindfulness itself. Rather than simply trying harder when awareness is lost, she encourages practitioners to get curious about where mindfulness goes and how it returns. The moment mindfulness returns unprompted is revealed as a precious opportunity—evidence of not-self, a taste of effortless awareness, and a chance to learn what being mindful actually feels like.
> The talk includes practical guidance on identifying patterns of where we lose mindfulness—whether in particular locations, activities, body sensations, or habitual mental states like anger or self-hatred. Andrea shares personal examples of how curiosity about these edges of awareness led to deeper understanding and expanded continuity. She concludes by noting that even as practice deepens, new transitions may temporarily increase mind-wandering, inviting practitioners to meet these moments with patience and investigation rather than judgment.

As we've been talking about satipatthana, the establishing of mindfulness, a big part of what it means to establish mindfulness is for the mindfulness to gain some momentum. There is moment-to-moment mindfulness, and this is supported by cultivating a continuity of mindfulness.

Many of my teachers have said, and Sayadaw U Tejaniya in particular says, you practice from the moment you get up to the moment you go to bed. Practicing, establishing mindfulness with everything that we do. In the sitting, in the walking, of course, but also in what Greg used this term for this morning—the in-between, the in-betweenings. All of those moments between formal sitting and walking. As we get interested in and explore the possibility of the mindfulness carrying through those times as well, this really deepens the power of our mindfulness.

Now of course we're not going to be able to be mindful all day long, but it is a worthy aspiration, and worthy to practice with what can support this continuity of mindfulness. Continuity of mindfulness is the establishment of mindfulness. But also I understand that when mindfulness is happening moment to moment, this is a form of concentration. Ryan spoke about momentary, moment-to-moment concentration. And so really we could say that the definition of concentration is mindfulness arising in each moment, and the mind not pulled out into distraction, not pulled out into losing mindfulness, essentially.

Sometimes we cultivate that moment-to-moment mindfulness on a single object, like the breath, where we're bringing a focus of attention to one object. It becomes the more one-pointed concentration. But still, really, the definition of concentration there is the continuity of mindfulness. The thing that makes that concentration is the continuity of mindfulness.

And then there's this flavor of it that's stable on one object. There's this other flavor of it that is the stability of the awareness—an awareness that is not disturbed by whatever arises, an awareness that can meet whatever's arising without getting pulled into it, wanting to push it away, or getting confused about it. This kind of moment-to-moment concentration really begins to reveal how our minds work.

We see the impermanent nature of experience. We see the dukkha nature of experience at times. We experience the suffering of what our minds do. This, by the way, is not a mistake. When we are mindful, we see how those habits and patterns of mind operate. When we can know them—as I said in my first talk, when I saw anger as anger, just really seeing it, I felt the suffering of it. That was a little bit of a shock, to actually recognize, oh, this hurts here.

The mindfulness, cultivated moment to moment, begins to help us see the nature of our experience as impermanent, as unreliable for a place to land for lasting happiness—its dukkha nature—and its not-self nature, its conditioned nature, that things are all process, just a tumbling on of process. The seeing of that has the effect of helping the mind to let go of the ways that we cling.

The ways that we cling are typically because we attribute permanence to things, we attribute reliability to things, we attribute a sense of "I can control things," a sense of self to things. Things are mine, things are me, who I am. Those misperceptions create or participate in why we suffer. When we can see the nature of our experience through this moment-to-moment concentration, the mind begins to let go of those patterns and habits. We don't have to do the letting go. The letting go comes with the understanding. And so the power of our practice is really revealed to us with the continuity of mindfulness.

That's what I'd like to explore this evening: some supports for continuity, the moment-to-moment kind of continuity. My teacher, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, has said if we really understood the value of the practice, we would not stop practicing. So appreciating or remembering, at times even perhaps reflecting on the value of practice, can be a support for our engagement with practice. And really that's what continuity is—this engagement.

You all know the value of practice. None of you, I think, would have signed up for a retreat of this length if you did not have some sense of the value of being here for this long. And we forget. Sometimes, especially on a long retreat—it's funny. Here we are doing this thing that we've thought about for so long. We've planned and set aside our time, and it takes a lot. It takes a lot to get here. And then we get here, and over the weeks—maybe more for those of you who've been here for seven weeks already, but maybe also starting now for some of you who've been here for a week, just over a week—it may start to feel like, well, this is just what we do. We get up, we go to the hall, we sit, we walk, we eat, we sit, we walk.

It becomes like going to work. We do our job. And we forget to remember how helpful it is.

So if you find yourself almost treating the practice like a job, take a few moments—maybe at the beginning of the day or at the end of the day—to remember how the practice has served you. Connect with the aspiration and intention that brought you here. If you find at times there's a waning of energy towards the practice, remembering how it has supported you can be very helpful.

The Dalai Lama has pointed to this kind of reflection and encourages it not over short periods of time. How have you benefited from the practice—not necessarily today or yesterday, but over the arc of your practice? Look at your life.

When I think about my mind before I started practicing, I'm so glad I met the practice. My life is completely, completely transformed. And I can forget the value at times. But when I remember that, it's like, yes. I remember those moments where I saw something and thought, wow, this works. This is helpful. Or even just noticing over time the weakening of habits and patterns. Sometimes we don't see something vanish in a moment, but we notice over time: I'm not reacting to those things as much as I used to. And we know that it is connected to our engagement with the practice.

So if you find your mind going, "Why am I doing this?"—see if you can remember that value, what you've actually experienced as value. I'm quite sure that all of you wouldn't be here without knowing something from your own direct experience of the value of practice. This can support the mind's willingness to engage. It's a form of confidence or faith in the practice.

In terms of exploring continuity of mindfulness, we often think about making effort, reminding ourselves, connecting again and again with the practice. This is one of the key ways that we engage—that light touch of effort to remember, to be connected. Just enough, as we talked about earlier in the retreat, just enough to meet this moment, and then do it again and again.

There's an analogy I find evocative for this light touch of practice, the light touch of effort. Often, in terms of engaging with effort, we come into a sitting or go out for a walking and we think, "Okay, I'm going to be mindful for the whole thing." We try to pick up all the effort to do the forty-five-minute sitting in the first few moments. "I'm going to do this." But it doesn't work that way. It really is just these small moments—moment to moment to moment.

So the analogy is this: children have these little scooters they ride on, not the motorized ones, but the ones that are just a little platform. I think they're called razor scooters. They're just a little platform and you put one foot on it, holding onto the handles. To get going, you put your foot down and you tap—tap the ground. After a while, finding your balance on those two wheels requires that gentle tapping. If you put your foot down and tried to push really hard to get fast momentum going, it would be a pretty wobbly ride. But the gentle tap, tap, tap—you can find your balance and get a little momentum.

A light tap. Touch, touch, touch. And then you start getting momentum and can ride for a little while. You bring your foot up and don't have to tap for a bit. Then you start feeling it get a little wobbly, and you know you need to put your foot down again to tap and get a little momentum. Maybe that time you just need one tap and then ride again because there's still some momentum—it's just a little wobbly.

This is very similar to how the light touch of effort works in our practice. We don't try to pick up the whole sitting at the beginning. Just enough for an in-breath. Just enough for an out-breath. Just enough for a step or two. Just enough to meet this. Just this moment. And then do it again. And do it again. A light touch. A light tapping.

The idea of "I have to do this for 45 minutes"—that's just an idea. The actual effort involved is very light. So you might notice if the mind picks up the thought "I have to keep doing this, keep doing this." It's just an idea. It's true we have to keep doing it, but the feeling of that idea and our relationship to it doesn't necessarily have to connect with the actual light touch of just this moment. Just this moment. Just this moment. Just that tap, tap, tap.

And then we start to feel the momentum of mindfulness. We start to get familiar with that quality, and we learn that perhaps we can connect with a light touch for half a breath and then find ourselves riding that for two or three breaths without needing to reconnect or prompt remembering. We begin to get the feeling of the momentum of mindfulness.

When does it become useful to connect again, to re-engage, to meet with a little intention—that intention to remember the mindfulness? A light touch of effort is so helpful, along with recognizing that momentum. We begin to get familiar with the experience of mindfulness, with what it means to be mindful. There's a feeling of being mindful.

And when there is that momentum—just as with the scooter, when there's good speed going, if you put your foot down, you're actually going to get in the way. Similarly, when there's that sense of momentum and we start checking, "Am I connected? Am I aware?"—that's actually interrupting the natural momentum of mindfulness. That's what Joseph meant when he said you don't have to try to turn the light on when it's already on. You get familiar with that sense of what it's like to be mindful.

This familiarity with what it's like to be mindful—for me this has been one of the key ways that the momentum of mindfulness has developed. I've been interested in engaging with this momentum, or the continuity of mindfulness, by getting curious about the experience of mindfulness when it's there—what it's like when it's there—and the goings, when it's not there.

Mindfulness is a quality of mind, a conditioned arising that is sometimes arising in the mind and sometimes not arising in the mind. We could call it a mental formation, a mental activity. Like concentration is a mental activity. Ease or peace or anger or confusion—all of these are mental activities. Mindfulness is one of them, one of these mental activities. And like confusion or anger or peace or ease, mindfulness is sometimes present and sometimes not present.

Getting curious about the comings and goings of mindfulness is really a kind of investigation. This investigation or curiosity about the disappearance of mindfulness and its reappearance has been a way in my own practice that mindfulness has expanded into new areas—more continuity resulting from this kind of exploration.

As opposed to thinking, when I notice that mindfulness goes, "I need to just try harder," what I did instead was get curious. What happens when mindfulness goes? Where's it going? How is it going? What's going on there? An interest to learn about those areas where there are these fallings-off of mindfulness. A curiosity to explore that. This has been a very powerful part of my practice and has greatly expanded the continuity of mindfulness.

So I want to talk about this in some depth. How do we explore the comings and goings of mindfulness, like we might explore the comings and goings of any mind state?

I've had people say to me sometimes that it feels like mindfulness is either there or it's not there. They can see when it comes back, but they can't see when it goes away. And it is definitely easier to see when mindfulness returns. But it is also possible, as I was describing with the scooter, to get familiar with the quality of being present, that sense of the momentum of mindfulness. We start to get a sense of when it's getting a little weak, beginning to drift.

I'll start with the exploration of recognizing mindfulness returning, because that is probably the easiest place to begin to get familiar with the experience of mindfulness—what it's like when mindfulness returns. When mindfulness returns, often we have what we call, "Oh, my mind wandered."

And, you know, when we wake up, we might say we're waking up, and in that moment, often our relationship to what's happening is, "I wasn't mindful." There's frequently a relationship to that of self-denigration: "I'm not doing it right, I can't do it right."

But in that moment—when you notice that you weren't mindful—what's actually happening is that you are aware in the moment. You are mindful in the moment that mindfulness is returning. That's what has occurred. You've become aware that mindfulness has returned. But then what we tend to do with it is overlay the idea that, "Oh, I'm supposed to be able to keep the mindfulness continuous, and I wasn't doing that, so I failed somehow."

So that moment when we notice that we're back—that moment is a great moment. There are several things that are great about it. First of all, mindfulness is back, so we've got the possibility of cultivating mindfulness again. It's also a moment of mindfulness that you didn't have to do. It was free. You made no effort for that one.

If we can be curious about the moment of mindfulness returning... At one point on a retreat here, that curiosity arose: can I see the moment of mindfulness returning? Now, this isn't something I actually recommend trying to see, because it's much more that it's seen—that mindfulness, you know, we can know that. But there can be a curiosity about it: can I know that without judging it? Can I just know the arising of mindfulness? And what is it arising with?

Because usually it's arising with something potentially connected to what the mind was doing moments before. It's arising with a thought, or it's arising with an emotion, or it's arising with a sound—it's arising with some experience. So what is the experience? Mindfulness returns and there's some experience that mindfulness is knowing in that moment. But very quickly we think, "Oh, I'm supposed to be with the breath," or whatever, "and I wasn't mindful a moment before, so that's a problem." And so we miss that moment. We miss that experience of mindfulness returning.

In that moment when mindfulness returns, when we're not judging it, there's an interesting kind of distinction or recognition that's possible. When mindfulness returns, there is the awareness in this moment of what it's returning with, and there's also a lingering memory of what was happening before. Consciousness, feeling, perception—all continuing while we're not mindful. And so when mindfulness returns, we can know something about what was happening before.

There's often a little bit of a sense of a quality of difference there in that moment when mindfulness returns. Not always, but sometimes there is a sense of, "Oh, this is what it's like to be mindful." And there's a lingering memory of what it was like a moment before, or a few moments before, when the mind was caught or tied up or not clearly knowing in the present moment.

So there's a learning, a kind of learning of the distinction. What does it feel like for that mindfulness to return? What is that experience of mindfulness returning? Getting familiar with that.

There were some periods of time where I got so interested in this—what's it like for mindfulness to return?—that I kind of just let the mind wander, almost. It didn't matter how many times the mind wandered in the sitting. If it wandered two hundred times in the sitting, that was two hundred opportunities for me to see what it was like when mindfulness returned. Getting familiar with that. Getting familiar with that moment.

Usually we cultivate mindfulness by prompting mindfulness. When mindfulness is present, we can remember to tap. We can remember to continue to practice with being mindful. And that's called prompted mindfulness. But this moment of mindfulness arising—it's conditioned, it is arising in dependence on conditions, but it's not anything that we are doing. It is arising without our participation. That is called unprompted mindfulness.

Another way we can cultivate mindfulness is by beginning to recognize the arising of unprompted mindfulness. Through the recognition of that arising moment, we are getting familiar with the experience of being mindful.

And as with any wholesome quality, when we notice it with mindfulness, it creates the conditions for that wholesome quality to arise more frequently. When we notice and bring attention to unwholesome qualities—anger, aversion, delusion—when we notice those, it creates the conditions for them to appear less often in the mind.

So this recognition of the experience of mindfulness returning seems to create the conditions for us to notice that happening more often. This is true here on retreat and also in daily life. If we're curious about noticing the moment of mindfulness returning, this is a great practice for the in-between times too.

We can cultivate a continuity. The prompting of mindfulness in the in-between times—we can prompt and encourage mindfulness using noting. A light touch of noting can help us stay prompting the mindfulness moment to moment. Stepping, stepping, reaching, touching, seeing, hearing. But it will get lost. Mindfulness will go away at times. And so the moments when mindfulness returns in the in-between times can be a great exploration. What is it? Mindfulness is arising. It's arising now. What is it arising with?

When you notice mindfulness returning, first of all, celebrate. Mindfulness is back. Notice the effortless quality of that. It gives a sense of what it means to be mindful without working very hard—that moment. It's a pointer to very easeful mindfulness, that moment of mindfulness returning, if we're not judging ourselves around it. It's also direct evidence for the not-self nature of our minds. Because who did that? Who made mindfulness come back? It happened. It was conditions, process, not self.

So notice that you're aware, mindful in the moment, and notice what is obvious in that moment. Then, once you're back, you can start prompting the mindfulness again in whatever way is useful for you—connecting with your anchor, the breath, body, hearing. Those of you who have been here longer, perhaps already with open awareness, just noticing: mindfulness returns. And then in the return of mindfulness there can be an engagement, a reconnection, the prompting of mindfulness again.

Then there's the curiosity about where mindfulness goes—the goings of mindfulness, the times our minds begin to wander. I find curiosity to be a great support for continuity of mindfulness and for this investigation. So rather than using the prompting of mindfulness, at times I will just get really curious about what the mind is doing. When is it starting to get disconnected from experience?

Often we notice certain patterns. One thing I'll suggest is just be curious about where and how you tend to lose mindfulness. You're here for long enough to really get familiar with some of these patterns. Maybe you notice you lose mindfulness when you go into your room, or when you go for a walk on the loop, or when you go to your yogi job. You might begin to notice some patterns of where mindfulness gets lost.

So noticing where you lose mindfulness, getting curious about how the mind tends to get lost, you can then begin to get curious about what happens there. Now you could say, "Okay, I get lost in my yogi job, or I get lost when I go into my room. Let me just note my way into the room"—almost brute force, just keeping the mind there. That's a way of using prompting to help us in those places where mindfulness tends to get lost, with a light touch just continuing.

For me, at least, I found it to be more fruitful in terms of learning, rather than doing that more forceful prompting of mindfulness in those zones where my mindfulness gets lost, to explore what's actually happening. Here's an example. I noticed for a while that my mindfulness got lost when I went into the restroom.

And I noticed my mindfulness would often return when I was washing my hands, finding myself gazing at myself in the mirror. That would be when I would wake up—gazing at myself in the mirror—and realize I had not noticed all of the activity in the restroom. I didn't notice that. And I didn't notice the intention to look in the mirror.

So I just began to get curious. What happens there? What is it? What goes on? As I was heading to the restroom, I'd think, "Let's see, what goes on? What is it the mind does there that it gets lost?"

In that case, I noticed that at one point I was very present with most of what was happening in the restroom. I was washing my hands, very aware of washing my hands. And then I noticed I was looking up. I caught the looking up a little bit. There was a moment of just habit engaging—the habit of looking at myself in the mirror. I didn't see that intention. I didn't see that impulse to look up. I was just automatically looking up. It was like, "Wow, this is just a habit to look at myself in the mirror."

So that curiosity of "What happens here?"—it wasn't like some deep need to be seen or anything like that. It was just a habit. But I could see in that moment the habit arising.

This kind of exploration—taking an inventory of where your mind tends to get lost, then having some curiosity about what happens there—can be very fruitful.

We might also lose mindfulness in particular experiences, like painful body sensations. I would notice at times that a couple of different things happened when I had pain in my body. At one point I noticed that when there was pain, the mind started singing. At other times I'd notice it would just go into spacing out. It would go into some non-mindful state. I would wake up kind of singing or in this spaced-out place.

What I found interesting was this: when I noticed I was getting lost when there was pain in the body and got curious about that, I realized that when the mind was singing its song or lost in spaciness, it was not bothered by the pain. There had been a lot of aversion to the pain, and in this place where the mind went out of mindfulness, it was almost like a little lesson. When I woke up in the singing or in the spacing out, I could see that the mind was not hooked by the pain anymore. It was not disturbed by the pain in that space.

So this was a strategy. My mind had learned how to decouple from being reactive to pain, but not in a way that was keeping me aware. That was interesting to me. It was a little learning: the mind knows how not to be hooked by the pain. Can I learn from that?

I played with that. Can I not let the mind be magnetized to the pain, but not get lost? What might that mean? Again, playing with the learning around when mindfulness gets lost. What's going on there? In this case, it was a strategy my mind had developed to deal with pain. Rather than letting it do that particular strategy, I learned from it and was then able to stay present with the pain without being disturbed by it.

We also might lose awareness in very particular identified habits of mind. For me, self-hatred was a big one. We all have our own.

It might be boredom. It might be confusion. It might be depression. These are patterns of mind where we tend to identify and get pulled into them, going down the rabbit hole.

For these patterns, what I find interesting is that it's more about working with the waking up. The exploration becomes about the return of mindfulness. At some point with these very strong, powerful habits of mind—like self-hatred for me—if the mind was caught in that rabbit hole, it didn't often find its way out by itself. I would wake up deep in the rabbit hole of self-hatred. Likewise with depression. The mind would have been lost in the depression, and I'd find myself waking up with the depression.

So that moment of mindfulness returning—it's returning with whatever state is present. Sometimes the mind is just returning from a very light kind of wander, but sometimes it will wander into these deep old habits and patterns. When that's where the mindfulness is getting lost, then I find the moment of waking up and noticing: Oh, here's what it's like to be aware with this pattern. This is the experience of self-hatred, aware with that.

The practice of exploring the moment of mindfulness returning can support this capacity to recognize when mindfulness returns into a deep pattern or habit of mind. What I found around anger and self-hatred was that waking up with it—just acknowledging, "Okay, yep, there it is. This is what it's like to be angry. It hurts. This is self-hatred. This is what it feels like"—that attunement on the waking up allowed the mindfulness to begin waking up with that state earlier in the process.

I might have described this before: it would wake up into full-blown anger, but over time, that attunement developed. It's like we set a kind of intention, a curiosity: Can I know when mindfulness gets caught by this? When we wake up into that state, in that moment of waking up, the mindfulness gets more attuned to that quality, more curious about it. And so it starts to wake up earlier and earlier in the process of that pattern, to the point where you might start to see the very beginnings of it.

This did happen for me with anger—beginning to see just the movement towards it before it was actually constructed. Seeing the mind, which felt like a freight train: "Yeah, let me jump on that thought and think more thoughts to get angry." But seeing that, the mind let it go.

So again, the curiosity around where mindfulness gets lost and what the mind can learn from it. Not to double down and just try to stay mindful through everything, but to be curious. Maybe this talk really could be a talk on curiosity—it's such a powerful support.

Just a couple more reflections, as I'm running out of time. I'd say one of the key ways mindfulness slips out is when there's a shift of attention and there hasn't been a clear recognition that the attention has shifted. We're sitting, paying attention to the breath. This has happened to me when I was really working with an anchor object, with the agenda to stay with the breath. With that agenda, it's like, "Yep, this is what I'm doing, this is what I'm doing." And then something happens—a sound occurs and the attention goes to the sound. It's not like we have to try to make it go; it goes to the sound. But sometimes, if we have that agenda to stay with the breath, we might not notice that shift. There's a sound, and then the mind just goes into its habitual thing around the sound. It thinks about the sound. I remember hearing the sound of a car going down Pleasant Street, and then I was driving down Pleasant Street in my mind. The mind just went down Pleasant Street, down to Barry. I didn't see that hearing had happened, didn't notice that shift of attention.

As mindfulness gets stronger, we can really notice that shift—that quality of the shift of attention. I'd say this is one of the key ways we slip into thinking. The attention shifts to some object, some experience, we don't clearly notice that shift, and then the mind starts thinking about it.

And the last reflection I'll share is this: as the practice deepens, as there's more continuity of mindfulness, quite paradoxically it might seem, as there's a little more continuity and stability in the mind, sometimes there are transition points in our practice.

It's like we're attending to experience in a particular way, and there's a kind of familiarity. At one point on the three-month retreat, I was finding it very easy to just sit down and stay with the breath. I would just sit down, and it would be right there—the breath would be so clear. It was almost effortless; I didn't have to work very hard. This was well into the course. And then one day I sat down, and it was like the mind was just wandering.

When there's a shift as the practice is deepening, this was a time where suddenly I started losing awareness more often. At that point I had known enough to kind of just be curious. It's like, "Okay, what's going on? I know it's not like I've been going out dancing and singing and seeking entertainment. That's not why the mind is wandering. There's something going on here."

So again, the curiosity. And what I discovered is that the sensations of the breath that I was so attuned to—those were not happening anymore. The mindfulness had dropped to a subtler, really subtle level. I would notice the sensations of the breath, and then they would just be gone. And that's when the mind would wander.

There's a kind of sense of, "Okay, there's a settling here, a deeper settling that's happening." It does happen that as the mind settles, there are times when the mind starts wandering more. And when that happens for me, I get curious. Because often something new is happening, something new unfolding—a settling of the mind to a new level perhaps, an unfamiliar experience, a quieter mind. There are things that maybe we're not so familiar with seeing. And when we're not as familiar with meeting those experiences, those can be times when the mind wanders.

So again, some patience and some curiosity: "Well, what's actually happening here as the mind is starting to wander? What's actually happening?"

I really want to encourage this curiosity around noticing mindfulness—the experience of mindfulness itself and the places where we lose mindfulness. Not to judge them; it's all conditioned. All the places where we lose mindfulness are conditioned. So any exploration, any curiosity about it, is going to be revealing the conditioning of our minds.

The exploration with curiosity also—like for instance in those explorations around mindfulness slipping as the practice deepens—there were times when I would just notice, like I would sit down and think, "Okay, I'm with the breath, I'm with the breath," and it's gone. It's like, "Okay, let's just see what happens as it goes." Rather than trying to stay with the breath, it's like, "It's slipping. How is it slipping?"

That practice, that willingness to be curious about where the slipperiness is, what that edge is—it has created the conditions for mindfulness to begin to see way more than I would have ever thought it could. Mindfulness can meet anything. Any idea you have about spacey mind being inherently a state that's non-mindful—it's just a state that's habitually non-mindful. We can be aware within that state. So some curiosity, some exploring the edges of mindfulness.

I might have said this the other day: if we're holding to what we already know, if we're looking for experience or trying to stay with what we know, we don't see what we don't know. And so this is kind of an exploration of willingness. Like, "Okay, mindfulness and wisdom are interested in something. And I don't know what that is. So let's see. Can I stay with them? Can I follow where mindfulness and wisdom are going?"

This has been a very powerful practice for me in terms of strengthening the continuity of mindfulness.

Mettā Practice: Difficult Person and All Beings

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this guided meditation and dharma talk, Andrea Fella explores the challenging yet transformative practice of extending mettā (loving-kindness) to difficult people and ultimately to all beings. She illuminates how working through the traditional progression of mettā recipients—from benefactor to easy being, oneself, dear friend, neutral person, and difficult person—reveals our hidden resistances and places of clinging. Using vivid metaphors of a mettā magnet attracting its opposite and a washing machine bringing dirt into consciousness, she explains that encountering aversion or resentment during practice is not a mistake but an opportunity for profound insight.

Fella shares her personal experience of discovering a wish for someone's misery within her own heart, describing how this humbling recognition opened her to deeper compassion for herself and all beings struggling with similar tendencies. She offers practical tools for working with difficult people: envisioning them at a distance, imagining them as children, or using the original Pāli phrasing (avero homi, abhyāpajjo homi, anīgho homi) which emphasizes freedom from danger and distress rather than directly wishing happiness.

The guided practice leads participants from their easiest mettā connection through offering phrases to a difficult person, then expands beautifully into all beings by gathering the various recipients together in community. This inclusive approach culminates in becoming both sender and receiver of mettā, recognizing oneself as one among all beings worthy of loving-kindness.

This afternoon we'll continue exploring the metta practice, and today we'll explore offering metta to a difficult person and all beings.

These instructions on the metta practice offer us a way to find representatives of various relationships we have to beings in the world: those who support us, the benefactor, the easy being, ourselves, a dear friend, a neutral person, a difficult person, and then out to all beings.

Part of the reason for this is to begin to explore, to begin to recognize the ways in which the wish for metta runs up against those relationships. We might have the overall idea that yes, I do want everybody to be happy. But then when we think of a specific person, we think, well, maybe not that person. And so this begins to show us whether there's any delusion in our wish for well-being for all beings. It points out where the rub is. And that's not a mistake.

Guy Armstrong—I learned the metta practice from Guy Armstrong during a month-long retreat; he and Carol Wilson were my teachers for that retreat—he said that the metta practice is like taking a metta magnet and running it over your heart. What a magnet does is attract its opposite. And so as you run that metta magnet over your heart, it's going to pull out anything that's not metta to be seen.

I also like the washing machine analogy. If we think of our minds like a washing machine and the clothes like the thoughts and ideas and opinions in our minds, the soap is like the metta, and the water is like our consciousness. We put the clothes in the water and the soap in the washing machine, and we add some energy, some agitation. The chemical function of the soap as it gets pushed through the clothes is that it attaches, it binds to the dirt and pulls it into the water. The soap, like the metta, attaches to things that are not so helpful in our hearts and brings them into consciousness where they can be seen. In the washing machine, the water is drained away and fresh water comes back in. This is the function of how metta works.

We may think when we're offering or wishing metta to beings that we're supposed to feel metta—supposed to feel good or feel that sense of connection and care. And we may, at times, feel that. But part of the function of the metta practice is to help us recognize when we don't feel that. As we notice that, we can say, "Thank you, metta, for showing me the resistance to the metta."

This gets particularly highlighted as we bring a difficult person into our practice. We see various relationships along the way. With the easy being or the benefactor, that's usually the easiest, the least complicated relationship to metta—the easiest place for metta to flow. But at the same time, there can be things that are a little in the way. I've heard people say sometimes that this person doesn't need my metta, or I'm not worthy to give metta to this person. There's something in the way there.

For ourselves, we have complicated relationships with ourselves, and so there may be some real struggle there. For me, this was one of the hardest places, actually. It was probably the most difficult being I had. I had to come at it from different directions to find my way to really recognizing that wish, that yes, I actually do wish to be happy and healthy and at ease.

These relationships are highlighted in this metta practice as we offer the phrases, say the wishes—simple phrases like may you be happy, healthy, safe, at ease. It points out the places where we have some clinging or resistance. With a dear friend, it may be that yes, I do wish this friend happiness, but they did that thing, and that was not... And so it pulls to mind the things we have issues with in the relationship. Can we open our hearts to them, even including that difficult thing?

With the neutral person, often the relationship is one of almost just disconnection. It can be, though, for some people, that the neutral person is actually one of the easiest beings to send metta to because it's so uncomplicated.

And then the difficult person—the difficult person being someone we have difficulty with, someone with whom there's some challenge in the relationship. This kind of person can often be quite difficult to wish well. Thoughts of the difficult person can bring up aversion, anger, even hatred, resentment, or even cruelty. I want them to suffer. They did all these things to me; I want them to suffer. Again, it can be so humbling to see this.

It was so humbling for me to see that I actually wanted somebody to be miserable. And in the seeing of that—there was mindfulness present when I saw it—it kind of broke my heart. There was compassion for myself and compassion for the world. It was like, "Wow! No wonder there's war." That was the recognition: this mind, which I think of as belonging to a basically good person, was holding that wish for someone to be miserable. It was so humbling and yet so opening of the heart. No wonder there's so much struggle in the world. May this practice help free us all from these struggles and suffering.

So it opened me to a deeper connection with all beings through seeing how my own heart held this wish for cruelty. Again, it's not a mistake when these things are seen. In the metta practice we explore a really wide awareness and wide arms for holding whatever comes up—seeing if it's possible to just continue with the phrases, understanding that this thing is being seen, it's coming out in the wash. Can it come out in the wash and be released? We can think of the metta practice as functioning in that way.

In sending metta phrases to a difficult being—"may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you be safe, may you be at ease"—my understanding of the wish is not that they be happy doing unskillful things, but that they find true happiness. It's not about condoning actions they've done. It's not about saying, "Yes, I'll have this person in my life." We can explore that wish for them to actually find a kind of happiness that's not dependent on greed, aversion, and delusion, without thinking they have to be part of our lives.

Sometimes in this exploration with a difficult person I've had the thought, "Yeah, may you be truly happy—that way you won't cause so much misery." Thinking it'll be better for me if they find true happiness. But this wish is actually a wish for them, for their own sake. So there's perhaps a near enemy here to watch for: wishing the difficult person would be happy for other people's sake, rather than including the wish for them to be happy for their own sake.

In choosing a difficult person—many of you may have done the metta practice before and have some thoughts about who you might choose—it's helpful to pick a specific person. I think touching into the actual relational aspects tickles something in us about the specifics of a relationship that can point out specific kinds of clinging. So it can be helpful to explore with a particular person for a while, as opposed to thinking of a general category of people you have difficulty with. Pick somebody for whom this is perhaps not the most difficult person. But if you're up for it, maybe try somebody more challenging. If you've done this quite a lot, you could play with an edge a little bit.

Some tools to use while offering metta to the difficult person: You can envision them at a distance, someplace far away, as opposed to right up close to you. You could envision them in a place or circumstance where they can't possibly harm you. You might envision them as a child, perhaps, when there was more innocence in their being. Recognizing again the conditionality—beings do the things they do, are the way they are, based on conditions. If we had lived the life that person had lived, how would we be? How would we be responding to the world?

Another thing that can be helpful with a difficult person: I have found that the metta phrases as stated in English—"may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you be safe, may you live with ease"—sometimes create a little more of a rub when directly wishing happiness for somebody with whom I have so much difficulty. The metta phrases in Pali, the ones in the Metta Sutta chant—that's a great chant, I love it because it gives you all the metta phrases—use different phrasing. Ahaṃ avero homi, abyāpajjo homi, anīgho homi—all of those begin with the "a" in Pali, which is a negation. Essentially the wish is: may you be free from danger, may you be free from mental distress, may you be free from physical distress. The negative phrasing is actually what the Pali uses for those first three phrases—the wishing for not having misery in your life, not having physical ailments.

So the language might be easier: "May you be free from struggle, may you be free from physical distress, mental distress, may you be free from danger." Those are actually how the Pali phrases the metta wishes. I find it easier to use that negative phrasing for a difficult person. You could play with that, see if it's more supportive for you in offering metta to a difficult person.

So let's practice together. We'll start with wherever it's easiest for you—either the easy being, or yourself, or perhaps a neutral person.

Just whatever being has been easiest for you to connect with the metta in some way. And then we will go right to the difficult person.

This is actually the way I learned the progression of the categories—that as I progressed through the categories each day, I'd start with where it was easiest and then move to the category that I was working with.

If you find it very difficult to be with a particular category—this is a general instruction in the metta practice—if you're working with a category that feels challenging and it feels like the mind is getting really caught, doesn't feel like you can hold it in that space of "oh, this is just coming out in the wash," then the first exploration within the metta practice would be to simply drop that person and go back to where you know it's easier, to a being for whom it is easier for you to connect with metta.

Or perhaps you might explore bringing in some support. Sometimes it can be easier to feel like you can offer metta to a difficult person if you feel like your benefactor is standing next to you, offering metta to the difficult person with you. So there are other ways to support yourself in offering metta to a difficult person, but you can also just drop it and shift to an easier metta person. Then try going back—slip in a phrase or two for that difficult being, then maybe return to the easier being, then slip in another phrase for the difficult being, then go back to the easier being again.

You can be playful with the metta. There aren't really rules around it. We offer it in this structured way, but you can find the phrases that are meaningful for you. You can linger as long as you want with one being. You can play with having your benefactor support you in offering metta to other beings. So you can be playful with it.

We'll start with an easier being and then move to the difficult being. Then I'll open it into a guided meditation partway through, expanding to all beings.

Finding a posture that feels comfortable. Relaxed. Maybe a place or a way where your heart, your heart area, can feel open. Maybe explore the sense of the breath through the heart as a kind of soft breeze, or a softening in that area of the heart.

Just notice how your heart feels in this moment. Just the sense of that area around the heart. And maybe begin with dropping in a wish for yourself. May the heart relax. Not trying to do it, but just seeing—how does the heart feel? How do body and mind respond to that wish? May the heart soften and relax.

Just taking in how your heart is in this moment. No judgment, just connecting with awareness of the quality of the heart in this moment. And if it supports you, you are welcome to put your hand on your heart. Sometimes that can bring a sense of connection to that area.

Bringing to mind the person or being for whom it's easiest for you to connect with these wishes. Perhaps remembering something you appreciate about that being, something that feels connecting or caring.

If it's useful for you, if you have access to an image of that being, that can be a support for the metta. Sometimes it's easier to just connect with a name.

Begin with whatever phrases you have found are supportive for you, offering the wishes of well-being, ease, happiness, safety to this person, to this being.

It can be helpful to take your time with the phrases. When I was doing the metta practice for a month, I really slowed it down. With each phrase, with each wish—may you be happy—I stopped and kind of took in the meaning of that phrase. How does it feel to make that wish? What's the experience? How does that phrase land in the heart, in the being?

Each phrase may have a slightly different flavor of landing, so be available to receive how those phrases affect your heart, affect your body, affect your mind.

Continue to wish this being metta in your own phrases, in your own time.

Now I'd like to invite you to bring a difficult being to mind. And even as you explore bringing that being to mind, notice your heart. No judgment. See if you can explore holding this being with you in some fashion in your heart.

You could explore whether there are any qualities that you appreciate about this being at all.

Begin offering the wishes, the phrases of well-being to this being. Remembering that it's not about condoning any actions but about wishing them true happiness. That phrase can sometimes be useful: May you know true happiness. Or perhaps the negative phrasing: May you be free from struggle.

Again, with each phrase, take some time. Almost like you're dropping the phrase into your heart, like you would drop a pebble into a pond. See how the phrase, when holding that being, resonates in your heart. What are the ripples?

It's okay if there are ripples of aversion or resistance or resentment. Let those ripples ripple out.

Can they be held with a wide heart? For their sake, may they be happy, healthy, safe, at ease.

Continue exploring with the phrases that work for you and the timing that works for you in this exploration of metta for this being. If it gets too challenging, you're welcome to go back and practice some metta for yourself, for a benefactor, a dear friend. And if it's more easeful for you to drop the metta for a while and just practice vipassana—a kind of metta vipassana, holding that difficulty, metta for yourself with that difficulty, with mindfulness. I think a form of mindfulness really is a metta practice for ourselves when difficulty is arising. So continue to explore metta for this person as it works for you for the next few minutes.

Letting go now of the difficult person, we'll explore expanding metta to more beings, ultimately to all beings. One way in that has worked for me has been to start by bringing my benefactor to mind, envisioning us together, standing together, and making the wish together: May we be happy. May we be safe, healthy, and live with ease.

So rather than just holding one being and wishing them well, hold both of you together. May we be well.

And then envision your dear friend joining the two of you, joining in the metta wishes. May we all be well. Happy and peaceful. Free of danger.

And then invite your neutral person to join you. The four of you standing together, sitting together, walking together. With the wish: May we all be at ease.

And then invite the difficult person to join you. May we all be free from danger, be happy, healthy, live with ease. All five of you standing together, being together, wishing all of you well.

I had a teacher suggest that from here you can basically open it up and invite anybody who wants to join you to join you. I was surprised at some of the people who showed up. Just let people come who want to join this wishing of well-being for this gathering of beings. Let anybody who wants to show up, show up. And continue the wishes: May we all be happy, healthy, safe, at ease.

This is an opportunity for anybody who's been knocking at the door. What about me? Can I be part of metta too? Anybody who wants to show up. Friends, distant family, people you haven't seen in ages. The postal worker you remember. The cashier at the grocery store. Let the space be big so as many people can join as want to join.

And then perhaps think of that gathering as a kind of metta engine for well-wishing for many beings. Allow the metta to expand out beyond the gathering, a sense of letting the quality of metta radiate as wide as it wants to go. And express or explore the wish: May all beings be safe, at ease, happy and healthy. Like that metta wave radiating out, just like the rays of the sun that land on everyone. Everyone who wants to stand in that can receive it.

May all beings be happy, healthy, safe, at ease.

And remember that you are one of all beings—both sending it out and receiving it yourself.

For the last few minutes of the sitting, explore the possibility of being the recipient of metta. Beings are wishing metta for you. Can you receive that?

Thank you for your metta practice. It is quite a rare thing, I think, to be in a gathering like this, and for so many weeks to be part of a community that is cultivating these beautiful qualities. It's not an easy thing to do. And it is so beautiful. Thank you for your practice.

CHAPTER 26

Five Aggregates Review and Exploring the Sense of Self

Andrea Fella · 1h01

In this comprehensive dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a detailed exploration of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā) and their relationship to our constructed sense of self. Building on earlier retreat teachings, she examines how the Buddha described these aggregates—form, feeling, perception, mental formations (saṅkhārā), and consciousness—both as nouns (what we experience) and as verbs (active processes that fabricate our experience moment to moment).

Fella draws on the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta (the Discourse on the Characteristic of Not-Self) to illuminate how we mistakenly attribute permanence, control, and ownership to experiences that are inherently impermanent, unreliable, and ungovernable. She presents the Buddha's teaching on twenty types of identity view—the various ways we identify with each aggregate as "I am this," "this is mine," "I am in this," or "this is in me"—and offers a simplified framework using three reflections: "this is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself."

Through personal examples, including her own struggles with identifying as "a miserable person" and observing anger's conditioning effects, Fella demonstrates how these teachings apply to everyday experience. She emphasizes that studying the sense of self through mindful curiosity—rather than trying to eliminate it—allows wisdom to naturally reveal its constructed, impermanent nature. The talk concludes with an encouragement to honor our various senses of self as strategies that have helped us navigate life, while remaining curious about whether such identifications continue to serve us or create unnecessary suffering.

Last week Tueri began an exploration of the five aggregates and seeing those processes begin to reveal the not-self nature of our experience. Then Greg mentioned the aggregates in the morning, and Brian talked about intention. These topics all weave together. I thought I'd do another flyby of the aggregates, looking at how the Buddha spoke about them. One of the main teachings with respect to the aggregates is how we tend to construct a sense of self around them.

They're called the aggregates of clinging. We tend to cling to and identify with these aggregates, and that is what we experience as a sense of self. The Buddha called this I-making and my-making.

In exploration of the sense of self, we discover that the sense of self is an arising. When we say experience is not self, we don't mean that the sense of self is nothing, because the sense of self is an experience that's put together through clinging to these aggregates. It is a powerful process. Much like some other mental formations are processes that shape our experience, that shape our choices, that shape how we relate to the world, so too is a sense of self something that really shapes our experience. And yet we can see it. We can see it as a process and begin to understand it. Through the seeing of it, we start to see that it is not what we think it is.

We often tend to attribute a sense of stability to a sense of self. Before I started practicing, I was pretty miserable, and I thought of myself as miserable. I was occasionally happy, but when I was happy, something like this would happen in my mind: "Well, I'm happy now, but I know what I really am is miserable." So I was imputing a sense of a carrying on of that miserableness, even when it wasn't there. I was identifying that as who I was.

We often impute this sense of stability to a sense of self. But when we start actually looking at the experience, that arising of happiness—with miserableness not arising—was evidence that I wasn't actually a miserable person. Miserableness was just something that arose sometimes. This is the way Tueri talked about her anger and the recognition that anger is just something that comes up now and then. It's not who I am.

As we begin to be curious about the sense of self, curious about what the experience actually is when it feels like there's a sense of self here, an investigation and curiosity arise around it. We begin to see that the sense of self arises. And in seeing that it arises, we see that it wasn't there a few moments before. We begin to understand something about the not-self nature of the sense of self.

We may see at times the sense of self, recognizing it, seeing it, feeling it, and then it vanishes—maybe replaced by another sense of self. Just the seeing of the mutating experiences that we call self begins to point out that they are impermanent, not stable. The very observation of what we call self, of the experience of self, begins to point out the not-self nature of it.

In this talk, I'll review the five aggregates and then discuss what it might mean to study the self, to be curious about observing the self.

There's a famous quote by the Zen master Dogen. Some of you may know it: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. And to forget the self is to be awakened by all things."

This studying the self—I would say studying the sense of self—means we get curious about it, we explore what it is, what it feels like, what the experience is. Through that exploration we begin to see that it's not what we think it is, and we begin to understand the not-self nature of experience.

The Buddha talked about this process of selfing through the lens of the teaching on the five aggregates. I'll review a little of what Tueri offered last week, perhaps in some different language.

That word "aggregates"—I think Tueri mentioned this—is not a very usual word. We don't use it much in the English language to refer to anything about our personal lives. If you're a geologist, you might talk about aggregate rock, but it's not a common word for us. My understanding is that the term khandha that the Buddha used means something like group or heap or bundle. It was a common word. People might say they were carrying a khandha of sticks, or point to a heap of rocks. It was an ordinary word, one that was used a lot, and I think it was used because people could relate to it.

While "aggregate" sounds technical and hard to wrap our minds around—a weird word for us—it's actually a pretty good word for what is being talked about.

perception, mental formations, and consciousness—the five aggregates. And each one of these has a whole collection of experiences connected with it.

So form, the body, has all of the experiences of the physical realm associated with it. It's a heap, a collection of physical sensations. The word "aggregate" means something like that collection. If we think of what an aggregate rock is, it's actually a rock made of rocks—so it's a collection. But the word "aggregate" is also a verb that means something like to collect, to gather.

And in the suttas, the Buddha actually referred to these five khandhas both as what we could call nouns—as experiences, the what of our experience—and as processes. He described them both as nouns and verbs.

The noun side of the form aggregate is just the physical experience: body sensations, the pulsing, tingling, vibration, coolness, heat—just the bare elemental body sensations. This is an aspect of the form element. Even within the eye, the eye itself is form, and the sights, the contact with sights—I understand also like the light waves and what contacts the eye—that's also form. What we experience there is basically form and color in the realm of the eye. In the ear door, there's pitch and tone. The sound waves hit our ear, and the rapidity of the vibration and how strong the vibration is creates the sense of pitch and tone. That's all form.

The Buddha also talked about these aggregates as processes. In one sutta, he described them as verbs. I won't go through all five of them here, but I'll give you a flavor of one. Somebody was asking the Buddha, "Why is it called feeling?" And the Buddha responded, "It feels. That's why it's called feeling. What does it feel? It feels pleasant. It feels unpleasant. It feels neither pleasant nor unpleasant."

This definition incorporates both sides of the aggregates—as being both the process that experiences things and what is experienced. So feeling is both the process that feels and what is felt: pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. The Buddha goes through this for all of the aggregates, defining them in terms of their process nature.

And so I think of the aggregates in some ways as what we experience—the actual content when we notice with mindfulness what is being experienced—but also the processes of body and mind. The aggregates are like the processes that tumble on, creating our experience moment to moment.

The teaching of the aggregates includes all the aspects of what we experience in the present moment. I understand the aggregates as being the conditioned happenings of our experience—pretty much everything that happens. All conditioned arisings are part of the aggregates. And we can look at all those conditioned arisings, which the Buddha divided up in a particular way: form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness.

There are other teachings, other ways that he divided up this realm of our conditioned experience. One is the six sense bases, which I think we're all familiar with: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—eye, ear, nose, tongue, body—and then the mind. The six sense bases teaching talks about the experiences at those sense bases and their objects. Again, all the conditioned arisings there.

I like that there are these two flavors of describing the realm of our experience. The six sense bases divides up our experience with a kind of weight on the sense impression realm—we've got five of those and one mind door. That's one way to study experience, noticing all the aspects of body and of mind, but with an emphasis on body in a way.

With the aggregates, the emphasis is shifted. There's one aspect related to body—the form aggregate, related to all five sense bases and their objects. And then the other four aggregates—feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness—are all related to processes of mind. So this is an exploration of how our minds do their thing in a very detailed way: processes of mind that come together to create our experience.

So, just a review. I've been talking about form a little bit—form being the experience of our physical realm, including all of the sense bases and their experiences.

Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—these experiences at their most rudimentary level. We talked a lot about the elemental nature of our bodily experience. That's in the form aggregate.

Now, our minds tend to put together experience and understand it using the other aggregates. For instance, as I look out here, I see people and I see zafus and walls and lights and chairs. I know that what's actually happening is form and color hitting the eye. That's the bare experience of the form aggregate—just shape and color. But it happens so fast that our minds pick up and understand and put things together so that I see people, zafus, chairs. But that part of the processing is more in the realm of perception. So the form aggregate is just this bare aspect of our physical experience.

Then feeling—we've talked about quite a bit—that experience of pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This is a mental experience. We can recognize this mental quality because we can see, through observing feeling tone and watching it change, that the feeling tone is not in the sense impression itself. The feeling tone depends on conditions. It depends on what we've learned in our past. It depends on conditions happening right now. There's a conditioned nature to feeling tone. Whether we experience something as pleasant or unpleasant, it's not in the object itself—it's in our body and mind's experience of it.

An example to make this more concrete: this was perhaps the first time I really saw the conditioned nature of feeling tone so clearly. I think it was my first three-month retreat here. We were having a very simple meal in the evening—bean dip and an apple. That was my dinner. So I took a bite of the bean dip and noticed the taste, the bitterness of the beans and the oiliness of the flavor spreading over the tongue. I don't remember much about pleasant or unpleasant with respect to the bean dip. But when I took a bite of the apple, I was just overwhelmed with pleasantness. It was like the best apple ever. It was so good. I think it was probably September—they had just picked apples off the tree. It was a really fresh, crisp apple, very juicy. I was just taken by the pleasantness of it. And I was interested in the feeling tone; that was just what was being noticed.

As I kept eating, I noticed some interesting things. The pleasantness of the apple was more intense after the bean dip. After a couple bites of apple, the pleasantness diminished. If I just had apple, apple, apple, apple, the pleasantness was not as intense. The second bite was not nearly as overwhelming as the first. But then I had some bean dip, and the next bite of apple was like, "Wow, that's so good." So I began to see that the pleasantness was conditioned—in this case, the intensity of pleasantness was conditioned.

There are other times when I've noticed something unpleasant that, in a different context, became pleasant, though I can't give you a specific example right now. But I've seen that happen too. Perhaps thinking about temperature provides an illustration. Fifty degrees—right now, fifty degrees feels pretty cold and might feel unpleasant if you walk outside without a sweatshirt. But after a few ten-degree days, if you walk out and it's fifty degrees, it might feel quite pleasant.

Again, the conditions creating that difference. And so the pleasant-unpleasant feeling is dependent on conditions. It is constructed by the mind putting things together. This can be seen. We can be curious about this, noticing how feeling tone changes.

Then perception is the process of recognition. As I said, it's like looking out here and seeing chairs and zabutons and people and walls and lights—that's all the process of perception. Our mind takes in sense impressions and looks for the nearest match. You've seen lots of chairs before. You go into a room, you've never seen that particular chair, but you've seen lots of chairs before, so you know that thing is probably a chair. This is a kind of pattern-matching function. This is the process of perception—that process where the mind goes in and finds the nearest match.

It doesn't always work. It doesn't always make a perfect match. And we can see that sometimes too. One time I walked into a room in very dim light and looked across the room at this odd shape, kind of a big odd shape. The first perception my mind put on it was: a deformed being. I saw that perception arise in my mind and said, "No, no, no—not a deformed being." Then something else came up, and it took three or four perceptions before the mind recognized that it was a vase of flowers. Part of the condition there was the dimness, so it wasn't immediately clear. The process of perception is not perfect. It's just this process of recognizing, doing the best it can to recognize the experience.

We can see perception like I just described. It can be very interesting to notice when something's not quite recognized—we can see our mind trying things on like that. Or we might recognize perception through another door. One of the easiest ways for me to recognize perception is with the ear door. Hearing a sound in meditation, there's the sound itself—the vibration, the pitch, the tone—but then there's a label that our minds put on it. "Bird" or "lawnmower." That might appear as a word in our mind, or it might appear as an image. I think we talked about this a little last week. That kind of identification often comes through language or imagery. It can also come through felt sense. But that identification is the process of perception.

Then consciousness is just this bare meeting of experience, just the knowing aspect of experience. Consciousness is understood to be six kinds: sense consciousness, one with each sense base. So there's seeing consciousness, hearing consciousness, smelling consciousness, taste consciousness, touch consciousness, and mind consciousness. It's just this bare recognition. Sense impression hits the eye and there's eye consciousness. A really simple aspect of experience. Just the knowing.

Volitional formations is not usually the last one in the list, but I wanted to spend a little more time with it, so I've put it last. Mental formations is the volitional aspect of experience. This is a lot of what we see on retreat—what our minds are doing, the doings of our mind. This is the whole host of mental activities that happen related to intention, related to volition. Not necessarily a conscious volition or a conscious choice, like something we're actively choosing in the present moment to do. But these activities of mind have a kind of momentum.

Like anger, for instance. I think we know this. We know this sense of these mind states or mental formations having an activity nature to them. When we're angry, we see how it tends to shape our thoughts, our actions. They have a shaping quality, these mental formations. So this includes our emotions, our thoughts, mind states. It includes the range of experience from the reactive emotions to the wholesome mind states.

One of the teachings around volitional formations that I find very interesting is this process nature of the volitional formations that the Buddha describes—the verb nature of the mental formations. I'm going to read this section. This is Thanissaro Bhikkhu's translation of the section of the sutta that describes mental formations, volitional formations, in terms of a verb, an activity, of what it does.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu uses the term "fabrication" to translate volitional formations, and I like the way this comes out in the whole of this passage:

Why are they called fabrications?

And the Buddha responds: Because they fabricate fabricated things. That's why they're called fabrications. What do they fabricate as fabricated things? For the sake of form, they fabricate form as a fabricated thing. For the sake of feeling, they fabricate feeling as a fabricated thing. For the sake of perception, they fabricate perception as a fabricated thing.

For the sake of fabrication, they fabricate fabrications as a fabricated thing. For the sake of consciousness, they fabricate consciousness as a fabricated thing. They fabricate fabricated things, thus they are called fabrications.

This is actually very profound. What he's saying is that the mental formations—anger, for instance—when anger arises, it's shaping all the rest of our experience. It's shaping all the aggregates. The fabrications arise in dependence on prior fabrications, and then they shape in turn the entirety of our experience.

Take anger as an example. When anger arises, we often feel its effect on the body—pressure and heat. It may actually physically distort the face, make it kind of harsh. We can often tell when somebody is angry by the look on their face. People aren't thinking, "Let me distort my face." Anger is doing the job. Anger is shaping the body there, fabricating the form.

Anger also tends to shape unpleasant feeling. When anger is arising, things tend to be unpleasant. There is occasionally some pleasant in there. As I noticed while observing anger very closely on one retreat, the first hit of the moment when anger arose—the very first split second—there was this sense in the body like, whew. There was this feeling of, "I know, I understand, I can do, I have power, I have control." There was this split second of real pleasantness. It quickly turned to unpleasant heat, pressure, tension, the whole host of mental thoughts and activities that are often unpleasant connected with anger. But the first split second of it was pleasant. I was like, wow, maybe that's the hook. Maybe that's why I go for anger, for that feeling.

Anger tends to shape how we perceive things. We tend to perceive through the lens of anger. One time doing walking meditation, I was noticing anger, just generally noticing that anger was present. I've watched a lot of anger on my retreats, in my life. I've spent a lot of time looking at anger. I was walking back and forth, and on one of my passes I turned around at the end of my path—it was downstairs in the basement—and after I turned around, I saw somebody else's shoes at the end of my path. The perception was like, "What are those doing here? This is not what's supposed to be happening." Looking at the experience, the whole anger was shaping the perception of those shoes as being in my path. If I had been in another state of mind, it might have been, "Oh wow, look at those shoes! They're so cool. Where did they come from? They just appeared." But no, there was anger, so the mind was shaping the perception.

Our consciousness is also directed by the filter of anger—any mental formation, really. I'm just using anger as an example here. It's like selective attention. I've noticed that when the mind is in a very aversive state and I walk into a room, I notice things I don't like. Consciousness will highlight the things I don't like. In another state of mind, I might walk into that same room and consciousness might highlight something else entirely.

And anger tends to construct more anger, shapes more of the mental formation of anger.

The sense of self is a volitional formation—like anger, like joy. And it can be felt and seen and observed. We can be curious about that experience. The sense of self as a mental formation tends to construct things in its image, we could say, just as anger tends to construct things in its image. Whatever sense of self is arising is constructing our aggregates from that perspective. And this can be seen. We can begin to be curious about when we notice a sense of self, how is it shaping our experience? This will be some of what I talk about.

The five aggregates are always going on. They're always happening, just tumbling on whether we're mindful or not. Consciousness, feeling, perception—these things are meeting experience and recognizing experience and carrying us through. The body is carrying us through our lives. Mental formations are shaping our choices and our actions, whether we are mindful or not.

Mindfulness I understand also as a volitional formation. Its job or its activity is to arise with the aggregates and meet them, to know them. Sometimes it kind of knows all of the aggregates at the same time. If these five fingers are my five aggregates, mindfulness arising can sometimes know the whole experience. Sometimes mindfulness might more hook onto form or feelings; it might be more interested in exploring one or the other of these aggregates.

In terms of the exploration of the sense of self related to the aggregates, there are several teachings here, and we'll see how many of them I get to. One of them is in the discourse called the Anatta Lakkhana Sutta, the discourse on the characteristic of not-self. The Buddha begins by asking his followers about what these aggregates are with respect to the sense of self.

Here's an example. The first thing he points to is the control aspect—that we tend to impute a sense of self as having control. He says to his followers: "Form is not self. If form were self"—so this is kind of a postulation—"if it were self, then form would not lead itself to affliction. And it would be possible to say of form, 'May my form be thus, may my form not be thus.' But because form is not self, form leads to affliction. It is not possible to say, 'Let my form be thus, let my form not be thus.'"

"Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were self, consciousness would not lend itself to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of consciousness, 'Let my consciousness be thus, let my consciousness not be thus.' But because consciousness is not self, consciousness leads to affliction, and it is not possible to say, 'Let my consciousness be thus, let my consciousness not be thus.'"

So this is pointing to the basic sense—he says, "if form were self." He's speaking to people perhaps who take the sense of self to be that sense of control. And this is a major way we tend to attribute a sense of self: when it feels like we're in control of something. "I'm in control of it." So he points to the fact that these five aspects of experience are not under our control, that the reason for that is because they are not self.

I think often we get caught in struggle around this very aspect of experience. We sit down to meditate, we say we're going to be with the breath or stay with the body, and the mind wanders and we feel like we've failed because we've not been able to control our mindfulness. Here we can stick mindfulness into this sentence: Mindfulness is not self. If mindfulness were self, mindfulness would not lend itself to affliction, and it would be possible to determine of mindfulness, "Let my mindfulness be this, let my mindfulness not be this."

But because mindfulness is not self, mindfulness leads to affliction, and it is not possible to say, "Let my mindfulness be this." We've all suffered over this, haven't we? And the Buddha simply points out that it's not a personal failing. If you can't say, "May my mindfulness be thus," it's the nature of the experience itself.

There's so much evidence for not-self in all aspects of our experience, yet it feels like such a remote thing sometimes, just talking about not-self. What is not-self? It feels so obvious that there's a self. But that's because we're not looking carefully at our experience and seeing what we take to be self—that sense of "I have control" or whatever. Then when we don't have control, we feel like we did something wrong. Instead of that interpretation, the Buddha is saying, no, it's not that you did anything wrong; it's because it's not-self.

So we can see experience when that uncontrollability is happening, when we observe things arising that are just arising. This is evidence for not-self. When we see we can't control that we have a stomachache after eating some food, it's not a personal failing—the body lends itself to affliction. It is not self. We can't simply say, "May the stomachache be gone." We live with the experience.

Now, there is some measure of control that we have, and I think that's why we get caught. When we're hungry, we can eat and the hunger goes away. When we want light to read by, we can turn on a lamp. There is some measure of control, and I think we misinterpret that as having absolute control—not understanding that when we don't have control, it is simply the nature of experience.

The Buddha goes on in the sutta, the Anattalakkhana Sutta, to point out with each of the aggregates that all of them are impermanent. All conditioned experience, if we look closely, is impermanent. It comes and goes. It's not stable. And because it's impermanent, it is unreliable. It is not a reliable place for lasting happiness.

That's another mistake we make when grasping onto things. When we cling to something, partly our mind has said, "This thing is going to do it for me. I'm going to find happiness by holding onto it." Then that thing goes away, and we feel the suffering of having pinned our hopes on it for our happiness.

This unreliability, the dukkha nature of experience—dukkha can be translated as "unreliable," sometimes as "suffering," and that is indeed the experience sometimes. But what's being pointed to here is not necessarily that experience is always felt as suffering, but that experience is always unreliable. We can't land on experience as something that can be depended upon.

Through this exploration—looking at experience as unreliable and impermanent—the Buddha asks his followers: Does it make sense to call something that is uncontrollable, unreliable, and impermanent a self? He's gone through every aspect of our bodies and minds, all experience that we know, and pointed out that it is all uncontrollable, impermanent, and unreliable. So does it make sense to call any of it self? This is what he asked his followers, and they said no, it doesn't.

I think he was speaking to people for whom blissful, permanent, and controllable was their definition of what self was. He was examining how they defined the sense of self and pointing out that what they took to be self was not self.

We may not think of self as blissful, permanent, or reliable. What do you think of as self? I have my own senses of self—what I think self is. Permanence does weigh in there sometimes. I don't know about blissful. But I think what this part of the teaching is pointing to is to begin to get curious about what it is that we call self. How do we attribute a sense of self? What is it that we're calling self? Get to know what it is that you're calling a sense of self. There are times when the sense of self arises very strongly, and we can get curious about that. What is that experience?

The Buddha had different ways to explore what the sense of self is. With respect to the aggregates, he pointed out that we tend to have four ways of identifying or clinging to a sense of self with each of them—essentially, twenty different flavors of identity view.

I'm not going to go through all of these twenty permutations, but I want to give you a sense of the flavors, just moving through this teaching quickly.

With respect to each of the aggregates, the Buddha says we tend to identify in the first way: "I am the aggregate." I am body. I am feeling. I am perception. I am mental formation. I am consciousness. That sense of "I am the body" is familiar to me.

Let me name some of the flavors I've personally experienced. That sense of "I am the body." Or "I am the emotion." "I am miserable" — that was one I was quite familiar with, imputing that this is who I am, that this is me. It might also be related to roles and social identities, which are perceptions and mental formations — the sense of "I am a parent" or "a student" or "a sibling." That kind of identification is really an identification with the perception of a role.

The second pattern is: the aggregate is mine. Things belong to me. The body is mine — that one I recognize. Yes, the body is mine. It's mine. Emotions and feelings are mine — that's another very familiar feeling, that sense of ownership, of appropriation. Form is mine in terms of things in the world, that sense of ownership. Ideas are mine — oh, I've suffered so much over ideas being mine. At one point I remember feeling ownership of a word. People were using that word and they were not giving me credit for it. So much suffering from just that possessiveness, that ownership.

The third pattern is: I am inside of the aggregate. This one I've perhaps experienced as feeling like I'm inside the body — maybe that homunculus kind of feeling Greg was pointing to the other day. A little homunculus inside the body, that's me in there, looking out from there. I haven't experienced all these permutations, but just giving you the flavor. Perhaps occasionally in some meditative states, having the sense of the expansiveness of the meditative state, feeling like "I am in consciousness." A feeling of being inside the experience sometimes. So even in those expansive states, there can be a sense of being in it.

The fourth pattern is: the aggregate is inside of me. This one is also fairly familiar — the emotions are in me, consciousness is in me.

So this is a pretty complex framework, and it can be useful to reflect on it occasionally. But I'm not going to encourage you to try to remember this or analyze your experience in these terms so much. There's a simpler teaching I've found really useful that takes this whole twenty-part structure and collapses it down into three simple sentences that support an exploration around the sense of self.

This relates to a phrase the Buddha uses around examining our experience. He said that with respect to each aggregate, we should understand: "This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself."

Taking just those three sentences — not even thinking about the aggregates so much — we can work with them directly. The sense of ownership, "this is not mine" — if we turn it around and consider the sense of self there, that's the ownership self, the appropriation self. That one's pretty obvious. I think that one can be quite clear.

And especially if something gets taken away from us. We walk in and see that our cup has moved, or somebody moved our zafu off of our cushion. There's that sense of appropriation, that sense of "mine." So we can feel that. We can feel, what is that quality of that "mine"? To me, it kind of feels like a gathering in, like I'm trying to hold all my possessions in or something. That feeling of "mine."

"This I am not"—that reflection, turned around to what the sense of self might be there: "I am this." That, to me, points to that control nature. If you think about the "I am" in a sentence, the "I" at the beginning of a sentence is the agent of the sentence, the subject of the sentence. I am the subject of the sentence. And the subject of the sentence is often the one with agency. So I am the doer. I am the thinker. I am the one who chooses, the one who decides, the one who acts. This one also can be pretty clear at times. We can feel the sense of that control, that feeling of being in control.

That one, to me, feels like a puff. I'm here. I do things. I know things. There are turkeys at Spirit Rock, and the male turkeys in the breeding season—they see a female and they go... puffs up. That's what it feels like. That's that "I am, I do, I'm here, I'm going to, I've got agency." So that feeling. Again, be curious about it. You don't have to make an issue about it, but be interested in it.

Then the last one—this one to me is actually one of the more interesting ones to begin to get familiar with, because as we start to really see all of these experiences as processes unfolding, we see the sense of "I am," that doer, that agent, the one who does things. We start to see that actually it's not me doing it; it's the mental formations doing it. We see the arising of an intention and an action that follows. We're sitting for a while. We feel some pressure in our bladder. We notice an intention to get up to relieve that pressure. We stand up, we go. Sometimes we can see that whole thing happening just out of the process nature of our minds. We feel the experience. There's an understanding of what it means. There's a decision that's made. It's not me doing it. We can see all of this arising just as conditions unfolding and see that I didn't make that decision—it happened. It was the mental formations making the decision. Mental formations leading onward.

As we see that, as we start to see that we're not the one who's doing things, sometimes this last level—"this is not myself"—I think of this as the self as the object of the sentence: "This is me." In my practice, on one retreat, I was really starting to see through this lens of the aggregates, seeing I'm not doing any of these. It is just tumbling on. I could see I did not have control over the consciousness of the experience. Consciousness was happening. The mental formations were happening. All of it was just happening. But it felt like it was happening to me. It was not me doing it.

I was not the agent. But there was a sense of being the one impinged upon—helplessly being impinged upon. That sense of self is also a very interesting one to have pointed out, because I think it's a subtler one, a subtler kind.

I tried so hard to see through that. I can't see through that—me, the agent, the doer, trying to see through it. I went and reported this to my teacher and he laughed. "You just notice that it feels like me." Of course that's what he said.

The last piece I'll offer is this: there are so many different experiences of a sense of self. We can start to see that there are just hundreds of them. There's not one sense of self. We have many different senses of self that arise and pass away. We can start to see them as arising and passing away.

I think many of these senses of self that we have—and Tuari pointed to this in her talk—are often strategies we've learned to help us navigate the impermanent, unreliable nature of the world. So it's almost like we honor them. Thank you for helping me get here. And now let's see if we can be curious about them. Perhaps these strategies are not necessary anymore. Perhaps some strategies are still useful, understanding them as strategies rather than as who I am.

We can honor our senses of self by opening to them with mindfulness and wisdom, familiarizing ourselves with how they act, how they affect our bodies, how they affect our minds. These mental formations, the sense of self—just observing it like you would observe any mental formation. How does it affect the body? How does it affect the mind? What kinds of thoughts does it make happen in our minds? How does it make us act?

Sometimes senses of self can be helpful. A sense of self for me around investigation was really helpful for many years. And then at some point I began to see the suffering of holding on to that identity. So it was useful for a long time. And then at some point I began to notice the suffering of clinging to it—the suffering of clinging to being a good practitioner.

But mostly I want to encourage again, like my last talk, curiosity. Perhaps all my talks are about curiosity. Honoring our experience. Letting wisdom help us to see the nature of our experience. And wisdom does the letting go. We don't have to let go of our senses of self. We need to understand them. This is the encouragement of the Buddha: understand our suffering, understand our aggregates, understand our senses of self. The understanding will lead to freedom.

CHAPTER 27

Recognizing Delusion

Andrea Fella · 1h00

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines delusion (moha), the most fundamental of the three unwholesome roots alongside greed and aversion. She presents three progressively subtler levels of delusion: simple disconnection from experience (lack of mindfulness), seeing through the filter of personal and social conditioning, and the deepest level—the universal human distortions (vipallāsa) that we all share.

The talk focuses extensively on the four distortions described in the suttas: taking what is impermanent to be permanent, what is unreliable (as a source of happiness) to be reliable, what is not-self to be self, and what is unattractive to be attractive. Andrea explains how these distortions operate at the levels of perception, thought, and view, each becoming progressively more rigid. She offers vivid examples, including how our visual system creates apparent continuity from discrete moments (like a sparkler appearing as a circle of fire), and how concepts and slow change mask impermanence.

Practical investigation methods are offered throughout: noticing when something feels solid and questioning that solidity, exploring the gratification of sense pleasure and observing what happens when it ends, and examining the sense of self when it feels strong. Andrea emphasizes that non-delusion isn't something we create through effort—it's understanding that arises naturally when we meet experience with curiosity. She concludes with a touching account of watching the mind's habitual reaching for clinging with tenderness, knowing it as delusion while allowing the pattern to exhaust itself.

This morning, Terry read and responded to a question around delusion, and I'd been thinking about giving a talk on delusion anyway, but that kind of prodded the pump a little bit. So that's the topic this evening—and in particular, that very question: How do we recognize delusion?

Delusion is part of this three-part set. We often talk about greed, aversion, and delusion. These are understood to be the roots of our unwholesome mind states and actions. They're at the core, at the base of all the unwholesome, unskillful things that happen, and they are suffering. The definition in the suttas of freedom, of nibbana, of awakening, is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion. So it's really worth getting to know these three very well.

If we think about what the Buddha taught as the first noble truth—there is suffering, the truth of suffering—that truth of suffering is meant to be understood. We can say that this comes down to the instruction to understand greed, aversion, and delusion, not by thinking about it, but by understanding how they function in our minds, in our hearts. We do that by witnessing them. The very witnessing of them creates the conditions for wisdom to support a release from these patterns and habits.

You've all seen this—how the shift of seeing a pattern, for instance around fear or anxiety or confusion or clinging, and then just seeing it, being able to hold it with mindfulness and wisdom, being able to observe it—there can be a shift. When we can see these patterns and habits with mindfulness and wisdom, they're no longer functioning as greed, aversion, and delusion. They're functioning as objects of our meditation. They're functioning as experiences that can help to wake us up.

Greed and aversion are relatively easy to recognize. There are some subtler flavors of those, but you've all been talking about this in your meetings, and I think we do find it relatively easy to recognize. Greed, that pulling towards something, that wanting, that leaning towards something. Or aversion, the pulling away from something. We can see the thoughts in our mind around it: "I want that," "I want to get rid of that." And the visceral sense of it as well. The question this morning also spoke to that—it's not that difficult to recognize greed and aversion.

But by its very nature, delusion is harder to see. So how do we see delusion? What is its nature? How do we get familiar with it?

In this talk, I really hope to offer some information that will help you recognize delusion—first of all, to learn what delusion is and how it functions, and then also to actually start seeing it happening, to start seeing when it is working in our minds.

Delusion can arise conditioned by greed and aversion. The perspective that greed and aversion put into our minds is a perspective that we're seeing through a filter, through a particular flavor. I think I talked about that with respect to aversion—how it shaped my mind, how I tended to see things from an aversive perspective. The perspective that greed and aversion can put in the mind creates the conditions where we're seeing things from a skewed perspective. We're not taking in all aspects; we're missing aspects of experience because we have a narrower or particular perspective that we're looking through. This missing of aspects of experience because we're looking from a particular perspective—this is one way delusion functions.

So delusion can be conditioned by greed and aversion. But fundamentally, delusion is more basic than greed and aversion. Ultimately, greed and aversion arise because of delusion. I'll talk about how that works as we go. But if delusion didn't exist, greed and aversion would not arise. So it is really the core issue, we could say.

We can think about delusion as having different levels to it. I've explored three different layers of delusion, moving from the more obvious kind to subtler and subtler forms. I'll name these now and then briefly go through the first two. I'm going to spend most time on the third one.

The first kind of delusion is basically a disconnection from experience, a not-knowing. The second kind is where there isn't a disconnection from experience, where there is awareness, but we are seeing experience through a particular perspective. As I just mentioned, greed and aversion can do that. We see things through a particular perspective and miss aspects of experience because of it.

This second layer of delusion is flavored by our own personal conditioning—the way we've been raised, the views and ideas and opinions we hold that have come into our experience and shaped how we meet the world. Our social conditioning, personal conditioning, familial conditioning—all of that creates a layer of views, a layer of ideas and beliefs that filter how we look at the world. That's what I'd call the second level or layer of delusion.

The deepest level of delusion is a level of misunderstanding, misperceiving that we all share. We could call it human delusions. The Buddha spoke to some specific ways that we as humans tend to misperceive, misunderstand, not recognize experience as it actually is. Tuari mentioned these this morning—the four distortions of experience. Sometimes the translation for the word there, vipalasa, is rendered as "inversion," that we see things upside down. We're seeing things exactly backwards. So that's the deepest level, the deepest layer of delusion.

Just a little bit about the first two, and then I want to spend more time on the distortions.

The first one—being disconnected, not aware of what's happening—this is basically lack of mindfulness. We're lost in thought, lost in a mind state, not conscious, not present in the present moment. This is a form of delusion. We've been talking about getting familiar with this a lot in terms of recognizing the moment when mindfulness returns. That moment when mindfulness returns, we can have a flavor of the difference between what it's like to be aware now and just the moment before. There's a lingering memory often in that space when mindfulness returns of what the mind was like when it was not mindful. It's that thing Tuari was pointing to in the poem. Light, not light. Light, not light. The difference between when the mind is aware and awake and when it is caught or lost in thought. This is pointing to seeing—we can get a flavor in the mind of what it's like when it's just in that cloud of not knowing. So we can begin to get familiar with that side of the experience through that simple exploration of recognizing when mindfulness returns.

Another flavor of this disconnecting comes up with doubt. When doubt is in the mind, there's often a wavering, a sense of: What do I do? What should my choices be? We may feel paralyzed, we may feel like we're stuck there. And it is often a place where we are not aware. We're caught in the belief or the view of doubt. "I have to figure this out. I need to figure out which way to go, what practice to do, how to do it." The doubt itself, when we're believing it or when we're caught in it, that's a form of delusion. But when we can see it, when we can know, "Oh, this is doubt happening in the mind," there's no longer delusion there because we know—there's clarity, we know there's doubt. Doubt is not functioning like doubt when it is seen with mindfulness and wisdom, when it is clearly recognized. This is the experience a human being has when doubt is happening, this wavering feeling.

That's a little bit about that first kind of delusion. I think you've all seen this, but maybe not really quite recognized that you can see the delusion there. You can recognize, "Oh, that being caught is delusion." The waking up is coming out of that delusion.

The second level—this kind of delusion based on our personal conditioning, our social conditioning or familial conditioning—we could say this is the views or beliefs or agendas that are associated with our own personal lives, our own history of conditioning. This doesn't have to be delusion, but very often we are so immersed in that perspective of our conditionings that we don't recognize that we're seeing things from that perspective and perhaps missing experience. Not seeing. We're so immersed in that perspective or view that we take it to just be how things are supposed to be.

We may start to feel or see into this kind of delusion when those views are challenged. Just a simple example: I think we all have some flavor of what do you do when you meet somebody for the first time. How close do you stand to them? How much eye contact do you make? Do you touch them or not? All of that is deeply conditioned, and it's not as if somebody sat you down and said, "Here's what you do when you meet somebody for the first time." You absorb it through the conditioning. You absorb it.

But then, you know, if you go to another culture or another place and people behave differently, you might feel the discomfort of that. That view is being challenged, that perspective. It's not really a view that we think about in terms of beliefs—it's just more like "this is how people behave in this situation." And it may be challenged if you go to another culture or see people behaving in a different way.

When we're immersed in a perspective like that, it's hard to see information to the contrary. This is what's called confirmation bias in psychological terms: when we have a particular perspective, our minds tend to take in information that agrees with that perspective and actively ignore information that does not agree with it. This is a lot of why we're in so much suffering these days.

The Buddha's version of this kind of understanding, which I mentioned the other day: whatever we frequently ponder becomes the inclination of the mind. And that frequent pondering may not be something we're actively trying to do. We're not actively thinking, "I want to think about this, I want to think about this"—we're just immersed in a perspective. And so that's how we see the world. That's how we take in the world.

So views happen. What's important is to recognize that we have views, and to begin to be curious about what views we are holding. We need to recognize that they're views as opposed to truth.

A way to explore this that I've found really useful: when I'm particularly caught in a pattern or habit of mind that feels deeply connected to my personal conditioning, when I can really be with that pattern—feel into it, hold it, open to it—self-hatred, for instance, or anger—really open to it, then I drop in the question: "What's being believed?" And I don't try to find the answer. It's like dropping a pebble into a pond and just seeing what the ripples are for that question. What's being believed?

Often there's an interesting thing we might notice. If a belief is apparent there, we might be curious about how strong the belief is. Are we really on board for that one—like 100%, "I believe that"? Or is it actually, "Gosh, I don't even consciously believe that"? Maybe we know that doesn't make any sense, but somewhere at a deeper level—maybe our two-year-old self inside—believes it. Understanding or recognizing that level of belief can be a useful exploration in this area of delusion: just beginning to recognize views are views as opposed to truth, just curiosity about what is. When we can see "this is a view, this is a view that's being held," there's a little crack there to be able to not believe it necessarily as truth.

And then there's this deeper level of delusion that I'll spend more time on: the human delusion, the patterns of delusion that we all share. In some ways our social delusions have commonalities—the underlying ways in which that conditioning unfolds are similar in us—but we all have our own flavors of those, and that's a lot of what we get to see, those flavors in our own minds. I had this aversive flavor, this self-hatred flavor, this analytical flavor, this arrogant flavor—all these flavors of my personal conditioning. Seeing with mindfulness really helps to weaken those patterns.

As those patterns weaken, we start to see much more the fundamental levels of delusion. I would say this is the most insidious kind of delusion. It's so hard to see. With viewed delusion, it's hard to see because we're often in a little pocket of people who share our views. With this human delusion, we all share it—it's really hard to step out of it and see how we're misperceiving, how we're misunderstanding things.

These distortions, these vipallāsa, are inversions, sometimes called an "upside-down making" of experience. They cloud our accurate perception of what is happening. They lead us to recognize, perceive, experience incorrectly. The four basic distortions, which Ṭhānissaro mentioned this morning: we tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent; we tend to take what is unreliable as a lasting source of happiness to be reliable; we tend to take what is not-self to be self; and we tend to take what is unattractive to be attractive.

This last one—taking what is unattractive to be attractive—is primarily around our perspective on our bodies, and I think it's included here because that is such a sticky area for us. To me it feels very much like a corollary or natural offshoot of the first two: we take things to be desirable, attractive, because we're taking them to be permanent and reliable.

These first three—taking what is impermanent to be permanent, what is unreliable as reliable, what is not-self as self—these are the ones I'm really going to explore. You might have recognized that they are essentially the flip side of what we often talk about as the understandings that happen with direct seeing. The vipassanā insights are around understanding the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. These are the understandings that free the mind—the seeing that frees, as Ṭhānissaro was mentioning, the title of Robert Beatty's book.

The seeing of experience as impermanent, unreliable, not-self—this will free the mind from clinging, because it is the misunderstanding that things are permanent, reliable, and self that leads to that clinging. As Ṭhānissaro also said this morning, whenever there is suffering—these distortions are at play. Anytime there's a sense of struggle or stress or suffering, at some level we are taking things to be either permanent, reliable, or self.

So a little exploration around recognizing these aspects—recognizing how we misperceive things in this way.

One of my teachers spoke about these kinds of distortions. That first kind of delusion I talked about, not being present, is not necessarily what's happening here. We can be present and knowing experience and still have the perspective that things are permanent, reliable, and self. My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya has said, "Delusion doesn't mask the experience or the object. Delusion masks the true nature of the object." So we see experience, we may be aware that we're meeting experience in the present moment, but we're seeing it through this distorted lens.

This first one—taking what is impermanent to be permanent. We've talked about this in various ways. Actually, we've talked about all three of these in various ways, so I'm going to just remind you with each one of some of the ways to begin to see this.

We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent for a couple of main reasons. Impermanence is masked by some different things that happen. One of the things that happens is that sometimes change is occurring so quickly that we don't see it as change. The example around this that my teacher in Burma, Sayadaw U Pandita, used is the example of a fire stick. He said if you have a fire stick—a sparkler, like we used as kids—you could wave it around in a circle, and it would appear that there was a circle of fire in the air. Moving fast enough, the way our perceptual mechanisms work, the image lingers. It makes the appearance of that fire—it's like the tip of the red lingers in our perception. There's a perceptual kind of holding, in a way. So this is partly the nature of our perceptual apparatus that creates this kind of misunderstanding around impermanence, that we tend to see what is impermanent as permanent.

At one point I was at an exhibit at the Exploratorium in San Francisco. I walked in and saw these bars hanging from the ceiling—maybe four feet long and about two feet apart—and there were flashing lights on the bars. I looked up and thought, "I wonder what that exhibit's about. Maybe I'll get to see that later." I was with my nephew, so we wandered through the exhibit, and after a while we sat down to have a drink and take a break. We were not too far from this exhibit with the bars, hanging pretty high up in the air from the ceiling.

He was kind of looking up at them and said, "Oh, it's a school bus." I looked up at the bars with their flashing lights and said, "What?" He said, "Oh, it's butterflies now." I looked up—more flashing lights. "What are you talking about?"

After some time, I had to look at it in a specific way. His eyes had apparently relaxed or something and been able to see it. But when my eyes kind of relaxed in a certain way, I could—actually, one of the first ones I saw was the school bus. Across that set of bars, probably about forty feet long, enough bars to fill forty feet, it turned into a screen. Like I was seeing a screen projected up there. And across that screen was driving a school bus.

The first time, when he said it was a school bus, I looked up and saw flashing yellow and red and black lights. But when I looked up this time, I saw the school bus. The detail on it—it's just bars with flashing lights. That's what was up there. That was the reality of it. But it was detailed enough that I could read the name of the school district on the side of the school bus. I could read the name of the school district.

That's the persistence of our minds that will create that continuity. I knew it was just flashing lights. It was impermanent flashing lights. And yet I could see the school bus. It was quite a powerful experience—this seeing of how our visual field creates that sense of permanence from little bits of information.

So this kind of delusion is hard to see through, but we start to recognize through meeting our experience that things we take to be solid are actually little bits and pieces of information, or sparks of sensation. We can sometimes see this as we settle in with a continuity of mindfulness. We can start to see the way our mind is creating that stability.

Another way we may not recognize impermanence is because the change is so slow. I was talking about change being fast before, but sometimes change is slow. The stability of our bodies, for instance—it is actually changing pretty fast when we look at the actual experience. But looking in the mirror day after day, it doesn't seem to change that much. We impute a sense of stability when change is slower.

And yet we can begin to be curious about this. We can recognize, "Yes, I don't look the same as I looked five years ago." It's like that axe handle that Tueri mentioned the other day—the slow wearing away of the handle of an axe. Day by day we don't see that change. But at some point we notice that the axe handle fits our hand like a glove. It's very smooth, and we know that some has worn away even as we didn't see it wearing away.

So sometimes, through reflection, we recognize there has been change that happened. We didn't see it as it was happening, but it was changing. This reflection can help us to have a more accurate perception of experience.

Another thing that masks change is concept. We've talked about this to some extent. The ideas that we overlay onto experience—when we're seeing experience from the perspective of the concept, we tend to miss the changing nature of experience. Our minds stabilize concepts. The mind can hold on to a concept and keep that concept going without recognizing that the actual experience is changing.

I think one of us did an example around the hand. Look at your hand and know it's a hand. You might not notice the sensation level too much if you're orienting to the concept of hand. But now, let go of the idea of hand and just feel the hand. Close your eyes and just feel it. That may create a different perspective on meeting that experience—the sensation level, the vibration, the pulsing, the tingling, very dynamic sensations. Concepts tend to obscure impermanence also.

We need concepts. Concepts are useful. But we need to recognize them as concepts. Again, this is the seeing. If we can know we're relating to something through a concept, then we have a better chance at not taking the concept to be the actual experience. Concepts are created in our minds. They're not the actual experience.

When we know we're relating to experience through a concept—and concepts often come with views, with ideas and beliefs and opinions—that pairing of concepts and views can be a really potent place for suffering and misunderstanding. When we can see a concept as a concept, there's a better chance that we might recognize that views coming along with that concept need to be held lightly.

In terms of exploring this aspect of delusion, investigating or bringing curiosity to it—we tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. So what is it that we're taking to be solid? For one period of time I had this kind of investigation. Certain things felt really solid, and I got curious about that. When something feels solid or really stable, what is that experience? Is it actually solid? Is it actually stable? This can be a curious exploration around that particular aspect of delusion.

Knowing that all experience is impermanent, when we're taking something to be solid or stable, what is that? Not trying to see it as breaking into bits, but what is the experience of that solidity? When I've explored that, I couldn't really find it. It did begin to break into parts—not because I was trying to make it break into parts, but because I was curious about what I was taking to be solid. How did the mind think this was solid? What is that experience of solidity?

Then there's the exploration around taking what is unreliable as a reliable place for happiness. I think this takes shape a lot around sense pleasure, or pleasure in general. When there is pleasure, we want it. We want to hold on to it.

And I think some of this sense that sense pleasure is reliable—it's kind of amazing sometimes. I was exploring this at one point because I was seeing that while I was having a piece of chocolate, my mind just thought, "Yes, this is really good." And somehow I thought that this was—I mean, even though I knew it was going to end, in that moment, the mind believed this was it. This is how happiness is found.

And so this is what our minds have done over and over again—sense pleasure is as good as it gets. And so while we may not think that it's going to last forever, we think we should be able to string them together, create a string of sense pleasures and just have a never-ending sense pleasure.

The Buddha had a teaching around sense pleasure and being curious about this, because it is that misunderstanding—I mean, it's kind of a corollary to impermanence. We think things are reliable as a place for happiness because we're taking them to be permanent. And so the Buddha encouraged us. He said, "Yes, you're going to experience pleasure. You're going to experience gratification when there's sense pleasure. So just notice. Be curious about how long does that gratification last?" And then I think the next encouragement is: and what happens when the gratification ends?

So that teaching or that exploration around sense pleasure is not to push away sense pleasure. We don't have to say sense pleasure is bad, but just look at our misunderstanding around it. What we see when we watch this process is that when we feel the happiness, the gratification of getting something that we want, and then when it ends—as it does—the next moment is looking for something else to want. Often. Not always. If we're seeing this very clearly, then it might just fall away and we might actually feel a sense of release and ease. But the habitual pattern around gratification, the one that tends to drive this misunderstanding or misperception of what is unreliable as reliable, is that when the gratification goes away, our minds immediately start: "Well, when was the last time I felt good? Well, when I had something that I wanted. So what do I want to want?" We start looking for something to want. We start looking for the next hit of sense pleasure.

So this teaching on exploring the gratification—I love this teaching because the Buddha is saying, "Start where you are. Yes, notice the gratification, but notice how long it lasts. Notice how far it extends." And then see what happens with that exploration. That will begin to help the mind see that it's not that reliable. We jump from one sense pleasure to the next, and we're missing that the whole process of jumping from one sense pleasure to the next is kind of missing the point that there is this unreliability. We miss the unreliability of it because we think we can get the next moment of sense pleasure.

So greed and aversion, I think, do arise out of this misunderstanding. We can understand that greed itself is that kind of pull towards something pleasant. That pull. That feeling of, "Yeah, I want that." Just that pull. The delusion embedded in greed is that having that is going to make me happy. Having that is going to make me okay. That delusion is embedded in the greed. Without that delusion, the greed is not going to arise. We think we need something—like, I need something pleasant to be happy.

Or on the flip side, aversion—the pushing away, that's the aversion, the wanting to separate, the nature of aversion to want to separate us from some experiences. So that's the aversion itself. The belief or the delusion embedded in aversion is that separation will make me be okay. It'll make me feel safe. I'll be fine if I'm separated from that thing. That's the delusion connected to aversion.

So again, in terms of curiosity and exploring this one, some of what I've talked about—the gratification, exploring the gratification—can be a doorway into understanding this side of delusion. Another kind of reflection or question: What are we relying on? What is it that we are relying on? And is it actually reliable?

We rely on a lot of things in the world for finding happiness—money, partners, having a particular car, whatever it might be. So what is it that we're relying on? That kind of question can be illuminating.

And then this last distortion: seeing what is not self as self, or taking what is not self to be self. We've talked about this quite a bit over the last weeks, but just as some reminders, taking what is not self to be self is a kind of misattribution of a sense of self to a process.

What's actually happening is just these five aggregates tumbling on—our sense bases and consciousness of each object. Joseph has a famous saying: there's only six things that ever happen. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and things going on in the mind. That's it. That's all that's happening. And yet we attribute a lot of things to those basic happenings. We attribute a sense of self in there, to this process.

There are natural laws that govern the processes unfolding in our bodies and minds—not a sense of self controlling or directing the experience. So we can investigate this. I talked about this last week, I think—the curiosity about when the sense of self feels strong. Again, to understand, we don't have to try to see not-self in self. The understanding happens as the sense of self is seen thoroughly. So curiosity about what it is that we are calling "me"—when it's strong, it can be much easier to see when we have that sense of self.

I pointed to this question or reflection on looking at the sense of self from this three-part perspective: feeling like mine, who I am, or me. Just recognizing the different flavors of the sense of self. That sense of "mine" is pretty obvious. The sense of "I am" the doer—the one who plans, who chooses, who acts, who's the agent—that's the next level. And then a feeling like it's happening to me: seeing that I'm not doing it, but it's happening to me.

We can see that what we are taking to be self is simply a tumbling on of process, these aggregates tumbling on. At times we can see that very clearly, and it's very freeing to see it. But at first we kind of just have to recognize that we are misattributing. We don't have to try to stop doing that selfing, but see it. Understand: this is a sense of self that's happening. We can see that as a process also—the sense of self is a process that's happening. Believing that sense of self is the delusion. When it's seen—"oh, this is the sense of self that's arising right now"—just as I said about doubt, "oh, this is doubt that's arising right now"—that's not delusion. We can see these processes at work.

These three distortions operate at different levels. There's the basic level—the most superficial—and Tuareg mentioned this this morning as well, but just to review: there are distortions of perception, which is the least sticky level. The example often given in the texts is around misperceiving or misrecognizing a rope coiled in a corner in a dim room as a snake. There's a distortion of perception—we see something and we misperceive it, we recognize it incorrectly. That kind of misperception can happen, but that kind of misperception is corrected by just looking a little more closely. We turn a light on and we see it's a rope in the corner.

The next level is the distortion of thought. We start thinking about that experience, and it gets a little more solid in our minds. That is thought. So in that instance: "that is a snake." It's attributing, in a way, a reality to our perception. It's a little more firm there. We think it is a snake.

Then there's the distortion of view—that's the third level of distortion. That's where our patterns of thought become rigid, and we take something to be... it's more than just we think it's a snake. It's like we think it's a snake and we can't be convinced otherwise. An example in this realm would be: we see the coiled form in the corner and think it's a snake.

And we go out of the place, come back, get somebody and say, "There's a snake in there. Somebody's got to get rid of the snake. Somebody take the snake out of there." The distortion of view would look something like this: you go in there and the person says, "That's not a snake, that's a rope." And you say, "Well, I know there was a snake in here. That's a different thing. There was a snake in here." That's the distortion of view.

So these three work in a kind of cycle. The distortion of perception builds to the distortion of thought, which builds to the distortion of view. And with the distortion of view, our further perceptions are then conditioned by that distortion. They reinforce each other. I had a great story to tell you about this, but I don't have time. Sorry about that.

This information about delusion can help you begin to recognize—even just remembering that when we're taking things to be permanent, reliable, or self, there's delusion going on. Get curious about that. How is it working? What's going on?

We can also use suffering as a pointer. Whenever there's suffering, there's some kind of delusion at work. One of the great explorations when we're experiencing suffering may not be to ask, "Is this suffering around impermanence?" That can get way too busy. But a simple question when we're suffering—"What's being believed?"—can begin to reveal the sense of "I need this to stay here," or something like that. The belief can point to what the deeper level of clinging is around. So when there's suffering, that exploration around what's being believed can help to find or point to the kind of delusion that's happening.

Non-delusion is not something we do. It's an understanding. It's insight. When we see through delusion, this is insight. We can't make it happen. But we can create the conditions for the understanding to arise by meeting our experience and being curious about the actual nature of our experience.

And insights themselves are also conditioned and impermanent. I've seen this so many times now—I've stopped getting frustrated by it—that we see through something, and for a little while, seeing through some kind of clinging, some kind of pattern... At one point I remember just being so happy. It was like somebody was in my ear whispering, "Clinging causes suffering. You don't need to cling." And the mind was just letting go of everything. I was so happy. I thought I'd figured it out. And it seemed so obvious—it seemed so obvious that clinging would create suffering. Why would I ever do that ever again? It was just so clear. And I think it was about an hour later, it was no longer so clear.

The understanding there, the seeing—it can't be unseen. We know at that point, we know that clinging causes suffering at a deeper level maybe than we had experienced before. When we have these insights, there's a deeper kind of understanding. And yet the delusion comes back. The delusion like, "Yeah, there's got to be something out there I can hold on to that'll make me happy. If not a piece of chocolate, then at least a concentration state—that'll make me happy."

So the mind goes back to that pattern of clinging. And knowing, having seen the clinging not be there, we can know in that watching, seeing the mind reaching out for something, we can know that's delusion at work, very clearly. Having seen through it with wisdom, it becomes much more obvious that it is delusion at work. And then at some point, several years later, seeing the mind just do this reaching out—

I was like, it was so tender almost. It was like, oh, yeah. Go right ahead. Try to find something. It was just this is what the mind was doing. And I could see that it was the habit. I could see it was just the pattern the mind was caught in. And there was so much capacity to just know it and see that it was delusion. It's like, okay, you try. I'll be here with you. Go right ahead. Try to find something that you can cling to and be happy about. Just try.

And it would find something and it would create something for a split second. And there would be a little bit of happiness. And then the whole pattern would fall apart. It just lets go. And it's so much more restful when it's not clinging. Oh, but there must be something. And I would just go right ahead. Seeing delusion at work. Because there was so much of that understanding there, it was okay to watch the pattern and know it was delusion. And just see the momentum, just the momentum of this pattern over and over again.

So having seen delusion, seen through it, when it comes back, it's not a mistake either. That's not like you did something wrong. It's because delusion is so deeply conditioned. It's human. It's human. One or two times of seeing through something is not going to undo years and eons of human evolution along these lines—to take what's impermanent to be permanent, to take what's unreliable to be reliable, to take what's not self to be self. These are so deeply conditioned.

So some tenderness there, some sense of, yeah, okay, this mind, it's going to do this stuff. And it can be seen. And so much freedom can happen. And the Buddha promises the ending of suffering with the ending of greed, aversion, and delusion—the seeing of impermanence, unreliable, not self.

Let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 28

Transcendent Dependent Arising

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this profound dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella illuminates the teaching of transcendent dependent arising (lokuttara paṭiccasamuppāda), which describes the conditions that support the mind's movement toward liberation. While dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) typically describes how ignorance leads to suffering, this complementary teaching reveals how suffering itself can become the starting point for freedom when met with the Buddha's teachings rather than confusion.

Andrea traces the chain of conditions: suffering gives rise to faith, which supports delight, then rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration, and knowledge and vision of things as they are. This clear seeing leads to disenchantment (nibbidā) and dispassion (virāga), culminating in release. She emphasizes that this unfolds naturally—like rain flowing down mountains to the ocean—though our habitual patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion can interrupt the process.

Particularly valuable is Andrea's exploration of disenchantment and dispassion. She describes the sometimes painful process of becoming disenchanted with our usual strategies for happiness, including experiences of fear, burden, homesickness, and even not wanting to practice. These are not mistakes but relationships to the truth of impermanence that point to deeper layers of clinging. Dispassion, she explains, is the gradual fading (virāga literally means 'fading of dye') of attachment, ultimately resulting in the non-arising of craving. The dispassionate heart, far from being cold, is spacious enough for deep compassion and the brahmavihāras to flourish naturally.

We spend a lot of time on practice, looking at dukkha. We talk a lot about exploring it in our meetings, working with it, and we all have been seeing these processes at work—the processes of body and mind that tumble forward towards suffering.

Marjolein gave a talk a couple of weeks ago on dependent co-arising, that teaching that describes the conditions leading to suffering, leading to dukkha. And we get to see this in our practice. It's very freeing to see that these are processes at work, as opposed to just being carried forward by them.

This teaching of dependent co-arising can really be thought of as an elaboration of the second noble truth—the truth of the arising of dukkha. Craving is the arising of dukkha. I think about this teaching in the moment-to-moment way that Marjolein described it. That whole chain, that process of suffering, is set off by the original condition at the head of the chain: ignorance. The conditions in the process tumble forward towards suffering. For instance, in that chain it says that feeling conditions the arising of craving. But feeling does not always condition the arising of craving. It's not what we can call a decisive support condition for the arising of craving. But ignorance is.

When feeling tone—when the experience of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—is met with mindfulness and wisdom, it doesn't have to lead onward to craving. In fact, it's seen, and it can just be pleasant. It can just be unpleasant. We see this in our practice, and we feel the freedom of that. We feel the freedom of it not tumbling onwards.

But this chain of dependent co-arising speaks to when ignorance is present. In a moment when ignorance is present and feeling is present, feeling will lead to craving. So that's perhaps the decisive condition that leads us on to suffering. When ignorance is arising in a moment, I think of it as if the entire chain of all those pieces is picked up at once. Feeling leads to craving, to clinging, to becoming, to birth, to aging and death, to suffering. It's all picked up at once.

But then the seeing of that ignorance with mindfulness and wisdom in a moment can shift that whole cycle. Feeling doesn't lead to craving. Craving doesn't lead to clinging, to becoming, to birth. We sometimes talk about it as a cutting of that cycle at that point, and I think it really is the seeing through of ignorance—seeing through those misperceptions of taking things to be permanent, reliable, self.

The teaching that describes the arising of suffering in its most general form is a teaching on conditionality. Conditionality works not only towards leading us toward suffering; there are also conditions at work that lead us away from suffering. And that's the practice. The same lawful processes that carry us towards suffering can carry us towards release from suffering.

The most general statement of conditionality in the Buddhist teachings goes something like this: When this is, that is. When this arises, that arises. When this ceases, that ceases. When this isn't, that isn't. This speaks to both sides of the process—the habitual, deeply conditioned process by which we believe that craving and aversion are going to somehow make us happy, that tumbling forward of those misunderstandings. And it also speaks to the conditions that we cultivate to understand suffering, to allow the cultivation and development of wisdom, which will release the suffering.

The suttas speak to conditions that support the movement towards freedom. Some of those conditions are the absence of arising—of craving, for instance, or ignorance. There's a teaching that says if craving doesn't arise, clinging doesn't arise. If clinging doesn't arise, becoming doesn't arise. If becoming doesn't arise, identification, birth into identity, doesn't arise, and suffering doesn't arise.

The falling away of clinging, the seeing through of ignorance—that shift where feeling no longer turns into craving—those processes just don't arise. When this isn't, that isn't. When this ceases, that ceases. It's an understanding that when things let go, a whole chain of conditions falls apart.

But how do we let go? How do we do that? That's the practice. The conditions we are cultivating here are described in a teaching called Transcendent Dependent Origination, which describes a set of conditions that support the mind towards the understandings that allow release, that allow the mind to see through ignorance. The chain of the arising of suffering falls apart when we see through that ignorance, when craving doesn't arise.

So freedom has supporting conditions. After the Buddha became awakened, there's a description in the suttas that says he reflected: How did that happen? He had this reflective process, asking: What was the condition that led the mind to be able to let go? That led to that release? That led to the seeing through of ignorance?

What was that? And he walked back through a number of things. Well, maybe it was that. It was the release that allowed that freedom. And what allowed that release was the mind being very dispassionate. He walked back through the chain of events that allowed for that freedom, that release to happen. He walked all the way back and arrived at suffering. And that's where he said, that's where it starts. The chain leading to the end of suffering starts with suffering.

Now typically we meet suffering with confusion, with ignorance. And that tumbles us into the pattern of dependent arising that Marjolein described. When ignorance is arising, it tumbles us forward into that process of the arising of craving, clinging, becoming, birth, suffering. And then suffering again. It becomes a cycle when suffering is again met with ignorance. It just perpetuates the cycle.

And yet the Buddha saw in that walking back that something different had happened. When suffering arose, there was some kind of faith that there was a possibility of another way. And that's where suffering, instead of going back to the arising of more suffering, took a different turn. There's a teaching in the suttas where the Buddha says something like, "I tell you that suffering either leads to ignorance or it leads to search."

The Buddha was unusual, I would say. He figured it out by himself. He was a rare mind that could see, and there was some piece in his system where, with that suffering, he thought, there's got to be another way. There's got to be another way to see this. And his mind could figure it out. The rest of us need the teachings of the Buddha to get there.

And so this suffering leading to ignorance or leading to search—all of us have that sense in our lives of, there's got to be another way. And we have been lucky enough to find the teachings of the Buddha. These teachings offer a path that says it's possible. It's possible to find freedom from this suffering. Now it's not easy, but it's possible.

This is where suffering, when it's met with the inspiration to find another way than just going in our habitual patterns, and we hear of a teaching—these conditions take us onto the path of practice. This is the arising of faith, essentially. When we hear that teaching and it inspires something in us to say, yes, this—I don't know maybe how it works, but this sounds worth pursuing. This sounds worthy of effort. And so this is where this chain of transcendent dependent arising begins. It begins with suffering being met with a teaching that says it's possible to be free from suffering.

These same lawful processes, just the conditioned nature of experience—we've used this quote several times: whatever one frequently ponders becomes the inclination of the mind. Several of us have mentioned this. And when we frequently ponder—that is, it doesn't have to be thinking about, but when we frequently engage in aversion and greed and delusion—that's what gets cultivated. That's what tumbles forward. But we can also cultivate faith. We can cultivate delight and joy. And these cultivations create the conditions for more of those to happen and lead us in the direction of freedom.

So this teaching of transcendent dependent arising—I'm just going to read right now the links that lead from suffering to freedom. And this is actually really profound. Suffering. This whole chain describes supportive conditions for liberation. Suffering is a supportive condition for liberation. It's not a mistake. We need to meet it in a new way. When we experience suffering with mindfulness and wisdom, it's not leading to more suffering. It's leading to freedom.

So these links of the transcendent dependent arising: the condition of suffering supports the arising of faith. The condition of faith supports the arising of delight. The condition of delight supports the arising of rapture. The condition of rapture supports the arising of tranquility. The condition of tranquility supports the arising of happiness. The condition of happiness supports the arising of concentration. The condition of concentration supports the arising of knowledge and vision of things as they are, which supports the arising of disenchantment, which supports the arising of dispassion, which supports the arising of release, which supports the arising of the understanding that freedom has been reached.

The sutta in which this teaching is given offers an analogy about this lawful process towards freedom. It gives the image of rain falling on a mountain, running down gullies and rivulets, finding its way to streams, then to rivers, and finally down to the ocean. It's natural law—the law of gravity, essentially—that water will flow downward and ultimately reach the ocean.

Now, just thinking about this analogy, we know that some of that water gets absorbed into the land and perhaps returns to the atmosphere before falling again. Not every drop reaches the ocean every time. This speaks to something about how the practice actually works.

This process is understood as being natural—the lawful unfolding of conditions. It's a natural consequence: when faith arises, there's another sutta that says there's no need for an act of will. When faith arises, it's a natural consequence that delight will arise. And you may have experienced this yourself—the confidence in the practice, the sense of "yes, this is possible," and the delight that comes with that recognition. There's no need for an act of will when delight arises; joy arises naturally. So it's described as an unfolding of natural conditions, a natural consequence for these to follow one another.

That doesn't mean we don't have to do any work. It's a natural consequence, and yet the habits of greed, aversion, and delusion are so strong that they will come in and interrupt—they'll throw a wrench in the works. So we do have to apply ourselves.

This path unfolds naturally, and there's a way in which feedback loops operate along it. Each pair of links is understood to feed back immediately to each other. For instance, faith supports the arising of delight, and with that arising of delight, the sense of trust deepens. Immediately there's a kind of nourishment—when the next quality arises, it supports and strengthens the previous quality. And there are multiple feedback loops in this process.

Just think about how practice works. The first time we truly experience understanding things as they are—just seeing clearly that the mind is clinging to something and letting go of that, seeing it's trying to hold onto something that cannot be held, seeing the impermanent nature of something and releasing it—the experience of that letting go is like a little mini cycle through this entire chain. There's been a release of holding. And that release, that seeing of impermanent nature, that seeing things as they are allows for freedom. The whole process then supports and nourishes our commitment to the path. It strengthens our faith. Delight and joy arise with that release. Happiness arises, and perhaps even a deepening of concentration. All of these qualities are strengthened through the process of practice.

We don't have to think about these things for this to be happening. That's one of the beauties here—because it is a natural unfolding, we step onto the path with faith and apply the teachings, and things will unfold. It will strengthen. You are all testament to that, having sat here for four and a half, five weeks, or even eleven, twelve weeks. You've seen this happen.

So in my understanding, with all these different feedback loops, it's not really what we'd call a chain. It's not that this thing happens, then this thing happens, then this thing happens. It's not that we have a little bit of faith and then delight, rapture, tranquility, and happiness simply cascade to the end. It's more like a spiral. We see something, and that strengthens our faith and deepens our commitment to the practice. We engage more.

We have more confidence. It's more of a spiral, I think.

So the first part of this chain really describes the conditions that open us to the understanding of things as they are. The middle point of the chain is that knowledge and vision of things as they are—that's seeing into the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. That's the midpoint. The conditions preceding that are faith, delight, rapture, tranquility, happiness, and concentration.

Suffering supports faith when the teaching is heard. There's a sense perhaps we have all experienced that. You would not be here if you did not have faith. The delight in finding the path arises with that sense of, "Oh, this is possible." So there's delight. We engage. That engagement brings a sense—potentially we begin to practice. The hindrances fall away. We begin to see some results and benefits. We feel the bliss of seclusion with the hindrances falling away. That's that joy, that rapture—one flavor of that joy and rapture. And then the mind settles even further to tranquility and happiness.

Happiness is said to be the supporting condition for concentration. I want to stop here and think about that a moment, because that was not what I thought would be the supportive condition for concentration. I thought a lot of hard effort was how concentration came about. This teaching points directly to settledness, ease, happiness. Not our usual kind of happiness, not our happiness of getting things that we want, but the happiness of a mind that is settled without the hindrances. That kind of happiness—it's a rare thing. And that settling of the mind, that is the movement towards concentration. The mind begins to collect.

So we've talked about all of these pieces. I'm not going to spend a lot of time with this part of the chain. This is really the tools that support, the tools and the qualities of mind that support our capacity to see clearly.

With that stabilized mind we start to see our experience, we see these processes. Actually, this mind of concentration, we could say, is applied to seeing the process of dependent origination that leads to suffering. We start to see the processes of body and mind, that feeling leads to craving. We see that. In a way I think of these two types of dependent origination as kind of happening together.

So this transcendent dependent origination, the cultivation of all of these qualities that we've been cultivating—what is it that we see? What is it that we do with those qualities? We look at the arising of suffering. We look at that process. We see it more clearly. We begin to see the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience.

As we begin to recognize the impermanent nature of experience, the unreliable nature of experience, the not-self nature of experience, basically we're starting to see through our misperceptions—those misperceptions I talked about in the delusion talk last week: taking things to be permanent, reliable, and self. We see through this exploration that our concentrated mind can recognize what I thought was permanent is not permanent. It's not reliable. It's not self. We see that we've been confused. We start to see through those misperceptions, those misunderstandings. We see that we've been kind of enchanted by those misperceptions. And the seeing through them—we become disenchanted.

This is the next link. I'm going to spend some time with this one and the next one, a little more elaboration on these two: disenchantment and dispassion.

Disenchantment comes when we start to see really clearly that our usual ways of engaging in the world, of finding happiness, just aren't the way to happiness. We start to see that those patterns of greed, that sense of "I'm going to get what I want, I'll find happiness there," that process I described this morning—the way we tend to go for those hits through craving, we go for what we want—we start to see that that getting, that having something, is not a reliable kind of happiness. We experience that.

We know that for ourselves. And so we start to see through these patterns.

Wanting and aversion are so powerful—such powerful forces in our minds. I mentioned this morning that wanting does not have to be followed through on, and that wanting can go away without being followed through on. But wanting is not going to tell you that. When the mind is caught by wanting, it's going to think it has to get what it wants. That's its delusion. Aversion is not going to tell you that you can wait until this goes away, that you'll feel better when aversion goes away. Aversion thinks it needs to do the separation. This is the delusion. This is the misunderstanding.

So we see that we've been enchanted by craving, believing its story, believing, "Yes, I have to get that thing." Enchanted by aversion, believing, "Yes, I have to get rid of that thing." The disenchantment comes when we see through these patterns and understand that they've been deluding us. We've been enchanted by them, and now we can see through them.

Bhikkhu Bodhi describes disenchantment this way. The Pali term for disenchantment is nibbida. Bhikkhu Bodhi is the modern-day translator of the Pali Canon—we owe him a great deal for his work. He describes the experience of disenchantment like this: "Nibbida signifies, in short, the serene, dignified withdrawal from phenomena which supervenes when the illusion of their permanence, pleasure, and selfhood has been shattered by the light of correct knowledge and vision of things as they are."

Well, that sounds pretty good. But my experience in the process of disenchantment is that becoming disenchanted is pretty painful. That may be the end stage of disenchantment, when the mind has seen through everything. But the process of seeing through these illusions—there are so many relationships that we have to impermanent, unreliable, not-self. There are emotional flavors, emotional relationships related to seeing the impermanent, unreliable, not-self nature of experience. Very deep levels of our being do not like these truths. We do not like seeing that things are impermanent.

I mean, at times it's lovely. Sometimes we do have these experiences where things are just coming and going and it's easeful and delightful. This can happen kind of earlier on in the path of practice, where we're just seeing things coming and going with ease. But at some point we start to see the deeper level of impermanence, the deeper level of this instability of experience. At some very basic level, we want stability. We want solidity. We want to know that everything is going to be okay, that we can land somewhere.

And so through this process of becoming disenchanted, we go through many relationships—almost emotional relationships—to seeing these truths. I think of these relationships as being connected to the deeper ways that we are clinging. It happens sometimes when we are seeing things changing very rapidly, experiencing the rapidly changing nature of experience, that it feels really uncomfortable. More than uncomfortable—sometimes it can feel fearful. We can feel dread and terror, even. It can be very strong because we don't like that feeling of instability.

But that fear coming up in the seeing of impermanence is kind of like deeper levels of clinging that are still there—the deeper levels of our being wanting stability, wanting it not to be so that everything changes so rapidly. I'm going to describe several different flavors of relationships to these truths that can happen. All of them—none of them—are a mistake. The path towards freedom lies through noticing those relationships, recognizing that they are pointing to the clinging around not wanting those truths to be so. Not wanting it to be impermanent. Not wanting it to be unreliable. Fear can arise from not wanting it to be unreliable.

And so the practice is to know the fear. You don't have to push yourself to try to stay with the unreliability. Know the fear.

Nibbida is sometimes translated as disgust or revulsion. And I have experienced it in that way. It's not a disgust or revulsion that has aversion in it. It's more like—the description of this is more like a dog who's really hungry and comes upon a bone, and that bone has been sitting out in the sun forever.

It's bleached. There's no value to that bone at all, no nourishment in it. But the dog, so hungry, picks up the bone and starts chewing on it, and realizes: there's nothing here for me. So it just drops it. Nope, nothing here for me. That feeling—there's nothing here for me, nothing worth clinging to, nothing worth picking up—that's also the sense of nibbidā. It can have a little bit of that quality of just, yeah, no. No.

Another flavor can be a sense of being impinged upon in relationship to this rapidly changing experience, seeing how quickly things are happening. Seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, speaking. Things going on in the mind. It's just nonstop. It doesn't stop. Will it cease? No, it doesn't cease. It just feels like such a burden. It feels so burdensome, heavy, weighty. Just... ah.

That needs to be seen. That "ah" is a relationship.

Sometimes the flavor of starting to see through the truths of taking things to be permanent, reliable, controllable, self, is a kind of homesickness. We see our strategies don't work anymore. We see our strategies are not going to make us happy. But we really wish they would. It's like we can't go home. We can't go back to that. And there can be a feeling of being a little bit lost, a longing for that stability, for thinking things were permanent even though we know that they aren't. It's kind of like, "I wish I could think that." There's that feeling of homesickness or longing.

Sometimes the flavor at this area of practice, when we're really starting to see through these truths, can paradoxically—in the flavor of that nonstop impingement—after a while, it stops feeling so burdensome and just starts feeling really boring. It's just like, yeah, yeah, I get it. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, stuff going on in the mind. Yep, yep, okay, yep. I get it, yep, wow. And so there can start to be disinterest. I'm just done. I've seen it. I don't need to see anymore. Just take me home, I'm done.

That's a relationship to this.

Sometimes this is called the "rolling up the mat" stage. I've experienced this as a not wanting to practice. Just, yeah, I'm done. I don't want to practice anymore. When I first stumbled into this, I was disturbed by it. I was disturbed by the idea of not wanting to practice having come up in my mind. I either thought it was true and I had to stop practicing—like I had to believe it—or I was being betrayed by my mind. My mind is betraying me! I want to practice. How can I get rid of this not wanting to practice?

I was practicing in Burma with some of this kind of thing going on, and I went to one of my interviews. The person ahead of me was—I knew she was clearly ahead of me on the path.

She was ahead of me in the reporting cycle, but she was also clearly, from what she was describing—I was very interested in hearing her reports because I could tell she was much further along the path than I was.

At one point she described, "I noticed not wanting to practice arose. And I noted it. I noticed it."

And I thought, You can do that? You can report to the Burmese teacher that not wanting to practice arose and just note it? It popped that bubble of feeling like it was a problem that this arose. Oh yeah, this is another arising. It's just another arising.

Some of you have described this in our meetings—not wanting to practice. Yeah, it's just something that arises. What a relief to know that all you have to do is say, "Yep, that's what's going on. Not wanting to practice." Carry on practicing, knowing not wanting to practice. Neither expressing nor repressing not wanting to practice. Just know it.

So many relationships in this place. And it can be a challenging kind of feeling, a bumpy place in practice, this disenchantment phase. But it's workable. Just keep going. Notice these relationships.

As the mind moves through disenchantment, it begins to touch into dispassion. The mind begins to deeply understand that holding on to something that is impermanent, unreliable, is going to cause suffering—and it just doesn't want to do it anymore. So the old patterns of craving, clinging, attachment begin to fade out.

The Pali word for dispassion is virāga. It literally means "to fade away"—like the fading of a dye. Rāga means color. It's often used to translate lust or greed, as Brian mentioned the other day. But it also refers to that colorful dye, and virāga is the fading of the dye. The fading out of these passions, of these patterns or habits of clinging.

To me, virāga—the fading—suggests a gradual process, which is hopeful because my practice has been very gradual. Think about what happens with the fading of a dye. If a cloth is dyed a bright color, you might wash it. Each washing, a little bit of the soap carries some of the dye out. You let it sit out in the sun, and the sun bleaches some of the color out. It's just a very gradual process. Slowly, over a very long time, the color fades out. The term itself suggests this gradual fading of attachments.

I think we see levels of this. Many of you have talked about seeing a letting go of some piece of a habit or pattern and feeling a lot of release and ease with that bigger piece falling away. For myself, I've seen big chunks of the angry identity fall away—so much ease when that level of attachment fades. Am I no longer having so much churn around relationships and particular ways people saw me? And yet then that becomes the new normal. We're no longer caught by all those habits and patterns. And then we start to see the deeper levels, the deeper layers of where we're still clinging.

This is the gradual nature of our path—a slow deepening to see through more and more layers of craving and clinging, a gradual movement towards the deepest kind of letting go.

Virāga itself is used in a definition of freedom: "This is peaceful. This is the sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbāna."

So here, the ending of craving, dispassion, nibbana—all equated, all functioning as synonyms. This dispassion, this deepest letting go, is that freedom. And freedom is not about getting anything. It is the letting go of these attachments. This is the peaceful. This is the sublime. The stilling of formations. The relinquishing of all attachments. The ending of craving.

Freedom isn't about getting anything. This is part of the paradox of this chain of transcendent dependent origination, because we do cultivate conditions that lead towards freedom, but it's not about acquiring them. The purpose of cultivating those qualities is in the service of letting go, not in the service of acquiring. That's a little bit of a paradox—that there is this cultivation of conditions, but ultimately freedom is about letting go, even letting go of the path, letting go of what has carried us to freedom.

The simile of the raft speaks to this as well. We cross the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion by building a raft. We put it together based on things that we find nearby. There's a construction there, a putting together of wholesome qualities that help us navigate that flood. And we navigate the flood. While we're navigating that flood, we can't jettison the raft. We do need to stay on the raft. But when we get to the other side, the Buddha says it's not helpful to say, "Gee, this raft has been useful to me, I think I'll carry it around on my head." Not useful. You set the raft adrift. You just let it go.

So the raft is needed to carry you to the other side. But the other side was not created by the raft.

There was a question: all conditioned things are impermanent, so why is full awakening not impermanent as well? It has its own conditions, such as seeing and understanding.

The conditions of seeing and understanding allow us to cross the flood. In this analogy of the raft, the conditions to cross the flood are to put the raft together. That allows us to navigate the flood. Once the flood has been navigated, once we've crossed to the other side, the raft is no longer necessary. And the other side of the river was not dependent on the creation of that raft. It was there already. That's the nature of it. It's there. It just wasn't reached.

So freedom isn't about acquisitions. The absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion—this is nibbana. The non-arising of greed, aversion, and delusion. This non-arising piece speaks to my sense of dispassion as well. When something is not arising, there's nothing being picked up. When something is not arising, the mind isn't reaching out for anything. It's not an action. It's not arising.

So dispassion—it's that gradual fading of the dye, but at a certain point the dispassion becomes the non-arising of craving, the non-arising of that ignorance.

Maybe we can get a taste of this, a taste of what this might be like, this non-arising of attachment. We've all actually experienced things like this. Think back to childhood, think back to when you were four or five years old and what your favorite toy was at that point. What was your favorite toy? You probably carried it with you everywhere, got upset if somebody took it away from you.

So as we grew up, as we aged, perhaps there was a gradual letting go of that beloved toy. There would be times when we simply forgot about it. We went off and played with our friends, then came back to it later and enjoyed it a little, but then we'd leave it again. And then at some point, we just forgot about it entirely. It ended up in a corner somewhere, and our parents picked it up and took it to Goodwill. We didn't even notice it was gone. Maybe we thought about it once and wondered where it went, but there wasn't much attachment to it anymore.

That's disenchantment. That's the process of disenchantment, the process of losing interest. Slowly we come to see something as not so enjoyable, and we lose interest. We think about it and there's just this sense of "nah, that's not interesting anymore." There's that quality of disinterest, and that's an aspect of disenchantment.

Dispassion, I think of differently—it's like being an adult now, and until I mentioned this toy, when was the last time you thought about it? As an adult, interest and disinterest around that childhood toy aren't even relevant anymore. They don't arise. There's simply the absence of longing, the absence of craving, the absence of interest in this thing.

So the practice opens us to this place where the mind just stops picking up what will lead to suffering. It stops being interested in that. It just doesn't go there.

I'll just say this to close: the word "dispassion" might sound a little cold. I think that's just the way we relate to it as a word. But the heart that is not clinging, the heart that is not picking up what leads to suffering—there's so much room in that heart for compassion. The dispassionate heart is also compassionate. It's not a cold place to be. It's a place absent of greed, aversion, and delusion. Those things actually bring coldness, bring constriction to the heart.

The dispassionate heart isn't flat. I think the dispassionate heart actually feels more deeply. The heart that is not constricted with greed, aversion, and delusion feels much more deeply. It feels the joy. It feels the sorrow. Those brahmavihāras that we're exploring, the open heart, the heart without clinging—it naturally has that connected quality. When it meets struggle and stress in the world, it experiences this quivering of the heart of compassion. When it meets joy and delight and happiness in the world, it resonates with that. And there's equanimity—not picking up of that pattern, not picking up of clinging to anything.

Thank you for being on this path. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 29

Layers

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines how our habits, patterns, and sense of self are structured like layers—using the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (khandhas) as a framework. She focuses particularly on the saṅkhāra aggregate (volitional formations), which the Buddha compared to a plantain tree: appearing solid but revealing no core when its layers are peeled away. This analogy illuminates how our personality and self-concept are constructed through layering, with nothing solid at the center.
> Fella challenges the common assumption that we must dig deep to find and fix our core issues. Instead, she advocates for meeting only the outermost layer of experience with gentle, continuous mindfulness—like Sayadaw U Paṇḍita's image of rubbing a bowl with a soft cloth. She introduces practical approaches: balanced effort (light as holding a helium balloon with thumbtack-covered hands), acceptance as the path through layers, and the mantra "this is nature" to recognize all mental states as natural processes of causes and conditions.
> Through personal examples of working with anger and self-hatred, Fella illustrates both the gradual cultivation path—like the Buddha's "rotting rope" analogy where mindfulness slowly wears away clinging—and sudden insights that can dissolve entire patterns. She offers a detailed account of exploring depression on retreat, demonstrating how patient attention to obvious experience naturally reveals underlying causes. The talk concludes with guidance on avoiding attachment to meditation experiences and trusting simple awareness of what is most obvious as the complete path to freedom.

Much of what we see when we sit on retreat like this is the habits, the patterns of our mind, the momentum of years and years of our mind functioning in a certain way.

It seems to me, especially with this style of practice, this open awareness practice, that we really get to know our mind's patterns very intimately. Because we're not coming back to a primary object quite as much. Coming back to that primary object, we have the opportunity to bypass our habits and patterns somewhat. But just staying in the open awareness, we really get to see our minds. It's like mind 101.

Often we have a sense of our habits, our patterns, our beliefs, our emotions being layered—that there's kind of a layer upon layer of different moods, emotions, patterns. So we often have this idea or this structure in our minds of our experience being layered.

The Buddha also used this analogy of layers in one of his teachings, the teachings of the five aggregates. The term aggregate translates the Pali term khandha, which, while aggregate sounds like a very technical term, khandha is a very ordinary word. It basically means heap or bundle. What the five aggregates describe are five heaps of experience, five different ways to break our experience up, or five different categories or groups or heaps of experience.

These five are the body, consciousness, perception, feeling, and what are sometimes called volitional formations.

The body is pretty clear—the experience of the physical, in the physical realm. The other four aggregates refer to aspects of the mind. Steve has mentioned three of them several times: consciousness, perception, and feeling. These form the bare functioning of the mind. They're the core, bottom-level functioning of the way the mind experiences things. There's an object, and then the mind contacts that object. There's the bare knowing of that object, and that object is perceived, is recognized, and there's a feeling tone to it—whether it's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. This is the bare taking in of experience, these three of the five aggregates.

The fifth aggregate is sort of the dumping ground for everything else in our experience. It includes our habits, our emotions, our patterns, our sense of self, as well as other states of mind. And this is where the Buddha's analogy using layers comes in.

He had an analogy for each of these five aggregates. They're great analogies, and I don't have time to go through all of them, but I'll tell you the analogy he gave for this volitional formation. Saṅkhāra is the name of the aggregate in Pali. He said that this aggregate, these mental formations, these volitional formations, are like a plantain tree, a banana tree.

What I understand the analogy to represent is that if you look at a plantain tree, it looks pretty solid. It's about that big around, at least the banana trees I've seen. They're pretty thick. They stand up. They're pretty sturdy-looking things. But if you start trying to find the center of the banana tree, what you do is peel away layers. Each leaf comes down and joins at the base of the plantain tree. You start peeling away the leaves, looking for the center of this banana tree. And when you have peeled away all the leaves, you've got a pile of leaves and nothing else.

There's no center. There's nothing there in the middle. The structure of the banana tree is created by this layering of leaves.

Much of our usual everyday experience of ourselves is found in this aggregate of the volitional formations—our emotions, our habits, our sense of self, the ways in which we normally experience our life, ourselves. Much of it is found in this aggregate.

So this analogy of layers is the one I'd like to explore this evening. I think this analogy is so interesting and so useful because, just as in the peeling away of all of the leaves from the plantain tree you find nothing in the middle, the structure of our personality, the structure of our sense of self, is created through this kind of layering effect. And there's nothing solid in the middle. You go through all the layers and there's nothing there—no solid core, no solid thing in the middle.

So often, as I said, we do have this sense of our experience having layers of sorts.

And we seem to think that what we need to do is get down to the core layer. If we just understood that core layer of our experience—the deeper fears, the deeper aversions, the deeper things underneath everything—then everything would be okay. So I think we often try to dive in to uncover the deeper layers of our experience.

But I found in my own experience of practice that that kind of digging is actually not as productive. What we really need to do in exploring all of these layers—whether it's a layer of habitual patterns of behavior or layers that create the sense of self—is actually just explore the outer layer. Just meet what is obvious in our experience.

There are several things I'd like to talk about with respect to exploring these outer layers of experience. Again, there's a quality of investigation that we need to bring to our experience. But what we often think of as investigation is digging—digging holes, pulling things apart, trying to uncover something deeper. But the way to investigate our experience is much lighter than that. Sayadaw U Pandita uses the analogy for investigation of rubbing a bowl with a soft cloth. Just that continual contact of the cloth with the bowl—that's investigation. It doesn't dig or penetrate or break. It does penetrate in a way, but it doesn't destroy the structure. It more just comes into contact with what is. It meets what is. And the curious part about that gentle rubbing is that it begins to reveal what is underneath.

Even though we often have a sense of what lies underneath—or we think we have a sense of how our patterns are layered on top of fears and vulnerabilities and insecurities—I think we all have explored our minds to some extent. In this particular culture, we tend to have an almost psychoanalytic approach to our lives. Many of us have this understanding of deeper layers to our experience. But I find in the practice it's not so helpful to hold those assumptions. They are assumptions about what lies underneath. Or at least we should hold them very lightly, if possible, so that they are not operating as a filter through which we are exploring our experience. Often when we hold ideas, beliefs, and assumptions, our perception of our experience is altered by those beliefs. So it's most helpful in the practice, in that meeting of our experience, that direct contact with our outer layer, to have no assumptions about what is underneath. Just recognize and be with whatever is most obvious in your experience.

Another helpful way to explore this outer layer is through using a balanced effort. This balanced effort is very light. When we use the word effort, often it has a heavy sound. In our normal everyday use of the word, it's a marshalling of resources to apply our strength and energy to something. But in the practice, the effort is much lighter than that.

Just now in your experience, notice the sensations of your hands. Notice your seat on the chair or bench or cushion. How much effort did that take? It's very light. It almost takes no effort at all to simply direct the mind and contact experience. That is the kind of effort that is most helpful in this practice. It's very light, but it needs to be completely continuous in order to be penetrating—in order for the combination of that effort with the mindfulness to really meet the experience.

I came up with my own analogy about this effort. It's kind of like the effort you might make to hold a helium balloon if your hands were covered with thumbtacks. It's got to be really light. But it's got to be a continuous pressure. If you let up at all, the balloon will float away. If you push too hard, the balloon will pop. So it's that kind of effort.

It's not so much about marshalling our resources, thinking, "I'm really going to be mindful this whole sitting." It's more about recognizing how frequently we need to refresh our mindfulness. When our mind is drifting and dull, we may need to remind ourselves more often—every half second—using perhaps the noting as a tool to keep ourselves present, or using some kind of reminder to help us stay present. But as the mindfulness and the effort gain momentum, that more continuous reminding actually gets in the way, and then we can allow the effort to unfold more on its own. So we need to have some discernment about how to apply this effort. But in general, it's really helpful to think of it as being really light.

There were times in my practice—I tend to be one of those driver types—when I would be noticing my experience and recognizing that I was over-efforting. I would consciously let go, back off. How much can I let go of trying and still stay present? At some point the mind would wander. But I could let go a lot before that would happen.

So it's an interesting place to explore how much effort we really need. It's very light—much more about the lightness, but also about every moment remembering to keep reapplying that very light effort.

Another quality that's very helpful as we explore the layers of our experience is acceptance. Just acceptance. If we could just accept whatever is happening. That actually, to me, in my experience, has felt like the path through all of the layers of experience. It's in the acceptance of an experience that it really reveals itself and reveals its true nature, and it potentially also reveals the causes and conditions that had it come into being. So acceptance can reveal the underlying causes as we just stay with the experience.

Non-acceptance is a kind of glue. I think of it as a glue that holds all of those layers together and creates that sense of solidity. Non-acceptance can take several forms. It can take the form of resistance, the basic aversive energy. It can take the form of wanting or desire, that holding-on energy. Or it can take the form of the delusional energy of basically not wanting to know, not wanting to experience.

Working through deep habits and deep patterns—we've spent years accumulating these habits and patterns, and it can take a long time to really see through and completely understand how they are put together. So they may not disappear suddenly. This is really part of the gradual cultivation that Joseph talks about.

There's one analogy the Buddha gives about this path of practice, this gradual cultivation path of practice, that's one of my favorites. I call it the rotting rope analogy, and I'll give you an impressionistic version.

If there's a shipwreck and the ship is broken up into bits all along the shore—pieces of wood, pieces of rope, stuff just strewn everywhere—over the course of years, the sun, the sand, the wind begin to wear down all of these bits of debris scattered on the beach. I particularly like to think about the ropes lying there on the beach, and how as the rope is worn away by the sand, the sun, and the wind, it still looks like a rope. But it's losing its internal structure. And someday, at some point, one grain of sand, one breath of wind may finally let that whole thing come apart. But it's such a subtle release that it may not be very obvious. It's not a dramatic kind of falling apart. It's a very slow, gradual process.

The Buddha says that the rope is like the clinging in our mind, and the sun, the wind, the water are like mindfulness wearing down the clinging. Part of the reason this analogy is one of my favorites is because I seem to be shorter on the sudden awakening side of things and longer on the gradual cultivation side. A few of those sudden awakening experiences, but this gradual cultivation really resonates with me.

I've had some experiences that have so clearly shown me this is operating over time. One of the key habits and patterns in my experience is aversion, often manifesting as anger. I had a very strong anger at a particular person for years and worked with this pattern of anger over and over again for years and years. At some point I realized that my mindfulness was kind of weak in comparison to this pattern. When I tried to apply mindfulness to the anger at this particular person, the mind would just get sucked into the anger. I realized that bringing mindfulness to it wasn't so helpful, actually, because I would get lost in the anger.

So I came up with this little mantra for myself to put it aside. I shortened this mantra to "not now." What that meant to me was an acknowledgment of the anger: "I see you, anger. My mindfulness is not strong enough to meet you, but I will pay attention to you when my mindfulness gets stronger." So it wasn't an aversive putting aside. It was a very gentle putting aside of the anger. This is the way I actually worked with this anger for several years. I didn't look at it directly. I noticed it when it came up—I clearly noticed it.

"Yes, there's that anger again. Okay, not now." And I would go to something neutral in my experience, putting my attention into my feet on the ground. It often seemed I was walking when I would get into one of these anger episodes.

Over the course of the years, I began to realize that the episodes of anger were getting further apart. I began to recognize, "It's been a few months since I've experienced that anger." And one day I realized it's been a very long time since I've experienced that anger. Even in the recollection in that moment of the person that I was angry with, I couldn't call up the anger. I was kind of amazed. I thought, "Wow, is it actually gone?" I didn't trust it. But it had disappeared. It has never come back. And it disappeared without my seeing it disappear—just through this being willing to meet the anger when I could, with what mindfulness I could, and not being aversive about it. This very gentle touching of this layer of anger proved to be very powerful.

Sometimes we can actually break through a layer in this kind of sudden awakening. We can have a sudden insight into the empty nature of a particular pattern, and then suddenly the whole thing just falls apart. I had an experience like this around self-hatred.

On one retreat, at one point I was in such despair around the self-hatred. I thought, "This is so deep." Again, I was seeing all the layers. I had seen how deep it went into my childhood and how many ways it was conditioned and put together into the structure of self-hatred. I thought, "I'm going to have to be fully enlightened in order for this to go away."

But on that retreat, at one point, just being willing to be there with it without that resistance, with complete acceptance of the self-hatred—at one moment there came the recognition of the pattern appearing as just an empty phenomenon. The pattern fell apart in that moment. And in that moment there was this little surge of complete bliss: "Never again, it's gone, it's gone forever." Then fortunately the mind was a little aware of that tendency and realized, "No, the causes and conditions have come together for me to see through it in this moment, but it doesn't mean it's gone forever."

In that particular case, that insight into the empty nature of that self-hatred cut pretty deeply into the pattern. The way I see it now in retrospect, looking at what is happening for me around this now, is that it cut the belief in the self-hatred. Those thoughts still appear—"You're no good"—they still come up, but there's no belief around them. There's not that formation of layers upon layers of self-hatred that arises because of a thought. These kinds of insights can be very penetrating and can really allow a sudden dropping of huge patterns that we've held for years.

So we don't know how long it will take to work through our habits, our patterns, these layers of experience. But there are some basic instructions for whatever we're paying attention to: observe what is obvious about what is actually happening with as much acceptance as possible. And if there is non-acceptance, notice that. We can often check into this non-acceptance through checking the attitude to our experience—a simple way of noticing what our relationship is to what is actually happening.

I'd like to go through an example of how this unfolded at one point in my practice, of how using this very gentle approach of just seeing what's there and looking at the resistance unfolded in a particular retreat for me. There's a lot of instruction—useful tips, I guess—in this example, which is why I'm going to use it. When I went back through it I realized there are a lot of good little tools that are helpful here.

This example took place on a long retreat I was doing in Burma at Sayadaw U Tejaniya's monastery. I was doing this practice that you are working with here. And I was noticing that my walking meditation was not so pleasant. I would be doing the walking meditation and I'd notice these contractions in the heart, these contractions in the throat. I began noticing that it was primarily happening every time I turned around to start the next path. I just kept observing it, noticing all of this, noticing as much as I could about this unpleasantness I was experiencing. It wasn't physical unpleasantness; it was clearly some kind of emotional experience that was unpleasant.

Finally I realized, "Oh, I should check my attitude." After a while of doing this, I checked, and what I recognized was not wanting to practice. I didn't want to be meditating. I didn't want to be practicing.

Now this is a really useful attitude to recognize. When this attitude comes up, we often think we either have to believe it or we have to get rid of it. But we can just notice this as an arising experience—just not wanting to practice, arising in our experience right now.

When I finally realized that this was a possibility—a way of relating to this mood or mind state—it was hugely freeing. Just noticing: not wanting to practice, not wanting to practice. That's what's happening right now. So in this case, while doing this walking meditation, I simply began noticing "not wanting to practice." That became my object. That was what was really happening.

Days later, hours later—I can't remember exactly; this whole episode unfolds over some weeks—more walking meditation, more unpleasantness. Aches in the head, resistance. And in this particular time, I began noticing with that resistance that what seemed most helpful was not actually trying to be with the resistance, but rather allowing the resistance to be there and recognizing that it was one among thousands of things going on in the present moment. My lens of the present moment got quite big. There's the breeze on my cheek, and there's the sun, and there's the movement of the walking, and there's the resistance, and there's my feet on the ground, and there's seeing, and there's the resistance—so that I'm just touching into it occasionally.

I find this technique extremely helpful when something is either hard to be with, when we are pulled into something if we try to bring close attention to it, or when we've got this agenda of "I'm going to pay attention to this and figure it out"—which is a very common one for me. So it's more like just letting it be at a very light level and touching into it as the mind naturally touches into it. Really, a lot of what we're doing here is noticing what the mind is already doing, connecting with what the mind is already doing. And the mind is already noticing many things along with the resistance. So not trying to have an agenda about fixing the resistance seemed to be most helpful for me in this particular scenario.

Then again, some days or hours later, I began noticing while walking—the walking did not get pleasant for quite a while on this retreat—a low-grade depression that was happening. This was new. I hadn't really seen the depression before. I'd seen the physical aches and the resistance, but it took a while to actually contact this depression. Through this gentle being with the outermost layer, this gentle touching of the outermost layer, the depression began to reveal itself.

I noticed these physical sensations I described earlier—the contraction in the throat, the contraction in the heart. I noticed resistance; I didn't like the depression. I noticed that I thought it wasn't supposed to be there. As a good meditator, I should not be experiencing depression. I noticed that when the depression wasn't there, when there was happiness, there was this feeling: this is the way it's supposed to be. And there seemed to be a direct connection between the "supposed to be" of the happiness and the "not supposed to be" of the depression.

I noticed that depression could arise when the mind was calm and tranquil and peaceful. That seemed to be one of the places where it appeared. This kind of thing happens more often than you might recognize. When the mind gets settled and calm, equanimous, peaceful, we can be drifting in that peaceful state and not really connected to it. In that state, the mind is actually not so comfortable sometimes. It's much more used to drama. And in that space, it will find things to be averse to or find things to crave. It's not so happy just hanging out in that space.

So it's really interesting to pay attention closely when the mind gets into that peaceful state. Don't just ride it and hang out there—that kind of gives the habits room. The way I look at it is that when we get into that very peaceful state, the habitual tendencies we have are just waiting to find a moment of non-mindfulness to erupt. Not that it's bad for them to erupt, but notice when they do.

I observed this depression, and what seemed to be happening—this wasn't something I was doing so much as what seemed to be unfolding in my awareness—was that I was recognizing this depression when it was there through three basic frameworks: either the depression itself, or the resistance to the depression, or the absence of depression. Just noticing those three valences, I tracked them. When am I depressed? When is the resistance there? How did that change the feeling of the depression? And what is it like when the depression is gone? Sometimes there could be a very rapid oscillation between these different states.

Some time later, again in the walking, I began to notice or recognize that the resistance to the depression was a natural process of the mind. It too was simply created by causes and conditions. And that recognition actually showed me that I had considered the resistance to be a problem—that the resistance was something that needed to be gotten rid of in order for me to be properly mindful.

Recognizing the resistance itself as a natural process of the mind didn't change the experience of those three different valences—the depression, the resistance to the depression, and the non-depression—but it allowed the observation to flow much more freely. There was much less contraction or any kind of holding around the experience of those three states.

This points to a teaching that Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about. He actually points to a mantra of sorts to use at times, and that mantra is: "This is nature. This is nature." I use that a lot in my experience when I'm practicing in this style, as a reminder that whatever is happening in my experience is simply a natural process of causes and conditions. It's just as natural as a flower blooming, or as natural as a tree aging and rotting and falling in the forest. "This is nature"—a very helpful pointing for the mind. It can open the mind to that more balanced, equanimous space of just being with experience.

Some time later, doing walking meditation, I noticed that I was calm. And almost immediately a very strong vigilance arose to keep on the lookout for depression arising. I checked into the attitude around this vigilance because I wondered, is this skillful or not? I didn't see any particular unskillful attitude around it. But after even just a few minutes of this vigilance, the mind got tired. There was a kind of exhaustion that began to set in. So I got a sense that something was a little off here, because there was too much energy going into this vigilance.

Checking into that vigilance a little more carefully, I saw there was fear underlying it—a fear of the re-arising of the depression, a kind of wanting to track the calm really closely so that I could catch it just as it arose so it wouldn't get out of hand. There was that fear underneath. And just hanging out with the fear, I could simply hang out with the fear, and the depression did not arise. Just hanging out with what is most obvious.

In the sitting period immediately following this particular walking, I went back to my room and got into my meditation posture. I immediately noticed the sensations I had been feeling in the walking arise. There was the contraction in the heart, the squeezing in the throat. This was unusual because I had not been experiencing these sensations in the still posture, only in the walking. But the mind was pretty open and was able to just be with that experience of the contraction. No resistance whatsoever.

And I watched it get really big, that feeling of the contraction. It felt like it grew and grew. I let it get as big as it wanted to. And at some point it flipped and turned into metta.

It was a beautiful, open state of metta. And there was this thought that arose almost immediately: "This is stupid, this is sappy, this is corny." And I laughed. But I saw in that moment that the pattern of the depression had been through a resistance to the metta—a kind of sense of sappiness, that Hallmark greeting card feeling about metta. "No, this isn't me." There had been a resistance to opening that connection, that feeling of connection.

After that moment, the depression didn't come back again. Now, I'm not saying that I was in a state of expanded blissful metta. What I saw in that moment was that I've got a lot of work to do around this. But having seen the resistance to the metta, having seen the attitude toward the metta, it was no longer operating underneath, hidden away, and no longer had the power to create that feeling of depression.

Sometimes when a layer drops away, we can get complacent about a particular pattern, about paying attention to the habits and patterns. We can feel like, "Oh yeah, I figured that one out." Sayadaw U Pandita often talked about three layers of habit. There's the layer of habit that erupts into bodily action. There's the layer of habit that erupts into thought but may not trigger bodily action. And there's the underlying tendency toward a habit. One of the layers—the layer of habit erupting into bodily action—can fall away. But the underlying tendency is still there. The thoughts arising in the mind are still there. And if we get complacent around those layers, the pattern can reform itself.

So it's really helpful to keep track of this, especially when a pattern begins to unravel—to pay more close attention to the subtle thoughts. Like in my self-hatred example, the subtle thought of "you're no good" arising.

Even though there's not much belief associated with it, I try to take care to recognize that thought.

The solid sense of self can be created through a reinforcing cycle of habits—of identification with habits or belief in a habit. A solid identification around a pattern happens because of layers upon layers of these beliefs and reinforcing identifications.

For example, I used to think of myself as a miserable person. That miserableness, that belief in being a miserable person, made me perceive my experience as miserable and reinforced that miserable self. Even times when I was happy, I had such an identification with being miserable that I would recognize, "Well, yeah, I'm happy now, but I know I'm really a miserable person." This layering can create self-fulfilling prophecies. Our habits, our patterns, our beliefs affect how we perceive the world.

So if we start paying attention to the outer layers of our experience, these habits and patterns can start to dissolve. Bringing attention to the happiness without that belief of being a miserable person—or at least suspending the belief—we actually begin to see that we are not in the states we identify with a lot of the time. I began to discover I wasn't miserable a lot of the time. It began poking holes in that identification.

Really allowing ourselves to be with what is happening, letting go as much as possible of beliefs—or at least recognizing that the belief is there so that it's not operating unseen—as we keep exploring, we see layer upon layer dissolving. And like the plantain leaf, there's nothing in the middle. There's nothing in the center. Just simply a process of things being experienced and things being known.

This layer-like quality can also manifest in our meditation experiences. Beliefs can get built up around our meditative experiences that then, like my belief in my miserable self, begin to alter our perception of our meditative experience, and we view our experience through this framework.

Sometimes in our practice, especially in early times, we start to experience very interesting things in meditation. Our body might start to feel really big, or very heavy, or really short—just some very interesting perceptual experiences that happen in meditation. Sometimes they're accompanied with pleasantness, and they're often accompanying concentration. We start to think that these experiences mean concentration, and we think that in order to have concentration we must have those experiences.

But what seems to happen over time is that as we get familiar with these altered perceptual experiences in meditation, they are no longer quite so startling or unique or interesting. They begin to become less predominant. I don't know exactly what happens to them—whether they just don't appear or whether they're simply not attended to, like, "Oh yeah, there's that, and it's no big deal." So it doesn't become such a big thing in our experience. But if we have the belief that these experiences need to be there in order to be concentrated, it will disrupt our ability to get concentrated.

Trying to get back to what something was like is suffering. It's grasping after some idea of a pleasant experience, perhaps, or some belief of good meditation: "This is what good meditation was. Even if it wasn't pleasant, it was flowing and clear. That's what good meditation is." Assuming our meditation isn't working because we're not having one of these touchstone experiences is not so helpful.

I've found that every time I get stuck in one of these patterns, every time I get stuck in these beliefs about not really meditating properly or not being able to do this now, the way through is to just notice the most obvious thing in experience. Not trying to dig, not trying to get anywhere, not trying to do anything. Just notice what is actually happening. What is most obvious about what's actually happening.

Sometimes in meditation we land in a new space, one we haven't been in before. Our experience gets really strange, different. It feels like we can't be mindful anymore. It feels like the mind is just continually wandering. Now, the mind continually wandering—of course that means things are going backwards. Obviously it means things are going backwards. But maybe not. Sometimes the mind settles into new spaces where it's like the mind has settled into a more subtle level of experience and doesn't quite know how to be there. It doesn't quite know how to connect with it. And because of that, it gets lost. But it's not because we've suddenly lost our mindfulness or haven't been paying attention. It's because our experience has shifted or we've landed in a new space.

So again, just seeing—can we notice? It's like, "Well, the mind is wandering a lot. What's happening?"

Oh, I see that as I pay attention to the breath, the breath gets so subtle it almost disappears. And that's when the mind wanders. Just notice what's happening. Just what's happening. Beliefs, ideas—put them on the back burner. Assumptions are not usually very helpful in our meditation practice.

So just to stress again, really the theme for me of this talk is: meet what is most obvious in your experience, whatever it is. It doesn't matter what it is. It might be peace and calm. It might be boredom. It might be not wanting to practice. It might be self-hatred, frustration, disappointment, irritation. Just meeting whatever it is, is the path. That is our path. That is our next step.

And being in that place of being aware, mindful of our experience without that resistance, without the wanting, in that place of acceptance of our experience—essentially that's the wisdom side, meeting with the mindfulness. And those two together take us right to freedom.

Let's sit for a few moments.

CHAPTER 30

Practice in Daily Life

Andrea Fella · 35 min

> In this practical talk, Andrea Fella addresses one of the most common challenges meditators face: how to sustain mindfulness practice when we leave the supportive environment of retreat and return to our busy daily lives. She acknowledges that the ideal of being mindful all the time, while beautiful, is extremely difficult to achieve without the supports of silence, stillness, and structured meditation periods.
> Fella offers two concrete approaches for establishing a daily life practice. The first involves choosing something neutral that happens regularly throughout the day—standing up, walking through doorways, or clicking send on emails—as a reference point for mindfulness. When we inevitably forget and remember later, that moment of remembering is not a failure but the actual beginning of practice. The second, more transformative approach involves working with emotional patterns and habits that cause suffering. Fella shares her own powerful story of working with out-of-control anger, describing how simply recognizing and naming the emotion created space around it, eventually allowing her to catch the momentum toward anger before it arose.
> The talk illuminates how mindfulness practice can reveal the subtle movements of mind, particularly the intentions that precede our actions. By catching these moments of intention, we gain access to choice—the ability to respond from wisdom and compassion rather than being driven by greed, aversion, and delusion. Fella emphasizes that two qualities are essential for this work: resolve, because we must keep recommitting each time we remember we've forgotten, and patience, because we are truly swimming upstream against the momentum of our conditioned habits.

This afternoon, I'd like to talk about practice in daily life. This was a question that came up this morning—a little bit about how we take this back. How do we take this practice back into our daily lives?

When we're on retreat, everything supports our practice: the silence, the environment, the schedule. Sitting in meditation actually supports the remembering to be mindful, to come back, to be present. When we're sitting in meditation, we're usually sitting with our eyes closed, in stillness. And so when the mind wanders off into thought, into one of these worlds that we create in our minds, it's pretty obvious when we wake up into the midst of that thought that we are not in that world, that we are attempting to meditate. This supports our ability to remember, to come back to the breath, to the body, to our direct experience.

When we go out into our daily lives, we lose all of these supports. So it becomes much more challenging to do this work in our daily lives. The ideal or the hope of just being mindful all the time is a beautiful goal, a beautiful ideal. And in reality, it's very, very difficult to accomplish.

I had a demonstration of this at one point. I was about twenty-three years old and I picked up the book Miracle of Mindfulness by Thich Nhat Hanh. I read this book and was very drawn to the teaching of mindfulness. I thought, "Wow, this is great." I was reading the book at night and thought, "This is great. I'll practice this all day long tomorrow." The next time I remembered it was when I picked up the book the next night. After a few days of that, I decided, "Well, obviously I can't do this," and I put the book aside. It was another fifteen years before I met mindfulness again.

The next time I met mindfulness, somebody had given me one of the books by Joko Beck. I think it was in one of those books—I'm not exactly sure; I've been trying to find out where I got this idea—but somewhere in a book I read that fifteen years later, it said, "Well, if you try to be mindful all day long, you're just setting yourself up for failure. So pick something, pick some things to be mindful of, pick some projects for your daily life."

James was suggesting this this morning in the question and answer, and I'd like to elaborate on this a bit, because this has been a huge part of my practice. In fact, in the early days of my meditation practice, I wasn't particularly interested in meditating at all, but I had some emotional patterns that were going on that I really was interested in understanding. I had the idea that perhaps mindfulness might help me with understanding those patterns. So I was very focused and had a lot of interest and motivation in exploring that particular pattern in my life.

In terms of picking projects for working with mindfulness, I like to suggest a couple of things for people. I teach this practice in daily life at the center in Redwood City where I primarily teach with Gil Fronsdal. I teach what I call a householder retreat where we get together on Sunday afternoon and I give some instructions about working in daily life. We have a daylong on Saturday at the end of the week, and we meet every morning and every evening during the week essentially to bracket our day with practice and support for working with this in daily life. It's an intensive week of learning how to engage with mindfulness throughout our day.

One of the main instructions I give for people is to pick something that happens regularly throughout your day that's kind of neutral. It might be standing up, it might be walking through doorways, turning on light switches. If you sit at a computer a lot, it might be clicking send on an email. Something that happens regularly throughout your day, which can serve as a reference point for knowing how much we're mindful.

When we're in sitting meditation, we have this reference point of the breath. We're paying attention to the breathing, and then the mind wanders off. When we come back, we wake up from thought and realize, "Oh, I haven't been paying attention to my breath." So there's that remembering. There's a kind of reference point that the breath provides to help us know how much we're lost in thought and how much we're present. That goes away in our daily lives as well. So choosing something that happens regularly throughout your day to serve as a kind of reference point is very supportive.

Now, if you do this practice—and I hope some of you will try it—what you'll probably find is that if you choose something, it'll be a long time before you remember it.

Like I said, we don't have the supports of our stillness, of the silence, to remind us about what we're trying to do.

So at some point you'll remember, oh, I had resolved that I was going to notice when I stood up. And maybe that happens when you're going to bed at night. Boy, I'm sure I must have been standing up all day long, and I didn't remember once.

That moment—which is the kind of moment when I, reading Thich Nhat Hanh's Miracle of Mindfulness, basically said, well, obviously I can't do this—that moment actually is not an indication that you have failed. That is the moment when the practice begins.

That moment of remembering, oh, I forgot to pay attention, or I didn't notice the thing I said I was going to pay attention to—that moment of remembering is a moment of mindfulness, and it's the moment that the practice begins. It's the moment when you have a little bit of an inroad into having the practice work, because you have remembered about it. You have remembered your chosen task.

So in that moment that you remember as you're going to bed at night, you can't actually go back and stand up all day long. But in that moment, just recognize what's happening right now. Check into your body. Is there tension? Is there ease? In a very light way, just what is obvious about what is happening right now?

Now, this lightness to the mindfulness is one of the keys in our daily life practice, because in our daily lives we have to engage in the content of what we're doing. On a retreat like this, we have the luxury of letting go of the content. Over and over again we let go of the thoughts and just come back to the experience of the body, not engaging in the thoughts. In our daily lives, we do have to engage in the content of what's happening. And so just the light touch of what's obvious about what's happening right now—and then just go on with whatever you're doing. Getting ready for bed, brushing your teeth, whatever it is.

And in that moment when you've remembered, make the resolve that you're going to keep trying. That's one of the keys here. Resolve that you will try again. So in that moment of remembering: what's happening right now, and resolve to try again to pay attention to this thing that you want to pay attention to.

Over time, what I found happening when I tried this the first time—what I picked was switching between DOS and Windows on my computer—the first time I remembered was when I was going to bed at night. And then as the days went on, I began to notice I was remembering more through the day that I hadn't remembered. So I was beginning to notice more of the remembering, but it wasn't exactly landing on the thing. And that's okay. Actually, this is a whole part of the point of this exercise—it helps us to get more of these moments of noticing just through our day.

And at some point you might remember right after the thing happened. Then it's getting really close. Then you notice that it's actually beginning to be linked with the event. And at some point you will notice right as you are standing up or right as you're reaching for a door. At that point, that task you've chosen can start serving as a trigger for mindfulness for you. When you stand up, it'll kind of pull the mindfulness along with it.

So this exercise is mostly about just getting familiar with what it's like to be aware in our day. In that moment of remembering, there's a kind of coming back into the world again. There's a light—it's like a light goes on. Getting familiar with what that feels like, this task of waking up, or vowing, dedicating ourselves to waking up for something that happens regularly through our day, begins to give us a sense of what it feels like to just be aware, just be awake in our day.

And this tends to then start to kind of leak out of that particular activity. We get more of a sense of when we wake up all through our day—a moment of mindfulness. Those moments happen all the time through our day. But what we typically do with those moments is we think we're supposed to do something with them. We walk down the hill and we see the golf cart coming up, and we see that, we're aware of it, we know that we're seeing the golf cart, but we're not really aware of the fact that we're aware of it. We think we're supposed to do something about it, like move out of the way. And that is a very good thing to do with it—that's what I mean by engaging with the content in our daily lives. But we can also recognize that we have woken up in that moment. We don't usually notice that quality of waking up.

What is that like? Just beginning to be familiar with that feeling is a huge part of this exercise I'm suggesting. That in and of itself is what I think of as the training wheels for daily life practice. The juice for daily life practice, for me, is in looking at patterns and habits.

Where we get caught, where we suffer.

And again, it's helpful to pick something—one particular pattern or habit, particularly one you might be interested in exploring, interested in understanding about yourself. That interest really supports our willingness to observe what happens for us around that pattern.

So patterns and habits are things like having a particular habit of procrastination that developed when you were a teenager. Or you might find a pattern going on with a particular coworker in the office. Now, most of us would not tend to call that a habit, but there may be a pattern that you're seeing developing. It's really helpful and interesting to pick some kind of pattern that happens regularly for you and that you are interested in exploring. If it doesn't happen regularly enough, your memory—your remembering to engage around it—is not as likely to get triggered. So picking something that happens kind of regularly.

Now I'm going to describe for you what happened for me when I worked with this. When I started my practice, as I said, I read this book and it said, pick something. Pick something that you're interested in. Pick a project. And as I mentioned, one of the projects I picked was switching between DOS and Windows. The other project I picked was the thing that got me into the practice in the first place: out of control anger. It was making me non-functional at times. I would just be in a rage. I'd kind of wake up in a rage at my computer, frozen, not able to do anything because I was in such a rage. This anger was getting in the way of my living my life normally, and I was very interested in understanding it, very interested in understanding what it was about.

In this book that I had read, it said it's helpful in paying attention to emotions if you simply notice the emotion rather than act on it. That didn't make much sense to me, but I was willing to give it a try and see what happened because I felt I'd pretty much hit bottom. I was not functioning very well.

So along with the switching between DOS and Windows, I resolved that I was going to remember, I was going to be mindful whenever I noticed that anger. The first time I remembered, it was a little different than the way it unfolded around the switching between DOS and Windows. Switching between DOS and Windows comes and goes so quickly. There's not much of an emotional charge around it, so it could be nighttime before I ever remembered. With the way anger was functioning for me—and I'm sure many of you are familiar with this kind of pattern—it had a cyclic, feeding quality so that the anger just kept getting worse and worse. I would work myself up into a rage.

So the first time I noticed, after I had made this resolve about the anger, was when I was in a full-blown rage. And I remembered, "Oh yeah," at some point during that time —it lasted for a while—"I said I was going to pay attention to this."

I didn't have a lot of instruction at that point. I was in the Peace Corps and I had read this one book. Basically what I did was recognize: I'm angry. Just recognize it in a very simple way. Yeah, I'm angry. I remember even thinking, "What am I supposed to do with this?" All I could do was recognize I'm angry.

That simple recognition is actually incredibly powerful. Incredibly powerful. I didn't have a lot of instructions on paying attention in the body. I don't think I even connected with the body for quite a while. But I recognized that anger was happening. It was kind of like that noting or naming—I don't know if you've talked about the noting—it was like just naming it. This is anger. This is anger. That noting itself puts a little space around the anger or around the difficulty, and essentially puts us into a place of observing it as opposed to being spun by it.

So I did this. I kept doing this. And over the course of months, I began recognizing that I remembered about this practice of paying attention earlier in the cycle of anger, so that I was no longer getting to the point of a full-blown rage. It was more like normal anger. And that to me was a huge indication that something's happening here.

With the mindfulness in the task of switching between DOS and Windows, I was seeing the mindfulness begin to approach the actual event. What was happening with the anger was that the mindfulness was kicking in, or I was waking up, earlier in the process of the anger. I was getting closer to the beginning, the arising of the anger. And in that seeing of just being with the anger—not in the full-blown rage—I could see, "Oh yeah, this is a little bit easier. I can be with this. This isn't quite so difficult."

It wasn't nearly as painful to be with that normal anger. And over months of just continuing this practice, I began to notice more of the beginnings of anger. It gave me such tremendous working room around my anger to do this exploration. It was quite helpful.

And then one day, I was in my kitchen, cutting an apple. As I was cutting the apple, I saw a memory of being with the person I was angry with—we were at a fruit stand. So I saw the connection between what I was doing and the memory. And I also saw that in that moment, I was not angry. But I also saw something like a freight train of momentum to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry. There was a desire, a momentum, to get angry.

But having spent the past several months really getting to know the suffering of anger, that hanging out with the anger essentially gave me very clear instruction: anger does burn me when I pick it up. It was a very clear demonstration of that teaching about picking up the hot coal. I saw that I thought somehow it was going to hurt the person I was angry with, but actually that notion popped pretty quickly because I was in the Peace Corps on a little island in the South Pacific and he was in California. I realized fairly quickly there wasn't much way that anger was going to cross the ocean and get to him. But it was burning me up. And every time I experienced that anger, I saw the suffering of it.

So in that moment when I saw that thought, when I saw that momentum, I didn't have to do anything, actually. It was like the mind itself said, "I don't think so. I'm not going to go there. I know this way lies suffering." And the mind just let go of that momentum towards anger. I stood there in my kitchen with the knife in my hand, waiting to get angry—because I hadn't had the experience of this person appearing in my thoughts without anger arising. And I didn't get angry. I was so blown away by that moment.

That essentially was the moment of verified faith for me, of seeing the benefit of this practice. I saw so clearly how this practice of mindfulness can reveal the subtle movements of mind—a thought leading to an impulse, and the mind just letting go of it. Now, I'm not saying I didn't get angry again. I worked with this anger for a long time. But I had a lot of confidence that this path was going to help. And so as the anger came up in the future, it was much easier to just be with it.

So picking some habit that you have some juice around understanding, and resolving to pay attention to it—even in the simple way of simply recognizing, "Oh yeah, this is frustration," or "Oh yeah, this is procrastination"—just that simple labeling is enough to make inroads into understanding this pattern. This is one of the most powerful ways we can explore our mindfulness in our daily lives: through looking at habits and patterns.

Sometimes I get the question of why do this? I hope there's been some clarity about why it's helpful. For me, at least in that example, the benefit around mindfulness was pretty clear—it gave me so much space around the anger.

Habits and patterns essentially run our lives. We operate on autopilot, it seems, much of the time. When we're not mindful and aware of what's happening for us, our habits and patterns are running the show. The ways that our conditioning has come together—those conditions are running the show if we are not aware of it. But through mindfulness, we have the opportunity to begin to break into those patterns and habits and see essentially moments of choice. Moments where, like I saw, there's the momentum of the mind towards anger. And I didn't actually have to make the choice—some wisdom in me made the choice not to go towards that suffering.

So essentially a lot of our practice—our daily life practice, our practice on the cushion—begins to open us up to making skillful choices in our lives. There's a lot of suffering out there in the world. There's suffering of racism, sexism. People lose their jobs. There's a lot of things to react to in the world. And reactivity is not such a helpful place to respond from.

In paying attention in our daily lives to our habits and patterns, we begin to see where we have choice. This exercise I mentioned about picking something that happens regularly through your day—at some point you'll remember it right as you're doing it. Just as you're standing up, you recognize you're standing up. If you keep engaging with this practice, at some point you will know you're going to stand before you stand. The awareness will kick in before you do it. And that's essentially the moment of noticing the intention to act.

An intention happens before every action of our bodies, every action of our speech, even every action of our minds. We can know we're going to move before we move. We can know we're going to speak before we speak. And we can know our minds are inclining towards a pattern before the pattern has appeared, as I mentioned in my example of the anger.

When we catch that moment of knowing we're going to do something before we do it, we can see the reason why we're going to do it. Often we can know the motivation. That motivation may be skillful or unskillful. It may be a motivation based in compassion, generosity, kindness. It may be a motivation based in greed, aversion, delusion. Beginning to see our motivations and making skillful choices is a huge part of this practice.

Sometimes I think people hear about Buddhist practice—this notion of just being with what is—and we think it means we're not supposed to try to change anything. What it actually means is that it's not so helpful to try to change things out of greed, aversion, or delusion. We may want to try to change something because we don't like it and we want to get rid of it. We may want to ignore something. We may want to just take ourselves out of a situation—"I can't deal with that, forget it, I'm just going to ignore it."

The practice brings us to a point where we can make skillful choices, choose to change something out of compassion, generosity, and kindness, as opposed to greed, aversion, and delusion. These practices I've mentioned begin to open us up to seeing our motivations, seeing why we do things. And it can be humbling—definitely humbling—when we see our motivations. Using, as James talked about, that compassion and letting go of judgment around unskillful motivations when we see them is so important. We don't always have control over our motivations.

So we observe. We notice. If you notice an unskillful motivation, can you let go? Maybe you can, maybe you can't. But following through with the awareness and noticing what happens after making these choices—this really is the training. We make choices. We notice what happens. We make mistakes. We're not going to be able to be perfect. And in fact, the only way we can learn is by making mistakes.

Joseph Goldstein, one of my teachers, often likes to say: we want insight into suffering without experiencing suffering. That's not going to happen. In my case with the anger, for instance, I felt the suffering of that anger really clearly because I was mindful of it. And then at some point the mind saw and let go because it saw where it was inclining. "Not going to go there. I know what lies in that direction."

I find that the sitting practice and these tools for daily life work together. We learn in our sitting practice how to open up to just what is happening. And in our daily lives, that's where we really meet our challenges. How we learn to engage in the sitting supports our ability to meet our difficulties in our day with some kind of balance of mind.

There are two qualities that are incredibly helpful as you engage in a daily life practice, and those two qualities are resolve and patience. Resolve, because if we simply think we're going to do this by just saying, "Oh, I'm going to try this," it's probably going to fall away. We need to resolve over and over and over again. Every time you remember, you've forgotten.

I'm going to try this again. Not as a beating yourself up, but just as a recognition: I've got to keep trying. This is hard. Doing this in daily life, the momentum of life is against us. We're swimming upstream, as the Buddha said. So we need to continue to make that resolve every time we remember that we've forgotten.

And patience—because it is so difficult, patience and kindness, compassion for how difficult it is. Recognizing that this takes time.

But I think if you try these practices, you will start to see, as I did, little incremental changes. A little more space around these habits. A little less being completely run by them.

CHAPTER 31

Energy and Effort

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this talk from a month-long retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of vīriya (energy) and sammā vāyāma (right effort) as essential factors on the path to awakening. She clarifies that energy itself is a neutral mental quality that must be coupled with wisdom to be skillful, directed toward understanding dukkha and cultivating the path leading to its cessation.
>
> Fella examines the sources that give rise to spiritual energy: a sense of urgency around awakening (saṃvega), wholesome desire (chanda), confidence (saddhā), and investigation (dhammavicaya). She describes investigation not as intellectual analysis but as a gentle meeting of experience—like polishing a bowl with a soft cloth—which naturally arouses curiosity and energy. The talk thoroughly covers the four aspects of right effort: avoiding unwholesome states not yet arisen, abandoning those that have arisen, cultivating wholesome states, and sustaining them once present.
> Practically, Fella addresses the art of balancing effort, noting that over-efforting leads to restlessness while under-efforting leads to sloth. She offers the Buddha's teaching on crossing the flood—"without tarrying, without hurrying"—as guidance for moment-to-moment practice. The key insight is that we need only enough effort to stay present for half a breath, then gently remind ourselves again, rather than forcing sustained attention. This light, continuous approach actually generates energy rather than depleting it, as we align with truth rather than resisting it.

I wanted to start tonight by introducing myself because I didn't have an opportunity to do that before. Having arrived late from Burma on Monday evening, my name is Andrea Fella, and I'll be talking this evening about energy and effort.

In the last few days we've been talking about meeting our experience, receiving experience, and moment to moment being with whatever presents itself. We've talked about meeting the hindrances and how our actual path is created as we meet them. The obstacles that we face moment to moment, if we meet them with mindfulness, become the path itself. Sally talked so beautifully about this—essentially, our spiritual journey, our spiritual path is created each moment as we meet whatever is arising. And as James said, everything is workable when we meet it with mindfulness.

So moment by moment, we meet our experience—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—whether it's blissful, easeful, and peaceful, or whether it's resistance, frustration, irritation, annoyance, or anger. We meet the experience with this kind, open awareness. And this is not easy. It takes courage. It takes effort. It takes energy, over and over again, to meet moment by moment what is happening in our experience.

The Pali word for energy is viriya. This is often translated simply as energy, sometimes as persistence, and sometimes as courage. This quality of energy to meet our experience has a dimension of courage, of willingness to meet whatever is presenting itself to us.

Energy itself, this quality of viriya, is a neutral quality in our mind. It can be directed either skillfully or unskillfully. We can have energy and direct it towards the cultivation of beautiful qualities of mind, such as mindfulness, concentration, and equanimity, or we can direct it towards desire, aggression, and ambition. This same quality of mind, this energy, is a kind of neutral factor, and it depends on what we are cultivating how skillful that energy becomes. So it doesn't really make much sense to talk about energy in the abstract. We have to look at it in terms of how the mind is directed.

We need to look at how energy is coupled with wisdom for our practice. The quality of energy that fuels our practice is an energy that is imbued with wisdom—the understanding of what is skillful and unskillful with respect to what leads to suffering and what leads us away from suffering. The quality of energy on our path of practice is energy directed towards understanding suffering, letting go of the cause of suffering, realizing the release from suffering, and cultivating the path leading to the ending of suffering. These are the Four Noble Truths and the actions associated with them that Howie spoke about the other night.

Energy appears in many of the lists that the Buddha talked about. Most of you are familiar with the fact that the Buddha was a great list maker, and these lists actually give us support and indication of what supports the various qualities within them. Energy, for instance, is in the list of the paramis, the ten perfections. In that list, it is preceded by wisdom, which really supports this understanding that wisdom needs to imbue energy in order for it to be effective for our spiritual path.

It's a crucial quality of mind, this energy. In one commentary on the list of the paramis, of energy it says: "It is entirely through the spiritual power of energy that the practice of all the requisites of enlightenment succeeds." This is a pretty strong statement. It really depends on energy—that we gather our energy and use it wisely—that we wake up, that we are able to meet our experience moment by moment.

I want to look a little at what supports energy, what supports its cultivation. One commentary says that the proximate cause of this spiritual energy is a sense of urgency around awakening—the sense that when we meet suffering, there must be a way out of or through this suffering. All of you have this quality or you wouldn't be here. You wouldn't have signed up to come for a month of silent meditation, sitting and walking. This quality is a sense that there is a possibility of another way to live our lives, another way to meet our experience. This sense of urgency brings in some energy.

The fact that you have all come here indicates that this energy is present for you. And to some extent, we need desire—we actually have to want to do this. If we didn't want to do this, we would never do it. This is not an easy journey. And this kind of desire is a wholesome kind of desire, a chanda that fuels our practice.

As we engage, as we hear the teachings, as we begin to practice them, we develop some confidence. And this confidence is also the ground out of which energy comes. When we have a sense that what we're trying to do is possible, an energy arises that moves us in that direction, that moves us towards the activation of engaging with the practices.

We can also simply have a kind of confidence in the teachings themselves, a sense of, "Well, I'm not sure exactly how this works, but I'm willing to try." That willingness also results in some energy—just a simple, "I'm willing to at least run the experiment here. This is what the Buddha said to try, and I'm willing to try it." So that sense of confidence, whether it's in our own understanding, our own actual experience, or in the teachings themselves, can produce the energy to engage in this journey of meeting experience moment to moment. Being willing to meet our resistance, our frustration without reactivity. Being willing just to be here moment by moment.

So the sense of spiritual urgency is a source for energy. This wanting, this actual sense of wanting to do this, is a source of energy. Confidence is a source of energy. Investigation, interest, curiosity—this is another source of energy. When we're interested in what we're looking at, again, a kind of natural energy arises to make that investigation.

This investigation that I'm referring to—we haven't explicitly talked much about it, but it's a gentle meeting of experience. It's not a thinking about, it's not an analyzing. Often the term "investigation" produces an idea that it means figuring out, analyzing, understanding in an intellectual way. But what investigation is in this context is really just meeting the experience, coming in contact with experience, moment by moment.

One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita, describes this quality of investigation. And I find for myself, when I actually come in contact with experience and start investigating it, that a natural curiosity begins to arise. It's like, "What is this? What is this experience?" An experience of anger arises. What is this? Meeting that experience in a gentle way.

U Pandita described this investigation not as a digging, not as a probing, but as a gentle rubbing—like polishing a bowl or a glass with a soft cloth. Just meeting, just gently contacting the experience, staying in contact, not digging, not trying to figure out. Just meeting experience in a very gentle way. And as we stay in contact with experience in that way, we start to see its texture. We start to see how it changes as we observe it. We start to understand how it comes into being, how it falls apart. Whether it's hindrances that we're observing or states of concentration, we start to understand the nature of our experience through this gentle investigation. And that leads to a kind of interest and curiosity: "Wow, what is the nature of this? How does this unfold?" So this gentle investigation and contact of experience is another place that energy results from.

Some of you may be familiar with some of these other lists that the Buddha referred to, and you may recognize that I've been talking about some of the qualities in them. In the Five Faculties, the Buddha talks about confidence leading to energy, which then leads to mindfulness, which then leads to concentration, which then leads to wisdom. Now it's not always a linear progression, but he did indicate this link between confidence and energy. And likewise with investigation, interest, and curiosity—in the list of the Seven Factors of Awakening, beginning with mindfulness, leading to the continuity of mindfulness, leading to investigation, and that followed by energy. So these sources of energy that I'm referring to come from the Buddha. He pointed us to these qualities of confidence and investigation as being places to draw from, to support our energy for the practice.

One other source—a teaching that really directs us towards energy—is the teaching on right effort. This is the effort that we make to cultivate and sustain wholesome qualities of mind, and to let go of, avoid, or refrain from unwholesome states of mind. Effort and energy, these two qualities, are often confused and conflated. They're often talked about interchangeably. But there is a difference between them. And one very clear pointing in the suttas to the difference between them, and the connection between them, is this: the Buddha says that energy—the spiritual quality of energy that functions for us on the path—is that mental quality that results from engaging in the practice of right effort.

So there's a very close link between energy and effort. We engage in right effort, and this produces energy.

I'd like to spend a little bit of time looking at this, and first of all, pointing to this interesting factor that making right effort leads to this beautiful quality of energy. We often think—and it is true to some extent—that we need to have energy in order to make effort. We all have some amount of energy. You're all in the room, sitting here awake. There is a certain level of energy in your system that's allowing you to even listen to the talk. That's what we need to begin with. That's the level of energy we need to begin engaging in this practice of right effort. And as we engage in right effort, it produces energy.

We think that making effort uses energy, but in this practice, making effort actually creates energy. This is a really helpful thing to recognize and know—that even if you just have a little bit of energy, just a little bit, all you need to do is make a little bit of effort. And that little bit of effort will create a little bit of energy.

So I'm going to talk briefly about right effort. I think most of you have probably heard a number of talks about right effort, so I'm just going to review and overview this. Right effort is very connected to the understanding of wisdom. It's connected to the understanding of what is skillful and what is unskillful with respect to the creation of suffering and the abandoning of suffering. What is skillful with respect to letting go of suffering? What is skillful with respect to understanding suffering? What is unskillful with respect to the creation of suffering? What should we avoid?

The simplest definition I know of what is skillful and unskillful is that the skillful states of mind are those that support our movement away from suffering. States like happiness, generosity, kindness, compassion, mindfulness, tranquility, equanimity—these are skillful states of mind. The practice of right effort is to cultivate those states, to encourage them when they've arisen.

Unwholesome qualities or states of mind are those that are basically based in greed, aversion, and delusion. States like anger, hostility, frustration, irritation, annoyance, rage, avarice, lust, wanting—these are the qualities of mind that lead us to dukkha, that lead us into suffering.

We get a very strong taste of that over and over again in our practice. We actually learn firsthand, physically in our bodies, that these states of mind are suffering. And this is not a mistake. It's not a problem. It's actually part of the training, part of the path, that we begin to understand firsthand that the state of wanting is suffering.

We typically fool ourselves or delude ourselves. At some level, this wanting feels like it feels good, and we feel like we're heading in the direction of constructing the world the way we want it to be. And yet when we really touch into that state of wanting, of wanting things to be other than they are in this moment, we see that it just doesn't feel right. And this is an insight. This is not a mistake. It's truth.

So we begin to understand the wisdom. We begin to gain the wisdom, the truth of understanding that these states lead us into suffering. They are not the kind of qualities that are helpful to cultivate if we want to live a life free of suffering. They're the kind of states that we should let go of, abandon, if we want to live a life free of suffering. We begin to see this directly in our experience. We gain this wisdom, and then we can engage in this practice of right effort with the wisdom, the understanding that it's useful to let go of wanting. It's hard to let go of wanting when we don't see a good reason to let go of it.

So there are four kinds of right effort. There's the effort towards avoiding unwholesome states that are not present in the moment. There's the effort towards abandoning or letting go of unwholesome states that are present in the moment. There's the effort towards the arousal or encouragement of wholesome states that have not yet arisen, that are not present in the present moment. And there is the effort towards sustaining wholesome states that have arisen.

The first one—the effort towards avoiding unwholesome states that are not present in the present moment—is really about beginning to understand what are the causes and conditions that land us in suffering, and learning to avoid those states and those conditions.

Avoiding—we need to be careful to understand what this avoiding means. It can have a very subtle meaning.

For example, you might notice sometimes that when you're in the food line in the dining hall, comparison and judgment arise around other people—around how much food they're taking or how much food you're taking, how they're moving, how slowly or quickly they're moving. All kinds of judgments can arise when we're engaged with other people, particularly in the dining room.

At first glance, we might think, "Okay, I see that I get into this state of self-judgment or other-judgment or criticism when I'm in the food line. So perhaps I should avoid being in the food line when other people are there—I'll go down late. And that way, I won't have this criticism and judgment." That might be skillful, but it also might be motivated out of aversion to those states. We have to be really careful in engaging in this kind of effort towards avoiding conditions that lead us towards suffering, not to be avoiding out of aversion.

Another way to engage with this might simply be, in going into the food line, as you move in, knowing that it is a hot zone for you—a place where criticism tends to arise, where judgment tends to arise—see if you can add some interest to how this criticism comes into being. What is the nature of this criticism? Observe the whole process around the criticism arising, around the judgment arising. Or perhaps see if you can just be really mindful in the line, noting, noticing the seeing, noticing when the mind begins to leap off into judgment.

In the seeing of that process happening, we begin to understand the causes in a different way. It's not as simple as "standing in the food line is the cause of the criticism in the mind." There's a much more subtle cause in the moment, a more direct momentary cause—perhaps a belief, perhaps a self-view of how I should behave or others should behave. Beginning to see that is much more supportive of really beginning to dismantle and untangle our unwholesome states of mind than simply just not going down to the dining hall until everybody is already through the line.

So be interested in understanding the situations that land you in suffering. When you begin to see situations that over and over again trigger suffering for you, see if you can get interested in that. The interest leads to energy. It leads to the ability to engage in our practice, engage in just that meeting of what is happening.

The second kind of right effort is the effort to let go of unwholesome states that have arisen. This means that we basically notice when we're caught up in an unwholesome state of mind—caught up in anger, caught up in frustration, caught up in wanting. And the wording of right effort says to let go of it. Now, this letting go can have an active quality to it, but I think more often it is about when we can meet that quality, just be with the wanting. The letting go is more about letting be, as has been said in someone's talk—I don't remember who mentioned that. Letting it be. Just meeting that experience of wanting, meeting that experience of anger, aversion, and letting it be.

With mindfulness, meeting the experience and letting it be, it has a tendency to let go of itself. So we don't have to do the letting go. The letting go happens. Because we are connected with the experience without reactivity, without judgment, without aversion. We just meet the experience. Let it be. All experience is impermanent. If we just let it be, it will naturally fall apart, as all things will do.

Letting it be. When we can meet it with mindfulness—this is a large part of our practice, much of what our practice is about. Meeting our experience and just being with it. Letting it be. When it's an unwholesome state of mind, it will tend to fall apart as we just meet it with mindfulness.

There are times, however, when some states of frustration, annoyance, irritation, anger—some of these difficult states of mind, some of these hindrances, fear—sometimes they can be stronger than our ability to be mindful of them. The power of that habit of mind has been practiced so much and is so powerful that it just swamps any attempt to bring mindfulness to it. When that happens, we can take some action to turn our attention away from that thing.

We don't have to just think that we have to meet everything with mindfulness. We need to have some discernment about whether mindfulness can actually meet the experience. Can mindfulness meet this? If you find yourself in trying to meet something difficult with mindfulness, if you find yourself just continually back, lost in the thoughts, swamped and overwhelmed and sucked back into the pain and the difficulty, then it's time to practice some skillful means.

Not with aversion, but with a kind of compassion, a recognition: this is not the time to pay attention to this. The mindfulness is being overwhelmed. As a compassion for yourself, you can say, "Not now. This is not the time." And simply turn the attention to something else in experience—perhaps hearing, perhaps steps on the ground, just something neutral in your experience that supports your ability to stay connected and mindful. This is a skillful means when we are overwhelmed.

The third kind of right effort is the effort to arouse wholesome states that are not present in the moment. In order to cultivate wholesome states that are not present, there are two ways we can approach this. We can abstain from situations that get in the way of these wholesome qualities, and we can actively cultivate or put ourselves in situations that lead to those wholesome qualities.

This first approach—avoiding situations that block or get in the way of these wholesome qualities—is really what the precepts are about. We engage in abstaining from actions that will tend to land us in suffering. Simultaneously, each one of those precepts is paired with a wholesome quality that is cultivated as you abstain from that action.

For instance, abstaining from killing is paired with compassion. As you abstain from swatting mosquitoes or killing any moths or scorpions you might find in your room, as you gently put them out into the woods, you are simultaneously cultivating compassion. As you abstain from taking what is not given, you're cultivating honesty and contentment. This engagement with the precepts is one way of engaging with right effort.

We can also try to cultivate these positive qualities through an active practice that would tend to arouse a quality. For example, we can engage in the practice of giving, which supports the cultivation of generosity. Daily in our 4:15 sitting, we're engaging in the practice of metta. We're cultivating that quality through a formal practice. This is right effort. And all day long we are engaging in practices that support the cultivation of mindfulness. As my teacher Sayadaw U Pandita says, mindfulness is the most wholesome mind state. Engaging in coming back, recognizing when you've been lost, remembering to bring attention—this is cultivating this wholesome quality. This is right effort.

The fourth kind of right effort is the effort to sustain wholesome states that have arisen. Surprisingly, at least in my experience, this sometimes does take effort. We wouldn't think of such a thing. It's like, well, if happiness has arisen, why would it be a problem to sustain that? But in my experience, at least the way my mind works—and you can look into your own mind to see how yours works—I find that sometimes when I come into these wholesome mind states of calm or peace or happiness, the first thing my mind does is acknowledge it. It recognizes it and says, "Oh, that's nice. That's nice that happiness is here, or that calm is here." And the next thing it does is say, "Now, because the mind is so calm, that's the perfect time to pay attention to the pain in my back." So I turn my attention away from the calm to put it someplace else.

What I've discovered for myself is that this movement was a kind of indication that there was a little bit of discomfort with being with some of these wholesome states. One of the ways to support sustaining the wholesome states is to simply be aware. Calm is present. Happiness is present. With happiness, I found the mind will quickly leap off into trying to figure out how I can stay happy. Then I'm immediately lost in planning, and I'm miserable because I can't figure out how to keep this happiness—as opposed to just being with the happiness. That was a revelation for me. Oh, it's just happiness. And happiness is fueling this miserable planning.

Another wonderful way to sustain or cultivate these wholesome qualities is to actually recognize the qualities that are being cultivated as we practice. So often we are engaged in working with some difficult state of mind. We're trying to be with anger or wanting, something that feels difficult. We're trying to stay with that, focused on the experience of the anger, the feelings in the body. All of that is very helpful. And it's also helpful to recognize that at the same time you're being with that quality of feeling in the body, mindfulness is being cultivated. Interest is being cultivated. Energy is being cultivated. Confidence is being cultivated—confidence that we can engage.

Recognizing the qualities that are essentially being pulled along with the engagement in mindfulness practice supports their continuing. Often we miss that in our practice.

We're engaging in mindfulness, but we're not recognizing the quality of mindfulness itself. We're engaging with investigation, but we're not really noticing that interest and energy have arisen. Beautiful qualities of mind come along for the ride as we practice. Recognize them. Appreciate that this is happening.

Sometimes people ask about or wonder about the teaching on right effort, because the teaching on mindfulness is very much about being with what is. Can you just meet what is happening? And the teaching on right effort sounds like very much a doing—we're trying to encourage wholesome states and let go of unwholesome states. But the practice of mindfulness that we are doing actually includes the four right efforts.

As we engage in moment-to-moment mindfulness of our experience, for example, if we're cultivating mindfulness of being angry, if we're cultivating mindfulness of that experience of anger, this supports the letting go. It's that letting be—we're just meeting it with mindfulness. And it supports the letting go, the abandoning of that experience of anger. It helps to prevent reactivity. Being with that state of mind and body without reactivity helps to prevent the arising of reactivity to anger. So it's preventing the arising of an unwholesome mind state to just be with it. So often when we're working with these difficult states, or when we're not mindful of these difficult states, immediately reactivity comes in. Mindfulness helps to avoid that quality of reactivity—avoiding the arising of unwholesome states that are not yet present. And it supports the arousing and maintaining of beautiful states of mind as we engage in meeting that experience. It supports equanimity. It supports the quality of mindfulness, of concentration. It supports wisdom. It supports beginning to understand how the mind can let go.

So in a sense, when we look at right effort in this way, it's like four sides of a single process. Anytime we're engaging in our practice, all four of these things are really happening simultaneously.

Part of the challenge of making effort is to continue, to keep going. I'm going to read a quote from the Dalai Lama: "No matter what is going on, never give up. Develop the heart. Too much energy in your country is spent developing the mind instead of the heart. Be compassionate, not just to your friends, but to everyone. Be compassionate. Work for peace in your heart and in the world. Work for peace. And again, I say, never give up. No matter what is going on around you, never give up."

This is what we have to do with our effort—never give up. Keep this gentle persistence of effort going.

As we engage in this gentle persistence of effort, it leads to energy. Part of my understanding of how this happens is that when we're engaging in wise effort, we find that we're letting go of clinging, letting go of reactivity, letting go of resistance to the way things are. As we engage in this practice, we align ourselves with truth instead of resisting truth. And resisting truth takes a lot of energy. So as we come into alignment, a lot of energy is freed up. Engaging in this practice of wise effort, not only does the very act of taking those steps of making effort create energy, it also frees up energy that's been bound into resistance to the way things are.

This balancing of energy, this balancing of effort, is the art of meditation. We're often on one side or the other of the energy equation. Too much energy often results in restlessness—we feel like jumping beans, there's just so much energy in the system, we can't sit still. Too little energy often results in sloth and torpor—sleepiness, dullness, difficulty bringing our attention. So we need to monitor our energy and see how we can bring it into balance.

One of the ways to balance energy is through our level of effort, because effort and energy are so closely connected. There's a beautiful exchange from the suttas that illustrates this. A deva asks the Buddha, "How did you, dear sir, cross the flood?"—meaning the flood of defilements, the flood of samsara, the flood of suffering. "How did you cross the flood?"

The Buddha replied, "Without tarrying, friend, and without hurrying, did I cross the flood."

"But how did you, without tarrying, without hurrying, cross the flood?"

The Buddha replied, "When I tarried, friend, I sank. When I hurried, I was swept away. That is how, without tarrying, without hurrying, I crossed the flood."

To me, this points to how we have to simply meet each moment as it arises. Don't sink into a stupor around it and don't try to rush past it. Moment by moment—what is happening, without tarrying, without hurrying? At times in my practice, just saying that to myself was so helpful. Without tarrying, without hurrying. That is the kind of way we apply our effort.

It's not hard to be mindful. In an instant, mindfulness is here. How hard is it for you to know the pressure of your body on your chair or cushion or bench? How hard is it for you to feel and know the sensations of your hands? How hard is it for you to know that you're hearing the sound of my voice? It's not hard. For most of us, just hearing those things points us to them almost automatically. Oh yes, there are the sensations of my body. There's the sound of the voice. There's the feeling of the hands. It's not hard for a moment to be mindful.

What's hard to do is sustain it over time. And this trying to sustain our mindfulness over time is often where we over-effort, we over-exert, we exhaust ourselves trying to be present. We come into the hall, sit down, and try to muster up the energy at the beginning of the sitting to be present for the whole sitting. And that is exhausting.

So the level of effort that's most helpful is to not think about trying to sustain mindfulness over a long period of time, but rather to only make the effort needed to stay present for a short period of time—a second, half a second. As Joseph says, half a breath. The secret teaching of the art of meditation is to just make enough effort to stay present for half a breath. And then at the end of that half a breath, do it again. Make enough effort to stay present for the out-breath. And then at the end of that out-breath, enough effort to stay present for the in-breath.

Moment by moment, reminding yourself just to come back, rather than trying to force the mind to be present. Gently reminding it—oh yes, come back, come back, come back. In this way, we can pull ourselves along with this light touch of effort, rather than a forceful, heavy pushing into trying to be present. It can be very light, very gentle. And that kind of effort is much more sustainable.

One of my teachers talks about lifting weights. He says it's kind of like going to a gym with a goal of lifting fifty-pound weights. If we start by trying to lift fifty-pound weights, we're going to injure ourselves. So instead, let's start with one-pound weights. And then when we can do that with ease, move to two-pound weights, then increase slowly over time. Gradually we can get to lifting heavier weights. It's kind of like that with the effort we make—we don't start by trying to be present for a long period of time. The mind isn't quite capable of that. So we stay present for a few moments, and then remind ourselves to be present for the next few moments, and the next few moments, and the next few moments.

The art of meditation is learning how frequently to remind yourself to be mindful. That's the effort we make—reminding ourselves to be mindful, over and over and over again.

At the beginning of a sitting, at the beginning of a retreat, we need to remind ourselves frequently. And it's not a heavy thing. This is just really light. Oh, the breath, the sound. It's reminding yourself frequently. Over time, the energy begins to develop, and it sustains us. It lasts for longer periods of time. So we can begin to tune our level of reminding to the energy that is available. It doesn't make a lot of sense if the mind is pretty continuous and steady already to be reminding yourself every second—that's getting in the way. But you need to kind of have a sense of how much effort to make. And this is really the art of meditation. This changes hour to hour, day to day, even minute to minute—the level of effort that we need to make changes.

Sometimes when I find myself over-efforting—and I think this is a very common phenomenon, particularly with people in our culture—we tend to really want to do it right. We want to be present. We want to get our mindfulness going. We have this very strong efforting culture. So when I begin to notice that there's a little bit of that efforting and striving going on, or sometimes even a lot of that efforting and striving going on, one game I play with myself is to ask: How little effort do I need to make to be mindful? Kind of backing off on the effort and seeing—if I don't try so hard, is the mind still here? Just letting go, backing off, backing off. And quite often I find that I actually need to make much less effort than I thought I needed to make.

Sometimes we need to make strong effort, which doesn't mean bearing down and forcing. Rather, it means really just continuously being with the breath, noticing the breath, dedicating yourself: Can I be mindful for the out-breath? Can I be mindful for the in-breath? You can do this in walking as well. If you find your mind is getting scattered in the walking, pick a place on the path, one or two steps out. Can I be mindful until I reach that point? And then do it again. Can I be mindful until I reach the next point, two steps away? In this way we can really pull ourselves along. And the effort begins to balance, the energy begins to balance, as we tune our effort to the level of mindfulness and energy that are present.

I'd like to close with a couple of quotes. One from the Dhammapada, just a brief injunction: "It is up to you to make strong effort. The Tathagatas simply point the way." So it's up to us. We are the ones that have to engage in the practice. Nobody can do it for us. We need to engage.

This last quote is by Piyadasi Thera: "We must, by our own resolute efforts, rise and make our way to the portals of liberty, and it is always, in every moment, in our power to do so. Neither are those portals locked, nor the key in possession of someone else from whom it must be obtained by prayer or entreaty. That door is free of all bolts and bars, save those we ourselves have made."

CHAPTER 32

The Wandering Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella invites practitioners to transform their relationship with the wandering mind from one of frustration to one of curious exploration. Rather than viewing mental wandering as a problem to be fixed, she presents it as a natural phenomenon that offers profound insights into the nature of consciousness and self.
>
> Fella distinguishes various flavors of wandering—from gentle drifting and daydreaming to intentional problem-solving and intense mind storms fueled by strong emotions. She emphasizes that when mindfulness is absent, we cannot force its return; it re-arises spontaneously when causes and conditions align. This points directly to the Buddha's teaching on anattā (not-self), as expressed in the aggregates teaching: "Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were the self, it would not lend itself to dis-ease. It would be possible to say with regard to consciousness, let my consciousness be thus."
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with this pattern: noticing what we wake up into when mindfulness returns, exploring the feeling tone (vedanā) of wandering states, and observing the cause-and-effect chain by which attention drifts—such as when an unnoticed sound leads to perception, thought, and proliferation (papañca). Fella shares how this exploration helped her understand the quality of awareness itself, that sense of presence teachers often reference. She encourages practitioners to approach wandering with gentle interest rather than judgment or complacency, recognizing each moment of remembering as a spontaneous, effortless arising of mindfulness worthy of celebration.

In my own exploration of practice, I found it very helpful to explore patterns and habits that arise over and over again. When we see something that happens to us repeatedly, as we explore it, we can start to understand things about it that will support our ability to further be with that experience and then deepen our understanding.

With patterns and habits that happen over and over again, we get to see different perspectives on what's seemingly the same phenomenon. It's not actually the same phenomenon because every time something arises, it's new. So as something happens to us repeatedly, we begin to see different ways it comes into being. We see different ways that we hang on to it or push it away. And we see different ways that it falls apart. Each time a pattern arises, we have the opportunity to see new things, to gather more information, to understand more deeply how that pattern works in our minds.

Tonight I'd like to explore a particular pattern, a particular habit of mind that happens to every single one of us all day long: the wandering mind. This is something I know you're all very familiar with, and yet it's not something we typically think to explore. Often we simply recognize that we're waking up in the middle of wandering, or we recognize that we've been lost in thought, and we just try to move right back. We have this idea that we need to get back to mindfulness. But it's very interesting to actually explore this phenomenon of wandering mind itself.

First I'd like to give a definition of what I mean by wandering mind. I use the term to mean anytime there's the experience of the mind losing touch with the present moment. We often think about it as the mind wandering out of the present moment, but the mind doesn't actually go anywhere. There's not actually a wandering. It's simply that the mind loses touch with the present moment. Mindfulness becomes low or even non-existent. The consciousness, the experience of the present moment, isn't being paid attention to, and yet the mind is still doing its thing—still seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, and recognizing things going on. It's just that there's not that awareness connected with that experience. Our experience of this is that the mind has wandered. That's the way we talk about it: "My mind wandered."

There are many different flavors or ways that we can experience this. It might simply be a kind of drifting out of present moment experience where there's not particularly any attachment to the content of what we're thinking about. The mind has just lost its vigor or its connection with experience, picks up on something, and wanders off. There's that feeling of it drifting out of the present moment. This can sometimes be experienced as daydreaming—just images or strange dreamlike images coming through the mind.

Sometimes the wandering mind has a more intentional or active quality to it, where it feels like the mind is engaged in thinking about some problem, thinking about the past, trying to figure out how we should have done something better, what we should have said, planning for the future, how to say something properly, what we're going to be doing. There's a little more intentionality or push to the thinking process.

This can get even more intense. It can feel like a mind storm where there's a strong emotion, or the thinking process is fueled by strong greed or aversion. This often comes with a lot of thinking. Something like self-righteousness, for example, comes with a lot of thinking: "I'm right. They shouldn't have done that." There's a strong push to it, and a lot of thinking results.

This state of the wandering mind is generally one of very low mindfulness. Mindfulness is not very strong, or it doesn't even exist—it's just not present. We're really, really lost. We can't do much about this state of mind when we're lost in it. We cannot make ourselves come out of the wandering. There's nothing we can do to come out of it. There has to be a kind of spontaneous re-arising of mindfulness. At some point this will happen to us, and this is how we notice that we've been lost in thought. Mindfulness spontaneously re-arises and we recognize, "Oh, here I am. I had been paying attention to the breath a few minutes ago, but that's not where I am now. I'm off on some train of thought." We cannot make the mindfulness re-arise when we're in this state of being lost.

It will simply re-arise at some point because causes and conditions have come together to allow for the arising of mindfulness in that moment.

In that moment of recognizing—or the mind recognizing—that it has been lost in thought, that moment itself can be recognized. Sometimes when we remember, when we wake up into the middle of wandering, we wake up right in the midst of it. We recognize, "Oh, the mind has been thinking about yesterday's lunch." When we wake up, we wake up right in the middle of that, and we realize that we had not been connected to the present moment experience. But now there is the reconnection with recognizing that we had not been here.

Sometimes, though, there's a kind of mysterious thing that happens. Perhaps some of you have seen this too. The mind can wander out of the present moment and wander back in, and then at some point we recognize or remember that we had been thinking—but we neither saw the getting lost nor the coming back. It's as if we're paying attention to the breath, and then without our recognizing it, the mind wanders out and wanders back, and we're back paying attention to the breath. Then we realize, "Wait a minute, I remember that I was just thinking about that friend of mine, but I didn't see the getting lost, or the thinking about it, or the waking up in the middle of thinking about it. Here I am, back with the breath." Sometimes this wandering can sneak up behind our backs. We can wander back into the present moment without ever having realized or recognized that we hadn't been in the present moment.

Looking at this pattern, this process of the wandering mind, can be very educational. We can learn a lot by exploring this pattern. I'm going to point to some of the things we can learn, and then I'll talk in quite a bit of detail about some ways to explore this process.

One of the things we can learn by exploring this pattern of the wandering mind is a lot about ourselves—about the kinds of things we get stuck to, the kinds of thoughts that tend to hijack us. Somebody mentioned the other day the top ten thoughts, the top ten kinds of things that tend to carry us away. By exploring this pattern, by simply beginning to recognize how our minds wander over and over again, we get familiar with the things we get stuck to. We begin to get familiar with where we get caught, what we cling to.

Another thing we really get to see very clearly with this wandering mind is that our minds are out of control. We sit down to meditate, we sit down for a session of meditation, and we have the intention to be present for our breathing, for body sensation, for thoughts, for moods, for feelings. That's our intention. Nobody sits down with the intention to space out—well, maybe sometimes we do. But mostly we sit down with the intention to be present. And we don't intend for the mind to wander. We have very little control. We have some. There is some amount of say, some connection with the process of the mind wandering out of the present moment. But once the mind has wandered, once mindfulness is not present in a moment, we have no control over when it comes back. We have no control over how long it's gone. It will simply come back when causes and conditions come together for it to reappear.

We sometimes think of this as a problem, that we don't have this control. But actually it points us to a deep truth. It points us to the not-self nature of our experience.

The Buddha describes various aspects of our experience—these aspects called the five aggregates: consciousness, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and body. These encompass all of our experience. Every part of our experience falls into one of these categories or groups. I'm just going to read out the part where he talks about consciousness, because that's what this is related to, in a way:

"Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were the self, it would not lend itself to dis-ease. It would be possible to say with regard to consciousness, 'Let my consciousness be thus.' But precisely because consciousness is not self, it lends itself to disease. It is not possible to say, 'Let my consciousness be thus.'"

This points to this fact of the wandering mind, pointing to this lack of control we have over our minds. Typically, in our experience, we think of things being mine, things being me, things being I, things being myself. And because we have that view—the view of self that we talked about the other night, this identity view—that view is a kind of belief.

It's a way that we perceive our experience. We look through this filter of identity view, and what we see in our experience confirms that identity view. As Carol was discussing, our views distort perception. Essentially, one of the main distortions of perception that we have is this view of self, and it filters everything that we see.

Because we believe we are a self, when we look out into the world and experience things and do things, our view of self kind of self-selects what we experience to confirm that view. We pick things out of our environment that confirm it and don't notice things that don't confirm it. Or if we notice things that don't confirm it, we don't even conceive of the fact that they don't confirm it.

The wandering mind is just such an experience. It shows us over and over again this truth—it points to this truth that there's not control, that consciousness is not under control, that mental formations are not under control. But we don't recognize it as being that kind of evidence. It's hard for us to take in this evidence. It's hard for us to actually recognize things that don't confirm what we so deeply hold to be true.

Another aspect of exploring the wandering mind that we can learn about is related to this exploration of not-self. As we observe the experience of the wandering mind—as we observe any experience, actually, not just the wandering mind—we can see experience as a stream of cause and effect. All of our experiences are just arising out of causes. It's just this stream of cause and effect, cause and effect, cause and effect. There's no doer. There's no causer. There's just this process, this flux of cause and effect happening.

When we see this, when we start to see how one thing arises and that leads to the next thing, which leads to the next thing—just like dominoes falling—this experience arises, then that experience arises, and that experience arises as a result of the previous one. Just boom, boom, boom, boom. That recognition of how things unfold out of cause and effect is also another pointing to the fact that there's no one in control.

So the exploration of the wandering mind can point to things we can learn about ourselves, ways that we get caught. We can learn about how we get stuck on things, where we're particularly prone to greed or aversion around our arising experience. We can see the out-of-control nature of our experience. We can see the cause and effect nature of our experience, that things are just a process, a flux going on. And we can also, through this exploration of the wandering mind, begin to see and understand awareness itself—some qualities of awareness, how it feels, and understanding awareness as a process.

The easiest place to start this exploration of the wandering mind is when we remember in the midst of the moment when mindfulness re-arises. Typically the moment is when we wake up into a wandering thought and we recognize, "Oh, I've been lost in thought." That moment of recognizing mindfulness re-arising—that's the easiest place to begin this exploration. Developing a skillful relationship with this moment is key. It's a key to our practice.

Many of you are describing that as the days go on, as we progress into the weeks of this retreat, there's much less judgment happening in that noticing of the mind coming back into mindfulness. And that's key to the practice unfolding as a smoother and less effortful experience. When we can recognize and really accept and understand the fact that we have no control over when that waking up happens, it can help also to lessen that sense of judgment. It's much more of a sense of celebration. Yes, here we are. I'm back again. There's not much point in judging that moment. In fact, that moment itself is mindfulness again.

But typically what we do in that moment is this: we recognize, actually there's been a moment of recognizing—I'm aware. And then the next moment we think that we've been lost. And so then we judge ourselves. But the moment of recognition has already happened. We've come back into awareness already by the time we judge ourselves for not being aware. So beginning to recognize and acknowledge what's actually happening—that awareness has re-arisen, that mindfulness has re-arisen—this is important.

Taking an interest in this moment, taking an interest in the moment of coming back into mindfulness, making an exploration of what that moment is about—I found personally that highlighting this as a place to explore in my practice really supported the letting go of judgment around that moment. That moment of remembering, that moment of mindfulness re-arising, is a purely spontaneous, effortless moment of mindfulness. It wasn't a mindfulness you did; it just happened. And it's a pointer to the kind of ease of mindfulness that can be present for us. Because we're not doing it.

It's just happening. It's nothing we're making effort to do. So if we're judging ourselves for not being mindful in that moment of mindfulness coming back, we're missing the opportunity to connect with that spontaneous, effortless moment of mindfulness. It's really a magical moment in a way, that moment of coming back into awareness.

So in this moment of waking up—we might call it waking up, or the moment of mindfulness re-arising—notice what you're waking up in the midst of. Mindfulness has re-arisen. What is it aware of in that moment when it re-arises? It might be aware of anything at any of the six sense doors. Just notice what it is noticing, what mindfulness is noticing in that moment. It might be body sensation. It might be moods or emotions. It might be planning or remembering or fantasizing or daydreaming. It might be a feeling tone.

Actually, in this exploration of the moment of waking up into mindfulness again, I found a gentle exploration of feeling tone to be a very interesting way to connect with the experience. Often, when there's some kind of mind storm going on, the experience can be unpleasant, and we connect with that unpleasantness. But a good percentage of the time—at least in my experience of playing with this, looking at the moment of remembering and noticing this wandering process that happens—particularly as the mind settles down, as there's more concentration, more stability, often the wandering aspect of the mind is more of a drifting off of experience. The energy just isn't quite strong enough to keep us connected with the present moment, so the mind loses the mindfulness and drifts out of the present moment.

Often I've seen that when I notice the feeling tone in that kind of experience, when the mind is drifting, the experience in the waking up is pleasant. Connecting with the pleasant after the drifting has happened has been a very helpful way to ground myself back in the present moment. It's actually also a bit of a carrot in terms of reconnecting with the present moment—the mind has woken up into this space of some kind of drifting phenomenon that's a pleasant kind of drifting experience. To reconnect with what's actually happening, reconnecting with that pleasant experience... now it's not going to last. It's going to have its impermanent nature; it will arise and pass. But reconnecting with the pleasant aspect of that experience—sometimes the mind actually drifts off into pleasant, and it's not noticed that the mind is drifting off into pleasant. I'll talk more about that in a few minutes.

When we reconnect with the pleasant that's actually happening, it brings us back, it reconnects us with the present and the pleasant aspect of that experience. So that's something I offer you: just checking into the feeling tone around the wandering mind, particularly around the waking up.

Again, often in the waking up, if we wake up into some fantasy, we kind of jerk ourselves back to the breath or whatever else we think of as the present moment, because obviously this fantasy is not the present moment—it's what I'm not supposed to be doing. But when we wake up into that, can we just recognize what is happening then and there? Pleasant experience. And then, because we're no longer fueling the fantasy with our thoughts, that pleasant experience fades and something else arises. But just reconnecting with what is happening.

See if you can notice the very moment when you wake up. Or when I say that, "see if you can notice"—that sounds like something to do. But it's not something we can really do. It's much more that we can incline our interest toward this phenomenon of waking up and notice where we are when we recognize the waking up.

Often what happens as we start this exploration is that we see there's a kind of lag between the initial coming back into mindfulness and the recognition of the mindfulness. It's as if—and this is my way of describing it, I'm not sure exactly what's happening—but it's as if there's a certain level of mindfulness or continuity of mindfulness that needs to be present in order for mindfulness to recognize itself as being there. You're coming out of a daydream or you're coming out of a mind storm, and there's just a moment of awareness. Then you're kind of pulled back into the mind storm. Then there's another moment of awareness and you're pulled back. It's kind of like climbing out of mud. At some point there's this recognition: Oh, I'm back. Here I am. I am paying attention to this mind storm.

Initially there can be this feeling of pulling ourselves out of a sticky kind of thought pattern. But as we explore this more and more, as we open our minds to exploring this pattern of waking up and taking an interest in this moment of remembering...

And kind of highlighting it as: well, can I notice how soon? What is the soonest I can recognize that I have woken up? Something about that exploration seems to encourage the mind to recognize more quickly as it comes back into mindfulness. Something about that exploration seems to attune us to the recognition of that moment of waking up.

So at some point, over time with this exploration, you might really begin to notice this moment. At whatever moment you notice or recognize "I'm back," it can be helpful or interesting to notice the difference between what it feels like to be present now and what it was like a few moments before to be lost in thought. This exploration has helped me to understand what the quality of awareness and being mindful actually feels like. What does it feel like to be mindful? The sense of presence, the sense of awakeness—what are the qualities? What is this experience of being mindful?

For myself, in my first years of practice, teachers would sometimes say, "Sense the presence in your experience," or "Connect with the awareness," or "Recognize the awareness that's present." And I would have no clue what they were talking about. It was beyond me to understand what a sense of presence meant. Then, as I began doing this exploration of the moment of remembering, this moment of recognizing that mindfulness has re-arisen, I began to recognize the difference. I began to see that when the mind comes back into awareness, there's a kind of contrast between what it feels like now to be here and mindful and what it felt like a few moments ago.

We can't really know so much in the moment what it feels like to be lost, but there's a lingering memory in that moment of remembering. There's a lingering memory of what it felt like. And there can be a clear sense of difference, of distinction, allowing us to get a sense of the qualities of mindfulness—the clarity or brightness of the mind. So our practice gives us many opportunities to explore this moment, to explore these qualities of the mind coming back into awareness.

One of the things that has been very beautiful for me to recognize about this moment of remembering is that getting familiar with what it feels like to wake up—really just that sense of coming back into mindfulness—getting familiar with that feeling begins to point it out to us more quickly. This moment of remembering actually happens to us a lot, both in our formal practice and in our daily lives. Often what happens in that moment of recognizing mindfulness coming back into being is that we experience a connection with knowing what's happening while it's happening. We see something, we hear something, and we know what's happening while it's happening. Some aspect of our mind actually connects with that experience. But what we typically do is immediately leap onto that thing and start thinking about it or doing something with it. So getting familiar with that moment begins to point it out to us so that we recognize it when it happens.

Walking down the hill to go to the dining hall, the moments of waking up will happen. This is an exploration to do also in the daily activities, in between times. Recognize the moment of coming back into awareness. It's very powerful and it will support you here on the retreat and also support you in your daily lives.

So that's an exploration of the waking up process. We can also explore the way the mind begins to wander out of the present moment. We can feel the mind start to lose its connection with experience. We can actually watch how the mind starts to wander. There are several ways that it does this.

One of the processes—and this is beginning to see the cause and effect relationship—is that often when the mind wanders, it wanders out of some sense experience. For instance, you're sitting in meditation in the hall, paying attention to the breathing, and a sound arises. Out of that sound there's a recognition, a perception: "That's the sound of a door opening." And leaping out of that recognition of the door opening is a thought that there's somebody coming into the sitting late. And then there's a bunch of thinking that happens after that—how that person shouldn't be doing that, or what's going on with that person, or "I know that's my neighbor because I know they weren't there." The mind explodes into what's called papañca.

We can catch this process in the midst of it happening. The mind wanders when some aspect of this process is not noticed. You're sitting in meditation with this kind of intention to stay with the breath or to be with body sensations. And there's the sound. Sometimes, I think partly because we have this agenda to stay with one object, there's the sound and we don't really recognize that the mind has picked up on it. The sound goes unnoticed—noticed by the mind, but unnoticed by mindfulness. When the sound is unnoticed by mindfulness, there's the possibility of that whole chain arising: perception, thought, papañca, all of it. So we can catch this in the midst of it happening.

willingness to recognize what the mind is paying attention to. As we're paying attention to the breathing, we have this agenda to stay with the breathing, or perhaps to stay with body sensations. And then there's a sound, and it's outside of our agenda. So even though the awareness has shifted to the sound and picked up on it, we don't notice that. It's that view again—because we have this view of "this is what I'm doing" or "this is my way of practicing," it's almost like we don't notice or recognize that the attention has shifted.

As we move more and more into just recognizing things as they are—the yathā bhūta that Carol was talking about—we start to recognize these subtle ways that the mind moves attention. We start to pick up on the fact that the mind is already attending to something else. That can be challenging. And so again, this isn't something so much to do as it is to just begin to recognize.

You may wake up or recognize—the mindfulness comes back into being—at any point in that process of recognizing a sound, perceiving the sound, thinking about the sound, and then proliferating around the sound. Any point you wake up in that process, just recognize that's what's happening right now. The more interest you take in the process of waking up, the more quickly you'll begin to recognize how the mind does what it does.

We can also start to notice the moment when the mind begins to let go of what it's paying attention to. This is a further refinement on what I was just talking about. Suppose you're paying attention to the breathing or body sensation, allowing your focus to come into that place. You may start to notice at some point the quality of the connection with that experience. What does it feel like when it's really connected, when the mindfulness is really connected with that experience? And then you can start to feel when it loses that connection—so that you're still paying attention to it, but it's not quite as connected. You start to notice that drifting away from the experience.

I noticed this at one point on retreat where I was really paying attention to the breathing. I was using it as a primary object, really focusing on the breathing. And I began noticing that I could see the mind losing touch with the breathing. Initially what I did with that was to notice, "Okay, the mind has lost touch with the breathing, come back to the breathing." And then I would notice it lose touch with the breathing and, "Oh, come back to the breathing."

At some point I recognized, as I noticed the mind losing touch with the breathing, that the awareness was strong—that the awareness was aware that it was losing touch with the breathing. And this recognition crossed my mind: "I'm mindful here. Why do I have to do anything with this? Why don't I just see what the mind is doing?" And the mind just opened into a new space, a new experience of settledness that I hadn't touched before.

So we can just see—if we start to notice the mind losing touch with the experience, we can use that to come back and cultivate a stronger concentration. And we can also just recognize, "Oh, this is what the mind is doing right now. It's let go of the breathing. What's it going to do?" It's an adventure. We get to see what our minds do.

So why does the mind wander? Most of us are familiar with some of the obvious ways the mind wanders. It often wanders—particularly early in retreat—because of greed or aversion, because of thinking about the past or thinking about the future. Or thinking about the present, for that matter, an endless kind of description of the present moment: "Oh, now I'm experiencing this. Oh, now I'm experiencing that. Oh, now I'm going to tell somebody I'm experiencing that." This is the most familiar reason, the most obvious reason why the mind wanders out of the present moment—because of the presence of greed or aversion or these reflections.

Some other reasons why the mind wanders: as the mind starts to relax, as it settles into concentration, as it lets go of the surface chatter—the obvious thoughts of the mind—we touch into these subtler levels, these little thoughts that come up. That can be another reason the mind wanders. It's actually because there's been some letting go happening, and we're touching into deeper layers of thought that we're not so familiar with.

The mind can also get concentrated. As the mind gets concentrated, if the energy isn't quite strong enough, as I mentioned earlier, the mind can go into these dreamlike states and images will start to appear. Then the mind gets hooked to those images and we drift out of the present moment because the mind gets hooked to images coming out of that more concentrated space. Sometimes this means we need to help bring up the energy a little bit—that kind of concentration drifting into dreamlike states.

Often just opening the eyes helps to cut the wandering in that situation. But generally, that kind of experience isn't an indication that you need to try harder.

Sometimes when the mind starts to wander, particularly at this point in the retreat, some of you may find that you've been applying yourself and things have been going really well—the mindfulness is getting steady. And suddenly you sit down and the mind is just all over the place. "What am I doing wrong? It was going so well. I must have to try harder." Just force yourself—come back, stay with the breath, stay with the breath.

Sometimes when the mind starts wandering after a period of particular clarity in the practice, at least as I've explored this phenomenon, what I've noticed is that it can mean the mind is touching into some more subtle phenomenon that it's not used to experiencing. And because it's not used to this subtle phenomenon, it doesn't quite know how to connect to it, and the mind wanders off. So it's not so much about trying harder or trying to get back to what you were noticing. It's much more about a gentle recognition of what is actually happening here.

On one retreat, I was working with the breath, and the breath had been getting very smooth, very continuous. I was able to just be right with the breath for longer and longer periods of time. And then one morning I sat down and suddenly the mind was just all over the place. I'd take a breath and the mind would be off. I'd take a breath, okay, come back, pay attention—the mind would be off. And I just began to recognize, okay, something's happening here. What is actually happening?

That's the key—not to try to force yourself into the present moment to stay with something, but to try to connect with what's actually happening. And what I saw as I watched the experience unfold is that as I paid attention to the breath, almost immediately within the space of a breath or two, the breath got so subtle that I couldn't feel it anymore. And then the mind would wander.

When I recognized that this was the process happening, I could just hang out with that experience and recognize, okay, it's subtle here. What can I notice about that subtlety? Not to try to force the mind into it, but just to touch the experience in a light way. So sometimes when the mind starts wandering like that, after a period of settledness, it can indicate that what the mind is naturally paying attention to is a little more subtle than you're used to. And it's simply a matter of time before the mindfulness catches up to that subtlety.

So an increase in the wandering mind doesn't always mean that you've lost concentration. It might just mean that you need a touch more interest, just lightly trying to stay connected, a little bit of interest in understanding how this process of wandering is happening. Just recognizing, as I did with that example, that as the breathing got subtle, that's when the mind wandered—recognizing that process helped me stay connected to the experience. The interest supported it, and the gentle touching of the experience.

As we get more comfortable with the wandering mind, less reactive to it, we can get interested in exploring it. But sometimes we can also get complacent. Sometimes we use our self-judgment as a tool—we beat ourselves up, and then we beat ourselves up enough so that we don't want to do that thing again. That's how we sometimes work with the wandering mind. And as we let go of that self-judgment and self-criticism, sometimes we can get complacent. "Oh, yeah, there's the mind wandering. No problem."

We do need to engage. We need to engage with the processes of the mind, with the things that are happening as they are. An interest in the process of wandering itself is very helpful with this—not getting complacent around interest in what the mind is doing moment to moment. There's no need to judge yourself for the fact that mindfulness disappears and mindfulness reappears, but take an interest in what you're noticing around that whole process, around the mind letting go of objects and mindfulness rearising. That really can help with not getting lost in the trap of complacency. Complacency is a big trap for meditators.

So I'll end with an enjoinder for interest in this area—taking an interest in this process, but not necessarily trying to do anything around it, other than just being interested in exploring the two sides: the side of wandering out of the present moment and the coming back into the present moment. Trying to do things around this exploration can just tie us into knots. Really just allowing curiosity—and that's actually what I hope this talk has done, piqued your interest around this process of the mind wandering such that you want to explore it, but not necessarily to do anything in that exploration. Just notice what you notice.

Notice what you notice. Notice things as they are. When the mindfulness comes into being, what do you notice in that moment? No need to judge.

When you notice the mind letting go of what it's paying attention to, no need to judge. Just what are you noticing? Always, always coming back to just that simple moment-to-moment exploration of what is actually happening. And from that, the practice unfolds.

So thank you for your attention. Let's sit for a couple of moments, just letting go of the words in favor of what the mind is actually experiencing in this moment. Perhaps body sensation, perhaps thoughts, moods—things as they are.

CHAPTER 33

Impermanence (Aniccā)

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines aniccā (impermanence), one of the three characteristics of existence (tilakkhaṇa) alongside dukkha (unsatisfactoriness) and anattā (not-self). She explains how vipassanā practice involves clearly seeing these characteristics, drawing on teachings from her teacher Sayadaw U Paṇḍita.
> Fella distinguishes between obvious impermanence—birth ending in death, meetings ending in partings, accumulation ending in dispersal—and the subtle moment-to-moment change revealed through settled meditation practice. She references the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's instruction to observe arising and vanishing factors, and the Buddha's teaching to Rāhula that developing perception of impermanence eliminates the conceit 'I am.' The talk includes a powerful passage from the Mahābhārata about how beings see death constantly yet never truly recognize their own mortality.
> Through personal stories from Burma and retreat practice, Fella illustrates how impermanence becomes viscerally understood rather than merely intellectual. She describes how watching pain without resistance reveals its dancing, changing nature, and how observing wanting shows clear arising and vanishing based on conditions. The talk emphasizes that recognizing impermanence naturally leads to compassion for all beings subject to the same truth, and supports the letting go of clinging when we truly understand that nothing permanent can serve as a basis for lasting happiness.

Tonight I'd like to talk about impermanence, anicca, the Pali term.

Anicca is one of what are often called the three characteristics of our experience—that everything we experience in our bodies and our minds has these three characteristics. They have the characteristic of being impermanent, inconstant. They have the characteristic of being unsatisfactory as a lasting source of happiness, of being dukkha, often translated as suffering. And they have the characteristic of being not-self, empty of any solid nature, the anatta characteristic.

As we bring our mindfulness to our experience through our practice of mindfulness meditation, we begin to see these characteristics. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita, gave a dharma talk about the term vipassana. He asked us first what vipassana meant, and I responded that it meant to see clearly. That's basically what the passana part of vipassana means. He added that the vi part means "various things," and that essentially the various things we see clearly in our insight meditation practice are these three characteristics.

Tonight I'd like to explore with you this characteristic of anicca, of impermanence.

Impermanence, change—this is not really news to us. Everybody knows things change. We see it day by day. We see our bodies change. We see our friendships change. We see people die. We see people being born. We see buildings collapse. We see all kinds of things change that really are markers of change happening all around us.

In the Buddhist teachings there are four aspects to change: all birth ends in death, all meeting ends in parting, any accumulation ends in dispersal, and anything that rises falls. By that last one, the teachings say that anything elevated in space will fall, and anything elevated in power will fall. These four aspects of impermanence are the everyday way we see change happening.

And yet still, we don't really take it in. There's a way in which we know that things change, but we don't really know that things change.

In the Mahabharata, there is a character, Yudhishthira, who is asked, "What is the greatest wonder?" Here is his response:

"This I think is most wonderful: that the man of the world, even though he is seeing before his eyes constantly creatures dying and passing away, never for a moment does the idea enter him, 'I too have to fall. I am also a creature destined to be destroyed.' Even if it is told to him, it never enters his mind. Only the surface mind understands the language, but the actual sense never goes into his head—that every man must one day die, yet every man lives as if they were immortal. This is the greatest wonder."

I'd like to explore this quality of impermanence and look at how we can move from having the surface mind understand this truth to really having it penetrate.

There are different ways in which impermanence can be seen. There are the obvious ways I've mentioned so far: birth ending in death, accumulation ending in dispersal, meeting ending in parting, rising ending in falling. This is the obvious change in the world—things are born and they die, things break. This is the gross or obvious level of impermanence.

There is also a more subtle level of impermanence, a kind of change that happens moment to moment. This is more difficult to see and does seem to require the mind being settled in some stillness. I'll talk about both of these, as they're both valuable to really understand—both levels of impermanence.

So why is it important to take in the actual sense of impermanence? Much of our suffering actually results from not truly recognizing and understanding impermanence.

One Buddhist scholar says, "Dukkha is but a logical corollary arising from the law of universal impermanence." The fact of unsatisfactoriness, the fact of suffering, is a logical corollary arising from the law of universal impermanence. For the impermanent nature of everything can lead to but one inescapable conclusion: as everything is impermanent, they cannot be made the basis of permanent happiness. Whatever is transient is by that very fact unsatisfactory.

Our suffering often results from clinging to things that we think will make us happy. And as those things are impermanent, they end, so the happiness is not lasting. Now, in many ways, we know things are impermanent. We don't really try to cling to that new car, for example, thinking, "Okay, now I'm going to be happy for the rest of my life because I have that new car." But there's a way that we actually do feel like it will make us happy, that it is a kind of source of lasting happiness. It's because we have this view, this way of seeing the world, that somehow we can stack up things that we like and just create a life filled with one happy thing after another, and that will be lasting happiness. We do pin our hopes on happiness in the things of the world. There's really a way in which we delude ourselves that we can be happy by stringing together a series of happy moments. And when that doesn't work, somehow we feel like we failed, that there's something wrong with us. But there's nothing wrong with us. This is natural law. And really taking in and understanding this natural law, this fact of impermanence, supports our letting go of clinging. Because when we really understand that something is impermanent, there's not so much of a move to hold on to it. The mind just doesn't see the point in clinging to it.

A poem from Rilke speaks to this way that we try to find happiness over and over again by arranging our world: "And we spectators always everywhere turned toward the world of objects. It fills us. We arrange it. It breaks down. We rearrange it and then break down ourselves. Who has twisted us around like this so that no matter what we do, we are in the posture of someone going away? Just as upon the farthest hill, which shows him his whole valley one last time, he turns, stops, lingers. So we live here, forever taking leave."

Taking in the obvious level of impermanence—one profound way to really start to take this in is to reflect on death. Birth ends in death. Reflecting not only on our own death, but the fact that our friends will die, our families will die. Someone stated—I don't remember who it was—that within one hundred years, or maybe one hundred twenty at the most, everyone on the planet currently will no longer be living. It's kind of amazing to me to reflect on that. One hundred twenty years and everybody alive now will be dead.

Reflecting on death, reflecting on the fact that we don't know when it will happen. It is a certainty for us. It is one of the few things we can count on. But we don't know when it will happen. And the other aspect of this, particularly within our culture, is that our culture seems to want to hide death away under the covers. It doesn't really want it to be out there, seen.

I was in Burma several years ago, and several of us were taking a walk down the river. We were at a retreat center, working at a retreat—some of us teaching, some of us managing, some of us translating. We were just taking a walk that day by the river, and we saw that there was kind of a hubbub. A bunch of people from the village had gathered, and we found out through the translator who was with us that three young novices, young monks, had been swimming that morning and that one of them had drowned. They were trying to find his body. We stood around and waited with some of the villagers and some of the monks and nuns that were there. We knew some of them. They found his body and brought it up. This young boy, maybe about ten or twelve years old, had gone swimming that morning and had not finished swimming. It can happen at any time, any time.

Being Burma, things were not quite so... death is much more a part of life in Burma. Death is a part of life, but in our culture, it doesn't seem to be accepted as part of life. They brought the body up and laid it out on a platform that had been set up, and people were all around the body.

He was still in his wet robes. And it struck me really hard that I was 47 years old and I had never seen anyone dead before. Forty-seven years of life without seeing death. That's the way our culture functions. So it's hard for us to come in contact with it.

This actual sense of mortality never entering our minds is referred to in the Dhammapada: "Many do not realize that we here must die. For those who realize this, quarrels end." As Don Juan says to Carlos Castaneda, an immense amount of pettiness is dropped if you turn towards the truth of death.

So this acknowledgement of our mortality, even just this one aspect of this obvious level of impermanence, can have a huge opening impact on our hearts. Really acknowledging that the person we're having this quarrel with in this moment—both of us may die at any moment. Quarrels end. This is a very powerful recollection for us.

Along with these obvious aspects of impermanence, death is one of the divine messengers, as it's called in the Buddhist texts. Aging, sickness, and death are seen as divine messengers, opening our hearts to the truth of impermanence.

There's a story in one of the suttas about a man who died and went to hell and was met by the king of death. The king of death was questioning him, and he says, "But my good man, didn't you ever see the first divine messenger appearing among humankind?" The man says, "No, I didn't see him." And the king of death says, "But didn't you ever see a man or a woman, 80, 90, or 100 years old, frail, bent like a roof bracket, crooked, leaning on a stick, shakily going along, ailing, youth and vigor gone, with broken teeth, with gray and scanty hair, bald, wrinkled and blotched limbs?" The man replies, "Well, yes, I did see such a thing." And the king of death says to him, "My good man, didn't it ever occur to you, an intelligent and mature person, 'I too am subject to old age and cannot escape it. Let me now do noble deeds by body, speech, and mind'?" The man replies, "I could not do it. I was negligent."

And the king goes on with the same inquiry about sickness and death. "Didn't you ever see anybody who was sick? Didn't you ever see anybody who was dying? How could you have missed these heavenly messengers?" "No, I could not see them."

We have our view obscured by our own agendas. We don't see these truths, these heavenly messengers. When we can see them, it opens our heart. It doesn't have to be a depressing thing to come into contact with these truths. We learn, as we connect with these truths, to really look at what's most important to us. We learn to live from our deepest values. These truths, these divine messengers, can reorient our priorities, point us to what our real priorities are, and can result in compassion as we see that not only we but all beings are subject to these truths.

This is what we've been doing in the compassion practice—recognizing that all beings are subject to this same suffering of aging, sickness, and death.

I had a clear understanding of the connection between seeing impermanence and how that leads to compassion. On a retreat about a year ago, I was at the Forest Refuge for about three months practicing. About five weeks into my retreat, I woke up one morning and heard all these cracking and popping sounds. It was incredibly loud. I wondered if somebody was outside chopping down trees. When I looked out the window, everything was coated with massive amounts of ice. There had been a huge ice storm—maybe you heard about it; it was in the national news apparently. Power was out in New England for a long time.

When I looked out the window and saw the tree outside, it had been this beautiful little spinney of trees, and it was just bent. I could see that it was breaking. I took a walk and could see so many trees that had been devastated by this ice storm.

I could hear them. I understood then that what I'd heard, those loud pops and breaking sounds, were trees cracking and falling under the weight of the ice. My heart went out to all the beings living in the forest—where had they gone? How much fear and challenge it must have been for them to live through this night. My heart felt such compassion through this connection with impermanence.

This opening to impermanence can be a beautiful experience, and that quality of compassion has such a lovely texture to it.

Another excerpt from Rilke, celebrating in a way this opening to recognizing impermanence:

Everything here apparently needs us. This fleeting world, which in some strange way keeps calling to us. Us, the most fleeting of all. Once for each thing. Just once, no more. And we too, just once. And never again. But to have been this once completely, even if only once, to have been at one with the earth seems beyond undoing.

At a less obvious level than aging, sickness, and death, meeting and parting, accumulation and dispersal, is what we might call subtle impermanence—an impermanence that begins to point itself out to us as we settle our minds in meditation. The moment-to-moment changing of experience.

The Greek philosopher Heraclitus made this philosophy of change his standpoint, his hallmark. He really pointed to this as being the truth of the world. Everything changes. There is no static being, says Heraclitus, no unchanging substratum. Change, movement is lord of the universe. Everything is in a state of becoming, of continual flux. He continues: "You cannot step twice into the same river, for fresh waters are ever flowing in upon you."

One commentator on this philosophy goes one step further, saying: the same man cannot step twice into the same river. For the so-called man, who is only a conflux of mind and body, never remains the same for two consecutive moments. The same man cannot step into the same river.

Through meditation we start to open to this moment-to-moment changing nature of our experience. We begin to touch into this aspect of experience by noticing how much our minds change. We see that our moods and emotions come and go. During a day—today, for instance—how many different mind states did you experience? How many mind states did you experience moment to moment? Our minds change constantly.

As we turn our attention to our experience, we see its changing nature. Paying attention to something as simple as the breath, for example—it obviously appears and disappears with each breath. It rises, it falls. It rises, it falls. That part is really obvious. But even in seeing this clearly in meditation, somehow the fact of impermanence doesn't really hit us. It doesn't really penetrate.

When we stay more clearly with the rising and falling of the breath, we see even more clearly that no two moments of the breath are the same. We stay connected from the beginning, through the middle, to the end of the in-breath, and we see many sensations in that time. Ever-changing flocks of experience. No experience we have lasts very long.

The more we meet our experience without resistance and without holding on to it—without clinging or aversion—the more this characteristic of impermanence becomes clear to us. The resistance and the clinging to experience actually obscure or mask this quality of impermanence.

Sometimes in paying attention to our experience, we can be surprised by how things change. This surprise is, in a way, a hallmark of the sense of impermanence really entering.

When we're paying attention to something and then suddenly it's gone, it's like, "Whoa, where did that go?" That's the beginning of impermanence really entering the mind.

Another example: if we're not resisting painful experience in the body, as we pay attention to what we call pain—what we think of as a solid mass or block of pain—when we're not resisting it, it becomes this dancing, sparking, moving, flowing experience. You find one place in that experience where you can feel the pain, and then boom, it disappears, then it appears a few centimeters away. Just this continual changing experience. Not one solid thing the way we had felt it to be, but a continually flowing, changing experience.

On one retreat I was really exploring this and was quite surprised at one point to see there were moments in my exploration of the pain when the pain disappeared completely—for just a split second, just a moment. Then it was back, changing, moving, and then boom, it was gone again. And I could see that if any resistance to the pain crept in, then those moments of non-pain were not perceivable. That, for me, was a kind of support for letting go of the resistance. Because in the moments of non-pain, there was just a moment when the mind would deeply rest. No pain. And then pain was back. So in a way, that non-resistance supported the mind to be able to stay present and see, again, this ever-changing flux. See appearance, see disappearance.

Body sensations are impermanent. Mental experience is impermanent. All of our thoughts, moods, feelings, images—everything that happens in our mind is impermanent. And in fact, it is more fleeting than the body. The Buddha even pointed to this. He said, "It would be better if an uninstructed ordinary person regarded this body made of the four great elements as himself or herself, rather than the mind. For what reason? This body is seen to continue for a year, for two years, for five years, ten years, twenty years, fifty years, a hundred years, and even more. But that which is called mind, is called thought, is called consciousness, arises as one thing and ceases as another continually by day and night."

So mind is impermanent. And I'll talk more about that in a moment.

This belief in permanence, the fact of impermanence not entering into our minds and our hearts, is partly because we have this fundamental misperception, this erroneous way that we see our world. We see what is impermanent as permanent. Partly this is because of the clinging, as I mentioned before—when we cling to something, it masks the impermanent quality to it. Another reason for this belief in permanence is because things are changing so rapidly that the mind can't really touch or see that change unless the mind gets really still. So in a way, the rapidity of change obscures the fact of change.

One great way to think about this is just to consider how a movie works. I know many of you have heard this example. Now it's all bits on a digital file or something, but in the old film version, there were these still frames, and they were moved very rapidly past a light and shined onto the screen. The rapidity of the movement, the rapidity of the change from one frame to another, made it appear as though there was actually change happening, as though there was actually something happening on the screen—that there are people up there doing things, whereas it's actually just individual frames going by one after the other. But we don't see that because it's happening so quickly.

Another really amazing demonstration I had of this—of the way our minds have the capacity to create permanence, create objects out of things that aren't actually objects—was at the Exploratorium, the science museum here in San Francisco. One year I took my nephew there. He was about ten years old. We walked in, and you know, there's all the exhibits—this big warehouse of different displays. Way in the distance in the warehouse, there were these bars hanging from the ceiling, long bars about four feet long, not more than an inch or two in diameter, with flashing lights on them. There were maybe ten of them strung up across the back of the room. I looked at that and thought, "Huh, I wonder what that is"—just kind of seeing these flashing lights.

We walked around through the various exhibits, and at some point we sat down to have a refreshment, a drink. My nephew was sitting there and he said, "It's a school bus!" I looked at what he was looking at—he was looking up at the flashing bars. And I saw, when I looked up there, flashing yellow lights and a little bit of flashing red. I said to him, "I don't see a school bus."

What are you talking about?

And then he said, "It's butterflies."

I said, "What on earth are you talking about? I can't see this."

And so I took the time to sit there and really hang out with this exhibit, just observing it. And what it seemed to take was just the right movement, just the right motion of the eye from one bar to the next. The eye carried the image of one strand of flashing lights into space across to the next bar and created this illusion of a forty-by-ten foot screen—or about forty feet by four feet—hanging in space. And across that screen was driving a school bus. It was so clear. The image was so clear I could read the name of the school district on the side of the school bus.

This blew my mind—how the mind can construct this out of flashing lights. I think this is an optical phenomenon; our minds do this. Somebody called it persistence of vision or something like that. Our minds do this, and because of this we impute permanence to our experience. This was a great example. You could really clearly see there was nothing there, and yet the mind created it.

So we have this belief in permanence because we don't see the rapidity of change. In our exploration of experience, it can be interesting to explore what we think of as solid. What do we perceive as solid, as lasting? Look at that. Bring your attention to it and notice what happens as you observe it.

Right now, bring your attention to the experience of the pressure of your buttocks on your chair or cushion or bench. Just hang out with that feeling, that sensation. Come in close to the actual sensation of pressure. Can you feel throbbing? Pulsing? Vibration, tingling? These sensations are some of the markers or heralds of change. Body sensations are impermanent. We can see this by bringing attention to our body.

In our minds, we have habits and patterns that we somehow think of as being me or mine—patterns that we strongly identify with, that somehow feel like they're there all the time. It feels as though there's some reservoir of that thing hanging out somewhere, just waiting to erupt.

I had this pattern for myself. One of my many patterns before I started my practice was that I really identified pretty strongly with being miserable. I was a miserable person. There would be moments when I wasn't miserable, but when that happened, my mind usually said something like, "Well, I'm happy now, but really, I know that I'm miserable." The mind, because of its belief in that miserableness—or fill in the blank for yourself—imputes a kind of permanence to it. I believed there was this reservoir of miserableness lurking all the time.

When my mind began to settle and I actually observed in meditation what was happening, I could begin to see patterns arising out of causes and conditions, falling apart when causes and conditions changed. I could clearly see that when that pattern was gone, it was gone. It comes together out of causes and conditions and falls apart. And in between, it's not there.

So in looking at patterns and habits, recognize whether you have a sense of imputing permanence to them. In watching them, notice when they're there. Clearly notice when they're there, when you're clinging to them. But also pay attention to when they're not there—especially with some of these strong patterns and habits that we have. Recognize their presence; recognize their absence. It's a very powerful support for understanding the impermanent nature of our mental patterns.

The other exploration around this is to observe what you think of as yourself. When you have a sense of yourself being there, what is it that you are calling yourself? I found for myself, as I did this exploration, that there were just various patterns of often body contraction and thoughts and moods that were very familiar. Those were the ones I identified with. There was the angry me, the contented me, the self-righteous me, the worried me. Where is the angry me when the contented me is present?

So observing these patterns, observing these things we call self, you'll start to see they're not permanent. One instruction to Rahula, the Buddha's son—he gave an instruction to his son: "Rahula, develop meditation on the perception of impermanence. For when you develop meditation on the perception of impermanence, the conceit 'I am' will be eliminated."

So there's a connection here between really taking in the fact of impermanence and seeing through what we think of as self. I'll enjoin you: develop meditation on the perception of impermanence.

Impermanence might be understood as actual things appearing and disappearing. Sometimes that's the way it feels. And sometimes the surprise we have when something disappears is because we have imputed a thingness, imputed a permanence to something. Then when it disappears, it's shocking to us. But the deeper understanding about impermanence is that there's not really a thing there. It's a state of universal flux—even as something arises, it's dissolving and falling apart.

There's an analogy I found so beautiful as I was looking through some of the texts on this. It's like drawing a line on water—even as you draw it, it's disappearing. That's the way our experience actually is. Even as it comes into being, it's vanishing.

Over and over again, the Satipatthana Sutta, the discourse on the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, suggests that we recognize how things come into being and how they dissolve. There's an aspect of the Satipatthana Sutta called the refrain, which is mentioned after every instruction for meditation—around the body, around feelings, around mental states, around mind objects. I'll read the one for feeling: "Abide contemplating in feelings their arising factors or their vanishing factors or both their arising and vanishing factors."

What this is pointing to, what the word "factors" is pointing to, are the conditions that support the coming into being of feeling. Over and over again, the Satipatthana Sutta enjoins us to look at the factors that cause something to come into being, the factors that cause it to disappear. This is a strong reminder for us to pay attention to how things come into being, how they fall apart.

So there's a strong connection between change and conditionality. Things don't change randomly. They come into being because of causes and conditions. When those conditions change, they pass away.

We can also observe this in our meditation. On one of my early three-month retreats—one of the first I did, I think—I was noticing that I experienced a lot of aversion to the other people on the retreat, especially during walking meditation. This was the winter retreat at IMS, and typically we were walking in rooms where people were kind of up close next to each other, and I just felt a lot of aversion.

So I spent some time walking outside, and I began noticing that I wanted to look at people when they walked by. I began noticing this strong wanting. I'd moved away from the aversion but had moved into this wanting. For a while, I kind of just put the blinders on. I said, I'm not going to look, I'm going to be a good yogi. And I basically ignored the wanting.

At some point I realized that the wanting wasn't going away. And finally—I was a little slow—it's like, oh, maybe I should pay attention to the wanting. So I started paying attention to the wanting, not acting on the wanting. I kept my gaze down so that I didn't follow through on looking at the person when they walked by. But I really observed the quality of wanting.

What I noticed was that I would be just walking, doing my walking meditation, and if somebody appeared in my peripheral vision, wanting appeared. Boom. There was a very clear connection for me. The arising factor for the wanting was the appearance of this person in my visual field.

Then I watched the wanting. I felt the wanting. I felt how it was like being pulled—just this feeling of being pulled to look at this person. And I just kept watching the wanting. The person would walk around a little while, and then they might go into the building and disappear. And then the wanting disappeared. The vanishing of the person led to the vanishing of the wanting.

I thought this was so cool. It was really interesting to watch this process happen.

Wow, look at that—poof, wanting arises, poof, it vanishes. So I got into it for a while, just watching this process happen. And then at some point I recognized that I was actually holding on to the wanting in order to see it disappear. When I realized that, it disappeared instantly. The person was still there in my vision, but the wanting vanished because the clinging vanished.

This kind of exploration is available all day long on this retreat. You really have an opportunity to observe how your mind puts things together, how things fall apart, how things come into being and fall apart over and over again. Everything that we experience is impermanent. Everything that we experience is conditioned. Our thoughts, our feelings, our body sensations—it all comes into being and it falls apart. And not only that, the causes and conditions that create something coming into being are themselves impermanent. The causes and conditions for our experience are impermanent.

There's one sutta that points at this, and it has very deep implications. The Buddha says consciousness comes into being in dependence on a dyad. In dependence on the eye and forms—that's the dyad—dependence on the eye and things in the world, eye consciousness comes to be. So because of the eye, because of forms in the world, there is the seeing.

And then he goes on: "The eye is impermanent, changing, becoming otherwise. Forms are impermanent, changing, becoming otherwise. Thus the dyad of eye and forms is moving and tottering, is impermanent, changing, becoming otherwise. Eye consciousness is impermanent, changing, becoming otherwise. How can it not be when it's based on what is tottering already?"

I won't read the whole section here because I don't have time, but you get the idea. He goes on further—eye contact, feeling that results from the seeing, the perception that results from the seeing—all of it is in dependence on something that is already impermanent, tottering, falling apart as it comes together.

It's not necessary for you to believe this. Look at your experience. Just look at your experience. See if you can find anything that lasts. If you find something that lasts, look more closely at it. Keep looking. In that, you might see that breaking up. If you find something that seems solid and lasting underneath that, look more closely. Keep looking at your experience. You will not find anything that is lasting.

When we meet this recognition of impermanence, we can see this. The truth of impermanence really results in recognizing: wow, I have no idea what's going to happen next. It's a deep knowing of not knowing, a deep recognition of the fragility, the instability of everything.

And this can be unpleasant. We can react to this. We might react out of fear, sadness, grief, a feeling of disgust or betrayal. How can this be? That too is an arising experience to pay attention to—notice the reaction to the recognition of impermanence. My understanding of what's happening there is that it's a view of self. It's seeing the impermanence through the view of self—that there is someone to be afraid, to feel betrayed, to feel sad, to feel grief. So looking at that helps to support our understanding and recognition of the characteristic of not-self.

As the Buddha said to Rahula, cultivate the meditation on impermanence, the perception of impermanence. This will eliminate the conceit "I am."

I'll end by reading a couple of paragraphs from an essay called A Walk in the Woods by Prakanti Palo: "Everything and everybody, that includes you and me, deteriorates, ages, decays, breaks up, and passes away. And we, living in the forest of desires, are entirely composed of the impermanent."

Yet our desire impels us not to see this, though impermanence stares us in the face from every single thing around. And it confronts us when we look within—mind and body arising and passing away. So don't turn on the TV, go to the movies, read a book, seize some food, or pursue a hundred other distractions just to avoid seeing this. This is the one thing really worth seeing, because the one who fully sees it in himself is free.

This is what we're doing here.

CHAPTER 34

The Obvious

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Andrea Fella offers profound guidance on working with the layered nature of our mental formations (saṅkhārā). Drawing on the Buddha's analogy of the plantain tree from the teachings on the five aggregates (khandhas), she illuminates how our habits, patterns, and beliefs create an apparent solidity that forms our sense of self—yet like the plantain trunk, when examined closely, we find only layers with nothing solid at the center.

Fella challenges the common assumption that we need to dive deep to find the "core" of our patterns. Instead, she emphasizes simply meeting what is most obvious about our experience—gathering data without agenda, like early astronomers patiently observing the night sky. Through personal examples, including working with depression and discovering unexpected mettā underneath, she demonstrates how acceptance and non-resistance allow layers to naturally fall away. The Buddha's teaching to Bāhiya provides the essential instruction: "In the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard."

Practical techniques include checking one's attitude toward experience, recognizing the four flavors of relationship (greed, aversion, delusion, or balance), and understanding that transformation often happens gradually—like the Buddha's analogy of rope rotting on a beach. This patient, accepting approach to whatever arises reveals the constructed nature of self and opens the path to freedom from suffering.

We've been exploring our minds now for several weeks, and I'm sure many of you have recognized that a lot of what we get to see on retreat is the momentum of our minds—the habits, the patterns. Even patterns or habits that we thought were really old, long gone, sometimes seem to resurface as the mind gets quiet. As the strictures that we put on our mind in daily life fall away, these old patterns and habits can resurface.

As we get more familiar with our experience, we often have a sense that these habits, patterns, and experiences are layered. We have a sense that what we're experiencing—say, for example, a pattern of anger—has a pattern of fear underneath it, and that pattern of fear is perhaps born out of a resistance to a sense of vulnerability. We kind of know that these layers are there.

I'd like to explore this idea of layers as an analogy and as a way of thinking about our practice.

Last night Sally talked about the five aggregates. One of those in particular, the mental formations, is connected to an analogy that the Buddha uses, which I'd like to explore. The mental formations—this aspect of the aggregates—is really the area where our habits and patterns lie. This is where our emotions, our beliefs, our habits of planning, of judging, all of that lives: in that aggregate, that bundle, that group of the saṅkhāras, the mental formations.

In creating an analogy for this, the Buddha described this particular aggregate of mental formations as being like a plantain tree or a banana tree. In my exploration of the suttas, I have really found the Buddha to be a brilliant mind with respect to analogies. The analogies are so apt and can teach us so much if we explore what they're trying to say. In my thinking about this analogy of the plantain tree, I really see how it speaks to layering.

A banana tree, a plantain tree, basically looks like a pretty solid thing. The trunk might be as much as ten inches in diameter. It can be pretty big, and it looks solid. But if you start to explore this trunk, what you find actually is that it's composed of layers. All of the leaves have a stem that comes down and joins into this trunk. If you start pulling away, peeling away the leaves or the stem pieces—which are the bottom parts of what were leaves—you see that this trunk, this apparently solid thing, is just composed of these layers. You can keep peeling off layer after layer, and there's nothing solid in the middle of this plantain trunk.

Thinking about how this applies to our mental formations as an analogy: our habits, our patterns, our beliefs are layered like this. Like the plantain tree, they can create a sense of solidity through the very fact of the layering. The sense of solidity that we experience is the way this layering aspect of the mental formations forms our sense of self. With so much accumulating, our minds have this sense of, "Yeah, this is really solid. This is a real solid thing."

Having a sense of these layers—the way that we understand our minds, for example, anger being laid on top of fear, being laid on top of resistance to vulnerability—we often feel that what we're supposed to do is really dive in and understand the core, get to the core of the thing. Find out about that resistance to vulnerability, or even what's underneath that, perhaps something deeper. We have this sense of diving in or wanting to go down. It's like we think, "This outer thing—that's not the important part. It's the inner thing that I need to really get to so that this whole thing can fall apart, so that I won't be bothered by this anymore."

In my own practice, I've found that this diving underneath is not really very helpful. What's most helpful actually is to just be with what is most obvious about whatever this outer layer is—to meet this outermost layer, the ways it manifests in our bodies, the way it creates emotions, moods, thoughts, beliefs. Just get to know it. Get familiar with it.

One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, talks about gathering data about our experience. It's most helpful to simply think of the process of investigation, of looking at our experience, as gathering information—not particularly with any agenda, but just gathering data. Perhaps with some agenda of understanding, but not with an agenda to change, to fix, to control, to get rid of. This gathering data in order to understand what we are observing.

One analogy that Sayadaw U Tejaniya uses I find particularly interesting because it points me to the vastness of our task in a way.

And he points to the first human beings who started observing the night sky to understand its patterns, looking up at the stars. Just imagine, before there was any knowledge about any of the stars, how patient they had to be, and how many times they had to observe the stars, and over what length of time they had to observe them before they started seeing patterns. There's the obvious pattern of the heavens that seem to be pretty stable. And then you might start noticing, oh, there's a few that are moving. How long they had to actually sit there and watch before coming to an understanding about what might be happening up there.

This is the kind of patience and sense of contact with experience that we need in our practice—just gathering the data about what is happening in our experience. The more continuous that data gathering can be, the more clear the understanding is. The continuous contact with our experience begins to reveal its nature.

All of you have been seeing the impermanence of experience, recognizing that things change—not just intellectually, but actually seeing the changing nature of experience. This comes through the contact, the continuity, meeting our experience moment to moment. We also can start to see, with this continuity of mindfulness, cause and effect. We can start to see how one thing causes another, causes another, causes another.

Seeing that cause and effect relationship begins to show us how these layers are put together. We start to see—not just intellectually with the idea that "well, yeah, I think that underneath this anger lies fear"—we start to actually see the fear, and then the anger being created on top of it. We start to see the actual process by which these layers get created. This supports the recognition of the cause and effect relationship. And seeing the cause and effect relationship supports the understanding that there's not a self here doing this, that it's just a process of cause and effect unfolding in our experience.

As we explore our experience, it's really helpful not to make assumptions about what might lie underneath, what layers might be beneath this outer layer that we're looking at. Even if we have some idea about what might be underneath, it's really most helpful just to meet that outer layer, just touching the most obvious experiences without any agenda or any idea about what we might find beneath it. And if we are noticing that there are assumptions present, we can at least recognize that we have those assumptions and hold them lightly.

On one retreat several years ago, I was watching a pattern of mild depression that was arising kind of regularly. This was a retreat in Burma with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, and he encourages that there not necessarily need to be absolute silence on the retreat. So there are periods of time during the day where people are talking, having dharma discussions with each other. There's particularly one time of day in the early evening, after it's cooled off, that seems to be the promenade time. Groups of people, twos and threes, get together and walk up and down.

Sometimes I might not have somebody to walk with. And I began noticing that this depression seemed to be triggered by seeing some of these pairs of people. I could see that there was a trigger—I could feel that connection between the depression and seeing the groups of people walking up and down. My immediate assumption was that it was getting back to the sense of high school: "Oh, I was always an outsider, I was always an outcast, this must be related to that." But this was an assumption. I didn't actually see that. So I knew that it was an assumption, and I was very skeptical of it. I was holding it very lightly.

As I continued exploring this pattern of mild depression, particularly while I was doing walking meditation, it went on for several weeks. So I really got a chance to observe it, spend a lot of time watching this pattern come and go, finding ways to observe how I was caught by it and when I could just be with it without feeling caught by it.

Then one afternoon I was simply paying attention to the feelings manifesting in the body around this depression. I felt these feelings, and I was just able to be with them without any resistance whatsoever. I felt this pressure in my chest just start to expand, and there was no resistance to that expansion. I just watched it expand, expand, expand, and at some point in that expansion, the feeling flipped and became an expansive feeling of mettā.

This surprised me. This was not what I expected to find underneath that depression. But the next split second, the next moment of my experience, I heard my mind saying, "This is stupid, this is corny, this is sappy." This beautiful feeling of expansive mettā—there was reactivity to it in my mind. What this seemed to be pointing to was that some degree of this depression had to do with a kind of repression around the feeling of connectedness that mettā brings.

Not holding my original assumptions tightly helped me to just be with the experience as it unfolded. If we have expectations, or if we're looking for something particular underneath in the layers, we might miss what's actually there.

Another lesson for me around this particular experience—and I've seen this in other situations as well—is this surprising sense of a beautiful quality underneath what felt like a painful pattern. The beautiful quality of mettā, and a skewed response to it, were part of this pattern of depression. That's another piece I have really come to respect as I work through various layers of habits and patterns in my experience.

To not simply assume that everything about this pattern needs to be gotten rid of. There may be some beautiful quality underneath.

A quality that's helpful with respect to working with these layers in our experience is acceptance—non-resistance, simply being able to be with whatever's happening. We've been saying this over and over again; I think most every talk has touched on this topic. Be with your experience as it is. Don't hold on to it. Don't push it away. Accept your experience as it is. This same quality supports us as we work through our layers of experience, just meeting what is obvious about our experience.

Working through these layers of experience, these patterns, these habits that feel like an accretion of stuff—sometimes it can take a long time. After all, we've been practicing these habits and patterns and beliefs for many years. We've had a lot of practice with them. Many, many years have put these patterns together. And so to expect that a few weeks of retreat will completely unwind years, decades of practice of anger, aversion, hatred, and greed is expecting a little much. So patience is helpful.

I've found in my experience of my own practice that this slow process of working through habits and patterns has been the norm. There's a sense of gradually, slowly wearing down these habits and patterns. This is mostly how my own experience has unfolded.

There's another analogy that I love in the suttas about this gradual process. The Buddha says that if you think about a ship that has gotten shipwrecked and the parts of the ship are all strewn across a beach somewhere—the wood and the rope for the rigging and all the parts of the ship just lying on the beach—over time, the wind, the sun, the sand, the water all wear down these parts. In particular, he focuses on the rope, the rigging for the ship, and says that over time, this rope will simply rot.

I love this rotting rope analogy. Thinking through it, if you consider how long it takes for this rotting to happen, and how imperceptible it is day to day, the change—this gives you some idea about what's happening in our practice, this slow process of wearing down our habits and patterns.

Sometimes it's a slow process, perhaps seeing subtle, slow changes, and then we may not actually see the last little bit of that pattern fall apart. Again, like with the rotting rope on the beach: it's lying there for years, perhaps, and looking at it, it looks like a rope. But one day you go to pick it up and find it just falls apart in your hand because all the fibers have worn out. They're no longer holding each other together.

Sometimes our patterns can fall apart like this too. I had one very strong pattern of anger toward one particular person that went on for several years. I worked with it a lot in my practice. I looked at it directly. I explored it in many different ways. And at some point I realized that when looking at that anger directly, the mindfulness wasn't quite strong enough to meet the strength of the anger. Trying to bring attention to that pattern, the mindfulness just got overwhelmed and I was swept away into the anger.

So at some point I realized it wasn't so skillful to turn my attention to try to be mindful of that anger. What I would do when I saw the anger arise was simply recognize it, acknowledge it, meet it for just a moment, and then turn my attention to something else, staying mindful in my experience by putting my attention on something neutral. In most cases for this particular pattern, it was arising when I was walking. So I just put my attention in my feet, over and over again.

Whenever I noticed this pattern of anger arising, I would acknowledge it, meet it, and without any aversion, without any resistance to the anger, it was like meeting it and saying, "Yes, I see you. This is not the time to pay attention to you because I can see that I'll get swept away." I actually made a bargain with my anger. I said, "I'll pay attention to you when my mindfulness gets stronger."

And so I just redirected my attention, put my attention in my feet. Over the course of several months of engaging in this practice, I started noticing that the bouts of anger got further and further apart. They weren't coming up so frequently.

And then one day—and I don't know how long this process took—one day I was walking up my sidewalk to my house, and I recollected that it had been a very long time since I had felt that particular anger. In recognizing that, the person I was angry with came to mind, and I couldn't find the anger. I was surprised. Where did it go? I kind of checked around. I couldn't find it. I didn't believe that it was completely gone, but it has never returned. This was years ago now, years.

And it's actually been replaced with a feeling of metta, wishing for the happiness of this person I was so angry at. So it is completely gone. And it disappeared without my ever noticing it disappear. I just noticed one day that I hadn't seen it for a long time.

Sometimes our layers fall away like that. There isn't always a sudden exploding insight where we see everything completely clearly with a sense of complete understanding of how everything was formed. Sometimes it just falls away. And in my experience, that's a lot of how our practice works. There are times when we have these sudden awakenings where we see deeply into a pattern or habit and it falls away, but in my experience, those are much more rare.

So we don't know how long it will take to work through a particular layer in our experience. But basically the instructions are always the same: if we can meet that outermost layer with acceptance, just be with it. Notice what's obvious about it. No need to dig, no need to jump over it, no need to try to go underneath it.

For example, with that pattern I used at the very beginning, talking about the anger and having a sense that there might be fear under the anger—sometimes, having a sense of that fear, we feel like, "Okay, well, this anger is here, but really what's happening is the fear underneath, so I should be with that fear." But the anger is still present, layered on top of the fear. So being with what's most obvious about our experience: if anger is the most obvious thing, be with the anger. Be with how it feels in the body. Notice the thoughts it produces. Over time, you might start seeing fear thoughts and feeling the fear more obviously. Then we can move into that layer and start exploring those aspects of the whole pattern of layered experience.

Just noticing what's obvious about our experience—this gentle holding, this gentle touching of experience. I think in my first talk on effort and energy, I talked about that rubbing quality of investigation. Just being with the surface, staying in contact with the surface of what's obvious in our experience. Not trying to chip or dig or pull apart or figure out what's underneath. Just meeting the experience that's obvious.

The other aspect of this instruction around meeting experience is that if there is resistance to the experience, if there is non-acceptance, then that's what we have to pay attention to. It's almost as if the non-acceptance to anger—"This anger is not acceptable" or "I need to get rid of this anger," this sense of resisting the anger—is actually a layer on the outside of the anger that's holding it together. Sometimes these non-accepting attitudes can be hidden from us. We think there's just the anger in our experience and we're paying attention to it, but we don't particularly notice, as Winnie talked about, the agendas underneath. It can be helpful to open our minds to exploring, checking into whether there's some agenda happening. And again, we've all talked about this: checking the attitude, checking the relationship to the experience.

I haven't heard anybody in the hall talk about the technique that Sayadaw U Tejaniya recommends for this. It's possible somebody mentioned it on a night I wasn't here, so if you've heard this before, just take it in again. This is basically a way to uncover some of these hidden agendas, these hidden attitudes that might not be so obvious to us as we're hanging out with our experience.

The technique Sayadaw U Tejaniya recommends is to ask ourselves the question: What's my attitude about this experience? Another phrasing might be: What's my relationship to this experience? In asking this question, it's like dropping the question into the stream of our experience. The instruction is not to do anything with it. You just drop the question in and then continue your practice. Sometimes just dropping that question and inclining the mind to notice—is there something else happening here?—is enough. That's another way to explore the attitude: a sense of dropping back and opening up.

Is there something else happening? Is there something else going on that I wasn't noticing?

So in putting this question in, we simply notice whether it becomes obvious to us once we ask. If there's nothing obvious, there's no need—and it's not helpful—to try to figure out the answer to that question. If you drop the question in and there's some obvious response, an obvious sense of, "Oh yeah, I want this anger to go away," then you can include that sense of wanting it to go away, that sense of resistance, in your practice. Including that is simply recognizing: okay, resistance is what's happening. What is resistance like?

In this checking of attitude, there are roughly four flavors you might find. They come in all different varieties, but they fall into roughly four categories. It will either be wanting to get rid of something, wanting to hold onto something—so aversion and greed—a sense of delusion around it, of not wanting to experience it or not connecting with it, or a sense of a view or filter underneath it. Carol, I believe, talked some about delusion. And the fourth flavor is balance of mind.

Sometimes when I've given this instruction to people, they say, "Well, I don't see an attitude." And I ask them, "Did it seem like your mind was balanced?" "Yes." "Well, that's the attitude." Balance of mind can be an attitude. So you may see obvious greed or aversion, maybe not so obvious delusion, or you might see balance of mind—or it might not be clear to you. If it's not clear, don't worry about it. Just keep going with your practice.

This checking of attitude is usually helpful to do just occasionally. It's not something to do every thirty seconds. Perhaps every few minutes you might check into your attitude, particularly if you're feeling caught around experience. If there's some kind of struggle around being present for your experience, that's a good time to check your attitude. Another good time is when it feels like things are going really well. Just check in and see if there's some agenda around that experience.

Sometimes our attitudes can be really subtle, such that we don't even see them, that we might not recognize them. That's one reason not to try to hold on to finding an attitude. Sometimes we can't see them. Sometimes they're a little more subtle than our mindfulness is capable of seeing.

I had an example of this around that same period of depression I was referring to a few minutes ago. On my retreat several years ago, before I noticed the shift to mettā, I was just watching the cycling of the depression, the resistance to the depression, and the absence of depression. I was seeing those three things happening. Sometimes they would cycle pretty quickly. I would notice, "Oh, there's depression. Oh, there's resistance. Oh, it's gone." And then, "Oh, there's back in it." It was like watching this pattern unfold.

Watching this for quite some time, I felt like I was just right with it. It didn't feel like there was any particular attitude or agenda about watching it. But at some point, I recognized—I saw—that the resistance to the depression was simply a natural phenomenon arising like anything else. It was no different or more special than any other phenomenon arising in my mind stream.

And at that point, in seeing that the resistance to depression was just something coming and going, I saw that I had had an attitude: the resistance to depression had been a problem. The resistance was a problem, and I needed to do something about it. But I hadn't seen that until it fell away.

So sometimes we can't see our attitudes until there's a shift and we see the absence of that attitude. Sometimes when a layer drops away—a layer of a strong habit or pattern we've known for a long time—we feel like all traces of it have disappeared.

I had this happen with one particularly strong pattern around self-hatred. I had a very strong pattern around that. On one retreat, I had a deep insight into the nature of the thoughts around the self-hatred—simply that the thoughts were just thoughts. They were just empty phenomena. In seeing the empty nature of those thoughts, the pattern just crumbled. This was one of those sudden awakening-type insights.

I didn't trust it for a while, but it was years before I felt anything like that self-hatred again. There was a sense, for a little while—I mean, I didn't trust that it was completely gone. I kept telling myself there must be some vestiges of this; it was such a strong pattern. But it was several years before I noticed little filaments of thoughts arising in the mind. "You're no good"—that thought that had been so devastating to me. At this point, the thought was simply arising, and there wasn't a belief attached to the thought, which is what really got truncated in that insight about the self-hatred, seeing the emptiness of the thought. It was the belief in the thoughts that was cut. And yet the pattern of thought still kept arising, those thoughts.

This points to another way that layers work in our experience. My teacher Sayadaw U Pandita describes different layers of defilement in our minds—defilement being all of these habits and patterns of mind that create suffering. He talks about the most gross layer of defilement being the layer that comes out into bodily action, where the pattern of that defilement is so strong that it comes into our behavior. We act on that pattern. The next layer down is the layer where the defilement comes into our thoughts but doesn't come into our bodily action. And the next lower layer is what's called the layer of underlying tendency toward that pattern.

So that underlying tendency can be there even if the pattern is not arising in our mind stream. There's a way in which if we get close to that place in our minds, we can drop into that pattern, that habit again, because that underlying tendency is there. It's really helpful, even in seeing a pattern fall away suddenly like that, to keep attuned to movements that are similar to it.

In my experience now with this pattern of self-hatred, it's pretty much only when I'm on deep retreat that I see these little fibers arising and sense, "Oh yes, there's actually still a very subtle kind of belief around that pattern." So not getting complacent when it feels like a pattern falls away. Noticing with care when we see those tiny little fibers. In my mind, I looked at it as like a bunch of this plant got uprooted, but there were still some roots left in the ground. Those were the underlying tendencies, still ready to sprout. And if we're not careful, they can sprout again.

As a layer falls away, we can experience a huge amount of relief, a sense of freedom when we find that we're no longer being whipped around by a pattern or habit that was so strong for us. It can be this real sense of freedom. Usually this is not enlightenment. It's simply the relief of letting go, of no longer being at the mercy of a particular pattern. But over time, and with more mindfulness, we sometimes can start seeing these deeper patterns underneath. We start seeing subtler kinds of suffering underneath, the next layer, which perhaps have been masked by the more obvious layer of suffering—the old pattern.

For myself, the old pattern of self-hatred falls away, and it feels for a time like, "Wow, there's no problems anymore." Everything that comes up feels like no problem. Everything feels very easy, partly because we're so used to responding to things through that old layer, and we're feeling such freedom from not having it. And yet there's still subtler clinging underneath. We're not fully enlightened.

After some time of getting familiar with this new state of no longer reacting through that old pattern, we start to see, "Oh, there's new suffering here. There's new patterns that I hadn't noticed." And this is not a mistake. Sometimes people say, "I feel like I've gone backwards. For so long I wasn't experiencing much suffering, and now suddenly I'm experiencing all this suffering again."

There are many, many layers of subtlety to our clinging. The obvious levels of clinging are at the strong mental formations, the strong sankhāras of greed and aversion, which manifest in what we might call the afflictive emotions: anger, frustration, hostility, cruelty, wanting—some of these very strong patterns that we have. Those are the obvious layers of clinging. Over time, through the practice, some of those can get much weaker. Some of them even fall away. And then we start noticing subtler levels of clinging. We can start noticing clinging to wholesome mind states, a wanting to construct wholesome mind states.

Whereas before, that wanting to construct the wholesome mind state wasn't experienced as suffering—in fact, it supported us to be with the more obvious layer of suffering around our afflictive emotions—as the afflictive emotions fall away, we start experiencing the suffering of holding on to these wholesome mind states. Many, many layers of holding. Many layers of clinging.

And an even deeper layer of clinging: clinging to being the one who feels, the one who perceives, the one who knows. When the mind gets very quiet and very still, then we can start to see these more subtle levels of clinging.

And again, I'll say it again: no matter where we are in our practice, whatever is happening—whether it's clinging to knowing, clinging to consciousness, fear of the sense of self being lost, or whether it's obvious anger and frustration—the instructions are the same. We meet what's obvious about our experience, and we check our relationship to that experience, to see if there's any subtle attitude in the mind holding it in place. Just keep being with, being with, being with whatever is coming up in experience.

So seeing through this solid sense of self—if we keep looking, if we keep looking at our experience, like with this analogy of the plantain tree, we find nothing in the middle, nothing in the center that's solid, that can be called I or me. There's simply a process of things being experienced and being known, experienced and known, experienced and known.

One teaching by the Buddha around this, seeing through this solid sense of self, is a very famous sutta that many of you, I'm sure, have heard of. It is a teaching that the Buddha gave to a monk called Bahiya, who came to him after a long journey saying, "Please teach me your Dharma in brief." And after a few more requests—he had to request three times—the Buddha finally gave him this instruction:

"This is how you should train yourself. In the seen is only the seen. In the heard is only the heard. In the sensed is only the sensed. In the cognized is only the cognized. That is how you should train yourself."

That is the instruction. Meet experience. Just be with what is happening. Without filters, without views. Look at the attitude to uncover those filters and views. Just be with the seen, the heard, the sensed, the cognized. The bare being with experience.

So that was the instruction: be with your experience in this simple way. And then he went on to tell Bahiya: "When for you in the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard, in the sensed is only the sensed, in the cognized is only the cognized, then there is no you in terms of that. When there's no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there's no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

So he points to this instruction of just noticing our experience. Notice the seen, the heard, the sensed, the cognized. That will reveal that there's no you there. You don't have to believe in this teaching of not-self. The Buddha pointed to simply being with our experience. When this is the case, there will be no you there. And there's no you there, no self, no problem. This leads us to freedom.

Very simple, very simple practice. It doesn't matter—we say over and over again—it doesn't matter what we're mindful of. It can be boredom. It can be bliss. It can be equanimity. It can be anger, frustration, irritation. It can be disinterest. It doesn't matter what we bring our mindfulness to. What matters is that we contact our experience with the mindfulness.

Whatever you are experiencing in this moment—that is the path to freedom.

So let's sit for a couple of minutes.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 35

Not Knowing

Andrea Fella · 52 min

> In this talk from a month-long retreat, Andrea Fella begins with a guided meditation that expands awareness progressively through the body and beyond, cultivating a spacious, relaxed quality of knowing. This experiential foundation sets the stage for an exploration of "not knowing" as both a profound truth of moment-to-moment experience and a doorway to liberation.
>
> Fella examines how we habitually bring baggage from the past—our views, opinions, and beliefs about who we are and what we can do—into the present moment, creating self-fulfilling prophecies that constrain our experience. She discusses the perceptual process described in the teachings on the five khandhas, illustrating through the famous sutta story of the blind men and the elephant how perception can be mistaken for reality. A personal story about misperceiving bat sounds as pigs being slaughtered vividly demonstrates how prone to error our conceptual mind can be.
> The talk addresses the paradox that seeking insight can obstruct insight itself, since we cannot truly know what we're looking for. Drawing on teachings from her teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Fella suggests that relaxing our effort to find something specific allows genuine understanding to arise naturally. She acknowledges that opening to not knowing can evoke fear and vulnerability, but through careful investigation, we discover that in each present moment, everything needed is actually known—it is only our projection into an imagined future that creates suffering. This recognition transforms the apparent abyss of uncertainty into the solid ground of immediate experience.

Tonight I'd like to begin by doing a guided meditation—essentially an exercise in expanding awareness as a pointer to a kind of awareness that can be very broad and very relaxed.

You don't need to alter your posture. Just find a place or a way to sit where you'll be comfortable for about fifteen minutes or so, perhaps as long as twenty. While we go through this exercise, it's really helpful to relax and keep coming back to that relaxation as we go. For now, go ahead and let your eyes close.

I'd like you to just allow your awareness to take in the sensations in your head—whatever physical sensations you're feeling there. Pulsing, tingling, vibration. Dryness, coolness. Just experiencing the sensations in your head.

Now I'd like to invite you to expand that awareness to include the sensations in your neck, almost as if your awareness were a bubble that you were allowing to relax and expand from just encompassing the sensations in your head to now include the sensations of your head and the sensations of your neck. Relax and widen the awareness.

Allow the bubble of awareness to expand now to include your shoulders, so you're taking in the sensations of your head, your neck, and your shoulders. See if you can relax your mind. It's easier to not try to do this so much, but more relax into it.

Allowing the bubble of awareness to expand to include your torso—all aspects of the physical sensations in your torso, from top to bottom, front to back, and side to side. The interior dimension, the three-dimensionality of the experience, including your head, your neck, your shoulders, and your torso. Pulsing, vibration, pressure, movement. Relax.

Allowing the awareness to expand outwards to include your arms. Staying connected with the sensations of your head, your neck, your shoulders, your torso, and your arms. You might envision this awareness as an expanding cognizant fluid bubble.

Now allow your awareness to stay connected with the physical experience of the upper part of your body, and also notice any emotional or mental experience or responses to the process that we're going through. Allowing this expanding bubble of awareness to take in not only the texture of the physical experience, but the texture of your emotional, your mental experience. Relax. This isn't something to do. Just see what you can open to.

Allowing your awareness to expand to include the physical sensations of your hips, your buttocks. Staying connected to the experience of your head, your neck, shoulders, torso and arms, your hips, your buttocks, as well as any mind states that may be coming. Relax and allow the awareness to expand to include your thighs and your hamstrings.

Staying connected to the physical experience, noticing the impact this has on the mind, allowing the awareness to expand to take in the whole body—including your knees, your lower legs, your feet, along with your head, neck, shoulders, torso, arms, hips, buttocks. The internal physical dimension of the body and the texture of the mental experience.

Now I'd like to invite you to allow this bubble of awareness to expand beyond your body, beyond the confines of your body. Allow yourself to let go of the idea of the edges of your body. Let yourself feel into the texture of awareness—the feeling of knowing.

Staying connected with the bodily sensations and the mental experience, allow yourself to open to include the experience of hearing. There's not much work that you need to do to hear, to include hearing in this practice. You've already been hearing without much effort during the course of the guided meditation. From time to time, you might notice the experience of hearing producing a kind of ripple through this field of awareness. And you might notice also sometimes a change in the mental experience producing a ripple through this field, this feeling of knowing. Relax.

Staying connected to your physical bodily experience, the experience of the mind, emotions, thoughts, moods, and hearing—I'd like to suggest expanding this field of awareness still further by opening your eyes. Notice the impact that opening your eyes has on the experience. Relax.

Allow yourself to take in the physical experience of the body—the vibration, pulsing, tingling, heat, coolness, pressure, hardness, softness. Recognize and acknowledge any emotional experience, any moods, mind states, or thoughts. Stay connected to all of that, taking in the vibration, the pitch and tone of hearing.

the form and color of seeing.

Relax. The body actually does all of this by itself. You might notice awareness moving rather rapidly between experiences, picking up on something here, then something there. Or you might notice a sense of awareness just suffusing in a very light way the whole of the experience. The experience can be very ordinary—very present but very ordinary.

Staying connected to your bodily experience, your mental experience, especially your mental experience right now, allow yourself to start looking around, noticing the movement as well as what you're seeing. Actually look at things. Notice how the mind responds as your eyes land on certain things. Notice how the body responds. As much as possible, stay connected to all of this experience.

You can break your posture if you like and start to move a little more, noticing again how the mind and body respond to that movement. I'd like to encourage you during this talk to see if you can stay connected with some sense of this awareness while I explore the topic of not knowing.

The more we practice, the more we come into our experience, the more we really deeply see and recognize that we just do not know what is going to happen to us. We feel this, we recognize this, on both the obvious, more gross level of our lives—really recognizing and understanding that we don't know from moment to moment what's going to happen to us. In the conventional sense, in all likelihood, five minutes from now we'll all still be sitting here. But we don't actually know that. There's a way that we really can connect with that truth the more deeply we enter into this practice.

On a more subtle level also, this is true. We really begin to see, as we touch into our moment-to-moment experience, the deep truth that we have no idea what the next arising experience will be. So entering into the present moment, really coming into our experience here and now, we can enter into it as an exploration of not knowing.

When we come into the present moment—particularly at the beginning of a retreat, but often during the retreat as well, over and over again—we often bring baggage with us that obscures this not-knowing quality of being in the present moment. We bring our views and opinions and ideas about who we are into the present moment, about what we can and can't do. Then we take those views and opinions from our past, from our history, from our conditioning, and we create a future in which we can and can't do things.

In a way, that historical conditioning, that baggage we bring into the present moment, conditions our experience to become a self-fulfilling prophecy. We find we can and can't do these things that we think we can and can't do, because these views and opinions are operating. So in a sense, with this conditioning and these beliefs, we think we know who we are. We think we know. We don't give ourselves much room to not know, to not be bound by those views.

I know that most people have had this experience of coming into contact with a friend or someone you've known for a while. That person, having known you for a while, has views and opinions about who you are and what you can and can't do. We bristle sometimes when we meet that kind of energy from a friend. It's like, "You don't really know me." And yet that same thing we do to ourselves. We do that to ourselves quite often. And we do it to our friends also. So this holding to views of who we are obscures the possibility of opening to this not knowing.

Not only do we bring in baggage from the past and project it into the future, we also have views, thoughts, and beliefs about what's happening to us in the present moment. One way this comes into play is through the assigning of meaning when we meet an experience. Something happens and it's about me. What does it mean about me? How does it relate to me?

Then there's the perceptual process that happens in the present moment. There's a very natural process that occurs: when something happens—the sound of a bell, the sound of a bird, the touch of a footstep, the arising of an emotion, a feeling of pressure or tension or tightness, the seeing of color and form—as soon as that happens, the mind recognizes it. It labels it. It's a very natural process of the mind. And yet we so often make the mistake of confusing that perception with reality.

Perception is something that simply arises in our minds. It may or may not be correct. It may or may not be accurately perceived. And from that movement of perception, which is just a natural functioning of the five skandhas, the five khandhas that Sally talked about, we very quickly move from perception to thinking about, to creating whole stories about. We move into that world of papañca where we create a whole world in our minds and often believe it.

So we're several layers removed from what's actually happening in the present moment, from what's actually being contacted with our present moment experience. We mistake the concept for reality, thinking that we know something. Concepts are useful—I'm not saying concepts are not useful. We need to use concepts. But it's also very helpful to be clear on the difference between the actuality of experience and the perceptions arising around it.

In a sense, I think partly we really count on these concepts because they stabilize our world for us. Things are actually changing pretty quickly. Through the use of concepts, we come into a place where we feel like things are kind of grounded here. We know what's happening. We have this sense that we know what's happening. And again, entering into the present moment, coming into contact with actual experience, we start to see that we don't know. The mystery, the mystery of experience.

There's a famous story in the suttas about mistaking perception for reality—the story of the blind men and the elephant. I'm sure many of you are familiar with the story, so I'll just review it briefly. A king asked his attendant to bring all the blind people together in the kingdom and to show them an elephant. To one person he showed the legs, to another the tail, another the ears, the tusks—all the various parts of the elephant.

After they'd been shown the elephant, the king asked them, "So tell me, what's an elephant like?" And the people who'd felt the legs said, "Well, an elephant is like a post." Those who'd been shown the tail said, "It's like a broom." Those who'd been shown the ear said, "It's like a winnowing basket." Those who'd been shown the side said, "It's like a storeroom." And having felt these things in their own direct experience, they started fighting among each other. "No, an elephant is like this!" "You're wrong, an elephant is like this!"

Part of the teaching aspect of this story is about the danger of creating views out of your own direct experience. We may not have the whole picture. So even though we have a sense of something true from our direct experience, creating a view and saying "this is the way it is" can be misleading—misleading at best, perhaps, and dangerous at worst.

So it's helpful to understand this process of perception, how it works, what the mind does around perception, so that we're not fooled into mistaking it for reality. And understanding also how prone to error concept can be. I have one story from my own experience around this mistaking of perception, how prone to error it can be.

I was on retreat in Burma, at a monastery relatively close to some houses in the nearby village. Every evening around dusk, or at least frequently in the evening around dusk, I would hear this squealing sound. And in my experience, the squealing sounded like a pig. This is the process of perception—the mind matches up what we understand from the past to our experience and does a search. I'm a computer programmer, so I think of things like this. It does a search through our experiences: "Okay, that's this." It matches it up. So that's what my mind did with this squealing sound. It matched it up with the idea, "That's a pig."

And not only that, this squealing sound had a sense of distress to it. So I envisioned that this was a pig being slaughtered for dinner or for the butcher. Compassion was the result of this experience. Each evening when I heard this, perception arose that it was a pig being slaughtered, and compassion came up.

Then one evening I was out walking around at about dusk, and I saw bats flying through the air, and they were squealing. I realized that was what I had been hearing. It had not been pigs being slaughtered. This perception process is very prone to error.

So coming into the present moment, recognizing this perceptual process as a process, can we just meet our experience without this clinging to what we think we know? Opening to the possibility of this not knowing. Opening to the possibility that these views we hold of ourselves don't have to constrain us, that we don't have to be boxed in by these views, that we don't have to box other people in by our ideas about them. Opening to the possibility that we're not what we think we are. Freedom from views. Freedom from the known, as Krishnamurti says. Freedom from the known.

In our moment-to-moment experience, opening to the possibility that we have no idea what we're looking at and what we're looking for. The very nature of insight is that we don't really know what might happen around an insight. The very looking for something can obscure the insight. We actually have no idea what we're looking for. We have some ideas about it. We think we know.

I remember on one retreat I'd heard a lot about this phenomenon called arising and passing, a phenomenon where you start to see clearly, moment to moment, things coming into being and disappearing, just in a continual stream, a flow of experience. I'd heard this described in quite a few dharma talks. I'd probably also read about it in books. And I really wanted that experience. I really wanted it.

One day I was doing walking meditation, and I realized that this wanting was expressing itself through a fantasy of describing to my teacher how I had had the insight of arising and passing. Waking up into the midst of that thought, I had to laugh, because at that moment I really saw that I had no idea what I wanted. I had no clue what this experience was. It was an idea in my mind. It was a thought that I wanted. I really wanted to be able to tell somebody I'd had this experience.

So it can be easier in some ways if we stop looking for insight and just meet our experience with this open mind of not knowing.

My teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya tells a story about how this works. He was visiting Massachusetts a year or so ago, and one of his students' father had taken them out for a drive in the countryside. They were talking about all the deer wandering around, and there was some concern about the deer getting in front of the car. The father said to U Tejaniya, "Well, I've got a deer alarm." U Tejaniya didn't understand what that was, and the father explained, "It's a very high-pitched sound that disturbs the deer, so they won't come near the car. Can you hear it?" U Tejaniya said he listened and listened and tried to hear the sound, and he couldn't hear it. So he stopped trying to hear the sound, and then he heard it.

It's that kind of relaxation. When we look for something, we don't know what we're looking for. The very looking can obscure what we're trying to see. So relaxing, settling back, and just meeting experience.

In this place of just meeting experience, coming into our present moment really fully like this, where we get a deep sense of not knowing, it can be unsettling. We can have a response of even fear, a sense of insecurity, a sense of vulnerability, because it is so clear to us that we don't know what is going to happen. We just don't know.

So what is this fear? It's worth looking into this fear. The fear might result from the mind creating an idea about something that might happen because we don't know what will happen. It might create a disaster scenario.

which would then create fear as a result of meeting that disaster scenario. So that fear isn't really about the not knowing—it's about fearing a thought in the mind. If you can see this process, that can help allow the mind to settle again back into the present moment.

And yet, settling into the present moment, there may not be any sense of a disaster scenario out there, but just this sense of vulnerability. Or a sense of: how do I move forward if I don't know what's going to happen next? This sense of almost being paralyzed because we don't know.

In my exploration of this, I think this is about a reaction to the idea of not knowing, and what we think that means—that we don't know, that we don't have control, for example.

On one retreat, I found my way into the space of just really recognizing that I had no idea what the next split second of arising experience would bring. And it took me into a place of quite strong fear. At one point I decided: I'm going to meet this. I'm going to meet this not knowing. I'm going to really be with this not knowing.

And what I discovered in this process of really trying to meet the experience was that there isn't anything that's not known. In the moment, everything is known. Now, it is true that we don't know what the next moment will bring. But the processes of mind and body just pick up the next experience kind of automatically. When we're not creating a future and referencing it back to me, a sense of self, this truth of not knowing ceases to be a problem.

It's kind of like we're standing on the edge of an abyss, surrounded 360 degrees by this abyss, and we have no choice but to take a step—feeling like we're going to step into the abyss, not knowing. And we step into the abyss. And we find ourselves standing at the edge of the abyss, surrounded by the abyss.

CHAPTER 36

Part 5 of 5: Discussion (PM) — Daylong in the Style of U Tejaniya

Andrea Fella · 29 min

In this closing discussion session of the daylong retreat in the style of Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Andrea Fella responds to practitioners' questions about the nuances of awareness-based meditation. The conversation explores how to work skillfully with physical discomfort and aversion, emphasizing that noticing an agenda—wanting pain to disappear—actually prevents the natural release that comes from non-reactive awareness.

A central theme emerges around recognizing mindfulness itself: what does it actually feel like to be aware? Fella describes how moments of spontaneous, unprompted mindfulness—those split seconds when we naturally wake up to present experience—are the key to understanding effortless awareness. Rather than immediately doing something with what we notice, we can learn to recognize and rest in the quality of awareness itself, allowing it to develop its own momentum.

The discussion also addresses the intimate connection between mind and body, particularly how mental tension can manifest as physical pain throughout the system. Fella shares her personal discovery that what seemed like whole-body physical inflammation around a frozen shoulder was actually mental holding that released instantly when recognized. She points toward the Buddha's description of liberation as the absence of mental pain and grief—a state where physical sensations continue but reactivity ceases, offering profound freedom regardless of bodily conditions.

During the course of the sitting, I found seven ticks on me. So if anybody has been in the brush or in the grass, they should check themselves carefully. There are a lot of ticks here.

Question: You've been talking about attitude, and I was trying to think of what that might be. This last stretch I had a lot of low-grade headache and discomfort in my seat and so on, and I was trying to notice whether or not my attitude was aversion. I'm wondering if that's the kind of attitude—in other words, an attitude towards a sensation.

Answer: Yes, that's what I'm talking about. If you're paying attention to headaches or physical sensations, there's often some way in which you are observing it that has a slight skew to it. With physical discomfort, it's often aversion. When you recognize that, it becomes part of the field of what you are aware of, so that it's not operating in the background but has the opportunity for mindfulness to be aware of that experience of aversion.

Follow-up: As I recall, it's said that if you stay with an unpleasant feeling, it goes away. But I don't know if that's really the case always.

Answer: The physical sensations in the body are coming and going. If you stay with the physical sensation without aversion, you'll start noticing that impermanent quality, and it can get to a state where the physical sensation disappears. But if you've got the physical sensation and an aversion to it, it's very unlikely that trying to hold yourself on that physical sensation is going to make it disappear, because there's an agenda there.

That's another way to look at the term "attitude." Is there an agenda? Does your mind have an agenda? Is there something that you're trying to do or change or fix or control? Are you paying attention to that unpleasant sensation because you've heard that if you pay attention to it really carefully, it will go away? That's having an agenda.

Question: Can you say something about moving around versus staying in one place with the awareness? In particular, with respect to physical tension and relaxation. This is something I struggle with hugely—I get tense and then I don't want to be part of it. I'm really encouraged by your teaching about the importance of relaxation, and if you see tension, just see it and try to relax. But for me, my jaw, my neck, parts of my back, my abdomen—relaxing them is a big project. Just looking and relaxing doesn't quite work. I could stay there and it holds my attention fairly well to actually sit and really work gently with relaxing over time. I'm wondering whether that's skillful within this set of instructions or not.

Answer: It is, initially. I spent a lot of time working with relaxation at first and just recognizing, "Wow, there's all this tension." So relax, relax, relax. I remember whole sittings where that's all I did—just notice the tension and relax, notice and relax, notice and relax. After one particular sitting like that, I thought, "Thank goodness I can do this in my meditation," because my mind had gotten so tense around meditating that it really needed this dedicated movement towards relaxation.

Over time, what I've discovered more recently is that I was in this habit of starting my meditations by relaxing. Then I discovered I started falling asleep. I talked to Sayadaw Tejaniya about that and said I was really sleepy in a lot of sittings. He said, "Well, are you still trying to relax?" I said yes. He said, "Well, stop that."

So over time, what begins to happen is that instead of needing to consciously relax, what you just need to do is turn to become aware of the tension and just notice it. That noticing itself will allow it to relax. But if a tense mind is trying to look at tension, it's probably just going to get balled up. So I would encourage you to work with that relaxation for a while.

Perhaps for a whole sitting, and then try the next sitting where you do a little bit more exploration of just being with what's coming up. But it's very helpful to get the mind to a place where it has that relaxed quality so that it can start to just notice what's happening—just very naturally notice what's happening.

Thank you. What happened with the walking? We haven't talked about the walking.

The thing I noticed is that having no instruction—not doing a slow, conscious walk or focusing on breathing or anything—I didn't quite know what to do except enjoy everything.

Were you aware of what was happening?

Some of the time, I would say. Not knowing what to do felt a little confusing at first.

One of the things I pointed to in one of the guided meditations—I think it was the one right after lunch—is beginning to recognize what it feels like to be aware. The recognition of mindfulness itself, so that you know what it feels like to be mindful. That begins to really serve you in this practice. It serves you in your walking and it serves you in your daily life, because you get a sense of what it means to be present, of what it feels like to be present. And that itself begins to wake you up, because this quality of becoming aware of what's happening while it's happening actually occurs a lot throughout our day.

It happens for a split second. For a split second we know it's happening while it's happening, and then immediately our habitual tendency is to leap on that thing and start thinking about it, start doing something with it in our minds. So we aren't trained—our minds are not trained—to notice this recognition of noticing mindfulness. We're trained to do something with what we notice. And so we completely miss mindfulness itself.

As we start to get familiar with the feeling of mindfulness, that's the direction—particularly in the walking. Well, it's in everything, but in the walking especially, just getting familiar with what it feels like to not be trying to do a meditation. And that's where it feels a little awkward. It's like, well, what am I supposed to do?

I remember when I first started meditating, early in my practice, teachers would say, "Connect with the sense of presence." I had no idea what they were talking about. I didn't know what it meant to be present. I didn't really know what it meant to be aware of awareness. That exploration has been very interesting for me as I've investigated what it actually means to be aware. What does it feel like?

At this point it has a very tangible feeling for me. I know what it feels like to be aware. There's a very clear sense of what mindfulness is. Because of that, as I'm going through my day, those moments—those split seconds when mindfulness just kind of naturally comes in—our mind is doing lots of things and it occasionally touches in and knows what's happening in itself while it's happening. When you recognize that quality of mindfulness in those split seconds, they wake you up. Instead of just automatically jumping on them and doing something with them, you're suddenly present: "Oh, here I am, cutting an apple. Oh, here I am, walking across the street."

Learning and becoming familiar with that is something you can work with in the walking: What does it feel like to just be aware?

In the guided meditation I also pointed to a particular place where you can explore this—the moment when you recognize that you have remembered mindfulness, the moment you have woken up into something or other. Normally in our sitting practice we have something to anchor ourselves on, like the breath, and we recognize that we're not paying attention because we're not paying attention to something in particular. In this practice we're not really anchoring on anything, so the movement is simply to learn to recognize those moments when we spontaneously come back into awareness.

Those are beautiful moments, actually. I've learned to think of them as almost the linchpin or the key to waking up—those moments of spontaneous coming back into awareness—because they're completely effortless. It's awareness that you haven't created. It's nothing that you have done. Simply causes and conditions have come together to make that awareness reappear in that moment. And if you can be there for that moment, if you can recognize it, you'll get a sense of what it means to be effortlessly mindful. Because that moment of spontaneously waking up into mindfulness is an effortless mindfulness.

Getting familiar with that feeling, it begins to point itself out. When we are familiar with it, it points itself out to us. Then we can learn to ride the wave of that effortless mindfulness. The moment when mindfulness reappears—just seeing how long it lasts. Getting familiar with that wave, the momentum of mindfulness, we then learn how to skillfully prompt mindfulness.

I would call that spontaneous re-arising of mindfulness "unprompted mindfulness." And that's how it all begins in the first place—there are these moments of unprompted mindfulness, of spontaneous re-arising of mindfulness. When we have that spontaneous re-arising, we have the opportunity to then remind ourselves to be mindful, to keep being mindful. And that I would call "prompted mindfulness."

This is where I would encourage you to go with walking meditation: see if you can begin to recognize the quality of awareness itself and become familiar with it.

A question arose about whether awareness includes states like grasping, or whether it only refers to those times when we are doing none of those things and there is just pure attention. Awareness can be aware of anything, including grasping. The purity of awareness itself does not contain that grasping, but it is a long process of getting there. As I have said, when you become aware of grasping, there can be a simple recognition: "Oh, there's grasping happening." It is like watching some strange creature form before your eyes. "Oh, there's grasping. What's the big deal? That's just grasping." It is not a problem. So awareness can be aware of anything.

Another question came about tension and relaxation, specifically physical tension. The practitioner described how they had developed a practice of starting with relaxation, and when the mind wanders and they return, the first thing they do is open and let something relax, whatever needs to. But their question had to do with there seeming to be more than one level of tension. There is the tension that comes and goes—perhaps the jaw—tension that simply releases when one becomes aware of it in a particular way. Then there is tension like what they were experiencing in the shoulders, which had been there for more than a week and does not just release. And then there is tension from parts of the body that constricted years ago and stay constricted. That latter group seems, as far as they can tell, unaffected by simple attention. There may be some very subtle effect, but it seems to be on quite a different level.

I think this observation is correct. Particularly those patterns that have been held in the body for years and years—it is almost like there is a formation in the body around them. A musculature has formed in that pattern. So it is a completely different level than something like clenching your jaw. Over time, I think there can be a releasing of the tension around those deeper holdings, but it is a very slow process. And there may be ways you hold your body that keep it locked in place. It is probably a combination of both body and mind that would help to release that kind of tension.

But mostly what we are working with here—there is the physical tension, and there is relaxing the physical body as much as possible. The main work with meditation, though, is to make sure the mind is as relaxed as possible. That is really where the benefit comes in: you can be relaxed in your mind around physical pain in your body. It is not necessary, in fact, for the physical pain to go away for the mind to be completely at ease.

There is one definition I came across recently. I was just teaching a class and read a description of what the Buddha said about this quality of liberation, enlightenment, or nibbāna.

One description is the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion. That sounds nice, but then it went on to say that this person experiences no mental pain or grief. That sounds pretty good—that no matter what's going on, no mental pain or grief. This is essentially a definition of what the Buddha calls nibbana: immediate, visible in this life. No mental pain and grief.

Now, this doesn't mean there won't be physical pain. The physical body will experience pain. There will be both pain and pleasure in the physical body. But with the work of meditation, we learn to let go of that reactivity—the mental reactivity to pain—and that's where the release comes from. There can be some releasing on the physical level, but most of the work is mental: learning not to be reactive to those states.

There's something else I've noticed around physical pain, something I find very interesting. This has been in the last year or so that I've really come to see this. There are times when there's some kind of injury to the system, or perhaps an area in the body that's particularly painful. For me, it was a frozen shoulder. It was quite painful.

As I was paying attention to the pain, it seemed initially that there was the pain in the shoulder—especially if I tried to move it in particular ways—but there also seemed to be this whole-body quality, almost like the entire system was inflamed. It felt like the whole body was in a kind of uncomfortable, painful situation. It felt physical to me.

As I explored the experience and simply noticed what was going on around it, at some point I noticed a release in the mind around some kind of holding. And that whole-body inflammation or irritation vanished—just like that. It was a shock to me to see that this was actually mental. It manifested physically, but its cause was mental, that kind of whole-body agitation. Anyone who has chronic pain may be experiencing some of that mental tension, which makes the pain reverberate through a larger part of the system.

I was quite surprised when I saw this. It was a lesson in just how the mind's tension could produce what seemed to be physical pain.

Question from participant about the continuity of awareness during meditation

The continuity is what we're going for. Yes, that is what we're doing—noticing sound, noticing tension, noticing smell, noticing movement. But what you're describing sounds like it stayed at a certain level, what I might call ordinary experience. It sounds like the mind was recognizing and identifying things at a particular level. That's fine—you can go for forty-five minutes like that.

But at some point it's worth checking in: was there perhaps some kind of attitude about how the meditation was supposed to go? Some agenda or belief around how paying attention should happen? Unnoticed, that might keep the meditation at a particular level.

Participant responds about experiencing shifts between ordinary awareness and periods of deep stillness

So it sounds like—I mean, that's kind of the description I was talking about, or related to it. It sounds like the mind getting more malleable and fluid. But what I found with this particular practice is that the mind can go between that really ordinary level of recognizing experience and then suddenly just drop into a very quiet space.

What it takes is the ability to recognize quietness, to really stay with the mind as it moves into a deeper space. It's quite possible that as you move into that space, if you don't notice that you've really suddenly become quiet, you could start drifting and become kind of sleepy or dull. Or if you can just notice, "Oh, the mind has shifted to a different level, it's paying attention internally"—not to make a lot of words out of it, but just to stay with the experience—that is where the mindfulness can go into a deeper level. It's not that you're trying to make it happen. It just happens. And it's that learning to stay with it.

The mindfulness gets more familiar with staying with these changing states of consciousness, essentially. It goes from the ordinary level down to a very quiet level, down to a very subtle bodily level, to a very open, broad awareness where you're just taking in everything in a flow, and then back to ordinary—oh, there's a person talking, there's a chair squeaking. And it just moves through all these different levels. It's not that we're trying to find any particular level in which to meditate. We are just trying to be present for how the mind is working. And what happens as we begin to make that mindfulness more continuous is that we do start to see more of this moving between different levels of awareness.

Question: When you said about the tension in the mind, that there's a release in the mind—my understanding is that there is no separation, that mind and body are integrated, so to speak.

They're very intimately connected. There is a difference between mind and body. So you can see, for instance—I didn't go into this aspect of the practice today; I didn't have enough time—but in the experience of something like hearing, there's the physicality of the sound wave hitting the eardrum. That's a physical thing, just this vibratory energy. And we can experience that turning into sound—pitch and tone, simply pitch and tone. And then there's the process in the mind by which it recognizes "chair squeaking." And that's mental.

There is a physical part of the experience where there's that contact. But it's very interconnected—it is completely interconnected. But there is a distinction. And it's actually helpful to begin to explore what is body and what is mind, to begin to recognize the distinction. When I teach longer versions of these retreats, I do get into that exploration a little bit.

So we need to stop. It's five o'clock. Thank you all for coming. It's been lovely to spend this day with you.

CHAPTER 37

Part 4 of 5: Working with Emotions

Andrea Fella · 28 min

In this fourth talk from a daylong retreat in the style of Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Andrea Fella offers practical guidance on working with difficult emotional states in meditation. Drawing from her own experience of six and a half weeks studying with U Tejaniya in Burma, she shares his refreshing perspective: when she reported seeing many defilements, he responded simply, "That's right attitude." This approach fundamentally shifts our relationship to difficult mind states—from trying to eliminate them to understanding how they arise, what sustains them, and what allows them to release.

Fella introduces the metaphor of the mirror of mindfulness: just as a mirror reflects equally a beautiful landscape or a dead body without being changed by either, our knowing awareness can reflect any experience, including reactivity, without itself becoming reactive. She offers practical tools for investigation—noticing how emotions manifest in the body, recognizing accompanying thoughts without engaging them, and especially checking one's attitude, since resistance often forms an unnoticed outer layer around difficult states. For particularly sticky emotions, she suggests widening awareness to include other present-moment experiences, creating a larger container for the difficulty.

The talk includes guidance on using reflective phrases characteristic of U Tejaniya's method: "This is nature," "This is impermanent," and the Buddha's reflection "This is not me, this is not mine, this is not who I am." Fella also addresses what to do when emotions become overwhelming—when the tsunami of anger swamps our small wave of mindfulness. In such cases, she recommends skillfully redirecting attention to something neutral like feet on the ground or hearing, while remaining mindful, allowing the emotion to do its thing in the background without engagement.

I'd like to talk for a few minutes about working with emotional states, or sometimes difficult states of mind, in our meditation practice.

The point of working with these states isn't to get rid of them. I think I said this earlier—it is to understand these states: how they come to be, what holds them in place, what allows them to release. That's a kind of shift that's helpful to contemplate as we engage in working with difficult emotions or difficult states of mind. An attitude or inclination of curiosity about these states, not an attitude of wanting to get rid of them but an attitude of interest, is supportive. So bringing an interest to these difficult states of mind.

When I was on retreat with Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma—the first time I was there I spent six and a half weeks with him—maybe a week or so into the retreat, I went into his room for my interview and said, "I'm seeing a lot of defilements." He said, "That's right attitude." For me, that was such a refreshing approach to these states of mind.

At least in my experience, and I think as meditation teachers often we—well, we talk about working with these states of mind, these difficult states, the reactivity—but underlying it there seems to be a subtle way that we are saying the effort is to get rid of these, or that we are trying to settle the mind past these states so that you can get down to the real practice. With Sayadaw U Tejaniya, I got the strong sense that no, he was actually really, really interested in my understanding of my difficult states of mind.

This was reflected in our interviews with other people as well. All of the interviews with U Tejaniya are group interviews, about ten people at a time. Hearing people talk about what's going on for them, how they're observing their reactivity, how they're working with their reactivity—it just frees up this whole idea that these are something to get rid of and turns it instead into an interest, a curiosity about how this comes to be.

With just that shift, there's a big movement towards non-reactivity about these states of reactivity themselves. That may sound like a bit of an oxymoron, but it is possible to be non-reactive while observing reactivity. Essentially what we're doing is looking at the mirror. The mirror of mindfulness, the reflecting power of mindfulness, can reflect anything, including reactivity.

It's almost like we can think about every experience as having two sides: there's the knowing side, and there's the thing that we are knowing. That thing we are knowing might be reactivity—it might be anger or aversion, or it might be greed and excitement—but the knowing side of that can simply reflect it.

The more we learn to understand and appreciate this knowing quality of our mind, this reflective quality, the more we gain the benefits of that reflective quality. It inherently has some beautiful qualities. It's inherently non-reactive. Like a mirror, it simply reflects. If you have a mirror, it doesn't care what's in front of it. The reflecting power of the mirror is unchanged by what's in front of it. It equally reflects a beautiful landscape and a dead body. The reflecting power of the mirror is unchanged by what it reflects.

Likewise with our mind, the capacity of our minds to know what's happening—it doesn't care. That aspect of our mind that simply knows what's happening simply reflects what's happening. As we more and more touch into that aspect of our mind, we see that there's a kind of natural balance or equanimity that goes along with that reflective power of the mind.

So as these two things come together—the difficult state of mind and the knowing of it—if we can recognize that we are knowing the difficult state of mind, it gives a little bit of distance. We can reflect that difficult state with a balanced mind, just be with it. That's like taking off the lenses and looking at them instead of looking through them.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya often says, "Nothing I tell you is something to do." When I talk about things, it's actually just information, just supposed to settle and percolate through your mind. You don't have to try to do any of the things I'm talking about.

In the next few minutes I'm going to say some things that sound like things to do around emotions if they get challenging or difficult. But hold them lightly. These are a set of things that, having heard about them, may occur to you as things to work with in your meditation practice. If that happens, that's great. If not, don't worry about it. You don't have to try to think, "Well, what were those three things she said about working with emotions?" Just let this filter in, and then if you have a difficult emotion in your practice, some of this may arise for you to work with. It's grist for the mill.

The basic work when there's some difficult state arising, a difficult emotion arising, is to allow there to be that kind of curiosity, to investigate what's happening around it. You could ask yourself some questions. What's happening in the body? How does it make me feel? Then kind of recognize what thoughts come along with the feeling.

If there's a lot of thinking around the feeling, it's often helpful to see if you can not engage so much in the thinking, as opposed to just recognizing that these thoughts are coming up. There's a way you can recognize: these are thoughts, these are just thoughts. These are fear thoughts, these are anger thoughts, these are frustration thoughts, these are greedy thoughts, these are excited thoughts.

It's also really helpful to check the attitude, particularly if it feels like there's a struggle around the emotion. If you are working with a challenging state of mind, it's really helpful to check the attitude. You might find resistance if it's a particularly challenging state of mind. Resistance is a very common attitude that sometimes goes unnoticed in our meditation practice because we are so focused on the meditation and being with something that we don't notice we're resisting being with it.

So if you check in and notice that there's some kind of difficult state of mind, and you check what the attitude is, and you feel like, "Wow, I really don't want to be paying attention to that"—that's resistance. And it's really more helpful to open up to that resistance rather than try to force yourself through to somehow be with the difficult emotion when resistance is really the thing that's happening.

I often like to think about, or talk about, the way our minds are as being composed of these layers of experience. Many people have this experience of themselves—that within a state they know something is going on, there's a sense that something's underneath it, deeper. And there's often a feeling or a sense of, "If I could only get to that thing underneath, then I would figure this out." So there tends to be a kind of digging or trying to figure out the thing that's underneath, as opposed to just being with what's obvious about the state itself.

Just meeting the obvious about some difficult experience—over time, as we meet and touch the outer layers, what seems to happen is that we're seeing it from different perspectives. We see our experience of, say, anger. If you're experiencing something like anger over and over again and looking at that, you may see different ways that it makes your body feel. Or you may see different things that trigger it. Or you might see a kind of mood, a holding on to that anger—like, "Yeah, I really want to be angry." There may be different things that you see around that anger, the longer that you look at it. And some of that may start to reveal something that's underneath it. You might start to see, "Oh, there's actually some sadness here"—just by hanging out with the obviousness of it. No need to pick it apart or pry it apart. Just meeting the obvious.

The way I like to think about the attitude—if we think about our experiences being this kind of sphere of layers and we're just meeting the outer layer, just what's obvious—the attitude is often something that's actually going on that we're missing, that's actually a larger layer. So that resistance: there's this anger going on and there's resistance that's not really being noticed, and that's actually the outermost layer of what's happening. If we, in checking the attitude, recognize, "Oh, there's resistance happening," it becomes within the field of experience. Then just recognize: what's obvious in my experience, now that I have noticed this resistance? Again, there's no need to dig or try to get rid of the resistance. We can observe resistance without resistance.

So again, we're not trying to make resistance go away. We're trying to understand. This is an act of understanding that we are engaging in.

If a difficult state of mind is particularly sticky—if you feel like you keep getting kind of stuck to it, or it just feels like it's hanging on for a long time, or you feel like your mind is trying to figure it out—there's something that can help. This does sound like something to do, and I think if it occurs to you to try this, go ahead and try it. If you feel really stuck to a difficult emotion, it can help to open the awareness to what else is going on in your experience besides this difficulty.

In any moment of experience there are hundreds of things, if not thousands of things, going on. And this difficult experience is just one of the things happening. There's hearing that's happening, and there's body sensation outside of the emotion. There are potentially other thoughts and moods. So open up your field of awareness to see, "Well, what else is going on?" Not to push away that difficult emotion, but to put it into a larger context—to put it into a context where there are many, many things going on here right now. What else is happening here? "Oh yeah, there's the feeling of warmth on my skin, and then there's the pressure of my seat, and oh, there's that anger, and now there's the feeling of my knee pressing down against the cushion, and the sense of my hand, and then there's that emotion." So it becomes more like that emotion gets put into a larger container.

I've often also found it helpful with particularly sticky states of mind to keep track of, or just notice, one of three states around it. For instance, if you're experiencing loneliness, you may just at times be experiencing that loneliness and there's not particularly a problem around that—just the pure state of loneliness. Then there might be times when that loneliness is there and you really feel caught by it. You feel the stickiness of the loneliness.

So that's two ways of relating to an emotion: essentially, when we're having an emotion, whether we are reactive to it or not. Just noticing that difference in the mind. When there's an emotion present, are we caught by it, or are we at ease around it?

The third thing to notice about that kind of emotion is when it's absent. Notice when it is not there. So if you're working with a very habitual pattern of loneliness, notice when you're caught by it, notice when it's present but you're not caught by it, and consciously recognize when it's absent as well. Highlight that to yourself: "This is what it's like to not be lonely."

That piece is actually really, really powerful. It's surprisingly powerful to recognize that, because it seems that some of these habitual emotions, these sticky emotions, carry a sense of identity around them, a sense of ownership. And what recognizing the absence of the emotion does is it begins to poke holes in that identity. We recognize, "Oh, here I am without that emotion. Here's what it's like to be without that emotion." So that's very helpful.

Then there's another way to work with some difficult states of mind, and that's by using reflection. This aspect of the Sayadaw U Tejaniya style is quite different from most mindfulness practices, where you're actually using thought in the mind to support the meditation. I've suggested some of this already through checking the attitude—"What's my attitude?"—and through using questions: "What am I aware of?" Not as things to think about, but as a way to drop them into the meditation and see what happens as you orient your mind around a question. As the mind is oriented around a question, it naturally takes in information almost through the perspective of that question, and may begin to understand things in a way that it didn't understand them before.

So this use of questions is kind of just a way to incline the mind towards some understanding, but then letting it go. You don't need to think about it. If you find yourself thinking about these questions, let go of the questions. Just don't go there for a while.

Did some of you try, in the guided meditation before lunch, the request I suggested: "May the body relax, may the mind relax"? Did that have an impact for any of you? Did you notice a difference? It's like it's not anything you need to do—you just drop that into the mind stream and see what happens. These questions, these reflections are like that. So you could reflect, ask the question: "What purpose is this emotion serving?" Again, not to think about it. Or: "Is this emotion necessary?" These are questions that would support a kind of investigation of the emotion, essentially inclining the mind towards understanding an aspect of it. In one case, asking what purpose this is serving may reveal something you haven't seen that's underneath that emotion.

It's also possible to use reflection to incline the mind towards wisdom, towards a deeper understanding of the process of mind and body. For example, you could use the reflection "This is impermanent" just as a way to recall that truth. This state is impermanent. Just recalling that. This will end. This has an end.

A couple of other reflections that align with the truth of experience—one that Sayadaw U Tejaniya suggests, and that I have found extremely helpful, is: "This is nature." Whatever is happening in your experience is a natural phenomenon. It's just what has arisen based on causes and conditions. It has come into being based on your history of experience, the state of things arising in the present moment. It's this confluence of events that has created what has happened here in this present moment. It's no different than a tree growing out of a seed. There are natural laws that allow that process to happen. You plant a seed, and the appropriate conditions of water, sunlight, warmth, and moisture allow that seed naturally, based on just natural laws, to grow into a tree. Essentially, there's just this stream of causes and conditions that have brought this emotion into being. It's just like a tree. "Oh, here's a phenomenon that's happening. This is nature."

For me, the use of that phrase—"this is nature"—brings in the whole notion of impersonal conditions coming together. It really supported a letting go of me trying to do or manipulate or adjust or fix. "This is nature." It really allowed the mind to relax around the experience.

Another reflection you can use—this one I offer from the Buddha—he suggests that you can reflect: "This is not me, this is not mine, this is not who I am." This is a way to align your mind with that truth, that these emotions that happen, these difficult states of mind that happen, are simply things that come and go. They are not who we are. This helps to remind us of that fact. And the noticing of the absence of that emotion also supports that recognition. This is not who I am. If it were who I am, it would always be there. But it is not. Here it is absent. So: this is not me, this is not mine, this is not who I am.

The last piece I'll bring in around working with difficult mind states is this: sometimes these difficult mind states can be overwhelming. The power of those mind states, the momentum of those mind states, is stronger than the momentum of our ability to be mindful of them. It's like we have a small wave of mindfulness and a tsunami of anger. It swamps our attempt to be mindful. Even just turning our attention to it, we get sucked in. What I find most helpful in that state—and this takes some discernment of your own mind, to recognize, "Okay, if I try to bring mindfulness to this, I just get sucked into this black hole of emotion"—

So maybe it's not the time to pay attention to this. If you find that an emotion is overwhelming, if it swamps your ability to be mindful, see if you can consciously turn your attention to something else in your experience—without aversion to the thing that you're turning away from.

This is like a skillful ignoring of the state, simply turning your attention to something in your experience. Something neutral is helpful. I've found that neutrality is more useful than trying to find something pleasant, because if you're trying to find something pleasant, it's like that part of your mind which is struggling says, "No, don't do that to me. This is important. You better pay attention to me rather than pay attention to that pleasant thing." The neutral thing seems to be easier to turn to.

So paying attention to your feet on the ground. Hearing is a great door to open when there's difficult emotion. I usually do not recommend that people pay attention to their breath when they're experiencing a difficult emotion. In my own experience, and it seems like for many people, strong emotions have a lot of physical experience in this part of the body. If that's where you're trying to pay attention to your breath—somewhere in your torso—it's likely that you'll just get pulled back into the sensations around that emotion and get sucked back into it again.

I've found it helpful to cultivate, for difficult states of mind, something that's really neutral, that's not in the vicinity of the main place where emotions are experienced in the torso. Feet on the ground are good. Sitting bones on the chair—something ground-

ing. Hands have pretty good sensation. Hearing is good. Something that will allow you to really move away from the emotion. But again, not trying to stop that emotion. It's not an act of trying to get rid of it. It's more like you're saying, "Okay, you can do your thing in the background. You can just do your thing. I'm just going to turn my attention to someplace else." Kind of like putting a child in their room for a timeout: "You do your thing in there, and we're just going to be calm over here." It's simply a redirecting of attention.

It's helpful to stay mindful in that space, though. If you let your mind just drift, if you just try to distract yourself through some fantasy or some non-mindful activity, it's likely that the power of that emotion will hook into your non-mindful state and just take over again. Staying mindful of something neutral allows that emotion to do its thing without your being engaged with it.

CHAPTER 38

Part 3 of 5: Discussion (AM) — Daylong in the Style of U Tejaniya

Andrea Fella · 29 min

In this morning discussion session from a daylong retreat in the style of Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Andrea Fella addresses a common challenge practitioners face: the deeply ingrained habits from previous meditation experience. She offers two practical approaches—one from teacher Steve Armstrong involving relaxation when noticing technique arising, and her own method of checking the attitude toward habitual patterns rather than trying to eliminate them.

The discussion reveals how this awareness-based practice differs fundamentally from concentration practices. Using the analogy of settling muddy water, Fella explains that concentration practice is like using a centrifuge—settling the mind through deliberate activity—while U Tejaniya's approach is like placing the jar on a shelf, allowing natural settling while intimately getting to know the 'mud' of our mental habits. This process develops wisdom through direct observation of impermanence, cause and effect, and the unsatisfactory nature of clinging.

Practitioners share their experiences with aversion, attachment to pleasant states, and the searching quality of mind when trying to find objects of awareness. Fella addresses each with characteristic patience, emphasizing that the practice involves meeting our habitual patterns with curiosity rather than trying to fix or escape them. She introduces walking meditation instructions that maintain the same open awareness approach—simply noticing what we're aware of and checking our attitude, rather than focusing specifically on physical sensations of walking. The session illuminates how this practice serves as 'mind 101,' offering deep familiarity with our mental patterns that ultimately allows natural letting go.

So many of you are familiar with meditation and probably have some particular ways that you meditate. One of the things that people often find in moving into this style of practice is that you have habits of meditation, and those come up. You find yourself paying attention to the breathing, just kind of automatically, because that's what you do when you meditate.

I'm going to suggest a couple of ways to work with that. It's not a bad thing, but it's also a habit, so it's not a natural thing. It's a natural habit that has evolved, but it's not just paying attention to things as they are, because this habit is functioning.

One method comes from Steve Armstrong, another teacher who has practiced quite a bit with Sayadaw U Tejaniya. The other is a way that I have found very helpful in my own practice.

Steve suggests that when you notice you're engaging in a technique—when you notice that you are doing something in the meditation, trying to pay attention to something in particular, or particularly engaging in focusing with the breath, or perhaps when you open to the attitude and you see that there's greed there and then you automatically turn to look at greed—when you notice that there's a technique happening, relax. Pick up again on that natural awareness that is apparent when the mind relaxes. Relax and just notice what you are naturally aware of. Essentially, you're relaxing that tendency of that technique.

Another way that I found helpful for myself when I first started this practice: I went to Sayadaw U Tejaniya and said, "Well, when I relax the mind, what is apparent—I'm not trying to do anything—but what's apparent is body sensations. That's the main thing that I'm noticing." He said, "Well, you need to consciously turn your attention to the mind because it's a habit that you're paying attention to the body."

For me, simply relaxing and noticing what's apparent wasn't quite enough because the mind was just landing on the body as a place of relaxed attention. What I found helpful was to notice the mind's relationship to that habit.

The way I would begin my meditation would be to let my mind do its thing. It would normally just take in the bodily experience; the whole body vibration was my main focus of attention. When I relaxed and started my meditation, that would be what was apparent. When I noticed that pattern operating, I would simply check in: What's my attitude? What's going on right now in the mind around this pattern? Very often I found that the mind was relaxed and calm. That was a way into opening up experience for me—simply checking the attitude about that habitual pattern. In that case, it was opening up to calmness, to peacefulness.

So for me, the exploration was noticing the mind, essentially noticing the attitude of the habit of practice, the attitude around the habit of practice.

I want to take a little bit of opportunity now. We're going to do some walking in a moment, but I'd like to check in and see how that was for you, whether there are any questions, what you noticed.

Participant: Just to pick up on what you were saying—this is also my tendency and my habit for many years, focusing on the body. Now there's another thing that I noticed when you offered what you just offered, which is to notice what the attitude is towards feeling sensations in the body. Immediately for me what comes up is that it's pleasant. There is that sense of subtle pleasure. It feels good and it feels calm and quiet, peaceful, like you said. But I think there's also a little bit of perhaps attachment to feeling that sense of peace, which until now I never questioned—attachment to feeling peaceful, to feeling the flow of sensation, to feeling grounded, to feeling in the body, which I believe is a good thing. But anyway, it's just...

Andrea Fella: This is actually the power of this technique, I think. It really takes us back into our assumptions about how we're meditating and our attitudes about how we're meditating. It reveals some pretty subtle kinds of clinging and aversion that may be operating, that had been operating for a long time that we've not really been aware of. It's actually quite powerful.

What we do with this checking of the attitude is that it reveals one layer of what's going on in our mind, and then we open up to that. After a time we check in, and there's yet another layer, and another layer. There are just layers and layers of these attitudes and relationships with experience, and we peel them back through this exploration of what's happening in the mind. We just check in. That's great, thank you.

Participant: What was happening in my mind was pretty constant—just noticing aversion or negative mind states and noticing my attitude, which was wanting to push away. But it was just so constant that if I were not here, I would probably get up and do something. What I found myself doing every once in a while was just going to my breath. I saw the constant aversive states, the wanting to push them away, and the wanting to escape. I was being aware of that, but I don't know how long I could maintain with it.

Andrea Fella: You have to know that. There is a place for primary object in this practice. If you find that it's hard to stay grounded in what's happening as it is, it's fine to come and settle with a primary object.

So coming to the breath is fine. It's helpful if you recognize the tendency to do that—if it's happening out of aversion or greed—and try to at least acknowledge whether that's occurring. See if you can move to the breath with an acknowledgment of, "Okay, I'm seeing that I'm getting overwhelmed here," or "I'm seeing I just can't stand to be here anymore, so out of compassion for my mind, I'm going to come into the breath for a while." There will be mixed motivations, but if you can at least incline towards that non-aversive or non-greedy motivation, it will help to settle the mind more.

Question: Not to be doing this meditation with a motive or anything, but does something eventually shift over time?

The way this practice works, at least the way I like to see it—when we do a concentration practice, when we bring our attention to the breath over and over again, just coming in and paying attention to this one thing, it tends to settle the mind more quickly than this open style of practice. The mind gets settled down. But in a way, what we're doing is ignoring all those attitudes, all those tendencies towards greed and aversion, by just saying, "Keep coming back, keep coming back, keep coming back."

With this practice, what we're doing is really getting familiar with our minds. So it settles, but it settles more slowly.

There's an analogy I like to use around this. When we're doing concentration practice, the way we're settling our minds is like if you've got a jar of muddy water and you want that mud to settle out—concentration practice is like putting that jar of muddy water in a centrifuge machine. It settles through an activity of doing.

The practice I'm offering today is more like taking that jar of water and putting it on the shelf. It settles, but it settles more slowly. And what the practice of settling is, is to really get to know the mud really well.

In a way, I look at this practice as a real getting to know your own mind. It's like Mind 101, this practice. In concentration practice, we can ignore some of those tendencies. In this practice, we can't ignore them. We have to meet them.

So it takes some courage to just meet, over and over, these habitual tendencies. But if you can look at it as: this is actually the practice—this getting to know things really well as they settle—that is the practice. It's not what we do in order to get to something else.

As we pay attention, we get really familiar with our habits and patterns. We get familiar with our minds—that's one benefit. And also, we start to see the impermanent nature of those experiences. We can see the cause and effect nature of those experiences. So we're actually developing some wisdom through looking at these difficult experiences in and of themselves.

The insights that happen around insight meditation practice have to do with understanding cause and effect, with recognizing impermanence, with recognizing how unsatisfactory things are to hold onto, with recognizing that everything is simply a process of flow—that there's nothing, not an entity here, not a thing here, not a thing that is me. It is a process.

These understandings can come out of that process of seeing things settle. We don't have to settle in order to have those insights. It takes a little continuity of mindfulness to have them, but that continuity can develop in the settling itself. So we're really looking at the mud here. That's the practice.

But again, if it gets overwhelming or it gets to the place where you just feel like, "I'm out of here," you can come back to something more grounding. I will talk a little bit in the first part of the afternoon about working with more difficulty—about some techniques that Sayadaw U Tejaniya offers for working with more emotional experiences.

Question: In the long run—because I know it's not about getting rid of the mud or trying to get rid of anything—but in the long run, does it settle? In terms of a life, does something shift?

It seems to.

Question: Is there a purpose to living with the mud?

The purpose is towards the wisdom, the understanding. When we really begin to understand how our minds react to things and the kinds of forces at play, when the mind sees that those things start to happen—it's like the mind has spent so much time paying attention to these patterns and habits that we really get to know they are suffering. We get really familiar with the fact that this is not a happy place to be.

As time goes on and we start to see how these patterns come into being, we may get to the place where we actually start to see, "Oh, I can see the mind is kind of heading in that way." When that starts to happen—when we can see the causes and conditions coming together to lead us towards those habits—and when we have spent the time observing and knowing the suffering of those places, the mind begins to naturally say, "I see where I'm headed, and I don't think I'm going to go there."

The mind will do that. We don't actually have to stop it. It's the educational process of this practice, and this practice in particular, because we aren't settling with a concentration style. We really get to know our habits and patterns of mind very well, and we really get to know that they are suffering—that they cause us stress, that they cause us unease.

That is part of the education. That is part of what allows the mind to begin to let go.

A student asked: "So you're saying that at some level—not unconscious, but on a deeper level than the part of us that says 'I don't want to go there' but can't stop—the mind itself, by being with it somehow, is learning?"

Yes, it's learning.

Another student shared: "My mind did drift off several times, either through tiredness or spaciness. And I appreciated what you mentioned about how sometimes there's a balance of mind with that awareness, with the moment that I became aware I had drifted off. Because it did seem some of the time that my mind was balanced, and that made it easier to just accept it without approach or avoid. But the second thing is what you mentioned about when it seemed I was aware that it felt good—the settledness, the being settled of the mind. It was a kind of gratefulness, because I haven't been doing my practice as much as I want to due to a certain situation, and it just felt so good to be here in that. But then I saw right away that there was this approach and clinging, this 'I really want this.' Could you say a little more about where to go with that?"

When you notice the clinging—essentially you saw that you liked this settledness, and then you noticed there was a kind of wanting to hold on to it—just notice that that's what the mind has done with this. There's nothing particularly to do about it other than to simply allow that to become part of the field. Don't worry about trying to let it go. Don't worry about trying to do anything with it. It will let go of itself if you simply observe it.

There's a way this practice feels to me, and I've been trying to find a clearer way of describing it. When I see some kind of aversion or greed, some reaching toward or away, it's like there's an energy to that reaching that's already happening, already come into being, already doing its thing. If the mind can simply reflect that—using this mirror analogy, just that mirror of mindfulness to reflect it—it's almost as if the mindfulness just rides on the back of that energy. You don't have to do anything with it. Just allow the mindfulness to meet that energy of wanting or aversion.

In that meeting, it's almost like an Aikido move. The energy of that thing, instead of going towards greed or aversion, becomes moved into the service of knowing. It's like this little quarter turn: "Oh, yeah, there's greed." And then the mindfulness just goes right on it and watches it. What often happens when mindfulness is able to meet it without any aversion or resistance to that greed itself is that it falls apart.

If you catch it early in the process, you can watch it actually form and have the mindfulness pick up on that right away. It will fall apart pretty quickly. If the greed has been developing for a while, you may have to just hang out with it for a time. But you don't have to do anything particularly with it. If it gets really strong, I'll talk later this afternoon about some ways to work with difficulties when they become intense. But I don't want to get too complicated just yet.

Another student said: "I'm not sure I'm reporting what happened correctly, but there was a lot of sleepiness and dullness, and every once in a while I would pop out of that and be asking questions about what am I aware of. Then I would be into this thing, thinking, 'What am I aware of?' And then it would become like—not grasping exactly, but looking for something to be aware of after I was aware of thinking."

So searching is the next thing that arose. If you find yourself in that space a lot—that "what am I aware of," that kind of searching—you can simply notice that searching is what's happening. That's the process that has arisen in the mind in that moment: this state of searching. Just notice what it feels like for the mind to be searching. But if you find yourself in that state frequently, just pick something. Just pick something obvious.

If you find that you can notice that state of searching and then it moves into recognition—oh yes, there's a sound, there's a body sensation—but it's not like these things come to you. It's like you're reaching, looking for them in the searching. It's not that experience of receptivity.

When you get into that searching mode, it's like you reach out and go, "Oh, there's a sound, oh, there's a body sensation." Can you just notice that that's the movement of the mind? If you're simply noticing that the searching quality is what's going on, at some point you may notice that there is something that comes to you—kind of surprising. "Oh, actually there's my butt! There's the sensation of my buttocks on the chair." Or there's a sense of calm that arose. So notice that searching quality, and at some point there will be something that arises naturally.

It's the same thing with the primary object. If you use an object to help you settle, at some point while paying attention to that breath or whatever you choose as an obvious place to rest your attention, you may notice that you're sitting there paying attention to your breathing and then somebody sneezes and you're automatically knowing that sound, the hearing. Then you notice there's an itch on your finger, then you notice your hand is cold, and the mind is just already noticing automatically what it is already knowing.

So if you use something to settle, at some point you'll start to recognize that there are other things spontaneously being known. Just allow that to support the movement towards the open style of awareness, and kind of let go of the need to hold on to that anchor of attention.

Does this eventually lead to that feeling of spaciousness, this open spaciousness?

There are different ways that the mind is aware in this natural awareness. One way is this very spacious, open awareness. Other ways, the mind might be paying attention by noticing this thing really clearly, then that thing really clearly, then that thing really clearly. It may not be a sense of open spaciousness—it may be a sense of really clearly knowing one thing at a time.

So I'm not going to say there's any one way that it looks. What I find with this practice is that the mind gets really fluid. It moves between states of consciousness really quickly, between different styles of awareness really quickly. And it knows how it is paying attention. It feels like the mind becomes more malleable, and the mind is aware of its malleability.

I want to have some time for walking, so I'm going to offer just a few minutes of instruction. There's not much to say, actually. When Sayadaw U Tejaniya was asked how to do walking meditation, his response was, "I don't do walking meditation. I don't practice walking meditation. I practice awareness while walking."

The focus is on awareness, not on the walking.

Many of you who have done walking meditation before are probably familiar with bringing attention into the feet and paying attention to the movement of the body. In this practice, we are simply aware. It's the same instructions as in the sitting: Notice that you are aware. Notice what you are obviously aware of. And from time to time, check your attitude.

With walking, there's probably going to be a lot of seeing happening because we have our eyes open. You can try it for a while, noticing how your mind explores the world of seeing. If it gets too distracting, if you find that your mind is pulled out into seeing and thought too much, you can narrow down your field of vision—not to stop using it, but to not let your focus wander quite so much.

Walk at a natural pace. There's no need to walk back and forth. There's no need to walk slowly. Just walk at a natural pace. I like to encourage people, for the first few minutes, to explore and see what pace feels easeful. There's usually some pace of movement that mindfulness can naturally pick up on. Tune into the mind and notice how easeful it feels to walk and be mindful. Find the pace that feels most comfortable for this process.

So start by checking into ease. When you've found that pace—and it may change over the walking period—simply notice what you're aware of.

Am I aware? What am I aware of? What's my attitude?

Watch what your mind naturally pays attention to, particularly with the world of seeing. You might notice that your mind is kind of taking in a panoramic experience of the world of seeing. You might notice that the attention is jumping from thing to thing to thing really quickly—you're looking at that, and then that, and that. Or you might notice that your attention kind of lingers on something and then it moves to something else.

Now again, this exploration of how attention functions through seeing is similar to the exploration of how awareness functions in general. Because awareness can function in many different ways, and there's no one right way. We tend to think that we have to construct a state of mind in order to meditate and hold ourselves in that state of mind—if I get to this state of mind, that's what I need to do. What this practice is about is learning about the various ways in which our mind pays attention, and being aware of that.

So as you walk, you may notice that you're in the realm of seeing. You may notice that your attention changes, that how you are attending to things changes. Pay attention to that as well. And it may go into your body too. You may be noticing your feet, the sensations of your feet on the ground, or the sound that you make as you walk. There's all kinds of experiences—a river of experience that we get into when we walk.

So occasionally checking your attitude, checking into your emotional state around the walking.

Enjoy your walk.

CHAPTER 39

Skillful Means for Concentration

Andrea Fella · 1h03

> In this comprehensive talk on concentration practice, Andrea Fella illuminates the dynamic relationship between abandoning the five hindrances and cultivating the five factors of jhāna. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that we can abandon the unwholesome (akusala) and cultivate the wholesome (kusala), she explains how these two processes work together—as we let go of hindrances, we simultaneously strengthen concentration factors, and vice versa.
>
> Fella offers practical guidance for working with hindrances in samādhi practice, distinguishing this approach from vipassanā. Rather than turning directly toward hindrances, she suggests allowing them to recede to the background while maintaining gentle contact with the breath. Using the Buddha's vivid analogy of the banyan tree that strangles its host, she illustrates how hindrances feed on attention and can be starved through skillful redirection.
> The heart of the talk explores the five jhāna factors: vitakka (aiming attention), vicāra (sustaining attention), pīti (rapture), sukha (happiness), and ekaggatā (one-pointedness). Fella emphasizes that only the first two are within our direct control—the others arise naturally as results. She offers gentle alternatives to forceful concentration, including peripheral attention, intention-setting, and the image of a child's scooter building momentum through repeated light taps. Each concentration factor counters a specific hindrance: vitakka counters sloth and torpor, vicāra counters doubt, pīti counters ill-will, sukha counters restlessness, and ekaggatā counters sense desire. This teaching provides a framework for understanding how access concentration develops and why the "bliss of seclusion" from hindrances becomes possible.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the factors that support concentration and the factors that get in our way.

Before I get into that, I want to reiterate what Philip said last night about how to listen to a Dharma talk, particularly on a concentration retreat. See if you can stay connected with your breathing and just let the words come through. Not that you're not paying attention to the words—you can pay attention to both the breathing and the content at the same time. But there's no need to try to hold on to the words. Trust that what you need will land. And if something feels like it's a little too much or it's not landing in a way that makes a lot of sense to you, just let it go. There's a lot of information in this talk, and you don't need to hold on to all of it by any means.

I'd like to start with some words of the Buddha. Speaking to his monks, he said: "Abandon what is unwholesome, O monks. One can abandon what is unwholesome. If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so. Cultivate what is wholesome, O monks. One can cultivate the wholesome. If it were not feasible, I would not ask you to do so."

This term "wholesome" in this sutta is a translation of the term kusala, which is often translated as wholesome but is also translated as skillful. Thanissaro Bhikkhu, in particular, translates it as skillful. He says that somebody who is cultivating a skill, such as a carpenter, would be talked about as being a kusala carpenter. So the term in Pali apparently was used in this way of meaning skillful. We can look at this term in terms of what is skillful for us in cultivating concentration—the skill of the Eightfold Path, with cultivating concentration being the cultivation of the factors of right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. The skill of that cultivation is understanding what is helpful to let go of and what is helpful to cultivate.

The states or qualities that are helpful to let go of are our old friends, the hindrances. I know many of you have probably heard many talks on the hindrances on retreats before, and I am going to talk about the hindrances, but this is not going to be a standard hindrance talk. I'm going to approach it from a slightly different direction. So those are the qualities that we want to abandon—abandon the hindrances.

Qualities that we want to cultivate with respect to concentration include several sets of lists. One set in particular is called the jhanic factors, the factors of concentration. These two lists of qualities—one that is meant to be abandoned and one that is meant to be cultivated—actually work together. As we abandon the hindrances, we are simultaneously cultivating these factors of concentration. And as we cultivate these factors of concentration, if our attention is going towards cultivating them, then simultaneously these hindrances are being abandoned. So there's a very powerful process at work between these two lists. I'm going to talk about both sides of this equation tonight.

The Buddha talked about the hindrances with respect to how we can denourish them. We can think about these two lists in terms of denourishing the hindrances and nourishing these qualities of concentration—essentially feeding the supportive qualities and starving the unwholesome, unsupportive qualities.

I'll start with the hindrances. You're all familiar with these states from your meditation practice—the states that essentially hinder our ability to get concentrated, that hinder our ability to settle and stabilize in the present moment, that hinder our ability to have a sense of well-being. These states of sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and anxiety, and doubt.

The Buddha used an analogy for the hindrances that I really appreciate. He had a brilliant mind, and the analogies that he used were very apt. If we can understand his analogies, it can help us understand something about what he is talking about. He talked about the hindrances as being like a banyan tree.

Some of you may know what a banyan tree is, but I'm going to describe it and how it functions, because it helps us to understand something about how the hindrances work. The banyan tree begins its life as a seed deposited in the crook of a tree, probably by some fig-eating bird, because the banyan tree is a species of fig. This fig seed gets deposited in the crook of a tree and begins to send out shoots, roots that are seeking the ground. As these roots hit the ground, they stiffen and get thick, forming a kind of latticework. Every place these roots touch each other, they get even stiffer. The roots of the banyan tree are now starting to compete for nourishment with the tree that is hosting it. As the tree gains nourishment from the soil and from the sun, more roots come out, and it forms a latticework that essentially surrounds the original tree.

—strangling it, preventing it from receiving its own nourishment, eventually killing that tree. And in its place stands this structure of a tree whose trunk is formed entirely of this latticework of what were once roots.

This is how our hindrances function. They nourish themselves in our minds. And as they nourish, they strengthen and strangle the wholesome, beautiful qualities within us. So we need to take care with what we feed, with what we nourish in our minds. We want to find ways to let go of the hindrances, to remove their source of nourishment.

I'd like to speak for a few minutes about working with the hindrances in concentration practice, because we don't approach them in quite the same way that we do in mindfulness practice. In mindfulness practice, we're usually taught that when a hindrance gets strong, when a hindrance arises, we turn our attention directly to it. We meet it with mindfulness.

In concentration practice, the first approach to working with a hindrance is usually to let it remain in the background. Stay with the breath if you can, knowing that the hindrance is there, acknowledging it. It's very important to recognize and acknowledge that the hindrance is present, not to deny that it's there, but to allow it to recede into the background while the breath remains in the foreground. We're not suppressing the hindrance, but we're also not giving it any attention.

In my own practice, on my very first long concentration retreat—it was a metta retreat—I finally began to understand what it meant to leave the hindrances in the background. When a hindrance would come up, such as anger, I'd be doing my metta phrases and then anger might arise. It was actually a relief at some point to realize I didn't have to turn toward that anger and work with it and meet it in any way. It was simply, "Oh yes, there's that anger. I can just stay with my phrases of metta." It takes a bit of an adjustment if you're used to vipassana practice, learning how to let these states simply be in the background.

We don't need to meet them directly in order for them to dissipate. I think from our mindfulness practice we develop a belief that if we don't meet the hindrances directly, somehow they will get stronger. The way I understand how this process of ignoring the hindrances works—letting them be in the background—is that we're still cultivating our mindfulness and concentration, but on the breath. The attention is directed somewhere; it's directed to the breath. And there's no place for the hindrance to feed from. The mindfulness and concentration are being cultivated on the breathing, while the hindrance is simply allowed to be in the background. Since the mindfulness is in the foreground with the breathing, there's nothing to nourish that hindrance. It will essentially dissipate because it is an impermanent state of mind.

Basically, this is learning how to skillfully say "not now" to the hindrances without aversion—just turning away, just recognizing, "Yes, I see you. Not now."

This is not always possible. Sometimes the hindrances have more momentum than that. They are stronger and have more of a pull on us. If they're a bit stronger, one way to work with them is the approach Philip mentioned last night, thinking about this foreground and background of attention. The way I was just describing working with the hindrances is having the breath in the foreground and the hindrance in the background. Sometimes if the hindrance is stronger, that may get reversed. The hindrance may be in the foreground, but you can keep track of the breath in the background, infusing the state of mind—the difficulty, the anger, the desire, the sleepiness, the restlessness—with the breathing. You're staying connected to the breath even as you're meeting and being aware of the hindrance.

If the hindrances become stronger still, we may have to work with them more directly. There are a couple of different approaches to this, one being the use of what might be called antidotes to the hindrances. For instance, if ill will is arising, you can use the metta practice we've been starting to work with in the afternoons. The metta practice is said to directly counter ill will. You can bring the metta practice into your heart and mind and cultivate that quality, which will directly oppose the ill will. If sense desire is present, you can contemplate impermanence, which is said to counter sense desire. If you are dull and sleepy, you can do several things. One of the classic reflections for sleepiness is to reflect on your mortality—on the fact that you actually have a limited amount of time in which to practice. There are various antidotes for working with the hindrances, and I'll talk more about working with specific hindrances later.

And then there's our old friend mindfulness practice. If the hindrance is really calling your attention, if you feel it's not possible to be with the breath, not possible even to bring up an antidote, not possible to breathe through the hindrance—turn directly to the hindrance with mindfulness. The choice of when to do this is really personal, really individual. It's something each of us has to learn to navigate on our own: when do we need to let go of cultivating mindfulness of breathing in favor of turning more directly to the hindrance? That's something you need to explore for yourself.

Try playing with these various approaches and see what works for you. Over time, you'll get familiar with how your mind works around these hindrances with respect to cultivating concentration.

It's really helpful not to think of the hindrances as being any kind of failure in the concentration practice. It's true that when the hindrances are present, concentration is not so strong. But we can cultivate concentration through working with the hindrances, through all of these ways that I've suggested. Even turning mindfulness towards the hindrances is cultivating concentration. So the relationship we bring to this practice, the relationship that we bring to working with the hindrances—rather than feeling like, "Oh, I can't do this, I'm never going to be able to do this"—is just meeting this moment, just meeting here and now as it is.

In concentration practice, as I mentioned a little while ago, cultivating the qualities of concentration themselves, these factors of concentration, actually supports a letting go of the hindrances. It's a very natural process that as concentration develops, the hindrances recede. Essentially, the hindrances are abandoned through the cultivation of concentration.

There are five factors of concentration. Philip mentioned these last night in his talk, just briefly: the factors of aiming and sustaining attention, vitakka and vicāra; the factor of rapture, of pīti; the factor of happiness, of sweetness, of sukha; and the factor of unification of mind, of one-pointedness, of ekaggatā. Each one of these factors is understood to counter one of the hindrances. So as these qualities get stronger in our concentration, very naturally the hindrances begin to recede.

This process is at play in both directions. By letting go of the hindrances, if we're actively working with them, we're cultivating these factors through mindfully staying with the breath through a hindrance. We're cultivating that ability to connect and sustain with the breathing. By cultivating the ability to connect and sustain with the breathing, we're actively letting go of the hindrances. This is a very powerful dynamic in concentration practice.

These factors of concentration essentially bring the mind together into unification. These five factors are understood to be present in what is called access concentration, or neighborhood concentration. At the point where these factors are unified in access concentration, the hindrances are suppressed. They are temporarily suppressed—they're not gone for good—but as these factors become strong and balanced, the hindrances fall away. This is a really pleasant state. It's called the bliss of seclusion, the seclusion from the hindrances. And it feels really nice when the hindrances fall away.

This is access concentration. It's also sometimes called neighborhood concentration because it's in the vicinity of, in the neighborhood of, the absorption states, the jhāna states, which we'll talk more about in coming nights. These five factors are present in access concentration, working to suppress the five hindrances. And then, moving into the absorption state, they're also said to be present in that first absorption state, the first jhāna, in a very powerful way.

I'd like to explore these factors with you, to describe them so that you might get to know them a little bit, and also to talk about how they work together—which ones we can actively use to cultivate concentration and which ones are actually results. Of these five, aiming and sustaining, vitakka and vicāra, the first two, are the ones that we can actually actively initiate in our practice: aiming our attention at the breath and sustaining our attention on the breath. The other three—the rapture, the happiness, and the unification of mind—are a result of the concentration practice. They occur because causes and conditions have come together for them to arise. So they're more of a result.

I'm actually going to spend quite a bit of time talking about these first two, because that's where we create this container of concentration, through using these qualities of aiming and sustaining the attention.

Vitakka and vicāra, these two qualities, are usually talked about as a pair. There are a few places in the suttas where they're talked about separately, but with respect to concentration practice, they're usually discussed together. They work together. Vitakka is the initial movement of directing the attention, often called initial application of mind, or aiming—directing the attention. Basically, this is about directing the attention towards the breathing in this practice of concentration that we are working on in this retreat. Aiming the attention at the breath.

Vicāra is a sustaining of attention. It's usually understood to mean holding the attention with, or sustaining the attention on, the breath—holding the attention on the object. As a pair, these two qualities bring together right effort and right mindfulness, these two aspects of the Eightfold Path that support the cultivation of our mind and support the cultivation of concentration. These two together bring together right effort and right mindfulness. This is our practice.

create our container of concentration through applying our attention and sustaining our attention.

There are some analogies offered in the suttas around vitakka and vicāra. Vitakka is understood to be like the striking of a bell. Vicāra is like the sustained sound that follows. You can't have the vicāra without the vitakka initially, but the vicāra exists—the sustained ringing of the bell exists—even though we're not continuing to strike.

This aiming of attention is often thought of as a kind of narrowing down of attention. When we think about aiming our attention at a particular experience, often that's how we understand it. We're paying attention at the nostrils, at our sternum, or at our abdomen. And we think about needing to narrow down our attention so that that's the only thing we're paying attention to, as if somehow we can block out everything else.

This is not actually such a helpful way to think about vitakka, at least in my own experience of how concentration most skillfully settles down. When I think about narrowing, it becomes a kind of forcing—a forcing into. So I'd like to offer a few different ways to think about this aiming of the attention. Some gentler ways, perhaps.

One way is something I mentioned in one of the meditations yesterday. The breath is sometimes a very delicate creature. It's like one of those little rodents outside scurrying among the bushes. If you approach it too directly, it's just going to disappear. We sometimes have to be very, very light and very quiet with our attention, approaching the aiming of our attention as if we are looking at something from the side. If you go out at night—we can't do it tonight, the stars aren't out—but if you're looking at the stars sometimes, and you're trying to see a star that's kind of faint in the sky, you'll notice that if you try to look directly at one of those faint stars, it disappears. But you move your eye just slightly to the side and it pops into view. This is the kind of thing I find helpful in turning my attention to such a delicate experience as the breath—not trying to look at it really directly, but allowing the experience to come in from the edges. Observing it as if through our peripheral attention.

Another way I have found helpful to aim the attention at the breath is to use what I might call a request, an intention, or an invitation. In my settling into the meditation, rather than trying to point my mind at the breath or direct my attention at the breath, once I find a relaxed container, I drop the invitation into the mind: "May the attention rest with the breathing." And then I just sit back and see whether that invitation allows a kind of natural connection. Sometimes it does, sometimes it doesn't. If it can allow that kind of natural connection, you can begin to learn how the mind more naturally pays attention to the breathing without being forced into it through an act of will.

Another way is allowing the breath to come to you—settling back rather than turning your attention to the breath. Settling back and inviting the breath to come to you. A receiving of the experience of breathing.

With vicāra also, we have a tendency to have an attitude of needing to hold on to the breath, a feeling that we have to latch our attention to the breath and hang on for all we're worth. And again, that approach will wear you out. It can work to create a concentration, but it's a kind of brittle concentration. This practice is like running a marathon. And that holding on is like sprinting. If you try to run the distance with a sprint, you're going to exhaust yourself.

So a more gentle, relaxed approach to this sustaining of the attention. Initially, it's more about short moments many times. Just a short meeting of the breath. Say, just enough energy to stay with half a breath. That's about maybe two seconds. Right now, just wherever you are in the cycle of your breath, how much energy does it take to meet half a breath? And then, do it again.

This is vitakka and vicāra working together. The aiming of the attention to incline the mind to pay attention to half a breath. And the vicāra, the sustaining, just for a few seconds. And then doing it again. And doing it again. And doing it again.

In this way, this is how you can keep the mindfulness and the concentration going, because it won't wear you out to just keep doing this. It's a very light touch, really light. Moment after moment, meeting the breath.

There's an analogy that I like to use around how this vitaka and vichara works in our practice. You've all seen these scooters that little kids use—these little two-wheeled scooter things that are narrow. To get going, to get the momentum going, you have to tap your foot down on the ground. So to get started, you have to tap pretty frequently, otherwise you're going to wobble and fall over. But after a while, you can ride for a longer time because the momentum has built up from the tapping.

The tapping is like the aiming of the attention. Initially in our practice, we need to aim more frequently, just seeing how long it sustains for, trying to sustain just for short periods of time. But as the momentum builds, we don't need to aim quite as frequently because that sustaining has built a momentum—like the scooter. After tapping for a while, you can ride for a while.

And with the scooter, you begin to get a sense of when it's getting wobbly. When do you need to put your foot down again and tap again? Likewise, we can start to get a sense of that in our meditation. When is the sustaining of the attention getting a little wobbly? When do we need to redirect, reconnect more carefully with that aiming of the attention back to the breath?

So it's really helpful to set up the container, to take the time to set up the container of the meditation with a relaxed attention. Vitaka and vichara together can be used to create a container of relaxed attention, or they can be used to create a fairly tight, rigid container. It's up to you how you use these, how you explore this. If you notice that the way you are aiming and trying to sustain the attention is making the mind feel tight, it's helpful to let go, to back off, to relax.

One game I like to play with myself at times in the practice—because I tend towards over-efforting, towards too much holding on, too much tightening around—I sometimes ask myself, how little effort do I need in order to stay connected? And I just back off the effort a little bit, seeing where the relaxed attention can stay in contact with the breathing. It's the contact we need. We don't need it to be grabbed on. It just needs to meet it very gently. Meeting it.

Taking the time to set up that container where the mind is meeting experience in this relaxed way is well worth the time. In my own practice, I've found that starting with this relaxation, settling back very much with a spacious full-body awareness, allows the mind to settle and relax from that space. Then gently guiding the attention towards the breathing. If I see that the attention tightens down on the breathing, I back off. I go back to relaxation. Going back and forth between that relaxation and inclining the mind back to touch with the breathing.

Doing that practice, slowly the mind begins to educate itself in how to focus on an experience in a relaxed way—how to direct the attention towards the breathing without gripping on it. That's been my experience. I really find it helpful to take a substantial amount of time to set up that container, that container of a very skillful vitaka and vichara. From there, the rest of it unfolds.

So take that time. Don't be in such a hurry to grab onto that breath and try to sustain that attention. Be more gentle about it, more relaxed.

Vitaka, this quality of aiming the attention, is said to counter sloth and torpor. How many of you felt sleepiness in the last day? It's a big companion, particularly on these first days of retreat. It's going to be present. It's not a failure in any way. It is just part of the terrain, partly just from coming into retreat from our busy lives. Of course we're going to be worn out.

Take some short naps. That's really helpful. A short ten- or fifteen-minute nap a couple of times a day can be very supportive for concentration practice as we're adjusting to the settling of energy.

the practice itself, as I think has been mentioned a couple of times, can make us sleepy also. The settling of the mind, the concentration—as the concentration settles, the mind can get kind of dull if there's not enough energy to balance that. Energy and concentration need to be balanced in this practice for the concentration to really deepen.

So if energy is not quite balanced with concentration, we're going to have something called sinking mind. The mind will just... it feels like you're fine, everything's going fine, and suddenly it's like—that's a sign that the energy is not quite matching the concentration.

It's helpful to use this quality of vitakka, of aiming, very consciously when the mind gets a little bit dull or sleepy. This is one of the factors we do have some control over. So using that, perhaps using a little bit more precision with paying attention to the breath, aiming the attention. What's the very first experience? What's the very first sensation that lets you know the in-breath is beginning? Using that bit more precision when the mind is dull can bring up the energy.

It's really helpful, particularly if you're experiencing something like sinking mind, to make very small adjustments. It's almost as if the concentration magnifies what happens in our minds somehow. And so if you do something kind of large—like, oh, I'm really sleepy, I'm feeling so dull, I'm going to take a really brisk walk to bring up the energy—you may find yourself with way too much energy. Some very small things can be helpful. Just open your eyes. Just try to aim a little bit more carefully. Maybe take one or two longer, slower, deeper breaths to bring a little bit more energy in. The small adjustments actually can make quite a large change in our energy levels.

The quality of sustaining the attention, the vicāra, is said to be the antidote to doubt. We experience doubt in many things. We experience doubt particularly—one of the main places we experience doubt in meditation is doubt in ourselves, our own ability. We start thinking about the fact that everybody else seems to be able to do this and I can't.

When we're lost in doubt, we've lost connection with the experience. We're not even in the vicinity of the breath. So this quality of sustaining the attention is the counter to that. If we can just meet our breath and stay there for a few moments, then meet our breath and stay there, there won't be room for those thoughts of doubt to come in. As long as there's connection to experience, the doubt begins to recede.

So try this—basically needing to stay connected. If you're experiencing doubting thoughts, see if you can engage the willingness to try. Just, yep, there's doubt. Can I just connect with this next breath? Can I sustain my attention on this in-breath? Connect with this out-breath, sustain my attention on the out-breath. Be willing to try that.

That willingness actually is the beginning, the seed of faith. The willingness to engage in the practice is connected to the confidence that the practice will support us. So that also counters doubt—the willingness to engage.

The next factor of concentration is rapture, pīti. This is delight and joy that comes accompanied by a lot of interest. Sometimes pīti is defined even as rapt attention or joyful interest. It comes about basically through vitakka and vicāra, sustaining the attention on the breath in this gentle way. The mind starts to get interested in the breath.

One of my teachers talks about ways to support this interest in the breath—that as we stay with the breath, if we can find ways to make the breathing comfortable, then the mind will want to stay with the breath. He uses this analogy, my teacher Thanissaro Bhikkhu, Tan Jeff—and this comes from his own teacher, Ajahn Fuang—that if you want to catch an eel, eels are pretty slippery. If you want to catch an eel, you need to give eels something they like. And so you put a jar in the river with some dead animal in the bottom of the jar, which is what eels like to feed on. You just put the jar in the river and the eels will go right in there.

He says it's like that with the breath. You need to give the mind something that it likes, an enjoyable experience of the breathing. And so actually in concentration practice, it's fine to play with the breath, to explore ways to make the breath more comfortable, more pleasurable. As we cultivate this kind of comfortable, pleasurable breath, the mind gets more and more interested in staying with the breathing. And this quality of rapture begins to come about.

It can be accompanied by very pleasant experience—a lot of bodily experiences, often a fairly energetic quality, quite a bit of energy. It can be felt as tingling or goosebumps. It might be felt as flashes of energy or feelings of energy rushing through the body. It might feel like showering waves, like being pounded by the surf. That doesn't sound pleasant, but it's actually quite lovely—this feeling of waves of rapture washing through you. You might feel like you're filled with lightness, or like a bladder that's suffused with pleasure.

So rapture has these aspects of energetic experience in the body, pleasurable experience, interest in the object of attention, and a feeling of being nourished—a feeling that the body and mind are being refreshed by the experience. For me, it feels like all the cells in the body are just drinking up this wonderful elixir.

This is a result of our practice. It's not something we can make happen. We cultivate the sense of interest through turning our attention to the breathing, cultivating the pleasant, pleasurable aspects of the breathing. We can appreciate the breath, as Philip was talking about—the life-giving breath, the beautiful breath. All of these things will support and cultivate this interest, which will then in turn support the mind's ability to more fully connect and sustain attention on the breathing.

We can tend to be pulled to the sensations of rapture. They can be strong sensations, and they can also be very interesting. The sensations of rapture can be like, "Ooh, that feels interesting," and it can pull our attention away from the breath. It's really helpful to see if you can stay with the breath while the rapture is beginning and coming into being. The rapture itself is nourished by the attention to the breathing. So if you turn the attention away from the breathing to the rapture, you're essentially cutting off a large source of the nourishment for that rapture.

See if you can stay connected with the breathing while the rapture is happening, allowing the rapture. For me, it seems almost like working with a hindrance—allowing the rapture to be in the background, staying connected with the breathing in the foreground, not letting the mind get pulled to the rapture. But paradoxically, unlike with the hindrances when we do this, letting them be in the background and the breath in the foreground, the hindrances recede. With rapture in the background and the breath in the foreground, the rapture builds. It strengthens the rapture.

The presence of rapture counters ill will. When the mind is in such a state of interest in what's happening, it's not interested in exploring the sides of things that make it dislike what's happening. Ill will is a state of disliking what's going on. When we're in the state of rapture, there's a very natural interest in our experience. The mind is quite happy, contented—states that naturally oppose ill will.

The fourth factor of concentration is sukha, happiness. This is a kind of mental pleasure, a sweetness—the contentment we've been talking about. Sukha is present with rapture; it's present within the rapture. But it's a subtler experience, and so it's often obscured by the energetic quality of the rapture. Sukha itself is not quite so energetic. There's actually more of a tranquility to sukha. And so it often becomes more apparent as the energy of rapture begins to subside.

The commentaries in the Visuddhimagga offer an analogy that helps us understand the distinction between rapture and this sweetness—between piti and sukha. Rapture is compared to the state of joy and interest of somebody who's crossing a desert, very thirsty, and sees an oasis in the distance and knows that nourishment and liquid and refreshment are coming. The state of happiness, sukha, is compared to that person having reached the oasis, taken a drink, and now resting in the shade. There's no longer that sense of urgency or energy around having that drink, no longer that strong interest in the drink because the drink has been taken. There's a tranquilizing, a calming of that energy.

Again, it's not something we can do. It's a result of the practice of setting this container, this relaxed, attentive container. The continuity, the relaxation, connection with the breath supports these other qualities arising.

Sukha is said to counter restlessness and anxiety, the fourth hindrance. We can see how restlessness is a kind of excess of energy—both physical and mental restlessness are a kind of excess of energy. And sukha is moving into a tranquilizing of body and mind, so it directly counters that.

We can have a tendency to grasp at sukha. It is so pleasant. My own phrase for this when it comes about in my practice is "the oh yes state." Oh, yes.

It's real. Why would I not want to be in this space? Really, really pleasant. So it can, again, pull our attention. So again, let it be in the background. Allow the connection with the breath to remain in the foreground.

The last of the factors of concentration is ekagata. One-pointedness is the literal translation of this term, but it is often also referred to as unification of mind. This actually points to two ways of understanding this factor. One-pointedness refers to the understanding of concentration that develops as we direct our attention to a single object—simply paying attention to one experience. Unification of mind, on the other hand, can come about more as a stability of mind, even though there may be other experiences present besides this one object. This stability of mind, this unification of mind, is the kind of stability that gets developed in our Vipassana practice. The ekagata that we're developing here is more what we encourage through stabilizing on one object—just choosing our breath and staying with it. Ekagata is often used as a synonym for concentration.

It contains a balance of mind. Basically, there's nothing that we want to change when the mind is unified, when it is in this space of one-pointed attention. The mind feels balanced. It feels contented. No problem. So nothing that we want to change, nothing that feels like it needs to change—that points to the hindrance this state counters. It counters sense desire, the state of wanting, the state of wanting something, to have something that we don't have, the desire to possess things.

As we practice concentration and these factors come together, we begin to experience states of pleasure, of bliss, of balance that are beyond sense pleasure. We really start to see that way more satisfying than sense pleasure are these states of rapture, of happiness, of balance of mind. That "oh yes" feeling I talk about—way more satisfying than having a piece of chocolate.

From the Dhammapada: "If by renouncing a lesser happiness one may realize a greater happiness, let the wise one renounce the lesser, having regard for the greater."

And another passage from the Buddha: "Even though a disciple has seen clearly as it actually is, with proper wisdom, how sensual pleasure provides little gratification, much suffering and much despair, and how great is the danger in them, as long as she does not attain to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sensual pleasures—that is, the rapture and pleasure of concentration—or to something more peaceful than that, she may still be attracted to sense pleasures. But when a noble disciple has seen clearly as it actually is with proper wisdom, how sensual pleasures provide little gratification, much suffering, much despair, and how great is the danger in them, and he attains to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sensual pleasures, then he is no longer attracted to sensual pleasures."

So the state of concentration, in particular this quality of one-pointedness, allows us to let go of the grosser kinds of happiness that come from sense pleasure for a more refined kind of happiness.

As I said earlier, the cultivation of these concentration states essentially allows us to set aside the hindrances. We abandon the hindrances for the period of time in which we're in the state of concentration, bringing this beautiful bliss of seclusion. As we are entering into the state of concentration, we are learning about how the hindrances arise, how we can skillfully avoid them. We're learning about what supports the cultivation of this skillful state of concentration. Essentially, we're really learning about the skill of meditation, the skill of creating concentration. And it is a skill. It is something in which we can all gain skillfulness.

We cannot actually create concentration itself, but we can cultivate the qualities that nourish it. We can let go of the qualities that counter it—essentially watering the field of our minds such that concentration will naturally arise.

CHAPTER 40

From Stillness to Movement: The Place of Concentration on the Path of Insight

Andrea Fella · 56 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the crucial role of concentration (samādhi) within the broader Buddhist path to liberation. She begins by reflecting on the Buddha's own journey—how he had mastered deep jhāna states with his teachers yet recognized these weren't the final answer to suffering. The key insight came when he recalled a childhood experience of concentration and realized that samādhi need not be an end in itself, but could serve as a doorway to wisdom.

Fella explains the two definitions of right concentration (sammā samādhi) found in the suttas: the four jhānas, and concentration "equipped with seven requisites"—the other seven path factors. This second definition emphasizes that concentration gains its transformative power through the intention and framework within which it's developed. She then maps the entire Noble Eightfold Path as a cycle, beginning with intellectual understanding of the Four Noble Truths, moving through ethical conduct (sīla), mental cultivation (wise effort, mindfulness, and concentration), and culminating in direct liberating insight.

The talk explores the spectrum of concentration practices—from one-pointed absorption to khaṇika samādhi (momentary concentration) that remains stable while meeting changing experience. Fella describes how concentrated awareness can penetrate the three characteristics: seeing through the illusion of permanence created by rapid change, recognizing the unsatisfactoriness of grasping at impermanent phenomena, and perceiving the not-self nature of experience as mere process. She concludes by describing how practitioners can transition from stillness back toward movement—turning the sharpened, stable mind toward changing experience to cultivate the wisdom that liberates.

So tonight I'd like to talk about how this practice of concentration fits into the path of practice as a whole.

The other night Sally talked about the Buddha's own path and how he had practiced in the style of his day—the deep concentration practices leading to some of the formless jhanas that Philip mentioned last night. He had discovered in that practice that the way they were practicing those states of concentration wasn't the answer to his question. The states themselves were not what he was looking for in terms of the solution to the problem he was struggling with.

Then, after his ascetic practices, he came back and had a reflection about a time when he was young, when he was a young boy sitting underneath the rose apple tree watching his father. He recalled a state of concentration that he had moved into at that time, and wondered, "Maybe that is the way. Maybe there's something in that."

I've been curious myself about what it was that he understood in that moment, because he had been through very deep concentration practices with two of his previous teachers. Yet somehow, in his reflection thinking back on that time when he was young, he had an understanding that maybe this was the way. I'm curious about what the difference was. Why did he not think that the states of jhana he'd practiced with his teachers were the way, while this state when he was a child was the way?

My understanding of this—and there are different views about this—but one way to look at it, one way to understand it, is that when he was practicing with his teachers in the deeper states of jhana, the framework of those practices was that those states themselves were the highest attainment possible. He saw for himself that that wasn't the answer he was looking for. But when he revisited the state of jhana from his childhood, he perhaps saw or realized that it could be a turning towards—that the state of concentration didn't have to be an end in itself, but could be a doorway through which wisdom could be reached.

This points to one way that concentration, or right concentration, is defined in the suttas. There are a couple of different ways it's defined. One of the main definitions is that right concentration is these four jhanas. In many places in the suttas it says, "And what is right concentration? It is this first jhana with all its attendant factors, and the second jhana with the letting go of the vitakka vicāra," and so on through the four jhanas.

There's another definition: that concentration equipped with seven requisites is right concentration. "What is noble right concentration with its supports and requisites? That is right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, and right mindfulness. Unification of mind equipped with these seven factors is called noble right concentration with its supports and requisites."

This is pointing to the framework in which concentration is understood. Essentially, this definition of right concentration includes the purpose to which the concentration is directed, the intention towards which the concentration is directed. In the Buddhist path, concentration is developed and cultivated in the service of liberation, in the service of freedom from suffering, from stress, from dissatisfaction, from dukkha. This is what the Buddha explored. The suttas describe him entering the states of jhana and then, after that, directing his mind—this concentrated and purified mind—towards understanding this problem of suffering.

When he looked at the world, the Buddha saw that people were going about their lives trying to be happy, trying to find happiness. And in every action that they did, he saw it slip through their grasp. Essentially, the way in which we habitually try to find happiness—without some instruction pointing us in another direction—actually leaves us feeling dissatisfied, leaves us feeling unhappy, struggling, suffering. Even if it's not a strong state of suffering, there's almost always something that feels a bit off. Something that's just like, "Why is it so difficult? Why aren't things working out the way that I'd like them to? Isn't there something more?" Almost always some feeling that things aren't quite right, that there's a dissonance in our minds with things as they are. We hold onto things, try to hold onto things that inherently can't stay. We try to get rid of things that we don't like.

In his awakening, as he directed his concentrated mind towards this problem of suffering, he understood how the suffering was created. He understood the suffering itself, how it came to be, the relationship between his mind, his wanting, his not wanting, the craving, and the suffering. He understood the possibility of freedom from that suffering by letting go of that craving. And he understood the path—how it's actually possible to become free from this suffering.

This path is usually expressed in terms of the Noble Eightfold Path. Most of you are very familiar with the Noble Eightfold Path: the path of wise understanding, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration.

This path is often understood in three sections. The first two aspects, wise understanding and wise intention, are wisdom that needs to be understood to some extent before we really want to engage in the path, before we want to engage in practices. The second aspect is the ethical component: wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. The third aspect is mental cultivation: wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration.

That's one way that the path is often described, and that version of the path ends with concentration. There's another way that the path is described, where it begins with ethical conduct. The training that the Buddha offered, called the gradual training, begins with ethical conduct, then moves on to training the mind, and culminates in wisdom.

So in a sense, we could look at the Noble Eightfold Path as a cycle, as a circle. It begins with some form of wisdom—a kind of intellectual understanding. We need some intellectual understanding of what this problem of suffering actually is. What actions and states of mind lead us into suffering? What actions and states of mind lead us away from suffering? Some understanding of how cause and effect works in our experience: that when we act out of states motivated by greed, aversion, and delusion, those tend to lead us into suffering. When we act out of states motivated by non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion, those tend to lead us away from suffering.

So the initial understanding in right understanding is an intellectual grasp of the teachings combined with some reflection on them—actually thinking about them. Does this make sense to me? As we think about this, explore this, if it does begin to make sense to us, there are two parts that come together: we have a sense of suffering in our own lives, and this teaching is pointing us towards freedom from suffering. There's a little bit of a leap of faith that's engaged in, that's brought up when we engage in this path of practice. A recognition of "I'm suffering. This suggestion of this path says that it will lead me to the end of suffering. Perhaps I can engage." This movement towards engaging is the movement of right intention—the movement to actually explore these practices.

So those are the first two aspects of the Eightfold Path that we begin with: hearing the teachings, understanding them to some extent in our reflective capacity, and beginning to engage. But that's not the full fruition of those two aspects of the path—of right understanding and right intention. We'll come back to that later.

With this intention to engage, we start to explore some of the practices that are offered. The next aspect of the Eightfold Path is a set of ethical practices: the practices of wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. These are essentially the practices that begin to create some harmony in our relationships with the world, creating balance in our lives in the way that we engage—the way that we meet people, the way we meet our environment—harmonizing our relationship with the world, with other people, with this intention towards non-harming, living peacefully in the world.

As we engage in those practices, we start to see some of the ways in which our mind reaches out to want to do things. Because we're engaged in the ethical practices, we refrain from doing things perhaps that our mind is prompting us to do. And so we start to see the need for mental cultivation.

This need for mental development as a part of the path comes back to the understanding from the first aspect of the Eightfold Path, from right understanding: the understanding of how this suffering comes to be, of how this dukkha comes to be. When we reflect on it and begin to look at it in our experience, we see that largely it happens because we are resisting the way things are or we're trying to hold on to the way things are. Either there's something in the world as it is that we don't like—we want to get rid of it, we want to push it away, or get ourselves out of the environment. Or there's something in the way things are that we want to try to keep and hold on to, which is an exercise in suffering because that thing will change.

We think that if we can arrange the world to our desires, then we will be happy. This comes back to what the Buddha saw. There's a poem that I like that describes this process we go through, an excerpt from Rilke's Eighth Duino Elegy:

And we, spectators, always, everywhere, turn toward the world of objects. It fills us. We arrange it. It breaks down. We rearrange it, then break down ourselves. Who has twisted us around like this so that no matter what we do, we are in the posture of someone going away?

We have twisted ourselves around like this. Impermanence is a fact of life. The notion that we can arrange the world to our satisfaction and be happy is a fundamental misunderstanding of how happiness is possible for us.

When we see what's happening, we start to actually recognize that the suffering we're experiencing is a process happening in our own minds. The resistance to things as they are is a process going on in our own minds. The wanting to hold on to things is a process happening in our own minds. So we start to get the inkling that it's these processes in our minds that are the cause of our dissatisfaction. Hence, the need for mental cultivation—to cultivate wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration.

To look at our minds, to begin to understand how they work.

Our typical experience of the mind, as you're all very familiar with, is very scattered. It jumps around. It goes from thing to thing, from idea to idea. It's propelled by mental habits that largely feed on not being aware of them. These mental habits that we operate out of are largely based in unawareness.

So this practice of mental cultivation—wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration—begins to bring some settledness into our lives. This is really what we've been practicing: the settling of our minds through bringing these three factors together. Wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration work together to settle the mind, to support this mental cultivation.

Much of what has been happening here on this retreat is learning about right effort and how right effort and right mindfulness work together. The effort to stay connected to experience in the present moment in a balanced way, in a relaxed way—staying connected with, not gripping onto, and also not losing touch with. That's an aspect of right effort: the balance of effort, the effort to begin to understand what things are worth saying "not now" to, the letting go of the hindrances, the turning towards the factors that support the development of concentration, using mindfulness to allow us to recognize what's skillful and what's unskillful in terms of creating concentration.

These two factors coming together—wise effort and wise mindfulness—result in wise concentration. The concentration resulting from, as we've said, the sustaining of mindfulness over time, whether on a single object like the breath, or whether a stabilizing of the mindfulness even with changing experience.

There's a large terrain that these three factors cover: wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise concentration. I'm going to explore some of the edges of that terrain, which we've talked about over the week, but I want to really clearly define some of those edges and then explore some of the ways in which there can be a blending.

One edge of that terrain is one-pointed concentration—the concentration cultivated in the way we have been practicing these days, by bringing the attention back to one object of experience over and over again. It serves as a very stable and settling unification of mind to collect the mind around a single object. The body becomes still. There's a lot of peace, joy, contentment, calm. Sometimes rapture arises, sukha can arise. This is largely the terrain we've been exploring in these days.

Another edge of this terrain is what is sometimes called khaṇika samādhi, which means moment-to-moment concentration. This is generally a concentration that can be cultivated by stabilizing the mindfulness through changing experience. The mindfulness simply meets whatever the next experience is: a sight, a sound, a pressure, a vibration, a thought, an emotion, a dryness, a pulsing, a heat, a coolness—just a flow of ever-changing experience. The mind that can stay stable and steady with that experience also becomes quite concentrated. It's that stillness of mind that can meet the movement.

Philip was talking about stillness and movement last night. In the concentration practice we've been working with, it's a movement towards more and more stillness, letting go—from movement to stillness. With khaṇika samādhi, the moment-to-moment concentration, a stillness comes to the awareness and the awareness can open to a changing flow of experience.

This kind of concentration can be extremely powerful. The jhānic factors also come together in this kind of concentration. The five jhānic factors appear. They suppress the hindrances in this kind of concentration. Joy and happiness arise. The one-pointedness isn't one-pointedness on a single object; it's that unification of mind that can stay still and not be caught by any event, not start drifting out after it or being propelled to think about an emotion or a thought or a pressure or vibration—just the stream of experience coming through. In this kind of practice, we generally make the effort to sustain the mindfulness over time on changing experience.

These are the edges of the terrain, but in large measure, much of what we do is somewhere in the middle, in the vast terrain between them. We unify our mind to some extent on the breath, but we're noticing the changing experience of the breath. Or we bring our attention into the body and feel the breath through the body, and the breath infuses all of the experience. We're connected to the breath in a way that stabilizes the mind, and yet that breath includes the world.

I don't want to give you the sense that it's one or the other. There's a large terrain in the middle, and most people find their way, as we explore concentration practice, to some place where their mind feels at home in this terrain. That's a different place for different people. Some people move into very deep stillness. Other people move into much more of that open awareness. Neither one is better than the other, as long as we are pointing the concentration towards this understanding of suffering.

So whether we're cultivating one-pointed concentration or moment-to-moment concentration or somewhere in the middle, this unification of the mind—these three factors of right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration coming together—gives a settling down of the jumpy mind, the distracted mind. It settles down the emotional reactivity. Rather than seeing the world through our normal state of habitual patterns and tendencies, we start to come into a place that is non-reactive.

This is again the stillness that Philip was talking about last night.

Right concentration, as I said earlier, is the last aspect of the Eightfold Path, but it is not the end of the path. We cultivate right concentration so that we can move towards an understanding of seeing things as they are. This is a revisitation of the wisdom aspect of the Eightfold Path—right understanding and right intention.

Beginning with an intellectual understanding, we explore the practices, and through the cultivation of this mentally unified mind, we can direct our attention towards our experience and begin to actually understand—directly understand—what the Buddha was talking about with respect to how suffering is created, how we react to experience.

We have a direct understanding of this core holding, this craving, and a letting go of that craving, even if for just a moment. And we have a taste of what it means to not suffer.

In the Buddhist understanding, one of the ways that suffering is expressed is that it results from greed, aversion, and delusion in our minds. And the most concise definition that I know of from the suttas of what enlightenment is, is the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion.

I'd like to read some of these passages to you. I find them quite inspiring.

"The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called Nibbana."

"Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed with mind ensnared, man aims at his own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and he experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, man aims at neither his own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and he experiences no mental pain and grief. This is Nibbana, immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

"And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and no more remains for her to do. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so, neither forms nor sounds nor odors nor tastes nor contacts of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired, can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is her mind, gained is deliverance."

"This is peace, this is exquisite—the resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, Nibbana."

There are a couple of points here that I want to highlight. One is that in addition to being defined as the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion, Nibbana is described by its result: one experiences no mental pain or grief. Just imagine what life would be like with no mental pain or grief. There would be no problem.

The other piece that I find inspiring is that he says this is visible in this life. This is not some far-off future possibility. It is actually possible. The extinction of greed, aversion, and delusion to me sounds like something that can be experienced while walking around. It's not something that we have to be off in some mystical trance to experience. Visible in this life—that's at least how I like to hold it.

So the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion is essentially the direction that we are aiming our right concentration towards. Deep at the root of these three is the quality of ignorance. Normally, when we think of this word ignorance, we think of a passive state of not knowing. But the ignorance that underlies greed, aversion, and delusion is far more pernicious than that. It's actually an active misunderstanding that alters the way we perceive things, the way we view things. It's an active misunderstanding of what would make us happy.

Three of the primary misunderstandings—you'll probably recognize these—are taking what is impermanent to be permanent, what is unsatisfactory to be satisfactory, and what is not self to be self. I'd like to talk about this for a few moments.

Part of the reason we have this misunderstanding is that it's built into our whole perceptual process. That we take what is impermanent to be permanent—this is partly because the impermanent nature of experience is masked by the fact that change is happening so quickly. Last night, Philip talked about seeing that things are happening not five times faster, but hundreds of times faster than you can even comprehend. This rapidity of change actually masks the change. It makes it appear solid.

A very simple analogy: it doesn't work this way anymore in movie theaters, but they used to have projectors where every frame was a separate still image, and they would run that past the light quickly, creating the appearance of something continuous happening. So it doesn't appear to be these broken bits of experience—it just appears to be a flow that seems continuous. The rapidity of change in our experience is very much like that.

It masks the impermanent by the very quickness of its change. The coming into concentration, the settling of the mind with this sharp knife-edge of concentration, can begin to discern the rapidity of change. So this training in the mind starts to unmask these misunderstandings. It unmasks this misunderstanding about impermanence.

Taking what is unsatisfactory as being satisfactory, as a source of happiness—this again is the belief that we are happy when we get what we want, that that's how happiness comes about. We've learned this since we were babies: when we get what we want, it feels good. So we think that's the way to be happy, because we've learned over and over again that when we get what we want, it feels good, makes us feel happy. For just a moment, it makes us feel happy.

What we begin to see through this concentrated mind, the mind that can actually see into experience, is that a large part of the happiness that comes when we get something—some of it comes from getting the thing that we want. But most of that happiness actually comes because the wanting itself has stopped. And the mind that is willing to just meet the experience with this concentration, this concentrated mind that's willing to just observe wanting instead of acting on it, can start to see the deeper kind of happiness that comes not from getting what we want, but from watching the wanting go away. The mind that's willing to hang out with that wanting and watch it fade away as an impermanent phenomenon—if you can hang out with wanting and watch it go away, it feels like being released from a vice grip. Quite a startling experience, actually.

The impermanence of our experience is masked by the rapidity of change. The very fact that things are impermanent is one of the reasons why things are unsatisfactory as a lasting source of happiness. If we hold on to something, try to hold on to something, if we even get what we want and so manage to maneuver things for a little while to get what we want—even if we get that thing, inherently in that getting, that happiness is unsatisfactory because it's destined to fall apart. That thing which we're holding on to is impermanent and won't last.

This is another thing we can really begin to see: the unsatisfactoriness of experience as a place for lasting happiness. There's no experience that we can have that is going to do it for us. We think we can try to string them together, and that might do it for us. But we suffer because we hold on to things that are impermanent.

And what's even more amazing—as we really start to see things clearly with this mind of concentration and mindfulness—is that what we're holding on to, what we think we want, actually doesn't really exist. It's a construction of our own minds. What we want is just made up by our own minds.

I had an example of this on one retreat. I had heard about this insight called arising and passing, which is described as being a very lovely experience of just seeing things coming into being and vanishing. The mind is so stable that it just sees things very clearly coming into being and vanishing. Usually the initial taste of that is described as being quite a joyful occurrence. I really wanted this experience. I suffered a lot wanting that experience.

And I got to look at that suffering, watch that suffering, see what was going on. Finally what I realized was that I had no idea what this was that I wanted. I mean, no clue what arising and passing actually was. I had read something about it in a book, constructed some idea in my mind perhaps of what it might be like. But when I really looked at what I wanted, I saw myself telling my teacher in an interview that I had this experience—and that was what I wanted. I wanted to be able to tell someone I had had that experience. That made me laugh. What I wanted was a construct in my own mind. This is much of how our minds work, and this is revealed to us through concentration and mindfulness.

Taking what is not self to be self—there are so many different habits and patterns that we have that we inherently assume to be who we are, ways that we've been for so long that we can't even imagine being without them. I myself had a strong pattern before I really moved into this practice of believing I was a miserable person. I was just miserable a lot of the time, but when I was happy, the belief that I was miserable was so strong that the thought in my mind was something like, "Well, yeah, I'm happy now, but I know I really am a miserable person." That is creating a self. There was evidence that I wasn't completely a miserable person, but I was seeing through this view of a miserable self. And that's how I saw my world.

These are misperceptions that we have. And gathering the mind together through effort, mindfulness, and concentration can begin to reveal these misperceptions.

With respect to not-self, we start to see our experience as just a flow, a process. We really begin to see the cause and effect nature of our experience—that there's no thing here really to call "I" or "me."

It's much like a seed that grows into a tree given the right conditions. There's no thing that is the tree. If you have a seed, there's not a tree there. As you plant it in the ground, there's not a tree there. That seed contains the potential for becoming a tree when the conditions are right, and the tree comes into being. It's a natural process by which that happens. There's no thing driving that process other than just this force of causes and conditions. Who we are is very like that. There's no one really guiding the process. It's just this flow of causes and conditions.

As we start to see into these misperceptions through concentration and mindfulness together, sometimes the insights we meet can be a little disturbing or unsettling. Seeing the rapidity of change can be quite unsettling. This is again where the concentration really supports us. The concentrated mind—we need that concentrated mind to be able to hold some of the deeper insights that happen on this path. The concentrated mind is stable, balanced, able to meet things as they are. The equanimity, the tranquility allows us to open our hearts to things as they are.

There are different ways to use concentration, different ways that concentration supports these insights. One of the ways is very much what we have been doing. We are learning about causes and conditions, cause and effect, as we practice to settle the mind. The very process of learning how to use these tools, learning how to balance the energy and effort, learning how to aim and sustain the attention—we are learning about cause and effect. We learn how to say "not now" to the hindrances. We learn that this supports the settling of concentration. The whole practice of concentration gives us a really great education in cause and effect: how a concentrated mind is put together, what comes in to make it fall apart. This is an understanding that can support our deepening of insight into cause and effect.

One of the main ways to direct this concentrated mind towards experience, to begin to open to insight, is to turn the concentrated mind towards changing experience. We can settle the mind in a unified kind of concentration through stabilizing, settling the mind on the breath. After the mind has become quite stable—perhaps going through the jhānas, but not necessarily needing to go through the jhānas—we can take that power of concentration, which is like sharpening a knife, and turn that concentrated mind, changing the object of experience from the stable object towards changing experience.

This might be as simple as attuning towards the changing nature of the breath itself. Or it might be an opening to a broader range of experience. It might be beginning to open to the way the body moves a little bit with the breath. Or it might be opening to sound or other body sensations. It might be recognizing thoughts coming and going, like images in the mind just appearing and disappearing.

The main shift in moving from concentration into insight practice is this attunement to change. As we start to attune that mind to change, we begin to directly see much more clearly the impermanent nature of experience.

These insights into these misperceptions—the insight into impermanence, the insight into unsatisfactoriness, the insight into not-self—these are the insights that begin to free the mind, that begin to educate the mind in non-clinging. The mind that sees that things are impermanent doesn't particularly want to pick things up to hold on to them. The mind that understands that holding on to an experience will bring suffering doesn't particularly want to pick it up.

So this direct seeing, this ability to turn the mind to meet changing experience, begins to open our hearts, our minds to these deeper insights of wisdom that move us towards a letting go—or even towards a non-grasping.

We've been moving from movement to stillness. And this movement towards turning towards change is taking that stillness and opening to movement. That still mind meeting changing experiences.

Thank you for your attention to the Dhamma.

CHAPTER 41

Factors that Hinder and Support Concentration

Andrea Fella · 1h05

> In this concentration retreat talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the relationship between the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) and the five jhānic factors that support sammā samādhi (right concentration) as part of the Noble Eightfold Path. Using the Buddha's powerful analogy of the banyan tree—which strangles its host by competing for nourishment—she explains how hindrances of sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and anxiety, and doubt can encircle and obstruct the mind's natural capacity for stillness.
>
> The talk offers a nuanced continuum for working with hindrances in concentration practice: from letting them remain in the background while maintaining attention on the breath, to breathing through stronger hindrances, to turning toward them directly with mindfulness when necessary. This differs from standard vipassanā approaches, emphasizing skillful setting aside rather than immediate investigation.
> Fella then presents the five jhānic factors—vitakka (aiming attention), vicāra (sustaining attention), pīti (rapture), sukha (happiness), and ekaggatā (one-pointedness)—explaining how each naturally counters a specific hindrance. She offers practical guidance on developing relaxed attention through gentle approaches: settling back to receive the breath, using requests rather than force, and learning to work with the natural resonance between aiming and sustaining attention. The teaching emphasizes that cultivating concentration and releasing hindrances are interconnected processes, each supporting the other on the path toward the deeper happiness of seclusion from unwholesome states.

The concentration that we are cultivating here on retreat is the concentration of the Noble Eightfold Path, wise concentration, which is concentration that is supported by wise effort and wise mindfulness. This is actually quite important—that we know how we are aiming our minds, how we are cultivating our concentration.

Wise effort is crucial in that we are aiming our minds to let go of, to abandon the unwholesome, unskillful qualities of mind, those based in greed, aversion, and delusion. And we are cultivating and maintaining wholesome qualities of mind, those qualities that are based in non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—qualities such as love, kindness, generosity, and wisdom.

In talking about cultivating the wholesome and abandoning the unwholesome, the Buddha used an analogy of feeding and starving. He spoke of qualities of mind that we should nourish and encourage. These are the wholesome qualities of mind that we should feed. And there are qualities of mind that we should not feed, that we should denourish—that we should starve certain qualities of mind that lead to our suffering, that lead to our struggle, stress, and dissatisfaction.

Tonight I would like to talk about some of the qualities that we would like to let go of and abandon, and some of the factors that we would like to encourage in our practice of right concentration.

In particular, when discussing this feeding and starving analogy, the Buddha mentioned the list of the five hindrances as qualities that we should abandon, that we should actively find ways to denourish. These factors of mind lead not to our welfare and happiness, but to our struggle and suffering. Then there are several other lists that he encouraged us to cultivate and nourish: the qualities of the seven factors of awakening, the qualities of the five faculties, the four brahmavihāras—the qualities of kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity. Many, many qualities the Buddha mentioned that we should encourage and nourish.

Tonight I would like to contrast the five hindrances not with one of those familiar lists, but with another list that may not be as well known to you. If you have attended this retreat before, this list will be familiar, but it is not one we tend to discuss much on regular Vipassana retreats. It is the list of the five factors that support concentration, sometimes called the five jhānic factors. These factors actively counter the qualities of the hindrances, and so it is a good paired list to explore.

I would like to start first by exploring a little bit about the hindrances, though not in the usual detailed way of going through each one individually. I know that many of you, most of you, have probably heard quite a few talks on the hindrances, and some of you might even be able to give a talk on them yourselves.

The five hindrances are sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and anxiety, and doubt. It sometimes sounds like seven, but sloth and torpor are paired together, and restlessness and anxiety are paired together as a single hindrance.

The Buddha described these states as states that particularly hinder concentration. They get in our way in terms of settling the mind. You can see this in just looking at a few of them. If you think about restlessness, how restlessness works—it keeps the mind scattered and distracted, which is the opposite of the unified mind. A mind filled with ill will is not at peace, not at rest. A mind that is continually wanting things has a kind of unsettled quality to it. So we can see how these qualities actively obstruct the possibility of concentration.

It is useful to learn how to explore these hindrances and let go of them. In our mindfulness practice, we tend to turn towards them and explore them actively. In our concentration practice, we have a slightly different perspective. I would like to talk in general terms about how to work with difficult energies that obstruct and get in the way of concentration, rather than going through each one specifically.

First, I would like to offer an analogy that the Buddha used for the hindrances. He called the hindrances "encirclers of the mind," and he said they are like a banyan tree. Now, some of you may know what a banyan tree is, but most of us do not have daily encounters with banyan trees in our country. So I would like to describe to you what a banyan tree is, how it works, because the Buddha's analogies were very intuitive and very apt. They rely on your understanding something about the thing he is making an analogy about.

A banyan tree is a kind of fig tree that begins its life by having a seed deposited in the crook of another tree. What that seed does is send out roots—moisture-seeking roots that seek the ground. So it starts up in the top of a tree and sends out these roots. As those roots hit the ground, they begin to stiffen. They become firm. And they begin to create a kind of latticework of roots around this supporting tree.

And every place those roots cross, they get even stronger, until the point where the banyan tree has completely encircled its host tree and actually begins to compete with that tree for nourishment. It competes for light, for moisture. It begins to crowd out the area where the roots of the other tree could grow, and it essentially strangles the host tree, killing it. At some point, you end up with just this huge trunk—banyan trees can get quite large—that looks like a trunk because the roots fuse together. But instead of a regular trunk, there's this latticework of stiffened roots.

The hindrances are like this in our minds. There's this notion of competing for nourishment with wholesome qualities. As the hindrances get entrenched, they are taking our energy, they are obstructing and getting in the way of wholesome qualities. They are competing for the nourishment. And what I think is particularly apt about this analogy is the way the banyan tree sends out its shoots and the way that where the roots cross, they actually get stronger. The hindrances are self-reinforcing. They support each other. They encourage each other. These are very powerful energies in our minds.

In our concentration practice, as Sally mentioned this morning and as we've actually mentioned a couple of times already, the first approach to working with hindrances is that we have to recognize they are present. We do have to acknowledge them. We have to know that they're there. If we don't know they're there, they can be operating in the subconscious mind and may create a kind of agenda around how we're even doing our concentration practice. I'm sure you've seen this kind of thing happen where you're trying to stay with your breath and there's a striving or a holding or a pushing that's motivated by wanting. If that hindrance of desire is not seen, it is being strengthened. It's being cultivated. So we need to recognize when the hindrances are present.

When we see them present, typically in our Vipassana practice we tend to let go of what we've been paying attention to and turn our attention directly to the hindrance itself. That's not the first approach with concentration practice. With concentration practice, we acknowledge the hindrance, we recognize it, and in that recognition, we set it aside or let it be in the background. We see if we can keep our attention with the breath, letting the hindrance be present, acknowledging it, knowing it's there, but seeing if we can keep the attention to the breath in the foreground with the hindrance in the background—clearly knowing that the hindrance is in the background. There's a setting aside, a sense of "not now."

This takes some practice and skill, actually. At least for me, it wasn't something obvious about how to do. Having done a lot of Vipassana practice, I was very familiar with turning towards the hindrances and was a little afraid to let them be in the background, thinking they might rear their heads or get stronger somehow if I wasn't actively attending to them with mindfulness.

But I discovered on my first concentration retreat—a month-long metta retreat—that when I got this instruction to notice the hindrances arising but just see if I could stay with the metta phrases, something shifted. I would notice anger arise and try to let it be in the background. Over the course of that month of metta practice, I realized how much of a relief it was to just think, "Oh yeah, there it is. There's anger. I don't really have to do anything with it. I can just let it be and stay with the metta phrases."

What we can discover with this is that there's another way these hindrances can diminish. My understanding of how this works—why letting it be in the background is a skillful strategy for working with hindrances in concentration practice—is that our attention, what we are nourishing, what we are feeding as we attend to the breathing, are the wholesome qualities that cultivate concentration, the settled stability of mind with the breath. Knowing that the hindrance is in the background, it's as if that hindrance doesn't have any place to send its roots to get nourishment, because the mindfulness and attention are with the breath. Hindrances tend to feed on non-awareness. When awareness is present and being attended to, even if the hindrance is left in the background, mindfulness does not allow much unawareness for that hindrance to tap into to nourish itself.

So we can see that when we have this setting aside, when we let the hindrance be in the background, the hindrance can essentially diminish on its own because it is an impermanent quality of mind. It is a factor that feeds on thoughts and energies. Ill will and sense desire, for instance, typically feed on thoughts and emotions. If we're taking our attention and placing it on the breath, there's not much room for the nourishing factors of thought and emotion to feed into that hindrance.

This is terrain we need to learn to navigate over time, this letting be in the background. But it is a very helpful tool to learn how to use. It takes some trust to do that. And we need to be honest with ourselves about whether we can let this hindrance be set aside.

This setting aside—or as Sally used the phrase this morning, "just not now"—that's one I use for myself: not now. And there's a way I explore how I'm saying "not now" to the hindrance. Is it, "Oh, there's anger... not now." Or "There's restlessness... not now." Or is it "Not now"—with a kind of energy of pushing it away?

We need to be really honest with ourselves about whether we can set the hindrance aside without an aversive quality, without a repressing quality. This is not about repressing the hindrance. It's not about that at all. It's more about letting it be, just not attending to it—what the Buddha might call a skillful ignoring of the hindrance.

At times, we can't just set it aside or let it be in the background. Hindrances have more energy than that. They're pushing themselves into our face. When that happens, we can approach from other directions, still trying to stay with the breath, but perhaps with half the attention on the hindrance and half on the breath. Maybe thinking of breathing through the hindrance—really consciously having the hindrance present in your mindfulness while allowing the breath to infuse it.

This is more of an approach you might take when the hindrance is a little stronger. I find it particularly helpful when hindrances are strong in the body, because the breath is an experience in the body. When restlessness gets strong in the body, you can think of allowing a spaciousness to breathe through the restlessness. Or perhaps with anger, having a sense of pressure and tightness and contraction around the heart—can you breathe through those sensations? This can apply also to working with pain. If you're finding pain in your body, you can have a sense of breathing through the pain.

Sometimes the hindrance is even stronger, where we can barely be in touch with the breath. Philip talked about this last night—the difficult mind state may be what's front and center. We're pretty much aware of and attending to the hindrance, but touching into the breath as we can. Just maybe every few seconds: ah, there's a breath, okay, and there's the anger, the desire, the wanting, the sleepiness. Every now and then we can touch into a breath, but more of our attention is on the hindrance. This is like the hindrance being in the foreground and the breath in the background—again, trying to stay connected with the breath as we can.

And of course, sometimes hindrances get strong enough that we simply cannot find the breath. I remember at one point, when I was doing metta practice as my concentration practice, the hindrances got so strong that I couldn't even remember the metta phrases. At that point it's like, okay, I need to turn towards this.

Learning how and when to apply these various levels is like navigating a continuum. We try to stay with the breath as we can, starting perhaps with the hindrance in the background and the breath in the foreground. If we find the hindrance is a little stronger, maybe we're trying to breathe with the hindrance. It might get stronger still, so the breath moves to the background and the hindrance to the foreground. And it might get so strong that the breath is just not possible to touch into, and we simply need to bring our practice of mindfulness to the hindrance. Many of you have had the teachings on turning towards the hindrance, observing it directly with mindfulness, so I'm not going to go into that tonight.

It takes skillful means, some discernment, to know when to apply the various tools along this continuum. One thing I'd suggest: let yourself notice whether, in working with one of these approaches, the hindrance is getting stronger. If you're being with the breath in the foreground and the hindrance in the background, and the hindrance doesn't seem to be getting stronger, just stay with the breath. That's fine. But keep your eye on it. Know that hindrance, know that it's present, and notice whether it's starting to creep up on you.

If we do need to turn towards the hindrance with mindfulness and let go of the breath, in that practice of cultivating mindfulness of the hindrance, we are still cultivating mindfulness. We're still cultivating the qualities of attending to our experience. So we are cultivating a form of concentration even as we attend to a hindrance. And we're also learning about our minds—cultivating the knowledge that helps us to let go.

This whole exploration of settling into concentration is not a week-long project. It's a long project of learning about your mind—learning how your mind struggles with itself, learning how your mind struggles with the practice. So as we come up against these things, it's not a failure, it's not a problem when we encounter the hindrances. It's our learning that needs to happen in this moment.

The learning that happens supports the cultivation of concentration because as concentration deepens, the hindrances fall away. And as the hindrances fall away, the concentration deepens. So the work on either side supports the work of concentration. The work of cultivating the deepening of concentration supports the letting go of the hindrances. The work of letting go of the hindrances supports the deepening of concentration. They're really interconnected.

You don't need to feel like you're somehow doing a lesser practice, or that you've taken a left turn and are no longer in the retreat because you're working with a hindrance. You're doing the work that needs to be done in the moment.

So as we cultivate concentration, there's the letting go of the hindrances that supports our cultivation of concentration, and then there's the cultivation of concentration itself. Five factors come together to support concentration and to create the concentrated mind. These are the five jhanic factors.

There is vitakka, the aspect of aiming the attention at experience. Vicāra, the aspect of sustaining the attention on experience. There is pīti—rapture, interest, joyful attention, rapt interest. Then there is sukha—sweetness, pleasure, comfort, happiness. And finally ekaggatā, which is one-pointedness or unification of mind.

These factors come together to support concentration. As Sally mentioned, there are only a couple of them that we have direct ability to engage with. That's the first two: aiming and sustaining the attention, the vitakka and vicāra. The others are more a result that comes together as we maintain and sustain our attention in a skillful way—not grasping or pushing away, without qualities of the hindrances involved. As vitakka and vicāra come together in a skillful way, these other qualities follow along.

Each of these five jhanic factors is said to naturally oppose one of the five hindrances. As these factors get strong, the hindrances naturally fall away. Now, it's a temporary falling away—it's not that they're gone for good. When these factors are present in the mind, the hindrances are not present. It's like a temporary removal or seclusion from the hindrances.

These are beautiful factors to cultivate. They create a state of mind in which we are free from the hindrances. Sometimes this is called the bliss of seclusion, because we are secluded from these unwholesome states of mind. It feels really good when the hindrances are not present. It has a beautiful feeling to it.

All five of these qualities come together to create what we can call neighborhood or access concentration. This is the basic concentration where the hindrances are at bay and the mind is very steady and stable. From this point in the teachings, it's said that we can choose to either move towards insight practice—where that concentrated and stable mind can be applied to recognizing the changing nature of experience and have insight into impermanence, suffering, and not-self—or we can choose to move into more absorption states of concentration.

These five factors are present in neighborhood concentration, and they're also present in the first jhāna. Later in the retreat we'll talk more about the jhānas, so I'm not going to go into detail about that this evening. I primarily want to explore these factors that come together to create the foundation for concentration and for jhāna.

Since these first two, vitakka and vicāra, are the ones we have the most ability to engage with, I'm going to spend more time talking about them and give a lighter touch to the other three.

Vitakka is the aiming of the attention, the initial application of mind. Vicāra is the sustaining of the attention. As an analogy, they're compared to the striking of a bell. Vitakka is like the striking of a bell, and vicāra is the sustaining, the resonant quality of the bell as it rings.

So vitaka is usually interpreted to mean aiming the attention towards experience—in this case, towards the breath. Directing the attention, placing the attention. This is something we can do with an act of will. We can choose where to place our attention.

Vichara, the sustaining of the attention, is usually interpreted as a kind of being with, sustaining—a rubbing is the way my teacher Sayadaw U Pandita talked about it. A rubbing, a connecting with the experience.

Thinking about the analogy of the bell, the vitaka is the striking of the bell. And the vichara, the way that the attention can sustain on experience, is going to be influenced by other conditions, much as the sustaining or the resounding of the bell is influenced by other conditions. If I hold onto the bell, it doesn't have that resonant quality. If there are other conditions, there may be changes to that resonance of the bell. So likewise, in our experience, there are conditions that will support that vichara to maintain.

And there are also different ways to strike, right? I can strike it like that, or like this. There are different ways to aim the attention that impact how the resonance happens. And so the aspects, the factors of vitaka and vichara—it's really important how we play with them, how we apply them.

We've been emphasizing relaxation. We've been emphasizing gentleness in the approach to being with the breath. And so I'd like to review this a little bit, because I talked about some of this yesterday in the guided meditation.

In terms of the aiming of the attention, the directing of the attention, we can forcefully aim our minds with a strong will—"I'm going to pay attention to that breath." Or there are some more gentle approaches. I mentioned a couple of these yesterday: the settling back and allowing the breath to come to you, having a sense of—rather than going out and looking for the breath—settling back and receiving the breath. This is a way of aiming the attention. It's just a little more settled back.

Using this approach is especially helpful as the breath gets more subtle. Rather than trying to look directly at it—you know, if you're paying attention to the breath at the nostrils or any place that's kind of a small place. I pay attention to a quarter-sized place at my sternum primarily. And sometimes the breath gets very subtle as we pay attention to it. When the breath starts getting really subtle, the inclination is to kind of force in and look harder. "Where is it? Where is it?" And what I find is actually helpful is to back off the effort at that point, to back off the intensity and almost see if, from a broader or almost peripheral perspective, the subtlety of the breath can pop into view.

I used the analogy yesterday of looking at stars. If you go out and look at stars at night, if you're looking at a dim star and try to look directly at it, it's hard to see. But if you look just off to the side, it pops into view. I've seen a similar kind of thing with the subtlety of the breath. Instead of trying to look directly at it, just let it come into the periphery. And then it can pop into view.

Another way to gently aim the attention is using what I call requests—rather than trying to do the aiming. For instance, right now, if I say to you, "See if you can attend to the experience of the breath at the nostrils. Just let yourself feel an in-breath at the nostrils"—often that's not too hard because I've pointed you in that direction, I've inclined you in that direction. And the mind, in hearing that, just naturally moves in that direction.

So we can do the same thing for ourselves. I will at times, if I'm finding that the effort is a little too forceful, settle back and just say to myself, "May the attention rest with the breathing"—and then see what happens. Not try to do it, not try to find the breath, but allow the mind to find the breath, having made that request. I've found this to be remarkably helpful. Not always—it doesn't always work, for sure. It doesn't always work, but it works more often than I would imagine. And so this can be a really helpful way to begin understanding how the mind can pay attention, aim the attention in a gentle way, as opposed to a forceful way.

So this gentle aiming is like the skillful tapping of a bell, which begins to allow a more full sustaining of the attention. In the sustaining of the attention, this is an area again where I think we tend to over-effort. We tend to use a lot of force in sustaining the attention, because sustaining the attention is not easy. And what I've learned to explore here is the natural resonance that happens as we make an aiming of the attention.

There's a natural resonance that follows. As you begin to get familiar with this, aiming the attention to the breath, there often is a natural length of time that the mind can stay with the breath in that moment based on the way you've aimed the attention. There's a kind of natural sustaining that follows. It may last half a second, it may last two seconds.

As we become familiar with this quality of sustaining, this resonance that happens as we aim, we begin to learn how to make vitakka and vicāra work together. As we aim the attention, there's a little bit of resonance that sustains. And as we get familiar with that sustaining, we begin to see when it gets a little wobbly, when it starts to fade, and then we need to aim the attention again. We sit with that resonance for a while, and then we aim again.

In this way of playing with vitakka and vicāra, we learn how frequently we need to aim the attention. As we do this practice, a momentum builds and the sustaining naturally lasts a little bit longer. It's like we're getting really skilled at hitting that bell, so the resonance lasts a long time. We begin to learn that we don't need to keep aiming the attention—we can hang out in that space of sustaining. These two factors work together, and we learn how to skillfully navigate them in relationship to each other.

It's really helpful to use a light touch with the sustaining. Just enough energy at the beginning to stay with half a breath—don't try to sustain the attention for much longer than that. Just half a breath, and then reconnect with the aiming to the in-breath. Sustain for the in-breath, reconnect to the out-breath, sustain for the out-breath. In this way, half a breath at a time, the momentum begins to build. Then we become familiar with the sustaining and realize, "I don't need to keep aiming. I can be with two breaths." And then touch in again.

For me, this has been a really helpful exploration around working these two together. I find it's very helpful to take the time to allow this container of skillful use of these two qualities to settle in, to set up—to take the time to establish the relaxed attention. That's how I'm describing this here: vitakka and vicāra are the qualities of attention, and learning how to use them skillfully supports a relaxed attention.

Part of the way I've navigated this is starting from a place of relaxation, which is why I emphasize relaxation at the beginning of a guided meditation or sitting. I usually start with relaxation, and then from that place of relaxation, I incline the mind to connect with the breath. "May the breath be present. May the mind connect with the breath"—as a gentle way to establish that connection.

If I find in connecting with the breath that there's any tightness or tension, I go back to relaxation. It may be I only get half a breath that's not tight or tense. As soon as I start to see the mind clamp down, I'll just go back to that place of relaxation and try again. I'll go back and forth like this for quite a while at the beginning of a sitting until the mind begins to rest skillfully in a relaxed way with the breath.

It's well worth that time to find the way to be relaxed and attentive. It's not so helpful to just say, "Okay, I can hang on to the breath for long enough that I'll break into concentration." We can do that. We can push through that way. But it generally results in a brittle form of concentration, one that's not very stable.

That's the way I used to do it. I used to think, "Okay, I'm just going to hold on to this breath. I'm going to do it." And I could get pretty concentrated, but it was not very stable. I learned the hard way that it's really helpful to just take your time and find the way into relaxed attention. It will be different for each of you how that unfolds.

So explore. This is really a playground. We're playing with our minds here, learning how to be relaxed and attentive.

So the factor of vitakka, that aiming of the attention, is understood to counter sloth and torpor—that dullness of mind. As we consciously connect to the breath, aiming the attention, it brings an energy and a freshness into the mind and counters that quality of dullness and sleepiness.

Just to acknowledge, this is only the second full day of retreat. Many of you are probably experiencing dullness and sleepiness. This is typical for the first two or three days. There's a lot of swamp out there, I know. And it's okay. Just know that's okay. You can take naps, take short naps, rest. And also, just try to stay with the breath, work with it.

The resistance to sloth and torpor, as Philip so beautifully mentioned last night—that resistance actually takes so much energy. The resistance to the sloth and torpor is binding up energy that could be used to attend to the breath with the sloth and torpor in the background. So there's no need to resist it. Just let it be and see if you can stay with the breath. Aiming the attention, perhaps being a little more precise, knowing that that aiming of the attention counters that dullness of mind. Noticing the beginning of the in-breath. In the guided meditation that Sally offered, it was very much that aiming of the attention—really helpful. Noticing the beginning of the out-breath, that regular aiming of the attention, connecting, will counter that sloth and torpor.

Then the factor of vicāra, the sustaining of the attention, is understood to be the antidote to doubt. Doubt we experience in terms of doubt in ourselves, our ability to practice, doubt in the teachings, doubt in the teachers. Often when doubt is present, we're lost in thought and not connecting at all—completely lost in thought. So it's really helpful to begin to recognize doubt. For me, the main key is: if I'm thinking about the practice, doubt may be present.

If you find yourself waking up into thinking about the practice—what kind of practice should I do? How should I engage? This practice isn't right. Maybe I should do this—doubt is probably present. When doubt is present, the antidote is connecting with experience and sustaining that attention on experience. Doubt can't get its roots in the ground when the attention is sustained on an experience. So we just need to be willing, when we notice doubt is present, to find an experience—find the breath. Find the breath and see if you can stay with it. See if you can practice that sustaining of the attention.

Be willing to try this and see whether it supports you. It does take a willingness, a little bit of faith, that this will support me to let go of the doubt. And the seed of faith actually also helps to counter the doubt. So that trust, that willingness—try it and see. Run the experiment. Does this work?

The third jhānic factor of rapture is delight and joy accompanied with interest in our experience. This comes about—again, this is not something that we do—as a result of maintaining our attention, the practice of vitakka-vicāra, the aiming and sustaining of the attention. As that becomes more continuous, this quality of rapture begins to naturally arise. This quality of interest in the breath begins to arise.

Now, we can't actively do this. We cultivate rapture by cultivating the conditions for rapture. And the main conditions for rapture are the aiming and the sustaining of the attention. Then there's another aspect we can support, another condition for rapture, which is the comfortableness of the breath that we can play with. Allowing the breath to be comfortable. Finding the pleasure in the breath. Sometimes this is actually quite easily present if we're just open to it, if we just check in: Is there any pleasurable experience to be found as I'm exploring the breath? Sometimes it's quite obvious. This connection with the pleasurable quality of the breath can also support the development of this third factor of rapture. The comfortable breath is something we can actively play with.

We can approach this from two angles. We can come at it from the side of the body, actually exploring whether there are different ways we might breathe that would support the breathing becoming a little more comfortable. For some people, this is very helpful. I found this to work at times, but what was more helpful for me was to come at it from the side of the mind—basically to look at the breath and recognize that if the breath doesn't feel comfortable, something is going on. Often it meant there was a little bit of aversion or a little bit of wanting in the mind that was obstructing the pleasurable qualities of the breath. So for me, exploring it from the side of the mind proved more fruitful. Is there a way I can be comfortable with the breath? Is there a way that this breath can be comfortable?

Another way to explore this is again through the use of requests. "May the breath become comfortable." This can be surprising. This is a way I found in for myself, using these requests—the mind can be quite amenable to this. Again, it's not that we're doing it. We're simply dropping this request into the mind and body and seeing what results. It's like dropping a pebble into a pond and watching the ripples. Drop this request in: "May the breathing become comfortable," and see if the breathing shifts a little, or if the comfortable experience around the breathing shifts.

Rapture can be a very beautiful experience. It can have many physical manifestations accompanied by pleasant body sensation—tingling, goosebumps, flashes of energy, showering sensations, waves of pleasure, lightness in the body. It can also involve energetic experiences. It sounds wonderful, and people say, "Oh yes, I want that." But be careful what you wish for. The energy can become really strong at times, and it can get a little edgy or agitating as well.

Rapture often has a physical component to it. It often feels quite nice and has this aspect of interest. There's a quality of feeling nourished—the mind and body feel like they're getting what they've been asking for in a certain way. The way it's felt for me is that all my cells seem to be just drinking it up.

Because rapture can be such a strong experience, there can be a tendency for us to get pulled toward it. Someone asked a question this morning about working with pleasant experiences in meditation and how to navigate them. The sensations of rapture can be really interesting. You're experiencing waves of pleasurable, almost orgasmic feelings through the body, and it's like, "Wow, that feels really good." The breath just recedes because it feels so good to be sitting in these waves.

A couple of things are important to understand here. First, the rapture comes about because of sustaining and maintaining attention on the breath. That attention was the nourishment, the cause for rapture arising. If we take that nourishment away, we're removing the conditions that support the rapture. So one of the most helpful things to do is—much like working with the hindrances—to let the rapture be in the background and let the breath be in the foreground. Or perhaps breathe with the experience of rapture when it's very strong. Sometimes there's a sense of breathing with or breathing through the feelings of rapture, allowing them without pushing them away.

There's an interesting distinction between what happens when we allow rapture to be in the background versus allowing a hindrance to be in the background. When we bring our attention to the breath in the foreground and allow a hindrance to be in the background, generally the hindrance dissipates. When we bring the breath to the foreground and allow rapture to be in the background, generally it creates conditions for the rapture to strengthen. Maintaining attention with the breathing actually supports the rapture.

Rapture counters the hindrance of ill will. When the mind is in a state of rapt interest, it is simply not in the terrain of finding fault with things, of discovering what's wrong. The state of being happy and interested naturally opposes ill will. Now again, this is not something we can do directly, but as concentration is cultivated, as we work with vitakka and vicāra and attention is sustained, as rapture arises, ill will will start to fade. This is how we abandon the hindrance of ill will through the cultivation of concentration.

The fourth factor is sukha—happiness, contentment, sweetness. It's a mental pleasure. This quality of sukha is present with rapture, but often it's a little obscured because the energy of rapture is so much stronger. Sukha is a much more tranquil kind of experience, and so it can be overshadowed by rapture's presence. As the mind settles more, becoming a little more tranquil, the quality of sukha becomes more apparent to us.

It's a refined kind of happiness. There's an analogy in the texts that describes the distinction between rapture and happiness. It says that rapture is like the state of someone who has been walking in a desert and comes upon an oasis. Just imagine, if you've been walking in a desert for a long time, the kind of joy that would arise for you, the happiness that would come up with the idea that relief from thirst is near. That's the comparison to rapture.

The comparison for sukha is somebody who has taken a drink of the water from that oasis and is already resting in the shade of the trees. There's more of a sense that the thirst has been slaked. The mind is more at ease—there's a contentment, a relaxation and ease, a tranquility with the happiness of sukha.

Sukha is understood to counter restlessness and anxiety. As the mind becomes more tranquil and settled, more content, there's no room for that agitated energy of restlessness. Restlessness, both physical and mental, is an excess of energy, and this quality of sukha settles our energy.

We also will have a tendency to grasp at sukha because it too is very pleasant. My own expression for sukha is "oh yes." It's the "oh yes" state—like, oh, this feels really good. So we can grasp at it. Again, see if you can let it be in the background. Stay with the breath. Stay with the supports that allow these qualities to be nourished.

Then there is the fifth aspect: ekaggatā, one-pointedness or unification of mind. These two translations offer two ways of exploring and understanding this factor. One-pointedness points us to the kind of concentration that is cultivated on a single object, where the mind grows more still based on attending to one thing. Unification of mind can be understood as a broader kind of concentration where the mind is settled and stable, not whipped around by the hindrances, able to meet whatever is arising. This understanding allows us to appreciate the broader concentration, the moment-to-moment concentration.

This quality of one-pointedness or unification of mind is present whether the concentration is on a single object or whether it is stable on changing objects. I wanted to make that clear. The translation of one-pointedness sometimes makes us think this only happens when we're paying attention to one object, but this quality of mind arises in both kinds of concentration.

Ekaggatā is sometimes used as a synonym for samādhi. It's this unification of mind, this balance of mind. It contains a mind that is more stable, not reactive. Again, it's a result of sustaining the attention. Vitakka and vicāra are the ground out of which all of these other factors grow. The continuity of our mindfulness, either on one object or on changing objects, supports this quality of one-pointedness, of unification of mind, to become strong.

The mind feels balanced. It feels contented. There's no problem, nothing that we need to change. And this points to the hindrance that this factor of mind opposes, which is sense desire. When we're in this state of unification of mind, the mind is completely contented with whatever is happening. There's no need to want anything. The desire to want things falls away with that state.

As this factor begins to grow strong, as all the factors come together, we begin to get a sense of how concentration helps us to overcome all of the hindrances. It points toward a happiness that is deeper and more satisfying than our normal way of operating in the world—the normal way that we go after sense desire, trying to construct the world as we'd like it to be, finding the next hit of pleasure, getting rid of the next thing we don't want in our environment.

In the Dhammapada, the Buddha says, "If by renouncing a lesser happiness one may realize a greater happiness, let the wise one renounce the lesser, having regard for the greater."

This is what we begin to see with concentration when these factors come into balance together. As they come into balance, the hindrances fall away. We experience a kind of happiness that is much more satisfying than the happiness of getting what we want.

And we begin to realize that renouncing the happiness of sense desire helps us to move towards this deeper kind of happiness.

So this practice of exploring our minds, getting to know the hindrances, allowing them to fall away, practicing concentration, cultivating these factors—we are exploring our minds here. We're learning about our minds.

However you are engaged in this moment, whatever's happening now, that's where we start. We've said that a few times: we start where we are. If that's with a restless mind, we bring the breath through the restlessness. If we need to, we turn to the restlessness itself. If we're starting with a mind that's a little more settled, stable, and satisfied with just being with the breath—that's where we start.

There's no right or wrong. However you are engaging is supporting the practice. It's actually supporting both directions at once. Whenever we're cultivating letting go of the hindrances, we're already cultivating qualities that support the factors of jhāna. Whenever we're cultivating the factors of jhāna, we're already cultivating things that help us let go of the hindrances.

Wherever you are, however you're engaging—that is the practice.

Let's just sit for a moment and allow the words to drift away.

CHAPTER 42

Using Concentration to See Things as They Are

Andrea Fella · 1h06

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella traces the Buddha's spiritual journey to illuminate how concentration serves as a tool for liberation rather than an end in itself. She recounts how the young Siddhattha first mastered deep absorption states with his teachers, then pursued severe ascetic practices, before finally recognizing that wholesome pleasure combined with wise investigation could lead to freedom. The key insight was turning the concentrated mind toward changing experience rather than remaining absorbed in stillness.
>
> Fella distinguishes between one-pointed concentration (where mind stabilizes on a single object) and moment-to-moment concentration (where awareness remains stable while observing changing phenomena). While absorption concentration produces blissful, refined states, it is the latter form—vipassanā practice—that penetrates into the three characteristics: anicca (impermanence), dukkha (unsatisfactoriness), and anattā (not-self). She explains how ignorance actively distorts our perception, causing us to take what is impermanent as permanent, what is unreliable as a source of happiness, and what is not-self as self.
> The talk offers practical guidance for transitioning from concentration to insight practice, whether by opening awareness to the six sense doors or by attending to the changing nature of the breath itself, as taught in the Ānāpānasati Sutta. Fella emphasizes that wisdom typically develops gradually—like rope weathering on a beach—rather than through dramatic breakthrough experiences. She concludes with the Buddha's teaching that the extinction of greed, hatred, and delusion constitutes nibbāna, offering freedom from mental pain and grief visible in this very life.

Tonight I'd like to talk about how concentration fits into the overall path of Buddhist practice and how we explore turning our concentration towards insight, towards understanding, towards wisdom.

To explore this, I'd like to start by talking a little bit about the Buddha's own journey. When he was a young man, he had this sense of: why am I looking for happiness in places where it doesn't seem very reliable? Here I am, a human being, subject to aging, sickness, and death. And the ways I'm searching for happiness is in searching for connections with things that are also subject to aging, sickness, and death. So how far is that going to get me?

This was a motivating question for him. When he was about twenty-nine years old, he left his home and went in search of an answer to this question. He explored various teachings that were available in the day. There was a very vibrant spiritual scene in India at the time that the Buddha lived—many teachers teaching a lot of different tools for what they were hoping to be a form of liberation. Various teachers were proclaiming that they had found ways towards liberation, ways towards freedom. And the Buddha went in search of these people and studied with them.

The first two teachers that he met taught very deep states of concentration as a way towards freedom—freedom from the suffering that was present in the here and now. The Buddha explored these and learned very deeply these teachings of how to concentrate the mind and become very blissful, very refined states of bliss, of peace, of ease.

Given that his motivation was how to be completely free of suffering, he saw that seeking happiness in things that were subject to aging, sickness, and death—or impermanence—that wasn't the way. In his exploration of these concentration states, he found that after he emerged from them, these states themselves were subject to impermanence. And so they weren't the answer to his question. Having learned what he could learn from these teachers, he decided this is not the way.

Then he went off to practice some very severe ascetic practices, another set of practices that were available in his day. He practiced a form of concentration of breathing practice where he basically stopped the breathing. He said he stopped the breathing in his nose, his mouth, and his ears. By doing that, he experienced what he called racking pains—pains in his head, pains in his belly. He described it as if somebody with a knife was carving up his belly, or a strap being bound around his head. This was an extremely painful experience.

So he went from the bliss of the concentration to this racking pain trying to do this practice of stopping up his breathing. This is an indication for you: don't try to make your breathing stop. It doesn't lead to bliss.

The Buddha decided this doesn't seem to work very well, so maybe he'd try some other practices. He decided to stop eating, that maybe if he stopped eating, he would liberate himself from suffering. He reduced the food that he took in. He got down to one grain of rice a day. He lost a tremendous amount of weight. His description of himself is that his hair began to fall off his body—when he rubbed his limbs, his hair would come off. His backbone was like beads sticking out. When he touched his belly, he could touch his spine. Very emaciated. Here he is on the door of death, basically about ready to die, and he's like, this doesn't seem to be the way either.

At that point, just about on death's door, he seems to have a kind of reflection: what might be the way? This question comes into his mind. And what appears to him is a memory—a memory of a time when he was younger, when he was a boy, watching his father do a ritual plowing festival. His father was the local king in the area, and he was watching his father do this ritual festival. As he was observing this, sitting under the shade of a tree, he spontaneously fell into a blissful state of concentration, basically in the terrain of the first jhāna, an embodied blissful state. As he remembered that, he thought to himself: is this the way?

Then he had this recognition: yes, this is the way. Why should I be afraid of pleasure that is wholesome?

This is interesting, I think, because the very first practices he did were heading in this direction of bliss—the concentration practices he engaged in. And so this has been an interesting question for me: What did he see in that moment as the difference? Because he had been practicing with these teachers, practicing very deep states of concentration, and had decided that's not the way. And then in reflecting back, he thought, maybe this is the way. This is the way. It came to him with some certainty. This is the way.

Reading further in what happened, he nourished himself so he became healthy again. And then he began exploring the four jhana states, concentrating his mind to these states—to the depth of peace, tranquility, equanimity. And then the key here, I think, that helps us to understand what he learned or what he found or what he intuited, is this: The description in the suttas is, "I purified my mind, concentrated my mind until it was malleable, bright. And then I turned that mind to the destruction of the causes of suffering."

So he basically—I think the key piece that he recognized is that the early teachers he went to were teaching the concentration states as an end in themselves. That the states that were attained, the very deep states of concentration in which the body completely falls away, where there's no experience of body, very refined states of mental stillness and tranquility—those states themselves were not the freedom that he was looking for. But he found, or thought of, a different way of using that. Rather than using it as an end in itself, he chose to use the concentration as a tool to explore this question of: What is suffering? How is it caused? Is it possible for it to come to an end?

And so he turned his concentrated mind towards this question. This is, I think, the real key—the shift that he found, the shift that he contributed: that this concentrated mind can be used as a tool. It's not the end, but it is a very powerful tool. He said to his followers, "Cultivate concentration. One who cultivates concentration sees things as they actually are."

So concentration in our practice, in our path, in the Buddhist path, is developed and cultivated in the service of liberation, in the service of freedom. This is the direction I'd like to explore: How do we turn this concentration towards freedom? How do we use this concentration in the service of liberation?

And this for me can be very inspiring at times when I'm practicing concentration. I can get into some very beautiful states and it's kind of like, well, why am I doing this? What's this about? Why do this? What is the point? I remind myself: the point is that this supports liberation. It is in the service of liberation, and that can give me the inspiration to continue with the concentration.

So to talk about how concentration is used in the service of liberation, I'd like to review something that we've already explored a little bit. This will just be a quick review of the different kinds of concentration.

The concentration that we've been mostly encouraging and cultivating these past days has been one-pointed concentration—the concentration where we're stabilizing our mind on one object. The object becomes more and more still as we do this, and that stillness stills the mind. So the emphasis in this kind of concentration practice is in stilling the mind.

Then there is the kind of concentration that we talk about with respect to insight practice—the kind of concentration in which the mind is stable, the awareness is stable and non-reactive, but there's changing experience. The mind is non-reactive to the flow of changing experience. So there's a stability of the mind, but the objects are no longer still.

This kind of concentration, this moment-to-moment concentration, can also get very, very strong. All the jhanic factors that we've talked about are cultivated in the process of attending to experience moment after moment after moment. The continuity of awareness is what cultivates the stability of mind, rather than continuity on one object. So the mind recognizes moment after moment: seeing, body sensation, a sound, an emotion, a thought, a sight, another body sensation. It's just an endless flow, but the mind is picking up moment after moment on the changing nature of experience.

This also creates the stability of mind where the jhanic factors are all strong and the hindrances fall away. So there is that bliss of seclusion in this kind of concentration as well.

The factor of ekagata—the one-pointedness, the unification of mind—in moment-to-moment concentration is not one-pointed on a single object. Rather, the one-pointedness or stability resides in the awareness itself. The awareness is stable in that it doesn't pick up on any object and then go following it out, following with thoughts and ideas and views and opinions about it. Something arises, it arises and it's known. It passes. Another thing arises, it arises and it's known. That stability, the ekagata, is the stability of awareness itself.

This second form of concentration—the concentration that can be attentive to changing experience—is the kind of concentration that allows us to penetrate into things as they are. The Buddha made this statement: cultivate concentration, for one who cultivates concentration sees things as they are. This second kind of concentration begins to penetrate into how experience is ever-changing, ever-flowing. How that ever-flowing experience is completely unreliable as a place where we can find happiness. There's nothing we can hang onto in that flow of experience that will be the thing that will do it for us—the unreliability of experience. We see that everything happening is simply a process of change, of causes and conditions. There's no abiding, lasting anything. Nothing that we can call self, me, or mine. This kind of concentration, this moment-to-moment concentration, is the kind that can see these truths.

Absorption concentration—the concentration of stillness where the mind settles into one-pointedness—produces very blissful states, produces great stillness, and very much sharpens the mind, refining its ability to meet subtler and subtler experience. And yet the stillness that we come to in that state... the change is not so obvious there. Change is not what's happening. And so that kind of absorption concentration, while it leads to very blissful states, doesn't lead to the kind of insight that will free us.

The key thing that begins to liberate us is turning the mind towards change. As we employ concentration as a tool, we turn the concentrated mind towards changing experience. This is actually the key distinction between what we would call concentration practice and vipassana practice. In concentration practice, we are inclining the mind towards stillness. We're not inclining it towards change; we're not inclining it to see all the subtlety of the changing nature of the breath. We're inclining towards stillness, more and more stillness. In vipassana practice, we turn our attention towards change.

So this is the key distinction between concentration practice and mindfulness practice. With the concentrated mind, we can use that concentration to turn towards change. The more concentrated the mind becomes, the more refined the concentration becomes, the more clearly it can see change—if we choose to turn that concentrated mind towards change.

This is the turning that we are exploring at this point in the retreat. We've been cultivating concentration for these number of days, and in the instructions tomorrow we will offer the suggestion to begin turning this concentration we've been cultivating towards changing experience.

There are a couple of ways to explore this, which I'll mention briefly here; we'll go into them more over the coming days. One way is this: you've been cultivating your attention on the breath, staying with the breath, inclining the mind more and more towards stillness. One way to explore this turning towards change is to open up—essentially to let go of the focus on the breath and open to the six sense doors. Open to the fact that seeing is happening, hearing is happening, body sensations are happening, smelling, tasting, and all the events happening in the mind. We can open to the changing flow of experience.

This can sometimes feel a little jarring after you've been really still—to just say, well, let me let go of the breath and open to changing experience. So we can take an intermediate step if you wish. And actually, it's sufficient: the practice of mindfulness of breathing is the practice of turning the attention, the concentrated mind, from the stillness around the breathing to the changing experience of the breathing. The Buddha said this practice of mindfulness of breathing can take you all the way to liberation. But it's not going to take you all the way if you just settle into more and more and more stillness, into absorbed states of concentration. You need to turn to the changing nature of the breath, the changing nature of the mind as it meets the breath—the instructions that Temple was talking about the other day in the Anapanasati Sutta.

So we can turn and open to the flow of broad experience, or we can also open to the change of the breath and the change in the mind, how the mind changes as the breath moves, noticing how various factors arise in the mind and are cultivated. We turn towards change, allowing ourselves to begin exploring experience—whether the flow of experience across all our senses or the changing nature of the breath. And in that turning towards the changing nature of experience, the concentrated mind has the capacity to simply be with this change, to not be reactive to the change, to just witness this flow.

So it allows us to open to insight. Insight into what? What is the insight that we are exploring?

Vipassana, the term usually translated as insight, means something along the lines of —the vi part, the first syllable, Sayadaw U Pandita says means something along the lines of "various things." And the passana part means "to see clearly into." So the term vipassana means to see clearly into various things. And the various things, Sayadaw U Pandita said, that that first syllable refers to are impermanence, suffering, unreliability, and not-self. This is the terrain of insight.

To come back to the perspective from which the Buddha was asking his question—I think that's always helpful, to return to what was the Buddha's motivation, what was his aspiration, what was the direction he was coming from. His quest was: Is there an end to suffering? Is there an end to distress, dissatisfaction, unease?

He found through his exploration that the core cause of this suffering is basically wanting things to be some other way than they are. He found that this wanting things to be some other way than they are is based in three basic factors of mind: greed, aversion, and delusion.

In his exploration, studying what's happening and what's the cause of that, he reasoned: Well, if there's suffering and the cause of that is greed, aversion, and delusion, how might I bring greed, aversion, and delusion to an end? If I can bring the cause of suffering to an end, then suffering should come to an end. It was very logical.

So he began that exploration, and he found that possibility. He found the possibility for freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion. And that is enlightenment.

Maybe it doesn't sound so glorious. We think of enlightenment as floating blissful on clouds somewhere. I don't know what we think of it as—blinding flashes of light and showers of bliss, something along those lines. But no greed, no aversion, no delusion sounds pretty mundane in a way.

But here are some of the descriptions from the suttas: "The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called nibbana." Nibbana being the term for liberation, extinction of suffering.

"Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain or grief."

Imagine that. Just imagine that. No mental pain or grief. That sounds pretty good.

"This is nibbana immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

To me, that's very inspiring. Enlightenment maybe seems like some far-off thing, distant. But the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion—the possibility that this is visible in this life—that is inspiring.

So the insight into suffering, the insight into the cause of suffering, the insight into ignorance—these are the insights that we explore. Deep at the root of greed, aversion, and delusion is this ignorance.

What is this ignorance? Our usual definition of ignorance is something like not really being aware of something, not knowing something, not having some kind of information—just a kind of passive not knowing. We sometimes think about ignorance as being a passive not having some kind of information.

The ignorance that's at the root of greed, aversion, and delusion is far more insidious than a passive form of not knowing. It actually is an active way that our minds engage with the world, misunderstanding things, misinterpreting things. We walk through life confused. Because of that confusion, we think that having things will make us happy. We think that getting rid of things that we don't like will make us happy.

So this ignorance, this fundamental ignorance, distorts the way we maneuver through our lives. There are three primary distortions.

These three distortions will be familiar, as I've been mentioning them throughout. The Buddha speaks of three primary distortions, three fundamental misunderstandings that shape the way we move through life: we take what is impermanent to be permanent, we take what is unreliable as a source of happiness to be reliable, and we take what is not self to be self.

This is simply human. It's not individual or personal—it's the way we are set up as human beings. These misunderstandings are wired into our nervous system in a certain way. But fortunately, they are not hardwired. It is possible to see through them.

Taking what is impermanent to be permanent—there are several ways this happens for us. One of the most innocuous ways is that things are changing so rapidly that the very speed of change masks its presence. In our experience, in all of reality, the level of change is happening so fast that it becomes invisible.

There's an analogy given somewhere, either in the suttas or in the commentary, about impermanence. Someone holds a fire stick—a stick with fire on the end—and whirls it around in a circle. I used to do this as a child with sparklers, just whirling around in a circle. The illusion created is that a circle exists in the air, because you're moving the fire so fast that the mind creates the appearance of a continuous ring. The rapidity of movement actually generates this illusion that something solid is there, something permanent. This is one way impermanence is masked—things are changing so rapidly we don't perceive the change.

Another way impermanence is masked operates more in our psyches: we overlay concept onto experience and relate to things through those concepts. For example, place your attention in your hand for a moment. Feel your hand, feel the sensations there. Close your eyes and don't look at your hand—just feel the vibration, the pulsing, the tingling. There's a variety of changing experience. Now open your eyes and look at your hand. Think about it as a hand, what hands do. What happens to the immediacy of that sensation?

For me, the concept removes me from it. The idea of "hand" overlaid on experience distances me from its dynamic, changing nature. This is another way impermanence is masked—we place concepts onto experience and relate to the world through them.

This is very useful. We couldn't live without concepts. If we lived only in raw experience—particles of sight—and had to construct people and chairs and floors and walls every time we walked into a room, marveling at all this change, we wouldn't get very far. Concept is remarkably useful, but we need to see it for what it is. It's not solid. It is a fleeting idea. The concept itself is impermanent, unsubstantial, unreliable.

And then there's taking what is unsatisfactory to be satisfactory. Until we truly meet a spiritual practice, we go about our lives mostly trying to construct a world that suits our desires. We arrange circumstances so that we have more of what we like, less of what we don't like. Our culture has trained us to believe that having what we want, getting rid of what we don't want, is happiness.

While we see at some level that this isn't very reliable, our sense of happiness still depends on maneuvering our environment. We think, "This will keep me happy for a while. I can live with that, but then it's going to start falling apart. So what's the next thing? What can I construct next to maintain the happiness?" We believe that arranging our lives—stringing together moments of getting what we want, moments of avoiding what we don't want—is the best it gets.

That's as good as it gets.

So we are seeking happiness in inherently unreliable things. And at some level we know that. At some level we know that the happiness we're creating is unreliable. This is why we're on this hamster wheel of "what's the next thing? What's the next thing? What's the next thing?"

The Buddha discovered that this form of happiness actually keeps us tied to endless dissatisfaction. As we are constructing this world of "what's the next thing?" we're in a state of dissatisfaction. At the moment that we want something, dissatisfaction springs up. The moment there is a sense of wanting, there's an inherent sense of lack. And so we're living in a continual state of lack.

The Buddha found a different way.

Taking what is not self to be self—I'll just give an example from my own experience. Before I started practicing, I was a pretty miserable person. And I knew I was a miserable person. There would be moments when happiness would come through, but the mind would go something like, "Well, yeah, I'm happy now, but I know what I really am is miserable." I was completely identified with this miserable person. Complete belief in its reality. It was a full-blown self. That's who I was. Miserable.

Through the practice, I began to understand that this miserable person was a construct, and that miserableness was a state with causes and conditions. It comes, it goes. There's nothing inherent about that miserableness. So taking what is not self to be self—for me, that's what I was doing. I was taking this miserableness, creating a whole construct out of it, and then saying, "That's me."

We do this a lot. We do this kind of thing a lot. We take what is not self to be self.

These misunderstandings actively impact how we relate to experience. We go around believing that we can find happiness by holding onto things.

As we begin to explore our experience with a concentrated mind, as we turn towards our experience, we're basically noticing change. Turning that concentrated mind towards change, we begin to deeply, deeply understand the impermanence of experience. Nothing lasts very long. Nothing lasts for even more than a split second. Experience is ever flowing and ever changing when we drop below the level of concept.

We see this in our experience. It's a truth that we witness. We see that it's our own minds constructing this belief in permanence, this sense of permanence. We see it as a fiction—a useful fiction perhaps at times, but it is a fiction.

The concentration begins to reveal this to us. It reveals the unsatisfactory nature of experience. Because we see the changing nature of experience, we see that there's nothing we can really hold onto. There's nothing out there that would be reliable. It's all just slipping away, slipping out of our grasp. The attempt to hold onto things that are impermanent creates this dukkha, this suffering.

And we also discover—actually, one of the things we discover in terms of what we hold onto as we turn our concentration towards experience—we discover that we are holding on not to things themselves, because there's no way to hold onto things that are just changing. There's no way to hold onto them. But what we are holding onto are concepts. We are suffering over clinging to something that our own minds have created.

This is quite a revelation when we see it.

Not only is our suffering created by clinging—our own minds construct what we cling to.

Seeing into the not-self nature of experience is essentially revealed through beginning to see that things are a process. Again, it's all related back to the impermanent nature of experience. Because of impermanence, things are unreliable. In that impermanent, flowing, changing experience, there are causes and conditions. Things arise, they create causes, there are effects. The effects then create more causes, and it's just this flow. It's kind of like dominoes—you set up dominoes in a series, then tap the end one, and they just collapse. It's like that. There's a process happening in our experience, a process of cause and effect, a very lawful process of cause and effect.

The very lawfulness of that process is part of what obscures this truth of not-self. Because the lawfulness of the unfolding of experience makes us believe that there's something here, someone here that's deciding and choosing and doing.

If we explore this through the analogy of a seed growing into a tree: you plant a seed and water it. There are conditions—the water that nourishes the seed, the soil from which it can draw nutrients, the warmth of the sun. All of these conditions come together for the seed to sprout. Then more conditions have to come into play. That little sprout needs to not be walked on or trampled over or eaten by animals. More conditions need to come together for this seed to turn into a tree. If the tree is in favorable conditions, it will grow, it will age, it will unfold into a full tree. But there's no being there directing that process. It is simply a lawful unfolding based on causes and conditions. That tree comes into being or it doesn't come into being.

It's very similar with this process that we call "me." We are an unfolding of process. There's a stream of unfolding cause and condition. There's no abiding entity. And as we turn our concentrated mind to our experience, we begin to see this. We begin to see the cause-and-effect nature of our experience. We start to see how, as I turn my mind to attending to the breathing, it supports a cultivation of various conditions. So there is some kind of agency—but there's not a being there that has that agency. That agency is itself a product of causes and conditions.

We see how intention leads to results. We see something creating the arising of an intention. An example that might illustrate this: as you observe your experience, you may find you're sitting in the hall for a long period of time and there begins to be a feeling of pressure in your bladder. That feeling of pressure produces some discomfort. That discomfort produces the intention to move. The intention to move produces a movement to stand. And we're off to the bathroom. There's this unfolding. We would typically think, "Oh, I need to get up and go to the bathroom. I've decided to do this." And we impute a self to that. We impute a "me" to that—"I need to get up and go to the bathroom." But when we start to observe our experience in this way, just noticing what happens, what is arising now, what does it condition—we see it's like dominoes falling. The pressure in the bladder conditions the intention to relieve that pressure, which further conditions the intention to move, which further conditions the intention to stand. It's just cause and effect. We start to see this.

So the concentrated mind starts to reveal the truth of our experience, and this inclines us to not cling to our experience. This undermines greed, aversion, and delusion.

It undermines ignorance, because we see in direct experience the futility of trying to hold on to things—the futility of trying to arrange things to be the way we'd like them all the time.

There's a beautiful quote from a Tibetan poem: "Grasping the ungraspable, we exhaust ourselves in vain." That is what we see. We see the fact that these things are ungraspable, and we see the exhaustion that results from trying to grasp. The mind learns this very deeply and starts to let go of the greed, of the aversion. The ignorance begins to be swept clear.

These insights, in my own experience, are revealed to us gradually. I remember in some of my early retreats, I was sitting there waiting for the mind-blowing insight after which I would be liberated. And I've had a few pretty amazing insights—I could probably count them on a few fingers. But mostly my experience has been that the unfolding of this practice is gradual. Gradually beginning to see into the changing nature of experience. Gradually beginning to understand how I'm holding on to things. Wisdom develops gradually. This understanding, this sweeping away of ignorance, usually doesn't happen in one mind-blowing insight.

There's an analogy that the Buddha offers about the path of practice that I love. I love this analogy because it really speaks to how my practice feels like it's unfolded. He talks about the process of the unraveling of the way we grasp things, the way we cling to things, as being kind of like a shipwreck. There's a ship that's crashed, and all the parts of the ship are strewn on the beach—the rope, the rigging, the wood, all the various parts lying on the sand. He says the sun, the sand, the wind are like our mindfulness, our effort, our concentration, gradually wearing away at those parts of the ship.

Thinking about this analogy, I consider the rope lying on the beach. Each day, if you went out to that beach and looked at that rope, you wouldn't see much change. But come back a year later, pick up that rope, and it falls apart in your hand—because gradually, over the course of the year, it has been worn away by the water, the sun, the sand, the wind.

Our practice unfolds in a similar gradual way. We may not see how it's changing. But at some point we begin to understand, and often we can see it by looking back. Sometimes we're in a situation with a co-worker or a partner, and we've been practicing meditation for five years, and we recognize: they just said something that I know five years ago I would have flown into a rage about. And it's okay. There's not a problem here. I see that my partner is motivated by their own struggles. I don't need to take this personally. We start to see small ways in which our minds have shifted.

For me, a lot of these insights are revealed when I see that certain patterns aren't happening anymore—when the clinging and grasping simply isn't arising. I didn't actually see things fall away. It wasn't a blinding flash after which suddenly that anger was never going to happen because I had this profound insight into it. It's just a gradual letting go. And one day it's like, "Where's that anger? I can't find it."

As we cultivate concentration, I want to talk a little about how the practice of concentration supports us with insight. As we practice concentration, the mind learns a great deal. The whole process of moving into concentration—how we learn that our minds can be relaxed and attentive—involves a lot of letting go. We see how we grasp onto the breath. We learn that grasping doesn't work very well. We learn how to let go of that. There's a lot of learning around craving and clinging that happens as we work our way towards the state of concentration. We learn about what we cling to and how to release it.

A lot of you have been talking about clinging to a great sitting, wanting it back. Yes, we do that. That's part of our work here. It's not a mistake that this happens—it's very natural. And we can't simply say, "Oh, I'm not supposed to do that. Just be with the breath without clinging to that state."

We can't do that. We need to learn how to be with that grasping. Learn how to let it be. Learn how to let it go. Those tools that Sally mentioned—allowing, avoiding, accepting, attending.

We also learn from the purification process that Temple so beautifully described. As we open—and we've been talking about this in the practice discussions—as our hearts open, we move into a place where the heart is not grasping for a few moments. A place where the hindrances fall away, and it feels like everything is okay. That opening allows things that have been held, things that have been tight underneath—it gives them room to start to move. And they come up to the surface.

So this is also not a mistake. This is part of the process. One of my teachers, Michelle McDonald, talked about this rhythm of purity and purification. Purity and purification. We have moments of purity, maybe even minutes of purity. And then often the rhythm is hours of purification. Learning how to be at ease with that process is another big letting go—letting go of wanting it to be this way, letting go of our agendas, our plans, what we wanted our retreat to be. This is my retreat. This purification.

So there's a lot of letting go that happens as we move towards concentration. Then, as the mind becomes more stable, as it stabilizes and we get more of the feeling of minutes or even a whole sitting of concentration, that stability of mind can then be turned towards changing experience. This is the shift from concentration to insight. We turn our minds towards changing experience, begin to witness the flow of experience directly—inclining the mind to see into impermanence, unreliability, not-self.

I'm covering this so briefly, and we'll probably talk about it more over the coming days. So this is just the first pointing towards how we turn towards insight from concentration.

As some of us might start to move into actually deeper states of concentration, into the deeper states of jhāna, there's another way to explore. In the state of jhāna itself, there's very little change happening. That's the place where the mind really comes to stillness. So there's not a lot of change happening in the state of jhāna itself, but the state of jhāna, being an impermanent phenomenon, will fall apart at some point. And as that state falls apart, the mind is in such a state of concentration that it can turn towards looking at the impermanent phenomena that are disintegrating around the state of concentration. So essentially, we're looking at the dissolution, the disintegration, the impermanent nature of concentration itself. This is one of the ways the Buddha taught about using concentration.

My teacher Tānissaro Bhikkhu says that the concentrated mind is one of the beautiful places from which to practice insight, because the mind itself is concentrated enough and the state itself has enough conditions that have come together that we get to see, in the dissolution of that experience, how it all dissipates, how it all falls apart. We watch the way the mind lets go, deconstructs the state of concentration. So we begin to understand the ephemeral, the unreliable, the impermanent, the not-self nature of that state itself.

Mostly, our insights are impermanent. When concentration and mindfulness become balanced, we move into a place where the mind is seeing clearly. Wisdom begins to be cultivated and nourished. The mind can see into something so clearly. I'm sure many of you have had this experience of being in a state where it's just so clear—like, how can I not see this? How can I not see how impermanent things are? It's so obvious. And then an hour later, you see it's not that obvious, because the mind has changed state. The mind has moved out of that place where concentration and mindfulness are balanced and clear.

The wisdom strong.

So the balanced state itself is a result of causes and conditions. It is also impermanent. But the key thing that happens—even though we can't live in that space of insight—when you see into something so clearly, you see: "Oh my gosh, that thought, 'You're a failure'—it's just a thought. It has no meaning, no bearing on anything. It's just an arising blip of neurons." You see into that. No belief arises around that thought. And there's a sense of wonder: "Wow, I really understand something here. This thought is just a thought. It doesn't have any reality to it."

And yet, a few days later, the thought comes up: "You're a failure." And you believe it. "Oh, I'm a failure." It's not so clear anymore.

But what has happened is that we have, for a moment, seen through those misperceptions. For a moment, in our own experience, we've seen through these distortions. In a moment we've seen the impermanence, the unreliability, the not-self nature of experience. That seeing through in direct experience is something that doesn't go away. We can't necessarily live from that space and know it continuously in direct experience, but we can remind ourselves. We can use that knowledge we have gained to remind ourselves: "Okay, yes, here's this thought, 'You're a failure.' It's just a thought." That doesn't necessarily put us into the space of seeing it as just a thought, but it can offer some space, allow us to not be quite so jerked around by it.

Through these small insights, we see into how our perceptions are distorted. And that's a fundamental shift—that we have seen this. These are distortions. So even if we're looking through this lens and seeing things as distorted, we at least know: "Yes, I'm seeing things as distorted."

These insights turn our minds in the direction of non-clinging. I'll finish with a few more quotes from the Buddha—these insights toward non-clinging, freeing ourselves from ignorance, letting go of greed, aversion, and delusion. This is the perspective the sutta is pointing to:

"The extinction of greed, the extinction of hatred, the extinction of delusion. And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, and nothing remains to do."

"Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so neither forms nor sounds nor odors nor tastes nor contacts of any kind—neither the desired nor the undesired—can cause such a one to waver. Steadfast is the mind, gained is deliverance."

"This is peace. This is exquisite. The resolution of all fabrications, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbāna."

CHAPTER 43

Comfortable Breath, Comfortable Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this guided exploration of concentration practice, Andrea Fella traces the Buddha's spiritual journey from palace luxuries through severe asceticism to his pivotal memory of spontaneously entering jhāna as a child—a state of embodied ease that became the foundation for his awakening. This teaching offers a profound reframing of samādhi practice: rather than striving or transcending the body, we create conditions for concentration to arise naturally through relaxation, connection, and comfort.
>
> Fella presents the Buddha's teaching on the natural unfolding of the path, where virtue leads to non-regret, which leads to joy, rapture, tranquility, sukha (pleasure/happiness), and finally concentration—each arising without forced volition when conditions are right. She emphasizes that sukha is the proximate cause for samādhi, offering the memorable analogy of catching a slippery eel by giving it something it likes: the mind naturally inclines toward pleasure.
> The practical heart of the talk guides practitioners through three steps: relaxing body and mind, connecting with the breath, and inclining toward comfortable breathing. Fella offers both directed attention approaches and intention-based methods using gentle requests like "May the breathing become comfortable." She explores the intimate relationship between comfortable breath and comfortable mind—how each supports the other—and addresses common challenges like the breath becoming too subtle to track. Throughout, she emphasizes patience and allowing over striving, reminding us that concentration practice is about creating conditions rather than forcing states to arise.

I'd like to begin tonight by repeating something Philip said last night around listening to dharma talks and how helpful it is, particularly on a concentration retreat, to listen with the body, being in the body as you listen, and not necessarily trying to get every last little point. Having a sense of trust that you will hear that which is helpful for you in the moment. You may actually hear some things that you don't know that you hear, and you'll remember them a year later. So, not having to hold on to the talk. As Philip said, it's fine to take notes if you wish about a particular point. But a good portion of this particular talk will be almost like a guided meditation, and so I'll actually point that part out to you so that you can move into that and just follow along with the suggestions I'm asking you to explore.

The Buddha had his own journey, much as we have our journey, and his journey has something to teach us. I'd like to remind you of his story, the story of his quest, and point to some of the pieces that are particularly relevant for this retreat.

As most of you know, the Buddha was a prince and lived a life of luxury. His father was a king, and he lived in very nice conditions, had the best food, the best clothes, had a lot of sense pleasures around him. He had palaces in the hills for the hot season and basically had the best conditions for someone living in India at that time. And yet he had this question. He had an innate sense of search about his life. One of the questions was framed something like: Why am I, who am subject to aging, illness, and death, seeking happiness in what is subject to aging, illness, and death? Surely that can't be the right way to find happiness. And so he left the palace to go in search of a solution to the problem that he saw was at the core of human existence—the problem of suffering. Why do we suffer? His quest was motivated by that question: Why do we suffer, and is it possible to find an end to that suffering?

The first teachers he encountered were teaching a very deep kind of concentration practice, a kind of concentration practice in which the body disappears and you're in very refined states of quiet and still mind. He got very skilled at those practices, and both of the first two teachers he met actually invited him to be a teacher in their communities. But his quest was motivated by this question of freedom from suffering. What he saw as he explored these practices was that he could be in very blissful states of non-suffering while doing the practices, but then when he stopped, the suffering was still right there. So it wasn't answering his question. The practices they were teaching weren't answering his question, and so he left those teachers and went on to search for other teachers, other practices.

He began doing some very severe ascetic practices, mortifying the body. There was a belief among some of the people practicing at the time that if you mortified the body enough, then the soul would become free of the body, that it would essentially leave the body and be free. And so he practiced very deep ascetic practices, practices where he stopped his breathing. He said that when he stopped his breathing, he experienced deep, piercing, racking sensations throughout his body. He thought, well, let me try another way, and he kept experiencing these piercing, racking, painful sensations throughout his body. Then he decided to try not eating, thought that might be a better approach. He said he got down to one grain of rice a week. At that point, through that practice, his body got so weak—it's said that his skin became black, people were saying Gautama is dead, and he said when he touched his belly he could feel his backbone. That gives a very visceral sense of how much mortification he was undertaking with his body.

Again he found—I'll read this part to you because it's really quite a striking passage. He said: "Whatever recluses and brahmins in the past, in the present, in the future have or will experience painful, racking, piercing feelings due to striving, this that I've experienced is the utmost. There's none beyond this. But by this racking practice of austerities, I've not attained any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. Might there be another way?"

So he had the experience through the life in the palace, the life of sense pleasure, and realized that's not the way. Then he had the exploration of the deep practices of letting go of the body and hanging out in bliss for hours or even—I understand that with those practices, Philip was saying you could hang out in these deep states of concentration for three days; my understanding is that you can hang out in those states for a week. He was doing that, hanging out in those states, and yet coming out of it, he realized this isn't the way either. The austerities weren't the way.

And so he had essentially exhausted the teachings and practices of his day.

Being so undernourished and weak from his ascetic practices, he decided he needed to nourish himself again. In this process, he had a memory of being a child, a boy, watching his father in the fields performing a plowing ceremony in the spring. The story goes that he was sitting under a rose apple tree. In that time, watching his father plow the fields, the breeze was cool, he was in the shade, very relaxed and at ease—and he spontaneously entered into a deep state of concentration. Not a state of concentration beyond the body, but a state of concentration in the body, one that included pleasure in the body.

Having that memory, the thought came to him: Is that the way? Is that the path? Is that the direction to go? And it occurred to him: yes, this is the direction to go.

I'll read this part of the reflection to you also. He thought, "Why am I afraid of that pleasure that has nothing to do with sensual pleasures and unwholesome states?" And he thought, "I'm not afraid of that pleasure since it has nothing to do with sensual pleasure and unwholesome states."

And so he began nourishing his body again, getting back to a state of health, and then began exploring the practice in a new way, seeing if he could find his own way. The basis, as he saw it, was a state of concentration in the body, through the body, with pleasure in the body. Not pleasure of the senses—not coming from having things, not coming from nice food and nice clothes and having palaces on the hillside—but rather a pleasure that connects body and mind. A pleasure of the mind that resonates through the body is the way I experience it. The pleasure of mind that ripples through the body and is very pleasurable in the body.

With this teaching, I first want to explore a little about this memory he had. What are some of the key components? He's sitting under this tree, relaxing, watching his father. It's a kind of state of grace. He didn't try to enter into that state of concentration—it happened almost spontaneously. It was a state of ease, of comfort, of relaxation that allowed the arising of that state. A different approach than the striving approach he'd been using with the austerities, and a different approach than transcending the body that he had done with the other deep states of concentration.

The other piece about the use of concentration as part of the path: he asks, "Is this the way?"—this state of concentration, is this the way? He doesn't ask, "Is this the goal?" His goal, his exploration, his quest was the ending of suffering. My understanding of this reflection—"Is this the way?"—is: Is this a tool that can be used in the service of liberation? And his answer was yes. This is a tool that can be used in the service of liberation. So it's okay to cultivate happiness, pleasure, comfort, joy, and delight through this exploration of concentration. It will support us in the service of liberation.

There's a beautiful teaching that describes the natural unfolding of the path. I think this resonates quite well with his entering spontaneously into that state of concentration, so I'll read some of this to you as well.

The Buddha speaking: "For a virtuous person, one whose behavior is virtuous, no volition need be exerted: 'Let non-regret arise in me.' It is natural that non-regret arises in a virtuous person, one whose behavior is virtuous."

This non-remorse, and the happiness that comes from non-remorse, is sometimes called the bliss of blamelessness.

"For one who is without regret, no volition need be exerted: 'Let joy arise in me.' It is natural that joy arises in one without regret."

Again, this bliss of blamelessness.

"For one who is joyful, no volition need be exerted: 'Let rapture arise in me.' It is natural that rapture arises in one who is joyful. For one with a rapturous mind, no volition need be exerted: 'Let my body be tranquil.' It is natural that the body of one with a rapturous mind is tranquil. For one tranquil in body, no volition need be exerted: 'Let me feel pleasure.' It is natural that one tranquil in body feels pleasure."

Again, this pleasure of mind that impacts the body, that resonates through the body.

"For one feeling pleasure, no volition need be exerted."

Let my mind be concentrated. It is natural that the mind of one feeling pleasure is concentrated.

Now, this term for pleasure here—the Pali term is sukha, often translated as happiness. What the Buddha is saying here is essentially that happiness is the natural or proximate cause for concentration. Happiness is the proximate cause for concentration. Sukha.

When I first experienced this sukha in a really deep way, it was amazing—like the best, sweetest experience. I like the word sweet. It reminds me of sukha. Sukha sounds kind of like sugar, you know. It was just so sweet, so tranquil and sweet, both.

As I came out of that state—because while I was in the state, I was simply in the state—but in coming out of it, the mind really went, "Wow, that was amazing." And it was like, "Oh yes, I want more of that." I gave it the name in my mind: the "oh yes" state. Because that was the sense of it.

So this happiness, this sweetness and tranquility, are the proximate cause for concentration. And as the Buddha points to—I'll just read one more of these:

For one who is concentrated, no volition need be exerted. Let me know and see things as they really are. It is natural that one who is concentrated knows and sees things as they really are.

This is moving towards insight, and this is the direction the Buddha was looking: how to know and see suffering as it really is, how to know and see the cause of suffering as it really is, and the freedom that comes from that. The concentration developed in this way leads naturally to this doorway of insight.

Now, it's my understanding that when the text says "it is natural that this state follows that one," the expression is one of becoming much easier to cultivate. There's a kind of natural inclining of the mind towards concentration in one who's happy. It doesn't mean you don't have to do any work. It doesn't mean you just sit there and it happens automatically. But it is like the supporting condition. The way I see it is that with the state of happiness, concentration begins to arise, and we can then begin to support that concentration with our mindfulness and wise effort—in an easeful way, not in a way of grasping or clinging or craving.

So the supporting conditions for concentration are tranquility and happiness. How can we, in exploring our breath, find our way to calm, comfortable, happy breath? That's really the exploration I'd like to make with you tonight.

In my own practice, I talked about setting up the container of the meditation. There's the container of the center, the container of our conduct together, and then the container within our hearts and minds that allows the concentration to unfold. For me, this really includes relaxed attention. I think probably for all of us it includes this relaxed attention.

There are three steps that I explore in creating this container for concentration to deepen naturally. There is the relaxation of body and mind. There's connecting to the breath, knowing the experience of breathing. And there's an inclining or encouraging that experience of breathing to become comfortable.

What I'd like to explore with you now are some ways that I've approached these three steps. I invite you into your own experience as I continue the talk.

Setting up the container of this relaxed, connected, comfortable breath, there are a couple of different approaches. One has to do with using directed attention and conscious action, conscious choice.

Beginning with step one: consciously relaxing the body, consciously relaxing the mind. Using a body scan, for example, noticing areas where there may be tension, releasing, relaxing that tension. The relaxation of body begins to support a relaxation of mind, so as you explore that relaxation of body, you may also check in and see how it impacts your mental experience to relax the body. Particularly relaxing in areas that you may not necessarily consciously think of—sometimes areas we don't check into, like hips and buttocks. There can be tension held there.

Also inside the body—relaxing in the area of the throat, inside the throat, relaxing the heart, the organs inside the body, relaxing the stomach and the intestines. For me, as I relax inside the body, I feel a kind of softening in the mind as well.

And then, inclining perhaps to relaxing the mind, letting go of mental tension, thoughts of the past or future. As much as possible, just allowing the mind to relax.

From that place, that container of relaxed body and relaxed mind, notice that within that container of body there's breathing happening. It's already been happening. Breathing is one of those great experiences that we don't have to create—it happens. And we can begin to tune in to the breath.

Allow a connecting with the inner experience of the breath where it's clear to you, wherever it's most clear for you. There's no right place. Sometimes it can be helpful, especially early on, to have a sense of more of the body breathing, not necessarily narrowing it down. So wherever the breath, the sensations of breathing, are clear, allow the attention to connect and rest with those sensations. An inner experience of the breath. The felt sense of the breath. The breath from the inside.

Now, this is bringing a focusing quality into the mind. We are choosing an object out of the field of attention, out of the field of objects. We're choosing an object on which to connect with experience. And sometimes that choosing an object, that focusing, we can lose the relaxation a little bit. I've found a couple of ways for myself that have been particularly helpful in allowing relaxation with focusing. So play with this a little bit in your experience.

Wherever you're noticing the breath, wherever you're feeling the sensations of the breath, rather than having the sense of narrowing down the field of awareness to find the breath, see if you might be able to allow the experience of breathing to expand, to fill the awareness. So rather than having that notion of narrowing the attention, let the object, let the experience of breathing—even if it's a little centimeter of place on your physical body—let that get really big. Let the experience of breathing get big.

Because I find often with focusing, we narrow and tighten the mind. But the focusing can be allowing the experience to get big. The relief, the sense of the object, becomes quite heightened. There's a kind of sense of really seeing the texture or the relief of that experience as it gets big. It's like using the zoom lens on your camera, being able to see something closer. So that's one approach—allowing the experience to get big.

Another approach I've found helpful in terms of focusing or connecting with the experience of breathing in a smaller area is this: sometimes, especially when the breathing gets really quiet and delicate, that narrowed attention almost obliterates the actual experience or sensations in the body. It's kind of hard to touch in. So sometimes I have a sense of, okay, there's this little area I'm paying attention to. Often for me it's right at the sternum, about the size of a quarter, where the sensations are felt. But rather than narrowing the attention down to that little space, it's like I look at a bigger space. I take in the whole of my torso, only the attention is kind of still settled in the middle. So it's like having the peripheral attention allow the subtlety of that delicate experience to come into perspective.

It's kind of like looking at a faint star in the night sky. Some of you may be familiar with this experience—or if not, you can check it out. At night, if you're looking up at the stars and there's a particularly dim star in the sky, sometimes if you look right at it you can't see it. If you look just off to the side, it pops right into view. So it's that kind of exploration—not looking directly at the area that you're exploring, but just off to the side. And sometimes, oh, there's the breath. There's the experience. Explore that in your experience.

Finding yourself relaxed, the attention connecting with the sensations of breathing, the next step is exploring comfort, ease, pleasant experience in the breath—inclining towards pleasant experience in the breath.

So again, we're right now exploring the kind of conscious action, conscious intent, conscious directed attention and conscious action way into this comfortable breathing. One of the ways to explore this is to actually adjust the breathing. Experiment with the breath, connected with the breathing. Does it feel more comfortable to have the breath be long and slow right now? Perhaps extending the breath, playing with that—a long in-breath and a long out-breath. Or play with shortening the in-breath or the out-breath. Perhaps a long in-breath—and just allowing the out-breath to release.

So you can play with it, exploring what makes the breath feel more comfortable. It's okay in concentration practice to play with the breath, to alter the breath for comfort.

Typically in our mindfulness practice, we don't go this direction. With mindfulness practice, we're looking at meeting experience as it is—not altering experience for any reason or any purpose or any goal in mind. With concentration, we are trying to cultivate the pleasure. Remember, the pleasure, the sukha, supports concentration.

One of my concentration teachers, Thanissaro Bhikkhu, gives an analogy. It's kind of a funny analogy, but I think his teacher gave it to him, his Thai teacher. The analogy was: if you want to catch an eel, eels are pretty slippery—eels that run around in the rivers in Thailand. If you want to catch an eel, it's kind of hard to just reach your hand in the river and grab an eel out. It's going to slip right out of your hand. But, he said, you give the eel something it likes, and it'll go right to it. You take a jar and put some raw meat in the jar, and then the eels will go right into the jar because they like raw meat. And then you'll have your eel. So you can catch a very slippery eel by giving it something it likes.

And he said, likewise, you can catch the slippery mind by giving the slippery mind something it likes. And the slippery mind likes pleasure. So if you can find a way towards comfort in the body with the breathing, the mind will more naturally incline there. It'll be happy to go there.

In exploring this in my own concentration practice, there was a time during one particular retreat—it didn't happen on every retreat—but on one particular retreat, exploring this comfortable breath, getting to the place where the mind naturally gravitated to this comfortable breath, it ended up feeling like I had this secret relationship with the breath. It was a secret lover. It really had that feeling of being that intimate and connected. A very lovely meeting of the mind and the breath.

What we do with a lover, I think with true love, is that we love that person for their own sake, not for what they give us necessarily. This is the true mettā. And this is another exploration with the breath: can we be with the breath for the sake of the breath, rather than for a goal or anything we think we're going to get from being with the breath? That notion of breath as lover supports that.

Another way into this container: we've been exploring the tools of conscious action, directed attention. Another way in is through using intention, which we have talked about quite a bit here—using intention, inclining the mind. And this inclining of the mind can happen at each step, each of these three stages.

So again, I invite you into your experience while we go through each of these steps from another perspective.

Allow yourself to find a posture that feels alert. And in terms of connecting with the relaxation of the body, rather than consciously doing it, consciously checking in and trying to relax the body, drop in the request: May the body relax. And see what happens. Not trying to do it.

With requests, as we've talked about—I'm just restating something we've said here, but the Buddha restated himself a lot. I think we can hear these things over and over again. We're not trying to do it. We're kind of just dropping a request into the mind and body and seeing: are the mind and body willing to do this right now?

So check that out for yourself right now. May the body relax. What happens in the body with that request? May the body relax. May the mind relax.

Sometimes that actually, for me, is easier. It's like I have no idea consciously what it means to relax the mind, but when I make that request, the mind knows how to relax itself. I couldn't tell you how to do it. Sometimes the mind and body know how to accomplish things from places that we don't have conscious access to.

These requests are a way in to see: does the body and mind have some wisdom it can offer us? It won't always manifest, and you don't need to beat yourself up if it doesn't. It's just like making a request. Let's see. Let's see what happens. It's out of your control, in effect, whether it works or not. So just seeing what happens.

May the body relax. May the mind relax.

And then, rather than consciously choosing the breath, again a request: May the attention rest with the breathing. What happens if you make that request? Again, sometimes it allows a more easeful connection to the experience of breathing. If it doesn't work, you can go back to directing the attention consciously. But again, sometimes there's some wisdom in the body and mind of how to do this easefully that our conscious mind doesn't have access to.

May the attention rest with the breath. May the breathing become comfortable. Again, seeing if there's a way that the body and mind intuitively know the comfortable breath in this moment. May the breathing become comfortable, or may the breathing become easeful. May the breathing be pleasurable. Using language that resonates with you. It's important with these requests that you find language your mind is comfortable with—so exploring that piece as well.

Images can also be used in this connecting, allowing a connection more intuitively. An image I've used at times is the image of very gentle waves on the surface of water. The rising and falling of the breath being like the rising and falling of the waves. And the attention being like a float sitting on the surface of the water—neither not connected with the water floating above it, nor pushing down into it. It's just resting and very naturally riding the rhythm of the waves. You may find your own images that support you in connecting with the experience of breathing.

As we find our way to a relaxed, connected, comfortable breath, the practice of concentration begins to unfold very naturally. Essentially, concentration practice isn't about doing the concentration. It's about creating the conditions in which concentration can appear. We're watering the seeds, nourishing the soil, and allowing concentration to grow naturally. With a tree, we can't make the tree grow, but we can support the conditions by pulling the weeds, by nourishing the soil, by offering it moisture—and the tree will grow. Likewise with concentration, we nourish the conditions. And the main conditions are relaxed attention, how we connect with the breath in a relaxed way, and encouraging this sense of comfort with the breath.

As we find our way to a comfortable breath, we also find that the mind begins to get really happy, delighted, easeful. The mind gets comfortable too. The mind and body are really intimately connected, and as the body and the attention connect with a comfortable breath, the mind naturally becomes very comfortable. Likewise, if the mind becomes comfortable, easeful, at ease with experience, the breathing also naturally gravitates to comfort as well.

This was a startling recognition I had on one retreat. In one set of practices that I do, it's very much an open awareness practice where I'm cultivating a comfortable mind, able to be with whatever's happening in the moment. The main practice there, in my insight practice, is cultivating a mind that is balanced and at ease with whatever's happening—a comfortable mind. And in my concentration practice, I was cultivating a comfortable breath. At one point on a concentration retreat, I began to see how these two interweave. With a comfortable breath, it's like the mind is automatically comfortable. And I could also approach it from the side of a comfortable mind, and the breath would become comfortable. Comfortable mind, comfortable breath; comfortable breath, comfortable mind.

So we can approach this practice of concentration, this practice of creating this container, not only from the side of creating comfort in the body, but also in exploring: how can the mind be comfortable? Minds can be very different in this respect, how they find their way towards that sense of ease with what's happening in the present moment. For myself, the easiest way to approach this is through that practice of open awareness.

And at some point in my concentration retreats, I began realizing that the most skillful way for me to move into concentration was to start from that comfortable mind. I had done enough open awareness practice to find it fairly easy to move into that place where experience is simply slipping through and there's an ease in the mind with that.

From that place of a comfortable mind, at some point there would be a breath in that experience. There's a breath, and that breath was comfortable. Then I began the process of inclining the mind towards the breath. The intention in the practice was towards gathering the mind on one experience, but for me it was helpful to start with a really broad container—let the mind be comfortable and then slowly try to find my way towards a comfortable breath.

It's as though my mind was able to be relaxed when I wasn't choosing a focus, but when I chose the focus, that was when tension began to creep in. So this exploration of comfortable mind led me to investigate: How can I choose an object and still have that comfortable mind? For me, this was a back-and-forth exploration, and a huge part of it was patience.

Very often I would start with a comfortable mind, pick up on a breath, a second breath, a third breath, and by the third breath the attention was all tight again. Rather than having the agenda of "I have to stay with the breath," I was working with the comfortable mind. I would let go, go back to the place where the mind was comfortable, and try again. This going back and forth would take some time to find the way. The mind educated itself on how to be comfortable and be focused.

This exploration of how to be focused and relaxed is one we all have to make for ourselves. It may be really natural for some. I had one friend—she died a few years ago—for whom deep concentration was the most natural thing. She could put her attention on something and just rest very deeply, very relaxed. For her, the practice was being able to open up into meeting a changing flow of experience. Minds are really different along these lines, but we all need to find our way towards this ability to focus and be relaxed. For some it may be easy; for some it may take more patience.

For me, having the aspiration towards a comfortable mind—a mind with an attitude of curiosity, of interest, of kindness, of happiness, of comfort—that was how I was navigating through my experience. If I found the mind beginning to contract, I went back to where the mind could be comfortable.

You can explore this from either direction. You can explore it from comfortable mind or from comfortable breath. Both ways have worked for me. I find them useful at different times. Sometimes the mind is more willing to choose an object and hang out with that object than other times. Having a wide variety of tools at our disposal and having the discernment to know which ones are helpful at a particular time is really valuable.

As we find ourselves in this container where there is a sense of relaxed focus, we need to track that we stay in that container. Too much effort and we agitate ourselves out of the container. Too little effort and we kind of slop out of the container. It's easy to slip back into old habits of paying attention, and so that is something to keep track of—in a gentle way, in a light way. For me, it was keeping track of this ease in the body and mind, letting that be the guide for the concentration practice. Whether starting from ease of mind or starting from ease of body, that was the guide. If it got tight in the body, I wouldn't try to force the mind to stay with the breath. It's more important to find our way to that relaxed focus than it is to actually be with the breath.

We can be with the breath through an act of will, and it creates a very brittle kind of concentration. It's not very stable; it's easily broken. The concentration that comes from this relaxed meeting—that hand-on-hand quality Philip was describing—is much more stable. It's like you've got a really broad base. The concentration of will, an act of will, feels like a very narrow post, very easy to topple over.

Another way we sometimes slip out of the container happens as the practice deepens. We may find that we've been able to be present with the breath with a lot of ease and relaxation.

So really kind of easily able to stay with the breath for stretches of time, minutes or even hours. I had one time at a retreat at IMS where pretty much every time I sat down, it was really easy to be with the breath. And then one morning I sat down and the mind was all over the place. I was like, what happened to the concentration?

At that point I'd had enough experience to be curious about the wandering mind rather than judging about it. So I was like, well, when is the mind wandering? What's happening here? What's going on in the mind that it can't stay with the breath? I would start, I'd be like, yep, there's a breath, and then—poof—the mind would be gone, off into thought. And a few seconds later I'd be like, whoa, wait a minute. What happened? It just felt like the mind was slipping out all over the place.

What I noticed when I looked back at the breath was that within the space of a breath, the breath was getting so subtle that I couldn't experience the sensations anymore. That's when the mind was wandering.

My understanding of this is that as we practice, as we attend to the experience of breathing in this relaxed way, it naturally happens—and some of you have talked about this—that the experience of body falls away, the experience of breathing gets more subtle. Sometimes the breathing gets really short, just like a little wisp. And that's kind of counterintuitive when you first start to do concentration practice. We intuitively think, you know, relaxed, settled breath is a really long, deep, slow breath. But that's not what happens when the mind settles down. The breath can get really short. Almost non-existent. Very long gaps between in-breath and out-breath, between out-breath and in-breath. Very subtle.

The experience of breathing can get very subtle. And what happens at times is that we've been paying attention to our breath—this is the breath, this hand here, and this is the mind paying attention to the breath—and it's been happily meeting the experience of breathing for a while, knowing what to look for, hanging out there. And then at some point, the experience of breathing gets more subtle, more quiet. The breathing settles down. And our mindfulness, our agenda—we have a kind of agenda of mindfulness—is still looking for the sensations of breath up here. It's not seeing that the experience of breath has gotten quieter. And so the mind doesn't have anything to connect to. It can wander off. It can wander into thought. It can wander into spacing out. It can go into a kind of zoned-out place.

Part of the way that the practice of concentration, mindfulness of breathing works—and it's a beautiful practice this way—is that as the mind settles, the sensations of breathing get more subtle, which means that the mindfulness that connects to those sensations also has to get more refined. So the settling of the breath draws in and refines the ability of the mind to meet it.

I say this because that falling out of the container can sometimes happen when we've been able to connect in that container for quite a while and suddenly we see, wow, it seems like nothing's going very well. Suddenly our mind is wandering all over the place. And we may think we need to double down, make more effort, try harder. Actually, what we may need to do is relax the attention more. Because as the breathing gets more subtle, again it's that narrowing and pushing in that obliterates the experience. Relaxing and settling back, the experience of breathing can pop into view.

So sometimes paradoxically, as the sensations get more subtle, backing off and not trying as hard to find them—there they will be. In being in that container and seeing the mind wandering, don't necessarily assume anything has gone wrong. It actually may be that the breathing is settling, the practice is deepening through the breathing settling and becoming more subtle. And it's just a matter of finding a way to have the mind meet that more subtle experience.

At one point I was reporting to my teacher in Burma, "The breath is too subtle, I can't meet it." He said, "What? Just notice that it's subtle." I was like, oh, that's a thought. And so I just began using a kind of note: subtle breath is happening.

And I could stay right with it.

So patience as we go through this journey. We're not creating the concentration—we're supporting the conditions. We all have our own way through this journey. Patience, allowing, accepting where we are, accepting how that journey is for us. And being with the breath for the sake of the breath.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 44

Mettā Practice Day 4

Andrea Fella · 38 min

> In this fourth day of mettā practice during a concentration retreat, Andrea Fella continues teaching a radiating form of loving-kindness meditation learned from Bhikkhu Anālayo. This approach differs from traditional mettā by beginning with radiation rather than specific recipients, and emphasizes allowing the feeling to flow naturally rather than trying to push or expand it outward.
>
> The practice begins with relaxation and connecting to the heart center, perhaps using an image of a being that brings a smile. From there, practitioners are guided to open metaphorical 'doors' of the heart in each direction—front, right, left, back, down, and up—allowing mettā to flow through the body and beyond as far as it naturally wishes to go. Andrea emphasizes that when the mind feels tired or tense, this signals an attempt to force the expansion rather than allowing it.
>
> This form of mettā practice integrates well with breath meditation, as the field of loving-kindness can expand and contract naturally with breathing. The guided meditation concludes with all directions open simultaneously, inviting practitioners to recognize themselves as both generators and recipients of mettā within the community of meditators. This allowing quality is identified as inherent to mettā itself—an acceptance of things just as they are.

Today we'll continue the radiating metta practice that we've been exploring this retreat.

Just a couple of comments to start. As we've been saying with respect to the concentration practice, there are so many different ways into settling the mind, and each person will find their own way in that. So we offer a number of ways to explore. Likewise for the metta practice, different minds will respond to certain teachings. Some of you may find this form of the radiating metta—starting with the radiating metta—to be very natural and easeful. Others may find it challenging. This is quite natural; different ones of you would have different responses to this practice. If you have a form of metta practice that works well for you, you don't need to feel like you have to do this form that we're teaching this retreat.

Both Philip and I learned this particular form from Bhikkhu Anālayo earlier this year. We both found it to be quite interesting and a different alternative for metta. We felt we'd like to offer it during this retreat as a form that might blend more easily with the breath practice, as Philip did yesterday in the guided meditation, blending the metta with the breath. So we're exploring that this retreat. But again, if you have a different form that works for you, it's fine to use that form.

In the practice of doing this radiating metta, one of the pieces that really supported me, as Bhikkhu Anālayo described it, was not that we were trying to expand the metta outwards, but rather allowing it to flow out as far as it wishes to go. As I guide it, I will be reminding you of that. As I practice this form of metta, I find that if I'm trying to push the metta out or trying to expand it, my mind gets tired. That's a kind of reminder for me: oh right, just let it go as far as it wants to.

Finding a comfortable posture for yourself, begin with relaxation as we've been doing with the mindfulness of breathing practice. Allow the body to relax. Allow the mind to relax. Allow yourself to be just as you are in this moment.

The very allowing of yourself to be as you are is right in the field of metta. It's in the terrain of metta to have that sense of allowing yourself to be just as you are. Metta is inherently an allowing quality. It's a quality of "it's okay just the way it is."

Allow the body to relax. The mind to relax. Allow your attention to rest in the area of your heart. Just notice how it is there for you in this moment. No need for it to be any different. Allow your heart to be just as it is.

Exploring this practice of metta, it's helpful to connect with something that may support a generation of that feeling for you in a small way. It doesn't have to be major. It might help to put your hand on your heart, for instance, and have the sense of your heart held in your hands. It might be supportive to call up an image or think of a person or a being that makes you smile. Bhikkhu Anālayo said that to start this practice, he remembers these very cute squirrels in Germany. Anything that makes you smile—allow that feeling to be there.

We'll go in each direction, much as Philip did yesterday. The image I like to use: if we connect to that sense in the area of the heart, whatever is there—a feeling of allowing or friendliness, okayness, kindness—have a sense perhaps of opening the door of your heart and seeing how far that feeling in the heart wants to move to the front. No need to try to push it out. Allow it to flow if it wishes to.

In that allowing it to flow from your heart, with your heart being in the middle of your body, allow the feeling to flow first through your body, through your chest, all of the muscles and spaces and tissue in your chest and abdomen towards the front of your body. It may go out just partway through your body; let it go as far as it wants to go, allowing it to flow in whatever direction or form it wants to flow in. At some point it may find the surface of your body and begin to almost have the sense of breaking through the skin, evaporating off the surface of your body, perhaps spreading outwards into space a little bit. Just allow it to go as far as it wants to go. It may expand and contract. It may go in and out. Just be aware of how that feeling flows and moves.

Now letting go of the frontward direction for now, allow the door on the right side of the heart to open. Let the feeling of kindness, caring, friendliness, allowing, flow outwards from the heart through the right side of the body, flowing through and around the spaces, through the air element, the water element, the earth element, the fire element, flowing through the body. There may be places where it feels like the feeling flows around instead of through, and that's okay. Again, as it reaches—if it reaches—the edge of your body, notice how it moves.

ripples through the surface of the skin—perhaps a sense of it evaporating off the skin on the right side of the body, out into space, if it wants to flow out into space.

And if it ever feels tight or tense, check in and see if you're trying to push it outwards. See if you can relax and allow it to do whatever it feels like doing, this sense, this feeling of caring. Again, you may notice a pulsing quality to the field expanding outwards on the right side of your body.

If the mind wanders, just come back to that connection in the heart. You may need to recall a being that makes you smile, or something to support the quality. And then simply allow a relaxation and a flowing.

Letting go now of directing to the right. Today we'll have the next direction be allowing the doorway of the heart to open to the left, allowing the feeling to flow out from the heart through the left side of the body—all of the tissues and muscles and liquid and space on the left side of your body. Allow it to flow however, in whatever direction or form it wishes to. You might notice some directions are easier than others, and that's natural also. Allowing the metta to expand outwards past the body if it wishes to, however far it wishes to expand.

Relax. This is much more of an allowing practice than a doing practice. Honor and respect how it wishes to flow, whether it has a sense of pulsing, expanding and contracting. We don't need to have any agenda for what this field of metta does.

Letting go now of the leftward direction, envisioning allowing the door at the back of the heart to open and expand outwards through the back of the chest, through the back of the body. Allowing it to bubble off of the surface of the body if it wants to do that, flow out of the surface of the body if it wants to do that. If it helps you to use imagery of certain beings that make you smile, that's also fine as we continue allowing the metta to flow as it wishes.

Letting go of the direction to the back for the moment, allowing the door at the bottom of the heart to open and let the metta flow down through the body as it wishes to flow. No need to be in a rush in its flow. Let it take its own time, allowing the quality of friendliness, caring, allowing kindness to flow from the heart down the body. And if it wishes to flow out of the skin, allow it to do that and reach down into the earth, however far it wants to go through earth's element. Love and earth connected.

Letting go for the moment of the downwards direction. Allowing the door at the top of the heart to open and allowing whatever feeling of kindness or friendliness is present for you to flow upwards through the body, through the neck and head, if it wishes to. Allowing the flow to happen in whatever way. And if that reaches the edge of your body, allowing it to soak through the skin and release into the air, letting it flow upwards as far as it wants to—maybe a few inches, maybe quite expansive. Allowing rather than pushing.

And letting go of the upwards direction for just a moment. Allowing the doorway to the front to open. To the right, to open. To the left, to open. To the back, to open. To the bottom, to open. And to the top, to open. Allowing the metta to flow from the heart outwards through the body in all directions, however it wishes to flow, however far it wishes to flow.

Relax. Allowing yourself to abide in the middle of this field. Allowing yourself to connect with the breathing with this field. The body breathing in this field of metta. Just noticing how far outwards this field of metta wants to flow. With the breath there may be a sense of expanding and contracting of the field, and that's okay too.

And while sitting in this field, recognize that not only are you a participant in creating a field of metta, allowing it to flow outwards as far as it wishes to go—you are sitting in a field receiving metta from everyone else in the room. A community of metta. Breathing with friendliness, caring, and kindness.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 45

Concentration in the Service of Liberation

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the Buddha's teaching that wise concentration (sammā samādhi)—concentration equipped with all factors of the Noble Eightfold Path—serves as the foundation for seeing things as they truly are. She begins with the Buddha's definition of Nibbāna as the extinction of greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha), offering this as an inspiring and accessible vision of freedom available in this very life.
>
> Fella explores three layers of delusion that obscure our perception of reality. The first is simple non-awareness—being lost in thought bubbles where the mind creates and believes constructed realities. The second involves personal and societal conditioning that creates filters through which we see experience, including views about who we are and what we're capable of. The third and most fundamental layer comprises the universal human distortions: perceiving what is impermanent as permanent, what is unreliable as a source of lasting happiness, and what is not-self as self. She explains how concepts mask the rapidly changing nature of experience, making investigation beneath conceptual thinking essential.
> Through vivid personal examples—including watching wanting arise and vanish during walking meditation—Fella demonstrates how bringing wise concentration to unwholesome states allows the mind to recognize that greed and aversion themselves create suffering, not the absence of what they seek. This understanding naturally leads to letting go. She emphasizes that while we cannot force non-delusion, we can witness delusion's operation and its falling away, gradually developing clearer recognition of how our minds deceive themselves.

One of the most wonderful things about teaching retreat is getting to sit up here and look out at you over the course of the week—how you become transformed. Your faces soften, and it's really beautiful. It's really a joy.

As we've said since the very first night of this retreat, we are cultivating concentration for a purpose. I think Adrian quoted the Buddha: "Cultivate wise concentration. One who cultivates wise concentration sees things as they are." This seeing things as they are ties back to the purpose, the motivation that the Buddha had in undertaking his own journey.

The question of what the Buddha essentially saw was the basic problem of the human condition: that we struggle, that we suffer. And he wondered if it was possible to be free from that. His own journey gave him the understanding and the amazing wisdom. I think he had the most amazing mind—to be able not only to see the truth, but to understand a way to articulate it so that we could hear it. Not only to articulate it, but to describe how he explored his own mind to free his mind.

So we cultivate wise concentration, which is, as was defined a couple of times, concentration equipped with its seven requisites: wise understanding, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, and wise mindfulness. This wise concentration is essentially the interweaving of the factors of the Eightfold Path—they are present together. When wise concentration is in place, all of these factors are in place. And it supports us being able to see into this question of suffering for ourselves: to understand suffering, to understand how our minds get caught, to let go of the cause of suffering, and to realize for ourselves the freedom.

As I said this morning, the understanding of dukkha—the suffering we are looking at—is not just unpleasant experience. It's the way we resist the deep truths of things as they are. We cultivate concentration so we can see things as they are, yet we resist the truth of things as they are. We resist the truths of impermanence, unreliability, not-self. Cultivating this path, cultivating wise concentration—which in this very definition contains the path—we cultivate it to realize freedom from this resistance to things as they are. We come to think of it as coming into alignment with truth.

There are some definitions of what this freedom is in the texts. Nibbana, the Pali term for awakening, literally means something like "cooling"—which is perhaps evocative on a day like today. But this definition of freedom, of enlightenment—I would have thought it would be something really mystical. Before I really began studying, I heard this word "enlightenment" when I was a teenager. This word was in the air, and I thought, "Well, that sounds good," but I had this image or idea of what I thought it meant. And it basically didn't have anything to do with reality.

The Buddha's description of Nibbana: the extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this is called Nibbana. Now, when I read that definition, it doesn't conjure up images of floating in some mystical space. It connects me with something I can envision happening here and now: the possibility of living a life free from greed, free from hatred, free from delusion. To me, that's an inspiring definition. It doesn't sound like too many bells and whistles, but at least it sounds like it might be possible to live that.

There's a little bit more that the Buddha describes about these three—greed, hatred, delusion, sometimes called greed, aversion, delusion. The Pali terms are lobha, dosa, moha, and they're translated in different ways in the texts. Just understand they're referring to the same three terms:

"Enraptured with lust, enraged with anger, blinded by delusion, overwhelmed, with mind ensnared, one aims at one's own ruin, at the ruin of others, at the ruin of both, and experiences mental pain and grief. But if lust, anger, and delusion are given up, one aims neither at one's own ruin, nor at the ruin of others, nor at the ruin of both, and experiences no mental pain and grief. This is Nibbana—immediate, visible in this life, inviting, attractive, and comprehensible to the wise."

Here he adds a little bit more to the description of the experience of this freedom. Not just greed, aversion, and delusion given up, but experiencing no mental pain or grief. Again, a definition that could be envisioned in this very life. And as he says, this is Nibbana—immediate, visible in this life.

That's inspiring to me—that possibility of freedom in this life.

The unified and collected mind, wise concentration, essentially creates the conditions for us to find our way to this possibility. The tools of the Eightfold Path could be considered the instruments that support us in learning how to give up greed, aversion, and delusion.

Perhaps it may seem paradoxical that the path to giving up greed, aversion, and delusion lies in using this concentrated mind to witness greed arising in the mind, aversion arising in the mind, and to learn how to unmask delusion arising in the mind. The path goes through the exploration of dukkha. I think it was Joseph who said something like, "We want insight into dukkha without experiencing dukkha." And it doesn't happen that way.

So I'd like to explore these three themes of greed, aversion, and delusion, and hopefully spend most of my time exploring what it might mean to unmask delusion. Greed and aversion are more easy to understand in a way, but often I get the question: How on earth do we see delusion? I'd like to spend quite a bit of time on that particular question.

But to begin with greed and aversion: we use the concentrated mind to purify these through cultivating wholesome qualities, through abandoning unwholesome qualities, through observing greed and aversion in our minds. The very act of bringing wise concentration—which includes wise effort and wise mindfulness gathered together in this samadhi factor—bringing that quality of mind to greed or aversion has this amazing capacity to help the mind see very clearly that this state of mind of greed leads to unhappiness, leads to struggle, unease, dissatisfaction.

And the very seeing of that—because the mind also sees, as concentration is brought to the arising of greed and aversion—the mind also sees that it is doing that greed and aversion. It is actively participating in wanting things, holding on, getting rid of things we don't like. Pleasant things we want to hold on to; unpleasant things we want to get rid of. That's an activity in our minds, that greed and aversion.

The mind infused with wise concentration, when it sees that the mind itself is contributing to its own struggle, finds its way to letting go of that greed or aversion in some seemingly magical way—although it's not magical. When we bring that unified and collected mind with wise mindfulness and concentration together, when we bring that mind to unwholesome qualities arising, it leads to the conditions for those qualities of mind to appear less frequently. It's as if those unwholesome states of mind wither and shrink and can't hold up in the light of that beautiful mind filled with wise concentration.

And beautiful qualities of mind—metta, compassion, joy, equanimity, mindfulness, concentration, patience, generosity, a whole host of beautiful qualities—as we turn our mind with wise concentration towards those qualities, it tends to create the conditions for them to appear more frequently. So it's an amazing property, this unified and collected mind gathered with wise effort and wise mindfulness.

The wise concentration that we've been cultivating, the one-pointed concentration—that very practice tends to make the more obvious forms of greed and aversion fall away. Those forms based in wanting pleasant things around us, the greed and aversion based in the sense world essentially. The mind that settles in wise concentration is secluded from the hindrances of sense desire and ill will—those hindrances Adrienne talked about the other night. Secluded from all the hindrances, but in particular sense desire and ill will, which are the grosser forms of greed and aversion, the more obvious forms.

And yet as we practice concentration, subtler forms of greed and aversion will arise. You've all seen this—how the states of concentration, the peace, the ease that you have all tasted, even if only for moments here and there, how the mind wants them, wants to reach out and hold on to them, find them again. This is just part of the purification. Greed arises in the mind around this very state of mind. It's in a sense a more worthy object for desire, and yet the greed still creates suffering. This is what our mindfulness and concentration, that unified wise concentration, shows us: that as we observe greed, as we observe aversion, we see inherently that these states do not lead to well-being.

I had a demonstration of this on one early retreat—just how much the mind gets educated by witnessing greed and aversion, and how the mind begins to let go. I was doing walking meditation, and in this particular instance I was experiencing a lot of wanting while walking. I was doing the walking with my eyes really down, secluded—this is what I had been told to do. So I was being a good yogi, doing what I was told, and I was wanting to see the other people who were around me. I really, really wanted to look up every time somebody walked by. And yet I was being a good yogi, so I kept thinking, "I'm not going to look, I'm not going to look."

At some point after weeks of this—because this was on a three-month course—I thought, "Duh, maybe I should notice that there's wanting here." It took me a long time to recognize: oh, this is wanting.

This should be known. The mind, the concentration, should be applied to know that. And so I began observing the wanting. I began observing it with curiosity.

It was very interesting to watch. I still kept my eyes down, so I didn't give in to the wanting. This is really a description of the middle way—that we neither repress something nor act on it. I didn't repress the wanting, as I had been doing when I said to myself, "I'm not going to look, I'm not going to look." Nor did I act on it by actually looking up and seeing people. I kept my eyes down but began noticing the wanting. Rather than repressing it, I began to feel: How does this wanting arise? What happens?

I was doing walking meditation, often in fairly secluded places where not too many people were around. Probably I did that intentionally. And I began to notice that the wanting arose as soon as somebody came into my peripheral vision. Someone pops into my peripheral vision and—boom—there it is, the wanting. So I watched it, I felt it. It felt like a magnet. It felt like I was being pulled. It was actually quite hard not to act on it, but I just felt that feeling of being pulled toward looking at somebody.

I watched this process, and the one I particularly remember: the person walked up next to me and I was really pulled. It was like almost having to resist following through on the magnet of the eyes. It would have taken just the smallest flick of the eyes to look up. Then the person walked right in front of me—really tempting. Then they walked up the stairs, into the building, through the door. The wanting vanished as soon as the person disappeared into the building.

That was amazing to see—the wanting vanish. And in seeing the wanting vanish, the mind understood that the wanting itself was the struggle, the suffering. It wasn't not having what the wanting was asking for that was the problem. That's what wanting tries to make us believe. Aversion tries to make us believe something similar—that if we can only get rid of the thing, then that's where our happiness will lie. But what the mind deeply understood in that moment, actually the moment when the wanting vanished, it felt like my mind had been released from a vice grip. Such a feeling of release. The mind in that moment deeply understood: happiness comes from the letting go, not from the having. A very, very deep lesson.

There's quite a lot we could explore around greed and aversion in terms of observing them, but I do want to explore delusion with you. Delusion can actually arise out of greed and aversion in an interesting cycle. An aversive mind state, for instance, can create a filter through which we see experience. I'm sure many of you know what I'm talking about—when we get angry or frustrated, we start seeing the world from that perspective.

I particularly recognize this around the flavor of aversion that is impatience. If my mind experiences something and impatience arises around some situation, very frequently, in moving into other situations, that impatience carries along with me. And there starts being impatience around other experiences. Aversion and greed can create this filter on our experience so that we're seeing things through that lens—essentially seeing things from a certain perspective and not seeing things clearly, because we have this filter on.

This is a manifestation of delusion. Delusion is inherently that having a veil, having something obscuring the truth of things as they are. Greed and aversion can create those veils. And yet delusion is more fundamental than greed and aversion. While greed and aversion can create a filter that results in this veil of obscuration between reality and the mind, delusion is more fundamental. Because without delusion, greed and aversion wouldn't exist. Delusion can exist in the absence of greed and aversion, but greed and aversion always come with delusion. I'll come back to that as we go through this exploration of delusion.

So there are kind of layers of delusion, layers of obscurations that cloud or filter our meeting with reality. The most obvious layer—well, I'll just name the three layers first and then go through them from the most gross to the more subtle.

The first is a kind of not knowing, a being disconnected—mind states like uncertainty, confusion, disconnection, that kind of state of mind. Spaced out, where the mind is disconnected from experience.

Then there is delusion that comes from views, these filters that come into play, how we look at our world based on views, opinions, agendas, concepts. I would call this the kind of personal delusion. These are delusions that we have based on our personal conditioning, based on societal conditioning.

And then there's the deeper form of delusion, which is, across the board, a human phenomenon. The deeper delusions, fundamental ways that as humans we distort reality.

So those are the three levels that I'll go through.

The first: not connecting, lack of awareness. This is basically the non-mindful state. When we are not mindful, not present, there's a cloud of delusion. We may be lost in thought, lost in a thought bubble.

I had an experience of the kind of bursting of that bubble at one point that was so clear. I had been in a relationship with somebody and we had broken up years before, and I had worked through much of the—well, actually by that point I think pretty much all of the anger around the breakup of the relationship. And one day I was walking down the street and woke up into the thought bubble of being back in relationship with that person. And there was confusion in the mind. It's like, "What? Wait a minute. Am I in relationship with that person? No, no, I'm not in relationship. That was years ago."

But for the moment in that thought bubble, the mind believed it was back in that relationship. And it was easy to see in that particular instance because the anger and the disappointment and the betrayal and the resentment had all gone away. And so that world of thought that I had been born into and living in, believing its reality, didn't have the emotional charge when I woke up into it. And so I could just clearly see that the mind had created this reality that had nothing to do with truth.

This happens all the time. Our minds do this a lot. And often what happens in that moment when we wake up into that reality is that we are living in the emotional reality of that mental creation. Delusion has created a reality and our minds have bought it hook, line, and sinker and are going through the emotions of it. This is some of the power of delusion—living in an unreal world.

Shakespeare actually seemed to understand delusion. In The Tempest, there was a character that had been enchanted and he was doing some very strange things. And one of the other characters was watching him and kind of just in awe and curiosity about, "Wow, look at that guy, look at what he's doing." And he said, "This is a strange repose, to be asleep with eyes wide open, standing, speaking, moving, and yet so fast asleep."

This is a large part of our waking reality.

We can get familiar with this kind of delusion in just this very way that I described—seeing the moment of waking up, noticing that moment when the mindfulness returns. In that moment when, poof, mindfulness comes back, if concentration is fairly strong—which it can be, even if mindfulness disappears at times, the concentration can have a momentum—so we get lost in thought and mindfulness and concentration return. And if mindfulness and concentration are fairly strong, we can see the arising of that moment of awareness and recognize what a moment ago the mind was lost in, confused about. So we can see the contrast between the mind that was deluded and confused and the mind that is awake in this moment.

Often what we do in that moment when the mind wakes up, when the mind comes out of delusion, is we judge ourselves for it. Or maybe the concentration isn't quite strong enough to actually catch that moment. But it is possible to begin to cultivate an interest in that moment of mindfulness and concentration returning, and begin to learn something about that state of delusion, that state of lost, constructed reality.

And as we get familiar with even the lingering scent of that experience of being lost in a thought world, it seems to give the mind a little bit of a toehold to be able to recognize it more quickly.

It's actually even possible to wake up into certain states that we would consider inherently non-mindful. Like the state of spaced out, for instance. We might inherently consider that to be a place where mindfulness could not go. But actually we can wake up in the middle of spaced out and know it fully. What tends to happen in that moment is that it vanishes or evaporates, kind of like the fog does when the sun comes out. But we can wake up into that state and know it fully.

This is something I encourage people in—to not assume that mindfulness and concentration can't go somewhere. The mindfulness and concentration can go places, meet experiences that you would be surprised, you would be surprised how much mindfulness can see that you would think it couldn't see.

Falling asleep, watching the mind fall asleep, watching the mind go to sleep, watching the mind from waking consciousness falling asleep into a dream—into a lucid dream. It's amazing how much the mind can wake up to.

So if you're sitting in sleepiness or dullness or a spaced-out state, rather than feeling like you have to change that, this is part of the exploration of bringing concentrated mind to our experience, opening to experience. Can we open into spaced out, dull, foggy, sleepy? It is possible. It is possible.

These are the areas of lack of awareness—states of mind that tend to have lack of awareness but don't necessarily have to have lack of awareness.

Then there's the second layer of delusion: the delusion based in views, in personal conditioning. These are personal kinds of views, filters, delusions, beliefs about who we are and what we're capable of—views based in our personal conditioning, our societal conditioning. We all have views about who we are and what we're capable of. We walk around with those views, believing them, and those views limit us. We recognize this kind of limitation when it's imposed on us by other people. But we don't recognize it as easily when we impose it on ourselves. There are so many different ways this kind of thing happens.

Societal conditioning is another example. When we're told something repeatedly, we tend to believe it. For instance: "America is the land of opportunity. Anyone who works hard enough can achieve their goals." We're told that and we believe it, and many of us don't see that it's perhaps variably true for a certain population who have economic, racial, and gender privilege. This leads to a kind of delusion in our cultural realm—not seeing the privileges we're swimming in. And this is a manifestation of how delusion works: we don't see the views we're swimming in.

So it takes some education sometimes. It takes willingness to meet what's happening in our experience, and it takes willingness to confront suffering. Because suffering results from delusion.

This kind of delusion also happens based not just on being told things—not just being told, "Oh yes, this is the way it is"—which is, you know, a lot of how our neuroses get built. We're told things are this way from the time we're young and we believe them. But views and delusions also get constructed based on our own personal experience. We experience something and we create an idea about it, and then believe the idea.

The classic teaching story from the time of the Buddha is the story of the blind people and the elephant. A king asks his minister to bring some blind people and bring an elephant, and then says, "Please show the blind people the elephant." Some of the blind people are asked to touch the side of the elephant, some the legs, some the tail, some the tusks, some the ears—and each forms different views about what an elephant is. That's not terribly surprising given it came from direct experience.

The power of delusion in this story is that as the teaching goes on, when they were asked to tell each other what an elephant is like, they described it differently. One said, "The elephant is like a storeroom"—that one had touched the side of the elephant. "An elephant is like a broom"—that one had touched the tail. "An elephant is like a winnowing basket"—that one had touched the ears. "Like a rope"—that one had touched the trunk. And the story goes on that they came to blows quarreling: "An elephant is like this! An elephant is not like that!"

Based on their own experience, what they had experienced had some measure of truth, some descriptiveness—we can see how they got their descriptions. But it was based on partial experience. We create many, many views like this, and then see our reality through those views, denying that other realities could be true.

Views are going to happen. The lesson here for us is to begin to recognize when we're holding views. The Buddha said something very beautiful about truth. He said, "How do we preserve the truth?" He said we can preserve the truth when we have a certain faith by saying, "My faith is thus." We can preserve the truth by saying when we have a certain view, "My view is thus." That preserves the truth—because it acknowledges that what's happening is that there is a view arising in the mind.

But what tends to happen is that we take our views to be truth—not as a view. Views are very useful. Thoughts are useful. What we need to recognize is that they are phenomena arising in the mind. The content of those thoughts has no inherent truth to them. The truth of a view is simply that it is a phenomenon arising in the present moment. All else is speculation.

And so the exploration around this aspect of delusion is really to begin investigating our views, to look and see: Do I really know something? What do I truly know?

There is a most fundamental kind of delusion, this human delusion that we all share. The delusions based on views and opinions we form—based on who we've met, who we've talked to, what we've studied—those are personal. If you ask any ten people about climate change, you'll get different responses. Those views are constructed based on conditioning from how we've lived our life, what we've learned, who we've talked to.

But these more fundamental human delusions seem to be embedded in our psyche from the moment of birth. And these are really insidious because they cloud our perception. They fundamentally obscure reality in a very profound way.

There are three fundamental delusions like this, and these will be familiar to you—basic distortions of the way we tend to meet experience as human beings. We tend to take what is impermanent to be permanent. We tend to take what is unreliable in terms of lasting happiness as being reliable. And we tend to take what is not self as self.

These are the three core insights of insight practice that Donald spoke about last night. The insights around impermanence, suffering or unreliability, and not-self essentially counter these fundamental delusions.

One of my teachers said this kind of delusion doesn't mask our experience—it doesn't create a veil that keeps us from seeing experience, much as the first kind of delusion did. That first kind of delusion creates a veil where we're not even seeing things; we're living in a completely constructed reality. My teacher said this kind of delusion doesn't mask the object—it masks the true nature of the object.

Shakespeare put it this way. Two characters talking about another character: "He misses not much." "No, he doth but mistake the truth totally."

This is this kind of delusion. We mistake the truth totally. So we see what is impermanent as permanent.

A lot of this, as Donald mentioned last night, partly comes just from the rapidity of change. Things are changing so rapidly that our sense apparatus puts things together to make them look solid. And then we believe that solidity. It's like the movie example he talked about—the rapidity of change masks the change. Certainly particle physicists would tell you that the rapidity of particle movement means everything in reality is just rapidly moving particles, nothing stable anywhere for any split second. But things appear solid just because they're moving so fast.

Another way that impermanence is masked is through concept. Concept masks change. We create an idea in our minds and we live experience through that idea.

Some of you may have noticed this with pain—the idea of pain. And then beginning to explore what pain actually is. When we have the idea of pain, for instance a pain in our knee, it feels like a solid block. Yet when we begin to explore it, it's a lively, dynamic, changing experience where there's no one place where the pain can be pinned down. Concepts are a huge way in which our minds mask impermanence—a very powerful way that our minds mask impermanence.

Now again, concepts are really helpful. It's not easy to live in a world without concepts. I mean, if I had to come into this room each time and figure out anew that there are people out here, that this is a floor, those are walls—our minds have created this shortcut of concept to serve us in getting through our lives. But it is a shortcut, and the concept itself is not the reality.

This is part of our exploration in mindfulness practice, in wise concentration. We begin to explore experience underneath the level of concept, and we start to see the dynamic, radically changing nature of experience. This is the direction of vipassana practice—we incline toward noticing experience under the level of concept and seeing the change. Inclining toward change helps us get under the level of concept. It helps us meet this truth of impermanence. And it really helps us see that trying to hold on to anything is an exercise in futility. Clinging to anything is going to create that rope burn I talked about this morning.

So investigating what appears solid, what appears unchanging—that is worthy of investigation, worthy of bringing your wise concentration to. When something feels solid, don't take for granted that it is solid. Investigate it. Wise concentration will begin to reveal its changing nature.

Because things are impermanent, they are inherently unreliable—this is the second characteristic. The mistake we make here, believing things to be satisfactory, believing things to be reliable, is a lot of how we get ourselves stuck in trouble. We live our lives so much with this delusion that there's something out there that's going to do it for us—some sense experience, some opinion of somebody. We seek not only material things but having ideas, views, opinions. We want emotions coming from other people. We want somebody to have a certain opinion of us.

You've looked at your own minds. How reliable are your opinions and your emotions? And we want them from others. What an exercise in suffering! Oh my goodness, it's so sad.

We have this fundamental mistake—we think we know how to find happiness. We mistake completely where happiness can be found. The Buddha suggested: look at where you find happiness. Yes, having a piece of chocolate may bring happiness. I just bought a new car, and I'm exploring this happiness around the new car. I've noticed one interesting piece about this. Mostly the happiness of the new car isn't there—mostly. I've been particularly noticing this because I'm not driving it around these days. I'm mostly here. But when I walk down the hill, I walk past my new car, and there's a little moment of "Ooh, I have a new car." A little happiness there. The happiness around that seems to have to do with control—a feeling that I could create a situation, that there was the possibility of having arranged my world here for a moment. But a delivery truck could come up the hill and demolish my new car. So I don't have any control.

This illusion around happiness—the Buddha asked us to look at that happiness. He acknowledged that yes, there is happiness to be found in sense pleasure. But he said: look at it. His instruction to us was, how far does that happiness extend? How satisfying is it really? And what happens when we make that investigation is we see it's fleeting.

There's not much depth to that happiness. And yet we live our lives constructing, thinking that happiness lies in constructing the surface level of getting what I want and feeling like I have control—even for just a few moments. And then we do it again so we feel like we have control for another few moments.

So we explore this delusion by looking at the unreliability of our happiness. But we can explore it from where we are. I appreciate that this teaching invites us to start from acknowledging that yes, happiness is here. Acknowledge that, and then really see it. How satisfying is that happiness really?

The Buddha's teaching for us on cultivating wise concentration is essentially that by relying on wise concentration—he uses this phrase, "by relying on this, abandon that"—wise concentration creates a much more stable kind of happiness. It's not permanent. It is not reliable either. But it is a more reliable kind of happiness. And it helps us to let go of that really unreliable kind of happiness.

And then we bring our mindful attention—we bring our concentration and mindfulness together—to bear on that state itself, the happiness of concentration itself. And we begin to investigate. That too is impermanent. That too is unreliable. And much as I described with the letting go of the wanting, when we see the release of the wanting for the happiness of even concentration, it feels like being released from a vice grip.

I'm not going to get to the third one today—seeing what is not self as self. But I want to come back to this exploration of non-delusion. We're looking at our minds with wise concentration, beginning to explore how our minds deceive ourselves. But this opening to the truth isn't something that we can do.

Non-delusion—it's like the Buddha said: the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion is nibbāna. We can't do non-delusion. We can investigate experience, begin to see how our mind creates these filters. We can begin to recognize we're seeing through these filters. But we can't seem to say, "Oh, there's a filter there. Be gone, filter." Our minds don't let go of things quite that easily.

But we can watch it, we can witness it, and watch it perhaps at times vanish—much as I described that wanting vanishing. We see a filter vanishing and we see experience in a new way. We've seen the falling away of a delusion. In that moment, there's a moment of clarity, even if it's just partial clarity. And in that moment of seeing that release from that filter, we understand the filter a little bit. We understand how it functions in our minds, and we maybe begin to be able to recognize it more clearly the next time it comes back.

Because they do tend to come back, even after they've fallen away. Because insights are impermanent. Mostly. Insights are impermanent. They seem so obvious to us when they're there—how can I not see this? And yet delusion is so compelling and so deeply embedded in our minds that an hour later, we think, "Wow, I guess it wasn't so obvious."

But having seen experience without that delusion, there's a way in which we know we're seeing through delusion now. And that very knowledge supports us in investigating our confusion, our delusion.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 46

Ordinary

Andrea Fella · 46 min

> In this illuminating talk, Andrea Fella challenges the common expectation that meditation should produce extraordinary experiences like bliss or golden light. Instead, she points to the profound value of the ordinary—both the ordinary quality of mindfulness itself and the ordinary experiences it meets. Mindfulness, she explains, is simply the mind's natural capacity to know what's happening while it's happening, a familiar quality we often overlook until someone points it out.
>
> Fella offers practical guidance for recognizing "unprompted mindfulness"—those spontaneous moments when awareness returns after being lost in thought. These moments, she suggests, provide a direct taste of effortless awareness and reveal the contrast between being awake and being lost. She references the Abhidhamma teaching that mindfulness is the proximate cause of mindfulness, explaining how unprompted moments can spark prompted, continuous awareness. Drawing from teachings by Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she explores the knowing quality of consciousness itself—how every experience contains both the object known and the knowing of it, and how inclining toward this knowing can reveal its inherent neutrality and non-judgment.
> The talk includes the Buddha's teaching from the Mūlaka Sutta that "all things merge in the deathless," emphasizing that liberation is available through any experience at the six sense doors. Fella shares how recognizing experience as "empty phenomena rolling on" brought unexpected relief rather than the fear she had anticipated. She concludes with a beloved Tibetan poem celebrating how happiness is already present in open relaxation, inviting practitioners to trust the ordinary unfolding of experience as the very path to freedom.

When we come to meditation, sometimes we're looking for something special—bliss, joy, lovely light, golden experiences. And those things happen from time to time. But what I'd like to talk about today is kind of the opposite side of things: the ordinary, and how that ordinary can be the ground of our freedom.

I'd like to start by talking about mindfulness, which is itself a pretty ordinary quality of mind. As we've defined it, it's basically the ability of the mind to know what's happening while it's happening. It's just a basic quality of our minds. It's nothing esoteric, nothing particularly special. And it's actually recognized—it can be recognized when it's pointed out to us—but we don't consciously recognize it that often. It's like it happens to us and it's not something we've noted or paid attention to too much. So we've kind of missed it. But then when somebody points it out to us, it's like, oh yeah, I know what that is.

As an analogy around this: there are things that we experience a lot that we don't really necessarily connect with. I was having a conversation with a friend of mine one morning and I was saying, you know the sound of the mourning doves when they fly away? And she said, no, I don't know that sound. I said, oh no, you know that sound. You've heard it a hundred times. The next time you ride your bike down the road and you see mourning doves there, listen to the sound and see if you recognize it. The next day she came back to me and she said, I do know that sound. I've heard it hundreds of times. She just really hadn't connected it with the experience or with the mourning doves.

So mindfulness can be like that for us. It's actually pretty familiar to us once we start recognizing it. It actually happens to us a lot throughout the day—little small moments of it. For little split seconds we come into mindfulness and we know what's happening while it's happening. But what we typically do with that moment, when mindfulness comes into being for a split second, is that we do something with it. We act on what we've known in that moment. And we lose the possibility then of recognizing that mindfulness has come into being. Because we immediately—that's what we've actually been trained to do in our lives. You notice something, you do something with it. Or you think about it. Or you figure it out. As opposed to recognizing that the quality of mindfulness has appeared.

And why would we bother with that? It's far more important to know that we've seen a bug on the floor and to pick it up and take it out of the hall. Why would we notice that we've become mindful? So we rarely actually notice this quality of mindfulness until someone points it out and says, hey, this is important. This is a useful quality.

The Buddha did that for us. He really recognized the value of this quality of mindfulness—this ordinary quality of mind, just a natural part of how our minds work, a natural function of our consciousness. That it has this capacity to know what's happening while it's happening. I really think it was brilliant of the Buddha to recognize the value of this quality. It's such an unassuming quality. And when it just functions in the way we normally function with it, it doesn't seem very important at all, really. It was the brilliance of the Buddha to recognize that this quality, when cultivated and developed, is really powerful.

So it's worth getting to know what it feels like to be mindful. It's worth getting to know the quality of mindfulness really well.

There's an interesting teaching about mindfulness that when I first heard it I thought, how does that work? This doesn't make any sense. And this teaching is that the proximate cause of mindfulness is mindfulness. So how does that work? Partly it works because there are kind of two different ways mindfulness happens. There's one kind that's called unprompted mindfulness. And this is the kind of mindfulness that arises spontaneously when you're lost in thought and you return to mindfulness.

That moment when you return to mindfulness—that moment is unprompted mindfulness. Prompted mindfulness, on the other hand, is when you are already mindful and reminding yourself to be mindful.

So you can perhaps see how mindfulness is the proximate cause of mindfulness: it takes that unprompted mindfulness, and then, recognizing it, prompts additional moments of mindfulness. From this perspective, getting familiar with what these unprompted moments feel like, really appreciating these unprompted moments of mindfulness, is immensely helpful. It's really valuable, because that's where it begins. That's where our practice begins.

I'd like to speak for a while about what it feels like to be mindful. I'd like to propose that it's really useful to get familiar with this feeling, because when we do, those spontaneous moments of mindfulness that just happen to us—those unprompted moments—start to point themselves out to us, instead of us immediately slipping past them in order to do something with what we've noticed. As we get familiar with this feeling of mindfulness, we actually start to recognize that it happens to us far more than we thought it did.

In my own experience, I found that one of the best places to explore what mindfulness feels like was this very moment of returning. When I first started meditating, teachers would get up on the podium and say, "Feel a sense of presence. Feel a sense of presence in your experience." And I thought, what are they talking about? I had no clue what it meant to feel a sense of presence. This knowing of presence, having a sense of what it's like to be aware, was pretty obscure to me.

But then one time Joseph Goldstein said, "Get familiar with the difference between what it's like to be aware and what it's like to not be aware." And I thought, well, how do you do that? How do you know what it's like to not be aware? But then I started looking at my experience, and I discovered this moment of remembering—the moment when we remember about mindfulness, when mindfulness returns spontaneously, the unprompted moments of mindfulness. In that moment, the awareness that has come into being and the unawareness are in pretty close proximity. The mind, as it comes into awareness, has a kind of memory. It remembers. There's a lingering flavor of what it felt like to not be aware.

So I began exploring that moment. I began exploring that moment of coming back into awareness, which I have mentioned as being an important moment to recognize. And here's another reason why it's so important: first of all, because you're mindful—you're already mindful in that moment that you've remembered. Whatever you've woken up into, you're already mindful. It's important because it can begin to give you a sense of the difference between being awake and aware versus being lost in thought. In that moment, there can be the beginning of a recognition of what mindfulness feels like. At least for me, this was a very important exploration—starting to get familiar with that moment, seeing if I could kind of contrast it. And this wasn't a lot of doing; it's more like simply asking, what does it feel like now to be aware? And at the same time, within that awareness, there is a kind of automatic lingering memory of what it was like before, when the mind was dull, foggy, lost in thought.

In this way, by exploring that moment, my mind began to educate itself around what awareness feels like, what it feels like to be present, what it feels like to be awake. This can happen not only in our sitting practice, although sitting is a great place to explore this.

Another reason why this moment is so important is because it is unprompted mindfulness. It takes no effort whatsoever for that moment of mindfulness to appear. Prompted mindfulness, on the other hand, requires some effort. But that moment of unprompted mindfulness, just arising spontaneously—it's effortless. You didn't have to do a thing to have it happen. And as you begin to touch into that moment, you get a sense of the natural quality, the possibility of a very natural awareness that doesn't take any effort at all. So again, that's another reason why this moment is so helpful to get familiar with: it reveals the natural quality of awareness, of mindfulness, and the possibility for natural awareness.

When we start prompting mindfulness—and it is necessary to prompt it, necessary to remind ourselves to be mindful in order to cultivate mindfulness—our agendas start getting in the way. And so this moment when we spontaneously come into mindfulness from being lost in thought is a real pointer to what mindfulness can feel like, what a very natural mindfulness can feel like.

Unfortunately, in that moment, we usually immediately start beating ourselves up because we have been lost in thought, and we lose our opportunity for these explorations. For myself, when I really started inquiring into this moment, it really cut into that judging mind. Anytime my mind got lost in thought and I woke up again: "Oh good, here's another opportunity to see this effortless mindfulness."

I offer this to you as an exploration.

We can also notice this phenomenon in the midst of our daily activities—just walking around, in the dining hall. This falls more into the informal areas of meditation. We have our formal practice time of sitting and walking, and our informal practice times. During the informal times, our goal is to be mindful all day long, but it seems to me, in my own experience and in talking to people, that when we're at meals, when we're going to our rooms, when we're putting on our shoes, we tend to be a little less intentional around the practice. It can be a little less fruitful in a way.

This is why we suggest the bells at two o'clock and at six-thirty, to kind of delineate these informal times from the formal times. It's not that we're really taking a break during the informal times, but something about the intentionality of formal practice supports the cultivation of these qualities.

Yet in our informal practice times, we actually get more opportunity to recognize this moment of waking up, precisely because we're not being so intentional about putting the effort in. So use that time as a time to explore this moment of remembering. This moment of, "Oh, I'm reaching for a glass and I'm noticing my arm just kind of magically moving through the air." You don't have to stop. You don't have to do a thing. You just notice mindfulness has arisen and you're noticing what's happening, kind of without missing a beat. The mindfulness just automatically lands on what's happening. It's like a light comes on.

See if you can get familiar with what this feels like.

Now I do have to say that in the initial explorations, it's not going to feel like a light comes on—not quite like that, probably. There seems to be this lag between mindfulness returning and our recognizing consciously that mindfulness has returned. It's kind of like coming out of the mud.

The way I understand it from the Abhidhamma perspective, in terms of how the mind functions, the mind is set to function in all these very small moments of experience. A mind moment can either be mindful or not mindful. And mind moments are really, really tiny—like seventeen trillion mind moments in the blink of an eye, or some fantastic number like that. Really, really tiny, these mind moments.

In any single mind moment, you can be mindful or not mindful. So it's kind of like mindfulness returns for a mind moment or two, and then it's not there for fifty mind moments, and then it's there for a moment or two, and then it's not there. It takes enough mind moments of mindfulness before we recognize it consciously. Something like that—it's my own model of it.

So it feels like we're coming out of the mud, and initially it may be that it's not quite such a clear distinction between awareness and non-awareness. But just keep playing with it. My exploration around this was: What's the earliest I can recognize that I'm back?

When we leap on and start judging, that's when you've become mindful—you've become mindful enough to know that you're back—but then you start judging, and so you've lost the mindfulness again. Part of the exploration is around really letting go of that judgment so you can just meet that moment of effortless mindfulness as it returns. This moment happens to all of us all the time. It's a great place to explore.

As we get familiar with what it feels like—what this ordinary quality of mindfulness feels like, what it feels like to be awake—we begin to appreciate the value of mindfulness. Its value becomes more clear to us. Partly because in the moment of mindfulness coming back, when there's enough of it, mindfulness naturally opposes greed, aversion, and delusion. As we start to see that, we really recognize clearly how valuable it is to be mindful.

That's something about the ordinariness of mindfulness, and yet how amazing it is when we recognize it, how valuable it is. It's ordinary but really valuable. It's ordinary, but the key to our liberation.

And then there's the experience that mindfulness meets. There's seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, things going through the mind, emotions, thoughts. All of our experience can be understood as coming through what are called the six sense doors—which include the five usual sense bases of seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, and the sense base of the mind. Everything we experience comes through one of these sense doors. That's all that's happening. All that's happening to us all day long. Pretty ordinary.

We happen to like certain configurations of those six things better than other configurations of those six things.

We like the configuration that contains bliss far better than we like the configuration that contains pain. And we tend to think that the configuration containing ordinary seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching is somehow unimportant.

But for the purposes of mindfulness, for the purposes of waking up, for the purposes of liberation, it makes no difference what's going on in those six sense spaces. The important quality is to be aware of what is going on in those six sense spaces. It does not matter what we are paying attention to. It really does not matter.

So from this perspective, ordinary experience—the ordinariness of walking through the woods or going to the grocery store—is the ground for our waking up.

This reminds me of a story from sitting with Sayadaw U Tejaniya. There was one time in one of our group interviews where one of the people in our group was a monk, and he had gone off to the Shwedagon Pagoda one day to circumambulate and meditate there. It's a beautiful place in Rangoon. He came back and was saying how great it was: "I really recommend going to Shwedagon. It was fabulous—such wonderful mindfulness I had there. My mindfulness was clear and I was meditating all day. It was just so clear."

Sayadaw U Tejaniya's response was: "Shwedagon is a good place to be mindful. So is the supermarket."

No difference. Doesn't matter.

The Buddha pointed to this. There's a sutta I'll read to you called "The Roots of Everything." He says: "All things are rooted in desire. They come to actual existence through attention, originate from contact, and converge on feelings. The foremost of all things is concentration. All things are mastered by mindfulness, their peak is wisdom, their essence liberation. All things merge in the deathless and Nibbana is their culmination."

Nibbana meaning freedom, liberation. That's all things he's talking about. It's not just states of bliss that merge in liberation—all things. There's no part of our normal everyday experience that is not worth paying attention to. The very ordinariness of our experience can be the place where we wake up.

Meeting these experiences at the six sense bases—seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching—we start to see, with mindfulness becoming continuous, that the whole show is a process. It's just a flow of changing causes and conditions. Seeing appears and disappears, hearing appears and disappears. It's just a flow of phenomena.

Munindra, one of our teacher's teachers, had this phrase: "Empty phenomena rolling on." Just seeing, just hearing, just smelling, just tasting, just things in the mind rolling on. We see the impersonal nature of this. It doesn't have to be special seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching. Any seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching will do to point out this impersonal nature of our experience.

And this recognition of the impersonal nature of our experience—that it is just a process, that there's no one particularly here doing anything—this recognition really begins to free us. Because our suffering, the way that we struggle, is all bound up with there being someone who suffers.

This teaching on not-self, which I'm not going to talk about much today—one could talk about it for weeks—but I will say one thing. When I first heard about it, it felt like a foreign concept. It sounded strange, and it sounded kind of scary. No self? Who's doing anything? It felt threatening, in a way, to hear about this teaching.

And then on one three-month retreat, I began to have my first taste of seeing just the process of life unfolding—touching into that sense that there's no one here doing anything, it's just happening. That experience was a relief.

It was not threatening. It was not scary. It was a huge relief. It came as a kind of surprise to me that this thing, this idea I had in my mind—this "not self" thing that sounded like it was going to be so scary to meet—turned out to be such a relief. I came back and reported this to one of my teachers, and he quoted what I think is a Zen saying: "No self, no problem."

Through our sense doors, every experience we have has two sides to it. There's the thing that we know—the sight, the sound, the smell, the taste, the touch, the thought, the emotion. And there's the knowing quality. There's the thing and the knowing of it. The sight and the knowing of it. The smell and the knowing of it. Every experience has that. Whether or not we're mindful, there is this knowing quality. It's called consciousness in the Buddhist psychology. So every sense experience has this consciousness to it.

It's usually easier for us to be mindful of the thing—the sight, the sound, the smell, the taste, the touch—than it is to be aware of or familiar with the knowing aspect. But it can be helpful to start getting familiar with this knowing aspect. Because this knowing quality, basically one of its functions, one of the functions of the mind, is just to know things. That's its job. It just takes things in and it knows them. It doesn't care what it knows. It doesn't have any opinions or views about what it knows. It just knows. That's its job. And so, kind of inherently embedded in this quality of knowing is non-judgment, acceptance, clarity. Starting to get familiar with this knowing aspect of our experience begins to connect us with some of these qualities that it embodies.

So how do we learn to touch into this knowing quality? It's not obvious. It's even less obvious than mindfulness, than being aware of mindfulness. There are a few things I can say about this. It's kind of indirect in a way. We know the knowing because it knows something.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya said one day, "I've been trying to think of a good analogy about knowing, how we see the knowing." He said it's kind of like wearing glasses and looking through glasses. Those of you who wear glasses—this will perhaps be a visceral experience. Usually when we have our glasses on, we're looking at the world. We're not so aware of the glasses; we're aware of what we're seeing. But the whole way we're able to see is because of the glasses. And we can kind of get a sense that the glasses are there. We take them off and we see, "Wow, can't see a thing." Then we can see. So we can begin to infer what the glasses are through how they function. It's kind of like that with the knowing. We get familiar with it through what it does, through the process that it engages with.

So here are a few ways to start teasing your way through those two pieces—the thing and the knowing of it. For me, the first place I began to be aware of this difference between these two was when I was experiencing something difficult. This happened on one self-retreat I did, and I was experiencing aversion. I was hanging out, paying attention to the aversion, noticing the unpleasantness of the aversion. At some point I realized that there were two things going on in my mind. There was the aversion and there was the knowing of the aversion. I began kind of exploring through using the noting practice—this was using the noting practice—"Aversion is known. Knowing aversion." When I inclined my mind in that way, toward the knowing of the aversion, the experience became neutral. It was no longer unpleasant, because knowing is neutral.

It is inherently neutral.

For me, this exploration has been particularly valuable when something is difficult or challenging—when there's a difficult state of mind. If you can be with it, if you can hang out with it without too much resistance, just hanging out with aversion or hanging out with unpleasant pain, if you can remain without reactivity, just being present with that... In that space, if you can incline your mind towards what does it mean to know aversion, you might get a flavor of the neutrality of the knowing. It was quite interesting—like flipping a switch. I could go back and forth: aversion, unpleasant; knowing aversion, neutral.

So that's one way to explore this quality of knowing.

Another approach is through the question "Am I aware?"—the question that Sayadaw U Tejaniya recommends. He suggests, "Am I aware? What am I aware of?" Those two questions reflect the knowing and the object. The orientation toward asking "Am I aware?" orients us toward recognizing what awareness actually is. So in asking that question, don't just jump over it. Hang out for a moment. Am I aware? What is the obvious experience there? Don't try to figure it out. This is not something to think through. But with this exploration over time, it may start to become clear to you what the difference is between "Am I aware?" and "What am I aware of?"

Sayadaw U Tejaniya suggested something helpful when I was saying I had trouble distinguishing between the knowing and the object. It wasn't clear to me; it was hard to place my mind in just knowing any experience. He said, "Well, you don't try to do that." This is again something he says over and over: the things I tell you aren't something to do. We hear what he says, we go off and try to do them. He said, "Just notice when your mind is paying attention to the object and when it's paying attention to the knowing."

Now, until you start to get familiar with the knowing a little bit, that's going to be not so easy to recognize. But the mind kind of naturally does both. From time to time it lands on the object and knows the qualities of the object—it knows the hardness, the pressure, the heat, the tension, the coolness. It knows the pitch and tone of sound. It knows the color and form of seeing. And from time to time, it becomes aware of the knowing of the object. The mind will do that. So it's really about attuning yourself to what the mind is already recognizing.

That's a little more subtle.

Another place to check into this is when your experience is really, really ordinary. You're brushing your teeth, you're putting your shoes on. It's like, what is there to pay attention to here? We can dive into trying to feel the pressure and tension and tightness; we can dive into the objects. But in times when experience is pretty neutral, that's actually an interesting moment to ask yourself, "What does it feel like to be aware of this?" When we're caught in something difficult, sometimes it can be hard to ask that question. When things are really blissful, we don't want to ask that question. But when things are neutral—just walking through the woods, or scooping out your rice, or brushing your teeth, or lying down in your bed—what does it feel like to be aware of this?

Now, don't try to figure out what that knowing feels like. This is just a question to prompt the mind to explore a little bit, but it's not something to think about. The use of questions is kind of an art form in a way—just dropping that question into the pool and seeing what the ripple effects are. Drop the question: What is it like to be aware of this? It may be that your experience points out to you what awareness is. Maybe not. But you can explore that.

A kind of state of mind that I stumbled into on one three-month retreat some years ago.

In my previous retreats, I had been really focusing on very detailed mindfulness in the Mahasi style, which tends to create certain mind states. It tends to create very precise awareness of arising and passing, of just little particles of experience. And I thought that's what mindfulness was—that's what it meant to be mindful, to get down to where you could see every single moment of reticulated experience as you move your hand.

On this particular retreat, I couldn't do sitting meditation anymore because of a problem with my back, and I couldn't do slow walking anymore for the same reason. So I was walking fast and doing lying meditation, and the Mahasi style didn't work very well. I found myself doing a completely different style, a much more open, relaxed style of practice. I hadn't met Tejaniya yet, but I was doing a style very much like what he teaches.

I began stumbling into this state of mind that was just present, alert, clear—but completely ordinary consciousness. It was quite interesting to me. I didn't know I could be completely mindful and have perception and consciousness feel just ordinary. It was completely ordinary, and yet it felt extraordinary.

The reason it felt extraordinary is because there's a continuity of mindfulness happening, a continuity that allows the clarity of connecting with just whatever you're paying attention to. In that case, it was simply walking through the woods or going up the stairs—completely ordinary perception. Just knowing I'm walking up the stairs, walking up the stairs, knowing I'm walking up the stairs. Walking in the woods, knowing I'm walking in the woods. It wasn't a detailed, precise mindfulness. It was completely clear. Just ordinary. Very ordinary.

I began calling it "ordinary mind" for myself, and have since learned that this is how the Tibetans describe a state of very clear mindful awareness—ordinary mind. I think the reason it feels extraordinary is because there is that continuity of mindfulness. Continuity of mindfulness means that greed, aversion, and delusion have fallen away. In that state, there's a kind of concentration called the bliss of seclusion—the bliss of being secluded from the hindrances, from reactivity. It feels quite good.

This ordinary state of mind is a place where we can live from. That reticulated mindfulness—you can't live in that space. You can't drive down the freeway with things breaking into bits. But this state of ordinary clear awareness you can engage in the world with. And the qualities of knowing become apparent in that state: non-judgmental, accepting, clear, brilliant. The Buddha used words like radiant and luminous to describe the mind.

There's a Tibetan poet I'd like to share with you. He really celebrates this—a lot of what I've been talking about. He celebrates the ordinariness, the spontaneity, the ease with which we can connect with experience. Many of you have heard this, I'm sure. I've heard it hundreds of times, and I never get tired of hearing it.

Happiness cannot be found through great effort and willpower, but is already present in open relaxation and letting go.

Don't strain yourself. There's nothing to do or undo. Whatever momentarily arises in the body-mind has no real importance at all, has little reality whatsoever. Why identify with and become attached to it, passing judgment upon it and ourselves?

Far better to let the entire game happen on its own, springing up and falling back like waves, without changing or manipulating anything. And notice how everything vanishes and reappears magically, again and again, time without end.

Only our searching for happiness prevents us from seeing it. It's like a vivid rainbow which you pursue without ever catching, or a dog chasing its own tail.

Although peace and happiness do not exist as an actual thing or place, it is always available and accompanies you every instant.

Don't believe in the reality of good and bad experiences. They're like today's ephemeral weather, like rainbows in the sky.

Wanting to grasp the ungraspable, you exhaust yourself in vain. As soon as you open and relax this tight fist of grasping, infinite space is there—open, inviting, and comfortable.

Make use of this spaciousness, this freedom and natural ease. Don't search any further looking for the great awakened elephant who's already resting quietly at home in front of your own hearth.

Nothing to do or undo, nothing to force, nothing to want, and nothing missing.

Marvelous. Everything happens by itself.

Let's sit for just a moment.

CHAPTER 47

The Present Moment

Andrea Fella · 59 min

> In this dharma talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of why present-moment awareness is so central to Buddhist practice. She begins with a verse repeated four times in the suttas, emphasizing that the past has been left behind and the future has not been reached—only the presently arisen state can be known with insight.
>
> Fella illuminates how our suffering is actually created in the present moment through reactive patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion. She explains that memories of the past and projections of the future are themselves thoughts arising now, and our reactions to these thoughts generate unnecessary dukkha. Through mindfulness, we can witness this process directly and discover that the reactivity is optional—that a memory need not automatically trigger embarrassment, nor does physical pain require the "second dart" of mental resistance.
> The talk offers practical guidance on working with difficult emotions, comparing the process to taking one's foot off the gas pedal—by turning attention to the feeling itself rather than feeding thoughts, we allow impermanence to naturally dissolve what seemed solid. Fella describes how mindfulness simultaneously weakens unwholesome states while strengthening wholesome qualities like mettā and compassion. She also explores how sustained present-moment awareness leads to concentration (samādhi), which brings well-being and creates conditions for insight into impermanence. The present moment, she concludes, is the only place where choice is possible—where we can notice intention before action and potentially choose a more skillful response.

So tonight I want to talk about the present moment and why we spend so much time talking about it and trying to pay attention to it.

Sometimes it seems like we endlessly talk about the present moment, and after a day of coming back to the body, coming back to the breath over and over again—even when we've done it for a while—we can start to wonder, why am I doing this? What does this have to do with anything anyway?

To start this exploration of the present moment, I'd like to begin by reading a poem from the Buddha. I find this an interesting poem to look at and reflect on because it's repeated four times in the suttas. In a couple of those instances, the discourse where this poem appears begins with a monk and a deity having a conversation that goes something like, "Do you remember that poem the Buddha told us to reflect on?" And the other one says, "No, do you remember that poem?" "No." "Well, maybe we should go ask about it." So you kind of get the sense that this is a poem they were encouraged to memorize, to reflect on:

Let not one revive the past or on the future build one's hopes.
For the past has been left behind and the future has not been reached.
Instead, with insight let one see each presently arisen state.
Let one know that and be sure of it,
invincibly, unshakably.
Today the effort must be made.
Tomorrow, death may come, who knows.
No bargain with mortality can keep him and his hordes away.
But one who dwells thus ardently, relentlessly by day, by night,
is one, the peaceful sage has said,
who has had a single excellent night.

So he's stressing here coming into the present, letting go of the past, letting go of the future, and coming into the present. I'll talk about that in some more detail, but first I want to share something I found—a Peanuts cartoon that to me is kind of like a commentary on this poem.

Lucy and Charlie Brown are sitting at the wall, hanging out in the afternoon, looking over the wall. And Lucy says to Charlie Brown, "Do you realize how many great moments in life are wasted? Take, for instance, the great moment that's coming up right now. Bang, it's gone, you've just wasted it." And Charlie Brown responds, "Well, you're a lot of fun to be around."

Like any good humor, there's truth on both sides of that. We do waste our moments by not being present for them. We waste so many of our moments by being lost in the past and being caught up fantasizing, thinking about the future. And yet on the other hand, Lucy's idea of what wasting a moment is seems to imply that there's something special that needs to be happening—whereas Charlie Brown is content hanging out and looking over the wall. Not a problem to hang out and look over the wall.

We tend to revive the past and project into the future. We do this endlessly. What is the past when we actually look at it? The past is thoughts that are arising now in the present moment. And we are in a kind of thought world, a thought bubble around that past. So we're lost, we're not connected to what's actually happening here and now. We are reflecting back and living in that world of the past.

Or the future. Even more of an exercise in futility in a way is spending our time projecting forward into what the future might be. Not to say that we can't plan and think about what we're going to do, but we spend an inordinate amount of time actually going over scenarios. What's going to happen if they say that? Well, then I'll respond this way. What's going to happen if they say that other thing? Well, then I'll respond that way.

I've spent so much of my life thinking about the future that never appeared. Even when I had planned out every possible scenario and thought, okay, that's what's going to happen, that's what I'm going to do—if that situation actually did happen, I rarely could do the thing that I thought I was going to do. We just cannot really predict how we're going to respond in a moment when we actually get there.

So these activities of mind, these thoughts, they're all just thoughts arising in the present moment. But we don't see them as that. We see them somehow as actually being the past and actually being the future—if not the actual future, possible futures.

If we're not actually here, present, we miss our lives. I spent so much time both looking back with regret, thinking back on the past, wishing I'd done this or said that, trying to revive the past and live it over again differently so that I wouldn't be experiencing something painful here and now. Or projecting, often with fear, into the future.

I remember one time I was having some struggle with my boyfriend. I came up with this whole scenario: well, he's going to do that, and then I'm going to get really mad at him. He never did that. It was all just fantasy, all just projection. And so much of our suffering actually happens over reviving the past and projecting into the future. I suffered a lot over that fantasy. I didn't need to suffer over that. It never happened.

So if we're not mindful of what's happening here and now, we're actually missing our lives. There's that sense of—bang, it's gone, you've wasted it. Never again is this moment going to be here. Every moment is new, every moment is fresh. And if we're lost in the past or lost in the future, we miss our lives.

That's one reason to be in the present moment: it's the only place anything ever happens. Including the past and the future. The past and the future happen here and now in our thoughts, in our minds. What we think of as past happens here and now. What we think of as future happens here and now.

Another helpful understanding about the present moment is that it's actually in the present moment that our struggles are created. We react to our experience. A thought arises now, and we may react to that thought. We think of something we wish we'd done or hadn't done. There's regret arising. What's actually happening is that there's a thought arising in the present moment, and then there's a reaction to that thought. Often that thought has a kind of unpleasantness associated with it—I wish I hadn't been the kind of person who said that thing. And so we regret that. There's the arising of that memory, the construction of that identity: I'm the person who said that, and I didn't like that person. And then we suffer over that. That regret arises now. It's arising here and now.

We sometimes think about our suffering over the past as something we carry around with us, like baggage that's always weighing us down. There is a kind of baggage there. The memory is there, and there's a tendency to have reactions around that memory—a memory of something that happened and a feeling of embarrassment. Often it feels as if these things are inextricably intertwined, that there's no way that memory can arise without embarrassment arising. It feels as if the embarrassment is lurking underneath the surface, just waiting to pop up.

But actually, when we start to explore in the present moment what happens, we see that the memory arises, the reaction to that memory arises, and then the embarrassment arises. It actually happens in sequence. And it's not necessarily the case that those two are inextricably intertwined. There's a habit of going from that memory to embarrassment—a very strong pattern, a strong habit.

And yet, it does not have to be that way. That memory can arise and we can simply see it as an arising memory. "Oh, there's that memory." When we see it arising, when we see the memory coming up as just a thought and don't create the identity around the person who did that in the past or was in that situation in the past—when we just notice, "Oh, there's a thought"—then there's the possibility of seeing that it is just a thought, and there doesn't need to be the follow-on reaction to it.

So much of our suffering is created like this. Thoughts arising about the past, thoughts arising about the future, and we react to those thoughts. And then there are things happening in the present moment that we react to as well. Physical pain, for instance, is one way that we often get reactive. Unpleasant experience in the body—we often react to this. And again, this is a very habitual kind of experience. When there's pain in the body, we don't like it, we don't want it, we want to get rid of it. We may feel like we don't have control over it, and there's a struggle, a feeling of being combative with that physical unpleasantness.

From the Buddha's perspective in the teachings around this, he talks about how it's as if we, having been struck by a dart—an arrow—then pick up another arrow and strike ourselves again. Because we have this initial sense of physical pain, that first arrow. But then we get reactive to it. We don't like it, we don't want it, we want to get rid of it, we want to fix it, change it, control it. That's the second dart, and it becomes a feedback loop whereby that pain just escalates—the mental pain compounding the physical pain.

These things happen in the present moment. This process happens in the present moment. And by being mindful, being present in the present moment, we have an opportunity not only to witness this process, but through witnessing it with mindfulness, we can sometimes choose differently.

The reactive mind basically wants things to be other than they are right now. Our reactive mind is essentially out of alignment with the way things are here and now in this moment. And if you reflect on this a little bit, you know, this is the situation we're in right now. Things have happened in the past; causes and conditions have come together to put us into whatever situation we're in right now. It is here. Whatever situation it is—pleasant, unpleasant, whatever experience we're having—is already happening. And so often we fight against that experience that's already happening. We hate it, we have aversion to it. Or we really like it and we want to hold on to it, and we experience fear around the thought of it going away.

So that situation here and now is just what's happening. And I'm not saying that all we do is sit here and not try to take action. But the aversion, the wanting to hold on—those are extra. And they create a mental stress, a mental suffering, a sense of dissatisfaction that's extra in our experience. It's not necessary. We can experience something unpleasant and take action. We cut our finger with a knife and we can bind it up without feeling angry at ourselves for having cut ourselves. That's just a simple example, but that's the kind of thing we do over and over again. We rail against things as they are. And that very railing against is the suffering, is the stress, is the dissatisfaction.

There's another way of relating to our experience. The Buddha suggests mindfulness as another way to relate to our experience in the present moment. When we notice that we are battling with things as they are, battling with the present moment, the Buddha said, "This is suffering, this battling with the present moment." And what we need to do with that suffering is understand it. Not understand it intellectually—he's not talking about thinking about it—but a direct experiencing of that suffering. How does it come to be? What does it feel like? It may sound counterintuitive, but I'll talk a little bit about how this works, how being mindful of our suffering actually helps to free us from it.

I'll share first a poem by one of my favorite poets, Rainer Maria Rilke. This is a kind of celebration, an acknowledgment of this truth that suffering is our teacher—it's what helps to wake us up. Rilke says, in the Tenth Duino Elegy: "Someday, emerging at last from the violent insight, let me sing out jubilation and praise to assenting angels."

Let not even one of the clearly struck hammers of my heart fail to sound because of a slack, a doubtful, or a broken string. Let my joyfully streaming face make me more radiant. Let my hidden weeping arise and blossom. How dear will you be to me then, you nights of anguish? Why didn't I kneel more deeply to accept you, inconsolable sisters, and surrendering lose myself in your loosened hair? How we squander our hours of pain. How we gaze beyond them into the bitter duration to see if they have an end. Though they are really our winter enduring foliage, our dark evergreen, one season in our inner year. Not only season and time, but our place and settlement, foundation and soil and home.

Mindfulness of this phenomenon of suffering, of unsatisfactoriness, of stress—there are so many different translations for this term dukkha. The Buddha used this term, often translated as "suffering," but dukkha is much broader and deeper than that word usually conveys. Others have translated it as stress, or unreliability, or unsatisfactoriness. These translations give you more of a sense of what we're talking about here. There's just this rub, this feeling that things maybe aren't quite the way we'd like them to be.

Being in the present moment offers us ways to learn about this reactive mind and learn to free ourselves from it, to let go of it a little bit. One of these ways is simply through the process of being present—the mind begins to settle down, it gets concentrated, it gets still. And in that process of the mind settling and getting concentrated, the reactivity toward and away from things begins to fall away. Concentration through mindfulness brings us to a place where we can meet the present moment without reactivity. Through this process, we begin to see that the reactivity is extra.

We can be with our breath through pain in our body, and then it's actually okay. We can sit through an emotional storm. Sometimes, as the mind settles even further, the emotional storms even fall away. We see a thought arise and it's not a problem—that memory that might have led to embarrassment. The embarrassment just doesn't come up because the mind is right there to see that thought arise. It sees, "Oh, it's just a thought," and the thought passes away. So the mind settling in concentration begins to help us understand how all this reactivity is extra.

Also, as we settle into the present moment, often through concentration, there is a kind of peacefulness, a settling that happens. The mind gets more comfortable and more at ease in this process. Through that, it's as if the mind starts to get an education in peacefulness and ease, and it begins to gravitate more toward that. It sees, "Yes, okay, so this reactivity is happening, and I remember what that peace felt like." The mind can almost begin to let go of the state of reactivity and gravitate toward something that has become more familiar and feels more grounded and settled. So the process of being in the present moment begins to educate our minds in another way of being. This helps us let go of some of this reactivity.

Then there's a letting go that happens as we start, through being mindful of something—being mindful of the arising of a very habitual pattern of self-hatred, for instance. That was one of my favorite habitual patterns that I worked with over the years. Through the practice of mindfulness, through being with things as they are and not resisting things as they are, there seems to be a little shift that can happen as we bring mindfulness to our experience. It's as if things don't have to be other than they are. "Oh, there's an arising thought of self-hatred. That's the way it is. It doesn't have to be any different." So mindfulness begins to create a little space around our experience.

There's a fun poem by Billy Collins—some of you might have heard me offer this before—that conveys this sense of a shift in perspective that can happen as we pay attention. When we come into the present moment and we are paying attention, something's happening and we just hate this thing that's happening. But we keep bringing our mindfulness back over and over again, and suddenly there's a shift. Things change. This Billy Collins poem is called—

Another Reason Why I Don't Keep a Gun in My House:

The neighbor's dog will not stop barking. He's barking the same high, rhythmic bark that he barks every time they leave the house. They must switch him on on their way out.

The neighbor's dog will not stop barking. I close all the windows in the house and put on a Beethoven symphony full blast, but I can still hear him muffled under the music, barking, barking, barking.

And now I can see him sitting in the orchestra, his head raised confidently as if Beethoven had included a part for a barking dog.

When the record finally ends, he is still barking, sitting there in the elbow section, barking, his eyes fixed on the conductor who is entreating him with his baton, while the other musicians listen in respectful silence to the famous barking dog solo, that endless coda that first established Beethoven as an innovative genius.

So something that we just assume is a problem can shift, and our minds can take it in in a different way.

Then there's the letting go that happens as we are willing to hang out with things that are difficult—the mindfulness of simply watching our emotions rise and pass, watching our bodily sensations arise and pass. With emotions, this is a particularly good place to notice this. If we are able to simply allow a challenging emotion without either resisting it and trying to push it away, or without trying to manipulate it or fix it or change it, or without holding on to it—sometimes we can hold on to a feeling of self-righteous anger, whipping ourselves up into even more anger through that feeling of self-righteousness, holding on to it because it somehow makes us feel justified.

Instead of relating to our experience in one of those ways—either pushing away or holding on—we can simply be with it. That's a shift of perspective, to just be with something. Allow a feeling of anger, not trying to change it, but just riding it out. The law of impermanence will take over, and that thing will eventually end.

We can watch this process. We can see how being mindful of something, particularly with difficult emotions, creates space. Emotions tend to be fed by our thoughts. When we're in a depressive state, we tend to keep talking ourselves into that depression: "Oh, I'm no good, I'm a failure, I've really blown it this time, nobody's ever going to like me again." We can go on and on like that, and those thoughts simply perpetuate the feeling of depression. Likewise with anger—we can perpetuate it through our thoughts.

Through mindfulness, instead of putting our attention out in the world on the thing we are focused on, or inside ourselves in terms of how we think we've failed or what we've done wrong, we turn instead to the feeling of the emotion itself. What we do is cut the mental juice that's keeping that emotion going.

It's kind of like a car. Those emotions are like a car going down the freeway at a hundred miles an hour. Pumping those thoughts is like putting your foot on the gas pedal. If you can turn your attention to the feeling of the emotion itself and let go of the thoughts, it's like you've taken your foot off the gas pedal and put the car into neutral. It's not going to stop immediately, but it will come to a stop because you're no longer giving it the gas.

Mindfulness works in this way. We turn our attention to the feeling, and that's like putting our minds into neutral around that feeling. It gives the opportunity for the feeling to live its life and come to an end. We can realize the letting go of our reactivity by being willing to be mindful of it until it dissipates through impermanence.

Mindfulness in the present moment is truly the key—mindfulness along with some sense of understanding about what's helpful for us to pay attention to, what leads us away from suffering. The Buddha really focused on this. He said, "This is all I teach: I teach about suffering and I teach about the ending of suffering. Everything I teach is leading in that direction." Keep your eye on the suffering. Keep your eye on that and understand it. This will help lead to the ending of suffering.

He said there are three main underlying tendencies of mind that lead us into suffering, into unsatisfactoriness and distress, over and over again: greed, aversion, and delusion. These qualities—acting out of greed, trying to hold onto something that inevitably, because everything is impermanent, will eventually go away—cause us to suffer. Or we suffer from the holding on itself, because we're afraid it's going to go away, knowing something about how things go. So we experience fear. In that very greed, there's a contraction, a stress, a suffering.

Aversion is really obviously suffering. Even the feeling of aversion is unpleasant in the body.

A sense that this is not acceptable, that this has got to change—that is suffering. Now again, it's not to say that when something is happening we don't take action to change it. But that sense of aversion around it is optional. The aversion itself is suffering. And we can take action instead out of compassion, out of kindness, rather than out of aversion—some more wholesome motivation for action.

The Buddha pointed to action taken out of greed, aversion, and delusion. He said if you act out of greed, aversion, and delusion, you're essentially deepening the ruts of greed, aversion, and delusion in your mind, and that will lead you into more suffering. If your actions are motivated by non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion, that will lead you away from suffering and towards happiness. And so in this teaching he said: keep your eye on your mind. If you're going to be acting out of greed, aversion, or delusion, if you can choose to not take those actions, that's going to lead you towards more happiness.

There's this interesting quality of mindfulness: as we turn our attention to those unskillful states of mind, those unskillful motivations—greed, aversion, and delusion are the three roots, but so many difficult, unwholesome, unskillful states of mind result from these. Anger, rage, cruelty, hostility, frustration, depression, wanting, avarice—all arise out of these three roots. And the amazing thing about mindfulness is that if you turn with mindful attention to those states of mind, letting go of the thoughts associated with them in favor of just being with the feeling, then mindfulness creates the conditions for those difficult states, those unhelpful states, to appear less frequently in our minds.

Partly this is because when we're caught by those difficult states, when we're caught by anger, we don't actually recognize how it's impacting us here and now. I know in my life, when I've been caught by anger, I've been so focused on that other person—I really hope that they suffer—so focused on the anger at that other person that I'm not feeling how I'm suffering through the anger in this moment. Turning the mindfulness away from the thing we're angry at and towards the experience of anger itself begins to give the mind an education in the fact that this state actually doesn't feel very good, is not very helpful in our system here and now. It begins to educate us in the suffering of those states.

When the mind begins to get that education, it also starts to see how that anger is arising out of a holding, a clenching in our own minds. The mind sees it's something it's doing to itself. And so it starts to let go of that. It's really quite an amazing property of mindfulness that turning mindful attention to these difficult things actually helps us to let go of them. I didn't believe it when I first heard it, but over and over again I have seen the truth of that in my own experience.

The other interesting thing about mindfulness is that if you turn your attention to beautiful states of mind, wholesome, skillful states of mind motivated out of non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—the quality of mettā, the quality of kindness that we were working with this afternoon, the quality of compassion, the quality of mindfulness itself, the quality of tranquility, the quality of generosity—turning mindful attention to those states, noticing how they are present here and now in the moment, creates the conditions for them to become more frequent in our experience.

So mindfulness has this simultaneous property: it helps us to let go of what's unskillful and cultivate what's skillful. By just turning our attention to the present moment and noticing what's here, we begin to naturally let go of the states motivated by greed, aversion, and delusion. We begin to naturally cultivate more of the wholesome qualities—love, kindness, generosity, compassion, equanimity.

So another reason why it's so helpful to be in the present moment, noticing the present moment: it's the only place anything ever happens. It's where our reactivity is born, so it's where we can start to see that reactivity. And the mind, being mindful in the present moment, begins to naturally let go of the unwholesome and naturally cultivate the skillful.

Another reason is that the present moment is the only place where there's any possibility of choice. This relates back to skillful action and unskillful action. Through seeing our experience in the present moment over and over again, we begin to notice that kind of motivation happening in our minds before we actually act. We can know that we're going to speak before we speak, we can know that we're going to move before we move, and we can even know we're going to think before we think. We can also know we're headed in the direction of an emotion before that emotion actually arises.

This is the factor in the mind of intention—intention is what motivates our action. And we can see this; we can see intention apart from the action. Through the physical actions of our body, we can begin to explore this, noticing that we can know we're going to move before we move. In the knowing of this intention—the knowing that I'm getting ready to move, or I'm getting ready to act, I'm getting ready to speak—in the knowing of that, we can also often, not always but often, see why we're going to do that thing. There's a motivation that underlies our actions. Accompanying all of those intentions to act is a reason why we're going to act.

And that reason is the key. The Buddha really pointed to this as a very important point to notice. If we can find that motivation and recognize whether it is skillful or unskillful, then we have an opportunity—having seen that intention and the motivation, because we've seen it come up—mindfulness has an opportunity to kind of step in and choose to not follow through on that intention.

If we're not mindful in the present moment, these choices happen for us. Our habits make our choices for us. The ways that we have engaged through our lives have created a kind of momentum of particular habits. We all have our own favorite habits. My two favorite habits were anger and self-hatred. And over and over again, I kept falling into those ruts. When mindfulness wasn't present, it was kind of like those were the ruts that I gravitated towards. I'm sure you all know your own ruts—you know your own things you tend to fall into over and over again. When we're not mindful, it's like those ruts are making our decisions for us, like our habits and patterns are choosing for us. So the choices are being made, whether or not we're conscious of it.

When we can bring mindfulness into the present moment, to this process of making choice, we can start to have a little bit of a wedge in the door to begin to say, maybe I don't want to choose that way. Not always. Often what happens as we just start this exploration, as we see this intention and this motivation, is that all we get to do is watch ourselves follow through on it. And then we just get to see the consequences of following through on that action. We get to see what happens as a result. Often it's some kind of struggle, some kind of suffering. And then the instruction is just to understand that suffering, just to meet it. Let go of thoughts of self-recrimination—"I should have been able to stop myself." If you could have stopped yourself, you would have.

Sometimes our habits are stronger than our ability to be mindful. And we have to respect that. We have to acknowledge that the conditioned patterns of our mind have a lot of power. Mindfulness is pretty powerful, but sometimes those habits are stronger than our mindfulness. And so when that happens, we just have to be compassionate for ourselves. This is happening because of the way causes and conditions have come together. The habits of my mind have led to this. And can I now be compassionate towards the situation I find myself in? Can I just meet this moment with mindfulness?

We can start exploring this moment of choice in our actions. It's actually an interesting exploration to make, something you might want to play with. You don't have to do this, but you might just want to try this: when you're sitting, you might take a period of, say, ten minutes at the beginning or at the end of the sitting, where you kind of just say, "Okay, I'm not going to move. I'm just going to see if I can hold still." And then, having made that kind of resolve around stillness, see if you can notice the intention to move before you move. If you notice that intention, you may want to see, "Okay, can I just see what's the motivation behind that? Is it an aversion because I've got an itch on my nose and I really want to scratch that itch? Or is it a pain that I want to move to relieve?"

I'm not saying not to move at all, but notice. If you can have that resolve for stillness, you might begin to notice that intention and begin to notice the motivation that accompanies it. And see if you can choose whether or not to follow through on it. Sometimes, you know, if there's a certain kind of pain—you've been sitting for a while and there's a certain pain, like my sciatic nerve, if I'm sitting on my sciatic nerve, there's a pain that really lets me know: it's time to move now. The body is going to be damaged if I don't move. And I can move then out of compassion rather than aversion. But if I'm not present to notice that, I'd probably just move kind of automatically out of aversion—"Oh, I don't like that. I want to get rid of that." But we can choose to move more skillfully. So explore that. You can play with that a little bit in your experience.

Another place to play with it is around the changing of postures. If you're sitting, then see if you can know you're going to stand before you stand.

The watermelon is out there and there's only a few pieces left. You've kind of had your eye on that watermelon, and you see somebody walking over there, and suddenly you're up, wanting to get to the watermelon before the other person gets there. That was some greed motivating that action.

So just see if you can notice—the larger changes of bodily posture are sometimes an inroad into being able to see our intention and the motivation that goes behind it. Again, not to say that we're not supposed to act at all. That's often a misunderstanding of the Buddha's teaching. But we see if we can, in the seeing of our motivation—often in seeing our motivations, there's a mixture of wholesome and skillful motivations and unwholesome, unskillful motivations.

Like the moving, for example, when there's pain in your body. Knowing that this pain is damaging the body—there may well be some aversion to that pain. And there is the sense of knowing this is a skillful thing to do. The damage to the body is not a good thing. So there is a compassionate motivation there as well. Sometimes I like to suggest for people, in seeing these mixed motivations, just see if you can connect a little bit more to the more wholesome motivation in taking the action. See if you can incline more towards the compassion than the aversion in the movement.

I've already talked a little bit about concentration, that this is another benefit of being in the present moment. The mindfulness, the sustaining of our mindful attention in the present moment, leads to concentration. It's as simple as that—if we can simply moment after moment be present, the mind will become concentrated, it will become settled, it will become calm. And this feels good. The state of concentration feels pretty good. So that's a benefit of this practice. As we learn how to engage with more continuity, it brings some peacefulness, it brings some happiness into our being. It brings a sense of well-being.

And through that well-being, through that sense of happiness, the mind opens into some of these more beautiful qualities that we were talking about this afternoon. In the present moment we can begin to have a heartfelt connection to the present moment—that kind relationship to our experience we were discussing. Being in the present moment, we can have that connection.

I'll read another poem by Rilke that speaks to this happiness of being here:

Truly being here is glorious. Each of you had an hour, or perhaps not even an hour, a barely measurable time between two moments when you were granted a sense of being. Everything. Your veins flowed with being. Yet we can so easily forget what our laughing neighbor neither confirms nor envies.

This state of well-being, this heart-opening connection to the present moment, is very beautiful. And we all know that feeling. But we do tend to overlook it at times. Our culture doesn't really respect or honor it. So we come into retreat and cultivate this sense of being present. And yet when we go back out into our lives, we often forget this because our culture doesn't value it. Being here, we really can begin to get a sense of the value of this being present. It's very beautiful.

And the being present, stable in the present moment, begins to open us up to insight, begins to open us up to actually seeing things more clearly. We begin to understand impermanence more deeply through being in the present moment—seeing impermanence directly through experience. Watching these emotions, for instance. Watching the feeling of wanting. I recommend this one highly. If you want something, you want that piece of watermelon—play with watching the wanting instead of following through on the wanting. Feel the wanting. Feel the kind of magnetic pull, that magnetic connection between you and that watermelon. It's like it's drawing you over there. Just feel it. Can you just feel it?

If you just feel it without thinking so much about, "I have to have that watermelon, that's going to make me happy for three seconds"—if you just feel the feeling, you will see it vanish. And when you see it vanish, you know in that moment directly the impermanent nature of that experience. And you will also know directly the way that that wanting had you in its grip. When that wanting releases, it's like being released from a vice grip. And you directly see how you were suffering, how you were caught by your own mind.

So insight—insight is possible through being in the present moment.

I'll close by reading a Tibetan poem. In a way, it's a kind of bookend to the poem I started with. The poem I started with pointed out: let go of the past, let go of the future, notice with insight each presently arisen state. That's what we've been talking about. See each presently arisen state. You have to do this here and now. This is the only place you can do this. We need to do it today because we never know when we're going to die.

So this poem says some similar things:

This human body, at peace with itself, is more precious than the rarest gem. Cherish your body, it is yours this one time only. The human form is won with difficulty. It is easy to lose.

All worldly things are brief, like lightning in the sky. This life, you must know, is the tiny splash of a raindrop, a thing of beauty that passes away even as it comes into being.

Therefore, set your goal and make every day and night a time to attain it.

Treasure the time you have been given, for this is all that matters.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 48

The Skill of Meditation

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this talk, Andrea Fella opens with the inspiring story from the Dhammapada commentary of a seven-year-old novice monk who, after observing irrigators guiding water, fletchers straightening arrows, and carpenters shaping wood, asked himself: if these craftspeople can direct mindless materials, why cannot one with a mind guide that mind toward awakening? This reflection led him to full enlightenment before his noon meal, inspiring the Buddha's verse: "Irrigators guide water, fletchers shape arrows, carpenters fashion wood, and sages tame themselves."
>
> Fella unpacks meditation as a kusala (skillful) practice—a term the Buddha used both for wholesome actions leading away from suffering and for craftspeople skilled in their trades. She presents the five faculties (pañcindriya) as the essential qualities for developing this skill: wisdom (paññā), which provides initial understanding of the Four Noble Truths and the nature of skillful and unskillful intentions; confidence (saddhā), the willingness to try the practice; energy (vīriya), cultivated through light, frequent effort rather than forceful striving; mindfulness (sati), the knowing of present-moment experience; and concentration (samādhi), the stability arising from continuous awareness.
> The talk emphasizes that these faculties work cyclically—insight wisdom deepens confidence, which renews energy for practice. Fella offers practical guidance on balancing effort, using the analogy of riding a scooter: tap frequently at first, then learn to read when momentum needs refreshing. She describes how mindfulness reveals the actual nature of suffering in our experience and how watching mental states like wanting or loneliness arise and pass away provides direct insight into impermanence, freeing us from habitual reactivity.

I'd like to start tonight by telling a story from the time of the Buddha. The story is about a very young monk, a very young boy. He was seven years old, and at that age he asked his mother if he could ordain.

His mother, having had the sense from the time he was gestated in her womb that he was a very special child, agreed. As she said, as soon as he was in her womb, all of the dull and stupid and careless servants became wise. And so she thought, this child is so wise. She made the resolve that she would never stand in the way of whatever her son wanted. So when he was seven and he asked to ordain, she agreed.

She took him off to the monastery, and her family had been a supporter of Sariputta, the very senior right-hand disciple of the Buddha. They spent seven days there with him. You can kind of imagine parents leaving their seven-year-old child with the monastics—they might want to spend a few days there. So they spent a week offering food and probably saying goodbye to their son.

On the eighth day, Sariputta was going to take him out for alms round. But the boy had never gone out for alms round in the first seven days, and so they lagged behind a bit. Sariputta didn't necessarily want this young monk to be with all the other monks because he didn't quite have the right manner of carrying the bowl or wearing the robes. So Sariputta wanted to give him some extra instruction, and they lagged behind a little.

As they were walking to the village for the alms round, the young boy was curious about what was around him. I guess he'd come from a more remote village or something, and he was seeing things he'd never seen before. So he was asking Sariputta about them.

They saw a ditch of water by the side of the road. He asked Sariputta, "What's that?" Sariputta said, "It's a ditch that the irrigators use to guide water to their crops." The boy said, "Does water have a mind?" Sariputta said, "No, water doesn't have a mind." Then the boy said, "So they can lead such a thing as water wherever they want it to, even though it doesn't have a mind?" Sariputta said, "Yes."

And the boy—I'll read this part to you, apparently this is what he thought to himself—reflected: "If they can lead such a thing as this, which lacks mind, to whatever place they wish, why cannot they also bring their own mind under their own control and cause it to be enlightened?" This is a seven-year-old we're talking about here, so obviously a very bright seven-year-old.

They walked a little further on and saw arrow makers. Again, he asked what they were and what they were doing. Sariputta told him that they were straightening out reeds to make arrows, putting them over a hot flame to straighten out the reeds and make them useful as arrows. Again, the same question: "Do those reeds have a mind?" And the same reflection: "If they can straighten out those things that do not have mind, why cannot they not straighten out their mind?"

Further on they saw carpenters building wheels and shaping wood. Again the same questions, the same response, the same reflection.

Now, monks walk along one behind each other, the senior monks in front and the junior monk behind. This novice monk was carrying Sariputta's alms bowl with him—that was the form at the time. After seeing and reflecting on all these things, he stopped. This young boy stopped and said, "Venerable sir, would you take your alms bowl back and let me go back to the monastery? I'd like to meditate."

He was inspired by seeing these things to straighten out his own mind, to see whether he could lead that which does have mind to where he wanted it to go.

And Sariputta, to his credit, didn't chastise this upstart young novice for giving him his bowl back—and in fact requesting that he go for alms round for him. "Oh, by the way, would you get my alms food too? I'm going to go meditate." This little seven-year-old boy.

And Shariputra agreed, so the boy went back to the monastery. And the story is, as these good stories go, that this seven-year-old boy became completely, fully enlightened before his noon meal.

I like this story for a couple of reasons. One, it's inspiring to think of the possibility that a child that young actually has the capacity to become enlightened. At one of the last retreats I taught, I was teaching with Gil Fronsdal, and I told this story. We had a little conversation about it afterwards, and he said that he hadn't heard this story before, but that it is said seven is the youngest it is supposed to be possible to become awakened. Seems pretty young to me, but I think it's interesting that it has been recorded as a story from the time of the Buddha—that monks that young actually became fully enlightened.

But the more practical reason I find this story inspiring is because of the verse it points to. After the Buddha came back to the monastery and heard this story, and determined that this young monk had become fully enlightened, he said: "Irrigators guide water, fletchers shape arrows, carpenters fashion wood, and sages tame themselves."

This is a verse from the Dhammapada, and the story I told you comes from the Dhammapada commentary. Most of the verses in the Dhammapada have a kind of back story that goes with them—what happened that inspired the Buddha to utter these verses. So that is the origin of this story.

The other reason I find this story inspiring is that it points to how taming our minds is like a skill. It compares the guiding of water by irrigators, the shaping of arrow shafts by fletchers, and the fashioning of wood by carpenters to what people who sit down and meditate do with their minds. The actions that carpenters, arrow makers, and irrigators use are skills, and we can cultivate the skills of meditation in the same way.

There's a term in Pali that's often translated as "skillful" or "wholesome." The term is kusala. Apparently this term, as it's usually referred to in the Buddhist texts, refers to those actions and intentions that are wholesome and helpful—that guide us away from suffering and towards freedom from suffering. Skillful actions are those based in non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion; those based in generosity, kindness, non-cruelty, and renunciation.

But the term itself, kusala, was also apparently used for people like carpenters and irrigators. If they were good at what they did, they were called kusala—skillful. So this term in the texts has a double meaning: a skill, something that can be cultivated, and this direction towards the wholesome.

I'd like to talk about the skill of meditation tonight—how we cultivate that skill. The skill of meditation is about learning how to wake up, learning how to guide our minds so that they don't, out of habitual tendencies, move us into our patterns and habits of suffering over and over again. When we're not mindful, as I said the other day, our habits and patterns kind of take over. With mindfulness, with the practice of meditation, we can begin to guide our minds in the way we'd like them to go.

In this way, it's a very apt analogy to the irrigators guiding water. When irrigators guide water, they're directing it to places where it's useful—to water the crops and support them to grow. In a similar way, we guide our minds in the direction that supports them to become happy, to let go of all those actions and intentions that drag us into struggle, dissatisfaction, despair, depression, anger, frustration, boredom, and all those difficult states of mind.

So in a sense, what we are cultivating in the skill of meditation is the skill of learning skillfulness—the skill of learning what is helpful for us and what is not so helpful.

There's a list of five qualities called the five faculties. These five qualities can be understood as the qualities that need to become strengthened in order for this skill to become strong for us. The five qualities are confidence, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom.

We can actually look at these five qualities as being almost general qualities that would need to be cultivated for any skill. Depending on what we're doing, the way these five qualities manifest would be slightly different. In order to accomplish anything, we need to have some sense of confidence that it's possible to accomplish it. Whether it's playing the piano or playing basketball or whatever we'd like to become skillful at, we need a sense of confidence that it's possible. And from that confidence, we may get some energy to begin to practice, to begin to engage.

The practice, the engagement, involves paying attention to what we're doing—beginning to be aware of what we're doing so that we can grow the actions and movements needed for that particular skill. With playing the piano, you start by seeing the page of notes, matching the notes to the keys, maybe figuring out how the chords go. It's all pretty slow at the beginning. But it's with that awareness of what you're doing that the skill begins to grow. That's the mindfulness part—the awareness of what we're doing, how we're engaging with this task.

And then there is the practice, the continuity, the repetition of that task—the repetition needing to be done over and over again in order for the skill to become strong. If you sit down to the piano once a week, you're probably not going to get very skillful at it very quickly. You need to sit down and really practice it, do those actions over and over again. This is the aspect of concentration: engaging in the actions, repeating them for a period of time. And from all of this engagement, the skill develops. The capacity to do this with ease develops. We understand how to engage with this task. And that's the understanding part, the wisdom part.

So with respect to meditation, the confidence is in the capacity to engage with the practice, and that helps support an energy to engage. And what do we engage with? We engage with mindfulness and paying attention to our present moment experience. Doing that continuously over periods of time, that continuity of mindfulness, brings concentration. And all of that together helps us to understand our experience, our inner life, helps us to more deeply understand things as they are.

The usual flow of these five faculties starts with confidence or faith as the first one in order to progress through them. That's where it typically starts, that list. But in my thinking about it, it feels to me that it makes sense to actually start with wisdom. We can think of these as a cyclic pattern. We need some kind of wisdom of what we're doing, what we are trying to engage with, in order to begin to engage—some understanding of what it is that we want to do. We don't just start by having faith in nothing; we have faith in something. And that something, in the teachings of the Buddha, is wisdom.

So I'd like to start there, to start by talking a little bit about what it is that we need to understand to begin, to begin to have confidence, to begin to engage.

There's a teaching about wisdom that there are three different sorts of wisdom, or three different ways that wisdom comes about. There's the wisdom that comes about from reading and listening to information—the wisdom that we gain by reading books, listening to dharma talks. Then there's the wisdom that comes about by reflecting on what we've learned, actually engaging our intellectual capacities, thinking about it, reflecting on how it might impact us, how it might relate to our lives. And then the third kind of wisdom comes about through cultivating our minds, through actually taking action to engage with the practices and teachings.

The first two—reading and listening and reflection—are essential underpinnings for the third. Without those first two, without learning a little bit about what the meditation practice is about, what the Buddha's path is about, we don't have anywhere to practice. So we start with some kind of understanding. And the engagement with those practices results in the wisdom of the third kind, which is the wisdom of insight. I'll come back to that after we've gone all the way through all of these faculties again, to show how this comes about to support insight.

So what is it that we need to understand? What is the wisdom that the Buddha offers us? It's phrased in a number of different ways, and it's not necessary, as I said a couple of days ago, to understand all of this. The first way that this wisdom is expressed is as the Four Noble Truths. It's the key core teaching of the Buddha. He said, this is really the central teaching: I teach suffering and the end of suffering. And the Four Noble Truths expresses that.

It expresses that there is suffering in the world, that there's suffering in our lives. And that the cause of that suffering is a mental experience—it's a wanting. It's essentially wanting things to be other than they are. We cannot, we seem to be, it's very difficult for us to just rest with experience as it is. We want it to be some other way. And that's what leads us into this suffering. Those are the first and second noble truths.

The third noble truth is that it's possible to let go of that wanting and that craving for things to be other than they are. That freedom is possible.

It can be realized. The fourth noble truth is that there is a path, a way that we can engage to free ourselves from this craving, this wanting—the Eightfold Path. That's one of the ways this wisdom is expressed.

Another way it's expressed comes back to this term kusala. When we understand what is skillful with respect to leading us towards happiness and away from suffering—when we understand in particular the underlying intentions and motivations that lead us towards suffering and lead us away from it—that is wisdom that will help to free our hearts. The wisdom of understanding that actions taken out of greed, aversion, and delusion will ultimately lead us into stress, dissatisfaction, unhappiness, suffering. And actions taken out of non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—or to put that more positively, generosity, kindness, and wisdom—actions taken out of those motivations tend to lead us towards happiness, towards letting go, towards freedom.

Another way this understanding is expressed, another aspect of the wisdom that supports our waking up, is the teaching on karma, which is essentially a teaching on cause and effect. When we take certain actions—and it's kind of an expansion of the understanding of what's skillful and unskillful—this is the understanding that skillful actions lead us to happiness, unskillful actions lead us to suffering. That's a two-minute summary of the teaching of karma. I'm not going to go into more detail than that because it can get really, really vast.

Another way this wisdom is expressed is through our understanding of experience itself. We understand the nature of experience to be impermanent. We understand the nature of experience to be basically unsatisfactory, unreliable as a place for us to be happy. If we try to hold on to something that's impermanent as a kind of foundation—thinking "this is what's going to make me happy, this thing will make me happy forever"—that thing is unreliable. It will not make you happy forever because it is impermanent, inherently impermanent. In its dissolution, in its falling away, any happiness that was dependent on that will also fall away.

And then there is the truth of the process nature, or ephemerality—that there's no thingness to anything. Because everything is changing at such a rate that it never really holds still to be a thing. It's always in some process of change. We impute a thingness for a time, but things don't inherently have that thingness.

So there's a potency to this wisdom. As I think I said a couple of days ago, we don't need to understand all of these kinds of wisdom before we start to engage. All we need is a little bit. I kind of like to think of the wisdom of the Buddha being this really rich meal. You can just take a tiny little taste of this meal and get the whole explosion of flavors in your mouth just through that tiny little bite. Any little bit of wisdom that you can connect to and begin to engage with will open the door to the whole of the Dharma over time.

So we can begin with a little bit of understanding. Just a little bit, perhaps. The First Noble Truth is an interesting place to begin. There is suffering. And the Buddha, in the statement of that first noble truth, didn't stop and just say, "Yes, this is something you need to believe." No. He said this is something to be engaged with. Suffering is meant to be understood. That's what we're supposed to do with suffering—we're supposed to understand it. There's an action associated with that truth. With all four of the noble truths, actually, there's an action associated with each truth.

So if we just start with that one truth—understand suffering—and we understand what the Buddha means by "understand" is not an intellectual understanding but an experiential understanding, it's pointing us to turn to our experience, to turn to look at suffering, to understand how it comes to be, the causes and conditions that put it into play, what helps it to fall apart.

With a little bit of understanding, a little bit of intellectual understanding in these aspects of wisdom, we may begin to want to engage, to actually be at least interested in the thought, "Maybe this could help me out." This is the beginning of confidence. Confidence that we can engage, and confidence that it would actually be helpful for us.

Initially it might be a little bit of a leap of faith. Sometimes some of this wisdom that the Buddha offers sounds counterintuitive. I know that when I first heard this about understanding suffering, I thought, "Well, why would I want to understand it? Don't I just want to get rid of it? What's this about understanding it?" But I began to see in my own practice that my willingness to engage, to at least kind of give it a try, came when there was a lot of suffering. I was in a place of despair, in a way.

And I felt like I'd tried just about everything. I had kind of hit bottom. I thought, well, I've tried everything that I know of to be happy and I am just so miserable. That very hitting bottom actually made me more open to something that sounded counterintuitive. Okay, it says pay attention to your emotions and don't act on them. Well, I'll give that a try. Doesn't make a lot of sense to me, but I'll see what happens.

So that's the beginning of confidence. I didn't believe it initially. The term "confidence" is often translated as "faith," and to me, confidence is a more resonant term at times, because faith means believing something that I may not understand. For me, it wasn't about believing. It was more of a willingness to try. It was a willingness to say, okay, I don't understand how this is going to work, but I'm at least willing to engage. I'm at least willing to try.

This actually has been a way that I've worked with confidence over and over again in my practice. The Buddha didn't actually say you need to believe this. He said, "Come and see. Try it out." There's a term used for the Dhamma, a quality of the Dhamma: ehipassiko. This term means "come and see." Come and see for yourself how this works. You don't need to believe it, but try it.

I'm kind of scientifically inclined, and so I just looked at it as, well, okay, the Buddha said if you do it this way, this will be the result, so I'll at least run the experiment. I'm willing to see what happens if I pay attention to these emotions, just turn towards the feeling of the emotion instead of doing something about it, acting on it.

By running the experiment—and as I said, this dharma is so rich that any little piece of it can really bear fruit—as we begin to engage with it, often we begin to see the benefits, we begin to see the results. And that seeing the benefits begins to verify that little bit of wisdom. It's kind of like, I'm beginning to see that this is helpful. I see that this is changing my relationship to this experience.

There's a second quality that the Dhamma is described as having. The Pali is opanayiko, which means "leading onwards." To me this is what it is: we get a little taste of the Dharma, we apply it, we engage with it, and it benefits us. Because of that benefit, we go, oh, this is helpful, let me try it more, let me engage more. So it's got this onward leading quality.

As confidence builds, we tend to engage. We have energy to put into the practice. This is the second of the five faculties: the quality of energy. In the context of playing a piano, the energy is around practicing the piano. Here it's around engaging with whichever bit of wisdom you found supportive for you, like understanding suffering. The energy is directed to the practice. It's not simply energy directed to mindfulness, although that's a big part of it. But it's got this foundation of wisdom underneath it, pointing us in the direction we want to be going.

We're not simply guiding water randomly through any which way; we're guiding water to the crops, guiding water to the seeds that need to be moistened. Likewise, we need to have some wisdom about what direction to guide our energy. And that is the wisdom we spoke about earlier.

Energy can be cultivated by making effort. Often the terms energy and effort are used interchangeably. But there's a slight difference between them, and I'd like to clarify that a little bit. One passage in the Samyutta Nikaya says that the faculty of energy we're talking about here is that quality of mind that results from making wise effort. So effort leads to energy. Now that sounds perhaps a little counterintuitive.

that we need energy in order to make effort. And we do need some amount of energy in order to make effort. We're sitting here, we're alive, we've got enough energy in our bodies to be sitting upright here in the room. That's about all the energy we need to make this effort. So it doesn't take a lot of energy, actually, to make the effort. And that effort then, in turn, generates energy directed to the practice.

So I want to talk a little bit about this effort, because effort is so often misunderstood. Greg talked about this some last night too, and I think it bears repeating, because it is so often—I think it's cultural—that we really believe in this culture that the way to get things done is to really dive in there and engage and do it. "I'm just going to do it." We bring a lot of energy, a lot of effort to our activities. And that kind of effort—the kind of effort that Greg talked about—you know, sitting down, the first thing in the sitting, "Okay, I'm going to be mindful. I'm going to be mindful for the entire thirty minutes." How do I do that in this first minute? How do I generate enough effort to be mindful for the whole thirty minutes? It doesn't work, as you know. It doesn't work. But that's kind of how we think. It's like going to a gym. "I've got to lift these heavy weights." Then we tear a muscle.

So the kind of effort that we need to make is really light. It is just enough effort to be present for a moment. Right now, pay attention to the sensations of your hands. Notice the sensations of your buttocks on the cushion or chair or bench. Notice the sensation of your feet. How hard is it when I say these things? Often, almost instantly, you can kind of touch into that experience. That's the level of effort we need to make. We just have to do it over and over and over again. Light effort. Many, many times.

So this is a different way of making effort. A simple persistence. It's a very light touch to staying with our experience.

There's an analogy I like. It's kind of like we need to learn how to balance how much effort to apply—or rather, how frequently to apply the effort. It's not so much how strongly to effort; the strength of the effort has to do with the frequency of reminding yourself to be aware. And as the energy gets rolling, we don't need to remind ourselves as frequently. We can kind of ride the wave of the energy that's there.

There's an analogy I think helps to illustrate this. You know those scooters that little kids ride on? When you start out on a scooter, you hold onto the little handlebar at the front and stand with one foot on the rail of the scooter, and then you tap the other foot on the ground to get going. When you start, you have to tap your foot on the ground pretty frequently because you're starting from a standstill. But as you get going, you need to tap less frequently.

It's kind of like that with our meditation practice. At the beginning of a sitting, at the beginning of a retreat, early on, we need to tap frequently. We need to remind ourselves to be mindful more frequently. But then as the energy gets rolling, we need to have a kind of ability to read that energy. Because it's easy for us to over-effort. We think we need to be reminding ourselves, "Be aware, be aware, be aware." But if we're already aware, Joseph Goldstein once said, it's kind of like trying to turn on a light switch that's already on. The energy is already there.

So we're learning to ride that energy, to recognize when we need to tap again. You know, like on a scooter—you ride for a while, and when you start to wobble a little bit, you need to tap again. That gets you going for a bit longer. Then you notice you start to wobble again, and you tap again.

We can get attuned to the energy in our minds this way. We can start to see: "Yep, I'm pretty present here. I can pretty much hang out with that." But we also notice that maybe we need just a little gentle reminder. And that reminder can take the form of a note. The noting practice is a really helpful way to use this—every few seconds, just a little note kind of nudges the mind. It's like that little tap on the screwdriver.

This learning to read our energy is trial and error. We'll continually be falling off on one side or the other, applying too much energy or not enough. Applying too much energy will get us wound up, make us too tight. And that kind of effort tends to drain energy—that kind where you sit down and think, "Okay, I'm going to be mindful for the whole sitting." That tends to drain our energy. But this light touch doesn't take much energy to make. And the accumulation of that builds.

Then we can fall off on the other side, where we get a little bit lax. It's so pleasant to just sit here riding that wave of energy that we forget to remind ourselves, and we drift off into wherever we go. So we need to learn through trial and error how to read our energy, how to remind ourselves, how to find the balance around energy.

A lot of what we are directing that energy toward is being aware, being mindful. The term for mindfulness is sati in Pali, and the root of that term comes from the word for memory. So we can think of mindfulness as having a component of remembering to it—remembering to be aware, remembering awareness in the present moment. That's one way to look at mindfulness. Another working definition is knowing what's happening while it's happening.

This isn't just the general awareness that we roll through our lives with. We can be wandering around doing things, kind of knowing where we are but not really present. If somebody asks us, "What have you been doing?" we'll remember, we'll know. But that's not true mindfulness. Mindfulness is when we really know in the present moment what's happening in the present moment.

The mindfulness task of this practice is exploring our inner world. It's about exploring what's happening in our minds and bodies—not so much about exploring what's happening out there, but rather the interface between the world and our bodies. How seeing happens, how hearing happens, how our minds work, how our minds process information. Mindfulness reveals to us how our minds work through this inner exploration.

And it gives us a couple of different pieces, different things we learn about how our minds work. One of the things we learn is about what suffering actually is, especially from the perspective of the Four Noble Truths—this perspective of understanding suffering. We start to see what suffering is in our experience.

For instance, the feeling of frustration. There's that feeling in our bodies. And typically, before we run into this practice—at least I know before I ran into this practice—I took that feeling to be a signal that I needed to do something to the world. Something needed to be fixed or changed, or somebody else needed to change the way they were doing something. So that's the usual movement: we try to get rid of that feeling of frustration by changing something in the world, changing the way other people behave. We think that's the way we'll be happy.

And in fact, we do become happy that way, by doing things to change our world. We find there's a little bit of happiness that results. It lasts a little while, and then we have to rearrange our world again. And we have to do that over and over and over again, because nothing lasts very long.

And so the Buddha suggested—the Buddha's wisdom suggested—that a more reliable way to become happy is to let go of the frustration itself.

The frustration itself is the suffering, not the situation we don't like. It's the frustration itself, or the anger, or the depression, or the fear—whatever your pattern is, whatever your struggle is. So the wisdom of the Buddha suggests we should turn toward that field. Observe it, get to know it. Get to see how it comes to be.

This is another piece of what mindfulness begins to show us. Mindfulness begins to show us cause and effect. When I behave this way, when I engage this way, this is the result. So we start to get some insight, again, into this distinction between skillful and unskillful. When I engage out of wanting something, I see that the wanting itself is challenging and unpleasant. When I get the thing I want, I get a brief moment of feeling okay, but then there's fear immediately—am I going to lose that thing? Or there's sadness or depression or loss when it actually goes away. So we start to see, we start to gain insight, that behaving and acting out of wanting is ultimately not terribly satisfying.

We see a thought in our mind, and we see a tendency to follow that thought and create some mood or emotion. I saw this on one retreat, and I was quite shocked when I saw it. I had a pretty strong pattern of loneliness. I would just move into loneliness a lot. At one point I was sitting at lunch, eating, and I was fine. I saw this memory arise in my mind about being with an old friend and doing something we really enjoyed doing together. And I saw my mind reaching out to that memory with the intention to become lonely. I was shocked. Why would I want to become lonely? But there it was. It was so clear that there was this response: "Oh yes, loneliness—let me wallow in that. I know that feeling. Yes, I know loneliness. That's me." It's kind of cozy because I'm so familiar with it.

So we actually sometimes want to put ourselves into these states. And with mindfulness, we can see this. This is the way mindfulness works a lot. We get an education into the suffering of these states by being with them. Spending time with loneliness: "This doesn't feel very good. This is how loneliness feels. There's heaviness, there's contraction, there's a feeling of weight. It's not a good feeling." And then when the mind sees that it's wanting loneliness, it remembers, "Oh yes, loneliness doesn't feel very good. Maybe I shouldn't go there." And it can let it go.

I've seen this happen in my practice so many times. It's quite amazing that through this education we get about suffering, when the mind starts to move in that direction, it understands. It's had that education. It recognizes, "I don't need to go there." And it's not something we necessarily have to do. We don't necessarily have to try to stop it. We just have to give the mind this education through mindfulness. So we see these causes and conditions that lead us into suffering.

As we stay more present, as we cultivate this mindfulness and stay more present with our experience moment to moment, this begins to cultivate concentration. The continuity of mindfulness itself is what results in concentration.

There are other terms for concentration that I like. Concentration often tends to have a kind of narrowing, focusing sense. The word itself gives us that narrowed sense. But there are other words I prefer: stability, composure, collectedness, settledness. All of these describe the state of mind that is concentrated. Essentially, it's the state of mind where awareness stays present over time. And there are two different ways to cultivate this continuity of awareness.

There are essentially two main approaches, two different camps of practice for cultivating this quality. One is the approach we're all pretty familiar with: one-pointed concentration, staying with a single object. This is a really effective way to cultivate concentration. It's an accessible method because the mind can stabilize readily, and it's easy to recognize when we're on the breath or off the breath. So it's relatively straightforward to learn to collect the mind this way. We stabilize our awareness with the breath and watch the mind start to settle down. It's not running off into thoughts all over the place, and we notice that we're not getting pulled out of the present moment or reacting to things. That state feels pretty good. This is the classic way to cultivate concentration.

Another way to cultivate concentration—and in fact the reason why one-pointed concentration works—is that it stabilizes awareness. It's not the object that's so important; it's the stabilization of awareness itself. You could pick anything: an idea of a color, a word, the breath. You can stabilize your mind on just about anything, and it doesn't particularly matter. It's the awareness, the continuity of awareness, that brings the concentration.

We can also cultivate this continuity of awareness on changing objects, on changing experience. This is a different approach to concentration, where we enter into the flow of our experience, recognizing the changing current or the river of experience, the river of sensation of our being. This kind of concentration is a little harder to begin with because it's so easy to fool ourselves that we're actually aware and present when we're really thinking about something. It takes some ability to know what it means to be aware and present before we can begin cultivating this kind of mindfulness. So often teachings start with settledness on one object and then open into this broader field of changing experience. It's in this opening into change where mindfulness and concentration can lead us into the deepening of wisdom.

So we're back to wisdom again. The mindfulness, the concentration, being with experience moment to moment begins to point out, to show us, the truths of all experience. We really deeply see—experientially, not intellectually—we start to truly recognize impermanence.

I talked the other day about watching wanting, seeing if you can just hang out and observe it. Watching it get strong, feeling it pull on you, and then potentially seeing it disappear. If you can actually watch that wanting, pick something really minor, like wanting a piece of chocolate. Feel the pull, feel that desire to go pick one up, and see if you can watch it until it goes away. When that wanting disappears, you will see that nothing has changed in the environment. It is only in your own mind that anything has changed, and you are free from the feeling that something is off, that something is wrong because you don't have this thing you want. It's the wanting itself that's the source of the suffering.

This is insight—when we experientially recognize and understand this by seeing it directly in the moment. Seeing that wanting disappear is something you never forget. If you see it vanish in the moment, it's quite remarkable.

This is the third kind of wisdom: the wisdom of insight, the wisdom that results from mental cultivation. You understand deeply in your being the truth of impermanence, the truth of suffering. It doesn't come by thinking about it.

And so we've come full circle to the cyclic nature of these five faculties. Wisdom supports faith or confidence—that basic understanding of wisdom supporting confidence. Confidence then supports energy, the energy to engage, which supports being here, connecting with experience through mindfulness. Energy and mindfulness together bring mindfulness more continuously through moment after moment, which brings on concentration. Mindfulness and concentration together give us penetrating insight so that we can see the truths of impermanence, the truths of the unreliability of experience, of anything, as a place where we might think, "Yes, this is what's going to make me happy."

We see the relief of letting go of wanting things to be other than they are, deeply in our being. We see that we're much happier when we let go than when we're trying to hold on. And we see this truth: that there isn't actually anything to hold on to, or anyone to hold on to it. It's just a process of change, just a process of causes and conditions.

And with this wisdom, this insight, we get yet more inspiration to continue the practice. At least that's how it's worked for me. Seeing something, a simple understanding of how the mind moves toward wanting to become angry or wanting to become lonely, and watching it let go of that movement—it's like, wow, this stuff is powerful. I'm going to keep doing this. This is really helping me out. I see that I'm not becoming angry when I used to become angry.

We see the benefits. We directly experience the benefits, and so it encourages us to have more confidence in the practice. And so the cycle begins again.

These qualities of the five faculties, when they become strong and balanced, support our deepening into understanding and insight, and they yet then encourage us to keep going. Keep going until we become completely free.

CHAPTER 49

Faith, Wisdom and Doubt

Andrea Fella · 57 min

In this talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a profound reframing of faith (saddhā) for those who may struggle with the concept. Rather than blind belief, she presents faith as "placing one's heart upon" something—a quality of trust, confidence, and willingness to engage that can be verified through direct experience. Drawing from her own transformative journey with anger, she illustrates how the Buddha's teachings function like a scientific hypothesis we can test in the laboratory of our own minds.

The talk weaves together the Four Noble Truths with practical meditation guidance, showing how understanding dukkha (suffering, stress, unsatisfactoriness) in all its forms—from catastrophic loss to subtle daily irritations—opens the door to freedom. Fella emphasizes that the Buddha's path addresses our mental reactivity to experience rather than attempting to eliminate unpleasant circumstances, allowing us to meet life with compassion rather than aversion.

Particular attention is given to doubt as faith's counterpoint, described through the Buddha's simile of being lost in a desert without landmarks. Fella offers specific strategies for different types of doubt—whether about teachings, teachers, oneself, or the practice—emphasizing that doubt often masquerades as rational thinking and may cover deeper emotions like fear or grief. The antidote consistently returns to direct connection with experience and taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha as living supports for practice.

Tonight I'd like to talk about faith, its relationship to wisdom, and the counterpoint quality of mind: doubt.

The word faith, for at least some of us, doesn't necessarily have positive connotations. Many of us already have a relationship with this word and what we understand it to mean. I know for myself, the meaning that I attached to faith was belief in something that was not provable. I looked up the dictionary definition this evening, and that is in fact one of the meanings: belief that does not rest on logical proof or material evidence. For myself, this kind of faith was not something I could resonate with or connect with, and so faith didn't seem to have a place in my life.

I'd like to explore what faith means in the context of our practice here, in the context of the Buddhist teachings. The word often translated as faith in the Pali is saddha, and I believe it was Carol or Sally who mentioned that the term literally translated means "to place one's heart upon." This is an interesting way to explore the meaning of faith. What is it that we place our heart with? To me, this evokes a connotation of trust. Other translations for saddha are confidence and conviction.

This quality of saddha—confidence, faith, conviction—is actually absolutely essential for our spiritual journey because it is from a place of conviction or confidence that we begin to actually engage.

To begin this exploration of faith, I'd like to start by talking about suffering. We all experience suffering. The term generally connotes some kind of larger sufferings, the major tragedies in our lives: a friend dying, a major relationship breakup, our own diagnosis of a serious illness. Or it may mean the suffering associated with large environmental disasters—this recent hurricane, for instance, the amount of damage it caused, tsunamis, earthquakes. We all experience this kind of suffering, although it is more rare for us.

More common is societal suffering, suffering that results from discrimination—of race, of gender, of age, of sexual preference. There is so much suffering in this world because of discrimination.

Yet the suffering referred to in the Buddhist teaching—the entire orientation that the Buddha had for his search—was: is there a way to relieve suffering? Suffering was his whole orientation. And the suffering he was interested in relieving wasn't just this deeper kind, but also the more subtle kinds that we experience all the time, throughout our day. We experience suffering because we don't like the kind of food that's out. We prefer brown rice to white rice, and there's maybe a little bit of irritation that our preferred food isn't available. Or maybe there's stress because of our work, or a particular encounter with a friend that didn't go the way we'd like, and it keeps niggling at us. So many different ways we experience stress and suffering, both in the large and the small. The Buddha was interested in all of these.

The term usually translated as suffering, dukkha, means much more than this broad or deep, massive kind of suffering. I think "suffering" doesn't really adequately translate the Pali word. Some translators have tried other translations. Stress is one that Thanissaro Bhikkhu uses. Other translations might be unreliability, unsatisfactoriness, unease, distress. Some of these words make it clear that dukkha means the whole range of this feeling that things just aren't the way we'd like them to be.

Most of the kinds of suffering I mentioned have something happening in the world around them. There's a hurricane and a lot of destruction, or there's the actual breakup of a relationship—something in the world happening, some given experience. The dukkha the Buddha was seeking to find an end to wasn't about finding a way the world could be free of natural disasters, because he knew that wasn't possible. Nor was it to be free of unpleasant experience—he knew that wasn't possible either. Rather, it was to be free of the mental reactivity to our unpleasant experience, to the natural disasters, to the tragedies of life. So that we can, with an open heart, meet our experience.

That open heart meeting experience, if it's meeting suffering, is going to have compassion as a response rather than anger or frustration or hatred or rage. That open heart meeting beautiful experience is going to have joy as a response rather than greediness and wanting. This is what he was pointing to: this reactivity of the mind.

This reactivity is the dukkha the Buddha was pointing to.

We all have our own familiar strategies for dealing with our struggles. One common approach is thinking that the way to relieve this distress is to fix the thing in the world that's a problem—or that we perceive as a problem. We try to get rid of what we don't like and keep what we do like, this continual sense of arranging things so they align with what we'd prefer. And if this doesn't succeed, we may escape into sense pleasure. That's another strategy for working with things not being to our liking.

When we first meet our suffering—before we really encounter a spiritual path—we think it doesn't get much better than arranging the world. This arrangement works for a little while. Perhaps we can arrange things so they suit us, and then we have a sense of happiness: "Oh, okay, I can relax. Things are just the way I'd like them to be." But the law of impermanence takes hold and things change. So we have to rearrange again. We keep trying this—rearranging and it breaks down, rearranging and it breaks down. Ultimately we know this doesn't quite work.

I want to add something here, because often when hearing this exploration of suffering—this notion that fixing things doesn't ultimately lead to peace—people think it means we shouldn't make any effort to change things. It's a little paradoxical, perhaps. If there's injustice in the world, if you see that because of discrimination there is suffering, the Buddha suggests we act to alleviate that suffering. But the intention behind that action is not reactivity, aversion, hatred, rage, or hostility—rather, it's compassion. We can act in the world. The Buddha suggests we choose to act out of compassion rather than reactivity. I want to put that out there because often there's a misunderstanding that this teaching means we're not supposed to try to fix or change anything. That's not what he's saying.

So we meet this suffering in our lives, and some of us begin our spiritual journey through an encounter with suffering. The Buddha said that an encounter with suffering will lead either to bewilderment or to search. When it leads to search, the question is something like: "Does anyone know a way out of this suffering?"

I know for myself, this is how I encountered my own spiritual journey—descending into a place of such deep suffering that I simply could not find a way out. It was just this sense of: "Does anyone know how to deal with this?"

If in that space of search we actually encounter a teaching that speaks to a way out of suffering, we may begin to sense a possibility that there's a direction that might help. This is the beginning, the initial stirring of faith. Hearing that someone has found a way can bring in a little bit of hope—"Oh, maybe there's something there." It brings a willingness to connect with that teaching. This is just the very beginning of faith, the beginning of willingness to listen.

In the context of our practice here, on this retreat and in our Buddhist spiritual journey, this faith, this confidence, is intimately connected with wisdom—the wisdom in particular of the Four Noble Truths. And here we are back at suffering. The Four Noble Truths: the truth of suffering; the truth that suffering has a cause, that it's not random but caused by this essentially rebelling and reacting against things as they are, wanting things to be other than they are; the truth of the possibility for the cessation of suffering; and the truth of the path leading to that cessation—the Eightfold Path. This is what we're practicing here.

Faith with respect to these teachings, this wisdom the Buddha discovered on the night of his awakening, doesn't mean simply believing them. Not putting them up on a pedestal or reading them in a book and saying, "Yes, I believe the First Noble Truth. I believe that wanting is the cause of suffering. I believe there's a path that leads to the end of suffering." It doesn't do us much good to simply hold a sense of belief in these. The Buddha suggested that we need to act on these truths. Faith in our practice isn't about simply believing—it's about the willingness to act, the willingness to engage.

So the actions the Buddha suggested with each truth: we need to understand suffering. This understanding is a turning towards our experience.

This isn't an intellectual exercise. You all know this. It's the turning towards our experience. What is this suffering? What is this experience?

Understanding suffering in this way helps us to see how suffering is put together, the cause of suffering. The understanding of suffering begins to allow us to actually see how the cause is connected, how this wanting is connected to the suffering.

And then we begin to see the second action that the Buddha suggested would be really helpful: let go of the cause of suffering. Let go of the wanting. If you let go of the wanting, the suffering will not arise.

Even just a thought experiment along these lines. If you have a sense that there's a problem in your life, if there were no reactivity to that external situation, no wanting it to be different, would it be a problem? When the wanting goes away, the suffering goes away.

The third noble truth, the task, the action, is to realize the cessation of suffering—realize that it's possible, realize the actuality that suffering can come to an end. And the fourth noble truth is to cultivate or develop the path, to develop the qualities of heart and mind that support our being able to understand suffering and to let go of the cause of suffering, which allows us to realize this release from suffering.

The faith that we begin to have comes in stages, in a way. We may see that there are people who have practiced. For myself, I heard from a friend, "Wow, I found this really helpful." And that brought in a little bit of a sense of, well, maybe I would find it helpful too. We take inspiration and we borrow faith, in a sense, from other people at the beginning.

So we begin with this faith in the possibility of freedom from suffering and a little bit of a sense of faith that there might be a path, that there might be some practices that would help us. And some faith in those who have followed the path and realized some benefits and are able to express that: "Yes, this has been really helpful for me." These three—faith in the possibility, faith in the practices, faith in the people who have practiced it—this is faith in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, our three refuges.

For me, the way faith has expressed itself in my own practice is kind of more like a scientific hypothesis. The Buddha suggested, here are these truths, here are actions associated with these truths. If you follow these actions, you'll experience some results. It sounds remarkably like a hypothesis, a scientific hypothesis. And so we can understand this as, well, let's run the experiment. Our minds and bodies are laboratories. Let's run the experiment of using mindfulness to understand the suffering and see what happens.

We examine the teachings in our own experience. We turn towards our suffering using the teachings, the practices, and mindfulness to explore our experience. And in this way we may start to see some benefits for ourselves. We may start to recognize the power of these teachings for ourselves.

This is a kind of transition for us in terms of faith. Initially we have to borrow faith from others, talking to people about how they have connected with the practices and what benefits they've received. We can read them and reflect on them and think whether they make sense or not. But it's not until we start engaging that we begin to taste for ourselves the truth of these teachings. And they are verifiable for ourselves. In this way, the faith in this practice doesn't have that same quality of faith in something or belief in something that is not verifiable. We can practice ourselves and verify for ourselves that these teachings are effective.

In my own practice, I'll tell you how this unfolded for me in the first months. I'm very skeptical, very scientifically oriented, a scientific kind of mind. But I was in deep, deep suffering. And I had tried everything that I could think of. It was very much like what the Buddha said: does anybody know a way out of this? I have tried everything that I can think of.

I talked to a friend who had been doing this practice and she said, "Well, this has been helpful for me. Why don't I send you a book?" And so she sent me a book and I began reading it. One of the key little bits—I didn't understand much from this book, but the wisdom of the Buddha is actually pretty dense.

And so even a tiny little bit of that wisdom, if you can just get a tiny little bit of that wisdom and start to act on it, it's pretty potent.

In reading through this book, which was Everyday Zen by Joko Beck, one of the things I pulled out was: try observing your emotions rather than acting on them. Strong anger was my main issue at that time. It was pretty much making me non-functional. I would find myself in a rage, frozen at my computer, oblivious to everything around me, lost in my mind in fury. I was pretty non-functional at times.

So this teaching—observe it—I thought, well, what good is that going to do? I had no idea how that would be helpful. And I had no training at that point in mindfulness whatsoever. Nobody to tell me: pay attention in your body, let go of the thoughts. I didn't have any of those instructions. But I thought, okay, it doesn't make any sense to me, but nothing else I've tried has seemed to work. So I'll see what happens if I try observing my anger.

I tried this. I remember the first time I noticed the anger and remembered that I was going to observe it. I had said to myself, I'm going to do this, I'm going to try to pay attention to my anger when it happens. And the first time I noticed and remembered, my thought was, wow, yeah, I'm angry. What do I do with this? This feels really unpleasant. I had no idea what to do with it. But in that moment, I thought, I don't know what I do. I guess I go back to work.

In retrospect, I realized that recognition of the anger, that moment, actually broke into the anger and allowed me to go back to work instead of being frozen in rage. There was a little bit of space around that anger. And over time, over the course of months of doing this practice, I began to see more and more space around my anger.

So the faith, the confidence in that teaching—I was getting some verification. It was definitely heading me in the right direction. I knew, at least I'm not quite so strung out here. I can function more. I could see that even just recognizing, yep, I'm angry, was really helpful.

And that helpfulness encouraged me to keep trying, keep practicing, keep exploring my anger. Then one day I was in the kitchen cutting an apple. I wasn't trying to be mindful, I was just present. I noticed as I was cutting this apple that a thought appeared in my mind about the person I was angry with. And in seeing that thought, I could see in that moment that there was this impulse to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry. I could see that direction. I was heading in that direction.

And in seeing that—having spent a lot of time paying attention to anger, noticing how really unpleasant it is—the mind in that moment saw that it was headed towards really unpleasant experience, and it let go. It just let go. I didn't even have to do it. The mind did it by itself.

I stood there in the kitchen waiting to get angry, because I hadn't had the experience of this person coming up in my mind without anger also arising. But I did not get angry.

I was so blown away. I thought, oh my God, this stuff is so powerful. That moment—when I look at it now—that was a seminal moment in my practice. Looking back on it, it was an understanding of the Four Noble Truths in that moment. I saw how the suffering was created by that movement towards wanting to turn myself up. And I saw that the mind could let go of that. I understood deeply the suffering of that reactivity.

I saw how the letting go happened. I realized the freedom there. I could directly witness—I directly saw—that had I not been doing that practice, this practice of observing, I would have been spun out in anger again. I saw the non-arising of anger, saw that anger did not arise. And I directly saw that the development of those qualities I'd been practicing for the past few months had led me to this place.

This was a moment of complete, deep confidence in the teaching. And that was really the moment that my—I feel like looking back on it, that's the moment I got on this path. That was the moment of deep verified faith. I knew for myself the benefit of these teachings.

I know you all have times in your practice where you have experienced something similar. It helps actually, at times, to recall these insights, these times when our faith is verified. This supports the reminder of the benefits of this practice—to remember how it supports you, how it has helped you in your life. We can do this to help cultivate this quality of confidence, of faith.

The practice of engaging with these teachings leads us to actually verifying for ourselves the truth of these teachings, which gives us a taste of the wisdom for ourselves and leads us to greater confidence in the teachings—which then cycles through. Greater confidence leads to more interest in engaging with the teachings, which leads us to deeper understanding of the teachings, which leads us to deeper faith. These two qualities support each other and encourage each other: the faith and the wisdom.

And yet the practice isn't one continuing deepening of faith and wisdom. We get caught. We especially, I think, can get caught around the gradual nature of the unfolding of this practice. I think we're a culture of instant gratification. We want the results quickly.

When we've had an insight, a recognition into a pattern, into a particular struggle that we've worked with, and we see, "Oh, this is how it's happening!"—and it falls apart in a moment like that—sometimes we can have the thought, the belief, "Oh, I understand now. That's not going to happen again." And yet the pattern returns again and again and again.

In seeing that, we can think, "I've seen through this before. What's my problem here?" We can feel like we must be doing something wrong if we can't see through it a second time, or a third time, or the fifth or eighth time it comes up again. Doubt comes in. Or maybe we figure, "Well, I must not have really seen through that in the first place." Or we figure, "Well, maybe it really didn't work. It never really happened. The practice didn't really work at all."

This is doubt. The Buddha described doubt—or he compared doubt, he gave a simile about doubt—as being like being lost in the wilderness. In particular, he described it as being lost in a desert. Imagine a desert. There's very little in the way of landmarks in a desert. You take a few steps this way, you think, "That must be the wrong way, better go back." You take a few steps that way—"Oh, that can't be the right way." So there's this wavering quality, a sense of not really being able to commit to any direction at all.

This is how the Buddha described doubt. When we're caught in doubt, we come to a kind of standstill in our practice. We might try something for a few moments and then think, "Ah, this isn't working," or "There's another practice I should do." So we don't ever commit. We don't commit when we're caught in this state of doubt.

There are so many things we can have doubts about. And I think it's helpful to actually name some of these things, because in my own experience, the different things that we doubt—there are also different ways to work with the doubt that comes up, depending on the kind of doubt it is.

So there's doubt in the teachings. The Buddha taught 2,500, 2,600 years ago. No such thing as iPods, iPhones, Macs, cars, 52-story buildings that planes fly into. There was just a much simpler life. What could he have possibly had to say that would relate to us here and now?

There are doubts we can have in the teachers. What do these teachers know? I know that there are much better teachers in Burma, so maybe I should plan to go to Burma.

We doubt ourselves. We doubt our ability, our capacity. We doubt the possibility that we can do this. This, I think, is probably one of the key ways we get caught. We seem to have the sense that everybody else can do it but me.

We doubt the practice itself. What does paying attention to the in-breath and out-breath have to do with anything? Or we can get stuck wavering about what practice to do. Should I pay attention to my breath? Should I do some metta? Should I directly face this difficult state? Oh, maybe I should try metta. No, no, let me try paying attention. No. So we waver. It's just like being lost in the desert.

The most important thing with doubt is actually to recognize that it's happening—to notice that doubt has come into our minds and has us locked into this wavering state. It has that feeling of, "What should I do?" In my experience, this recognition of doubt is the most important piece. Once we can recognize that doubt is happening, we have a kind of toe in the door to begin to help it release. Doubt really feeds on us not being aware of it. But when we become aware of it, something shifts.

I find that doubt is often experienced as a lot of thinking. So it can be helpful to get familiar with the ways in which your doubt manifests, what kinds of thoughts it takes shape as. In my own experience, I've found that if I find myself thinking about the practice—thinking about what kind of practice I should do, how this practice works, whether this practice even works—thoughts about the practice rather than doing the practice, it's worth checking in to see if doubt is present.

This kind of thinking can often be hooked into our logical, rational mind. And so it can fool us. Doubt has this incredible capacity for masquerade. It puts on this costume of reason: "I shouldn't be doing this practice. This practice obviously doesn't work for me." It can hook into our rationality, and we have a lot of trust in our thinking mind in this culture. Doubt brings that in and fools us into thinking that it's actually a rational, reasonable thought. So it can be really helpful to just begin to notice: when we are thinking about the practice, is there doubt present?

As I said a few minutes ago, I think there are different ways to work with doubt depending on the kind of doubt. If there are doubts in the teachings, the teachers, or the practice, I often find it helpful to reflect that the whole nature of this Dharma is that the Buddha said, "Come and see. Try it for yourself." He didn't say, "Believe me." He said, "Come and see." And so I come back to that sense of a scientific hypothesis for myself. The Buddha didn't ask me to believe this, but can I run the experiment? Here's a teaching. Can I run the experiment on my mind and body? Why don't I try the practice and see what happens?

With certain kinds of doubt—if there's a lot of confusion about a teaching, if you're not clear about a teaching and your mind is wavering about how you can work with this if you don't understand it—that kind of doubt, it's usually helpful to go talk to a teacher. Ask a question. Help to clarify your understanding.

Sometimes doubt can be covering up some other emotion. So it can be helpful to check in when you notice doubt. You've noticed, okay, there is doubt here.

What does it feel like? What does doubt feel like? When I've done this, when I've explored, it's like, "Oh, grief. There's grief here." That's what doubt feels like. I was caught for two hours one afternoon at Spirit Rock on a long retreat, just completely struggling with doubt. And when I finally recognized it—"Oh, doubt is present. I guess doubt is what I need to practice with. What does doubt feel like?"—I just felt so much grief. I could be with the grief. And in being with the grief, there was no doubt.

So it can be helpful to check in. The question "What does doubt feel like?" can sometimes open us to something underneath: a fear, an uncertainty, some other emotion, depression perhaps.

On one retreat, I felt like there was a lot of doubt. It was an early retreat—I think it was my second retreat. So I decided I would ask a question in the hall during the question and answer period. I was sitting there trying to frame my question in my mind about doubt. I heard in my mind the question being framed, and the first few words of every question started with "I'm afraid that..." When I heard this five or six times, I began to think, maybe this isn't doubt. Maybe this is fear.

I never even got a chance to ask my question, but I started just noticing that actually fear was everywhere, that the doubt had been kind of masking this fear. Somebody would walk up next to me and I'd feel this fear. The fear was quite predominant; it was there a lot. And I could be with it. It wasn't an overwhelming fear, but it was just that it had been hidden from me by this doubt.

If the doubt is about what kind of practice to do—"Should I do this or should I do that? Maybe I should do this. No, I should do that"—just pick one. It really doesn't matter that much. You can pick one, explore it, see what happens, run the experiment.

The antidote to doubt, the main antidote to doubt, is connecting with experience. When we are lost in doubt, we have gotten disconnected from experience. We are completely in a world of our thoughts, of our projections, of our ideas. We're not, as Joseph says, even in the vicinity of our experience when we're lost in doubt. And so if we can simply connect with experience, this question—"What does doubt feel like?"—begins to connect us again with experience. When we connect with experience, doubt actually doesn't stand much of a chance.

Sometimes we might listen to the voice of doubt and then apply a little bit of a teaching, and then listen to the voice of doubt and apply a little bit of the teaching. That's kind of like putting the kettle on and off the stove. We just need to connect with our experience. Sustaining the attention counters that wavering mind of doubt.

One of our ways that doubt comes up for us is through belief, through views. We think, "Well, since I'm experiencing some mind state—take your pick: fear, anxiety, dread, lust, boredom—since I'm experiencing this, I must not be doing the practice right." Again, the sense that the practice isn't working because we're experiencing something. Actually, what's in the way there is the belief that the practice isn't working. Can you just connect with boredom? Can you connect with fear, anxiety, worry, depression, lust? In that very connection is the antidote to doubt.

Another thing that supported me in my practice around doubt is to take refuge. This kind of emerged spontaneously—it can emerge spontaneously. On one retreat, I was really feeling like I just couldn't be mindful. Every time I'd try to be mindful, I couldn't be very mindful.

My mind was just all over the place, and I was wavering back and forth. "Oh, I'm such a horrible yogi. I can't be mindful at all. This practice doesn't work." And then I'd take a step and feel my foot on the ground. "I'm a good yogi! I can feel my foot on the ground." And then my mind would be all over the place again. "I can't pay attention."

At some point I realized that when I could take a step and feel the foot on the ground, that wasn't me doing that. It was simply the capacity of the mind that can be aware. And that, for me, is how I understand the refuge in the Buddha. The refuge in the Buddha, for me, is the refuge in our capacity for awakeness. And there it was, just all by itself—awareness appearing in a footstep. I thought, "Wow, okay, I'll just take refuge in that capacity. I can take refuge in the Buddha."

It gave me a great feeling of ease around my struggles with my mind. It was so clear I couldn't control my mind. But every now and then there would be this awareness that was very clear.

We can also take refuge in the Dharma, the refuge in the practice itself. Just sit and walk. One teacher suggested to a student to put a sign in their room: "When in doubt, follow the schedule." Just sit and walk. The practice will unfold if you simply continue. I think James mentioned that Bhikkhu Bodhi said there are two things: we must start, and we must continue. Just continue the practice.

Another support for countering doubt is to cultivate faith—to cultivate the quality of confidence. There are a few ways to do this. I mentioned one earlier: reflecting on ways that your practice has supported you. If you find yourself in a hindrance attack of doubt, it can be helpful to remind yourself that it hasn't always been like this, that you have actually had times when you've directly known for yourself the value of this practice. There's not one of you who hasn't experienced this. There's no way you would be coming on a retreat of this length if you didn't have some of that confidence, some of that verified experience. So recall those times when your faith has been verified. This is very helpful to reflect on. It supports our faith, our confidence, our trust in the practice.

Also recognize when confidence is actually present. At times when the practice is unfolding and you have a sense of engagement and connection with your experience, sometimes there can be a sense of confidence there. Acknowledge that. Actually recognize that quality. Mindfulness has this capacity: when we are mindful of beautiful qualities of mind, like confidence, it increases their tendency to occur in the future. And when we bring our mindfulness to the hindrances, it decreases their likelihood of occurring in the future. So mindfulness has this great property—it supports the beautiful qualities and allows us to let go of the unwholesome qualities. Actually recognizing, being mindful of the quality of confidence, will support it to arise more frequently.

Likewise, another support for confidence is to recognize when other beautiful qualities arise. Guy talked about this in the guided meditation this morning—recognize when mindfulness arises. Notice it. There's a host of beautiful mind states that come as we practice. And sometimes as we're practicing, we become so focused on the suffering.

We're looking at our aversion, we're looking at the pain in our leg and the aversion to it. And we're not quite so aware that while we're actually being mindful of that, mindfulness is being cultivated and patience is being cultivated.

I remember on one long retreat, I had an incredible kind of clamping down around my heart, and it felt like there was very little I could do to be mindful of anything else. So I could just walk back and forth and feel this incredible pain in my heart. But in that walking back and forth, I said, "Well, at least I'm cultivating patience." Recognizing that strengthens the quality.

So recognizing these beautiful qualities—recognizing mindfulness, interest, joy, calm, equanimity, kindness, concentration, truthfulness, patience, compassion—beautiful qualities arise for us as we practice. As we recognize them, this cultivates the soil for faith, which undermines the soil that doubt can grow in.

So really, our practice, our faith related to this wisdom, we keep coming back to suffering. We can use an exploration of suffering as understanding suffering. This is our practice; this is what we're doing here. We can use suffering as a guide.

Confidence in this teaching of the Four Noble Truths gives us a sense that when we're experiencing suffering, it's not a mistake. It's actually the direction that we can meet. If we can meet that suffering, it's the direction for our freedom.

There's sometimes a teaching that we get the lessons that we need. That's kind of a new age teaching—we get the lessons we need. It's not that the world out there, the universe, is conspiring somehow to create the situations that will give us the lessons we need. It's our own minds that are struggling against situations. The lessons that we need are created because we struggle against things as they are.

So meeting our suffering is the very point, the very doorway through which our freedom can be found. All it takes is the willingness to do it.

CHAPTER 50

The Five Aggregates

Andrea Fella · 1h04

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella illuminates the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā), transforming what might seem like dry technical doctrine into a practical tool for direct investigation. She explains that the Pāli term 'khandha' simply means heap or bundle—the Buddha's way of categorizing all experience into five processes: form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhārā), and consciousness (viññāṇa).
>
> Fella draws on the Khandha Saṃyutta texts to show how each aggregate functions both as what we experience and as a process of experiencing. She emphasizes that these processes occur in every moment, whether we're mindful or not, and that understanding them helps us see how we create suffering through identification. Referencing Bhikkhu Anālayo's commentary on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, she offers the insight that from the unenlightened perspective, body is 'where I am,' feeling is 'how I am,' perception is 'what I am recognizing,' mental formations are 'why I am acting,' and consciousness is 'whereby I am experiencing.'
> The talk provides detailed guidance on investigating each aggregate directly—from experiencing the four great elements (earth, water, fire, air) below the level of concept, to watching how intention arises and conditions action, to noticing how perception can mistake concepts for reality. Fella shares personal examples from retreat practice that demonstrate how these teachings reveal the constructed nature of experience and how mindfulness simply reflects what is already happening, requiring no additional effort to construct anything new.

This evening I'd like to talk about a subject that's come up a couple of times at least in the dharma talks, and perhaps in the instructions, but we haven't covered it in much detail yet—the topic of the five aggregates.

The title itself sounds a little dry, technical, perhaps boring. The term "aggregate," which translates the Pali term khandha, doesn't resonate with us very much, especially in terms of direct experience. When I first encountered this teaching, the first image that came to mind was a big lump of rock. The geological term "aggregate" was what I thought of, and I wondered, what does this have to do with anything?

But this Pali term khandha is actually not a very technical term. It's an everyday, ordinary term in the Pali language, meaning something like heap, bundle, or pile. So this teaching on the five aggregates is essentially the Buddha looking at our experience and dividing it up into five heaps, saying that everything in our experience can be found in one of these five heaps. This teaching is really about looking at our experience—it's a teaching around how we can explore our experience. I think all of the Buddhist teachings were very practical. No matter how technical they sound, they always come back to how we can explore our direct experience, and this teaching is no exception.

The five aggregates are: the aggregate of body, which is basically the physical aspect of our experience; and then four aggregates relating to our mental experience. I actually think this teaching is particularly interesting because it explores our experience from both physical and mental perspectives, but it really looks at our mental experience in a fairly finely grained way. There's one physical aggregate—the aggregate of form—and the other four relate to our mental experience.

We can contrast this with the teaching on the six sense bases, which is kind of the opposite in a way. In the six sense base teaching, we look at our body through its five aspects—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—and then the sense base of the mind. In that teaching, the body is given a kind of emphasis; how the perceptual and knowing faculties work through the body is highlighted. In the five aggregates, the emphasis is reversed, and the exploration focuses more on the mental aspects of our experience.

So the five aggregates are: form, the body basically; feeling, the felt aspect of our experience, whether things are pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral; perception, the recognizing aspect of our experience; mental formations, the volitional aspect of our experience; and consciousness, the knowing aspect of our experience.

I'll go into some detail on these—what they are and how we can actually see them as experiences in our moment-to-moment experience. But first I'd like to talk a little bit about the aggregates themselves, just an overview.

There are two ways that these five heaps are described in the texts, in the suttas. Form is defined as this body, the aspects of the physicality of the body. Feeling is defined as the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral aspect of experience. Perception is defined as the recognition that we make, the concepts that happen in our minds. Mental formations encompass all of the mental activity that happens in our minds. And consciousness is the knowing.

So each aggregate is defined both in terms of what we experience and as a process. There are actually two definitions given in the suttas for each of these aggregates—one that essentially describes what we notice in our experience, and another describing how it happens, the process within our experience. These aggregates cover both sides.

Essentially, these processes of body and mind cover any experience you have. Any experience whatsoever can be found within these five aggregates. And these processes are continually going on, day and night. Whether we are awake or asleep, whether we are mindful or not, these processes just continue. Whether we are mindful or not, the mind recognizes things and knows things and feels things. The body experiences heat and cold. It's all happening all the time.

During this talk I'd like to explore both sides of the understanding of each aggregate —the what, essentially what is understood or experienced in body, in feeling, in perception, and so forth, and also the process, how it's understood as a process.

But first I'd like to say something about why. Why bother to understand this? What is the point? It still sounds perhaps a little dry and technical.

First, because these aggregates include the entirety of our experience, they are an excellent framework for beginning to understand our experience, particularly the mental realm. The distinctions of how our mind does what it does are very well described in this teaching. And it points us to the actuality of what we are experiencing. If we can begin to see our experience through this framework, through understanding these processes at work, we begin to see them simply as processes. It begins to undermine our identification with these processes.

And in fact, that is another main reason to understand them. The Buddha highlighted these five aggregates as being the primary ways that we cling, the ways that we identify.

In fact, he equated, in a sense, the five aggregates of clinging with our suffering. And that is, in one definition, the definition of the first noble truth. So through understanding these five aggregates, we come to an understanding of this first noble truth of suffering. Through understanding how we cling to them—that we cling to them—we begin to see too that this clinging itself is also simply a process. A process that goes on within these aggregates themselves. Clinging is found in the aggregate of volitional formations, the volitional aspect of our experience.

So we're encouraged to understand these heaps, these areas of experience, to get to know them really well so we can see how they serve as magnets for clinging, magnets for suffering.

The Buddha also highlighted this teaching in terms of the process of selfing—this confused, misperceived aspect of our experience. He called it "I-making" and "mine-making," and he noted that each of these aggregates particularly collects this I-making or mine-making. So understanding these aggregates is a good way for us to begin to see how we create this notion of self and believe in it. We can begin to actually deconstruct this notion of self through exploring these five aggregates.

One teacher, Bhikkhu Anālayo, who is a wonderful practitioner-scholar monk and a great researcher into the Pali Canon, wrote a book that I highly recommend if you haven't read it yet. It's called Satipaṭṭhāna: The Direct Path to Realization—a modern-day commentary on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the Buddha's instructions on mindfulness. In that book, he talks about the aggregates and says that from the unenlightened perspective—the perspective from which we normally view our experience—body is where I am, feeling is how I am, perception is what I am recognizing, mental formations are why I am acting, and consciousness is whereby I am experiencing, the means or mode by which I experience things. So these are five ways that we tend to identify.

I'd like to describe each of these aggregates in turn, and then talk a little bit about how we can actually begin to explore this in our experience.

The form aggregate, in terms of a process, is described in terms of our subjective experience. In one sutta, the Buddha says—and it's a little bit hard to translate this particular line—but in terms of the process of form, he says, "It deforms. That's why it is called form." The Pali terms involve a word play that the Buddha is using. The term for form is rūpa, and the term he uses for deforms is ruppati, which is not etymologically related to rūpa but sounds like it. So he's making a pun, basically. Ruppati means something like breaks or gets injured or spoils. What he's saying is that we experience form because of things that impact our world, our body—that the form element is experienced through how things contact us, how the world contacts us. So it's in terms of subjective experience that this aggregate is defined.

This is about looking at our physical experience, the physicality of our experience itself, in an elemental way—in terms of both the process and the "what" of experience. The "what" of form is defined as the four great elements: earth, air, fire, and water, as well as sight, sound, smells, tastes, and touches. So, for instance, a bell has form—it's got earth element—and the sound waves are also form, but they are experienced only because they impact this body. It really is an experiential understanding of form that this teaching is pointing to.

We come into contact with our physical experience through the elements: vibration, tingling, and pulsing being air element; heat and coolness being the fire element; hardness and weight being earth element; and fluidity being water element. The teaching on form is about coming into contact with the actuality of our felt experience, the actual sense of form—not our ideas or concepts about form.

This exploration is a really good place to begin distinguishing mental and physical experience. So often when I talk to somebody who's just begun this practice, I'll say, "Tell me what you're experiencing." In a practice discussion, we'll be sitting there and I'll ask them to tell me what they're experiencing. Often they'll say something like, "Well, I'm experiencing my shoulder," or "I'm experiencing my stomach." But that is experiencing through a lens of concept, because we can't feel "shoulder." We feel pressure or tension or tightness or aching or pulling, but shoulder is a concept. So this exploration of form is about coming into the actual experience of form.

So then there are the mental aggregates, the four mental aggregates. I'm going to describe these briefly here for now, and then I'll come back to them in talking about how to see them in our actual experience.

Feeling is the experience of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, constantly happening in our experience. The other aspect of this teaching of the aggregates is that they all come up every single moment of experience. Unless we're in some kind of formless jhana, we're experiencing body, feeling, perception, knowing, and mental formation in every single moment. And so every single moment of experience is colored by this feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—and we can recognize that. I talked about this the other morning, so that's the what of feeling. The how of feeling is the process by which we recognize pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—the process by which that happens in our minds, the mental process responsible for sensing and feeling.

Then there's perception. Perception is the process of recognizing experience, a kind of pattern matching where we see, based on what we have known in our past, what we've seen over and over again, and we come up with a label or a name for this experience that we're having. So you can see the color and the form of this thing that I'm holding up, and you will recognize it as a glass. The perception takes in all of these—there are layers of perception. Part of the perceptual process is noticing the color and the shape of this thing, and part of the perceptual process layers on top of that and recognizes that it is a glass. And you know this because you've seen a lot of glasses. Now, you haven't seen maybe this particular glass—you've seen a lot of ones that look a lot like this lately, but maybe not this particular one. But because you've seen them, this process of recognition happens.

This is an extremely helpful process. We couldn't really navigate our lives without this process of recognition. And there are some very sophisticated ways that the mind does this, particularly around recognizing faces. We will recognize the face of our mother like that—it's not going to take us any time at all. So this process of perception serves us really well, and it is not something that we need to stop or need to have any judgment about. It's simply the way our mind works. The difficulty comes in not seeing that this is a process of mind. Essentially, we conflate or confuse the concept with reality, and I'll talk about that more in a little bit. So this perceptual process is a second kind of mental activity.

Then there's the knowing process, consciousness. This is just a very simple meeting of experience. In the suttas it's described as just the bare, simple knowing. It talks about six kinds of consciousness: consciousness of seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, touching, and consciousness of mind objects. So just a very simple, basic knowing of experience.

Before I move on to the fourth mental aggregate, I want to talk a little bit about these three—feeling, perception, and consciousness—as a group. My way of understanding these three is that they are the basic processes that meet our experience. We feel experience, we conceptualize it, and we know it. It's pretty fundamental to the way we navigate our world. It's actually kind of hard to tease these three apart. In fact, there was a person in the time of the Buddha that had this question about how to tease these three apart, and he asked a question about it. I'll read this to you.

The questioner says, "Are feeling, perception, and consciousness—are these states conjoined or disjoined? Is it possible to separate these states from each other in order to describe the difference between them?" And the answer is, "These states are conjoined. It is impossible to separate these states from the others in order to describe the difference between them. For what one feels, that one perceives. And what one perceives, that one cognizes."

So these three really come together to meet our experience.

We can recognize them independently, but we cannot experience feeling without having the knowing and the perceiving happening. We cannot experience perceiving without having the knowing and the feeling happening. It's like there are three facets of a prism. You cannot take one of the facets off—you have to have all of the facets there. So we can look through one of those facets and get the flavor of feeling, the flavor of perceiving, the flavor of knowing. We can distinguish them, but we cannot separate them out.

Then there is the fourth mental aggregate, the aggregate of volitional formation. The Pali term for this is sankhara. And even in the Pali, this has two meanings. It means both what is put together and that which puts together. So it has both an active and a passive connotation to it—both the what is put together and how that putting together happens. Essentially both sides of this are found in this aggregate of volitional formation.

The result, the what, of the process of volitional formation is the many mental activities involving volition, choice, intention. This includes emotions, thoughts, states of concentration, bliss, joy, peace. It includes afflictive emotions, reactive emotions, anger, irritation, lust. This is a really big category. It includes pretty much everything that is not feeling and perception. The process of volitional formation is that which shapes our experience.

I want to read a little bit of the Buddha's words here, because he had a great way of putting things. He says, "Why do we call them volitional formations?" And again, he's using a pun here, so it doesn't translate very well, but: "Why do we call them volitional formations? They construct the conditioned. That's why they're called volitional formations. And what is the condition that they construct? They construct conditioned form as form. They construct conditioned feeling as feeling. They construct conditioned perception as perception. They construct conditioned volitional formations as volitional formations. They construct conditioned consciousness as consciousness."

So this is saying that all five aggregates are being constructed. The volitional formations are responsible for the construction going forward of all of our experience, of all of the aggregates.

How does this work? How can we understand this? Let's take a simple example, like anger. The experience of anger itself is the volitional formation of anger. There's a choice in there. It may not be a conscious choice to become angry. But as I pointed out in my talk last week, when I saw anger coming up, when I saw a thought in the mind and I saw the mind wanting to jump on that thought and think more thoughts to get angry, I saw how that anger was intentional. I saw how there is a choice in there. So the anger itself has this intentional quality to it.

Now, how does this construct the aggregates? How does this impact the other aggregates? Well, if you think about how anger works, when anger is functioning, it distorts perhaps our face. It perhaps brings up physical experience—heat and pressure in the body, tightness, clenching in the jaw, contraction in the stomach. So anger has this impact on form. The feeling aggregate typically becomes unpleasant when anger is present. Perception—we tend to recognize or perceive things through this lens of anger when anger is present.

For example, from my own practice: I was doing a metta practice at one point, and those of you who do metta practice may notice at times that the opposite of metta comes up. We may talk about this in the metta practice on Tuesday nights—when the opposite of metta comes up, it's not necessarily a problem. It's the purification of our hearts that metta draws to the surface, that which is not metta: anger. So I was doing a long period of metta practice over a month, and from time to time I found myself in a really aversive, angry state. One of my jobs during that retreat was to do the dishwashing late at night. I went down to do the dishwashing while I was in one of these aversive states, and everything that I saw was just—wrong and bad. I was doing the dishes and I was having a little trouble closing the machine door, and my thought was an explosion of, "Who designed this stupid machine anyway?"

So you can see how anger influences the way we perceive our experience. When I was feeling metta, even if I had trouble closing the machine, it wasn't like an explosion and a berating of the person who designed it. When anger is present, it influences how we perceive things, how we recognize things, what we perceive.

Our consciousness is also directed by this state of anger—it's like a filter. We may be conscious of certain things and completely unconscious of other things when we are in such a state. It's as if we are attuned to picking up things that affirm this state of anger, and we will completely miss things that are not in line with it. These volitional formations can completely influence what we are actually conscious of.

And having anger tends to construct more anger. So all five of the aggregates are created out of this volitional formation. This is why it is so important to keep track of our intentions—these intentions that James talked about last night. When our mind is motivated and supported by peace and calm and generosity and kindness, it constructs our world more skillfully.

So how can we use this teaching as a support for investigating our direct experience? We'll go through each of these again and look at each one.

The bodily experience—looking at our experience through the actual lens, the actual felt sense of body. Not the concept of head, of hand, of foot, but as I say these now, I'm going to name quite a few elemental kinds of experience. See if you can touch into these in your experience.

The earth element: heaviness, hardness, density, weight. It's a sense of your body, the kind of weight of your body. Earth sitting on earth.

The air element—this is a big area of experience, at least in my experience. There's a lot of different air element sensations: vibration, tingling, pulsing, pressure, movement, pulling, pushing, tension. All of these are air elements.

Fire element is pretty obvious: heat. That's what I'm experiencing right now. Not too much coolness at this moment. We'll get some of that later on.

The water element—this one is a little harder to touch into at times. You might have a sense, a little bit of perhaps some stickiness or some moisture on the surface of your body. The water element is about fluidity, cohesion, liquidity. One way to contact the water element: blow into your hands and then push them together, and then slowly let them come apart, and you'll feel stickiness there. That stickiness is a manifestation of the water element.

So we can experience our physicality in these ways, the touch experience. And then there is form within the realm of sight—the shape and color that comes in is also in this realm of form. In the realm of sound, the pitch and tone that hits our eardrum is also in the realm of form. In taste, there's the bitter, sweet, salty, pungent, sour flavors that our tongue is designed to experience.

All of these take us below the level of concept to the actual experience of form. It's actually hard sometimes to experience this actual physical experience because we usually, in our normal way of living, experience things through our concepts. So it's hard, for example, to eat an orange and not taste "orange." What's actually experienced there is a combination of sweet and sour, the feeling of liquid across the tongue, the tartness and the coolness. There's just this mixture of experience that becomes "orange" like that.

So in this exploration, we quickly move to that recognition of what is experienced—hand or orange or chair—rather than the form or the shape and color of our experience.

It's really hard in the realm of seeing to break this down—to look out at this room and not see men and women sitting there, but to just see a pastiche of form and color. It's happened to me rarely on retreat where that occurs, where I turn my attention to something and it's just a wash of random color blotches, and then suddenly it pops into view. Oh, that's what that is. But that's not a normal place for our experience to go. We typically see things through this filter of perception. So this teaching begins to bring us more closely into contact with the actual physical experience, and we begin to recognize at least when concept is coming into play. I'll talk more about concept in just a minute.

The mental aggregates, the processes of the mind—it's easiest to begin understanding these processes by seeing the result of the process, by observing the result. So by seeing and recognizing pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, for example, we start to see the process. We can begin to see the process of how feeling is felt.

I'm going to start this exploration by talking about mental formation because that's really the easiest one to see. You've all seen a lot of this. This is where we see our anger, our frustration, our irritation, our doubt, our confusion, our calm, our peace, our happiness, our interest. This is where a lot of our experience is found.

As we begin to see these—this "what" of our mental formations, our volitional formations—we start to see how they shape our experience, as I talked about a few minutes ago. If anger is coming up, we can begin to see how it impacts these other areas of experience. We see how it shapes our experience. This is the process of volitional formation, this shaping aspect.

Seeing this, especially around mental formation—seeing how they are a process—really begins to undercut the identification with the result of that process. Seeing that anger is a process begins to undercut the identification with anger. One of the main reasons why seeing them as a process helps us is because identification tends to solidify things. It stops them. As we see things as a process, this process of stopping and solidifying doesn't hold much truth anymore. We see through it.

Another way to explore the mental formations is to look at one of the aspects James was talking about last night: this moment-to-moment intention in our experience. The key defining characteristic of mental formations is that they have an intention associated with them. There's a choice or a volition associated with these. Beginning to see how intention works in your experience is a great exploration around this aggregate of mental formations.

As James mentioned last night, this is easiest to see in our bodily processes. We can particularly notice that we're going to move before we move when making major changes of posture. When you're sitting, before you get up from the sitting, there will be an intention to stand. You can know that you're going to stand before you stand. Actually, you can know that you're going to move before you move, you can know you're going to speak before you speak, and you can know you're going to think before you think. This knowing—this "about to," this recognizing, "I'm about to move"—is catching this factor of intention.

We can notice this even if you're having a still sitting. If there's an itch, for instance, you may notice the intention to move to scratch the itch before you move. In seeing that intention, the intention itself is neutral, but what accompanies it is going to give the direction to the shaping of the future. If it's accompanied by greed, aversion, or delusion, the shaping is going to head in that direction, towards suffering. If it's accompanied by non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion, the shaping will be skillful. It will head us more towards happiness.

In this noticing of intention, we can often see—at least when we recognize "I'm about to move, I'm about to shift my posture"—we can see the motivation that's associated with it and begin to choose or decide: maybe I shouldn't follow through on that. How do I want to shape my experience?

We also see in looking at this that intention comes up—intention arises—and it conditions the next moment. There's an arising of an intention to stand, and then the standing happens. The intention prods us into action.

When we actually start to see this in our moment-to-moment experience, when we start to see this really clearly, it begins to undercut one of the major ways that we identify a self. We have a particularly strong identification of self around being the one who chooses. This is a big area of selfing. Who else would be choosing? But choice chooses. Intention intends. And seeing this in our experience—when we're sitting, we see this impulse, this urge to stand, and then we watch the standing—we see this is just unfolding. We can actually see this happening without there being an "I" doing the choosing.

We also start to see that the choice itself is conditioned.

Suppose you've been driving in a car for a really long time—three or four hours—and you don't have any water with you. That condition of driving for so long without something to drink is going to condition the body to get thirsty. So thirst will arise. That thirst arising conditions the desire or the wish to satisfy it. And so the intention or the plan is formed to stop to get a drink.

All of this just unfolds. There doesn't actually have to be somebody there deciding or making this choice of "I need to pull over and stop." It will unfold on its own. The condition of body not having a drink for a long time conditions the thirst—body conditions body. The thirst conditions the desire to alleviate it—body conditions mind. That desire to alleviate the thirst conditions a plan of action: "I'm going to pull over and stop"—mind conditioning mind. And that plan of action conditions action in the body—mind conditioning body.

It's just a flow of body conditioning body, conditioning mind, conditioning body, conditioning mind, conditioning mind. There's no one doing it. And seeing this, actually witnessing the unfolding of this in your experience, will really begin to undercut this identification with mental formations.

Then there's the feeling process—the process of experiencing pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. Again, there's simply the recognition of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral in our experience. And then there's the exploration of feeling itself: how feeling comes to be.

I had an interesting experience of this on one long retreat—I think it was my first long retreat. I was having a meal, one of the simple teas, and there were apples and bean dip. I think that was all we had that evening. I took a bite of the apple, and it was really pleasant—one of the best apples I'd ever had. It was just about this time of year, fresh and crisp. I took this bite, and a delightful, tingling experience went through my whole body. Pleasant.

So I noticed the pleasantness of it and took another bite—pleasant. Then I took a bite of the bean dip, which had a different flavor and texture. It wasn't quite as pleasant as the apple. Then I took another bite of the apple, and the contrast between the bean dip and the apple made the flavor of the apple all the more pleasant.

I was just noticing. After a while of taking multiple bites of the apple, the pleasantness wasn't quite as pleasant. Then I'd have some bean dip, and the pleasantness would come back in the apple. Over the course of the meal, the mouth seemed to get used to this whole thing, and it wasn't nearly so pleasant.

I began to see how the feeling that comes up is a result of conditions. In that case, the pleasantness was more pleasant having the apple after the bean dip than after multiple bites of apple, because of the contrast between them. Same apple, different conditions in the mouth created different experiences of pleasant.

So we can explore how feeling comes to be. That simple exercise actually showed me how feeling is a result of our choices—a result of karma. How we feel things is shaped by our volitional formations. I saw that directly in that exploration. In your own exploration of vedanā, you can begin to investigate how feeling comes to be.

It's also a very powerful place to watch the process of feeling within the whole flow of how suffering comes to be. I talked about this when I discussed feeling the other morning. A pleasant experience tends to condition a liking—a mental formation of liking. That liking further conditions a wanting, a feeling of "I need this," followed by greed.

Watching how feeling plays into this whole cycle is another very powerful exploration of the feeling process—seeing its place, its role in the creation of suffering.

In being able to recognize feeling in its own experience, as I said, it can kind of short-circuit this almost nearly automatic movement to craving. We can just know: pleasant is pleasant. It doesn't have to move to wanting and needing and grasping. We can just know: unpleasant is unpleasant. It doesn't have to move to "I hate this, I can't stand this."

Then there's the process of perception—the process of recognizing something. I've found this to be a fascinating exploration. This is actually one of my favorite places to explore in the aggregates. It may be a little hard to see initially, but one of the easiest places to explore it is in the realm of sound, at least in my experience.

You'll hear something. There's the contact of the experience of hearing. And then, when the mind is pretty quiet and calm, you may notice that very shortly after that experience of hearing, there's going to be a name set in the mind, or an image perhaps. There's a sound, and then the word "car" appears in the mind, or an image of a car appears in the mind. Or there's the sound of a sneeze, and then an image of a person sneezing appears in your mind. That's the process of perception. There's the sound, and then there's the recognition of the sound.

This is a pretty clear distinction between the two. You can pick up on the actual experience of hearing and recognize that it is different from the label or image that goes through the mind. So that's a place to explore this, a place to play with it.

Another place I've had fun playing with this is in watching the mind try to recognize something that's unfamiliar. I saw this happen last night. I walked into my room and there's a device sitting in the window with a cord hanging down from it that's all wrapped up. I walked in the room and the first thing my mind went was: huge spider. This black cord was there. Then the mind recognized: wire, cord. I could see how the mind misperceived immediately. The mind was trying to recognize something that wasn't very familiar as I walked into that room.

You can sometimes see your mind trying on various explorations of what something is. On one retreat, I walked into a very dim room, and there was something in the dark on the other side of the room. I watched my mind go through several things. The first thing it said was: grotesque being. And then—it took about twenty seconds—it came up with: vase of flowers. I could really see this process of perception trying to recognize. This is something our minds will just naturally do. They'll keep trying until they come up with a fit that feels right. "Ah, vase of flowers. Okay, that's what that is."

In this exploration, we can actually see that this process is prone to mistake. We also start to watch and see that we can easily confuse the concept with reality. Just play with this and see. Especially when perception is making a mistake, it gets a little easier to observe. I had one experience where the mind was confused and was identifying a sound as a pig, but then I discovered that it was actually bats. I could really see how the mind had created a whole story around pigs that were being slaughtered. There was a reality there. But when I found out they were bats, my whole reality changed.

Through this exploration of perception, we can start to see how we mistake concept for reality. This is a huge place where we get caught. In fact, the whole process of selfing—the whole process of identifying a self—is a misperception. It's within this realm of perception, and the fact that perception often makes mistakes, that we delude ourselves into believing in self.

Then there's the aspect of consciousness, of knowing—the process of knowing. Every experience arises with both the experience and the knowing of it. They come up together. And it's possible to see either side of that experience. Most of the time, in our normal way of experiencing things, we're paying attention to what we are knowing—the qualities, the features of what we are knowing. We're not so aware of the knowing itself. But they both come up together, and we can recognize that knowing is happening. It's a pretty subtle experience. It's not something we can try to do necessarily, but your mind will naturally, from time to time, move between what is known and the fact of knowing.

This kind of exploration is definitely not something to do. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, says, "Nothing I tell you is anything to do. I'm just giving you information, and that information may inform you so that you can then see things in a different way." So this is along those lines in terms of information. The mind can recognize the knowing aspect of experience.

One way I've explored this, or one way I've seen this more clearly in my own experience, is by noticing when there's something unpleasant happening—aversion, for instance. Aversion is happening in my experience, and the aversion itself is unpleasant. I discovered this on one retreat. I was noticing the aversion, noticing the unpleasantness of it, and then at some point the mind just shifted to: aversion is known. And the whole experience shifted. The knowing feeling—and I'm not sure whether it was the knowing itself or the mindfulness—had a quality of neutrality to it. So the experience really shifted. I could really clearly see this; I could switch back to knowing the aversion and really feel the unpleasantness of it, and then shift to aversion is known, and I could feel the shift to more neutrality.

So this is a way to explore it. Actually, even using the label—"aversion is known" or "experience is known," whatever experience is known—can begin to point us to this aspect of knowing.

The last piece I'll put out there is that, as I said earlier, these aggregates are happening all the time. Whether we're mindful or not, all of these experiences are happening. Mindfulness fits in as a volitional formation; mindfulness itself falls within that aspect of volitional formation. When mindfulness comes into being, one of the ways to explore these experiences of the aggregates is to see that mindfulness is kind of like a mirror. It reflects what's happening. As mindfulness comes into being, it is already reflecting these five processes that are already happening. These aggregates are already going on, and when mindfulness comes in, it can just notice what's already happening—just notice the feeling that's already happening, what's being recognized that's already happening.

This has been a really big help for me in my practice: the recognition that when mindfulness comes back, I don't have to do anything. There's already plenty going on. The aggregates have already been doing their thing when I wasn't mindful, and mindfulness comes in and can just meet this moment. This is what's happening now. Just waking up to what is already taking place. No need to construct anything, no need to do anything. There's already plenty happening. Just notice what's obvious in that moment.

This exploration will ultimately help us to see how these processes function and begin to loosen that grip of identification that we have.

So let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 51

The Wandering Mind

Andrea Fella · 1h03

> In this retreat talk, Andrea Fella invites practitioners to transform their relationship with the wandering mind—from seeing it as a meditation failure to recognizing it as a rich field for investigation. Rather than simply returning to the breath when we notice distraction, she encourages genuine curiosity about the patterns, causes, and qualities of mind wandering itself.
>
> Fella explores the various forms wandering takes—from low-energy drifting and daydreaming to charged 'mind storms' driven by strong emotions. She draws on the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta to illuminate how our inability to control the wandering mind points directly to the Buddha's teaching on anattā (not-self): 'If consciousness were the self, it would not lead itself to dis-ease.' The talk also examines how perception leads to thinking and then to papañca (mental proliferation), revealing the cause-and-effect nature of experience.
> Practical guidance centers on the moment mindfulness spontaneously returns—a completely effortless arising that can teach us the qualities of awareness itself. Fella shares her own journey of learning to notice this moment earlier in the process, eventually recognizing 'mindfulness re-arising' as it happens. She addresses how feeling tone (vedanā) underlies wandering, why the mind may scatter after periods of concentration, and how to navigate the fine line between non-judgment and complacency. The invitation is not to follow specific instructions but to cultivate genuine interest in this universal pattern.

In my own practice, I found it really helpful to explore patterns or habits of mind that happened to me over and over again. This exploration of a pattern gives us a lot of information about our minds. Each time that pattern happens to us, if we can bring mindfulness to it, it's like we get a different perspective on that pattern. We may see different ways that it comes into being, different ways that it arises, different aspects of our mind that hold it into place, that keep the pattern going, and different ways that it can fall apart. So each time we see a pattern, we get a little bit more information about how our minds work around that pattern or habit.

We all have our own patterns and habits. Some of us will have patterns of anger. Some of us will have patterns of greed, patterns of loneliness or self-hatred. And there's one pattern—at least one—that we all share: the pattern of the wandering mind.

We experience this pattern a lot in our practice. In experiencing it, it's not something we often think of exploring so much in and of itself as a pattern, a phenomenon that might be interesting to watch or observe or get to know. We typically think of it as something that is wrong with our meditation, that we need to get back to being present, get back to the work of being present.

So I'd like to explore with you tonight ways that I have explored the wandering mind, some of the ways that it's helpful for us, some of the reasons it's helpful for us to explore this, what we can learn about ourselves and our minds, and how we can engage with this. I find it actually quite an interesting phenomenon. It happens in so many different ways. The wandering mind itself is not just one kind of phenomenon. There are so many different ways that it happens.

We usually use this term for an experience where we kind of lose touch with present moment experience. We often use the phrase "the mind wanders out of the present moment." This wandering out of the present moment may happen just as a kind of drifting off. This happens particularly as the retreat moves on. At this point in the retreat there's more of this particular kind of wandering where there's just a little bit of low energy and the mind is not quite connected with experience. The mind just kind of drifts off. Some thought has come up into our mind and the mind just drifts off into thinking about that. There's not particularly a charge or any kind of emotional response to that. It's just a drifting. It may not even be thinking about things you know about or care about. Some of you have seen thoughts like that—you find yourself thinking about people you don't know, talking about things you don't care about. Why does the mind do this? This is kind of a low energy phenomenon.

It can manifest too as daydreaming, just images, almost like you're dreaming awake. Or it might even happen as kind of a spacing out—not so much actively thinking, but the mind has lost touch with the present moment and is just in some kind of spaced out state without much thinking. That also can be a kind of wandering. We'll wake up into this space of, "Wow, I was just kind of zoned out there, but there wasn't a lot of thought happening."

And then there are also the familiar kinds of wanderings where it's not so much a wander out of the present moment, it's more like a charge out of the present moment. We leap onto a thought, or an emotion comes up and there's a lot of charge. Maybe call this a mind storm. It's kind of driven by greed or aversion or delusion, some kind of strong emotion fueling the thoughts. Or there might be not so much an emotional charge out of the present moment, but just a kind of reflection. We get caught by our reflections. We get caught by some thought of the past or some thought of the future or even some thought of the present moment, describing what is happening right now.

The general quality of the wandering mind across all these different kinds of wanderings—one thing they kind of have in common is it's basically a state of low mindfulness or non-mindfulness. That's actually what's going on in this experience. The term "wandering mind" is perhaps not quite the best description because that's not what's actually happening. The mind actually doesn't wander anywhere. What happens is that mindfulness disappears, gets lost, and in that space the mind does other things. That's what we call the wandering—basically the non-arising of mindfulness.

or the infrequent arising of mindfulness.

In this space of wandering mind, when the mind has wandered off and there's very little mindfulness or no mindfulness, there's not much we can do about it. We can't make ourselves come out of that wandering mind. We cannot make mindfulness re-arise as an act of will when there is no mindfulness. There's one teaching that mindfulness is the proximate cause of mindfulness. So how does that work? Partly because mindfulness arises spontaneously from time to time. And that's just what happens when we come out of a wandering mind—mindfulness arises spontaneously. When mindfulness has arisen, then we can connect with it and cultivate it actively. So when mindfulness re-arises, we can respond.

We can notice what happens in the moment when mindfulness returns. We can be aware of what the mind is waking up into. We've said this a lot: this is actually a key to our practice, this moment of coming into mindfulness after having been lost in thought. And our relationship to that moment is important—to not have a judgmental relationship, but just to recognize that in that moment mindfulness has returned. What's happening? What is mindfulness aware of as it returns into being? That's one of the ways we commonly recognize the fact of the wandering mind.

There's another way that we wake up from that wandering. At least I've seen this at times, particularly when I'm on a longer retreat like this one. This kind of waking up happens to me a little more: the mind wanders back into the present moment. It's as if you're present, then the mind wanders out of the present moment, and then it wanders back. You've been paying attention to the breathing, the mind wanders off, thinks about something, wanders back, connects with the breathing, and then you recognize that you're breathing. There's a recognition or a memory: wait a minute, I was thinking a minute ago, but I didn't see the mind come back into this. I just remember coming back into this breath. Sometimes it can wander back behind our backs somehow. We just find ourselves back and paying attention to the breathing, but we recall that the mind had wandered.

This is interesting to notice if you can recognize it. If you notice that, the thing to recognize or do with it is basically that you're noticing remembering. You're remembering that the mind wandered. That's what the mind is doing in that moment when it recognizes that it's remembering.

There's a lot we can understand about our minds by observing this pattern of the wandering mind. The most obvious thing we can learn or understand about ourselves is some of our personal patterns—how we get caught, what we get caught on, the kinds of themes that our mind habitually gets hooked to. Through recognizing over and over again the moment of waking up and acknowledging what we're waking up into, we can begin to see and get familiar with some themes. I think it's Jack Kornfield who talks about the top ten thought patterns that we have—we all have our favorite kinds of ways that our mind gets hooked into thought. Part of this exploration is to begin to see: how does our mind get hooked? What does it get hooked to? This is learning about our personal patterns, one of the things we can learn by exploring the wandering mind.

Another thing we can begin to explore or learn with the wandering mind is that our mind is out of control. We sit down to meditate with the plan, the intention to be present, and we find that our mind wanders. Why does that happen? If we're sitting down with the intention for presence, what is it that sweeps us off? Habits sweep us away. Causes and conditions sweep us away. We have very little control over the fact that our minds wander.

There is a little bit of control in the wandering itself, a little way we can begin to explore how our minds wander out of the present moment and connect to that losing touch. I'll talk about that more in just a moment. So there's a tiny little bit of control there. It's not that we have control—it is that the processes of mind have choice. The processes of mind have choice about whether mindfulness will continue or mindfulness will let go and we get lost. There's a tiny little bit of choice that the mind has in that place.

But once the mind is lost, we have no control over how long it wanders or when we'll come back. We don't have any control over when mindfulness will re-arise. And instead of thinking of this as a problem, I find it interesting to recognize that this is actually pointing to a very deep truth—that out-of-control nature of our minds.

The Buddha talked about this out-of-control nature of the mind as pointing to the teaching on anattā, on not-self. In the second discourse that the Buddha gave, the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta, he mentioned this quality of being out of control with respect to the five aggregates. He said: consciousness, perception, feeling, volitional formations, and form are not self. I'm going to express this teaching from the perspective of consciousness, because this is really the exploration I find around the wandering mind—an exploration of consciousness.

Consciousness is not self. If consciousness were the self, it would not lead itself to dis-ease. It would be possible to say with regard to consciousness, "Let my consciousness be thus. Let my consciousness not be thus." But precisely because consciousness is not self, it lends itself to disease. It is not possible to say, "Let my consciousness be thus."

So how many of you would, if you could, say "Let my consciousness be thus"? We can't do it. It doesn't work that way.

We usually see our experience in terms of the sense of self—the sense of I, me, mine—in subtle and obvious ways. Because we have this belief, and it's there until you're fully enlightened, this feeling of "I am." The sense of "I am" is said to be one of the last things to go when one is fully enlightened, so it will be with us for a while. But the belief, the view of self, is something a little more gross. The sense of "I am" is a subtle experience, but this belief in identity—the identity view, the sakkāyadiṭṭhi—we also tend to operate a lot from this belief.

Because we have this belief, it operates kind of under the surface for us. It filters our perception in much the way that states of mind filter our experience. If we have a state of anger coming up, we tend to see things through that filter of anger. Because we have this belief of self, we tend to filter things through that belief. This is one of the key delusions in our minds—this belief in self, this sakkāyadiṭṭhi.

And because it's there, we tend to experience the world in ways that confirm that belief. We notice things that confirm this self-view. We don't particularly notice things that don't confirm it. Or if we notice things that don't confirm it, we just don't connect the dots—that this thing doesn't confirm the belief in self. So it's very hard for us to take in evidence for not-self.

I'd like to suggest that the wandering mind is just such a piece of evidence. We see this over and over and over, but we don't really connect the dots and see how this is pointing to not-self.

Another aspect of this exploration of the wandering mind is related to an exploration of not-self. In exploring the experience of the wandering mind—and any experience that we have, this is not about just the wandering mind—we begin to see the cause-and-effect nature of our experience. Seeing that cause-and-effect nature begins to undermine our belief in our sense of self, because we see that things are just unfolding as causes and conditions, cause and effect, this process of being in flux. That's more evidence for not-self.

The Buddha also pointed to this recognition of cause and effect as being an avenue to explore that will help us understand this teaching. In one teaching, he was talking about this cause-and-effect nature of our experience to one of his monks. This monk was asking him about these experiences. I'm just going to jump into the middle of the dialogue.

The Buddha is saying: "With the six sense bases as condition, contact comes to be." So with the six sense bases—our eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body, and the mind—with these six sense bases as condition, there's contact. Something meets our senses. "With contact as condition, feeling comes to be."

And the monk he's talking to jumps in here and says, "Venerable sir, who feels?"

The Buddha says, "Not a valid question. I do not say one feels."

If I should say one feels, in that case, this would be a valid question. But I do not speak thus. If one should ask me, 'Venerable sir, with what as condition does feeling come to be?' this would be a valid question. To this the valid answer is: with contact as condition, feeling comes to be. With feeling as condition, craving comes to be.

And this monk, not quite getting it, then says, "Venerable sir, who craves?"

So we also have this sense. It's not an uncommon experience to have the sense of who is it that feels, who is it that craves. And the Buddha points us to looking at experience through this cause and effect process that unfolds as a way to begin to understand. There isn't necessarily one who feels. It's a process that feels. Feeling comes to be on the basis of contact.

Through this exploration of the wandering mind, we can see, we begin to see some of the cause and effect nature of our experience. Through exploring the wandering mind, we can start to see something about our minds, our own personal processes, the personal ways we get caught, our patterns, our habits. We get to see and explore the out of control nature of our mind, the cause and effect nature of experience. And we can also begin to understand awareness itself, mindfulness itself, through exploring the wandering mind. We can begin to recognize how it feels to be aware, to be mindful. What are some of the qualities of the mind that is aware, the mind that is mindful? We begin understanding this as a process.

So I'd like to talk about how to explore this. What are ways to look at it? I'd like to talk a little bit about how I've done this in my own practice.

The easiest place to begin this exploration, at least in my own experience, is in the moment when we wake up, the moment when we remember about mindfulness. As I said a little earlier, developing a skillful relationship with this moment is key for us. And I think most of you—all of you are reporting a much less judgmental relationship with that moment. Over the course of the retreat, it tends to be much easier to wake up and to recognize, "Oh, here I am again," and not have it be such a big deal. It's just like, "Oh yeah, here I am. I'm back. Here's what's happening."

Exploration of this moment of mindfulness re-arising has been key in my own practice. Once the judgment has fallen away, I've been able to get interested in this actual re-arising of mindfulness, taking an interest in that moment of mindfulness coming back. What is it about? How does it feel?

One of the most interesting things about it that I find is that since it is a spontaneous re-arising of mindfulness, it's effortless—pure mindfulness, spontaneous mindfulness. Connecting with that moment of mindfulness returning is not something you have to do. It's completely effortless in that moment. So it's a pointer. That moment of waking up is a pointer to a kind of ease that can happen with mindfulness.

It doesn't last for long, that ease. We do tend to have to pick up on that moment and then prompt a little bit. This moment of arising mindfulness, a spontaneous moment of arising mindfulness, we could call unprompted mindfulness. It just happens. Causes and conditions have come together to make it happen. And then we can connect with that moment and continue to cultivate the continuity of the mindfulness.

One thing that's interesting to play with—I find interesting to play with in that moment—is getting a sense of that ease of mindfulness and noticing how long it will last.

There's an analogy that I like to use about this prompted and unprompted mindfulness, about getting familiar with this feeling of mindfulness coming back. It's the analogy of using one of those scooters, those little scooters that kids use, those thin things that you put your foot on and you have to tap on the ground to get your momentum up—not a motorized scooter, but one that you actually have to use your foot with.

In working with the scooter, you have to tap on the ground quite a few times initially to get it going. And then after a while, once the scooter is moving, you can get a sense that you don't have to tap as frequently. You get a sense of the balance, the momentum of the scooter, and you notice when it gets a little wobbly and you need to put your foot down again.

We can have a similar feeling about this quality of mindfulness—that we can get familiar with the feeling of mindfulness itself and get a sense of when we need to reconnect, re-engage, remind ourselves again to be mindful.

In this moment of waking up, we can get a sense of riding that wave of easy mindfulness, that effortless mindfulness. Over time, we develop a feel for when we need to remind ourselves again. We don't necessarily have to jump on that moment, saying, "Oh, mindfulness! I've got to be mindful!" and trying somehow to hold it and grab it. We can begin to get a sense of how much momentum the moments of mindfulness have.

In working with this moment of waking up—not only the recognition of mindfulness and the effortless quality that it has—it's helpful to notice what we wake up into. This is one of the main instructions we give about waking up into the wandering mind: mindfulness has re-arisen. What is it aware of in that moment? Often it's thought—planning, thinking, remembering, judging, arguing, describing, fantasizing. Whatever it is, just recognize it. Awareness has re-arisen. Mindfulness has re-arisen. Simply notice what mindfulness has become aware of in its re-arising.

One thing that can be helpful when working with thought is to recognize not just the kind of thinking that's happened—the planning, the judging, the remembering—but the way in which thinking is happening in your mind. This connects to the process of thought, how thoughts actually occur for you. You might notice them as if you're speaking to yourself, or as if somebody else is speaking to you. Whose voice is it? Your mother's voice? Your partner's voice? Or it might be images. So notice how thinking is happening for you in that moment of waking up. What is it that you've woken up into?

If the thinking is pretty strong, has a charge to it, it's really helpful to notice the emotion underlying it. We're actually waking up not only into the thinking but also into a whole complex of experience that has arisen as a result of the thinking. Thoughts are pretty powerful. When we think certain thoughts, it tends to impact us. If we're thinking about an argument we had with a friend, it can bring up anger in the moment. So in the waking up, is there emotion? Notice the emotion. Notice the feeling tone when you wake up.

This has actually been a really interesting and helpful exploration for me. If there's been some kind of mind storm, some kind of reactivity, you may notice unpleasant experience. If there's been a fantasy, you may notice pleasant experience. But one of the ways I've found this exploration of feeling tone to be particularly helpful is when the mind kind of just drifts out of the present moment—that kind of drifting out I talked about at the beginning, where there's just a little bit of low energy and the mind moves into a kind of drifty space. In my experience, at least, that's a pretty pleasant experience. To connect with the pleasantness of that drifty quality when you wake up gives a little bit of energy to the system. It's a very organic way to connect with that drifting quality of mind, because there's often not much real content to connect with—it's just drifting. But the feeling tone is actually part of what may be holding us in the drifting. The mind has gotten caught in that pleasantness, and it hasn't been noticed. So if we can notice that pleasant quality, we're back. We're connecting with what's actually happening. This has been a really helpful exploration for me—noticing the feeling tone when I wake up.

At one point in my practice, I became really interested in whether I could notice just when the mindfulness returns. I seeded myself with this question: What's the earliest I can be aware of mindfulness coming back? This exploration was actually really helpful in cutting through the whole judging pattern, because what typically happens when we wake up into thinking is that we judge ourselves for thinking, and then we've lost the recognition of that moment of mindfulness. If we're judging ourselves for thinking, there have already been some moments of mindfulness to recognize that we've been thinking. So in taking an interest in this question—how early can I notice the waking up? How early can I notice mindfulness re-arising?—for me, this exploration really cut into the pattern of judging.

And initially, as I explored this, there seemed to be a kind of lag between when mindfulness came up and when mindfulness actually noticed that mindfulness had come up. The mind would wake up—it's like coming out of mud. There's a little bit of awareness, and then the mind sinks back into the mud. A little bit of awareness, and the mind sinks back into the thoughts. A little bit of awareness, and then the mind sinks back. At some point, the awareness gets strong enough to recognize, "Oh, I'm mindful, I'm back."

So it doesn't necessarily happen—at least initially in my exploration—that I was noticing "mindfulness re-arising," just the spontaneous mindfulness re-arising. It was much hazier than that. But this exploration began to attune me to this moment of mindfulness re-arising. Just this exploration of how soon I could notice it seemed to make me aware of the mindfulness earlier in the process, to the point where I did begin to see:

mindfulness re-arising. It's almost like being born in that moment. Suddenly, poof, I'm back. In the midst of reaching up for the shampoo bottle—I'm back, I'm reaching for the shampoo bottle. It's kind of a miracle in a way, that mindfulness re-arises and that we can be there for it re-arising.

So taking an interest in that moment. What does it feel like to be aware now? This was also a key exploration for me: What is the difference between the feeling of being aware now and the feeling of having been lost a few minutes ago, or a few moments ago? We can't really be mindful of the feeling of being lost while in the lostness. But in the waking up, in the moment when we come back into mindfulness, there's a lingering memory of what that feeling of being lost was like. In that experience, there's a contrast between what it feels like to be mindful and what it felt like to be lost.

This exploration, for me at least, really began to point out the qualities of mindfulness—qualities of a mind that is aware and mindful. When I first started sitting, teachers would give instructions in the morning sitting, and often they would say something like, "Feel a sense of presence, connect with a sense of presence in your experience." I would have no idea what they were talking about. I just had no clue what that meant, to connect with a sense of presence. This exploration of the moment of remembering is what began to educate me in what it means to be present.

The feeling of mindfulness is a subtle feeling, but it's actually pretty clear and apparent once you begin to connect with it and pay attention to its qualities. I found that the contrast between the moment of loss and the moment of waking up was a really good place to check into those qualities—the quality of clarity, of brightness, of transparency.

Meditation practice gives us a lot of opportunity to explore this, because we get lost a lot, and this moment of returning happens a lot. Hundreds of times, if not thousands of times through the day, you've got an opportunity to recognize mindfulness coming back. Familiarity with this feeling of mindfulness coming back seems to begin to point out to us when mindfulness comes back. Mindfulness actually comes back a lot through our day, but we don't recognize these moments of spontaneous re-arising that happen all through our day—in daily life and here on retreat.

Spontaneous re-arising of mindfulness happens when we notice the watermelon at the end of the table, and then we leap on it and start planning and thinking about how we're going to get to that watermelon to make sure it's not all gone by the time we get there. We become aware of something, but we aren't aware of the awareness of it. Instead, we leap onto the thing we've noticed and take action or plan around it.

Beginning to familiarize yourself with this feeling of waking up will start to point out these moments of mindfulness to you. This has been a huge gift for my practice, both in retreat and in daily life. These spontaneous moments of mindfulness happen so much. As we get familiar with them, they point themselves out to us, and we get the benefit of these small moments—small moments of completely effortless mindfulness that happen all the time.

I've talked quite a bit about noticing the returning from wandering back into the present moment. We can also begin to explore the other side of the equation: the getting lost. There's this gray area in the middle where there may not be much we can learn. Sometimes there is. Sometimes there's a foggy area in the middle where there's a little bit of mindfulness, where we may be very stuck to thoughts, and yet there's a little bit of mindfulness where we can feel the sense of what it's like to be caught by that thought. Again, there's not a lot of control we have in that situation until mindfulness accumulates and begins to clearly recognize what's happening. Doubt seems to be this way a lot—we get caught in the story, and at some point it's like, "Oh yeah, this is doubt, right, oh right."

So there is that kind of middle area where we can see where we're lost. But mostly the exploration I'm working with here is on either side of that wandering—the coming back into awareness and the getting lost.

Early on in practice, we may think it's not possible to notice where our minds move out of mindfulness into getting lost. But it actually is something we can begin to recognize: how our mind moves out of the present moment. What is the process by which this happens? I'd like to explore a couple of different ways.

This exploration, just to point back to what I was talking about earlier regarding cause and effect—this exploration of how the mind wanders really begins to educate us on the cause and effect nature of our minds.

One of the key ways that our mind tends to wander is from a sense perception. We recognize something, and we're not clearly mindful that we have recognized it. So there's awareness flowing in the present moment, and then there's some perception of something. Sitting in the meditation hall, we hear footsteps. There's the perception of footsteps. When it's not clearly noticed, a process will tend to unfold.

From recognizing footsteps, we'll tend to start thinking about footsteps. "Somebody's coming into the meditation hall. It's the middle of the sitting." So thinking has started. And then the next step of the process that the Buddha talks about is that it's not simple thinking—it moves into full-blown mental proliferation. Papañca is the term the Buddha uses for this. "They're not supposed to be coming into the meditation hall in the middle of the sitting. There are rules about this. I'd better write a note to somebody. We really need to keep the meditation hall quiet. After all, we're doing all these things to make sure the meditation hall is quiet, and here's somebody walking into the hall." We go off. We just get lost.

At any place during this part of the process, we can be aware. But we tend to get caught by something—the footsteps, the thought that it's somebody walking into the meditation hall. That may be what catches us. So we can watch this process happening. This is a cause and effect process: there's sound, there's the perception of the sound, thinking tends to arise very closely after perception, and from that follows mental proliferation.

We can watch this process, get familiar with this cause and effect. Now, we can't necessarily see the whole thing, but we can notice where we're waking up in this process. And knowing how this process works can begin to help us with seeing how our minds wander.

One of the things I think happens to us is that we're paying attention to experience and we have a bit of an agenda about what we're paying attention to. We're paying attention to our body sensations, connecting very clearly with them. And then we hear the sound. Our attention, our awareness, has connected with the sound and recognized it as footsteps. But there hasn't been clear mindfulness of that, partly because of this agenda for staying with body sensations.

So in the practice here, what we begin to notice is when our minds start to lose touch with our object of meditation. It can be a subtle sense of, "Oh, the attention has moved. It's now noticing sound." If we saw that—if we just saw that the attention had moved to sound—then it would simply be hearing, and it wouldn't necessarily lead to getting lost in thought.

Sometimes we have such strong opinions about things that the opinions kind of come in and take over—the opinion that people shouldn't be coming into the hall at certain times, for instance. But we can watch this process, see how the mind wanders out of the present moment.

Another exploration: not only from sense perception, from the recognition of sound or sight or smell or taste, but also from feeling tone. We can wander out of the present moment from feeling tone.

For example, the breath. The breath feels very comfortable. There's a lot of pleasantness. We're paying attention to the breath, paying attention to the sensations of the breath, and the breath has become so pleasant and so comfortable that we kind of drift out of the present moment into the pleasantness. Not necessarily thinking, but also not terribly mindful of the fact that what is happening is that pleasantness is happening. We get lost in the pleasantness. We don't clearly notice that feeling, and we drift off.

And then perhaps—one pattern I've seen in my own mind—"Oh yeah, this feels really good. I should do more of these retreats." I would often notice the flavor of what was going on based on whether I was planning my next retreat or avoiding my next retreat.

We can also drift out of the present moment in response to neutral experience. We don't often notice when neutral is happening. It's something that we don't connect with. So again, this is part of the key to the mind wandering out—when we don't notice something is happening, we don't clearly connect with it.

Beginning to notice feeling tone, noticing that neutral is happening, can be very revealing. One of the patterns I saw happen many times when my mind was in a place of neutral was a sense of leaning into that neutral, kind of expecting or waiting for something to happen. And when nothing happened, I was a failure. I saw that my mind, from nothing at all, from just a place of neutral experience, could launch into this very familiar pattern of "I'm a failure, I'm no good."

Neutral, I think, is a really interesting place to watch familiar habits begin. When the mind is in a space of neutral and is not particularly aware of it, familiar habits and patterns are very likely to arise. For me, it was "I'm a failure."

So we can begin to notice the moment that the mind begins to let go a little bit of what it's paying attention to. You're paying attention to the breath, for instance. There's the awareness of the experience of the breath, and we're connected to the breath. If we have a very strong agenda about that, we may not quite notice that the attention is connected to the breath but just not quite as attentive.

I began to notice this on one retreat. I was doing a lot of breath meditation, and I began noticing that I could feel the attention just losing touch a little bit with the breath. When I noticed that, I'd be like, "Oh, okay, I can come back. Come back to the breath." Then I'd notice that the attention lost touch a little bit with the experience of breathing. "Oh, come back to the breath."

At some point, after noticing that several times—that kind of the mind letting go of the object of breathing—I recognized, "Well, I'm mindful. Why don't I see what the mind is doing? Why don't I just see where the mind wants to go?" And the awareness opened up into a new space, a very broad, spacious awareness, a kind of space I'd not been in before. It allowed a deepening of the practice by allowing the mind, being mindful of essentially what the mind is already doing. The mind let go of the breath—what is it doing here? It was almost as if the holding to the breath was not allowing the mind to settle more deeply in that case. So allowing the mindfulness to stay connected with the awareness: Where does it want to go? What does it want to pay attention to?

There are so many different reasons why the mind wanders. The most common, most obvious are of course the obvious defilements of greed, aversion, and delusion—caught in our patterns, caught in our memories that come up. Recollections arise, emotions arise out of that, and we get caught. Very familiar. Reflecting on the past, thinking about the past, thinking about the future, thinking about the present. All of these are some very obvious and familiar reasons why the mind wanders.

Some other reasons why the mind starts to wander: at this point in retreat, at least one thing I've seen is that there seem to be periods of time where things stabilize and there's a feeling of settledness that you get familiar with. And then either it deepens and settles further, or else suddenly it's like, "Whoa, the mind is wandering all over the place! What's going on? It was so settled yesterday."

In my exploration, I've seen several different things that lead to this phenomenon of the mind being relatively settled and then suddenly it's like an explosion of wandering mind.

One thing that happens is that as the mind starts to relax and lets go of the habitual structures we are familiar with, the surface layers of the mind begin to release, and we settle into a kind of ease in that space. What can happen then is that there's been a relaxation of holding ourselves together with familiar structures of personality. When those familiar structures fall away, sometimes old patterns, deep habits, deep thoughts, and deep feelings can come to the surface because they're no longer being held in. We can open into essentially a new space, and it may be that the very settling is what's allowing this new unsettledness to arise. So it's not necessarily that you've gone backwards. It's a moving into deeper levels of holding, deeper levels of feelings and patterns that will need to surface, that will need to be felt for full freedom to happen.

Another common reason why the mind starts to wander—and this one is probably familiar to some of you—is that the mind gets a bit concentrated, more relaxed, and moves into a kind of dreamlike space. You sit there and it's like you're dreaming. You're not falling asleep, but all these dreamlike images keep arising. Often this is a manifestation of concentration combined with a little bit of low energy. The mind starts to wander because the energy isn't quite in balance with the concentration.

In this kind of space, it's not necessarily helpful to jump on things and say, "I really need to put in a lot more effort here." The mind is actually in a pretty subtle state when there's some concentration but low energy. I've found that very small adjustments can bring up the energy—just open the eyes, or perhaps straighten the spine a little bit. One time I noticed that just thinking "I should stand up" was sufficient. It sent a rush through my body to even have that thought. I realized I could just sit there for a few more minutes because there was more energy in the system. So making small adjustments when the mind is more settled like that can be very helpful.

Another interesting way I've seen wandering happen after times of clarity is that the clarity of mindfulness itself, when we're really, really clearly connecting with moment-to-moment experience, can lead us to subtler experience—experience that we're not so familiar with. And because we're not familiar with it, we get lost.

An example of this, and one of the first times I noticed it, was during a three-month retreat. It was several weeks into the course and the breath had gotten pretty settled, pretty continuous. I was able to stay with my breath for long periods of time. Then one day I sat down and suddenly the mind was just wandering all over the place. What's going on? I began to get curious about this wandering, so I started exploring. I noticed that within the space of a breath or two, the sensations of breath got so subtle that I could hardly feel them anymore. That's when the mind would wander. In seeing that process, I began to learn how to connect with subtle breath.

So just checking in—what is actually happening, particularly if the mind starts to wander after a period of settledness—without assuming that you must have lost your concentration. There are several different reasons why the mind can start to wander in the settling itself, and exploring that wandering, exploring why it's happening, was very helpful for me.

As we get less reactive to the wandering mind and develop more of a sense of "here's mindfulness coming back," there can be a trap: a sense of complacency. There's a fine line between judging ourselves for the mind wandering and falling into complacency—"No problem, the mind's wandering. Oh, here's mindfulness. Yeah, mindfulness is back"—without really connecting with it. We need to be careful that in letting go of judgment, we don't slip into complacency. I found that interest and curiosity in the wandering mind itself was really key to navigating this edge.

I've described many things that can be noticed in exploring the wandering mind, and I'd like to say that this isn't actually something I'd suggest you try to do—thinking, "I need to do this exploration of the wandering mind." It's more that I'm offering you information, and my main hope in this talk is that you become interested in this process and want to explore for yourself what you notice around it. I've described what I've noticed, and in hearing that, you might begin to see some of these things. But it's not so much that you should try to see how perception leads to thinking, leads to proliferation. It's simply information I'm offering.

And so, having given this talk, I'm going to suggest that you forget it. You don't have to try to remember anything that I've said. But I do hope there's a sense of interest or curiosity in exploring this pattern, because it can lead us to some very deep understanding about our minds.

So let's sit for a few moments.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 52

Aversion and Insight

Andrea Fella · 1h02

> In this talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of aversion as a gateway to deep insight rather than an obstacle to practice. Drawing from the Sallatha Sutta (SN 36.6), she illuminates the Buddha's teaching on the two darts—how we compound inevitable unpleasant experience with our reactive aversion, creating unnecessary suffering.
>
> Fella provides an extensive taxonomy of aversion's many flavors, from obvious manifestations like anger and fear to subtle forms such as boredom, impatience, and the quiet wish that things were different. She emphasizes the importance of turning attention away from the trigger of aversion toward the experience of aversion itself, particularly its physical manifestations in the body. This approach helps disentangle us from the narrative fuel that perpetuates reactive patterns.
> Through vivid personal stories, Fella demonstrates how habitual patterns are constructed in the present moment despite having roots in the past. She shares her discovery that even deeply conditioned states like self-hatred can become doorways to profound insight when met with patient, compassionate attention. The talk offers practical guidance for working with overwhelming aversion, including redirecting attention to neutral experience, and reveals the surprising possibility that aversive states may sometimes mask wholesome qualities like mettā waiting to emerge.

Whether you're here for six weeks or three months, we are well into the retreat. And I think most of you have seen by now that, especially on a long retreat like this one, the practice doesn't unfold in a kind of steady progression towards more calm, more peace, more equanimity.

There are cycles in our retreat. It gets smooth and then it gets challenging, and then it's smooth again and then it gets challenging again. Within these cycles, one frequent component is the mind state of aversion. And that's what I'd like to talk about tonight.

As you're all aware by now, aversion comes up a lot in our practice, possibly more for some than others. There is a sense that we each have our own proclivities, our own favorite challenges. Some of us tend more towards the aversion side, some more towards the greed side, some more towards the delusion side, but we all have all three of these aspects in our experience. I'd like to focus tonight on how aversion comes up for us.

We react to physical pain with aversion. We react to what other people do, sometimes the food. We react to our own states of mind. These reactions can be obvious or subtle. Sometimes they might be as clear cut as anger or fear, or sometimes they might be more subtle—just a subtle wishing that things were a little bit different. You're basically with your experience, able to be mindful, and there's just this subtle sense of "it was better yesterday."

Sometimes with aversion—I think Carol referred to this in a way the other day—we think we need to get rid of the aversion in order to practice, that somehow the aversion is in our way, or any of the hindrances are in our way of practice. We think, "Well, yes, okay, I can be mindful of the aversion, but when that passes, that's when the real practice will begin." It can feel like second-class practice if we're working with states of aversion or any state of difficulty.

What I hope to convey this evening is that it's not a second-class practice. In fact, very deep insight can come directly through being mindful of aversion.

Aversion is a reaction to something that we don't like. Typically that something is an unpleasant experience of some kind. I'm going to read you a section from the suttas that I referred to in the question and answer the other morning.

The Buddha says: "The uninstructed worldling"—that's someone who is a normal person—"the uninstructed worldling feels a pleasant feeling, a painful feeling, and a neither painful nor pleasant feeling. The instructed noble disciple too feels a pleasant feeling, a painful feeling, and a neither painful nor pleasant feeling. Therein, what is the distinction, the disparity, the difference between the instructed noble disciple and the uninstructed worldling?"

He goes on to say: "When the uninstructed worldling is being contacted by a painful feeling, he sorrows, grieves, and laments. He weeps, beating his breast, and becomes distraught. He feels two feelings, a bodily feeling and a mental feeling. Suppose they were to strike a man with a dart, and then they would strike him immediately afterwards with a second dart. So that man would feel the feeling caused by two darts. So too, when the uninstructed worldling is being contacted by painful feeling, he feels two feelings, a bodily feeling and a mental one. Being contacted by that painful feeling, he harbors aversion towards it."

Then he goes on to talk about the instructed noble disciple: "When the instructed noble disciple is contacted by a painful feeling, he does not sorrow, grieve, or lament. He does not weep, beating his breast, and become distraught. He feels one feeling, a bodily one, not a mental one. Suppose they were to strike a man with a dart, but they would not strike him immediately afterwards with a second dart. So that man would feel a feeling caused by one dart only. So too, when the instructed noble disciple is contacted by a painful feeling, he feels one feeling, a bodily one, not a mental one. Being contacted by that painful feeling, he harbors no aversion towards it."

Kind of amazing to think about, isn't it? No aversion towards unpleasant experience.

This story that the Buddha is telling is essentially a story of reactivity. We react to unpleasant experience. Life will give us a certain amount of unpleasant experience—that is a given, in a sense. That unpleasant experience may be actual painful bodily experience. It might come because of the ending of something pleasant. It might come from having something pleasant and fearing its loss. And typically we react to this unpleasantness by wanting to get rid of it, by clinging to things that are pleasant.

For example, as I mentioned the other morning, if you injure yourself, if you damage your body in some way, there will be painful feelings.

That painful feeling is simply part of the way the body is designed. It's designed to produce painful feeling when we're injured. But we don't typically just feel a painful feeling. We react to it. "How stupid that was of me not to see that the pavement was uneven!" And we fall down. So we berate ourselves.

We don't even stop there. That kind of berating ourselves is what we might call the second arrow, the second dart. We add a third, a fourth, a fifth dart. We're angry at ourselves for being self-critical. We feel sad for feeling angry at ourselves. This can go on and on and on. This cycle can continue, this cycle of reactivity, stabbing. It's essentially as if we are stabbing ourselves with multiple darts.

Paying attention to this reactivity, paying attention to this aversion with mindfulness, begins to open a space around our experience and our reaction to it. And this is what I'd like to explore this evening.

Aversion seems to have some of its roots, at least, in our biology—just the fact that our physical body produces painful experience. Very naturally, we want to protect ourselves. The body and mind seem to be designed to protect ourselves. So there's a very natural wanting to avoid unpleasant experience. Sometimes it almost feels hard-wired, but it isn't hardwired. It's possible to experience unpleasant experience without that quick movement to reactivity, without the pushing away. As my colleague Gil Fronsdal sometimes says, pain is inevitable; suffering is optional.

Beyond this sense of physical survival, beyond the aversion that comes into play around protecting our body, it seems also that we have a need to protect our identities. I was reading a book about how neuroscientists understand the self to be a construct in the brain. One of the things I found interesting was that as the brain got more sophisticated, the representation of our physical body in the brain became more sophisticated. And essentially, the patterns that protect us—the fear, the aversion—are designed to protect that representation more than they're actually designed to protect the physical body.

This, I think, is how our minds make the leap to identities, and how the sense of identity becomes something that really needs to be protected. We cling to our identities. They're very near and dear to us. And if they're threatened, if our identities become threatened, it's as if our physical being is threatened. This kind of aversion can arise because our sense of identity is threatened. "They don't have a right to do that!"

Aversion can function sometimes as a signal that something needs to be attended to. This is important, I think. Partly coming from the roots it has in our biology, aversion can be a signal that something needs to be taken care of. It's well worth paying attention to aversion.

As we turn mindful attention to aversion itself, without the agenda of wanting to get rid of it—which is just more aversion—the aversion itself becomes the real practice. When there is aversion arising in our minds, that is the real practice. That is what we are encouraged to pay attention to. The first noble truth, which Sally talked about the other night, is to understand suffering. When aversion is happening, there is suffering in the mind. So this aversion is meant to be understood.

When we are turning our attention to understand aversion, it no longer functions as what we could call a hindrance. When aversion is not seen, it is hindering our practice. It's hindering our ability to be present for experience. But when we see aversion, it no longer hinders us. And even in the midst of observing and exploring, even in the midst of understanding aversion, deep insight can arise.

One of the first steps to understanding our aversion is to begin to recognize it in our experience. Aversion has many flavors. After hearing a talk by Carol at one point, I decided to make a list of all the ones I was familiar with. So I'm going to read that list: fear, anger, bitterness, resentment, hostility, dislike, rage, irritation, annoyance, worry, hatred, distrust, cruelty, discontent, frustration, aversion, dissatisfaction. Then I went to the thesaurus and got some more: loathing, disapproval, disgust, fury, disrespect, disparagement, contempt, humiliation, unkindness, meanness, spitefulness, disdain, disquiet, anxiety, apprehension, dread, distress. Many, many flavors—from the subtle to the obvious.

Boredom can also be a manifestation of aversion. It might simply be a kind of disconnect, a manifestation of delusion, but it can also be a manifestation of aversion where what's happening in our present moment experience is just not quite what we'd like it to be, so we move into boredom.

Impatience can also be an expression of aversion. It can be an expression of greed, as in being impatient for something wonderful to happen—that happens to me occasionally. When I was a kid, I definitely was impatient for the holidays to arrive. But more often in my own experience, I've seen impatience around wanting something unpleasant to be over. Even something as simple as brushing my teeth—I've got better things to do than brush my teeth. So impatience can also be a manifestation of aversion.

Beginning to recognize your own familiar flavors of aversion can help you recognize it as it arises in your mind. It's very powerful to simply recognize this state—just a simple recognition. It starts to create some spaciousness around the experience.

In the very early days of my practice, before I had any real meditation instruction, I had read a book that talked about being mindful of your experience. I didn't really understand what mindfulness was, but I was willing to try anything because I pretty much felt like I'd hit bottom. Anger was ruling my life and making me non-functional at times. I would find myself sitting in front of the computer, frozen with rage going through my mind.

So I decided I would start observing anger in my experience—I had read this book and decided to try. Only I didn't know what it meant to be mindful. I hadn't had any instructions at this point. Somebody had sent me this book. I was in the middle of the South Pacific, in the Peace Corps. This was all I had, this book.

I remember the very first time I remembered that I had decided I would pay attention to this anger. I was sitting there, just fuming, and at some point the memory arose. I remembered, "Oh yeah, I said I was going to pay attention to this." At that point there was so much anger in my mind that all I could do was say, "Yeah, I'm angry. This is really unpleasant. This doesn't feel good. What am I supposed to do with this anyway?" That was about all I could do with it.

After some seconds of sitting there in that space, I thought, "Well, I guess I go back to work. I don't know what I do with this." In retrospect, even that very first time, I see that it gave me enough space—just that recognition. "Oh yeah, I'm angry." Just that recognition gave me enough space to be able to go back to work.

I kept going with this over the course of several months, just noticing anger when it arose. What I began to notice and recognize was that, just through the simple willingness to recognize anger—not even having all the tools of mindfulness that you all have—the mindfulness began to recognize the pattern of anger earlier in the cycle. The mind didn't spin out quite so much anymore. I saw the direct benefits of mindfulness in that I was no longer ruled by the anger, and it wasn't taking me to that non-functional space anymore. Just the simple recognition. That simple recognition is very powerful.

It's also very important within our practice, particularly on retreat, to recognize when there is aversion in your relationship to your experience. If there's a struggle happening in your meditation, check your relationship with your experience. There may be some kind of aversion happening—it may also be greed or delusion. But check and see: is there some kind of aversion hidden in the way that we're attending to experience? It's really prevalent.

I've heard it in many of your interviews—paying attention even to something not terribly challenging, just some small pain or discomfort, noticing it, able to be with it, not particularly difficult to be with it, and yet there's a very subtle sense of: "I wish this wasn't here." That very subtle sense, that quiet "I wish this wasn't here," is a form of aversion and needs to be recognized, opened to. That may be all that's needed—simply acknowledging, "Yes, there's aversion here. There's a little bit of this not-wanting happening in my mind."

Recognizing that aversion is happening is crucial. In working with aversion, in working with this challenging mind state, it's really helpful to bring a sense of acceptance, allowing, kindness, and compassion to the state of mind. We turn to recognize this experience in the mind and body in the present moment.

One key to this exploration of aversion is turning the attention away from the thing that we are averse to. There's often something in our experience or in our environment that is triggering the aversion. It may be the way somebody is taking their food in the dining hall. It may be the way somebody is walking. It may be something happening in your own body. In working with aversion, it's helpful to take the attention out of the thing that is the trigger for the aversion and turn the attention to the experience of the aversion itself—taking the attention out of that external object and placing it, turning it back towards the mind and body. How does it feel in the mind and body? Aversion feels like this.

With aversion, often both the aversion and the thing that we don't like are unpleasant. This is essentially the teaching of the two darts. There's something that we're responding to, and that's unpleasant. And then the aversion is unpleasant. So it creates a kind of positive feedback loop. Because of this, because they're both unpleasant, the effect seems to be multiplicative. It multiplies the intensity of the unpleasantness when we react to an unpleasant experience with aversion.

Because of this dynamic, attending to aversion can be difficult—we see how unpleasant it is. But we do start to see, as we bring our mindfulness to the aversion, that what we're experiencing, the unpleasantness that's experienced with mindfulness, is somehow less out of control than it is when the aversion is just running on its own. And we begin to see that this kind of suffering we experience around observing the aversion, the unpleasantness that we experience, is what some people call the suffering that leads to the end of suffering.

We begin to see that being mindful of our aversion gives us a pathway towards freedom from suffering. And as we see this, as we see the benefit that it brings to be mindful of our aversion, it's almost like the aversion starts to trigger the mindfulness. At least that's been my experience—that if any kind of difficulty begins to arise in my experience, mindfulness is pretty much right there. It becomes a mindfulness bell. It becomes a very strong incentive for mindfulness.

When we're experiencing aversion, as many of you have seen in your own experience, there's often a lot of thinking present. Not always, but very often there's a lot of thinking: "Why did they do that? They shouldn't have done that. I was right about that. They were wrong. That was a really unpleasant thing that they did." We can get lost in the narrative, the story, the thoughts around the aversion. It's really helpful to not put the attention there. Turn the attention towards the bodily experience. How is this aversion manifesting in the body? Aversion is a mental state, but it does create bodily experience. Notice the immediacy of the emotion in the body. Anger might feel like tightness and heat. Fear might feel like contraction in the abdomen or tightness in the throat.

Bringing our attention to the physical sensations helps us to let go of that narrative, and the narrative itself is one of the fuels for the pattern. Turning our attention away from the narrative and towards the bodily experience gives us a way to let go of the fuel. The bodily experience is a result, an effect of the manifestation of the emotion. And turning our attention towards that can be a way for us to simply allow it to flow in our experience as opposed to continuing to churn it up.

Turning attention to the sensations in the body, turning our attention to the physical sensations—it's really helpful in doing this practice to be very clear that what you're paying attention to is physical experience, not mental experience. For instance, if you are noticing that there's fear and you're paying attention to the contraction in your abdomen, know with the mindfulness—if you're using the noting practice, this becomes easier in a way.

Know that the mindfulness is observing physical experience, not the fear itself. So if you're using the noting, you could note "contraction, contraction" as opposed to "fear, fear." It seems like a fine point, but this is actually more important than you might think. It serves a couple of purposes.

First, it helps us to distinguish, to disentangle from the aversion, because the physical experience is not the aversion—it's a physical manifestation. And the other thing is it helps to clarify the mindfulness. We know at the moment what we are paying attention to is the physical experience, not the mental experience.

This has actually been quite important in my own practice. On one retreat here, I was waiting for an interview, and often, as I think many of you have also had the experience, before the interview I was experiencing anxiety. So I was sitting there waiting for the interview and noting: anxiety, anxiety, anxiety is happening. And this interview before me happened to go on for quite a long time, so I got to pay attention to this for a really long time. I was just noting—anxiety, anxiety, anxiety—and it didn't change much.

This actually kind of surprised me, because by this point in the retreat, often if I really clearly met something with mindfulness, it began to shift and change. So I got interested in the fact that it wasn't particularly changing, and I began to pay more attention to the physical manifestation of the experience in the body. The body was experiencing a kind of quivering—the whole body was quivering. And as I connected to that quivering experience directly, letting go of the label "anxiety," I realized that what was happening was rapture, not anxiety. The situation had fooled me, in a sense. The context of where I was, having experienced anxiety in that situation many times, had created an assumption.

And so this attending directly to the physical sensations can actually help us clarify what's really happening for us. If we have assumptions about what's happening, if we assume that it's anxiety or some other experience, that can almost become a self-fulfilling prophecy. So just connecting with the physical experience, just connecting with it, noticing that directly.

Since the kind of connection between aversion—what we react to is the unpleasantness; there's the unpleasantness and then the aversion is the response to the unpleasantness—it's really helpful to pay attention to unpleasant experiences. On one retreat, Carol was sitting up here giving a dharma talk about aversion. One line that I still remember from that talk was: "If you're experiencing aversion, there's something unpleasant in your experience that's not been noticed."

This is actually interesting. When we're experiencing aversion, sometimes we're not actually aware of what it is we are reacting to. This can be a very interesting exploration. When there's aversion happening, see if you can recognize what it is that's unpleasant in your experience, what you're responding to.

Not long after that talk that Carol gave, I was doing walking meditation in the walking room out here. It was pretty crowded in the room. We were doing walking and we were kind of close to each other. Then somebody came up and slipped in between me and the person next to me. The aversion just surged. I thought, okay, there's aversion, so what's unpleasant here in my experience? I had a sense that it wasn't so much just that the person had come in close, but that there was something about this particular person that was bothering me.

So I began exploring my sense doors. The person wasn't particularly unpleasant to look at. There wasn't any particular unpleasant smell. They weren't bumping into me, so there wasn't any unpleasant physical contact. I just kept walking. I ruled out all the sense doors. There wasn't anything unpleasant in my physical sense experience. I thought, well, it must be something in my mind. But I hadn't really seen it—I hadn't seen what it was.

So I thought, okay, I'll just keep an eye out for thoughts, things going on in my mind while I'm doing this walking meditation and feeling the aversion. At some point, doing the walking, I didn't see many thoughts at first. Then this thought came up: "He's weird." Oh, there's a thought. And I still didn't quite connect the aversion to that thought. But I just kept walking. And then the next thought that came up was: "He's walking in bare feet and it's freezing cold out." This was my justification for the weirdness.

So I saw this whole thing. And as I actually saw that, what I realized was that I was averse to an experience in my mind. I was averse to something happening in my own mind.

It was so clear to me that this was a construct in the mind, something I was averse to. And as I saw that, the entire thing fell apart. In the very next pass, there was spontaneous metta toward this person.

So exploring for that unpleasant feeling tone—it can actually be in our ideas more often than you might think. What is the unpleasantness we're actually responding to?

One evening at my home, I was having some insomnia. Often when I have insomnia, what I do is meditate. So I had gotten up to meditate, and I was in my meditation posture when I heard this very slight tapping sound. It was the middle of the night, probably half an hour or so into my meditation, and I heard this very quiet tapping. The experience was that the hearing, the sound itself, was unpleasant. I didn't like it. Just noticing that unpleasantness, noticing hearing as unpleasant, I kept meditating.

The next time the tapping came up—it was kind of intermittent—I noticed a contraction in the body when the tapping came. And the contraction was unpleasant, so I noticed that. I noticed the contraction. I noticed the unpleasantness of the contraction. Then at one point when the tapping came back, I noticed a very quick burst of fear. And the fear was definitely unpleasant.

Then when I noticed the tapping the next time, having observed and worked with the fear a little bit—it wasn't a strong fear, but it was there—the next time the tapping came back, I realized that the tapping itself was not unpleasant. It was actually even slightly pleasant, just this quiet little tapping. Again, reacting to something in the mind. Very interesting. The unpleasantness wasn't in the sense experience. The unpleasantness was in the mind, the reaction in the mind.

Our strongest patterns, our habits of mind—the ones that really bite us, that grip us, that come back over and over again—sometimes seem to come out of nowhere, as if they're somehow lurking in our subconscious, just ready to spring up. We have this sense sometimes of these very deep ruts in our minds.

Observing strong patterns in my own experience, something I have really come to appreciate is that even though these patterns are deeply conditioned—we've practiced them a lot, and there are many causes and conditions from our past that lead us to react in a certain way—in a sense, there are kinds of ruts in our mind. We've practiced a pattern over and over and over again so that the neurological explanation is that when we practice a pattern a lot, the nerves in the brain say, "Well, this is a really important pattern. I'd better shore this one up." So when we practice something a lot, a particular kind of reactivity, the pattern gets very ingrained in the brain.

In a sense, those patterns are there in the brain, and yet if we're not activating that particular pattern, it's not happening. And one thing I've seen in my experience, over and over again—I've seen this enough to have a deep sense of confidence in it—is that when we are experiencing a habitual pattern, a very strong habitual pattern, it is being created in the present moment. The suffering of that pattern, the arising of that experience is happening in the present moment because of causes that are arising in the present moment.

For example, I have had a very strong pattern around feeling like I'm a failure at practice. Is this familiar to any of you? I would see this come up over and over again in my practice. At one point, I was sitting a three-month course here, and my room was in the gym, which is just below the Catskills. I went downstairs one afternoon and walked through the door. I just pushed the door open in the gym, and I actually watched the construction of the pattern of "I'm a failure" happen as I pushed the door open.

What happened in my mind was that a memory arose of some days before when I had been going through that door in a really concentrated state. Having seen that memory, my mind immediately compared my present state to that state and found it wanting. Not as concentrated as I was two or three days ago. You're a failure.

I could clearly see that there was a trigger, something happening in the present moment. A thought arose in the present moment that there was a reaction to. So I began getting interested in these triggers. When this pattern came up, I was clear that there was something happening in the present moment. It wasn't just some pattern waiting to spring up—although it can be at times.

I want to restate this because it's really important: while there may be conditions in the past that incline us towards particular habits or patterns of mind, the experience of that habit—the re-arising of a pattern like "you're a failure" or "I hate myself" or "I'm depressed," whatever our favorite pattern might be—the arising of it happens in the moment. There are causes in the moment that make that pattern happen. Everything you need to know about that pattern is happening in the present moment.

It's not actually necessary with our mindfulness practice to go back and dig and think about why we are this way. Why do I feel like I'm a failure? Oh, it must have to do with when I was a kid in school and all the kids teased me. Thinking about that is not so helpful in our mindfulness practice. But noticing what's happening in the moment as the pattern arises—that is very helpful. We begin to see the conditions, the causes in the moment for that pattern to come into being. And by witnessing this with mindfulness, these patterns begin to slowly, slowly, slowly unravel.

This kind of recognition—my seeing that thought arise, followed by the comparing, followed by the response of feeling like a failure—was watching cause and effect happen in the mind. This is insight, direct insight into the unfolding, impersonal nature of our experience, right in the midst of observing aversion.

Sometimes when experience is neutral, another place where strong habits can come into being emerges. I find that when experience is neutral, it's almost as if our neural circuits are just wandering around to see where they can hook onto something. So I've often noticed that when things start to get really neutral, some of my strongest patterns can arise in just a split second.

I began getting interested in how this happens. Again, I saw some of the triggers at work. On one retreat at Spirit Rock, I was doing walking meditation and had moved into a space where quite a bit of neutral was happening. I had heard enough dharma talks by this point to have the idea that when it starts to get really neutral, it might mean something good is going to happen. So I started leaning in, waiting. Sometimes I would notice this waiting, just recognize, "Oh, waiting is happening." Other times it would slip by unnoticed.

What I saw was that in this space of neutral, with that waiting for something really good to happen, when nothing really good happened, my pattern—"you're a failure"—came up. On this particular retreat, my mindfulness was clear enough that I had to laugh. It amused me that out of nothing, my mind could create this pattern of "I'm a failure."

Looking at neutral can be an interesting place to watch where our particular forms of strong habits arise, whether they are greed or aversion. Whatever your strong habits are, looking in that field of neutral can be a very interesting place to see how our minds construct these patterns in the moment.

Sometimes these states of aversion can get overwhelming. Sometimes the aversion can be stronger than our ability to be mindful. So it can be helpful to have some skillful means for working with states like this. This can happen at any time—it may happen in the middle of a long retreat, or it may happen at home in your daily life.

One thing I found particularly helpful in my own experience, when a pattern arises that—in my case, the pattern I was observing was anger. Anger was my favorite. When anger would come up around a particular situation, what I found helpful, after realizing that when I tried to bring mindfulness to that experience it sucked me in—the anger was stronger than my ability to be mindful of it—was to recognize that it wasn't so helpful to try to be mindful as long as that anger had the upper hand.

So what I began doing was turning my attention to something neutral in my experience. I turned my attention, in this case, to my feet. Often it seemed that my pattern of anger was arising when I was walking, so I would simply put my attention on my feet on the ground, allowing that anger to be there without pushing it away.

This kind of redirecting of attention needs to be done skillfully. It can't be done with the sense of "I can't feel this, this is bad, I can't feel this anger." It needs to be done really gently, more as a "not now." The way I did this with my own anger, I initially had a conversation with it: "I'll pay attention to you when my mindfulness gets stronger. In the meantime, I'm going to put my attention on my feet." Eventually that got collapsed to simply "not now"—a very gentle way of redirecting my attention to my feet.

This was really helpful. This pattern unfolded over the course of months. What I saw, essentially, was that pattern of anger arising less frequently in my experience.

Until one day I recognized, wow, I haven't felt that in a long time. And it was gone. I didn't believe it. I thought, where did it go? Even bringing the person up in my mind didn't create the anger. And this all unfolded simply by doing that gentle letting go, gentle putting aside. So that approach can also be very powerful. We don't actually have to confront these things directly. It's more the not engaging, the not entwining—that's what's most important. And for me at that time, not entwining meant putting my attention someplace else.

Sometimes people ask me, "Well, how about the breath? How about if I put my attention on the breath?" If you find that works for you, great. But I often find that with strong emotions—many of these strong emotional experiences are felt physically in the realm of the torso. And if you're paying attention to your breath in the area of the torso, sometimes that can just draw you right back into the experience. So I found putting my attention somewhere in the periphery of my body—my feet, my hands, perhaps sound—was very helpful. Explore for yourselves what works. You could also redirect to metta, if that is a practice that really resonates for you. That is the traditional antidote to aversion, bringing metta into the mind. In my own experience, I found that I was so averse to doing metta that it wasn't helpful for me. So I just let that go and put my attention on neutral experience instead.

Something that has come as a surprise to me in my own practice—but having now seen it several different times, I've begun to appreciate it—is that sometimes aversive mind states can be a reaction to wholesome states of mind. We can be averse to the feeling of love, the feeling of generosity, the feeling of happiness—believe it or not. I've seen this enough in my own mind to recognize it.

When we're experiencing aversion, sometimes we have this sense or notion that there's this complex of stuff happening, and everything in there must be unskillful, unwholesome, and what we need to do is get the scalpel out and cut out the whole thing and get rid of it. What I've begun to recognize in my own experience is that sometimes aversion can be masking a wholesome state.

I'll give an example from my experience. On one retreat, I was noticing depression arising pretty frequently, especially while I was walking. This was in Burma at the Shwe Oo Min Monastery, and at that monastery there's an evening period where people walk together in pairs or threes, and talking is allowed. I would particularly find the depression arising when I noticed people talking together. I came up with some idea about exclusion from when I was a kid in high school, feeling left out, and that's why the depression was arising. But I'd had enough experience to realize that's not so helpful. I don't actually know that—it's just an idea. So let's just observe this depression. Let's see what's happening.

I began observing it, and I spent quite a bit of time noticing resistance to the depression first—that there was depression and some resistance to it. So noticing that resistance. At some point I began to see deep sensations in the area of the heart, this contracting feeling, an unpleasant contraction around the heart.

During one sitting, finally, after several weeks of watching this, observing this, I felt the sensation of this contraction just completely not resisted at all—just completely not resisted, this feeling in the area of the heart. And it got big. This feeling of almost painful contraction just grew and grew. It was easy to let that happen because there was no resistance. It grew and grew and got really big. And then it flipped into metta. The next thought in my mind, after this beautiful expansive feeling of suffusing metta, was: "This is stupid, this is sappy, this is corny." I recognized in that moment that I had some resistance to that quality of metta.

Having recognized that, I didn't actually see a direct connection between that kind of reaction to the metta and the depression. But having seen it, the depression stopped happening. I'm not saying I was living from then on in this beautiful expansive state of metta. I realized, wow, I've got some work to do here.

But I've seen this happen more than once—that underneath some kind of aversive state of mind can be a very beautiful state of mind. By going in and through and not resisting, we may open to something really beautiful.

Sometimes we hear that when concentration is strong, the hindrances are at bay. Concentration is strong, so I'm not going to be experiencing aversion. And then we hear that concentration is needed for insight to arise. We put these together and think, "If I'm experiencing aversion, there's no way I can have insight. I can be with my aversion, but there's no way I'm going to learn anything here. The learning has to happen later when my mind is completely balanced and equanimous. That's when the insight will happen."

Well, I've seen in my own experience that when we can be with our aversive states without resistance, deep insight can happen.

I'll tell you one more story from my own practice. On a three-month course—this was my self-hatred retreat. Not that it was the only time I ever experienced self-hatred, but it came up a lot on this retreat. I got to see it from so many different angles. It would come, it would go, and I would see it when it came. Initially, there was definitely this sense of, "Well, okay, I guess this is my self-hatred retreat," but I didn't really trust at that point the depth of insight that could come from really just meeting this kind of experience. So it was kind of like, "Okay, well, I guess there's not going to be any deep insight here, but I guess I'll be with my self-hatred." Over and over again, just working with it, working with it, working with it.

Then one night in the hall, Joseph was doing a question and answer session, and he talked about a pattern he'd had where he got really stuck. He came up with this tool for himself that seemed very helpful when he got really stuck. It was what he called a "double noting." He would note the contact of the thing he was reacting to, and then the feeling tone. For him it was lust, so he would note, "Contact pleasant, contact pleasant." The double note seemed to really bring him right into the experience, make it a little bit easier to just be right with what was happening.

Having heard that, I was leaving the hall, walking up the little stairs out into the cloakroom. As I took those steps, I felt the self-hatred descend. I felt powerless over it. It just came crashing in. But my mindfulness was pretty clear. I went back to my room and thought, "Okay, I'm just going to be with this."

I started using that double noting Joseph had talked about. Whenever I saw the mind wavering towards even the subtlest thought—"You're no good, you're a failure, I hate you, you're a bad person"—whatever thought, even just the slightest movement towards it, I would note, "Contact unpleasant. Contact unpleasant."

In the process of this, at some moment, I heard people coming back from the late-night sitting. I was sitting in my room, and I thought, "It's ten o'clock. Time to go to bed." But something in me said no—I'm just going to stay here with this. It felt like something was happening. Just "contact unpleasant, contact unpleasant."

At some moment in that seeing, the mindfulness just completely saw the arising of this pattern of self-hatred. I can't even describe to you how it saw that. But what it saw in that moment was: this is just a construct of the mind. It's just a thought. Seeing that—basically the emptiness of that thought, that it's just a thought—the very next moment, mind and body were flooded with bliss. Split second from self-hatred to bliss.

There was the subtlest feeling of "Oh, never again." Then came a recognition: "Oh no, this insight too is impermanent." And the bliss moved into more of a balanced equanimity.

I didn't really trust or believe in that moment that this had uprooted the pattern of self-hatred. And it hadn't. But it was a couple of years before I experienced self-hatred again. And when I began seeing it, it was the subtlest forms—just little thoughts.

You're no good. And there was no belief in those thoughts anymore.

So that moment of observing that pattern of self-hatred, deeply, deeply cut into that pattern, radically transformed my relationship to myself.

This happened through the willingness to be with the aversion. When aversion is happening, our path is being with the aversion. And truly, attending to these states with mindfulness, with compassion, with kindness, can lead us towards some very deep insights and freedom.

So let's sit for a few moments.

CHAPTER 53

The Cycle of Suffering: Paṭicca Samuppāda

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this comprehensive talk, Andrea Fella unpacks paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), one of the most profound and complex teachings in Buddhism. Drawing from the Kaccānagotta Sutta and other discourses from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, she explains how this twelve-link chain serves as a detailed exposition of the second noble truth, describing the precise conditions through which dukkha arises in our experience.

Fella guides practitioners through each link—from avijjā (ignorance) through saṅkhāra (mental formations), viññāṇa (consciousness), nāmarūpa (mentality-materiality), the six sense bases, contact, vedanā (feeling), taṇhā (craving), upādāna (clinging), bhava (becoming), jāti (birth), and finally jarāmaraṇa (aging and death). She presents this not merely as a cosmological description spanning multiple lives, but as a moment-to-moment process observable in our own experience. The arising of a self-identity as "a good yogi," for instance, demonstrates how this entire chain unfolds within ordinary experience.

The practical heart of the teaching lies in recognizing the "weak links" where mindfulness and wisdom can interrupt the cycle. Particularly at the junction between feeling and craving, clear awareness can prevent the automatic cascade into suffering. Fella emphasizes that ignorance co-arises at every point in the chain, and wherever wisdom meets experience, liberation becomes possible. She concludes with the Buddha's teaching that all things —whatever we bring mindful attention to—have liberation as their essence and culminate in Nibbāna.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the teaching of dependent origination. This teaching is fundamental, foundational to the Buddhist teaching, and it is also an extremely complex teaching. I think of dependent origination, which is a chain of twelve links that describe the causes and conditions that lead to suffering, as a detailed exposition of the second noble truth. It goes into great depth about how suffering comes to be in our experience.

Sometimes dependent origination is called the middle teaching—distinct from what we usually think of as the middle path or middle way. The middle teaching, at least in my understanding, is not a practice but rather a description of how suffering is created in our experience. The middle path is a set of practices that help us to understand and see this teaching in our moment-to-moment experience.

I'll read you a quote from a sutta that talks about how this is a middle teaching, from the Saṃyutta Nikāya:

"This world, Kaccāna, for the most part depends upon a duality—upon the notion of existence and upon the notion of non-existence. But for one who sees the origin of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no notion of non-existence in regard to the world. And for one who sees the cessation of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no notion of existence in regard to the world. 'All exists,' Kaccāna—this is one extreme. 'All does not exist'—this is the second extreme. Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathāgata teaches the Dhamma by the middle, the middle teaching. With ignorance as condition, volitional formations come to be. With volitional formations as condition, consciousness comes to be. With consciousness as condition, name and form. With name and form as condition, the six sense bases. With the six sense bases as condition, contact. With contact as condition, feeling. With feeling as condition, craving. With craving as condition, clinging. With clinging as condition, existence. With existence as condition, birth. With birth as condition, aging and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair come to be. Such is the origin of this whole mass of suffering."

What the Buddha is pointing to here is that largely we think about things in terms of either existing or not existing. He's pointing to this teaching of dependent origination as a counter to that, a middle way between those two extremes. When we see that the origin of experience is in this causal chain—that it's simply a product of causes and conditions creating experience—the idea of non-existence doesn't occur to us. And when we see that the cessation of these very same conditions is just a causal process, the notion of existence doesn't really fit for us either. So this teaching is between these two extremes of existence and non-existence. There is a chain of conditions that leads to a kind of stream, but it's not existence in the way that we think it is. It's not a thing existing; it's a process—a conditioned process of things coming together and falling apart.

This teaching is complex, with twelve links in the chain of dependent origination, and I will cover them all this evening. This teaching has always been complex. There is an interchange between Ānanda and the Buddha that underscores this complexity. Ānanda comes to the Buddha and says, "It is wonderful, it is marvelous how profound this dependent origination is and how profound it appears. And yet it appears to me as clear as clear." And the Buddha says, "Don't say that, Ānanda. Don't say that. This dependent origination is profound, and it appears profound. It is through not understanding, not penetrating this doctrine, that this generation has become like a tangled ball of string, covered with a blight, tangled like coarse grass, unable to pass beyond states of woe, ruin, and the round of rebirth."

So the Buddha basically equates a penetrative understanding of this teaching with full liberation. We probably won't get there tonight, but there's one sutta that I really like to contemplate, both when giving Dharma talks and when hearing them. It's a story of a monk who's giving a Dharma talk about the five aggregates. He's not fully enlightened, but he's more awakened, more realized than the people he's giving the talk to. So he's explaining to them his understanding about the five aggregates, which they don't really understand very clearly at all. The sutta says that during the process of giving this Dharma talk and having a Dharma discussion—because it was actually a back-and-forth discussion—both all the people who were listening and the person who was giving the talk became fully enlightened. So there's hope for all of us tonight.

I hope to make this talk both clear and practical. This teaching can seem obscure, sometimes almost irrelevant—why do I need to know this? I have actually found it helpful in my own practice to have some understanding of this teaching, and so I'm going to offer it in a way that will hopefully give you some sense of its practicality, why understanding this is helpful, how this teaching can support our practice.

A couple of comments about that just to begin. I think one of the key ways this supports our practice is that it provides such a clear causal description of how suffering is created. This is an impersonal process that's described. It happens in all of our minds.

It's not just me or just you that experience this. It's an impersonal process. So it helps us, seeing this or hearing this teaching—at least for me—to resonate or connect with the impersonal nature of the arising of suffering.

The other aspect of this teaching that is helpful is because it does describe a set of causes and conditions that lead to suffering, and it points to suffering and the causes of suffering as happening in our mental processes. This chain describes a set of conditions leading from one to the other, tending from one to the other.

But as Guy said the other night when he spoke about a portion of this chain of dependent origination, it's not in lockstep once this thing gets started. It's not as if it's just dominoes. It can sometimes seem like that—we can watch portions of this chain falling as though dominoes were stacked up against each other. But it is as if at some point, through clearly seeing particular aspects of this chain with wisdom, with mindfulness, that chain can be cut. Through seeing how the causes are created in our minds, choices that we make can begin to dismantle this process. Through understanding the causes of suffering, we see that when the causes are not arising, the suffering doesn't arise. And the choices that we make can help support the causes of suffering to not arise.

So the twelve links of dependent origination—I'll just state them right now and then go through them. Ignorance conditions mental formations, conditions consciousness, conditions mentality-materiality. The Pali word for this is namarupa, sometimes translated as name and form. Then name and form, mentality-materiality, conditions the six sense bases—our eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Having the six sense bases conditions contact. Contact with the sense bases conditions feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Feeling conditions craving. Craving conditions clinging. Clinging conditions becoming. Becoming conditions birth. Birth conditions old age, sickness, and death—and as the Buddha says, the entire mass of suffering.

Before I go into the links, I want to just point out that this chain is often described not just as a one-way chain to suffering, but as a cycle. So the ending of this chain at suffering doesn't simply end with suffering; it actually loops back. Suffering tends to condition more ignorance—although it doesn't have to, and I'll get to that in a little while. So this cycle loops back on itself. Suffering tends to condition more ignorance, which then sends the cycle into another round.

The classical teaching on this topic, in the commentaries in particular, breaks this chain down into essentially three lives. In that teaching—and I see this potentially as partly a pedagogical way of understanding this cycle—ignorance and mental formations, which are the first two links in the chain, come from a previous life and condition the arising of consciousness in this life. So the chain of dependent origination broken into three lives has the previous life being ignorance and mental formations. Then the links from consciousness through mentality-materiality, six sense bases, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, and becoming—all of that is in this life. And then that conditions our arising into the next life, into birth, and aging and death.

So the literal phrasing of the links, particularly birth, aging, and death, tends to support this notion of this chain being a description of how the round of suffering is carried from life to life. Part of the teaching here serves as a way of understanding a question frequently asked in the time of the Buddha: if there's no self, who gets reborn? His answer to that lies in this chain of dependent origination. It's just causes and conditions flowing.

So the suttas support this understanding of the chain of dependent origination as describing how suffering continues or propagates between lives. And they also support an understanding of the teaching as a description of how suffering is created moment to moment in this life.

If we even think about it, to break it into ignorance and mental formations in the previous life conditioning all of our consciousness, feeling, craving, and clinging in this life—we don't have to even think about a previous life to recognize ignorance happening here and now. It's not just ignorance from a previous life that's conditioning this life. It's ignorance here and now. It's ignorance in this moment that's conditioning the unfolding of our experience and our suffering. We also don't have to wait until the next life to be born and die.

So all of these links, even the ones said to be connected to the previous life, can be laid into this life. Likewise, the links said to be connected with the future life can be seen as overlaid into this life as well. In this case, the term birth is understood not as being born from your mother, but as the birth into an identity, the feeling of self. And the term aging and death can be understood to refer to the passing away, the cessation of moment-to-moment experience—how these identities that come into being pass away, how moment-to-moment experience just changes radically, arising and passing away, moment by moment.

So there are both interpretations: the three lives interpretation and the understanding of the chain of dependent origination as unfolding in moment-to-moment experience. Both can be understood from the suttas.

Now the second interpretation is the one that I connect with most. I don't have any knowledge or intimation of previous lives, so I cannot, in my direct experience, connect with that part of the chain as referring to previous lives. But I can connect with quite a bit, or at least portions—I have seen portions of this chain at work in my own experience. And this has been very meaningful to me, to actually witness this and see how it works. So this is how I'll speak about it tonight, from this perspective.

I'm going to start in kind of an unconventional way. The first link of the chain is ignorance, but I'm not going to start there. I'm going to start kind of in the middle, where Guy started the other night, because this is really the easiest place to begin to connect with what the Buddha is talking about. I actually found a sutta tonight when I was reviewing the suttas that the Buddha gave on dependent origination. There's one sutta where he too begins with: there's the eye and there's a sight and there's contact, and from that contact there's feeling. So in one discourse he actually began right with our physical experience. And that's where I'm going to begin tonight, just starting with our sense bases.

There's contact with those sense bases. So the first link I'm going to talk about is that we have these sense bases: eyes, ears, nose, tongue, skin, and our mind. Because of those sense bases, there is contact with experience. This arises because of those sense bases and because there is consciousness, which is a previous link. If the body was just lying there dead, there's not going to be this contact. But because there is life, because there is consciousness, there's contact with these sense bases. That's the second link tonight. Six sense bases condition contact.

Each one of those contacts with the sense bases produces a feeling to it, a flavor. It's got a flavor: pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. This is the vedana, the feeling tone of experience. We've talked about this quite a bit. Based on this feeling tone, in a really straightforward way, natural in a way, if it's pleasant, we like it, we want it. If it's unpleasant, we don't like it, we don't want it. If it's neutral, we may not notice it. But often what arises from here—and in this chain, this is the condition—this feeling tends to condition this wanting. We're kind of like a simple automatic machine that tries to maximize pleasant and minimize unpleasant in our experience. This is the wanting. This is the craving. Feeling conditions craving.

We usually automatically act on this craving. We take a kind of action to grab onto that thing. That's clinging. There's the wanting and the clinging. As Carol described the other night very beautifully, that distinction: the wanting, the craving, is described as being like the thief that's reaching out to get something. And the clinging is when the thief actually grabs it.

Once something is clung to, our intentions, our actions kind of rally in the service of that clinging—to control it, to make sure it stays in our possession in some way, or to make sure that whatever it is we're clinging to, we can continue to have. This is becoming. It's the entire process, the intentions and actions that are generated to serve the clinging. We like becoming. It actually feels good in a way to know where we're headed, how we'll get there, how we'll control things. So sometimes this becoming feeling can take a subtle form like "I'm in control, I know what I'm doing."

Following on from this becoming is birth into some kind of identity. Things become me or mine or "I am." This might take some obvious form like "this is my shawl," a kind of possessive aspect. Or it might take more of an identity form: "I am a kind of person who does things right."

One little side note about dependent origination, one thing that I find really helpful to reflect on: it describes how suffering comes to be, but it also describes how this process of selfing comes to be. This process of becoming and birth, this identification process, is the process of selfing. We can study the suffering, and by studying the suffering, we're studying the selfing. Or we can study this process of selfing, and we will be seeing how suffering is generated in our experience.

From this point of birth into an identity, suffering is inevitable, because anytime there is a birth into an identity, a birth of any sort, there will be aging and death.

There will be a dismantling of that identity. Whether that identity is a sense of possession—this is mine—the suffering might come from the obvious separation. Somebody picks this up and walks off with it. It's no longer mine, and I suffer because it was mine. I liked it. I enjoyed the feeling of it. And now it is no longer mine. So there can be suffering from that.

Or there can be suffering if you have an identity around being the one who does things right. There may be some evidence pointed out to you that you simply cannot ignore—that perhaps you don't always do things right. You made a mistake. And that shatters the notion of being the one who always does things right. There is a death of that identity.

So I've gone through those links rather briefly, and I'd like to give you some examples. I'm going to offer just one example since I have much more I'd like to cover. There's the obvious example I could give around sense pleasure—the clinging that happens around something pleasant to our senses and the possessiveness that arises. But I think more often, what happens in our suffering, the way this chain unfolds, involves clinging around an identity. And so I'll describe how that might unfold.

You might have a notion arise—the idea of being a good yogi comes into your mind. This is contact with the sense door. The idea arises in the mind. What does it mean to be a good yogi? A thought, a fantasy might appear about being a good yogi. You might, for example, envision telling your teacher about some profound insight. I've had this experience myself—this fantasy comes to mind. That's contact. The idea arises in the mind, we become aware of it. That's contact.

Then there's a feeling tone to that. The feeling tone around this particular idea or fantasy may be pleasant. Thinking about describing yourself having this great insight to your teacher feels pleasant as a fantasy. Then there may be the wanting for that fantasy to become reality. That's the craving. The clinging that results is a kind of intensification of that wanting—a fixation on the idea as being necessary. I think of the clinging in this case as a belief that being a good yogi is necessary for my happiness. So that belief comes into being. There's the wanting for the fantasy to become reality and the belief that it's necessary—the craving and the clinging.

The becoming aspect is the intentions that rally in the service of that belief—what we start to do, how we start to act in order to fulfill that belief. Perhaps we have these intentions around what we think we need to do to be a good yogi: sit for a long time in the hall, do really slow walking, or whatever your particular version might be. Some ideas about that. And then we begin to act them out. We begin to follow through on those intentions that are in the service of that belief. This is important. This is necessary. Here's what I need to do. That's becoming.

Then the birth is—and let's say for simplicity in this example—that these patterns of behavior actually lead to the feeling of being a good yogi. This is the birth into the identity, the distinct feeling of identity, the sense of "Ah, I am a good yogi." And perhaps there's evidence to confirm this. You see yourself walking more slowly than everybody else, or perhaps you're sitting later at night or getting up earliest in the morning—whatever it is, there's some kind of evidence to support this. So there's this distinct feeling of self here.

And then from this point, again, this distinct feeling of self is a construction of the mind, and it is impermanent. It will pass. Things will happen.

Now, it may be possible to hold onto that identity in an unbroken chain until you die. It's possible—unlikely, but possible. So your separation from that identity could happen at your death.

But most likely what's going to happen is that something will change in your experience. You'll have a sitting or two where the mind is wandering all over the place. No longer does it seem like you're really able to be present and connected for the entire sitting—being a good yogi, really able to sit and not just sit for a long time but be completely mindful and present. And then along comes a sitting where you're sleepy or tired, or the mind just starts going back into fantasy or remembering your childhood.

The five hindrances come up, and this is now proof that you are not a good yogi. So that identity of being a good yogi dies a smashing death, and another identity is born: "I'm not a good yogi."

This is suffering. The actual loss is suffering. The threat of loss is suffering. The fear of loss is suffering. The suffering that we experience is in direct proportion to the amount of attachment we have to that experience—how strongly we were clinging to it.

A simple example demonstrates how the strength of attachment gives rise to different intensities of suffering. If you're sitting at the dining room table and you have a glass by your place, and you go away and come back and your glass is gone, there may be some irritation or annoyance that somebody cleared away your glass. That's a small kind of suffering. The attachment to these glasses is not that strong. We do have a subtle attachment—"This is my glass while I'm using it here at this meal"—but when somebody clears it away, there's just a kind of annoyance. "Oh, I need to go get another glass. Why did somebody clear it away? Didn't they see it was obviously my glass?" So there's a little bit of suffering that arises.

If you have brought your own personal insulated travel mug with you and it's sitting next to your plate, and you come back and it's gone, maybe a little bit more suffering arises. This points to the intensity of the clinging—more of a sense of ownership, a possession of your own personal property.

So that gives you a flavor for how this chain works. We've talked about a number of links in this chain. Now I'd like to go back to the beginning and review those first few that I haven't talked about yet.

But first, again, I want to point to the cyclic nature of this. Suffering conditions ignorance. The Buddha actually pointed to this directly in one teaching. He says: "And what is the result of suffering? There are some cases in which a person, overcome with pain, her mind exhausted, grieves, mourns, laments, beats her breast, and becomes bewildered. Or one overcome with pain, her mind exhausted, comes to search outside: 'Who knows a way or two to stop this pain?' I tell you, monks, that suffering results in either bewilderment or search."

So suffering often leads to this confusion, this bewilderment side of things, which is related to ignorance. Suffering leads to ignorance. The main definition of ignorance given in the suttas is not understanding the Four Noble Truths. So ignorance means we don't understand suffering. And here again we see the connection between suffering and ignorance: when we don't understand suffering, suffering leads to more ignorance. We don't understand suffering, we don't understand its cause, we don't understand how it comes to be.

In ignorance, we think we know what will lead to happiness. We think having what we want will make us happy. And as I think you've all seen, having what we want only goes so far. It doesn't actually lead to a very deep kind of satisfaction. In fact, when we get what we want and have that moment of "Ah, yes, this is the way it's supposed to be," clinging arises from that, and we are just deepening the rut of this pattern of dependent origination, this pattern of suffering.

But if we can meet this suffering with wisdom—mindfulness and wisdom coming together—the causal chain can lead us in another direction, towards liberation, towards freedom.

So suffering leads to ignorance. Ignorance conditions mental formations. Based on ignorance, mental formations arise. Just as a reminder, mental formations are the intentional aspect of our experience.

And so based on ignorance, our intentions are formed—how we choose things, decide things, and behave. These intentions are the mental formations. Mental formations are the patterns and habits that lead us forward through this cycle. Out of ignorance, these patterns and habits make us act in unskillful ways. We take the most obvious move to get rid of suffering: to have what we want, to get rid of what we don't want. Which just leads us through this cycle. We think we are acting to alleviate our suffering by getting what we want, but actually it's just cementing this process further.

So these unskillful patterns and habits are the mental formations that result from ignorance. With mental formations as a condition—these mental formations conditioned by ignorance—consciousness comes to be. But ignorance is an interesting factor here. Ignorance is at the beginning of the chain, but one scholar monk, Ñāṇatiloka, pointed out that ignorance isn't just at the beginning. It's actually arising at every point on this chain.

So in those mental formations, those unskillful habits and patterns, it's not simply that ignorance has propelled them into being. There is that aspect of it—because of ignorance we act in unskillful ways. But in that very acting unskillfully, ignorance is there in that moment. Ignorance co-arises with every link in this chain when wisdom is not present.

With mental formations as a condition, consciousness comes to be. We can think of the habits and patterns conditioning our consciousness and what we experience. These are the filters we've talked about—those habits and patterns, the proclivities. Ignorance has put us into a certain frame of mind, and that frame of mind then conditions how we see things.

As an example, which we've used before, if there's an arising of anger in the mind, there is a kind of proclivity, a filtering that tends to point us towards things that confirm that anger, or perhaps even just pulls unpleasant experience out of our environment. When we're in an aversive state, it tends to orient us towards the unpleasantness in our environment. This is the process of mental formations conditioning consciousness.

This filtering mechanism is pretty deeply put into our psyche. It's deeply ingrained that when we have an agenda towards something, our mind is designed to exclude things that aren't in line with that agenda. There's an interesting, amazing study that points to the power of this. Researchers asked participants to watch a video of basketball players and count the number of times the ball was passed between players on a team. While watching, most people were able to pretty accurately count that number. But then they were asked at the end: did you notice anything unusual? The vast majority said no. Occasionally somebody would say, "Was there a gorilla in there somewhere?"

And there had been. While these people were passing the basketball, a person in a gorilla suit had come out, wandered around the basketball court, and then walked off. The vast majority of people did not see this. Their sense of their own perception was so strong that when they actually saw the video again, they denied it was the same video. "This can't be the same video." This is the power of this filtering mechanism.

With consciousness as a condition, nāma-rūpa—materiality and mentality—comes to be. That's a somewhat unusual term. Other translations render it as "mind and matter" or "name and form." The most concise definition I've seen is that it refers to the processes of our body and most of the processes in our mind. If we go back to the five aggregates, mentality and materiality are the four aggregates of body, feeling, perception, and mental formations. The only one excluded is consciousness. And that consciousness is what's conditioning the other four.

So this is one way to understand materiality and mentality: as four of the five aggregates, the four excluding consciousness. There's a very close dependence between these two. The five aggregates are often talked about as arising together. In one sutta, the Buddha describes his exploration of these links in the chain of dependent origination, contemplating mentality, materiality, and consciousness. He thinks: what conditions mentality and materiality? Consciousness conditions that. And what conditions consciousness? Materiality and mentality condition consciousness.

So he sees that there's a kind of back and forth, a mutual conditioning of these two. In one sutta, a monk is confused about this and asks Sāriputta to explain it. Sāriputta gives an analogy. He says it's as if there are two sheaves of wheat propped against each other—they hold each other up. If you take one out, they'll both fall. This is the way in which these two are mutually conditioning.

Based on the state of our consciousness, however it is disposed, if it's flavored by anger, then the other aggregates are conditioned by that flavoring of consciousness. If we have anger in our minds, we tend to perceive things that confirm that anger. The feeling tends to be unpleasant. Our body may be distorted with tightness and tension, and our face may have an unpleasant expression on it. So these other four of the aggregates—mentality and materiality—are conditioned by the kind of consciousness, the kind of flavoring to consciousness.

Now we've made a full loop around this chain. We're back where we started: there is this mind and body, and there are the six sense bases. But you can see now—when I first started talking about it, we were approaching it from a neutral place. There's the eye, and then there's a sight, and then there's contact, and then it's either pleasant or unpleasant. But actually, coming in from this point, it's not starting from something neutral. It's already got a spin to it. Our mind already has a spin to it. We are predisposed to have contact with things that confirm our ignorance, our views, our identities. And so this cycle tends to reinforce itself. A very potent cycle.

This chain being a description of causes and conditions that support the arising of suffering, and understanding that it's not lockstep, that there is possibly a way to get out of it, we look at how we can change the conditions. If we can change the conditions, then perhaps the cycle will lead in a different direction.

The main way to change the conditions is to bring mindfulness and wisdom to our experience, moment by moment. The only place we can have any foothold or toehold in breaking this chain is in the present moment, in this very moment. We can't do anything about what happened in the past. But we can meet this moment with mindfulness and wisdom. This begins to undermine that ignorance, which is co-arising at every point in this chain. When ignorance is present in the mind, wisdom is not present in the mind. When wisdom is present in the mind, it begins to knock that ignorance down.

We can use mindfulness and wisdom at any point in this cycle to begin to dismantle this process of suffering. And there are some weak links in this chain. We've talked about in particular the link between feeling and craving. There's another one between suffering and ignorance—that link at the beginning of the cycle where suffering tends to lead to ignorance.

In that quote I read where the Buddha said suffering leads to bewilderment or to search—in that search, we may meet a teaching, some wisdom that seems to point us in a different direction. If that wisdom meets us at the right moment, it will lead to faith instead of ignorance. Suffering also has the possibility of moving not to ignorance but to faith.

There's another chain described called the chain of transcendent dependent origination that begins with suffering and then moves from faith to gladness, to rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration, knowledge and vision of things as they are, to disenchantment, dispassion, liberation. A similar kind of causal link leading from suffering met with wisdom and understanding, leading to faith.

The work at this point in the chain is to understand suffering. This is the first noble truth. This is what the Buddha told us is our work with suffering: understand it. Not intellectually, but understanding in the moment how the suffering comes to be, how it dismantles. Understand the processes around it. Essentially, understand some of the aspects of this chain.

This is much of what we've been doing here—meeting our suffering with mindfulness and wisdom. With this teaching, all of the teaching we've been doing, the discussions in the interviews, the teachings, the question and answer—there's this wisdom being chewed on in this room. And this wisdom and the mindfulness together, when they meet suffering, they begin to put little holes into that suffering. We begin to see how this thing we used to suffer over—it's not such a big deal anymore. There's a lot more space around it. Or sometimes we even see suffering end.

Completely. A particular pattern simply collapses when we see, "Oh, I see how I think this is going to continue forever." Seeing that ignorance in the mind, actually seeing it—the ignorance can't sustain under the light of that understanding, and it falls apart. The pattern falls apart. We've all seen this: the power of mindfulness and wisdom to cut through our suffering, to transform it in a moment.

Then there's the link between feeling and craving, which is also a weak link. We've actually talked about this one quite a bit, so I won't spend much time on it. But I do want to point to another sutta where the Buddha highlighted this aspect of feeling. I'll read it to you. He brings a completely different twist on the topic than the chain of dependent origination, where feeling leads to craving, to clinging, becoming, birth, suffering—that's the flavor of dependent origination.

In the sutta, the Buddha said: "I will teach you the all, the root of everything. All things are rooted in desire. They come to actual existence through attention, originate from contact, and converge on feelings." So here we're in the same terrain as some of those links of dependent origination. We have contact and feeling, and there's attention, which is in the realm of mental formations. But then it goes in a different direction: "The foremost of all things is concentration. All things are mastered by mindfulness. Their peak is wisdom, their essence liberation. All things merge in the deathless, and Nibbāna is their culmination."

Here the Buddha points to feeling, then to concentration and mindfulness leading us to wisdom. So whatever we feel, bringing concentration and mindfulness to our experience—this is a very central practice in what the Buddha teaches, this mindfulness of feeling. Bringing concentration and mindfulness to our experience of feeling, we simply see, "Oh, it's feeling. It's just feeling." That wisdom—essentially, feeling leads to craving when ignorance is present with that feeling. When wisdom is present, feeling leads to the cessation of feeling. Pleasantness ceases. Unpleasantness arises and ceases. It's just feeling.

One key aspect of this sutta that I like to highlight is that it points to all things. All things have liberation as their essence, merge in the deathless, and culminate in Nibbāna. All things. It doesn't matter what we bring our mindfulness and concentration to. Joined with wisdom, whatever we are paying attention to has this capacity to lead us to liberation. The touch of a doorknob. A feeling of anger. Fear. A feeling of bliss, of happiness, of balance of mind, of equanimity. Whatever we are experiencing, mindfulness and wisdom lead us toward freedom.

Whatever we're doing—brushing our teeth, eating a meal, sitting in meditation—moment by moment, this work of seeing our experience can begin to break this whole chain apart. We see ignorance at work. And in that seeing, there's freedom.

So let's sit for a few moments.

Thank you for listening to the Dhamma.

CHAPTER 54

Crossing the Flood

Andrea Fella · 58 min

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a rich exploration of two interconnected water analogies the Buddha used to describe the path to liberation. The first is the simile of the raft from the Alagaddūpama Sutta (MN 22), where the Buddha describes building a raft from materials at hand—grass, twigs, branches, and leaves—to cross a dangerous flood. Fella illuminates how this raft represents the Noble Eightfold Path meeting our moment-to-moment experience, emphasizing that we cannot avoid contact with the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion but must navigate through it.

The second analogy comes from the Ogha-taraṇa Sutta (SN 1.1), where a deva asks the Buddha how he crossed the flood. His paradoxical answer—'by neither tarrying nor hurrying'—becomes a powerful guide for practice. Fella unpacks how tarrying manifests as sloth, laziness, or getting stuck in pleasant states, while hurrying appears as restlessness, over-efforting, or anxiously seeking results. This balance between sinking and being swept away offers practical wisdom for meditation.

The talk concludes with an exploration of when to let go of even wholesome states, using suffering as a guide. Fella shares personal examples of noticing subtle agendas behind mindfulness—wanting experiences to change, wanting to understand, over-efforting—and how recognizing these forms of clinging leads to deeper freedom. The teaching that an arahant naturally embodies the Eightfold Path without effort suggests that our practice now models the very freedom we seek.

Most of you have probably seen the scheduled change for the part one yogis posted on the board. We'll talk about that tomorrow, but let me just notice how even something that simple can impact your minds.

When the Buddha taught, he used a variety of teaching styles. One of the ways he communicated and expressed the Dharma was through the use of analogy. I think he was actually quite a master at analogy. For me, when I read the analogies the Buddha offered, I find that they seem so appropriate and apt—it's like the teaching comes in from a different angle. The image created in my mind around the analogy often goes in a different way than simple words do. Analogies provide an intuitive way that we can connect with the teachings.

Tonight I'd like to explore two analogies that the Buddha offered. They're both quite familiar—you're probably acquainted with one or the other or both of them. They're both water analogies. The Buddha used water a lot in his analogies, and both of these have to do with crossing a vast expanse of water or a flood.

Before I actually get into these analogies, I want to explore a little bit about what this flood means. The Buddha explicitly said in one teaching that the floods he's referring to in these analogies are the four floods: the flood of sensuality, the flood of existence, the flood of views, and the flood of ignorance. It's said that they're called floods because these aspects of our mind keep us submerged in the round of existence, in samsara, not able to find our way to freedom from suffering.

This particular list, the four floods, is not talked about that much in the suttas. But all of these unwholesome states referred to in the floods are grounded in what we could call the three unwholesome roots of greed, aversion, and delusion. That's how I relate to this notion of flood and of crossing the flood—that we're crossing over this flood of greed, aversion, and delusion. We get swept away by greed, aversion, and delusion. We get drowned in these states of mind.

We try to arrange things to suit us. We try to arrange our lives, even for small moments, so that we can have things be the way we like them to be. You might think of this as coming up for a breath of air. But it doesn't last long. Things fall apart, and so then we have to work again, struggle again to find a way to come up for another breath of air, arrange things again. And again it doesn't last very long. We're submerged again.

I think you all know this sense of being submerged by these qualities of mind, and the struggle of using our habitual, familiar ways of getting that breath of air, seeing that it's just an endless struggle. I'm reminded of the saying of the Red Queen in Alice in Wonderland: "You see here, it takes all the running you can do to stay in one place." Being flooded by greed, aversion, and delusion, we're not able to navigate our lives very skillfully.

Tonight I'd like to explore two of these analogies about crossing the flood. I think we actually have a lot to learn about practice and what the Buddha had to say by looking at the various parts of the analogy, by unpacking it a little bit. So I'd like to explore these two analogies in some detail.

The first one is the simile of the raft. I'll read this to you and then go over parts of it—read a little bit, do a little commentary, then read a little more and do a little commentary.

"Suppose a man in the course of a journey saw a great expanse of water whose near shore was dangerous and fearful and whose further shore was safe and free from fear, but there was no ferry boat or bridge going to the far shore."

So a couple of the parts of the analogy so far. First is this near shore that's dangerous. The Buddha equates this near shore with identity. Why is identity dangerous? He says that the near shore is dangerous. Some identities are obviously dangerous just in their very being, in their way of feeling. I have had various identities that have felt dangerous—the identity of self-hatred, of being miserable. "I'm the miserable person. Well, I'm happy now, but I know that really what I am is miserable." Those identities, those very identities can feel, at the very least, unpleasant and uncomfortable. That's one way that identities are dangerous.

And then there are those other identities that we feel somehow are the way things are supposed to be. When I feel like I know how to do things, when I feel like I'm right, when I feel like I'm a good person—whatever it might be, fill in the blank. These identities are a kind of way of feeling stable, secure. It's like, "Yes, this is me. This is when it feels right. This is when it feels good. This is the way it's supposed to be." There's this solid feeling, and with it comes a sense of what feels like safety or security.

But it's an illusory kind of safety. In the analogy, the near shore is solid—it's at least not in the expanse of water—but the Buddha says it's a dangerous place. In clinging to an identity, we have to make this effort to protect it, to defend it, to make sure that other people agree with this identity, that they see who we really are. There's an endless need to prop up this identity, and we suffer when some experience or circumstance undercuts that sense of solidity, of security.

On one retreat, I got very familiar with two patterns that I saw playing off of each other. One was "I'm a good yogi." The other was "I'm a failure." When I was in that place of feeling like I was a good yogi, it felt like that's what it's supposed to be like, that's what I'm supposed to be and do. I was trying to find a way to have that identity and get rid of the other one. What I discovered, kind of to my surprise, was that these two identities were intimately interconnected. There wasn't a way to have one without the other. The very having of that identity of "I'm a good yogi" was the setup. Because we can't always have things the way we think they should be. So when for a few moments or hours I couldn't be very mindful, or the mind was wandering a lot, the other identity arose: "I'm a failure. I'm not that good yogi." These identities are a dangerous place. They create suffering.

The second part of this analogy is the vast expanse of water—this is the flood. I've already spoken about this a little bit. The other part we've talked about is the far shore. The Buddha equates the far shore with Nibbāna: freedom from suffering, freedom from needing to do, needing to protect, needing to defend, freedom from clinging, freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion.

To continue with the analogy, we have this man who is on a journey and has come to this place. He thinks, "There is this great expanse of water whose near shore is dangerous and fearful and whose further shore is safe and free from fear. But there is no ferry boat or bridge going to that far shore. Suppose I collect grass, twigs, branches, and leaves and bind them together into a raft. Supported by that raft and making an effort with my hands and feet, I could get safely across to the far shore." And then the man collected grass, twigs, branches, and leaves and bound them together into a raft. Supported by the raft and making an effort with his hands and feet, he got safely across to the far shore.

There are a few parts to this aspect of the analogy that I'd like to unpack. The first is the raft itself—this raft by which we cross over the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion. In exploring this analogy, Ajahn Sumedho wrote something that really spurred my thinking and prompted me to look closely at the various parts. He wrote: "The Buddha referred to his teaching as a raft, which you can make out of the things around you. You don't have to have a special motorboat or submarine or luxury liner. A raft is something you make from the things around just to get across to the other shore. We're not trying to make a super-duper vehicle. We're just able to use what's around us for enlightenment."

This is quite inspiring to me—this notion of the raft being created from just what's at hand. And what's at hand is our present-moment experience. Wherever we are, whatever's happening, we have our sense experience: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and things happening in the mind. So the raft is built in part out of our moment-to-moment sense experience.

The other part of the raft—in fact, what I think of as the binding for the raft—is the Dhamma. The Buddha equates the raft with the Eightfold Path: wise view, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood, wise effort, wise mindfulness, and wise concentration. We can look at the path as a way to meet our moment-to-moment experience. It's the binding that holds the raft together.

Our moment-to-moment experience, our sense experience—we meet it with wise understanding, with the intention to engage. We meet it with wise effort and mindfulness, and it cultivates concentration.

On one retreat I was sitting with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, he went over how this Eightfold Path is really a moment-to-moment unfolding. It's not necessarily something that unfolds only over a long course of time. In each moment we're cultivating the entire Eightfold Path. And for the three aspects of ethical conduct—wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood—he pointed out that these are fulfilled by abstaining. Here on retreat, those aspects are fulfilled by the abandoning of killing, taking what's not given, all of the precepts we're working with. Wise livelihood is fulfilled by engaging in the practice of meditation. Wise speech is primarily fulfilled by silence. So moment to moment we are cultivating the Eightfold Path by meeting our experience.

Using this combination of our moment-to-moment experience and the Eightfold Path, we cross over this flood of greed, aversion, and delusion. This is the raft built out of our present moment experience and bound together with the Dharma.

Another aspect of this analogy of crossing the flood that I resonate with is this notion of being on a raft. A raft is pretty creaky. You're not going to stay dry, right? You're on the raft; you're going to be in contact with that stream while you cross over it. You're going to be in contact with the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion as you cross over it. The raft helps keep you afloat so you're not drowning in it, but you're in contact with it. We don't cross over the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion by somehow magically floating up in the air and flying across. We have to meet the difficulties. We have to meet the flood in order to cross over it.

It's not a mistake when we turn with mindfulness to our experience and see anger, aversion, longing, pride, arrogance, frustration, ignorance. It's not a mistake. The practice brings these into our awareness. The practice doesn't create these states—it uncovers them. It allows us to see them in the space of mindfulness where we have an opportunity to work with them. Rather than having them run us, rather than having them make our choices for us—because if they're not seen, if these states motivated by greed, aversion, and delusion are not seen with mindfulness, they're going to be running the show. They're going to be making our choices for us.

Being on the raft with mindfulness, with effort, with concentration, with understanding and intention, we meet those states of greed, aversion, and delusion, and we aren't swept away by them. We can cross; we can navigate them.

The other piece—he says, "making an effort with hands and feet, he got safely to the far shore." So we build the raft, and we can't just go out into the water and sit there. We've got to make some effort. We've got to head in a direction. If we just go out and drift, it's pretty unlikely, even floating on this raft, that we'll actually get to the far shore. We need to make the effort. Engage with the practices of the Eightfold Path. Make the effort to stay present.

This effort is the resonant piece of the second analogy that I want to bring in, so I'll shift to that one for a few moments.

This analogy comes from a time when the Buddha was sitting in meditation and was visited by a deva. The deva came to ask him a question: "How, dear sir, did you cross the flood?"

"By not halting, friend, and by not straining, I crossed the flood."

"But how is it, dear sir, that by not halting and by not straining you crossed the flood?"

"When I came to a standstill, friend, then I sank. But when I struggled, then I got swept away. It is in this way, friend, that by not halting and by not straining I crossed the flood."

One of the notes about this sutta observed that there's meant to be a little bit of a paradox in this analogy of not halting and not straining while crossing a flood. The comment says that typically how you would cross a raging stream would be to find a foothold, stop there, look, find the next place where you could step, and then rush quickly through the raging water to get to that next foothold. Rest for a minute.

That's not what the Buddha describes for crossing the flood of greed, aversion, and delusion.

There's another translation of this that is my resonant translation. In reading the suttas, I actually recommend—if you get interested in reading the suttas—finding multiple versions. When you discover a particular sutta you're drawn to, seek out different translations, because we're reading translation. Different uses of words can highlight things or resonate with us somewhat differently.

And so there's another version of this sutta that translates these words: "By neither tarrying nor hurrying, I crossed the flood. When I tarried, I sank. When I hurried, I was swept away." For me, this has been the image and the words that have resonated most deeply. Neither tarrying nor hurrying.

The first thing I want to point out about this—something I personally take great inspiration from—is that the Buddha says, "When I tarried, I sank. When I hurried, I was swept away." He didn't do it perfectly. He had to experiment. He had to find what worked, what allowed him to cross the stream. We also need to do this. We need to experiment and observe what happens, observe what supports us in our practice, what helps us to cross the flood, what sweeps us away, what makes us sink. Again, it's not a mistake when we find ourselves tarrying and hurrying, sinking and being swept away. We learn from that. The Buddha learned from it, and we can follow his example.

I want to explore this notion of tarrying and hurrying. The commentaries describe many different ways that tarrying and hurrying can be understood. I'm not going to follow the commentaries so much, but rather explore some of the ways I've found in my own experience—this image of tarrying and sinking, hurrying and being swept away—how I've felt it in my own practice.

The first and most obvious form of tarrying is sleepiness, the dullness of that hindrance of sloth and torpor, where we're just sunk into oblivion. There's a feeling of sinking there. This is tarrying in our practice—we are not engaging. The counterpoint to this, restlessness, is a form of hurrying. When the mind is restless and unable to really meet and connect with experience, it's like we get swept away. We land on something for a moment and then our minds get swept away.

Related to these two of dullness and restlessness, for tarrying there's also a kind of laziness or indulgence—we find ourselves indulging a pattern of thought. It's almost like we're in a whirlpool, using another water analogy. We get caught in a whirlpool of thinking. We don't go very far. We're sinking into the water in that whirlpool of thought. On the other side of laziness is over-efforting, being anxious for results. For me, this has had a feeling not so much of sinking, but of not really connecting. It's like being swept away on the current, not meeting experience moment by moment.

Another way to explore tarrying and hurrying is through greed and aversion. We can think of greed as a kind of tarrying. We get stuck on something. "Oh, this is pleasant. I think I'll just hang out with this for a while." It could be anything—a very blissful state of meditation that we get stuck in, or a pleasant fantasy whose pleasantness catches us, and we just remain there. With aversion, we have a sense of not liking an experience, and rather than meeting it, we want to rush past it, on to something else. That would be hurrying past our experience from aversion.

Then there's another aspect of aversion which can be a form of tarrying. I'm very familiar with this one, actually. This is a way my mind tends to work with aversion: I get stuck to things I don't like, trying to get rid of them. That's a kind of tarrying. "How can I fix this? How can I change this? How can I control this? How can I get rid of this?" Or with greed, we can have the sense of being swept away—just the anxiousness of wanting the next pleasant experience. "Where's the next pleasant experience? How can I get the next good thing?"

The commentaries do mention that one of the ways of exploring this tarrying and hurrying is through looking at how we can be sunk into unwholesome states of mind and caught by, swept away from the true goal by wholesome states of mind. This is an interesting one, I think, to explore. Yes, the unwholesome states of mind catch us and drag us down. But we can get caught by wholesome states, feeling like, "Oh, this is what is most important—being with this state of bliss"—and missing out on the understanding, the wisdom that we can cultivate through combining concentration with mindfulness. So we can get swept away from the true goal, not able to actually land on the far shore, by being caught by these wholesome states.

Another sutta explores something that's not connected particularly in any of the commentaries with tarrying and hurrying, but I found it and it resonated for me again in my own experience—ways that I get stuck and swept away. This is a sutta about investigation. The Buddha said, "One should investigate so that consciousness is not distracted and diffused externally, and internally is not fixed."

What does that mean? For me, again, it's not explained anywhere that I've seen, but I have seen in my own experience at times that when I'm investigating something, if I'm looking at something, it's kind of like my mind goes, "Oh, look at that thing. Let me put that under the microscope and really look at it." And it's almost as if I hold onto it in order to look at it. I think that's what it means by being fixed internally—that we kind of get stuck in the pattern of investigation, holding onto something in order to look at it.

Distracted externally—my connection with that is that we can move into looking at the outer experience, looking for explanations of why things are happening in our history, in our surroundings, essentially in our external environment. We look for the reasons why things are happening, as opposed to really seeing moment to moment that suffering and its causes are happening in the present moment. That's another way to look at this tarrying and hurrying.

For me, this image of neither tarrying nor hurrying has been a really supportive image, actually. Just almost envisioning the Buddha crossing this stream, like walking on water, with a very steady pace. Each time the foot meets the water, it comes up. But it meets the water. It meets it, and then it comes up. It meets it, and it comes up. Just that very steady meeting of experience, moment by moment.

On long retreat, this image has been so helpful to me. Just keep going. Just keep going. Moment by moment, just meet what's right in front of you. And whether we're on retreat or at home, whatever is happening, we can just meet with this very steady pace, moment by moment. Meeting things we like with balance of mind—not holding on to them, trying to keep them, not lost in thoughts about how to control it or get more of it. Meeting things we don't like with balance of mind—really meeting it without rushing over it, but also without getting stuck to it, trying to figure out how to change it or fix it or get rid of it. And meeting things that we usually ignore.

Actually, I think in the ignoring we can both get sunk and swept away. It's kind of like things that we're not really connecting with can grab us from behind and either pull us down or send us off. So meeting the things that we usually ignore, moment by moment—every experience.

Returning to the raft analogy, we left our protagonist at the far shore. He had made it across. And the sutta continues. The Buddha says:

"Then when he had got across and had arrived at the far shore, he might think thus: 'This raft has been very helpful to me. Since supported by it and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore. Suppose I were to hoist it on my head or load it on my shoulder and then go wherever I want.' Now, what do you think? By doing so, would that man be doing what should be done with the raft?"

"No, venerable sir."

"By doing what would the man be doing what should be done with the raft? When that man got across and had arrived at the far shore, he might think thus: 'This raft has been very helpful to me, since supported by it and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore. Suppose I were to haul it onto the dry land or set it adrift in the water and then go wherever I want.' Now, bhikkhus, it is by doing that that the man would be doing what should be done with the raft. So I have shown you how the Dhamma is similar to a raft, for the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping. When you know the Dhamma to be similar to a raft, you should abandon even good states, how much more so bad states."

There's a lot to explore in this—this letting go even of wholesome states. The image here is of having crossed over, then setting the raft adrift.

The letting go is not so much a pushing away; it's a not clinging to. One of the key pieces here, I think, is that we can't let go of this raft too soon. We have to use the raft in order to navigate the flood. So the Buddha doesn't recommend letting go of the raft while we're in the middle of the stream.

I think that in hearing this teaching of letting go of everything, letting go of craving, letting go of wanting, we see how when we're engaged in the practice there is wanting —wanting to be mindful. And we've talked about this. We've talked about the notion of wholesome desire, the possibility for wholesome desire, of the chanda that can be associated with wholesome states, and the unwholesome desire. We let go of the unwholesome desire, the unwholesome craving, and try to connect with the wish that's associated with the wholesome.

But there can be a kind of confusion that happens when people hear this teaching about letting go and they see that they want to be mindful, they want to cultivate these qualities of concentration, of effort, and then they realize, "Oh, but I'm not supposed to want anything." We have to build the raft. We have to use mindfulness, effort, concentration in order to cross this flood. If we let go of the raft too soon, or if we think, "I'm not supposed to want mindfulness, so I'm not going to do anything to be mindful. If I find myself wanting mindfulness, I won't engage in that mindfulness"—the instruction there is to notice the wanting. It's not to let go of the mindfulness. It's to notice the wanting.

So we use the teachings, which help us to let go of suffering. And there's likely to be some clinging in this process. The path can unfold as a staged letting go. We start our practice, and a lot of what we see initially, and for a long time in our cycles of practice, is real challenges. Dukkha dukkha. We see the pain of afflictive emotions, the pain of holding on to wanting things to be the way we want them to be. We really experience that suffering. And we use wholesome states of mind to begin to let go of those unwholesome states of mind. This is using the raft to cross over the flood, using these wholesome states to let go of the unwholesome. And then we start to see as we practice that we're holding on to those wholesome states. We begin to see that there's suffering, there's clinging in those wholesome states as well. And then we need to start looking at that. So practice can unfold by stages.

The Buddha actually pointed to this. He said, "Before my enlightenment, while I was still only an unenlightened bodhisattva, I too clearly saw as it actually is with proper wisdom how sensual pleasures provide little gratification, much suffering, and much despair, and how great is the danger in them. But as long as I did not attain to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sensual pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, or to something more peaceful than that, I recognized that I could still be attracted to sensual pleasures. But when I clearly saw, as it actually is with proper wisdom, how sensual pleasures provide little gratification, much suffering, much despair, and how great is the danger in them, and I had attained to the rapture and pleasure that are apart from sensual pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, or to something more peaceful than that, I recognized that I was no longer attracted to sensual pleasures."

So here the Buddha is pointing to the wholesome pleasure of meditation, the wholesome pleasure of concentration in meditation, as being a way to surmount or let go of the dependence that we have on happiness coming from sense pleasure. This is the only way we think that happiness can come until we actually meet another way. And so by depending on the wholesome states of concentration, of insight, we let go of the unwholesome.

And then in another place he said, similarly but pointing to a little more realization, "I see other beings who are not free from lust for sensual pleasures, being devoured by craving for sensual pleasures, burning with fever for sensual pleasures, indulging in sensual pleasures, and I do not envy them. Why is that? Because there is a delight apart from sensual pleasures, apart from unwholesome states, which surpasses even divine bliss."

Here he's pointing beyond the happiness of wholesome states themselves to a state that surpasses divine bliss. And the commentaries point this to freedom, to the freedom of complete liberation. This is, I think, what he's pointing to when he says letting go of the raft once we've crossed over—letting go even of the wholesome.

Now in my own experience exploring this navigation of when to let go of the wholesome, my own guideline, my rule of thumb, is to use suffering as a guide. As we explore our experience—I'll go through some various ways I've used this suffering as a guide, and I think you've probably seen some of this as well. As we practice, as I said, there are a lot of unwholesome states that we meet. And as we bring mindfulness to that, we start to see that the unwholesome states begin to fall away. Sometimes we bring clear mindfulness right to a difficulty and it just falls apart.

And so we start to want that falling apart. An unwholesome state comes up and we bring mindfulness to it in order that the thing will go away. "Oh, here's a painful experience. Let me be mindful of it, then it'll go away." This is a clinging around mindfulness. It's an attitude in the mind, an agenda. Essentially, it's an agenda around why we're being mindful—so that these difficulties will go away.

We start to see, actually, and I know you've all seen this, how this agenda just gets in the way. When we have that agenda—"I want to be mindful in order that this will go away"—we often find that it just locks things in place. So we have to start seeing that agenda itself.

Now, it doesn't mean that we stop being mindful. It doesn't mean that we let go of mindfulness just because there's an agenda there. It means we turn that mindfulness to include the agenda. The agenda and the mindfulness begin to get decoupled so that we can bring mindfulness without that agenda. Initially, it seems hard to do. How do we decouple them? We decouple by turning and noticing the agenda itself, noticing the suffering of the agenda, using suffering as our guide. This is where we need to turn our attention, to bring our mindfulness.

As we continue in our practice, maybe some of these more obvious agendas begin to fall away, but we get really interested in our experience. We really want to understand what's happening. This can be a very helpful agenda at times. If we're in the midst of an aversion attack, wanting to understand it is very useful. And yet this wanting to understand, I've seen in my own practice, becomes a kind of habit and pattern in itself. The wanting to know becomes the important piece. It's like, "I'm not okay unless I understand this, unless I know this." So this wanting to know is a subtler form of wanting—a wanting to understand.

At least in my own experience, what I've seen is that at some point, that very wanting becomes clearly suffering. And that's when I need to turn and look at that habit. I don't necessarily worry about it too much if I see wanting to understand while I'm engaged in observing an aversion attack. But when the mind is more balanced, when there's a flow of experience, and the mind leaps in wanting to understand—again, it's like that tarrying. It steps into the experience, fixes on it, says, "What is this?" We sink into that experience. So again, beginning to notice this agenda. That's all that the practice asks of us: turn towards what is creating the suffering itself. That wanting to understand, at some point, is the suffering and needs to be seen. What is the clinging around that? What is the suffering there?

I've also seen in my practice a kind of holding on to mindfulness, doing the mindfulness, pushing the mindfulness. "I need to be mindful. I need to be mindful. I need to be mindful." In seeing that, I began to see there's an over-efforting, a pushing in to try to be mindful. That over-efforting can bring a kind of struggle to it. Again, when we notice the suffering of that, that's when to turn to explore it.

One of my favorite ways to explore this over-efforting is to ask myself a question. Noticing that over-efforting, turning to notice, "Okay, over-efforting is happening," and then asking myself: "How little effort do I need to make in order to be mindful here?" That one question has been hugely supportive for me. I actually find I can let go of quite a lot of the doing of mindfulness. To my surprise, I don't have to do the mindfulness in order to be mindful. Mindfulness gets its own momentum, and we're getting in its way, essentially, at some point, by that trying to be mindful. So again, this is an agenda behind the mindfulness that we can see.

And we can see the suffering of it when we begin to experience the suffering of it. That's when we look at it.

Sometimes we can be in a state of beautiful, expansive clarity—calm, quiet, no problem. It really seems like a very pure experience, and it doesn't seem like there's any suffering in there at all, no clinging at all. Those are times that are great to just check into and get familiar with that experience. It's also helpful at times like that to explicitly check your relationship with that experience. What is your relationship to this state of blissful peace, calm, quiet, purity?

On one retreat, I noticed just this kind of state, and it did not feel like there was any clinging in the state at all. It felt so pure. And then I checked: what's my attitude? There was a subtle, just a very subtle leaning in, trying to make it continue—a little doing to hold on to that state. When I noticed that, the mind was clear enough that all I had to do was just notice that subtle clinging to the state, and it let go. The next thing that arose was clear suffering, wanting it to continue. And again, that was seen and that was let go. The next thing was fear that it wouldn't continue. And the next thing that arose was joy that the mind had uncovered all of this. I was blown away. I had no idea there was defilement in that state. I had no idea.

So this practice of checking the attitude, checking our relationship with experience, is a key practice. In fact, all of these examples that I'm giving are looking at essentially the clinging that is there in the relationship with the practice, in the relationship with the mindfulness. This checking into what is my relationship to the experience is very helpful for uncovering this kind of clinging even to wholesome states.

The last part of the analogy is the letting go altogether. I just want to say something about that, because the analogy has the raft set adrift, and the raft is the Eightfold Path. So I want to explore that and bring in some teachings from other places.

One piece here is that the letting go of the wholesome states once one has fully crossed over greed, aversion, and delusion—the understanding isn't that they have somehow transcended those wholesome states and that they don't apply. In one sutta, the Buddha says about the Eightfold Path that right view comes first. And how does right view come first? In one of right view, right intention comes into being. In one of right intention, right speech comes into being. In one of right speech, right action comes into being. In one of right action, right livelihood comes into being. In one of right livelihood, right effort. In one of right effort, right mindfulness. In one of right mindfulness, right concentration. In one of right concentration, right knowledge comes into being. In one of right knowledge, right deliverance comes into being. Thus, the path of the disciple in higher training possesses eight factors—the standard Eightfold Path. The arhat possesses ten factors: the Eightfold Path plus right knowledge and right deliverance.

So in this crossing over the flood, my understanding here is that someone who has fully transcended greed, aversion, and delusion is living the Eightfold Path. They don't have to try to do it. They don't have to hold on to it. It's just simply an expression of their being. The Buddha says the arhat, the fully awakened one, possesses the ten factors—the Eightfold Path plus right knowledge and right deliverance.

So in a way, we can think of our following the Eightfold Path, engaging in the Eightfold Path moment by moment, as a way of modeling what it's like to be liberated. The path and the goal, the freedom from suffering, the way one behaves in the world—my understanding of this is that the way one behaves in the world is through living the Eightfold Path. So by following this path, we too can live the Eightfold Path. Maybe not in that pure way where it doesn't take any effort. But I like this notion that what we're doing to engage in the practice is very much how our life will be with complete freedom.

So let's sit for a couple of minutes.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 55

Hindrances Can Wake Us Up

Andrea Fella · 1h03

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a transformative perspective on the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa): sense desire (kāmacchanda), ill will (byāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and anxiety (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). Rather than viewing these mental states as obstacles to practice, she draws from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) to show how the Buddha included them as legitimate objects of meditation in the fourth foundation of mindfulness.

Fella uses the metaphor of a naturalist to describe the investigative approach we can take with hindrances—observing them with patience and curiosity rather than trying to eliminate them. She explains how each hindrance operates through delusion: sense desire convinces us that obtaining pleasant objects will bring lasting happiness, while ill will persuades us that removing unpleasant experiences is the path to peace. Through vivid personal examples, including her experience with sense restraint practice and working with intense anger, she demonstrates practical approaches for each hindrance.

The talk emphasizes a middle way of neither repressing nor indulging these states, but meeting them with wise mindfulness. Fella shares how even states like sleepiness and spacing out can become objects of clear awareness, challenging the belief that meditation requires a particular mental state. She offers specific techniques for working with overwhelming emotions, including the practice of respectfully acknowledging difficult states and setting them aside when mindfulness isn't strong enough to meet them directly. The teaching concludes with an invitation to develop courage and curiosity in meeting our challenging mind states, recognizing that insight into suffering requires direct contact with it.

This morning in the instruction period I described a little bit about working with mind states in general. This evening I'd like to explore some particular mind states that tend to catch us up.

The Buddha was very kind to us in all of these lists that he made. One of the lists that he offered to us was a particular set of mind states, mental energies that tend to hinder our ability to be in the present moment, hinder our concentration. This list is called the hindrances. The five hindrances that the Buddha identified as being states that tend to get in our way, tend to make it difficult for us to meditate, to be mindful, to settle into concentration, are sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and anxiety, and doubt.

The very name "hindrances"—I think because of the understanding that these states tend to get in the way of our being in the present moment, we may tend to think that if they are present, we cannot be present in the present moment. That they inherently hinder our ability to connect with experience in the present moment. What they do mostly is tend to take us away. There's a lot of habitual energy around these hindrances that tends to catch us, to have us get caught in their beliefs and their delusions, and tends to obscure our ability to be present—but does not inherently obscure our ability to be mindful of them.

In fact, in the Satipatthana Sutta, the instructions that we have of record that offer what the Buddha had to say about mindfulness and practicing mindfulness meditation, he included this list as good objects for meditation. In the fourth foundation of mindfulness, he included a whole section on how to practice with the hindrances.

One of the keys around the hindrances is recognizing that they are hindrances, they get in our way, only when we are not mindful of them. When we can bring mindfulness to them, they actually become the path. They become the soil, the compost, in which our mindfulness can strengthen.

These states, the hindrances, tend to be experienced as unpleasant, as dukkha, as suffering. In the First Noble Truth, the Buddha said, what do we need to do with suffering? Suffering happens. And we need to understand it. That was his instruction to us around suffering: understand suffering.

With these hindrances, if we apply that instruction, we need to understand these hindrances. Not intellectually. This understanding in the First Noble Truth that the Buddha was talking about is not an intellectual understanding, but an experiential understanding, a knowing, a meeting, a being with. An understanding that arises through connection with the experience, not through thinking about it.

And so we become explorers, we become naturalists, we investigate, we get to know our states of mind—and in particular these hindrances when they arise.

I like the analogy of a naturalist in terms of investigation in our practice. The way a naturalist works: a naturalist will go out into nature and just observe. Take their time observing what happens over time. They walk through the woods, identify perhaps different plants or different animals to observe, and over time they continue to go back over and over again to look at them. The understanding arises with a naturalist as the observation gains some momentum, as the naturalist over time begins to see: oh, this is what happens to this plant as it grows. This is what this animal does at this time of year, and this is what they do at this time of year. These are the calls they make when they're mating. These are the calls they make when they've found food. These are the calls they make when they're alarmed. Over time, just through being in the environment, they learn. The knowledge grows.

Very similarly, as we—with patience, with kindness, with persistence, a gentle patience and persistence—meet these states, we get to know: how do they come about? What are the conditions that lead to them? What are they like when they're here? What are the conditions that support their falling away?

As naturalists we observe, not with the agenda to get rid of the hindrances, but with the interest to understand.

One of the principles, one of the interesting things about the way the practice works, is that things shift and change as we observe them. They shift and change not because we want them to, not because we are observing them in a particular way in order to make something happen to them, but they shift and change because as we hang out with our experiences, much as with the naturalist, wisdom and understanding begin to grow.

As we notice what happens as sense desire arises over and over and over again, wisdom begins to grow. We begin to understand something about the nature of sense desire. Or we begin to understand something about the nature of fear, anxiety, restlessness, doubt. As we begin to understand that nature, wisdom strengthens, and it is wisdom that creates the transformation. Wisdom transforms our mind. Understanding transforms our minds.

In exploring these hindrances with you, I'd like to talk about each one.

I'd like to encourage this attitude of interest, investigation, and curiosity. These hindrances will arise—probably every single one of them in every single one of you. They're going to be with us, and they're going to be with us for a while. So it might be useful, rather than having an adversarial relationship with them, to get curious about them.

For a while in my practice, I definitely had the sense that the hindrances were obstructions. They were in the way, things to be gotten rid of in order to get down to the real practice. I believed the real practice didn't begin while I was experiencing anger or sense desire or sleepiness—that it was not possible for practice to begin until those went away.

Through many three-month courses and many times of basically having the hindrances so in my face—one retreat was what I call my self-hatred retreat—it was like surrender. Okay, I guess self-hatred is what I have to pay attention to. And as I surrendered to it, getting interested in it, that's when I began to see that deep, transforming understanding can arise right in the midst of observing these hindrances. Watching self-hatred, deep understanding about its ephemeral, empty nature as a mind state became possible.

So the hindrances are not in the way of practice. They are our practice. They don't tend to feel good, and so we don't like them. But that's just ill will—another hindrance.

These hindrances do at times tend to come together in what we sometimes call a multiple hindrance attack. You have a feeling of sleepiness, and then you hate that feeling of sleepiness, and then doubt arises: "Oh, I'm sleepy." There you've got three of them all at once. They can tend to come together, but they are workable. They are our path. Transformation can happen right in the midst of them. I'd really like to encourage a sense of curiosity, of interest to understand them. With that perspective, wisdom will grow.

So, sense desire. This one's pretty basic. Certain things are pleasant; we tend to like them, to want them, to want more of them. This movement of being in the presence of pleasure and not really clearly understanding whatever it is—this pleasant phenomenon—as being an ephemeral, impermanent experience. Our delusion, our mind thinks, "That is what's going to make me happy."

It's actually quite amazing when we start to really see the way sense desire works. While it's operating and while we believe it, we really do think that extra cookie is going to make us happy. Watch it for yourself. In that moment, in the throes of being caught and enthralled by sense desire, we have absolute conviction that that cookie is going to do it for us. We are not aware of just how impermanent and unreliable that bit of pleasure is.

Caught in the state of sense desire, sense desire believes that having that pleasant thing is what's going to make me happy. And sense desire also believes that if I don't get that thing, I will be unhappy. So sense desire tends to keep us from being present because we are caught in this story, caught in this fantasy.

Sometimes it's an idea in our mind. We construct something. It may be something actually there in the dining room, or it may be an idea in our minds—something from the world enters into our mind and we start planning the perfect job. "That's what I'm going to do when I leave." It becomes this kind of enduring fantasy. We can get hooked into sense desires of our own construction as well.

In that time, we are caught in the fantasy, caught in the belief that having that thing is what will make us happy. We are not noticing that in the very moment of having that sense desire and being pulled out of the present moment, there's an inherent sense of offness, of dissatisfaction happening. Essentially, with sense desire, we are willing to give up happiness here and now—the sense of ease and peace here and now—for the possibility of a fleeting moment of happiness, maybe, in the future.

Sense desire has this powerful delusive force to it, making us believe that getting that thing will make us happy. What sense desire will not tell us is that if the sense desire goes away, there won't be a problem.

So this is the exploration with mindfulness. When sense desire arises and you notice it, you become aware of it, see if you can take your attention out of the thing you are reaching for, whatever it is that you want, and turn towards the experience of sense desire itself.

That experience of sense desire itself doesn't feel very good. It feels off, it feels like something's wrong. We get the visceral sense of why we follow through on it—in effect, because it doesn't feel good. And when we get that thing that we want, that feeling of dissatisfaction goes away for a moment. That's one of the hooks that sense desire has for us.

When we get what we want, we get a double hit of pleasure. We get the pleasure of the thing that we want, and we get the pleasure of the sense desire going away. I'd like to propose to you that the bigger part of the pleasure, the biggest hook actually for us, is the sense desire going away—that relief that we get when sense desire disappears. It's huge.

When we begin to turn towards the experience of sense desire, look at it, feel it, get to know it, and we watch it for long enough that we actually begin to see it, maybe we even begin to see it dissipate or even see it vanish, then we will know for ourselves that sense desire has been like pulling the wool over our eyes, making us believe that the only way we can be happy is to get what we want.

In one three-month course, I was doing the practice of sense restraint—not looking at people, keeping my gaze down. And I found that I really wanted to look at people. For many weeks I was walking around with blinders on. "I'm not going to look. I am not going to look. They told me not to look. I'm not going to look." So it was kind of like I was doing it because I was told to. At that time there was more of an encouragement towards sense restraint, and so I was forcing myself to do it. As I felt all that sense desire arise, it was like, "No, no, no, I'm not going to follow. Nope, nope." There was a lot of repression of the feeling of wanting.

After several weeks of this, finally I got it. "Ah, this is sense desire. This is desire. Maybe I should look at it. Maybe I should watch it as opposed to just trying to force myself to stay unmoving." And so I began to do that. I began to watch the desire. I didn't follow through on it—I kept my gaze down—but rather than having it be a forceful thing, I got interested in the desire.

It was actually fascinating to begin to see how it appeared, when it appeared. I would be walking, minding my own business, nobody around. Sense desire was very far away. The desire to look at people—when people weren't around, the desire to look at people didn't exist. That was pretty clear. And then as I was walking, somebody would pop into my peripheral vision, and boom, sense desire would arise in that instant. I was seeing it coming into being.

As I felt it, I felt like a pull, like a magnetic pull, to look at that person. It took some energy not to look up, but while I was feeling it, I was interested in the experience of that pull. Then it got even stronger. It strengthened as the person would walk a little bit up in front of me, and all it would have taken was a little flick of the eyes to look up and look at them. Oh, it got so strong. And there, just noticing, feeling the feeling.

I was doing walking meditation out here. A person would cross in front of me—oh, very strong when they were right there. And then they'd go up the steps and into the door. The desire disappeared. It vanished in an instant. I felt like I'd been released from a vice grip.

The recognition of just how powerful that experience of wanting had been—around something as simple as looking at somebody. How painful it had been to be caught in that vice grip around the simplicity of wanting to look at somebody. The mind reels at how much dukkha there is for the many kinds of wanting we have that are more potent for us than looking at somebody.

Seeing this, being curious about watching this moment—the moment of seeing it arise, seeing it strengthen, feeling it, then seeing it disappear—that was a powerful moment. Not only for the understanding of how much suffering it was, but for the understanding of the happiness that came from the release of the wanting.

In that moment, the delusion of wanting—the story it was telling me that I would be happy if I looked—was seen for the complete hoax it was.

So, watching sense desire, getting familiar with it. As we explore turning towards sense desire, there's a kind of middle way that we practice around both sense desire and ill will: we neither repress it nor indulge it. It can be quite challenging to walk that middle line. When we open to sense desire without repressing it, sometimes it can slip into, "Oh, I'm just going to feel this desire," and we end up indulging it. We might find ourselves in a fantasy, just indulging that fantasy. So it takes some honest discernment to recognize when we are slipping into indulgence rather than really paying attention to the desire itself.

In general, I would say that if you're noticing desire and there's a lot of pleasant experience, you may be indulging it—not really connecting to the feeling of the desire itself. The desire itself has a little bit of an off feeling to it. We have to learn to be honest with ourselves about whether we are indulging. If we find that a particular kind of sense desire has so much power over us, there may be some strategies that help. Let yourself not be in the presence of that thing you desire, if possible. Just keep yourself away from it. Or you may be able to turn your attention elsewhere, put your attention on something else—especially if it's a sense desire of your own construction in your own mind, a fantasy kind of sense desire. Let yourself set it aside and put your attention on something neutral in your experience. Perhaps the breath, perhaps sound. Just keep saying no to that pattern if you find that trying to pay attention to it just loops you into it over and over again.

Then there is ill will. Ill will is the flip side of sense desire, so much of what I've said about sense desire applies here as well. Ill will tends to arise when we are in the presence of something unpleasant. We don't like it; we want to get rid of it, fix it, change it, control it. There are many different flavors of mental states that can come into this category of ill will, including anger, frustration, hatred, irritation, annoyance, rage, and dislike. It's a range of experience, from extremely strong to quite subtle.

The delusion around ill will is that the mind of ill will believes getting rid of that thing is what will make us happy—or getting ourselves away from the thing is what will make us happy. Fear can also come into this category. Fear may arise as the sense of, "I don't like that thing; I need to get away from it."

Again, one of the main ways to work with ill will is to see if you can take your attention out of the thing you are averse to and place the attention on the aversion itself, on the ill will itself. It's very helpful, for both sense desire and ill will, to recognize how these mind states impact the body.

There are often many thoughts accompanying both sense desire and ill will. With sense desire, the thoughts may run along the lines of, "How can I get that thing? I'm going to be so happy. It's going to be so great if I get that thing." With ill will, it may be, "If I get rid of this thing... How can I fix this? How can I change this? How can I control it? I can't be happy unless I figure this out." These kinds of thoughts tend to run when we are caught in the throes of sense desire or ill will. And the thoughts themselves are like fuel for those states of mind. If those thoughts are running and we're not aware of them as simply thoughts, it's as if we've got our foot on the gas pedal, fueling the belief in those thoughts and in that state of mind.

As we begin to explore sense desire and ill will, one of the most helpful things is this: as you turn towards the sense desire or ill will itself, see if you can let go of the thoughts, the story associated with it. Take your attention away from the thing that serves as the trigger and see if you can come into the experience of the ill will or sense desire itself.

It can be particularly helpful to look at this in the body. Ill will in the body often manifests as contracted feelings in the throat, tension around the heart, heat, or pressure in the case of anger. There are many bodily sensations that accompany ill will, anger, rage, and irritation. Get familiar with those. When we attend to the physical sensations associated with the emotion, with the ill will, we are in the present moment. We are mindful in the present moment. There can be some level of balance, of wise mindfulness with the experience—as opposed to being caught by the beliefs and stories of ill will.

So, turning to the body. As we explore that, as we put our attention in the body and take our attention out of the fuel of the thoughts, we begin to see things shift and change. We may experience some relief or release around these states of mind.

at least for me, it feels like bringing attention to aversive states of mind produces an almost immediate relief as I put my attention on the aversion. The aversive states tend to be really unpleasant, and when we recognize them, something shifts.

With sense desire, our minds can be caught in the fantasy or the thought, "Oh, that's going to be so great." Our mind is deluding us into thinking that we're happy or feeling good when this sense desire is going on. We're so confused that we don't even notice the unpleasantness of the sense desire itself. But with aversion, with ill will, it's pretty obvious. It doesn't feel good, usually. It doesn't feel good.

And so putting our attention on the ill will itself, sometimes we can recognize, "Oh, that's what's happening right now. Anger is happening right now." And there can be just a little bit of space around the experience. We don't feel quite so caught up or revved up in the ill will. Right in the very turning towards it with mindfulness, there can be a little bit of release, a little bit of relief. A little bit of that wisdom can begin to operate.

With ill will, with aversion, with anger—these states can often get very strong. If they're not seen, they can very quickly spiral out of control. Dislike can quickly turn to irritation, which can quickly turn to anger, which can quickly turn to hatred or rage. It can mushroom really quickly. And sometimes it gets so strong so quickly that there can be overwhelm. It becomes very difficult to bring mindfulness to it. Or if we try to bring mindfulness to it, we find ourselves hooked. We turn towards it, thinking, "Okay, I'm going to try to be present for this anger," and then boom, we're right back in the story. It becomes nearly impossible to let go of the story.

I found this happening for myself around anger at one stretch of time—a particular person that I was angry with. Whenever they came up in my mind, I would get so angry. I tried being mindful of it, but I discovered pretty quickly that when I tried being mindful, almost immediately I was back in the story. The intention to be mindful, the mindfulness itself, was not quite strong enough to meet the power of that rage.

As I began to see that turning my attention to it with mindfulness wasn't so helpful, I began choosing to put my attention elsewhere. For some reason this often happened while I was walking. The mind would be drifting, and it would land on a thought of this person and spin into rage. So what I would do when I was walking was simply put my attention on something neutral, which happened to be my feet on the ground. Just noticing, "Okay, yep, there's that anger. Yep, okay, I see you."

This shift to turn away from a hindrance cannot be done with aversion itself. It can't be done with, "Oh, there's that anger. I hate that anger. I can't be with it. I need to push it away." It has to be a more respectful kind of recognition and acknowledgment. The way I did this with my anger was almost like I bowed to it. "I see you. I see you, and I see that you're asking for attention. And I can't do it right now. So I will come back to you when my mindfulness is stronger."

That kind of respect and acknowledgment—it's like saying, "Ah, not now. I see you, not now." That whole conversation in my mind got collapsed down to just the phrase: "Not now. Not now."

I worked with that anger in that way for a long time—months. Months I worked with the anger in that way. And actually, that simple tool, "not now," in that particular case was really powerful. What happened was this: I was mostly working with this particular anger in daily life, and I would notice it. At first it was happening daily—"Oh, not now. Okay, not now"—multiple times a day, even. And over time I began recognizing another one of the tools that the Buddha points to around the hindrances.

Noticing when it's not there. Notice the absence of the hindrances.

And so I began noticing that the bouts of anger were getting further apart. Perhaps every few days I would have this experience and think, "Oh, not now." And then every few weeks. At some point, it occurred to me that I had not experienced that anger for a very long time. And in that moment of remembering—"Oh, gosh, that anger's not there"—of course the person popped into my mind. But the anger still did not pop into my mind. It was kind of like, "Whoa, where did it go?" It was startling in a way.

Since that moment, that anger at that person has never returned. It disappeared when I wasn't looking. It disappeared because I was willing to meet it, bow to it, and set it aside without aversion. Slowly over time the pattern got deconditioned. And so that tool also can be very powerful—a simple recognition, acknowledgement, and then turning to the breath or feet on the ground or hearing.

When we cannot meet our difficult mind states directly, wisdom can also grow in the simple recognizing and setting aside.

Then there's sloth and torpor—sleepiness, low energy, thick mind, dull mind. Often the mind is agitated around this particular hindrance because there are beliefs operating, particularly in meditation. If sleepiness arises in meditation, if low energy or thick mind arises, we often have the belief, "I can't meditate while this is happening. It's not possible to meditate while sleepiness is happening. I have to increase the energy. I have to become not sleepy in order to meditate." That's a belief that we have.

What I'd like to suggest is that if you have enough energy to have the thought, "I'm too sleepy to meditate," then you might have enough energy to be aware of the sleepiness itself, of the low energy itself. Perhaps play with it.

One of the confusions in the mind, I think, or one of the beliefs around meditation, is that we're supposed to be able to see things clearly. And when the mind is sleepy, things are very hazy—it's hard to touch what the experience is. From the standpoint of being able to clearly recognize and clearly connect with this sensation and that sound, that may not be available when you're sleepy.

I sometimes use the analogy of mindfulness being like a mirror. It reflects. It reflects whatever's there—beautiful things, unpleasant things, ugly things. The reflecting power of the mirror is not changed by what it reflects.

Then think about that mirror in the bathroom after a shower, when the mirror is coated with steam. You might be able to see a kind of hazy outline of yourself, maybe. We might think, "Perhaps I need to clear the mirror. The mirror is not doing its job. I need to wipe it off so that I can see myself, so the mirror can do its job." But the mirror is actually doing its job perfectly. It is reflecting every drop of water on the mirror. It's just not doing the job we want it to do.

And very much when the mind is sleepy, that's what's going on. There's a state of mind—foggy, dull, low energy, droopy, drifty, dreamy. The mind is not perhaps able to choose, "Oh, I want to look at that thing," or "I want to observe this or investigate that." But perhaps, what I've seen in my own experience, is that if I align myself in the moment with what's actually happening in the mind and get interested in what's most obvious—which is that state itself—there's often enough energy to know something about it.

And again, it's not a precise thing. The state of sleepiness, of low energy, is not something we can say, "This is where it is, this is the experience of it." It's a broad state of mind.

And we can get familiar with that. I've had a lot of practice with this. It was a couple of years that pretty much every time I went to retreat, the mind was very dull, very sleepy, very low energy. And again, it was like, surrender. This is what's happening. I learned so much from that time—so much about over-efforting.

Sometimes I think, especially as the retreat goes on, that a dull mind, a sleepy mind, an exhausted mind sometimes results because we've been trying too hard. And so sometimes it's a pointer to a way to pay attention with a little less energy. Can you meet the state of low energy?

Actually, I found that using the phrase "low energy" instead of "dullness" was helpful. I was doing walking meditation out here on one retreat during this two-year period, and I was noting the dullness of mind. I was like, "dull, dull, dull." And at some point I recognized that even though I was noticing it as dullness, there was a little bit of a spin to it. It was a little bit judgmental. Dullness is bad. I could be kind of aware of it, but there was just this belief that dullness was not a good state.

And then when I shifted it—when I recognized, well, what's actually happening here is the energy is low—okay, low energy is happening. That had a more neutral feeling to it. And then as I explored low energy, I noticed that in the dull state, my mind had been going, "God, I cannot pay attention to hearing. I can't notice the sensations." But as I began to recognize, "Oh, this is actually low energy," and I just turned to the feeling of low energy through the body and the mind, I recognized, "Wow, hearing is already happening. I don't have to do that. I'm already experiencing body sensations. I don't have to do that either."

And so the practice helped me to see that there had been a little bit of over-efforting, trying to see experience that was actually already available.

We often believe that our minds need to be in a certain state in order to meditate. And this state of mind around low energy, thick mind, dull mind, sleepy mind—these tend to be states that we believe we cannot meditate or we cannot be aware in. Spacing out, for instance. We might think spacing out is inherently non-mindful. Isn't that the very definition of spacing out? Wouldn't that mean that you're not mindful? That's what I thought—until I began getting curious and let go of the idea that spacing out means I'm not mindful.

I was having breakfast one morning and noticing that the mind was spacing out, and at that period it was like, "Okay, spacing out. Okay, come back to breakfast." To me that's what being mindful meant: being mindful of eating, the physical sensations, and so forth. And so I was turning my attention back to the physical sensations of eating, and the mind would space out again. Okay, come back. It was this come-back, come-back approach.

But at some point during that meal, I began to see that while I was paying attention to breakfast, there was this pull, a feeling of the mind wanting to let go of paying attention so hard. And as I noticed that, I was curious: "Wow, I can see that. Why don't I just see where the mind wants to go?" Instead of trying to hold my attention on the physical sensations of eating, I watched the mind go into this very pleasant, vibrating, energetic space. I could be completely mindful of it. I was right there for it. It was very restful. And in about thirty seconds, it cleared. Then I was just very present with my food, my body.

And in that coming back after it cleared, I understood: the mind had been tired, exhausted. It wanted a rest. And it was taking its rest whether I wanted it to or not, but I could be there for it while it took its rest. It got its rest, and then it was available again. I was available to be with it while it was spacing out.

And so if there's ever a state of mind where you think it's not possible to be mindful while X is happening, don't believe that thought. Play with it. Explore. How might it be possible?

Maybe you could turn the question around: How might it be possible to be mindful while this is happening? Over and over again I've seen that it is possible—far more than we can fathom.

Another piece about sleepiness that I want to drop in is that so often we resist it. Sleepiness, dullness, low energy—and often the very resisting of it creates an unpleasant experience. Have you noticed that? When you're meditating and you're sleepy, the experience becomes so unpleasant if you're resisting it. The resistance itself is what creates the unpleasantness.

What I've discovered is that when that resistance goes, when I'm willing to just observe the sleepiness and watch without worrying whether I'm going to drop, but simply notice the sensations—oh, the feeling of the body getting heavy, the feeling of relaxation—it's really pleasant. It feels really good.

I spent one sitting at Yucca Valley in California where I had so much sleepiness, but I let that sleepiness happen and remained completely mindful of it. Then it would happen that I would drop, but I was sitting, so dropping woke me up, and I just sat up and did it all over again. In the course of that forty minutes, I never got past the sleepiness, but I was mindful for almost the entire thing, with the exception of very brief times when I dropped. So if you can let go of the resistance to sleepiness, there's a carrot waiting. It feels really good. See if you can be present for it.

Then there's restlessness and anxiety. Restlessness has both physical and mental aspects to it. Restlessness in the body is often very physically unpleasant—it feels sometimes like jumping beans under the skin, like you just cannot sit still. Restlessness in the mind is often like a whirling mind, a lot of thoughts.

What I found most helpful with restlessness, especially the physical side—well, both actually—is to let the attention get broad. With physical restlessness, if you're trying to hold the energy in the body or come in and be very precise about noticing all the various sensations of the restlessness, it's like putting yourself in a pressure cooker. All of that restless energy is trying to be contained in this tiny little space. But if you have the sense of letting your awareness get as big as the room, letting the restless energy get as big as the room, it creates more space for it. This has been the most helpful instruction for me around physical restlessness.

Around restless mind, when the mind is just spinning and spinning, often there is some kind of emotion connected to it—maybe some kind of worry or anxiety. So again, seeing if you can let go of the thoughts and come into the energetic experience of how that restlessness is manifesting. It may feel like bees buzzing in the head, or whirling energy in the body, or a feeling like—at one point I felt like there was a pinball rolling around in my mind, in my head, just this swirling energy. If you can connect to the energetic experience and let go of the thoughts, the thoughts keep the state of mind stirred up. When we let go of the thoughts and connect with the energy, all of these states have their life.

Sense desire, ill will, restlessness—if we can open to them with mindfulness and not put the foot on the gas pedal with the thoughts, they have a life. They may last for a certain period of time, but if we're not fueling them, they will eventually dissipate.

It's kind of like a car going a hundred miles an hour down the freeway. The emotion—the sense desire, the ill will, the restlessness—is like the car hurtling down the road, and the thoughts associated with it are like our foot on the gas pedal. If we take our foot off the gas pedal and put the car into neutral—which is a good analogy for mindfulness, putting our minds into neutral—if you do that while going a hundred miles an hour down the freeway, the car doesn't stop immediately. It has momentum. But it will stop because you're no longer fueling it. You know it will stop. You can hopefully steer while the car's hurtling down the road as it's slowing down.

That's what we aim to do with our mindfulness. We aim to put our minds into a space that's more neutral, able to let these states flow through, live their life, and begin to dissipate. In the process, we learn something about the conditions that create the state of mind, about the experience of that state of mind. We learn about the dukkha. We learn about the dukkha of sense desire, of ill will, of restlessness. Understanding grows as we have the mind in neutral, allowing the state to begin to dissipate.

With restlessness we also need to learn when not to engage with it directly. Again, if we try to turn towards any of these states with mindfulness and we find that they're strengthening, or that aversion is growing as we try to turn toward these states with mindfulness—when that happens, we may need to change the channel, put our attention on something else.

With restlessness, it can be helpful to go out, take a walk, be in nature, look at trees. I found looking at trees to be a really helpful way to work with restlessness. So open the eyes. See if you can again let the container get big.

Then there's doubt. Kamala talked so beautifully the other night about faith, and faith is the flip side of doubt—or rather, doubt is the flip side of faith. So much of what she talked about with respect to faith illuminates what supports us to release doubt. There's doubt in the same things that we have faith in: we have doubt in ourselves, in the teachings, in the practice.

I think with doubt, when it arises, one of the key things is that we need to learn to recognize it's happening. Because when we're caught in doubt, our mind is so far from mindfulness. If we can begin to recognize the stories that doubt tells, we have the possibility to turn toward it. Doubt cannot last long. Doubt doesn't last long when we turn to it with mindfulness. It really doesn't have a lot of traction when we can meet it with awareness.

Beginning to recognize the thoughts of doubt—for me, what I discovered most indicative of doubt was thoughts about the practice. Usually thoughts that it doesn't work, that I can't do it, or that the teachers don't know what they're talking about. If there are thoughts in your mind like that, see if you can recognize: doubt is happening. If you're having thoughts about the practice in that way, just play with it—okay, maybe doubt's here. Maybe this is doubt. Maybe I could notice this is doubt.

Again, there's often an underlying feeling. When I would turn toward doubt, when I recognized "oh, this is doubt," I would ask myself: What's here? What else is here? What does doubt feel like? It had different flavors and was often connected to some other kind of emotion—vulnerability, a feeling of inadequacy, a feeling of failure, a fear of the unknown. At one point I remember asking, what does doubt feel like? It felt like grief. And as I opened to that feeling, it was like, "Oh, I can be with this."

Learning to recognize the stories of doubt is probably the most powerful tool we have, because doubt is almost always manifesting as thoughts in our mind.

The piece I most want to leave you with is hopefully some sense of interest in the exploration of these states that can sometimes be so difficult. There's a lot of power that comes from being willing to have the courage to meet our challenging states of mind. It took a lot of courage for me to meet that self-hatred over and over again. And there were times when I had to set it aside. But the power of mindfulness—of wise mindfulness—to begin to transform these difficult energies is profound. Not that we do this transformation, but the understanding, the learning, the wisdom that develops as we meet these difficult states has the power to deeply transform us.

Sometimes Joseph says we want insight into suffering without experiencing suffering. These states are often experienced as suffering, and we have to meet suffering. Insight into suffering happens through connection, through contact with it.

So open to them. Be curious about them. Get to know them, understand them.

CHAPTER 56

Recognizing Delusion

Andrea Fella · 1h01

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines moha (delusion) as the most fundamental of the three unwholesome roots, noting that both greed and aversion arise in dependence upon it. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's instruction to know when delusion is present or absent, she explores why delusion is paradoxically the most difficult mental state to recognize.
>
> Fella identifies two broad categories of delusion: the disconnected, foggy states where we're lost in thought worlds and not present to experience, and the more subtle form where we're aware but perceiving through filters, views, and biases. She offers vivid personal examples of how aversion can color perception, how cultural conditioning creates unexamined beliefs, and how selective attention causes us to miss obvious aspects of reality—illustrated by the famous 'invisible gorilla' study.
> The talk culminates in an exploration of the three fundamental perceptual distortions shared by all human beings: taking what is impermanent (anicca) to be permanent, what is unreliable (dukkha) to be a source of lasting happiness, and what is not-self (anattā) to be self. Fella emphasizes that while we cannot simply will non-delusion into being, we can cultivate curiosity about our delusion and learn to acknowledge when believing is happening —creating space around even deeply held misperceptions.

In his teaching on freedom, the Buddha over and over emphasized that freedom was not freedom to do things, but freedom from ways that we get caught. And over and over again he said that freedom, Nibbana, is freedom from greed, freedom from aversion, and freedom from delusion.

Our practice is not—I mean, it would be nice if we could just simply hear that and go, "Oh, greed, aversion, and delusion, that's not helpful. Let's stop." That doesn't work that way, as I think you all are very aware. Our work is to understand. The Buddha said we need to understand our suffering, we need to understand the things that cause suffering, and let go of the causes of suffering. We move in this direction by studying how our minds get caught in greed, how our minds get caught in aversion, how our minds get caught in delusion.

We've been talking about working with these over the last couple of weeks. This morning Greg brought out the teaching on mindfulness of mind, which emphasizes these three: recognizing the presence and absence of greed, aversion, and delusion as a very big part of this aspect of studying mindfulness of mind. We get familiar with what the presence of greed is like, what the absence of greed is like, what the presence of aversion is like, what the absence of aversion is like, and what the presence and absence of delusion are like.

It's relatively easy to begin to recognize greed and aversion. It has been commented in the hall that they're at least recognizable, if not easy to be with. We can begin to recognize when we're caught by those energies and begin to learn some tools to allow us to open to them, tools that allow us to work with them. But delusion, by its very nature, is much harder to even recognize.

So how do we do this? How do we begin to know the presence of delusion? As the Satipatthana Sutta recommends, one knows delusion when it is present, one knows delusion when it is absent, when delusion is not present. How do we recognize delusion being present? That's the subject for the talk.

Delusion is more fundamental, in a way, than greed or aversion, in that greed and aversion arise in dependence on delusion. If delusion didn't exist, if we didn't have delusion in our minds, greed and aversion would not be arising. And so greed and aversion always exist simultaneously with delusion—some fundamental misunderstanding in the mind that leads it to want, leads it to want to get rid of.

There are different forms of delusion that I'd like to explore with you tonight. My aim with this talk is mostly to provide some information, some examples, and some stories that I hope will help you begin to be able to recognize delusion in your experience. To begin to follow that instruction: delusion is present, delusion is affecting the mind right now. That simple instruction of the Satipatthana is not so simple to implement, not so simple to recognize. But my hope is that with this talk there will be some understanding that allows you to begin to recognize this—that delusion is affecting the mind.

So, different forms of delusion. Two basic broad categories. One is simply the not-connecting form, the form of delusion that is checked out, lacking awareness. This is maybe the more obvious form of delusion. The second more general form of delusion is where we're aware, we're present, it's not that we're checked out, but we are experiencing things through some kind of filter, some kind of perspective, agenda, or view that alters how we take in information.

To begin with an example of this: greed and aversion, while they already have delusion at their root, can also create a form of delusion on top of themselves. For instance, with aversion, if we are caught in the field of aversion—some of you may have recognized this or noticed this, I certainly did at one point—I knew that I was in this aversive state, and everywhere my eyes landed, I saw things to hate. I was doing walking meditation downstairs in the walking room, and I was noticing that I was in this aversive state. As I turned around and looked at the other end of the room, my eyes landed on some shoes that somebody had left at the end of the walkway. And my mind just exploded with aversion. Who left those shoes there? This is a form of the aversion, but with everything being colored by that lens. It's like we only take in things from that perspective. That's the delusion.

At one point, in an early exploration of choiceless awareness, my teacher asked me just to notice whatever my attention landed on. I did that for a few minutes, and as I finished, I stopped and said, "Well, you said to do choiceless awareness, but this couldn't possibly have been choiceless, because everything my attention landed on was unpleasant." Again, that speaks to a filter, a kind of view that the mind is seeing through, pulling out of the environment, pulling out of experience, things that are in line with that view or that filter. This is the second form of delusion. It's not a form of delusion that prevents us from being present, but in our being present, we are not taking in information in an unbiased way.

There are three areas I want to explore tonight. One is this area of uncertainty, the lack of connection to experience—that part of delusion, the more cloudy, unconnected, disconnected state. Then, within the area of filters—of taking in information in a biased way—there are two ways I want to examine this.

First are views or perspectives that we grow up with. These are views and perspectives created because of our culture, our family, the way we interacted with people—basically because of our conditioning. As human beings, we have navigated this world carrying various views, perspectives, and agendas that we have lived with. Those views, perspectives, and agendas influence how we see the world and create a skew, a bias, in how we take in information.

The third category I want to explore is what I will call more human delusion—a kind of fundamental distortion of our experience that we share uniformly with all human beings. It is very deeply ingrained in our structure as human beings, not so particularly conditioned by our families, but simply part of our very makeup. These misperceptions are part of the structure of how we interact with the world because they are not seen as distortions.

This first one—not connecting with experience—we have actually talked about quite a bit: this form of delusion where we're in a fog, or lost in a story, in a thought world, a thought bubble, basically living in some world where we're not really connecting with what's actually happening here and now. These thought bubbles, these thought worlds we inhabit sometimes—when we get lost in thought, it's quite amazing sometimes when we come out of those thoughts to recognize just how much we might have believed the world that was created by them.

At one point, I had broken up with a partner several years before. I had pretty much gotten over any of the anger or hurt—it was all gone at that point. When thoughts about my ex-partner would come up, there wasn't any particular emotional charge anymore. One day I was walking down the street, and I woke up into this thought world. I had been lost in it for about five minutes, and in that thought world, I was back in relationship with that partner. As I came out of that thought bubble, awareness immediately arose. In that moment, I could see that what was being experienced was confusion—because the mind had so thoroughly believed the story that I was back in relationship with that partner. When I came out of it, it was like, "What? No. What? Where am I? What's going on?" It was really like a waking dream.

I think this kind of thing happens to us a lot. But often we have an emotional charge around those thoughts, so what's obvious to us when we come out of some of those thought worlds is emotional reactivity. In this case, it was really clear to me that the mind had been caught in this world and believing it, precisely because there wasn't an emotional charge. There was this recognition that the mind had thoroughly been believing something that was just a construction, something that had not been part of my life for years.

So this is the kind of disconnection from reality—taking birth into our thought worlds. This is a form of delusion. We can start to get familiar with this disconnection from experience. In the moment that we return back into mindfulness, when we remember, there can be—if you're curious about that moment, if you're curious about the re-arising of mindfulness itself rather than thinking, "Oh, I need to do something, I need to come back to my breath, or do metta"—rather, just: here I am, I'm aware in this moment. What is awareness like in this moment? In that moment, as we come back into mindfulness, there can be a lingering memory of what it was like to be lost moments before. We get a flavor of what that disconnected state is like in the moment that we come back.

We can also begin to get curious about those states that are habitually disconnected—as we've been talking about with the hindrances: sleepiness, dullness, fogginess, confusion. With many of these states, we habitually experience a disconnection from experience. But it doesn't have to be inherently non-mindful or unaware in those states. Again, we can begin to explore, to be curious about states that we think would be inherently non-mindful.

It is possible to be mindful when the mind disconnects from what we think we should be paying attention to—we can stay present for the spacing out itself. We can begin to get familiar with these foggy, hazy, confused states of mind. And in the very becoming mindful in those states, we are no longer in that condition of delusion where we are disconnected.

Habitually with spacing out, we're disconnected from experience, not even aware of what's going on. But there's the possibility of becoming aware of the spacing out. In that moment, we are aware of what's happening in the present moment, connected with the experience of spacing out. It's a very different relationship to that experience.

I think I said the other day that if there's any state of mind that you believe or think it's not possible to be mindful while X is happening, don't believe that thought. Rather, perhaps try exploring: how might it be possible to be mindful while X is happening? When I've explored it from that perspective, it can take some time—sometimes it can take some time to find the way to connect, to have the mindfulness kind of infuse that state. But the curiosity about how it might be possible is very supportive. You may not figure it out right away, but keep holding that question.

Now, in the terrain of the second kind of delusion—where we're not disconnected but we are seeing things in a biased way based on our personal conditioning, our cultural conditioning—how this becomes delusion is that we're immersed in a view, immersed in a perspective. Being so thoroughly immersed in a perspective, we are unaware that we're even holding a view or a perspective. It's simply the way things are. And because we don't even have a clue that we are holding a perspective, the way we're taking in information, we assume it's an accurate representation of reality.

These views in place, one of their functions seems to be to pull things out of the environment, have us find things that corroborate those views, and to conveniently ignore things that do not line up with those views, that do not match them. It's very hard when we're immersed in views like that to see evidence or information that would counter them.

I'm going to give you some examples of this kind of delusion. There's so many ways. But I want to give you a flavor of different ways that this kind of delusion works.

One is simply views that we have about ourselves—what we can do, who we are, what we can accomplish. "I'm good at this kind of thing, I'm not good at that kind of thing." We have these views of who we are, and from that perspective it's almost like we're limiting ourselves, boxing ourselves in. We do this to ourselves and we do it to other people.

There's one friend of mine who for a while I was noticing was late a lot. I began creating this view about her that she was always late. And I noticed the times that she was late. Then I began to get curious: am I just highlighting those? Am I just highlighting the ones where she's late? And then I discovered, actually, it was maybe fifty-fifty. She was sometimes late, she sometimes wasn't late. We create views of ourselves, of other people, and then we see our world in ways that support that.

One of my colleagues, Gil Fronsdal, tells a story that when he was young, maybe ten or so, he was in an art class drawing, and his art teacher came up to him, looked over his shoulder, and said, without any particular charge in her voice, "You have no artistic ability." He just took that in—okay, I don't have any artistic ability—and went through life thinking that. Then at some point in college, somebody convinced him to take an art class. He said, "I don't have artistic ability." But somebody convinced him to take an art class anyway. And it turned out he did have artistic ability. We can go through our lives with beliefs and limit ourselves based on those beliefs.

We notice when other people do this to us. Have you noticed sometimes when somebody says, "You're like this," and you bristle? It's like, "Well, yeah, I know I'm sometimes like that, but that's not who I am." We notice when other people do that to us, but we equally do it to ourselves—create these identities and limitations around who we are.

Our culture offers us many views. In American culture, one very predominant view—I certainly grew up with this belief—is that America, this country, is the land of opportunity. If you work hard enough in this country, you can get what you want.

So I grew up with that belief, and for me it happened to be fairly true. But the conditions of my life were really smooth. My family had enough money to send me to live in a place where I had really good schools. I felt safe at school. They had the money to send me to a good college.

In my case, yes, I worked hard and I accomplished many things, and I felt good about what I accomplished. But that perspective—that America is the land of opportunity and if you work hard enough you can get what you want, achieve your dreams, achieve your goals—is based on a very limited perspective. It doesn't take into account certain segments of the population: people living in poverty, in slums, in areas that are not safe, drug-dealing neighborhoods where there's a lot of gang warfare. It doesn't take into account that for some people, working hard means they have to overcome so much. And the patterns of culture keep one really embedded and stuck in various ways.

This kind of belief, this view that America is the land of opportunity where anyone who works hard enough can achieve their goals—this is kind of the root of what we could call white privilege. And I have to acknowledge that as a child, and even more recently, some part of my mind still has this very deeply held conditioning, these beliefs. My mind still has this little subtle thought if I see somebody who's on the street—that they're just not trying hard enough. These views are, I know, delusion. I know it's delusion. And so now at least I can start to see it, see these little thoughts. This is a view. It's a perspective. It's not based in everybody's reality.

There's a saying in the circles that are exploring this terrain of white privilege and understanding—recognizing that the perspectives we hold as a white culture are not universally applicable. This is really the perspective of one segment of the population. So the saying is: some people are born on third base thinking they hit a triple. I was born on third base. I had a really fortunate childhood where my parents had funds to clothe me and feed me, and they weren't abusive to me. I was born on third base. And I know now that I didn't hit a triple.

This kind of delusion, these filters, these views that have us taking in information in a biased way, can also be amazingly simple. Just a simple agenda in our minds can create a filter that selects certain information out of the environment and not other information. This is actually a useful function of the way our minds work. There's a name for it in psychology—it's called selective attention. It has a purpose. When we have a particular goal, it helps us to find information that relates to that goal and ignore information that doesn't relate to that goal. So it's a useful feature of our minds.

But what happens with that feature is that we do not recognize that this selective attention is operating. And we think that our mind and our sense apparatus is recording reality completely. It's like we have cameras for eyes and microphones or receivers for ears, and we're taking it all in and it's all available. But that's not the way our minds work. Our minds selectively pull certain things out of the field of sight and don't see other things. Selectively pull things out of the field of sound and don't hear other things. It's mind-blowing, but it's true.

There's a very famous study—I think maybe some of you have heard it, but I'm going to tell it again because there may be some of you who have not heard this story about selective attention. There was a research study doing an exploration of this selective attention, examining just how selective it is, how much we might miss. People were given a task when they watched a video. The video was of people throwing a basketball to each other, and they were told to count the number of times the basketball passed between the people in the white shirts. They watched the video, counted the number of times the basketball passed, and at the end they were asked how many times the basketball passed between the people in the white shirts. Largely, people could do that task.

It took some degree of focus. You had to follow and count, so the agenda was very selective—following that basketball.

A few people after the study would say something like, "Was there a gorilla that went through the video?" And indeed, there had been a guy in a gorilla suit who walked through the middle of the people, kind of stood there for a minute dancing around, and then walked out. I've seen this video—it is so obvious. If you're looking for the gorilla, you are not going to miss the gorilla. Or even if you're not looking for the gorilla but you're not doing anything else, if you're just watching the video, you're not going to miss it. Most people did not see the gorilla. That's selective attention.

Now in and of itself, that is not necessarily delusion. It's a form of not taking in information. But to me, the real delusion came in what's almost a footnote at the end of the study: some of the people, when shown the video again to demonstrate that yes, there was a gorilla in the video, said, "That cannot be the same video. I would have seen the gorilla." That is delusion. That is the believing of our experience as the truth of reality.

This kind of thing happens a lot, in so many ways with little small agendas. We walk into the dining room getting ready to get some tea—a little agenda of getting tea—and we may miss something entirely. Again, it's not that we're trying to not have selective attention happen. But I would say we need to begin to have some respect for the fact that we are probably not taking in everything. And if someone proposes an alternative view of reality, rather than saying, "Nope, doesn't match my experience," you might think, "Huh, that's interesting. Somebody else thinks it's different. Maybe I could check that out."

Another very common way of having a view created is when a view gets created based on incomplete information. The classic story about this is the elephant and the blind people, where blind people are given various parts of the elephant to touch. Some touch one part—the foot or the tail or the ear or the trunk—and then they're asked to compare notes about what an elephant is like. They have very different perspectives. This story is actually a teaching story from the time of the Buddha. At the ending of this story, after the blind people have touched the various parts of the elephant and they're comparing—"Well, an elephant is like this, it's like a trunk." "No, an elephant's like a broom." "No, an elephant's like a hose." "No, an elephant's like a storeroom"—they come to blows, saying, "An elephant is like this. It's not like that. I'm right, you're wrong."

Now, it's natural that we would create a view based on our limited experience, but to hold to that and say, "This is reality"—that's a very powerful form of delusion that works in our minds: not being aware that we're holding to views like that.

Views are useful. They help us to navigate the world. But often our views are below the level of our conscious awareness. We see somebody do something and we react. Sometimes in our meditation here when we're on retreat, we can recognize, "Wow, I see that person do that thing and I'm reacting, and I see it's completely out of line." All they're doing is getting a cup of tea and moving a little slowly. What is the reaction to? Often what's going on there is that there's some kind of belief operating, something that we believe that we're not seeing. And so it can be useful or interesting at times to check in.

If there's some kind of suffering happening, some kind of greed or aversion or confusion arising, and it's not clear to you what's going on, you could try checking in. Just ask the question—not trying to figure it out, but simply asking: What's being believed here? Is there a belief happening underneath this?

Then, rather than trying to figure it out, sometimes just opening the door to "Is there a belief here?" allows us to see something that was previously hidden. So check it out. Is there a belief? What might be being believed? Something about ourselves? Something about the other person? Something about the way the world works?

As we begin to see the way we believe things—one belief I had about myself for quite a long time was that I was a failure, that I was no good. This was a very subterranean belief for a long time in my life. It wasn't until I started meditating, actually until some of the three-month courses here, that I really began to see just how deep this pattern was, that I felt like I was a failure.

And so that thought, "You're a failure," at some point became such a refrain in my mind. I think I mentioned my self-hatred retreat a few weeks ago—just the mind that kept going back over and over again: I'm no good, I'm a failure, I can't do this, I'm a failure, I'm a failure, I'm a failure. Over and over again the mind was thinking that.

Sometimes when we see this, when a belief like this gets revealed—I mean, it was better to have it revealed than to have it be subterranean. It wasn't very pleasant to have it revealed, I'll say that, but at least it was seen. And when we can start to see these beliefs, what we can sometimes recognize is that it's a thought and it's being believed. "I'm a failure" is a thought. And the power we give to that thought is the belief we invest in it. It's simply a thought. It's simply a blip going through the mind. And yet when we are caught in the belief of it—and that being caught in the belief is the form of delusion—when we're caught in the belief of a thought like that, sometimes we might try to tell ourselves, "Oh, I'm not a failure." But what that's trying to do is deny the belief that's happening.

Something I found very helpful is to acknowledge: "Ah, 'I'm a failure.' Believing is happening." So when beliefs get revealed like this, we can acknowledge, "Oh yes, believing is happening right now. Believing 'I'm a failure' is happening right now." Acknowledging belief is a very powerful way to crack the door open around delusion, because it can take the experience from being something we take to be true—"I'm a failure, that's true"—to "'I'm a failure' is a belief that's arising in this moment." And again, there's a big difference between those two.

You're not trying to convince yourself not to believe it in that moment, but you're acknowledging: believing is what's happening right now. I've suggested this to some people, and the space this can create around even very powerful self-negativity can be quite helpful.

The most fundamental kind of delusion, the delusion we're all subject to as human beings, really the most insidious form of delusion—these are views that we share as a species, tend to share as a species I should perhaps say, that cloud accurate perception of experience and have us take in information in a very biased way. These views of taking what is impermanent to be permanent, taking what's unreliable to be a reliable source of lasting happiness, and taking what is not self to be self.

These are views that we are so deeply enmeshed in, they're very difficult for us to free ourselves from. Sayadaw U Tejaniya, in speaking of this form of delusion, says: delusion doesn't mask the object; it masks the true nature of the object. And so with this form of delusion, we can be aware, we can be mindful, and yet the very way that we're mindful, the very way we're taking information in, has a spin to it.

Beginning to see through these three very fundamental distortions of our perception, these distortions of the way we take information in—beginning to see through these is a lot of what our practice helps us to do.

There's so much rapidity of change in our experience that actually some of our perceptual processes work to slow down that change to some extent, to keep us from being overwhelmed by this massive amount of change. So we create concepts about experience.

Just for instance, looking out at this room, I'm seeing a room full of people and zafus and walls and lights. There's all kinds of concepts in this room. And largely, it's hard not to see experience through those concepts because it happens so fast. I've had some experiences at times on retreat when the mind got very, very still and I'd look out at something and all I would see would be form and color. It would be just like a blur of pixels. Thank goodness we don't have to walk through the world that way, figuring out moment by moment, "Oh, that's a person. Oh, that's a wall—don't walk into that." We need our concepts.

And yet, because we are unaware that we are living our experience through concepts, we take our concepts to be reality. It's actually the concepts that we take to be permanent. Concepts mask change.

The rapidity of change itself can also mask change. If you think about movies—they aren't like this anymore—but it used to be films with different frames, and the frame would go past the projector really quickly. Each frame is just a little still snapshot, but the rapidity of the motion creates the sense that there's some kind of continuity happening on the screen. So rapidity of change can create an appearance of solidity.

Another example of this is mentioned in the suttas, or maybe in the commentaries—a fire stick. If you have a stick with a burning fire on the end and you spin it around in a circle—we used to do this with sparklers when I was a kid, spin it around in a circle really fast—you'd see a circle in the air. The rapidity of the movement created the illusion that there was something hanging in the air. Our perceptual processes also mask the rapidity of change in just this way.

Our mindfulness begins to unmask this, to reveal that what we take to be solid and stable is actually very rapidly changing. A way to explore this is with anything that seems solid—I did this at one point on retreat—anything that seemed solid, I would put my attention there. "Wow, that seems like it's solid. What is that solidity?" Often it would actually start to break up as the attention actually met it and landed on it.

You can sometimes see this with pain. With the idea of pain, the concept of pain, it feels like in the knee there's a big block of pain. But if you can get past the aversion to the pain—which is contributing to that idea, "This is pain, this is a problem"—and get past that and just kind of hang out with the actual sensations, you'll see it is so rapidly changing. There's almost nothing anywhere that you can say, "Well, that is the pain." It's just this little flash of sensation and then that little flash of sensation and then another little flash of sensation, just moving, dancing around.

So investigate: What appears solid? What are you taking to be solid? What are you taking to be permanent? We can begin to go below the level of our concepts and actually meet the direct experience.

Then we see what's unreliable as reliable, as satisfying. This is the story of greed, really. This is the delusion that underlies greed—that this thing will make me happy. This sense pleasure, this pleasant experience, this is what will make me happy. Greed is the actual reaching out, but it's motivated by this belief that something will make me happy. Likewise with aversion—the belief that getting rid of that thing will make me happy is the underlying delusion of aversion.

An exploration here is to begin to investigate, not to just try to tell ourselves, "Oh, I shouldn't want things. How can I stop believing that when I get this thing it will make me happy?" We can't stop believing that. We have to begin to investigate, to explore. One of the instructions the Buddha gave around this: he said, yes, there are things that are going to make you happy. Pleasure, sense pleasure will make you happy. But start looking at how long does it last? This points back to impermanence, because the belief that something will make us happy is based on the view that it's going to last.

And so as we begin to see these things that we think are going to be reliable, that they end, that they vanish, it begins to undermine this belief. It begins to help us to let go.

And this is a very, very deeply ingrained belief. It goes beyond simple sense pleasure. On one retreat, I had enough understanding to recognize that searching for happiness in something was not going to work. But at some very deep level in the mind, what I got to watch at one point was just the mind searching, searching, searching. It's like, there must be some place for happiness to be found. Just this restless quality—surely somewhere, surely somewhere there's happiness to be found.

Early on in this, as I saw this pattern start to happen, I thought, this is ridiculous. I know this is not going to do any good. And I would try to stop the searching and just come to some kind of more stability. But at some point it's like, wow, this is some deep pattern that just wants to be convinced. And so I just let it do it. I was very mindful. This is the searching. Trying to find something, trying to find something.

And lo and behold, actually, the mind would find something. It would create a state of peace that felt really good. And I'd think, ah, that's nice. And then that state of peace would begin to disintegrate, and there was an even deeper release that happened as the mind just saw that state disintegrate and there was nowhere to land. It was just disintegration. And there's a little bit of learning there. Right, even that, even that peace isn't the place to land.

And then the mind would do it again. And again and again and again, over and over and over again. It's like, well maybe it was just that state of peace or something. I don't know what the mind was thinking, but it was just this very, very deep pattern that was asking to be seen.

And so sometimes that's what we do with delusion. This, to me, was watching delusion at work. Watching the mind searching for happiness, having some kind of feeling that surely there's some belief somewhere, some happiness somewhere. Understanding at an intellectual level that it wouldn't find it, but at this very deeply ingrained level, just watching it.

Watching that delusion at work, just watching it. Each time the mind let go, there was a deep release, a very deep release. That was kind of a moment of the mind going, right, okay, yep, nowhere to land. Absolutely nowhere to land.

I don't have time to talk about seeing what is not self as self, but I know somebody else will talk about that.

Exploring delusion, exploring non-delusion, is not something we can do directly. But as we explore delusion, as we get familiar with it, there are times when there's a kind of state of insight where the mind lets go of some confusion. And it sees—oh right, sense pleasure is not the way to go. Or it sees, yeah, aversion around this situation, that's not helpful. Or we see how thoughts are just thoughts. And it seems so obvious to us at some point.

When we're in a state where the insight or the non-delusion is functioning, it often seems so obvious. Like, how can I not see this? When delusion falls away, there is such clarity about particular understandings. And yet it is not obvious. Minutes later, maybe an hour later, the delusion comes back. And then we see, ah, it wasn't so obvious. How was it that I was seeing thoughts? How was it that it was possible not to think there was something out there that would make me happy? We're confused again.

At that moment we might disbelieve the insight, or disbelieve that what we saw was real or true or really seen. But what that can do for us actually, over time, what we can begin to recognize is that delusion falls away and it comes back. It falls away, it comes back. When it's fallen away, we see something really clearly. When it comes back, we can know it's delusion operating.

At that point we can know: delusion is present in me. And we are often not able to simply say, "Oh, let delusion go away and let me see things clearly again." But we can at least know delusion is present. Delusion is affecting the mind.

Even that is incredibly powerful—to know there's a belief here, and this belief is affecting the mind. Again, it creates a little gap around that delusion so that we're not just taking that delusional reality to be truth. And so delusion unwinds in a slow process.

Patience. Patience with this.

But I hope that you get curious about your delusion, as opposed to being combative with it or frustrated by it. We're all deluded. It's the nature of our minds. I could even go so far as to say: enjoy your delusion. Not in the deluded way, but in the curious way—being curious about it.

Thank you for your attention. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 57

Investigation

Andrea Fella · 59 min

In this three-month retreat talk, Andrea Fella offers a comprehensive exploration of dhammavicaya (investigation), one of the seven factors of awakening. She clarifies that investigation in Buddhist practice is not analytical thinking or figuring out why things happen, but rather a direct inquiry into what is happening right now. Drawing on the suttas' definition of wise attention, she shows how we can examine any moment of experience through the framework of the Four Noble Truths—recognizing whether suffering, its arising, its cessation, or the path is present.

Through vivid personal examples, including recurring embarrassment from a forgotten stage line and nightly loneliness traced to an unexpected memory, Andrea demonstrates how suffering is constructed in the present moment and how its causes can be discovered through patient observation rather than historical analysis. She emphasizes that wisdom—not our effortful doing—frees the mind, and that our role is to cultivate conditions for understanding to arise.

The talk addresses practical challenges in investigation: working with complex emotional patterns without assumptions or agendas, using questions as sparks for curiosity rather than analytical tools, and learning to receive subtle experiences rather than directing attention toward them. Andrea encourages patience with the gradual nature of practice, using the Buddha's analogy of a shipwreck weathering grain by grain, and Gil Fronsdal's image of chopping wood. She concludes by noting that investigation applies equally to wholesome states, helping us recognize even subtle craving within peaceful experiences.

The teachings of the Buddha offer us so many different tools and suggestions for our practice. There's a particular list that we're encouraged to cultivate—the qualities of the factors of awakening—which support us in this process of meeting experience, coming to understand our experience so that wisdom can grow.

This is really the purpose of our practice. We meet our experience, investigate our experience to cultivate wisdom and understanding. It's this wisdom and understanding that does the work of freeing our minds. We really can't do that work. It's more that we cultivate the conditions. We cultivate the conditions that support the development of wisdom, and then wisdom frees the mind.

It's kind of like creating the conditions for a beautiful tree to grow. We plant the acorn, perhaps, and then nurture the conditions. We offer it water and make sure it gets sunlight and make sure that the weeds are pruned away from it. We make sure we don't mow it over with a lawn mower. So we cultivate the conditions, but we don't make that tree grow. And so much of what the Buddha talked about was how do we cultivate the conditions for freedom?

One of the key supports for this is the seven factors of awakening. Tonight I'd like to explore one of those: the quality of investigation.

When we hear this word investigation—in the translation into English at least—we often associate it with a kind of thinking about or analyzing or figuring out. But that's not what this word dhammavicaya, which is the word typically translated as investigation, means. It doesn't mean figuring out or analyzing.

In practice, rather than trying to figure things out or figure out why things are the way they are—this is often what we're doing with investigation, we're in a mode of trying to figure out why something's happening—with the practice we turn towards a different question. And that question is: What is happening right now?

It's so simple. It is beyond simple in some ways. Our minds complicate things.

And so we're asked to look at what is happening moment to moment. In the texts it says that wise attention is the condition that supports the cultivation of all the enlightenment factors. And how does it support investigation?

One definition of wise attention is described in one of the suttas. It's a simple definition. It says: One who attends wisely attends to experience thus—this is suffering, this is the cause of suffering, this is the origin of suffering. One attends wisely: this is the cessation of suffering. One attends wisely: this is the way leading to the cessation of suffering.

This probably sounds familiar. It's a version of, a kind of framework—it's the framework of the Four Noble Truths. And yet when I first read this, it kind of glossed right over it. It's like, oh yeah, he's talking about the Four Noble Truths. Then in reading it again and really looking at what it is saying—one attends wisely: this is suffering, or this is the origin of suffering, or this is the cessation of suffering, or this is the way leading to the cessation of suffering—this teaching is asking us to explore our present moment experience from this perspective of the Four Noble Truths, from this perspective of this framework.

In any moment of arising experience, one of these four things will be what's happening. There will either be suffering, or suffering will be in the process of arising, or suffering will be ceasing, or we'll be cultivating the conditions that support our practice and support the ending of suffering.

So we can look at our present moment experience through this framework. This was kind of an eye-opening thing for me. It's like, right, he's talking about the present moment here.

So this is wise attention: bringing attention to the present moment and studying our relationship to suffering. This wise attention is contrasted with unwise attention, and this is how one attends unwisely.

One thinks: "Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future?" Or else one is inwardly perplexed: "Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where will it go?"

This is what we spend a lot of our time doing. These can all be thought of as variations on trying to figure out the why of experience, rather than looking right into the present moment and what is happening right now from the perspective of the Four Noble Truths.

Pointing into the present moment like this, as I began exploring this reflection, really began to show me that suffering is created in the present moment. I think it was my first three-month course—I had a lot of time, and I spent a lot of that time with my thoughts. Lots of those thoughts created lots of emotional storms. There was one particular pattern that came through repeatedly.

A couple of years before this retreat, something had happened that was a very embarrassing situation. I was in a play and I forgot my line. During this three-month course, I remembered that moment over and over again. I would be sitting, paying attention to my breath, and the feeling of standing on the stage and looking out at the audience and not remembering my line would come back. I'd be flooded with embarrassment all over again.

Over and over I saw this, and at some point it really sank in: this is not the same embarrassment that happened three years ago. This embarrassment is happening now. It is being created. The conditions include that event three years ago—that's one of the conditions. But right now, in this moment, this embarrassment I'm experiencing is created because this thought arose and there's a reaction to that thought in the present moment.

This is our investigation—to begin to see that the present moment actually contains the information we need to understand why we're suffering. The why of the present moment, not the why of history. Yes, the why of history in that case involved the fact that I forgot my line on the stage. But in this moment, the why of the suffering was happening right here in the present.

This points us back into the present moment for an exploration, an investigation of our suffering as it occurs. Our suffering is created right in the present moment, and the origin, the reason for that suffering being created, is also happening in the present moment.

Another example from my practice: in the first few months after I began practicing, I was exploring a lot of emotional reactivity related to the breakup of a relationship. One of the patterns I noticed was that I would feel lonely when I went to bed at night. The why of this was not a mystery to me—at least so I thought. It made perfect sense that I was lonely when I went to bed at night.

And yet, because I was curious and interested in exploring my emotions through this new practice—a friend had sent me a book about practicing mindfulness with emotions—I started just exploring. This is a regularly occurring thing; what's happening? Each night I would watch this pattern unfold over and over again. Over the course of several weeks, I watched it. Each night I'd notice the loneliness and simply acknowledge: okay, this is loneliness.

This is what loneliness feels like.

And then one night I discovered—I don't even remember exactly how it happened—but what happened was that it became very clear that when I picked up my alarm clock to set my alarm for the morning, that was when the loneliness started. And it was like, wow, what is that about? That's kind of weird.

I kept watching night after night, seeing that very clearly: set the clock, loneliness comes.

One evening, as I was setting the clock, a memory flashed through my mind. I can only hypothesize that this memory had been flitting through night after night. This memory was of being with my ex-partner in Disneyland, looking up at a clock on a marquee in Tomorrowland. It was a digital clock. The clock that I was setting was a digital clock.

I could see that there was a connection between the sense impression of setting the clock and the memory. I could see this cause and effect relationship. And I could also see in that moment that the loneliness was a response to that memory. The loneliness didn't have much to do with the thing I thought it had to do with—which was going to bed by myself at night. Woe is me, I'm always going to go to bed by myself forevermore. This is what I thought the loneliness was about.

The simple investigation of just watching the experience led to the understanding that it wasn't about going to bed alone. It was about a memory that flitted through my mind. The memory didn't even have anything to do with going to bed. It had to do with having a fun time with my ex-partner. And again, I could see that the loneliness was a reaction to the memory.

That surprised me. This was probably two months into my practice. It surprised me that I could see something that clearly just by observing my emotions in daily life.

But the thing that surprised me even more was that the next night when I went to bed, I remembered the memory, of course. But having seen that hidden link to the loneliness, the loneliness did not arise again in the same regular way. That really surprised me.

This is the power of investigation, the power of seeing conditions, the power of being willing to just watch our experience. This is wisdom. This kind of experience where the mind sees something, sees a connection that's leading one to suffering—the mind saw this pattern, this unfolding that led to that suffering of loneliness. And seeing through that, the mind didn't go that direction the next night.

I'm not saying that I didn't get lonely again. I'm not saying that at all. But that regular repeating pattern of loneliness that happened every night as I went to bed—that stopped.

Suffering is constructed in the present moment. The causes of suffering are arising in the present moment. All the information we need to understand about what's happening is available in the present moment. We do not need to think back on history. We do not need to figure out how our upbringing influenced this kind of pattern in our lives. There is a place for that; I'm not saying it's completely useless. But in terms of the practice, the power of the practice is to open into this moment and see what's available to be seen here and now.

And that is investigation. What is happening right now?

We look at the what of experience by simply meeting our body sensations. We know our body sensations as sensations arising in the present moment. We know our emotions as emotions arising now. We know our thoughts as experience arising now. All of the instructions we've been offering you is the exploration of what is happening in the present moment.

So we explore this, we investigate it, we get to know the nature of our experience in the present moment. This question of what is the nature of our experience is an interesting one for investigation. Whatever's arising—body sensations or emotions or thoughts—we get to know its nature as we meet it in the present moment. We get to know its specific nature, and we get to know its more general nature.

The specific nature is helpful for us to understand. For instance, regarding reactivity, it's really helpful to understand what is the nature of aversion. The nature of aversion is to separate. It separates us from things. It has a belief that separation will be a condition for happiness—a delusional belief. And it orients us toward looking for things to separate from. Sayadaw U Tejaniya calls this "aversion doing its job." This is the nature of aversion. When aversion arises, this is what it does. This is the job description of aversion. And he suggests we get to know the job description of aversion really well, that we should get to know the job description of greed really well.

The point of this is to understand it, to understand its nature. Again, the understanding. It's an understanding not to get rid of something. We're exploring: what's the nature of aversion? Not to get rid of aversion, but to understand aversion. And again, the understanding is what allows the mind to begin to release, much as that example of the loneliness showed. I didn't do the letting go of that loneliness. It was the seeing of the pattern. The mind released the loneliness. Wisdom released the loneliness. And so we explore the nature of our experience to cultivate this understanding. What's the nature of greed? What's the nature of confusion?

A curiosity about this supports what we would call a wise attitude, or a perspective that allows us to just watch what's happening so that we can understand it. As we get to know the nature of our reactive emotions, it creates the space for us not to be so entwined in them. The very act of investigation helps us to take a step back. Curiosity has us looking at something from the perspective of a naturalist again. We talked about the perspective of the naturalist—just what's arising here? What's growing here? As we have that perspective, we can watch the pattern unfold without being so caught in it. The interest supports that. Disidentification helps us to meet the experience without being entangled in it.

In investigating our experience, sometimes we can use questions to help us investigate. When I ask myself the question, "What is the nature of aversion?"—it wasn't a thinking-about asking questions. Sometimes asking questions, and you can look in your own mind to see what happens, but sometimes asking questions tends to create a pattern of trying to figure out an answer. That's not the point of asking questions. Sometimes I like to describe the way questions work as if we have a still pond. That still pond is a somewhat quiet mind. The question is like dropping a pebble into that still pond, and we just see what ripples arise from dropping that question into our mind.

So we drop a question such as, perhaps while aversion is arising, "What is the nature of aversion?" And then you don't do anything in particular. You just keep looking at what's happening right now. What is the mind noticing right now? What's obvious here? The question is just a spark for curiosity and interest, and it can also organize the mind. It can have the mind naturally start to be interested in information that may be related to that question. Words are powerful in our minds, so we don't have to do a lot with them. Sometimes dropping a question in like that, you may have some response. When I explored this, it was actually quite interesting to really recognize the separating nature of aversion. It was an experience of separating.

What is the nature of aversion? And the feeling was separating, separating, separating. So it was an experience that answered the question, not a thought.

Often I encourage people, if you use questions in terms of evoking curiosity or orienting something to investigate: if the response arises as a thought, put it on a shelf and hold it lightly. If the response arises as an experience—that, in my experience, is the way questions really lead us into investigation. There's an experience in which we understand something about the question.

So we can use questions to help us explore our experience. How does this emotion impact the body? What purpose is this emotion serving? What is the nature of this experience?

As we explore and investigate our experience more, we begin to see into its nature as being impermanent, unreliable—a process, causes and conditions unfolding. Not a solid, stable self driving the show, but just a set of conditions unfolding. This is another aspect of the nature of experience that is revealed as we investigate. It's not always about the specific nature of a particular experience. Sometimes what we see when we explore "What's the nature of this?" is simply change. A general understanding rather than a specific understanding about that experience.

And yet so much of our investigation happens around our conditioned patterns, the habits of our mind—often habits and patterns that are very old and deep. Ones that don't seem so simple as just loneliness arising in a moment, but feel like this big mess of layers: aversion and fear and anger and confusion and hostility and desire, all just in this tangled mass.

Sometimes we may create a theory about that big mess. Like, "Yeah, this big mess is about my deep inner fear of being intimate." Something like that. We're great analyzers in our culture, and we come up with theories about a lot of our patterns. And sometimes, as we see these big, messy patterns—these convoluted, multifaceted, many-layered emotional states—we might get the idea of needing to get right into the middle of it. "When I get right into the middle, when I know just what's right in the center, when I can really see that deep inner fear of intimacy—that's when this pattern is going to fall apart. That's what I need to find. That's what the investigation would have to do."

We have beliefs like that. But what I've seen is that this kind of investigation—where we're trying to dig and pull, where it's like we're trying to pry everything apart and put something under a microscope and see all the little pieces and bits—that's got an agenda to it. And often that agenda is based in greed or aversion, wanting to get rid of it, wanting it to go away. Sometimes I would feel like this pattern is wholly bad. "What I need is a scalpel. I need a scalpel to cut the whole thing out and just remove it like it's a tumor or something."

So we have these beliefs, these views about our patterns. And what is helpful—no surprise—is this: can you just notice and meet what's obvious in a moment, as opposed to having the idea that you need to pull it apart, need to figure it out? It's more like this big messy ball of mind confusion. Can you hold that with wide arms and just notice what's obvious? What's the most obvious bit of that mess in this moment?

Because the pattern is changing and evolving and shifting in moments, as you stay with it, different pieces of the puzzle, different pieces of the mess kind of rotate to the surface. We get a little flavor of that one, then a little flavor of that. "Oh, there's some anger in there. Oh, there's fear in there. There's confusion in there." Just settling back and being willing to have a wide view, as opposed to trying to dive in and figure out what's in the middle—that's really helpful.

It's helpful not to make assumptions about what's in the middle. The making of assumptions is often related to our habit of looking for the why. Why is this happening? If we have an assumption and we're looking for something—like, for instance, that deep inner fear of intimacy, which was a belief I had about myself—if I go looking in my experience for that, I'm likely to find it. Our minds will construct what we look for sometimes.

It's quite interesting when we are willing to set our assumptions aside, willing to just say, "Okay, that's a theory, I'll set that on the shelf," and just meet what is happening. Moment after moment, just the what. Over and over again I've been incredibly surprised by the way the whole pattern is put together. Like that example of the loneliness—I had no idea that loneliness was put together from a fleeting thought about Disneyland.

So if we make assumptions about our experience, about what's going on, the assumptions may or may not be true. Hold them lightly.

Just recognize whatever is obvious about the experience in the present moment. Patience. Patience with this investigation.

And likewise with that idea of some pattern being wholly bad that I talked about—just the idea of wanting to take a scalpel and cut something out and say, "Just get rid of it. That's what needs to happen with this." Many times when I've had that perspective on a pattern and I've been willing to hang out with it, willing to sit with it, willing to just open, open, open to depression—willing to just be with that depression, willing to see it there, watch myself get caught by it, see the patterns around it, notice that it came when I got really calm—it was just a whole variety of things over the course of weeks on one retreat where I had this low-grade depression.

And the willingness to just explore that... at one point I was feeling that depression in one sitting and it was like, "Oh, this wants to get big. This feeling of depression, it wants to get... wow, it wants to get really big." Let it get big. Let this depression just get as big as it wants to. And at some point in that experience of the depression growing and becoming vast, it turned inside out and became mettā. That was not what I expected to find inside of depression. More often than I ever would have expected, inside of some confused pattern is some flavor of mettā, some flavor of compassion that is confused—that is being repressed or having something demanded of it.

We find our way into the structure of our experience by being willing to meet it without agenda, without assumption. If we have assumptions—because we will have assumptions—know that it's an assumption. "Okay, yep, I have an assumption about that. Let's just see if we can not go searching for that assumption."

I think we have to have patience with these multi-layered patterns in particular because they grew over a long period of time. They came into being over years, if not lifetimes. And so one sitting, or even one three-month course compared to lifetimes or years of a pattern putting itself together... there's a very gradual nature to the unfolding of our practice. It's a gradual cultivation of the wholesome qualities, a gradual cultivation of the wisdom that allows us to let go of things, that allows us to see things, that allows the seeing then to help support the mind to release the suffering.

The Buddha gave an analogy around the gradual nature of the path. He compared it to a shipwreck. There's a shipwreck—you think about a shipwreck, the parts of the ship are strewn all over the beach. And he said those parts of that ship are daily being subjected to the sun, the sand, the wind, the water, the waves. Just to reflect on the analogy a bit: if you were to go to that beach every day and look at the rope, for example, the rigging, it's not going to look any different day to day. But the course of the inexorable nature of the sun, the sand, the wind is to wear away at that rope. And the nature of the mindfulness, the investigation, the wisdom, the wholesome qualities that we cultivate is grain by grain to begin to release our suffering. Maybe not seen day by day.

Sometimes patterns can just let go so gradually that we don't even see them disappearing. I think I told the story of that—I'm not sure, I'll just briefly mention it—a pattern of anger around this same relationship. Just watching this anger over and over and over again. And at some point recognizing that trying to bring mindfulness to that pattern was creating the conditions for me to spiral in and just get lost in the anger. So I began setting it aside. I think I did talk about this in the hindrance talk: "Not now, not now, not now," over and over again. And that pattern disappeared while I wasn't looking. I began noticing it getting more and more spaced apart, that anger arising less and less, and then one day just realizing, "Wow, it's gone. When did it go?" So sometimes our patterns disappear so gradually we do not see when they disappear.

Other times there's an experience of a kind of rapid disappearance of a pattern. It feels like that moment of insight is so clear. And sometimes that happens—a clarity of seeing into something, and there's an experience of release in the moment. You really, in that moment, know the ending of suffering. You see the mind release. But those patterns too often happen after a long time of gradual cultivation.

Gil Fronsdal gives an analogy for this kind of moment where suddenly we see something so clearly and the mind just releases. He talks about chopping a piece of wood. You have a hatchet and you hit at that piece of wood. The first time it's probably not going to just split. Or the second, or the third, or the fourth. And we might think, "Well, I just haven't quite got it in the right place or something."

But every time you hit that log, the fiber of the wood is weakening inside. And at some point, the fiber is weak enough that the log splits. We think it's all due to that one chop, but it's the whole gradual wearing down of the fiber that allowed that to happen.

So much of this is what happens in our practice. Really, the gradual nature of the practice is where it's at. We like the big flashing insights—they feel good, they're like, "Oh great, this is working!" But it's working anyway. Really, it's working anyway for every single one of you. You are being steeped in the Dharma here, and it is working you.

Sometimes we have a tendency to create meaning related to the assumptions that we make. Our minds are meaning-making machines. That's really helpful to know as we explore investigation.

For example, there's such an interconnection between our minds and our bodies. As an emotion arises, physical sensations often arise with it. And because of that back-and-forth pattern, sometimes we can attribute a particular emotion to a particular constellation of physical sensations. Again, it's a meaning. "Ah, my heart feels heavy. I must be sad." Maybe, maybe not. When the heart feels heavy, notice the heaviness, the pressure, the tension, the weight. Explore what's actually going on before making this attribution of emotion to physical sensations.

Sometimes, because we've explored a particular pattern so much in our lives, the body can have a habit of going into a particular constellation of physical symptoms even if the emotion isn't there yet. For me, efforting was one of these. I tended to effort so much, and it created this kind of tight band around my head—the efforting to really look at things closely would create this tight band and pressure. Then at some point, I began noticing there was just this tight band of pressure, but as far as I could tell, I wasn't making effort. It was almost like the body saying, "Okay, we're used to doing this now. You sit down. This is what we do." At that point, I realized, "Oh, this is just sensation. This is just sensations. I don't have to attribute that I'm over-efforting here. This is just sensation happening right now."

Sometimes particular states arise or experiences arise in the practice that we attribute meaning to. The thought, for instance, not wanting to practice. "I don't want to practice right now." When I first started experiencing that thought and was conscious of it, I felt betrayed by my mind. It's like, "Oh no. Oh no, I don't want to practice. What does this mean? It means I'm a bad yogi. It means I'm a failure. It means I have to reorient my whole life." It's just an arising mind state. The next time you notice that you don't want to practice, you don't have to convince yourself that you want to practice. Just notice: not wanting to practice is arising. You don't have to create meaning around it. It's just an arising mind state. It happens to all of us.

Another piece—and this is the last piece that I'll mention—that I wanted to explore with you: as the mind settles more, there are periods of time where the mindfulness is pretty stable. Perhaps not for days at a time, but for ten minutes in a sitting, or maybe even a whole sitting. And then suddenly it seems like the mind just starts wandering. What happened?

My mindfulness was so strong, and now it's wandering. I've seen my mind do things like this—creating stories about how there's something I want to avoid, something I'm afraid to see. Again, creating ideas, creating meaning, creating beliefs. Why is this happening? There's got to be some meaning, some reason, some deep meaning, some historical meaning, some pattern about my life that explains why the mind is wandering right now.

What I've often seen happening as the mindfulness starts settling is that there's something being missed. That is true. When the mind wanders, we haven't noticed something. And the investigation can be simply: What is being missed?

As the mind is settling in this way, there's been a period of continuity. If at that point the mind starts wandering, rather than doubling down and saying, "Gotta keep the mind present, gotta force the mind to stay present," get curious about what you're missing.

As the mind settles, when the mindfulness is more continuous, the mindfulness and what it's knowing are kind of in sync. It's familiar in a way. And at some point, with the settling of the mind, experience gets a little more subtle. But our intention of being mindful is still looking around up here—and the mind wanders, because it's actually interested in something more subtle.

In that kind of place, rather than trying to force yourself to stay present, it's more like asking: What is actually happening here? With this kind of experience, where things are getting subtler, we don't know what we're looking for. We can't have an agenda and say, "I'm going to see that thing that I'm missing." By very definition, when we're missing something, we don't know what we're missing.

So what might it mean to settle back and be curious? What's happening here? Sometimes the very act of trying to find something will obscure the thing that's happening.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya was visiting here a few years ago, and somebody was driving him around the country roads. They were talking about the deer that run out into the road, and the driver said, "I have a deer alarm on my car." Sayadaw asked what that was, and he explained, "It's a very high-pitched tone. The deer don't like it, so they stay away from the car." Then he said to Sayadaw, "You might be able to hear the tone."

Sayadaw tried to listen but couldn't hear it. He was listening, trying to find the tone, and he couldn't hear it. Then he gave up. He relaxed. And there it was.

The very act of looking had obscured what was happening.

Sometimes investigation is like that—settling back with curiosity. What's here? Being willing to be present and available for something you don't know. This kind of investigation, by definition, cannot be directed. We cannot choose what to look for. We have to receive what's happening. Where's the mind right now?

As the mind settles more and more, this kind of investigation supports us—rather than the kind where we're directing the attention, saying, "I'm going to look at this right now, I'm going to look at that right now." That can serve us, and boy did it serve me for a long time. But at some point in the practice—and it will come and go—there's a time when we have to stop that directing and settle back and receive what we don't know.

It can take some courage to not know what we are going to be seeing.

It really doesn't matter what's happening in your experience.

We say that a lot, I know. But we really mean it. We do.

Just keep noticing. Just keep observing. What's happening? What's happening? Moment after moment.

Wholesome mind states too—investigating wholesome mind states. What's the nature of peace? What's the nature of calm? What's the nature of love? It's so easy to get caught with very subtle craving for wholesome mind states.

At one point on a retreat, I was watching—I was in a pretty quiet, very quiet state—and at some point the mind, I don't remember whether I did it intentionally or whether it just arose: "Oh, what's my relationship to this state?" And it was wanting it to continue. Trying to make it continue. Subtle, subtle. Then that fell away. And there was fear that it's not going to continue. I felt the fear. And then joy, because it was like, "Wow, I had no idea there was defilement in the midst of that. That's so great that the mind could see that."

I think this is a hallmark of investigation too—the joy that can come just from whatever we're looking at. Just moment by moment knowing: this is what's happening. Setting aside ideas, setting aside agendas, setting aside assumptions, setting aside meaning, and just being with what's actually here.

This will lead us to freedom. Moment by moment, grain by grain, very gradually most of the time.

Let's just sit for a moment. I'll read a poem—a Fernando Pessoa poem:

The mystery of things, where is it?
Why doesn't it come out
To show us at least that it's mystery?
What do the river and tree know about it?
And what do I, who am no more than they, know about it?
Whenever I look at things and think about what people think of them,
I laugh like a brook cleanly plashing against a rock.
For the only hidden meaning of things
Is that they have no hidden meaning.
It's the strangest thing of all,
Stranger than all poets' dreams
And all philosophers' thoughts,
That things are really what they seem to be.
There's nothing to understand.
Yes, this is what my senses have learned on their own.
Things have no meaning, they exist.
Things are the only hidden meaning of things.

Perception and Papañca

Andrea Fella · 53 min

In this dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Andrea Fella offers a detailed examination of perception (saññā), one of the five aggregates (khandhas), and its intimate connection to papañca—the process of mental proliferation and distorted perception that underlies much of our suffering. Drawing on the classical analogy that perception is like a mirage, she illustrates how we constantly mistake our mental constructs for reality itself.

Fella explains the layered nature of perception through vivid personal examples: mistaking a clod of dirt for a dead porcupine, or hearing bat sounds and perceiving pigs being slaughtered. These misperceptions reveal how our minds create objects, overlay emotional associations, and then respond to these constructions as though they were objective truth. She traces the process described in the suttas: contact leads to feeling, feeling to perception, perception to thinking, and thinking to papañca—where the mind runs riot with proliferating concepts that then color all subsequent experience.

The talk explores various translations of papañca—mental proliferation, objectification, reification, distorted perception—each illuminating how we create themes and beliefs that fragment our experience into self and other, us and them. Fella connects this process to real-world suffering, noting how constructed concepts like race, though having no biological reality, create devastating consequences when believed. The teaching points toward recognition rather than elimination: we cannot stop perception, but through continuous mindfulness we can begin to see it as process, as appearance, loosening the grip of clinging and opening to wisdom.

Last week, Guy explored the topic of the five aggregates—these five areas of experience. Heaps of stuff, I think he called them. The teachings highlight these five aspects of experience as places where we tend to get caught, places where we tend to cling and create a sense of self. And so they're worth exploring in some depth. It can be useful to get to know these processes in our experience, to begin to recognize how they work and to see how the clinging and craving and selfing manifests around these areas.

Earlier this week, Sally talked about vedana, the process of feeling and the experience of feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—and the way we get caught around that through craving and clinging. Vedana is one of the five aggregates, but it's also found in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, so she explored it from that perspective.

Tonight I'd like to pick another of the five aggregates to highlight: the topic of perception, the process of recognizing what's happening in our experience.

On the surface of it, this seems like a really simple process—this aspect of experience of recognizing something, knowing something's happening, and then recognizing it from the past. It's almost like a process that goes into our memory banks and retrieves: this shape, this form, oh that's that thing. Or this sound, that's that thing. It's this process by which we recognize experience.

So it seems like a fairly simple part of our experience. And yet the suttas point to ways that not understanding this simple aspect of experience leads to so much suffering—not only in our own lives but also in the world. The suttas point to misunderstanding around this process of perception as one of the sources for conflict. So it's very useful to begin to get familiar with this process and begin to see: how does this confusion happen? What goes on?

Perception is this very simple function of mind that, based on sense contact, takes that contact and then identifies it. It's a very natural function of mind that happens in every moment of experience. And so we meet our experience, and the process of perception—though it sounds simple at the beginning—is actually a layered process.

Initially we may meet our experience through the sense of sight, the bare kind of sight. The mind recognizes shape and color, form and color. And then from that form and color, the mind begins to make sense of the objects. So the mind might first recognize flat and brown, looking at the back of the room, and then recognize that's a wall. It's got this layered nature to it. Recognizing round and brown, and then recognizing it as bell. This all happens so fast that we don't have to think about it.

It's a very useful function of our mind to do this recognition. If we had to, every time we walked into a room, figure out what people were and what zafus were and what floors and walls were, it would exhaust us. The brain power, the amount of mental energy it would take to do that every single time—I think it would exhaust us. And so this function of perception, I almost think of as an energy-saving device. It helps us to move more quickly through the world.

We can actually start to see this process at work in this simple way as we explore, as the mindfulness gets more continuous. On one retreat I remember I was sitting on the porch and I just turned my head, and my eye landed on this patch of nature on the side. And I watched the experience being categorized and figured out. There was green. And then there was the recognition of jagged. And then the mind recognized it as leaf. In three discrete steps: green, jagged, leaf. I watched that happen in the mind. I wasn't trying to see it. And so again, it's the continuity of mindfulness that can start to reveal the subtler processes at work in the mind.

Sometimes we can also see this process at work when the mind isn't quite sure of what something is. If the light is dim or you're looking at a distance at something, you can sometimes see the mind trying on various perceptions for what you're looking at. At one point I walked into a room, the sitting area at a retreat center. I think it was a two-week retreat I was on, and it was pretty quiet. The light was pretty dim in the room.

As I walked into the room, there was this form, a large form across the room. The very first thing my mind did was identify it as a deformed being. And my mind then said, no, it's not a deformed being. But it took a while. It kept looking at it, looking at it. And finally it recognized it as a vase of flowers.

So you can begin to see this process at work at times if the mind isn't quite recognizing what's happening. I saw this happen the other day. I was walking down the road with Greg and we were looking into the distance. There was a lump on the road and my mind went, dead animal. We talked about it. He said, "It's pretty big. It's probably not a squirrel." And I thought, porcupine—I had seen a porcupine. But when we got up to it, it was a clot of dirt.

Again, the mind will make these attributions. Perception is very prone to making mistakes. And herein lies some of the issue with perception.

This process of perception is a very normal, very natural function of mind, but it can get us into trouble. It can take us out into delusion, into confusion, when we don't understand it—when we don't understand the process of perception.

Each of the five aggregates that Guy described has an analogy that the texts associate with it. The Buddha was a master of analogies. It's really quite amazing, the evocative power these analogies have. In the case of the aggregates, the commentaries say that the analogies used for each aggregate point to the ways in which we get confused or deluded by that particular process.

For the aggregate of perception, the analogy is that it is like a mirage. I actually looked up what mirages are because I think often we use the word casually to mean a hallucination—somebody's seeing a mirage, they're seeing a hallucination. But what mirages actually are—and I'm sure the Buddha was aware of this—is something like the classic mirage in a desert of seeing a lake. What's actually happening there is that the desert and the air and whatever moisture there is or isn't in the air is acting like a reflector. What you're seeing when you see a lake on the desert is the reflection of the sky on the ground.

So a mirage is a reflection of something that is there, but it's misconceived or misconstrued as being something other than what it is. And this aspect of perception is a place where we tend to get caught. We take in experience, we meet experience, we perceive something. We perceive a dead porcupine on the road and we respond to that image or that perception. The perception is a reflection of what's out there, but it's not what's out there. It's a reflection in our minds. And so often what happens is we respond to the reflection thinking it's reality or truth.

Very often we relate to our experience through perception as being an accurate representation of reality. But perception very easily gets distorted, it very easily makes a mistake. It's often also distorted by interpretation. And so if we don't understand perception, this is a major area where delusion enters into our experience. We believe our perceptions to be accurate representations of reality.

Now, perceptions are very useful. It's not that we're trying to stop perception—we couldn't do that anyway. Perception is said to be one of the seven universal concomitants for every moment of consciousness, seven universal factors that arise in every moment of consciousness, and perception is said to be one of those. So we're not going to stop perception. But we can learn to understand it as perception and learn not to be fooled into believing our perceptions are truth. They are our perceptions.

The first place to begin to explore is simply whether we can start to recognize this process at work. It's possible to recognize this process with the mindfulness getting stronger. I wouldn't say this is something to try to do. What I'm going to describe in terms of the ways I've experienced this—generally, these experiences have come because I've been available. Well, not just that I've been available, but that I've heard people talk about this process, I've heard it described, and then, in being available for my experience, I can begin to see it.

And that's part of the function of this kind of talk. It's not to tell you, "go find this in your experience," but the description of it may unlock a little possibility in your mind, and then it might be possible for you to see it. So it's not something to do. It's more of a description of something that might be experienced.

For me, the place that has been the most easy or natural to recognize this process of perception is in the avenue of hearing. When I'm sitting with my eyes closed in meditation, there are all kinds of sounds arising. There's the pings of the radiator, the sounds of cars on the road, sounds of construction, birds, coughs and sneezes—all of those things. There's the sound that hits the ear, and then the mind identifies it. It happens so fast. We hardly even think about it. We hardly even think that it's a process. It's just, "Oh, we've heard a sneeze." That's what we think—we've heard a sneeze or we've heard a car. But actually, we've heard the vibration, and the mind has recognized it, interpreted it, categorized it as sneeze or as car.

And it does this often, at least in my experience, through thought, a form of thought. So I'll be sitting in meditation and I'll hear the car and the mind will go, "Car." A thought, "car," will appear. Or maybe I'm sitting there hearing, and there's the sound of the drill out on the roof, and my mind will create an image of a person on the roof with a drill. This is perception at work—this creation of an identification or recognition of what's happening.

So it's easiest for me—one of the easiest avenues for seeing it is with sound. I think partly because the avenue for recognition for many of us comes through image or often through words in the mind. And so there's a distinction or a contrast in a way. We recognize something, the sound arises, and then we might hear our mind say the word: car, or truck, or drill, or radiator. This is perception. And this is this process.

Some of you have talked about recognizing this—recognizing this mind that's identifying or naming experience. So this naming is one way that perception works. It's one kind of perception. Perception is actually responsible for many ways we recognize experience. Just a simple identification of objects through naming them is one way, one form of perception. Perception also creates space, location, direction, time.

One example of this around space and location: I was meditating in Hawaii for six weeks earlier this year. Birds rule in Hawaii. There are so many birds there. And for days, actually, sometimes there would be hours on end where the only sounds I heard were the sounds of the birds. There wasn't much else. So there are all of these bird sounds, and I began to recognize that the sense of space was created with the hearing. I would hear a sound and the mind would create an idea—ah, that sound is over there, in that location, in that direction. So it created this three-dimensional experience through the recognition of sound. Sometimes I've had the experience of, when hearing a sound, it's almost like my mind moves out into space, up in the air somewhere, in the direction of where that sound was. That's perception creating that sense of distance and location.

I would say the easiest way to recognize perception is through this naming, but I just wanted to put out there that it also is responsible for these other forms of recognizing various aspects of our experience. Perception is what allows us to walk up the stairs without falling over—the distance and height of a step.

So we can begin to see this identification as a process. When it's not recognized, this identification of a perception—often, again, as I said, it can come as a thought. This name perception can come as a thought.

And so close to thought, if we don't notice this, if we don't see the mind recognizing "sound, car," we may start thinking about cars. We may start thinking about where that car is going.

So many times, sitting in this hall, I have heard the sound of a car driving down Pleasant Street. My mind would create an image of the car driving down Pleasant Street. When I saw that, I could just recognize it as seeing, as an image, as the process of perception recognizing that sound. When I didn't recognize it, the likelihood would be that there was the perception, the recognition of it as car, and then the image of the car driving down Pleasant Street, and then there's the notion of what's down at the end of Pleasant Street? Oh, that's Barry. What's in Barry? Oh, there's that... I won't say what's down in Barry.

So the mind can quickly move from perception to thinking to getting lost. I would say this is one of the main avenues through which our mind wanders. We do not recognize that perception has happened, and the mind slips out into thinking about it. As Guy mentioned the other day, also with perception there are often emotional associations that come along. And this is another avenue from which we can get lost. As a perception arises, if it comes with emotional overtones and those emotions aren't recognized as coming with the perception, we can slip out into the emotions.

Perceptions very naturally impact our experience. How we perceive our experience has a huge impact on how we respond to it. This is highlighted sometimes when we misperceive something. A classic analogy about this is misperceiving a rope as a snake. Walk into a room with dim light, a coiled form in the corner, and the mind might misperceive that as a snake and become frightened. As soon as the mind recognizes it's not a snake but a rope, the fear vanishes. So we see that how we perceive, what we're perceiving, can have an emotional impact on us as well.

I had a really clear example of this that unfolded over several days in Burma. Each evening when I was meditating, I was hearing a sound—a kind of high-pitched squealing sound. And my mind identified this high-pitched squealing sound as a pig. The monasteries often are very close to villages, and this was pretty close to the wall of the monastery. In Bagan, I was always hearing sounds from the village coming over the wall—from loudspeakers or whatever else noise there was. The noise of the village was around. And so the sound of a pig squealing, I interpreted as a pig in the village.

But the sound had a kind of—what I interpreted, and I recognize this as an interpretation—a distressed quality to it. And I began to create this notion that these pigs I was hearing each evening squealing were being slaughtered by the butcher for the next day's sale. And so compassion was arising in me regularly each time I would hear this sound. Now I knew that this was an idea in my mind, but still it was compelling to me. The sound sounded so distressed—the pig squealing sounded so distressed—that the response was this feeling of compassion.

So this went on for some days, maybe even weeks, of hearing the sound and feeling this compassion when I heard the squealing. And then one evening, instead of sitting in my room at that time of day, I was out walking. And I saw these bats flying in the air. And they were squealing, these bats. That was what I had been hearing.

It had not crossed my mind at all. It had not at all crossed my mind the possibility that I had not been hearing pigs. It was a complete misperception. And of course the compassion vanished. There's no need for compassion when there are no pigs being slaughtered.

So the mind created the perception. The mind responded to that perception. And the mind believed it. The whole thing was believed. This is often how perception works in our minds. It's easier to see when perception makes a mistake how our responses are to something constructed in our mind. It became fairly easy to recognize at that point—oh my gosh, that whole thing, that whole notion that it was a pig, that it was a pig being slaughtered, the compassion—it was all a construct of the mind. It was fairly easy to see that when perception made a mistake.

It's harder to see that we are responding to our perceptions and not to what's actually out there with all of the perceptions that we're having. We so easily take our perceptions to be reality. So little examples like this, where perception makes a mistake, can begin to highlight and show us how we are attributing reality to our perceptions.

So the teachings in the suttas connect this process of perception particularly closely with a deluding or deceiving influence in the mind—that process of papañca. The texts don't really give a clear definition of papañca, but they describe its function, they describe how it works in the mind. There's one particular sutta that goes through how perception leads to this process of papañca, and then feeds back in a cycle.

Here's the process at work. This first part simply describes how perception functions. Dependent on the eye and forms—and this is repeated, of course, with all six sense bases—dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. So this is simple: something, sight, the eye—they meet and there's the knowing of it. The meeting of the three is contact. So there's this contact of the experience. With contact as condition there is feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. What one feels, that one perceives. So we have this contact, there's a feeling and a perception. These two can occur pretty close together—the contact, the feeling, the perceiving. What one perceives, that one thinks about. So this is like recognizing it as a car and then thinking about the car going down Pleasant Street. What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates.

That is one translation for this word papañca: mental proliferation. One way this might be understood is the mind starting to run riot. We experience something, we perceive it, we start to think about it, and then the mind goes crazy with thought.

We see this happen in sitting a lot. We may experience a little twinge in the knee or somewhere in the body and then feel that. There's the unpleasant feeling of it. There's the recognition of it as an unpleasant experience in the knee, maybe a sharp pain. And then the mind starts thinking about it. What's happening? I've been sitting. I've been sitting now for four weeks and the knee is starting to bother me and oh my goodness, four weeks of sitting like this may create a crippled leg. I'm not going to be able to walk again. Things like this—I know you all know what I'm talking about. We go from a twinge in our knee to cancer in seconds. This is one way that the mind moves from a recognition to the mind proliferating, spreading, running riot. The mind runs amok.

Then the description continues: with what one has mentally proliferated, perceptions and notions tinged by mental proliferation beset one with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye. That's what the texts say—it's a little complicated. I'll read it again and then give you a sense of how I understand this. With what one has mentally proliferated, perceptions and notions tinged by mental proliferation beset one with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable by the eye.

So we have some idea—pain equals crippled leg—something like that. And then that idea of crippled leg gets overlaid on our experience of the pain. Every time we are experiencing that pain, it's coming through that lens of "crippled, oh no, oh no," and aversion just mushrooms.

Here's another example of how this works. Suppose you're walking down the street and you see somebody—that's often a kind of neutral experience, just seeing a person walking down the street. But in this case, perhaps this person has an appearance that reminds you of someone who has harmed you in some way in the past. You may recognize consciously that it's not the same person, but at the same time, that notion of having been harmed by somebody with a similar appearance can come into the experience and create a feeling of fear with that perception. This kind of thing happens to us a lot. Our past comes into our present through the workings of our mind, through the workings of papañca, and distorts our perception of the present moment. One person actually translates this term papañca as "distorted perception."

So this distortion of perception, this papañca, is one of the ways that delusion begins to enter in, connected with perception. This definition of papañca as mental proliferation—this is how Bhikkhu Bodhi translates it in the texts—is sometimes described as a mind full of thinking or the mind that runs riot with thought. The Pali itself for the term papañca means something like "spreading," and so there could be some justification for this translation.

And yet I've grown interested in this term because there are various places in the texts that speak of freedom from Papanca in a way that suggests something far more fundamental—a deeper freedom than simply not having the mind thinking all kinds of thoughts.

In one sutta, for instance, the text describes the goal of this practice through perhaps eight different qualities: the goal of this practice is for one who is free from delusion; the goal of this practice is for one who is free from clinging; the goal of this practice is for one who is free from Papanca. It includes that among the most essential freedoms. To me, this implies something deeper than simply attaining quietude in the mind through concentration. That kind of mental stillness is not yet the freedom being pointed to.

So I've been curious about this term and have done some exploration, reading various perspectives on it. Thanissaro Bhikkhu has been particularly instrumental in my reflection here. He explains how the term was used in early India to refer to the elaboration of a theme in art. In music, for example, you might pick up on a theme—several notes repeated in different ways at different times—and your mind hooks onto that theme. An emotional resonance develops. The term Papanca referred to this creation of a theme for the evocation of a response.

So the term in our minds may also refer to something along these lines: the creation of a theme, the creation of an idea, the creation of an object even. We take things in with perception. If we return to the sutta—what one perceives, that one thinks about; what one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates, or creates ideas about, or creates concepts around. We take things in with perception and then we create an idea about that. We believe that idea. And with that belief, we overlay it on our experience and view everything through that belief.

This may be what is meant by Papanca: the creation of a theme, the creation of an object. We take in experience, we perceive it, and our minds turn it into an object. This is a person, this is a wall, this is a floor, this is a dead porcupine in the road. The mind, through perception, creates the idea of an object and then believes that object to be reality.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu actually uses the term "objectification" to translate Papanca—the creation of objects and the believing of that creation. Rather than understanding that what's happening is a process in our own minds, that we're relating to a perception, we relate to what we have perceived as being something true, something real.

Another possible definition might be "reification." I appreciate this term. The definition of reification is the error of treating as a concrete thing something which is not concrete but merely an idea. This is exactly what happens with perception in our usual way of relating. We don't recognize that we are relating to perception. We take it to be relating to something real, something concrete.

This becomes more poignant when we reflect on how the suttas teach that this process of Papanca—of distorted perception—is intimately connected with conflict and suffering in the world. Our beliefs, our taking in information and believing our perceptions to be reality, create the conditions for people with different perceptions to hold different views of reality and to meet in conflict there.

If you recall the story of the blind people and the elephant from a couple of weeks ago, this is precisely that dynamic. People bringing in a perception and creating a reality from that perception: an elephant is like a post, an elephant is like a hose—and then coming to blows over it. This is Papanca at work. That process of believing our perceptions to be some kind of reality.

In our culture, the notion of race has been responsible for so much conflict and suffering. There is very good scientific evidence that race as a biological phenomenon is non-existent. It is a construct of mind. There is nothing real about it. And yet the power of the delusion, the mind believing its reality, creates very real suffering in this world.

We cannot, I think as a culture, afford to dismiss this with "Oh, it's just an illusion." We really need to look at how we are perceiving things and recognize them as just processes, just perceptions—and to recognize when they are being believed in ways that create suffering in the world.

There's a very powerful film I watched a couple of years ago whose title encapsulates this notion: Race: The Power of an Illusion. The title itself speaks to the illusory nature of race and how much suffering it has created in the world—the power of our beliefs.

One scholar, Professor Padmasiri De Silva, says that the process of distorted perception—his translation for papañca—the process of placing every bare perception into a framework of emotions and beliefs that have come out of our past, our history, our conditioning, robs the freshness out of our experience. But we are not aware of this constant interference of the past. Because of this unawareness, which is our ignorance and our delusion, we see humanity fragmented as "me and others," "us and them," and in various stereotypes—skin color, ethnicity, language, ideology included.

This process of papañca is said in the texts to have its root in the thought "I am." This creation of a sense of identity, a sense of self. And what does that do? The creation of a sense of "I am" creates a subject, but a subject doesn't exist without an object. And so the creation of "I am" creates "us and them," "me and that." This process of papañca is in this area—this creation of separation in the world.

Through this exploration of perception, of seeing just how the examples of misperception really give us the sense of how mental creation has a huge impact on how we navigate the world, how we feel about the world. This exploration begins to point us to what Guy was pointing to this morning in the guided meditation: every experience is appearance. It's all appearances, all reflections. We reify it into something solid rather than knowing it as appearances. When we can know experience as appearance, wisdom can help us not make mistakes—not make the mistake of taking something to be real that is simply an appearance.

It's kind of mind-blowing when we start to feel into this and recognize this. Everything we experience is a creation of our minds. There is nothing that we experience that is not a creation of our minds. I happen to be of the belief that there are things out there. I think you're all out there. I don't think I'm sitting here giving a dharma talk in my mind with no one out there listening to it. But my experience is mediated through the mind. All that I can know of experience is mediated through the mind. Everything we experience is appearance.

It doesn't mean that we don't engage skillfully, or that we have free rein to do whatever we want. But we begin to recognize that we misunderstand appearances as reality. And therein lies a lot of our suffering and a lot of suffering in the world.

Suffering is created by clinging in the mind. The clinging itself is a pattern in the mind, that holding on. But what we actually want, what we're clinging to, is also nothing more than something created by the mind. Seeing this is quite freeing—when we recognize that all of it, the suffering, the clinging, what we are clinging to, is all created by the mind. In that recognition, the mind begins to understand it doesn't need to do that process. It doesn't have to create that suffering.

When we actually witness this process at work, the mind begins to learn. It gains the wisdom that allows it to let go—allows it to let go of those processes that create the suffering in our minds and allow it to ripple out into the world and impact other people as well.

We can't stop perception. We don't even want to try to stop perception. But what is helpful is to begin to recognize perception as a process. To recognize that this is a creation of mind, that what I'm responding to is a creation of mind. If we really understand this, the mind loses its traction for clinging.

I find this to be a very interesting exploration and experience, and yet it's not something—as I said earlier—to try to do. Just observe. Just watch your experience. Simplicity, simplicity of just observing. The processes can begin to become apparent. We begin to recognize experience as just appearance through the meeting. There's just a simple meeting of our experience. We don't have to believe this. We don't have to try to do it. We don't have to try to find it. Just keep observing in a very simple way.

Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 59

The Experience of Wisdom

Andrea Fella · 1h00

> In this profound talk from a three-month retreat, Andrea Fella investigates wisdom not as an abstract concept but as a living, recognizable quality that arises in the mind. Drawing on teachings from Sayadaw U Tejaniya and her own practice journey, she explores how wisdom develops from initially borrowing the Buddha's perspective to experiencing direct insight that spontaneously frees the mind from reactive patterns.
>
> Fella explains that wisdom (paññā) is one of the five spiritual faculties (indriya) and, like mindfulness and concentration, is a conditioned quality we can cultivate. She traces wisdom's development through three stages: hearing the teachings and reflecting on them, engaging with practice to test their validity, and finally knowing directly through experience. The talk illuminates how wisdom functions in understanding the Four Noble Truths, recognizing skillful and unskillful mind states, and perceiving the conditioned nature of all experience.
>
> Particularly valuable is Fella's detailed description of how to recognize wisdom at work in the moment—from the subtle shift when we see frustration simply as frustration arising, to the profound insight that causes a pattern to simply vanish. She shares personal examples, including her early discovery that anger causes suffering to oneself rather than others, and how wisdom eventually arose spontaneously to prevent her mind from moving toward anger. The talk emphasizes that wisdom develops through contact with dukkha, that insights are themselves impermanent, and that our work is not to "do" wisdom but to create conditions through steady mindfulness and wise view.

Tonight the topic is wisdom.

The word wisdom might have a range of meanings, a range of things that we can have wisdom about. But the wisdom of the Buddha is quite specific. When he began his own exploration, the question he asked was: Why do we suffer, and is it possible to be free of suffering? And so the wisdom that the Buddha teaches, and that develops in our minds as we practice, is related to understanding dukkha, understanding suffering—how we suffer and why we suffer.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya actually says that the purpose of practice is to develop this kind of wisdom, that this wisdom is what allows the mind to let go. Wisdom is what allows the mind to release the ways that we cling, the ways that we are confused, the ways that we push away, the ways that we hold on. We sometimes think we're doing a letting go, but that letting go happens with the presence of wisdom.

When I first started really tuning in to the word wisdom—and in particular for me this happened through Sayadaw U Tejaniya's teaching, as he uses the word wisdom more than any other Dharma teacher I had heard up to that point—at some point he suggested that I notice wisdom at work in the mind. This was a little mystifying to me. What does that mean? What did he mean by that? And so I began trying to explore that, to answer that question for myself.

I think I had the idea initially that either wisdom was something very grand that would be out there someday in the future, or that wisdom was something abstract and not really relevant moment to moment in experience. What we see as we begin to explore wisdom directly in our minds is that it is a factor, a quality in the mind that is conditioned—much as mindfulness, concentration, energy, and confidence are also conditioned wholesome qualities that arise in the mind. We can create supportive conditions for the cultivation of these qualities.

These qualities I just named—confidence, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—are what are sometimes called the five faculties, the five faculties that support our minds waking up. Wisdom is one of these faculties. So it is a conditioned arising in the mind. While we can't actually do wisdom, we can cultivate conditions that allow for its arising. And we can begin to recognize it when it is arising, when it's present in our experience.

This is really what I'd like to explore this evening. What is it? What does it feel like? What is the experience of wisdom? Not an idea of what wisdom is, but what is the experience of wisdom? How can we begin to recognize it when it's working?

As with any wholesome quality, mindfulness is a great force in our minds. It has this amazing capacity: when we turn our attention to hindrances or reactive states of mind, when we turn our attention to the kilesas, the factors of mind rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion, mindfulness creates the conditions for them to appear less in our mindstream. But when we turn our mindful attention toward wholesome qualities, it creates the conditions for them to grow, to increase. And so if we can begin to recognize the experience of wisdom—not just let it slide by us, but truly recognize it—this supports it, nourishes it, to be mindful of it.

In the texts, the Eightfold Path begins with wise view. We could say that the path of practice begins with some kind of wise understanding. Understanding of what? How to orient our practice. Sayadaw U Tejaniya has said that mindfulness alone or awareness alone is not enough, that we have to have wisdom with that awareness. And so the path begins with an orientation around some wisdom teachings. We don't start in the abstract, thinking, "Oh, let me pay attention." There's an orientation that helps us look at our experience from a particular perspective.

That perspective—the most common way that wise view is described in the texts—is as an understanding of the Four Noble Truths: understanding that there is suffering, the truth of suffering; understanding the cause of suffering, recognizing the cause of suffering as craving in the mind; having a sense that there's the possibility to be free of that suffering; and recognizing the path that leads us to the ending of that suffering.

I like to simplify that to a rephrasing of the Four Noble Truths, of this wisdom that the Buddha offered: The feeling of offness in our experience, that things just aren't quite right, is created by our own minds—and it's possible to change our minds.

Embedded in this teaching of the Four Noble Truths is an understanding of states of mind that lead us towards suffering and states of mind that lead us away from suffering. Skillful qualities of mind that lead us away from suffering: the Brahmaviharas—love, compassion, joy, equanimity—the five faculties of mindfulness, faith, concentration, energy, and wisdom, the seven factors of awakening. All of these qualities that we cultivate to support freedom. And the unwholesome qualities of mind, all of those different reactive emotions, basically filter down to states of mind rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion.

As we start to explore our practice, we see this very simple, in some ways ethical, distinction of our states of mind. And that ethics isn't about right and wrong, but about suffering or not suffering. Our heart wants to orient more and more towards not suffering.

So this understanding of what is skillful and what is unskillful is another way that wisdom is framed in the teachings of the Buddha. This definition or understanding that certain actions, certain mind states, when acted on, lead us to suffering—they have that consequence. Other actions, other mind states, when acted on, lead us more towards happiness—they have that consequence. There's a cause and effect recognition built into the wisdom of the Buddha. Suffering is not random and freedom is not random.

The cause and effect nature of experience both works to catch us up and keep us hooked, but when we begin to see how this cause and effect relationship works—and see that cultivating mindfulness, wisdom, compassion, and love supports moving us away from suffering—cause and effect works in our favor to free us.

These basic definitions of wisdom are where we begin. We begin our path by having an understanding, by hearing these teachings. We probably would not find the way ourselves without hearing this perspective. It's said to be highly unlikely. The Buddha found the way; the rest of us need help. And thank goodness we have that. We have the teachings.

The path of practice, which begins with wise view, begins with hearing the teachings. We start there, but then for those of us in this room, it's not just, "Oh, heard that. That sounds like a good idea." We actually start reflecting on it. We may begin to think about whether this makes sense. Does this work? How might this work in my life? Or perhaps, "This sounds like something different."

My own experience when I met the teachings of the Buddha went something like this. I was really suffering. Somebody sent me a book that pointed out the teachings of the Buddha. I read the book, understood very little of it, but got one little piece out of it, something like: try just knowing you're having reactive emotions instead of acting on them. I thought, "Well, what good is that going to do?" Anger was my issue. If I look at anger, isn't that just going to make me more angry? But I was willing to engage, to try it.

This is how the practice begins. We hear the teachings, and something in us—perhaps some conditions in our lives—in my case, it was a condition of feeling like I'd hit bottom. I'd tried everything I could think of to find happiness in my life, and none of it had worked. And here came this very unintuitive suggestion, and I thought, "Well, nothing else has worked. Why not try this?" There was that engagement with the wisdom, engagement with trying it on.

This is the next turn of the wheel of wisdom. We reflect on it, we're willing to engage, so it's bound up with trust and confidence and faith. In my case, I didn't have any kind of outward faith in the teachings but was willing to give it a go because it sounded like something I could just try. Like running an experiment. I could try running the experiment. And lo and behold, in a very short time, I had some confirmation that this experiment is really useful.

This is the next turning of the wheel of wisdom. We start by hearing the teachings, and then we may begin reflecting on them, thinking about them, trying it out.

And then we start to know for ourselves that this is useful. That knowing for ourselves—seeing how the practice helps to free the mind—this is wisdom at work in the moment.

Most of you have probably had some kind of experience that solidified this for you. I mean, you're all sitting here in a six-week retreat. It's not just that you think this might be interesting. I certainly wouldn't have considered going on a six-week retreat after reading that first book. It took quite a bit for me to actually gain enough confidence to even sit a day-long retreat. And all of you are here in this room. There's some degree of wisdom that has you here—some experience of wisdom that has you sitting in this room.

As I started to read about all the teachings, I discovered that the suttas, if we stacked them on the stage here, would probably be three stacks of books about this high. There's a lot of teachings in the Pali Canon. And so, as I started studying and learning, I thought, wow, there's a lot of stuff here. We might think we need to understand it all.

But actually, what it feels like to me—and what I think I saw in that very first book I read, where I got this one little nugget—is that you don't need everything at once. Try looking at your reactive emotions instead of acting on them. That little nugget was enough for a tremendous amount of learning to happen simply by turning to my experience with that question: What is it like to be experiencing this reactive emotion?

In my sense, the wisdom of the Buddha is really dense. It's like the most rich, dark chocolate possible. One little tiny bit of it on your tongue and you're going to taste it. The wisdom of the Buddha is like that. One little bit that you can understand, one little bit that you can turn and apply in your experience, will take you a very long way. So you don't have to understand all the links of dependent origination and how the seven factors of awakening work with the four brahma-viharas to lead to awakening. You don't have to know all of that. When you find some wisdom that resonates, use that and look at your experience.

I think in many ways this wisdom of the Buddha comes into our system, into our organism, and works in conjunction with the way our organism functions. Our organism, like any living organism, tends towards well-being. Only delusion in our mind has us operating with a layer over that direction towards well-being, and this delusion puts on a very short-sighted perspective of well-being. If I get this next little hit, that'll be well-being. This next little hit of happiness, this next little hit of getting rid of that thing—we end up with this idea or belief that this very short-sighted way of navigating the world is as good as it gets.

But what happens as we start with this perspective, with this wise view that the Buddha offers, bringing our attention to our experience? Those two together—mindfulness and wisdom—even at the beginning when it's simply the perspective of wise view rather than the inner experience of wise view, where we're just borrowing the wisdom of the Buddha, as I did when I said, well, okay, let's see what happens if I look at my emotions instead of acting on them—as we start to do that, our system, the organism, gets a whole different set of information. It begins to recognize that the continual grasping for something in the future, the continual grasping of "I need that hit, I need to get rid of that thing, get that thing"—that the very grasping, the very aversion itself, is not well-being. The delusion of those states obscures the non-well-being of the greed and aversion itself. But when we bring mindfulness and wisdom to that perspective, the organism gets different information and begins to orient towards how to let go of those states that are very clearly not well-being.

So many of you in the interviews have talked about this—seeing how much suffering it is to want something to be other than it is. The good news is that as you're seeing that, your mind is getting an education. We can't skip over that education. We wish we could. We wish we could say, "Oh, I saw that once. I've seen that feeling of craving, that feeling of wanting things to be other than they are. That's suffering, so why do I need to keep feeling it?" But the patterns of clinging and craving are so deep that it has to be seen over and over again. And the wisdom develops in contact with that dukkha.

It's not a mistake when we are experiencing dukkha in our practice. It's the process of the mind beginning to learn. The way it thought happiness was found—it's not going to be found in that way. Over and over again this lesson needs to be relearned. So wisdom develops through contact with dukkha much of the time.

As the practice develops, there are different ways that wisdom comes into play.

can be aware of what's happening. Just in that example I gave where we're caught by something, we're sitting there—I remember so many times sitting in this hall feeling the suffering of something, and the mind saying something like, "I'd let go if I knew how. I don't know how to let go of this."

Well, in that moment the mind is essentially getting the education about the dukkha, the suffering. And that's what we seek. Can we meet that? Can we be with that? There are times when we're in that space. In that time, wisdom is not strong enough to free that moment of contraction. But we can borrow wisdom in that moment. We can potentially bring it in.

So we're aware of some kind of struggle, and we can use reflection—reminding ourselves, "Right, this is impermanent," or "This is dukkha." I love that reflection. When I finally started recognizing that, it was a great reminder for me that what I'm experiencing right now, this struggle that is being experienced—this is dukkha. And that became shorthand for me, reminding me that the Buddha asked us to understand dukkha. Again, wisdom develops in contact with dukkha. So that very reminder—"Ah, this is dukkha"—kind of let my mind settle: "Ha, right, that's what's happening. Okay, the practice is to be with it. It's not a problem. This is what we open to."

We can drop in these reminders. Sometimes even consciously using mental reminders, like little wisdom nuggets that we drop into our meditation, can be very helpful at times when we're struggling. I have some favorites. "This is dukkha" is one of them. "This is nature"—we've talked about that. This is one that Sayadaw U Tejaniya offers: "This is nature, what's happening right now. Of course this is what's happening right now. It really couldn't be any other way."

Again, a kind of orientation to the cause-and-effect nature, the conditioned nature of what's arising in this moment. It's been conditioned based on—well, actually the entirety of the universe up until this moment. What's arising right now is what's arising. It's not random. And it's conditioned based on our experience, how we're relating to it right now. This is nature. This is what's growing in this moment. Can I know that?

At different times we may be able to see through certain kinds of struggle, certain contractions. We're experiencing something—for instance, we might be seeing something happen and recognize that there's a relationship of aversion to it. Over time we begin to see there's a skill that develops. "Oh right, I can check the attitude. Oh right, what's happening is there's aversion going on." The mind begins to be able to have the skill not only to remember the tools, but in that moment the tools kind of draw the wisdom to the surface, and experience shifts.

This is a kind of intermediate time where wisdom is beginning to operate. We see there's a kind of intuition, or we've practiced certain ways for a while using the tools that we offer—checking the attitude, for instance, or just meeting experience. And those tools become kind of intuitive. As we see a struggle happen, we remember, "Oh right, there's struggle happening. What's my relationship to what's happening? There's some relationship. Oh—I want it to be different. That's what's going on right now." So we see that.

And in the very seeing of it, there's a little space that's created. And it's not so much of a struggle anymore. So we see the little space created. Oh, this is what's happening. That's wisdom at work in that moment.

There can be a kind of feeling that we're consciously drawing on our tools and practices at that point. But in the moment of orienting to, "Oh, let me look at it this way," suddenly there's a feeling of freedom, a feeling of at least loosening or letting go around the suffering. And then there's a kind of wisdom that we don't even have to try to make work. It's like when wisdom gets very strong, when the conditions in the mind are right, sometimes wisdom just comes in—you don't even have to think about what to do. Wisdom just comes in and makes a choice.

An example of this from my own practice: I think my very first example of this unfolded over the course of a number of weeks. I had been observing anger in my experience for many, many weeks. And one bit of wisdom that was developing during that time was that when I'm experiencing anger, I'm suffering. That kind of took me by surprise. I think I mentioned the other day in the metta session that sometimes I've had the idea that I want somebody to suffer from my anger. In my first few months of practice, I really saw that when anger was coming up, some part of my mind believed that the person I was angry with was going to be suffering because I was angry.

And then came the recognition: they don't even know I'm angry. They're 7,000 miles away. I'm in the middle of the South Pacific and that person's in California. That person is not being touched by this anger, but I am burning up. This is suffering. So there was a very clear understanding and a kind of mind-blowing recognition: oh my gosh, I thought this was supposed to be making that person miserable, and it's making me miserable. I mean, it's kind of like, "duh," but it's amazing how deluded our minds are.

So in any case, there was that recognition, that seeing of "anger is suffering," over the course of a number of weeks of just being curious about it—being curious about what it's like to be experiencing anger.

And then one day I was doing something, and as I was doing this thing, a thought arose in my mind about the person I was angry with. In that moment, the mind started heading towards—as the person arose in my mind, it started heading towards the anger. But in that moment the mind saw it was headed towards suffering. In that moment the mind knew: that way lies suffering. Enough experience, as I said—part of what our practice is, is to really get that the reactive states are dukkha. And so as the mind saw the thought and saw the kind of inclination to jump on that thought and think more thoughts in order to get angry, as that inclination was seen, wisdom came in and said, "That way lies suffering. I don't think so."

I was stunned. I did not try to not become angry. Wisdom arose in that moment. It was years before I knew that was what happened. But that's an example of wisdom coming in and taking the lead. Wisdom knows: that way lies suffering, don't go there. I didn't have to do it. And so this is where wisdom can become very strong.

Now, it may sound like we start by thinking about or reflecting on and bringing in and borrowing wisdom, and then there's this period of time where we're able to navigate and bring in our practices, and wisdom just gets deeper and deeper and deeper. It doesn't quite work like that. There are certain—it seems to me that there are certain—well, there are conditions. Wisdom is a conditioned factor of the mind. There are times when that wisdom is available and times when conditions don't allow for it to be there.

Just a simple example that you all recognize: there are times of the day when the mind is more tired. Conditions such as how much food you've had or how much sleep you've had affect how much connection there can be to the present moment experience. So various conditions make the wisdom more or less available at times. And so the very same kinds of things—patterns, especially our habitual patterns, the ones we see over and over again—there are times when we see them and think, "Oh, there's that pattern. Hi, pattern."

We just get a different perspective on it, and the mind is pretty balanced about it. Another time later that same day, maybe we're completely caught by that pattern. This is not some kind of personal failing. This is really just the conditioned nature of wisdom. Sometimes the conditions are such that it's more available than others. And we just keep doing the best we can.

So sometimes we have to go back to drawing on borrowed wisdom. "Oh right, right, this is just anger." Okay. And whatever we try doesn't seem to have inroads into the experience of the dukkha. "Oh, this is dukkha. Okay, this is dukkha." Again, borrowing the wisdom, drawing on the wisdom that we know but maybe don't have experiential access to in that moment. It's not a failing when this kind of cycling happens. It is the nature of the mind.

And then there are times when certain kinds of patterns are more seen through. We may see through a certain pattern completely. At one point I had an insight around a particular anger with a particular person, and that pattern fell away. So there was some wisdom that developed around that particular pattern. But that didn't mean that all the anger went away. Wisdom seems to drop particular kinds of delusion, and we have many, many ways the mind holds delusion.

So we learn. Just like sometimes we gain little bits of wisdom, and then that wisdom gets obscured, and then it comes back. There are a few ways I've already been describing how we might experience wisdom. That little shift of "oh, this is just frustration"—when we see something just as something arising in the present moment, that's wisdom at work. When we can see, "Oh, this is just frustration arising," there can be a shift of perspective around a pattern that allows us to just watch it as a pattern instead of being caught by it or believing it means something about us.

This kind of shift sometimes feels like we've put our mind into neutral. If a car is traveling really fast down the freeway and you put the car into neutral, the car doesn't stop. But you know it's going to stop, because you're no longer giving it gas and it's just in neutral. This shift of perspective—"Oh, this is just..."—you can just watch a pattern unfolding and not be caught in it. That's like the mind is in neutral. It allows the pattern to unwind in its own time. This is wisdom at work. This is a form of wisdom at work. When you have that capacity, wisdom is present in the mind.

Part of my aim, I think, the purpose in offering this talk, is to help you recognize that you all have a lot of wisdom. It works in your mind a lot. That simple experience of "oh"—wisdom at work.

Sometimes we have maybe a little bit stronger wisdom that sees something in the moment so clearly. The mind is just so interested and curious and right there with it, and the experience vanishes. Again, that's wisdom at work.

I remember one time on my first three-month course, during the transition between the first half and second half. My first half teachers left, and the second half teachers came in. I felt abandoned by my first half teachers. I was sitting in the yoga room feeling really sorry for myself, feeling abandoned. I felt like a three-year-old. I was just feeling that. I was aware of it. I was feeling it, and I was practicing compassion for myself, so I was kind of feeling into it.

But at some point the mind got really curious. "Well, what is this? What is this feeling of abandonment anyway?" And it's like I turned to look at it and it was gone. "What? Where did it go?" I was very confused at that moment.

When my second half teacher came and I reported this experience to her, my original interpretation was that I must not know how to investigate emotions, because it disappeared when I tried to look at it. So I reported to her, "I don't know how to investigate emotions."

And she says, well, tell me what you saw. And I say, well, I saw when I turned to look at it, it disappeared. And she said, trust your experience.

So that was a case where wisdom was at work and I thought it was delusion. When I described the experience to her a little more clearly—that I was being with it with compassion, and then there was this real interest that arose that said, "Well, what is this anyway?"—and then poof! She said that's wisdom at work. The curiosity.

She said sometimes when we're hanging out with emotions like that, being with them with compassion, there's a little bit of a hook into it. And this just little bit of curiosity lets that hook go. If we go back to the car analogy, in that kind of scenario, it's like the car doesn't go into neutral—the car just disappears. It doesn't come to a stop; it just vanishes, that pattern. It just goes. That's another way that wisdom can be seen.

And there's another form of wisdom that many of you have talked about in interviews, and that is recognizing essentially when reactive emotions are not happening—the non-arising of reactive emotions, the non-arising of the hindrances. We've talked about this, recognizing when the hindrances are absent.

There are certain ways this non-arising of reactive emotion might be experienced. We might recognize that at particular places in our day, we tend to get caught up in reactivity, and we learn how to navigate that time or place in order to avoid that hindrance from arising. An example of this would be something like noticing that going into the dining hall, judgments tend to arise. Many of you have talked about this also—just how much judgment arises there. It's like the dining hall is a sea for judgments: self-judgments, other judgments. Am I taking more food, less food? It's a minefield of judgment in the dining hall.

If you notice that going into the dining room involves a lot of judgment, you could think, okay, let me avoid going in the dining room. Well, that might not work because you need your food. But you could also explore bringing mindfulness to the seeing process. Joseph gives this suggestion that if you notice there's judgment for you walking into the dining room, as soon as you cross that door, start noting seeing. Know that seeing is happening.

That very orientation towards knowing that seeing is happening begins to short-circuit the movement to reactivity. Because the reactivity, the judgment, arises because we don't recognize that seeing is happening. Thought arises from seeing, and then the idea of more or less arises from that thought. So when we can just be right with the seeing, it can avoid the arising of that defilement.

That's one way we can know the non-arising of defilement. We can be practicing in a particular way—we learn what leads to the defilement and learn how to avoid that.

Another way that many of you have talked about in the last few weeks is beginning to see that whatever's going on right now, three or four weeks ago when this kind of thing was happening, you were way more reactive. So you start to see a lessening of reactivity. The conditions are such that you almost should be reactive, but you're not. Another way that we can see the non-arising of defilement. Again, wisdom at work there. Wisdom is present in that time.

It's a quieter kind of wisdom. It's not like the kind of wisdom that's big, mind-blowing, earth-shattering. We think of wisdom or insights as being these big kabooms. I certainly thought that was the way it was going to be. I was going to have one big insight and then I would be done. But it's much more these small, little shifts of understanding that happen. And this is one way we begin to see—oh, wow, I'm not as reactive as I was. A whole pattern of reactivity that I know would have made me really crazy here, but now it's just a little bit of agitation. There's not a whole big pattern of aversion and going off the deep end.

So we see the weakening of the defilements, the weakening of reactivity, as an increase of wisdom. We can also know the mind is free of reactivity when we see calm, equanimity, the brahmaviharas. When those are present in the mind, these also can indicate that wisdom is present. Balance of mind.

We recognize that when the mind is free of reactivity, wisdom is often present—though not always. Sometimes the mind can be temporarily free of defilement through suppression, through concentration. We can have these periods of calm and peace that arise simply from being very concentrated. But at the same time, there's the possibility for wisdom to grow there, because in that state we see just how optional our reactive patterns are. We're in a place where we're not reacting to things through concentration, and the mind learns that the reactivity actually doesn't add anything useful. So wisdom can grow in that situation too, even if it's concentration that's keeping the hindrances at bay.

And then there are moments of insight, moments of wisdom that happen around clear seeing of impermanence, the unreliable nature of experience, the conditioned nature of experience, seeing the not-self nature of experience. As the mind begins to see just how rapidly things are changing, at a very deep level it understands there's no point in clinging to this. It's just going to vanish. That's the wisdom around impermanence.

There are times when we see some perhaps beautiful emotion, a beautiful state of mind. Sometimes I find after an insight, after a clear seeing of dukkha, there can be this feeling of bliss—oh, I figured it out, I understood something. And there can be a kind of sinking into that bliss. But that bliss will bite you at some point.

I had one really clear recognition around this. I saw a very strong pattern—just the conditioned nature of it and how it was simply a creation of the mind. It was like self-hatred just poofed. And the next moment was oh, bliss, no more self-hatred. And the next moment was no, this is just for this moment. This seeing, this insight, this recognition, this moment of wisdom is conditioned in this moment. Insights are impermanent.

That recognition matters, because insights can lead to some beautiful states of mind, and yet we can cling to those. When we cling to something wholesome or beautiful, we will suffer when it goes. As the mind begins to deeply understand the impermanent nature of those pleasant experiences, it understands the dukkha of holding to that, the suffering of holding to that. And it just doesn't do it. Wisdom simply says there's no point. There's no point in holding on to that. It's dukkha to hold on to that.

When we see a pattern as conditioned, as simply an arising phenomenon, we watch it arise. Sometimes we can see the conditions themselves arising. A thought arose in the mind, and that thought led to this feeling, and that feeling led to this belief. It's like watching dominoes fall. And we see—who did that? This is just conditioned unfolding. Not me, not mine. The mind just lets go. These are deeper levels of wisdom at work in the mind.

Deep insight can happen around a pattern in a moment, and then the next day it sometimes seems so obvious—seeing through something, wisdom at work in the mind. When wisdom is present and we're seeing through a particular kind of delusion really clearly, it seems so obvious. How could we not see it? We've figured it out. It feels like we've figured it out.

It's really helpful to recognize, rather than oh, I figured it out, that this is wisdom at work in this moment. To acknowledge that this is wisdom at work in this moment. This helps us recognize the impermanent nature of understanding. It comes and goes, conditioned, based on conditions.

We have an insight into something, and it seems so obvious. Then two hours later, we think, "Wow, I guess it wasn't so obvious, because I have no idea why it seemed so clear." The veil comes back. The delusion returns.

Again, this is not a personal failing. It's just the practice. It's the conditions of the mind.

Learning to recognize these moments of wisdom, learning to recognize when wisdom is at work in the mind—this will strengthen wisdom. Wisdom is at work in all of your minds. These insights, when we see them, when we can recognize, "Oh, this is wisdom at work," it inspires some confidence.

It works in a spiral nature. As we see something clearly, it encourages us to keep looking, to keep exploring. Trust and wisdom feed off of each other. As we see something clearly with wisdom, it feeds the trust. And then when we're no longer in that place of seeing clearly, we can draw on that trust. The practice spirals deeper.

Our work is not to do wisdom, because we can't do it. Our work is not to do insight. Insight arises based on conditions. And the conditions are the steady mindfulness, the simplicity of meeting moment-to-moment experience with the perspective of wise view—this curiosity about how suffering is created in the mind, and how it is possible for it to release.

CHAPTER 60

Crossing The Flood

Andrea Fella · 55 min

In this profound dharma talk, Andrea Fella examines two of the Buddha's most illuminating analogies for the spiritual path: the simile of the raft and the teaching on crossing the flood. The flood represents the torrents of greed, aversion, and delusion that keep us submerged in suffering, while the near shore symbolizes our identification with self and the far shore represents Nibbāna—freedom from clinging.

Drawing from the Alagaddūpama Sutta (MN 22) and the Ogha-taraṇa Sutta (SN 1.1), Fella explores how we build our raft moment by moment from present experience, bound together with mindfulness and wisdom. She emphasizes that crossing the flood means direct contact with our difficulties—we don't float above them but meet greed, aversion, and delusion with the Eightfold Path. The Buddha's paradoxical instruction to cross "by neither tarrying nor hurrying" becomes a practical guide: when we tarry (through dullness, indulgence, or clinging), we sink; when we hurry (through restlessness or aversion), we get swept away.

Fella offers personal reflections on identity formation, self-hatred, and the subtle ways we cling even to wholesome states and the practice itself. She explains how suffering becomes our guide for recognizing when our relationship to practice needs examination. The talk culminates in understanding that the fully awakened mind doesn't carry the Dhamma as a burden but naturally embodies the tenfold path, living freedom in every moment—whether at a retreat center or in daily life.

When I reflect on the Buddha's teaching, the way it's presented in the suttas, I'm amazed at the brilliance of how he portrayed the teachings. In particular, I love the way he uses analogies. He seemed to be a master of analogies. I like analogies because they can speak to us really directly. And yet when I spend time with the Buddha's analogies, not only do they speak to us directly, but they also bear a lot of fruit in unpacking them a little bit and exploring them in some depth.

That's what I'd like to do tonight—to look at an analogy the Buddha used for the path of practice: that of crossing the flood. To do this I will explore two different texts that use this analogy of crossing the flood as representing what we do when we engage in this path of practice.

In one of the flood analogies, the flood being an expanse of water, the Buddha talks about needing to cross this expanse to get to the other side, where this side represents where we are now, our ordinary everyday life, and the other shore represents freedom. We have to cross this difficult flood to move from our ordinary everyday way of being to freedom.

The Buddha equates this flood with the floods of greed, aversion, and delusion in the mind. There's actually one list that the Buddha talked about called the four floods: the floods of sensuality, of existence, of views, and of ignorance. These inclinations in our everyday mind tend to keep us swept away, tend to keep us submerged, caught in our patterns, caught in our habits, caught in the ways that we struggle and suffer.

In my own understanding of this flood, it does connect back to the patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion in the mind—all of those kilesas, those patterns that arise, the many forms of patterns that arise from those basic three roots. We get swept away. We drown, literally almost a feeling of drowning in these states of mind.

We try to arrange things to suit us. That's our way of dealing with things on this shore—trying to figure out how we can arrange the world so that we'll have this little moment of happiness, get rid of this little moment of aversion. We try to arrange things to suit us but it doesn't last long. We get submerged again. We struggle, we swim a little bit, we come up for air, we maybe get things arranged for another few moments, we get a gasp of air, and then we're submerged again. Because it's just not possible to do this arranging. It's a kind of endless running just to find these little moments of happiness.

We're under the delusion that this is as good as it gets. If I could string together moments of happiness, even though I know that they go away, but if I can just create the situation where I have this moment and this moment and this moment of happiness, then that would be what happiness was. That would be as good as it gets. But it takes so much work to do that—endless arranging. As soon as we arrange something, it's already falling apart.

In Alice Through the Looking Glass, there's a part where Alice meets the Red Queen and suddenly the Red Queen just starts tearing off at a run. Alice struggles to keep up with her, but as she's running, she realizes they're not getting anywhere. And the Red Queen says, "Yes, now here you see it takes all the running you can do to stay in one place." That's the way we actually operate. We try to accumulate and grab on, and it takes so much effort to do this.

This is the flood—the flood of greed, of aversion, of delusion. And how do we cross this flood? There are two similes for this, two texts that explore this.

The first is very famous. I'm sure most of you, if not all of you, have heard of this simile: the simile of the raft. I'll read it to you and we'll explore the various parts of the analogy together.

The Buddha said: "Bhikkhus, I shall show you how the Dhamma is similar to a raft, being for the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping." And I'll come back to this point. "Listen and attend closely to what I shall say."

"Yes, Venerable Sir," the bhikkhus replied.

The Blessed One said this: "Bhikkhus, suppose one in the course of a journey saw a great expanse of water whose near shore was dangerous and fearful and whose further shore was safe and free from fear, but there was no ferry boat or bridge for going to the far shore."

This is the near shore of our usual way of being. In another version of this text, the Buddha equates the near shore with identification, with identity, with selfing. This near shore, the way we typically engage in our lives, is so much bound up in this process of creating identities—many identities. We actually don't just have one self; we have many selves, which we begin to see as we explore what's going on in our minds. Our senses of selves are ways that we arrange ourselves in order to meet the world in certain ways, ways that we try to make ourselves feel stable, secure. And yet they're anything but stable and secure, these identities that we have.

As we cling to an identity, as we orient around an identity, we find that we must make sure other people agree with that identity—that they see us the way we see ourselves. And if they don't, we have to convince them to see us as we do. There's an endless need not only to arrange our world but to arrange ourselves in order to prop up these identities. Even identities that are uncomfortable. We spend a tremendous amount of effort propping up the identities of self-hatred, for instance. I have a lot of personal experience with that as an identity. The familiarity of those contractions around self-hatred—somehow it's like slipping into an old glove. Even though very uncomfortable, it feels somehow like, "Yes, I know this at least. I don't have to jump out of this familiar glove to be in a different way."

And so there's this endless need to prop up identity, and we suffer when others don't see us in the way we want to see ourselves, or when experience intervenes and we see ourselves clearly—"Oh, I'm not the perfect yogi. I'm not the one who's the best at everything." This was one of my patterns: a back and forth between feeling like, "Yes, I can do this, I'm good at this, I'm probably the best yogi here," versus those moments when experience obviously proved that I was not always continuously perfectly mindful—unable to meet my own standards of perfection. And so I would spin into self-hatred.

It doesn't just take others to burst these bubbles. Our own experience will burst the bubble of our identity. And then we feel like we've failed, we've done something wrong, we're bad, we're hopeless. This is the near shore: identity, the way we typically and habitually engage with others, with ourselves, with the world.

And then the expanse of water being the floods of greed, aversion, and delusion—back to the analogy—and the far shore: safety, freedom. The Buddha equates this with Nibbāna in his teaching. He actually unpacked this analogy himself, saying, "I'll give you this simile and then I'll tell you what the parts mean." And he said the far shore is Nibbāna: freedom from clinging, freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion. This is the most simple definition of Nibbāna found in the texts: "Freedom from greed, freedom from aversion, freedom from delusion—this indeed is Nibbāna," the word of the Buddha.

I particularly like that framing of freedom, because I can envision the possibility of life here and now without greed, aversion, and delusion. It doesn't necessarily feel like it needs some transcendent, otherworldly domain. In this very life, this possibility of freedom from greed, freedom from aversion, freedom from delusion.

So the analogy continues. This person in the course of a journey has seen this expanse of water. That person thought, "There is this great expanse of water whose near shore is dangerous and fearful and whose further shore is safe and free from fear. But there's no ferryboat or bridge for going to the far shore. Suppose I collect grass, twigs, branches, and leaves and bind them together into a raft, and supported by the raft and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore." And then the person collected grass, twigs, branches, and leaves and bound them together into a raft, and supported by the raft and making an effort with hands and feet, got safely across to the far shore.

The raft in this analogy is how we cross the flood. The text says, "Suppose I collect grass, twigs, branches, and leaves and bind them together into a raft"—just gathering what's nearby to create something with which to cross the flood. We build the raft out of what's very close at hand.

Ajahn Sumedho, in discussing this analogy, said, "The Buddha referred to his teaching as a raft which you can make out of the things around you. You don't have to build a special motorboat or a submarine or a luxury liner. A raft is something you make from the things around just to get across to the other shore. We're not trying to make a super-duper vehicle. We're able to use what's around us for enlightenment."

And so what are the grass, the leaves, the twigs, the things that are in the immediate environment? This is our present moment experience—just what's here now. We gather it, we bring it together with mindfulness and wisdom. To me it's as if mindfulness and wisdom are the binding that puts together all of the grass and leaves and twigs and allows us to get across to the far shore. We build our raft out of our sense experience together with the Eightfold Path. In another teaching, the Buddha equated the raft with the Eightfold Path.

So the teachings support us in building this raft. The raft is built not simply with teachings, though—it is the meeting of those teachings and the application of those teachings to our direct experience. Really, it feels like we build our raft moment to moment as we cross greed, aversion, and delusion. Actually, the raft is built by meeting greed, aversion, and delusion. We don't cross the flood by magically elevating somehow and floating over the surface of it. We are right in contact with the flood as we cross it.

In this analogy, we build a raft out of leaves and twigs. If you imagine yourself floating on such a raft, you are not going to be dry. In fact, you're using your hands and your feet to propel the raft. That's the effort that we make. We meet the flood in order to cross the flood. We meet greed, aversion, and delusion with mindfulness, with wisdom, with concentration, with wise view, with wise intention, with a non-harming attitude, with kindness.

It's not a mistake when we turn with mindfulness to our experience. Meeting the flood, it's not a mistake when we see suffering. It's not a mistake—it's how the path unfolds. We meet the suffering and understand it in a different way. If we didn't have the Eightfold Path, we'd be stuck on the near shore.

So we see the layers of anger, aversion, hostility, frustration, confusion, desire, pride, longing. Some things we know are there, and other things we are taken aback by as we see them. That self-hatred that I ran into—I had no idea that I had so much self-hatred in my mind until I started looking at the mind.

Being on the raft doesn't create all of the things that are revealed. It reveals them. It reveals the deeper undercurrents of the flood. And because it's revealing them with some degree of mindfulness and wisdom, some degree of ability to meet them, we are not pulled under. These patterns, these habits, come into consciousness and have the possibility to be released. Brought into consciousness, they have much less opportunity to make our choices for us. If they're making our choices for us, we'd be submerged again. We have the Dharma to help us stay afloat with all of the difficulties.

I'm going to leave this analogy for a little while. I'll come back to it and move to another one.

This is another sutta where the Buddha talks about crossing the flood. In this sutta it's said that a deva, a heavenly being, came to the Buddha while he was meditating and approached him. This heavenly being approached the Buddha and began a conversation with him, saying, "How, dear sir, did you cross the flood?"

"By not halting, friend, and by not straining, I crossed the flood."

"But how is it, dear sir, that by not halting and by not straining, you crossed the flood?"

"When I came to a standstill, friend, then I sank. But when I struggled, I got swept away. It is in this way, by not halting and not straining, that I crossed the flood."

Another translation of this uses language I particularly like. These are all Pali words being translated, and so different English words can be used to convey the meaning. The translation that I used over and over again in my practice, this image, this analogy: "By neither tarrying nor hurrying, I crossed the flood. When I tarried, I sank. When I hurried, I got swept away. And so by neither tarrying nor hurrying, I crossed the flood."

The commentaries say that this image of neither tarrying nor hurrying and crossing the flood is meant to be somewhat paradoxical. Because if you think about how you might cross a flood—if it's a flood of water across a wash—you might find a foothold on that flood, find a place where you can stand firmly, then get both feet there and stand, then search for another place and move to that one quickly. The commentaries say that this is meant to make us stop a little bit. It's like, well, that's not how you normally would cross a flood, a raging stream. It's not how you would cross it, by just slowly, methodically moving.

I love this part. It can slip right by you. "When I tarried, I sank. When I struggled, I got swept away. In this way, friend, by not tarrying and not hurrying, I crossed the flood."

The Buddha says, "When I tarried, I sank." He sank! He sank in his practice. He didn't do it perfectly. It wasn't one easy thing from one end of his path to another. He had to experiment. He tarried, he sank. He hurried, he got swept away. He learned from that.

And so I take inspiration from this. The Buddha too tarried and sank. The Buddha too hurried and got swept away and learned from that. He tried different things and noticed what was helpful, what wasn't helpful.

So tarrying—what does it mean to tarry in our practice? What does it mean to tarry as we cross the flood? There are a number of different ways that this image of tarrying might resonate.

Sleepiness, dullness—when that part of the mind is present, when we have those states of mind, we sink into oblivion. Laziness. Indulgence in thought. Sometimes it feels like we're caught in whirlpools of thought, another way of sinking, tarrying.

When we get greedy for something, we latch onto it, we hold onto it thinking, "This is it!" And what are we doing? Basically we're grabbing onto a heavy rock and we're sinking in our flood. We're tarrying with that sense desire.

Aversion is a similar kind of thing actually. At one point I recognized—and I'm a self-professed aversive type—what I recognized for myself around aversion is that I would get stuck to something. If I didn't want this thing, I would be like stuck to it with sticky glue trying to get rid of it. Not this, not this, not this, not this. And in that way, we are stuck, we are sinking, we are tarrying when we're aversive also. Again, it's a form of clinging, this aversion. Clinging to "not this."

Stuck to views—a very powerful way of tarrying. Some idea or other we have: it's like this, it needs to be like this, it's supposed to be like this, this is wrong, this is right. All of those keep us stuck in one place, not able to just meet this moment and move to the next moment.

Hurrying. How do we hurry across? Where do we get swept away?

Restlessness is the obvious analogy for this—the mind not able to meet experience moment to moment. But also anxiousness for results, over-efforting. When we're trying so hard, running so hard to stay in one place.

Aversion and greed can also have this quality. Aversion and greed are not always tarrying. Aversion and greed can be rushing over experience. Greed rushing not to this experience but to the next experience where pleasure will be. Aversion: don't want to be with this one, let's get to the next one.

So depending on how we hold in our minds, how we are relating to greed and aversion, it may be that we're just skimming across experience. Sometimes we get stuck to experience. Sometimes we skim across experience.

And the Buddha suggested neither tarrying nor hurrying. Meet each experience.

Give each experience its due. Contact with it. But not sticking to it and not slipping off of it.

For me, this image of neither tarrying nor hurrying—just meeting each moment of experience, really meeting each moment, and then the next moment, and then the next moment—this sutta provided me with a little mantra for my practice: Neither tarrying nor hurrying. Just this moment. Am I mindful? Am I here? And this moment, and this moment, and this moment.

Giving each experience its due, meeting it, but not clinging to it. We can't really cling to it. It's already changing. It's already slipping away. The next moment is arising. Meet that moment. It's already slipping away. Every moment, neither tarrying nor hurrying. Meeting things we like with balance of mind—not holding on to them, trying to keep them, or getting lost in thoughts about how to control it or fix it, how to keep it, always have it, get more of it. Meeting things we don't like with balance of mind. Really meeting it. Not rushing over it to cover it up. Not trying to get rid of it by using the practice. Really meeting it. Understanding it. Not by trying to stop and fix or change it. Moment by moment. Each moment, neither tarrying nor hurrying.

This analogy of crossing the flood has us in direct contact with the flood. There's no raft. We're just right there walking with the water. And so to me, these two analogies come together where it feels like what we're doing as we cross the flood, if we bring the analogy of the raft back in, is building the raft out of the stream with the Dhamma.

So back to the raft analogy. After having made an effort with hands and feet and gotten safely across to the far shore, one might think: "This raft has been very helpful to me. Since supported by it and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore. Suppose I were to hoist it on my head or load it onto my shoulder and then go wherever I want." Now Bhikkhus, what do you think? By doing so, would that man be doing what should be done with the raft? "No, Venerable Sir." By doing what would the man be doing what should be done with that raft? "Here, Bhikkhus, when he had got across and arrived at the far shore, he might think thus: 'This raft has been very helpful to me. Since supported by it and making an effort with my hands and feet, I got safely across to the far shore. Suppose I were to haul it onto the dry land or set it adrift in the water and then go wherever I want.'" Now, Bhikkhus, it is by so doing that that person would be doing what should be done with the raft. "So I have shown you how the Dhamma is similar to a raft, being for the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping. When you know the Dhamma to be similar to a raft, you should abandon even the teachings, how much more so things contrary to the teachings."

And so this famous statement: letting go even of the Dhamma, letting go even of the teachings. In some translations it says let go even of wholesome states, how much more so unwholesome states. Let go of clinging to the teachings, let go of clinging to the wholesome states. It's not that we have to push away the wholesome states, it's not that we push away the Dhamma, but carrying around the Dhamma with us as if it's a raft on our head—it's like holding a view and saying, "This is the Dhamma, this is the Dhamma, this is the Dhamma," instead of just living life freely.

So the Buddha points to not clinging even to wholesome states, not even to the Dhamma. But in this analogy, the person has crossed to the far shore using the Dhamma. You can't let go of the raft in the middle of the flood. We do have to use the teachings.

Even sometimes we cling to the teachings while we're crossing the flood. We can't let go too soon. This is sometimes a danger of seeing or hearing this kind of teaching—we think, "Oh, I want to be mindful. I'm clinging to mindfulness, therefore I shouldn't be mindful." That wouldn't get us very far. We can't think that way. We have to build the raft.

So we use the teachings. We use the teachings to cross the flood. And while we are using the teachings, while we are engaged with the practice, there may be times that we are actually creating identities as a meditator. There's likely to be some clinging in the way that we use the practice as we are crossing the flood.

I've certainly seen this in my own practice. In my very first meditation retreat, my very first ten-day retreat, I recognized that I was creating an identity of myself as a meditator. And yet there was at least some amount of wisdom that could see this. I saw, "Yes, I'm creating this identity." And I realized from hearing the teachings that this too would have to go someday. But I saw that this identity was really helpful right now. It was helping me overcome things far more problematic, far more submerging, than an identity as a meditator—self-hatred, for example.

And so we use the teachings. We may be clinging to the teachings, or craving, holding on to those teachings that will help us let go of more unwholesome things. There's actually one sutta that speaks to this. It talks about different ways that we use things that seem unwholesome to overcome their very nature: "This body comes into being through craving, and yet it is by relying on craving that craving is to be abandoned. By relying on craving, craving is to be abandoned. Thus it was said. And in reference to what was it said? There is a case where one hears, 'This person named such and such, they say, through the ending of fermentations, has entered and remains in the fermentation-free awareness release and discernment release, having known and realized them in the here and now.' When hearing that, the thought occurs to one, 'I hope that I too will, through the ending of the fermentations, enter and remain in the fermentation-free awareness release and discernment release, having known and realized them for myself in the here and now.' Then at a later time, one abandons craving, having relied on craving."

And so craving to move to the far shore supports us to get there. And in the process, we do have to begin to recognize when the craving for the practice, the craving for the path, the craving for freedom is in our way. When is it in our way, and when is it not in our way? I would encourage you to use suffering as a guide there.

At times early in our practice, dukkha is really obvious. It's afflictive emotions—it's anger, it's hostility, it's self-hatred, it's pride, it's all of the variety of difficult states that we go through in our daily lives. And as we practice, as we meet that with mindfulness, as we engage in the work of the path, some of those may start to settle down. They may begin to fall away. Some parts may let go and release. And at that point, some subtler kinds of craving may become obvious. As the mind settles down its ways of craving in the world, we begin to see how the craving is operating in the practice itself. We begin to see some stress in those states that have supported our ability to meet experience. There's not stress in the wholesome states themselves, but in our clinging to them, our doing of them.

Here are some examples. Probably the most obvious one that we meet early in our practice is an agenda around mindfulness—wanting something painful or difficult to go away. When we practice for a little while, we begin to see, "Oh, when I meet something difficult with mindfulness, it doesn't hurt as much anymore." And so then we start turning toward painful experience. I remember turning my attention to very painful experience, thinking, "Oh, if I just get in there close enough, it won't be painful anymore"—basically using aversion in the mind to try to get the mind close to the experience. And there was a lot of suffering in that.

So some of these agendas—we'll start to see agendas around mindfulness. This is a form of clinging to mindfulness. When we start to see suffering around the practice, we turn to that too. It doesn't mean to abandon the wholesome states; it doesn't mean to abandon mindfulness. It means to look at how we are engaged in the practice. What is our relationship to the practice? We don't have to let go of mindfulness—only the agenda.

Another example, this one from a more recent time in my practice: my mind has a very strong capacity for investigation. It sees things very clearly, with very little work on my part really. I can't take any credit for this investigative mind—I came into the world this way. And yet there's been a lot of identification around that, a lot of doing of the investigation. And boy, it served me really well for many, many, many years. Even in propping myself up, thinking "I'm really good at this kind of mode," it was still serving me in so many ways.
