I thought that was great. I mean, who knows? I don't know. I thought, well, it'll be interesting when we see from another camera.

When I got home and put some photos from my camera on my computer—different camera, different computer, similar pictures of the same time and place but different pictures—mine also had bright circles, the same type, but not exactly in the same places.

Who knows? Maybe it's devas.

The point isn't whether it is or it isn't. What I love about that is the quality of the open mind and heart: Well, what if? Who knows? When we know how things are—boom—the mind and heart snap shut. When we don't know, but we're interested, we're present without bringing along assumptions. That's when the quality of interest and wakefulness and the steadiness of being present with that quality of openness—who knows, but what's here now?—that's when the truth can reveal itself, over and over.

I love those moments. Who knows? Let the mind open.

So in terms of the deep-rooted habits that the Buddha talks about—this greed, this hatred, this confusion—again, looking at what if we shift the paradigm of what we assume. I won't even say believe, because for most of us it's beyond belief. We don't even know that this is how it is.

Bhikkhu Bodhi, an American man who's been a Theravada Buddhist monk for many years, is one of perhaps the two foremost translators presently alive now of the Pali language Buddhist texts into English. He says this: "Remember that the Buddhist teaching goes against the current of one's habitual assumptions and attitudes. After all, most of our habits revolve around the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self."

Does that sound at all familiar to anybody? You might think, well, what's wrong with a desire to enjoy pleasure? Given a choice, what's wrong with wanting to avoid pain? And then to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around ourselves—we might fudge on that one a little bit. We might be able to say, yeah, maybe that's not so good. But look, just watch your thoughts over the days. With honesty, without judgment, how much of it is me at the center and everything going on? It's all about me.

So without jumping into right or wrong, Bhikkhu Bodhi is saying these are our assumptions, our attitudes. Then he goes on: "When one's personal experience of dissatisfaction, of suffering, becomes vivid enough"—I like that, vivid enough, meaning you can't ignore it anymore—"it may induce one to become disenchanted by these habits and then to begin to place our trust in the way the Buddha talks about reality as guidelines for liberation."

But until we actually even just begin to get a glimmer that maybe these responses, these reactions to life, maybe these strategies aren't working—first of all, we have to even recognize that's a strategy that's going on, that that's not just the obvious and only way to act. As long as we really deeply, beyond belief, but know that happiness rests on getting as much pleasant experience as possible, then that's going to be what rules our life. And as long as we deeply believe that the way to end unhappiness is to be separated from anything that's unpleasant—which we know is impossible, but that doesn't stop us from trying. As long as we somehow believe that suffering means being together with that which we don't like, and the ending of suffering means that doesn't have to happen anymore. As long as our idea of freedom and liberation is floating on white clouds and everything's pleasant and rose-scented in the air, if you like rose scent, then that's going to be the underlying worldview that guides not only our choices and decisions, but our attitudes in our mind. It's going to guide how we do our meditation practice. It's going to guide everything.

And until we learn how to not hate it—that's just the same thing, right? Not tell yourself you're stupid, because that's just the same thing—until we learn how to step outside, step back and just have a look: Is this working or not? Is this present or not? A pleasant experience comes, I start wanting it—does that work or not for happiness? With interest, not with judging. Until we start to look that way, we're never going to be able to see what's really bringing ease and peace. We'll never even be able to recognize ease and peace.

Because another thing about these little moments of ease and peace—for many of us, when we're not quite present with them, they're just kind of boring. Calm. "I came for some juice! I mean, enlightenment, satori—it's supposed to be this big shakti kind of hit, not just smelling my tea. Give me a break. Not lift my foot, put it down. Yeah, that sounds really nice, but I want some juice. I want to be enlightened. It should confirm what a spiritual person I am. Not just this simple, nothing-special moment of non-clinging."

So learning to recognize that. But as long as we're still caught in not seeing that, the mind's idea of happiness is pleasure, intensity. And we're not going to recognize another possibility.

And it was just about nonviolence as a political way of relating in different periods in history. But the most interesting part that I want to bring up here was really in the introduction, part the Dalai Lama and part the writer.

Just the word itself—nonviolence—similar to ahimsa in the Sanskrit or Hindi. Himsa is the same as violence. So nonviolence is really just a negation of the word violence. The book was about how nonviolence can be a profound and engaged, really radical way of relating—very alive. But the word "nonviolence" doesn't convey that. It just conveys a kind of abnegation of violence. So when we hear "nonviolence," what our mind goes to is violence. Violence is kind of like the real thing, and nonviolence is when this real thing happens not to be there.

How powerful words are. How they reflect the way our mind works. And so he gives another example. He said, what if, in English, there was no word for war? The only word for war was "non-peace." You see what I mean? It really, really changes things. We don't even understand the levels of assumptions we're making in the way that we experience ourselves in the world. So if peace is the norm, war is the aberrant experience. It still happens—it's not saying it doesn't happen.

Turning this inward, the idea of nonviolence not as just a negation of violence, but as an active, proactive way of being. What if, in our experience, when we talk about suffering, when we talk about greed, hatred, our discontent, our dissatisfaction, our self-judgment—what if that's not the bottom line? What if that's the aberrant way of being? What if the natural peace and ease, whether it's non-clinging or calm, the simple isness of things without needing to believe all the stories and ramifications—they come, they're thoughts, they're fine—but what if this natural peace and ease is actually the real thing? And the habits of chasing after the pleasant, getting really engaged in pushing away the unpleasant, and all the confusion and delusion around "it's about me"—what if these are mistaken habits based on misperceiving our experience, misrecognizing things over and over and over?

That's a question I posit, and that's kind of a question that's behind our moment-to-moment mindfulness practice. If we start and we just practice thinking, "I'm going to sit, I'm going to be with the breath, I'm going to get to the breath, I'm going to hold on to the breath, I'm going to get more and more breaths so I can do better and better, and then I'm going to get to the state of concentration or the state of no-self, and I'm going to understand"—because it's like this, it's already snapped shut, right? We already know it's the moisture on the lens. We already know what's happiness, what's suffering. I've got to get from suffering to happiness, and this is how I do it.

What if we don't know? What if we bring that quality of really tender, wakeful interest to just this moment of mind and body and see how it opens up, what happens? And this moment, and this moment. When we feel that there's suffering, instead of going, "Oh no, bad, I've got to do this, what did they say?"—what does it feel like right now? What's the suffering? When it feels easeful, what is this like? What's happening in the mind and body right now?

So our path is really to rediscover, to look in another way—both by recognizing the habits, the reactions, how they arise, how they strengthen, how they work, and also recognizing and seeing if we can just allow our conscious thinking mind to let in the moments when these habits aren't present. Not that they're in the background, buried somewhere deep inside and you just don't notice them right now and it feels kind of good but you're fooling yourself and they'll come back. No. They're not present. Sometimes this is true. You need to really look and notice that.

So our meditation really is not about what's happening. It really isn't. It's about the quality of the heart and mind that's meeting whatever's happening right now. That's really the difference. Our tendency so much, in terms of self-confirmation, in terms of achievement, just in terms of doing—we only know how to do stuff by me doing it, right? I do this and X happens.

That's just what we know. And so the habits of going after the pleasant and really judging pleasant as good—I'm not saying pleasant is bad. I'm also not saying it's good. It just is pleasant, that's all. Unpleasant doesn't have to be bad or good. Just unpleasant.

Can we even open to the possibility that we're sitting here and your back's really hurting and your mind's all over the place and you're feeling grumpy, and it's just what it is? Just fine. That even then, without creating anything around it, it's just this. Grumpy mind is like this. Really, it's possible. It's still grumpy mind—don't get me wrong. It's not "grumpy mind is like this" with the angels singing. Grumpy mind is grumpy mind. But it doesn't have to go into all the elaboration: "I've got to get rid of it." Then you've magnified it a hundred times.

Grumpy mind is like this. That's shifting the paradigm. That's stepping out of the habit. Just noticing, oh, look what happens. Grumpy mind is like this. It can be with unpleasant. And that's not the source of the suffering. The relationship of hating, of fearing, of trying to change, of violence—really violence to ourselves—is the source of suffering.

So nonviolence, as you're saying, is not like a passive negation of "okay, whatever." That's not nonviolence. That's passive giving up. But nonviolence is really that quality of, "Oh, this is what's happening." You don't hate it. You don't hold onto it. But you're really present for it.

And this is a trick for us because so many of us are so used to relating to the object—whether it's a material object or the experience that's happening—as the source of pleasure or suffering. Somebody's making a noise. Somebody's making us feel good. "You're making me angry," that kind of thing. We're so used to that, that we have to retrain ourselves. That's really what the discipline of meditation is about: retraining ourselves to get more interested in what's going on in the mind that's observing—the pure heart, the impure heart.

Ajahn Chah, who was a great Thai monk and meditation teacher, said in one of his books: "When I was a young monk just starting to practice, I would sit in meditation and sounds would disturb me. I thought to myself, what can I do to make my mind peaceful? So I took some beeswax and stuffed my ears with it till I couldn't hear anything at all. All that remained was a humming sound. I thought that would be peaceful, but no. All that thinking and confusion didn't arise in the ears after all. It arose at the mind. That's the place to search for peace."

So that's what we're really learning. Not this external thing or that external thing. Search in the mind. Search for suffering. Search for the end of suffering. And the only way we can search is when there's that quality of open interest without knowing already what we're going to find. If we know what we're going to find, the search is dead. There's no space for wisdom to arise.

One of my Burmese teachers, whom I just saw when I was there, had what you might call his teaching theme at the moment. He asked me, "What's the difference between someone who practices awareness and someone who doesn't?" I said, "I don't know, what?" He said a practitioner meets every experience, every object, everything that's happening with interest as a chance to learn. And a non-practitioner responds or reacts to every situation or object with either greed or aversion or confusion. Sometimes we're one and sometimes we're the other. It's not about trying to be perfect.

But I know it's really true for myself that even when the most difficult situations are going on—and I just want to point out again, meditation practice or spiritual life doesn't fix the world. It doesn't stop people we love from getting sick and dying. It doesn't stop relationships from breaking up. It clearly doesn't stop war. It doesn't make everything turn out okay in that kind of way.

But it really does mean that even in the most difficult circumstances, when I notice in my mind that I'm really caught, fighting, struggling, I look and I see there's fear, there's aversion, there's a sense that this shouldn't be happening. Or on a deeper level, there's this feeling that I ought to be able to make it better—especially if it's somebody else you're trying to help. I ought to be able to make it better. As if we're in control. We were just talking about this today in different situations of working with family members or people in prison. We see people struggling, and we think we ought to be able to help. And if difficult things happen or they fall back into old habits, somehow we weren't good enough. Talk about me being the center of everything!

But anyway, what I see when there's suffering is that. But in that same difficult situation, when I meet it with "Oh, what's going on now?"—I might actually feel more tenderness in my heart. I might feel the other person's pain in a closer, more intimate way. It's more a quality of compassion, really, rather than this urgent feeling of "I've got to fix it so I don't feel it." The sense of suffering, of something wrong, the sense of dissonance is gone. There's just the sense of what's happening now. What can we see in this, what can we learn in this—for ourselves and for how to be of more benefit to others as well. But that's not coming out of "me-ness"; it's coming out of an openness to learn. It's really a vastly different way of meeting experience, meeting our life. That's really active nonviolence.

Speaking of nonviolence, they say Gandhi invented a word for his whole nonviolent way of political protest against the English: satyagraha. It never really caught on. We all remember Gandhi and what he did, but his word didn't really catch on. Satya means truth, and they say the basic translation of satyagraha is "truth force" or "holding to the truth." That really is the quality of nonviolence as well—the quality of interest and wakefulness that mindfulness practices. It's truth force, holding to the truth. Not that we know the truth, but that willingness to have that non-judging interest and to be totally honest about whatever's arising. Not to make me look good, or to prove that I'm useless, or to somehow hope that we're getting somewhere. Not "Oh my god, this again. I can't believe how much crap." Not "No, this isn't really happening."

Have you ever noticed? My mind does that. I love to look at denial. Something will come up—I noticed this, I think, last week. I was angry a little bit. Not huge anger; you can't pretend that. Well, maybe you can, but it's harder to pretend it's not happening. I was a little angry at someone. I noticed anger in my mind because I'm used to really watching my mind. But then: "I'm not really angry." And the mind wanted to believe that. "No, it's really fine. I'm not angry." And just go on. It's as if that's a habit. As if we can pretend we're not angry, or we're not jealous, or we're not lonely, or we're not really wanting this thing to happen.

Do you ever sit in meditation, if you've been meditating much before, and it's calm? You're being with the breath, for example, or changing experience, whatever. And it's going well, whatever we're calling well at the time.

And the mind has a little thought. And I keep going. No, I'm not thinking that. Oh no, I don't want this. I'm really just accepting that it comes and goes. Have you ever noticed that? I mean, we can't kid ourselves, of course, because if the clinging is there when the thing goes, you know the clinging is there, because you suffer. It really doesn't work. But it's such a trip to see how we do this.

So this year, I made a kind of resolution. I just want to really, really open to total honesty in my mind. Whatever's arising, just see it. That's the path of freedom. Whatever it is—oh, that's what it is. It's okay. It's really much more okay than "Oh no, that's not happening," and then you get into the whole dance. Oh, that's despair. Feels like this. Okay. And you know, it really is okay. That shift of paradigm.

So this is really what our practice is. Bankei, who was a seventeenth-century Japanese Zen master, said, "If you don't set yourself into confrontation with things, into confrontation with experience, then your primary being reveals itself in its true form."

When we talk about meditation as being the work of the mind, or purifying the mind, or recognizing the pure mind, sometimes we can recognize those moments of purity. Often, though, we're recognizing and exploring how the confusion is triggered and takes root—how wanting or aversion or "it's all about me" springs up in relationship to a particular experience, and how thoughts feed it and strengthen it. This is fascinating. It's great to explore. It's really interesting.

But what it's based on is the description of mind or heart itself. This is Andrew Olendzki's description—he's the executive director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies, and he's a Pali scholar. I like the way he puts things. He said, in Buddhism, very simple definition: the mind is not a subject. The mind is not some solid-state object that's sitting here like a lump, staying the same while things come and go within it. It feels like that, doesn't it? We're watching, and the breath comes and goes, and wanting comes and goes. But it's not. It's not something. It's not a subject that has objects as content. Rather, the mind is the activity or the process of cognizing a flow of events.

The mind is an activity. The cognizant—just that moment of knowing. There's hearing, right? The mind is just that moment of knowing hearing. And all the mental states, the qualities that come along in that moment of knowing hearing—it's an activity. It's arising and passing in every moment. It's alive. It's constantly moving.

That is maybe unsettling to our ideas of wanting stability. But that's what makes a moment of freedom possible. That's what means we can be completely caught in some stupid wanting this or disliking that or whatever, and the next moment—ah, it's just this. It's always just that close, because the mind is a constant activity.

So the way it works is this: in a moment like that, the moment of cognizing arises—there's hearing—and whatever other qualities, mental states, factors are going on at the same time color that recognition, color that perception, and lead to how we think and act.

This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "When the sense organs encounter an object"—like ear and that sound, that's hearing—"the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness." From then on, as your mind reacts to that object, reacts to that sound, for example, it's influenced by all the accumulated habits and past experiences. The whole process is entirely subjective.

So when your mind is full of anger, the world seems to be a hell realm. Have you noticed that? You can be in the most wonderful situation you've been waiting for for weeks, but you're filled with anger—you can't enjoy it. When your mind is peaceful, free from any clinging or fixation, and whatever you do is coming from a place of non-greed, non-hatred, you experience everything as naturally pure.

Don't jump on yes or no, but see if you can just hold openness to explore that.

Or as Ajahn Chah says in his very practical, down-to-earth way—he was holding up a vase and he said, "Look at this vase, look at this cup. You think it's beautiful or it's ugly or whatever you think, but it is indifferent. It's you who are making yourself crazy. The vase is just the vase."

That's the quality of just a moment of arising mind colored by experience. That's why a sound can be neutral one moment, beautiful or nostalgic the next, and then drive you crazy and feel so unpleasant another moment. Different mind moments, different experience. It's a different mind.

This is what we're really learning to explore moment to moment in our practice here. We're talking about using the sensations of breath, or of body, or of hearing as a way to collect our attention—just to be able to have all the activity going on in any one mind moment calm down enough so that we even have the sense that we can actually notice there's a mind moment and that there are different qualities in that mind moment. Mostly we're just so engaged in the habits of hating and wanting, desiring and aversion.

But it's not that the breath or the body or hearing are somehow better objects. They're just tools to help calm the mind down. Then you notice each breath. The sensation of each breath is different if you're being with the breath. And the way the mind is being with the breath is different. And so the quality of noticing—when it's peaceful, notice the peacefulness in the mind, the mind that's being with the sensations of the breath and isn't wanting, isn't aversive.

Notice how when it starts to feel that little bit of "oh, it's getting better," and that little bit of leaning in—we often don't remember to turn around and look at what's happening in the mind. "Yeah, this is it. Now let me get closer. Let me get closer." And we don't recognize that wanting, that greed.

Greed is very seductive. It's like holding out a promise that if I follow this greed and get this thing, it's going to do it for me. And we get the thing or we don't get the thing. If we don't get the thing, we think, "That's why I'm not happy." We don't recognize the greed is the seducer. If we do get the thing, we're happy for a little while—and it's a lot littler of a while than we care to acknowledge. But then we didn't also see that the greed was the seducer. We believe what it's telling us. It's almost like the greed just finds another thing to want.

When greed's in the mind, it really colors our perception. The thing desired or the experience desired looks so much more wonderful, lovely, doesn't it? When you have a crush on somebody, don't they just look amazing—how they dress and how they walk? If you get them, then you find out that wasn't true. If you don't get them, eventually the crush dies and you look at them and think, "What was I thinking? What was that all about?" That was craving in the mind.

Aversion, hatred, fear—the same kind of seduction. You're sitting here, and someone's making a noise in the hall, and you're saying, "If they could only stop it, if they would only stop, my sitting would be better." And that's so believable, so believable. "Only if I could fix it all. Everything would be okay."

So our practice is to turn around and feel: "Oh, hatred in the mind feels like this. Wanting in the mind feels like this. 'I'm the most important thing in the universe'"—unfortunately, it doesn't usually come through that clearly—"feels like this."

But the mind that's noticing isn't judging any of these things. It's just interested. How does wanting work in the mind? How does it feel when it's present?

How is it when it's absent? Where's the suffering? How is aversion and hatred in the mind? How is self-judging in the mind? Oh, self-judging is like this. Sleepiness is like this.

That's how Ajahn Sumedho talks about it. It's like this. So that every moment—feeling of breath is like this, hearing is like this, hating being here is like this, wanting to go to sleep is like this.

And over the steadiness of this practice, we gradually, or less than gradually, begin to realize that our refuge isn't in what's happening. The refuge is in the awareness—that moment of interested, non-judging awareness itself. That's always available to us when we're not running away from experience or trying to hold on to experience. We learn to rest at ease in whatever arises.

It's the way Krishnamurti describes it: When you look totally, you give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself, just in a moment, just one moment—your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You attend with complete self-abandonment, and then there's no room for fear, no contradiction, and therefore no conflict. Just this in a moment is the end of fear, the end of desire, the end of conflict. This complete self-abandonment in interested, kind, full attention. Just for a moment. Don't stretch it into the past, into the future, think you can't do it over time. Just right now. Pain in the back, boredom, tingling, hearing, breathing. We get lost in a story—fine, thinking. It's never further than this. It's always, always right here.

And so what develops is what Ajahn Sumedho calls a real confidence in this natural, interested, non-judging awareness. He calls it intuitive awareness, to distinguish it from thinking about things. But it's a natural confidence that develops. Just like I was saying—I'll be in the middle of some difficult situation and I'm struggling. And it's like, oh, what's happening? Despair. That's a movement, a shift of paradigm, from me and fixing it and wanting it pleasant to, oh, awareness. Awareness can hold anything. Awareness is always available. It's like this. That's the movement from suffering to the end of suffering.

Our job, in a way, is to recognize that, to trust it, and really learn to know it for ourselves. Don't believe anything I say—that won't do you any good anyway. And maybe I'm wrong. Look and see for yourself in any moment, in every moment. It doesn't matter what your experience is. It's always available.

I want to end with a little poem. To me, it gives the feeling of how this sense of isness and peace is available in any moment. It's by Mary Oliver, called "Snow Geese":

Oh, to love what is lovely and will not last. What a task to ask of anything or anyone. Yet it is ours, not by the century or the year, but by the hours.

One fall day, I heard above me and above the sting of the wind, a sound I did not know, and my look shot upward. It was a flock of snow geese, winging it faster than the ones we usually see, and being the color of snow, catching the sun, so they were in part at least golden.

I held my breath, as we do sometimes to stop time, when something wonderful has touched us, as with a match, which is lit and bright, but does not hurt in the common way, but delightfully, as if delight were the most serious thing you ever felt.

The geese flew on. I have never seen them again. Maybe I will, someday, somewhere. Maybe I won't. It doesn't matter. What matters is that when I saw them, I saw them as through the veil, secretly, joyfully, clearly.

So that's our task—seeing through the veil, secretly, joyfully, clearly.

There's about thirty-five minutes or so for walking, and then at nine, the last sitting, which will be short. At that sitting, we'll also have some short chanting together—a loving-kindness chant in the Pali language, which is a lovely language for chanting. We'll have chanting sheets you can read along with. You don't have to chant if you'd prefer not to; you can simply listen. But it's a nice, energizing way to end the evening. And loving-kindness is never a bad thing to put into our minds and hearts. So I urge you to come.

CHAPTER 47

Shifting Paradigms

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to fundamentally shift their understanding of meditation practice. Drawing from the opening verses of the Dhammapada—"Mind is the forerunner of all states"—she illuminates how our habitual reactions of craving (taṇhā), aversion, and delusion (the 'impure mind') are not actually our natural state, but rather aberrations from an ever-present peace and ease.
> Wilson challenges the common assumption that spiritual progress requires forceful effort to eliminate unwanted mental states. Instead, she suggests that the 'pure mind'—citta free from greed, hatred, and confusion—is always available in any moment we simply notice what's arising without judgment. She explains that cognition is not a static container holding experiences, but a momentary process of knowing that arises fresh in each instant, offering continuous opportunities to recognize awareness itself.
> The practical guidance offered is deceptively simple yet radical: rather than focusing exclusively on meditation objects like the breath, notice the quality of mind that is aware. When difficulty arises—whether physical pain, restlessness, or the five hindrances (sense desire, ill-will, sloth and torpor, restlessness, and doubt)—the practice is to recognize "it's like this" with gentle, non-violent awareness. Wilson draws a parallel to Gandhi's concept of satyagraha (truth force), suggesting that this steady, non-judging presence is itself an expression of active non-violence that allows wisdom to arise naturally.

to talk about what I call stepping out of samsara, just momentarily. But that's good—momentarily is good.

One of my current teachers likes to say all the time that meditation is the work of the mind. It seems obvious, but sometimes we forget. We get so caught up in trying to make things happen. By "work of the mind," he means, as the Dalai Lama says, that all happiness and suffering begins in the mind, in the heart. The word we're using, citta, for mind means both mind and heart in the Pali language. It's not a differentiation that's made.

His example makes this obvious: happiness and suffering begin and end in the mind. If you're in a really depressed space or you're in grief, you could be on the most lovely vacation of your life. You could be in a wonderful situation, and you're not really happy. You don't enjoy it. The external circumstances don't necessarily bring happiness.

And the reverse—again, this is obvious, but we forget it—when you're feeling balanced, feeling good, or you just fell in love and things are great, something difficult could come along and it doesn't fluster us the way it might at other times. We might notice that in passing, but we might not really quite remember or see the radical nature of this.

The text for the talk this evening is a short one that I'm sure most of you are familiar with: those first two verses from the Dhammapada, from the Buddha, saying, "Mind is the forerunner of all states." Other translations say, "Mind is the forerunner of all things. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with an impure mind, and trouble will follow you as the wheel follows the ox that draws the cart. Mind is the forerunner of all things, of all states. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with a pure mind, and happiness will follow you as your shadow, unshakable."

I actually think this is a really radical and profound statement, pointing to the real nature of what we are, what creates happiness, what creates suffering, what creates our whole idea of the world. I wanted to talk about that a little.

I deliberately chose a translation that used the words "impure" and "pure," which are not always words that, at least in this culture in the States, we really vibe to. We don't like to think of ourselves as impure. It brings along a certain negative, aversive quality. But in these terms, it's very specific.

Talking or acting with an impure mind simply means—not so simple, maybe—but what it means is a moment. Just a moment. Remember, don't stretch it out into past and future. Then it gets untenable, unbearable, overwhelming. We realize that it's always only just this moment. So we think or act with an impure mind in this moment—this simply means a moment of consciousness, of conscious knowing, that is colored by the qualities of craving, clinging, of aversion or fear. Hatred is the kind of shortcut term for that. And the bottom line: confusion, delusion—it's all about me.

When consciousness is colored by one or more of those qualities, and not recognized, it's as if our awareness is looking through greed-colored glasses, me-colored glasses, hatred-colored glasses, not recognizing that. So focused outward, through the greed, through the hatred, through the confusion, we're speaking or acting. And all it creates, basically, is trouble and confusion.

We don't always tend to get that. It feels so normal and natural. I hope it doesn't—I hope you're not agreeing with me. But in my experience, the reactions of desire, that clinging that says "I've got to have," of aversion to what's unpleasant, of the discontent

Rodney was speaking about—both of which are founded deeply in the sense of me. There is no desire or aversion without the sense of me in a moment. That can be so frequent, so familiar, that it feels like it's just normal.

When we don't stop and look at it, the impure mind feels like the normal thing. The pure mind, which is simply a moment of conscious awareness that isn't colored by greed, hatred, or delusion, can seem like some ideal, really far away, because we're so impure and disgusting. We start looking at how frequently wanting or aversion or discontent arises—which is what I would call noise when Rodney was talking about it. Not every thought, but these reactive qualities. They can seem so frequent, and we get so caught up in relating to them, that the ideal of a pure mind becomes something to strive towards. Our practice can turn into a striving, effortful activity based in either aversion or greed, trying to get me to be pure.

That's never going to happen from that motivation, from that intention.

So what I'd like to look at is this: how about if we open our minds to the possibility that these habits of relating to experience, to objects, to the world—from wanting and greed toward the pleasant things, from pushing away and aversion and discontent when things aren't the way we want them, to having it all be about me—

What if those are simply habits? They're not actually the norm. They're not actually the place that we can rely on. They're not actually needing to be our deepest refuge. They're natural in the sense that it's just nature—when we're perceiving inaccurately, we respond in this way. And if we don't learn how to look more clearly, if we don't learn that, then we keep acting in these same ways because we don't really recognize that they're not working.

So what if our practice is not about trying to get out the pickaxe and dig up all the impurities with aversion? "Let me get rid of that greed, get rid of that aversion. I'm here sitting two days and all I see is how much aversion is arising in my mind, and I've got to get rid of it. I've only got six more days." And we forget to notice what the attitude in the mind is right now. Ah, that's aversion.

What if that's all we have to do? What if it's not my job—since I'm not the center of the universe—to control every mind moment and make sure nothing difficult arises? What if all we have to do is shift the perspective, shift what we notice, from being so engrossed in the object—the breath is calm, my mind is filled with aversion—to simply the knowing of what's happening? Aversion feels like this.

What if that's actually the norm? What if that's actually all that's necessary to begin to recognize, to land in, to trust what Rodney called the silence, what I would call from this text the pure mind or heart? What if that's actually more natural to us, but we're just in the habit of not recognizing it?

You know how the Buddha often spoke about his teachings, even back then, as going against the stream, like swimming upstream against society. That's obvious; I don't think I need to go into that so much, although it's different from twenty or thirty years ago. Thirty years ago, when I would go on these long silent retreats, if I was sitting next to someone on a plane and they asked, "What do you do?" and I said, "I teach meditation," that usually ended the conversation—unless they were a fundamentalist Christian, and then I was sorry I ever said anything.

But nowadays, if I say that, most of the time people are really interested. They have no real understanding, of course. They say, "Oh, that's what I need to do. I need to relax and just be happy." That's what they think you're doing. They have no clue. But the attitude is one of interest. Still, it's not really the norm in society.

More important than that, though, is what I want to talk about tonight: moving upstream against the habits and views in our own hearts and minds, the way we've been taught to view ourselves and the world that we don't even recognize.

This particular aspect of how the mind works really fascinates me—how the way we think, how our thoughts construct the world. And when we reiterate those same thoughts, those same views, or when everyone around us holds the same view, we don't even realize that it's a view or a description. It's just how it is. These views might be useful, so it's not that we dislike them, but just to know: this might be a view.

Let me give you a small example. I was in Burma in January with some friends, and we were going around to different nunneries and villages, giving dāna, doing various things. There were several of us, and you always take pictures, so there were lots of photographs. When we were back at the monastery where we were staying, one of my friends—a Swiss woman who's been a nun there for seventeen or eighteen years—had taken some photos with her camera, and we were looking at them on the computer. On some of them, like one of me on my skirt and on other people in other places, there were these perfectly round, bright light things appearing in different spots.

So this friend who'd been there for seventeen years, and who's really become very Burmese—it's a very faith-based society, you know, in the Buddha's teaching—immediately said, "Oh, these are devas." She totally believed they were devas. She called us in: "These are devas!" She went to the senior teachers: "These are devas!"

Then another friend there, also a nun, but her background is as a scientist—she has a PhD, she's a real scientist—immediately said, "Those aren't devas. That's just some moisture that collected on the lens."

Well, you know, who really knows?

So I thought it would be interesting when I got home, because I had pictures of a similar time and people from a different camera, to put them on my computer and see. And the pictures weren't exactly the same, but on some of them there were these round circles.

Now, is that devas? I don't know. But I'm bringing it up because what I love is that space where we just hold open. Who knows? Not just saying, "Oh, that was a world of devas. What? That's so crazy." But rather thinking, "Who would have thought? Oh, maybe that's a possibility." Just maybe there are many different explanations for things, for phenomena in the world.

So rather than focusing on the explanation, we can get familiar with that inner feeling of openness, of not knowing. The willingness to meet experience in any moment fresh. So not just noticing the experience—the sight, the sound, the smell, the taste, the touch, the thought—but also the quality in the mind that's being aware of the experience.

We can notice the aversion, but we can also notice that quality of open presence—without being colored by me-ing, by hating, by fearing, by wanting. Awake and present, without judgment, without assessment, without knowing. That allows for reality to reveal itself without our unknown views twisting our perceptions to meet what we think.

Do you get a little sense of what I mean? I'm just playing with that.

In terms of how the habits of the so-called impure mind work, how easily in a moment the impure—I'm just going to keep using that word, I even cringe a little from it—but the habit of wanting when something's nice and we think it will make us feel better. The habit of judging, of pushing away when something's unpleasant or makes us not feel good or makes us feel bad about ourselves. The habit of, as Bhikkhu Bodhi says, trying to keep the delusion, the illusion going that everything revolves around me.

You might not consciously think that if you were challenged, but just start to notice as you go through the days, without judgment, with interest. Notice just the kind of thoughts that come up. Not every thought's going to be about you, of course, because actually—this is a secret—we're not really, each of us is not really the center of everything else in the world. There actually isn't really a solid us that's not changing.

But it's a trip, isn't it? Each of us here in this room, say there's a loud noise that goes on. Each of us can have our own reaction, and it's about me. "Who made that noise? It's affecting my meditation. Why are they doing that?" Or, "Oh, no, I'm really cool. It's not bothering me at all. My concentration's firm." Or, "I can see, oh no, my concentration isn't good." "Why is that person—so glad it wasn't me!" "It was me, but I hope nobody noticed."

All of us, with our own little story, from pleasant, from unpleasant, from liking, from fearing, from "what does it mean about me?"

So what if that's just a habit? We can learn to put our reliance, our trust, on the pure aspect of heart and mind.

I read a book recently about the practice and philosophy of nonviolence. I want to share this part from the introduction because I found it interesting in terms of how we look at things, how we language things, how the thoughts we use can really affect our perception in quite deep ways. Anyway, it hit me that way.

He's talking about just the word "nonviolence." In that word, the main aspect that attention is drawn to is violence. The "non" is just a negation. So the main concept you get from that is violence. And he's talking about how, in terms of it as a philosophy, nonviolence is actually a very active, proactive, engaged approach to situations and to life. But when one hears "nonviolence," it just tends to feel kind of passive, like you just don't do anything. It doesn't really do justice to that quality.

He says it's not just in English. In Hindi, for example, ahimsa—it's the same thing. So he said, just play with the idea: What if the only word for war or conflict were "non-peace"?

Doesn't it just change a little bit, the whole idea? Non-peace then—in that, peace becomes the norm. The thing that we're used to. Non-peace becomes the aberration.

So in the same way, as Ajahn Amaro likes to say, what if the peace and ease of the mind and body is the natural peace and ease of the mind and body? What if the pure mind that isn't contracted in response to situations with greed, with fear, with me—what if that natural peace and ease is actually the reality, the norm? What if the habits of the so-called impure heart and mind—of greeting, of needing, of aversion, of making it all about me—what if those are actually the aberration? What if we could begin to recognize, begin to trust, begin to give our interest more to the recognition of the natural peace and ease? Not as some distant thing that's going to happen in fifteen years and then never change, but as something momentary, momentary, momentary. What if we really gave a lot more interest and trust to recognizing those moments, that possibility?

I actually think that's a huge part of our practice, of our path. Meditation isn't really about creating some steady state, whether it's concentration or choiceless awareness. It's not about me creating some state out of forcing some wisdom and holding on to it. You can't hold on to anything. But it's really about allowing us the space, the quietness in the mind and heart, to recognize what's always available when we stop being so entranced by our reactions, by the reactions of mind.

So the natural peace and ease—notice it. I talk about this a lot through the days. It doesn't have to be a big deal. If you're waiting for the big blast of unified bliss that's going to really shake your world and you walk out of here a different person, I'm not talking about that. Maybe that'll happen. May it be so. Maybe it won't. But if we're waiting for that, then everything else isn't good enough, is it? Everything else is just more samsara.

Instead, recognize simple moments when you can tune into the awareness, to the knowing of whatever's happening, and the mind isn't in reactivity, the heart isn't in reactivity. And you'll see it doesn't matter what the activity is or what the experience is.

Take sitting in meditation and being with the breath. Sometimes one is with the breath and you feel it quite easily. Sometimes one is with the breath and it gets very refined and subtle. Then all of a sudden that becomes very tight and tense. So what if, just in the moment that you're feeling the breath—it's not super concentrated, it's just easy, no big deal, you don't get into some story about how wonderful the breath is, there's just a sense of being present with it—what if then we could not give so much focus to the breath, but just notice how that peace and ease in the mind and heart feels? It's not really a physical feeling, but we just start to recognize it more.

In the walking meditation, sitting on the toilet, drinking a cup of tea, standing out and hearing the birds—generally we might tend to notice it more frequently, or in the beginning, with pleasant things. But it's not about pleasant things. It's got nothing to do with pleasant things. It can be when you're sitting there and your knee is just killing you, and you're fighting and struggling, and then there's just that moment where it's just sensation. The moment where it's just sensation, before you go into, "Wow, I'm doing so good, it's just sensation." The moment when it's just that—if you can notice how the natural peace and ease manifests.

We learn to recognize it, recognize it more and more. You see, it's not some really abstract, far distant thing that we have to create. We can't create it. The act of trying to create is actually what hides it. Not that it's an "it" that's sitting here, but that in every moment, every moment of what we call mind—Andy Olinsky, who's the director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies, a Pali scholar, and I like the way he says things, talks about describing what we call mind.

He says the mind is not a subject, not a thing that has objects as content. I know it can sound like that—the mind that has aversion sitting there as content, or peace sitting there as content. And we think of the mind as a steady state. It's not that. It's an activity, the process of cognizing, the process of knowing a flow of events.

So when I'm talking about a moment of mind, a moment of citta, it's as if—a simple kind of description—it's a momentary arising of the quality of consciousness, of knowing, of cognizing. Arising and passing, moment to moment. There's no steady state there. So it's birthing and death in every moment.

And in any moment, that process of cognizing—so for instance, right now, I'm seeing. I'm seeing all of you. It's a moment of seeing, that cognizing. Coming with it in that moment are whatever qualities, whatever factors of mind are present. So that could be a moment of calmness and liking. It could be a moment of greed. It could have a sense of me—how do I feel? Or sadness or joy. Any of the qualities of mind come with it. You see what I mean? And that's fine. That's just how it works. And every moment is new.

What I love about that is when we begin to not get so focused on the object. Say, back to that knee. When you're sitting and there's pain, and if it's pain you're trying to be calm with, but it's pain, it's tight, it's tight, it's tight—and you're not noticing the momentary arising of the known, you don't notice that it's colored with aversion. You keep looking at the pain. The aversion is getting stronger and stronger, and meanwhile you don't notice that.

But because it's arising, the cognizing, the knowing is arising every moment, the stepping out of saṃsāra—what I'm calling this—is always available. As soon as we go, "Oh!" It's as if we turn around or widen our field of awareness and include the aversion. Oh! Aversion. Aversion. I know I make it sound so nice. I know it doesn't feel so nice. But even recognizing the aversion, that's a shift. That's a new moment of knowing. And it can really be that there's aversion, and the next moment of knowing it is really a moment of peace and ease. And we don't need to fix it. We don't need to get rid of it. We just need to recognize, "Oh, this is aversion. Aversion is like this."

Ajahn Sumedho—you probably must know who Ajahn Sumedho is—he uses that languaging a lot, and I love it. Really, what we're learning to do is not be so interested in whatever's arising and all our reactions to it, and how do we feel, and what does it mean, and how is the breath, and how calm is my mind, and am I getting concentrated, I'm still superficial, I'm not deep—all of that. Or in life, anything.

Instead, we get more interested in what's the quality in the mind that's aware. And it's like a Tai Chi move, sort of. "Oh, I'm like this and how can I get a better job?" Oh—discontent is like this. In that moment, "Oh, it's like this." That's moving our trust, our reliance, into the awareness, into the knowing. And that's always available.

When we're mucking around, liking and disliking, me and what does it mean about me and how can I make it better—we're overlooking the natural peace and ease.

So a big part of our path, really in some ways all of the different forms of meditation, are about setting a foundation to help us recognize the pure mind, natural peace and ease, and to support us to continue to shift the paradigm, to realize that that's more the norm rather than falling back into our reactions. And as Rodney was saying last night, it's very subtle. It doesn't matter how long we've been on a path.

It's very subtle and tricky, this sense that it should feel good. It should make me feel good about me. It should somehow fulfill me—some sense of achievement, some sense of getting somewhere. It can get more and more subtle. It's hard for us, and this is the shift, this is the moving upstream against society, against our own habits, to say that it really, really, really doesn't matter what's happening. The point of the meditation isn't to get some particular experience. There is no experience that lasts more than that moment. There can be varieties within it, and sure, some experiences are nicer than others. Some experiences help to cultivate calm. Some experiences cultivate aversion. There's all the skillful means we talk about.

But none of the skillful means are useful if the attitude in the mind with which we try to carry them out is impure. All the skillful means in the world, practiced out of aversion, cultivate aversion.

So when I say it doesn't matter what's happening, can we learn to trust enough the natural awareness, the quality of the natural peace and ease? That no matter what's happening, we can just recognize, "Oh, it's like this. It's like this."

Sometimes that's not so hard to do. Sometimes it's so hard to trust it—even when you know, even when you really know deeply. For myself, when I'm really caught up in something, my mind can be pretty clear. I'm really looking very carefully at my experience. But a particular suffering personality pattern may be coming up, a sense of identification with something. Or I may be having a memory or a plan or some discussion I had, some relationship thing, whatever. And it comes up with a strong pain or a strong sense of me or a strong sense that I need to do something about it. It comes up with some oomph, right? You can notice the oomph. You're aware of the oomph. "Oh yeah, oomph." Maybe that's not the way you name it, but it's like this.

But it keeps on going.

To have that radical trust that the practice is—"Oh, totally caught up in hating this and needing to fix it"—is like this. And that you don't need to do something about it. That the wisdom actually arises by itself through the steadiness of this non-violent, non-interfering, but very present awareness. That's really hard to trust because we think we have to do. That's what we've been taught.

Just to sit and notice and say, "Well, it really doesn't matter what's happening"? Where does your mind go with that? "Well, that doesn't make sense. It doesn't matter what's happening? Why are we busting ourselves sitting and walking and being quiet and following the breath and noticing calm and all of this? They tell us all this stuff and then they say it doesn't matter. It doesn't make sense."

It doesn't really make sense. Not in the way we think of sense.

Because the bottom line is this: once the mind is pure, we speak or act with a pure mind, then all the skillful means make sense. But when we're speaking and acting really caught up in the wanting, in the aversion, in "this is about me," we can meditate till the cows come home with strong, vigorous effort. And I imagine many of you have done this. Just meditate your heart out. Rising, falling, lifting, placing, noting, noting, breathing, silence—until you just feel like you're going to snap in two. "What am I doing wrong?" You can be incredibly mindful, noting every single sensation in your breath, in your leg, every movement in your mind. And I've done this, believe me. I'm not speaking theoretically. And it's just getting tighter and tighter. I'm talking weeks now, months on retreat.

I'm not just talking a couple of days. I'm noting every single damn thing that's happening, no matter how quick. And it's getting tighter and tighter and tighter. Because what? I'm not noticing the attitude in the mind that's meditating.

In that particular instance, the attitude was "not good enough." I'm not good enough. I have to try harder. But another way striving manifests is through wanting—you know, "I want enlightenment. Enlightenment or bust. I will feel this breath." And you're really sincere. You're putting out tremendous effort. It's actually too much effort. But you're looking through the red glasses and not seeing them. That's what we've learned, and you can press like that and create experience. Absolutely. I know—I've done it. And experience can be useful. It's not like it's bad. But it's so hard to trust, to really trust, from that place.

I just have to notice the attitude in the mind. What's happening right now? Right now. Right now. Gentle. Relaxed. Around the clock—you know, continuously. Not every single moment, but it's like, okay, just remember yourself.

This quality of effort that my teacher describes—he often says, "If you don't mind doing this, if you can't bear to move, then don't do it. But if you don't mind, just put your hands together." Can you feel where they're touching? Yes? Not too tough, right? Pretty easy. That quality of effort. That quality of effort.

It's actually not daunting, not difficult. It actually becomes, as Rodney keeps saying, "Have fun"—it does become enjoyable. Because we're just noticing what's the quality in the mind and the heart right now, without judgment, without needing to say it should be different. Just noticing.

So part of our practice is really learning to recognize and trust—and more and more be able to trust—the pure mind and heart. And the other half is recognizing when there's so-called impure greed, aversion, or confusion in the mind. But as soon as we recognize them with interest, without judging, without taking it personally—it's just how nature is—"Oh yeah, that's wanting." Maybe it was five weeks before I noticed the wanting. Maybe it's a second. But it doesn't matter. As soon as you notice the wanting, that's all that needs to happen. Over and over and over. You don't have to get rid of it. You don't have to blow it up. You don't have to do something to yourself to never want again. Just notice.

And when that trying to make everything better, trying to make me better, trying to achieve some end, goes away—even just for a moment—"Oh, I'm completely knotted up in pain and aversion. It's like this." Stuff stops being such a problem.

You go through the day and it's not like you have to make yourself pay attention as some onerous duty, because it gets interesting. Because we stop judging everything that happens. "Oh no, I did that walking, it wasn't good enough, I was thinking, and then—okay, I've got to try it again." I wonder why I hate walking meditation, you know? Instead, we might say, "Oh yeah, there's a lot of thinking. Thinking's like this." Or, "I'm really not enjoying this at all." Not enjoying's like this. It really doesn't matter.

So you're just noticing, with that gentle but persevering quality of attention, what the attitude in the mind is that's noticing. And don't make a big thing about it. Don't turn around and look and go, "What's the attitude?" It's not a big deal. Sometimes it's just calmness. Sometimes it's just peace. Sometimes you don't notice. Fine. Then notice the breath, the body, the thought—whatever is predominant.

As soon as it starts to be a problem—something's a problem here—that's kind of the sign. Oh, okay, check out what's going on in the mind. A very easy way to see is as you're sitting, as you're walking, as you're eating, as you're showering, just to notice: are you wanting something to happen? That's wanting. It's not any big subtle thing. Are you wanting something to stop happening? Aversion, fear. Or do you not actually have a clue what's happening? And sometimes we don't. "Oh yeah, I'm meditating, I'm here at Gaia House." But I would add to that: is it all about me? Whatever's happening, is it all about me?

None of this is with judging—it's just with interest. Just with interest. Let interest do the work, not wanting.

So in meditation we're learning to recognize and trust just those moments of is-ness, of purity, of natural peace and ease. It's natural for all of us. It doesn't only come with deep concentration. Just notice it. Trust it. Really learning to trust your own insight, your own connection to truth. No one else can give that to you, but no one else can take it away either.

And then really getting interested in and recognizing how we get seduced by these habits that obscure. I want to talk a little bit about playing with recognizing and noticing a couple of the strong habits, particularly craving and aversion, because they're so strong. Also, in terms of early days in retreat, you know how the so-called hindrances—I really don't like that word, hindrances to concentration—but difficult emotions come up. They come up anyway, but they come up really strongly in the first days of a retreat. Different ones of us have different ones that arise, and they can just take us away.

So the specific of craving is really sense desire, and the second one is aversion or ill will. Not just a moment of aversion, but you really start hating everyone, everything's wrong. Or with sense desire, you're just sitting there: "I could have this for lunch, I could have this for dinner, I wish I brought a different pillow, I wish I had a different room..." I have a friend who used to fantasize about his wardrobe. If he had a shirt he liked, he'd fantasize about getting it in five different colors. He'd spend hours in sittings doing this. On that level, we're in the hindrance of sense desire—just a little over the top.

Then there's sleepiness, tiredness, sloth and torpor, dullness. The fourth one is the flip side of that—the mind's just spinning, spinning, spinning. We're all thinking a lot, but I mean spinning with some kind of obsessive worry, where your body energy is really restless, where you feel like you want to jump out of your skin or run screaming out of the hall.

And what goes with most of those is doubt.

Doubt usually manifests as thought—doubt in yourself, doubt in the practice, doubt in the time. It can also just be a wavering, an indecision. Should I be with the third or the fourth way of being with the breath? Which one is helpful for me? Is the breath helpful for me now, or is it better to be with the body? What works for me? Joseph said see what works—but what does it mean, "what works"? That's doubt.

And especially when it takes the form of thinking about the practice. Then we think we're practicing, but we're just thinking, thinking, thinking. That is so much suffering, I tell you. But to recognize any of the hindrances—oh, that's doubt—just don't go too far down that road. It's like they say about the donkey between two bales of hay: it can't decide which one to eat from and starves to death. So if you're like, "Is it the body? Is it the breath? Is it calming the breath, the helpful one? What's that third one? If only I could remember that third one, that's probably it"—drop it. Just feel the damn breath. Feel your body or your butt, it doesn't matter. Just connect with something that's happening now. That's actually the antidote. That's all I have to say about doubt.

But I was going to go into craving, desire. I just want to say a word about the word itself, because in English, the word "desire" or "wanting" covers a wide range of mental states that in the Pali language these teachings come from is more specific. And Joseph is going to talk a lot about that, I think, whenever he talks tomorrow, so I dare not go too far into it or my name is mud.

But I just want to say that when I'm talking about craving, tanha, it's a particular quality of mind and heart. "Thirst" is the closer translation. "I want this"—you can almost feel the contraction around it. And so there could be what we would say in English is desire. "I desire to take care of my children." You say, well, that's a good desire. Actually, I was going to say I hate that framing—that's not really helpful, is it? But that's how my mind works. I don't think it helps that we label this a good desire and that a bad desire. That just perpetuates this way we have of looking at the world in terms of good and bad.

But desire, tanha, as a form of kilesa—torment, impurity—it's not about what the object is. It doesn't matter. It's about that quality of thirst. So that thirst could be for pizza. That thirst could be for enlightenment. The thirst could be for anything. But say you say enlightenment or taking care of my family—that's a good thing. Yeah, it is. And one can have an intention, a kind of willingness to do that which we might call desire in English, but which isn't that thirst. Do you see what I mean? It's this thirst that blinds us, that keeps us locked onto the object, that keeps us in samsara.

Because the thing with craving is it has this promise—it's so seductive. The wanting, we tend to overlook it, but doesn't it have that seductive quality, just whispering, "If you can only get this, you'll be happy"? I mean, it's not so obvious, because we can hear that it doesn't really work. But still—just this next calm sitting, or if I had a sweater, or if this pain wasn't here, or if I had a new job, or whatever the heck it is.

The seduction of craving is precisely this: when I get this thing, I'm going to be happy. And we don't tend to look at the craving itself—we look at the thing, the object, whether it's a mood or a physical thing or whatever. When the thing actually happens and the craving goes away, there is natural peace and ease. But we don't tend to notice the natural peace and ease. We notice we have this thing and we're happy. We impute it to the thing. We impute it to the state. We don't recognize that the peace and ease is what's here simply because we're not clouded by craving in this moment.

But then the seduction continues. We start to feel dis-ease again because craving comes up. Well, okay, now I have this, but what about the next one? So what we need to do is simply start to look at how craving itself feels in the mind, in the body.

I was recently having a discussion with some friends about the quality of craving, about this promise it carries, and how when we really look—really look—we can start to see the suffering of craving. But when we don't look, we don't notice it. This friend said, "Well, it's like this"—and this is a person who really likes cookies. The person was saying, "You know, there's the craving, but then I get the cookie, so this isn't really suffering, right?" We get the craving and then we get the cookie and it's all fine. And then the craving comes and we get the next cookie, it's all fine.

So I asked, "Okay, but then what about when you don't get a cookie?"

"Oh, but I always get the cookie."

That's samsara. That's why we keep on spinning it. We always get the cookie. And if it's not this cookie, then the mind is really good at thinking up something else to hide that we didn't get that cookie. That's how we stay spinning. Samsara actually means this round of birth and death, of wanting and dying and wanting and dying, moment to moment. And when we don't stop to look, we think it's making us happy. You stop and look and it's unbearable. So then we don't want to look anymore because it's unbearable. So we go back to, "Okay, never mind, I'll just keep getting the next cookie. I don't have to deal with it too much." It's what they call rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic. But at some point, the Titanic's going to go down.

But we don't have to wait for that point. Because when we actually can just know—oh, wanting feels like this. Honestly. We really just recognize: wanting is like this. Next time you're doing walking meditation is a good one for this, because if there's a thing you want, in walking meditation there's the illusion that you could stop walking and go get it. So in sitting, at least there's social pressure. But if it's wanting a state, you can't make that state happen, so then it's clear that the wanting is suffering—but not really clear, because you tend to jump over it and just say, "Oh, I'm a useless meditator," and then you go to aversion.

Try it in walking. Wanting comes up. Maybe you just want to stop walking. You want to hear the birds. It doesn't matter what you want. And there's nothing wrong with the thing you want. But see if you can just do that Tai Chi move: oh, wanting is like this. Notice how it functions in the mind and the heart. That's all. Not with judging—with interest. How does it function? Notice if there's a feeling in the body that can help us just stay present with it.

Just keep on noticing. Keep on noticing. At some point—I promise, I'm not saying how long—but at some point, it will go away. Because everything goes away. Stay really present so you can notice it gone. Don't just jump to the next thing. Hang out there and notice the gone-ness. Notice the gone-ness.

And the same applies for aversion. Just notice the gone-ness. That's all. Maybe there's a natural peace and ease. Maybe it's just that much of a moment of gone-ness and the mind whips up another one. Playing with this really starts to shift our relationship to experience.

At this point, whatever's happening is interesting. Whatever's happening—even wanting, even aversion, even me-ing—is a doorway to recognizing peace and ease. You don't have to get rid of it. Oh yeah, wanting is like this. At that moment, we've stopped being so seduced by the object. Wanting becomes the next object. And the mind is simply aware of it. Awareness can be with anything.

The same applies to pain—physical, difficult sensation, but also emotional, or a sound that's bugging you, whatever. When the mind is really balanced, the attention can be with that unpleasant sensation, and it's fine. But as soon as you notice reactivity or tightness in the mind, don't give so much attention to the sensation. Notice the aversion, the fear, the pulling back. That's fine. There's no saying you have to bear it. We're not here to cultivate aversion. We're here to cultivate awareness.

So when you're aware—ah, aversion is like this—at some point you may need to pull back, because we don't want to just cultivate aversion. That's a skillful means. Then when the mind is balanced again, when you're in touch with awareness again, the difficult thing may arise. Can you really be present with it?

The whole thrust of the practice isn't to last through things, but to get more and more trusting in recognizing: what's the attitude in the mind right now? That's the effort we put in—to really trust the steady, non-judging process of awareness.

This non-judging process is really radical. Martin Luther King said, in terms of non-violence: "Non-violence means avoiding not only external physical violence, but also internal violence of the spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a person, you refuse to hate him." That same level of pure, kind awareness, non-judging awareness with whatever is arising in our experience. Non-violence. Active presence. But that gentleness—it's like this, it's like this, it's like this—steady. We learn to trust that the wisdom, the deeper seeing, the subtlety, it arises by itself when we are willing and able to trust the steadiness of this non-judging, gentle awareness. It's really manifesting active non-violence.

I want to end with something Gandhi said. He invented a word for non-violence that was more active: satyagraha, which translates as "truth force." I like to think of our awareness practice as truth force. It's really about honesty. In any moment, the knowing mind arising, and a willingness to be totally present and truthful with whatever is. It's almost like we learn to love the awareness without reacting so much to whatever is happening. And then whatever is happening becomes the doorway back into natural peace and ease.

One of my teachers said to me—actually a really tough teacher—he said, "You know, there's nothing you need to be afraid of, because awareness can be with anything. Awareness doesn't care."

In that way, you really can enjoy your practice, your life. Practice and life—same, same.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 48

Generosity

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the profound teaching of dāna (generosity) as a powerful path of awakening that extends far beyond formal meditation practice. Drawing from her extensive experiences in Burma and Thailand, she shares how the Buddha established generosity as foundational to spiritual development—often the first teaching he would offer newcomers before introducing the Four Noble Truths. The Buddha designed the monastic sangha to be completely intertwined with lay practitioners through daily acts of giving and receiving, creating what he called 'mutuality.'
> Through vivid stories—from devoted Burmese nuns caring for orphaned girls to villagers immediately offering back rice they had just received—Wilson demonstrates how generosity transforms consciousness in the moment of giving. She explains that authentic dāna is rooted not in obligation but in purity of intention, faith, and wisdom. The teaching emphasizes that even small acts, like mindfully pouring water for plants, can purify the mind when done with wholesome volition.
> Wilson offers six practical points for the practice of giving: attending to one's volition, abandoning clinging to what is given, giving face-to-face when possible, maintaining full attention during the act, continuing mindfulness afterward, and giving with clear comprehension that doesn't harm oneself or others. She concludes with the Buddha's teaching on recollecting one's own generosity as a powerful meditation that overcomes greed, aversion, and delusion, leading naturally to concentration and joy connected with the Dhamma.

Last night Joseph mentioned at some point in his talk that all of the different teachings of the Buddha deal with transformation of the mind. And so what I want to talk about tonight is really that all the teachings do.

Here, of course, we're on an intensive meditation retreat. Most of what we talk about and look at is the aspect of the teaching of mindfulness meditation, of concentration, and really the cultivation of mind in that way, which is, of course, you could call it the apex or the highest fruit of the practice. But we also can get a little myopic at times, like we're looking so close. In the times when your meditation practice isn't working, it feels hopeless because there's no concentration or mindfulness and you're just spinning in negativity or self-doubt—if any of you have any sense of what I'm talking about. And we say "be mindful of it," and you think, "Thanks a lot. That really doesn't do much."

It helps to remember that meditation is not the only form of teaching the Buddha gave, and that all his teachings are in support of liberation of heart and mind. So tonight the particular teaching I want to talk about is generosity—the word dāna in Pali—because I feel like I've learned a lot about the joy, the reciprocity, the purifying quality of generosity, receiving and giving in heart and mind, in the last few years. I've learned a lot more about it experientially, a lot from traveling in Burma, but not just that. And I feel like maybe we don't talk about it enough.

As an active path for brightening the heart and mind, generosity actually cuts through clinging and ill will, and also cuts through that locked-in sense of me, separate from the world, that I need to protect and fear. An act of giving—of time, of energy, of caring, of physical things, it doesn't matter what—counteracts all of the kilesas in that way. It's a powerful practice. So I just want to talk a bit about it.

As probably most of you know, generosity was usually the first thing that the Buddha would talk about when he would meet somebody new who would come to him. Particularly with lay people, but also with monks and nuns, generosity was one of the first things he talked about, always.

This is from Bhikkhu Bodhi, who says: "Generosity serves as a basis and preparation which underlies and quietly supports the entire path of freeing the mind from the defilements." The Buddha really taught it that way, as a practice of freeing our hearts and minds from defilements, but it also has the power of supporting and underlying the whole path of awakening.

The Buddha chose to live as a monastic, as a renunciate. And so he had an order of monks and later an order of nuns. But the way he set it up—he was making it up, right? He was making up the order. He was making up the rules. He could do whatever he wanted. He could teach in whatever way he wanted. And the way he chose to set up the order of monks and nuns was in a way that was completely through generosity and reciprocity, what he called mutuality, that was daily intertwined with the life of lay men and women. He set it up in such a way that monks and nuns couldn't have food or money, that they're completely dependent on lay people.

Here's how the Buddha expressed it: "Monks, nuns, Brahmins and householders are very helpful to you. They provide you with the requisites of robes, alms, food, lodgings, and medicines in times of sickness. And you monks are very helpful to Brahmins and householders, for you teach them the Dhamma that is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end. Thus, this spiritual life is lived with mutual support between ordained and lay people for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

Basically, he set up the way the Sangha works so that monks and nuns are completely dependent every day on the generosity of lay people. Even now, in Theravada Buddhist countries, every morning the monks—and in some places the nuns—line up early in the dawn time and go out every day for alms round. They have a big bowl and lay people come and put in food, whoever wants to. They can't keep food overnight, so that's the food they have for the day. This is a huge living activity in all the countries I've been in, mostly Burma and Thailand. It's a way that there's always contact. The monks and nuns couldn't completely withdraw from connection with lay people and feel themselves superior or better. They're completely intertwined by generosity.

And the lay people, even now, come to the monasteries, to the nunneries, for teachings, for festivals, once a week to practice, to take the precepts, to hear dhamma talks, for their inspiration—like we try to do with a sitting group or a retreat. But this is a monastery or a wat in Thailand, sort of like a church, that there's one in every village, and it's the center of the spiritual life of the village.

In Burma, during the cyclone last year, in many places it was the monasteries where the monks would really be the ones who could safely go out and try to clean up the damage and have food, and the villagers would come to the monasteries because they felt safer there. So that's a real living reciprocity set up on generosity, set up on mutuality. It cuts through the sense of separation.

I always knew it was set up that way, and it seemed nice. And of course, the idea that to be generous is a good thing isn't really a far stretch—pretty much all spiritual paths have that. But what was kind of experiential for me was as if it were a secret teaching, because I never really experienced it so directly until I started spending time in Thailand, quite a while ago now. And then in the last eight years, I've been at least a month or so every year in Burma, where the spirit of generosity and friendliness—metta and dana—just permeates the culture. Not only the monks and nuns, but the regular people as well. It permeates everything, so you pick it up.

And what was kind of secret, what I didn't realize, was how incredibly joyful it makes one. How much lightness and spaciousness and brightness and joy this sense of generosity brings—whether you're receiving or giving. It's like a circle, a mutuality that goes both ways. How much joy it brings to the heart! It really energizes one, uplifts one.

At first, in my Western way, if someone would be generous to me, I'd think, well, then one should give something back—kind of like quid pro quo. That's the way we do it, and it's still generous. But in terms of the Buddha's teaching, of course, this like everything isn't about outward appearance or the object given or how much or anything like that. It's all about the quality of heart and mind.

And so the conscious practice of generosity—giving, receiving, being really present with the receiving as well as the giving—has a quality of transforming the habits of our heart and mind. It has a power. Sure, nothing's permanent, but really a power to, when we're in a generous moment, we're not experiencing ill will or greed. We're much less feeling a sense of me, self, others, because there's that connectedness that's really quite palpable.

And so this was kind of—I could say it was the secret that seeps in, and all of a sudden you realize, wow, generosity is such a happy aspect of life, and one that, looking at it from the internal way, we can really consciously cultivate, call on, and recollect in our life, in our practice. Not just kind of work, work, work, mindful, mindful, mindful. Do generous acts and then think, well, if I think about it, that's just being egotistical. Play it down. It's very different there.

So let me give you some examples, partly to give you a sense of this, but also for me—just when I think about some of the little acts of generosity or qualities that I've met in people, I get really happy. And it's interesting to see. Some people have been talking in the interviews about how to change the channel in the mind when we feel that we're drowning in negativity or stuck on some particular personal or life issue. Not that you can just say, oh boom, it's gone. But we can actively sometimes change the channel. Metta is that. Sometimes it doesn't work. But actively speaking or sharing in some way—your time, your energy with someone else—in a very conscious way of being generous can also do that. Even just reflecting, recollecting your own generosity or the generosity of others also has the power to brighten, enlighten the mind and heart.

So really, everything I'm saying tonight, I'm just trying to offer as another aspect of widening and broadening our path, our practice of awakening.

So just a couple of stories to give you a sense of this. This winter I was staying at a small meditation center, and in the area where it's located, about a half an hour outside of Yangon, within like a ten-minute walk, there's at least fifteen or twenty very small nunneries. Very small means there could be like two nuns up to three or four adult women nuns, and often with eight or ten or in some places even up to forty really small little girl nuns.

When you see these little nuns, they're all in pink—Burmese nuns wear this lovely pink color. Their heads are shaved. People who see these little girl nuns, that's it. It's all over. They're just so cute. You can't stand it. The first time you see one, you think, oh, she's so cute. And then you find out they're everywhere.

So anyway, these nunneries—all of the ones in this area are very poor, very poor. So I just want to tell you about one particular one we visited. We were going around looking, just meeting different women, different nunneries, and seeing ones that we could offer some little support to. So this one we went to—we were really drawn because it was two sisters.

One was 42, one was 37. And they had eight or ten young nuns—small girls who were either orphans, or had only one parent, or whose parents were so poor they couldn't support them and the children had ended up on the street. So these little girls ranged from about six years old, maybe this high, up to fourteen.

They were living in a little—I can't even describe it—one of these shaggy places made out of bamboo. It was smaller than just this space up here, maybe half as wide, going back there, with a little kitchen outside, a little brazier outside, made of plaited bamboo. And ten or twelve of them were living in this.

We walked in, and there was just such a feeling of metta and lightness in this place. We walked in, and on this little crummy floor, there's a tiny bookcase with Pali books and Burmese study books. There's a big blackboard, and on it, in Burmese script—but we asked what it said—they're teaching the little girls Pali, which is the language the Theravada sutras are written in. They're teaching them Abhidhamma. They're teaching them Burmese in this little crummy place.

They get up at four. They pray, which means meditate and chant for a while. They all have breakfast together. And then the two sisters start teaching these little girls until they all get together, have their showers, have lunch. Then the oldest sister, who really wants to study, goes away for the afternoon. She manages to scrape together enough money to take a bus into Yangon so she can study more. Meanwhile, the other sister teaches these little girls all afternoon, and then the oldest comes home. This is their life, except for two days a week when all the nuns have to go out—they don't go out every morning for alms round because they wouldn't get food the way the monks do.

So what a lot of the nuns do is twice a week, every week, at like five in the morning, they all get on a bus and go to some designated part of the city of Yangon. It seemed like all the nuns in the area had their own space, so they don't all go to the same place. And all day, from five a.m. until night, they walk around with their little bowls, and they get raw rice and a little bit of cha, a little bit of money. When they come home, if they have money, they can buy the other food. Sometimes they get too much rice and then they sell it to the rice stall guy down the road and get money for their other food.

So this is their life. And we were talking to these two sisters who, as I said, were filled with life. They were so strong about how important it is to help bring up these young girls because life without parents, life without an education—it's so hard here. They could end up servants on the street. It's so important that they have a chance to better themselves. They were so filled with care for them. They said, "When someone gives us a set of robes, we think, wonderful, because now we can make fifteen little blouses out of these robes for these little girls. That's the way we think."

We assumed this was because many women become nuns and have the idea to start schools—we figured that's what they wanted to do, that was their plan. But no, not at all. They were acting from total generosity.

These two sisters had only become nuns in their early twenties. One, because she was so sick—she was almost dying for two years. She couldn't even move. She said if her hand was down on the ground, she couldn't raise it to her chest. If her hand was on her chest, she couldn't lower it. Her parents had been a little bit well off, but they had lost their money. She heard them talking about how they were going to have to sell their house to take care of her. And she thought, no, I can't have them do that. I'll become a nun.

She told her parents, who immediately said, "No way, you can't be a nun." Even though they were going to have to sell their house to take care of her. So she struggled and fought, and they said, "Okay, if your other sister comes with you."

So we asked the other sister, "How did you feel about that?"

She said, "Oh, I always wanted to be a nun, but they wouldn't let me."

So it was a big struggle with the family, but they were allowed to become nuns. This is one of these wild Burmese stories.

Two days after they ordained, the sister who had been so sick could get up and walk. She could start talking—she hadn't been able to talk before. She said she's a little weak again now, but it's been fifteen years. That kind of magical occurrence happens a lot there.

Anyway, they came to Yangon and studied. Just two years ago, they didn't have these little girls yet, and they were really deciding what they wanted to do. What they wanted was to go to a meditation center where they'd been studying—to really dedicate themselves to meditation, to practice, to become liberated.

But just at that time, the Sayadaw in their home village, way down in the delta, died. I didn't quite understand what happened, but somehow he died, and he'd been taking care of all these little girls. So just before he dies, he sends them up to the two sisters. "Okay, now you have to take care of these girls." This was never anything they wanted to do or had thought about.

And what did they do? They just immediately made a 180-degree about-face: "Oh, okay." With the help of their family, they got this little piece of land. By themselves, with the help of their brother, they built this house. And now they're completely dedicating themselves—as I described their life—to raising these girls and helping them have a better life. With not a trace of "I have to do this," but rather love and affection. You could see it in the way they related to the little girls and the way they related to each other. There was just a real buoyancy and mettā in that place.

That's not an uncommon story. That's a kind of normal story, especially with the nuns—that's why I like visiting them. This incredible generosity of spirit and heart, together with this real mettā, this real kindness, without the kind of resistance of "okay, I'm stuck with these little girls." They just change the mind.

And it's not blind either. She said, "In ten years, once they really learn, if they want to disrobe and go live a life, great. They'll have good values. They'll know how to live a good life. That's wonderful. We're not trying to make them nuns for life. But if some of them stay nuns and they can teach, that's even better, because then we can finally go up and meditate." So they didn't forget that, you know.

But there's just this quality of not just me, but us. And the "us" suddenly changed from the two to the ten, and their activities changed accordingly. So that's just one example. And as I said, just being there—we're getting this through translators—you just come away feeling so happy. It's very contagious in that way.

And it's not just, as I say, a kind of mutuality. It's not just with the nuns or with the monks. It's really there in the culture—the sense of the joy of receiving. There's no shame in being on the receiving end of generosity. If you give something to nuns or to lay people who are hungry, the receiving is done with a real dignity, with a real face-to-face presence, just as the giving is done. It's always a little ceremony, and pictures are taken, and it's a joyful time. There's no sense of "this poor homeless person needs something"—it doesn't have any of that.

At the same time, in this little meditation center where we were staying, the village around had been affected by the cyclone of a year ago. The people were still quite affected; there was quite some hunger. So the Sayadaw, the head of the monastery—we had brought in a lot of money that people all over the world had donated—one of the things he did was organize what's called a rice dāna, offering rice to each of the households in the village, which was about 1,200 households.

And they know exactly. It's all extremely orderly. Each household gets a little chit, and on the day of the offering, they pile up the rice. Each person comes with their chit, and then you hand them the bag of rice. The women all put it on their head, these giant bags, and go walking off. Again, they're dressed up and it's lovely doing it. But it's fast—it's not a leisurely thing. You're handing out this heavy rice, they take it and go. It really moves.

Anyway, my point is that these were all the villagers from that village, and this is where the monks in that meditation center go for their alms round every morning—just this immediate village. The next morning, there was one Mexican monk among the mostly Burmese monks, and he was kind of talking to us. He told us that when they went out for the alms round, having been there several months, you kind of always go on the same route. You get to know the route, and more or less the same families, more or less the same people come out and offer the rice or the food. It's always done with this great dignity. People stand and wait for the monks. They step out of their shoes. They kind of bow and give. There's something about it in the early morning—it's really beautiful.

But what this monk told us is that the next morning, after the rice dana, when they went out, there were families and people giving rice who had never been out there before. It's because now they had rice to give. It's so touching to me. The first thing they did on receiving rice was turn around and offer it back again—not all of it, but some of it. There's just this sense of the movement, the joy. It was so touching to hear. This monk who received it was really deeply touched, uplifted in his heart. And then you want to be more generous, and it's like a flow. But also there's a sense of the happiness of the people who then can offer something. It's a real living thing, and the longer I spend just watching it—not even being part of it—it starts to affect our hearts and minds.

Joseph said last night that violence can be contagious. But all of the moods are contagious. The wholesome, the beautiful states are really contagious, super contagious, like an infection—because it's touching that place of truth, that place of beauty in us. That's why it's so touching.

As I said, it's just in the culture. Later, we took food down on some boats into the delta to even poorer villages. It was a whole organizational thing—Sayadaw organized all of this, which was really quite a lot. He's a wonderful guy, very kind and caring. Anyway, we were doing the same thing, just offering some food. But it was all organized through the monasteries in these villages, so the villagers knew that the Sayadaw was coming with food. When we got there, the villagers had all brought things to offer back to the Sayadaw, to take back to his monastery—beautiful plants that they had grown, or fruit that they had. It was this really joyful thing where they all took their offerings in a big procession down to the boats, whatever they had that they could offer back. There's this sense of giving and receiving and joy all around. It's a very alive thing.

And it's so central to the culture that—what was it, a year and a half, two years ago? I don't know if you remember when there were big demonstrations again in Burma, and again it was shut down, of course. But one of the things the monks did was refuse to accept offerings from the military, from the big generals. The generals would come to the monastery and want to offer, and they would do it for show. They would come with cameras so there could be pictures in the newspaper of the generals offering to monks, which was a way of trying to keep their spiritual legitimacy. If the generals came to offer, or even on alms round, what the monks would do was simply turn their bowl upside down. That's all—but it's a huge insult. Huge. And if it wasn't a really well-known or protected monk, they were arrested and thrown in jail for that. Simply for refusing to accept generosity.

And what they're refusing recognizes what's really the truth about the way the Buddha taught generosity: the heart of it is in the intention, in the purity of intention, in the faith, in the kindness, in the connectedness. And so when someone's coming and offering not from that place, they don't really want to receive because it isn't really what generosity means in that circumstance.

So, as I said, it's so intrinsic that even the little kids... I was walking one day just between these two meditation centers. It's like a ten-minute walk on the road, just before dark. All the kids are out of school. It's a very poor little village there, so all the kids are just kind of running around wild. And I was just minding my own business, walking back. Suddenly a little boy—and he was still in his cute little school uniform, his little green shorts and his shirt, he looked kind of neat compared to the others—he came up to me very solemnly with this tiny little white jasmine flower. With great dignity and attention, he came up to me and bowed and handed me this jasmine flower. It just made me cry, you know, it's just so lovely. And I just bowed and thanked him in Burmese, one of the like three words I know. And that was it. That was all. You don't need to make a big deal about it. But just that sense of how that's in the culture and the connection it brings and the happiness, the upliftedness it brings—it brightens my mind and heart now, just to think about that little action.

So generosity has really far-reaching effects, whether we're giving, whether we're receiving. It doesn't stop with that little action.

I was trying to think of an example of this, and I remembered the book—if you've read it, it's been on the bestseller list in the States for years—called Three Cups of Tea, by an American man, Greg Mortensen. He was a mountain climber, climbing K2 in the Pakistani part of the Himalayas. Coming down, he somehow got separated from his friends and lost. He wasn't like, you know, out there dying—he was lost and in trouble—and he kind of stumbled into a Pakistani village. It's actually up in that part now, the northwest, that's having so much suffering and so much pain from the fighting.

Anyway, a family and the village head took him in. They were just kind to him, cared for him, gave him tea. The three cups of tea refers to a saying there: if you have three cups of tea with someone, then you're friends for life. He was so moved by that. I mean, he's an unusual guy, okay, it sounds like from this book. He swore that he would come back and help them build a school, and he went home.

His whole life has become about raising the money. He went back to build this. It took him forever to raise the money. He worked as a nurse in an emergency room. At one point—this is why he's unusual—he lived in his car so he could save the money it would cost to have an apartment, in order to go back and help build a school. I think he spent a year, he got the money, he went back, and got there, his way out. And they said, "Well, actually, before the school, what we really need is a bridge to go across this river here, because otherwise we can't even get the materials." He goes, "Oh, okay, then we'll build a bridge." And he didn't know what he was doing. Anyway, it just mushroomed and mushroomed, until now he has this huge foundation and he's building schools all over, and he goes back every year. From just a simple act of hospitality and kindness, it just keeps cycling. So we don't know.

A friend was talking to me a couple of years ago. She had been in—I guess it was Burma again—for a retreat for a couple of months. And she was talking to me about her experience coming back. She said how she didn't really notice at first. I mean, she noticed that people are really kind—the people who run the guest house where she was staying just go out of their way to do little things for you. She's an acupuncturist. She met some acupuncturists, and they were so kind in taking her all over Mandalay and took her to see really big Sayadaws to work on them, and dinner. It just goes on and on. It's just like that. And she said at first, you know, she was appreciating it, but she didn't really notice what an uplifting effect it was having on her heart, on her mind.

But after a month or two—and it was the same for me the first time I went—I started to notice that I was not always happy, but happier. When difficult things happened, I would feel like I had some support, some sustenance, some pliability of heart and mind, some resiliency. I could actually notice the metta around me, the generous field around me, and you can call on that to give you the wherewithal to be with difficulty. So it's not like you're just happy, happy all the time. I don't mean that. But it's a real strengthening and uplifting.

She really noticed it. And when she came home—and I keep experiencing this too—we come back to the States and people are really generous. People are really generous in the States, and I assume here too. I'm not saying we're not. But she said it's not the same for her, and I've noticed this too. That kind of natural, spontaneous extending of ourselves to others isn't quite so free-flowing. Back in the States, it's almost like there's a little hesitation—you don't want to intrude on somebody's space, you don't want to seem like you're offering something that they could be offended by, or whatever other reasons we have. It's just not so naturally free-flowing. A little more closed in. We're generous, but we get all these letters in the mail and we write a check, or we do this, or once a week we go to the soup kitchen—which is all great, I'm not saying it's not. But there's just some immediacy of face-to-face connection, some natural free-flowing spontaneity that isn't quite as completely embedded in the culture. She just started to notice the difference.

In terms of how the Buddha talked about generosity, I want to give some examples, some stories about a man who lived during the Buddha's time and was seen as the most generous supporter of the Buddha: Anathapindika. Stories about him show up all through the suttas. I'm taking particular ones that highlight the teachings, the quality of the practice of generosity as a freeing practice, as a supportive practice for our path of liberation. What these stories really highlight is the importance of the inner motivation, not at all what's given.

Anathapindika is seen as the most generous, and he did happen to be rich, so in that way you could say he was the most generous because he had the most to give. But really, he was the most generous in terms of the motivation, the generosity of his heart, which arose not out of a should, but out of faith and joy and wisdom in the teachings.

If you've read the suttas at all, you probably know how many start out with, "Thus have I heard"—that's Ananda talking when it starts like that—"On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Savatthi, in the Jeta Grove, Anathapindika's monastery." It really shows up a lot in the suttas. The Jeta Grove was this beautiful grove monastery that Anathapindika bought and donated to the Buddha and his whole Sangha. They spent nineteen out of forty-five rains retreats there. A rains retreat is like three months a year in the rainy season when the monks and nuns weren't wandering. They moved from place to place, but three months of the year in the rainy season they would stay in one place. Mostly they'd do their meditation and live a more secluded life, but also so as not to harm the crops that were growing. So again, the mutuality—not wandering around through the fields and harming the crops.

Just a little bit about how his faith arose before he started being generous. For me, it just speaks to how the beginning of generosity isn't a should or a wanting or what would be nice, but the deep inner movement of connectedness, of faith, and of real wisdom in the path of awakening.

Before he'd ever met the Buddha, Anathapindika came to his brother-in-law's house to visit. Usually they were so happy to see him, but this time something was going on and they were just, "Oh, hi, hi," and everyone was busy. He said, "What's happening?" His brother-in-law said, "We're inviting the Enlightened One, the Blessed One, for a meal." When he heard that—"Enlightened One"—it just shot a bolt of lightning through him. He said, "Who? The Buddha? I've got to go see him." His brother-in-law said, "Well, tonight's not appropriate. You can go in the morning."

He was so excited he couldn't sleep. He kept waking up—you know that feeling—"Now is it morning? Now is it time to go?" Finally he couldn't wait, and he just went out in the dark and was walking way far to find the Buddha. But he got so scared.

He got so nervous, just completely overwhelmed. And he got so scared that he thought, "I better go back. I better go back."

And as often happens, an invisible spirit urged him on. We can see that as an invisible spirit, or we can see it as our own inner intuition: "Better for you to go forward. Keep going forward." So he kept going.

And then, just in the dawn, he sees this serene person doing walking meditation in the distance. Of course, we know who that is. He sees this person, but he's afraid—too shy. But the Buddha sees him and calls him by name: "Sudatta"—which no one called him; only his family knew that name—"please come."

So he knew he was in the presence of the Buddha, but he was so nervous. You know how it is when you meet someone you really want to meet and you're so nervous you just can't think of what to say? So he threw himself at the Buddha's feet and said, "Did you sleep well last night?" He felt like an idiot after that. But the Buddha doesn't care.

So, of course, the Buddha gave him a whole teaching. This appears often: "The Blessed One gave Anāthapiṇḍika a step-by-step teaching." And this shows up in many other suttas, and I'm bringing it in because it relates to generosity.

When the Buddha meets someone who hasn't really seen the Dhamma, isn't really quite in tune with the teaching at all, he gives instruction step by step to bring the heart, the mind into readiness—into a state of openness to hear, to understand the depth of Dhamma. You can't just blast everybody.

And he starts by giving talks on generosity. So he begins by talking about the virtues of generosity, and then the power of virtue, of non-harming behavior. And from there he goes to the perils of vanity and getting lost in sense pleasure. He talks about the benefits of renunciation. And then—I love this line—"when he saw that Anāthapiṇḍika was ready in heart and mind, pliable, unobstructed, uplifted, and serene."

That's really what happens when we're transforming consciousness, working with generosity, working with virtue, working with renunciation. It has the power to affect this transformation in our heart, in our mind. Even momentarily, our minds become uplifted, unobstructed, not clouded by hindrances, serene. That's really important.

And then the Buddha gives him a teaching on the Four Noble Truths, because now the heart-mind is open to take it in. It's just very practical.

And at that point, "the dust-free, stainless eye of truth opened for Anāthapiṇḍika. Whatever has the nature of arising, all that has the nature of passing away." He had understood the truth of the Dhamma, overcome doubts, and was without wavering. He was now self-dependent in the dispensation. He had realized the path and fruit of stream entry.

That's, in the Theravāda, the first level of awakening. And I love that sense of "self-dependent." It doesn't mean one is completely, totally, forever free of greed, hatred, and delusion. But there's that sense that you can rely on your faith, your understanding. Yes, we get lost again and again and again. But you can rely on the trust and faith to find the way again, to call on the tools you need.

So at that point, when his faith and his wisdom were really alive, that's when the generosity came forth. From that moment, he invited the Buddha to eat, and the saṅgha to eat. And later he paid a mint for Jeta Grove because the prince didn't want to sell it—just many stories of his generosity.

But the point I wanted to make is that it begins with that upliftedness, that joy, that real love of the truth. It isn't personal to the Buddha. He's supporting the possibility for this truth of Dhamma to keep on being shared. That's really very important.

And there's actually another story right after this about Anāthapiṇḍika that highlights again the importance of motivation—that it's not about the object, or the time, or what's given, how much or how little. It's all in the motivation. That's what liberates our heart and mind. That's what uplifts consciousness.

So after a time, the king of this area, who was a follower of the Buddha, quite devout—King Pasenadi—he heard how generous Anāthapiṇḍika was.

Anathapindika would have five hundred monks and nuns come every day and offer them food, and everyone felt so filled with light and serene in his house. So Pasenadi said, "Yes, I want to do that too." He decided to offer a wonderful, delicious meal to five hundred monks every day.

But after some time, he learned from his servants that after the monks were offered the food, they would take it with them and go to their supporters in the city. The monks would give the food to their supporters, and then the supporters would offer it back to the monks.

So King Pasenadi asked, "What's up with that? I'm giving you really good food—what's going on?" He brought this question to the Buddha.

The Buddha explained to the king that in the palace, the courtiers and servants distributing the food did it without any inner feeling at all. It was just their job—give out the food. They could have been following orders as if they were cleaning out a barn or taking a thief to court. Those were the Buddha's examples. They lacked faith and had no love in the doing of it.

And so when anything is given in that spirit—this is from the Buddha—no one would feel comfortable accepting it, even when the meal was made of the most delicious food. So the monks would take it to their supporters, and their supporters would offer it back with a purity of inner intentions. That's the act of generosity. Even though the supporters didn't originally give them the food, it was that purity that makes the receiving and the giving really alive.

There's another statement from the Buddha that emphasizes this same point: "Even if a person throws the rinsings of a bowl or a cup into a village pool or a pond, thinking while they do it, 'May whatever animals live here feed on this'—that would be a great source of generosity and merit."

We can all do that, right? Pour out our water and say, "May these animals, may these plants live." The mind is being purified in that moment. The heart is being uplifted. Throughout the pouring of water: "May all beings have fresh water." That's all it takes. Over and over and over. You can see how it really changes the way we relate to life and each other, how we recognize that we really are connected in that place. We're not just about "me." It really does bring in an openness of beauty that is very, very powerful.

I wanted to offer something from a talk I heard from Bhante Jnana Panika, who came many years ago to IMS with Sayadaw U Pandita. He was a Nepalese monk, and he gave this talk on generosity that I loved. He offered six points—just six points for the actual practice of giving. I found them lovely, and I want to share them here.

The first: when you're actually giving something—and it could be a book, it could be just your time to listen to a friend, it could be anything, it could be pouring the water on the plants, whatever it is—the first thing is to give attention to the volition with mindfulness. This is all acts of mindful presence with ourselves. You consciously get in touch with a pure volition. So, for example, when pouring water, we can just do it automatically, or we can take a second and reflect, "May I really offer this." That's all. Give attention to the volition. With this act, may all beings be free from suffering. That's a practice. As we wash our hands: may all beings have clean hands. With this act, may all beings be free from suffering. Just try dropping it in over and over and over. See the effect it has on how we feel, how we relate to the world.

The second point: whatever one is giving, take a moment to see if there's any clinging to it, and see if you can just abandon that clinging. If there's a hesitation—should I give this or not?—just take a moment and feel the clinging, not with aversion. Notice the clinging, and sometimes we really can abandon it so the gift is given wholeheartedly. Sometimes not. There are no shoulds.

But just taking that little moment to see, to abandon the clinging.

This third one is interesting—not always possible, but I think it's part of what makes dāna so alive in Burma and Thailand. When it's possible, when it's appropriate, to have the giving and the receiving be direct, face to face. That's really powerful because it increases so much the awareness of the interconnectedness, of the joy, of the love, the mettā that's moving back and forth.

Sayadaw U Pandita made me do that one time. We were on this retreat, and I'd heard him say he wanted a book—kind of a simple book in English, he was learning English—about Jesus, about Christianity. He wanted to learn. So I was sitting, but it was at IMS, so I had a lot of friends, and I had a friend buy the book and give it to him. And also, I have to say, I was a little shy. I sometimes see myself being shy about giving a gift—it's not good enough, or whatever. So I was hiding a little bit. I was on retreat, I mean, I couldn't do it, but I was also hiding a little bit.

And he could really tell what was going on, a lot. When I came out of the retreat and I was just kind of paying my respects to him, he said, "This book—you take this book, you hand it to me." He said, "It's a wonderful book. Face to face."

So he made me really hand it to him. And then it was like a real teaching, because he took it, we were both holding it, and he was really present. And it's really what they do in Burma and Thailand when you offer dāna or receive—really there. Not like, "Oh, you're so wonderful," but accepting it one hundred percent and saying, "May this gift be a cause for your awakening, for your enlightenment."

Can you imagine giving—and this happens a lot—you give somebody a little thing and they say, "May this be a cause for your... may you realize Nibbāna in the shortest possible time." That's what they say in Burma. Can you imagine being somewhere, you give somebody a Coke, and they say, "May you realize Nibbāna in the shortest possible time"? It's another culture, but it's nice, you know—you want to give them a Coke again.

Again, that nunnery I mentioned to you, that was so kind—the one I was telling the story about. It was another example of the giving face to face. Our friend Jack Kornfield was leading a group this winter. He brought about fifteen people to Burma, kind of on a tour, but they'd all donated a lot of money to a foundation that Jack's on the board of—a project foundation for the people of Burma. So it was really a way to raise money. He actually raised like three hundred thousand dollars; these people had donated to build houses for people who'd been in the cyclone and such. So he was taking them around, and he came to where we were in the monastery. It was their first day, and he knew I was there. He'd call me up and say, "Carol, so can we go see some nuns? Just something—go see some nuns." He wanted to go see this other teacher who wouldn't let him come. So we went to see these nuns, and Ariyañāṇī and Vīrañāṇī, my two Western nun friends, and I thought this was the best place to take them. Of all of them, it's really little, it's really poor, and there's this great mettā feeling.

So we took them there, and we told them, warned them. This group of like fifteen people crowded in. First of all, these big old Westerners crowded into this little room I told you about, and actually started cracking the bamboo floor. I mean, it was a scene. So we're all crouched there, and the little nuns are kind of standing up because there's no room to sit. And they're just talking and telling their story, this and that. That's all.

And then at the end, kind of talking to the head of the group, they wanted to donate some money. They went out, and Jack had said to me, "Oh, we'll give you some money to give to them." I said, "No, no—you give the money to them. That's the whole thing." He said, "Okay, okay."

So they went out, got the money, came in, and offered it, which you do—you just hand it over in an envelope. And they do what they do, and we knew this would blow them away. All the nuns, including the little ones, are standing there, and they chant a mettā chant for like five or ten minutes. These little six-year-olds, they know it, and they're putting their heart into it. And by the end of it, these guys were just... they were gone. They were crying. "Let's give more money!" "No, no, no—that was already a lot. You'll see many, many more people."

You don't need to give more money.

And they came out, and I'm not exaggerating. I saw Jack two months later, and that was the first thing he said: "You knew it was going to be like that, didn't you?" It was just wonderful. They were like floating. It's hard to explain. It's just some little bit of chanting. But it's that face-to-face encounter and the reciprocity—you leave having given, feeling like, who gave? Who received? You received so much more than you gave in terms of the beautiful qualities of heart.

So that's the third recommendation: get face-to-face.

The fourth: when you're giving, and this is obvious, give with your attention, with your mind focused on the giving. Really do it wholeheartedly. This is something I've often noticed in myself—"Oh yeah, yeah, you can have this." But instead, it's really about not making it offhanded, but truly feeling, "Oh yes, I would like to offer this to you." That lets in the moving out of the sense of self. It lets in the absence of ill will, the absence of delusion, the absence of offhandedness. There's that real heart-to-heart generosity. Just mindfulness as you do it.

After giving—this is the fifth one—continue to be mindful of your motivation, your volition. Because you know how sometimes you give and then think, "Oh, I wish I didn't do that." Or you say, "Oh sure, I'll be glad to spend some time with you," and then you go home thinking, "I've got so many other things to do." So continue to be mindful, because it might change. And if it changes, you can again get back to that place of generosity.

The sixth, and this is again important, is the aspect of clear comprehension with all of our mindfulness—to be aware of the broader context. So that when we give, we give in a way that doesn't harm ourselves or harm others. We give in a way that's appropriate. This is an aspect of wisdom.

And there's another quotation from the Buddha about this: "How a person of integrity gives a gift. Five ways a person of integrity gives. Which five? A person of integrity gives a gift with a sense of conviction. A person of integrity gives a gift attentively. A person of integrity gives a gift in season"—meaning at the appropriate time. "A person of integrity gives a gift with an empathetic heart. A person of integrity gives a gift without adversely affecting himself or others."

So there's that aspect of wisdom, very similar to compassionate action—we can't always know all the effects, but there are times we think we want to help, yet it could cause more trouble. The same with giving.

And there's a story, again from Anathapindika, that I really relate to, as it could happen today. Do you give a junkie money, if you know they're going to buy more drugs? I'm not saying we know what the answer is, but there are real ethical questions about what to give.

So Anathapindika, remember, was incredibly rich, and his kindness spread out to his whole family, his whole household, his servants. His family members were all serene and generous, and it spread to his friends—not by teaching, just by being who he was. The generosity and the happiness were contagious.

That said, he had a nephew who inherited a huge fortune but lived a wild life—drinking and gambling, squandering his wealth on entertainers, women, and needy friends. When he spent through his whole inheritance, he asked Anathapindika, his uncle, for money.

His uncle said okay. He gave him a thousand gold pieces, but said, "Use this to start a business. Use it to get yourself going again."

But he didn't. He just squandered it. Then he came back to his uncle again and asked for money. This time, Anathapindika gave him five times as much—five thousand—but said, "This is a severance. This is it. Make something of yourself. No more."

He squandered that and came back again. And this time Anathapindika said he would give him clothing, but nothing else.

Even that he squandered. And the next time he came back, Anathapindika said, "No, I'm sorry, I'm not going to give you anything."

It ended up that he didn't want to be a beggar, and he died wretchedly. His body was found outside the city wall and thrown into the refuse pile. That's pretty wretched. And of course Anathapindika felt terrible and went to the Buddha and said, "What could I have done?"

We have these kinds of situations sometimes in our families, with our friends, with people we know. And you try, you try, you try. So even with the Buddha, even with Anathapindika, there was a point where the giving was adversely affecting them. It wasn't real generosity.

And the Buddha said—so we don't ever know. He could see everybody's lifetimes and history. We don't know that. But he said that Anathapindika really couldn't have done anything. It would have just gone on and on like that. His nephew belonged to the fortunately small number of insatiable people who are like bottomless vats.

I just think that's interesting. Not that we can't all change, but that some of us can just get so inured. So that's the sixth kind of giving: giving aware of the broader context in a way that doesn't adversely affect oneself or another.

The last thing I want to say about the teaching of generosity as part of our path of awakening is this: just as I explained how the Buddha used it as a graduated teaching, when you see your heart and mind is closed, or dull, or dark, when you're caught in clinging or craving, and you listen to the Four Noble Truths, or you think about some teachings that have been so wonderful, and it's just like—you can't get there—call on generosity. Call on virtue, non-harming behavior, which I didn't talk about, but which has the same kind of qualities.

Sometimes in the actions—even the small actions of throwing in water, offering something to a friend, clarifying your motivation, really paying attention—so, actions. But this is something I think we really don't think of or use enough in the West: not only the actions, but the contemplation of our past actions is a very powerful source of brightening and freeing the heart and mind.

The Buddha talked about this. He spoke of six wise reflections. In another place he says that when you're meditating and your mind gets really caught, pulled inside, spinning in something, then consciously call up a wise reflection, a beautiful reflection. Change the channel. Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha—those three reflections, which are powerful for people in countries where that arouses a lot of faith. That may or may not be true for us.

But the fourth reflection is to recollect your own virtues, your wholesome, non-harming, kind behavior. The fifth one is where you recollect your own generosity. You consciously remember times that you have been generous and really reflect, let it in, on what a wonderful thing it is for your clarity of mind, awakening of heart, that you have done these generous acts.

We don't tend to do that, right? We sit and think, "Oh, that's really an egotistical thing, to run over all your generous acts." But this is what the Buddha said:

At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity, her mind is not overcome with greed at that moment. It's not overcome with aversion. It's not overcome with delusion.

This is exact pointing to the moment-to-moment transformation of mind or heart, simply by recollecting your generosity.

And when the mind is not overcome with passion, aversion, or delusion, her heart heads straight based on generosity. And when the heart is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones has a sense of the goal, a sense of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma. And in one who is joyful, rapture arises. In one who is rapturous, the body grows calm. One whose body is calmed experiences ease. In one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated.

So, you should develop this recollection. You should develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home, crowded with children.

When we recollect generosity, our heart goes straight. We realize the goal, a sense of the Dhamma, and we experience the joy connected with the Dhamma.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Shantideva said, "When I have done something for the sake of another, no amazement or conceit arises."

It is like having fed myself. I look for nothing in return.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 49

Insight

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this Dhamma talk from a full moon observance at IMS Forest Refuge, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of insight (vipassanā) and the conditions that support its arising. She distinguishes between three levels of knowledge found in the suttas: sutamayā paññā (knowledge from hearing), cintāmayā paññā (knowledge from reflection), and bhāvanāmayā paññā (knowledge from direct cultivation)—emphasizing that true insight belongs to this third category and cannot be achieved through thinking alone.
> Wilson uses the vivid analogy of Magic Eye images to illustrate how insight works: just as the hidden image appears only with relaxed, steady attention rather than effortful looking, genuine insight arises through non-clinging awareness rather than striving. She addresses common misconceptions that insight requires subtle or special experiences, demonstrating through practical examples how liberating understanding can emerge from any moment—including restlessness, aversion, or familiar personality patterns—when met with clear mindfulness.
> The talk examines three essential supports for insight: sati (mindfulness) as non-judgmental awareness that receives experience freshly; viriya (energy) understood as patient, courageous persistence rather than forceful striving; and samādhi (concentration) as flexible stability rather than rigid one-pointedness. Wilson draws on teachings from Sayadaw U Tejaniya to explain how a mind colored by kilesa (afflictions) sees only concepts, while a mind free from greed, hatred, and delusion perceives things as they truly are—opening the door to the direct seeing of anicca, dukkha, and anattā.

Tonight, what I want to talk about is a little bit of Vipassana 101, so I hope you can bear with me. I want to offer some reflections on the nature of insight and what supports the arising of insight. This is, after all, insight practice, vipassana practice.

A lot of times people come and say, "So where are the insights already?" There's a real sense of struggle, of looking for something, waiting for something, practicing in order to acquire. So let's look at what is actually the nature of insight. What are we talking about when we talk about insight?

In the suttas and also the commentaries, three levels or three types of knowledge are spoken of, all of which are valid and useful when we know how to use them together.

The first level or type is what you could call information—in Pali, suta maya paññ̃a, that which is heard, that which is learned. This is important; we need the right information to begin to do anything, to support us in what we're doing.

The second level, called cinta maya paññ̃a in Pali, means really using that knowledge with our intelligence through thinking, reflection, and contemplation. This is also extremely useful and helpful. The information isn't just something that's retained without any meaning, but rather we've really reflected and contemplated, coming to have a deeper intellectual understanding of it. Cinta still means using thought.

Now, for many of us, that thought level, that reflection level of cinta maya paññ̃a, presents a challenge. Either we've grown up basically thinking that this is how you learn everything, so we're really stuck there. Then we come to practice and see that we're stuck there, so we start to hate that level and think we don't want to contemplate, we're not supposed to think. Both of those, of course, are exaggerated reactions. To understand how to use thought, reflection, and contemplation with accurate information is very helpful.

The third level, bhavana maya paññ̃a—where bhavana really means mental cultivation—is the level of insight, of insight knowledge, of deeply understanding what is true.

You can see in this way of delineating three different levels, three different ways of understanding, that insight knowledge is different from thinking about, contemplating, or using our intelligence. We often think of insight as either some experience to get or some kind of knowledge or information that we acquire, understand, and can hold on to.

But I like the translation of sammā diṭṭhi as "right view." To me, it's quite literal: viewing accurately, perceiving accurately. It's not holding some idea that everyone else agrees with, but actually perceiving in a moment things the way they are. This shift of perception is one of the ways I like to describe insight, and it's been very helpful to me. It's not a result of thinking.

You all know those moments—you could call them "aha" moments—where suddenly you just perceive something from another angle, in a different way. You didn't get there by thinking about it, though of course we think about it afterwards, which is fine.

So it's some knot or tangle or view in our mind—how we're looking at something, perceiving an experience without even knowing it—that somehow unknots. And it's, "Oh!" You're trying to solve a problem in life, and suddenly you see it from a different angle. That's a moment of insight. It's a radical shift of perspective that then may have an effect on our mindstream, on how we understand, and on how we respond to situations. It doesn't mean that moment of shift of perspective stays that way. But it's opened another door, another way of perceiving that maybe we didn't even suspect was possible. And it can change everything.

A very simple example that I like to use—no example is ever quite full enough, but this gives a sense. You know those Magic Eye graphic drawings? They have whole books of them, just different colored graphic designs. If you look at it long enough in the right way, suddenly out of this graphic design a specific image will spring out, appearing like a 3D image. What was just graphics and nothing special suddenly becomes two hockey players, or a dinosaur, or a flying saucer.

How do you do that? You can open the book and say, "I want to see the dinosaur." It doesn't work. When you first try to do it, we're trying, we're looking, we're trying to see—and we don't see it. In fact, my mother, bless her, could never see those things. It used to make her so crazy because she'd keep trying. "What's in that one? I can't see it, I can't see it." And she'd get tighter, tighter, tighter. Does that sound familiar?

And how does it work? When there's a steady attention—you can't look away and look back, look away and look back. It has to be a steady, connected attention, but relaxed. Without trying, without looking for a particular thing. Just relaxed, steady, focused attention, without any wanting, without any assumptions. And suddenly—boom—there's the dinosaur.

Now, what I find interesting, the way it relates to Dhamma insight: the dinosaur was always there, right? This shift of perception didn't make something be there that wasn't there. Did it? Or did it? I don't know. Don't believe me. But then when we stop looking in that way, it goes away again, and there's just the graphics—red and yellow, whatever it is. But having seen that, we know there are at least two different ways of perceiving that particular flat piece of paper and colors. And if someone else comes and says, "No, you're crazy," you don't have to get upset about it. You know there are two different ways.

So it doesn't have to stay. The insight doesn't mean it has to stay that way. In fact, it won't stay that way all the time. But seeing that there's another reality, maybe a more accurate way of perceiving—that's the "Oh, that's what impermanence is like!" That's "Oh, that's how I could solve this problem." You all know this, right?

And part of our problem is we then think it should stick, it should stay. Because of course, even though, as I said this morning, we talk about impermanence, really we think, "I've had one insight, I've seen it—okay, that's it." You've seen through that personality pattern, well, maybe a hundred times by now. Aren't you convinced? It's enough already. It should go away. You've seen how painful craving can be, and I'm sure more than once. Sometimes on some level it can keep being a surprise that we get caught again, because there's a sense that once we've seen it, we're finished.

Or else there's the fear that if I really perceive the impermanent, unsolid nature of everything, every moment—how am I going to function?

If I really perceive that there's no intrinsic, unchanging, self-existent being here, how am I going to be able to find the bathroom when this ends? I'm not going to be able to function in the world.

But that's what's kind of cool about the way insight works. Both levels of reality, if you will, are still perceivable. It's just that mostly we've been going through our life only perceiving in the one way, not even having a clue on a deep level of what other perceptions are possible. If there are only two—though there are many millions.

So we can't hold on to the actual perception of insight. As soon as we start trying to hold on, the clinging in the mind tightens everything up. As soon as you try to hold on to seeing that dinosaur, everything just clocks back into how it used to be.

But it has an effect. That clear seeing has a deep effect on our mindstream. And we trust it. We know it. This is really what we call verified faith. We know for ourselves, this is how it is—even when that's not our perception.

I know for myself that one way of perceiving this body is as a completely fluid arising and passing of moments of sensation, with no shape, no boundaries, no self at all. I know that. Is that my experience right now? Definitely not. It's really very solid, all too solid, all too here. But I know this is one perception, and that reality is not bound up in or limited by that perception.

So it has a very strong effect. Something has changed. With each moment of insight, our views, our assumptions, our unconscious description of ourselves and reality is not quite so fixed. And there might be more of a possibility to respond appropriately in the next situation.

Now, of course, when an insight arises like that, often a huge amount of energy comes with it. It's quite natural, and nothing's wrong, that then the mind tends to think about it, describe the insight, explain it, connect it with things in the past and the future. To some extent, that's fine—that's just normal.

But it's helpful to keep aware of the energy and the thoughts, and notice when it's turned from the useful quality of wisdom, of reflection and contemplation, where the thoughts are really in service of understanding the insight better—and when it shifts to just energy spinning. If you're paying attention, you can feel the difference. "Wow, yeah, everything's impermanent! Oh wow!" It starts to get disconnected, the energy is all over, you're actually not perceiving impermanence at all. You're just spinning. "Oh, that was an incredibly neat insight! How can I explain it to my friends? Let me get on the email..." Wait a minute. What's happening now?

So the thing with insight, that aha moment, just like anything, is to be fully present with it. Notice the effects. Notice how it affects the mindstream. And let it go.

I mean, it's going to go. It's already gone. Letting it go really is a misnomer. We talk about letting something go that's been gone forever. How long? Let go of the idea of thinking it's still here, and wake up again in this moment.

In terms of insight, of course, this can happen with anything. In terms of the Dhamma, it's all in support of what the Buddha said: he taught suffering and the end of suffering, dukkha and the end of dukkha. One of his proclamations, one of his ways of describing that, very familiar to all of you: "The supreme state of sublime peace that has been discovered by the Tathagata—namely, liberation through non-clinging."

That state of heart and mind, a moment of citta, that in that moment is minimally free from clinging, but also supported by mindfulness, by perseverance, by energy, and by samādhi, by collectedness of mind. Those are the three particular supports I want to talk about tonight.

But a moment of insight—that sudden seeing differently—is only possible in a moment of mind that is not clinging, that doesn't already know what it's looking for, that doesn't already know what it wants. There's a great line from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Nothing of value can happen to the mind that knows exactly what it wants." Hard to trust that, though, isn't it?

In terms of our practice here—and I know people are doing all different forms of practice, and that's fine—one place where this sense of non-clinging, of trust, of seeing how this quality of insight arises, is to recognize that it's not dependent on having a particular experience or situation. It's not that insight is only the deep, deep opening into anattā, and anything else is just some little nothing, unimportant. The place where we can see clearly how the mind works, how suffering is created and how it's released through clear seeing—that kind of insight can arise with any experience as its object.

Now, we get a little highfalutin sometimes and really down on ourselves when our experience isn't subtle enough, when we're spending our time spinning out in our personality patterns. Well, the spinning-out part isn't so helpful. But when the main object of our meditation through the day is sometimes our historical personality patterns, we think, "Well, I've got to get over this to get to the possibility for insight, freeing insight."

I've got to get to subtlety. But the insight can reveal how the mind works in all kinds of situations, anything through the day.

One example I love: a woman told me this on a retreat a few years ago. It was a two-week retreat in a pretty crowded room in another country. It was set up sort of like this, except the door would be behind me and no door there. A really crowded room, and she was at the back, having an extremely restless, uncomfortable sitting. She was sleepy. She was tired. Her body was physically uncomfortable—not like pain, but that restlessness and jumpy legs and unpleasant feeling, which she was very aware of.

She just couldn't stand it, so she stood up. Well, once she was standing, of course the thought came: why don't I just leave? That would solve the problem. The problem is I can't be here with this unpleasant, restless mind and unpleasant physical sensations. And the only way to fix it, to get rid of that suffering, is to get the heck out of here.

But because it was so crowded and not with good pathways... social embarrassment often keeps us staying with something long enough to actually see it in a different way, which is what happened to her. That's what the structure of retreat can be helpful for. We don't just run on our habits. The only way out of unpleasant? Get the heck out of here. That's what we know.

So she stood there. And then because she didn't feel comfortable to leave, she started paying attention. And all of a sudden—just that simplicity of steady paying attention, being mindful of what was there, instead of just thinking, how can I leave? How can I leave?—she said, okay, what's happening? Unpleasant sensation, aversion in the mind, and suddenly: oh, it's just uncomfortable sensation. What's the problem?

You can't talk your way into that. You can't really think your way into that. And you can't make it happen again when it's happened before, as I'm sure you've all tried. But we can when there's just that steady mindfulness that let go of the clinging to wanting it different, that let go of the view—probably unspoken in her mind—that the only way, only freedom from this suffering is to get rid of the unpleasant experience. She was able to just rest at ease in the arising of that unpleasant situation. Oh, uncomfortable sensation is like this. No problem.

She told me this because it was really a huge insight for her, really very liberating. And you see, that kind of liberation is not really about just liberating one from the unpleasantness of the moment. It's so easy to slide back into the almost subconscious idea or view that freedom or liberation basically means getting away from that which we don't like. And then that which we don't like becomes the problem. We get into struggle with that. And then our whole practice becomes how to get rid of this so I can experience some insight. Or maybe you don't even want insight—maybe you really just want to only have pleasant feelings. Good luck.

So, in terms of the possibility of insight arising, I just want to make this point again: it can arise through any experience. You practice, and you'll know this. Those of you who've been here for some time or who will be here for some time might see how the practice can go in so many different directions. Sometimes each retreat has its own flavor. Sometimes if you're on a long retreat, just as you're settling in and thinking, ah, now this is how it's going to be—it's pretty calm, I'm just with the breath, there's not much emotion, and now I've got the sense of it—

And suddenly, from out of nowhere, something happens—or nothing happens. Just some memory comes up and you're thrown into really deep-seated and painful historical personality patterns. And you think, "Well, this is hindrances. I just need to get rid of this, get back to the breath, and get calm again." And we're caught in the struggle. "This is in the way of my practice. I came to this really refined retreat center for a couple of months to experience subtlety, to experience calm, to finally get somewhere in my practice. If I just wanted to spin in my stories about my childhood and being hurt and how much I'm striving and how worthless I am, I could have stayed home and done that very well at home."

You know the drill. It's easy not to trust that. But it doesn't matter. It doesn't matter. It's not about getting past anything.

Insight arises into seeing how the mind and heart work to create suffering in this moment when it's seen accurately—whether that's seeing impermanence, whether those personality patterns come and go due to conditions. We don't need to fight them or hate them or own them. We stop struggling and just see: "Ah, it's another arising experience. I can see why this personality pattern arises. I know my whole history. It comes up in this situation. When it comes up, there's fear. Fear feels like this." Mindful. And it goes away. And then it's lunchtime and I'm hungry. That's the next thing to notice.

Huge liberating insight can arise from just being willing to rest at ease in our old familiar personality patterns. Often they come up not about the past but in relationship to the meditation experience itself. And this is often where we see them really deeply—our patterns of striving, our patterns of discouragement, our patterns of not even realizing we're trying to make a certain thing happen until we've hit our head against the wall for three months and realize it's not happening and something finally lets go. "Oh, that's what it's like to relax." We can't make it happen. But in any context, it can happen.

There are many examples. This one I'm making up from another retreat—no one here said this. Just so, in case it happens to match your experience, you don't have to feel like I'm using your story, because I'm not using anyone's story. But where someone is just feeling, every time they see somebody, a huge aversion at the way someone walks or at a particular behavior that person does. And maybe noticing the aversion and trying to work with it—which means maybe noting it, trying to feel it, or maybe more likely judging it, or trying to pretend they don't feel it, or trying to send mettā, or all the different things we do that sometimes work to get rid of the aversion and sometimes don't.

Until finally there's that moment of, "Oh, aversion's like this." You feel it, and unbidden comes a huge and really deep rush of compassion, of connection—a sense of that person, the sense (of course it's a projection, but the felt sense) of the suffering that would lead to such behavior that's driving you crazy. And in that compassion, there's no driving you crazy. It's connectedness. It's non-separation. It's just so clearly a truer way to be in the world. It's not even about me and other anymore. That's a huge insight that arises quite spontaneously through the willingness to be present with something that we think we should be beyond by now.

That's just one of a million examples. I don't have to give more. I want to talk a little bit about what supports this arising of insight. There are many things. As I said, I just want to briefly touch on sati, samādhi, and viriya—mindfulness, collectedness, and energy. The meditation aggregate of the Eightfold Path, you could say. But there are other things that also support insight arising in different situations. I'm not going to go any more into it tonight because there's not enough time. But remembering that the insight is in the service of understanding suffering and what leads to the release of suffering.

Suffering is based on confusion, on delusion—on recognizing inaccurately and responding inappropriately in ways that we think will make us happy, but that actually increase our confusion and delusion. That's samsara.

A big part of our habit, and I've already alluded to this quite a few times, is that we tend to look outward—to the content of our experience, to the subtlety or grossness of our experience, to the depth of our experience, to getting our practice to match a certain idea. If we came to cultivate one-pointed concentration and what we're getting is something different, it's so easy to fall into thinking, "I can't progress, I can't cultivate wisdom and insight until I get it back in line with the idea I had." It's so easy to look outward, thinking a better object will give us deeper insight.

But insight has nothing to do with the object.

Our whole practice is really about the purification of heart and mind, isn't it? The definition of a completely awakened being is one in whose heart and mind there's no more arising of greed, of hatred, of delusion. And all the various techniques of our so-called meditation practice—but really of our life of spiritual awareness, not just meditation practice—all the different skillful means exist to incline our mind more towards non-hatred, non-greed, and non-delusion, rather than reinforcing the habits of wanting, the habits of dislike or fear, the habits of delusion. Delusion shows up as either not knowing what's going on, or else imputing everything that's going on to being about me—two forms of confusion.

So our practice isn't about getting the correct object. It's not about trying to see the object more clearly. It's not about looking out at what's happening at all, but about learning to recognize and trust. This is where awareness, mindfulness itself, is our indispensable support and tool—recognizing the quality of the citta, of the mind itself, in any one moment.

We may not be arhats—probably we're not. It's only imagination, perhaps, what it would be to live without greed, hatred, and delusion. But for sure, we all experience many, many moments of heart and mind, of citta, of conscious awareness that are not colored by wanting, not colored by hatred or fear, not colored by confusion or fogginess or making everything revolve around me.

We may not notice those moments so much. We may tend to notice the greed, the confusion, the aversion more. That's okay—the noticing of it is also mindfulness. The real problem is when we not only don't notice the moments of pure heart and mind, but we also don't notice the moments of kilesa, of the afflictions—greed, hatred, delusion. Then we're looking at experience through a conscious moment that's colored by that. Colored by wanting. Colored by "it's all about me." Colored by fear. And when we don't recognize that our consciousness is colored in that moment, our perceptions are off.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya has an interesting way of talking about this that I like very much. He uses very down-to-earth language. He says the quality of the mind is matched with the object that it recognizes. In other words, insight comes to the deserving mind. I know that feeds into "I'm good" and "I'm bad," so try and throw that away. But what he's saying is really interesting: a mind that is colored by kilesa—by greed, by hatred, by confusion—that we're not recognizing, that moment of mind, of citta, that moment of recognition will observe through the kilesa. And so that mind, he calls it kilesa mind, will only see concept, will take the concept to be reality.

So when that woman was standing and feeling like she couldn't stand it—thinking her problem was this unpleasant feeling and the only way out was to get away from it—that's taking the concept to be reality. When I'm sitting and there's a burning sensation in my knee and I think, "My knee is killing me, I can't bear this another moment, and that's just the way it is"—that's kilesa mind taking concept to be reality.

Now, concepts are useful. But taking the concept to be reality—that's what the Buddha talks about in his inverted perceptions. There are three, really four, where we see what is changing, what is impermanent, and we perceive it as permanent. We perceive what is not satisfying as being satisfying. We perceive what is dukkha as being reliable, as not dukkha. We perceive what has no intrinsic self-existence as being me or mine. We actually perceive the world this way. And it really seems true, right? We know that it seems true.

And we may have the heard information that everything's changing. We may have the cintā mayā paññā, the level of reflection and contemplation, where it really makes total sense—we really do know everything's changing. We wouldn't have an argument with someone who said, "No, everything's not changing." We'd say, "No, it's changing." And we've even had insight on the third level of the constant change, but the insight comes and goes.

So in the moments when there's delusion, not seeing accurately, when there's some clinging to sense of self or wanting stability or comfort—and this clinging can be on a subtle level, we don't even know it's there sometimes because we're looking out—that's when we perceive permanence. And that's seeing concept.

The second level, what he calls vipassanā mind, I would call a mind with clear mindfulness. Just a moment of awake mind, awake consciousness. There's mindfulness, there's energy, and there's not greed or wanting, and we're not telling a story about me. In that moment, then we see things the way they are. We can see the concept, but we also can see underneath it, recognize. I'm just using "see" as a way to talk about all different modes of perception with all the different senses.

So he says vipassanā mind, without greed, without hatred, without delusion, observes things as they are. And that's a moment you could call vipassanā mind, a moment when insight is possible.

So what supports that? Again, I've talked about mindfulness and what I mean by it—you all know what mindfulness is. I'll just say very simply, that power of a moment of awareness, in a moment of consciousness, knowing what's happening without assumption or judgment or comparing. That willingness—it really just feels like a willingness to be. As Ajahn Sumedho says, his language is so great: "Oh, it's like this," whatever it is. Resting at ease in whatever arises. Oh, burning is like this. Fear is like this. Discouragement, thinking my practice is no good—thoughts are like this. Discouragement feels like this. Subtle, subtle sukha is like this. Mettā is like this. Words of the mettā just spinning, spinning, spinning in my mind and feeling aversion—is like this. Memories from my past—is like this. Whatever.

That quality of mindfulness brings that sense of trust and freshness to whatever's arising. Not looking for anything, but as Ajahn Sumedho likes to say, awareness receiving experience. No clue what the next moment's experience will be. As soon as there's a sense of leaning into what we're looking for in the next moment, there's a little subtle wanting there, a little subtle judgment. It's like all the freshness, all the openness, all the mystery snaps shut.

It's fascinating to explore that. Fascinating. And then we get interested in it, because even that's just another moment of wanting, and awareness snapping shut—it's like this. There's nothing that awareness, a moment of mindfulness, cannot be present with.

And so when we get, at times, kind of caught up in seeing the kilesas, the defilements—I don't like that word—the afflictions, seeing greed, seeing how much aversion there is, seeing how every second thought is about me, we can actually get reactive to that, thinking, "Oh no, it's hopeless." Or we can just bring mindfulness to that. Oh, wanting feels like this. And in that moment, the wanting is simply another arising appearance. Aversion is just another arising appearance. The sense of self, another arising appearance. No problem. Nothing awareness can't be with.

So that's the mindfulness. I'm just very brief on these three, because each of them is like three whole talks. The mindfulness, and then the way I want to talk about viriya tonight in this simple context, in this really broad context—viriya in the sense of energy. It's not a physical energy, it's a mental energy, but viriya in the sense of gentle, patient persistence. Really the aspect that we often talk about in our practice as continuity.

But try not to jump when you hear "continuity" to thinking that means I have to be mindful every moment, and if I'm not, I'm not continuous, and therefore I'm a failure. I don't mean that. But the intention, the willingness to just—every moment we wake up, no matter what you're doing all day, twenty-four seven—to just show up with mindfulness for this moment.

Relaxed yet persistent awareness.

This is really huge because it's this continuity of awareness that allows a natural momentum of mindfulness to begin to develop. You know how, as you practice, at first it's remembering to bring awareness to this, bring awareness to this, bring awareness to this—and it gets easier, right? You've all experienced that it does get easier. I'm not saying it stays easier, but it gets easier. And there are times when that momentum actually takes off on its own and you don't feel like you are putting in any effort at all.

It's the steady, gentle continuity that allows this momentum to happen. And it also allows the opportunity to be here for the completion as a whole process unfolds, where we actually might see—this is what allows insight to arise—see a process begin, go through all its moves, and actually end. See the effects of that process. See the causes of that process. It's only continuity of awareness that allows this aspect of reality to present itself.

So in terms, for example, of anicca, these vipalasas, these inverted perceptions that the Buddha talked about—take anicca. It's kind of the most obvious one: seeing permanence where there is no permanence. Even though we know the mind is doing that, it's still so difficult to see through. Because the habit of imputing permanence and the perceptions of imputing permanence are just so deeply habituated that it's easy to miss the impermanence.

And one of the really strong supports for the insight into impermanence—for all the insights—is the continuity of awareness, the steadiness of awareness. We don't have the conscious power, would that we did, to decide "Now I'm going to see impermanence." Or "Today I'm going to work on anatta, and by this evening I will be perceiving moment-to-moment arising and passing away of all phenomena." Would that that worked! I'm sure we've all tried it one way or another. It doesn't work. "Now I will move into deep samādhi. I have the deep intention not to move from my breath." Good luck.

It takes effort, but not the effort of striving. Not at all. When I'm talking about virya here, I mean patience, persistence, the willingness to keep showing up—this moment, this moment, this moment. But virya in terms of wise energy is patience. You really have to see what's the attitude in the mind that's feeding that energy. And this is where we so often get into knots in our life and here in our meditation practice.

Again, this is the way Tejaniya talks about it because it's very simple. Wise virya, when it's coupled with mindfulness, when it's coupled with a moment of mind and heart that isn't fed by, colored by confusion, wanting, or greed—and it's actually really simple to notice if we remember to notice.

So when this energy of gentle, persistent patience, willingness to be with what is, whatever is—that's real virya. That leads to continuity. When we have enormous energy, we're pulling it up, it feels like resolution, it's really strong willpower, you're here for every moment—but you check. And all that energy trying to focus, trying to see clearly, when you really look: what's feeding it? You see that you're wanting something particular to happen. You're expecting something particular to happen, or you're looking for something.

One thing I've seen myself do a lot—and I even think I'm just being mindful of whatever's arising, whatever arises is fine—but I need to see it more clearly. Behind that needing to see it more clearly, I spent a whole retreat discovering: wow, that's nothing but craving. I thought I was completely choiceless, whatever arises, but "see it clear, that's not clear enough." Lots of virya. Wise virya? No. Craving.

Ah, that's craving. Craving is like this. Unclear is like this. And there's no problem. That's the insight.

That's the release of suffering in that moment.

Or the reverse. We're bringing up all our commitment and we're kidding ourselves. We don't quite let ourselves see that we're being with this experience to make something stop happening—to get rid of something. Okay, pretty clear. That's aversion. That's dosa.

Or confusion. Well, confusion—we forget to check because that's the nature of confusion. At one level, the basic level, you don't even know what's going on. You don't know what mindfulness is being with. You don't know what awareness is with. Okay, that's confusion. That's moha, delusion.

But also, the more subtle and even deeper level of moha is making it about me. What's happening is either me or mine. Wrong view. That's another level of confusion that will lead us into one of the other two. Because it's me or mine, it either needs to get better or it needs to go away. So you don't have greed or aversion without confusion. You can have confusion without greed or aversion—just like, "Duh, I don't know what's going on."

So this quality of virya—not trying to make things turn out the way you want them to be, but this total willingness to be totally present with this moment, every moment, without expectation—that's an enormous and amazing power that leads to the steadiness of awareness that actually allows us to see through these inverted, these confused perceptions about sense of self. Which is a great place to see it: ideas we have about ourselves, ideas we have about our practice.

A story I tell a lot. A friend who was a cook—well, she cooked a lot, she used to cook a lot at retreats—and she was known by herself and by her friends as being, quote, an "aversive person." A lot of anger, a lot of critical mind. And so she came one day and was saying to the other cooks what an aversive personality she has. And they were all going, "Yeah, it's true, you really are." Even though that was her sakkāya-diṭṭhi, her personality view, it was still a little demoralizing to have everyone agreeing so fervently.

So she came to one of the sittings on the retreat—it was just a one-hour sitting. She told me this later and said she sat down. She'd done years and years of practice. So she sat down and said, "Okay, I have this view: I'm aversive. I'm just going to be present moment by moment by moment with everything that comes up"—watching her mind, watching her emotions, watching her ideas.

And she said it was fascinating. She said, yeah, quite a few aversive, critical thoughts came up about herself, about others, about what was arising in the moment. She said, but that was maybe only ten percent. There were plenty of generous thoughts. There were moments of love. There were lots of times of calm and concentration. There were moments of all kinds of stuff. She said, how come she picked those ten percent of aversive thoughts—and they weren't all in a block either, you know—and said, "That's who I am"?

What allowed her to see through that was just the mindfulness and the virya in the sense of patient, persistent willingness to be here, be here, be here for whatever's arising, without judgment.

That quality of virya—and one other definition of virya I'd like to add—is courage. Courage meaning not shrinking back from the difficult. It's actually one of the commentarial descriptions of virya: not shrinking back from the difficult. You know, we kind of go, "Ah, that's too much." That moves into sloth and torpor, actually. It's just a little too hard. But virya—that doesn't mean get out a hammer and hit what's happening.

It just means that willingness to be here. So mindfulness supported by virya is not discriminatory, not choosing "I'll be with this and not with that." The steadiness of continuity is what allows for deeper aspects of reality to reveal themselves.

I read a line by Colette recently where she said, "Look long at what pleases you, and even longer at what pains you." I like that. I just feel like if you add "and also at what you don't notice as being pleasant or not," it becomes a lovely description of mindfulness—non-discriminatory, non-hierarchical, just what's happening now.

And the steadiness of virya and the steadiness of mindfulness, when they start to get that momentum, cultivate and turn into samadhi, often translated as concentration. But here again, in this broader context, I want to talk about it not only as the kind of absorption-focused, one-pointed deep samadhi. That's often what we think about when we talk about concentration.

In all these years of talking to people who meditate, I couldn't even begin to say how often—out of all the qualities being cultivated in the practice, all the experiences, all the insights—how much people pick out this one factor of concentration. And I'm using the English word on purpose because it has all kinds of connotations for different people. How often people come in and say, "My concentration isn't good," which tells us basically, as a teacher, nothing except that the person is judging. That's about all it tells you. Or "My concentration is good"—that also tells you very little. Good compared to what? Bad compared to what? And why is that the one thing we single out?

I'm saying this because often concentration is thought about only in terms of absorption, in terms of deep one-pointedness. In this level of samadhi that I'm talking about, in terms of feeding insight, it isn't always necessary for that deep level of one-pointedness. Samadhi is also translated as a stability of mind, a collectedness. But the collectedness can be a steadiness, a stability that doesn't fall into reactivity with whatever's arising—that steadiness of awareness on objects that can be changing with greater or lesser rapidity.

The Pali word that Mahasi Sayadaw used was khanika samadhi, momentary samadhi. In terms of the mindfulness and that gentle perseverance of no matter what's happening through the day, it cultivates quite naturally the steadiness, a peaceful, relaxed quality of mind, but one that is stable—stable in that things don't throw it off so much. You can feel it. It takes a little longer to develop because you can't develop it by forcing. And so just that moment to moment to moment to moment. After a while, the mind becomes non-distractable in that nothing is a distraction; everything can be included.

As Ajahn Sumedho says about mindfulness, mindfulness is the point that includes. This quality of samadhi is a flexible, light, stable quality of mind that just isn't thrown off. It's not fragile, it's not brittle, it's not heavy. And when we do get thrown off, it comes back really quickly.

Just a quick example: I was practicing with U Tejaniya in Burma, and in his meditation center there's not silence. People can come up and talk to you, and you're practicing in a very open way with just whatever's arising, not deliberately focusing on any anchor at all. I was doing walking meditation and just being with whatever, and someone came up to me and started talking. I'd been there long enough that at least I didn't get into aversion. It really takes us Western heavy-duty vipassana meditators a little bit of time to get over the sense that my practice is being bothered when someone comes up to talk. So I was past that. They came up and talked. I turned and talked and then went back.

And very interesting—my mind actually was more present and settled after the talking rather than less. I really got this sense of this flexible yet stable, non-distractable quality of samadhi that develops.

These qualities of mindfulness, of this flexible samadhi, and of continuity, persistence, patience, that steadiness of awareness—these are qualities that allow for this non-clinging shift of perception, what we call insight, to arise.

I'll just end with a short quotation from Francisco Varela, the scientist: "The purpose of calming the mind in Buddhism is to render the mind able to be present with itself long enough to gain insight into its own nature and functioning."

Just learning to be present with our mind, no matter what it's doing. Wisdom arises by itself. We don't have to create it—in fact, we can't. If we can just trust the steadiness of awareness, wisdom arises by itself.

It's actually a huge relief.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment, and then we'll close with chanting together.

CHAPTER 50

Anything Can Happen: Faith & Confidence in Awareness

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> Drawing inspiration from the unexpected fall of the Berlin Wall on its 20th anniversary, Carol Wilson offers a profound exploration of saddhā (faith/confidence) as understood in the Abhidhamma. Rather than faith in something stable or known, she presents saddhā as the active quality of "placing one's heart upon" the present moment—a willingness to trust awareness itself amid the mystery of not knowing.
> Wilson examines how our background assumptions and personality patterns create a cage of familiar suffering, and how we habitually return to these constructions rather than resting in moments of natural peace and ease. Drawing extensively from Ajahn Sumedho's teachings, she suggests that liberation isn't about getting rid of anything, but about shifting our refuge from personality to awareness. She references Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching on "Nibbāna for everyone"—those ordinary moments of coolness when greed, hatred, and delusion are temporarily absent—suggesting these occur far more frequently than we notice.
> The talk addresses a key obstacle for Western practitioners: the tendency to doubt our own insights and moments of freedom because our personalities feel so solid and believable. Wilson encourages practitioners to investigate the simple arising of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings that underlie our complex stories of self, and to develop confidence in awareness that doesn't require understanding, achieving, or landing anywhere—just being fully present with what is.

Tonight, today, it's all over the news—the 20th anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall. It's been all over the news and all over Europe. They're celebrating it. And I remember, and this actually touches me deeply. I don't know why. I was never even at the Berlin Wall. But I remember the time when that happened. Twenty years ago, we were in the middle of teaching a three-month retreat, so I remember it really clearly. And the sense of it being so unexpected, so unknown, how it just kind of happened all of a sudden and actually by chance, as we find out now.

So in honor of that, I want to talk tonight about the reality that anything can happen. I want to talk about faith and confidence in the mystery of unknowing. Because we don't know.

It turns out, I just read this now, that the night they took away the restrictions and people started just going across, it hadn't been planned at all. The East German government hadn't planned it. There had been a lot of demonstrations for days, and the government was shaky, and the leader had been taken out. But a spokesman for the government was speaking on the radio, and they heard it in East and West Berlin. He said, without realizing that it wasn't true and he didn't have the authorization, that the travel restrictions were going to be lifted on East Berlin and West Berlin people going across the wall—that you could go across. When the interviewer asked when, he said immediately. It turned out he didn't have the authority to say that at all. But everybody heard him on the radio, and that was it. They just all ran to the wall and started going back and forth, and that was it. That was the end of it. So you never know. You never know. It's just so amazing.

That's what I want to talk about. Saddhā, the word in Pali that we translate as faith or confidence—it is, in the Abhidhamma manual of mental states, the first of the beautiful mental factors in the list of all the beautiful mental factors. We tend to think of faith in the normal English way of speaking, of having faith or confidence in something particular—in a person, in a belief system, or in knowing something is true, some kind of stable, static thing or understanding that we can rely on and have faith in. And of course, that's not the meaning of faith at all.

Saddhā is, as all mental factors are, active, changing, arising and passing in a moment. It has the characteristic of placing faith, or one of the translations I like—I don't know how accurate it is—of placing one's heart upon. It's really this active quality. It manifests as confidence, as resolution, as the energy to do, as Sayadaw U Pandita likes to say, as non-fogginess, to set forth as one might set forth to cross a flood. These are all things I'm reading from the manual of Abhidhamma.

So it has this energy, this brightness. It has the function of—now I'm talking for myself—uplifting and brightening the heart and mind. That's really the quality of faith. It's easy for us to think of it as an intellectual investment in something to give us stability and safety. And it does give us stability and safety, but not in something. That's the way I want to look at it tonight: the sense of a quality of confidence, but not in a deluded way.

This is where we come into how the Buddha often spoke about practicing his teachings as if to swim against the flow of the stream of society and culture, or against the flow of the stream of our own so-called personality, habit patterns, ways that we think. And this is where it gets really interesting, where really anything can happen, where we don't know.

How we perceive and think about things—sort of what I talked a little about last week, about insight being a shift in how we perceive an experience, and that shifts how we think about it. But how we think about the world and ourselves, how we perceive, is so often taken for granted. We're so used to it that we don't even notice those inverted perceptions I talked about, where we perceive what is in constant flux and change as being stable and solid. And that's just so normal—normal because habitual—that we don't even think about it. We don't even recognize what the ideas are, the views, the constructions, the explanations that are sort of in the back of our mind, the way Ajahn Sumedho likes to talk about. What are the ideas working in the back of the mind that are actually guiding the way we experience and describe our life, ourselves, and our practice?

We all generally operate in the world with a sort of accepted understanding of things: that things change, but only later; that of course there is a self; that if we can get more pleasant things, we'll be happy; that I have a certain personality—whatever our beliefs are. And awareness practice, our awakening practice of just exploring what's happening, what's arising and passing in this moment, is very much a stepping outside of our comfortable—comfortable because familiar, maybe not even pleasant, but familiar—stepping outside of our comfortable views and explanations and understandings of the world.

And not stepping into another one that we're creating. Years ago, I was with Poonjaji in India for quite some time, and he used to always say, "Pick up your foot and don't put it down again." I used to think, what the heck is he talking about? He meant pick up your foot out of one construction and don't put it down in another. Can we just have confidence in that mystery of not knowing—that alive, awake, vibrant, fragile moment?

So just to give an example of how the way we're used to thinking, the ideas in the background that we don't even know we have, how they color our perceptions, let me tell you a little story.

I was in Burma last winter with several friends. We were traveling to two or three different nunneries and monasteries and offering some food, some dāna, to villagers who were still suffering from the cyclone of the year before. And as you do in these situations in Burma, you take a lot of photos. There's always a lot of photos of giving and receiving—it was a whole big thing. So when we got back to the monastery where we were staying, two of the friends, both Western women who were nuns, one of them put her photos from her camera on her computer.

This woman had been a nun for many, many years in Burma. So even though Western, she had absorbed Burma's very faith-based culture. And by faith, I mean faith in the teachings of the Buddha, in the cosmology as it's described in the suttas—different realms of celestial beings and human beings and suffering beings. That was really working in the background for her.

So she put her photos on the computer. There were a lot of them. But several of them, more than one, quite a few, in the same kind of locations, had these really perfectly round, brilliant spots that look like spots of light on some of us, right on some of our bodies. And I just kind of said, "Oh, that's interesting." And this woman said, "Oh, those are devas." Not like maybe or I think—that's what it is. She went and showed the Sayadaw.

Then our other friend, also a nun, but with a scientific background, a very scientific mind—immediately she said, "That's a little kind of moisture that collects on the lens and it's just refracting the light."

And I thought, well, who knows? I don't know either one. It will be interesting.

So I got home here and put my pictures from a different camera in. And in the same scene, but the pictures were different, these same kind of spots of light appeared in different ways. And I thought, hmm, who knows?

First, I just love that space: Who knows? And notice how our mind likes to come down somewhere.

Then I told this story at IMS last month, and it got to be quite fun because it engendered a whole kind of—not exactly debate, but different experiences. One guy who works over there immediately said, "Oh, there was another photo this summer from a Vipassana teacher meeting in England." And of many photos, this one photo was sent around on email of three people, three of the teachers who were kind of directing that day. One of them was Ajahn Sumedho. And on him, there was this exact same round, bright spot. The people sending the email around asked, "Well, what could this be?" I just didn't go there. I just left it alone. But later, he said, "Oh, that often happens in photos of him."

So I mentioned that, and then this friend who works over at IMS said, "That's ridiculous. That's not devas. You just have to look in that photo—you can see there's a glass of water, and the light's refracting off that water. That's what it is."

I said, "Okay."

Then Kathleen, who works here, said, "I've got to show you my photo of all the devas in this grove at Sayadaw U Tejaniya's." And she brings me a photo of what looks like the Jeta Grove or something—all these trees, and it's kind of dark, and there's all these monks and people, and there's these spots of light all over the place.

And then, just to top it off—I know I'm going on, but I'm enjoying it—just as it happens, the scientific-minded friend happened to be visiting for a few days recently.

And she told me, "I don't know, I may be coming around to the deva view." Because she had just been in Tiruvannamalai, which is Ramana Maharshi's ashram. She was there on the August full moon, when a few Indian pilgrims come to walk around the mountain. A few—like two and a half million. I'm not exaggerating. Two and a half million people walking around that mountain. She said it's completely solid, wall-to-wall people around the whole mountain the entire night. It's a trip. India is so much fun. That's just a few people showing up in India.

So they did that, they walked around the mountain. And then she said, "I just went out and took some photos. There were no lights. There was nothing you could say was refraction." And when she looked at the photos, they were all over the place—these orbs everywhere.

So who knows? And I love that. Can we just rest in that space? That vibrant, open, connected space that doesn't have to land in explanation and knowing. It doesn't have to shut any doors. There might be one explanation that's accurate, but that's not really what's important. It's that quality of awakened, connected interest that doesn't need to limit the experience by knowing what things are.

This is really the opening into confidence and faith—not faith in some explanation, but the confidence and trust to be able, at times, or willing, to open into that vibrant place of unknowing. Which means to be able or willing to be just totally here, to place one's heart upon reality as it's manifesting in this moment, without ever knowing what's next, or without needing to have a whole explanation about it.

As Ajahn Sumedho says—and I'll be quoting from him quite a bit from this one article, if I can find it... I put it somewhere special so I could find it again. Here it is.

"Awareness is not about making value judgments about our thoughts or emotions or actions or speech. Awareness is simply about knowing these things fully, that they are what they are at this moment."

It's radical, but just at this moment, things are as they are. Awareness is just putting one's whole being, really—energy, whatever you want to say here—without needing to evaluate, to judge, to self-reference, to understand.

So it's really helpful and interesting in our practice, as we keep noticing moment after moment what's happening, to recognize the ideas, the views, the self-judgments, the expectations, the assumptions that are working in the background, so to speak. I think this is why Sayadaw U Tejaniya puts so much emphasis on the right attitude or having the right information. What I'm saying here is: let's just notice what information we're believing, what information we're using to drive the bus, where we're trying to take it as if we even know. Because that's going to skew our perception. It's going to skew what we're trying to make happen. It's going to warp things if we're not aware.

We can be aware of the views—that's fine. Of course we have views and opinions and explanations. That's not a problem when we just know it. But when we don't recognize them and take them for the truth, that's when we're running up against the brick wall.

So this is actually a kind of skillful attention with thought. When you feel that you're struggling, when you feel you're in confusion, when your practice doesn't seem to be going well, or you're feeling like you're failing, or you're feeling discouraged—you might just stop and actually look, for a bit, at the content of the thoughts that are feeding that mental state. The thoughts that are convincing you, that are giving you such good evidence that you're basically a loser, that you're doing it all wrong, that it's hopeless.

Instead of just saying, "No, bad, I know that's not true," sometimes say, "I know it's not true, but let's see actually what it is that's not true. What am I believing here?" Just for a short time, that kind of skillful investigation of thought can be quite interesting.

Sumedho gives the example of something like: we believe "I'm someone who grasps and has a lot of desires, a lot of aversion, a lot of self-judgment, and so I have to practice in order to get rid of these things. I have to practice in order to stop grasping. I'm somebody who has to do something to become enlightened in the future."

You could probably agree with that, right? Just notice what we might be thinking, without needing to construct a new belief in its place.

It's all here right now. Just watch the mind that does that—the sense that somehow reality is somewhere else, freedom is somewhere else. We have to do something to get there, or we have to get rid of ourselves to see it, or whatever the heck we have going on back there. Just notice it.

It's also interesting to me looking at how language both can show us our limiting views and ideas, and can also reinforce those limiting views if we're not really aware of it. I've used this example before, but I read a book about nonviolence sometime, and the interesting part that stuck with me was the author talking about the use of the word "nonviolence"—or in Sanskrit, ahimsa—and how in that word "nonviolence," the operative word is violence. The "non" is like a negation of this thing, violence. So in "nonviolence," the main thing your mind goes to is violence.

He gives the example: What if the only word for war were "non-peace"? Doesn't it just shift things? "Oh, there's non-peace happening in Zimbabwe now." And you get a sense—maybe it doesn't do it for you, but for me there's this sense of—what if the norm is really other than what we've been assuming? And we don't even know what we've been assuming. It's where the attention gets drawn. In nonviolence, the attention gets drawn to violence. In non-peace, the attention gets drawn to peace.

So in this possibility of having confidence in the unknowing, in the not needing to land, just hold the possibility that rather than "I'm someone who has to get rid of the kilesas, the defilements, in order to reach nirvana"—and it would seem to be true from our experience that greed and hatred and delusion and the hindrances, that's the norm. Of course we have to struggle to get rid of them. And we may not buy into nirvana being somewhere else—we may believe that pure mind and heart, the nature of mind, is here. But really, we think, I can't experience it very much. I know it's here, but I'm still hopeless and can't get there. Even if it's here, I know it's here—I still can't get here. I'm somewhere else, whatever.

But just what if we could imagine shifting the paradigm? Just imagine that really the natural peace and ease of mind and body is the norm, is the truer, more real experience. What if we're just so not in the habit of noticing that we absolutely don't notice? Not that there's something else to do, but that we could actually learn to shift our refuge, to shift where we really have confidence.

And of course we can't do this by willpower. I'm just saying this as a what if, okay? What if? Don't land in any "this is how it is." But just what if our path is not to get rid of anything—not even to get rid of our so-called false sense of self—is not to change our personality, but simply to discover, rediscover, a shift of refuge, a shift of interest, a shift of what we really place our confidence, our heart on. A shift from fighting with or having faith in all the difficult aspects, the so-called me, me, me, to just actually recognizing and trusting natural peace and ease.

No big explosive experience am I talking about. Just what Ajahn Buddhadasa calls—and it's a little playful—he calls it "Nibbana for everyone." Ajahn Buddhadasa was one of the most famous forest monks in Thailand in the last century. He died in the nineties. I spent some time there when I was a nun, spent some time with him. He liked to be a little bit poking, a little provocative for Thailand. And so in one article he's talking about how nibbana in Thai means "cool." He's saying that nibbana, or freedom, liberation, the liberation of non-clinging—he said it's the coolness that results from the extinction of the defilements. Defilements are greed, hatred, and confusion, right? Greed, hatred, delusion.

And so he says, where there's this extinction of the defilements, there's what may be called nirvana, whose meaning is cool. And then he goes on to say that of course, if you look at greed, hatred, delusion, they're mental factors. They are compounded—the sankharas, compounded things. And so they come into being through conditions and pass away through conditions. In other words, they're just as impermanent as everything else.

And impermanence, remember, doesn't mean that things come into being and last a long, long time—your whole life—and then go away when you die. No. Impermanence means arising and passing in every moment. To the mind that wants permanence, that's shockingly scary. But to the mind that's simply present—wow, this moment's arising and passing.

It's like someone was telling me they had looked at one of those slow-motion time-lapse videos of a flower growing and blooming, and how you can see from nothing the stem comes up and it's slowly growing, and there's the leaf and the flower, and then it's decaying. There's never one moment that's static, and there's never one moment you can say "now that's the leaf" or "that's the flower." Each moment is a death and a birth, a death and a birth. That's impermanence. And opening into that is always a mystery, because no matter what we think we know, we never know what's going to happen.

No one knew the Berlin Wall was going to come down that night. No one knows what's going to happen in the next moment. Every time we sit down or walk, you never know what's going to happen the next second in your mind, do you? We like to think we do, for good or for bad. We like to think we know. We hate it when we find out we have no control. But if we could just say, "Yeah, I don't have to have control. It's just exhausting trying to control this anyway." We just dance in the flower, growing and dying.

So he says the defilements are rising and passing like anything. And since the defilements, when the conditions aren't present, become extinct—although this extinction is temporary, maybe even momentary—in other words, the coolness takes place temporarily, he says this phenomenon has the real sense of nibbana, even though it's not the lasting one. A real sense of coolness. And I like that—just, it's cool.

He says the fever of the defilements—anyone can see that if the defilements (and I know that's not such a great word, but think of greed, hatred, and delusion, confusion, me-ing about everything)—anyone can see that if they were with us all day and night, every second without ceasing, who could ever stand it? He says under such conditions, living beings would either die or become insane. And he's not exaggerating.

So let us consider well, he says, these periodical moments of coolness—what he calls nirvana for everyone—these moments of what I would call purity of heart and mind, citta that's free in any moment of greed, hatred, and delusion. These moments happen many, many times in a day. He says we survive because of the nourishment of these moments of coolness, of nibbana. This is the nourishment that keeps beings alive in terms of the mental realm. We couldn't stand it otherwise.

So just notice when we have periods—mentally—of feeling relaxed, refreshed, cool. No matter what's happening. It's not about what's happening. It's just that quality of coolness, non-burning from greed, hatred, and self-delusion in the mind. Perhaps that's much more natural than we give it credit for. We're just so interested in all the stuff that we don't really stop to notice. It's not whoop-dee-doo enough. It's not great enough. It doesn't, for one thing, in any way reaffirm me. And that, in some ways, might be the biggest habit we've got going at all.

So let's say our practice, then, can become re-recognizing, rediscovering, and learning to have faith, to place confidence in these simple moments of coolness—in the awareness that allows the recognition of these moments of coolness—no matter what's happening in the mind or the body. It doesn't matter. And as well, a lot of our so-called practice also becomes, with this awareness, as Ajahn Sumedho mentions, not judging, not making up value judgments, noticing the assumptions, the stories, the ways that we get sidetracked and confused again when we don't notice or trust at all the natural ease and peace of body and mind—and get reabsorbed, re-caught up again in sense experience: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking and emotions, making up a big story of me about any of it.

This is also, in a way, a doing. It's a way of looking. As I said in an interview the other day, it just came into my mind—Master Sheng Yen, who was a wonderful Taiwanese Chan master who just died this January, really a wonderful man. He said one time that our meditation practice is an illusion, but it's an illusion that we use to replace our other illusions. So it's not to say that sitting and looking and watching the thoughts and emotions is something fixed—that's also just something happening. It comes and goes and changes, nothing to hold to. But that illusion replaces our other illusions. It's like the Buddha said: his teachings are the raft across the stream. When you get across the stream, you don't need to keep carrying the raft on your back.

But we use it. We know how to use it. So our practice can become that—rather than a thing in itself to succeed at, or a thing in itself to achieve the result of getting rid of ourselves or anything. Just awareness.

Ajahn Sumedho—I've done a few retreats with him, and I've found his way of talking, just very simple but quite profound, has been very helpful to me. One time he was meeting with a few Spirit Rock teachers, and he was talking about things he'd noticed in teaching Westerners. He was speaking about how strong our belief is—Western educated people in particular—because I suppose he did a lot of his practice under Ajahn Chah in Thailand. He speaks Thai. He taught Thai people for many years.

But he says that we—well, all of us—we create ourselves, our sense of ourselves, with our thoughts, over and over and over. We're creating who we think we are. And we can't create a peaceful self. You can take that as a challenge. See if with our thoughts we can create a peaceful self.

What he says, and it certainly seems to be true in my limited experience with myself and people I've talked to, is that for us, the thoughts and stories about our personalities are so central, so strong in the way we view ourselves, in the way we construct our background assumptions about life, that everything becomes so personal. Such a sense of me is just succeeding or failing—everything's about me.

Ajahn Sumedho said that in his experience, he sees the biggest hindrance for Westerners in terms of awakening, in terms of trusting their insights, is self-doubt—self-doubt in their own insights and liberation. I would say self-doubt into these moments of coolness. The fact that this is even true—I can't say how many people I've talked to who say, "Well, I had this experience ten years ago or yesterday, but now everything's back. The personality's strong. I really doubt it. I'm the same jerky person I was. That couldn't have been true."

He thinks that Westerners doubt this because our personalities are so strong and believable. We give so much emphasis and so much belief to our personalities, our thoughts, our ideas about ourselves, that we get so caught back into them. That's actually where we put our confidence—in our personality. We may hate it, but when the chips are down, what do you really believe? What's the voice you're really believing?

There's just peace, just isness, just the rain falling and the crickets and the tea and your back hurts—and it's just this, and there's no reference point, and there's no me. And then "I" come rushing back, and my back hurts, and why can't I be with it? I could before, and now I can't. Which do we believe? "That was a nice moment. It was an aberration. This is now—back to what I know." This is where we're comfortable. And we are comfortable. It's like putting on an old cloak, and it stinks, and it has holes in it. We don't like it, but it's just so comfortable. And at least I'm here in it.

It's really interesting how to just trust in that not knowing. To even see it's possible not to take our personalities so seriously.

An example—I don't know if it works for you, but to me it illustrates different ways of holding. Gen was in Burma helping to teach a retreat with Sayadaw U Lakkhana. He teaches in a strict Mahasi style where you're noting every moment of experience. This was a retreat for Westerners, but the man translating was a Burmese friend. Sayadaw was saying that when fear arises, or when anger arises, you just note it: "Fear, fear, fear." And in three notes, it'll go away. And the translator was just translating. Later, when the Sayadaw wasn't around, the other teacher and I would do questions and answers. One of the participants raised his hand. He said, "It doesn't go away when I note three times."

And we said, of course it doesn't. It doesn't always go away when you note three times. The approach we would give here is that you just explore.

So then Ulamang said to me later, privately, "Oh, I was so interested to hear what that man asked, and what you said—that it's not how Sayadaw says, and it doesn't go away. And it was very helpful what you said."

And I said, "Well, what about you?"

He said, "Oh, it doesn't go away for us in three notes either."

I said, "Well, what do you do?"

He said, "Oh, we just say, 'Oh well, never mind.'"

I thought, well, that's refreshing. We laugh, but that's like—it couldn't appeal to us. The teacher said this is how it's supposed to work, and I do it, and it doesn't work. Oh well, never mind. Not so likely for us, because we're so caught up in getting at our personality. It's just really interesting.

But not holding to the assumption, not being caught back into our personality, doesn't mean denying it or hiding it or not believing in or not seeing those thoughts. It just means being aware.

This is Ajahn Sumedho again. He's talking about non-grasping. And he says, you know, it can just be another statement that we grasp and hold on to—non-grasping, liberation. And how often do people say, "Oh, I'm letting go of this, I'm letting go of that." I'm highly suspicious, I have to say—and in my own mind too—of the phrase "letting go." If I'm letting go, forget about it. I'm not letting go. I'm throwing it away because I don't want it. That's different. Just letting be with awareness. It's going to go by itself, whatever we do.

So anyway, he says there's the catch-22. No matter how hard you try to make sense out of non-grasping—"I should not grasp"—you end up in total confusion because of the limitations of language and conception. You have to go beyond language and perception, and the only way to go beyond thinking and emotional habit is through awareness of them. The way to go beyond them is into them with awareness—through awareness of thought, through awareness of emotion, through awareness of the body, without value judgment. Without making a "me" out of it.

The island that you cannot go beyond, which is being used as a metaphor for Nibbāna, is the metaphor for this state of being awake and aware, as opposed to the concept of becoming awake and aware. So saddhā—faith, confidence—is really the confidence, just in a moment, to be awake and aware, no matter what's arising in this moment. It just doesn't matter.

We use these thoughts about ourselves, these stories, our personalities—and they seem so fixed, so solid. As Sogyal Rinpoche said one time, we've created a cage for ourselves out of our emotions and our sense of personality. And here we sit, day in and day out. Doesn't it feel like that sometimes? Just sitting in this cage of emotions and personality.

But the thing is, it can feel like we're sitting here only because we're not noticing how thought is recreating it over and over, and this is the assumption that we're taking to be true: "I have to get out of this cage." And as Ajahn Sumedho says, the way beyond is simply awareness in. This emotion is just like this. This thought is just like this.

And another assumption—and this you all know, but I just want to point to it again—is that really, when you break it down, maybe not to the absolute bottom line, but when we start really looking, when I start looking at the thoughts and storyline of my personality and my past... but really it's all happening right now. When I look at the personality patterns that catch me—meaning I'm suffering or reacting or not liking or wanting or whatever—no matter how complex the story may become, when I notice how it begins in a moment, I'll say almost always (just because I'm leery of ever saying always), it comes down to the movement of lobha, greed, in the mind, or of dosa, which is some form of aversion or fear in the mind, and some form of confusion. There's always confusion when there's greed or dosa in the mind, although there can be confusion without greed or dosa—confusion in the sense of delusion.

And so often that simply starts up from an experience of pleasantness or unpleasantness or neutrality that isn't noticed. And that is so simple and basic that it almost feels too simple, embarrassing even. There's no way my whole complex suffering personality could just be reactions of thought to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral.

Excuse me, but I don't want to break down the whole human experience to just that—surely there's much more than that. Okay, so that's a thought. That's a concept. Never mind. Just explore and see. It's fascinating.

So you all know this, but we can just start noticing again how I'm in some whole story about me and feeling good—I had this wonderful interaction with this person, and blah, blah, blah. And I tune in, and there's just a memory of a conversation, and this pleasant feeling comes up with it. That's it, folks. Pleasant feeling coming up. Yes, me. It fulfills me. It reaffirms me. It's all about me.

Unpleasant, just the same. Of course, it can be something as obvious as a physical pain, a thought that comes up, a memory that has an unpleasant connotation, an unpleasant feeling with it. Something even so subtle we hardly notice it. And from that, into a whole world.

I'm not at all meaning to belittle or dismiss our really deep and profound traumas and personality habits and memories. Sometimes they come up too strong to notice at their inception. You can't say, when you're having huge post-traumatic stress, "Oh, it started from an unpleasant. Let me just notice the unpleasant." The energy of the emotion has gotten way too strong by then. So often we can't notice on this level.

But on a retreat, when you're here for a long time, there will be times you can notice on this level. And then it's really interesting.

I've seen for myself certain habits that brought up a lot of fear and suffering over my life. And now when they start to come, when I start to feel that primal terror, I can say, "Oh, I recognize it." Whereas before I'd go into the stories about the past, or what do I do about it, or what's wrong with me, or I've practiced all these years and this is still coming, and my practice is no good and I need to do some other kind. Now it's just, "Oh, primal terror. I can feel it. It's unpleasant. It feels like I'm going to die." That's it. That's all. It's a feeling. It's an emotion. Vedanā. It comes and goes, and I know that. I know that. That's all that's happening.

And when we don't see that—which is a lot of the time—then it goes into the stories and something about me. Whether it's pleasant or unpleasant or really neutral, it somehow morphs into, "What does it say about me?"

And that sense of me is just so reaffirming. Often—maybe not often, but sometimes—when there is that sense of just the coolness, just the is-ness of things, or in a particular experience that's maybe been really difficult but there's a strong sense of me, a strong personality pattern, and I suddenly see, "Oh, it's just this, just unpleasant fear feeling"—it can feel so odd, so unfamiliar, that we're kind of at sea. We don't know what to do. And we're not so comfortable.

This is, again: can we be at ease in that not knowing?

Part of how our sense of self reconnects, comes back so strongly, why we buy back into the personality so completely, is because we're in the uncertainty of, "But if I'm not this fearful person, who the heck am I?" We may not even say that, but that's the feeling. So back again. Better this loser than... nothing? And we go off into that fear of the unknown.

So this entrancement with our thoughts, with the stories, with sense of self—it's so deep that "good" means it's pleasant. It's so back there, so embedded in the stuff that's working in the background, that if it's painful, scary, unpleasant, it's wrong, it's bad. No way freedom can be here with this scary, unpleasant experience. If it's pleasant? Well, then I'm really on the way. The more pleasant it is, the closer I am.

And neutral? We just don't notice.

But the other aspect of neutrality is making it all about me, this sense of self. And so this cycling, this needing to land somewhere over and over and over—this is really samsara. It's the creation of a sense of self in every moment. It's not some solid, steady-state thing.

And when we start to have the faith to shift the refuge—to shift the refuge from the seeming comfort of the patterns to the willingness to simply say, "Okay, I don't know what's happening now," to just surrender into this moment—it takes faith. It takes confidence. It takes a willingness to trust.

Two things I want to read. One from Thich Nhat Hanh: "Understanding does not arise as the result of thinking." If only we could believe that. "It is the result of the long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding."

In this way, he's talking about understanding not as a piece of conceptual knowledge, but as that confidence, that trust. And as he says, the long process of conscious awareness—just meaning the surrendering of conscious awareness into just now, over and over and over, with no goal, with no "so that," with no conscious awareness in order to understand. That's already too much. Just dying into this moment. And it takes trust. It takes learning to trust.

Tsoknyi Rinpoche again: "The principle of an awareness that you can't get beyond—it's very simple, very direct, and you cannot conceive it. You have to trust it. You have to trust the simple ability that we all have to be fully present and fully awake, and begin to recognize the grasping and the ideas we've taken on about ourselves, about the world around us, about our thoughts and perceptions and feelings. We have to trust. There's no way we can think our way into it or do our way into it or remember our way into it."

Every moment is a moment requiring active trust, surrender, opening to this moment. This is really what we call confidence in awareness.

And it's hard because of our discomfort with not knowing, because of how deeply habituated we are to what seems like a need for self-affirmation. We want to know that we're doing it right and getting somewhere. "I'm just being aware every moment, but I'm not getting more concentrated. I'm not having huge insights. I'm just being aware as I'm fluffing around all day." It's really hard to trust. I'm not saying you should just fluff around all day, but... you can if you want, as long as you're aware. You can fluff around all day and watch your mind. That's okay.

Because through the long process of conscious awareness, reality is already real. It reveals itself. We don't have to figure it out.

It's hard because of the unreliability, the untrustworthiness of everything we take to be self. This is from Mae Chee Kaew, a nun in Thailand from the last century, supposedly an arahant—I mean, who knows? No one knows. You can't know. "Everything that makes a person unique changes continually and eventually disintegrates. Each personality is constantly ceasing to be what it was and becoming something new."

Notice that it doesn't cease and become nothing. It's ceasing and becoming something new constantly. "Those factors one tends to conceive of as self are impermanent and fleeting. Everything about bodily form and the mind's thoughts and feelings is without intrinsic stability and bound to dissolve. For that reason, clinging to body and mind is a major source of pain and suffering."

And when we're just trusting in that, there's that freedom, that wakefulness of this present moment awareness. But when there's the clinging, that's scary, that's uncomfortable. Everything we conceive as me is in constant change and flux, and we're not used to hanging out in that not knowing. The habit is to look for something. And what we tend to look for is to go back to the assumptions, looking for stability, looking for what feels comfortable.

Even Ajahn Sumedho, again in this conversation with the teachers, gave an example that really touched me.

I don't know if I can convey it accurately, because he's always talking about absolute trust and confidence in this awareness, no matter what. When he uses language like "fear is like this, pain is like this, sense of self is like this"—that phrase "is like this" really means awareness receiving. And there's nothing that arises that cannot be received in awareness. Nothing. It's radical.

So he's always talking about this. And for how long has he been doing this? Thirty years? Thirty-five years? He described one period at his monastery, Amaravati, some years ago. He's the head abbot of the whole community. It was an extremely difficult time interpersonally with the monks and the nuns. There was all kinds of difficult stuff going on, and they were having meetings. It was one of those horrible organizational dukkha kind of times. And he said it went on and on.

Being the head abbot, he was of course the focus of a lot of the blame and criticism and judgment. He said it was really, really hard for him. Because, he says, like most people, "I really want to be appreciated. I want to be loved and respected. I don't want people hating me and blaming me and pointing the finger." And he said it really started to get very difficult for him. It went on for some time.

And then suddenly, he realized it was this faith. He said, "I just made a resolution, a very clear resolution. I absolutely determined—I made a determination to trust awareness and not my personality."

I just love that. So strong. Because trusting his personality was getting sucked into "oh no, this is too hard, I can't do it." An absolute determination to trust awareness. And that doesn't change the dynamics of what's happening interpersonally. But it completely changes where he put his refuge, the whole experience—the fact that freedom really is available here and now.

That's that quality of saddhā. To me, faith is kind of like love. It's a sense of putting my heart onto the present moment. The way it feels to me, it's like living in the heart of life instead of a little bit removed, trying to reorganize it the way I want or figure it out. Just die into this moment just like it is. No reservations, not needing to understand. Byron Katie calls that loving what is.

So I'll just end with this, one last quotation from Ajahn Sumedho:

"As one begins to realize or recognize non-grasping as the way, emotionally one can feel quite frightened by this. It can seem like a kind of annihilation is taking place. All that I think I am in the world, all that I regard as stable and real, starts falling apart. And this can be frightening. But if we have the faith to continue bearing with these emotional reactions and simply allow things that arise to cease—the emotional reactions to appear and disappear according to their nature—then we find our stability not in achievement or attaining, but in being. Being awake. Being aware."

CHAPTER 51

Silence of the Non-Reactive Mind

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this Forest Refuge talk, Carol Wilson investigates the profound silence that emerges when the heart-mind ceases its habitual reactivity and fabrication. She introduces the Pāli term atammayatā—non-fabricating, non-concocting—as pointing toward a state where the mind remains independent of greed, hatred, and delusion, no longer constructing any sense of self in relationship to perception.

Drawing from Ajahn Pasanno and Ajahn Amaro's anthology 'The Island,' as well as teachings from Luang Pu Dun (a disciple of Ajahn Mun), Wilson presents a striking reformulation of the Four Noble Truths: 'The mind that goes out to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering; the mind seeing the mind clearly is the path.' She traces how paṭicca samuppāda operates through sense contact, vedanā, saññā, and mental proliferation (papañca), showing how quickly pleasant or unpleasant feeling triggers perception and the elaborate construction of self, other, and world.

The talk examines three sources of papañca—craving, attachment to views, and māna (conceit/comparing)—with particular attention to how deeply conditioned the perception of 'wrong' or 'bad' becomes linked to unpleasant vedanā. Wilson encourages practitioners to find willingness to rest in confusion and unpleasantness rather than fabricating escape routes, suggesting this openness reveals the stillness of non-fabrication and genuine connection with all life through compassion.

So yesterday I found myself musing about silence, stillness. It was just such a lovely day when I would walk out of here in the morning and be looking outside, and I got that reflection back of the silence.

I really mean not external silence. And I don't mean the silence of deep samadhi, or of no thought exactly, but that silence of the non-reactive heart and mind. That stillness, that peace when the mind and heart is not concocting something, is not picking up something—any perception—and making something of it. I just kept musing about that quality of silence.

Yesterday I was reading in this book called The Island, which is a great book—a new anthology by Ajahn Pasanno and Ajahn Amaro where they put together basically all different sutta references and many other references pertaining to Nibbana in any way. It's very well put together, a great compilation. I was reading a particular chapter about a word that I love: atammayata, which basically means non-fabricating, non-concocting, non-identifying. It's really, in some ways, the state or non-state when the heart, the mind is independent—not affected by greed, hatred, or delusion. That pure state of heart and mind is not involved in concocting any sense of self or any sense of anything in relationship to any perception.

Of course, in the highest, most profound level, that's Nibbana, freedom. But this is also following on a theme I was talking about last week. We can explore what that silence means in our own moment-to-moment experience—not to pick up anything, not to make anything of anything, but not to try and stop experience. Even more, we get the chance to explore how the concocting and fabrication happens, to observe the process. Sometimes it's even quite possible to observe the process of fabricating without actually fabricating anything around it, if that makes sense.

A couple of different people have given me examples in the last two days of seeing a perception and a whole amount of anger coming—a whole pattern that they're used to, that they've seen a million times—and the whole thing's going, and the heart-mind's just watching it without being involved. You get a sense of your personality running its show, but the mind's just observing: "Oh yeah, it's like this," and it just bubbles up and disappears. It's quite possible to do that, so we can explore.

I love this passage from The Island. It's from one of their Thai teachers, Lungphu Dun, who was a disciple of Ajahn Mun. It's his way of re-describing the Four Noble Truths. Just take it in terms of this mind constructing and making suffering.

He says: "The mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering. The result that comes from the mind going out in order to satisfy its moods is suffering." So that's the second truth and the first truth. "The mind seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering. The result of the mind seeing the mind clearly is the cessation of suffering."

I just love that. Very simple, but I could really feel it—that way of putting it: the mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering. And the effect that we experience when the mind and heart goes out and constructs a whole mishigas in relationship to its moods—that's suffering. Probably we wouldn't argue too much with that second one, that that's suffering. But just to explore that sense that it really feels like the mind reacts to something, goes out, creates the whole story, creates the world, creates suffering.

So how does that happen? That is the exact definition of this mental proliferation, or papañca. This is from the suttas:

Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of these three—eye, forms, and eye consciousness—is sense contact. With sense contact as condition, there is feeling, vedana: pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling. What one feels, that one perceives. What one perceives, that one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates. With such conceptual proliferation, papañca, as the source, the heart is beset by mental perceptions and notions characterized by the prolific tendency with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye—so too with ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind.

So we know that, but that's clear.

Simply contact, seeing arises. With seeing, there comes feeling. It's felt with the mind as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. And feeling and perception come together. What one feels, one perceives. We perceive it as good, as bad, as this or that, and the whole show unfolds just like that. Over and over and over.

What one feels, that one perceives. It happens so fast. We know this—none of this is news to anybody. But I'm wanting to go over it, to explore this really amazing process by which the mind goes out in response to, in reaction to, feeling and perception.

And we all know the reverse. When there's wisdom, when there's mindfulness, just the simple being present with what is, without reactivity, without liking or disliking, when there's wisdom to just see it, the tendency to go out is sometimes consciously restrained. Or if the wisdom and mindfulness is even stronger, the tendency to go out just doesn't arise at all.

That's the heart and mind at peace. That's that sense of what you could call silence or stillness. And when it's like that—what's the problem? Because the tendency to go out and make up a whole story just doesn't arise. Sometimes people say they're almost looking for it: "Come on, where's the selfing in that? The wanting must be here somewhere." And they can make a whole story of that. But without going that far, you kind of look, and it really isn't arising. Pure mind, pure heart in that moment. The stillness of non-fabrication. Beautiful.

Of course, there are many ways to explore this fabrication. I'm just going onto the train my mind was working on the last couple of days, which is on this level of vedana and saññā—of feeling tone and perception—that arise together at the point of contact, that as the Buddha says, feed... Well, actually, that wasn't the Buddha who was saying that. That was Mahakassapa. But the Buddha said, "I would have said the same thing," so it counts.

Every now and then, the Buddha would give a short talk. The monks would say thank you, he'd go away, and then they'd look at each other: "What was he talking about? That was too complicated. Who can we go ask?" And they would go ask one or another of the senior monks, and occasionally a senior nun. Then the whole sutta is this other monk or nun talking. At the end, of course, they all go back to the Buddha and say, "We asked him this, and he said this—what do you think?" And the Buddha says, "Yes, just as they said, so I would have said, so you should remember it." So then it gets into the suttas—if it was one of those. We don't know about the times the Buddha said he was really off. That didn't make it in.

So, to explore the sense of vedana and saññā, and how quickly and how deeply the habit of perception is linked to vedana. This again we all really know, but I keep getting amazed at how deep and subtle this habitual saññā, this perception, can be. When at contact the sight, the sound, the smell, the taste, the feeling, the thought, the mood is pleasant, the perception of it—first we perceive it as pleasant, but the perception is on some level "right" or "good" or "how it should be." And when it's unpleasant, so close is the saññā, the perception, that it's "bad" or "wrong" or "need to get away from this."

We know this, but it's just so deeply in there that so often we don't even recognize it. We may recognize the vedana, we may not. We often don't recognize that perception. And that is exactly where the proliferation begins to take off.

This is from Santikaro, translating Buddhadasa, who used to talk a lot about rising above positive and negative.

So I don't want to talk about being above, but this is just where this language is coming from. He says, "Human beings instinctively feel and perceive—so vedana and perception—experience as being either positive or negative." It's just our deep habit. And so this leads to evaluating and judging those experiences, which turns into liking and disliking those experiences, which in turn fosters craving, attachment, and selfishness—the whole mass of dukkha and misery. The mind that has, as Buddhadasa termed, gone beyond positive and negative, cannot be pulled into this conditioned arising of dukkha.

I don't like so much this language of going beyond, because that feeds into our striving mind. There's somewhere else to go. And right away, we want to go beyond because already positive and negative is bad. You see how fast we go there? "I need to go beyond it because that's wrong." We're right there—in the vedana and saññā, perceiving it as bad, wrong, should change. When we're just not caught one way or the other, not needing to evaluate, that's when there's this non-fabrication, this stillness.

As Buddhadasa says, though, it's such a deeply conditioned habit. Talking to people and watching my own experience, I see how often the mind, as Ajahn Dunn says, goes out in response to moods and creates suffering. How often the trigger for that is the perception of something unpleasant, disliked, or held with the idea that this should not be happening. Usually it's unpleasant. If it's not unpleasant, then it doesn't conform with an idea we're holding of how things should be.

I'm talking about our practice right now, but this is the same as in our life. In practice here, how much of the suffering—the mental striving and trying to fix and reorganize, all the self-judgment—comes from some sense that this should be different, that it's not quite okay? Rarely is it pleasant when the mind goes there, though it could be. But how deeply ingrained is this belief that I can somehow hold myself separate from this unwanted experience, or that this unwanted experience is proof that something's wrong, that I'm bad. Something needs to be different for there to be peace, for there to be silence, for there to be stillness.

Somehow this deep sense arises that peace and freedom—keep looking in your mind because it gets so subtle—somehow comes back to this entrancement with the positive, to use Buddhadasa's language. This subtle sense that liberation is a movement towards more and more pleasant, away from the unpleasant. And when something's going well and it's pleasant and clear, and then it changes and contracts and gets cloudy and all kinds of junk is happening and you can't notice what's going on—well, that's a problem. Now we've hit a problem. Something's wrong because it's supposed to be this other way. That's what practice is about. That's what life is about.

I don't remember if it was the Buddha or Sariputta who said this, but whatever is felt is included within dukkha, included within the first noble truth. Not just unpleasant vedana is included within dukkha while pleasant vedana is down there in the third noble truth, cessation. I don't think so. Whatever is felt is included within dukkha—in terms of unreliable, in terms of not self, in terms of not bringing us any kind of reliable satisfaction. But the habit is so strong.

There's that sutta from the Buddha about the two darts, which I love. He describes how these habits come to underlie our heart and mind. The setup is: if someone has a painful feeling, and the unenlightened worldling—there was a translation I saw that rendered this word, which is often translated as "unenlightened worldling" or "ordinary person," as "thickster." I loved it. A thickster. So when a thickster is touched with an unpleasant sensation, they beat their breast and lament and grieve and wail. It's like shooting yourself with a second arrow. So they experience two kinds of feelings: a bodily and a mental unpleasant feeling.

The thickster, having been touched by that painful feeling, resists and resents it. Then in one who so resists a painful feeling, the underlying tendency of resistance comes to be a habit in the mind. It becomes a habit to resist unpleasant feeling. And under the impact of that painful feeling, one proceeds to search for and enjoy sensual happiness. Why? Because an untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness. Then, in one who enjoys sensual happiness, the underlying tendency of lust, of craving for pleasant feelings, comes to underlie the mind.

One does not know, according to how it is, the arising and ending of these feelings. One doesn't know the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings, doesn't see them clearly. And so in one who lacks that knowledge, the underlying tendency to ignorance as to neutral feelings comes to underlie the mind.

So when he experiences either pleasant, painful, or neutral, he feels it as one who is fettered by that feeling, who is chained by that feeling, simply through not seeing it as it is.

I actually find this personally really poignant—this sense of how deep the habit is when touched by something unpleasant or painful. We get into resistance, and some with the aversive temperament tend to notice the resistance more, tend to kind of muck around in that mental state for a while. But from that, you could say the more desiring temperament or the habit of mind in some is stronger, and it just zooms into looking for something to lust after, something that's more pleasant. And then that becomes the habit that underlies the mind.

As the Buddha says, what the mind frequently dwells and ponders upon, that is how it will naturally incline. And so just this very simple experience that's happening to us with every moment of sense contact—that's pretty much every moment we're awake: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, contact—there's feeling and there's perception. And so often when there's not mindfulness, and sometimes even when we are watching, this speed of concocting moods, our whole story of self and other and past and future, comes to be. Just like that. Just based on vedanā and saññā.

As you know, the three sources of papañca—this is from the commentaries—tend to be craving, attachment to views, and māna, or conceit, the subtle sense of self, the subtle comparing. But you can see, just starting with craving papañca, how we think of papañca as just lots of thoughts coming really quickly, but how really it is that perception and those thoughts are creating our world in that moment. Many worlds, over and over, with every new construction. But this is really the confusion, the delusion that keeps us kind of off balance with the world, with ourself, with what's happening, because we're basically making it all up.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche says: "When our sense organs encounter an object, the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness." So when there's the sound, that sound is the object, your ear works, there's hearing of it. Perception would be "bell" or whatever perception you had. "From then on, as your mind reacts to the object, influenced by all your accumulated habits and past experiences, the whole process is entirely subjective."

And we know this really, if we look at it. When your mind is full of anger, the whole world seems to be a hell realm. When your mind is peaceful, free from any clinging or fixation, you experience everything as primordially pure.

We know this, don't we? Isn't it like that? I can't remember, someone was telling me how they just were having a bad morning—this was wrong and that was wrong. And then you notice the mind was clouded with grumpiness, and then every single thought was something else that was wrong. If we're not really watching that, it really is that the whole world becomes a hell realm. And you walk in the dining room the next morning and it's all so beautiful—the sun, the people, they're so lovely. Everything is primordially pure. That must have been a dream yesterday.

Ajahn Chah is wonderful on this. He holds up a vase and says, "Okay, cup. Look at this cup. You might think it's nice or ugly or indifferent. It's just a cup. It's you who are making yourselves insane. A cup doesn't care." And it's like that with anything.

So right at the point of contact, mindfulness wisdom at the point of contact, at the point of perception and vedanā—that's the fount of freedom, the fount of all wisdom. But it's so easy to miss that point of contact and get completely into this concoction, so quick, so fast. And then the mind flips. We wonder why we're confused.

In terms of this craving papañca, Tibetans have a great saying that craving puts feathers on an object. Craving colors our perception. The thing craved looks so much more attractive. And this is really the way the mind moves away from the unpleasant, from craving.

A few weeks ago, I was talking to someone in an interview, and the person was saying, "I'm seeing craving all the time, but I really want to see aversion. I know I have this aversion, and I can't see it. I want to see aversion." I bit my tongue because I could have said a lot of things, but we kept exploring. We'd come to what work they did, and I asked, "Well, how long do you walk?" Somehow that came up. They said, "Well, I walk ten minutes or fifteen minutes." I said, "Oh, really? And then what happens?"

"Well, then I think of something really much more interesting to do, and I go and do it."

"What happened just in that moment before?" I asked.

"Well, I think, you know, the walking's not so great. So I go."

And as we talked, we could see that in many different areas of his life, as soon as just the slightest unpleasantness arose, the mind immediately created something so much more desirable—which could have been anything, but it was desirable—so that the unpleasant wasn't even noticed. Never mind the aversion; just zoom into desire. And whatever whole worlds that particular desire created, whatever concoction or fabrication.

It's fascinating. As we explored together, he thought, "Oh, wow, that's interesting." And then, of course, I never got to talk to him again. I have no idea if he could keep exploring that or what. But just seeing this—that's exactly the papañca of craving. Exactly what the Buddha was describing: the way the mind avoids the unpleasant and never knows that's what's happening.

So as long as we're seduced by this promise of pleasure, as long as we're seduced by this subtle or not so subtle perception that the difficult, the painful, the grief-stricken, the sad is wrong, bad, a mistake, something to get rid of—as long as we're seduced by the perception of the beautiful being the right way and the other the wrong way—so long we're going to keep being entranced by samsara.

Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche, who is the brother of Mingyur Rinpoche, gave a teaching I heard once—which of course I can't find now. He talked about renunciation as really being what he called weariness with samsara. And by weariness, he didn't mean aversion. When I hear "weariness," my mind goes to aversion, to not liking. But he meant a weariness with samsara that comes from just keep watching the fickleness of vedanā—the untrustworthiness of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—how quickly it changes, and how quickly our mind is seduced by just a moment of pleasantness into a whole mood, into a whole story of us and other and life and past and future and what's going to happen and how good I'll feel and how will I do it and what will they say and when I get home. All of that from just one moment of pleasant feeling. Or unpleasant feeling. Or neutral feeling.

And somehow, when we're not weary in a moment yet with that, there's that promise of, "Yes, yes, this concoction, this fabrication is really how it is. This is really going to bring me to peace." And then we change.

Andrea Levine, Stephen Levine's wife, wrote about how the mind is so untrustworthy. She described eating chocolate cake and the mind going, "Oh, have another piece. It won't hurt you. It's really tasty. Have another piece of chocolate cake. Be kind to yourself." Then you eat the second piece of cake and the mind goes, "I wouldn't have done that if I were you."

And we keep on believing it. We keep not noticing. Just one concoction after the other.

Ajahn Chah has a lovely way of describing how the mind concocts reality. He says we are determining things into existence in every moment—this concoction, this fabrication. The Buddha talks about the tides of conceiving sweeping over a person, being a source of endless suffering. Ajahn Chah writes: "The tendency to conceive, to make things up in terms of self, is the source of happiness, suffering, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This is the worldly mind spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions."

This is what he means: appearances are determined into existence because they don't intrinsically exist. For example, a simple example—suppose somebody wanted to make a marker. They would take a piece of wood or a rock, place it on the ground, and then call it a marker. Actually, it's not a marker. There isn't any marker. It's just something that we've determined into existence through the use of conventional concepts. Very helpful when we know this.

In the same way, we determine cities, people, cattle, everything. We determine these things into existence because intrinsically it isn't like that. They aren't these separate things. It's like having an empty dish—you can put anything you like into it because it's empty. This is the nature of determined reality. Men and women are determined concepts, as are all the things around us.

If we know the truth of determinations clearly, we can be at peace. It's not a problem. We know how to use them, but we need to understand them. Good and evil, high and low, black and white—all determinations. The trouble is that mostly we're lost in determinations. That's the truth.

But when we see that everything arises and then ceases—people are born, then they die; bad moods arise and then they cease; good moods arise and then they cease—we begin to understand. As Ajahn Chah asks, have you ever seen anybody cry for three or four whole years without stopping? The most you might cry is a whole night, and then the tears dry up. In their passing is peace. This is really peace—to be calmed of proliferations, calmed of this concocting, calmed of the burden of self.

Because as the Buddha says, even what the world calls self is in fact unsatisfactory. For no matter upon what it constructs its ideas of identity, the fact is ever other than that. The sense of self is a moment-by-moment fabrication based on contact, vedanā, and saññā in any particular moment. And because the actuality is always other than that, as Ajahn Sumedho says, you can't construct a peaceful sense of self. There's no solid sense of self anyway, and whatever we construct is based on reactivity to moods, to saññā, to vedanā. And we wonder why it doesn't really work.

So how do we—we know this, but in terms of this place of vedanā and saññā—how can we begin and continue not constructing? How can we just be so present that construction doesn't need to happen? Again, what I've been noticing the last couple of weeks is how often it starts from that moment of perception of unpleasant or bad or wrong, and that immediate construction to change, to get away, or to go into and blame oneself. That construction, that inability or unwillingness—or not even noticing—to just be completely at ease, at rest, even in the difficult.

As Joko Beck says, can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the confusion and unpleasantness? And it's true, sometimes we can find a willingness but not the ability. I want to acknowledge this. We can have some really strong concoction come up—a terror, a mood, an aversion, a sense of self-judgment, or incredible lust. And you sort of know what's there. You can say, "This is incredible lust," but that's as far as you can go with mindfulness. The energy of the kilesa, the energy of that mood, is so much stronger than the energy of mindfulness. This happens once in a while. It might happen to you.

So when you notice that, it's also wisdom to see that at this moment—and this is what we call feeding and starving—you're trying to be mindful of the lust, and it's getting worse and worse, and you're about to act on it. You realize, "Okay, too strong." At this point, you really need to change the channel. You need to back off. That's not an unwillingness. That doesn't mean you're a hopeless failure in mindfulness and practice. It means with wisdom you see the energy of mindfulness, the strength of it, just doesn't meet the strength of the kilesa at that point. We've got to choose when to be present and what skillful means when it's time to change the channel.

But often it's not that there isn't an ability—there's not a willingness, or even, as I was saying in the beginning, the perception that "this is wrong" is so deep and unquestioned and maybe not even noticed that we're engaging in a huge fabrication to change, to fix, to get away from, and we don't even know it. We don't even know that's what's going on.

Our mind, as quite a few people were saying in the last couple of days—the word rationalization kept coming up over and over. "But I can rationalize this," or "There's a really good rationalization." Yes, our mind can come up with thoughts and constructions and explanations for anything. My God, just listen to politicians—they can explain anything. And when you're listening, you go, "That's a bunch of crap," right? Now, if only we could listen to ourselves in that same way. As soon as I hear my mind going, "Oh, yeah, yeah, that's really good"—okay, thank you very much. What's going on? What's going on? Come back here. Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in the unpleasantness, to just rest in the unpleasantness?

A French writer, Colette, wrote once, "Look for a long time at what pleases you, and for a longer time at what pains you." It's like that as an expression of mindfulness. Mindfulness, a willingness to be aware, isn't hierarchical. And it isn't choosing which things are more worthy of our awareness than another—whether worthy means pleasant, whether worthy means I think I'll learn more if I look at this than if I look at that.

Worthy means this is what's supposed to be happening, that's not what's supposed to be happening. If I look at this thing that I like longer, it'll get better. If I pretend this isn't happening, it'll go away. I don't know why we keep thinking that'll work. Denial is an amazing force—but that's a whole other talk.

Can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the unpleasant and the difficult? This is a place, I think, where we encounter the deeply inlaid habit of self-judging that so many people carry. It comes from particular personal circumstances. Each of us who has that can perhaps trace in our biographical history reasons why self-judgment or self-hatred, fear of annihilation, being unloved, abandonment—we each have our personal story with it.

But what I keep exploring in myself is how, on this very basic level, this momentary level of experience, the sense of self-judging and worthlessness pretty much only comes along with something that's happening that's unpleasant, or that I don't think should be happening. When I'm feeling really concentrated or filled with love, when my body doesn't hurt, when there's a sense of stillness—am I judging myself? Not so likely. But when that goes away: Oh, what did I do wrong? And then we start judging, because I was so filled with ego about that good thing, and that's why it went away. I could give you ten million examples. You can all make up your own.

But I've seen how much the sense of self-judging is, again, a sign of not really deeply understanding the first noble truth—the sense that bad stuff isn't supposed to happen. And when it does happen to me, I'm a failure. Getting sick, getting old, getting angry, not being able to concentrate, not being able to do open vipassana, not being able to do whatever your mind made up as the way things are supposed to be happening—not seeing that our mind made it up, trying to make our experience fit. It doesn't fit, and that becomes another sign of failure. Somehow not really clearly seeing, as Chökyi Nyima said, the fickleness of vedana, of perception, of samsara, the constant changing nature—as if anything could stay the same. As if, if we get it right, the sense of self will never arise again. And when you think you've really seen through it and it arises again, that's just further proof that you're hopelessly, hopelessly deluded. You might as well just give it up. We land in there, not really understanding.

All my life—well, since I was old enough to read—I always found myself most deeply inspired by reading or hearing about people who have somehow been present in periods of great suffering, either through big cataclysmic events in the world or in their own lives, and have been able to be present with that, to bear witness to that suffering—their own, others', or both—in a way that is both bearing witness to what's happening and yet ennobling. A way that meets suffering with compassion and understanding, without dehumanizing the people who are suffering, the people who may seem to be creating the suffering, or oneself for being in it.

I remember when I was maybe in high school, I compulsively read all of Alexander Solzhenitsyn's work—all of it. The Gulag Archipelago and all of his novels. Looking back, I actually still have it lying next to my bed. When I try to read it now I think, God, this is horrible stuff. How come I was always wanting to read it? Because it's long, and it's a lot of detail about what went on in Stalin's Russia.

But when I think back, it's the fact that—I mean, he had anger; I'm not saying he was like a bodhisattva—but there's a way he bore witness to his own experience and others' experience that kept finding the humanity and the goodness and the decency in people. For him, going through the horror of being in the labor camps actually woke him up more to the depth of life, to the beauty and the suffering, to what life's all about. Instead of just living on the surface, it opened him to depth of connection—connection with life, with suffering, with compassion, with human beings.

There's a way that suffering—I always forget if it was Buddhadasa or Ajahn Chah who said this—there's suffering that leads to more suffering, and suffering that leads to the end of suffering, depending on how we meet it, how we relate to it.

Somehow this has always touched me so deeply. Solzhenitsyn is just one example. Or Martin Luther King, when you read some of what he said about facing suffering and violence and horror and racism and murder, saying: I refuse to become bitter. I refuse. And he refused to turn his back, refused to make anyone else "the other"—being able to be present and awake with wisdom, with compassion, with a wholeness of presence, in the midst of suffering that you don't even want to watch on television. And he's living through it.

So many people like that, in big places, in big events in the world. But for each of us, in any moment, that same possibility exists—that this willingness to simply be fully present for whatever it is becomes the opening into the stillness of non-fabrication, the opening into connection with all beings through compassion.

I know for myself I've seen this a million times, on retreat and off retreat—it doesn't matter. But you have to keep rediscovering it. I can't just tell myself; that doesn't work. I have to really rediscover it from my gut, so to speak.

When I'm going through periods where I start to feel alienated, disconnected, alone—just that sense that something's wrong—the more I'm trying to figure it out, the more disconnected, the more alienated I feel. Whether it projects outward and I start perceiving people as being weird or not acting right, or whether it turns around and goes inward with thoughts like "I'm a hopeless failure," whatever way it goes, that just leads to more alienation. I'll say always—this is an always question. I always find that somehow at the root of that is a trying to avoid, to move away from some difficult, painful, unpleasant experience. It could be so-called internal, so-called external; it doesn't matter.

It could be a huge, unpleasant experience of something going on with my family that I feel helpless to help with, that really triggers a fear and an anger, and I don't want to be with the whole thing. So I unplug my phone so I don't get a phone call, just pretend the whole thing isn't happening. Yeah, that really helps.

Or it could just be something I don't even know what. I just sit down or stop walking. Or if I'm driving, just kind of tune in with my eyes open. Just tune in: What's happening? Sometimes it just comes down to a tightness in the chest. It's not even some huge event necessarily, but just some unpleasant, icky feeling. And the mind and heart is con-cocting a whole fabrication—the whole world is turning into an alienated hell realm—not to feel this. It's not to feel this. You feel and go, "Oh, if I feel this, I'm going to die." That's how it feels.

But you feel it. Not only do you not die, it's like, "Oh, that's just what's happening." The whole concoction stops. Self and other, no problem. Just this-ness. Quite amazing. Quite amazing.

From that, just the willingness to rest in the unpleasant, in the confusing, in the difficult, is the potential for this opening into connection and tenderness with all life that's not based on separation, that's not based on concocting, that's not based on fabrication.

Well, I was going to talk about the other two papañcas—craving being the first—but I think I won't. I'll just mention them. The second source of papañca, the source that feeds the concocting, is our attachment to our views, which I've been alluding to: our views of what's right, of what's wrong, how someone should act, how something should be. You can already get a sense of how far we can go with that. And the third is this māna, conceit, comparing.

We have a couple of minutes, so I'll just give some examples of that, because it's really, really interesting to look at this on retreat, just because you have more time and the mind is a little quieter.

Māna, often translated as "the conceit of self," is in one way really obvious. It's happening a lot; it isn't that subtle. When you start noticing it, you think, "How could I not have seen this?" But on another level, it's really very subtle. In terms of the ten so-called fetters in the Theravada system—the phases of awakening as various torments and confusions are attenuated and released from the mind, so gradually there's less craving, less aversion, not the strong belief in personality—in fact, one of the first fetters that's supposed to be seen through is sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality belief. That doesn't mean sense of self goes away. Māna, conceit, this subtle sense of self and other, is one of the last ones to be seen through.

And so one of the ways this subtle conceit of "I am" manifests is through a grosser or more subtle comparing of the mind. I'm sure you've noticed your mind comparing once in a while. Just better than, less than, equal to. Start tuning into it—it's a trip. You walk into the dining room. Sometimes when I'm on retreat over at the retreat center, I haven't done it for a long time, and when it's really crowded there, I think of the dining room as hell realm meditation. There's just so much going on.

And when the mind is really quiet, not concocting, not reacting, it's not a hell realm. Let's be clear—the hell is not the dining room. The hell realm is in the mind and heart that's reacting, that's fabricating, this concocting.

But how much of that comparing goes on? It's not all comparing, of course. There's other stuff too, as you all know. But just notice the comparing. How do they eat compared to me? How much do they take? How do they walk? How do they sit? How do they chew? They're better than me. They're worse than me. They're the same as me. They're eating more. They're eating less. They come late. They go early. They're so greedy. I'm so greedy. Who's more greedy? It's just endless.

Who sits longer? Who sits shorter? Who walks longer? Who walks slower? Who's that walking by me? Isn't it remarkable how much you have to look when somebody's walking by you? As if it makes a difference. Has it ever really brought peace to your heart and mind when you looked? It brings the peace of the end of craving, yes—it does bring that peace. But we could have that without satisfying the craving too. That's a big insight. But it generally then adds the un-peace of that person, whoever they are, and whatever particular judgment or comparison the mind makes.

So if it's someone slumping by, making a lot of noise, and you finally look and think, "Oh, it's that person I thought was better than me—and look at them now!" Or someone's going so slowly, and you look: "Oh no, it's that person I thought was the one person worse than me, and they're doing better now." And every time a new person comes, you have to reorganize the whole order you've got everybody in.

Comparing is an endless source of suffering. It's a wonderful source of increasing our sense of worthlessness and self-judgment—it's really good for that. It also, in a twisted way, shows the interconnectedness of all of us. Because you can't compare without me and you and them and other. You can't compare all by yourself. There has to be something there. Everything anyone else does affects us, in a twisted kind of way.

But anyway, it's a great practice, a great group practice, a great dining room practice to simply notice. Notice when the mind has zoomed out—just as Ajahn Dun said, zoomed out after a mood and created a whole world based on comparing. See if you're still there, if you can just notice the point of sense contact. Did the comparing start with seeing? Can you come back and just be with seeing? See if you notice whether it's pleasant or unpleasant. See if you notice the perception—seeing, "Oh, they're no good." Seeing, "Wow, aren't they doing well." Seeing, "Oh, I'm no good." Just noticing. Seeing the contact, the vedanā, how it feels, the perception.

Not in order to achieve anything special, but simply to explore and to see if it's possible—and it is possible—to, from time to time, come back to this level of immediacy of experience. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, vedana, perception. Yes, that's happening. Thoughts might come. That's also happening. We don't have to buy into the construction.

And then there's stillness—that stillness of the mind not needing to reference other or self for anything, not needing to reference time, not needing to reference space. No movement to locate, to compare anything. Just the stillness of this right now.

This is the Buddha. He's describing the end of papañca, but he's really just talking about himself: "Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathagata does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight. He does not conceive of something unseen. He does not conceive of a thing to be seen. He does not conceive about a seer."

Do you understand? And he goes through all the different senses. He does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight—the famous teaching to Bahiya: "In the seeing, there's only the seen." There's no seer seeing something. There's not something else somewhere else to go and be seen. There's not someone seeing. There's no visible thing apart from sight, no audible thing apart from sound. He goes through all of it. "He does not conceive about one who cognizes. Thus, whatever is seen, heard, sensed, or clung to is known as truth by other folk, but amidst those who are entrenched in views, one who is thus, like the Tathagata, holds none of these views as true or false."

You don't need to take a stand on the view at all. And this is the end of papañca—the end of resorting to weapons, quarrels, brawls, disputes, recrimination, malice, and false speech. Here, these harmful, unwholesome states cease without remainder.

The end of papañca, as the Buddha says, is the ending of conflict.

Adyashanti has a quote I like: "Self-referencing is the mind's tendency to locate itself. So when it is realized that there is no self apart from the perceiving, then the tendency to try to find oneself in any experience, insight, or concept ceases. I'm talking about a condition where the mind has no compulsive need to understand in terms of ideas, concepts, and beliefs. A condition where you are no longer referencing the mind, feelings, or emotions for security in any way."

So let's just sit quietly for a minute. Nisargadatta Maharaj says, "Just sit quietly, free from the obsession with 'what next.' And in the silence, something may be heard which is ordinarily too fine and subtle for perception."

CHAPTER 52

Ānanda

Carol Wilson · 1h05

In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson shares her deep appreciation for Ānanda, the Buddha's personal attendant during the last 25 years of his life. Known as the 'Guardian of the Dhamma,' Ānanda's extraordinary memory preserved the Buddha's teachings—every sutta beginning with 'Thus have I heard' comes from his recollection at the First Council. Wilson explores his distinctive qualities: unwavering devotion, profound kindness, humility without pride, and his role as a bridge rather than barrier between people and the Buddha.

The talk illuminates Ānanda's humanity—he remained a stream-enterer throughout his time with the Buddha, only fully awakening after the Parinibbāna. Wilson recounts touching moments: his grief at Sāriputta's death, his weeping against a doorpost upon learning the Buddha would die, and his instrumental role in establishing the Bhikkhunī Saṅgha through his advocacy for Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī. The Buddha's admonishments to Ānanda about attachment to togetherness offer profound teachings on the balance between connection and renunciation.

Wilson also introduces several remarkable women disciples—Dhammadinnā, whose teaching appears in the Cūḷavedalla Sutta (MN 44); Khemā, who awakened upon seeing impermanence; and Puṇikā, a slave who taught a Brahmin the true meaning of purification. The talk concludes with the inspiring story of Anāthapiṇḍika, the Buddha's greatest lay supporter, whose dying request to Sāriputta ensured that profound Dhamma teachings would be available to laypeople, not just monastics.

So lately, for some reason, the last weeks or months really, I've been hanging out with Ānanda a lot. He keeps popping up in my mind, in my heart—Ānanda, the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life. And he inspires me a lot. He's an easy way into the human face of the whole period of the Buddha's sāsana.

I keep thinking I want to talk about Ānanda and maybe some of the other people at that time. And I keep not doing it because I think, well, why should I just tell stories? But then I decided, what the heck, I just really want to talk about Ānanda, so I'm going to.

It can happen that we are so seriously practicing in this Buddhist tradition and teaching of the elders, and we hear about the Buddha, we hear about how he gives talks and five hundred people immediately become arahants. It can all seem a little beyond our possibility, or almost enter into the realm of the mythological, even though we're always talking about how Buddha was a human being.

In the suttas and in the commentaries—but more in the suttas—you really can get a sense of the personality of quite a few of the people. And for many, Ānanda is the easiest way into that. He has a very distinctive personality. Quite a lot is known about him comparatively. And to me, he's really quite inspiring.

So I just want to share a few aspects that are probably common knowledge, but they bring me in touch with the human, the alive, the immediacy right now—people just like us. Well, maybe not just like us, but close to being like us, I could imagine.

Ānanda was called the Guardian of the Dhamma, one of the names that the Buddha gave him. He had many wonderful qualities. The one that comes to mind first—when I mentioned that I might talk about Ānanda today, someone immediately said, "Oh great, I love Ānanda." And I asked, "What's the quality you love so much?" The first one she said is the first one for me too: his devotion, his faith.

For the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life, Ānanda was his attendant day and night, every day for twenty-five years. But his devotion wasn't just to the Buddha as a human being. It was really to the Dhamma. The Buddha made the statement that if you see the Dhamma, you see the Buddha—there's no need to see him as a person. And you really get that from Ānanda: his dedication to the Dhamma played out in his love for the Buddha.

He was also a very kind person. He did many acts of kindness, showed much mettā, much integrity. And he liked people. He was, in relative terms, a very social monk—relative to Mahākassapa or Anuruddha, who went off and never wanted to talk to anybody. Ānanda was very friendly, very caring to both ordained and lay people, and very helpful. He was much beloved by lay people and monastics alike.

How he became the Buddha's attendant is interesting in itself, because it really shows his personality. When the Buddha was fifty-five years old, he addressed all his senior monks and said, "In my twenty years as the father of the Sangha, I've had many different attendants. None of them was really quite right. Some little sense of willfulness would become apparent after time. So I'm looking now for an attendant for my last years."

Of course, all the noble disciples—when it says noble disciples, it means fully enlightened ones—immediately offered themselves to be the attendant. Only Ānanda modestly held back. And the Buddha didn't pick any of them. The other monks turned to Ānanda and said, "Well, you should offer." So he did, and the Buddha chose him.

When it came out later and they asked, "Why didn't you offer?" Ānanda said—and this is why his faith was so great—"The Blessed One knows what he needs and he knows who would be the best. What is it for me to offer?"

He will choose what he needs.

And he was always like that—just complete faith and no sense of willfulness or putting himself forward in any way.

So he agreed, of course. He wanted to be the attendant, just like all of them did. And he agreed, but he gave eight conditions. He requested eight conditions from the Buddha, conditions under which he would be his attendant. And these really show both his lack of putting himself forward—he just had no pride, no sense of thinking himself special—and also his love for the Dhamma.

So he had eight conditions. The first was that if the Buddha received a gift of robes, he would never pass it on to Ananda. The second was that the Buddha would never give Ananda any of his alms food. The third, that if someone gave the Buddha a special dwelling place, he would not give it to Ananda. And the fourth, whenever the Buddha received a personal invitation to a special meal, that he would not include Ananda in that. Ananda said later this was so no one would think that he was personally profiting by being the Buddha's attendant.

And then he had four other wishes. That if he, Ananda, were invited to a meal, he asked for the right to transfer the invitation to the Buddha. If people came from far away to see the Buddha, he asked the Buddha for the privilege that he could always lead the people to see the Buddha when they came to look for him—which is, I think, a lovely thing. If he, Ananda, had any doubts, any inquiries about the Dhamma, he asked for the right to ask the Buddha at any time. And if the Buddha gave a discourse during Ananda's absence, Ananda asked for the privilege to have the Buddha repeat it to him privately. Since Ananda wasn't going to any of the meals the Buddha was invited to, where he would always give a discourse, the Buddha must have had to repeat a lot.

But this last one is very significant, because another thing about Ananda was his incredible memory. The reason the Buddha repeated all the discourses is because Ananda remembered them all word for word. So when you read the suttas, how many of them start with "Thus have I heard"? That's Ananda. Every one that begins "Thus have I heard"—that's Ananda after the Buddha died, at the first council, recollecting the sutta, the talk that he heard the Buddha give, and then reciting it. I know we can't even remember the seven factors of enlightenment. He remembered them all.

So the first four conditions were so he wouldn't benefit, but the second four were so that he could truly fulfill the duties of his post in order to serve all beings.

And so for twenty-five years, day and night, he served the Buddha. At the end of the Buddha's life, he said, "For twenty-five years I served the Lord with loving deeds, loving words, and loving thoughts. When the Buddha paced to and fro, I paced along behind."

And it was really like that. His duties as attendant were myriad. Part of it was just being present, taking care of the Buddha's physical needs—washing his feet, helping him get a place to lie down, making sure he had food. He was like a social secretary, organizing all the different things, making sure people could come and see him. He often served as a go-between, when lay people would come to Ananda and ask a question, and he would go to the Buddha.

One of the beautiful things I always think about in reading how he served this role—because he was the gateway to the Buddha for twenty-five years—is that I know in some spiritual scenes nowadays, when there's the big charismatic teacher and hordes of people wanting to get close and come and see, there's often this sense of an in-crowd. And the in-crowd's job, or what usually happens with the in-crowd, is making sure they stay the in-crowd by keeping other people the out-crowd. And Ananda was just the reverse. That condition about if people come from outlying areas, requesting always the privilege that he could bring them to see the Buddha—his goal was to help people hear the Dhamma, not keep them out. He genuinely cared for people, he was really kind, and he served as a bridge rather than a barrier between people and the Buddha. That was really a beautiful quality.

For twenty-five years he was the perfect attendant, meaning that he didn't ever show any aspects of willfulness. Really perfect devotion to the Dhamma in thought, word, and deed.

Another interesting part about Ananda gives us insight into the human element. Besides the fact that he was social—that's kind of why we know more about him, there are more stories about him—he was not a fully awakened arahant. Most of the other monks and nuns that you read about, you read about them because they became fully awakened arahants pretty quickly. And Ananda didn't. He was a stream-enterer. The eye of the Dhamma had awakened in him. But then for the twenty-five years that he was with the Buddha day and night, listening to every sutta, every talk the Buddha gave, and so much discussion, he never completely awakened until after the Buddha died.

And yet the Buddha himself said, even though Ananda is still on the path of higher training, it would be difficult to find someone who equals him in wisdom. So just to know—you don't have to think, "Oh, only stream entry, not good enough." It's really quite a deep wisdom. There are many suttas where Ananda is shown to be an excellent teacher, partly because of his affinity with people.

He really tuned into people. He could say what was appropriate at the right time. Well, the Buddha could do that too, but that's because he was omniscient—he could read what was in people's minds, like that story about the leper last week. But Ananda, it was more that he just had the human empathy. His heart could tune into people and say what was helpful.

Sometimes the Buddha would ask him to teach. There's one story, and I like this too because it shows even the Buddha is human. The Buddha and Ananda were with a big assembly of the Sakyans, the Buddha's clan. And the Buddha was giving a long talk most of the night—most of the night. I know you guys think an hour is long! And then after a while, the Buddha said, "Ananda, I've been talking a long time. My back is really hurting me, and I need to stretch. So you now give a talk to the Sakyans. Talk to them about the disciple in higher training who is practicing the path. My back is aching, and I will go and stretch."

So he went off, and Ananda then gave a whole talk, at the end of which the Buddha sat back up again from stretching his back and said, "Excellent, Ananda, excellent." There were other times where he said, "If you had come to me with this question, I would have said the same thing." That's called Buddha Vachana, the word of the Buddha. When one of the other monks or nuns gives a talk or answers a question, the people they talk to would always go to the Buddha and say, "This is what they said." You always wonder, why didn't they just ask the Buddha in the first place? But anyway, they'd ask, "This is what he or she said." And the Buddha would say, "Yes, excellent. Had you asked me, I would have said the same thing." So he said that at this point about Ananda.

He also said at the time of his death—well, before he died, at the time when he announced he was going to die—the Buddha said that Ananda has four remarkable and wonderful qualities. This is at the end of the 25 years. What are they? "If a company of monks comes to see Ananda, they are pleased at the sight of him. And when Ananda talks Dhamma to them, they are pleased. And when he is silent, they are disappointed. And so it is too with nuns, with male and female lay followers." So basically, Ananda was well beloved for teaching the Dhamma and for his kindness.

He was a great supporter of the nuns, Ananda. In fact, in the beginning there was no nuns sangha—there was just the sangha of monks, of bhikkhus. I don't want to go into the whole story, but the woman who was Buddha's aunt, who had raised him because his mother died when he was a week old—Mahapajapati Gotami—later in life she wanted to become a nun and begged the Buddha to start a sangha of nuns. And he resisted, which is never really explained why, but he resisted.

At one point, Ananda, again in his role as bridge, not exactly interceded, but he spoke up when the Buddha had three times refused Mahapajapati Gotami. Technically, you could ask the Buddha for something and ask him up to three times, and the third time he would say yes if he could. But this time, he didn't say yes. So it's said Ananda thought, "Hmm, let me ask in another way."

So he came in, speaking on the side of the women, and he asked the Buddha two questions. He said, "Lord, is it true, is it possible that women can awaken to the same wisdom that men can?" And the Buddha said, "Absolutely, no question." So then Ananda said, "Well, looking on…" He then interceded in a personal way, and only he could have done this. He said to the Buddha, "Lord, look how much she has done for you in your life. When you were young, she suckled you, she fed you, she raised you as her own child. She is so sincere. It would be good, Lord, if women could become nuns." And at this point the Buddha agreed.

So there's a way that Ananda, in his kindness, was really—I wouldn't say a protector of the nuns, because they had the Buddha as their protector—but he was a great favorite with the nuns, which once in a while led him into a little bit of trouble. Just because he was so open and friendly, sometimes he would get overenthusiastic, but I'll say more about that in a moment.

In the same way, the nuns and the monks lived in separate communities. The monks would go to the nuns and teach, and later the nuns developed their own teachers. I'll mention some of the women teachers a little later—I won't talk about Ananda the whole time. But he also had this same quality, this ability to connect with laypeople, laymen and laywomen.

And you just get the feeling that women really trusted him in a way—that he was kind to them, not so aloof.

One story about this involves King Pasenadi, who was one of the kings of the area and a great devotee of the Buddha. Apparently the kings at this time had many wives and many consorts, whole harems of them. And these royal women were actually kind of prisoners; they weren't allowed out of the harem. You read in different suttas where the royal women wanted to go to the Buddha and get teachings, and they weren't allowed to. They couldn't wander freely. In fact, slave women had much more freedom of movement than the royal women.

So all the wives of the king begged him to ask one of the Buddha's teachers to come teach them. King Pasenadi, of course, agreed. He said, "Well, who do you want?" And they all conferred and immediately said, "Ananda. We want Ananda." So Pasenadi went to the Buddha and asked him, and the Buddha agreed. And then on a regular basis, Ananda would go and teach the king's wives.

One time when he went—and this is just a story of his willingness to get involved in the lay level of difficulties that happen, and his wisdom in dealing with them—one time he went to teach these wives and they were all upset and couldn't focus because someone had stolen one of the king's really important jewels. Everyone had been searched and they couldn't find it, but everything was in an uproar. Everybody was mistrusting everyone else, not just the women but in the whole court.

So Ananda came up with this ingenious plan, which King Pasenadi adopted. He said, "Set up a tent in your courtyard that has flaps so no one can see in. And inside, put a big pot of water. Then have everyone who's a suspect go in singly, one at a time. And whoever has the jewel can just drop it in that pot of water." So at the end, after all the suspects had gone in and out, the king went in and there was the jewel.

Ananda accomplished three things. He ended the crisis, so the king got back his property. Nobody was blamed. Nobody was punished. All suspicion was done away with. He was praised by the king and also by the monks for restoring the peace through gentle means. And that was an aspect of his kindness and his wisdom and his ability to tune in—to restore the peace by gentle means.

Another example of his kindness that I've always loved comes from the Agamas, which is a later collection, but it sounds really true. It sounds like Ananda to me. This is from Jack's compilation.

Ananda was being sent somewhere by the Buddha on a mission, so he was on a long walk. He passed a well on the outside of a village and saw Pakati, a young outcast woman, and asked her for water to drink. Mostly monks could not ask for food or anything, but they could ask for water. But she was from the lower caste. And she said, "Oh no, I'm too humbly born. I can't give you water. Do not ask anything of me, lest your holiness be contaminated, for I am of low caste." That's the way it was at that time in India for the so-called low caste, the untouchables. The belief was that if you took anything from them, a higher caste person would be contaminated. And that's how she thought of herself.

Ananda replied, "I'm not asking about your caste, but simply for water."

The woman's heart leapt joyfully, and she gave Ananda water to drink. He thanked her and went away, but she followed him at a distance. She'd heard that he was a disciple of the Buddha. So she went to the Blessed One and said, "Oh Lord, help me. Let me live in the place where your disciple Ananda dwells so that I may see him and minister unto him, for I love Ananda."

And the Blessed One understood the emotions of her heart. He said, "Pakati, your heart is full of love, but you do not understand your own sentiments. It is not Ananda that you love, but his kindness. Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice towards yourself, and practice it towards others."

I love that, because that's the way Ananda seemed to affect people—by his kindness, just by not accepting that she was low caste and would contaminate him. And that was an aspect of the Buddha's radical teachings, actually. When he set up his sangha of both monks and nuns, within the sangha it had nothing to do with caste, which was so rigidly stratified in Indian society at that time.

But in both the monks and the nun Sangha, the hierarchy was dependent on when you ordained. So an outcast person like that woman, Pakati, could have ordained as a nun. And she would have been a nun ahead of the next nun who ordained, even if that next nun had been a wife of the king. That was really radical. And that's what Ananda was showing just in his sense of accepting someone just as they are and meeting them with kindness. He had no pride.

But sometimes, just as this woman misunderstood his kindness and turned it into a personal love for Ananda, he got into a little bit of trouble with the nuns. It's not that he did anything wrong, but sometimes he was just so kind and so enthusiastic. He was really—I don't know if you could say impulsive about any of these monks, but close to it, as close as you could get to impulsive in that time.

So there's one story when he was admonished by Mahakasyapa. Now, Mahakasyapa is one of the great disciples of the Buddha. He's renowned as the most ascetic of all the Buddha's great disciples. I won't go into his whole story, but he sounds like he was a bit of a rough guy. He didn't really like hanging out with people too much. He loved being extremely ascetic, loved being out in nature. There's actually lots of poems where he's extolling how much he loves nature, which is really nice to hear. But he wasn't perhaps the most personally empathetic, as Ananda was. But he was, again, an arhat.

Once the nuns that Ananda used to visit and teach frequently asked Ananda to have Mahakasyapa come and teach. Kashyapa resisted—he didn't want to go—for a couple of times, but finally he came. And he went, and Mahakasyapa gave a whole discourse to the nuns. He talked the whole time. When he finished, one of the nuns, who clearly really liked Ananda, blamed Mahakasyapa for doing all the talking. This is the quote that comes from this: "It's as if a needle seller was peddling his wares in the presence of the needle maker." She's saying this about Kashyapa—you know, you're doing all the talking and the really good guy is sitting here in silence. And then Ananda immediately jumped in and begged Mahakasyapa, "Oh, please forgive her, please forgive her."

What's interesting is that Mahakasyapa actually admonished Ananda for that. The nun was clearly off—that's obvious. Remember, he's an arhat. In terms of really generating wholesome speech or unwholesome speech, putting down an arhat is not really the greatest thing to do. "Mahakasyapa, oh my God, we have to listen to him when we could have Ananda." And then Ananda's basically jumping in and saying, "Oh, don't be mean to her." He's almost trying to block her learning what she did that was unskillful, which to us often we can hear as being kind. Ananda jumps in and goes, "Oh no, forgive her, forgive her, leave her alone." But that's not really the way the Buddha Sasana works.

We'll learn about and later say how the Buddha admonished Ananda. Admonishment isn't out of anger or saying, "You're bad, you stupid jerk." That's how we hear admonishment. Admonishment is saying, "You know, this isn't so skillful. This would be more skillful. This other way would be for your own well-being and happiness." And so for Ananda to jump in and say, "Oh, no, no, no, forgive her," is actually blocking that.

Kashyapa actually—and he was a little tough—admonished Ananda, saying that in his zeal to teach the nuns, he was overlooking possibly the dangers and the effects of their becoming too attached to him. I think that's just really interesting. He's so wanting to help that he gets a little too close sometimes. And that's where you can see he's still one on the path of higher training. It's what makes him lovable, of course. And for us, I find that a very delicate and powerful teaching. Kind, generous, almost impulsive.

The one other time that the Buddha actually admonished Ananda again comes out of his really being such a social person. But the Buddha's admonishing I also think is interesting in terms of Dhamma teaching. It's said elsewhere in the suttas that one who is easily admonished is a really beautiful and wholesome quality, because that's how we learn.

That's how we're letting go of our sense of self. And remember, admonishment isn't delivered with anger or blame. Admonishment is simply, "Oh, you know, this isn't so helpful. This would be more in line with wisdom." One who is open to that, who is easily admonished, is free from pride and open to learning, not caught in self-centeredness.

So when we react with, "Oh my god, you're right, I'm so bad, I'm so stupid," that's all about me, me, me. And then you notice, "Oh yes, it is about me, me, me," and that becomes another layer. But to be open enough to think, "Look at that. What I did got in the way. She was too attached to me and I didn't see it. That's interesting. Next time I'll see it, because it will be for her good, it will be for my good, it will be for the good of both." Such an open way.

So one time, the occasion when the Buddha admonished Ananda for an action rather than words—he often admonished him for saying things that weren't completely true. The most famous instance being after Ananda had been meditating on paṭiccasamuppāda, dependent origination, which is a very central and complex teaching. Ananda went to the Buddha and said, "Oh, paṭiccasamuppāda, dependent origination is just so clear, so obvious." And the Buddha replied, "Not so, Ananda, not so. It is very difficult to understand."

But this particular admonishment concerned action. Another thing Ananda was apparently good at was sewing. The monks have to sew their own robes, patch them together, sew the hems—there are different techniques for all of this. Ananda, again, was very skilled at this. He was a man of many talents. The Buddha praised him for how well he could do it and said he should teach the other monks how to sew.

Later, when they were at a certain monastery, the Buddha came and asked Ananda how many monks were living there. He saw that Ananda had set up a huge circle—as if we put all the cushions into a circle—where all the monks would sit. Ananda explained it was time for them to learn how to sew their robes properly. It seemed he'd arranged a kind of evening sewing circle, where the monks would all come together and sit around sewing their robes. And basically, it had turned into a time for indulging in frivolous chatter—just sitting around shooting the breeze, as far as that happened for monks at that time.

Now, this doesn't seem horribly frivolous to us, right? But in terms of that context, the Buddha admonished Ananda quite strongly. I'll shorten it, because the passage is actually quite long, but he says: when a monk enjoys socializing, finds contentment in socializing, is attached to togetherness, finds his whole happiness in togetherness—he will have no access to the bliss which exists independent of the desire for togetherness.

So the Buddha isn't saying togetherness is bad, but how this evening sewing circle was leading into attachment, into contentment with togetherness. He said that for a bhikkhu to attain the bliss of renunciation at will, the bliss of solitude, the bliss of tranquility, the bliss of awakening, in their totality—while pleased with and finding contentment in togetherness—this is impossible.

He's basically saying, not that we can never be together, but that until we have no attachment at all to the contentment of togetherness, to socializing, only then can we truly, completely taste the bliss of freedom. That's a hard teaching for those of us who enjoy the bliss of togetherness.

And remember, this is why the Buddha was always very direct with Ananda. I know in our culture it's easy to rationalize: "Well, what's wrong with togetherness? We don't all have to go off into the wilderness." He's not saying that. He's simply saying don't indulge in it. Don't set up a situation, Ananda, because you're an important teacher, that feeds people's attachment to togetherness.

He gives a whole long admonishment. Then at the end—what I really love—he speaks directly to Ananda out of his love for him, basically saying, in shorthand, that he is admonishing him so that he can attain the highest peace. "I'm admonishing you because I know you love me, and I know you love the Dhamma, and I want you to be free."

He says, "Therefore, Ananda, have amity, friendship towards me, not hostility. For long will that be for your benefit and happiness." And explaining why he admonishes him, he says, "I shall not treat you, Ananda, as a potter treats his unfired pots."

That analogy—an unfired pot is one that's been formed in clay and dried but not fired. It's very brittle. As Bhikkhu Bodhi notes, saying he won't treat Ananda like an unfired pot means he won't walk on eggshells around him. "You're very sensitive. You're very touchy. If I tap on you too hard, you'll break." But he says, "I'm admonishing you. I'm not treating you like an unfired pot. Repeatedly admonishing, I shall speak to you. Repeatedly testing."

And one who is sound will stand the test. So he's making it clear that he's holding nothing back with Ananda, because he really knows that his love of the Dhamma, his faith in the Dhamma is so pure that he won't be crushed by that.

And it's true—Ananda didn't really have any pride, and he had no enemies, which they point out is actually pretty amazing. To have no enemies! No one was jealous of him because he didn't have pride. And Helmut Hecker in Disciples of the Buddha points out, well, it's easy for someone like Ananda's cousin Anuruddha, who was an arahant, to have no enemies because he didn't hang out with people at all. He just stayed out on his own. Ananda was more with people than almost any other monk, and still he had no enemies.

And the other piece of his humanness that I really love is there are two times that he really expresses grief in a way that's so human. The Buddha, when someone dies, always just says, "How many times have I told you? All that comes together has to come apart." But Ananda really expresses grief. To me, he's like our stand-in for how it feels.

The first time, his strongest friend was Sariputta, the Buddha's main disciple. Ananda and Sariputta would often go teaching together or go visiting other disciples together. And Sariputta died a while before the Buddha died. And Ananda, it's said he was just... he felt like he'd fallen into an abyss of depression, of grief. And this is the poem in the Theragatha that he's said to have exclaimed at the time of Sariputta's death:

All the directions are obscure. The teachings are not clear to me. With our benevolent friend gone, it seems as if all is darkness. For one whose friend has passed away, one whose teacher is gone for good, there is no friend that can compare with mindfulness of the body.

Remember that next time you're in grief. There's no friend that can compare with mindfulness of the body.

The old ones have all passed away. I do not fit in with the new. And so today I muse alone like a bird who has gone to roost.

Ananda missing his friend, Sariputta.

At that point, the Buddha consoled Ananda with one of his peppy Dhamma talks. But the point he made was he said, "Did Sariputta's death take away your virtue? Did that take away your wisdom? Does Sariputta's death take away your meditation? Does it take away your liberation?" And Ananda said, "No, of course not." And he said, "So this is where you take your refuge. No friend can ultimately be our refuge."

And of course, preceding his own death, the Buddha said the same thing. That's a very famous scene of grief, when the Buddha announced that he was going to die in three months. He was with a whole group of people, and Ananda kind of disappeared at that point. Later, the Buddha—of course he knew where he went—said, "Okay, where's Ananda? Somebody go find Ananda." And they found Ananda, and he was leaning against a doorpost, weeping.

I read somewhere that there are many pieces of artwork that depict this—this devoted twenty-five-year attendant hearing that the Buddha is going to die in three months, leaning against the doorpost, weeping. And he's saying, "I'm still a learner with much to do, and the teacher is passing away who is so compassionate to me."

So the Buddha calls him, and he says what you'd expect. First he admonishes him. He says, "Enough, Ananda, do not weep and wail. Haven't I told you?" And then it's the usual thing—that all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other. How could it be that I should not pass away?

But then he really praises him. He says, "For a long time, Ananda, you've been in the Tathagata's presence, showing loving kindness in acts of body, of speech, and mind, beneficially, blessedly, wholeheartedly, and unstintingly. You have achieved much merit, Ananda. Make the effort."

In a short time, you will be free of the corruptions.

And then he turns to all the monks. "Monks, all those who were fully enlightened Buddhas in the past have had just such a chief attendant as Ananda. And so too will those in the future. Monks, Ananda is wise. He knows when it is the right time for monks to come to see the Tathagata, when is the right time for nuns, for male lay followers, for female lay followers, for kings, ministers, leaders, and their pupils." And that's when he goes on to say that Ananda has these four remarkable and wonderful qualities—basically, that all are pleased at the sight of him.

And so that's Ananda, the guardian of the Dhamma, twenty-five years following one step behind the Buddha with thoughts, speech, and action of loving kindness, but without excluding anyone. Loving the Dhamma because he loved the Buddha, and doing everything he could to make it accessible to everyone else. Really, to me, a very inspiring being.

I want to talk about a couple of women disciples. As the nuns' sangha grew more mature, the monks continued to teach, but the nuns also developed their own teachers—their own women who had their own stories and their own wisdom. They were really quite equal in the way of wisdom and freedom to the monks.

Since we got into the women from Ananda, I'll give a short account of a couple of them. The one who was considered the greatest teacher was named Dhammadina. And again, all these are just like regular people that we can in some way relate to—their lives, their stories.

She was the wife of a man named Visakha, middle class and quite well-to-do in Rajagaha. They had a very happy marriage. This is one of the stories where it wasn't enormous suffering that brought the woman to the Dhamma, which is often the case—that women became nuns out of enormous suffering. That's still often the case now in Thailand and Burma. Even when you talk to some of the brightest nuns, you find that when they first became nuns, there was a lot of suffering going on. But not Dhammadina. Her marriage was very happy, and they were very close. They would always eat together.

But one day, her husband came home from the market, and instead of being friendly and talking, he just passed by her, abstracted, and went into the next room. This is so human—she thought, "What did I do? He doesn't love me anymore. What's the problem? What's happening? Our marriage is on the rocks." And she got very upset.

Finally he came to her, and what had happened was that he had heard the Buddha and gotten quite inspired. He said to her, "Dhammadina, I'm inspired. I want to become a monk. I will give you all my wealth, and you can stay here or go back to your family. I give you everything I have."

She thought about it. She said, "Well, you know what? I want to renounce also. I'd like to become a nun."

He said, "Okay." So before he became a monk, he gave her a big send-off. He arranged for her to go in a grand palanquin with people carrying her, and she went and ordained.

Once she ordained, of course, you don't see your family anymore. She practiced and became completely awakened. She also became one of the women with the highest insight, and she became a great teacher.

Later in her wandering, she came back to Rajagaha where she'd lived, and found out—guess what? Her husband never managed to make it to becoming a monk. He was still hanging out in Rajagaha. But he was still inspired by the Dhamma.

This is what Sayadaw U Pandita often says: "Women make the really good yogis." Nothing personal.

He just says that sometimes.

So he hadn't become a monk, but he was very interested in the Dhamma. So he went to her, but as a seeker, not as her husband, and said, "Sister Dhammadina." And he asked her a whole series of questions. This is actually one of the suttas in the Majjhima Nikaya, the Lesser Series of Questions, that is all about Visakha asking questions to Dhammadina and her answering. There are not that many places in the suttas where a teaching is elevated to the same equality as a teaching of the Buddha. Being in the Majjhima Nikaya, it is elevated to that.

"For what is meditation?" she says. "Meditation is the focusing of the heart." And he keeps going on and on, finally asking her about Nirvana. And finally she says, "Okay, now you should go talk to the Buddha. Go ask him." And again, it's one of those occasions where the Buddha said, "What she said, that's exactly what I would have said. She answered exactly as I would have." So she was considered one of the foremost teachers of the Dhamma among the women, Dhammadina.

One of the other foremost women in the Sangha, one of its two leaders, was Kema. And I just like her story of how she became a nun. Probably not likely to happen to any of us, but it's one I love.

She was the chief consort of one of the kings, Bimbisara, who was sort of a follower of the Buddha—not quite as devoted as Pasenadi, but he was a follower. Kema, however, was extremely beautiful and extremely conceited. She loved pleasure and she loved sensuality. So even when the Buddha would come to the beautiful park nearby, she wouldn't go to hear him, because she said, "I've heard that he talks about the dangers of sense pleasures and he advocates renunciation." And frankly, she didn't want to hear anything about it. She loved her life and her beauty and everything about it.

So Bimbisara, for some reason really wanting her to go hear the Buddha, organized a kind of enticement. The Buddha was teaching in a particularly beautiful park, so Bimbisara hired a musician to walk around singing a song extolling the beauty of this particular park, knowing that Kema would be seduced because she loved pleasure and she loved beauty.

So she went. And then when she got there, of course, there was the Buddha teaching. She couldn't help but hear it. And there was the Buddha with his all-encompassing mind that could know just whose mind was ripe to hear the Dhamma and just what to say to hook them. As one of my earlier teachers, a character named Robert Hover, used to say: the velvet-gloved iron fist of the Dhamma.

So what he did was create, with his psychic powers, an image of an incredibly beautiful goddess, far more beautiful than Kema. And because she loved beauty, she was completely attracted. "Wow! Oh, that's incredible! What beauty!" And then he had it gradually decay. He had her beauty kind of gradually wither and turn to middle age, and the teeth started to rot, and the skin started to sag, and the hair fell out, and gradually she died.

And Kema got it, right? "Oh, it's going to be the same for me." And then he gave a whole talk about how people devoted to physical beauty and sensual pleasure were bound to the world, while those who renounced were free of attachments, were free. And she is one of the rare laypeople that is recorded as having, on just hearing this one talk, become completely awakened. She became an arahant. That's why I said it's not so likely to happen to us.

What I like about her story is the fact that she was so ready to hear the Dhamma but completely resistant to it. She just needed to hear one teaching. It's sort of like being just on the edge of, "No, I love my pleasures, and I don't want to hear about anything else. Let me hold on." And when it's just on the other side of that, there's this complete freedom. She had what Chögyam Trungpa used to call nostalgia for samsara. We just love it. "No, I want my pleasures. Don't make me give them up"—not imagining the freedom and beauty and peace on the other side.

So she became one of the great teachers. I'll read you part of her poem:

Everywhere the love of pleasure is destroyed,
the great dark is torn apart,
and death, you too are destroyed.
Fools who don't know things as they really are revere the mansions of the moon and tend the fire in the wood, thinking this is purity.

That's talking about some of the Brahminical rituals, thinking that's purity.

But for myself, I honor the enlightened one, the best of all,
and practicing his teaching,
I'm completely freed from suffering.

Okay, one more woman, and then just a little bit about Anathapindika, because I love him too. This other woman, Punika, was a slave. She was actually the slave of Anathapindika, who was the Buddha's most generous supporter, and also partially awakened.

So, who can figure out the society norms of the time? The kings had all these wives and mistresses and slaves. Anyway, Punika was a slave, and she used to have to go down to the water, the stream, in the early cold morning and draw water for the family. She was apparently really clear in her faith, in her understanding of the Dhamma—it's kind of like speaking truth to power. As a slave, she had more ability to get around, and she had heard the Buddha teaching. She had really understood the Dhamma and had great faith in it.

So one day she was down drawing water, and she had such confidence that her poem is really a dialogue. She's talking to a Brahmin man who comes down, a Brahmin of the high caste. He came down because there was the belief at the time—maybe still to some extent—that if you washed yourself off in holy water, it purified you of all your sins. So he was there, washing off all his bad karma in the water. And she basically says, "What do you think you're doing?"

This is her poem talking to him. She says, "I'm a water carrier. Even in the cold, I have always gone down to the water because I'm frightened of punishment or the angry words of high-class women. But what are you afraid of, Brahmin, that makes you go down to the water? Your limbs shake with bitter cold."

And the Brahmin says, "You know why, Punika. I am doing good to prevent evil. Anyone young or old who has done something bad is freed by washing it in the water."

And she says—and this is the sense of the confidence, just the confidence of knowing the Dhamma—she says to him, "Whoever told you that you are freed from evil by washing? The blind leading the blind. In that case, all frogs and turtles would go to heaven, and water snakes and crocodiles and the rest of the water creatures." She goes on and on: "Thieves, executioners, other wrongdoers would be freed from their bad karma by washing in water. If these streams carried away all your old evil, they would carry away your virtue too. You would be separated from both. Rather, just don't do that thing, the fear of which leads you down to the water. Stop now, Brahmin, and save your skin from the cold."

That's kind of tough, huh? Speaking to a high-caste Brahmin. And he hears her, of course, because she's speaking with such confidence. He says, "You're on the right road. You brought me back." Then he says, "I'll give you the robe I bathed in."

She goes, "Keep your robe. I don't want it. If you're afraid of pain, if you don't like it, do nothing evil, either openly or in secret." She just gives him a whole Dhamma teaching.

And then he says, "I take refuge in the Buddha, in the Dharma, in the Sangha. I train in the precepts." This is good. So she basically turned the man on to the Dhamma.

And then later—she clearly was gutsy—she went to the Buddha and said, "I want to become a nun." But slaves were not allowed to become nuns or monks, and the Buddha was about to leave the area. She goes to him and says, "Well, wait. Would you just go talk to Anathapindika and have him give permission that I could become a nun?"

And the Buddha said, "Okay." He went and talked to Anathapindika, who said, "Never mind. She's freed. I adopt her as my daughter." And she became a nun.

So just know there were all these different ways that women became involved in becoming nuns and powerful teachers, with strong faith in the Dhamma. There are lots of poems by the women. This book, The First Buddhist Women by Susan Murcott, is really quite inspiring, with a lot of the stories of the nuns and their poems.

So just a few more minutes—I want to tell a couple of stories of Anathapindika. He was the man who was the greatest lay supporter of the Buddha, very rich.

And again, besides his incredible generosity, what's inspiring about him is his enormous faith—just enormous faith. And that faith colored his generosity. There are great lessons on generosity from Anathapindaka.

From the very first time he ever heard about the Buddha, he was visiting his brother-in-law, and the house was in an uproar. He said, "What's going on?" And his brother-in-law said, "Well, the Enlightened One is coming. We are getting ready for him tomorrow." And Anathapindaka said, "The Enlightened One? Is there an Enlightened One?" And he just got so excited. He didn't even know why. He couldn't sleep all night. Then early in the morning, he just had to go running out really early to meet the Buddha.

It's like when you get that intuitive sense of something that's going to change your life and you don't know what it is. I love that. It's so naive, and he just acts on it. And he goes running out, and he gets really afraid on the way to the Buddha, not knowing what's happening. He goes to turn around, and then it says an invisible spirit came and urged him on. Whether the invisible spirits are our own inner intuition—we say, "No, I can't do this. This is too stupid. What am I going to say?" And the intuition says, "No, go. This is far more important."

So finally he went and saw a figure walking in the distance, which was, of course, the Buddha. And he stopped. And the Buddha called, "Kamsudatta," which was a name that no one else called him. He was surprised the Buddha knew it. He went up, but he was so off balance, out of presence, just so excited to be in the presence of the Buddha that he just fell down at his feet. He stammered, "Oh, did you sleep well? Did the Blessed One sleep well?" Just not knowing what to say. And of course the Buddha said he always sleeps well—the Brahmin who is fully quenched—and went on to give him a whole talk.

And for Anathapindaka, the Dhamma eye opened. He understood the Four Noble Truths. It says, "The dust-free, stainless eye of truth opened for Anathapindaka. Whatever has the nature of arising, all that has the nature of cessation"—the beginning of awakening.

From then on, he devoted himself to supporting the Buddha, supporting the Sangha. He went back to Savatthi and asked the Buddha if the Buddha would accept if he bought a park and gave it to him to make a monastery. And the Buddha said yes, he would accept that. So Anathapindaka went back, and at enormous expense—a whole long story—he bought the Jeta Grove from Prince Jeta at a huge amount of money.

Now so many suttas begin, "Thus I have heard"—that's Ananda—"on one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Savatthi in the Jeta Grove, the monastery of Anathapindaka." The Buddha ended up spending nineteen of his forty-five rains retreats there.

Anathapindaka not only bought the monastery and offered it, he had buildings built. He would bring the monks robes every day. He made sure they had food every day. He made sure they had medicine all the time. And he also invited hundreds of monks every day to his mansion to feed them. It just goes on and on, his generosity.

But the important thing about his generosity is that it came from total faith—that real generosity is this open-hearted faith and happiness producing, not about result.

There's a great story about King Pasenadi, who again was a devotee of the Buddha. He heard of Anathapindaka's generosity and how he was having five hundred monks every day. So he said, "I, too, want to do that. I, too, want to imitate."

So he gave orders to his servants: every day I'm inviting 500 monks, cook and serve them. And he started doing that.

But then he was walking in the city and heard from his supporters that the monks would come to his house and be offered the food, but then they would go into the city and each monk would offer his bowl of food to one of their other supporters, who would then offer it back to the monk, and only then would the monk eat it.

King Pasenadi said, "What's that about? This is the best food, the richest food, the most well-prepared food. Why is this happening?"

And the Buddha explained to the king that in his palace, his servants who distributed the food had no inner feeling about it. They were just following orders, as if they were cleaning out a barn or taking a thief to court. They just did whatever the king told them to do. They lacked faith, and they had no love for the monks. Many of them even thought the monks were parasites living by the labor of the working population. Anything given in that spirit, no one could feel comfortable accepting it, even when the meal was of the most delicious food. So the monks would take the food and give it to one of their devoted lay supporters, who would offer it back again. And then it was really a true dāna.

So Anāthapiṇḍika embodied this spirit of real open-hearted faith and generosity. It's really quite beautiful.

Now, just the last thing—I know we're running a little over, but I have to tell this final story of Anāthapiṇḍika because it inspires me so deeply. When he was dying, it was kind of his last act of generosity, in a different kind of way.

He was ill and dying, and Sāriputta was very close to Anāthapiṇḍika. So Sāriputta and Ānanda together went to visit him. Sāriputta asked, "Are you getting well?"

And he said, "No. My painful feelings are increasing, not subsiding. It is as if my head were being split open with a sharp sword." The man was not feeling too good.

So Sāriputta gave him a very profound teaching. I'm going to extremely shorten it, but he gave him a teaching on not clinging to anything. He said, "You should train thus: I will not cling to the eye, the ear, the nose, the body, the mind, or consciousness. My consciousness will not be dependent on these. Householder, you should train thus: I will not cling to forms, I will not cling to sounds, to mind objects, to tangibles, and my consciousness will not be dependent on mind objects. Householder, you should train thus: I will not cling to eye consciousness or any of the sense door consciousnesses. Householder, you should train thus: I will not cling to contact, I will not cling to feeling born of eye contact, ear contact, or mind contact. My consciousness will not be dependent on feeling. Householder, you should train thus: I will not cling to the earth element, to the water element, the fire element, the air element, the space element, or the consciousness element. My consciousness will not be dependent on the consciousness element. Householder, you should train thus: I will not cling to form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness—the five aggregates. Householder, you should train thus: I will not cling to the base of infinite space." And he goes through the higher jhānas. "You should train thus: I will not cling to what is seen, heard, sensed, cognized, encountered, sought after, and examined by the mind, and my consciousness will not be dependent on that. Thus you should train."

When this was said, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika wept and shed tears. And Ānanda asked him, "Are you foundering, householder? Are you sinking? Are you dying?"

He said, "I am not dying, Venerable Ānanda. But although I have long waited upon the teachers and the bhikkhus worthy of esteem, never before have I heard such a talk on the Dhamma."

And Ānanda said, "Such talk on the Dhamma, householder, is not given to lay people clothed in white. Such talk on the Dhamma is given only to those who have gone forth, to those who are ordained."

And Anāthapiṇḍika replied, "Well then, Venerable Sāriputta, let such talk on the Dhamma be given to lay people. There are clansmen and women with little dust in their eyes who are wasting away through not hearing such talk on the Dhamma. There will be those who will understand this Dhamma."

And then, saying that, he died.

So in a way, we have Anathapindika to thank for the subtlety of the Dhamma teachings being available to all of us laypeople—in its depth, in its entirety, in its totality.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 53

Putting Your Trust in Awareness

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this profound dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to examine their deepest expectations and assumptions about practice. She explores how the path of awakening goes against the stream—not merely the external stream of society, but more fundamentally against our deeply held views and beliefs that we don't even recognize we're holding.
> Wilson illuminates a radical reframing of practice: rather than chipping away at defilements to create peace, what if natural peace and ease of heart and mind is actually more normal than we realize, and our clinging, aversion, and self-centered thinking are the aberration? She emphasizes cultivating trust in awareness itself—that open, curious, loving attention that can meet any experience, whether pleasant or unpleasant, without needing to make it about "me."
> Drawing on teachings about the kilesas (defilements) and the nature of dukkha, Wilson offers practical guidance for recognizing when greed, hatred (dosa), and delusion color our experience. She shares Ajahn Sumedho's teaching that awareness is about knowing conditions fully without judgment, allowing what arises to cease according to its nature. The talk emphasizes that liberation arises not from what's happening, but in how we meet each moment—every experience becoming a potential gateway to freedom when met with interested, non-clinging awareness.

Maybe it's too soon for you to have started asking yourself this in any serious way, but it's a reasonable question that comes up, consciously or not, for most people at some point: What do I want out of this retreat? What do I expect to get from this retreat?

Put that way, it sounds rather bald and greedy. But I think if we let ourselves honestly begin to notice what ideas are working in the back of our mind, at some point we might notice that question arising. What am I going to get out of this? Why am I here? Cut underneath all the high-sounding stuff that we say and get right to the deep chase—not in any kind of critical way.

As you know, and I'm sure many of you have heard, the Buddha described his teachings and the path of awakening as moving against the stream, going upstream against society. And of course, that's rather obvious just in this form. Coming to an intensive retreat for a month is certainly a little bit counter to the external norms of society. In that way alone, it can be rather difficult, rather challenging. And as I'm sure you all know, the form of the retreat itself—the simplicity, the sitting, the walking, the silence, the commitment to really show up for whatever's arising in our mind and body, like it or not—that can be really challenging. There are many moments when a retreat is rather uncomfortable, to say the least. It's partly because it goes against our normal external habits.

But I think even more deeply, when the Buddha talks about this practice, this path of awakening going against the stream, more important than the external stream of society—that's almost secondary. The stream that our practice of mindful attention, of loving presence without discriminating what we like and don't like, goes against is the stream of our deep-set habits of heart and mind, and in many cases our deeply held views and beliefs. These are the ones we don't know we're holding because it's just the way things are.

When I was talking about getting down to the nitty-gritty of what we really want out of this, on that level the answer will come from what we really deeply hold and believe to be true, without even knowing it. Not what we wish, not some view in our intellectual head, but where we take refuge, where we really have confidence, what we trust.

One of the reasons we begin a retreat with taking the three refuges in Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha—sure, it's a tradition—but it's also a way of reminding each of us in our own particular way. For me, it gets deeper and deeper. It's a way of reminding me that this whole path is about learning to shift where I have confidence. The beginning and end of the path is wise understanding, right view—what we really know to be true, accurate perception of ourselves and the world around us.

As the Buddha describes so clearly, we perceive ourselves to be a solid, separate, eternal being. What we perceive leads to how we think about the world, which leads to the beliefs we hold, what we trust. And those beliefs then form the ideas and perceptions that we carry forward into the world.

This path of practice, of awakening, is at times uncomfortable because it's really taking us into a direct, face-to-face examination of what we've believed to be the truth about ourselves and the world. And we discover on a cellular, moment-to-moment level—it just ain't so. This is not an intellectual pursuit. This is really a moment-to-moment lived experience.

Mostly, the views we've taken for granted feel safe because we've taken them for granted. Our practice is really a stepping outside of our comfortable—although it doesn't work, it's still comfortable—definition, description, idea of ourselves and the world. Stepping outside of that view and opening up not to another view, but to not knowing. Opening up to "what if." Opening up to the willingness to be actively engaged and really present without needing to make a conclusion about every experience, without needing every experience to reaffirm me: "This is about me. This will make me better. This will whatever."

Awareness practice is stepping outside of our comfort zone—not only on the physical level. That's the easiest part, although that's the one we might consciously fight. That's the easiest part. But the deep-held beliefs.

I'll give you an example. Not about practice, but about how our views of the world color how we understand what's happening. Can we just have the potential of not being so sure? It's a great place, this open, interested place of not knowing. It's alive. It's connected. Knowing—"Oh, that's what that's about"—wham, it all slams shut.

So, this example: I used this last fall at IMS and it sparked a whole discussion with all the staff people because it got interesting. Last year I was in Burma in January, and several of us were with a Sayadaw. We had raised some money and we were going down to a village in the Delta, a couple of villages, offering dānas of food. These are very formal occasions where food is piled up, you stand in a row, people come, you pass it out, and photos are always taken. It's a very joyous occasion, but there are tons of photos. So we got back to the monastery where we were staying, and one of our friends—she's a Swiss woman who's a nun, she's been a nun there for seventeen or eighteen years...

She speaks Burmese. She's really not part of the culture, but quite immersed in it. And you should know that in Burma, it's a largely Buddhist country, and so the culture really accepts the suttas and the way the Buddha described the world as the way it is, including all the different realms of existence, for example. That's just accepted.

So she was putting her photos on the computer, and quite a number of them had on our skirts in different places, when we were standing, these bright, perfectly round circles of light. Immediately she said, "Oh look, these are the Devas." Devas are celestial beings. She was absolutely sure—these are the Devas. And she's telling the Sayadaw, "Oh look at the Devas," and he was laughing.

Then another friend who was also with us, also a nun there, but her background is as a scientist—she's been a scientist for a very long time. Immediately she said, "Those aren't Devas. That's condensation on the lens of the camera. That's what it is. You can tell." And she was sure. The other one was sure. I thought, well, who knows? I would never have thought Devas to begin with, but I don't know about condensation on the lens either.

So we thought, okay, whatever. I'll look at my pictures when I get home on my computer. Different camera, different computer, different photos, but the same situations. And not as many, but some of the photos did have those perfectly round circles. I thought, well, that's interesting. Who knows, right? Could I just stay with the "who knows"?

And so when I talked about this in the fall, the staff all got going. Immediately one guy who's the IT person, the computer guy, very certain, says, "Look at that. There's no way. It's obviously condensation." And then we saw another photo taken that summer of a teacher meeting we had at Gaia House in England. There's one photo of three of the teachers sitting there, but one particular one, who's a monk, has this exact same round, bright thing right on his chest. And when he was asked about it, he said, "Oh, often pictures of me have that."

So we showed Eric the skeptic this photo. He goes, "Well, you can see right there, there's a glass of water, and that's exactly what it is—it's just water reflecting." He was so sure. And then all these people started coming to me with different photographs from different places with these really wild images. Someone brought me a photo of a forest grove in Burma with people sitting there at dusk, and these round, particular lights were all over up in the top. I swear, I just thought, this has to be like Anāthapiṇḍika in the Jeta Grove after he died. That's the first thing that came to mind. It just really looked like that.

And then my friend, the scientist nun—this winter she came, not sheepishly exactly, but she came with a photo she had taken in August in Tiruvannamalai, which is Ramana Maharshi's ashram in southern India. She spent a month there. And one night, the full moon night—as you know, it's a done thing, you take a perambulation around that mountain, the holy mountain Arunachala, which takes a few hours. On the full moon night in recent years, it's become a big thing for Indian disciples to do; they didn't used to. So they went out that night, and it was packed. In India, a few people coming to walk around the mountain means two and a half million people. Two and a half million people show up to walk around this mountain on the full moon. Complete solid people, she said, the whole way around—having a party, talking on their cell phones, people selling things. She said it was a great atmosphere.

So she went out and took pictures. There were all these lights everywhere, and there weren't street lights. She showed me the picture. It is filled with these bright, perfect, like Deva lights. Who knows? And she said to me, "Okay, who knows. I'm putting down the moisture-on-the-lens theory. I really don't know."

So I'm just telling this to give a sense of how the beliefs that we automatically assume, that we don't even question—scientific or the different realms of existence—that we use to describe our world, those are going to be how we describe experience. Maybe that's correct, maybe it's not.

It certainly can be useful. I'm not saying we go around not knowing what anything is. But can we, rather than having to land on an answer, be willing to cultivate, to recognize, to become familiar and comfortable with this active, engaged, open energy of heart and mind, of really being present? But who knows? Yeah, it looks like moisture on the lens, but who knows?

This is really what we're talking about when we speak of the quality of mindfulness, the quality of awareness that we're cultivating, hopefully, in this retreat. This is what we're cultivating. We're not here to find an answer to your question. The answer is going to shut everything down. We have more answers than we need. We're here to cultivate that open connectedness that doesn't even need to go around the question. Just this. Just this. Without needing to reference past or future and lines of experience. Just this. Really present. And who knows?

It's an active, awake quality of energy, of heart, of mind, of attention. It's not stressful. It's not exhausting. It's engaging. It's enlivening. And it's not something that wears us out, just meeting moment-to-moment experience that way. It doesn't frustrate us. It doesn't make a day of mindful presence seem endless and tormenting. Because it's just now. What's going to arise in the next moment? Who knows? You think it's going to be a certain kind of feeling of your breath? Well, who knows? But the more we think we know what we want, the more we'll get locked in struggle.

But this isn't, for most of us, the natural habit of mind. Again, my scientist friend—I think she wouldn't mind if I said this, we talked about it—she's a botanist. We used to go walking, and as we're walking wherever, she's naming every tree and every bird. It used to drive me nuts, you know? And then as we talked about it, we realized it's not that she was showing off or something, but that was her way of controlling the world. Knowing what's going on. You name it and you know it and you can reference it. And everything's kind of safe and secure. Not knowing—there's not such a place to put your handholds.

That doesn't mean we're not going to have the questions: What do I want from this retreat? Or what is it that's going to bring me happiness and peace? Or what is happiness and peace? Nothing unusual or wrong with having those questions. It's when we think we have to get an answer that's going to stay the same without changing that we get lost.

So what do I want from this retreat? The Dalai Lama says that the purpose of our spiritual practice is to fulfill our desire for happiness, for peace. Nothing weird or wrong about wishing for happiness or peace. I mean, if we didn't, for sure we wouldn't be doing this—unless you're really just masochistic. I guess that's always an option.

We are all equal in wishing to be happy and to overcome our suffering. And I believe we all share the right to fulfill this aspiration. It's a sincere, appropriate motivation. As the Buddha said, one of the things that unites us all as human beings is our deep wish for happiness, for peace. That's normal. Nothing wrong with that. But where it runs into trouble is where it meets our unseen, unexamined assumptions about ourselves, about life, about what happiness is.

When we don't stop and really look—what's actually bringing peace and happiness in a moment? What's actually contributing to confusion and suffering in a moment?—we miss what's right in front of us. To see it clearly, we have to learn how to look free from our assumptions. Otherwise we're looking through a veil. We already think we know what makes us happy, and through that veil we keep trying to do the very thing without seeing that it isn't working. We all know this, but it's so subtle.

So what do I expect from this retreat? Asking yourself that question honestly and seeing what surfaces—do it quietly. You don't have to be embarrassed about it, because really, when I do this and let the real thoughts come up, my dhamma mind that could tell you everything about right understanding is ashamed. I just want pleasant feeling, by God. I just want to feel good. I want to float on clouds. I want to feel compassionate. I want the pain in my back to go away. I want to really impress everyone.

Just be really honest with yourself—not to shame yourself, not to be judgmental, but to see what ideas are working in the back of your mind. Once we see them, we're not driven by them or fooled by them anymore. When we don't see them, when we don't recognize them, that's the lens through which we're evaluating our experience. That's the lens that drives striving. That's the lens that feeds disappointment. We're only disappointed when we're not getting what we expect, right? Which is always a good sign when you're disappointed, because then you can stop and say, "Okay, great, there's some expectation here that isn't being met. What is it?" Bring it up into the light. We don't have to be afraid of this stuff.

So looking to see: what are we placing our faith in? What are we placing our heart on? What are we consciously or unconsciously looking to in order to bring us happiness? I find myself over and over and over—even though I know better, and on many levels I know better, and sometimes I completely know better—but then the next moment or the next year, I discover how often my attention or my sense of what will make me happy is outward directed. Or it comes to a certain state of mind or heart. That's what I'm going for. And when that state of peace or that state of happiness or just the state of not being in pain—we'll take that, just the state of the back pain going away, that's good enough, you could call that a mini-nibbāna—that would be good enough. Some state. Knowing all the while that every conditioned state dissolves, and really quickly.

But there's still that view in the back of the mind that this external or internal state, or this object, or this situation, or this particular experience will change me forever. Experience is a big one. Do you find yourself waiting for some particular experience? If you have a cessation of experience, then you're finished, right? So just let that cessation experience come, and you can quit all this sitting and walking. You can quit experiencing greed and hatred. You've read about it. It'll come. It's all over, right?

It's impossible. Any experience that comes, goes. And when it's here, it's here. This seems so obviously stupid, but when it's gone, it's really gone. A level of insight is present when it's here, and when it's gone, it's gone. It's not something we can make into a chart—"I had this level of insight"—and walk around with it like a diploma. But that doesn't do any good. It's just another thing we're holding on to.

The suffering is the holding in the mind in this moment—right now, in this moment. And as long as we're subtly or not so subtly looking outward to things, to experience, to people, to states, to anything that comes and goes, we're lost in saṃsāra. That is saṃsāra. We're spinning in saṃsāra.

As long as we think we can get something and hold on to it, as long as we think there's a view—and I spent twenty years at least deep in thinking, "I'm practicing to understand the truth of things." But on some level, I thought, once I get some understanding... I never really thought it so obviously as "I could write it down, this is the truth of things, and then all my suffering would be over." But some sense of, once I understand the truth of things—and that was the energy behind it—once I understand the truth of things, it'll all be okay. It'll explain everything. It'll explain samsara and why I keep suffering and why I keep going back into these same old habits that I've seen ten million times.

Has that happened to anybody? Yeah, once or twice, right? And you think, "I really saw deeply through this." And you did, in that moment. But the moment doesn't last. And isn't it easy to feel completely discouraged after that? "I really saw it. So how come I'm turning around and doing it again?" And it's even worse because not only am I doing it again, I know I'm doing it again. I know that I've seen through it. So it's twice as painful because I can add judgment for my stupidity on top of doing it anyway. And I can't stop.

We have unreal expectations.

This practice isn't about getting rid of one view to take up another view—not even the Buddha's view. You know this, that he said even his own teachings are to be used as a raft to get across the river. It's useful, it's helpful. When you get across the river, you don't take the raft and carry it on your shoulders for the rest of your life. So all views are useful, are helpful. And even anything I'm saying now is intellectual information. If it's helpful, great. If it's not, let it go. But nothing is anything that we can hold on to and say, "This is the truth."

So this practice isn't about putting down one view in order to take up another view. It's about learning to recognize, to shift our trust from views and explanations and experience and steady state moments and sense of self—to change our trust to that willingness to just surrender wholeheartedly in one moment into the not-knowing presence of awareness, of mindfulness. Just awareness of what's happening now. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, emotions. That's the basic range that we experience over and over and over. But "over and over" is already a concept, because there's only just right now. Seeing happening now. Feeling happening now. Thinking happening now. Pain happening now.

Our way of talking, our way of trying to teach meditation, our way of trying to teach anything, carries a sense of "me doing." So we talk about me being mindful of sensation. It's language. We have to use language. And the view we have is me doing things. But really what happens is sensation arises, awareness arises, just like that. Hearing arises, the knowing of it arises, just like that. We're not doing anything. We say we're showing up to be present for it, inclining the mind in that way, but what we're really cultivating is that open not-knowing, that willingness to just meet with open-hearted attention whatever happens to be arising in this minute—and notice it's going away, the next, the next, the next.

We are so trained to look for things leading in a certain direction, for experience to confirm "me." Now my breaths are getting better. Now my sensations are getting more subtle. Now my thoughts are getting louder and more gross. So one is bad and one is good, these judgments. But it's not about what's happening. What we're really cultivating is that moment-to-moment quality of open, curious, loving—you could say—attention. Really loving the awareness itself. And any object, any experience that's arising is the gateway to help us recognize awareness itself.

So really, we don't believe this because of our deep views.

It doesn't matter what's happening. And in those moments when we actually know this—when we truly know it doesn't matter—there's such a relief.

When practice is a burden, when you're slumping through the day thinking, "Oh my God, three and a half more hours until I can go to bed without hating myself"—those are tough days. But look at why you're slumping. It's probably unpleasant. We rarely slump along like that when the experiences are all pleasant and the mental states are lovely and our body doesn't hurt. Then it's like, "Yes! I'm one step away from bodhisattva-hood."

But when your body hurts, when you're feeling moody, when you're wishing you had taken that vacation instead of coming here, when you thought you were doing good but then it all crashed—and that person next to you, that person who you thought wasn't doing any good, is suddenly really doing good. You thought you were the inspiring one, but now you're the person really struggling. And then you think, "Okay, I'm out of here."

That's when you're slumping along. Because you're looking at experience as a confirmation of self—of good or bad, of getting somewhere.

But in those moments when there's just that open loving of awareness, of mindfulness, of just being present for its own sake, you're not slumping along because it doesn't matter. The day's long, the day's short—it doesn't matter. Your back hurts or it doesn't. Sure, you have a preference. I'm not saying you don't have a preference for your back not to hurt. But it doesn't really matter.

And this is a whole different angle from the way we're trained, the way we're so deeply ingrained to take all experiences and ask, "What does it mean about me?" Really deep-set habits.

I read a book called Nonviolence a while ago. One really interesting thing the author said stuck with me. He was talking about the word "nonviolence" and saying how in English, the main word is "violence." So the concept "nonviolence" is just a negation of violence. When you hear that, violence is kind of like the norm, and nonviolence is seen as something aberrant—something weak or passive. In Hindi it's the same: ahimsa. The same thing—a, negation of himsa.

But he said—and this is what struck me, just thinking about how language can reflect our views, but also shift them—he said, "Just think: what if the only word for war were 'non-peace'?" So whenever we're talking about a war, we're saying, "Oh, there's non-peace happening in Zimbabwe right now. There's non-peace starting to occur in Afghanistan." It would make a subtle shift in how we experience things, how we think about things.

So one way of thinking about our mindfulness practice—about learning to have confidence in awareness rather than in things, in objects, in experience—is a shift like this.

What if—as Ajahn Amaro talks about—the natural peace and ease of mind and body that is natural peace and ease, what if this natural peace and ease of heart and mind, what if non-clinging of heart and mind, is not some obscure state that we need to create over many years, if not lifetimes, of intense struggle? What if non-clinging heart and mind, natural peace and ease, is actually more normal than the norm—but we're just not used to recognizing it?

What if the fear, the clinging, the aversion, the spinning all the world around the idea of me, me, me—what if all the frustration, the internal suffering and sense of separation that seem to create us, to encompass us, to be the cage we have to break out of, that seem to hold us back from freedom—what if these are actually the aberration? But we just keep giving our attention, our energy, our trust, our refuge to the wrong place.

Think about it. When you're really down and out in moments of intensity, you don't have time to think through what's the proper Dharma perspective. You're off center, not really balanced, and something difficult happens. Where does the mind go in that moment for refuge?

It can be different places; I'm not saying there's only one. When I'm really balanced and something difficult happens, sometimes there's just a sense of, "Ah, that too." And then I think, "Wow, that's nice. I can see that." But there are times when I'm really unbalanced or tired or stressed, traveling and about to miss my connection at the airport, and somebody's in my way. That's a real test for me, I have to say. Somebody does something slow, and aversion just shoots out.

Okay—that was the refuge in the moment. That was the trust: if I can be pushy enough, I'll get on that plane.

Which, by the way, doesn't work. But just to see for ourselves.

And what if our path isn't so much the moment to moment effort where we've got to chip away the clinging, chip away the aversion, make a little mark on the blackboard each time we've chipped something away, try to hold on to some state, try to create some experience of peace? What if our path is much more about rediscovering the natural peace and ease? Learning how to re-recognize it, to have more confidence in it, to trust it more, no matter what's happening.

This is really something. When we're looking at practice from this angle, it has a whole different feeling. It really becomes fun. It really becomes quite delightful because there's nothing going on that we need to fight away. We wake up and we're filled with rage. Okay. Rage is like this. You can actually meet rage with interested awareness.

And that's the key—interested awareness. Rage is like this. When we meet rage with "oh my god, I'm so horrible," when we meet rage with rage, we're buying into it again, aren't we?

So all of you have, I know, many times in any day—on retreat we have more chance to notice—but many times in any day when the mind is not filled with greed, when the mind is not filled with aversion or self-hatred or judgment or fear, when the mind is not running that endless story of "what about me." Okay, maybe there aren't many, many moments, but there are some when the mind isn't running that story. And those moments we often tend not to notice because we're more tuned into "what about me," good or bad. "What about me" is often a story of how bad I am, how useless I am, but it's still all about me.

Just notice those simple moments where—what is it the Third Zen Patriarch said?—where nothing is missing, nothing is lacking, and nothing is in excess. And we're not relating anything back to me. Just this. The "just so" moments.

And it doesn't matter what's happening. In the middle of a sitting, there's just a moment of just breathing. And then later we go, "Oh, there was a moment. It was just the breath. The breath was just breathing itself. Oh my God—" Okay, that's not it anymore. But the moment when there's just breathing. Or hearing. Just hearing. Or thinking, but it's really just thinking. Or having a cup of tea and there's just heat. Or hearing a bird. Or feeling the fog. Or just standing.

But there's awake. You're awake. This isn't a moment when you're asleep or in a coma—that's not what I'm talking about. There's wakefulness, there's presence, but it's not filled with greed or aversion or any particular me-story. It's just this.

Notice those moments. You don't have to put a word on them. Any word is already too much. They're not huge—the neon lights don't go off, everything isn't suddenly different. And that's why we often don't notice them. We want the one big experience to be done with it all. And that's just more wanting. That's coming from the same place of me wanting something big to change me so I'll be different—I'll still be me, but different and better. Can't think it through that way.

The little moments of nothing special, but that exquisite presence. There's no me hanging around right then. Nothing to want, nothing missing.

Your back hurts or it doesn't hurt. It doesn't really matter in that moment. Your knee hurts, you're cold, there's a loud noise, or you wish it was bedtime. It doesn't really matter. Just little moments. Notice them.

We really need to give these moments the attention, the energy, the sense of re-re-cognizing, so that we can learn to shift where we have confidence, to shift where we put our trust—as I say, when the chips are down. That's a big part of our practice here.

And the other part, of course, is what we spend a lot of time caught up in: recognizing the habits, the reactions from the belief systems that seem to hide from us this natural peace and ease. You know what the habits are, right? The deep belief that if something is pleasant, it's good. That's so deep. It's good, it's right, it's the way it's supposed to be. If something is unpleasant—an unpleasant sensation in the body, an unpleasant sound, an unpleasant thought about yourself, an unpleasant perception, you think someone's looking at you cross-eyed because you did something wrong—you feel bad. Unpleasant equals bad or wrong. Something wrong with me.

The pleasant is to be gotten more of. The unpleasant is to be gotten rid of. And the neutral we don't even notice, to be overlooked.

But even more, in the sense of the delusion, is that relating it all back to me. It's pleasant, it's good, because it fuels my feeling good about myself. It's good for me. The unpleasant is bad or wrong only in relation to some sense of me that has the deep-set idea that peace and happiness is associated with pleasant feeling.

I'm not saying we aren't going to prefer pleasant feeling to unpleasant feeling. But really look deeply: how much of our life choices are posited on "this will get me more pleasant feeling"? How much of the way I even practice? I keep finding it over and over. I think I'm just being open and present. And then somewhere there's a little sense of struggle. I look, and ever so subtly, I've started to try and steer things in the direction of pleasant. Oh, that's the way it's supposed to go.

Do you ever have doubt about your practice when you're feeling good, when the experiences are smooth and pleasant and lights are going off? You come into the interview and we say, "You're just caught up in the defilements of insight." You don't want to hear that. You think, They don't know what they're talking about.

When you're caught and you're really seeing greed arising in a moment with every sense impression and you come in and say, "Oh my God, I'm hopeless. I'm just seeing craving in every moment"—and we say, "That's great. You're really seeing the truth of things. This is freeing to the heart and mind." You say, "Freeing? I don't think so. This isn't what I signed up for. I didn't come here to see greed and aversion arising in every moment. I came here to be peaceful, to feel good, to get into the jhānas, which keep greed and aversion away." And if we could stay in the jhānas from now until we die, that would be very nice. But we can't. And then greed and aversion come back.

So our job here is, from the confidence in that not-knowing, that open, loving quality of awareness that can just be with whatever—the confidence that that's accessible no matter what the experience is—this gives us the faith, the energy, the confidence to then meet even aversion, even clinging, even our self-judgment with this open-hearted mindfulness. Even our deepest demons. And yes, we have to work with them in different ways—I'm not saying you just dive in and go for it. But even our deepest demons, we can meet with mindfulness. They can be part of our gateway to freedom.

There's nothing, as one of my Burmese teachers said, there's nothing you need to be afraid of because there's nothing that mindfulness can't be with. There's nothing awareness can't be aware of. Nothing.

When we place our trust more and more in awareness through our own experience, you start to know that. You start to have confidence in that. And that freedom of mind, of heart from clinging, just begins to naturally, more and more, show itself.

We get a sense for what that means. It's not a state—it's a moment-to-moment activity. There's no state to reach. But as we trust that moment-to-moment activity, this loving, open, non-judging quality of mindfulness, the more we trust it, we come to see that even when we feel deeply spinning in some story, deeply spinning in some reactivity, somewhere we increasingly know: just like that, just like that. This whole spinning mess—oh, it's like this, as Ajahn Sumedho says.

We're aware of it. Not that it goes away, but that we shift our confidence from "this is who I am and I have to do something to get rid of this and this is unbearable, I can't stand it another moment" to simply: oh, it's like this. The unbearable nature of pain is like this.

It's still the unbearable nature of pain, don't get me wrong. But the shift of interest, the shift of trust has moved from the me experiencing unbearable pain who has to get out of it at any cost, to awareness of the unbearable nature of pain. It's like this. We really learn to love awareness—to trust it, to have confidence, to know that this is accessible. Awareness is truly the doorway to freedom of heart and mind, to freedom from suffering, to freedom from causing suffering for others.

So that's really the work of our meditation: to rediscover in many, many moments, over and over and over, the natural peace and ease of mind and body when the mind and heart isn't colored by wanting, when it isn't colored by hating, when it isn't colored by me-ing. And there are many such moments in our days. From that place of trusting and confidence, we can then explore the many moments when we feel really caught in reactivity, in fear, in wanting, in "it's all about me"—when it just feels so solid. It doesn't even feel solid; we just know this is how it is.

Sometimes it's only an intellectual remembering. "Oh yes, I remember I was able to be aware of aversion." We can't quite bring it in; it's just intellectual. But sometimes just remembering that can really help.

On a retreat I was just teaching last week in Burma, a young woman came who was going through a huge difficulty in her life—a major ending of a relationship, with all the external suffering and confusion and questioning herself that brings. You can imagine coming on retreat in that state. She was filled with aversion, she said. Aversion everywhere she turned. It was becoming unbearable. She was on the floor of her kuti, her little cottage, just sobbing.

And then suddenly—she'd been practicing a while, other retreats—suddenly she said, "Oh, right. This is just aversion." It sounds silly, perhaps, but she said it was just aversion. It was like she was in this well of aversion, but it just didn't stick anymore. It wasn't a problem. None of the situation changed. She saw all the aversion. She didn't push it away. She just recognized: "Oh, right. This is aversion in the mind." Awareness of aversion—aversion is like this.

In that moment, we're trusting in mindfulness. We're trusting in awareness again. It's not always possible. Sometimes we're too caught in the story, too caught in belief in the aversion. It's too strong. Or the energy of greed is stronger than the energy of awareness. Sure, plenty of times. That's what we're practicing for. But it's never lost. It's never hopeless. It's never further away than that.

And this is what we learn to trust for ourselves. Me telling you doesn't make any difference. But learning to really know that for yourself—that's everything.

The times when, like that young woman, when suddenly she said, "Oh, it's just aversion. Everywhere I look, but it's just aversion." And she was free. She felt so happy in that moment. And she was filled with aversion. That's not an aberration. That's possible. It happens for all of us sometimes, and it really fuels our trust.

So we recognize and strengthen confidence in the natural purity of heart and mind by recognizing those moments when the heart and mind is pure, and by recognizing what it's like when the heart and mind is colored by kilesa, by these distortions. They're suffering always, but it's not rocket science. One of my teachers makes it very simple to notice in our minds. We get all twisted up, but he said: In our practice here, if you're wanting something to happen, that's greed. It's not so hard to tell. You're trying to stop something from happening, or you want something different to happen—that's aversion, that's hatred or fear. Do you not have a clue what's happening? Well, that's delusion. But the other aspect of delusion is: are you relating everything that's happening as being me or mine? That's delusion. My knee, my aversion. Somebody's making a sound halfway across the room and it's bothering me. Just notice that.

So it's not rocket science. You're wanting something to happen—greed. You want something to stop happening, you want something different—aversion, hatred, or fear. You don't know what's happening, or it's all me or mine—delusion.

The trick is recognizing those. This isn't a judgment. I'm happy when I see aversion or dosa. I say dosa now because it's the Pali word that covers aversion, hatred, fear—all of it—and it makes it really impersonal. So I might be being really subtle, and I'm noting and noticing all these things, and suddenly I realize: oh, I'm trying to push that away. Oh, that's dosa in the mind. In that moment, the mind isn't colored by dosa anymore. It's become aware. Oh, dosa is like this. The trust has gone into the mindfulness.

Oh, wanting feels like this. We don't have to be afraid of wanting. We don't have to be afraid of pushing away, of aversion. We don't have to be afraid of delusion—that's just adding dosa on top of delusion. All we have to do is trust awareness enough that we can recognize.

And when awareness is being fed, when we're loving awareness in that moment, we're not loving the greed. We're not loving the aversion. When we're buying into it —"It is aversion and I am so bad"—that's feeding the aversion. "I am greedy, but that would really solve everything if I could only get it. This will be the last one." That's feeding the greed. "Oh, this will be the last one," and you're watching. Yeah, just watch. Is that the last one? Go ahead and eat that.

Does that end all greed? Funny, it didn't seem to do the job.

That's awareness. Always available, always accessible, and not so difficult.

One of my teachers asks: What's the difference between someone who practices mindfulness and someone who doesn't? He says a practitioner regards every object, every experience that arises with interest, as a chance to learn. A non-practitioner reacts with greed, hatred, and confusion.

From this perspective, every experience that comes is a chance to learn. We're not here to try to have better and better experiences. Every moment is an opening into awareness, and every moment of awareness is a potential gateway to freedom in that moment. And there's only this moment. The past moment is over, the future isn't here—there's only this moment.

Liberation arises, the purity of heart and mind arises, not from what's happening, but in how we meet this moment. So even the most ugly, fearful, painful experience, met with interest, met without fear—that's a moment of cultivating non-clinging. The most beautiful, sublime, subtle experience, met with "Wow, now I'm really getting somewhere"—that's cultivating greed. Recognizing "Oh, that's greed" is cultivating awareness again.

It's just like that. We're never more lost than this. And there's nothing we need to be afraid of. Nothing.

Byron Katie has a great line: "Loving what is." I like to think of awareness as being like that—our mindfulness practice. Just loving what is. And only when the heart and mind is clear in that way can we recognize accurately what is. It's the accurate recognition of what's really going on in our mind and body moment to moment that ultimately frees us from our wrong ideas, our inaccurate perceptions. As long as we perceive wrongly, we're going to keep building the world in an inaccurate way. We can only perceive accurately in those moments when the citta, the mind, the heart, is not looking through confusion.

So recognize this. Trust in it. Have confidence in all those little moments of just this, just this. And no matter how much you seem caught in fear or confusion, know that just recognizing that is already a moment of potential freedom, of feeding the heart and mind of non-clinging, no matter what's happening. Every moment here is the moment that can free our hearts and minds. There's no other moment. There's only this moment.

I'll end with something from Ajahn Sumedho:

"Awareness is not about making value judgments about our thoughts or emotions or actions or speech. Awareness is about knowing these things fully, that they are what they are at this moment. What I found very helpful was learning to be aware of conditions without judging them. In this way, the resultant karma of past actions and speech as it arises in the present is fully recognized without compounding it, without making it into a problem. It is what it is. What arises ceases. As we recognize that and allow things to cease according to their nature, the realization of cessation gives us an increasing amount of faith in the practice of non-attachment and letting go."

CHAPTER 54

Yathā Bhūta: Things As They Are

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this talk from a month-long retreat, Carol Wilson examines the profound Pāli phrase yathā bhūta (things as they are) and its centrality to Buddhist practice. She explains how yathā bhūta ñāṇadassana—knowledge and vision of things as they are—forms the ground for liberation, since in moments of truly perceiving reality without distortion, clinging and aversion naturally fall away.

Wilson offers a nuanced exploration of the First Noble Truth, clarifying that dukkha extends far beyond mere suffering to encompass the inherent unreliability and friction of conditioned experience. Drawing on the etymology of dukkha as a poorly-fitting axle hole creating friction, she illuminates how even pleasant experiences are included within dukkha because of their impermanent nature. She emphasizes that understanding dukkha is not meant to generate aversion but to reveal how our habitual reactions of craving and resistance—rooted in ignorance—perpetuate confusion and obscure clear seeing.

Through practical examples from retreat life and the Buddha's own post-awakening existence, Wilson demonstrates that awakening is not an escape from life's difficulties but a transformed relationship with experience. She guides practitioners toward bare mindfulness—attention beneath concept—where sensation is met without the overlay of 'my knee' or elaborate stories. This accepting, loving presence with what is allows reality to reveal itself, releases energy bound up in reactivity, and opens space for genuine compassion and appropriate response.

So now we're about a week into this retreat, however long you're going to be here. And a week is enough time to find out that maybe what you thought was going to happen isn't happening—to find that everybody's practice is starting to develop in your own particular way. People start going into different areas, and that's exactly as it should be happening. But it's also a time when some people are just going along, while others, without realizing it, can find themselves struggling in some subtle way with "this isn't really what I thought it would be like. I don't know how I thought it would be, but not exactly like this."

What I want to talk about tonight actually feels like the same talk over and over. But that's okay. There's a phrase in Pali that appears often in the suttas: yathā bhūta, which means "things as they are, reality as it is." Yathā bhūta.

One of the deep, high insights—an insight, an understanding that's the ground for liberation—is in Pali yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana. You see that a lot in the suttas, and it's generally translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they are." So this seeing things as they are, reality as it is, yathā bhūta, is really the core, the essence, the seed of our whole practice. It's basically what we're yammering on about all the time: seeing things as they are, yathā bhūta.

This knowledge and vision—just in a moment, when there's a real kind of opening, let's call that insight, that ñāṇa, that wisdom of knowledge of things as they are—it leads to liberation. Because when the perception, when the mind, when the heart is truly perceiving things—self, others, sense experience, whatever arises in a moment—as it truly is, seeing it as it truly is in that moment, the wisdom of that releases the mind and heart from clinging, from aversion, from the sense of "me." Those reactions, those responses to life are based on our ongoing misperception and misunderstanding of things as they really are.

So that's what's so simple but also magical about the Buddha's understanding and about our practice. We say it over and over: we're not here to create some other reality or to get out of this one. We're here to actually find out what this reality actually is. I just love that phrase, yathā bhūta.

And what allows for our accurate seeing of things as they are in a moment? Mindfulness, of course—clear perception. And what allows for clear perception, for mindfulness, is the quality of acceptance, in just one moment. To see how reality is in this moment, it's necessary to be fully present with total acceptance of things as they are in this moment.

I want to elaborate on that a bit—on yathā bhūta, on what hides things as they are, and how mindfulness can help with that. Acceptance of things as they are, with mindfulness, with clear connectedness, opens the mind and heart to the liberation, the freedom of non-clinging. And that allows for—not passivity, this acceptance is not about passivity—it allows for a clear, compassionate, appropriate response, because we're actually responding to what's actually going on rather than our ideas and constructions and delusions about things.

But don't believe me.

When we talk about the roots of our suffering, our confusion—when they're spoken of as the kilesas, the qualities, the factors in the heart and mind in a moment of greed, of hatred or aversion or fear, of ignorance, confusion, delusion—we say these are the seeds of suffering. On one level, at times, that's obvious. Usually it's more obvious with aversion and hatred and fear than with the others. It's obvious that in themselves, we don't like them too much and that they seem to be causing us suffering.

But that's not really the most subtle, most pervasive way these things cause us suffering. They contribute to, they're the causes of our confusion, of our delusion, because when greed, hatred, and confusion are in the consciousness, coloring our heart and mind, coloring our perception, we cannot perceive or recognize accurately. When greed or hatred or fear or ignorance or confusion or the "me" story is clouding us—when we don't recognize that it's present in the mind and it's clouding, coloring our perception—we can't see accurately. There's no way.

And so what we respond to isn't what's happening at all. It just keeps self-perpetuating, like a rolling snowball. We get further and further from what's really going on and wonder why our actions, with the best will in the world, just don't seem to achieve what we want.

What I want to talk about mostly here is the first two noble truths. I think it's really interesting, and the more I've practiced, the more I've come to really appreciate that when the Buddha decided to describe to the world, to people, what we need to know to actually recognize things as they are—what we need to know to free the heart and mind from anguish, from confusion—the first thing he picked, his first truth, is this truth called dukkha.

I want to talk about that, because I think it's profound. If it was as obvious as it seems to be, why would the Buddha need to lay it out and say that this truth needs to be understood? That's the action he recommends for the first noble truth of dukkha: the truth of dukkha is to be understood. Not to be avoided, not to be transcended—it's to be understood.

I want to talk a little about my understanding, my limited understanding, and the things I've read that help give a sense of the naturalness of this truth of dukkha and how understanding it contributes to recognizing accurately, and how that contributes to ease, freedom, peace of mind, peace of heart—a heart and mind of non-clinging.

So, to be understood: dukkha. We all know this word, and it's generally translated in shorthand as "suffering." Often when we hear the first noble truth from non-Buddhists in particular, they say, "Well, Buddhists say life is suffering. What a down thing. I'm not really interested in that." And then so-called Buddhists also say life is suffering.

The first noble truth is dukkha, often translated as suffering. But this is far too narrow an understanding for the depth of the first noble truth.

Dukkha is a word that can be used in different ways. One is dukkha as pain—dukkha-dukkha. When the first noble truth is written out, one aspect of dukkha is simply this: flat-out unpleasant pain. In the suttas, when the vedana—the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feeling tones that Andrea talked about today—the unpleasant physical one is named dukkha. So the word is often used to mean plain unpleasantness, suffering.

But in terms of the first noble truth, understanding dukkha as mere unpleasantness is far too limited. When we think of it that way—which I often do too, using the word dukkha specifically to relate to unpleasantness—we speak of "dukkha times" in retreat. We don't mean the times you're lost in rapture, do we? We mean the times when it's just ugh. But that's not the first noble truth.

You're good, just laughing about dukkha. That helps. It lightens things up. Don't put it in a little hole.

One of my teachers pointed out that when we think of dukkha as suffering, as soon as we contemplate the first noble truth, isn't there a tinge of aversion? You think "first noble truth," and then "dukkha, suffering"—you don't go, "Wow, how freeing is this!" And that's not helpful. The Buddha's not saying, "Let's get down with aversion. That's what I'm all about." I don't think so. As soon as we're into ugh, first noble truth, we're not getting it. We're not broadening our view.

What I have to say may not exactly lead you into bliss. But just to get a sense: the understanding of the first noble truth has nothing to do with aversion. It has everything to do with freeing our heart and mind from confusion.

The derivation of the word dukkha is illuminating. If any of you have read Analayo's book on the Satipatthana—which I think is a great book because he pulls together so many different strands with really good scholarship, and if you read the footnotes, they take you in all different directions, and he's fairly balanced about bringing in different opinions—just a little plug for that. When he describes the etymology of dukkha, I love what he says. One etymology suggests disharmony, friction. He gives the derivation of duh as difficulty, and kha as the axle hole in the round wooden wheel of an ox cart—which they still use in Burma. It's this big round wooden wheel with a hole through which the wooden axle goes. If it's not properly fitting in its hole—and mostly it's not, these aren't exactly highly streamlined machines—there's friction, some rubbing every time the wheel turns. That's dukkha: this kind of friction.

Another derivation he offers is "standing badly"—uncomfortable, uneasiness. That's really more the sense of dukkha. Not that it's good or bad, but simply calling us to notice accurately in our lives that so much of the time there's this sense of things not quite fitting.

It's not that everything is awful suffering all the time, but there is that—and that's part of it. The dukkha-dukkha part acknowledges: yes, there's pain. Birth is pain. There's old age, sickness, and death. None of us gets out alive, right? That's part of it. Not all of it, but part of it.

Yet even that, obvious as it seems—someone was just saying today, and we all do it—well, it's obvious, but my mind goes, "Okay, to other people." It's obvious I'm going to get sick and die, but not now. Really notice this. I noticed it in my own mind recently. I don't know, it wasn't anything serious. Nothing horrible was happening. But I was lying down somewhere, and things got really fuzzy, like my blood pressure dropped or something, and I almost fainted. I could see my mind going, "Oh—"

Well, I wonder if this is the thing. You know, who knows? I wonder if this is the thing that's like dying or that's really starting something. And that was a moment of just open curiosity—well, I wonder. Immediately followed by, no, not now. Not me. Not going to happen now. And it wasn't, you know. But just to see how the mind does that. Yeah, sure, we know, but...

And that's the obvious part, the most obvious part of the first noble truth of dukkha.

I'll get to say what we do with that as I go on, but there's that. There's another aspect, the secondary aspect of dukkha as a noble truth. Of course, there's pleasant experience. There's beautiful experience. Dukkha isn't just about unpleasant vedana. It's about the fact that there's pleasant feeling, there's neutral feeling, there's unpleasant feeling, and they're all constantly changing. That dukkha part is that there's nothing that we can, or anyone can, rely upon, hold to—really, for more than a fraction of a minute—for any kind of lasting happiness or suffering. So it's this unreliability of things that he's calling dukkha.

Remember, that doesn't mean aversion. The aversion comes in the second noble truth—why we suffer from this. But the fact is, there's one place where the Buddha says, in terms of feeling tone—some conversation I think he was having with Sariputta about Sariputta's awakening—he says, "All feeling..." Let me say exactly: "Whatever is felt"—and by felt he's talking about vedana, feeling, this sense of pleasantness, unpleasantness, neutrality, which is a mental experience, experience of the mind—"whatever is felt is included within dukkha." Not because it means it's all unpleasant, but because whatever is felt, whatever arises due to condition, ceases. And he's calling that the first truth of dukkha because we can't hold to it for any stability, for any lasting peace, sense of self, or pleasure, or reliability. Just nothing's reliable.

When we understand that—in those moments, you know, and we all have moments. I keep saying moments because everything's moments. If you're waiting for the lasting understanding that you never have to look again, we tend to discount... First, that's never going to happen because nothing's lasting, but we then discount it because, as I said last week, it's just moments. So in a moment, when you're really seeing, "Oh, that's nothing I can hold to"—you will have moments of that—in that moment, craving and clinging doesn't arise, or if it's there, it just goes away because it doesn't make sense. It just doesn't make sense. You don't have to talk yourself out of it. It just doesn't make sense because yathabhuta jnanadasana—when we're seeing things the way they are, just the reality of things—clinging doesn't make sense. It's not some huge renunciation. It's a moment of opening to how things are, of tenderness, connectedness to life as it is. No need to push away what's difficult. No need to hold on to what's pleasant to try and confirm a sense of me.

But as is everything, those moments are also fleeting. And then here we are again, and ah, no, it's so hard.

So pleasant is also included within dukkha. And that's to be understood. That's not to be hated. This is just to see how it is.

The Buddha, saying to really understand this, says, "Before my enlightenment, oh monks, while I was still a bodhisatta, it occurred to me: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger in the world? And what is the escape from the world? And then it occurred to me: Whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, this is the gratification in the world."

He's not saying we hate pleasure and joy, open to dukkha and never smile again. He's not saying that. He's saying the pleasure and joy there is in the world, the pleasant vedana, this is the gratification. That the world is impermanent, bound up with dissatisfaction, and subject to change—this is the danger in the world. The abandoning of desire and lust for the world—by the world, he's just meaning any of the sixth sense experiences—the abandoning of desire and lust for the world, this is the escape from the world. He's using "world" in that way.

We may hear "escape from the world" as somehow zooming off to some other realm, as if you don't have to live in this world. That is not the Buddha's awakening. What he's talking about is: what's the danger? There is gratification. We enjoy it. We appreciate it.

But we just, as Eckhart Tolle says, appreciate the beautiful. We just don't look to it to give us something that it cannot provide, which is some sense of lasting anything—happiness, pleasure, sense of self. A moment of pleasure, a moment of love, a moment of ease, a moment of unpleasantness. We don't look to any of it to be more than just what it is in that moment. It is to be understood.

In this understanding, we start to see—just from this yathā bhūta—it opens us into seeing that the second noble truth, which is often said to state that the cause of suffering is taṇhā, thirst, craving, really needs to be expanded. Because there's no craving without ignorance, without not seeing clearly, without delusion. Really, that's the aspect of ignorance, of delusion. It doesn't mean we're stupid jerks. It means we don't recognize accurately. We perceive wrongly, and on that wrong perception, we have thoughts and emotions and reactions, and we create a whole world in two-tenths of a second based on one perception, and then start suffering from it.

So the cause of our anguish is all these reactions of heart and mind—the clinging to the pleasant, the fear, the aversion, the pushing away of the unpleasant vedanā or experiences we rate as unpleasant. And both of these are fueled, only arise, when there's ignorance, confusion, delusion in the mind. We'll talk more about that.

Now, these reactions seem natural. I mean, it seems instinctive, doesn't it? If there's an unpleasant sensation, or if there's a hot flame and you stick your finger in and it hurts, you pull your finger back. We're not saying you don't do that. That's normal. That's obvious. That's what our mind does with unpleasant—it pulls back and goes, "Oh no, that shouldn't be happening." That just seems normal. Of course bad things shouldn't be happening.

When something is pleasant, we like it. Here in your sittings, in your walkings, when the body's at ease, you think, "Yeah, right, that's how it should be." Relax. Now I'm relaxed. That's right. That's correct. That's how it's supposed to be. Then the pain comes in the back. That's incorrect. That's wrong. And this just seems normal. That's how we live our life. You see why the first noble truth is so profound.

The delusion part—one aspect is we just don't know what the heck's going on. But that's actually the most obvious type of delusion. That one we wake up from eventually, one hopes. The more subtle delusion is the misperception, the not seeing, and that fueling the sense that it's really all about me. Because if we're reacting with greed to the pleasant and aversion to the unpleasant, that's only because it's me here. I'm not really reacting with such aversion if you get stuck with a fork. That's all, "Gee, I'm really sorry, that must hurt." But if it's me, it's like, "Oh my God, this is unbearable."

Actually, that's why—just moving from that into compassion—compassion is actually an expression of the non-deluded heart and mind. Because compassion is: she's stuck with the fork, and I feel it. It doesn't mean empathetically that I physically feel it, but there's that sense of it's not worse because it's happening to me than because it's happening to her. There's just this sense of, "Oh, this pain, this suffering is suffering." The heart's open to it, whatever the source, because there's not that delineation, that separation of, "Well, I'm sorry for you, but let's keep things straight—it's all about me."

You were laughing because it does seem normal that unpleasant stuff is wrong, and that's where our mind goes about it. We blame ourselves. We blame the world. We think we've got to get it. Really, really deep down, enlightenment at some level is about things should get more pleasant.

Enlightenment is not about thinking, "All this back pain I'm having, these traumatic memories that are coming up, these unpleasant feelings—they're in the way of my practice. They must go away so that I can see what's really going on, which is subtle and refined and concentrated and hopefully blissful." No. Yathābhūta—things as they are, now, in this moment.

I was going to read this later, but it seems to be coming up now. This is actually from Adyashanti, and I really like it. He's saying "abiding," but I'm using "acceptance," which is clear mindfulness meeting what's happening just as it is:

"Accepting means letting everything be as it already is, no matter what it is. If you're feeling good, let that be as it is. If you're feeling bad, let that be as it is. No matter what your emotional, physical, or mental state, let it be as it is, not wishing for it to be otherwise."

And I'll add: if you're wishing for it to be otherwise, notice that and let it be as it is.

If you want it to be different from what it is, that's not acceptance. You're picking and choosing and trying to control your experience—which of course we all do because it's so deeply ingrained, so natural. That's why we don't understand the first noble truth, why we think unpleasant is the problem, why we imagine awakening is somehow going to rid us of this problem.

Recognizing and understanding the truth of dukkha leads us to being able to see how these habits of reactivity—of aversion, of grasping and clinging, of delusion, of making it all about me—feed the confusion, the dissatisfaction, the pain. Because everything we're doing to try and fix the pain, to try and feel happy, is predicated on not recognizing things as they are.

Something that really helped me—and it was pretty far into my practice when this happened—was realizing that I would think I was just being with what is, being with what is. I really believed I understood. And then I'd find that little niggling seed back there: "Oh no, I'm going for it. It should be pleasant. This bad thing shouldn't be happening. This unpleasant thing shouldn't be happening. It's wrong, it's bad, it's my fault, or it's your fault, or it's the weather's fault, or it's somebody's fault—because it's not supposed to be happening." Or, "I'm a failure." That's the other way we turn it back on ourselves, right? You're doing good when it's pleasant. When it's unpleasant, you're a failure. You can't do this practice. It isn't working. All of those things.

What helped me—and this is not profound, it's more of a "duh" moment, as in dukkha, but a "duh" experience—was looking at the Buddha's life after he was enlightened. Fully enlightened. The fully enlightened one, freed from anguish, freed from suffering. No more greed, hatred, or delusion arising in his heart, in his mind. That's one of the ways a freed mind and heart is described, and I have to say, that does sound pretty nice, doesn't it? No more reactivity to experience. Without greed, hatred, or delusion—just pure being with things as they are. Wakeful, but not resisting.

But looking at his life after enlightenment, it wasn't... if you try to just imagine living the life he was living, it doesn't sound like a birthday party. Unless you hate birthday parties. He spent forty-five years after he was awakened walking around India barefoot, teaching, eating one meal a day, going begging for his food, forming a sangha of monks, a sangha of nuns. And if you read the suttas, if you read the Vinaya, people were the same then as now. You listen to the politics, you listen to what's going on in the EU when they meet, you listen to any kind of group of people meeting and trying to come to decisions. Take it to meditation centers—I've got news for you, it's the same thing.

You read how all the rules in the Vinaya came about. The monks are always going, "Oh, he's doing this, she's doing that." And the Buddha said, "Okay, I have to make a rule. You don't do this, you don't do that." Trying to keep the peace. Trying not to have the lay people lose their faith.

Anyway, looking at his life: he had the choice when he fully awakened. He could, at will, spend all of his time in deepest samādhi, in complete bliss of peace. Or he could put his mind into nibbāna, into cessation, and just hang out there. And you'll see suttas where he said, "I've just come from a calm day's abiding, from a pleasant day's abiding."

He could have spent his whole life doing that, but he didn't. Motivated by compassion, by a sense of seeing the unnecessary suffering of beings, he chose otherwise. But his life was not one of comfort. It was not one of ease. It was not one of pleasant vedana, particularly at all.

He could have chosen any way to live. He chose the life of a renunciate. He was willing to be a teacher, which had both all the joys and the beauty of sharing the Dhamma and the Sangha difficulties. And just being in India with all of these wanderers coming around, haggling with him all the time. There's lots of suttas like that. He gives his teaching, and they shake their heads and go away. Rivalries. His cousin Devadatta tried to kill him and take over the Sangha. There were sorrowful things where some of his clan's people got involved in a war over water rights and many of them were killed, and he had to go help pacify that. His most beloved, favorite disciples died shortly before he did. And they're just saying he was aware. I mean, he wasn't prostrate with grief, but he was aware of their being gone. And he said, "Look, I see the Sangha is empty, empty of Sariputta and Moggallana." You get that sense of loss.

In other words, he awoke into this life, not into some rarefied Deva realm. He was in a body. He died of food poisoning. He had headaches. He would have to go lie down. He was living a life in a body like we are now. Yet he was free of suffering. He was not free of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral vedana. He was not free of the fact that everything changes. He was free of seeing things inaccurately and needing for things to be different in order to be at ease. He was really awakened fully into this world, fully engaged in this world with people, with beings. And he didn't just stay with people, but with beings in all realms, of all walks of life.

And so when I looked at that, I thought, whoa, this awakening isn't about escaping from life, and it isn't about getting rid of my body pains, my personality. We'd like to, maybe, but here it is. It's about understanding—understanding where the suffering really is and where the freedom is. And it's right here. The freedom's here and the suffering's here, because there's only here. But the freedom is in that recognizing accurately, yatha bhuta, the reality of what's happening in mind and body in this moment.

So I want to talk a bit about how greed, hatred, and confusion distort the perception—just a little bit—how they cause our suffering and increase it and perpetuate it, because they're so familiar. They're so familiar. And then our familiar reaction—like when we see clinging or grasping, for example, or we see aversion—and then we have the intellectual understanding, "Oh, this is the cause of suffering." It's so ingrained that what's our usual reaction to that? Aversion. "Oh, there's aversion. I shouldn't be having aversion." This is just a natural, ingrained response. Clinging. "Oh my God, all I'm seeing is clinging. It's hopeless. I'm hopeless. I'll never be happy." Aversion to the clinging.

And when we come in and we say, you know what? That's great. Seeing clinging arising in every moment, that's fantastic, because that's the way to freedom when you really see it. I'm happy when I see clinging in my mind, because when I see it, it's not coloring the show. When I don't see it, that's a whole other story.

When I recognize aversion, I'm glad to recognize it. I'm not saying I'm glad it's there. I'm not saying, "Oh great, welcome aversion, let's kiss it, we love it." I'm not saying that. But I'm glad to recognize it.

It's just nature. Clinging is just nature. It's just the way our minds are habituated. Delusion is just nature. You're not some special person more filled with clinging than anybody else here. Nobody gets points for being the most clinging person, or the most aversive person, or the most deluded person. We all have all of it. We take turns being the most, being the least. It's just nature manifesting and changing all the time. Don't take it so personally.

Clinging comes up, and we make a whole big story about it. Me, me, me. And then we're suffering. But clinging comes—oh, clinging is like this. Okay, I don't like it too much. Oh, aversion is like this. Wow, it's all about me. Me is like this.

I'm serious. I know it's not always that easy. But notice the place that you stop—the place that the moment-to-moment noticing stops. Because that's the place where we've landed. And it's not always a pleasant place; sometimes it's an unpleasant place. But that's where we've landed and started to really get into the story of me, whatever it is. But again, recognizing is just that Tai Chi move. Oh, story of me is like this. And then it all starts flowing again.

So how do these habits obscure? I'm just going to give some simple examples, obvious ones, starting with clinging, with craving, which is, as Andrea said this morning, the habit of mind that follows unpleasant when there's not awareness, when there's not attention. But we don't have to be afraid of it. We just watch to see how the mind works. Yathābhūta—how the mind works, both with delusion and with clear seeing.

One thing with clinging: when, say, there's craving for an object—a good kind of food, or for lunch, or you saw someone put their spare pillow back there and you noticed it, and the whole sitting you were just clinging, thinking, "How can I get out of here first and get to that pillow before someone else does?" That's clinging. Simple. The suffering of that is relatively obvious, isn't it?

But not always. Clinging is sometimes hard to separate—the attachment from the object we're clinging to. Especially for people where clinging really comes a lot with pleasant objects, and you can go and get the pleasant object. When you get the pleasant object, the clinging goes away, you have the pleasant object, and you feel peace. And you think, "Well, what was the big problem with that?"

In fact, someone at the last retreat I was teaching was asking this. He was saying, "Well, if I move and then it doesn't hurt, that's fine. So what's the problem with clinging? I think I want to not hurt, I move, it doesn't hurt. Are you saying you just never do anything?" Of course we're not saying that. But it's learning to tease out the difference between clinging and the object clung to—that's what makes the difference.

The Tibetans have a great phrase for this: a kind of clinging puts feathers on the object.

It kind of brightens it up. You want something and it just looks so great, so wonderful. You can't see clearly. And then the clinging narrows our field of perception. It narrows our mind. It narrows our heart. You can almost feel it like that.

In fact, the Buddha said that clinging and aversion are makers of measurement in the mind, in the heart. And you can really feel that. How does it feel when you're just doing a walking meditation, you're just walking and very present, and the lunch bell rings? Is there a change in the mind, in the walking? Just notice that.

It doesn't have anything to do with whether the thing wanted is bad or good. We're not saying there's anything wrong with clinging to lunch. You need lunch. Everyone needs to eat. What's the problem? Don't get into that rationality thing. Notice the effect when there's clinging in the mind. It's got nothing to do with any kind of value judgment of the thing clung to. The thing clung to could be a piece of pizza or the idea of enlightenment. It's nothing about what's clung to. It's that quality of clinging, craving in itself. It's a particular factor of mind that narrows.

I'll give you an example. A few years ago I was teaching a retreat in Yucca Valley, which is in the desert in Southern California. I really love it—it's a wonderful desert with Joshua trees and animals. Everyone loves walking out in that desert. And one of the thrills, the things that people love if they're walking, is to get to see one of the big tortoises. There are a few out there, but they're shy and they hide and you don't necessarily get to see them.

This one year I was out walking, and I just loved being in that desert. At that time, just walking, present, whatever's there—there wasn't a sense of measurement. There wasn't a sense of me or other, just being. And then it popped into my mind, "Oh, maybe I'll see a tortoise." That was just a thought, but it turned into craving. "I want to see a tortoise." And my walk changed. It's like the scope narrowed. I got tense. I'm looking for a tortoise. I'm walking a little and I'm looking. And my mind is going, "Not tortoise, not tortoise, not tortoise." You're just looking for the thing. That's what clinging does. That's what clinging does.

Notice that it's a maker of measurement. Often we can get the thing clung to, and that hides the fact of the suffering of clinging. It's the suffering of measurement. It's the suffering of making difference. And then we go on to create whole worlds. I don't have to describe how we create whole worlds out of clinging, out of wanting.

So here, when we notice clinging, we don't talk ourselves out of it. We turn around, look back at the wanting mind itself. Experience it. See if what I'm saying resonates with your experience. Do you feel that sense of tightness, that sense of narrowness? Hang with it. Instead of going to get what you want—we get what we want and we feel happy. Why? Because the clinging went away. That's why we feel happy. The Buddha's brilliant insight is that we could be happy without getting what we want, simply by noticing when clinging arises. "Oh, clinging's like this."

This is how clinging is experienced in the mind and the body, yathā bhūta. Clinging is like this. It's simply a mental experience, with some physical expressions perhaps. I often feel a physical tightness. And it's just another arising experience—nothing to hate or fear. Clinging is like this. It will go away because everything does. And then just notice: peace, until the next clinging arises.

Aversion is much the same, only it manifests more as either a lashing out, a pushing away, or a pulling away. But it's the same kind of experience in how it distorts our perception and our judgment.

It's interesting because with aversion—dosa, usually translated as hatred—it's about some unpleasant sight, sound, smell, taste, mental experience, or touch that's happening now, because there's only now. Even a memory of something horrible in the past is a memory arising now. You can experience the unpleasantness of it, and aversion springs up: "This shouldn't be happening." That reaction really comes from not understanding the first noble truth. This unpleasant thing shouldn't be happening, and there's some way I can either stop it or get out of here and not have to deal with it—or blame somebody, or fix the world, or zone out completely, or take a pill.

I'm not saying we don't take pills when we're in pain. I'm not saying that. But notice how aversion completely distorts our judgment because we're so fearful of the unpleasant. We're so aversive to the unpleasant that it's almost like we're afraid to even go there. And we can do all kinds of crazy things not to feel it, or to fix it, or to make it go away.

Aversion can actually distort our visual perception. If you're really angry with somebody—really angry and caught in it—and you keep looking at them, how do they look? Do they look nice? Do you think, "Oh, I really like their hair today"? No. Your mind goes to everything that's wrong with them, things you never knew were wrong with them. When the mind is in aversion, it seeks out the unpleasant, and it just riles itself up. It spins in it.

It's like when you have a little jagged tooth, a small piece that's broken off. It doesn't even hurt. Can your tongue leave that little jagged piece alone? All your other teeth are fine. Is your tongue noticing your other teeth? No. But this little jagged tooth—you're ready to go mad after a day. Why? Just a little unpleasant experience that we fixate on.

The Buddha said, "When one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will"—and that's how it feels when we're caught; it doesn't mean forever, but even in a moment we're obsessed, oppressed by ill will—"and when one does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is. One doesn't see one's own good or the good of others or the good of both."

I would say the same for craving. When we're obsessed with craving, when we're obsessed with ill will, we can't see things as they really are. And when we need to act, we can't see what's good for ourselves, what's good for others, or what's good for both.

So acceptance—this quality of mindfulness that simply meets what's happening, whether pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, not for any result but just to see what's happening now—that quality of acceptance is not passive. It's what allows for clear seeing, the clear vision of things as they are. And that allows for appropriate response, clear decision.

The Buddha lived a very active life. He made clear decisions about how to live, not passive at all. But those decisions can be based more on reality.

A simple example: a friend of mine who lives in Massachusetts was invited by a very close friend to come teach a weekend in Washington, D.C. It was an eight-hour drive, and she really didn't want to do it. She was already busy, already stressed. Cramming in this weekend would push her over an edge. It wasn't something that would save all beings—she genuinely didn't want to do it.

But this friend was a dear friend. And so whenever my friend would think of saying no, it felt so unpleasant. She felt so bad at having to decline that the very thought of it—she was aversive to that thought. She didn't even want to go near that unpleasant feeling. So in order to avoid having to face it, she came extremely close to agreeing to go do this thing that would have really put her over the edge. Just to avoid one unpleasant feeling of saying no to her friend, she would have gone into a whole stressful weekend and subsequent probably illness. It's crazy. We can't see clearly.

Thankfully, she caught herself. She said, "Oh, that's what I'm doing. I can just call my friend and with all the love in my heart say, this is the truth of my situation. I can't do it right now." And of course, her friend was totally fine with that. It was all a manufactured story.

But we can't see clearly when our mind is obsessed with wanting, when our mind is obsessed with not wanting. And both of them, of course, lead to the mind being obsessed with: it's all about me. Me, me, me. This is where the thoughts and the whole creation of a world just springs out—from a reaction of holding onto pleasant or pushing away unpleasant.

Again, don't believe me. See if you notice.

Since we're all here in this room together, going through all different kinds of experiences, a very common example is when someone else in the room is making a noise. Our story is they shouldn't be making that noise, or it's ruining my concentration. That's the story. Or somebody's moving, or they come in late, or they leave early, or somebody gets ahead of you in the lunch line. It doesn't take much to find something.

And to see how, in the beginning when it first happens—there's a sound, it's unpleasant—there's an immediate story about it, isn't there? They shouldn't be doing that, or they're doing it because of this or that, or this is the effect it's having on me. Should I move? Should I not? I shouldn't move because then they'll know. Or I shouldn't move because I should be a better yogi than this. A whole world is created, isn't it?

And even if you try not to do it, you have a whole idea of who that other person is, their life story, how completely insensitive they are, how they shouldn't have been allowed on this retreat. And I mean, no one here has said this, but I've been in retreats with people whose minds go to throttling the other person, hitting them over the head. It gets out there. Thank God you're in silence.

When the hindrances take over and you're talking—oh my God.

So that's the whole world. And when we're not recognizing what's actually happening—there's just a perception of a sound, it's unpleasant, and then how that relates to me, I don't like it, and then thoughts start—that's what's happening.

At some point, maybe the thoughts change. Maybe the mind quiets down, and the same sound comes again, and this time it doesn't register as unpleasant. It registers as neutral. Oh. And then all those thoughts don't come that time.

It's just hearing. Neutral. Another thought arises, kind of like, "Well, what now?" And then the mind generally makes up another story, which is just as plausible to us. But what it means is, "Oh, I see—I made that up, but now it's not that way. Ah, this person's really not how I thought, and I'm actually much wiser than I thought." And so it goes. And maybe we notice that, and maybe we don't. If we do notice it, fine, great, because yathabhuta—that's what the mind does. Mindfulness can simply notice that. We don't have to stop it. That's aversion. That's what the mind does. "But I don't think it should do that. It should do—" No. Yathabhuta. How does the mind work? When there's pleasant and we don't recognize, it goes into wanting. It makes up all these stories.

Joseph likes to say we're making it all up. And he's not exaggerating. Watch that. But with humor, just say, "Wow. Make it up." And sometimes do it on purpose. Notice you're wanting something, and just with real awareness, watch the story the mind creates. But watch it. And then take your attention right back to the sense door. Say it was a smell at lunch and it got hunger going. Just go right back into smelling, smelling. Notice if it's pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. That's not in your control. It just arises. But that can change from moment to moment.

Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral is not inherent in the object. It's a felt experience in the mind. Something that I, in this moment, experience as pleasant, someone else might experience as neutral or unpleasant. Something I experience as pleasant now, I might experience as unpleasant or neutral at another time. There's nothing steady-state here.

So when you've got a whole story going and you notice it, just come back. If there's some experience arising again—a smell, a sound, a sight—come right back into seeing, right at the eye door. Smelling, right at the nose door. Notice if there's pleasant, unpleasant, neutrality, and then see if any story comes. How does that affect me? That's how the story starts. And see where that goes with awareness, just watching it. The more we watch it, the less energy it has.

It's amusing. Sometimes the stories are useful, but we know we don't have to believe them all. And in the middle of one, you go, "Wow, that's really quite a story. And I really believe it too." And then you just feel, ugh, you know—aversion. And that's just what's happening right now. Aversion. You don't have to fight it away. It's really fascinating.

So the escape—the escape from unpleasant, the escape from the aversion, from the clinging to delusion—is simply this quality of mindfulness. Acceptance. Bare mindfulness means mindfulness of just what's happening, not of our concept about what's happening.

That is so key, and that's what we're pointing to so much in the interviews. When we say, "What's happening?" you say, "Oh, well, you know, the breath is like fire, and it's swirling." Yeah, well, what does it feel like? "Well, you know, it's like this, and the air, and the pressure." Yeah, but what's the sensation? "You know, pressure." I mean, it's kind of deflating, isn't it? But that's yathabhuta.

Oh, yes. Pressure. And if you look, it may be deflating, but it's also quite peaceful. We're addicted at times to our endless stories, even though that's where the suffering is. Who would I be without my incredibly obnoxious personality? But that's just fear. It won't go away—I really won't. But that sense of "oh, it's just this, just this," free of concept, is liberating.

It's about noticing just what is, not our concept of what is. And this is very tricky. For example, there's a burning feeling—"there's a pain in my knee." And that might be said not with aversion, but simply, "Oh, there's a pain in my knee." But that's already concept. If you recognize "a pain in my knee," my knee is an idea. It's a useful idea—I'm not saying it's wrong—but are you actually experiencing "my knee"? What is that? What you're experiencing is a particular sensation. Maybe it's burning. Maybe it's tingling. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Just that one sensation.

As soon as we go to "my knee," measurement has come in. It's a knee belonging to me. And if you look—if you're really with the sensation—for it to be "my knee," there's a reference back to some sense of "me," some looking outside that bare experience to something else. Comparison: my knee. And immediately it goes to "how will I make it through the sitting?" It goes right into the future. "My knee" goes right to the whole story of my health, my whole life, the skiing accident I had twenty-five years ago. "How am I going to make it through the rest of this month? I have to go to the managers. What about the hospital?" That far away from the bare sensation of burning—that far away from "my knee," right?

Burning. It's just burning. I mean, it's just burning. That's peace. It's still burning, but it's peace. There's just not all these constructions.

So that's really what we're talking about with this sense of bare mindfulness—mindfulness that accepts what is, just meets whatever's happening without resistance, without pushing away, without holding on, without picking and choosing, without making a meaning for it.

Sharon Salzberg likes to say that to pay attention is to love. This mindfulness, this accepting quality of mindfulness, is really what Byron Katie means when she speaks of loving what is. Whatever is arising in this moment is what is. Loving what is doesn't mean "Oh God, loving really isn't about me"—loving is this quality of accepting, open, connected attention. Just being here with what is. And that allows for reality to reveal itself. It's just nature, how it is in this moment. It allows for the clear seeing—the yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana—this mindfulness beneath the concept, allowing whatever is arising in this moment to reveal itself. Loving what is.

And it's really only when this clear seeing in a moment is present

A moment of allowing whatever's arising to simply be as it is—really embraced in the energy and the light of clear awareness, kind awareness, truly loving what is. It's only then that real compassion and real love become possible.

Without that clear seeing, we can go through the motions. But real compassion, real love, a genuine opening into life in a whole other way—this is only possible when we're seeing things as they really are, with this quality of active, engaged, accepting presence. Not passive at all.

Just like that sense of burning I mentioned rather than "my knee." In that burning, it's simply what it is. Not referring back to me, there's no problem. There's no making of self and other. This clear seeing opens us to a really different relationship to life, to others.

Like the Buddha—he opened into life. His awakening was full engagement with life, but not from a self-centered perspective. And we all experience that in moments when we feel real compassion, real love. We all do. It's not some esoteric thing. We all know this, we all experience it. And if your mind is going, "Well, not me"—no, no, no, no. See that that's just a story in that moment.

When we're not engaging from this self-centered place, other people and the world are no longer about somehow gratifying us. It's not about needing other people to be any particular way to make us okay. It's not about needing anything from anybody else. But it's not like, "Oh, I don't need you." It's not that. We don't need, but we can be there.

So much energy goes into this construction—the delusion, the aversion, the clinging, the sense of trying to make things okay for ourselves, the sense of trying to fight away the unpleasant, the stories. And the story here turns into a story against yourself because you don't want to have the stories and you don't want to be doing this, so then you just pile aversion on top of that: "I shouldn't be doing this." Same thing.

So much energy goes into that. So sometimes when you have an insight—a moment, some moments of just seeing yathā bhūta, as it is, nothing special—so much energy is released, is available. And that energy is available for appropriate response, for compassion, for generosity, for kindness, for acting in the way that's appropriate, that isn't about serving me.

We don't get there by thinking about it. But it's not so far away—for a moment. And we're not going to live there all the time. But we all know it in moments.

CHAPTER 55

Compassion and Emptiness

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the inseparable relationship between emptiness (suññatā) and compassion (karuṇā), showing how genuine insight into non-self naturally gives rise to tenderness for all beings. She addresses common misconceptions about emptiness—the fear that it leads to disconnection, indifference, or nihilism—and explains what Tibetan teachers call 'falling into emptiness,' where concepts of emptiness become obstacles rather than liberating insights.
> Drawing on teachings from Nāgārjuna, Śāntideva's Bodhicaryāvatāra, and contemporary teachers including the Dalai Lama, Pema Chödrön, and Stephen Batchelor, Wilson describes how when the 'closed sense of self' dissolves, we don't vanish into nothingness but rather 'fall into the midst of everything.' This openness naturally awakens bodhicitta—the tender, awakened heart that responds spontaneously to suffering. She explores the three levels of wisdom (paññā): learned wisdom (suta-mayā paññā), contemplative wisdom (cintā-mayā paññā), and the transformative insight wisdom (bhāvanā-mayā paññā) that arises through meditation.
> Wilson offers practical guidance for working with difficult emotions during retreat, emphasizing that suffering met with kind awareness is precisely where wisdom and compassion develop. Using examples from Sister Chân Không's activism and Nelson Mandela's long walk to freedom, she demonstrates how compassion married to wisdom manifests as skillful action rooted in intention rather than attachment to results. The talk concludes with Nisargadatta Maharaj's teaching that direct realization of our interconnectedness brings both freedom and total responsibility for the world.

So tonight I want to talk about how the wisdom of emptiness is naturally expressed as compassion—really the unity of emptiness and compassion as wisdom.

A lot of what's been talked about the last couple of evenings, and what's been coming up in many people's practice, is seeing this sense of just this, this, this. No past, no future, no reference outside. And our habitual mind—our linear, logical, rational mind, the way we think about things—doesn't tend to find a lovely idea in our projection of what life would be like if we were living from the understanding of no self, if we were living from within the wisdom of emptiness. Often the intellect projects something quite unappealing.

Words people have used with me are alien, disconnected, inhuman. What Trungpa calls a kind of nostalgia for samsara: "I'd rather be caught in my stupid patterns, but at least it's me doing it, and I'm familiar with it." Or uncaring—this fear of a dry, gray kind of emptiness where you can't tell the difference between beautiful and scary, where you don't care if you have peanut butter or sauerkraut, where it doesn't really matter.

On another side of that is when we taste the freedom, the liberation of emptiness. And of course, for all of us, it's not complete all at once. There's a way that then the thinking, rational mind can own that, making a description of it that is no longer the living experience. And that's the kind of emptiness where you can tell the difference between peanut butter and sauerkraut, but really, nothing matters. It's all empty. So what I do doesn't matter. In some way, those are the words we use—awareness doesn't care—and we turn that into "nothing matters, so whatever I do..." That's also a real misunderstanding, a misconception. It's what the Tibetans sometimes call falling into emptiness.

I want to read a couple of things from Nyoshul Khen. This can actually be quite subtle, and it can be a place we hit in our lifetime of practice. Remember, we're always looking at it from a certain angle, as long as we don't stop and think this is it.

The danger in falling into emptiness is that we hear too much too soon. We think we have understood shunyata, emptiness, and we err on the side of the absolute in a nihilistic fashion, obscured by concepts—concepts of emptiness. Nagarjuna said, "It is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material, concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness."

Let me give you Stephen Batchelor's translation of that same verse: "Buddhas say emptiness is relinquishing opinions. Believers in emptiness are incurable."

Back to Nyoshul Khen: "Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practice, through the way of skillful means. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge, since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do."

You can hear all the spiritual material that's around, and sometimes you can hear how—when we're not following someone or some path the whole way, when we just read snippets—it just says nothing matters, there's nothing to do, there's nothing to have, there's nothing to be. Buddha dasa, right? And when we take that and make it a concept—"Well, there's nothing to have, there's nothing to do, there's nothing to be.

You're saying whatever's happening, just notice it. It's fine. It doesn't matter"—there's a piece of that which is accurate, but when we turn it into a view, we've fallen into that abyss.

Now, don't be afraid of that. Because what I'm wanting to say with the unity of emptiness and compassion is that the real moments of trustworthy glimpses, experiences, understandings of emptiness—or the non-separateness of things—naturally give rise to compassion or tenderness of heart, as Pema Chödrön puts it. These are the natural effects. We respond appropriately.

So that's something we can kind of check out in ourselves. I'll give you an example from Stephen Batchelor writing about Shantideva, who wrote The Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life—one of the Dalai Lama's favorite texts. Stephen should know about it since he translated it from the Tibetan many years ago. He's writing about it in his preface to his translation of Nagarjuna.

He says that when Shantideva, this great Bodhisattva, when his closed sense of self dissolved—closed, that's really what it's like. Sogyal Rinpoche says we're closed in this trap of our emotions and thoughts and personality. Here we sit day in and day out in this little closed-in space. So when Shantideva's closed sense of self dissolved, he did not vanish into the abyss of nothingness. He did not. But what happened is he saw that to be empty is no longer to be full of oneself.

And that's what's so exhausting. Quite a few people have mentioned in the last few days, listening to Winnie's talk and Howie's talk, they're saying, "I'm just seeing every thought about me and my stories and my views—it's so exhausting." It takes a lot of energy to maintain this little cage that we're sitting in, our ideas of ourself. But when that dissolves, we don't go into nothingness.

I want you to listen to this—not exactly a poem, but Howie read it last night. Hear it again, this Zen nun's words, from the sense of how the openness into emptiness of any separate self is the same as compassion. See if you can hear how these two things go together. Maybe you don't, maybe it's only me, but see if you can get a sense of how these two things are united.

Togetsu saw that arising arose, abided, and fell away. She saw that knowing this arose, abided, and fell away. Then she knew there was nothing more than this, nothing more than this. No ground, nothing to lean on stronger than the cane that she held. Nothing to lean upon at all, and no one leaning. And she opened the clenched fist in her mind and let go and fell into the midst of everything.

We don't fall into the abyss of nothingness—we fall into the midst of everything. And the inescapable, natural response of that is the tenderness of heart, of metta, of compassion. It's an aspect of wisdom, appropriate response when response is needed.

This is again Stephen Batchelor talking about Shantideva: "For his insight into emptiness does not merely change the way he views the world, but it also transforms the way he feels about it. His heart is opened to the anguish of others, which prompts a spontaneous longing to assuage their suffering"—which is really the seed of bodhicitta. But it's not a kind of crazy, disconnected longing. Shantideva also acknowledged the irrational nature of such a passion, knowing that just being relatively a limited person, there's no way he could assuage the suffering of all beings. "I don't even know myself," he said. But still, that's the natural effect of opening to emptiness, falling into the midst of everything.

It's natural when we see how much of our energy, our thoughts, our emotions are so self-referential, and how this really does create a limiting separation that seems so real only because it's being recreated moment to moment in the mind. The self-referential sense—just to notice it. Not to stop it, just to notice it. It's just another thing to notice.

Sogyal Rinpoche describes it in a way that I personally really love because it's vivid. He says that this felt sense of me—not an intellectual idea, not talking about ego and this and that, but just as you're sitting here, the felt sense of me. Can you connect with that? No, not because there's no me—can you connect? It's not any big whoop, it's just a little ugh, you know?

He says that felt sense is like the original yardstick of samsara. In Tibet, when they're making the footprint for the foundation of a house, they start from a point in the middle. They have a long string of however wide it's going to be, and from that point in the middle, they measure with that string all the way around. You get the footprint of the house. So that referential center point that everything's referring back to—he's saying that's the sense of me when it's arising and we don't quite realize it. He calls that the yardstick for samsara.

Our job is just to notice it, not to try and get rid of it, but just notice it. When we don't notice it, that becomes the seed for all this incredible energy that goes into creating and maintaining what we wish we didn't have to create and maintain. We're trying so hard to get rid of it—but "I'm" still trying so hard to get rid of it, and "I'm" creating—and we forget to notice this little sense of me.

And when we think about it not being there, it's really scary. Back to that sense of a fall into the void of nothingness.

Because the mind can only know what it already knows. And what it already knows is severely limited. So that's why we're always talking about trust.

This relentless, obsessive, exhausting self-referencing—quite a few of you have mentioned just noticing, even for a moment, sometime when it's not there. And people have said, "My gosh, I didn't realize how exhausting this burden is." And then it comes back. You want to shoot yourself. But when it comes back, you don't have to take that personally either. You don't have to take it personally.

In just that moment when self-referencing isn't the center of the world, we fall into the midst of everything, and what naturally awakens is what Pema Chödrön calls this tenderness for life, tenderness for beings. The way she describes bodhicitta is she calls it noble or awakened heart. This bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, awakens naturally without our doing when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence. When the pain of the world touches your heart, it naturally turns into compassion.

It's really not something we have to do. "I have to be the compassionate one." Not that we can't incline the mind—I'll get there later—but at this point, I just want to keep pointing to how the recognition on a deep level, a cellular level, even though it comes and goes, of emptiness, of no self, of not-separate-self—that is the basis for what Stephen Batchelor calls a spontaneous empathetic responsiveness. Or he actually calls it this: emptiness is the basis for the ethics of empathetic responsiveness.

And this is how Shantideva says it, very basically: "When I act for the sake of others, no amazement or conceit arises. It's just like feeding myself. I hope for nothing in return." Just like feeding myself.

Stephen says that when he realized this idea of a separate self was just an idea—but when we're caught in that cage we create, the spontaneous concern for others does arise. We all feel some compassion, some spontaneous concern for others. But when we're in the midst of that house created by the yardstick of samsara, then that spontaneous concern for others is limited, right? It's felt for those who fall within the range of what is mine—me and mine and those I love and those I can let in somehow, where it feels safe. The pain of those outside this range can be treated with indifference or disconnect, or on occasion we're even kind of happy to see someone else suffer.

What goes away is this range of inside-outside. It's just like having fed myself—I look for nothing in return because there's not this boundary where we only care about what's within it.

Now, the other side, though: for the vastness of compassion, also the vastness requires wisdom. Just as the wisdom of emptiness is naturally trustworthy when it has the compassion, the non-separation aspect, the natural tenderness—which could manifest in many different ways, but people know it, many people have described it, you can tell—it's not indifferent, it's not disconnected, it's not "oh, who gives a..."—it's really there.

But in the same way, the vastness of real compassion, deep compassion, is only possible with the wisdom of emptiness, of no separate self. It really requires that. Our intellectual and really heartfelt, sincere wish to be compassionate, our understanding of it and having that as an intention, a goal—that's really useful. Don't get me wrong. I'm not saying that's not helpful. It's wonderful, because it will incline our mind towards more wisdom, and the more wisdom will incline our heart towards more compassion.

But you can see the limits of acting from compassion when it's not married, when it's not really met by the depth of wisdom, because we don't have all the information in a way. We're still looking from within the self-interest, trying our best, but we don't realize how narrow that little box is.

I heard a great example. Well, to me it's an example—maybe I'm stretching it a bit. But I heard this on the radio in the fall, I think. It was actually an economist talking about the economic theories that if you act on rational self-interest, it'll be for the good of everybody—which already we can see doesn't sound so great in Buddhist terms.

But anyway, the example he gave, I loved. He said there was recently—I don't know how recent, in the last few years—some new bridge that was built in London over the Thames. I don't know if it was a footbridge or also for cars, but he was talking about foot traffic on this bridge right after it had opened. So many hundreds of people were walking across this bridge, and it was new, but it started really shaking and trembling, I guess particularly on one side—which, you know, not so great. It just opened.

So all these people, it started shaking and trembling. Each person did what seemed like, for themselves, a rational thing to do, which was they moved to the other side from where the shaking was. But everybody did that, because everyone was just acting in their own little world of rational self-interest. So all several hundred people moved to the other side, which of course made the whole thing a million times worse.

So you get the sense. We do what seems appropriate, logical, useful. But without the wisdom, we can't see past. We don't even take in the big picture without consciously thinking, "Oh yeah, let me think." Just because we're limited in space and time—what Einstein called the optical delusion of separation in space and time of ourselves. So the wisdom of emptiness allows for clear seeing, accurate recognition of the bigger picture. Not everything. We're not going to always have all the information, but a much bigger seeing of what's going on, which allows for more possibility of an appropriate response.

Another aspect of how emptiness is essential for the vastness of compassion is what we all probably feel at many times—which is when the tenderness, the suffering, the fragility of the world is touching our heart. We do feel quite deeply and sincerely that tenderness for beings, for ourselves, for others. And we can be with it a while, and then suddenly it's like we're drowning. It's too much. And God knows there's so much suffering in the world once we start opening to it all.

The question, as it often comes up in my mind, and as many people I've heard say, is: how can I stay open to the suffering in this world? Or how can I hold all the suffering? And in the question itself, you can see the seed of the problem. I can't. It's not about me as a separate being holding some concept of all the suffering in the world. There's no separate me anyway. There's no one to hold it and there's nowhere for it to be held. It's just arising and passing, arising and passing, arising and passing.

The rational mind says, "But that's negating suffering." No, it's not. But the sense that I have to hold it is exactly where we drown. It's not possible. And we'll all come to that place many times—not to judge it, but at that point see, "Oh wow," feel the constriction, the overwhelmingness, the overpoweringness of that sense of trying to hold it all, and just bring compassion to that. That's all. Don't try to figure out emptiness, but just recognize, "Oh wow, this is unbearable right now. Unbearable feels like this." Seriously.

Ajahn Sumedho has a great line he'd say a lot. He was talking about something different—something unpleasant, sweating through his robes in Thailand or something. But I keep remembering this line he said. He said, "I'd be with it so long. It'd be just unbearable, unbearable. I think this is unbearable. I can't bear it another moment." And then I'd find that I could. Because that's just a moment. "This is unbearable." When I feel that, then I go, "What's actually so unbearable about this moment?" And it turns the awareness in, and then I start looking again. And it's usually, okay, that was a mood. "I can't bear it." But that's an aside.

So when you're feeling like, "I can't bear this. How can I hold it?"

It's too much, the suffering of the world. This is exactly the place where we begin to, and continue to, learn how to recognize, cultivate, and strengthen compassion in our own experience—here, now, this moment.

It's what the Dalai Lama says in talking about the cultivation, the development really, of bodhicitta, this noble or awakened heart. How does it develop? It develops through deep insight into what suffering is. Not what you wanted to hear, is it? Deep insight into what suffering is. And this arises by being present with, opening into, our own experience. This is from the Dalai Lama. This is where we start.

And he didn't say this, but as some people say, each of us, the suffering of our own personal—and yes, we're still in the realm of the personal, the relative, the conventional. The absolute, they go together. One doesn't negate the other. The conventional me suffering here, now—this is the place compassion can begin, that wisdom develops, that we recognize the emptiness, the falling into the midst of everything. Nowhere else.

And he goes on to say that by focusing, by being with our own experience, this is how the bodhicitta begins to develop. And then the compassion strengthens as it moves into a sense of empathy, of connectedness with other beings.

This is what all of us at different times experience. Not all the time. I'm not saying every moment of our practice should be opening into the experience of deep suffering. Definitely not. All different kinds of things happen. So if that's not your experience now, don't go out of here thinking there's something wrong. "I should be suffering." You'll have your chance. Don't worry. But sometimes other things are developed. It's moving in many ways.

But quite a few people, just in the last couple of days in interviews, are in different ways and following different routes finding themselves in the middle of some kind of deep unpleasantness, some kind of suffering. It could be physical. For many people, it's kind of running into emotional patterns—not so much stories from life, but the way the mind is relating, the patterns that come up in relationship to actually doing our practice. Which is where they really catch us, actually. When it comes up about our past, it's really painful and we suffer, but we can also see it easier. When it's about how we're relating to practice—self-judgment, for example, like what he talked about—when we don't see the agendas, we're just beating ourselves up. "I want to be more concentrated. I want it. So what should I do? I should try harder. I should focus more. I should get more concentrated." We don't see, "Oh, that's just wanting." And we do see, "Well, how can I get rid of the wanting? Well, if I got more concentrated, I could get rid of it." And we just cycle, cycle. We all do this all the time.

And because it's about what we're doing now, and it can be quite subtle, it's easy to miss. It can come up very subtly, and we don't notice it for half a day or a day. And then suddenly you feel like your head's in a vice, and you just go, "What happened? I was just minding my own business, and now it's intense." It's amazing. And you'll go, "Oh, it's that judging mind again. I've seen it a million times, but it snuck up on me. It took a little turn. It moved into more subtlety."

But anyway, my point is many people have been saying this and really saying, "Oh, and I see, I'm really getting it this time. This is the practice." Which of course makes me really happy to hear. Yes, concentration and samadhi are really important, and sometimes that's the direction of practice. Sometimes experiencing on a subtle level the seven factors of enlightenment is practice.

Sometimes what practice is about is the purification of memories and remorse. None of this we choose—it happens as it needs to happen. But many different people have been saying that practice has suddenly taken this turn into really being in these habits with some awareness, enough awareness to see the habit. But we think it's not enough awareness, because if it was enough awareness, it would just stop and be done, right?

But the way we learn that these habits are suffering—this is my particular rule of thumb, but it certainly seems to be true—is by really suffering in them over extended periods with awareness the whole time. Which just seems to make it worse. "Oh God, I see it. I really see it. Okay, I really see it. Now I really get it." And then it goes away for a while—a week, a month, a year—and then you're back at the next occasion. "Oh, I forgot about this, but now I really see it."

But anyway, my point being: this is why the so-called difficult times of retreat, when we say it's so important, we're not just trying to be a cheerleader and get you through it. It's really the place where emptiness and compassion open up from. When people come and say, "I'm really seeing this is what is, what's arising now—just this is all there is," this is the practice. It's not to get through the difficult to get to bliss. It's not to get through the mediocre to get to the difficult. It's not to get through anything to get anywhere else. It's to be totally here without reference back or forward to anything. And when here, right now, is really suffering and difficult, this is just as much the place of awakening.

When it's difficult and we really are bringing awareness to it, it's messy awareness. I think I said this the other night, but samsara is messy. Awareness of strong, difficult emotions is not going to be all nice and tidy. "Oh yes, anguish, anguish, tightness, contraction. I note it and it goes away." That's how they talk. It sounds so nice when they say it. "Oh, anguish is like this. No, no, I'm just floating on a cloud." No—it's messy. It hurts. And when we notice it and drop into it, guess what? It's even more tender because we're not fighting it anymore. We're not resisting it. We're actually feeling it. But the feeling with awareness is our protection. It's the opening into wisdom.

So these difficult times of retreat—that's what it's about. The Dalai Lama says this is where compassion for ourselves begins and where it naturally moves into empathy with beings.

People have mentioned this, not just here but all the time. Take grief—grief's a good example. There's a personal story, you're feeling the grief, it's really strong, and you're starting to really be able to be with it and feel it. There's the story and the grief, and you're being with it, and suddenly it gets—I don't know—deeper. It changes. Even though your story's still there, nothing takes away the story, but people can feel it's like a qualitative change, and you couldn't really call it suffering anymore.

Because—and the way I can best say it for me—it's kind of changed into the grief of the world. It's like this story is the representation of the grief of the world. And the natural movement of heart and mind with that is compassion. And compassion is one of the beautiful states. It's weird. It's weird because it comes out of suffering. It's weird to our logical mind. But compassion is one of the beautiful states, and it feels qualitatively different. You're connected with the suffering, the grief, the sadness, the pain, but it stops being mine. It is mine also, but not only mine.

And what makes—this is me talking, not from the suttas—but in my sense of what the vastness of all the brahmaviharas is, what makes them vast, what makes them beautiful, is exactly that there's not that constriction of me. It's the vastness of knowing we are in the middle of everything, whether it's suffering or whether it's joy. And that vastness is experienced as beauty, as peace, as ease, as brahmavihara—the divine abodes. That's what brahmavihara means.

So how does the difficult open into the wisdom of non-separation, the vastness of compassion? Really, again, it's only in this moment. It's completely determined by how we're meeting, how the mind and heart is meeting currently arising experience.

Because as we know—as we all know now, because we're all adepts—we all know that whatever's arising is out of our control. We're born with that in some way. I didn't cause this pain to arise; it's just happening, even if this understanding is only intellectual. And even how we meet it isn't totally in our control. But the way that compassion and wisdom are developing is exactly that kind, clear, non-judging awareness is the expression of wisdom and the deepening of compassion right there.

The pain comes up, and it's simply, "Oh, burning is like this." It doesn't feel like any big thing. You don't really notice, "Oh, I'm developing compassion, isn't this great?" Just: burning is like this.

But that moment—as the Buddha said, and I'm sure it's been quoted here—what we dwell and think about, that becomes the inclination of the mind. We've spent plenty of time dwelling and thinking, "I hate pain," or "I don't like this pattern," or "I want to be a better person"—yada yada, that's what Winnie talked about. But the moment of meeting—"Oh, pain is like this. Oh, incredible stabbing in the heart. Wow, that's really painful, feels like this"—that is the expression of wisdom. That is the cultivation of compassion in that moment. Where else could it be? Nowhere else.

I think Sally told this story about Sayadaw U Pandita, saying it happened to Kamala, but it didn't—it happened to me. I was in a hugely judgmental frame of mind, which I didn't tell him. These teachers, they just know. I was simply describing what was happening, and he was basically saying, "Wouldn't it be better? It's a silent retreat. Wouldn't it be better not to talk to yourself in that tone of voice?" And it wasn't critical. That was said with so much compassion. Because right here, how we're meeting present moment experience is where wisdom and compassion arise, are strengthened, and developed.

Just what's happening now is all we need. We don't have to have some big, huge, amazing experience. How we meet the conditions arising and vanishing is the path. Just small moments. It doesn't have to be huge, heart-cracking open, Martin Luther King moments. We can just be very simple.

Sharon has a great line: to pay attention is to love. By love I don't mean, "Oh, you're so wonderful, I love you." Love is just that open-hearted friendliness, acceptance, non-separation. This is just how it is. To pay attention. Just to pay attention—steady, steady, steady. The wisdom of falling into everything and the compassion naturally open by themselves. We don't have to create it. We can't. We can't create wisdom, which should be a huge relief—that just through the steadiness of kind awareness, steady, steady, steady, wisdom arises by itself.

People have noticed that all of a sudden there's wisdom, but it was so effortless. "I didn't do it." Exactly. Exactly. And can we trust that we're only getting in the way?

Notice too when there is a time that in your heart, in terms of compassion, some piece of information, some piece of suffering comes in from somewhere else, and you feel like there's just that natural meeting with compassion. It's interesting—and this is in daily life, not just here—just to notice what are the qualities in the attention, in the mind, in the heart at that moment that makes the receiving and the compassion naturally come forth.

It may not work for any of you, but again, I was listening to the radio. I like listening to public radio because you get lots of interesting snippets of life. The interviewer was talking to a man who had been a war correspondent for a long time for some network in Britain. But now he wasn't, because he had discovered that he had something called Huntington's disease—a genetic disease, a degenerative nerve disease, really bad. You get it and it starts to manifest when you're in your mid-40s, and you just gradually, gradually, everything deteriorates and you die. And it's genetic.

So his father had had that. And he and his mother and his brother had to watch his father deteriorate and die in his late middle age. Then you could get tested for it. It passed more through the male line. So his brother got tested and had it. And now his elder brother was in the middle stages of it. So then he got tested, and he has that gene. And in terms of medicine, if you have that gene, you're going to get this thing. And of course, they have no clue how to help it.

So he was just talking—so far he had no symptoms. And he was just describing this very clearly. And for some reason—and this is the more interesting thing, because there are a million stories like this—something enabled me to just receive it in that way. I was just listening, eating my breakfast. You know how you do. I wasn't like, ah—just eating my breakfast and sort of listening. And then something let me let it in.

And there are different ways you can let it in. You can let it in with oh my God, it's horrible, and you're in despair. And I'm not calling that the wisdom of compassion. I'm calling that overwhelm. It's touching us, but then we close around it. I can't bear it, and we're in overwhelm. And maybe it's because it comes too close to something. We're not comfortable with feeling that pain in ourselves, so we have to push it away.

Or the other time, if we hear it, we go, oh, that's a shame. You know how we do that. Oh yeah, that's really a shame. Poor guy. And we sort of mean it, but we're distracted. We're in our own little world.

But this time, I was just sitting there looking, and I realize now what opened it to me was the details he gave that allowed for empathy. And this is the detail he gave that really—oh, I get what that would feel like. Because I didn't know until then. I don't have a genetic disease that I'm aware of that I know is going to hit. And he's in his mid-40s. You know it's going to happen.

He said, now every time he goes out to the store—he stopped his job, he wants to be with his kids and his wife—every time he goes out to the corner store to get the newspaper or something, every time he takes a walk, his mind kind of wanders. And he didn't say this heavily. This is just how it is. I always wonder, is this the time I'm going to first stumble? Is this going to be the day that I feel the first little tremor in my arm?

I thought, whoa. That went in.

So my point with this is that that simplicity of describing experience hit a place where I could really have empathy. And the empathy is—you just feel how that could be. Without adding a whole big story, positive, negative, or anything, it's just, oh yeah, somewhere we're all in that boat. You don't have to go further. That's already making too much story.

But my sense is just that—how that just being present without expectation or story or self-reference—the empathy naturally arises. And with the empathy, we care. Oh, the poor guy.

That's really a shame. We do care. But it's not really the tenderness for life, the compassion of falling into the midst of everything.

Let me read you this Mary Oliver poem. I read it a lot because I love it—about how simple mindfulness naturally opens wisdom and compassion in the midst of everything.

In Singapore, in the airport,
a darkness was ripped from my eyes.
In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open.
A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl.

Disgust argued in my stomach and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it.
Kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings.
Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees.
A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling.

A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.

The woman turned—I could not answer her face, her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win.
She smiled and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this?
Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.
But first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough.
She is washing the tops of the airport ashtrays, as big as hubcaps, with a blue rag.
Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing.
She does not work slowly, nor quickly, but like a river.
Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life.
And I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river.
This probably won't happen.
But maybe it will.

If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it?
Of course it isn't.
Neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life.
I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth.
The way her smile was only for my sake.
I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

As Colette says, "Look long at what pleases you, and even longer at what pains you." The wisdom and the compassion are the natural effects of our willingness to just be present with things as they are.

As I was saying, we don't have to—in fact, we can't—create wisdom.

I want to talk for a minute about wisdom. There are three levels of wisdom talked about in the suttas. The first level, and they're all useful, is called sutamayā paññā—wisdom that's heard, that's learned. The stuff that we read, the things we hear people say, information that comes in. This is definitely useful. It's important to have correct or useful information.

The second level of wisdom, called cintāmayā paññā, is really thinking, contemplating. We take the information and turn it over, use our intelligence, really look at it and see: Does this actually make sense? This is also really useful.

But for most of us—and certainly what I've learned—that's the level where we basically operate. We think this is where everything happens, this middle level. But the third level, called bhāvanāmayā paññā—and bhāvanā is the word for mental cultivation, used for meditation—this is really the level of insight, of deep transformative knowledge or wisdom, which arises through insight, through meditation.

We can use the second level to help us incline our attention, incline our memory toward re-recognizing on the third level, on the insight level, when we've actually experienced it.

This is the way Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche talks about it. He says we study, we learn the teachings, we contemplate—all really important for all of us. So if you're listening here every night, that's giving you information that hopefully on some level meets your inner intelligence, and you see if it's helpful or not.

But then he goes on to say about this third level: "Unless we also come to some inner realization by actually applying the teachings and mingling them with our minds, the knowledge remains theoretical. So we ponder deeply the meaning of the Dharma until it permeates our whole being."

That's really what we're doing here. Pondering, yes, but also paying attention, being with moment to moment experience until the meaning of the Dharma—the emptiness, the compassion, the freedom from clinging—permeates our whole being.

In that way, it's not that we create wisdom—compassion arises naturally. But when we remember it, if it's useful to incline the mind, we can use this second level of contemplation, understanding, intelligence to incline the mind in the direction that deepens us into the third level of wisdom, of insight, of really mingling the teachings with our mind.

Just to give a couple of examples: it takes patience. At first it takes some insight into—and everyone has had this, believe me, we're not talking earth-shattering insight—the emptiness of separate self, the non-doing nature of things just happening, and the natural effect of recognizing that: our connectedness, our caring, our tender heart. Even just for a moment, we see that.

Then when we're not actually contacting that insight but it's a memory on the second level, that can still be useful. We can use our understanding, all the skillful means we have, just to incline our mind back in the direction of cultivating compassion rather than impatience, cultivating compassion rather than self-hatred.

It just takes patience. Patience.

You know Sister Chân Không, the nun who's been working with Thích Nhất Hạnh? She used to be Sister Phượng, ever since she was sixteen during the Vietnam War.

Now she's older. They were working with social work, with young people. They were basically kicked out—they left the country during the war and couldn't come back because both sides hated them because they wouldn't take sides. She's totally committed. I read her autobiography. From the time she was sixteen, she's been committed to mindfulness, to compassionate action, to activism. Living in France, she's still committed to this. She practices every day.

But it's not like, "Oh, now I see. Now I know. I don't have to do anything anymore. The compassion just flows. I never get caught." It's this quality of commitment to our understanding, and patience.

She talks about a period—this was a while ago, but many years after she left Vietnam—when a lot of nuns and monks and activists and artists were being arrested in Vietnam. And she was involved in organizing a letter-writing campaign to the government. She said, "Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry. And I knew I had to do walking meditation."

Is that the first thing you would think of? "I'm angry. They did this thing. It's so wrong. I need to do walking meditation."

"Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to regain my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities have acted in arresting such a lovely monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

I love that. I use that all the time because it's the sense of knowing that compassion doesn't mean passivity. Compassion can mean real proactive action. But compassion married to wisdom means that compassion is all about the intention in our heart, in our mind—not about result.

And this is, again—I know we've talked a bit about intention—but intention is the seed of action, the seed of karma. And compassion, the way it shows up in the Eightfold Noble Path, is as the second factor: wise aspiration, samma sankappa. Three specific wise intentions are mentioned: greed transforms to renunciation, ill will transforms to loving-kindness or metta, and cruelty and aversion transform to compassion. It's one of the wise intentions.

When we're really cultivating, really inclining our mind towards compassion out of wisdom, out of our own experience—but of course, until we're completely awakened, our experience is limited. It goes back and forth. There are times when the compassion is just that natural flow. We're not really thinking about what's going to happen and what are they going to think and what can I do. It just arises spontaneously.

But when we're not quite in touch with compassion as intention, we can easily get into an idea about how compassionate action should look, or what we should do. And often, when we're not in touch with intention, our idea of the action being right or appropriate tends to go to whether it gets the result we want. That's how we judge actions: Does it get the result we want? And that's the one thing that's completely out of our control.

In our practice, in our daily life, in every action that we do, every way that we live, when we're working with inclining our heart and mind towards compassion and just noticing when it's present—the cultivating isn't about what it looks like from the outside in. The true compassion comes from the wisdom, from the inside out.

We can start from the inside out, really feel compassionate—like Sister Chan Khong—and really want to take proactive action in the world. We can start from really feeling compassion and connection and caring. But it's so easy, isn't it? The world is so frustrating. The world is ambiguous, no matter how much we care and how much we might know.

She says, "I know they acted unfairly." It's so easy for us to slip into frustration, into trying to make the result come out a certain way. And when that doesn't happen, we get lost in either frustration or self-judgment or whatever. And it can get really carried away—like people who are opposed to abortion because it's killing, and then they kill doctors who perform abortions, and don't see any kind of disconnect in that. And that kind of thing has gone both ways.

It's easy, when we're on the ideologue level, to still think that's compassion, right?

But we're not in control of the externals. This is what James was talking about last night regarding the "iddy-potties" – getting in tune with what has become the Dalai Lama's refrain: our sincere motivation. That's what we can trust. That's our reward. And he should know, my God.

There's a story from an interview with him that has touched me deeply for years. His whole commitment to nonviolence, especially in terms of the Chinese overrunning Tibet – he's so profoundly committed to nonviolent response. But externally, it doesn't really seem to have helped at all. In fact, the Chinese have increasingly overrun Tibet, and the culture is being more and more destroyed.

So in this interview I read, some young Tibetans were talking to him. He's like the old man now, in his seventies. And they're saying – perhaps in a kind way, but essentially: "It's not working. It's not working. You speak about nonviolence. Okay, we respect it. But old man, it's not working."

And he said – this is a touch of openness, not "I'm right," but the compassion, the falling into the midst of everything – he said, "Yeah, I hear you. Maybe it's not working." And then they said tears were running down his face. He said, "But I cannot be any other way."

To me, that is incredible courage. Because he's not blocking anything out. He's hearing all the pain around him. He's returning to his motivation. As Dr. King said one time, "I refuse to become bitter. I refuse. Hatred must never be our motive" – taking a clarity of intention. Now, of course, you could drift into bitterness, but we recognize it with kind awareness. And in the recognition, there is its own transformation. We don't have to create the compassion, just fall back into that willingness to be present. It doesn't mean being a doormat.

So I want to close with a story that inspired me about the vastness of wisdom and compassion, and the ambiguity of life. We just don't know.

This is a common story, but two days ago, on Thursday, I was listening to the BBC in the morning. They said it was the twentieth anniversary of the day Nelson Mandela was released from prison. I don't know if Sally talked about him the other night. Twenty years. And they played a little snippet on the radio – so you couldn't see it, but you could hear – the moment when he was released. They described what they called his "long walk to freedom" from the jail cell where he was held into town.

You could hear people cheering and the commentators talking, then parts of his speech in different languages, some in English. It was so moving to me. You could feel, just in hearing it, the energy – how much people were touched by it. Of course, having twenty years of hindsight, knowing what's happened in the meantime, and having seen that movie Invictus, which I did see and found really interesting – to witness how he came out of that experience able to bear witness to so many years of personal suffering and so much suffering of others. Not only the people in jail with him, but of the whole country.

And to have that breadth of vision, which he seemed to carry through into his period of leadership – the breadth of vision that we're all in this together. He could really seem to see that the suffering wasn't only among the black people and people of color, but that through their hatred and separation, the Afrikaners and white people were also suffering in a different way. It was just one big mess of suffering. The compassion – it isn't about going easy. It's really being able to be straight, to do what his heart and wisdom told him to do in all different kinds of situations. He couldn't plan it all out.

That movie was about using rugby as a way to bring the races together, because rugby was an Afrikaner white sport and blacks mostly hated it. In fact, they wouldn't go to rugby matches, but when they'd hear about them, they'd cheer for whatever team was playing against the South African team. They just hated it – the white rulers' sport.

So Mandela decides to use rugby as a way to bring them together. Very practical, using what's right in front of him, calling on people. And he got so much flack, called to meetings with all the other black leaders saying, "What, are you crazy? We're not going to do this."

And he would just stand up and say, "No, this is really what we need to do. This is what we need to do." He had so much stature because he wasn't coming from hatred or ideology, but really from this depth of compassion that was fed by the wisdom of interconnectedness. There were just example after example after example of that.

And it's inspiring. For me, and I'm sure if not this particular story then other things would be inspiring to you, because it touches what we know is true as our potential as human beings. I mean, if it were just so different from us—oh, he's amazing, but he's some kind of freak of nature—our intellectual mind might say that. But the inspiration, which brings brightness, which brings energy, which brings vigor, which brings willingness to do, arises because it's touching on that deep wisdom and compassion that's the essence of what's true. Somewhere down there we know this. We've all glimpsed it.

I think the reason I love just looking at huge figures—people, famous people, or people you hear on the news who manifest this—is because it helps us to trust it more, instead of believing our little small minds, our little separate self.

So I just want to end with a short quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj, one of our favorites:

Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, "I am the world, the world is myself," you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern.

So let's just sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 56

Hitting the Wall of Sakkāya-diṭṭhi

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a universal experience in meditation practice: hitting the wall. She describes the natural sine wave of practice—periods of insight and flow alternating with times when we become caught in our habitual patterns and personality views. Drawing on the Pāli concept of sakkāya-diṭṭhi (identity view or personality view), she explains how this fundamental misperception causes us to grasp at the stream of mental and physical experience as 'me' or 'mine,' leading to suffering and self-doubt.
> Wilson references Ajahn Sumedho's teaching that self-doubt is one of the biggest hindrances for Western practitioners, largely because our belief in and reliance on personality is so deeply ingrained. She shares the story of the monk Asaji from the suttas, who even while dying worried about his inability to concentrate, illustrating how even experienced practitioners can fall into this trap. The talk explores various ways we hit the wall: believing 'I had it but now it's lost,' feeling despair at seeing our patterns return despite awareness, or experiencing what Chögyam Trungpa called 'nostalgia for saṃsāra.'
> Using the vivid allegory of Frodo's journey in The Lord of the Rings, Wilson illustrates how the spiritual path spirals deeper—each challenge requiring greater courage, met by deeper wisdom and faith. She concludes with the inspiring image of an elderly Tibetan nun who, after enduring tremendous hardship, spends her days spinning her prayer wheel with prayers for all beings, reminding us that we can do this because ultimately, awakening does itself.

Today we had a little teacher meeting after lunch, as we sometimes do, and we were talking about our sense of the flow of the retreat. Of course, everybody's completely different, so in some ways it doesn't really make sense to speak of "the flow of the retreat." But at the same time, we always do that, and there's a sort of sense we pick up on.

The sense we had, which really matched what I've been feeling the last couple of days, is what we're calling the sine wave. If you look at everybody, there's a sense that people's practices are going up and down—different people at different places, each of you at changing places, and at any one time all in different places. The sine wave describes those periods when you're having insight, when it's flowing, when there's not much velcro and nothing is sticking. It's really quite tender, or the mettā is flowing—just no problem. You really understand, you're seeing, "Oh, these are the patterns," and you see they're patterns, and they come and go, and you really know that. The anicca that Andrea was talking about—you're really seeing, "Yeah, that's really how it is."

And then in the trough of the sine wave—which is equal, because you need both, that's the thing—we're watching it slowly deteriorate with full awareness. You can really see how a little thought came in and it was a little stickier, even though it was the same thought. A kind of mood came in, and this pattern which you've seen a million times, and you know it's not really... you know it's just a pattern, and yet... just a little bit, but not quite. You watch it go down to the trough and all of a sudden it's stuck. It's solid. We really believe it. And we get riddled with either frustration or doubt or fear. It's what I call hitting a wall—not just a little bit of a hard time, but a big-time wall. We all have that. We all hit the wall.

That's what I want to talk about tonight: that place where we really lose our trust, if not our motivation, not our commitment. There's this really deep believing of whatever personality view arises—really, that's all that's happening in that moment. But it's the personality thing that we bottom-line place our faith in, and it's come back. We're riddled with frustration, with doubt, even though we've seen it more, seen it coming in, can actually describe the causes and conditions, how it starts, what triggers it, how it comes in. We're seeing that we're in it, but somewhere deep in there, it's not okay. And not that it should be okay—that's part of believing it, that it's not okay.

When this happens to someone who's been practicing quite a bit—not just new practitioners, and none of you are new practitioners—these are things that happen over and over to all of us as part of our path. The crests and troughs of the sine wave are equally valid parts of the path. There's no such thing as only up and no down. The down isn't some kind of mistake to get rid of so we can have just ups. They're equally the path.

I want to talk a little bit about the different ways we hit the wall. Hitting the wall isn't just "Ah, I'm so sick of this." Hitting the wall is "I can't do this anymore"—or more like "I won't do this anymore." And I don't mean just a mood, a little five-minute mood. We all have those. I mean a deep level of despair or doubt, where your motivation drops out or whatever.

What's really going on—and this goes on the whole path—is that our views are being challenged. This came up a lot this morning. Our personality views, the views that Winnie talked about the other night about what we want to happen, but even more, subtly held views about what is and is not the path, what is and is not supposed to be our practice—views we don't even know we have.

It's hard. It's hard for everybody. No one doesn't experience this sometimes, because that's how it is. In those times when it's free and open and we really know—even if it's for a tenth of a second—we really know it doesn't matter what's happening. Absolutely no exceptions. It doesn't matter. There's consciousness, awareness, and things happening, and that is it. We really know that.

And then in this trough, it's like you thought you knew it. You can't get there, and this really is... use your own words for what it is for you. But it's something to really consciously bring in a little bit more.

When our views are being challenged, first know that it's a paradox: no thought, no view can adequately hold or describe reality. It can't. Impossible. And yet our main tool is thoughts and views. As Andrea was saying this morning, we use views. No one's saying we don't use views. It's the attachment to them, the belief in a view that we don't even know is defining our world—that when it gets challenged, it just sends us around the bend.

And the main one—I don't want to talk about views too extensively, but the main one I want to refer to, of course, is sakaya-ditti. Ditti means view. Sakaya-ditti is translated as identity view, personality view. This is the kind of big view that gets us attached to all the other views we become attached to, kind of in service of our identity view, our personality view.

When it's talked about in the suttas, in reference to so-called stream entry, they say the eye of the Dhamma is awoken in her or in him. One of the things that's seen through is sakaya-ditti, personality view. Seen through. It doesn't mean it stops arising. Seen through. Not completely held to and believed without exception anymore.

I want to give a very brief description of it. Sally is going to talk more about the five aggregates, which is really at the core of it, in another talk. But identity view—Sayadaw U Lakana, a Burmese teacher Andrea and I were teaching with last month, defines sakaya as the stream of mental and physical experience, or the mind and matter flux. He kept saying that this time: the mind and matter flux. I love that. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental experience. Just these things happening over and over and over. That's all that's happening. And we're making these huge stories about it. That's all that's happening.

Those times when the natural phases of life, the natural phases of practice—expansion, contraction, expansion, contraction, the day and the night, the tides, the weather—that's just how life is. In the so-called expansion phase, there's spaciousness, non-clinging, no problem. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking—it's coming, it's going, it's pleasant, it's unpleasant, whatever it is, that's fine. No problem.

Then in the so-called contraction, sakaya-ditti arises in any moment when any particular seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental experience, emotion, thought, feeling tone—whatever—is clung to, is identified as being either me or mine. In that moment, identity view is born. And that can be quick, or mostly what happens is this: there's a sense of being out walking. There's smells, sounds, the sensation of the breeze. There's pleasant or unpleasant. It's just whatever. It can be very finely noticed or more broadly noticed—that's not to the point. Things are just coming and going. You're walking. It's whatever it is.

And suddenly, the coolness of the breeze is felt as unpleasant. Maybe noticed, maybe not. And there's a sense: unpleasant. I'm cold. Right then, identity view is born. My unpleasantness, my cheek, I'm cold. This experience of cold is happening to me.

Well, that doesn't have to be a big deal. We can just see that. But generally, it doesn't stop there. It goes on. I'm cold, and I need to do something, and why is it like this, and blah, blah, blah. And then the whole propensity of thoughts and emotions, the whole story of me, arises out of that moment. You can see that happening sometimes.

But that's just what happens. It's okay. We can just notice that. That's part of the expansion-contraction. Expand, expand, expand. Whatever it is. And it's always something different, but we neglect to notice that.

Expansion, contraction—that's what identity view is. And we can just watch it happen. It doesn't have to be a problem.

But when it becomes a problem, identity view, personality view—I'm using these terms a little bit differently now. It's exactly the same thing, but I'm going to talk about personality view in the way that Ajahn Sumedho discusses it. We're moving from that moment when there's just a contraction of clinging around unpleasant sensation or pleasant thought—oh, it's almost lunchtime, pleasant thought. I'm hungry, I need to go eat. And then the whole story that gets created: "Oh, I'm hungry again. What's the matter with me? I'm so greedy. All I ever do is eat, and I should try to renounce." All of this stuff, all your history, all of that—that's what I'm going to call personality view. "I'm this person who has these patterns around food, and I always do, and here I am again, and everybody's watching me." All of that stuff—personality view.

So it's with any particular moment where there's clinging, there's grasping at any of the sixth sense door experiences, and then it leads to thoughts and emotions, what we call our personality. Now, this is in our common parlance, not so much the Buddha's way of speaking. It would be that the more habitual patterns and emotions and reactions come up. I mean, I think I'm assuming, but most of us, if you were asked, "What's your personality like?" we could pull out a few threads of particular patterns that come up a lot. Yes? You can think of a couple. I don't have to say them, but we could think of a couple. They may be nice ones. They may be not nice ones. That's not the point. It's not about good or bad.

And then we think, "That's me. That's my personality." And we believe that deeply on some level. And when the sine wave goes down into the trough, when something's unpleasant and something's identified with, the sense of identity view is there—the particular patterns and thoughts and emotions that get triggered, that catch us, are usually one of these familiar strands that we would pull out, that we're familiar with.

Generally, it's not going to be "Oh yes, all is as best as it can be in this best of all possible worlds," and we're lost in frustration. Probably not the identity view we pull out at that time. It's more like, "I can't do this. I'm hopeless. I knew I was hopeless. And I had this good time before out of the grace of God, but now it's gone, and now this is what I really know."

And I'm saying it like it's sort of funny, but we know it's not the least bit funny when it's happening. Even when you can describe that it's happening, and you know it's happening, and you're watching it happen, and you can be aware that it's happening—but it's still really me it's happening to, isn't it? And it's hard.

This is where Ajahn Sumedho says something that I think has really been interesting and helpful to me. He was talking about teaching Westerners—because he practiced in Thailand, he teaches a lot of Thai people—but he was just talking about working with Westerners, American and European culture. He said that for him, he sees self-doubt as one of the biggest hindrances for Westerners in our practice. Self-doubt about our insights. Self-doubt about the insights and experiences of awareness and the liberating nature of insights that we've all experienced, the liberating nature of awareness that we've all experienced.

And he said he thinks—this is his opinion—but he thinks in part we're so prone to this, so really riddled by this self-doubt, and it takes such a grip of us because, in Western culture, our personalities are so strong. Our belief in and our reliance on our personalities is so strong. It's almost like that's really our bottom line belief system. That's where we go for refuge—the kind of steadiness of our personality. Even if we might hate our personality. We're totally practicing to change our personality. Really, bottom line, isn't it? But it's all about the personality. And when the going gets tough and we're caught back in really believing the personality, there's some way that's almost our refuge, he's saying. That's what we get caught in.

That's the belief system. That's the sakāya-diṭṭhi on a really deep level, where we can talk a good line, but somewhere in there we're so caught in believing it. And so he says we just keep getting tricked back into this sakāya-diṭṭhi, this belief.

This is the place of reference from which we'd be, what I say, hitting the wall. It's not the experience that's happening that makes us hit the wall. It's that reference point of sakāya-diṭṭhi—"this is happening to me, I'm doing this, I'm not doing this, I can't do this," whatever.

We all keep saying this all the time, but just noticing that. So many people have talked about and experienced just moments—not even experience—of such profound tenderness, sensitivity, or ease, or relaxation, or quiet, or all kinds of things going on, but it's just no problem. Just seeing what's happening. Even seeing the personality patterns come and just seeing them and going, "Yeah, look at that. I see how the causes bring it about, I see the effects, it goes, no problem."

And then when we get somehow really caught, you can see it coming in because there's a lot of awareness. You can see: "Oh, this thing triggered, and this thing triggered, and my energy was low, and my back was hurting, and there was a little bit of aversion, and I was a little tired, and I didn't quite notice this thought and that thought and that thought, and the next thing I knew—boom." It's like you can make the whole recipe, and we can see it.

And that even undercuts our trust more, because we believe so strongly in personality that if I see it, that means I should be able to stop it. I'm in control here. Not. So we then don't believe, we don't trust the wisdom from the tenderness, from the spaciousness, from whatever it is. It could be any experience—there's no particular experience I'm calling good and another one I'm calling bad. But the times when the Velcro's not so strong, that one isn't about our personality view, and we don't trust it.

That's what Sāmedo's saying. We get caught back into believing in our personality, really believing in it. And it gets more and more subtle, and there's no way we can describe or have a view that encompasses the breadth of our path. What should happen? What shouldn't happen? Everything's going to happen. And all of it's the path. And it's completely different for each one of us. Yes, there's movements we can see, there's patterns, but the particulars are completely different for everybody.

So there's nothing to really compare it to, to prove how useless you are. What's happening is all that could be happening. There's no way it can be outside of our path. But our personality view is not a reference point from which we can see that or trust it. So that's so limiting.

This is from a book about a Thai woman in the last century who was apparently greatly realized. Mei-Chi Cao was her name. She said, "Everything that makes a person unique changes continually and eventually disintegrates. Each personality is constantly ceasing to be what it was and becoming something new. Constantly. Those factors one tends to conceive of as self are impermanent and fleeting. Everything about bodily form and the mind's thoughts and feelings is without intrinsic stability and bound to dissolve."

Just what Andrea was saying last night. But even if within our moment-to-moment thinking and thoughts and emotions and personality we can see the constant shift—we can see that, we know it—there's a way that views, when we don't see them, we see the inner change. But the big view is that's all changing, yet the big picture is it's all coming back to that same self-judgment, which is my bottom-line core pattern, or whatever it is.

And it's something Luang Por Jamnian said once. He said, "Only two things are not impermanent: nibbāna and a concept." You get it? Because a concept freezes. The concept solidifies what the concept is of and doesn't let it change. So our concept of our personality does that.

So notice when the sakāya-diṭṭhi comes in, when it's just starting or when it's strong. Notice when it's not there. And notice, as Buddhadāsa said, "The sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind." That's all.

It's just another arising appearance. There's grasping and clinging—boom, sense of self. Fine. That's the effect of grasping, so what? The grasping and clinging goes away, the sense of self goes away. A hundred million times a day, so what? We breathe so many times a day, fine. Coming and going. But we make this big commotion because of this kind of belief in our personality.

So I just wanted to talk then about a couple of examples of hitting the wall. As I said, you can all come up with your own. And again, it's not just that it's hard, but when we really somehow feel so discouraged, we're losing our motivation and really believe "I can't do it."

That's one of the big ones, the first one: "I had it, but now it's gone. I knew how to do it, but it's gone. It just proves I can't do this. I really can't do it." That's what vicikicchā is talking about—self-doubt.

There's a sutta from the time of the Buddha that I really like because it points to something quite profound, about a man named Assaji, a monk, a well-realized monk who was very ill, probably dying. The Buddha comes to him and asks him a series of questions, but the gist is that he's saying, "I hope you are not troubled by remorse and regret," as he's dying. "I hope your mind and heart is clear."

And Assaji says, "I actually have quite a lot of remorse and regret."

The Buddha says, "Is it about your virtue? Something you've done?"

"Oh no, it's not that."

"Then why are you troubled if you have nothing to reproach yourself for in regard to virtue?"

And Assaji says, "Well, formerly, Venerable Sir, when I was ill, I was able to keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations"—in other words, he could get calm and concentrated—"but now I cannot obtain concentration." The man is dying, and this is what he's upset about. "And as I do not obtain concentration, it occurs to me, 'Let me not fall away.'" He's really afraid. He's falling away from the path because he can't get concentrated while he's dying.

You can relate, can't you? It's really quite something. And when our personality views are turned towards what's happening in our practice—which is what starts to happen here—it's magnified. It's like, "Oh my God, this is the most important thing to me and I can't do it. This is proof I can't do it. What am I going to do?" So it's huge. And he's dying, so add that on top of it—your last moments and you can't do it and there's no other chance.

Of course the Buddha says, "Assaji, those ascetics, those Brahmins who regard concentration as the essence and who identify concentration with asceticism, with the path—failing to obtain concentration, they might think, 'Let us not fall away.' What do you think, Assaji? Haven't I told you? Is form permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent."

"Therefore, seeing this, one understands this cannot be relied upon. There's no more of this."

And he goes through all the aggregates—form, which is the body, pleasant feeling, perception, consciousness, mental formation. They're all impermanent. You can't rely on any of them. He's basically saying, "Okay, so you can't concentrate. That's just a mental formation that comes and goes based on conditions. It doesn't mean you are falling away from the path. It just means conditions have changed right now."

We don't always have the Buddha to come and remind us. But the fact that even at that point, a monk who had been practicing with the Buddha and had a lot of understanding could still fall into that when he was close to death—it just shows how deep this pattern can be. It's not a small thing to keep deeply running into the identification and the power that this identification can have with our deeply habituated self-doubts, fears, and pains. You don't just see it a couple of times and you're done. It's going to keep on showing up in different ways.

That's not something you're doing wrong. It is the path.

So that's one way we hit the wall: I can't do it, and I could before.

Sometimes, again as I was saying, we've seen our patterns, our really suffering patterns, quite a bit. We're quite familiar with them. And they come again. And as I was just saying, we see the whole thing. You can label the whole thing. But not only is it happening, it's happening with awareness. And so not only do we feel the pain of it, we feel the pain of knowing that I shouldn't be doing this anymore. I've seen it enough. So we add the pain of humiliation. And we add the pain of "I can't do it properly." And it's just, I don't even want to look at this anymore. I can't face this another moment—as if there was anywhere to go, and there's not.

So that's really the despair, because if you walk out of here, it's walking out with you. But there's this sense of, I can't look at it anymore. And there are times, of course, when everything—the fear or the pain or the frustration, whatever—is, as we say, overwhelming, stronger than the mindfulness and its skillful means to change the channel, to do metta or brighten the mind or take a walk. I'm not talking about that. I'm talking about on such a deep level, it's hopeless. I just can't do it anymore—like hitting a wall.

This is where patience comes in. The three types of transcendent patience: patience when wronged, patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma, and patience to keep meeting the profound truth without giving in to fear. The profound truth doesn't always look beautiful and lovely. The profound truth could be plumbing the depths of your despair in a particular moment as well.

Another place we hit the wall is sometimes it's just an intimation. It isn't obvious. You're not recognizing what the pattern is. But things have been going well, and then it changes. Okay, this happens all the time. And usually a lot of thinking starts. Things get really scattered. You get really confused. You don't know what's going on. And you know you didn't do anything different. I like to call that a transition time, when usually something is about to come up. We never know what. It's usually something we'd rather not know about. But sometimes it's just this intimation of either a pattern or a fear or a grief—just something about ourselves. We don't really know what it is, but the habit of our life has been to keep it down. The habit of our life has been around denial of this, which may have been skillful at the time. It's nothing about skillful or not, but for now, that's not needed. But the habit of denial, the habit of "I don't want to feel this, I don't want to be it," is so strong that all kinds of behaviors have been promulgated over our life to basically distract the mind from feeling this thing.

And so when it comes up—and it could be some kind of primal fear, it could be some deep loneliness, it doesn't necessarily have to be a traumatic memory, it could be, but it doesn't have to be that at all—it's just something that our so-called personality patterns have been built around. I don't want to have to feel that. And for me, I noticed the thought was, "I'll die if I have to feel that." That's as if. And then all these basically stupid, not very nice behaviors to keep myself from having to feel it. You get into all kinds of arguments with people and running away from things and doing this and doing that and creating all kinds of complications in one's life—not to feel a feeling, which when I actually feel it, it's like, oh, well, that's really intense. Okay, I can feel that. It's like a huge relief.

But anyway, when it's just there and we don't know what it is—the mind doesn't know and we don't have any kind of clear intellectual understanding—the sense is, "I'm out of here. I'm so out of here. There's no way I want to get anywhere near this." And we can't even quite say it clearly.

Or something really difficult comes up and we know it, but that personality view arises: "I can't. I just can't be with this"—which is the old belief system. "I can't. There's no way." And it's almost as if at that point, the sense of our limitations, our personality limitations, are so strong. "Well, I just can't do that. There's no way I could meet that." You know, that sense of the box that we make for ourselves out of our sense of ourself. "Well, I just can't."

And we don't almost have the courage to really own our aspirations, to really own our motivation, to really say, "You know what? I can. I don't know how or when or how it's going to show up, but I can come back and be here for it." Almost like sometimes we're afraid to really consciously acknowledge to ourselves the power of our motivation and commitment, because then what if we've really acknowledged we're going forward with everything we have and we still fail? So almost better not to try. I mean, it isn't better not to try, but this is the story. Better just not to really open to it, because I know I can't do it anyway. So why even beat my head against the wall? And I know. So let's just keep on kind of practicing around the edges. And it's pretty good, and it's good enough.

And that's actually another place—"it's good enough." Sayadaw U Pandita called this "stopping within." He would always say, don't stop without—like it's too hard, we want to give up—and don't stop within, which means, "Okay, it's pretty nice now."

And many of us, when we first come to practice, of course we have no clue what we're getting into, because who would if you knew? But we want somehow to be happier, more at ease. That's normal. And so not even knowing the vastness perhaps of what we're getting into, of course our motivation is going to be somewhat limited. That's normal. And it might be some personality thing, some sense of ease, some particular suffering goes away, whatever. And it may be that that actually happens. Life gets easier. Or you understand something. Or it's just enough equanimity. It's mellow enough. "I can deal now." And the motivation just drops out. Okay, stopping within.

And that can be on many levels. That can be just "it's good enough for now. I'm not suffering too much." I spent years like that. "Oh, I'm equanimous. Things are equanimous. I'm kind of practicing"—but not really with that complete abandon, so to speak. But of course, luckily, something always happens to prick the bubble if you're just somewhat awake.

And so the stopping within can be all the way up to really deep levels of absorption and really strong insights. And I think James referred to that in his talk, where the Buddha said one thing he never lost sight of was never to be satisfied with less than complete liberation of heart and mind. And so we may not know—we may think we have complete liberation of heart and mind—but all we have to do is just keep noticing, just keep being honest, just keep being aware. And that's what we would do anyway. Liberated or not liberated, that's what we're going to keep doing. And if we keep doing it, sooner or later, if it ever happens that greed or aversion or confusion arises again in your mind, you'll notice it.

And then, great. You're noticing it. You're happy to notice it. We keep on paying attention. So that's stopping within.

One last thing I want to mention—I don't think I can quite explain it. It's sometimes what I've called, using Chögyam Trungpa's phrase, "nostalgia for samsara." It's not when we're in deep, deep difficulty, but rather as practice is going along and you're really quite deep in the practice, no longer feeling the sense of struggle so much. There are periods where you just start to feel the possibility, opening to moments when that personality view isn't really so operative.

And even though the moment in itself is just what it is—peaceful or joyful or whatever, it doesn't matter—when we kind of come back a little into the personality, there can often be this sense of, "Oh, but what about..." All kinds of projections arise. "I don't know if I want liberation if it means I have to give up my family." We didn't have a family, so now I have to give up my family? Or I can't be in a committed relationship, like someone said today. Or it means I can't appreciate art anymore. I can't be creative. Or I'll never like chocolate again. That's kind of silly, but it's there—this "Oh no, I don't want it."

It's just our mind making stuff up and projecting it. And then it's like, "I want to go back to the pleasure garden. I don't want to renounce this stuff. I don't want to give up this stuff, and you can't make me." Nostalgia for samsara is just all the dull grayness.

I've found in myself, often in different periods in my life, it's almost like a grief, like a mourning. It really feels like that for some—I couldn't even say what—but some aspect of my personality that feels so familiar. It doesn't even go anywhere, that's the thing. But it feels like something, some attachment to it, is dying. Some deep belief is getting less. And it's almost like an old, comfortable cloak, and we just want to hold on to it, even though it's ratty and moldy and stinky. "No, it's just so comfortable." It's almost like a mourning of something. There are times I've really felt that. That's okay. Mourning is like this. Just that nostalgia for samsara—don't want to let it go, even when we don't like it.

People often say they see they're in a deep suffering pattern. They recognize it. They can name it. But there's just some little piece that's like, "But still, who would I be without this?" Sometimes it's really bizarre how we're holding on. So we just notice all these ways.

The last one I want to mention is one we've already spoken about in some of the impermanence talk as well. It's the kind of fear that comes up after an insight into "there is nowhere to land, everything's changing, there is no self"—whatever form it takes. Sometimes that's very liberating, and sometimes fear comes up with it, and sometimes we get lost in the fear. But mostly people hear that and think, "Well, that's the one I want. I want to have that kind of fear." But that can stop us too—if we start thinking about it, with all the projections of annihilation.

And the other one, in terms of practice, is when we have an idea of choiceless awareness, when it's just things coming and going, that openness I was talking about—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching. It's very nice, or it's fast, or whatever, but there's a way we think, "Oh, now this is what it is. This is how things are. Everything's just coming and going and there's no me, and now I know how it is."

And it's going to stay this way. And then it doesn't stay that way. It gets completely chaotic. You think, well, this isn't choiceless. This isn't how it is. It's chaos. It's not supposed to be chaos. It's supposed to be orderly, flowing smoothly. Or else really concentrated. Not stuff all over the place in chaos. And I can't tell what's happening. This can't be right. I can't do it. And we're back there again.

But that's the other thing I like to say: saṃsāra is messy. It's not going to get all neat and tidy because we meditate. You just see how chaotic things are. In terms of a reference point of me, we never know what's going to happen. That's what Andrea was saying—it never stays the same, ever. Doing your practice right doesn't mean now stuff stays the same. It doesn't mean even the patterns stay the same. Constant flux, expanding, contraction.

And so it's so hard sometimes. Freedom from clinging, which is really the seed of freedom—freedom from clinging is uncompromising. It's not freedom from clinging to most things, but a few things kind of can stay familiar. Freedom from clinging is completely uncompromising, and we can't imagine what it's like because we can only imagine what we already know. You know, Krishnamurti's famous phrase: freedom from the known. Or the Buddha saying, in terms of a sense of self, it's always unsatisfactory because whatever way you conceive of it, the fact is always other than that. Whatever way we conceive of our sense of self, the fact is always other than that.

But we keep on, this personality wanting to land somewhere and falling into this, hitting this wall—me hitting the wall. I just don't know.

Enlightenment is not a self-improvement project. Nothing about non-clinging confirms and justifies and props up the sense of me or my personality. And we can't imagine from the view of our personality what that's like. And so when we're in that hitting the wall, knowing that that sense of personality is always the reference point when we're feeling we're hitting the wall like that—we're looking at what's wrong, what's wrong. Nothing's wrong. We're just evaluating it from some standpoint that's completely unreliable. But it's so familiar at times, and subtle. That's what Sayadaw says—we're so caught back into it, we don't recognize it.

Stephen Batchelor, I love the way he says things. He says emptiness is not just an experience of oceanic bliss. It is a falling apart of all of our strategies of self-interest, self-centeredness, and seeming protection. And although freeing, this falling apart of all our strategies evokes great disconcertion, dis-ease sometimes—like being in a no man's land without reference points.

And here in practice, all our strategies, our personality patterns of self-interest, of self-centeredness, of seeming protection—these are coming into play around mostly your actual meditation practice. And we can easily tend to overlook that that's what's happening and get so focused on how we're practicing and what we're doing and what's arising. We forget to say, oh, right—I can't trust any view I have about what should be happening and what I can do and what's right, when I'm caught. I don't mean we can't use skillful means. Of course we can. But that's not with this view of: if I do this, then it's going to be like that. If I do this, I'll get rid of this frustration. If I do this, it'll get back to openness. You can feel it—it's not the words, it's the energy in the mind from wanting, from aversion, from it's all about me getting it together. Unreliable.

We can't trust any idea we have of skillful means when the motivation is greed, aversion, or me, me, me. We just can't see clearly. That's all.

But this is hard for us—that our strategies all fall apart. And still, we somehow have to find the motivation, find the trust, find the commitment to keep on opening with total commitment into this next moment of the unknown. And it is unknown. As much as we up here talk about the way and the path and the way it can go, and all the things we read—that can support us, that can be information. But again, it's completely different in each moment for each of us. And all we can do is say, how can I summon up the courage, really like undaunted courage, to open again into this moment with total commitment?

And sometimes it's the one thing we think we don't ever want to be with, the thing we're practicing not to ever have to be with, that is the thing we have to open into. Because that's what's happening. That's our path at this moment.

Maybe a lot of you saw that movie, Touching the Void. It was a recreation of something that happened maybe twenty years ago—two friends who were mountain climbing, really high mountains in the Andes in South America. They were coming down together, roped to each other, and they kind of slide, and one of them falls over the edge, hanging over this huge void. The other guy's trying to pull him up for hours, can't pull him up. He's getting slowly, slowly dragged over to the edge himself. And so at some point he made the decision, and he cut the rope.

The guy who cut the rope went over and looked down—his friend had fallen into a deep crevasse. There was no way he could get to him. So the guy who cut the rope went on back.

Then what happened? The guy's in the crevasse, this big, big hole in the ice. It looked as if it was the Himalayas—that level of mountain climbing. He's in this deep crevasse, and he'd broken his leg, so he's in a lot of pain. He's on a little ledge, and it keeps going down, and he's on this ledge for hours—twelve hours, twenty-four, I can't remember. He can't get back up. No way he can get back up. And he's just there. No water, no food. Broken leg.

And he said, after twelve or twenty-four hours, "What do I do? I've got to do something." He said he had such a deep, primal fear of going down deeper into that crevasse. He just could not imagine ever doing it. But he said, at the same time, "I can't just abdicate. I have to do something." And the only thing he could do was with his rope—kind of secure it and lower himself deeper into the crevasse.

So he did that. No idea if it was just going to go on forever, if he was lowering himself into the thing he feared even more than the position he was in now. And he did it. He said, "I can't abdicate."

And as it turned out, he went down and he hit ground and he could kind of go up a slope. Remember, he has a broken leg. He's had no food or water for like twenty-four hours. It's an amazing story. It takes him two or three days to drag himself over boulders and through horrible terrain. He's completely out of it, hallucinatory by the end. But he just barely manages to make it back before he dies. And his friend had been waiting four days, never thought he was alive, and was just about to leave.

It's really an intense movie, but it really happened. And they have the two guys who did it kind of talking too. But that sense of—you know, the most scary, self-perpetuating experience. Sometimes it's like that. Do we just open into it, or do we just freeze on the crevasse?

And I just want to say: nobody here is freezing on the ledge, because you're still here. And awareness is going. You're not creating awareness. Mindfulness is happening. You're noticing what's happening. You don't have to fix it. You just have to keep being willing to be awake. Everything else is doing itself.

But sometimes that being willing to stay awake is really, really hard. And so we have to find—how do we find that? I don't advocate giving up. We find that way to really make that commitment. And then—and I'm not trying to be discouraging, I'm trying to just be straight—over and over we need to do that. It's not just once. And it's about all different kinds of things.

Even Ajahn Sumedho, who talks so much about having trust and confidence in awareness—that's kind of his thing, he's always talking about it—we were meeting with him, some of the teachers, a couple of years ago. And he was describing a period some years ago at Amaravati, where he's the abbot, where it was an extremely difficult time between all the sangha members—the nuns and the monks and him. And a lot of it, because he was the head and making decisions, he was getting a lot of blame, a lot of criticism. And he said, "My personality hates that. I hate being blamed and criticized." He was just shrinking and fearing it, doing what he needed to do, but a little bit getting caught in it.

And he's always talking about, as I said, having confidence in awareness. And he said—this really went in for me, I don't know if it will communicate to you—he said at some point through this whole process, which went on for weeks and weeks, he realized something. He said, "I just made a determination, an absolute determination, that my confidence is in awareness, not in my personality."

And he knows this and has been talking about it for years. But at this point, in a really heavy time, he called up all his clarity, all his clear intentions, saying, "My confidence is in awareness, not in my personality." Just reminding oneself. We have to keep reminding ourselves. It doesn't go on automatic pilot. And I don't know, somehow that really inspired me.

And so, as I said, I don't mean to be discouraging. It's like the expansion-contraction. We come to a place where we have to lower ourselves into the crevasse. We find that commitment to just open into this next unknown, just wholeheartedly, and let it be what it is. It might be fine for a while, the regular ups and downs. Then we come to another one. But it's not the same us coming to the same place.

Because what I've found in this practice is it keeps going. It may even be harder as we keep going. We're hitting into more difficult stuff that we haven't been able to see before. But it's met with a deeper faith because there's a deeper wisdom, a deeper understanding. Sort of like people say, "I keep coming to seeing these same things I've seen before, but in a different way." It's kind of spiraling deeper and deeper.

I don't know if this helps, but to me, this is kind of like an allegory that helped. A couple of years ago I had the flu for a few weeks, and all I could do was just lie around on my couch, so I was watching a lot of videos. And I ended up watching the Lord of the Rings trilogy again, just all three of them. I'm sure most of you are familiar with it. But what I was so struck by, more than before, was what an allegory Frodo's journey is for our spiritual path, for our practice—how it keeps spiraling deeper and deeper.

So I'm just going to go into it a little bit, if you'll let me. And what are you going to do?

So, in the beginning when Frodo has to take that ring of power and Gandalf the wizard comes and tells him he has to go outside of the little hobbit town he lives in and go to Bree—he's doing that on bright faith, what you'd call bright faith, because he trusts Gandalf.

He doesn't have a clue what's going on in the world, or really what the danger is, or anything. But Gandalf tells him this, and he trusts Gandalf. He thinks it'll be an adventure going outside of Hobbiton. He goes with his friends.

And before he even gets to the little town of Bree, he's already run into danger like he never even knew existed in the world—in his safe little world. These black riders are coming and trying to get them. And they finally get to this place, and he's like, "Oh my God, that was a huge adventure. But finally I can hand this thing off to Gandalf, and I'm done." Right?

And of course, he gets there and Gandalf has disappeared. And he has no clue what to do. There's danger all around. And he has to make the decision to trust some weird guy—he doesn't know who he is. And he does some things that are stupid, and the guy is threatening him, and they almost get killed that night. And finally the guy, Aragorn, says, "Okay, you have to come with me. We have to go to the elves."

So they go out again, and they're really being pursued this time. It's really dangerous, and they're having to actually fight. These little hobbit guys—they never fought. And they're having to actually fight with swords against these huge black wraiths that can't be killed. And Frodo is stabbed. He almost dies. And it's more than he ever could have imagined that he could ever live through or do. And somehow, really almost having no choice, just getting carried along. And finally Aragorn gets them to the elves, and they're in a place of more beauty—like a deva realm—than he never expected, never thought was in the world.

At this point, good and evil are so obvious. The elves are so beautiful. Rivendell is so beautiful. The black riders are so evil—the horses are all foaming. It's pretty clear who's good and who's bad, so far.

So he gets to the elves and he's like, "Oh, I've done the hero's journey more than I could ever do. And now I'm in this more beautiful place." And he meets his uncle, who he thought was dead, and all this stuff. And then it turns out it's just beginning. It's just beginning. And this ring has to be carried to the land of evil to be destroyed. And it turns out he's the one who has to do it. And he has to volunteer to do it. No one tells him he's the one to do it—it becomes really clear.

So at this point, he has a bit more wisdom as to the importance of good and the importance of what he's doing, and also of the threats facing him. So he has more courage than he ever had in the beginning to stand up and say, "Okay, you guys are all arguing. I see I have to do it." Still not really having a clue, but a little more sense that this isn't just a lark.

And then the seven guys come—they're all going to help him, go together. So you have a sense of togetherness. And right away, the leader disappears—Gandalf. And they go through all kinds of more and more difficult stuff until finally one of the company turns on Frodo. And he sees he can't even trust the company he's with. And then he has to make the decision to go completely by himself, off across the river into this land of Mordor—this little guy, no clue what he's doing. But he knows enough now to be scared to death and to know he has no clue. And he's exhausted. He can't trust anyone.

But his faithful companion comes with him, so they go. And it just keeps going from bad to worse. Every day, once they're in Mordor, he has to keep making the decision. They get up off the rocks and the steam, with that slimy Gollum following. How to keep going? It's not a one-time decision, and each time it's harder, but the stakes are higher.

Somewhere along the way it becomes so clear—he really gets it—that he's never going to live through this. At some point it starts becoming clear that the only way he can keep going is because his motivation has shifted to really caring for the world. It's no longer about being the hero or having a lark or not letting down his friends. He's really seeing that for some reason this is where he is, and he has to do this for all beings, basically.

And at the same time as he's going, the evil outside and all the good stop being so separate. The difficulty starts turning inward on him, and after a while it starts eating away at him from the inside. So there's no longer this separation of the evil out there and the good ones going to do this thing. It's turning in, and the ring is taking over, and he can't see clearly. He turns on his friend, believes the lying voice of Gollum, and is just barely dragging himself up there.

But the only way forward—the harder it gets, the deeper he has to go into his own experience of confusion and delusion and evil and anger and fear. Yet there's still a deeper faith and wisdom that keeps him going, keeps him going, even when he knows he's going to die.

And then even at the very end, when he's going to throw it in, he can't do it all by himself. It really isn't about him doing it by himself. He kept sparing this creature Gollum when his companion wanted to get rid of him, when everyone else wanted to get rid of him. He kept sparing him. And Gollum turned on him and almost had him killed. But at the end, if it hadn't been for that creature coming and trying to take the ring and biting off his finger, he never would have been able to let go.

So you never know. The unknown—you never know.

I just loved that sense of how the deeper you go, the more you see you never had a clue when you started. And it gets harder and harder, more and more touching us internally. It takes so much more courage. But the courage is there because the faith is stronger, because the wisdom is deeper. That's how our practice keeps going. Our life keeps going like that. And for each of us, it's going to take a different turn. We never know which turn is around the corner for us—how to keep finding the wisdom, the courage, the humility.

Just remember that it's different for everyone, and it's hard for everyone. Buddhadasa likes to talk about Nibbana for everyone. But it's hard for everyone. When we get too lost in hitting our own wall, just widen your gaze a little and realize this is just this particular personality representative of all beings. This is my difficulty I'm coming up against, but it's just representative of all beings in all our different ways. Can I, just for this moment, find the courage to open into it again?

I want to end with an example of how it's hard for all beings and we don't know, we never know what manifestation our path is going to take—how our deepening wisdom and compassion and courage and difficulty is going, what direction it's going to take us, how we're going to show up in the world. There's no template of how you should act or how we should live or how our awakening should manifest. But it does.

Some of you may have seen this film called Blessings, about Tsoknyi Rinpoche and some women going to see some nuns in Tibet—the Nuns of Nangchen—whom Rinpoche had been kind of responsible for. They traveled to this remote area of Tibet, just in the last couple of years, where there had been a series of forty nunneries with all these nuns doing really heavy-duty practice. During the Cultural Revolution, all forty nunneries were destroyed. The nuns had to disperse. Some were killed. Some went back to their families or regular life. Some were sent to work camps. A few went way, way higher up into caves in the mountains and just did their practice in hiding.

But for all of them, it was really tough times. Starvation. The ones who went back to their families had to act like normal people and be like secret yogis. They couldn't show that they were practicing, but they were committed. Very tough, horrible conditions, a lot of starvation, a lot of difficulty.

Just in the last few years, they've been able to start coming out. The nuns who were up in the hills have started coming down. The ones living with their families have started coming back out.

And by hand, they're rebuilding nunneries to live in. The film showed this, and it's pretty intense—they're dragging all these materials up huge mountains. I can't even imagine the suffering they had to go through. That was their particular path.

But I just want to leave you with this image from the very end of the movie. They go up to meet what they say is one of the oldest of the nuns, the one they think is the most realized. They climb up to some little hut where she agrees to see them.

She looks ancient—ten million lines in her face. She's had a really hard life. She could be 120, or she could be 35, who knows? She'd been through starvation. She was lying down; you couldn't tell if she was actually disabled and had to lie there or if she was just resting. And she was just spinning her prayer wheel.

And of course, since she was the oldest, most realized nun, her eyes were filled with light. Her face was filled with light. She's just spinning her prayer wheel nonstop. It seems like she lies there all day spinning her prayer wheel. She said, "My mind—all that's in my mind is just prayers for the happiness and well-being and freedom from suffering of all beings."

I thought, wow. What a way to spend your day. What a way. Who knows how her circuitous path took her there, buried somewhere way up in Tibet where nobody knows. And she's just there, every moment of the day, spinning her prayer wheel and sending out prayers for the well-being of all beings.

We never know. But stuff like that helps me refine my commitment. When I feel like I can't do it—we can do it. Because we don't have to do it. It does itself.

So let's just sit quietly for a minute.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 57

An Unhesitating Generosity

In this intimate conversation, Carol Wilson reflects on her transformative visits to Burma over many years and how encountering the country's rich Buddhist culture has profoundly shaped her understanding of the Dhamma. She describes how the meditation traditions taught at IMS—stemming from Mahāsī Sayādaw, U Ba Khin, and other Burmese masters—are just one facet of a broader spiritual culture where dāna (generosity), sīla (ethical conduct), and mettā (loving-kindness) are woven into daily life.

Carol offers moving descriptions of the nuns she has come to know in various nunneries throughout Burma—from large established communities where nuns study for years to pass the rigorous Dhammācariya examinations, to tiny startups where two or three nuns build their own dwellings while caring for orphaned girls. Despite living under an oppressive government, these women manifest what Carol calls "unhesitating generosity"—a reflexive kindness extended equally to strangers and friends that she finds deeply purifying to witness.

The conversation illuminates how meditation practice, while precious, exists within a larger ecosystem of supportive conditions. Carol reflects on how Western practitioners often encounter the Dhamma primarily through meditation instruction, without the cultural context that naturally cultivates qualities like generosity and loving-kindness. She speaks of how Burmese people—taxi drivers, young families, elderly nuns—embody a reciprocal generosity that isn't calculated but flows naturally from the heart. This teaching offers a valuable reminder that awakening is supported not only by formal practice but by the cultivation of dāna, sīla, and bhāvanā as an integrated way of life.

An Unhesitating Generosity

As many of the yogis here probably know, some of the forms of meditation that we teach come from Burma. Goenkaji, my first teacher, was coming from a tradition out of Burma—U Ba Khin, who was Burmese. Mahasi Sayadaw, U Pandita, Sayadaw U Janaka—they're all Burmese, coming from a form of meditation that Mahasi Sayadaw began.

But for many years I wasn't interested in going to Burma. When I did go to Burma to do a retreat for myself, it was in 2001, I think. So I wasn't going anymore looking for the tradition or the lineage. Something just drew me to go do a retreat in Burma.

And it completely took me by surprise and crept up slowly. But there's some way that after I spend time in Burma, my heart and mind feel a little bit purified. I come back often uplifted. There's really a sense of being cleansed out, and I did not understand that for a long time because Burma is a very conflicted country. It's a country of great opposites.

What I've come to see is that what uplifts me and purifies me is being in this field. The nuns, the monks, and many of the lay people that one comes in contact with are filled with a kindness, an unhesitating generosity—to strangers, to friends. It doesn't have to be that you're someone coming to meditate. It could just be the guy who's driving the taxi. There's just this mettā-full generosity and kindness.

And at the same time, the government is violent and brutal. Everybody in that country has to deal with that on a daily basis. It colors, it invades, it intrudes on everybody's life. So everyone is living in the face of compromises with a really brutal government that does nothing for the people—compromises and ways of finding ways around it, how to take care of each other. They really have to take care of each other because the government doesn't. And personal compromises that you don't hear about but that you know people are having to make.

There's no way anybody escapes that ugliness, that brutality, that fear on a daily basis. And it's not something that's shared. That's not what you see. It's taken me years to start to even feel into it. I still have no clue how much that's coloring people's lives. We can't imagine it sitting here safe and secure in Barre, in our middle-class, seemingly safe world.

And so many of the people that one comes across—I think it's seeded by the nuns and the monks. I think it's seeded by Buddhist ways of looking at life. But it's actualized in how people meet you: with the friendliness, with the kindness, with the generosity, with having so much faith in goodness and faith in meditation practice, faith in practicing mettā and sharing that with each other.

You don't notice it at first. Our mind can see some of the practices as being too faith-based, simplistic, ritualistic. But you start to see how it affects people's lives on a very deep level—their psyches, their hearts.

I know I'm not alone in this experience. Many people I know come out feeling, "Wow, I just feel so much more willing to be kind, to be generous, to have mettā for people." It just is contagious. So that's the best I can say as to why I keep going back.

One of the things that I've gone back to in Burma year after year is in fact visits with the nuns in various monasteries. Burma is basically a traditional Buddhist country. It took a few visits, because the first couple of times I just went to a meditation center to meditate. Usually those are run by a Sayadaw who is a monk, and there are monks there. There would be nuns practicing as well, in general. The more you go to Burma, you see monks all over the place—although less obvious in Yangon after their troubles a couple of years ago. And nuns in their beautiful pink. You just see them everywhere on the streets.

And if you go up to Sagine, where I went for a few years to help teach a retreat at Chazwa, there are hundreds of monasteries and nunneries—and they're different. Monasteries and nunneries for the nuns. They generally keep separate, though meditation centers can bring them together. But generally nuns will be in their own nunneries, and each of them is very different from the other. There's not just one way.

For example, just around the area in Yangon near Shwe Oo Min and Chanmyay Myaing, two meditation centers where I've spent a lot of time, there are probably twenty, twenty-five, maybe more nunneries within a couple of miles. Some of them are rather large, with twenty or thirty nuns, established for a few years. Some are very small, like startups—two or three nuns building a place by themselves, bricking it by themselves, putting up the bamboo walls by themselves. And as soon as they get it going, they bring in several small girls who become nuns, whom these older nuns, who have done some studying, then educate. They really take them on, take them in.

Many of the nunneries consist of a few older nuns and a lot of young girls who are either very poor or orphans, or some who just want to be nuns from the time they're young. Others, like those up in Sagine, are older, more established. There's one right next door to where I used to teach, and I know the nuns there pretty well. I was just talking to one this year, my friend Yuzina, and she told me the building had been there over a hundred years. There were forty-two nuns there. She herself is very bright, very with it, with a great sense of humor. She's been there since she was seven. She wanted to be a nun from that age, and her parents didn't want her to, but she talked them into it. She's been in that place since she was seven. You'd think she'd be really isolated and out of it, but she's very savvy, very together. She's in her late thirties now.

There are forty-two nuns there, and now that she's older and has finally passed her Dhammacariya—which is a very difficult period of study that takes years and years—she's become quite accomplished. Many of the nuns are study nuns. They don't meditate as much; they study a lot. She will have studied for years and years to learn Pali and Burmese to pass this exam. And at the same time, she's getting up early, doing the chanting, doing the cleaning, doing the cooking, spending two full days a week going out on alms round where they receive raw rice and a little bit of money. They have gardens—this huge amount of work alongside this intensive study. Then once they finally pass, which is extremely prestigious and hard, they start right away teaching young nuns. I noticed there were a lot more young nuns there this year because she passed her Dhammacariya last year.

There are also huge places in Sagine, in Mandalay, in Yangon that are more established, where the nuns focus more on studying. There are places where nuns go specifically to meditate. And then there are tiny nunneries with just two nuns, really poor, hardly having anything to eat. You don't always know if they became nuns because there was nothing else to do—and I will say that's part of how it impacts their lives. Or perhaps they just don't happen to have the support, because many nuns don't. Yet they still manifest this generosity, devotion, kindness, friendliness—completely dedicating their lives to taking care of these young girls. It's really so beautiful to see. And this is throughout Burma. There must be tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of nuns. They're really part of the fabric of life.

So if we were to take all of this rich experience you've had in Burma and try to understand how it might speak to us—how would you describe that? How would you translate it, if you will? Or can you?

I think partly, for me, you notice I keep talking about the qualities, the broader qualities. I'm not so much talking about meditation, which is of course a huge part. But here, coming up in the West, we learned meditation as part of Buddhism, and it is the jewel. I'm a meditation teacher—it's the jewel of the Dharma. But it's not the all of the Dharma.

I really feel that for me, coming out of this Western system, we needed to bring up the meditation, but it doesn't have a culture to rest in. In Burma, you see that the culture naturally supports, encourages, and brings out the really important qualities that go along with practice: dāna, sīla, bhāvanā—generosity, ethical conduct, and meditation. That's resting in the culture. The bhāvanā, the meditation, is enormously respected in Burma. You get in a taxi, and some young guy driving you asks, "What are you doing here?"

I came to meditate. And this is a normal experience. "You came to meditate? That's so wonderful. I wish I could meditate, but I have to take care of my old mother." Not said with resentment—just, that's how it is. There's both the respect for meditation and the understanding that you take care of your old mother with love. You're generous. You take care of people.

You have nothing. There are poor people, and you offer them something out of dana. Or you offer the nuns something. There's not so much a sense of greed. The nuns will stand and chant metta to the people who've given, and I have seen this happen—people are crying from being so touched by the gratitude, the blessings. The nuns are really blessing you for your generosity, hoping that this will be the cause for your awakening, inspiring metta. You leave feeling a million times better than when you went in to offer the thing. You think, "Who's giving what to whom?"

I don't feel that we have quite learned how to manifest that yet. And it's so natural there. And it's not just with nuns. I know young families that some of us have come to know over the years, and we might offer them some support. There is one family we offered support to this year—a young family, just some money. We have a long-term relationship with them. The next day they show up. I mean, often there's not money for food, but they will always show up. They arrived with huge bouquets of roses to give us, just out of such happiness. You just always reciprocate. And it's not like a tit-for-tat, "I should." It's an expression. You can feel the metta. You can feel the dana. And it just reverberates through the culture.

So I feel, for me, it's really broadened and deepened my internal understanding of Buddha Dharma. Of course, I always knew it wasn't just meditation—and sila, ethical conduct, of course. But there's a way it's more vibrant, more alive. I feel it as a natural, almost reflexive action of mind and heart. Not like, "Oh yeah, dana—that's good. I should give." Or, "Oh yeah, right—moral conduct. Oh, metta—okay, let me try and feel some metta." It's just there.

And people are messed up, and people are greedy, and believe me, there's weird stuff—I'm not saying otherwise. But there's just a way that these qualities are so much more seeded in the culture, among good people, and it has affected me deeply. I'm trying to find how to bring that more into my own life and teaching.

I know when I'm teaching a retreat, sometimes if I give a talk educating about dana as the movement of the heart—which I feel as a teacher, we feel that—the real educating about dana comes in the face-to-face. You're sharing your love of Dharma. People are sharing their inner practice. That's beautiful. That's dana. People support with finances. That's beautiful. That's dana. We offer. That's dana.

So sometimes on retreat, when I talk just a little bit about a story of this nun or that nun, or some generous person in Burma, I can see it in the yogis. First, I can tell who has been to Burma because they get this look on their face—their face starts to glow. You can see it's touching that place of metta, that place of generosity, the beauty of it.

It brightens our heart and mind. You can see it in the audience. And then often many other people are touched. Stories help, you know.

Well, Carol, just seeing the way they have lit up your eyes and inspired you, obviously there's something very powerful that's there. And I do hope that you'll find a way to tell their stories, to learn their stories, to tell them, and that it has the same impact on the rest of us as you transmit those stories to us.

So thank you for taking the time with us. We really appreciate it. I hope it was helpful in some way.

CHAPTER 58

Awareness Is The Path

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this profound talk from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson illuminates how awareness—not any particular experience or state—constitutes the very path of practice. Building on Joseph Goldstein's teaching about mindfulness and clear knowing (sampajañña), she explains that all Vipassanā methods exist simply to support our recognition of and trust in the luminous quality of awareness itself. The Buddha's teaching that the mind is naturally luminous, only temporarily colored by visiting attachments (kilesā), turns our ordinary assumptions on their head: the peace and ease we seek is what's actually natural, while greed, hatred, and delusion are adventitious visitors.
> Wilson grounds these teachings powerfully through her experience visiting the Dachau concentration camp memorial, reflecting on how the same mental forces we observe in small moments on retreat—fear, greed, denial, wanting things to be different—can manifest with devastating consequences when unexamined. She draws on Einstein's description of our sense of separateness as an 'optical delusion of consciousness' and the four agati (wrong courses of behavior caused by desire, hatred, delusion, and fear) to show how these mental qualities literally distort our perception of reality.
> The practical instruction is both simple and demanding: rather than trying to change our experience, we turn toward awareness itself. Through Ajahn Chah's teachings on sati, sampajañña, and paññā, Wilson shows how wisdom (paññā) arises naturally and inevitably when we stop feeding reactive habits and instead nourish awareness. The suffering in any moment—whether physical illness or emotional struggle—dissolves not through fixing but through the simple recognition: 'It's like this.' As Ajahn Chah says, saṃsāra and nibbāna are like the front and back of the hand, known by the same awareness.

Last night Joseph was talking about mindfulness, the difference between just being in the present and mindfulness, actually knowing clearly what's happening in this moment. The difference between awareness and just kind of hanging out.

In some ways, all the different techniques, the different methods that we've offered here—and there are many, many more—all the methods of Vipassana are not about trying to create some better state or to make you good meditators. They're all methods to support, to enhance our recognition, our familiarity, our trust in awareness itself, in the purity of awareness. The way we come to understand how our minds work, as Joseph talked about, is not by sitting down and figuring it out and making charts and graphs, though God knows that's been done enough. It's by the moment to moment, absolute surrender with total commitment into awareness of whatever happens to be arising right now.

So in a way, awareness, mindfulness with clearly knowing, is the path. Not even talk about goal—but moment to moment, it is the path. Awareness that is mindfulness is all about the attitude, what qualities are in the mind, in the consciousness at the moment with awareness. This is really what I want to talk about.

We're not here to cultivate a particular experience. I mean, you might be here to cultivate a particular experience. And maybe you'll get it, and maybe you won't. And then if you do get it, you'll find out it really didn't matter. It came and it went. And then here we still are. Here we still are with—I don't want to say task, that's the word that comes to mind, but that's not inspiring enough—here we are with the joyful and at times daunting and vast life path of exploring the nature of reality, the nature of suffering, and the nature of peace and freedom. We find that the recognition, the understanding of both—freedom and suffering—is right here, right now, in what's arising in this moment, in how it's observed through the quality of the purity of mind of awareness or through the confused, deluded mind. And we take turns experiencing one or the other.

That's what we're studying. We're studying the deluded mind, as Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche said once, and we're studying the awakened mind. It's not like all the delusion is here and somewhere else is the awakened. It's back and forth, back and forth.

We're here to reintroduce ourselves to—there's no "our," of course—our own awareness, just the natural, pure knowing quality of mindfulness. When the knowing faculty, when consciousness is not colored by, when we're not identified with the qualities of confusion, of wanting, of craving, of ill will, of fear. They could even be present, but not when we're identified with them.

When purification of mind or cultivating the pure heart or mind is spoken of, I used to not like that term because it brings up all that pure, impure, good, bad. But if I think of pure as squeaky clean—which is how someone once in an interview described it to me. She'd had some moments of just this really pure moment-to-moment awareness, and that's how she described how the experience felt, just like the mind and heart is squeaky clean. Whatever is arising is just this. Nothing in excess and nothing lacking. Just this, with wholehearted presence.

This is not some unattainable, esoteric state up on Mars somewhere, because something that really makes this whole path workable for me is the understanding, the knowing that there's only moment to moment arising and passing experience, that there's nothing that lasts for more than a fraction.

Knowing that, what we call "my mind at this moment, my mind filled with greed"—have you had that experience at all of your mind being filled with greed? Yes. And how one might characterize it: "I'm such a loser. My mind is filled with greed." That's become very solid, very temporal, lasting in time, and something really difficult that we have to do a lot of stuff to change—to become a person whose mind is not filled with greed. Of course, the trouble is really as long as I'm a "person who," that's really the source of it. But we'll get there later.

If you notice, in that moment what's happening is that in a moment of what we call mind or consciousness, this knowing quality arises in a moment. And all different mental states or mental factors come and go with it. So a moment of greed is really that: a moment of consciousness, a moment of other mental factors. Coming together in that moment, there's also greed. That doesn't mean it's a steady state. Now, if we get attached—"Yeah, I do want that, I do need that, let's really crank it up"—well, that moment of greed strengthens the next moment of greed. But it's very cause and effect, very rational. If with awareness we notice, "Oh, greed feels like this," what's being fed in that moment? Not the greed.

In that moment, the interest, the attention, the ardency, if you will—the love—is going into the awareness. Wow, awareness of greed. Greed feels like this. And greed doesn't last so long in that moment because it's not being fed. The awareness, the mindfulness gets stronger. And you might very well discover the next moment is a moment of just this. And then the next moment is, wow, I had a moment of no self and no greed—I want another one! And then there's a moment of greed. That's how it goes.

How can we take this personally? And yet we do take it personally—that's why we're all suffering here. We react to each of these moments: Oh, what does it mean about me? I'm so bad. I'm so good. I'm so liberated. I'm so lost. It's exhausting. It's a moment of greed, a moment of pure mind, a moment of delusion. I mean, it's not so clear cut, I realize that. But it's not unattainable. That's what I'm trying to say.

And our path is this ardency Joseph talked about last night—of total commitment, of interest. I like to use the word love, really. Love of awareness, of this process of just being willing to be totally here and see what's happening without our interference. It sounds easy. We know it's not, because we are schooled to interfere. We're schooled to think that somehow we can fix it, that we can decide to be a better person, that we can decide to stop being greedy. We know that doesn't work, right? Because if it worked, we wouldn't have to come do this. But we don't really know it doesn't work.

So as Joseph said last night, what we're doing here—we're quite privileged to have this opportunity. Privileged also in that we're interested, that we care enough to explore this way. Because, as you already know, it's not always enjoyable or easy. It really requires, in some ways, the strongest commitment of our life. Because everything's included. Everything. There's nothing outside of this exploration. How can there be? Because in each moment, everything is here. That's all there is. Anything we try to exclude is delusion pushing away the reality of the moment.

So we're privileged. And it is somewhat rare. But what I really wanted to get to tonight is that it may be rare, but it's not some esoteric thing that's somehow divorced, separated from the way we live our lives, from the way everyone lives their lives in the world. What we're watching and learning about—hopefully—and suffering from and feeling joy with in our own minds, here in little things, is the exact same processes that go on in all human minds. Which is both beautiful and, to me, extremely frightening.

I think Sally read from the Dhammapada. I just wanted that last line: with our minds we make the world. This world, this whole world—with our minds, we make the world.

This summer, I was in Munich for a few weeks, and I was there longer than usual. So I had time to do something that I've wanted to do for many years but never had the personal time to do: to visit Dachau, one of the concentration camp memorial museums from the Nazi wartime. This was for me a really powerful experience. Grounding—very grounding—and unexpectedly so. It kind of brought me home even more deeply than usual to the vastness of the human mind, the vastness of what we're doing here, and the reality of what the mind can create in the world. It aligned me with what's really important in this world, and how completely out of whack the world can get.

And it's not just about concentration camps in the Nazi time. I don't have to even run through the list of things—I'll mention some in a minute.

But the site is actually a really quite lovely park, and it's really big. That's one thing that surprised me. There's a couple of buildings that are still standing, and in one of them, they made a museum. I think they did a really good job. It's just lots of big bulletin board placards with different information—different aspects of Dachau all through the years—and really very broad, almost too much information to take in because it was room after room.

But the way they did it that I thought was so skillful was that they'd give an overview—maybe medical testing, maybe that one was about that—and they'd give an overview, but they always made it individual. There was always a picture of some particular people. It would say their names. It would say a little bit about them. Whether it was a guard or whether it was an inmate, there was a way that it made it—you couldn't just say, "Oh, it's some vast other thing over there." It's a really individual person, after person, after person.

I think that's what grounded me in what's really important in this world, in this life, and not in some kind of la la la, "Oh yes, compassion is the natural state of the pure mind." I say that all the time. In a place like that, looking at the vastness of how many people were involved, I can't just so easily go, "Well, as soon as you see how much suffering aversion causes in your own mind, the wisdom naturally arises and compassion is there." I mean, I do believe that. I have experienced that. But that's rather glib in the face of whatever we might be confronted with. And we never know what we're going to be confronted with in life.

So when I say the vastness beyond the individuals—that's why I thought the museum's approach was so wise. Because otherwise, you just get lost in the bigness.

Out behind, there were just the foundations where other barracks had been, but they were gone, so it made it like a nice park. It was huge. I don't know, twenty or thirty barracks had been there. And when I came back into Munich and talked to friends, they all said, "Oh, that wasn't even one of the big ones." And that just—I don't know—it made it all more real.

In my life, I've done tons of reading about the whole gulag system under Stalin, a lot about Chechnya, Bosnia, the Democratic Republic of Congo, racism and sexism and bigotry in this country. I mean, you can look around anywhere. It's not a one-off. And when you look and see how many people and individuals were involved, there's no way my mind could say, "Oh, these are just the bad, weird people. These were all monsters." Can't be so. So many people involved in so many ways—they have to be pretty much regular folks, most of them.

And it makes me look in myself. I don't know what I would do if I was in a situation where each person has to make, in some situation, a small choice. We can make choices from greed, from fear, from denial, from looking around—"Well, everyone else is doing it, it must be okay." Or the denial where we just don't see what's too painful to see. I'm sure you've recognized that in your own personal experience. And you can't see it till you see it. You can't talk your way out of it. Or fear, or wanting to protect someone, or being afraid of losing something. Who knows?

And each decision might be as good as one can make, not knowing how to work with greed or fear or denial. We don't know what we'd do in a situation.

It makes me think of a book I read a few years ago by a doctor named Hassan Bayev. He's a Chechen, and he had come back from Russia—he's a surgeon—during the height of the war between Chechnya and Russia, to just work in the hospital. And he was the only surgeon in all of Grozny, doing operations on people from both sides of the conflict, for some years.

It's quite a story. Because he wasn't taking sides—even though he said, "I'm a Chechen, I'm a patriot, but I'm a doctor first"—things became very intense. The name of his book was The Oath, the oath being his oath as a doctor.

I don't have time to get into it anymore, but the thing I always remember him saying was that his oath was to cause no harm, to help as a doctor. And he said, "I was in a situation I'd never been in. I'd never held a gun. I'd never been in the face of violence." He was threatened and attacked from both sides. And he said, "When you're in a situation you've never been in before, you don't really know ahead of time how you're going to act, how you're going to respond."

I really can relate to that. I don't know how I would respond.

Somehow, being in Dachau and connecting with all these other strands of study grounded me in a way that actually gave me a stronger sense of commitment to this path and commitment to understanding our mind. I saw even more profoundly the strength, the power of these habits in our mind—of fear, of greed, of wanting power, of ill will, of aversion. So much of that impulse to get rid of a whole group of people comes out of fear of the other, out of wanting something the way it used to be. Doesn't that sound familiar?

Seeing the vastness of it, rather than getting completely discouraged, was like: yes, let's get real about this. I know that we don't have to be driven by these forces. It's possible to be filled with anger, filled with fear, filled with greed, and really feel it and not act in that way. But the only way this is possible isn't to have some idea that I want to be a good person and won't act from anger anymore. I tried that one. The only way is by really knowing—fearlessly—how greed and hatred and anger and fear work. How do they arise in our mind and heart? How do we experience them? How strong can they be? What's the effect of acting on them? And the only way we can know that is by being so interested, with awareness, with kindness, that we just sit back and watch it all happen here.

Granted, we're in a situation where we're not going to be challenged in a life-threatening way. We are in a special situation. The situations that come up where we feel filled with fear and filled with greed are not going to be as intense as being life-threatened or having your family threatened. But that doesn't make the way these habits work in our mind any different.

So don't just say, "Oh well, I'm filled with greed, but it's just about wanting another helping for lunch, and it ran out, so I'm just a greedy person." Sit down. Don't judge it. Watch how it's about a stupid thing, but that's not the point. Watch how strong it can get. The greed can be so strong that even though I have the full intention to be fully present with "oh, greed is like this, greed is like this, I'm feeling it in my body, I'm noticing the thoughts"—suddenly I'm out in the parking lot with my car keys thinking, "Where can I go get some ice cream?" How did I get here? I think greed was kind of the intention. But then at least, thank God, I noticed it.

So it's little. And it's okay that it's little. But the force of how these habits work is working in the same way.

And seeing how even an example like that—the greed, or the not getting what we want, really. If there's greed and then we can get what we want, we don't have to actually look at how much suffering there is in the greed, because we got what we wanted. That's how samsara works. You want it, you get it. You want another thing, you get it. Or you get it, and then it's not doing it anymore, so you want another thing. And you can get that, and samsara just keeps rolling.

But you don't get it, and you're stuck here on retreat, so you can't really distract yourself. You have to just sit there and feel: greed feels like this. Then you start to see why most people don't want to look at greed.

Better to act on it than feel it. My god—talk about masochism. And greed is nothing compared to how much suffering there is in hatred and fear. Greed gets under the radar, though. Don't kid yourself if you're a greedy type rather than an aversive type that you're somehow better. Don't kid yourself. It gets under the radar, and you think, "Oh no, everything's just nice." Everything's just nice until you can't get that thing. Then you're in trouble.

So what we're doing here, it may be relatively rare, but it's, in my opinion, so important. We can't change anybody else's relationship to their experience. We know that. I mean, within our close intimate relationships, we may not know that—we keep trying —but you can't. What we can work with is understanding our own. And then that's what we can bring to the world: who we are and how we respond and how we relate. And it does make a difference. So it's so important what we do.

When I was telling some of these guys what I was talking about tonight, they asked, "What are you talking about?" I said, "Oh, you know, awareness and Dachau." That's kind of a leap, isn't it? But I don't think it's a leap. At all, I don't think it's a leap. I think that's what this world is. And what we're doing here isn't just some intellectual, interesting thing we're doing because we have a few months. This is really the heart of freedom and suffering, not only for ourselves, but for what we can bring to the world.

I say that because hopefully when you touch into that for yourself—if you believe it, you don't have to believe it, it's up to you—that gives me, when I remember that, when I believe that, when I know it's true, the courage that it takes to keep waking up into this moment. Because at least fifty percent of the time, it's not going to be a pleasant moment. There are phases when there's more pleasant than unpleasant. But if you think awakening is about getting more pleasant moments and less unpleasant moments, you can throw that idea out the window.

Because that's really where these deep habits come from. It sounds so clinical and technical. How can the sense of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral lead to concentration camps? That's the genius of the Buddha, in my humble opinion—that he was brilliant and obviously had quite a bit of mindfulness, that he could really see this moment-to-moment way the mind was working and the cause-and-effect relationship. But we don't have to be Buddha. We can take what we've learned, and then just take it on trial and look in our experience and see: Is it so? Does this happen for me? As I said, it's on a smaller scale, but it's the same habits. And they're just as strong. So we really need this ardency, this commitment, this courage to show up with this simple, non-judging, committed awareness.

Our path isn't to make ourselves different. Awareness is our path. This pure, simple awareness of what is.

I know you're probably all familiar with this quotation. It just kind of turns things on their head, the Buddha. "Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it." And I say the attachments, the aversions, the kilesas, the torments, the distortions of mind. It is colored, this luminous mind, by the attachments that visit it. "This, unlearned people do not really understand, and so they do not cultivate the mind. Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, and it is free of the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way really does understand. And so for them, there is cultivation of the mind."

To me, that kind of turns our unexamined assumptions—what I'm calling the unexamined assumptions of the world—on their head. What the robot mind acts on, what the normal world acts on.

Right, get it. Greed is good, right? But if there's wanting, that means you need it. If you get it, you'll be happy. And that's just the normal way of things.

That with unpleasant experience, naturally there's ill will and aversion or anger or fear. What else? Unpleasant is bad, and pleasant is good, right? That's just the unexamined assumption about things. And if something is neither pleasant nor unpleasant, well, we just don't even notice it. That's delusion.

The other aspect of delusion, and again the unexamined assumption, is that basically it's all about me—what we call identification. The pleasantness, we want it because it gratifies me. Unpleasant, ill will comes up because it's not nice for me. And even neutral: I'm bored. I need something to happen. Because it's a little scary if there's not something to react to. Then there's no me to really suffer.

So what this quotation is saying is that the attachments—which I'm calling greed, hatred, and delusion—they visit the luminous nature of a moment of awareness, a moment of consciousness. But they do not touch it, color it, stain it, harm it in any way.

But the kleshas—the greed, the wanting, the aversion, the fear, the me, me, me—are basically so much louder, you could say. So much more obvious. We're so much more trained to give all our interest and energy to that, that that's where we go. We forget to notice: oh, greed is like this. Well, that's not... what good is that? Greed is like this. Give me a break. Ill will. Ugh, ill will feels like this. Yeah, well, something better should be happening than that. We want to get in, focus on the experience, focus on what we can get, focus on what we can get rid of.

Turn around. What we're doing here is turning around and recognizing a moment of awareness, a moment of pure conscious awareness. That's all. It's not about changing the experience. It's just about re-recognizing, over and over and over and over, mindful awareness—and the steadiness as we're doing.

And that's what we're doing here. I'm sure you know that anything we're talking about is trying to support us to actually do this practice. And at first, it's some work, and we forget. And we don't know how to just let awareness notice what's happening. We think we have to do it. That's why it's so exhausting. You're trying to relax and be present with just this. No, not this, this. I'm trying to be present with the breath. No, not that way, this way, right? No, I don't want to be present. If I was really present, this wouldn't be happening. This would be happening, right? And then you wonder, how come we're all knotted up?

But awareness is awareness—of what doesn't matter. Whatever's arising does not stain or color or tear or damage awareness or mindfulness in any way, in any way. That's what's turning it on its head, so to speak. Because the moments of mindful awareness, they're not flashy. Much more subtle than all this stuff that's going on—beautiful, ugly, lovely, whatever.

It's just much more subtle. But available in any moment, regardless of whatever experience is happening—pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Sense of self, no sense of self. Sense of self is just another arising experience in a moment.

So our practice is really to strengthen this interest. That's why Joseph was talking about last night: ardency, clearly knowing, mindfulness. Then whatever is arising—as I was saying, mindfulness is difficult in the beginning—but gradually we learn how to just be here for this moment, be here at this moment, with a little less striving. And you find, magically, the awareness starts to get a momentum of its own. If you're doing metta practice, it's the same. The awareness of the metta starts to get a momentum of its own. And in that more steady—not one hundred percent steady, like Sally said, but more steady—wisdom, paññā, arises by itself.

It's not our job to figure out what wisdom is, how it should arise, and make it come. No way. Because we can only think about what we already know, or what we've heard, or what we think wisdom should be. Actually, it would be helpful if you look in your mind and see what thoughts you have about what wisdom should be, so you know what not to believe. Because any thought is too limited. Any thought is too limited.

So our doorway to wisdom, our doorway, is just this simple, steady awareness that allows for accurate recognition of the way things are in this moment to arise.

The habits of wanting that come with pleasant—we're caught in it, but that's fairly observable, no? At times when the mind is somewhat quiet, we can see we're not really wanting unpleasant experience. Just noticing: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thoughts, moods—they can have a little tinge, as the Buddha said, of being pleasant or unpleasant or neither one to us. We mostly don't notice this. It's a feeling, a mental quality. It's not like a thing in the experience. But we experience any sense experience with just that tinge. It's quick. It's gone. It's very fleeting.

And the habits are so strong that when it's pleasant, the mind just leans in a little bit once more. And that assumption—"Oh, this is right, this is good, this is the way things are supposed to be"—it's just so ingrained.

It can be a little bit unpleasant. A sound just comes. You experience something really strong and shocking, or even just mildly unpleasant. And it's not the same for everybody. It's not the same for any one person all the time. It's changing in every moment. A little bit unpleasant, just the tendency to shrink back a little bit. If it's stronger, a tendency to get rid of it. And if we're really lost in it, it goes into ill will or it goes into fear.

We're not saying you should go and make yourself suffer or hurt. We think, "Of course it's normal. It's unpleasant. It should be gone. That is just the way of things." Of course it's suffering. And in the neutral, we just space out, go to sleep, or look for more intensity, or make up a daydream.

The assumption is that it's these experiences that are in the way of peace or happiness or freedom, right? And I don't have to tell you that we get caught in the same patterns in our meditation. Do I? I talk about this stuff all the time. On a mental level, I really know it, but that's not enough. On a cellular level, sometimes I really know it. And then the times that I don't really know it—because everything is only this moment—I find I'm practicing away, or I'm in my life, and all of a sudden I'm suffering, I'm struggling, and I go, "What's going on?" Then I realize, "Oh, I think this thing shouldn't be happening."

There's a teacher, not a Buddhist teacher, in California—Byron Katie.

She has a great line. She says, "When you fight with reality, you lose." It shouldn't be happening—but it's happening. This is what's happening. Oh, it's like this. And then it's okay.

The block to the freedom, the peace, the ease—the natural peace and ease, this luminous mind—that's what turned it on its head. What if, as Ajahn Amaro says, this luminous mind, the natural peace and ease of mind, is what's really natural? We just don't remember to notice it. And the kilesas, the attachments that visit, that color, that seem to block the natural peace and ease—they're adventitious. They come and go. We don't need to give them all the attention. We can notice them, but come back and turn around and notice the awareness, the natural peace and ease in this moment. We can really learn to shift.

And so when the Buddha says that for those unlearned people there's no cultivation of the mind, you're just like a victim. It's unpleasant—it's bad, what can I do? It's pleasant—I need more, I can't get it, what can I do? And it's all about me. There's no way out of that. But this is offering us a chance to just really turn that on its head and explore.

So the work of our mind, the work of meditation, is to see both how the mind's working when the natural peace and ease is observable, accessible—and when it's not, what's going on? How does suffering arise in the mind? How does it cease? And we can see this moment after moment. When we get caught in hating the suffering and taking it personally and blaming ourselves, we're missing—just in that moment—we're missing: oh, look how it works. But then you're blaming yourself, and suddenly you go, "Oh, blaming myself is like this. That's aversion." And here it is again: natural peace and ease available. That's our path.

So the assumptions that pleasant is good, unpleasant is bad, neutral we don't see, it's all about me—they're not subtle. And we do get caught. But in some ways, I think they're easy to recognize. Sometimes they're easy to recognize. It's certainly workable.

But an even more profound and subtle level of the way that these kilesas, these distortions of mind, work when we're not aware of them is that when there's wanting, greed in the mind, and we're not aware of it in a moment of consciousness—when there's fear or aversion and we're not aware that it's there—when there's delusion, confusion, and we're not aware that it's there—it actually colors perception so that we do not perceive what's happening in this moment accurately.

And when we talk about the delusion that it's all about me, that I'm a separate, lasting, temporal entity—it's not like that's an idea we can talk ourselves out of. I bet you've tried. Doesn't work, does it? In fact, the more you think about it: "Yes, yes, I really get it. It's all conditions. It's all just arising. We're all part of the great net of Indra, and there's no separation here. Therefore, from now on, I will just respond with compassion, knowing that we're one." And then, you know, two minutes later somebody gets in front of you in line and you're like, "I can't believe—oh, I'm responding with compassion, responding with—" and then, "Why can't I respond with compassion? I'm so greedy, I'm so deluded, I'm so selfish." And then you're beating yourself up. All this in service of seeing that there's no self, right? Because it comes right back, recycling it all around me, me, me.

Because it's not something we can talk ourselves out of. It's a deeply rooted, moment-to-moment perception—because there's only moment to moment. It's the perception that without wisdom, we don't perceive accurately.

And we can't will ourselves to perceive accurately, because we don't even know we're not perceiving accurately.

This is another really quite famous quotation from Einstein that exactly fits this. Einstein wrote: "A human being is a part of a whole called by us 'universe,' a part limited in time and space. She experiences herself, her thoughts and feelings as something separate from the rest, a kind of optical delusion of consciousness."

It's exactly that—an optical delusion of consciousness that we're something existing in time and space, separate from other things. He continues: "This delusion is a kind of prison for us, restricting us to our personal desires and to affection for the few people nearest to us." He goes on to say, "Our task is to free ourselves from this prison by widening our circle of compassion to embrace all living creatures and the whole of nature in its beauty."

But I will also add that the simplicity and commitment to moment-to-moment pure awareness—when it's possible, and when it's not, in the next moment we remember again—also frees us from this optical delusion, from this prison. Because the prison is a delusion of recognizing wrongly. The genius of the Buddha was to see through this.

I'll give you an example of all the delusions. There's something called the four agati, the four wrong courses of behavior or prejudice, from the Vinaya, from the rules of the monks in the Pali canon. The first is called chandagati, which is prejudice or seeing wrongly that leads to wrong action caused by desire, by partiality. We see wrongly. The desire causes us to perceive inaccurately, that causes us to have prejudice, that causes us to make decisions that aren't based on the way things really are—that limitation, that optical delusion.

Dosagati is the same thing—prejudice caused by hatred, enmity, ill will. Mohagati is prejudice caused by delusion, by not seeing clearly. And the fourth one, bhayagati, is fear—prejudice and wrong action, wrong choices, wrong decisions caused by fear.

When you say it, this is kind of obvious, isn't it? When we're really afraid, really afraid, doesn't everything look fearful? And even if you tell yourself it's not, it's the actual perception. You really can't tell what's what. They say of a Sotapanna, when they have a first taste of awakening, that those four prejudices are seen through.

The genius of the Buddha—mohagati is the one that really underlies all of them—continuing to have that optical delusion of me, the center of everything. Don't judge it, but notice how it acts when it's here, when it's not. How any sense experience immediately becomes "me hearing." Or "What does that sound mean about me?" You see somebody walking in the distance, and right away it's like, "Oh, they're walking better than me. What does that mean?" Or "They're sitting. Oh, I'm sitting better than them." Or "Oh, that's a really pretty pair of socks. I wish I had them. Oh, I'm so greedy." Me, me, me, me. Just noticing that.

The genius of the Buddha was to see through this. In the moments when there's not that "me and other," when there's just not "me the center of things," there's accurate recognition. It happens by itself. We can't will it, but it happens quite naturally because the perception, the clarity, the awareness isn't colored by confusion. But we can't do it from some ideal, even with the best of intentions.

There's a great story I heard on the radio. They were talking about economic policy and "enlightened self-interest," which as we know doesn't work, but they were using this example, which I loved. I guess it's true that some footbridge had been built recently over the Thames River in London, some big footbridge. Soon after it opened, hundreds of people were walking over it—maybe right after it opened, just getting used to it. I remember the radio said it was like two or three or four hundred people on this bridge. And the whole bridge started to really shake. It was like too many people on this bridge. Of course, everyone got kind of scared. And each person did what seemed like the appropriate thing to do—it was shaking this way, so each person stepped over that way. All four hundred of them stepped over that way, which of course made the whole thing worse.

You're acting from the best of intentions, but it's limited by just "me." And we can't will ourselves out of that. In a moment when there's what sampajañña is—what Joseph was talking about last night, clear comprehension, the whole big context—mindfulness in that context would say, "Oh, what's going on here?"

It's shaking. Some would go that way because it's not this reference point of me, which is our natural reference point. So that's an example of sampajanya and how it happens quite naturally when we're not locked into this optical delusion.

I just wanted to offer this. I read in this great book that came out recently from Ajahn Amaro and Ajahn Pasanno, who are two Western monks in the Ajahn Chah tradition. They brought out this book—it's a compilation of sutta references and some material from Ajahn Chah. It's called The Island, and it's all about aspects of awakening, of nibbana. It's quite wonderful. They've done a great job of compiling all these references. And of course, it's for free distribution if you write to them.

This is from Ajahn Chah talking, in his very pithy, earthy way, about the relationship between sati, sampajanya, and pañña—sati being mindfulness, sampajanya the clearly knowing, and pañña wisdom, which Joseph talked about last night. I liked it. It sort of fits in here.

He says sati is like the hand—like our hand that simply picks things up and cognizes them. Sampajanya, clearly knowing, is like the arm. The arm is what enables the hand to reach for objects, to move objects around. So sampajanya refers to seeing an object in its bigger context, how it relates to its surroundings. And pañña, he says, is like the life source—it's like the body. For him, pañña is the seeing of things in terms of anicca, the impermanent nature; dukkha, the unreliable, unsatisfactory nature; anatta, that there's no intrinsic self-existing separate entity here. Seeing things in that way—that's pañña.

He says that while a hand and arm have their functions, without the body they are powerless. And it's like that with sati and sampajanya. That's what we practice. The pañña—seeing clearly, knowing, seeing through our optical delusions of permanence, of "this thing is going to make me happy," of separate entity—that happens naturally and spontaneously, because that's just the nature of things. We don't have to create it. It's how it is. We're just setting up the conditions where we stop feeding the habits, and instead we feed the awareness. And it allows the Dhamma to reveal itself. In that self-revealing Dhamma, our heart and mind is free.

There's still unpleasant in the world. Don't think there's not. The suffering, though—the suffering doesn't have to be there in that way. And we can experience this just in a moment. Whether you're hurting, or you're down on yourself, or you're just feeling lousy—in that moment, "Oh, feeling lousy is like this." And all that extra just goes away.

Someone was telling me about feeling really sick. When they were trying to be mindful of it, they were really caught—knowing they were caught, feeling kind of reactive to the symptoms and the physical experience, noticing that struggle. And then at another point, they just completely opened into, "Oh, heat is like this. Tingling is like this. Burning is like this." Not even getting put together into a sense of "I'm sick," but just experience. There was no more suffering about it. And then there were even moments when you couldn't even say you were sick. You didn't even feel sick at all. There are moments when you're sick, moments when you're not, and it's just what it is. That's quite knowable for all of us.

This wisdom, to me, is like such a huge relief—to know that with the steadiness of awareness, wisdom is inevitable because nature is how it is. We don't have to create it, thank God. In fact, we only make a mess when we try to create it. All we have to do is settle back, bring our interest, our love, our commitment, our courage, and just let it rip. It's ripping anyway. All we're doing is showing up and being here with it.

Ajahn Chah says, "Be the knower, the knower of experience, not the owner of experience." Just loving the knowing, loving the awareness. It's like a Tai Chi move from being caught in this.

"Oh, it's like this."

That's John Semedo's language. "It's like this." It's helped me so much—in daily life, in meditation, it's the same. You're all caught. You're liking, you're not liking. You can't even say what's happening, but you know something is going on that you wish wasn't. What is it? Oh, I don't know. It's like this. That's all. Stop trying to fix or own or be or figure it out. It's like this. It's really powerful.

So I just want to end with another statement from Ajahn Chah, which I'm dropping in for your reflection. I'm not saying I totally understand it. You'll hear what I mean—just see how you think about it.

He says, in his way: samsara and nibbana are like the front and back of the hand. They happen in the same place and are known by the same awareness.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 59

Mettā

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates mettā (loving-kindness) not as something we must laboriously cultivate, but as a natural expression of wisdom already present within us. Drawing from the Abhidhamma, she explains that mettā is an aspect of adosa (non-hatred), one of the beautiful mental factors present in all wholesome mind states. Rather than being a sentimental emotion, mettā manifests as genuine connection, spaciousness, and the sincere wish for the welfare of all beings without discrimination.
> Wilson shares the inspiring example of Mahā Ghosānanda, the Cambodian monk who lost his entire family to the Khmer Rouge yet dedicated his life to bringing mettā back to traumatized refugees in border camps. She also draws on John Lewis's powerful testimony about nonviolent love during the Civil Rights Movement, demonstrating how mettā enables us to see the humanity in those who oppose us. These examples illustrate that mettā is not passive or blind, but rather allows for clearer seeing of things as they are.
> The talk addresses common obstacles to mettā practice, particularly the near enemy of desire (which masquerades as love but actually reinforces separation) and the far enemy of ill will. Wilson emphasizes that formal mettā practice trains our intention moment by moment, gradually shifting the deep habits of mind that create perceptions of fragmentation and isolation. As the Buddha taught, what we repeatedly think and ponder becomes the inclination of our mind—and mettā practice offers a practical path toward recognizing the immeasurable, connected quality of heart that is our natural state.

So tonight I want to talk about mettā, loving kindness. There are some reflections about the state of mind as well as the formal practice—making the choice, making the determination for love.

And it's really not so much that we as an individual, which since we know from last night there is no such thing, make the choice for love, but wisdom makes the choice. Mettā is described as not its own particular mental factor, but it's an aspect of the larger mental factor of, in Pali, adosa, which is non-hatred—quite a large mental factor, one of the beautiful factors. So whenever there is a so-called beautiful mind state, a state of wisdom without delusion, a state that isn't colored by any of the kilesas, adosa is always present. It's one of the universals in all beautiful mind states.

So there can be non-hatred, which is clear what that is, but it's not necessarily mettā. But mettā is an aspect of non-hatred. And as such, it's an expression of the heart and mind that's clear from confusion. It's an expression of the heart and mind, the consciousness of wisdom. And so rather than thinking it's something that we somehow have to find a way to cultivate—in this culture we don't really trust it so much, and it's weak, and this and that—it's really more to discover, to learn, to have confidence in mettā, in this non-individual love as a power of mind and heart, as an expression of wisdom. And even though I know probably most of us think it's a good idea, it may not be what we really deeply trust.

Let me just read some of the teachings you've heard a million times, really basic stuff from the Buddha, where he's talking about the power of mettā. It's from the Dhammapada:

"When we hold fast to such thoughts as, 'they abused me, mistreated me, molested me, robbed me,' we keep hatred alive. If we thoroughly release ourselves from such thoughts as, 'they abused me, mistreated me, molested me, robbed me,' hatred is vanquished. Never by hatred is hatred conquered, but by readiness to love alone. This is the eternal law. You too shall pass away. Knowing this, how can you quarrel?"

And then just one last one that I like: "There is no fear if the heart is uncontaminated by the passions and the mind is free from ill will. Seeing beyond good and evil, one is awake."

I really like those, especially that last one, because that's an expression of mettā. We often think it's blind, just seeing the good. But seeing beyond good and evil, one is awake. That's a great expression of the power of mettā in the heart, in the mind.

Really, on a deep level, the work is to keep looking in yourself. I look and I ask, do I really, truly believe that? I mean, believe it in the way that that's where my mind goes when I'm feeling someone has abused me, mistreated me. Though I don't want to hold on to these thoughts—that just keeps me suffering. Intellectually, okay, I can go there. But really, in ourselves?

And so this is why we have a training. It's not that one has to cultivate mettā as the intensive practice, as we've been doing in the afternoons, as the only way to experience it. Of course not. It's a really common everyday experience of our mind and heart. But we can learn to recognize it. We can learn how powerful it is, and we can learn to train our mind and heart to really take refuge here in this wisdom. It's a choice. We can begin with ourselves, begin where we are, and learn how to trust, how to incline the heart and mind in this direction.

I'll give you another example, a current example: Maha Ghosananda. You may know who he was—the Cambodian monk. He died in 2007. Actually, he died in Northampton. He was staying out at the Peace Pagoda a lot during his last few years, in Leverett. He was a Cambodian monk who, during the Khmer Rouge years, just before the Khmer Rouge took over Cambodia and began really the genocide of the Cambodian people, happened to be in Thailand studying. So he missed the Khmer Rouge. But they killed all of his family, something like eleven or twelve family members.

After he heard what was happening, there were so many thousands and thousands of Cambodian refugees who had managed to get out of the country, living in refugee camps on the Thai border. And as with Maha Ghosananda, many of the people in the refugee camps had lost everything. But even besides losing everything material, for many people their families had been killed. They'd just been through the killing fields—a horrible situation you can't even imagine.

Maha Ghosananda was really committed to his path of awakening, but he was committed to it from the basis of loving kindness, of mettā. And so, as the story goes, he went into these refugee camps. Over and over, he spent years really trying to bring Buddhism back to the people, because most of them were Buddhist, had grown up in a Buddhist faith.

But again, most of the monks and nuns and temples were destroyed also in Cambodia by the Khmer Rouge. So Mahagosananda went into these refugee camps to help in what way he could.

The thing that he did—two things. One, he would go and build a little bamboo temple, just a little bamboo shack for the people to come. And then he would start chanting these metta phrases that I just read. That's what he started chanting. Amazing, isn't it? Amazing. And the people would know this. Most of the people would be familiar with these words. And after some time, it's said, other people would start to chant with him.

He spent years going around giving out copies of the Metta Sutta, the discourse on loving kindness, just trying to revive the goodness in the depths of people's hearts and minds, knowing that that's really our truest nature when the mind isn't clouded. The best way he felt he could help was to reconnect people with metta.

But thinking about it—to go into a situation where everyone is in such a state of loss and trauma and bitterness and fear and grief, and to start chanting, "If you hold on to thoughts that 'he beat me, he robbed me,' then you're not really practicing"—it's really amazing. And he spent years doing this.

When he died, there was an obituary in the New York Times. I just want to read a couple of lines from that. Scott A. Hunt, a professor of Buddhism at the University of California in Berkeley, wrote that "Mahagosananda's ability to forgive those responsible for the murder of his entire family is incomprehensible until one heard his explanation of Buddhism." Mahagosananda said—and this is written for non-Buddhists—that he "does not question that loving one's oppressors, Cambodians loving the Khmer Rouge, may be the most difficult attitude to achieve." But he then added, "It's the law of the universe that retaliation, hatred, and revenge only continue the cycle." Reconciliation, he continued, "means that we see ourselves as the opponent. For what is the opponent but a being in ignorance? And we ourselves are also ignorant in many respects."

Just an example. It's a high bar, you could say. I realize it's a high bar. So don't let your mind go into "Well, it's hopeless." It's a high bar. But this is someone who's been living in this world as it is, in some of the worst ways that it is, and knowing deeply that metta as an aspect of wisdom is really the deepest expression of wisdom—how we can live with ourselves and with each other as human beings.

I'm bringing up this high bar on purpose just to let it get in, to let ourselves—not in a judgmental way at all—but just to really explore in ourselves over these days: Do I really have any confidence, any faith, in the power of love, of non-hatred, of kindness as an aspect of wisdom?

Again, this really has to be approached without judgment. Not "Well, if I really had faith, I'd never feel aversion again. If I really had faith, I'd go around loving all the time." Not that kind of stuff. But just seeing if somewhere in the background—way, way back—there are beliefs operating that, well, loving kindness is nice, but when the chips are down (that's an American expression that means when the going gets tough), then one needs to get tough. Is that what one believes? When the going gets tough, when the chips are down, I need my anger. I need fear. That's the best protection. Of course, we're not going to say "Oh, yeah." But just look at what's operating in the background sometimes.

And so as a formal practice of metta, as an intensive practice, but also just inclining your mind to recognize the qualities of metta in your vipassana practice—we do this as a way to really see for ourselves. To move from the concepts of loving kindness and wisdom ("It's nice, it's good, yes, I'm committed to it") to the deep experience on the insight level of both how loving kindness can manifest in my mind—in relation to the beautiful, in relation to the difficult, in relation to the boring—and also what gets in the way. A lot of our exploration in practice is learning what habits block my recognition of loving kindness, of connectedness.

So it's not that we actually have to create so much as just begin to trust, to uncover the possibility of this natural state of mind—this connectedness, this caring for others, this friendliness.

So I just want to talk a little bit about what the heck is it anyway? What is metta? Just some descriptions.

As it's described in the Abhidhamma, metta is an aspect of non-hatred—a very powerful wholesome state. We talk a lot about hatred, we talk a lot about greed, we talk a lot about delusion, but they have their opposite wholesome states: non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion. These are factors of heart and mind that are actually more powerful.

Metta manifests as the sincere wish for the good and welfare of all, without discrimination. It's not personal love. It's not personal affection. It's not any kind of sexual love or affection. It has an aspect of inclusion, meaning not these people but not those people—that's not metta.

And again, as I said before, I really like to recognize that everything is just moment to moment. So I don't have to think that my mind and heart need to be filled with all-embracing, cosmos-pervading metta all the time before I can begin to have a sense of what it might be. That's possible—the Buddha talks about that, and I'll read that in a minute. But you don't have to wait. And it's not helpful to denigrate or put down what arises: "Well, maybe that was metta, but it really wasn't very good or very strong. It was a little bit of caring for all beings, but not really vast. It's not good enough." That wasn't metta talking, that line.

In a moment of metta, you can just really feel it. It doesn't have to be this incredible emotional state. In fact, it doesn't have to be an emotional state at all. But it's a quality of heart and mind that's inclusive. Whatever the attention turns to, the proximate cause, the immediate cause for a moment of metta to arise in consciousness, is seeing the good—seeing the lovableness in anybody. Then in that moment of metta, the mind just opens and connects with the whole of what it sees.

To me, the essence of metta is really connection. Not a kind of holding back, and not saying, "Well, this part is good, but let's not look at that over there." So the proximate cause for metta to arise is seeing the lovableness in a being. But then when the attention turns to that being, the metta spreads out and includes everything—a being out here, or even a being in here.

Metta is inclusive, connected, very simple, and non-judging. It discards ill will. Ill will is the far enemy, you could say. When there's metta in the mind, there's not ill will in the mind. They don't coexist.

Metta also has the quality of spaciousness. The example often given in the suttas is this: if you had salt and you put it in a cup of water, you'd have extremely salty water. But if you take a spoon of salt and put it in the pond around there, you don't even notice it. So the quality of mind of metta is just spacious, including, not causing trouble about anything, not pushing away and not saying, "Yes, I need this." Just connected, inclusive, spacious, kind, not discriminating. And it's really normal and natural.

The example I always use, because it just really works for me, is this: if you walked out here and you saw two little kids, three-year-olds, playing with each other, laughing and bouncing a ball, what would be your normal feeling? Assuming you're not in a really aversive yogi mind, and it's just a normal day—you walk out, the kids are laughing, they're cute or they're not cute, but they're just little kids. It's like, ah, don't you wish them well? It's just appreciated. It's not rocket science. It's not some big esoteric state that you have to crank up intensive meditation for three months to feel. You just walk out and go, "Oh, yeah." You may not say, "May you be happy and peaceful, may you be safe and protected," but you feel that sense of how the mind and heart just expands, connects, includes all of them, all of the kids.

And it's not blind. It doesn't mean you can't act. So the kids are playing. And if, as happens with three- and four-year-olds, they go from being friendly to getting into a fight, and one of them picks up a big stick and starts hitting the other one over the head, you don't go, "Oh, aren't they cute, la la la." You also don't go, "Well, I hate them. Look at those kids. They're so horrible."

You kind of take the stick away, out of metta, right? You still have this sense of appreciation, friendliness for the little kids. That's metta. It sees the whole situation with friendliness, with inclusivity. It acts appropriately, but your mind and heart isn't troubled. You're not filled with rage and hatred because, "Oh no, look at that! You can see the evil of human nature right there." One could go there, but that wouldn't really be the choice.

So metta is not rocket science. And on that simple level, we all know it. This is the simple level we bring to our own experience. Acceptance is a huge aspect of metta, just what Melanie spoke about the other night. This quality of simply bringing all our attention right here, whatever's happening, seeing it clearly without adding anything extra, without adding hatred, without pushing away. So that's an aspect of our Vipassana practice as well.

But metta—all the wholesome states, but especially all four Brahma viharas: metta, compassion, appreciative joy, equanimity—all four of them can become really unbelievably powerful forces in the heart, in the mind. And you can sometimes even feel it. You almost feel like you've walked into a metta field around certain persons, or sometimes at the end of a metta retreat when people have been practicing metta for a week together. You can kind of feel it.

There's a quiet, lovely Sayadaw, a Burmese monk and teacher in Sagaing up in the hills that we usually go to visit—U Jayanta. He doesn't speak English, and he seems very simple. His monastery is small. It's always impeccably clean. There are only ever a few monks there. We go up to visit him every year. I love it. And I've told him this, because I just feel the sense of metta and peace whenever I walk in there, whenever I come and we just talk to him. He's simple, and he remembers us, and loves it if we have a dharma question. There's no big amazing thing going on, but it can just feel like walking into a field of purity, a field of metta, because it touches that in oneself—just living a simple, quiet life.

Although I have to say, my friend Greg, who goes every year too, said that last year his illusions were shattered because U Jayanta was on the cell phone when he walked in. Which doesn't mean you can't have metta. Let's not go there.

But metta can become a powerful force in the mind. This is from the Buddha, describing metta when it's really moving into a force:

"That disciple of the noble ones, thus devoid—or empty—of covetousness, devoid of ill will, unbewildered, alert, mindful, keeps pervading the first direction with an awareness imbued with goodwill, an awareness filled with goodwill. Likewise the second direction, likewise the third, likewise the fourth. Thus above, below, and all around, everywhere, in its entirety, he keeps pervading the all-encompassing cosmos with an awareness filled with goodwill—abundant, expansive, immeasurable, without hostility, without ill will. This is called the immeasurable deliverance of mind, the immeasurable deliverance of heart."

So metta is a simple, really accessible, normal and natural state. And it can also, when it comes together with wisdom and real purity in our heart and mind, open into the immeasurable deliverance of mind. It's really extremely powerful. Immeasurable—without measure.

So what does obstruct or hide or keep us from recognizing the measureless quality of mind, of heart? What keeps us in these perceptions Joseph was speaking about last night—the perceptions that seem to lead to and increase fragmentation, separation, limited mind, limited heart, affection for myself and a few? What feeds the fear?

And really, it's not like there's some monolithic thing. Moment to moment, the sense of fragmentation in our heart, in our mind, the sense of isolation, the sense of separation—that perception is created moment to moment. It's not something we're carrying around with us that maybe someday, if we're lucky, will go away. There are plenty of moments when it's not being created. A moment of acceptance without any judgment, presence and awakeness—that's a moment of non-fragmentation, when one can almost intuit the measureless quality of heart and mind. Until we think, "I have experienced it," and boom, measurement is back, limitation is back. Fine. Notice that.

So these habits—the habits of seeking pleasure, the habits of wanting, the habits of fearing the unpleasant, of pushing away, of aversion, of ill will, the habit of shutting out certain aspects of our experience: "I don't want this to be part of me. I don't want this to be happening."

I don't want to know about this. This is undesirable. This basically cannot be happening.

All of these habits—and these are just the ones we talk about all the time—but this is really the essence of why these habits are the source of suffering for ourselves and others. They're creating, in the moment, this sense of insufficiency, of separation, of isolation, of neediness, of fear. And then we believe it. And then we tell ourselves a story that feeds that. And then we act on that. And then we act with somebody else on that. And they respond. And then it just keeps on going, boom, boom, boom.

A friend of mine was just telling me he had been doing a retreat somewhere else, and he came out of it with a big insight into the basically empty nature of thoughts—a lot of what Joseph was talking about last night. He was telling me, "I came out of the retreat and was visiting friends I hadn't seen, and they would say, 'Tell me your story.' And it was sort of like they'd talk to me—all these thoughts, thoughts, thoughts, thoughts, thoughts—and then they'd hand it to me. And then I'd say my story—thoughts, thoughts, thoughts, thoughts, thoughts—and hand it to them. And then our thoughts are kind of meeting in the middle, la la la la la." He said, "It's just also nothing. It's just also nothing. We could just sit here and be here together, and that's fine."

So a lot of our practice, our cultivation of metta in the direct way and also through the attitude in the mindfulness, is through recognizing the qualities of metta and also recognizing these habits of mind and perception that feed the sense of limitation, that feed the concept of separation.

They say the word metta has two root meanings. I like both of them. One is gentle, and the example often given—very appropriate for today—is that of a gentle rain that's just falling everywhere. You know how it was gentle this morning, just coming down? I love it when it's like that. It falls everywhere in a particular area. Don't go scientific on me. But if the gentle rain is falling, it's not like it says, "I'll fall everywhere, but I'll just miss that lilac bush over there." Just gentle rain on everywhere. It doesn't select and choose.

And the other aspect is friend, friendship, friendliness. A true friend is someone who, in happiness and in difficulty, doesn't reject you, isn't envious, doesn't rejoice when you're unhappy, is always present without judgment, without picking and choosing. So these are two qualities of the mind of metta, the heart of metta.

And I really feel that with metta practice and in noticing the metta in the vipassana, it's gentle. There's no way to be with metta other than gentle. You just can't say, "May I be happy" without gentleness. It has to be gentle. And we become a friend—a friend to ourselves, a friend to our minds and hearts, a friend to each other, a friend to the world. We start to see through the perceptions and the habits of mind that feed separation, that are not inclusive.

I'll read you this little story a friend of mine uses and gave to me, from a nurse who said:

"During my second month of nursing school, our professor gave us a surprise test. I was a conscientious student and I went easily through the questions until I read the last question, which was: 'What is the first name of the woman who cleans the school?' Surely this was some kind of joke. I had seen the cleaning woman several times. She was tall, dark-haired, and in her fifties, but how would I know her name? I handed in my paper, leaving the last question blank. Before class ended, one student asked if the last question would count towards our test grade. 'Absolutely,' said the professor. 'In your careers, you will meet many people. All are significant. They deserve your attention and care, even if all you do is smile and say hello.' I've never forgotten that lesson. I also learned her name was Dorothy."

That's metta.

Whatever's here, it deserves our attention, even if all we do is smile and say hello.

And the subtle habits of exclusion—sometimes they're very subtle in my mind, sometimes they're not so subtle, but sometimes they're very subtle—these habits of exclusion. Whether it's about what's happening internally or externally: "Well, these people are more interesting or more important." Or in some subtle way, "These people don't count," or "I just don't have the time." Just to notice that quality of mind that picks and chooses.

In the formal practice of metta, as we've been doing on the Tuesday afternoons, as some of you are doing more steadily through the days here—Sharon says she'll go to her grave saying this, and I'll say it too. I don't know if I'll go to my grave saying it, but I'll say it: The practice of metta is not about creating and holding on to a great emotional feeling. It's not about holding on to anything. Metta has a wide variety of how it manifests. It's not necessarily about trying to feel anything.

The formal practice of metta is really the practice of training our hearts and minds through the cultivation of thought, the use of attention, to cultivate our intention—the motivation, the movement of mind. As I think Melanie said, that very famous line from the Buddha: what we naturally think and ponder upon becomes the inclination of our mind. Well, metta practice—what is the mind saying over and over and over?

People say, "Well, it's boring." Okay, it's boring. How really fascinating is the other stuff your mind is saying? "May I be happy and peaceful. May you be happy and peaceful" is a lot better. "I don't really feel it." Who cares? Just come back. The intention to say it, the intention to connect with the sense of the person—just that is strengthening the intention, is inclining the heart and mind. And it does have an effect.

Wanting to feel good. Now let me see, does wanting to feel good sound like metta? Does wanting to have a better experience sound like the quality of open, connected, well-wishing for all beings? Or does it maybe sound like wanting, which is the near enemy of metta—which I'll get to in a minute.

Through the cultivation of intention, every moment that we can connect—whether it's with ourselves, with benefactor, with friend, with all beings, with whoever—ultimately it doesn't matter. Because in the moment, whether it's yourself or benefactor, when there's that phrase of wishing well, "May you be happy and peaceful," and you don't feel a huge emotion, but in that moment there's some connection with it, and there's really no ill will in the mind just for a second. I know sometimes you could say the phrase with ill will; I'm aware of that. But we're talking about a time when there's not ill will. In that moment of metta, it's a little metta, but it's metta.

It doesn't really matter whether it's for you or benefactor or whomever, because the moment of metta in itself has this expansive, inclusive quality. It's just that moment of metta—you just feel, "Oh, may I be happy, may you be happy." That's one reason we say start where it's easy, if yourself isn't easy, and come back, because once the metta is there for a moment in the mind, it's easier to include the self or the difficult person.

So we're working through the cultivation of intention to really stop feeding the habits of mind of resistance, of greed, of aversion, of separation—to stop feeding those perceptions and instead to strengthen the intention of well-wishing, the intention of spaciousness, the intention of inclusion. Just very simple, very matter-of-fact, very practical, moment after moment after moment. And a lot of moments, that's not what's happening. Fine.

But every time you're trying to wish well to someone, and your mind goes off—"Well, they would be happy if they'd only do what I said," and "I've been doing this all day"—and you say, "Okay, that doesn't feel like metta," and you just come back, reconnect, say it again: that's powerful. Instead of going on the whole train, you're seeing—maybe you don't use these words—but you're seeing, "Oh, that's the habit, the perception of separation, of not good enough or something lacking. Let me not feed that right now. Let me just come back to: May I be safe and protected."

It doesn't seem like a lot, because we're always looking for some big, juicy something or other. But this is the level, the subtle moment-to-moment level, that is really changing the deepest habits of our mind. When Joseph was talking about concepts last night, I'm sure—well, I'm not sure, I'm not sure of anything—but maybe you got a sense of how fast and subtle the concepts are that give us a sense of self. It's not something we can think our way out of.

So the effects of those concepts are gross and with us a lot. But the creation in a moment of perception and concept is so quick and so subtle, isn't it? And the habit of mind is so quick. So it's the subtle habits of mind that really, in some way, represent the deepest level of freedom and the deepest level of ignorance.

It doesn't always have to be this big blowout experience, but just this willingness, this determination to cultivate friendliness, loving-kindness, gentleness, inclusivity over and over. This is really what we're cultivating here.

And the part we don't like so much is that a big part of the practice—whether it's the formal metta or the vipassana too—is the recognizing, learning to see and understand these habits that get in the way. We've talked about those a lot. I don't want to go into them too much, but just a little bit in terms of metta.

The two biggest habits in terms of metta, of course, are desire or lust and ill will. Desire, or lust, is called the near enemy of metta because it's often confused with, mistaken for metta. It masquerades as metta. It can look like metta—which, when we're really caught in lust or desire and we recognize it, it doesn't actually seem like metta at all, does it? It's kind of surprising that we can confuse lust or wanting for metta, but we can.

One way is because metta, when you're feeling it, when you're just inclining towards well-wishing to someone, it's pleasant. And pleasant, when there's not mindful awareness—when the awareness kind of drops—the habit of mind is to move from pleasant into wanting something, isn't it? Often in metta, it can move into wanting more about the person you're sending metta to. And so then we don't quite recognize it.

"Oh, may you be happy, my good friend." I remember when I was doing metta and would feel so much well-wishing for her and happiness for her. And then these little thoughts would come in: "We really should spend more time together." "Oh, may you be happy." "Really, why doesn't she call me more?" "May you be happy." "Maybe when I get out, I'll call her up. We'll go into town. We'll go to that good restaurant." And then it's not so subtle anymore—you're off. But it's very easy to kind of slip over into that. And when it's connected to the person, we sometimes don't quite see it.

Another way that we can really get into wanting with metta—classically they say it's lust, that you actually get into sexual desire for the person. I think that's actually a lot less common than the wanting something back.

So with metta we can also start wanting the feeling, right? "May you be happy." How do I feel? "May you be peaceful." How's the heart doing? "May you know..." And you're always checking it out. Is it open? Not quite open. It was better yesterday. "May you be happy. May you be peaceful." Maybe if I go slower...

And you have to look and see: What's the motivation right now? Is it metta? Metta is a complete generosity of the heart. Just wishing well for the person. Seeing them, the energy goes out, includes them, spreads out. "May you be happy." Do I feel good yet? Oh, okay. Maybe that's not metta. Just seeing. The near enemy is still bound up. It's still all about me. And you can see that.

The sense of me is still a reference point when we're in the near enemy, when we're in wanting, whether subtle or gross. And that's just something you can really notice.

As I said, when I really look at wanting in its essence, it doesn't look like or feel like metta at all. The essence of wanting, of craving, is separation—I'm wanting something else. It's a sense of insufficiency, of inadequacy, of incompleteness. I need whatever it is to feel okay, to feel peaceful, to feel happy. We don't say it that grossly, perhaps, but the craving and the wanting itself creates a sense of separation, of insufficiency, and actually increases it, feeds it. The more the wanting there is, the more this sense grows.

When wanting is present in the mind and not seen, that's really the perception that keeps this sense of me and other going. Metta, when there's a moment of metta, that perception of separateness, of insufficiency, of neediness, of inadequacy, is not here. A moment of "just as you are, may you be happy"—just that. There's no sense of "I need something else in this moment." You're not even thinking about I. Even though we're using the language of I and you, in the moment of metta it's just: may you be happy. That's it. Simple, expansive, inclusive. Nothing is lacking. Nothing is in excess.

Wanting is just the opposite of this, whether it's wanting outwardly or inwardly.

This is from Mark Epstein. He's talking about the sense of unworthiness. He says, "When we have a sense of unworthiness, it is easy to feel deficient and to see the love of another person as the only possible solution to this plight. Meditation tends to work against this assumption of deficiency by restoring the capacity for connection from the inside." In doing this, meditation challenges the common assumption of our culture about where connection comes from. We see that connection is already present. We are not as separate and distinct as we think we are. Connection is our natural state. We just learn to permit it, to allow it—I would say to recognize it, actually. You can't stop it. We just learn to recognize that connection is already present. There's nothing to want from outside. And love, metta, is an expression of this wisdom. It then strengthens our trust in this reality, in this aspect of reality. Just open-hearted, simple connection.

The Buddha said that lust is a maker of measurement. Hate is a maker of measurement. Delusion is a maker of measurement. In one whose taints, whose poisons are destroyed, these are abandoned—that's an arahat. But in terms of the near and far enemy of metta, lust or craving, far enemy ill will—these in themselves, when we don't recognize them, when we believe them and identify, and there's the sense of me doing it—these are makers of measurement.

You can feel measurement in the mind, rather than the immeasurable mind that the Buddha speaks of with the brahmaviharas. This maker of measurement—you can almost feel everything shrink, contract. It comes down to me and other, whether it's wanting or aversion. Suddenly there's this measurement, and I'm the center that everything's measured from. The mind contracts. The world contracts. Our view contracts. And that in itself is a form of suffering.

So the far enemy of metta—and I'll say a little more about this—is ill will. Well, that's obvious. We're not going to mistake ill will for metta, I hope not. And metta is said to be the antidote to ill will. The Buddha gave lots of advice to his son, Rahula.

One of his teachings was: "Rāhula, develop meditation on loving-kindness. For when you develop meditation on loving-kindness, any ill will will be abandoned." They don't coexist. They simply don't coexist.

So ill will is the far enemy. And as we practice mettā, just as we practice vipassanā, sometimes you might feel like it's bringing up more ill will. I think it just highlights it, because the ill will starts to seem so abrasive, so out of sync with the mettā, with the vipassanā, with the acceptance. It's just so much harsher. But we still believe it often, still get caught in it.

And in terms of what I said earlier—do we really have confidence? Do we really know that the strongest aspect of wisdom, the strong heart, manifests as mettā, manifests as compassion? Or do we, as people so often say, think we need our anger, need our fear? "If I'm just full of mettā, I won't be able to function. I'll just sit passively by while people walk all over me. How can I protect myself?" These are reasonable questions given the culture we grow up in. That's why we sit and look and see what's really true.

I've told this story often, but I'll tell it again. At a retreat quite some years ago—I think it was with Joseph, up in the mountains of New Mexico—specifically for specially invited environmental activists. People who weren't necessarily Buddhist practitioners, and some of them hadn't done much meditation at all. It was a ten-day silent retreat, very intensive, and we were doing a regular retreat like this one. Once a day, just like we do on Tuesdays here, one sitting every day, we would teach the mettā practice. And we had discussion groups.

These environmentalists were lawyers and activists, really on the front lines, living very intense lives. Actually, it was billed as a retreat for burned-out environmental activists. They were pretty stressed, I tell you. Working very hard. Very smart people—it was a little intimidating, extremely smart.

So we started teaching the loving-kindness. In one of the groups, about the second or third day, one of the men said very sincerely, "I'm in the middle of this huge, acrimonious, anger-filled court case. I have to go into court. These other lawyers will stop at nothing. They're angry. I need my anger. I can't get into this mushy mettā, weak stuff. I need my anger."

But he was sincere. He kept on doing the practice anyway. And at the end of those ten days—I don't know what happened after—but at the end of those ten days, he was really so touched. He said, "I really see from this time, from working with the vipassanā and the mettā, that anger was eating me up inside. It's not like I can just have the anger and take it in and throw it at those other lawyers in the courtroom, and then everything's okay. It's coming out at my family. It's eating me up inside. It's making me sick. It's just taking over my life."

It was so touching. But I know he had to walk back into that court case, surrounded by it again, and our old habits spring up. We know that. We've seen that here in these three weeks. So I'm not saying it's easy—to find in ourselves, over and over and over, the trust that comes from wisdom, from seeing your own experience.

And then we almost make a resolution, an adhiṭṭhāna. It's one of the ten pāramīs—resolution. I'm resolving to choose love when I can. And when I can't, meeting that with mettā too. That's also mettā.

I was just on the phone with a man who stays in touch once in a while. He's in his late 70s. He's been doing this meditation for years. He's a welder farmer from Kansas—just a very down-home guy, the kind who says, "You know, I can never really do this practice." But he's completely dedicated. He said to me yesterday, "You know, I've really been doing metta practice for the last two years. You told me to do that." I actually don't remember, but anyway, that's good. "You told me to do that, and it's really making a change."

I said, "Well, what? What change is it making?"

He goes, "Well, you know, when I walk down the street, anyone I see, I really try to send the metta. And if I can do it at that moment, that's great. And if I can't do it at that moment, then that's okay too."

I thought that was just a perfect example. Metta outward, metta inward, when we can't be perfect. Okay, that's okay too. This is how it is right now. May I be happy.

Ajahn Sumedho has a wonderful way of expressing metta in terms of the difficult—in terms of scary, frightening, violent situations. That's when we think, "No, I need my fear, I need my anger. Metta's blind, metta's weak." Sumedho says, "With metta, one is not blinding oneself with an ideal." And that's where we can often go. You're not blinding yourself with an ideal. Instead, one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, a thing, a person, or in oneself without creating anything around it.

I just love that. One is witnessing wholeheartedly the unpleasantness in a situation, in a person, in a thing, or in oneself. Just witnessing without creating anything around it. Just space. It's like this. That's Sumedho—the one who always says, "It's like this." That is an aspect of metta.

So my friend is walking down the street. He tries, he can't send metta now. Okay. You don't have to make up a big story. Acceptance, presence, spaciousness—it's like this. Those are aspects of metta.

This is especially true, much as Melanie talked about, towards your own internal experience. There's an interesting transition that occurs naturally and spontaneously. We begin to find that to the degree that there is bravery in ourselves—the willingness to look, to look directly at our own hearts—and to the degree that there is kindness towards ourselves, there is confidence that we can actually forget ourselves and open to the world.

The only reason we don't open our hearts and minds to other people is that they trigger confusion in us that we don't feel brave enough or sane enough to deal with. To the degree that we look clearly and compassionately at ourselves, we can feel confident and fearless about looking into someone else's eyes.

Sharon likes to say, "To pay attention is to love." And also listening—there's a slogan on public radio. They have a series of stories where they go around getting people's stories, and their slogan is, "Listening is an act of love." And I think it's James Baldwin who said that an enemy is someone whose story we have not heard.

With this ill will, in the face of the difficult, of course we do want to be separate from violent people, from people that are harming us, or that we don't like, or that we don't agree with, or who get us upset. The tendency of our mind in that ill will is to create the sense of me and other, to put the other in a box—these bad things they do, these scary things they do—and to just disconnect. That can seem safe. But first, it's not true about them that they're just all this bad thing.

When Bush was president, I couldn't stand to even think of anything good about him. I didn't want to hear anything good. Now, that's not reality. I just wanted to stay in this hostility. I was feeding hostility. That's not so helpful. It keeps me in the prison of hostility and separation. And it's not seeing accurately—it's delusion. Delusion keeps the perception of separation going.

Non-delusion, clear seeing, the mind that's alert and free—this sees well beneath the separation, beneath the box of "that bad thing" we put people in. And it's incredibly powerful. So I just want to read two examples, current day examples, nothing to do with Buddhism, about the power of this clear seeing that comes from metta, from loving-kindness. Metta, far from being blind, actually allows for a clearer seeing of things as they are.

The first is from Tracy Kidder's book Strength in What Remains, about a man named Deo who had escaped from Burundi at the time of the huge genocide in Rwanda and Burundi. Through a series of events, he managed to escape as a very young man in medical school, get to New York, and went through years of hell there. It's a great book, actually—really uplifting.

Kidder writes that Deo had spent a lot of time in Manhattan classrooms—he was going to Columbia—thinking about the catastrophic violence in Burundi and Rwanda. He had come to believe that the misery of the people, while not the sole cause of the mayhem, had been a primary cause, a precondition too often neglected by scholars: that there was little or no education for most people. Many people had lessons in brutality, toil, and deprivation—hunger, disease, and untimely death, including rampant infant mortality.

As an example, Deo said, "Almost everyone has got worms. They're there since they were born, and worms will be their friend—intestinal worms—until they die. Can you imagine that kind of life? It's terrible. So how are you going to think right with pain everywhere? It's been really hard for me to blame the people who have been slaughtering each other, although I do blame people all the time. They were not themselves. They were something else."

Tracy Kidder says his stance is remarkable. How many people in his place would have divided up the world into good guys and bad guys, Hutus and Tutsis, and left it at that? But somehow he had found a way around the self-poisoning of hatred. He kept his mind flexible. And in that flexibility, you see more clearly. That's an aspect of metta. It's not just loving—it's seeing deeply, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, and not creating anything extra around it.

The second example is from John Lewis, who was a congressman from Georgia for over twenty years—an African-American man who was in the early days with Martin Luther King in the Civil Rights Movement. He was one of the young college students in Nashville in the late fifties and early sixties, one of the early Freedom Riders, one of the founders of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and deeply committed to nonviolence—not just the idea that you don't fight back, but a very deep and profound way of life, internally and externally.

This is from his autobiography, where he's talking about nonviolence. He was beaten many times on the Freedom Rides. He's not talking theoretically here. This is a man who put himself on the line over and over and over. They trained with Jim Lawson, another African-American who had studied in India, studied Gandhian principles.

I want to read this from John Lewis, because to me, this is metta. He's talking about the suffering—the suffering of being beaten, the suffering of racism and violence. He wrote: "The suffering is nothing more than a sad and sorry thing without the presence on the part of the sufferer of a graceful heart, an accepting and open heart, a heart that holds no malice towards the inflictors of his or her suffering. This is a difficult concept to understand, and it is even more difficult to internalize, but it has everything to do with the way of nonviolence.

"We are talking about love here. Not romantic love, not the love of one individual for another, not loving something that is lovely to you. This is a broader, deeper, more all-encompassing love. It is a love that accepts and embraces the hateful and the hurtful. It is a love that recognizes the spark of the divine in each of us—even in those who would raise their hand against us, those we might call our enemy. This sense of love realizes that emotions of the moment and constantly shifting circumstances can cloud that divine spark. Pain, ugliness, and fear can cover it over, can turn a person toward anger and hate."

It is the ability to see through those layers of ugliness, to see further into a person than perhaps that person can see into himself, that is essential to the practice of nonviolence.

One method of practicing this approach when faced with a hateful, angry, aggressive, even a despicable person is to imagine that person—to actually visualize him or her as an infant, as a baby. If you can see this full-grown attacker who faces you as the pure, innocent child that he or she once was, that we all once were, it is not hard to find love and compassion in your heart. It is not hard to find forgiveness.

And this, Jim Lawson taught us, is at the essence of the nonviolent way of life: the capacity to forgive. When you can truly understand and feel, even as a person is cursing you to your face—if you can understand and feel, even in the midst of critical and often physically painful moments, that your attacker is as much a victim as you are, that he is a victim of the forces that have shaped and fed his anger and fury—then you are well on your way to the nonviolent life.

This is to me one of the best expressions of the incredible power of a commitment to continue working towards metta, towards compassion. Only wisdom can give us that strength. But there is wisdom, and we can really trust the depth and the power of this force in our heart and mind.

CHAPTER 60

Simplicity of Non-Reactive Mind

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson illuminates the transformative power of simplicity—not the absence of thoughts or perceptions, but the non-complication of direct awareness. Drawing on the Pāli term atamaiyatā (not made of that), which Ajahn Buddhadāsa called "the ultimate Buddhist concept," she points to those moments of being prior to subject-object duality, where awareness rests without fabrication or self-reference.

Wilson examines how papañca (mental proliferation) cascades from perception to thought to suffering, referencing the Buddha's teaching that "what one perceives, one thinks about; what one thinks about, one complicates." She explores the three seeds of papañca—craving, attachment to views, and māna (conceit/comparing)—showing how each generates endless trains of thought that "overwhelm and assail" us. Through Luang Por Dun's reformulation of the Four Noble Truths, she emphasizes that "the mind seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering."

The practical invitation is to trust the simple ability we all have to be fully present—not becoming awake and aware in some future moment, but simply being awake now. Wilson encourages practitioners to notice how perceptions are colored by mental states, how views snap shut our open awareness, and how comparing mind generates suffering. The path lies not in stopping thoughts but in recognizing them with the simplicity of yathābhūta—things as they have come to be—resting in the non-reactive awareness where, as the Buddha taught Bāhiya, "in the seen there is only the seen."

Tonight, what I mainly want to speak about I think of as simplicity—simplicity of being—or alternatively, the silence of the non-reactive mind, taking off from Guy's talk last night.

When I talk about simplicity or the silence of the non-reactive mind, I don't mean the simplicity or the silence of no thoughts, of no perceptions, of nothing happening. Not that we have to get rid of anything, but the simplicity of non-complication. As Guy spoke about last night, an example of that simplicity would be that moment of resting between vedana and tanha, craving. But it doesn't have to be just that little moment. There's the sense of non-complicating.

I think freedom of heart, freedom of mind really is a matter of simplicity. As we've been saying over and over, the essence of awareness is just the simplicity of being with things just as they are right now—nothing added, nothing taken away.

At least in the way most of our minds and culture seems to work, the trouble with simplicity is we're just not used to it. Our minds are obviously rather complex. The world is complex. We're used to complexity. Just look at how the body works. Pick any system of the body. Pick the whole structure of science. The more we know about science and the more science comes to be the trustworthy reference point in our culture—and the way I was trained in school, though I'm no scientist—the complexity of systems is endlessly fascinating. Of course, if you follow the complexity all the way down, it breaks up till everything is connected. And if you keep following the complexity of physics all the way down, which believe me I have no clue about except what I read, you follow it all the way down and you end up with nothing. There's no there there. But mostly, we're seduced. We're fascinated. We're just entranced by the complexity.

I loved what Guy said last night on how the Buddhist teaching is really about our condition as human beings, the quality of consciousness of our own minds. From that point of view, the complexity we get seduced by is the complexity of our thoughts and our personality. We're continually seduced, fascinated, entranced by this seemingly endless—nothing's endless—this endlessly renewable energy source of thoughts, over and over and over, and personality. We can get lost there. So the simplicity is not perhaps quite what we know how to recognize or trust.

There's a word in the Pali, atammayatā, which I've liked for a long time. Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was in the last century one of the most well-known Thai forest monks and scholars—and for the Thai Sangha, he was a little bit radical, the most radical who could stay within it in terms of scholasticism—he called atammayatā the ultimate Buddhist concept. It's a concept, still a concept. What it basically translates to mean is "not made of that," which is like non-fabricating, non-concocting, not making something out of anything. Non-identification is another way of saying it.

But it's the experience, that sense of the simplicity of heart and mind in the moment, just in a moment prior to the subject-object duality concept arising—or maybe that doesn't arise at all. Just the simplicity of just this, without a me, without an other, without a subject perceiving object. Just this. That utter simplicity, that silence. Not made of that.

I like the word concocting, but I know if English isn't your main language, you probably haven't heard that one. It means fabricating, making something up, constructing something out of nothing. You get the drift—concocting.

So a lot of what Guy spoke about last night, what he pointed us to, was the silence of the simplicity of heart and mind in a moment that is not fabricating, that's not concocting. But also, as you know, we spend a lot of our time in awareness exploring not only the simplicity, the silence, but also from the simplicity we can notice how the fabrication occurs. And then it simply becomes another thing that we don't have to fabricate on top of—if you know what I mean. You don't have to go into infinite regression about it.

This fabrication is the mind going out and creating a reality about any perception, any experience. And it does this endlessly. It's in The Island, but before that book came out, I saw a little pamphlet from another Thai forest Ajahn, Luang Por Dun. He was a disciple of Ajahn Mun, who was in the last century this very fierce, very revered Thai forest monk, the teacher of Ajahn Chah and that whole lineage.

So this Luang Por Dun—this is his reformulation of the Four Noble Truths, and it fits the way I'm thinking tonight. He says: the mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering.

The mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering. That's the second noble truth. The result that comes from the mind going out in order to satisfy its moods is suffering. That's the first noble truth. The mind seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering. The result of the mind seeing the mind clearly is the cessation of suffering.

Don't try to remember all of that. You get the drift. The mind that goes out is basically making all the problems. And the mind seeing the mind is the path leading to the cessation of suffering. He didn't say the mind that hates the mind, the mind that gets rid of the mind, the mind that deadens the mind, the mind that stops functioning. I didn't hear anything like that. The mind that sees the mind clearly is the path to the cessation of suffering. And so that's our path here. That's what I want to talk about tonight.

The mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods—well, this is not a surprise to us. We're very familiar with it. As Guy spoke about last night, he gave great examples in terms of the dependent origination, where the craving turns into grasping, turning into becoming. That's an example of the mind going out to satisfy its moods.

The way I want to talk about it tonight is mostly in the realm of thought. Not that thought has to be a problem. When the mind sees the mind and how it works, when thought is simply another arising experience like sound and sight and everything else, and there's just the simplicity of awareness noticing it—no problem. But when thought becomes the agent, so to speak, as if the thought is going out and constructing a reality around any particular perception, and then we try to do something about that reality, and then we suffer from it—well, that's what we call papañca.

Just to read the way the Buddha describes this: "Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises." That's what Guy said last night. "The meeting of the three is sense contact. With sense contact as condition, there is feeling." We're up to speed on that, right? With sense contact as condition, there's feeling. And what one feels, that one perceives. So perception, which is also one of the five aggregates, arises with contact just as vedanā, just as feeling tone does.

Now, here's the salient point. See if you've noticed this. "What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one complicates"—mentally proliferates with concepts as the source. "The heart is beset. The heart is overcome by mental perceptions and notions that then overwhelm and assail a person."

He's just describing the solution to this cascade of troubles. That wasn't the Buddha, the solution to this cascade of troubles—but doesn't it feel like that? What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates with notions, associations, memories, comparisons. And then these notions can overwhelm and assail a person—assail, like attack. Don't you often just feel like you're the victim of these thoughts? The thoughts have somehow become so strong.

And so as much as we say, just notice—a thought is a thought, it comes and goes, the sky is blue, I'm hopeless, the thought is a thought—somehow we can't quite... We know it. We've experienced it. But that was yesterday, which is now only a thought.

And that thought is strong. Yesterday I could do it. Today I can't.

So seeing how this papañca gets triggered, and how we can work with it—not to hate thoughts, but the path to freedom is when the mind can see the mind just as it is. Seeing things just as they are. Another great Pali phrase is yathā bhūta, which is often translated as "things as they are." But I've heard it's more precisely, in terms of the right tense, "things as they have come to be"—which gives it the moving sense, because things as they have come to be right now won't be like that in the next moment. Things as they have come to be.

And that simplicity of awareness can meet thoughts, can meet this whole cascade of troubles, and stay in the simplicity, rest in the non-fabrication, in the silence, in the non-reactivity.

So the beginning, of course, is just understanding, seeing. I always hesitate with "understanding" because we use that as thinking. Seeing is a way of perceiving the nature of thought itself. Again, as I said, we know it's ephemeral, but then we don't know it. So really, first looking at the fact of how much we trust thought to explain things.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Understanding, wisdom, that kind of understanding, does not arise as the result of thinking." Let me read that again: Understanding does not arise as the result of thinking. If only we knew that. "It's the result of the long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding."

Yet we're so seduced, as I said. So used to just trusting, really having our faith in the power of thoughts, that we often don't even realize this whole train of fabrication has gotten going.

So let's go back to the point of perception. This is the Dalai Lama: "All of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception." That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience or true knowledge. I mean, our whole practice, right, is emphasis on just what's happening now, that simplicity of awareness, that just being totally present with what is. That's the only way for accurate perception.

So we've spoken about perception—I actually can't remember if we've spoken about it here or not; it all blurs. But perception, that quality of recognition in the mind. Yes, Joseph talked about it, that's right. So perception, that recognition: this is a bird, this is a bell, this mood is sadness, this is a mood—all of that is perception. And how we perceive, we then think about and describe.

That doesn't have to be a problem. It can be extraordinarily useful, right? When you hear the bell and you think, "Oh, now it's five o'clock, time for tea." So there was the perception of bell, there was the thought about it, the perception of the time. And the thoughts about perceptions are how we construct our world. A great deal of the time, we're constructing enough of a similar world that we're all sort of functioning here together. So that just makes us think that our perceptions are completely accurate. But as I know has been pointed out, our perceptions often are not accurate.

The perception is colored, is affected by the mood, by the mental state in the mind, particularly when we're not aware of what the mental state is. So for instance, I was practicing in Burma—usually sunny, but then there's one really cloudy day. And I noticed at two different points in the day, one time I went out and my thoughts and my mood were kind of a little heavy. There was a little fear, a little unsettledness. And when I went out, the clouds looked threatening and ominous and heavy. Then later in the day,

I was in a bright, calm mood. I walked out, and the clouds were cozy, and it was nice to have the sun blocked. Both of those perceptions—that was what I really perceived at that moment. To think that my perception is an accurate description of reality? Not so trustworthy.

Or when there's delusion in the mind, we don't even know accurately. So say, for example—if this has ever happened to anyone here—after lunch you go to take a nap, or at two in the afternoon, or some odd time.

And you think you're just going to lie down for 15 minutes, but you totally conk out. One of those really heavy sleeps where, when you wake up for a minute, you don't know who you are or where you are. The bell rings, and you're thinking, "What is that? Is it breakfast? Is it tea?" That moment when you just don't know—that's delusion. But at least you know you don't know, so that's wisdom. If you don't know you don't know, and you think you know but you don't know—that's delusion. And a lot of the time, it's like that.

For me, a good example is when I don't have my glasses on. I don't like to wear my glasses all the time, but I really don't see so well without them. So when I'm in my cottage without my glasses, everything looks really clean, and I'm happy when things are clean. It's really nice. Maybe I don't need to vacuum this week. Then I'll be working, and I'll go into the bathroom with my glasses on, and I'm sitting there going, "Oh, God." My whole mood shifts.

That's the papañca. The perception is just, "Okay, well, it's not so clean as I thought." The papañca is when I think about it. "Look at that. I thought it was clean." Then the mood follows, and more thoughts about it. "I'm so lazy. Why don't I clean? What am I going to do? This is depressing." And then it just starts rolling. In no time at all. Those are the thoughts that overwhelm and assail a person, in no time, because we're jumping on the train and going with it. But see how it comes from perception. That's the first place it starts.

I find it fascinating to explore perception, especially when we don't even notice it. We just assume it's accurate and go from there, then wonder why things are a little out of sync.

A woman some years ago, in another country, told me this story. She had gone to work, her regular work in an office. That day, without realizing it, she was in a state of feeling bad about herself—low self-esteem, worthlessness, self-hatred. So she was working, and she saw one of her colleagues, someone she didn't have that much to do with, across the office, frowning at her. "What did I do to him? We didn't even speak today.

Why is he frowning at me?" Going back to her work, and all day, that thought keeps coming. "What did I do?" Feeling worse, getting angry, then feeling bad about herself. The whole day, building, building, building.

And of course, you come to find out: first, he wasn't frowning. Second, it had nothing to do with her. He hadn't even noticed her. He was just having some thought about something that had happened at home. No correlation at all.

Have you noticed anything like that ever happening here?

Just to see—it's not about bad or good. Just notice. The mind can get so complicated when I talk about it, but the moment of awareness, just noticing, is quite simple. I'm not trying to fix it. Just watch how it works. "Oh, look at that. This whole cascade of perceptions and thoughts and story and mood."

"Oh, it's like this." Honestly, just that simple awareness of it is enough. We don't have to take it all apart and unpack it and fix it and put it back, get back to the original perception and see what's right. That's making another big story. Just, "Oh, it's like this." This whole story—"I'm no good and they all hate me and everybody here is getting together secretly at some time when I'm sleeping and making a plan to kick me out"—it could be paranoia. Maybe so. But anyway, it's like this. You don't have to figure it out. Just, it's like this.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, who was a great Tibetan teacher, said: "When our sense organs"—so it's not just seeing, but hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking (remember, a lot of our perceptions are mental ones of moods and thoughts)—"when the sense organs encounter an object, the only part the object itself plays is to begin the process of perception in your consciousness. From then on, as your mind reacts to the object, influenced by all of your accumulated habits and past experiences, the whole process is entirely subjective. When your mind is full of anger, the whole world seems to be a hell realm. When your mind is peaceful, free from any clinging or fixation, you experience everything as primordially pure."

And that's just what Guy was saying last night. We tend to look out, look out, but it's all... And this is even a concept, out and in—I mean, that's just some idea too. But looking back at the mind itself.

Ajahn Chah said—he's so pithy with his examples—he held up a vase and said, "Look at this vase. You think it's nice, or you think it's ugly, or you think the flower arrangement should be different, or whatever. But it's just itself. It's just a vase. It's neutral. It's you who are driving yourselves insane."

So it's just to see that our emphasis, our interest can see the process, but it really comes out of all the investment into the perception, the vedana. Because vedana, the feeling tone, is not inherent in an object. For example, that vase—I could hold it up, and the sight could be pleasant to you and unpleasant to you and neutral to you. And tomorrow, it could all change around again. It's not an inherent thing at all, but rather a quality of feeling tone in the mind that's influenced by, as he says, our accumulated habits, past experiences, and things as they have come to be in this moment.

So the emphasis, the interest comes back to the simplicity of awareness—of just simply noticing without needing to give so much energy to all this concocting, to all this fabrication. Not trying to stop it, but we can withdraw the fascination, the belief, the sense that this is what's holding our world together. You may not want to withdraw the sense that this is what's holding your world together. And that's another story. That's also something we could look at.

So atammayatā—this simplicity. Not of hating or fearing or fighting with thoughts, or of loving our thoughts, or of making a world of our thoughts, or of needing to change anything. The simplicity of simple awareness.

I'll read you from Ajahn Sumedho. I just love the way he talks about the simplicity of awareness. He says, "The only way to go beyond being caught in thinking and emotional habit is through awareness of them, through awareness of thought, through awareness of emotion. The island that you cannot go beyond"—which Guy read last night—"is the metaphor for this state of being awake and aware, as opposed to the concept of becoming awake and aware."

I love that. Any moment, be awake and aware. You're never going to become awake and aware. That's always a concept somewhere else. But just right now, it's like this. You are awake and aware.

"Awareness is not about making value judgments about our thoughts or our emotions or our actions or our speech or anything. Awareness is simply about knowing these things fully, that they are what they are at this moment. It's very simple, very direct, and you cannot conceive it—awareness. You can't conceive it."

You have to trust it. You have to trust the simple ability that we all have to be fully present and fully awake. Trust the simple ability we all have to be fully present and fully awake, just for a moment. Don't let your mind project "fully awake" into the future, never spacing out again. Just for a moment—this ability to be fully present and fully awake.

And begin to recognize the grasping and the ideas we have taken on about ourselves, about the world around us, about our thoughts and perceptions and feelings. Just recognize with awareness. That's all. You don't have to fix it. You don't have to change it.

And then, as I was saying before, as you begin to realize and recognize this non-grasping, sometimes emotionally one can feel frightened by it. It can seem—it doesn't have to, but it can at times seem—like a kind of annihilation is taking place. All that I think I am in the world, all that I regard as stable and real, can feel like it starts to fall apart. And that can be frightening. As I said, when we know the ideas that are constructing our world, it can feel frightening.

But if we have the faith to continue bearing with—in other words, faith and awareness to continue being with these emotional reactions—and allow things that arise to cease, to appear and disappear according to their nature, then we find stability not in achievement or attaining, but in being. Stability in being awake. Stability in being aware. Just the stability in the simplicity of awareness—of the non-concocting, non-involved, non-reactive mind. I think I used that word last night: stable.

And so in doing that, part of what we do is continue to explore the nature of thoughts so we're not so afraid of them and we get less and less caught in them. It's not a bad thing that you're seeing so many thoughts here, really. We do seem to need to be hit over the head a little bit. We can't just see something a couple of times and get it. We wish, but no.

But the amount of thoughts you've had—how many thoughts would you say you've had since you've been here? Impossible to tell, right? And how many have we believed? A lot. But how many have we not believed? A lot. And so we really start to see the nature of them. Underneath that, we start to get it.

This is, again, Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "The mind is always being carried away by one delusion after another. Thoughts of hatred or attachment suddenly arise without warning"—have you noticed that?—"triggered off by circumstances. And if not seen clearly, they quickly take root and proliferate," just as we've been saying. "Yet, however strong these thoughts may seem, they are just thoughts and will eventually dissolve back into emptiness." No matter what you do, they'll eventually dissolve. Try to hold on to a thought and don't let it go from now until the end of the evening. It's going to dissolve. "Once you recognize this intrinsic nature of the mind, these thoughts that seem to appear and disappear all the time can no longer fool you. As clouds form, last a while, and then dissolve back in the empty sky, so these deluded thoughts arise, remain a while, and then vanish in the emptiness of the mind. In reality, nothing at all has happened."

That's what I love. This whole story and world, and it's gone. In reality, nothing at all has happened. Awareness isn't touched or stained, and all that world we went through —gone. Nothing has happened. There's no logical reason to be so driven by thoughts.

In terms of how we get so seduced, of course there are many ways of talking about it. But one classical way, found really more in the commentaries, is often called the three papañcas—three particular habits of mind, none of which will be a surprise to you.

But it's not just greed, hatred, and delusion. It's a slightly different list, although those are a subset—the tendencies that feed papañca, that just take off. I mention them because I find it interesting to explore, and it gives me a little bit more to notice. It helps cue me: "Oh, yes, right, that's what's happening." And you can just see the process.

What tends to really fuel this papañca, this tendency for thoughts to take off and construct a world, is craving, attachment to views, and māna—conceit. I'll say a little about each of these, although we've obviously talked a lot about them already.

The craving I think I need to say the least about. You know what it is. But it's interesting to watch how craving—this wanting, this thirst for whatever, it doesn't matter what it's for—operates in the mind. When there's not awareness of it, when it goes out towards some idea, some object, a sense object, a mind object, whatever is perceived as pleasant, and when that isn't seen, the energy that goes into concocting, into fabricating a whole world is really amazing, isn't it? I'm sure you've all seen this.

It's interesting to observe, at times, without judgment. The only way to watch any of this is from the motivation of interest, or just the simplicity of awareness. Judgment—that's just the backside of craving. It's just aversion. And you can't see clearly with judgment. When you're judging yourself, it's just the nature of the mind. This is how the mind is working for everybody, not just you.

So just watch the machinations that go on when there's desire in the mind. And here, with little stuff—if you have a seat that you like in the dining room, have you gone through all kinds of contortions to make sure you get that seat again? And also that nobody should notice you're doing it? Or when to have your shower time? How to sit, how to walk, all that stuff. It gets so complicated here.

You start saving food and then discover how much work that is, how complicating it is to save food and then put it somewhere. Then you want it later, but you're all the way in your room. Do I want to go back? But I can't do it at four—everybody will see me. When can I do it? I get up at three in the morning so I can eat this food that I saved. Meanwhile, it rots there in the yogi refrigerator, which, by the way, they would like you to clean out if you have little pieces of moldy food in there. The cooks have asked us to ask you to please, for God's sake, clean it out. And as you're doing it, you might notice: what's in my mind when I put this little piece of whatever—I don't even know what it is anymore—in here?

The craving runs us. And it's so believable when this is the perception. Craving colors perception, so that the object, whatever it is that we want, the thought—it looks like a beautiful thought. A person looks like the most beautiful person you've ever seen.

I used to have this thought come up, God knows why, of some street corner in Bangkok that I was at years ago. Now, that street corner was a really busy intersection of little stalls selling plumbing parts. There was nothing attractive about this street corner. But for some reason, in certain moods, it would come up, and my mind would go, "Bangkok. So lovely." And then it would add all this beautiful stuff about Bangkok. And then I'd spin into a whole story. You can spend hours like this.

You wake up and nothing at all has ever happened, which is lucky. Because the other option is you go online, book a ticket, fly to Bangkok, get out of the taxi at three in the morning and think, "Why did I come here again? What was it about Bangkok that I liked so much? I forget."

Choki Nyima Rinpoche, who is a brother of Tsoknyi and Mingyur Rinpoche, once talked about this. He said, "Watch the fickleness." Fickleness is like unreliability.

We say "fickle" in English—someone who falls in love with one person, then another, then another. Unreliable. Untrustworthy. Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche says to watch how easily the mind is influenced by just a pleasant or unpleasant sight or sound into an immediate mood. And then out of that mood, we construct a whole world. And we believe it.

At least here on retreat, the papañca mostly ends with thoughts. But as I said, in the world, it can go on into actions. You might make a career choice based on papañca. You might—hopefully not—get married based on papañca. "Oh, I'm a little bored. Let's have kids." Then what are you going to do?

It's really about watching this. And what we have the chance to observe here is how craving, as the Tibetans say, puts feathers on the object. It makes things much more beautiful than they are. If we don't see that the perception is unreliable, we're gone. We see that over and over, and then we wake up—oh yes, in actuality, nothing has happened. The more we see that, we start to develop a simple recognition: these thoughts, they're not really anything.

There's this seduction of pleasant thoughts, this promise of craving, the promise that more pleasant thoughts will finally make me happy. And we'll sit here with our knee hurting while we're off in some daydream, and if we stop and examine it—okay, I really know I'm probably not going to have that dinner party when I leave, but maybe, yeah. I spent a three-month retreat planning all these dinner parties, the menus, the recipes. You wake up—oh yes, right, here I am. And I never did any of it. I don't even like dinner parties. But that was the promise, that it was going to be so pleasant. Or the reverse—the fear of the unpleasant.

So we start to see: we wake up and it's nothing. The thoughts are going nowhere. It's just a thought.

What helps us trust awareness again is what Chokyi Nyima calls a weariness with saṃsāra. Not a weariness of aversion, because that's just flipping from craving to aversion, but the weariness of this word nibbidā. It's sometimes translated as "disgust," but that's not a good translation. Disgust for us has this negativity and revulsion. But nibbidā—the best way of describing it is that you kind of lose one's taste for something. The example given is of a dog chewing on a bone, but the bone is completely bleached out by the sun and there's just no juice there. There's nothing there. So you lose your taste for it, not out of disgust or revulsion, but because it just doesn't offer anything. It's really a movement of wisdom, a freedom of heart and mind in the moment, a turning away from something that isn't offering us anything anyway.

Nibbidā, this sense of turning away—it's not only from seeing that something doesn't give us what we hoped. "Oh yes, these thoughts, they're really not so great. Come back." The turning away is also just a releasing of the idea that this is going to bring me happiness, simply by seeing with awareness the actuality of it. A thought is just a thought, and it will never be more than that.

But nibbidā can also be developed by attention to the positive, the wholesome aspects of peace in heart and mind. So it's not just a negative thing. In your practice here, in your daily life, as you're walking around—those moments when you're just touching things as they are, yathā bhūta, things as they have come to be. Just that. The simplicity, where nothing is lacking and nothing is in excess. And the mind is not concocting any story about anything. It's just this—that sense of peace.

I think Guy talked about last night how we don't tend to notice it enough. But when we do, it's so much more—I don't know what the word is—refreshing, attractive, fulfilling, nourishing, than getting lost in thoughts about dinner parties. They don't really compare.

And so the wholesomeness, the peace, the satisfaction of the heart and mind that's pure, that's simple, that's non-reactive, that's not involved in the moment—this becomes so much more vivid and real that the attention turns away from getting lost in daydreams. Not out of aversion, but out of just seeing: oh, there's really another possibility.

This is one of the attractions of samādhi, of the mind that's collected and balanced—whether it's one-pointed or in a steadiness with changing objects. That sense of the collected mind, the secluded mind. Citta viveka is the secluded mind, secluded from the hindrances for a time. The first time you experience it strongly, or sometimes after, we don't even realize until then what it feels like not to have all this stuff in our minds all the time. Like, wow. What's going on? Everything's just so pure and clean. The world is so amazing. No—just for a moment.

There's no great hatred and delusion coming up in the mind. It's like, wow, that's nice. Oh, maybe that's a possibility. Maybe that's more attractive than thinking about the vacation I'm going to take next month. So it's not a should, but it's seeing the drawbacks of samsara and the peace, the nourishment of the heart and mind that's at ease.

So that's craving papañca. The second papañca is the papañca of views—views and opinions, and attachment to them. Obviously it's attachment to them, but a view is really a description of the world, any description we have that we take to be actually true, holding to it: this is true and everything else is false. Although, of course, we don't usually think of it in those terms. And in fact, we don't even know we have a view.

But it can be a view of who you are, what your personality is like. It can be, obviously in the world, political views—we all see where that goes. It can be views about how someone else should behave. It can be views about how we're all supposed to behave here. It can be views about what the appropriate kind of food is. It could be views about what's right practice.

A really sorrowful source of views is Dhamma views. What's the true Dhamma? What's the inaccurate Dhamma? Who has the true Dhamma? Which way of practice? Which teacher? Is it the Thai forest tradition? Is it the Burmese Sayadaws? Is it the Tibetans? Is it the Zen? I mean, does anybody even know what anybody else really holds as a view anyway?

Views are an enormous source of suffering. But really, at this level, we're talking about a concoction of thought. Have you noticed that? Huge. I think views are much more gripping and seductive even than craving for sense objects. This is what's happening, we take it as the reality. And we stop looking. We stop noticing. Our perception kind of snaps shut. It's like this.

That's why the mindfulness is this non—not picking and choosing. Just mindfulness, awareness, meeting whatever's arising. Not just the things we like, not just the things we think we should pay attention to.

Have you noticed how much we try in the instructions or in interviews, and we say, "Well, what are you noticing?" And how often the response is, "Well, this. That's happening, but that's not what's supposed to be happening. This is what's supposed to be happening." Or, "Yeah, I'm noticing lots of changing objects, but that's because I'm not concentrated enough. I should just be with the breath." Or, "I'm only with the breath, and that's because I'm not able to do choiceless awareness, which I know is really where it's at."

You can have people come in one after the other, with completely opposite experiences, and suffering because it's not happening the way they think it should be happening. But they don't think they're just thinking that. They know that's how it is.

And how much thought gets engendered when you're holding to a view of what practice should be, or what right practice should be. Or you're feeling fine in your practice, but then you see someone else—they look a little better, they're doing something different. And one of us up here says something that completely doesn't match your experience. And you don't know whether to hate us or hate yourself, but one of us has to be wrong, and you better figure it out or you're going to go crazy. And the mind just starts spinning, right?

How do the question periods affect you in the morning? Does your mind just go, "Okay, fine, that's not my experience, never mind," and you keep going? Great. May it be so. Because otherwise you have to figure it all out. How can it all fit in? Views, views. So much thinking comes from that. So much getting caught.

Sogyal Rinpoche has a great line about this. He says we get into so much pain and confusion by getting lost in what happens. And this, to me, is a good description of how views form. You project a thought, and then the second thought believes the first thought. Then the third, fourth, and fifth thoughts are projected. The first thought is, by this time, already a reality. By the time the tenth one comes, it believes the fifth has always been an actuality. That's it—views, views. And we just don't even see it.

Nisargadatta said, "The world appears to you so overwhelmingly real because you think about it all the time. Cease thinking about it and it will dissolve into thin mist." I would say, you know, I feel so real because I'm thinking about me all the time too. We think, "But I don't want to dissolve into thin mist. I'd much rather sit here and stew about the fact that my practice isn't going right and I'll never be able to do it the way those other people are than to dissolve into thin mist and simplicity."

So views are an endless source of papañca—not only the thought, but this concocting a whole world, believing it, suffering, and acting on it. Remember the example I gave a couple of talks ago about a friend of mine who felt that she was so aversive? That was the view she had of herself: "I'm an aversive person." And the view everyone else had—they all agreed she was aversive. That's a perception, all agreeing, and we think, "Okay, that could define the world."

And then when she sat down with open, balanced mindfulness, deliberately seeing that as a view and not buying into it, she noticed that aversive thoughts were maybe ten percent. There were all kinds of other thoughts. And then in the long run, she wasn't any of the thoughts anyway. That's the difference between the simplicity of awareness without a preconceived notion of what we're looking for or what's already here. The preconceived notion can completely blind us to open perception.

It's an example I give a lot, but I'll give it again because it was so vivid. At a retreat I was teaching quite some years ago in California with a friend, James, there were about fifty people, a retreat like this, but maybe a week long. Many of the people had never sat an intensive retreat before. And then as now, I had to sit in a chair. I sit in a chair. We taught just the way we teach this, and we described how to sit just like we do here.

This woman, about the fifth day, had an interview with me. It was one of those times when she had just broken through something. She said, "I've been in such agony, physical agony, for the last four days. Just sitting there cross-legged was absolutely impossible for me—so much pain. I've never sat cross-legged before." She was a middle-aged woman; it was killing her. But clearly that's how you have to sit. There's no way you can meditate if you don't sit cross-legged. She'd just been fighting with pain, no mindfulness. "I don't even know what's the point of this."

And finally last night, the fourth night, she said, "I looked up and I thought, 'Oh, Carol's sitting in a chair. Maybe it's okay to sit in a chair.'" She sat in a chair, and she could actually meditate—actually notice what was happening. That's how strong views can be, and how the papañca not only of the thinking about it can lead to actions.

So that's the second source of papañca. And the third is that of māna, translated as "conceit of self." It's a subtle sense of self, but the way we mostly notice it feeding endless trains of thought and belief is in this comparing. I think Sally talked about that, where somebody walks by and they're better than me, they're worse than me, or we're equal. But just this subtle—it's a sense of I am-ness.

It's brought about by the perception of seeing, for example. We don't notice seeing. We don't notice the perception that "that person looks so mindful." They're mindful, I'm not. I'm not doing well. And then the endless thoughts about everything you haven't done well in your whole life cascade forward.

You're walking, and then you slow down, and finally you're really slow, and someone comes rushing past, and you think, "Ah, I'm really doing well. I'm so mindful." Again—seeing, perception, fast—not seeing at all. Just going, going, going. There's this comparing that's extremely subtle, and don't be judging yourself about it. Just get fascinated by it. Wow, look at all this that gets going—completely extra!

If you could imagine thought balloons from all of us in the dining room at lunchtime—oh my God, it would feel like a nightmare. "They're good. They're bad. They're eating like a slob. They're eating so great. They're eating too much." It's like, oh please. So comparing to each other.

Comparing with our own past experience: "Well, this is the third week and the fourth day, and in the last retreat on the third week and the fourth day, I was doing a whole lot better than this. Is it my fault? Is it the teacher's fault? Is it the other yogis' fault? Is it the weather? Is it because I'm old? Is it because I'm young? Is it because of my health? Is it because of the food?"

It's like—cool it. Yathabhuta. Things as they have come to be right now. It's like this.

How simple is that? How free is that—from that whole world of comparison—to "it's like this"? Oh my God, what a difference. But the mind goes, "Hey, that's almost like being a simpleton." In the big world, if you say about someone, "She's a really simple person," it's not usually a compliment, except in certain spiritual circles. It's not really a compliment to be that simple.

Am I doing better or not? Should I be going slower or not? Are they faster than me? Are they slower than me? Well, maybe there's a reason... "It's like this." It's almost like that fear of annihilation Sumedho was talking about. The whole thing just falls apart. But we don't need that whole thing. We're just dragging that around and suffering.

Ah, the simplicity. Atamayata—not concocting.

So comparing to others, comparing to ourselves in the past, and again, comparing with a view, with an ideal. This is what practice should be like. This is how much I should eat. This is how much I should sleep. This is how I should dress—whatever it is. And then comparing to that. Source of endless, endless thoughts.

Just notice that. To me, this is a great dining room practice. Because when I'm on retreat, I tend to stay more by myself. But it could also be practiced in the meditation hall. Just walking into the dining room and being in your body, being aware of seeing. Seeing, seeing. And if it comes up—ah, judging—notice it. The judging, the comparing. No need to do anything about it. You don't have to concoct anything around the comparing. Just notice it. Seeing, comparing. It's like this. Seeing, comparing. It's like this.

We don't need to fear it. We don't need to try and push it away. It's also just another thought. Every thought is just another thought. No matter how puffy it is or how much emotion it comes together with, in that moment there's always the potential for the simplicity of awareness. It's like this—awareness of thought and emotion. And it will remind us that just because a thought comes together with really strong emotion, that doesn't make it more true. In fact, more likely less true.

So just noticing that. These are the three—they say—seeds of papañca. Not the only ones, but the main ones: craving, attachment to views, this māna, this conceit, this comparing. And not to stop it, but just to notice the process. In noticing the process, we've kind of stepped back into the simplicity of awareness, which is always available—the stillness of not self-referencing, of non-concocting, of yathābhūta, just things as they have come to be right now. Nothing extra. Not referencing back to anything else or forward to anything else. Just the willingness to be so simple.

I just want to end with a quotation from the Buddha describing himself, his mind. So this is the Buddha describing his mind to the bhikkhus. He said: "Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathāgata does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight." In a sense, there's seeing. The Tathāgata does not then conceive of a visible thing—there's just seeing. "He does not conceive of something that is unseen. He does not conceive of a thing to be seen. He does not conceive about a seer."

To balance it, in the famous sutta where he's talking to Bāhiya, giving him this little pithy instruction—he only had three minutes to give him an instruction to enlighten him—he said: "When in the seen, there is only the seen. In the heard, there is only the heard. In the sensed, there is only the sensed. In the cognized, there is only the cognized. This, Bāhiya, is how you should train yourself."

That's what he's saying. In the seen, the Tathāgata does not conceive, does not think about something visible as apart from the seeing. There's only seeing. He doesn't conceive of a seer apart from something seen. There's only seeing.

"When, Bāhiya, there is for you in the seen only the seen, in the heard only the heard, in the sensed only the sensed, in the cognized only the cognized, then, Bāhiya, there is no you in connection with that. When there is no you in connection with that, there is no you there. When, Bāhiya, there is no you there, then, Bāhiya, you are neither here nor there nor in between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

There's only seeing. There's only seeing.

"When, Bahiya, there is for you in the seen only the seen, in the heard only the heard, in the sensed only the sensed, in the cognized only the cognized—then, Bahiya, there is no you in connection with that. When there is no you in connection with that, there is no you there. When, Bahiya, there is no you there, then, Bahiya, you are neither here nor there nor in between the two. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 61

Courage and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this heartfelt talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the intense ups and downs practitioners experience as they deepen their practice. She observes how the sine wave of expansion and contraction—moments of flowing insight followed by periods of identification and doubt—is simply the nature of things, not personal triumph or failure.
> Wilson explores the teaching of sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view) and how our tendency to take refuge in our sense of self becomes the source of much suffering. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, the Dalai Lama, and Sogyal Rinpoche, she explains how compassion naturally arises through deep insight into suffering, beginning with our own experience. When we meet our particular pain with mindfulness and kindness, we discover it is not isolated but representative of universal suffering—connecting us to all beings rather than separating us.
> The talk addresses those moments when practitioners feel they "can't do it anymore"—whether facing physical pain, difficult emotions, or the disorienting groundlessness of impermanence. Wilson encourages stepping back from the narrow view of "me" to recognize these experiences as opportunities for cultivating wisdom and compassion. She concludes with an allegory from The Lord of the Rings, illustrating how courage and wisdom strengthen each other as we face increasingly difficult challenges, ultimately transforming personal motivation into bodhicitta—the aspiration for the awakening of all beings.

In the last week or so, I've been really struck—and this tends to happen to me about this time, four or five weeks into most long retreats—by the diversity of what each of you come in with. Actually, each one of you comes in with a diversity. You never know who's going to walk through the door; it's so changeable. At this point in the retreat, I'm struck by how intense it all is and how much you're all going through in different ways. Up and down, contraction, expansion, contraction, expansion.

It's not overwhelming, but sometimes it's really inspiring to me. Sometimes I just have a sense of amazement—it's extraordinary that you keep going. Other times, the intensity is on the side of lots of energy, lots of inspiration, lots of openness. But what I'm struck with is the commitment, the energy, the courage that it really takes to keep hanging in there like you are and to meet what's occurring in all the different realms.

I know sometimes that's difficult. It can change so much. Sometimes the insight is just flowing. It's relaxed, spacious. You just see things coming and going. It's so clear that there's no problem, never has been, never will be. And then the next time it's like, "Oh my God, I'm never going to see through to the end of this. It's just hopeless. It's never going anywhere." It goes from profound ease and insight to profound identification—sometimes in the same day, sometimes over a series of days.

The whole retreat is like life itself. It goes closing and opening, closing and opening, like the breath, or like the tides, or really like the energy of the universe—like a sine wave, up and down, up and down.

Part of what's great about a longer retreat is that hopefully you start to get it a little bit: that's just the nature of things. Instead of each up being your personal triumph and each down being your personal failure, you begin to see the pattern. Though perhaps you think, "Okay, maybe the up isn't mine, but the down is certainly my personal failure."

When Joseph mentioned emptiness and compassion just the other night—how compassion is the natural expression of wisdom, of the heart-mind of emptiness, of when all the energy isn't coagulating into a sense of me—there's so much space for empathy, for compassion. In the up periods, in the expansion periods, that just seems obvious. Of course compassion and wisdom are the natural state of things.

In the down periods, I know sometimes never mind even just compassion, but moving into even the mention, the possibility of bodhicitta—of the aspiration that my practice, my life, be a source of awakening for all beings—it's like, "Are you kidding me? What does that have to do with my sitting here, lost in aversion, at this tingle in my back? I'm ready to kill. I know it's a little overreactive, but I don't get what this has to do with compassion or bodhicitta. It doesn't really seem too connected."

I want to talk a little about the ups and downs and the sense of how when it's about me, it's much more difficult. You know that, but I'll explore it some more. In terms of how our path unfolds—and each of our paths is different—we never know how it needs to unfold, even tomorrow, even in the next minute.

Something I've learned I really trust, except when I forget it, is that even when it seems like my particular suffering, my particular pain, my particular story, and I'm really caught in the personal nature of it—each of our so-called particular stories is just our individual experience as a representative of the suffering of all beings, so to speak.

In the particular, when we continue to simply be with it, open to it, meet it with kindness, with compassion, with courage—just to bear witness to our own incredibly painful or incredibly stupid pain—when we just bear witness to that over and over, that's the cultivation of compassion and wisdom. We really see that this is just the particular expression of what is universal.

Ajahn Sumedho used to say when he would start a talk in Thailand, "Welcome, brothers and sisters in old age, disease, and death." We're all in it together.

Our tendency at times can be, when you're in the down cycle of the sine wave, when you're in the contraction, of course it's about me. That's part of the contraction. But that's not when you feel connected to all beings, is it? That's when we either want to go off and hide.

You don't want to come to an interview because you don't want to have to really admit how completely you're failing at the moment, even to yourself—never mind to us. You don't even want to say it. "Oh, it's not going well. I've completely failed. It's all about me." We don't tend to feel connected.

But actually, any particular suffering—you think whatever you're going through, you're the only person who goes through it? No. Maybe you'd like to be, but no. And instead of it being an isolating experience, simply by meeting our confusion or suffering with mindfulness—of course, the kindness of mindfulness, that's a quality of compassion—non-judging, not having an assumption about what should happen, just the courage to keep showing up, the wisdom arises by itself. And by itself we start to... the expansion comes again, the opening into the fact that even though it seems like my individual little poor me, even this can be the avenue into connection with all beings.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama talks about compassion a lot, obviously. Compassion is described as the quivering of the heart in response to suffering, feeling with—it's just empathy, really, not a pushing away. And His Holiness says, how does it develop? Through deep insight into what suffering is. And guess how we get that deep insight, he says: it arises through focusing, through opening to, through being present with our own experience. And then the compassion strengthens through continually being open to our own experience. It strengthens with the empathy to ourselves, and naturally moves into empathy with all beings, connectedness to all beings.

As Sogyal Rinpoche says, just cultivate the correct motivation in your heart, just the compassion. It turns into bodhicitta all by itself. But this talk—I'm not concerned with bodhicitta because it'll happen all by itself. I just want to talk about what he's saying here in terms of the opening, in terms of the acceptance, in terms of the strength that it takes, which is enormous, to be present for all this stuff. It's enormous strength, over and over.

But that's why the difficult times in life and the difficult times in retreat are so important. They're key to someone who's on a path of awakening. And if we're on a path of avoid, repress, deny, the difficult times aren't so key. But for the path we're on, they're so important. And so I just want to talk a little bit more about that tonight. Hopefully it's a little bit of a pep talk, but you never know.

As I mentioned, watching the ebbs and the flows in your own practice—even though each thing that's happening is so immediate, everything's so intense—your world has both really shrunk in a way to this area, these four walls, a lot more than you even realize. And so incidents that happen here reverberate hugely. Have you noticed that in your mind, in your heart? Hugely.

Because all our conditioning is still popping up. It just happens to all be focused here. Like my teacher said once—someone said to him, "Oh, you're a monk because you're giving up all desire." And he just cracked up. He said, "Don't kid yourself. A monk can take all that craving you have in the world, and that same amount of craving, bring it down to two things: food and their robes. But the amount of craving can still be the same." So in a way, sometimes that's what's happening here.

So when you're in the midst of an intense, open, beautiful experience, even though intellectually you go, "I know. I know it's impermanent. I know it comes and goes. I'm seeing the mind that says, 'Oh, finally you've got it.' I'm seeing it. I'm not clinging to this." And when it goes—which it does—we say, "That's okay. It's all right. I know it's going." It's kind of okay for a while. But somehow the next day, suddenly everything's just wrong. And it's so intense. And each time, this is how it is. This is how it is.

It's so up. It's so down. And even if you sat and looked back over these four and a half weeks, you might not even be able to remember how many changes you've gone through. You may be able to remember some of them. So we get the sense a little bit. But still, when you're in them, it's everything.

When insight and wisdom are there, they're so strong. And then they go. And we're so caught—but with the added little extra goody of being able to see that we're caught, to actually know that we're caught and identified, whereas before we didn't know that. And since we know we're caught, and yesterday we weren't, clearly we shouldn't be caught now. We're caught because I'm useless. I can't do it. I did something wrong. You know the whole thing.

So doubt comes up, impatience, frustration, and whichever particular way your personality is inclined, it can go to doubt or self-doubt or frustration or impatience or out the door. I can't imagine why you're laughing.

We're also coming up against—as many of you have expressed—whatever views and expectations we hold about our abilities, or the practice, or what should be happening. And even when we think we know what our expectations are, often there's really some subtle one in the background. I can't count how many people have said in the last few days, just as a passing reference and not a big deal, "Well, at this point in the retreat, blah blah blah." It should be or it shouldn't be, compared to another retreat, compared to what? But "at this point"—even that we're thinking anything indicates some subtle expectation, as if we know what should be happening.

So our views, our ideas about ourselves, about practice, about what's going on are constantly being challenged. And really, day after day, even if it seems familiar to you, it's not. It's unknown territory. The conditions are never exactly the same as they were that other retreat when you experienced the breath in this particular way and you know what the next thing should be. And then it isn't that. Oh my God, what does this mean? It's better. It's worse. It's this. It's that. It's like—give it up. We don't know.

We're always being challenged. But we like to have a framework, a path that we can compare ourselves to, even if that makes us feel bad. At least we can have a path to compare ourselves to. Or it makes us feel good. That's even worse. I mean, it's both the same. It's both a trap.

But it's really difficult. We get into the frustration, into the comparing, into the doubt, the self-doubt, when the reference point is me, is all about me. When the changes are just happening—you know, it's really calm, you're really present with the flow of changing objects, choiceless awareness is peaceful—and then it changes but there's just really no clinging, it's no problem. That can happen. And then you're tired and things are not so clear, but the mind isn't really reactive—it's no problem.

But the reverse—when suddenly it's been all cloudy and it opens up. And I'm not saying choiceless is better and cloudy is worse; I'm going by what people tend to judge themselves about. People don't usually say, "Cloudy—great! Choiceless flowing—I'm blowing it." Usually not.

When it goes from a way you like it, that feels effortless and flowing, and it changes—there's the sense of, what did I do wrong? How can I keep it? How come my concentration and mindfulness, which were proceeding very steadily for two and a half weeks, how come now it's all over the shop? What am I doing? How can I fix it?

And it's really—we're always looking to some reference point, some pattern we can put it in—but the suffering here, the thing that feeds our doubt and confusion, is the sakāya-diṭṭhi, the personality view.

We've mentioned this before. Diṭṭhi is view. Sakāya—well, Sāriputta defines sakāya as just the flow of the six sense experiences that we've talked about a lot, just the six things coming and going.

Sakāya-diṭṭhi—well, actually, let's go to the Buddha. "This is the way leading to the origination of personality." One regards—and in parentheses it says "all phenomena," but that's just shorthand—one regards any one particular of the six arising experiences as "this is mine, this I am, this is myself."

It's just a fast little moment. You go outside, it's chilly—"I'm so cold." Or you're sitting here and there's a little sound and you go, "I don't like that unpleasantness." Or there's a pain in the back—"my back hurts, this is mine." Or you see someone else walking and that comparison arises, that māna—"I'm so this, I'm so that." It's really just a clinging, the movement of clinging. But it comes and goes in a moment.

This is the Buddha again: "This is the way leading to the cessation of personality." One regards any particular sakāya, any particular sense experience, any of the five aggregates Sally talked about—which are also sense experiences—one regards thus: "This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself."

Sometimes that's just theoretical. Sometimes saying that doesn't connect. But sometimes when you're feeling relatively clear but a little caught up, you might just notice in relation to whatever's arising and go, "Hmm, this is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself." It's interesting. Not with judgment, just... "Hmm, this pain in my knee—oh, my knee—actually, where's the knee? There's sensation. The sensation is not me. It's not mine. It's not myself." You can just drop that in from time to time.

But when it's all about me—my story, my failures, my beautiful experience—it can be overwhelming. And when it tanks, when it goes in the wrong direction, or it's suddenly really intensely overwhelming, or you just feel like, "Ah, I can't do it, it's just too much, I can't do it"—stop a minute.

First of all, we don't even know what the "it" is that I can't do. But "I can't do it." Open to the bigger picture. The sakāya-diṭṭhi has narrowed down to "I've got to somehow do it better, I've got to somehow whatever it is."

Just the big picture. This really helps me a lot. When I'm with something—and sometimes it's not that I can't do it, sometimes what's arising is just so difficult—you really kind of know what to do, open to it, be with it, but something in you just says, "I can't." You know, "I can't do it."

That's when I find consciously bringing in the bigger picture helps. This is the particular representation of this particular aspect of suffering in the world. That doesn't make it go away or better, but sometimes it gives me more courage, more motivation to be with it.

I want to say I don't mean it in the way that some people have said, as a way of denigrating your own suffering. "Well, I feel this pain, but what about all the people who are in the hospital? So I shouldn't be complaining." You might notice what that attitude is in the mind, right? It's aversion. We're not talking about aversion.

We're talking about, "Oh, okay, let me just for a moment be the representative"—even of something like hunger. "How can I be hungry when people are starving?" No—I'm hungry. That could actually bring us into empathy with people who are really hungry, or people who are really lost in confusion.

This practice is a continuing call to the courage to open into the unknown of each moment, to meet things we never thought we could meet. When we fall back into our personality beliefs—well, this is beyond me, I'm just a simple soul, I thought maybe I'd have a few nice meditation experiences, but I could never be enlightened. I mean, I come, I practice and all, but for me to really be free? If I really look at it, do I hold that possibility? Of course, as Ajahn Sumedho likes to say, it's not the personality that's enlightened, which is actually a huge relief.

Ajahn Sumedho said something really interesting in a retreat we were on once. He was talking about Westerners, people with a Western education and cultural upbringing. He said he feels that for people with a Western education and upbringing, one of the biggest hindrances is self-doubt—self-doubt in terms of not having confidence or faith in our own insights, our own experiences, those momentary experiences of the potential of freedom. Absolute moments of freedom—really seeing, say, the emptiness of personality view, or just seeing that something you were really suffering from is no problem. I mean, you've all had experiences of seeing impermanence, seeing the uncontrollability, and the freedom that comes with that.

He says that for our insights into awareness, our liberating insights, in part our self-doubt is so strong because—this is Sumedho's view—our personalities and our belief in our personalities is so strong that we really rely on and take refuge in our personalities in a powerful way. Our personalities become our reference point. So when something doesn't go the way we think it should, we're back in our personality.

Let me give you an example. When in a relaxed, non-grasping mode of practice, there's not much velcro, not much clinging, things are just happening, the sine wave is just going—then it might be really obvious, as Buddhadasa says, that the sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind. That's all. Just a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind. Clinging to anything—clinging to this thought, clinging to a view, clinging to a pleasant feeling, clinging to an extra piece of toast, whatever it is.

And that can also be noticed. Sense of self arises. Sense of self vanishes. It's really no big deal. Just another thing to notice. There's no personality view really going on at that time. Even so, emotions can be coming, thoughts are coming, our personality patterns can still be running. But we're just seeing them as causes and conditions. I know if I walk into a particular situation—say I'm by myself, on a retreat, and I've been in my room sitting just by myself, and then I walk into the dining room—unless I'm incredibly still in the mind, as soon as there's seeing, little judgments start to come up. But that can just be seen as cause and effect, cause and effect. It just goes into empty space. There's no big personality view around that.

It's fine. There's a tenderness. There's a peace. This is how it is. You can just really see it coming and going. No problem.

And then, as you know, the contraction starts. You can't quite say why it changed. You can see it's a little more sticky. There's the judgment coming. Judgment, but it's okay. It's a little more sticky, but you're still seeing it. It gets stickier and stickier, and then no problem. And then all of a sudden, it is a problem. A big problem.

"I am so judgmental. Why doesn't this stop? It was so clear. How can I get caught back in this again?" I, I, I. And we're back in.

This is what sakkāya-diṭṭhi means. We really believe this view of "I did this. I shouldn't be doing this. I should be better. But of course, this is the type of person I am. What do I expect? I expect to be enlightened." You know, "Okay, I'll schlep through another day, another week, another month. I'll keep doing it because what else is there to do? But we all know, where is it going to go? Nowhere. Because my personality is so strong."

And this one we really believe. We really believe. We take refuge in our personality so much. It's the default reference point. And from this place comes what makes it really hard sometimes to keep going.

Let me just give you an example of how it could be different. A friend of mine, a Burmese guy, was on a retreat with me in Burma, and he was translating. He hasn't done too much practice. He's very intellectual, but still different conditioning. He was translating for U Lakhana, and the instructions were the noting practice where you note whatever's arising. As U Lakhana described it, he was saying if anger arises, you note "anger, anger, anger," and it goes away. If this arises, you note "sadness, sadness, sadness," and it goes away. And then he left.

Sometimes the other teachers would take questions. And one American—Canadian guy—said, "Well, I note it three times and it doesn't go away. What am I doing wrong?" And he's really upset. "What can I do? It lasts longer than three times!" And we're all saying, "Of course, never mind," all the stuff we tell you.

Later, my friend who was the translator said, "Oh, that was so interesting, because it doesn't go away in three times for us either."

I said, "Oh, I didn't hear what you said. Well, what do you do when it doesn't go away?"

He said, "Well, we go, 'Oh well, never mind.'"

You get a sense of the difference, the suffering that comes from each approach.

I was listening to a talk, a talk on a CD by Pema Chödrön.

I was just driving in my car, listening to a talk by Pema Chödrön about compassion. What I remember most is her point about how in life and in retreat both—though retreat is just magnified, intensified—as we stay on a path of practice, a path of awakening, anyone who stays on the path of really exploring their experience, their mind and body in a steady way, we're going to come up against that which we really, really, really don't want to have to face, one way or another.

This is a lot of what starts to happen at this point on retreat. It might be some huge trauma from the past. A lot of times it can just be irritation, or discomfort, or sleepiness. It doesn't have to be some huge thing—it might be, but it doesn't have to be. It's some pattern of mind that we've almost unconsciously structured our lives around not having to totally be there with. We can move away.

And here, as the spirals deepen—I say sine waves, but it's also like spirals—have you noticed you keep seeing the same insights over and over, deeper and deeper? "But I saw that one. I got it already. I know this is a habit. I'm ready to be done with it." No, you're not. Down and down, spiral, spiral. It's got to come in a deeper, more subtle way.

That which we really don't want to be with can take many forms and different intensities at different times. But just know that it's not a mistake. It's what requires so much courage and steadfastness and faith and compassion—to just continue to show up in every sitting and every walking.

By this time, you know you're more or less aware as you're moving through the day, as you're doing things. You really have got it that your mind and body is going with you wherever you go. You really can't get away from it too well.

And so when we're in the sakkāya-diṭṭhi, patterns can come up. It can be unworthiness. It can be loneliness. It can be the groundlessness of impermanence, the chaos of no control. It could be the judgment of no clear progress. It could be aggression. It could be boredom—massive boredom. It could be anything or all of the above, different things at different times. But when it comes up: "I can't do it."

Pema Chödrön was saying she had noticed in all her years in the monastery and working with people that so often people come for longer retreats or shorter retreats, or she's seen them working through their lives. They can come and practice for a few years, coming and practicing but mostly getting the goodies. Come to feel a little bit better, come to have some nice meditation, come to feel better in their life—which there's nothing wrong with. Feeling better in our lives—everybody around us feels better if we feel better in our lives. I'm not putting that down.

But she noticed how when, for some people, it hits this place that we don't even know we don't want to go there—but we don't—they're out the door. Just out the door. "Oh, this isn't what I signed up for."

I'm not saying anyone here is doing that. You're all still here. Maybe right now you're in a space where you're going, "Oh, this is great. I'm in the dessert phase." That's wonderful. We need to have some dessert phases so that we can go back and ask, "Now can I find the courage? Can I find the wisdom to meet this new thing with compassion and to really trust that this isn't something going wrong?"

This is really the depth of identification, of personality view, opening up to be met with wisdom and compassion. How we meet this difficult experience right now is the cultivation of wisdom and compassion. Compassion isn't something that happens out there.

It's like meeting this experience right now without aggression, without pushing away, without needing to change. This is what we've been talking about the whole time. There's nothing new about that. But noticing—it's not about making the experience better, but just the fact that for a moment you take a breath and you go, "Okay, fear. Fear is like this."

Quite a few people have mentioned they've been able, just for a moment, to recognize: fear is like this. That's so different from when fear's driving the bus, when fear's telling us all the stories, all the stuff we do not to feel fear. Or aggression, or greed, or loneliness, or grief, or impatience—you name it. We all have our particular ones.

And so, as Ajahn Chah said, it's like many people are out the door. I just want you to appreciate that you're not out the door. We may take a little hike in our heads, but then we wake up and we're still here. That's okay. Because this isn't about pushing, but it's about finding that motivation that comes really from love of awakening, from kindness, from courage. The courage actually comes from the wisdom, the faith, that gives us a stronger courage to keep going.

And that's why, as you go along, it both gets easier and more difficult at the same time. Have you noticed that sometimes? It's like what you're going through maybe the last couple of weeks, you think, "Oh, this is just what I was going through in the beginning." But it's not. It's so much more intense. You really would have been out the door in the beginning. But now people are coming in and describing this intense stuff, and I'm just starting to think, "Well, how are you doing?" And they go, "Oh, but I'm really fine. I really have the balance. I have the courage. I have the wisdom to be with this." And you do. That's huge. That's amazing.

And that's a movement out of sakkāya-diṭṭhi—to see we have no clue what's really possible, not to limit ourselves with our personality beliefs.

So just some examples of when we get to this place of, "Okay, that's it. I don't have the motivation to keep going." Just to recognize those and see we can find it. Again, one is the strong thing of "I"—it's all about me, I can't do it, it's not going right, I had it but I lost it. That doesn't sound like much in the beginning of practice, but as you're getting deeper in, sometimes the fear that the way the meditation is going is a sign that you're never really going to be able to do it—that can be terrifying. The thought "I'm really never going to understand the truth" can be totally terrifying.

There's a sutta where a monk named Assaji was sick and dying. The Buddha came to him and said, as he was dying—and this was a common thing he would say to monks—"I hope you are not troubled by remorse and regret in regard to your actions, in regard to your sīla."

And Assaji said, "I do. I have quite a lot of remorse and regret."

The Buddha said, "In regard to your virtue?"

"No, no, not that."

"Well then what? If you have nothing to reproach yourself in regard to virtue, why are you so troubled by remorse?"

And Assaji said, "Formerly, venerable sir, when I was ill, I could keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations. But now I cannot obtain concentration. And as I cannot obtain concentration, it occurs to me: let me not fall away. Let me not fall away from the path. Let me not fall away from awakening."

So he's dying, and he's in this deep panic because he can't concentrate, thinking he's lost the path. Lucky he had the Buddha there. Because the Buddha said, "Hey, those ascetics and brahmins, Assaji, who regard concentration as the essence and identify concentration with asceticism, who fail to obtain concentration—they might think, 'Let us not fall away.'" But then he gives him the whole teaching: "What do you think? Is form permanent or impermanent?" Going through all five aggregates.

You know, the consciousness of the whole five aggregates that Sally talked about. He goes through the whole thing of everything's impermanent, including mental formations, which concentration is. So therefore, if you understand it, there's nothing to fall away. You're not falling away.

But see how even someone who had been practicing with the Buddha and was quite attained can fall prey to that sakkāya-diṭṭhi of "I've lost my concentration, it's all over, and I'm dying without having awakened." Panic, total panic. And the Buddha says, no, that's not true.

So here we're practicing that, practicing it over and over and over. When you say, "Oh no, I've lost it," right then, that's where you bring in the awareness. "Oh, 'I've lost it' feels like this. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi feels like this." And there's awareness there. That's all. You don't have to fix it or talk back to it or rearrange it or get a new personality or anything. "'I've lost it' feels like this." And you're back with awareness.

Another place we kind of hit a wall, where we just think, "I've really worked hard, but I can't do it one more time," is often when we're with physical or mental experience that is actually very, very difficult—very painful physical experience, very painful mental experience. Many of you have been going through that. And it gets harder, especially when it's a difficult habit of mind, when we not only keep getting caught in it but we also see that we're getting caught in it. "I'm actually more neurotic since I started meditating than less. I not only get angry and yell at someone, I also deeply feel the shame of being angry. And I add on the shame of being a bad meditator on top of it." And it's like, "Oh, great." Or the pain and the reactivity, whatever. "I just can't handle it anymore."

Sumedho also had a great line talking about something else in Thailand. He was sweating through his robes in the hot season. If you haven't been in a hot season in Asia with all these robes on, it really is like being in a tin roof baking. It's like you're in a hundred-fifty-degree oven in the sun. And he said he would just feel like, "I can't bear it. I can't bear another moment." And then he'd find that he could.

And that's really how it is. I get to a place of physical pain, or more often it's aversion in the mind. Not that you're pushing, but the mind just kind of shuts down. You go, "I can't bear this anymore. This is unbearable." And I ask myself at that point, "Oh, really?" And this isn't a judgment. "What's so unbearable about it?" It's a way of getting into what actually is so unbearable about this right now. I usually can't find what's unbearable about it. Although a hint: there's almost always aversion in the mind. Pretty much always aversion.

That doesn't mean, as we've said, that when you're having strong emotional memories, trauma, fear, whatever, and at times the energy of the emotion is much stronger than the energy of mindfulness and you're just getting swept away over and over—the skillful thing doesn't mean push through it. That might mean you back off. You change your object of awareness. You go to mettā. You take a walk. But that's not saying, "I can't do it." That's saying, "Oh, okay, let me find a way to balance the awareness and strengthen the heart to keep on exploring." That's very different. That's skillful means. That's wisdom. We all do that.

Sometimes, again, it's just that sense of, "I've seen this so much, this is such a strong habit, I'm never going to get free of it." And we're back in that cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, where we don't trust beyond our personality view, where we don't trust the depth of our own aspiration, of our own motivation, of what's possible, where we think we know but really we have no clue.

When you first started meditating, however long ago that was, would you ever have imagined you'd come on a six-week or a three-month silent retreat? You think you could bear it? Most people's first retreat is really hard, and if it's not, then your next retreats are even harder. So we really have no clue what's possible.

Another place I want to mention, and this is a little different—not exactly that strong suffering, but as you start to see some intimation that freedom from clinging, or opening to the groundlessness of change, the groundlessness of no stable place to rest... we start to get a sense, some idea, that I'm going to lose some sense of myself. Something—you don't even know what. I use this kind of feeling of some sense of your personality that's comfortable. Or it's often a projection, not actuality, but a projection: "I'm just not going to care about beauty anymore. I'm not going to care about my family." And even though Joseph was talking about how we still appreciate pleasantness, it is different without the clinging. We're not so driven by it. And it does happen that things that were so incredibly important aren't so important anymore.

And then I go, "But I don't know if I want to give up whatever—fill in the blanks. I don't want everything to be old, dull, gray. I can't tell the difference between pleasant and unpleasant, between beauty and garbage." You know, if a leper's finger falls in my food bowl, I don't care—which is one of the stories of Mahakashapa. Okay, I'm not aiming for that one, I don't think.

But it can, in a subtle but quite profound way, be like a sense of dying to something. And we don't want to die to that. There have been many times in my practice where I've felt a deep sense of real grief, as if some part of me—this is a concept, but some part of me, some sense of Carol personality, I couldn't even say what—is dying, is going away, is being lost. And there's this sense of wanting to hold on to it. Why? God knows. It wasn't so lovely. But a sense of wanting to hold on to it—a comfort with the familiar. Like it's an old cloak, an old shabby cloak we put on, but it's me and I'm familiar with it and I don't want to look into these other possibilities. It's just a habit, but it's like a series of small deaths. So we mourn them and find the courage, find the willingness to step up again, to be present, to see we really don't know where the next step is going to go.

One of my teachers used to say, "Pick up your foot and then don't put it down again anywhere." It's kind of like that.

So sometimes in practice, the places that get the most unsettling as you practice more and more—maybe the most likely to make us want to roll up the mat and leave—is when we're experiencing the deeply unsatisfactory nature of things. There are times in practice when the so-called dukkha lens reveals that nothing's really satisfying. That's the first noble truth. There are times when that's just so obvious, and there's nowhere to go to get away from it. It's true, but it's not complete. It's not where we stay. But there are times when we just see that there's no home—in the mind, in the body, in the world.

I went through a phase where I knew that was true, but it would come up: "There's no home." And it was terrifying. There was no home, and it was terrifying. And my mind would go, "I can't bear it." And I'd ask, "What actually can't you bear?" "I don't know, but I can't bear it." And it would keep going on and on. It's a phase. But it's frightening. It's disconcerting.

Or the no control—everything gets chaotic. At times, choiceless awareness is open, spacious, peaceful. And then all of a sudden, it's not. You still think, "I was doing open choiceless awareness, but now it's chaos." Everything is going like crazy.

It's not that I can just notice what's happening. It's all over. It's chaos. And yes, samsara is messy. It's not all nice and tidy. It doesn't mean anything's wrong, but it's very disorienting.

Stephen Batchelor says emptiness is not just the experience of oceanic bliss. It is a falling apart of all of our strategies of self-interest, self-centeredness, of seeming protection. That's why it's so scary sometimes. And although it's freeing, it can also bring up great disconcertion, confusion, dis-ease, even fear. It's like being in no man's land. We're losing our reference points.

That's when we want to go back to the sakkāya-diṭṭhi, our reference point. You know, that cage, but it's our reference point. But you don't have to even think about all this. Just that willingness to notice fear. Fear. That's all we need to do. Meet that with karuṇā, with compassion.

And we find we have the courage to recommit over and over and over to—what? We don't know. When we started out, we might have had some idea what we wanted, where we were going. We have to have some idea; we wouldn't have started without one. And I imagine you're finding your ideas of what this path is about, what freedom might be, where it's going—changing. I bet for sure your ideas, even your ideas of who you are and what you're capable of, have really changed.

But then we solidify new ideas. Yet as the wisdom grows and the compassion grows, so the faith grows. And even though what we open to is even more unknown, more disconcerting, with fewer and fewer landmarks, there's a stronger faith, a stronger wisdom to meet it. So practice gets both more difficult and easier as we go along.

But there's no way to really avoid, as Pema Chödrön said, that thing we really don't want to meet. What we do find is that we have more wisdom and more compassion and more faith and courage to actually meet that thing, whatever it is, a little bit at a time.

I want to share a story, an allegory that I really like. I've used this before, and it gives me a sense of how we have to keep making choices over and over. Every time you show up again when it's difficult, you've made that intention. Or rather, you haven't made it—the intention has arisen. Let me be here for this moment. That's an intention of wisdom, of courage, of resolve, which is one of the pāramīs, of compassion. Let me just meet this moment. I don't know where it's going, but let me just lift up my foot again.

Over and over, we're making that commitment. We're re-motivating ourselves. It's not just a one-time thing. That's why I have so much respect for all of you being here. On the hard days, it's like you have to make that commitment every moment almost, just to stay in the sitting, just to get up. You get up and your mind says, "I'm out of here." And then you find yourself in the walking room doing walking. You're walking, and at the end of this walk you think, "That's really it." And then you find yourself in the sitting, doing the sitting. You're showing up.

Because the faith gives you the energy to show up, and that energy gives more wisdom, that gives more compassion, that gives more courage, that gives more faith—and it just keeps spiraling and opening deeper and deeper into the unknown.

A couple of years ago, I had a bad flu and was home for a couple weeks. I couldn't read or anything, so I was watching videos, and I ended up watching the Lord of the Rings trilogy—the whole thing, all in a row. I'd seen it before, but watching it straight through struck me. It's really an allegory, and probably many of you know the story. What struck me was how the courage of choosing is strengthened by wisdom, how we go into situations we never thought we could face. And then it not only strengthens our courage—it strengthens our wisdom and compassion.

And it has a momentum all its own.

So this little being Frodo, this hobbit, gets involved in this whole quest because he has faith in a wise, older wizard. The ring of power, which is evil—the wizard tells him about it, but Frodo has no clue. He's just given this task in his little safe hobbit world, kind of like a perfect English countryside where there's just not really suffering. And he has to take this ring out of his hobbit world to a nearby place he's never been and give it there. He's told it's dangerous. Don't tell anyone. But some friends go with him.

So he's nervous, but it's an adventure. He's never been out. He's trying to do good, and he has no clue—no clue what he's getting involved in. He couldn't even imagine if he wanted to.

And so this trip to this little nearby town outside of hobbit town is a million times more dangerous than he thought. These dark riders, these wraiths—ring wraiths—like ghosts on horses, trying to kill him and his friends. They barely make it to this place in the pouring rain. They get into this establishment that's kind of coarse—not evil, but really rough men. And they're completely out of their element.

"Thank God, here we are. Gandalf's going to be here. We can give him the thing." Well, Gandalf isn't there. Nobody's heard of him. They don't know what to do. And then some of these riders come again and start trying to kill these little guys. Meanwhile, the hobbits have no sense of how much trouble they're in, so they're acting in inappropriate ways—calling attention to themselves, acting out. They're almost killed.

"What do we do now?" And they have to place their faith in this kind of weird-looking guy they've never met or heard of. He says, "You have to come with me. We have to go even further away from your home to this elf land." They don't trust this guy, but they've got nothing else to do. What else can they do?

So they go on this journey of a few more days and they're attacked by these riders, really almost killed. Frodo almost dies. He's stabbed with this magical knife. They barely manage to get him to the elf land of Rivendell before he dies. He's there for weeks. They manage to pull him back.

So here he is, and it's been ten million times more scary and frightening than he ever could have imagined—more evil than he ever thought existed in the universe. But they've also shown a lot more courage than they expected. And now here they are in this elf land, which is like a deva realm. They've always heard about elves, these beautiful, good people.

Up to this point, good and bad has been really very clear. There are clear delineations. You know who's good—the elves. You know who's bad—the ring wraiths. Okay, Strider wasn't clear at first, but once you get to the elf land, you know he's good. And so they're in this deva realm. "Wow, this is amazing!" Better than they ever thought anything could be—after worse than that.

"So this is it. Now we can turn it over and this was a wonderful adventure and I see there's beauty in the world. Now we'll go back home and la la la, everything will be the same."

No way, right? No way.

It turns out that this ring—they have to figure out what to do with it. It has to be taken to the most evil, dangerous place in the whole universe to be destroyed. And who can do it? They're already fighting about it. So little Frodo realizes he has to do it. Again, he knows this is far worse than he ever thought. And he doesn't think he can do it. But no one else is stepping forward. At the same time, he still has no clue what he's signing up for. But he signs up for it. And a band of friends come to help him.

So he thought this beautiful deva realm was the end of it. That was only the beginning. Only the beginning. And then begins this whole three books' worth of a trek with the seven friends through all kinds of dangers. Gandalf, the leader, gets killed. After a while, this band of seven starts to be torn apart from within. The evil in the ring begins to infect one of the people. And Frodo realizes it's getting stronger. But he's just this scared little guy. He can't even trust this group of people anymore. He has to go alone—over to the evil land of Mordor, which is just belching smoke and evil beings. He has no clue how to get there. And he has to go by himself. His faithful friend goes with him into the land where the evil head of everything is getting ready for war. There are tens of thousands of evil orcs. And he has to walk into the middle of this without any battle skills or anything, by himself, because now he can't trust even his friends.

His one little friend goes with him. And as they're getting over and walking, walking, walking for days into worse and worse and worse, trailed by a little kind of evil being who's always trying to ingratiate himself and steal the ring—then the evil stops being just from outside. It starts to eat up Frodo from the inside. He starts not trusting his most devoted companion, who never really had any kind of badness in him. He starts to trust the evil little guy that's following them. And it starts to be that you can't tell what's good and what's bad, what's evil and what's wholesome. It all starts to reveal—as Solzhenitsyn said, Alexander Solzhenitsyn—it's not that some hearts are good and some hearts are bad, but evil and beauty is like a line that goes through all human hearts. And Frodo is finding that.

As he's getting closer and closer, he starts to realize something. First he was doing it because it seemed good and adventurous. Then he was doing it to save his world and make his world okay. Then for his friends. But as he goes on, he realizes: there's no way I'm going to live through this. It becomes so clear he's only doing it because it must be done for the benefit of all beings. He's getting more and more eaten up by the evil in the ring, but the strength of this goodness, the only thing that drives him on, is completely impersonal by this point. There's no way I can survive this. But he keeps on going, keeps on going. And it really is turning into bodhicitta there.

He goes right to the end with no clue of what could happen. And in the end, he can't do it all by himself. Even at the very end, that little seemingly evil twisted being—because that's there, it makes it possible. It bites off his finger and throws the ring, and it falls with the ring into the fire, because at the last minute, Frodo just couldn't let go of it. Just couldn't let go. But then he didn't need to, because events came together in such a way that it happened.

I love this story because if Frodo knew from the beginning where it was going—no way. No way in the world would he have taken it on. But as it goes on and on, the horror brings out a courage and a wisdom and a compassion and a love that just gets stronger and stronger and stronger, giving him the strength to be with more and more difficult things. And the motivation moves from being all about me and my happiness to just really what's for the good of beings. I didn't say it that way at the time, but it was like that. We see the same things but not in the same way.

So I want to end with a quotation from Pema Chödrön about bodhicitta, noble or awakened heart: "We awaken this bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence. You let the pain of the world touch your heart, and it turns into compassion."

So let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 62

Buddha's Advice on Becoming Free from Latent Tendencies

Carol Wilson · 1h04

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), the Buddha's discourse on abandoning the āsavas—the deep underlying tendencies of sense desire (kāmāsava), attachment to being (bhavāsava), and ignorance (avijjāsava). She frames these teachings within the context of the three vaṭṭas (rounds of saṃsāra) and how sīla, samādhi, and paññā protect us from different levels of defilement: transgression, obsessive states, and latent tendencies.
> Wilson presents the Buddha's seven practical methods for abandoning these latent tendencies: through insight (seeing clearly), restraint at the sense doors, wise use of requisites, patient endurance, wise avoidance, removing unwholesome thoughts, and developing the seven factors of awakening. She emphasizes that the key throughout is wise attention (yoniso manasikāra)—not what we attend to, but how we attend, noticing what feeds or starves the kilesas.
> The talk offers rich practical guidance for daily life and retreat practice, using vivid examples from the speaker's experience as a nun in Thailand. Wilson encourages practitioners to observe without judgment whether their attention is feeding greed, hatred, and delusion or allowing wisdom and compassion to naturally arise. The teaching emphasizes that patience, contentment, and gratitude are not obligations but powerful tools for liberation.

So as we have said in various ways this whole time, this whole week, all aspects of our path, all the different techniques and focuses of our path are really about freeing our hearts and minds from the influence, from the drive of greed, of hatred, of confusion. Wisdom and compassion naturally arise when our mind isn't so obsessed with these things, when it's not holding fast to whatever it's holding fast to—holding fast to anything.

As Joseph said last night in his talk, when we purify, when our own hearts and minds are purified or are not so enthralled to these kilesa, these torments, then wisdom and compassion are the natural expression, naturally arising. Larry Rosenberg said once—I really like him, he cracks me up—the best thing we can do for others is to develop wisdom and compassion, ease within ourselves. Then we stop bothering other people.

Tonight I want to talk about a specific sutta of the Buddha that I really like. It covers a lot of ground. The Buddha is really working with how it's not only just the focused meditation, but all aspects of our life. We can be working with how our minds are either feeding the kilesa—how the way we're relating to our experience feeds wanting and aversion—or how it starves them. And I think Guy or someone mentioned that this is a metaphor the Buddha uses a lot: feeding and starving. All aspects of life are part of our path.

There's something called the three vattas, the three rounds of samsara, or the three rounds of purification, depending on whether you want to look at it as half full or half empty. The three vattas are sila, samadhi, and paññā.

The first round is deeds or speech. When we act from kilesa, we experience the torment, the kilesa of transgression. We've actually transgressed to the point of acting or speaking in a way that brings harm to ourselves, harm to another. Sila is what protects us from the torments of transgression. Sila, which of course requires mindfulness, requires paying attention, requires good intention, requires wisdom.

When we are protected by sila, we naturally experience freedom from remorse, because remorse comes. Many people have said they've been experiencing memories of even very small, unwholesome things they said or did in the past—not even giving themselves a lot of trouble about it, but just experiencing the remorse, the sadness, the pain of that. "Oh, I didn't understand then. I could have acted better." We're free from that when we're protected by sila from the torments of transgression. And we offer others the gift of fearlessness. That's one of the lovely things here—more or less we're giving each other the gift of fearlessness.

The second level of the rounds of samsara is the obsessive kilesa, the obsessive defilements—when we're not acting on it, but just completely caught up in spinning. I don't know if you've ever had that experience of just spinning in greed or self-hatred. Take your pick from your choice of favorite ones. But "obsessive" really describes it. We're protected from that by samadhi. When the citta, the heart, is collected—and you've all experienced that too, whether you want to acknowledge it to yourselves or not—when the mind and heart is not so distracted, when the attention is more unified and collected, it's as if the obsessive quality of kilesa doesn't have room to get in. There are many, many levels of this purification, but that's one of the lovely things about a more collected, unified mind. It just feels so peaceful not to have all this stuff yammering at us all the time, not to be driven by that. So samadhi suppresses these obsessive torments.

The third level of the round of samsara is called the latent. Latent means underlying. It's not in evidence at the moment, but it could arise at any time. I don't want you to feel like Big Brother is watching you. The latent is described as the underlying potential for kilesa, for these torments of mind to arise given the proper conditions. I'm not saying this to breed fear—you know, like, "Oh my God, I'm working this hard, but at any time it could attack me from any side." But haven't you sometimes noticed this?

Actually, you notice this level more at a point like this in a retreat, when your mind is calmer and you're not as caught up in the huge stuff that was there in the beginning. People come and say, "Oh my god, I'm just seeing clinging all the time now." But it's on a much more subtle level. You walk into our favorite place, the dining room. You can be feeling quite mindful, quite present. You're not off in a train of thought. And it doesn't take much, right? Someone gets in your way, someone slops some food, someone sits in your place, someone who knows what.

And sometimes the mindfulness is strong and no reaction arises. And it's like, wow, notice that. At that point, even the latent underlying tendency wasn't functioning. Wisdom is getting stronger.

But other times, when you're just minding your own business and something happens—boom, a burst of anger so quick, or a burst of greed so quick. Someone told me years ago about their experience with this. They were really mindful and had been working with greed, and it wasn't there. They were walking past—probably at tea time—walking past the food table with no intention to take food whatsoever, very, very mindful. And then they saw, as in a dream, as they walked past the bowl of oranges, their hand reached out and took an orange. Whose hand is that, taking that orange? Just small ways.

So this underlying potential—this is where we can get discouraged. But this is seen through by paññā, by wisdom. The Buddha said that greed, hatred, and delusion at this most subtle level aren't abandoned completely through acts, but through wisely seeing.

This latent underlying level is like a seed. When the seed is there and the conditions are ripe, it can sprout. That's why so many times when you're reading the suttas and the Buddha is talking about his full awakening, he says it's cut off like a palm stump. No more can grow from it. He's kind of alluding to this—nothing else can grow.

One of the definitions of complete, full enlightenment in the Theravada system is that these āsavas are abandoned. Āsava is the word for this latent underlying potential. It's not like something is really there, sitting in you like a big ball of sludge. It's just that when the conditions are right, something could arise.

So imagine that you walk into the dining room and the most annoying thing that always makes you crazy happens, and your mind just goes, "Uh-huh, may you be happy," and keeps going. Lovely. Imagine it was always like that. That's what they're talking about. It's possible. They wouldn't tell us we could do it if we couldn't.

But we can notice it now—notice the times it doesn't arise, notice the times it does arise, with interest.

To describe these āsavas, I'll draw from Bhikkhu Bodhi, who is quite the most well-known of the current interpreters and translators from Pali to English. He has a whole series of talks on each sutta in the Majjhima Nikāya—it's a lot of talks. I've only listened up to four. And he's talking about this sutta, the three āsavas.

They're defined as three specific ones, and it's not greed, hatred, and delusion for a change. It's a little more subtle, actually. The āsavas, he says, are the three deepest, most fundamental tendencies or drives that can keep the process of saṃsāra in motion when we're not aware of them—the most likely biases of mind that arise when we're not paying attention, when we're just in robot mode.

The first is kāmāsava, sensual desire, sense desire. The second is bhavāsava—bhava meaning being—attachment to continued existence. And of course, avijjāsava, ignorance, seeing things wrongly. These three.

One interesting thing Bhikkhu Bodhi said is that you'll notice dosa, hatred, is not listed as one of the āsavas. So for all you aversive types out there, finally one little piece of hopeful news: hatred is not considered one of the qualities that binds beings to saṃsāra. He said it's not a wholesome thing, but it causes so much suffering that we see it more quickly.

So these are subtle: sense desire, bhavāsava—attachment to being—and ignorance. These are considered the three āsavas.

And again, it's not the state itself, but these tendencies, these seeds that could sprout given the right conditions—which usually include not being present, not being mindful, include a mind that's confused.

I want to mention again that there are plenty of other wholesome seeds that are also easily sprouting given the right conditions. And that's what we've been cultivating here all this time. It's not just that we're in these hopeless rounds of samsara and should forget about it. We have actually been spending a lot of time—not just here, but throughout your whole spiritual path—recognizing the wholesome, feeding the wholesome.

So you walk into the dining room, someone does something totally outrageous in your mind, and your response is, "Okay, may you be happy." That's a wholesome seed—wisdom, non-aversion, or loving-kindness sprouting. Notice that. Or you walk into a situation where normally you'd feel really self-judging, really shy and embarrassed. You walk in and there's just nothing—just calmness. That's a big deal. Notice that.

The sutta I want to talk about is called "All the Asavas." The Buddha actually lists seven different aspects that we can pay attention to. Very practical. It's nothing new, but I really like it because it points my attention in different directions, all of which function to purify our heart and mind of these habits. It's not just "get into the deepest samadhi you can and stay there." That doesn't work. It's not "stay there until you finally become an arahant." Actually, we can work with other aspects.

All of these are based in wise attention, which Sally talked about. The sutta begins: "Bhikkhus, I say that there is an exhaustion, an abandonment of taints"—that's one of the ways asavas is translated—"in one who knows and sees, not in one who does not know and see. Who knows and sees what? Wise attention and unwise attention."

This is a thread through the whole sutta. When one attends unwisely—and this is also the shorthand for wise effort—it feeds an arisen unwholesome state. The things he's going to talk about give us ways to look at that. Unwise attention can even bring unwholesome states that aren't present into existence in the moment. When we attend wisely, if there are unwholesome states present, it starves them. It doesn't increase them. And wise attention can bring more wholesome states into being without arousing unwholesome states. Actually, just stick with feeding and starving—that's easier. Don't make yourselves crazy with it.

The first category—and I'm not going to list all seven because then you'll just try and remember them, so I'll go through them one at a time—the first is asavas that are abandoned by insight. This is obvious. This is what we've been practicing here: seeing clearly the way things are.

But what I want to highlight is his description of wise attention. He says one who is unskilled in the Dhamma, undisciplined, does not understand what things are fit for attention and what things are not fit for attention. This is a really interesting concept to me, because if you don't understand this, you don't attend to the things that are fit—you attend to the things that are unfit.

What tends to happen in my mind is to think there's a list of things that are fit for attention, and a list of things that are not good to pay attention to. But it's not that, of course. It's not in the object at all. It's not inherent in any particular thing that that thing is not fit for attention. The fitness or unfitness is in the wise attention itself, the quality of attention.

This is what we've been saying all along in terms of noticing the attitude, the quality in the mind that's paying attention. And if you can't tell that directly, you can tell by the effect. If what you're paying attention to—not just in the first moment, but over a longer period of time—results in sense desire, wanting to be, and ignorance arising and getting stronger, then there's some way in how you're paying attention that constitutes unwise attention. If they lessen or don't arise, then there's some way you are paying attention that is wise attention.

The example he mentions here, which Sally used in her talk, was very much about views of existence or non-existence—this kind of thinking, which she read about.

I'll just briefly read how he attends unwisely: "Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I? How was I? Having been what, what did I become? Will I be in the future? What will I be in the future?"

You can get the drift. That doesn't seem like rocket science—it's obviously not going in a helpful direction, right? But when we're in it, it's fascinating, isn't it? "Now let me just think about this. How will I be at the end of this retreat? What's going to happen?" And how many of you have already been thinking about—whether you're leaving tomorrow or in six weeks, I don't care—"How amazing am I going to be at the end of this retreat? How can I impress people with my incredible insight?" That's on a good day, in a good moment. Bad moment, end of the retreat: "God, how am I going to hide from people? I'm worse of a mess than when I arrived. How will I ever...?" That's the same thing. Not so fit for attention, not so fit for attention.

But let me give you another way, more basic, that I personally find fascinating—not just on the level of thought, but on the level of sense experience.

Say there's a sound here in the hall. Maybe it's a ticking clock. This happened years ago at some retreat. I think the clock we had up here ticked. And some yogi was telling me for days this sound was just driving them insane, nuts, ruining their concentration, ruining their practice. The more they paid attention to how it was ruining their practice, the worse it got. They thought, "I'm being mindful of how upset I am and how this is ruining my practice." But really, the attention was unwise attention to the repugnant, the unpleasant nature of the object. Unwise because you just keep focusing: "This is so unpleasant. This is so unpleasant." And what's getting stronger? The aversion, the ill will is just getting stronger and stronger. But we think we're being mindful.

Now, sometimes we'll say turn back and notice the aversion in your mind. But sometimes that doesn't work. In this case, what worked is she just really connected to the purity of the sound itself—just hearing—just really dropped the resistance into hearing. And the whole rest of it dropped away. It was just hearing.

So sometimes you have to explore. Does giving full attention to that painful sensation feed the hindrances? And as you pay attention to the aversion in your mind, does the wise attention come back, the hindrances get starved? Or does just paying attention to the aversion ramp it up and make it stronger? And if you come right into the sensation, does the mind calm down? Sometimes you have to explore.

This very handy measure of what's being fed and what's being starved—it's not about "I'm good, I'm bad, there's a right, there's a wrong." It's very experiential. You just pay attention to what's happening, not with judgment or "I'm good" or "I'm bad"—just "let's do this, I'm paying attention to this, look what happens... whoa, maybe not so helpful."

In terms of these three āsavas, it's said that what feeds or sprouts the āsava of sense desire is attending to the gratification in sense pleasure. You get a sense of that? Not only is it pleasant—all of these have a "me" in them, right? "This is really pleasant. And I'm noticing pleasant, pleasant..."

So how come all of a sudden I want more? And I'm noticing wanting. And it feels so nice. There's nothing wrong with enjoying pleasant—which there's not. But the gratification, unwise attention to the gratification rather than just being with the pleasant. Just with the sensation itself, or with the sense of, "Wow, liking feels like this." This is subtle, but explore it.

What feeds the seed of being, of wanting continued existence, is the same attending to the gratification in what are called exalted states—the gratification in your meditative states that are really pleasant. And of course we're going to be gratified by it. We just need to really notice that.

It's actually called, in one form, the corruptions of insight. There are stages, experiences in practice that are very pleasant. The mind could be very collected, or whatever. Maybe it's choiceless or whatever—it doesn't matter what it is. But it's pleasant. The mind is pretty present. You know it's, quote, good practice, whatever the heck that means. You're noticing pleasant. But there's just that subtle, "Yeah, now finally I've hit into the good place."

We're all going to get caught in it sometimes. Don't take it personally. But start to notice it. The corruption of insight is when we don't notice it, and we can just be spinning in that for an extra period of time until it decays—which it will. And then you'll know you were caught because you're really, really bummed out. That's how you know you were caught. No problem, but we can see it sooner.

And what feeds ignorance, of course, is—they say—attending to any mundane thing, which is anything, anything that arises in the, quote, wrong way. But that's actually just when there's delusion in the mind, when we see through the upside-down perceptions, when we're perceiving anything as permanent. The stuff we've talked about: perceiving anything as me or mine, perceiving what can't give us any lasting satisfaction as being reliable, trustworthy, somewhere I can rest and find my home. And the fourth one they always say is seeing what is not lovely as being beautiful, something to hold on to.

So any time we're perceiving in this inverted way, it's both a function of ignorance, but it also feeds further ignorance. You can see these are subtle.

Attending wisely on this one is what leads to insight. It's simply this: noticing the attitude in the mind. Is there wanting? Is there aversion? Is there confusion? If you can't notice the attitude, notice what's being fed. Maybe not the first moment. I mean, if aversion is what you're noticing, and you can be aware of aversion and go, "Oh no," then aversion's getting stronger. That's wrong. But you can be with it. Be with it. And you can see it isn't really going crazy. You might see more of it, but it's not overwhelming you.

Do you know the difference? Just like I said in the beginning, as you're starting to see perhaps more and more and more clinging, and you think, "I should have less clinging after all this," but you're actually seeing much more subtle levels that we never even noticed before. And in the seeing of it, you're not being driven by it so much. The seeing, that wise attention, does actually keep the seed from sprouting. Mindfulness is absolutely our protection in this.

So that's the first one: abandoned by wise seeing, by insight.

The next four are a little more specific. None of these are news to you, but I just want to point them out. The second one is abandoned by restraining. The sutta says, "Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely..." And it always says "reflecting wisely." There's a sense that we can use a little bit of our reflective mode just to notice what we're doing. When we notice we're getting caught up in a lot more sense desire, we can kind of reflect, "Hmm, what's going on here?"

Reflecting wisely, one abides with the eye faculty restrained, and then all the faculties restrained—the nose faculty, the ear faculty. And while taints and fever of defilement might arise in one who abides with the eye faculty unrestrained, there are no taints or fever of defilement when one abides with the eye faculty restrained.

So what does restraint really mean? It doesn't mean going around blindfolded and with earplugs, not letting anything in. I have a friend who tried that once. But that's not exactly it. What it really means is mindfulness and wisdom—sati-paññā—right at the sense doors. So that when we're with seeing and we have mindfulness and wisdom at the sense door, we see seeing, we see form. When we don't have that presence, it's judgment and the whole story, that whole papañca within two seconds. With hearing, when we're right there with sati-paññā—like that woman with the ticking clock—when she was right there with mindfulness and wisdom: "Oh, hearing, unpleasant," right at the sense door. It doesn't have to go into feeding the kilesas. It doesn't have to go into all that papañca.

I want to read from the Buddha, this great sutta that perhaps many of you are familiar with, where he makes an analogy of the six sense doors. So we all know what the six sense doors are, including the mind. He makes an analogy of them to six animals that live in different domains: a snake, a crocodile, a bird, a dog, a jackal, and a monkey. Six very different animals. And he says, if you tied each of those animals with a rope, and then you took the six ropes and tied them together in the middle, so those six animals are just tied to each other in a circle—then it's wild, right?

He says these are like the six sense objects. "Monks, when those six hungry animals are all fighting against each other, when they grow weary, then whichever one was the strongest, they would all have to give way to that one. They'd be pulled along by whichever animal was the strongest, going to look for its food."

"In the same way, monks, whenever a bhikkhu, a bhikkhuni, or a layperson fails to practice and develop mindfulness of the body, the eye struggles to draw her towards attractive objects while unattractive objects are repellent to her. The nose, the ear, the tongue, the body, the mind struggles to draw him towards attractive objects of thought while unattractive objects of thought are repellent to him."

Do you get a sense of that? We're walking around, and all six sense doors are competing—which is the most attractive? Whichever one is strongest pulls us that way. Or which is the most repellent? Whichever repellent thing is strongest pushes us away, whether it's a thought, a physical sensation, or a sound. "This, monks, is lack of restraint at the sense doors." The sense doors are all just open. We go to the pleasant, we're pushed from the unpleasant, and it just pulls and pushes us around like that our whole life.

So what is restraint? "In this, seeing objects with the eye, a bhikkhu is not drawn to attractive objects and is not repelled by unattractive objects." Truly this mindfulness is this protection, this equanimity at the sense door. "He remains with firmly established mindfulness as to the body, his mind being boundless, unrestricted. He knows in truth that liberation of the heart, that liberation by wisdom."

Just being present with mindfulness and wisdom at the sense doors, not pulled toward the pleasant and repelled by the unpleasant. Present with pleasant and unpleasant, but just not this, you know—the eyes are open, "Let me see what I can see. Let me do some walking meditation," just looking all around. "Let me hear." Different from hearing, just being with hearing, but instead: "What's that? What's that bird in the distance? What's that sound? Maybe there's something... maybe I could... What's that thought? Let me examine my thoughts. Which one is the most repellent? Let me get all caught up in that."

And then he says, if instead of having the animals just looped together, you took a really stout post and tied each of the animals to the post, they'd all pull on it. And when they got tired, they'd calm down and lie down. That post is mindfulness.

Mindfulness of the body, mindfulness of the four foundations of mindfulness. Wise attention, really. So this is sense restraint.

And it's true we might make choices—not to just see if I can meet all pleasant and unpleasant objects with a calm mind, with satipañña. "I'll just open." Thich Nhat Hanh says you don't have to throw open all the windows and let in everything and try to be balanced in the middle of it. So here we do practice some restraint, but not because things are bad—rather to strengthen the satipañña, the mindfulness-wisdom, at the sense door, to learn how to do that.

We've been talking about this a lot, so I don't think I have to go into it too much more. When we don't practice this restraint, we're off in the papañca, the reaction. But one other hint I did want to give from the Buddha that I also think is interesting—on restraint, again on a subtle level. He's talking about seeing here, but it could be anything.

So on seeing attractive forms with the eye: in this scenario we don't have complete satipañña at the sense door, but we're sort of mindful. We can see—say there's a person here that you find really attractive, really beautiful, really handsome, and you keep getting drawn into looking at them. So you're sort of mindful: "Oh yes, seeing, pleasant," and you're falling into it. But you're not completely mindless.

Then the Buddha says: on seeing a form with the eye with real restraint at the sense doors, one does not, in that form, grasp at all the features, grasp at all the signs. You don't go into it so deeply.

Like an example with a beautiful person. Maybe there's some woman you think is beautiful. You go, "Okay, beautiful, falling into it." The grasping at the signs would be, "Well, look how nice the hair is. Look at the clothes. I love the way she walks. Oh, doesn't she seem dignified?" And so you're sort of present—you see what I mean?—but really getting seduced into looking at all the nice things about it. And that's sucking us in, feeding the sense desire with the details that catch our attention. Not that we hate those things, but we just come back: okay, seeing, mindfulness-wisdom right at the eye, seeing pleasant. It's contact, seeing. Like Joseph says, just not hating or pushing away, but exploring that difference between it all being out there and just wisdom-mindfulness being here. Keeping it simple really helps in terms of restraint.

As they say about Thich Nhat Hanh: don't throw all the windows open. It doesn't mean we don't appreciate the beautiful. But again, Thich Nhat Hanh has a great line where he says we can tell the difference between obsessing and getting lost in sense pleasures and appreciating what is beautiful. And what's the difference? It's back to wise attention.

He says—I think I have it here—we have to distinguish between indulging in sense pleasures and the joy and happiness that we experience when we are mindful and at peace. How to tell the difference? Attachment to sense pleasures brings about suffering and entanglement—basically what's being fed: more wanting, more desire, more discontent, both in the present and in the future. The joy and happiness of a peaceful mind brings neither suffering nor attachment in the present or in the future, for ourselves or for others.

That happiness can sometimes arise from being with a beautiful, pleasant experience. But it just doesn't have the Velcro. It doesn't lead to further wanting, further wanting to be.

So that's all I'll say about that. Oh, just this last line from Ajahn Chah: "When the nose smells an odor, let it be. Leave it at the nose." You can take that with any of the sense doors. Just let it be. That's all it is. Hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting, touching, thought. That's all it is. So that's back to that whole papañca talk. We'll have to go into that more.

Okay, the third method—and I like this very much too—in the sutta it's translated as "taints that can be abandoned by using."

But it's really attention to the attitude with which we use things—with which we use food, with which we use clothing, with which we use what supports us for a safe and comfortable life.

Here, a bhikkhu reflecting wisely uses a robe only for protection from cold, for protection from heat, for protection from contact with gadflies, flies, wind, burning and creeping things. So he's not saying you've got to go sit in an anthill. You can protect yourself. And for the purpose of concealing what disturbs conscience.

The same with alms food. And this is actually something that monks say when they are about to eat their food. Reflecting wisely, he uses alms food not for amusement or for intoxication or feeding vanity or for making yourself beautiful, but for the endurance and the continuance of this body, for ending discomfort, for assisting with the holy life, considering: thus shall I terminate old feelings—like old feelings of hunger—without arousing new feelings, new feelings of greed, and blameless shall I live in comfort and health.

Nothing wrong with eating to be comfortable. Nothing wrong with wearing clothes to protect ourselves. I live in comfort and health. The same with using a resting place for the purpose of being comfortable, for the purpose of your retreat, for the purpose of protection. The same in terms of using medicine. So these are the four requisites of an ordained person—using medicine in a way that's for the benefit of good health. It's quite sensible to be comfortable, to not have difficult feelings of hunger, of being bothered by insects, or conscience, or for good health.

For us, it's the same. We're lay people, so of course we use more things. It's not that we need to restrict ourselves to the four requisites, but to really look with wise discernment at the way we use things in our life. What's feeding greed? What's letting greed be abandoned? What's fueling more a sense of me becoming? What makes life just be more simple and a joyful flow?

I find it a really fun thing to play with—attention to the attitude with which we use things. Certainly now, I mean it's been a long time, but in terms of the whole environment. And this is not to say, "Oh, I shouldn't use things," and then the attitude with which you're using things is negativity. That's also not helpful. But to see: do I take more than I need? Not a should—that's not it—but really looking and seeing.

Here on retreat is a great place to explore it. Do I take—I think I talked about food the other time, because that's such a big hit on retreat. Just noticing. I noticed in myself the "in case" mind. Let me just take a couple extra pieces of fruit, in case. And not only do they rot back in the room, but noticing what's being fed in the mind. It's not too long before I could see it's feeding anxiety. Then every moment: should I take more? Should I take—am I going to be hungry later? Should I eat more now, even though I'm not hungry now?

When I realized I'm not hungry now, just don't eat now. So what if I'm hungry later? Big deal. I'm a little hungry—so what? It's so much more simple. It's so much more peaceful. Life is just a flow. You eat when you're hungry, and when you're not hungry, you stop.

That's one of the things in the ordained sangha—they can only go out for alms once a day and can't keep food overnight. When I was a nun in Thailand, nuns don't have the same amount of rules, and you could keep food overnight. So I had several male friends who were monks in this one monastery, and I ended up with this giant white tray with a moat around it—because ants would get in, so you have to have water all around it—with all these extra fruits and extra sweets that I could then go and offer to my friends the next day. It was a little anxiety-producing, complicating.

It's just so simple when we take what we need and let it go. We're not afraid of being a little hungry later—I'll have something to eat tomorrow. Or for me, I'm always worried when I go somewhere: am I going to be cold? Extra blankets. I go running around the place, collecting all the extra blankets. Where if I was cold, I could just go find an extra blanket.

I really don't need to go collect all the extra blankets. Maybe I don't even use them. Just notice what's being fed in the mind.

Consider the way we dress. I don't mean externally, that there's some judgment about dressing, but I remember one retreat many years ago in Australia with Sayadaw U Pandita. For some reason, the room I was in—it was some weird place—had this giant full-length mirror. Not a great idea on a retreat. And I had this one dress. I don't know why, but I really just liked it. I liked the colors in it, the flowers. It was bright. You just need something bright somehow on a retreat, or so I told myself.

And I noticed—there's nothing wrong with a dress—but every time I wore that dress, I couldn't walk past the mirror without looking at it. And then you don't just look at the dress. You look at yourself, and then the complications begin. I like it, I don't like it, how do I look, how could I get more, maybe I shouldn't wear it—on and on. Completely unnecessary.

The time I was a nun for a year, we wore white in Thailand, and I had three outfits: one to wear, one washing, and one drying. It was so great, so wonderful, just not to have to get involved in all this complexity.

I remember when I came back home, living upstairs here, and I had this image in my mind of standing with my closet door open, trying to decide what to put on that day. Like, oh my God. This is really, really complicated. It's just so much suffering, such a waste of mental energy. Obviously, I got over it, but just to experience the possibility of how burdensome it can be.

So notice that—how it complicates. Ajahn Sumedho once said that the mind states of contentment and gratitude are really supportive for awakening. This sense of restraint, of paying attention to the attitude with which we use things, seeing what's feeding greed and putting it down—not because it's bad or good, but because who needs the greed?

This leads to contentment, and contentment leads to gratitude. Instead of not having enough stuff or the right food or enough blankets, it becomes: wow, I not only have a bed to sleep in, I have a blanket, and there's heat. I'm not in a tent in the mountains of Pakistan two years after an earthquake. Just not feeding in these simple ways—it's much more powerful than just not feeding greed. It actually strengthens the wholesome, the beautiful states. It gives space for them to arise.

The next factor is called Enduring, which I like to think of as patience. "Here, a bhikkhu reflecting wisely bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, and contact with gadflies, flies, wind, burning, and creeping things." You get a sense of their life. "He endures ill-spoken, unwelcome words and bodily feelings that are painful, wracking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life."

So patience. But you'll see from the next factor, which is avoiding, that the Buddha isn't saying you must be patient with absolutely everything no matter what. It's with wise discernment. But generally, the sense of endurance, of patience—we've talked about it a lot. It's an aspect of not bringing anything extra, not bringing ill will or negativity. Just: okay, this is how it is right now. Reflecting wisely, I can be with this difficult experience without adding anything extra.

And even though I go to Pakistan in the cold winter tents, even being here on retreat, on the physical external realm, you have to put up with things that aren't the way you'd have them at home. Maybe by now you've adjusted a lot. Hopefully you're tasting a little bit of the joy that can come from simplicity, the gratitude and contentment. But still, we've had to bear with, to be patient or impatient with things—physical experiences, people not acting the way we want, not getting what we want. God knows our meditation doesn't go the way we want much of the time.

See how patience is just this willingness to be here. Not because you should, not because that's the right thing to do to be a good meditator, but because we're not feeding these underlying tendencies—the craving to become something better, the wanting of sense pleasure, the ignorance.

It's like, okay, this is how it is. Not just because I've got to get through it, but because patience is actually a way to strengthen wisdom, to cut through the habit of feeding the kilesas. It's not just, "Okay, I'll be patient until something better comes along." It's a very proactive, powerful way to strengthen wisdom. It's a big axis of practice.

I'll give examples from Asia, since I'm being a nun, because Asia's great to practice there. It's great just to have examples like this. But the point is not about war stories of what tough times we went through. That's not the point. What's energizing about it is being with the difficult experiences—and they're difficult to me because I'm not used to them. For the people who live there, they're less difficult, but they're also difficult. The Buddha's talking about gadflies and creeping things all the time.

What's energizing is learning that a situation which had been so unpleasant, so difficult, so overwhelming—when we start to meet it with patience instead of aversion, instead of trying to fix it. And that's the real American mind: "Let me just fix this. We could get rid of all this stuff." No. You run into that all the time in Burma and Thailand. I was a nun in Thailand. "Let's just do this. We could fix it. We could get rid of this." No, this is just how it is. "No, we could have better food. We could do that." This is just how it is. "Why is everyone being so obstructionist?"

But you realize, no. It's actually very powerful practice to be in the same situation a few months later and be absolutely happy with the same circumstances.

I'll just give a couple of simple examples. I was in Bangkok in the hot season. In the nun's clothes, you have like three layers—an undershirt and a long-sleeved blouse, and then another thing that goes over it. Of course, polyester, because that stays un-wrinkled, which is somehow very important. And I was in a little kuti with a tin roof. So when the sun comes up, you're baking in there. I mean, it's like an oven. And there's nowhere else to go. There's no fans. There's no electricity most of the time. You think, "Well, this could be air-conditioned." This was a very well-to-do temple. "We could have some AC in here. We could have some fans." Forget it.

I remember seeing the sun coming up in the morning and just going, "Oh. Another day." And there's nowhere else to go. Nowhere to go. Where are you going to go? Go out in the sun or into your kuti. That's it. There was nowhere. And it just wore me down. The food was making me sick.

Then I went up to the forest, and that was cooler. Then it was cold. I could kvetch about that. And on the tin roof of that forest hut—the jungle, they're incredibly loud. You think it's loud here. And this didn't even have loudspeakers like someone was talking about.

But just the sounds in the jungle, and the tokay lizards, and there are snakes all over the place, and the bugs, and the tokay is incredibly loud. And then it came to be mango season, and I had a mango tree right over my kuti. And tin, you know, very loud. And the mangoes would drop off when they were like hard little rocks. So I'd be sitting there, mindful mind, you know—WHANG! I'd jump about ten feet, you know. Mango, mango—WHANG! And that just went on sporadically. You can't time it, you know, for days.

What are you going to do? You have two choices. One of them leads to a lot of suffering. The other one is patience. This is how it is right now.

This is Ajahn Sumedho again. I would call this wise attention. He's calling it metta; I'm calling it wise attention. An attitude of not dwelling on the unpleasantness or faults of any situation, inside or outside of oneself. One is not blinding oneself with an ideal —"Oh, everything's perfect, everything's lovely." Not that. But instead, one is witnessing the unpleasant in a situation, a thing, a person, or in oneself without creating anything around it. You simply don't let the mind go into thinking, "I hate it, I don't want it." Just not creating anything around it. This is wise attention. This is patience.

And as I say, the mind truly relaxes around experience. It's not just like, "Okay, I can bear it." That's not patience. It's really this open, connected, relaxed state of heart and mind that truly accepts what's happening. And really, I came to be, in many moments, truly happy and at peace in situations that had just driven me crazy. And not just for a couple of days it drove me crazy—I'm talking a few months. And so to really see that it really is not the external situation.

And the patience—I guess what was great about practicing in Asia is that you've made the commitment, so you stay there. And to stay there, you either have to deal with the stuff or just be in an aversive snit the whole time. And so it forces us to look at this.

I just want to mention three aspects of patience on arousing bodhicitta from Patrul Rinpoche. I don't want to talk about them at length, but I would remember these three a lot when I'm on retreat. They inspire me. All of these three are to help arouse bodhicitta.

The first is patience when one is wronged—patience when wronged. In other words, not giving rise to anger.

The second is patience to bear hardships for the Dharma, which you're all doing here when you're sitting there and your butt is killing you and you say, "Let me just be with it a little longer." Patience to bear hardships for the Dharma.

The third is patience to face the profound truth without fear. That doesn't mean fear doesn't come, but it just means we're willing to gently, gently reconnect again.

Patience when wronged. Patience to bear hardships for the Dharma. Patience to face the profound truth without fear.

The next one, and this shows to me the practicality of the Buddha, is taints that can be abandoned by avoiding—by avoiding difficult, painful, unwholesome things. And this, I think, is so practical, not idealistic. I mean, the things he says to avoid are obvious, but aren't there times we can get in our practice and something is just so intense, or you're hurting your knees sitting, and you think, "No, I need to be with anything." You're having extreme pain, and there's this idea in the mind: "If I was a good practitioner, my mind just wouldn't move. It just wouldn't move, no matter how intense the pain is, no matter how much I enjoy something. Therefore, I'm not going to avoid it. I'm going to go right in."

So he says, "Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, avoids a savage elephant." Okay, he's talking about big things. A savage horse, a savage dog, a snake, a stump—

A stump, I guess, so you don't fall over it. A bramble patch, a cesspit, a sewer. Reflecting wisely, he avoids going to unsuitable places or frequenting bad companions, unwholesome companions.

And so in a way, it's sensible. The kind of idealistic thing is, "I should be the wise companion always, and I can be with whoever, and they're not going to bring me back to being more greedy or being more aversive because I'm stronger than that." Well, we're not always stronger than that. It's really noticing, without any kind of self-judgment, what's feeding the hindrances, what's starving them.

And so here, what we avoid may not be a savage elephant, but it may be a savage elephant in your mind. You know how we've said sometimes a huge emotional storm can come, and sometimes there's enough mindfulness to be with it. It's intense, almost overwhelming. But in not a really long time, you can see it doesn't go, but there's some balance. You can tell there's a little bit of mindfulness in it—maybe not a lot, but a little. But then there are other times when it's so strong you're just completely swept away, can't be present. It's just getting stronger and stronger and stronger—the fear, the aversion, the grief, whatever. And we'll say, back off. You need to turn the attention elsewhere. This is really helpful and supportive. That's what the Buddha is saying. Not just to think, "I should be able to be with anything." No. What's helpful?

The energy of the fear is so much stronger than the energy of mindfulness. Then redirect the attention to something that can help balance, that doesn't keep feeding the fear. That's unwise attention at that point. You keep paying attention to the fear, and it's getting worse and worse and worse, and then everything looks dreadful, and you're afraid to step outside, and you're afraid to open your door, and you're afraid—wait a minute, I need to redirect my attention. This isn't wise attention here. And that's what the Buddha is really saying.

And sure, we make choices too here. We've avoided in the way we set this place up. We're not in the middle of Times Square. We don't have TVs playing like they do in the airport, CNN news running twenty-four-seven. In fact, we go to great pains to keep you from finding out anything that's going on, to support the practice. We're avoiding. We're not saying you should be able to do this anywhere, anytime, and if you can't, it's just because you're too weak. No, we're saying, what supports our wise attention here?

So we don't have super comfortable accommodation, but it's comfortable enough. We don't have incredibly rich gourmet food, but we have really good food—almost on the edge of too good, almost on the edge of feeding greed too much. So wise avoidance. We're not saying, why don't you go out shopping when you're feeling a little bored? I think it's good we're in Barre. If you've gone shopping, you know. Once will do it. You have to be in a really bad way to think of something in Barre that you really want. You can do it, but...

I mean, I've whipped up things, even not on retreat. I make it up in my mind. "Oh, I remember that aisle in the supermarket, that row that has this thing." I did that the other day. I completely made it up. The supermarket didn't have that thing. It never had had that thing. It didn't even have that whole category of things I was looking for, which was cake pans. I envisioned the whole row in my mind. Driving around like an idiot looking for this stuff. So save yourself. You don't need to do it.

Wise avoidance really supports our practice.

The last practice—well, there are two more, but I'll tell you that the seventh one I'm not going to discuss because it involves developing the seven factors of awakening, and Guy has fortuitously talked about that already. That's the seventh one that, of course, cultivates wise attention. When the seven factors of awakening are developed completely, we are awakened. That's why they're called the seven factors of awakening.

So the sixth one is called removing. The way the Buddha describes it is: "Reflecting wisely, a bhikkhu does not endure an arisen thought affected by sensual desire, by ill will, by cruelty. He abandons it."

This points to a very important sutta called "Two Types of Thought," which is really fascinating to me. It's one we use a lot, where the Buddha is talking about before he was the Buddha, when he was still practicing—speaking about his own early practice.

He said, "What if, while doing walking meditation, I divide my thinking into two types?" One type is thinking that leads to his own affliction—thinking colored by sense desire, by ill will, by cruelty. The other type is the opposite: wise thought, where sense desire transforms to renunciation, to non-greed; ill will changes to non-ill will or mettā; cruelty changes to compassion.

But what's interesting is how he describes working with this. He didn't set up these two categories and then say, "Okay, this is good, this is bad. It should be like that. I hate myself whenever these bad ones come." He walked, and with this interest, with this wise attention I've been talking about, he said, "Let me just notice what happens." This is where, if we can simply notice, we see for ourselves that the abandonment of the unwholesome ones comes naturally from wisdom, because they cause us suffering.

So he said, "Let me notice. As I remain heedful, thinking filled with sensuality arose. And I noticed: thinking filled with sensuality, sense desire, has arisen in me." Noticing how it behaves, he said, "I noticed that it leads to my own affliction, to the affliction of others. It obstructs discernment. It obstructs clear seeing. It promotes vexation. It doesn't lead to freedom. And as I noticed that it leads to my own affliction, it subsided."

He didn't say, "I took out the whip and hated myself." As he was noticing it leads to affliction, it subsided. As he noticed that it leads to the affliction of others, that it obstructs discernment, promotes vexation—it subsided. And whenever thinking imbued with sensuality had arisen, he would look at it this way with wise attention and abandon it.

Sometimes it just goes by itself. And sometimes, as we've seen more clearly with certain types of thought—ill will thoughts, cruel thoughts—we know we can't abandon them by trying to get rid of them with aversion. That's not looking in the same way. But when we just look and see, "Oh, when I follow this thought, this is what happens," and we see that clearly without negativity, without taking it personally, we can bring in a quality of resolution. In common parlance: I don't need to go there.

I experienced this very clearly quite some years ago when I first developed a condition—it's actually the reason I sit like this—that affects my joints. When it was first happening, people didn't know what it was, and I was getting much more ill, much less able to move than I am now. Of course there was all the fear: "What about the future?" I was seeing doctors all the time, and they were always offering their wonderful ideas about what horrible thing it could be.

I could notice, because this went on for some months. I really saw what was happening in my mind. I remember one time going down to try and clean the bathtub. It was really hard to get up and down, really hard to stretch like that, and my mind went, "Oh my God," with this fear. "I'm never going to be able to take a walk. I'm never going to be able to do this. I'm never going to..."

And I saw my mind start, and I just thought—I saw so clearly, and I was so grateful for the Dhamma, for mindfulness, for the capacity to watch thoughts. I saw those thoughts, and I said, "You know what? One, who knows? And two, I don't need to go there. I really don't need to go there. Just come back and feel the arm moving on the tub. It's a little stiff. It's a little sore. And that's all that's happening."

And I really could do that over and over. It was amazing freedom—not feeding the fear, not feeding the aversion, not feeding the wanting for something to be different. And it wasn't the whip. It wasn't "you're so bad." It's wisdom.

You all have that ability, when we look and just see what's feeding these āsavas, what's starving them.

I think this is just a really helpful tool—feeding and starving, not taking it personally, whether we're on retreat or whether we're in our daily life.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 63

Trusting Awareness or Yathābhūta (Reprise)

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson invites us to examine what it truly means to trust awareness as our refuge rather than our habitual patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion. She explores the Pāli term yathābhūta ñāṇadassana—often translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they really are"—offering a more nuanced understanding: recognizing things as they have come to be in this moment. This subtle shift reveals the radical nature of present-moment awareness and its transformative potential.
> Wilson illuminates how the three kilesas—lobha (greed), dosa (aversion), and moha (delusion)—function as "makers of measurement," constricting our hearts and coloring our perception. Through vivid examples, from the sound of someone swallowing in the meditation hall to a hunting dog enslaved by its nose, she demonstrates how these habits of mind narrow our world and lead us away from accurate recognition. She emphasizes that awareness itself is never damaged or exhausted by difficult experiences—it can be present with anything.
> The talk offers practical guidance for shifting our refuge from habitual reactivity to steady, non-judgmental awareness. Wilson shares Ajahn Sumedho's phrase "awareness is the point that includes" and suggests a gentle "Tai Chi move" of meeting experience with curiosity: "Oh, this is like this." Drawing on Dīpā Mā's teaching that freedom brings freshness to every moment, Wilson reminds us that this practice of purifying the heart is not separate from life in the world—it is essential for how we meet ourselves and others with wisdom and compassion.

In the way that we have been presenting the formal practice, it's quite obvious that the central factor, the essence, is really awareness or mindfulness. So I want to talk a little bit about that—really the radical nature of trusting, truly trusting awareness, mindfulness. Basically, shifting our refuge from our normal habits of mind, including in the meditation, to really trust the transformative power of steady awareness.

We go on about awareness, and it's not a thing. It's not some state we're trying to get to and stay at. It's really an activity, moment to moment. And that's all there is—moment to moment. I love that. Whenever you find yourself trying to create a state of mind, and somewhere in the back there's the unspoken belief that then it'll be like that forever—no, impossible. But also, what's great about it is when you find your mind filled with self-judging, or you see how much greed is coming up, or you say, "Oh, I'm hopeless, I'll never be concentrated," whatever your deal is—it's only this moment. No matter how unbearable it is, it's only this moment. That's amazing.

So when we try to think about what the potential of freedom from craving might be, you don't have to jump to the arhat never experiencing it again. Try opening to the possibility of a moment right now of pure awareness, total presence that's free from craving. It's totally within all of our experiences, many times a day. We tend to overlook it because it's quieter than the obnoxious habits that we tend to put our trust in.

This awareness that's a moment-to-moment activity—it's like it's so nothing, right? We do overlook it. And so often, the tendency is to have in the background a sense that when we talk about this total non-judging presence, accepting what's arising in the moment, there's a quality of passivity, of non-doing, that has a little bit of a negative connotation. How can this nothing that's completely non-interfering transform anything? How can we trust that?

One thing that I love about the Buddha's teaching, the way he talked about what really frees our heart and mind and what liberation is—as Andrea was saying last night—it's not about adopting a new, an old, or any set of beliefs. It's very simple and elegant. Yes, there are dense, endless books, and it can be extremely dense and complicated too. But the way I like to look at it—and maybe just because I'm too simple—is that the essence, the heart of freedom, begins and ends with right view.

Right view—sometimes we say wise understanding, but right view. As Joseph was saying the other day, he was giving a talk somewhere and talking about right view, and somebody asked about wise understanding. He said, "Let me just be obnoxious for a minute. I didn't say wise understanding. I said right view." I love that because I think, for me, it's very literal.

When the Buddha is talking about what's so simple, what's so elegant, what frees—in a moment and more and more—our heart and mind from the habits of believing the stories, of clinging, of aversion, of me, me, me, me, me, what frees us in a moment from believing that is accurate recognition of things as they are. The freedom of the Buddha isn't about getting to another world. It's about waking up into this one, actually recognizing what the heck is going on in our mind, in our body, instead of just making it all up because we don't recognize accurately.

So right view, the beginning and end of the path—it's so beautiful. What frees our heart from clinging in a moment is recognizing accurately the way things are. And when we recognize that, clinging doesn't make any sense, because it doesn't work. Clinging to what?

Recognizing the self and the world as it is in any moment—how we recognize an experience, how we think about it, how we respond. It's obvious, very simple, how seeing accurately can change that.

Here's a very simple example: a sound occurring in the hall. A similar sound arises over and over at irregular but steady intervals, and you hate it. Then the sound comes. It's unpleasant. You may or may not recognize the unpleasant. But it's a human sound, which always bugs us more than if it was just some random external sound. So we can be aware there's a sound, there's the annoyance—we can be aware of the annoyance or not. But basically, we're really buying into the belief that sound should not be happening. Doesn't that person know better? Or even if they're coughing or burping or swallowing—which, by the way, at some point everyone starts going crazy with their swallowing. Just do it now and get it over with. Don't worry about it. You swallow, we're all swallowing. It's okay.

But you see what I mean when there's that sense of "the sound is really bothering me, it's messing up my concentration, they shouldn't be doing it." Or even if I can think, "They can't help it, but it's messing up my concentration. It's messing up my practice. How can I..." You know the whole deal.

That leads to—that's already action, the action of thinking about it. What to do? Should I move? Should I write a note? Should I leave them one of those metta notes on their cushion? Should I write a note to the manager? Should I complain to my teacher? Should I beat myself up for not being compassionate? Should I sit in my room from now on? And then it takes up your whole day.

You get a sense that we're really taking refuge in, believing the story about how it's messing up my concentration—as if my concentration mattered in the first place, as if that's what it's about. That it's that sound, that that person can't help it, and on and on and on. That's such a simple example. Multiply that by how many sense experiences do we have in a normal day. Multiply that by everybody in the normal world not even stopping to look at their minds. I mean, it's amazing the world isn't in worse shape than it is. It would be possible to get in worse shape than it is. It's amazing it's not.

Recognizing accurately—this is the power of simple mindfulness. I know it can drive people crazy. They come in with whatever story and I go, "Okay, so are you just noticing hearing?" "That doesn't help." "Are you noticing irritation?" "Yes, I'm really aware there's irritation." Yes, we know you're aware. Are you really aware? Aware means not owning, not judging, not hating, not clinging—just noticing. Irritation is like this.

You think, "Yeah, thank you very much. I came here for that." But you try it, because ultimately you've tried everything else that's socially acceptable. So you're sitting here, there's 35 more minutes, try the damn mindfulness—or run out screaming. You just bring awareness to hearing. Just hearing. You come to: "Ah, that's a sound. Oh, that thought—they shouldn't be doing that. Ah, it's irritation." It doesn't necessarily change that pattern, but it takes all the heat out of it because you're seeing accurately. Just this series of things.

And then what often can happen, through just being with the experience without jumping over to the story, is an even more accurate recognition of something you couldn't see before. Say, for example, if it's about another person—suddenly, "Oh, that must be really uncomfortable for them, whatever it is that's going on." Say they have a cold and they're sniffing. "Oh. That must be really uncomfortable." And compassion just naturally arises. Not because it should, because then you'd be a better person. It's just the actual understanding, which isn't accessible when we're lost in the reactivity. It comes by itself. It's not "I should sit here, I should look, I should get to how can I be compassionate—metta, metta, metta." Sometimes that works, but that's not what I'm talking about. Just being with what is. It's like, "Oh, okay, it's not a problem."

Very simple, but this goes on all the time. This recognizing accurately affects the way we think about something, the stories we tell, the views we have, the actions we take here and in the world.

There's a phrase in Pali—it's one of the lists of different kinds of insights with different names. There's one level that's called yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa-dassana, which is a pretty so-called powerful level of insight. It's often translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they really are." Ñāṇa-dassana means knowledge and vision; yathā-bhūta is often translated as "things as they really are." But as Gil Fronsdal pointed out to me—he's quite a Pali scholar—a more accurate translation of yathā-bhūta would be "things as they have come to be in this moment."

I'm adding "in this moment" to that translation. And I think that is so perfect. Yatā bhūta—things as they have come to be in this moment. Recognizing that it's only for this moment, that it's nothing we can hold on to. Now I know—just in this moment. This requires a total open-hearted presence, free from agenda, assumption, liking, disliking, or "what does it mean about me?" It's that recognition of things as they have come to be in this moment.

This phrase gives us a sense of the complexity of all the causes and conditions that come together to create this moment just as it is. It can't be any other way. And the next moment, the causes have changed and it's different already. This ineffable, unholdable essence—things as they have come to be in this moment. Recognizing that in a moment is the doorway to freedom in that moment. Because there's nothing to hold, and you can't even label "things as they have come to be in this moment."

What causes and conditions had to come together for you to be sitting here? If you start calling all of them up, you'll never come to an end. You can start with your health. You can start with having the financial resources, the family that supported you, the fact that there is a center here, the fact that you have an interest, the fact that we're not at war in this moment, in this place, in this country. The fact that thirty-five years ago people went to India and came back and someone donated money to open this place. The fact that you've had enough to eat for most of your life. The fact that farmers were growing the food. It goes on and on forever.

How do we think we can somehow control and hold on to all of this? And why on earth do we think—which we do—that it's all about me in this moment, when me sitting here is the momentary, constantly changing result of everything coming together?

I just love this: yatā bhūta ñāna dassana—knowledge, recognizing things as they have come to be accurately, just for this moment—is the really elegant doorway the Buddha talks about into freedom.

And so in this particular way of practice, we're emphasizing the awareness, the steadiness of cultivating this mindfulness, this awareness—whether it's precise, whether it's broad—that allows by itself for many, many moments of recognizing yatā bhūta. We don't have to figure it out in advance. You can't. And that's what's so crazy: we try to think, "How will we get it so the next moment's clearer? How can we control this moment so we know how it'll be in the next moment or the next sitting or the next day?" And anything can happen in any moment. So our only real viable option, if we could trust it, is to just surrender into total presence without resistance, without clinging. Easier said than done, I know—to just being here right now. So that's what we're practicing, because it is easier said than done.

The Buddha often would talk about this, and the suttas say: this is dhamma, visible here and now. As André said last Sunday when he quoted the invitation, "You too, come and see this dhamma, visible here and now." At one point the Buddha asked, "To what extent is this dhamma visible here and now?" And he answered: to the extent that greed, that hatred—which includes aversion, resistance, fear, sadness, all the negativity—and delusion, confusion, are not present in the mind-heart, in the citta, in a moment, are not coloring the mind that's noticing what's happening.

I want to talk a little about these three—not so we hate them, but so we recognize them. Because really, our bhāvanā practice, the meditation practice, is about the work of the mind. It's to really learn to recognize accurately how the mind is working. It's to learn to recognize how we recognize yatā bhūta, and how we can know when we're not. How we can know when our judgment, when our citta—that moment of consciousness that comes together with whatever mental factors are present—when that citta is colored by wanting, colored by aversion, colored by confusion or delusion, and there's not recognition of that—that's when we don't recognize accurately.

But in the moment we recognize, for example, "Here's craving"—that's a moment of recognizing accurately again. Craving simply becomes the next object of recognition. So it's about learning to get interested in exploring this.

The Buddha talks about this all the time. I know you're all familiar with these, but just to remind us very simply: wanting, clinging, desire, aversion, hatred, fear, confusion, delusion, "me, me, me"—the recognition is all we need to do. But when we don't recognize, these are such deeply ingrained habits that arise so naturally and spontaneously in our minds, in our hearts, in response to any sense perception, any sense contact. They're so familiar that we often don't recognize them, because it's just... familiar. We think, "Yeah, it is right—that person is making a noise and that noise is messing up my meditation, and that is the problem in this sitting. Anyone would agree with that."

So it's really learning to see where the suffering is. Because suffering begins, arises, in our heart and mind in a moment. It's abandoned, it vanishes, in our heart and mind in a moment. I love that. I keep emphasizing "in that moment" because it makes it all workable. You don't have to do it forever. This moment—it's workable.

So learning how these habits obscure our clarity. The Buddha also said that greed, hatred, and confusion—or delusion—are makers of measurement. Makers of measurement in our heart, in our mind. And you can actually feel that: the kind of constriction, the limitation of our heart, the sense of me and other, distance and separation and neediness. That arises when we're taking refuge in greed, hatred, and confusion, when we're believing in them.

So just very simply, when there's wanting in the mind and we don't notice it—or we notice it but we're believing it—this is how it turns all our attention outwards towards the thing wanted.

My brother used to have a hunting hound dog, a very sweet dog. But these dogs are bred so that their sense of smell is incredibly sensitive. And this poor dog, he was like a slave to his nose, to smelling. He would come into the house every time and we would have to hide all the wastebaskets, all the garbage cans. Whenever I would go to visit, I would have to zip up my suitcase because anything that had anything to do with food, or had any scent of human being or animal on it—like if you had a dirty shirt—he would smell it. He couldn't keep his nose out. He'd go in the room, go in the suitcase, go through everything, pull out that dirty shirt because it had animal smell on it.

He would come in the house and just couldn't go lie down. He had to follow his nose around. The poor dog. He'd go outside and have to run around the whole yard smelling everywhere an animal had been. And it just seems to me like a great image for craving. The next thing, the next thing, the next thing. It's going to do it. It's going to satisfy. And it never ends. Then he'd just flop down exhausted and sleep for about ten hours. I never saw a dog sleep so much. Usually dogs are up early, but this dog was sleeping late. Nine in the morning, you're like, come on, get up and go for a walk.

So I'm joking, but you see how it does this to us. We're looking outward, going to the next thing. And when this thing doesn't satisfy, craving has this seductive promise: oh, but the next one will.

In fact, I was talking to someone the other day about how you can even, by not noticing the craving, think that the craving itself is a kind of pleasure. The Buddha says in one of the places where he's talking about the second noble truth—as Andrea mentioned, the cause of suffering is taṇhā, often translated as craving, though closer to thirst—he says, "craving accompanied by delight, searching now here and now there." And that's what we do. Oh yeah, wanting—how great. What's our problem?

But then some daydream comes up and you say, oh, that would be so nice if I could go do that. I'll plan it. And then you spend about twenty minutes cultivating craving, cultivating wanting, really thinking you're having a nice time. Then you wake up and here you are sitting on your pillow. There's twenty more minutes. There's peanut butter and rice cakes for tea. What good did that do you? Oh, but it was so nice. It was so pleasant.

That's taking refuge in craving. We do. I could go into much more, but I just want to touch on these briefly.

Dosa — aversion.* Dosa is the Pali word that covers aversion, fear, resistance, all of those states. I like to use dosa personally rather than the specifics because it gives the breadth of it, but it also helps me not go into the specific stories. I really find that helpful if the dosa* you're getting caught in is a kind of self-judgment or self-worthlessness. Because otherwise you go, "Self-worthless, judging. I'm judging again. Can I stop judging? Oh, that's so aversive. It's hopeless. I'm so aversive."

Just dosa in the mind. It's not all about you. You're not the only person here with dosa arising in the mind. It's the human condition. Just as craving comes up, so does aversion.

In the same way, when aversion, when resistance or fear is present in the citta, in the mind, as a response to an immediate experience happening here and now, and we don't recognize it — we're seeing through it again — it shrinks our world.

Take that unpleasant sound in the hall. Doesn't it seem like some little nothing when you're not really caught up in it? But when you're married to that sound with aversion, doesn't it just take over the world? It's so loud.

The swallowing thing — it can happen where you start noticing your swallowing. "My God, everybody in the hall is hearing me swallow. It's humiliating." I'm really not making this up. This happens to almost everyone.

I remember one time years ago I was sitting here. I'd been living here. I knew this place. Somehow I got into this sensitive space, and the radiators used to make this popping sound. It just got so loud. I felt like it was machine gun fire going on. It was unbearable. And I was convinced — it leads to action — I was convinced there was something really wrong. The maintenance guys, I knew them. They're very different ones from now. I knew them. I knew they didn't know what to do. Even if something went wrong, they wouldn't know how to fix it.

So I was really running around — don't you do this — I was running around down in the boiler room, trying to see what was wrong with the furnaces because they were making this unbearable sound that was taking over the world. It was no different from how it had always been for five years. It was just my mind.

But aversion takes over and it limits everything. That became my whole experience — how to fix this sound. Enormous suffering.

I'm making silly examples, but you can extrapolate, right?

Or the example Thich Nhat Hanh always gives, which I love: if you have a rough tooth or a tooth that hurts, can you keep your tongue away from it? How much have you been trying? Oh, God. And all the thoughts. What about all your other teeth? Do you notice them?

They don't hurt. They're fine. No. Before it was rough, did you notice them? No. But now this tooth has taken over the world. That's what we do. That's what happens when we don't see.

Aversion in the mind shrinks the consciousness, narrows it, and leads us to actions not based on yathā bhūta—things as they are. Recognizing things as they are doesn't necessarily mean the aversion or the clinging goes away. It means recognizing that's what's happening. "Ah, this is aversion." Being able to hear the sound of the radio. "Oh, it sounds really unpleasant. I don't like it. Here's this thought." That's all happening. Fine. Awareness can be with all of that. That's the radical nature of awareness. We're not saying it has to change everything. We're saying it's able to include, to be totally present with anything. Just letting it be like it is, but with total presence. And total presence doesn't mean, "If I do this for a minute, then it'll get better." It just means yathā bhūta—things that have come to be in this moment is the place, the only place, that suffering arises and that freedom is recognizable. It's the only place. As long as we're resisting or limiting or looking to some other moment, then that's the one thing we can't recognize—how things actually have come to be now. Where's the suffering? Where's the freedom? It's only right here, right now.

And the third hindrance is delusion, confusion, which is of course often harder to recognize because—well, that's its nature. But the obvious aspect of delusion is when you just don't have a clue what's going on. And that, okay, that's great. At least we wake up from that daydream of twenty minutes and think, "Oh yeah, right, I wasn't aware at all." And now I am—appreciating that moment of awareness.

But the underneath, the more pervasive—I don't want to say it's subtle; it's not really subtle—the most pervasive refuge, the most pervasive entrancement of this area of delusion, is the sense of it being all about me. The sense of ownership. The sense of either "this is me," "this is mine," "what does it mean about me"—this sense of measurement.

Sogyal Rinpoche gave a great example. He said in Tibet, when they're setting out the footprint, the foundation to build a house, they just start from a point in the middle and they have a rope to make the diameter. So they just stretch the rope in all directions from that center point. And he said—I don't know if this makes sense, but I like it—he said the sense of me is like that. Everything begins from that, not an idea, but from that felt sense of me now. And then everything is kind of related back to that or out from that or compared to that. Not everything, but many things.

So for example, James or someone gave the simple example of dropping a fork in the dining room and it makes a clatter. It doesn't immediately trigger, "What does that say about me? Everybody's going to be looking at me." You know, just fork, whatever. But often—me.

Or Joseph has a great story, which I'm sure he wouldn't mind my telling since he tells it, where he was in line on retreat, waiting for a meal, like the second person in line. A lot of people had lined up. And the first person reached for one of those big pots, lifted the lid off, and dropped it—just made a heck of a racket all over the floor.

You can imagine, right, with everyone just standing there bored, waiting for the meal. I know you're really aware doing standing meditation, but maybe there's a little expectation. And Joseph said his first thought when he heard this clanging noise was, "It wasn't me."

This sense of self is our most pervasive experience, the most familiar, the most—well, we don't question it because, obviously, it's about me. I mean, if we followed it through thinking-wise, we wouldn't really say that, but we don't. So it feels so real that we may not recognize that it's there, and we see everything through it.

Back to sitting there: there's that noise, it's wrecking my concentration. Do you see how that relationship to "me" and "my concentration" works? How I feel about the noise, about the concentration, some idea I have of how it should be compared to the past, compared to the future—but it's basically all about me getting something I want. All the time. Not all the time. Much of the time.

This sense of me-ness can be noticed just like anything else. It's not something to hate. It's something to recognize, to get interested in, to notice how when that's in the citta, in the moment of recognition—and we don't recognize it—there'll be maybe not huge recognizable suffering, but some little sense of it being a little bit off. Sometimes it's big, noticeable suffering, but sometimes it's just a little bit off, because it's a maker of limitation, a maker of separation.

And so it's very important to recognize in our practice that these are habits of all of our hearts and minds that we've practiced a lot. It's not personal. The sense of me-ness is not personal. It's just a habit of mind in response to all the six sense door contacts happening over and over—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, sensations in the body, moods, emotions.

We spend, as Tejaniya was saying—it's so obvious—all day long, on or off retreat, it doesn't matter, it's the same mind. These sixth sense experiences are happening every second. There's a seeing, a hearing, a smelling, a tasting, a thought, a mood, an emotion, over and over and over and over. And when there's not quite awareness, when we're just going through our daily life, the habit that is so familiar, that we take such refuge in, is simply: I like this, I don't like that. We may not even say that, but it's pleasant or unpleasant. Oh yeah, this is good. This isn't good. That's not worth paying attention to. This is good. This is not worth paying attention to. Over and over and over.

And then from that, we think, we make up our stories, and we act. So it's incredibly familiar. It feels so normal that sometimes—say, for example, when it's not present—we think, "But this is weird. What's wrong?" Like Andrea's story last night about "Where's the anger? Where's the anger?" This is unfamiliar. This is too weird. She didn't say that—she was happy there was no anger, it sounded like. But we go, "Oh, where's the self-judgment? There must be something wrong. Where's that sense of me? Oh my God, how can I function without a sense of me?" And it came back pretty quick, didn't it? God forbid it should not be there for very long.

So all day long. But it's not personal. It's just nature. And that's really important to remember, to hold in your heart and your memory, because we want to explore when these are present—when we see aversion coming up a lot and going away a lot, when we see wanting and desire coming up. If we're interested in seeing how it's working: "Oh, that's desire. It feels like this." Notice the thoughts. Notice how it narrows the mind. Get interested in all of that. That's the scientific experiment.

How has it come to be in this moment? Desire is just another condition that's arising, yathabhuta, as it's come to be in this moment. We don't need to be afraid of it. We can explore it. We can bring full attention to wanting, to aversion, to self-judgment, to just that sense of me. None of it's personal. And it's not that we want to bring aversion to these habits. That's just doing the same thing. And isn't that what we do? "Oh yes, these are bad."

So it's really about purifying the mind. And then the next time you go out of here you think, "Oh my God, purifying the mind—all I see is greed and aversion. And since I've come here, I only see more. It's hopeless. It's hopeless. So I'm going to do some really strong concentration practice so I can get rid of this greed and aversion." That's the same habit, right? I trust you recognize that that's the same habit of mind. That's how we know how to act.

That's why working with effort is so delicate, so tricky. Because we can put in enormous effort to achieve some state, to get concentrated, to be mindful every moment, to walk slow, to do whatever—and if that effort is being fed moment to moment by "by gum, I'm going to get rid of this," it's the same old thing. Practicing for fulfillment of me. Practicing to get rid of the unpleasant and get more pleasant. That's what we've learned as the way to peace. But it isn't the way to peace. And yet it's so deep in there.

The way to peace is that yathabhuta ñāṇadassana—recognizing accurately things as they have come to be in this moment, with total presence and interest, and not even wanting wisdom out of it. Just that willingness, that radical trust in moment-to-moment awareness, no matter what's arising. Because awareness doesn't care. Awareness isn't stained or damaged or tired out or exhausted. "Oh, there's so much difficult stuff coming up, so the awareness is going to get too frayed at the edges. I need to give it a break." We might get frayed at the edges—that's true. It may be that the energy of awareness isn't strong enough and we're getting lost in the fear or the aversion. Sure, that can happen, because that's our habit.

And when we recognize that, that's when we talk about using skillful means to back out a little bit. If you're forcing the sitting, go and do some walking. Go outside and open up the senses. But it's not the awareness that is having a problem. It's that these habits of mind—of wanting, of aversion, of "it's all about me"—have just gotten really strong again. And that's nature. That's natural. That's going to happen.

What we really keep learning to trust is that at some point, at any point, the awareness comes back again. It doesn't matter if you're sitting, if you're walking, if you're going to the toilet, if you're taking a walk outside. At any moment, just that willingness to radically trust awareness. "Okay, I can't be aware now. I'm so distraught. I'm so distressed. I'm walking up and down. I'll go walk in the woods. I'll do whatever." You're doing that—and there's a smidgen of awareness still there, you know, moment to moment. You're not just hanging it up, getting in your car, and going home. There's a smidgen of awareness, and that's enough. All of a sudden you feel your feet. "Oh, okay, that's what's happening." All of a sudden you realize, "I'm completely lost in this story." But that's awareness.

Completely lost in this story, and I recognize I'm completely lost in this story—that's awareness. Anything awareness can notice.

What we're doing here really, what I hope I'm talking about anyway, is learning to shift where we go for refuge. Learning to shift what we trust, consciously. And it's radical. It's really hard—and for me too, often—to trust awareness.

Sometimes it's not so hard for me now when it's something really difficult, because I know there's no other way out. The more I think about it and worry and try to fix it, the worse it gets. But if I'm really in grief or really upset, okay, just be with it. Just totally be with it. I know that's fine.

Where it's harder for me now to trust awareness is when it's just like, "Oh, la la, thinking about this." I'm walking up and down, I'm thinking, "Oh, it's a la la la." No, that can't be awareness. Awareness means it's sharp. It's clear. It's quiet. It's connected. Awareness can't be awareness with not a lot of energy. There can't be awareness if the mind is cloudy. How could there possibly be awareness if you're sleepy? There could only be awareness if I'm really focused and concentrated.

Awareness is so much more pliable, available, all-inclusive than that. So if you ever find your mind in any way saying awareness can't be here—as soon as you have that thought, there's awareness. It doesn't have to change what's happening. And that's the thing. That's the radical trust. It brings us more into what's happening. We may not like to be more into what's happening, so then we jump back off on the aversion train.

But really, the shift of refuges—it gets to be more and more reliable. Fulfilling is not exactly the right word, but it's the closest word I can come to. Like I said, when I'm in a lot of grief or sadness or sorrow and the mind's doing its thinking, I know: just totally feel it. Sorrow's like this. Thoughts are like this. These are the situations in the world, not going to change. It's totally okay. It's still sad, and the situation's still what it is, and it can't be changed, and my body's doing what it's doing.

Awareness doesn't necessarily change what's happening, but it lets us be fully present with what's happening, and the suffering is gone. The unpleasantness might not be gone, but the suffering of the mind that's in contention with reality is gone. And that's a peace that's very different from pleasant experience. It can be pleasant—you can be fully present just as much with joy as with sorrow. But it's not dependent on pleasant or unpleasant, or liking or disliking it. It certainly doesn't have to mean anything about me.

So what we're doing here is practicing moment after moment after moment, just learning to recognize this simple mindfulness, this simple awareness—to recognize it, learn to trust it, learn to surrender into it.

The kilesas—kilesas is the Pali word for these so-called greed, hatred, confusion, these obstructions of clear seeing of heart and mind—the kilesas are a lot louder than awareness. We're more used to them, but they also call for attention. They're clanging and banging and carrying on. Awareness is just kind of, "Oh yeah, clanging and banging and carrying on. That's fine."

You're probably thinking, "So what? What is that?" The shift from all the energy and attention that goes into the object, that goes into trying to fix everything—and even our mood can be the object—the interest, the attention, the identification (that's not the right word, but it feels like that)—shifts into just being the awareness. And whatever's going on, after a while the awareness just gets so much more interesting in that moment than what's happening.

And this isn't just a meditation and retreat thing.

This is really in our life. Ajahn Sumedho used to like to say, "Awareness is the point that includes." Point, because it's just right now, just right here, an arising experience right now, not a thing. But it includes everything right now without preference, without being stained or harmed or damaged in any way.

So it's really quite radical. It's really quite radical, learning to trust this. How can the steadiness of awareness be so transformative? How can it lead to wisdom? It seems so nebulous. I'm saying, okay, the kilesas are clanging and banging, and you just be aware—clanging and banging. It's like, okay, so what good does that do?

But I think Andrea's story last night about the anger is a really great and very accessible example. When she talked about the first anger and the thought, "Okay, maybe I can just pay attention to the anger rather than going with it"—that was a kind of awareness that had no conceptual overlay. She didn't have a lot of experience, so she wasn't trying to make the awareness be a certain way. She didn't have some idea of what's going to happen if she paid attention. She was like, "I give up. There's nothing else to do. So let's just be with the anger."

That quality of simplicity, of innocence you could say, beginner's mind—just to begin to see that anger, dosa, is taking over. Same for greed, same for "me, me, me"—it's a quality arising in the mind at that moment. It isn't everything. Awareness can notice that too. So that makes it simply another arising mental experience, another thing that can be recognized. And that's very different from the sense of "this is who I am."

So just the noticing—she said, "Oh, okay, well, that's different." And then she didn't even know how it happened, but suddenly she could go back to work on the computer. The energy going into the awareness—often, the energy comes out of the kilesa at that moment. Not always. If you do it wanting that to happen, it doesn't work. Like we say, it knows. But really, it's because it's not mindfulness. It's not pure awareness. The citta is not pure. The awareness is colored with wanting. "I'll be aware so that..." Oh, that's wanting. It isn't bad. We just want to turn around and recognize what's actually happening. That's all. What's actually happening.

And that steadiness of noticing—this is another thing I love—wisdom arises by itself from the clear seeing that's possible through the noticing. We don't have to create the wisdom.

So again, that example she gave with cutting the apple and just seeing so deeply the thought arising and about to go off into the anger—and the wisdom, the wisdom is another factor in the mind that rose and really made the decision not to go there. And the aversion just was abandoned in that moment. There was wisdom. You really get it from that example. It was not an act of will. It's not a sense of willpower. "I need to look. I need the wisdom that understands why I shouldn't be averse, and then aversion will stop."

How many of us have tried that a million times? "I get it. Greed causes me suffering. I really see it. So I'm going to stop having greed arise as of now."

It doesn't work because that's willpower. It's more wanting. But through moment-to-moment seeing, there will be moments when you think, "Oh, look at that food. There should be greed." And it doesn't come. It doesn't come. Wisdom is saying, "Okay, that's okay. You'll get the banana or you won't. Either way, tomorrow, it won't matter." It's gone.

So learning to trust that through the steadiness of awareness, the wisdom, the clear seeing—when we recognize accurately the greed, the aversion, the sense that it's all about me—these things can just kind of poof away. They'll come back again in another moment, but that's why it's okay that it's all moments.

But if I'm trying to make it happen, to meet some insight that I've read about in all the Buddha's teachings—those teachings can inform us to pay attention, but if we're trying to make this moment match some idea, you get it? That's not total surrender. How is this moment? What is happening right now? That radical surrender into awareness is very, very powerful.

So it's really that the purification of these habits of mind, the purification of the heart and mind, allows greed, hatred, and delusion to begin arising less frequently. All the different kinds of practices and all the aspects of the path the Buddha talked about —I think all have in common that in one way or another, they're working at helping us recognize the suffering of greed, hatred, and delusion to begin with, when it's present in our heart and mind, and moving to shift those habits.

Generosity, non-harming behavior, sīla, really focused samatha practice where we get deeply concentrated on one thing until the mind becomes completely absorbed—that is a kind of purification in those moments where the mind is so focused that there's no space for greed, hatred, or confusion to arise. That's why really deep samatha practice is so pleasant. You actually experience this. You see how nice it is when the heart and mind isn't colored by greed, by aversion, by clinging.

But that's not only available in samatha practice. And that's not what we're doing here. There are millions of kinds of practices. Vipassanā practice, which uses enough steadiness of mind to notice the changing sense experiences over and over and over and over, including the mind—that's what we're cultivating in the way that we're teaching here. There are many different forms of that, but it's also, as I've been saying, through the steadiness of awareness, recognizing these habits of mind without aversion, without hating them, without identification, trusting the awareness over and over.

And it's in the way that we actually pay attention in this practice—it's the way we meet the moment—that the purification is happening.

So as I've been saying, in the moment of awareness when greed is arising, there can be, "Oh, wow, that's greed, really greedy right now." Or there can be a habit of, "Well, that's greed, and what can I do to stop it, and I shouldn't be greedy, and let me think about renunciation, or maybe if I do some method, maybe I can push it away." But that's not what we mean by purifying the mind. That's still a lot of willpower.

Notice greed. Awareness that isn't colored. "Oh, greed is like this. Greed is like this." Whether the greed goes away or not, that moment of awareness—the energy has shifted. That moment of awareness is not greedy. That moment of awareness is not aversive. And it's also not about me. "Oh, greed is like this."

So the cultivation of moment after moment after moment of this simple, pure awareness is the purification of our heart and mind. It is the practice. Not so much focusing on the object, but getting interested in the quality of the heart, the mind that's paying attention itself. Getting interested in that is always available.

It's sort of like a Tai Chi move. Ajahn Sumedho has a line that I use all the time because it's been so helpful. Say we're lost in anger, lost in self-judging. And sometimes we think we're being mindful—"Well, self-judging, self-judging, this story and this story"— but there's a kind of pushing. There's still judging the self-judging. The Tai Chi move, the movement into awareness, the way that Sumedho languages it helps me a lot: "Oh, self-judging is like this."

Deep despair. Your heart's bleeding. Oh, heart bleeding is like this.

Just that little shift. It's not to change the experience, but to change the interest into the awareness. It's subtle, but it's really powerful. And over the steadiness of cultivating and trusting that, the transformation is profound. Not the transformation of our outer life—that's what I was saying when I mentioned that the Tibetans say this urge to correct is samsara. It's not about correcting. Can it be so radical, our trust in awareness, that we give up our willful trying to correct and instead trust that through the presence—that open-hearted presence with whatever's arising—awareness can be with anything?

Sayadaw U Pandita, who's a very fierce teacher, said something to me once when something difficult was going on. I can't remember what it was, but he said, "You don't need to be afraid. Awareness can be with anything." It really can. At some moments it can, but then again, it can. And so just that subtle Tai Chi move: "Oh, this is unbearable. This pain is like this." Not to correct, but to trust that through steady awareness, when we recognize accurately, wisdom arises, and we can respond in a much more appropriate way. It's not about not responding in life, as has been said, but it's about not responding when we're trying to fix it, fix it, fix it—rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic. That's not really the place where our attention is most useful.

We're very privileged to be able to sit here and look at these relatively subtle movements of our mind and heart over and over, all day long. It doesn't need to be a lot of effort, but it's that interest. Let interest do the work.

It may often seem like this doesn't have much relevance in our life. But learning to really see how our minds work, to understand, to recognize when we're coming from habit in our responses, and knowing that we don't have to be afraid of seeing that—the seeing of it with awareness is what makes the change. This is how the world works. This is how all our minds are working. It may seem like really small, insignificant things here, but it's what we take into our life.

I've used this example a few times over the last couple of years. Last summer, I was in Germany for several weeks, and at one point I visited Dachau, which I'd managed never to go to before. It's a museum now; it was one of the concentration camps. It is what it is, but it had a very interesting effect on me in terms of deepening my faith, deepening my trust in just what we're doing here—in the absolute essential necessity of it, for my own life and for the world.

The sense I got from the way the museum was set up, which I thought was really well done—I mean, of course it's horrific—and it's not just Dachau. Pick so many places in the world even now where one group of people is being so unbelievably horrific to another group of people. Our individual lives, smaller groups—there's so much hatred and fear and discrimination and economic bullying and racial and gender discrimination. It's endless. And in many places there's so much violence.

I'm not saying this is just about Dachau. But the way it was set up, there would be different large posters with examples of different aspects of the whole thing: the people who were there as prisoners, the people who were there as guards, the people who worked there, the people in the village, how people got there—just everybody. They'd have a broad story, like doctors doing experiments, but then they'd also have pictures, photos of an individual for each category—maybe a doctor, maybe a person who was an inmate, maybe someone who ran the trains, maybe someone who was a guard, someone who was from the Roma community who got interned, someone who was gay who got interned, Jewish people. There'd be the broadness but also the individuality: a photo, a name, and a little bit of a story.

That made it both vast and personal. And what was so clear to me—this is obvious, it's not rocket science—is that it's not like a few weird, horrible people. It's mostly relatively normal people caught up in something, and each person is confronted with something they don't know, have never been in before.

You have no idea in 1932 or something what's going to be going on in 1941. So you're confronted in whichever place you are with little decisions that we have to make. And if we don't understand how our heart and mind work, if we don't understand when we're seeing inaccurately, then we'll make a decision.

We might think, "I would never do something like that. I would never be part of mass hatred of another group. I would never consciously do something to harm another, or to take food when there's not enough food to go around, to take for my family and not for them." We can say all these nice things, just like you can say, "From now on, I'm giving up craving." But it doesn't work. We have to understand. It's for all of us—we make a decision based as best we can, but it might be from fear, from protecting our family, or just a knee-jerk reaction of hostility without realizing it because it's so familiar. And then that leads to another decision, and another, and another, all over the world.

It's the same mind that gets us here rushing to the head of the line because there might not be enough bananas for breakfast. Elbowing the person—I know you don't do this—but elbowing the person out of the way. Okay, it's not a big deal, but here's the thing: it's not that we think "I will never do that," but rather that we learn with love, with kindness, with interest. We understand when these tendencies are arising in our mind, how they function, how they color our experience, how we can be free even within them.

This is not dissociated from life, from what's going on in the world. I really have felt—I felt it before anyway, obviously; I spend my life doing this—but I feel more, I don't know, more committed than ever that this is where we can start. This is a whole life practice. It takes enormous courage and commitment and faith, as Andrea was talking about. And it's radical beyond anything our mind can understand in terms of transforming not the externals, but how we recognize ourselves in the world and others, how we meet ourselves in the world and others. And that transformation is going to affect everyone we come in contact with because we're not separate.

Yathābhūta ñāṇadassana—seeing how things have come to be in this moment. Each moment affects the next moment. Each moment of trusting and awareness makes it a little more easy for the next moment. Each moment of clear seeing, of clear recognition, has an effect. It's one of the conditions leading into the next moment.

I just want to end with something Dipa Ma said. Dipa Ma was this really amazing, tiny Indian woman who was quite realized. She said one time: "There's so much sameness, sameness in ordinary life. We are always experiencing everything through the same set of lenses. But once greed, hatred, and delusion are not present, you see everything fresh and new all the time. Every moment is new. Life was dull before. Now every day, every moment is full of taste and zest."

Just a little carrot. But then put it down and recognize that this moment is fresh and new and full of taste and zest.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 64

Emptiness and Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential unity of wisdom and compassion in Buddhist practice. She addresses a common misunderstanding: that emptiness (suññatā) and non-self (anattā) teachings can feel distancing or nihilistic when approached only intellectually. Drawing on teachings from Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, the Dalai Lama, and Nāgārjuna, she explains that genuine insight into emptiness naturally expresses itself as mettā and karuṇā—not as something we must construct, but as the spontaneous response of a mind no longer bound by self-referencing.
> Wilson emphasizes that when our energy isn't consumed by the exhausting habit of "me-making," the heart becomes "ceaselessly responsive," offering friendliness, compassion, or equanimity according to what each moment requires. She quotes Śāntideva's famous teaching: "When I act for the sake of others, no amazement or conceit arises, just like feeding myself." The talk also explores how the brahmavihāras are called "immeasurable" precisely because in moments of pure loving-kindness, the separation between self and other dissolves.
> Practically, Wilson addresses how to work with difficult mind states on retreat—grief, self-hatred, loneliness—not as obstacles to "real" practice but as essential opportunities for developing genuine compassion. She shares the powerful example of civil rights leader John Lewis and the Freedom Riders, illustrating how deep understanding of non-self can manifest as extraordinary courage and love in action. The talk concludes with Nisargadatta Maharaj's teaching: "I am the world, the world is myself"—pointing to how personal suffering, met with kind attention, opens into universal compassion.

What I think of as the unity of wisdom and compassion—really, tonight I want to focus on how it relates to our practice here. Later, perhaps I'll talk more about action in the world, but here I really want to talk about practice.

Our practice cultivates wisdom. It also cultivates compassion. Wisdom and compassion go together. They're like two bundles holding each other up.

We've talked a lot in the dharma talks about different wisdom aspects of practice—investigation, understanding and exploring our moment-to-moment experience in ways that reveal the impermanent, changing nature, the not-intrinsic-self nature, the five aggregates. We've talked all about that. And this is true. This moving into the experiential understanding of emptiness—not just an intellectual understanding, but experiential, even just for a moment—is essential to the experience and understanding of freedom, to living in freedom.

But so often people hear about it, read about it, experience it a little for themselves, and a question comes up, or they have a particular response to anatta or no-self: "It's just these five aggregates changing back and forth." It's not really inviting. Sometimes people feel it's distancing, alien, a kind of disconnect, a kind of non-caring. It can be really scary too—unsettling, sometimes frightening. Or people think it's veering into indifference, annihilation: just all aggregates coming and going, what difference does anything make? And we sit up here and say, "It doesn't make any difference. Mindfulness doesn't care."

I think, okay, so that doesn't quite seem whole somehow. It doesn't quite seem complete. And that's true, because that's only half of the equation. Emptiness is completed with compassion. Compassion is completed with emptiness. Or put together, you can't really separate the two in wisdom, in wholeness.

This is from Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, who was a wonderful Dzogchen master. He died just a few years ago. I like this quotation. He says, "The danger is that we hear too much too soon. We think we have understood shunyata, or emptiness, and we err on the side of the absolute in a nihilistic fashion, and we are obscured by concepts. Nagarjuna said, it is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness. Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practice, through the ways of skillful means. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge, since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do."

When someone says, "Oh, everything's empty, nothing I do matters," and gets into that as a belief rather than an experience, that's incomplete. As Rinpoche says, far more pitiful when we believe in emptiness.

So the wisdom of emptiness needs compassion—karuna, metta, all loving-kindness. And the great thing is, it's not that we then need to somehow think about how to construct this or add it in. It's the natural expression of the mind-heart that's not clinging—not clinging to self, not clinging to views. That sense of the deep experience, or just a moment of emptiness.

The Tibetans have a great way of putting it. When realizing this emptiness of self, of intrinsic separate self-existence, they say the mind, the heart, is ceaselessly responsive. It means that when there is a situation, something to respond to—maybe just hanging out in emptiness and spaciousness with things coming and going—but when there's a need to respond, the natural, unplanned response of the wise mind and heart will be of friendliness or metta, of compassion or of equanimity, of appreciative joy, of wisdom, according to what's appropriate. It's this appropriate response, ceaselessly responsive. And it makes total sense.

When our energy is not bound up in this obsessive, ceaseless, exhausting self-referencing—have you noticed how much energy that takes? And then you hate it. Have you noticed how much energy that takes? Because that's the same thing: "I hate that I'm self-referencing." That's an endless loop; it goes on forever. But when a moment is just put down, so much energy is released. And when it's with wisdom, the response is appropriate to the situation.

Compassion also is completed through wisdom. The wisdom of emptiness—emptiness of particular self, emptiness of it being all about me, emptiness of thinking I have to know everything ahead of time—but total presence.

This is from the Dalai Lama about this. He's, of course, Mr. Compassion. And he's saying that compassion must be derived from, must arise from our insight into emptiness of inherent self. Because this is where the vast meets the profound—the emptiness of self, the profoundness of compassion for living beings. Only those two, both profound experiential understandings, support one another.

He's saying that without the wisdom of emptiness—and even just momentary, let's keep it momentary, not jump into Arhat—without that wisdom, compassion can so easily fall into despair. Have you noticed that? Knowing that people's suffering is avoidable, knowing that my suffering is avoidable and is based on confusion, but without the wisdom of emptiness, we really can fall into a quality of hopelessness, even despair. So while the compassion may be strong, when it still has some element of me-ness in it, it's limited, and we fall into despair or hopelessness.

With all balancing acts, with all our practice, sometimes one side's stronger, sometimes another side's stronger, but they really serve one another. And we don't actually—my point is—have to sit around and think, "Should I work on wisdom today or should I work on compassion and metta?" No, you don't have to think about it at all. It's natural. And what we're doing here is cultivating both. I really hope that's the only point I'm trying to get across tonight.

As I was saying, when our energy isn't bound up in this relentless self-referencing, so much is released. Stephen Batchelor is a British writer who has translated a lot of Tibetan writings. He translated the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life by Shantideva. This is actually from his introduction to Verses from the Center, his translation of Nagarjuna, which is all about contingency—really all about emptiness, the emptiness of any single inherent existing thing. Contingency is his way of expressing what I was trying to express with yathabhuta: that as things have come to be in this moment is all these different conditions coming together. And now this moment, new ones coming together and changing. You can't pull any condition or experience out of that and say, "This is solid, unchanging."

He's talking about emptiness, but he's talking about Shantideva when he spontaneously spoke this Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. He said, "When Shantideva's closed sense of self dissolved"—that's a good way of putting it, isn't it? A closed sense of self, me and everything else out there, just for a moment. The next moment it may not be there. But when it dissolved, he did not vanish into the abyss of nothingness.

That's what's important to remember when it feels a little frightening, that emptiness. You don't vanish into the abyss of nothingness. When you're in despair, maybe you would wish you would vanish into the abyss of nothingness—that's called nihilism. But you don't.

Batchelor saw, he knew, that to be empty is no longer to be full of oneself. I love that. To be empty is no longer to be full of oneself. That's all. Doesn't it just sound like a relief, even if we imagine it?

And then the natural expression—this very famous line from Shantideva: "When I act for the sake of others, no amazement or conceit arises, just like feeding myself. I hope for nothing in return." Acting for the sake of another is just like feeding myself. Empty of oneself, opening to all. And it's the natural expression, ceaselessly responsive.

It's lovely, wonderful, amazing actually, that it's the natural response of the mind, the heart, in the experience, in the cellular understanding of emptiness, of non-self. To be free of self is to be empty of self. We can reflect on it—I'm talking about it, that's the intellectual level, and you're hopefully listening. We may reflect on it, and we can notice aspects in our actual deep experience. That's the main thing. But then we just really need to keep practicing—mindfulness or metta practice, both—and trust. Not turn it into a view where we try to think our way into what should be compassion.

Just like asking, "What should I be seeing with wisdom?" And then you beat yourself up because you're not seeing some idea you made up. Same with compassion. We have to trust that the depth of compassion and wise response can arise from no longer being full of ourselves.

This example I've used before—I really like it. I'm assuming it's true, but you never know anymore. Even when you hear stuff on public radio, you still never know. So I heard this a couple of years ago. They were actually talking about economic philosophy right after the crash in 2008. They were discussing the economic philosophy of acting in rational self-interest, and they were going, "Duh, it didn't really work." But the example they gave is what I like.

So this, I'm assuming, is true. But even if it's not, it works. There was a new footbridge built over the Thames River in London. When it was opened, people were walking over it, kind of inaugurating the bridge—hundreds of people. It was a big deal. So whatever, four hundred sticks in my mind, but I don't know. People are walking over this bridge on the inaugural day, and there's so many people that it starts shaking. Really shaking and vibrating. Highly embarrassing for the opening of a bridge. But anyway, that's what was happening.

So it's shaking, kind of leaning. Each person, acting in rational self-interest—thinking, doing what's for the good of all—stepped to the other side from the way it was shaking. But all four hundred of them stepped, because each person was acting for herself in rational self-interest, thinking, "If I act for my own good, it will also be for the good of others." I mean, we can sit here and go, "Duh," but how often do we do that? So everybody moved to the one side, and the whole thing just got worse. That didn't work.

My point is, even with our best of intentions—"I want to be compassionate"—when we don't understand accurately, we can still do good things. Don't get me wrong. It's not like I'm going to go sit in my room and never do anything helpful until I'm an arahant. I'm not saying that. But we don't have the big picture, and sometimes we can't tell. That's all just to know that, just to see how the deep understanding of emptiness makes compassion so much more vivid and real—and vice versa.

Without the emptiness, we have this sense of, "How can I keep opening to my own suffering—never mind the suffering of the world—just my own suffering?" It's like, "How can I hold all this without drowning?" That's a question that would often come to my mind. In my own story, or listening to the news, or there's phases where you hear, and we each have phases, where a lot of people you know are suddenly really sick or going through difficult times. You know how there's phases like that? You just kind of go, "Ah, I want to be there. How can I hold this all?"

And that's the question of the me, as if I could somehow hold it all. No. Nor do we have to. It's just suffering arising in emptiness. "The winds of change blow across emptiness—whom can they harm?" The sufferings arise. Being open to it is just that willingness to connect, to touch, to be present, just as it is. Sound familiar? This is a huge aspect of our practice.

And the way our minds work—our minds work with making distinctions. And that's useful, not to put it down.

And the way we talk, the way we do particular practices—in our habit of making distinctions, we can talk about wisdom, emptiness, karuna, compassion, metta, as if they're two different sides of the same thing. But we can think of them as two different things. And in our practices here, there are various specific techniques, specific practices.

Mindfulness practice, which is essentially what we're doing here—moment-to-moment kind mindfulness—I really, really hope that you've heard at least once from one of us, in the way we try to describe mindfulness, that a moment of sati has a quality of kind attention in it. Does that sound familiar? The quality of metta, the quality of compassion.

But essentially, mindfulness—steadiness of awareness of just what is—we've been talking about it as the condition for wisdom, for clear seeing to arise, accurate recognition, seeing into emptiness, seeing into non-self, and then that allows for compassion. And then once a week, we're cultivating the specific metta practice, which can also be done with compassion, with appreciative joy, with equanimity. In that practice, we're really specifically inclining the mind through practice to that particular quality of mind and heart of metta, of compassion.

They can seem like two very different practices, and they are specific practices. But big picture, in terms of our work here, in terms of our life, I want to say: sati-pañña, mindfulness-wisdom practice, and karuna-metta practice—both are cultivating wisdom. Both are developing kindness and compassion just by the very nature of both aspects.

The Buddha, in talking about Brahmavihara practice, says—he calls it "pervading," and I'll read the whole thing—with loving kindness, with karuna compassion, with appreciative joy, with equanimity, these are called immeasurable deliverance of mind, measureless deliverance of mind. He goes on to remind us that lust is a maker of measurement, hate is a maker of measurement, delusion is a maker of measurement.

I've read these before in relationship to the purification of mindfulness. Now he's talking about it in relationship to the immeasurables, to the Brahmaviharas. He talks about the immeasurable deliverance of mind: "Here, a bhikkhu abides pervading one quarter, sending out one quarter with a mind, with awareness filled with goodwill. Likewise, the second, third, fourth quarter, all the directions above and below, around and everywhere, with an awareness filled with goodwill and to all as to himself. He abides pervading the all-encompassing world with a mind, with an awareness imbued with loving kindness, abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility, without ill will." This is called the immeasurable deliverance of mind, immeasurable deliverance of heart.

This is a description of the potential of loving kindness as a deep cultivated practice, of compassion as a deep cultivated practice. Immeasurable, one, because they are developed towards all living beings and thus have a potentially limitless range. We're really just not picking and choosing, but developing loving kindness, compassion towards all living beings, including yourself.

But I would also say they're immeasurable, measureless practices because in a moment of pure mind imbued with loving kindness, or with compassion, or with any of the Brahmaviharas, in that moment there's a real falling away of the concepts of me and other. Even though in the formal practice we use phrases of sending loving kindness to me, to this other person, and visualizations—we use the relative, we use concepts, of course—notice how it moves, that there's this potential of loving kindness equally to all beings. Because in that moment of loving kindness, it's not about me cranking up this good feeling in my heart and sending it to you. It's because the separation that comes about through lust, through ill will, through delusion, drops. And so there's the boundlessness. These practices also open us to this boundless quality that's empty of self, that's empty of separation.

I know personally for me, a lot of this kind of wisdom has arisen in formal metta practice—which I was thinking for years, "No, no, no, I'm into the wisdom side. I don't want to do metta. I won't get any wisdom from that." Huge wisdom. From seeing the concepts that the mind constructs, that we believe, that keep us separate.

And of course, just as wisdom arises in the metta practice, certainly in our mindfulness practice, cultivating mindfulness and wisdom, metta and compassion arise together spontaneously, inseparably from the ongoing momentum and deepening of mindfulness. You can't really separate the two.

Sometimes in the way our experience is unfolding here on retreat—what's going on for you in the sitting and the walking and what you talk about—one or the other side of the coin may be more obvious. Or you may be looking for one or the other and upset because that's not the one that's happening. You know, the sense of wanting to see the subtleties of vedana leading to papañca, and how the papañca creates the sense of self, and what's the difference between consciousness and the contents of consciousness, and how does saññā work with vedana, and is saññā also a mental formation, and all that stuff—really wanting to see cause and effect. Sometimes that's just naturally what's arising, and it's fascinating, and it's just clicking along.

There are the other times. Have you noticed? The other times when, as much as you may want to—"Yesterday I was seeing this subtle vedana and it was so far out, so I'm really going to work on that today and get to the next level of it"—you wake up, and from the moment you wake up, you are just filled with... fill in the blank: grief, self-loathing, grumpiness, boredom, hunger, self-hatred, loneliness, wanting.

You fill in your own blank. But this is in the way. How can I get rid of this and get back to that subtlety? And you know where it goes from there—just spinning, spinning, spinning.

And you come and you talk to us, and we say, "Well, it's really important to meet this with kind attention." And maybe you don't say it, but often people go out thinking, "Right. That's really second-tier practice. When you can't do the real thing, meet what's happening with karuna. It's better than hating it. I guess intellectually I can see that." But underneath, we know it's not the real thing, right? So we'll do it until finally this junk goes away and I can get back into whatever we think we want to get back to that's giving us so much wisdom. In the meantime, we'll mark time.

And I really beg you to know: this is not second-tier practice. It's essential. Essential. It's not like, "Oh, we'll develop compassion because at least we've got something to fall back on." This is an essential part of our waking up.

And how do you think compassion develops? You know what I'm going to say, but unfortunately for us, it's true—from the Dalai Lama. How does it develop? Through deep insight into what suffering is. And how does that develop? The Dalai Lama says this arises by focusing, by opening into our own experience. Where else?

So it's like the first step of really opening to compassion is by opening into our own suffering experiences. That's the personal level. But what's far out again is that the personal opens to the universal. It opens beyond the personal. And again, you're coming into the emptiness of the small self. The Dalai Lama goes on to say that the compassion then strengthens into a sense of empathy, into the real experience of connectedness with all beings.

So really, it can happen—not every time, but it can happen—that when, with whatever little sati we can muster, some little memory of what mindfulness is, we just meet this with kind attention, opening into our own personal suffering becomes the avenue to empathy, to opening into the connectedness of all beings, the emptiness that is also the fullness of caring and compassion for all beings.

That's why the difficult times of retreat, the difficult times of life—we don't wish them on anybody, but nobody gets out without them. That's why they're so important, whatever the difficulty is, because this is right here, the crucible for learning, for experiencing, and for deepening the habit in our heart and mind. The trust, the faith in connectedness, in compassion, in clear seeing as the avenue of freedom and the avenue of real non-separation from beings in the world.

Everything that happens is useful in this way. Not to get rid of the difficult times, but to really see: this is the place. Like Dogen said, "If you can't see the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?" When this goes away? No—right here, right now.

Sure, sometimes it's too much for us. Of course. Not having the mind go, "Okay, open to this suffering—boom—now I'm open to connectedness with all beings, compassion, emptiness, la la la." Of course not. But just to know that whatever's arising in this moment, in our mind, in our body, is arising due to all the infinite causes and conditions. In this moment, the past is out of our control. What's arising now, we really can't make it different in this moment, can we? Do you believe that? No, we're going to keep trying, but we can't. This moment is what it is.

How the mind and heart meets this moment is the creation of present-moment habits. And so if what's coming up is your deep habit of self-hatred or loneliness or aversion to somebody else or whatever you can't bear—that's what's coming up. How we meet it with just that intention of clear mindfulness, that's actually an intention of wisdom and compassion. "Oh, it's like this." Not that it goes away or that we understand or anything—just that connectedness in a moment is the development, the strengthening, and the heart and mind coming to find more of a refuge, more of a trust in the wisdom, but also in the compassion to meet whatever's happening.

And far from weak, it's maybe the most powerful. It gives so much strength.

Chögyam Trungpa wrote once that true fearlessness comes from the tender heart. From the tender heart. Not when we're closed and fighting and warrior-like. The tender heart. Just touching this. So tender. And we don't need to be afraid of touch.

Even Sayadaw U Pandita, Mr. Warrior himself—he told me once when I was in an interview with some horrible thing going on, I don't even know what, it didn't matter—and he said with so much compassion, I always felt so much compassion from him, he said, "You know, with mindfulness, with awareness, you don't have to be afraid of anything."

I think they're both the same, the tender heart. The tender heart is where true fearlessness comes. That's the compassion way of looking at it. With awareness, with mindfulness, you don't need to be afraid of anything because mindfulness can hold it. Two different ways of expressing the same thing.

Sogyal Rinpoche said, "The times when you are suffering can be the times when you are open. And when you are extremely vulnerable can be where your greatest strength lies. When you can say to yourself, even for a moment, 'I'm not going to run away from this suffering. I want to use it in the best, richest way that I can so that maybe I'll become more compassionate, more helpful to others.' Suffering, after all, is what teaches us about compassion. If you suffer with awareness"—I'm saying, with tenderness—"you know how it is when others suffer. And if you're in a position to help others, it is through your suffering that you will find the understanding and the compassion to do so."

This is not a second-tier aspect of our practice. It's just as much about the courageous presence, the courageous opening to what is, as mindfulness is.

I want to share a story from the world about the power, the incredible courage that comes with this deep understanding and commitment of non-personal love—to really meet suffering in a different way, in a way that I could never have imagined from my own ideas.

This is really about two people. One is Jim Lawson, whom I haven't met. He's one of my heroes—an older man now. He's an African-American minister, and in the 1950s he was deeply committed to the practice of nonviolence. He went to India and studied with followers of Gandhi, who had died not that long before. His commitment was so deep that during the Korean War, he went to prison as a conscientious objector. He said he could have gotten out of prison because he was a minister, but he didn't feel that was fair if other conscientious objectors had to go to prison. So he's a person who really walks his talk.

In the late 1950s, when the Freedom Rides were about to start coming out of Nashville and the beginning of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee was forming there, Jim Lawson was the one teaching workshops about the theory of nonviolence and how to work with nonviolence—not as an attitude that's put on, but as an inner expression of your understanding of your heart, of who you are in the world. As Martin Luther King said, nonviolence means you not only don't shoot a person, but you refuse to hate a person.

What I want to read comes from the biography of John Lewis, who was one of the original Freedom Riders, one of the young students in Nashville who later became head of SNCC. He's been a congressman from Georgia since around 1988. In his autobiography, he's writing about their first marches, but it's really about mettā and compassion and courage.

He says: "Suffering puts us and those around us in touch with our consciences. But suffering can be nothing more than a sad and sorry thing without the presence on the part of the sufferer of a graceful heart, an accepting and open heart, a heart that holds no malice toward the inflictors of his or her suffering. This is a difficult concept to understand. It is even more difficult to internalize, but it has everything to do with the way of nonviolence.

"We are talking about love here, not romantic love, not the love of one individual for another, not loving something that is lovely to you. This is a broader, deeper, more all-encompassing love. It is a love that accepts the hateful and the hurtful. It is a love that recognizes the spark of the divine in each of us, even in those who would raise their hand against us, those we might call our enemy.

"This sense of love realizes that emotions of the moment and constantly shifting circumstances can cloud that divine spark. Pain, ugliness, and fear can cover it over, turning a person toward anger and hate. It is the ability to see through those layers of ugliness, to see further into a person than perhaps that person can see into himself, that is essential to the practice of nonviolence."

These are powerful words, because this is a man who was beaten severely, numerous times—on marches, on the freedom rides—thrown into prison over and over. This is where he's coming from. He's not talking off the top of his head.

This is the power of this love, metta, compassion that sees through individuality. "The spark of the divine" is Christian language, but it points to the spark of truth beyond our personal self.

Taking this back to our practice for ourselves, we can recognize that our own fear and pain and ugliness and anger clouds that recognition of the spark of the divine, you could say—of the natural emptiness, the pure heart of goodness. It clouds the recognition of that in ourselves, doesn't it? Until we feel that we're just that little, narrow, limited self, feeling these really difficult feelings, and we meet it again with anger.

And when we say, "No, meet that anger"—okay, you're meeting it with anger, great. Anger feels like this. That doesn't fix it. That changes everything. That's the movement from buying into the small self where the spark is hidden, where I am the anger. It's the movement from that into the vastness of emptiness. Anger's like this. It's an expression of the suffering of the world, in my particular experience.

The personal, as the Dalai Lama was saying, can move into the universal. But first we have to find that moment of full-hearted, wise connecting with the personal suffering. We don't get to jump over that piece. We don't get to jump over it. But our own suffering is good enough.

There are amazing people like John Lewis and all of the Freedom Riders—amazing. But it doesn't mean that if we're not doing that, we're not doing the work. Meeting it here, meeting what's going on here.

Joko Beck asked the question: "Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation?" Whatever it is. And don't let yourself talk yourself out of a confusing and painful situation just because you don't like what's happening, or you didn't get what you wanted for breakfast, or the person you work with—you don't like working with them. That's nothing compared to a Freedom Rider, right? So no, don't dismiss it. Suffering, here and now.

Can I find it in myself, a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation? Not the story, but that feeling of whatever it is—loneliness, sadness, self-judgment, wanting, "I'm not good enough," "I can never do it," doubt, whatever it is. You can't name it, it's just ugh. Okay, ugh. It feels like this.

That connectedness—just a moment of connectedness. To me, that's the essence of metta. That's the essence of karuna. The heart-mind, the citta, the consciousness is completely open, turned toward connecting. Spontaneous compassion and understanding springs from that.

Here's a small example from a couple of years ago. Again, I was listening to public radio—you learn a lot of things listening to public radio, though you have to wade through a lot of stuff too. They were interviewing a man about a disease I was not familiar with called Huntington's disease, which is, as I understood from the interview, a genetic disease passed along the male line from father to son. If you have the genes for it, you're basically going to get it. It comes on in middle age. You'll be fine until middle age, and then it's a severe nerve deterioration, and you die. A really intense, difficult thing.

They were interviewing this man whose father had died of it, and whose elder brother had just died from it as well. He himself was just coming into middle age. He had no symptoms of it, but he was entering the time when he would get it. And he was just talking about it. This man was in London, and he had been a war reporter for the BBC or wherever, all over in these really horrific situations. But he was saying that in some ways, this was the most frightening.

Just talking, and he's speaking very matter-of-factly. And my point is, I was listening. You know how you listen, and you go, "Oh yeah, shame, oh yeah, that's really..." I mean, not like blowing it off, but going, "Oh, that's really hard, that's really sad." It's kind of... you know, we're a little bit open, sort of compassionate. "Oh, yeah, I'm really sorry, it's hard for you." It's not a bad thing, but you know what I mean. It's kind of, "Oh yeah, that person's making a lot of noise. They must be suffering. Metta, metta." And so I was just listening and really thinking, that was pretty tough. And we all have our problems. No, no, it wasn't that bad. I was kind of open.

But I guess being a journalist, he was very clear. They were interviewing him well. And then this one line—it just hit me. It just went in. Because it was so connectable. I really connected.

So he was saying, "Every day when I go for a walk down to the corner store to get the newspaper, or I'm just going for a walk, every day as I'm walking, the thought comes up in my mind: Is this going to be the time when I feel the first sign of weakness?" Assuming, from what all the doctors tell them, that it's going to happen. I mean, you never know, but assuming that. So every day he's just going for his walk, but is this going to be the first day that he feels it?

And just the... I don't know, something about that is so accessible, isn't it, as an experience? I was like, whoa. And then I really felt the compassion, which can have the edge of poignancy, the edge of feeling. Compassion means feeling with the suffering. It doesn't mean despair. But it doesn't mean, "Oh, la la, isn't that suffering?" And really, I felt so clearly that that's my situation. It's all of our situations.

We may not have such a clear forewarning of "this is the thing that's going to get you"—which it still might not be. But for all of us, really, every day, it's true as I'm taking a walk. I'm not saying take your walk going, "Is this the time I'm going to have a heart attack? Is this the time?" I don't mean that. But the unknown, the not knowing. And in fact, as Spring talked about with impermanence, yeah, all of us. Is this the time? Is this the plane ride that the plane's going to go down? I don't know. You wake up in the middle of the night in some weird state. I mean, I never used to think this before, but now I think, "Well, what if this is like a stroke or something?" And I don't get scared. I go, "Wow, I want to really be here."

Well, that's really all of our states. But what opens into compassion is just that open-hearted connectedness, like listening. Just like mindfulness is like listening to our mind, listening to our body—just that subtle quietness of hearing. And compassion, karuṇā mettā, really is too. Just listening.

I read a lovely quotation from James Baldwin, the writer. He said, "An enemy is someone whose story we have not heard."

So coming back to ourselves, those aspects of your experience that at times are the enemy—just listen. Hear its story. I don't mean the whole story of your life and this and the third grade and your mother. Maybe that comes with it.

But I mean, just let it exist in your loving awareness right now. Grief feels like this. You don't have to do anything about it. Just that gentle touching of it. Let it tell its story, just how it is now. Self-hatred, doubt—whatever it is. Just bearing witness, courageous witness, to the suffering of the world in the particular form of my story of loneliness right now.

And it starts with me, but that's okay. As we're able to be with, for example, my loneliness, at some point—either you don't even realize it—but you're with a friend who's feeling so lonely, and you can say, "Yeah, I know what that's like." You don't have to fix it. You can be there with them.

Have you ever had a period where you're really sick or really suffering—some loss or whatever? And people care. They want to help. But you get the difference between someone who wants to help, meaning make it go away, which can't be done, or someone who's been there before and can just sit with you, be with you while you tell your story or cry or whatever. To me, it's a vast difference.

How do we know it? From being with ourselves.

So sometimes it manifests in that way later with a friend, a person, or anyone who's suffering. Sometimes it actually occurs as we're sitting here, being with what's going on. It's not our natural tendency. And we've talked about that a lot in terms of the vipas-sanā, haven't we? The tendency to flee from the unpleasant. Of course. When we say just hear the story of the suffering state, the mind goes, "Hey, I don't want to make friends with my violence. I would like it to go away, thank you very much."

But remember, it's that connection—it's that connection that opens us to the truth.

John Samedo has a lovely way, I like it anyway, of describing mettā in connection with the difficult. Because mettā—the proximate, the immediate cause for a moment of mettā to arise—is focusing on the good. That's why we start in the easy way. But it doesn't just stay with the good. Mettā isn't "I like this good part of you, but that part has got to go." It spreads out and includes everything as a mental state. It's a beautiful state. So it starts by seeing the good, and then it includes everything.

Samedo says, "With mettā, one is not blinding oneself with an ideal." So it's not "Oh, everybody's lovely, everything's lovely, you're so lovely, may you be happy." No, you're not blinding yourself with an ideal. It sees more clearly. Instead, one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a thing, in a person, or in oneself, without creating anything around it.

That I love. That is the emptiness of wisdom. Just witnessing, that tender witnessing of the unpleasant, let's say in ourselves, without creating anything around it. Not a story about how useless you are. Not getting into all the memories of how it should be different. Not a story about "I can't bear it." Not a story of "Again, for the four-thousandth time." Not a fear about where it's going to go, "Oh, this is unbearable." That's just it—don't create a story around it.

Unbearable. Although, as you know, Samedo has this great line about when he was practicing in Thailand, sweating through his robes in the hot season.

And believe me, it's pretty much unbearable over and over for years. I just get to the point where I say, "This is unbearable. I can't bear this another instant." And then I would see that I could.

That's what I love. It's actually one of the lines I say to myself. I'm going, "I can't bear this." And then I ask, "Well, what actually about this moment can't I bear?" I get interested. So far, I've never been able to find what it was, because "I can't bear it" was a mental state. "I can't bear it"—what? Well, I don't like how my knee feels. Grief is really unpleasant. Okay. Look and see. We can bring humor in. What helps us be present?

So our particular experience, even here, can often open into the universal—in small ways, in large ways—where your feeling of sadness, of grief, begins to transform. Many people over the years have reported this, and some here too. It's personal, and you have your story and all, and it is your personal story. And suddenly, there's a moment when they really open into the grief, the sadness, the loss, and suddenly it's like, "Wow. This is experienced by everybody at some point. Everybody."

And it really is a whole different feeling from "I can't bear this," or "poor me," or even whatever story we're telling. This is one of the things we share as humans on this planet. Not every moment. We also share joy. We also share love. But sometimes I think when there's a moment of deep loss, for example, or a moment of insecurity, or a time when we really don't know what's going to happen, or we're really getting sick—and it just spreads out. Whoa, how many people right now are experiencing loss? Think about people going through war, or so much hardship.

And this isn't a judgment. Thinking this with judgment isn't helpful. But thinking, "Well, this is so hard for me. How is it for people who've lost three kids in a war?" And then not to answer that question, but just to hold, "Oh, this is all of us." I'm kind of feeling the particular that opens into what all of us are going through. And this is the opening into compassion and the opening out of our small sense of self.

So that we really start to see: we are the world. We're each a unique, specific representation of the world, of all humans, of the nature of mind, of the nature of body. We all experience sorrow and loss and joy and love, just like we all experience greed and aversion and boredom and mindfulness and wisdom. Kind of like you can look out here and —something James likes to say—it's like everyone's taking turns, you know, being the wise one, the compassionate one, the sleepy one, the concentrated one. And then the next day it's like it all shifted, musical chairs or something. We're all just partaking in the nature of life at different moments.

And so sometimes when it's too much internally, I open up and just let the world present the nature of the world. Let the suffering of the world wake up my own mind and heart to compassion. Whenever I hear a siren go—a police siren or an ambulance siren—I can feel that somebody's life is changing radically right now. Another time, that could be me. Other times, it has been me.

Go out and just be with nature and the beauty and the joy and the suffering and the unknown quality. All the chipmunks running across the road—have you seen them? You're not driving, but they like to shoot out running across the road. And it's really hard. Try not to hit them. But sooner or later, you see one that's been hit. You just never know.

Nature is beautiful. Nature is cruel. Nature is just how the world is. There's suffering and joy and beauty and happiness. Let it all in.

I love fall.

It's incredible. It's alive. The colors are so beautiful. And they're beautiful because the leaves are dying. The leaves have to die. There has to be winter so they can come again the next year. Nature's like that.

I'll tell you a little nature story about change. I was sitting in Switzerland a couple years ago in this beautiful chalet—just a beautiful spot that friends of mine have. It was June. I hadn't been there in June before. There are fields, small fields all around, and lots of cows up and down the hillsides. So the fields were quite high, filled with wildflowers. The whole air everywhere smelled like honey. I was in raptures. It was really like I was just ecstatic with the beauty. That place makes me really happy anyway. The air is clear, you're up high looking at the high Alps. And the air just smells like honey and the fields are filled with wildflowers and it's incredibly beautiful.

And then after a week or so, it was going to rain. The farmers all came. They worked really hard and cut down all the fields—they make hay for the cows. And then they did this really Swiss thing, which if you haven't been there, you don't know this part of Switzerland. They spray cow manure all over everything. They don't just spread it on. They have a machine that sprays it in particles in the air all over everything, all over the fields. I've been through this before. And when it started, I said, "Oh my god." You can't be outside. The field is right there on all sides. Got to run, close all the windows, and keep them closed for the whole day. It's really intense. You don't want to go out. So I didn't quite make it, but almost. And then I'd go out, and the honey smell was gone. A very different smell was there, quite pungent for several days.

But this is life. The flowers are beautiful, you cut them down, they feed the cows, the cows make the manure. You need the manure so they can grow the fields, so you can have those beautiful flowers the next year. How can you separate any of it? Some is beautiful and some really stinks. And some is in between. All of it. Nature tells us all of it. Just open up. When you can't stand it internally anymore, externally open up. You'll see someone else suffering. That can arouse compassion too. And then come back to yourself. There really isn't any separation.

I'll close with a quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

Free from desire and fear on the one hand, and totally responsible for the world on the other. "I am the world, the world is myself." Karuna, metta practice, mindfulness, wisdom practice—two sides of the same thing.

Either one, both of them—we can't escape from recognizing this truth.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 65

Investigating Personality View

Carol Wilson · 1h03

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson offers a practical and accessible exploration of anattā (not-self) and sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view), inviting practitioners to investigate rather than fear these central Buddhist teachings. Drawing from the Vacchagotta Sutta, she illustrates the Buddha's skillful refusal to answer whether there is or is not a self, pointing instead toward direct investigation of experience.

Wilson uses the metaphor of a magic show to describe how our sense of self operates—seeming solid and real only when unexamined, but losing its fascination when we look behind the curtain. She explains how sakkāya-diṭṭhi arises through the process of paṭicca-samuppāda (dependent origination): from contact to feeling to craving to grasping, culminating in what Ajahn Buddhadāsa called 'I-ing and my-ing' (ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra). Through vivid everyday examples—from shower curtain struggles to meditation hall sounds—she demonstrates how quickly perception leads to elaborate stories of self.

The talk emphasizes generating contentment with moments of suññatā (emptiness of self) and recognizing atamayyatā—the non-fabricating, non-reactive quality of mind. Wilson encourages practitioners to notice the gaps between self-constructions, to appreciate the 'place of no problem,' and to trust their insights into awareness rather than taking refuge in familiar personality patterns. The teaching concludes with Ajahn Sumedho's reminder that awakening is not about becoming aware but about being awake and aware in this moment.

So tonight I want to talk about investigating the sense of self, the idea of self—that anatta thing.

As hopefully you know by now, or believe, as far as we can tell, all the Buddha's teachings he taught not as philosophical concept, not as some kind of doctrines that we should discuss and try to understand and add to our collection of the way we understand the universe and have arguments with each other about. Everything he taught was to directly point our attention, our experience, to accurate recognition of things as they are. And that recognition, over and over, is what frees our mind, our heart, from confusion and from clinging—that is, from suffering.

And so too with the teachings on anatta, so-called not-self. But we think so much in philosophical, conceptual terms. While it's actually a very fascinating thing to explore in our practice—not some huge, big, monolithic, horrible thing that we somehow have to get through or get crazy thinking about—it's just something really fascinating to explore. But often just even mentioning anatta or not-self, everyone kind of tightens up or goes into whatever your reaction is.

This was true in the Buddha's time too. There were lots of spiritual seekers of different philosophies, different groups wandering around India, just like the Buddha and his nuns and monks were wandering around India. There are lots of different suttas where one or another is coming and talking to the Buddha, where they're having these dialogues. At the time, there were two kind of opposite views. One is eternalism—that I am a self and it will last after death. The other is annihilationism—that everything's gone, that when you die, there's nothing. But there were views and opinions.

People would come to him, and this is what we do too. We try to think about it, or all these questions come up: What happens to myself when I realize no self? What happens to the self that's here now? If there's no self, then who's eating the oatmeal? If there's no self, who's making these decisions? Who's sitting here? Who decided? On and on.

So some of us can make ourselves a little bit crazy thinking about it a lot and getting all worked up. If there's no self, who's sitting here stressing out, trying to figure out what does this mean about no self? And the more you think like that, the stronger what gets? Sense of me, right? "I've got to figure this out—it's impossible."

The other thing that a lot of times happens—I'm making broad strokes here; hopefully this is meant to be a practical talk, but right now I'm making broad strokes—the other thing that I see in myself or in talking to people is kind of putting the conceptual stuff on the side or trying to say, "Okay, I can't figure it out. So I have this self and I just have to keep practicing until finally I get rid of it." And you're waiting for that big, mind-blowing experience that blows the self away. You finally realize anatta, and you're finally free forever from this sense of self.

Do you get how both of those are coming from a sense of self that's got to change, and then it's gone, and then we will be free? "I will be so happy when I no longer have a sense of self. But in the meantime, I've got to suffer and dig and I can't do it right."

It's not like that. It's not like that at all. It's more about—first we can just explore, it's fascinating—but on the conceptual level, can we be willing to just open into not knowing? Just not knowing. That space, that alive, curious space that doesn't have to land on any definition, on any experience for more than a second.

I want to read you one of the suttas, just a little short one, of one of the wanderers who came to the Buddha—Vacchagotta, who kind of shows up a lot. He never really quite gets it, and he wanders off.

So the wanderer Vacchagotta approached the Buddha and said, "How is it, Master Gotama, is there a self?" And this isn't like the first time he ever heard the Buddha's teachings. And the Blessed One was silent. "Then, Master Gotama, is there no self?" A second time, the Blessed One was silent. So then the wanderer Vacchagotta rose from his seat and departed. He didn't get much.

Then Ananda after that said, "Well, how come you didn't say anything? Why didn't you answer one way or the other?"

And so this is just kind of the subtlety of the Buddha. He said, "If, Ananda, when I was asked by Vacchagotta, 'Is there a self?' I had answered 'There is a self,' that would have been taking the side of all those Brahmins who are eternalists." Because that language—"there is a self"—fed into that view. "If, on the other hand, when he said, 'Is there no self?' I had answered, 'There is no self,' that would have been taking the side of all the ones who are annihilationists." So there's no way he could answer without feeding into the current concepts.

Then he keeps going—that's not all. "If, Ananda, when I was asked by Vacchagotta, 'Is there a self?' I had answered 'There is a self,' would this have been consistent on my part with the arising of the knowledge that all phenomena are not-self?"

So here he's saying all phenomena is not self, and Ananda replies, "No, venerable sir." And if, when asked by Vajagata, "Is there no self?" the Buddha had answered, "There is no self," the wanderer, already confused, would have fallen into even greater confusion, thinking, "It seems that the self I formerly had does not exist now."

I can kind of relate to that—maybe not, maybe it's only me—but I can relate to some of these confusions. And the subtlety of the Buddha: he's not interested in propagating some doctrine that "this is how it is." If saying "there's no self" or "all phenomena is not self" is going to fuel a view in the listener's mind, or get them more confused, he doesn't say it. It's really fascinating. I love that because it really points to what he's teaching.

This whole thing I want to talk about tonight is to explore—just to explore—when we notice the experience of a sense of self, or a little bit broader, sakāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, which is talked about a lot. Can we, rather than jump onto whatever view we have—it is, it isn't, it should go, it shouldn't go—just surrender into not knowing, but with awareness, with interest, and actually explore?

The sense of self, the arising of sakāya-diṭṭhi, view of personality, is simply another saṅkhāra, another mental formation arising in a moment. It lasts a little bit. It passes. That's all.

I think Guy read, maybe in his talk on the aggregates—anyway, one line from one of the suttas where the Buddha says that consciousness is like a magic show. And I think to talk about the sense of self or sakāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, that's a really good way to think about it. It's like a magic show.

There's a lovely little pamphlet from many years ago from the Buddhist Publication Society by Bhikkhu Ñāṇananda called The Magic of the Mind. He uses this metaphor of how it's a magic show. I remember years ago reading that at the very beginning of my practice when I didn't know anybody who practiced. I would just get these books from the Buddhist Publication Society in Sri Lanka. They kind of saved my life, kept me from thinking I was really nuts.

Anyway, just using this image—and it's a great image for the sense of personality view or the sense of self. If there's a magic show and someone's in town doing all this magic, when we just see the externals, we know somehow there's a trick, but we don't see it. So we think, "Wow, that's great! That's amazing!" But when you see behind how the trick is done, all the magic falls apart, doesn't it? It becomes mundane, obvious. You can see—I don't know exactly how they do it—but how he pulls the rabbit out of the hat or whatever. It's okay. It loses its fascination. You can see how it's done.

It's exactly like that with our sense of self. It seems so real, so solid, so taken for granted, so impenetrable, so inescapable—because it's unexamined.

This is from Ramana Maharshi: "The idea of self is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. Look closely and the ghost vanishes. It was never there. So also with the self or ego"—he's using that word. "So long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one looks for it, it is not found to exist in any way of separate existence."

So just tonight, a few aspects—because there's so much one could say—but a few ways of using our practice, and it's all stuff we've talked about already, to look behind that curtain of the magic show. Not just once, but ten million times. To really look behind the curtain, not just stop with, "Oh yeah, sense of self again. When am I ever going to get rid of this?" We've stopped looking right there.

Sakāya-diṭṭhi, translated as personality view—in the formal way of talking about the Theravāda stages of awakening, it's said that belief in sakāya-diṭṭhi is seen through at the first level of awakening, stream entry. The belief in personality view. It doesn't mean it doesn't arise anymore. It doesn't mean sense of self doesn't arise anymore. But some of the solidity, some of the magic goes out when we remember to look.

Sayadaw U Lakkhana, a Burmese teacher in the Mahāsi tradition with whom I've taught a few times in Upper Burma, gave a description of sakāya-diṭṭhi that I liked a lot. He defined sakāya as the stream of sixth sense door experiences, the stream of nāma-rūpa. What we've talked about a lot: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, cognizing with the mind. As we've said, just six things happening over and over and over.

Cognizing with the mind encompasses a lot. But that's all, right? Just different things happening.

And so, sakkāya is that. And when it's just going along—when people come in and say, "Well, I just had such a great open awareness sitting. Things just coming and going, and it was so nice." Why was it so nice? Because stuff was just coming and going. Just the sakkāya going along.

What makes sakkāya diṭṭhi, personality view—and this we can notice also—is like seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking, thinking, thinking, thinking. Something comes, and it's as if that internal hand of grasping in the mind comes up and goes, "I. Am. Mine." A thought, a perception, a sound, an unpleasant or pleasant feeling tone. We may not notice what's being grasped, but it's as if everything's coming and going and suddenly—oh. This one is me or mine. Not telegraphed so clearly as that, but it just starts to feel glitched up. And then the whole story of me is created in like a second, which I'll describe in a minute, although I'm sure you're quite aware of it.

So really seeing over and over: some aspect, some phenomena that's just coming and going is mistakenly viewed as me or mine. And that leads, just like that, to a whole series of thoughts and associations and further graspings—birth of sense of self ten million times a day. But without exploring it, it seems like it's just always here.

It's like the story—I'm sure you're quite familiar with the story of the two Zen monks, an older monk and a younger one. They're walking together and they come to a stream that's really quite rapid water. There's a young woman there trying to get across and can't. So the older monk picks her up, they all walk across the stream, he puts her down, and they walk on. Nothing is said.

After quite some time, the younger monk, who has apparently been seething this whole time but hasn't said anything, turns to the older monk and says, "What are you doing? You broke your sīla! You broke your precepts! You know you're not allowed to touch a woman, and you just picked her up!" And on and on. The older monk says, "I put her down at the stream. It seems you've been carrying her this whole time."

That's a good example of sakkāya diṭṭhi. The younger monk was carrying that perception, the thought about what should be, a sense of self-righteousness and aversion. You can see how it just goes and goes—the sense of him and what's right, the other guy and what's wrong. So strong, so real. We get so seduced into the story and the feelings that we may not notice how that clutching to whatever it was—with the second monk, maybe the idea that's the wrong thing to do and I'm right—we don't even see the sakkāya diṭṭhi, the creation of personality view, of a sense of self in that. We can think we're quite mindful but be more involved in the specifics.

Have you noticed that your mind ever does that? Ever noticed?

I'll give another very simple example. I had it in my notes. I'd forgotten it, but it's just a good little example of how our mind does this all the time when not investigated. See, that's the thing—our investigation tends to snap shut and go, "Oh, me again! I'm so..." fill in the blanks.

So I remember I was trying to fix some little thing in my house. I'm not that dexterous with eye-hand coordination. It took me fifty years to figure that out, but I'm not. So I was just trying to put up the shower curtain or something, and it was just taking me a while. I'd just get it, it would slip. I'd just get it, it would slip. And I was getting a little frustrated.

And the thought comes in, "Ah, I'm so clumsy." I mean, that's just okay. But that sense of me around the "I'm so clumsy"—like what I just said, "I don't have good eye-hand coordination"—and then memories started coming of all the different times in my life when I've been clumsy. Maybe not all of them, but some of them. Back to when I was in the remedial gym class in fifth grade. And that really set a whole tone for my life. That's who I am: the clumsy person who was in remedial gym class, scarred for life about that.

And I saw this happen. I saw how that happened. That took like a second, right? Wow, that's sakkāya-diṭṭhi—sense of self so strong, the clinging to the aversion to not doing it well, to the thought "this is who I am." And then what selective perception! The memories come that fit that perception. Every moment of my life have I been clumsy?

Probably not. Have there been other things going on in my life that had nothing to do with that? Yeah, once or twice. But those particular memories come, it solidifies, and we tell ourselves the story of who we are.

This is broader than just a little oomph of self. It's the story of who we are, based on grasping at a particular perception, a particular sense or experience, and then all the stories spun around it.

Often, that's the place investigation stops. "Oh yes, really caught in this sense of me." It's like awareness snaps shut. Or even if we're being mindful—and we are being mindful—we could be mindful of the specifics: the sensations in my hand, the tightness when the thing would drop, the pressure in my mind, the aversion going on, the images coming up. I could be mindful but still fascinated by all the objects and not quite turn around and notice that sense of grasping at me in all of those. Memory is me. Clumsiness is me. This thought of my life history is me.

And then if you start thinking, "But it is me—who else had that?" That's thinking. That's just another thought. You're just talking moment-to-moment experience. You can think you're mindful but not see the bigger background grasping that's coloring the perception at that moment, which is the sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the sense of me.

But we can just keep on looking. This isn't about hating it or getting rid of it. We notice, "Oh, sakkāya-diṭṭhi here right now." Instead of saying, "That's who I am, a hopeless klutz, that's it," we see how it's constructed and arising in that moment, and how it passes. Yes, a new one comes, often pretty quickly, but keep on looking, keep on staying with the steadiness of mindfulness, of awareness. Even if the thought comes up, "Oh, it's hopeless"—just another thought. Because the magic show starts to unravel.

And it all starts with perception. The whole nature of insight, as I think we've said, isn't like getting to some new place. It's a shift of perception, where the perception is no longer colored by confusion, by greed, by wanting, by limitation—where the perception is more accurate. And then the way we think about it and the way we act becomes more appropriate.

So there's a story I've used before because it's so perfect for illustrating how perception leads to how we think about ourselves and the world, and how that thinking then leads to the view, the description. This would be personality view arising really quick, in a moment. If we can watch that over and over without identifying, without getting all upset because it keeps happening—just watch how it happens over and over—the seduction of the magic show starts to fall away. It can be fascinating to watch, but more on the level of, "That's how you do it, that's how it's put together," rather than, "I don't know how this happened, but here I am again."

So this little story my good friend in Switzerland told me. Many years ago, she was sitting a retreat, one of her first retreats. Not in a retreat center—this was before there was one in Switzerland—but the people putting on the retreat would rent a house, like we used to do here back in the seventies or early eighties.

And they have many big old houses in Switzerland that they use for children in the summer—I don't know what you call them, like summer camps. We would think of them as a big scout house or something. They're large, but they're not really insulated. They're old, made out of wood, very noisy and creaky. You think it's creaky on the floor here? Forget about it.

So this old creaky house. It was a ten-day retreat, very strict schedule like here. The room they were using for the meditation hall was upstairs, and the room for walking was down below on the ground floor. It was like this, but without all the insulation in between.

So it was a sitting period, and she was sitting and just starting to get a little something going with her breath, you know, finally. Finally a little bit of concentration, finally. And then she heard someone walking downstairs, and she could hear because the creaks were so loud—like I said about the radiators the other night, like gunshots going off.

"God, it's completely ruining my concentration."

She started getting more and more annoyed. I don't know if any of you can relate. But she started to get more and more annoyed. And then, see, it was fed by: "But this is a sitting period. People shouldn't be walking in the sitting period. This is only a short ten-day retreat." And nothing personal, but it was Switzerland. So this is the sitting period—this is when you sit. And in the walking period is when you walk. It's very orderly. There's something very nice about it. You know what you're supposed to do at the time you're supposed to do it. And people actually do that. The Americans might like to know—people actually do that. It's very refreshing. I like it.

Anyway, so there's this creaking, and it's driving her crazy, and her mind is going, "Oh, what's the matter with these people?" And it was just getting more and more blown up. Finally she said, "Okay, getting out of control. Let me just come back to the breath." So she tried to come back to the breath, really just feeling the breath coming in and going out.

And then she realized her attention came back to her body, and she realized she was sitting leaning against the wall. Every time she breathed in and her abdomen expanded and her back hit the wall, she was making that noise. That was the noise she was hearing.

So that's a perfect example: perception inaccurate, leaping to conclusions, unpleasant—and the whole story of, you know, "This is what's supposed to be" and "It's ruining my concentration" and on and on into the anger—that's the whole story of me. And you see how when the perception became accurate, that whole story went away. Just gone.

But what maybe we don't notice when that happens is how quick the next story starts. And we don't notice that it's two completely different saṅkhāras, two completely different formations.

So I can imagine—she didn't say this, but knowing her, I can imagine the immediate next story would be: "How could I have been so angry and thinking that? I'm so rigid. I'm so uptight. Why can't I relax?" Can you imagine it going off on a whole new one?

Somehow that's what's called papañca, right? Take the grasp, the perception, and run, basically. Somehow the mind just really seems to love doing that. Have you noticed?

Most of the papañca is the creation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Notice that.

Not just one sakkāya diṭṭhi, many. And if I say that and you think, "Oh God, yes, it's true. What's wrong with me?" Same thing, same thing. We don't have to get rid of that. This isn't about needing to get rid of it. It's about understanding how it's working.

When there's accurate recognition, the fascination goes out by itself. When my friend recognized that the sound was coming from her breathing, she really couldn't work up anger at the unknown person walking anymore. You just really can't do it. It doesn't make any sense. So in that moment when I saw that whole sakkāya diṭṭhi about being clumsy in the third grade and all of that, it's just kind of, "Oh, okay, fine." There's nothing to do about it. And the next moment it's gone, and you're into a new one. There's nothing we have to fight. We can explore how it happens.

So part of the exploration on this level of thought is just to notice that. Really make it fun. Make it interesting. It's not something to hate. When we're feeling, "Oh no, I don't want to see sense of self again," when we feel so victimized by it—well, that's a pretty big one. That's just fear. We're never going to see clearly from that place. That's when awareness snaps shut.

As Sayadaw U Pandita said, and I've mentioned this before, with awareness we don't need to be afraid of anything. I love it when I see a sense of self. I may not love the story that it's telling. But when I see, "Oh, that's sakkāya diṭṭhi"—sakkāya diṭṭhi's like this, to quote Ajahn Sumedho—it's great. Sometimes we can see it really small and specific, like I just traced through with my friend. Sometimes it's all spinning and you realize, "Oh, I'm back in clumsy remedial gym class sakkāya diṭṭhi." Didn't quite see how I got there, but I can feel it. Oh, sakkāya diṭṭhi's like this. Feel it, notice it. The phone rings, you're into something new.

I'm not saying there's only one sakkāya diṭṭhi, then the next, then the next, with no gaps in between. Otherwise it would be hopeless. But I'll get to that in a minute.

So first, just discovering—as Ajahn Sumedho says, we create our sense of self with our thoughts over and over all day long. And he says we cannot with our thoughts create a peaceful self. So of course when we're locked in that sense of self, it's a little bit unsettling, even when it's a happy one. It's still a little bit, or a lot, unsettling because it's really like a square peg in a round hole. It's not really quite fitting with reality. And even the good ones—it's just some idea that's going to go.

But we don't have to be afraid. Just watch how it happens. Watch how any sense contact—and we can be calm, present, awake—and any sense contact, there can suddenly be a sense of grasping and suddenly it's triggered into the story of me. It could be anything. The most neutral, mundane thing or something really awful, it really doesn't matter what. It's so fun. It's really fun to just explore. It's like looking at a puzzle. How did this one get started? Don't make yourself crazy with it, but how did this one get started? And notice when it stops.

Notice how in "I'm the sad person," "I'm the lonely person," all the things are coming up, all the memories. You feel it, you're exploring it in your body. Again, as I say, we can be quite mindful but without quite noticing what's the attitude in the mind, or what's the belief, that's the sense of self that's feeding it. I am the lonely person.

It's always been like this. Here I am. Who but a lonely neurotic misfit would come on a three-month retreat where you don't talk to people? Who else is here? Maybe everyone else is a neurotic misfit too, so then maybe we're not misfits because we're all here together. But I don't want to just be like everyone else. I really want to be special. That's why I'm... and on and on and on.

Then at the end of the day, you think, "Well, it's been like that all day." Stop a minute and see. You stopped being the neurotic misfit maybe when you heard the lunch bell. You became the hungry person pretending not to be hungry. You became the person wanting to be at the head of the line but going to the end of the line so no one else can tell how greedy I am—as if anyone else cares, because they're all doing their own number. But we don't notice that.

Then there's a time when you're just the person standing there. You're not even a person. There's just hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting. You walk, you sit down and go, "Ah, I'm the person so embarrassed to have all these people around me while I'm eating. I'm just a neurotic misfit." Yes, because I am a neurotic misfit, and that's what I've been all day. Not noticing all the other ones—they don't count.

And it doesn't have to be neurotic misfit. It could be that you're the Maitreya Buddha in hiding, and you're almost there because you're having good sittings. That's the next day, right? Have you noticed it goes Maitreya Buddha one day and neurotic misfit the next day, and then it kind of goes back and forth? That's how these things work. That's how the retreat works. That's normal.

So notice all of them. I'm making them funny on purpose. They're not all funny. Sometimes it's really painful. I'm not belittling the pain. We can bring our tender awareness to all of it—the beauty, the pain, the boring, the neutral—just noticing this magic show as it's going on. We don't need to land as "me" in any of it. And when we do land, we can see that as just another arising appearance.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa wrote in his book Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree, which is a great book on anattā and sense of self, he says the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind. That's all. It arises when there's clinging. It goes into all this story that creates the personality view. And when the clinging goes, the whole thing's gone. A new one comes, but they're different. Each one is arising, each one is passing. Sense of self is not a steady, unchanging thing. It comes and goes, comes and goes. If we stay steady with our interest, with our mindfulness, we can't help but see that sometimes. And that gets even more interesting.

So this habit of papañca, as the Buddha described it: what one perceives, one feels. Perception and vedanā come right together. What one feels, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates with perceptions and associations that then assail—which means attack—a person. Like the story of the monk who drew a tiger on the wall of his cave, and it was so realistic it scared him. That's what's going on with papañca. This kind of concocting is this great word.

Concocting means kind of putting stuff together. If English isn't your first language, it's maybe not a word you'd hear that much. It means creating, putting together, manufacturing. But to me, in English, "concocting" has a little bit of the sense that you're really just kind of making it up—you're just imagining, putting it together. Let me concoct some kind of a stew from all these ingredients that happen to be in the refrigerator. It's kind of haphazard.

It isn't even that the thinking is the problem when we can be aware of it. It only becomes a problem, we get lost in it, when we're not recognizing the whole process and we take the content to be the reality. Take the content to be true. But when we can just notice the whole process and see how it works, we don't have to land in any of the content as being true. Even my memories—yes, but that did happen—that's just a story right now.

I got this really clearly one time when I was on a long retreat. I was watching a lot of different stories of Carol, and now Carol's doing this, and now Carol's doing that, and so on. Do you have that, where you're narrating: now I'm getting up, now I'm taking a step, now I'm serving the soup? Watching the whole thing. But I had—I don't know if it was a mistake—just before the retreat I had seen a movie, The Fugitive. I don't know if you remember it—a very thrilling movie with Harrison Ford, a lot of action.

So if any of you have had the experience of having to relive over and over, like James with his song, a movie that you saw or some TV show—I would be sitting, the Carol thing would go, and then the fugitive would start, and the memories and the emotions would come, and it would go, and then I'd stop and go back. I think I was even doing metta at the time. And then all the Carol stuff would start.

After a while, I realized both processes were exactly the same. Sometimes the image of Harrison Ford came up and the story went off in that direction. Sometimes the image of Carol came up and the story went off in that direction. It was exactly the same process. One of them wasn't more real than the other. A few did have a little more interesting content. But one wasn't like "me," you know. It was both just perceptions and feelings and thoughts and emotions coming and going, coming and going.

Try that next time, noticing sakkāya-diṭṭhi. You don't have to give it a movie review, but just watch it like that and see what that's like.

So the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. As such, a saṅkhāra—just another arising phenomenon that arises in awareness, that awareness can be with, that awareness can see dissipate, just like anything. It's not something to get rid of. It's just to watch it come and go. So what? It comes, just like craving. You don't need to be afraid of craving. We see it come. We see how it acts. We experience the suffering, and it goes. Same, just exactly the same.

Ajahn Buddhadasa again talks about it in terms of dependent origination, which Guy spoke about the other night. He's so down-to-earth, Buddhadasa, in the way he would talk about things. In the same section of dependent origination Guy discussed—where contact, the sense perception, leads to vedanā, to feeling tone, which leads to taṇhā, to craving or not wanting, which leads to grasping at something—Buddhadasa, in terms of talking about this sense of self, describes this place where the craving, just the subtle leaning forward, moves to grasping. He describes the grasping as the feeling of "I" and "mine."

And he calls it—I love this—in Pali, well, in English it translates as "I-ing" and "my-ing," because it's a verb. "I" isn't a thing. It's simply an arising experience, yathā bhūta, due to conditions in this moment. I-ing and my-ing—ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra in Pali. I just like that. You don't need to remember it, but I just like it. So the grasping is the feeling of "I" and "mine," the formation, the coming together in that moment of I-ing and my-ing.

And it gives rise—the next step is bhava, having and being. So I-ing and my-ing, having and being. Having these thoughts, being this person. It's a little more solidified in the view, in the mind at that point.

And then having and being what? That becomes birth, jati. That's the next step—birth, the birth of me in that moment.

Now, this can be a really simple thing. Again, I had this written down from another retreat. This is incredibly simple: just walking through the dining room as a yogi, because we notice these things more, and there's a bowl of candy out. Not an eight-precept little hard sugar candy, but some nice thing—something more tempting to me anyway. And there's a bowl of candy and I'm just walking, pretty present, relaxed, pretty mindful. No big thing going on, no big sense of me.

And there's the seeing of the candy, the pleasant feeling, the arising of wanting, and right away the sense of I wanting the candy. And right then you can feel the birth of self. That's me, and that's the candy, and I want it. And the hand goes towards it and starts to pick it up. It doesn't matter whether you take it or not. But I remember this particular time, I was like, "Oh," just put it down, and walked on.

The candy was out of sight. The whole sense of birth—that was the death of that self right then. Didn't carry the wanting the candy with me. Just gone. And then you walk on, and that's gone. That's over. Birth and death of self just in a flash like that.

There's nothing to be scared of and nothing to worry about, but we can explore it like that. See how it comes. See what keeps it going. What makes it last longer? How it gets put down. Really, when the craving is released, there's that death of that sense of self at that moment. But just explore it. Don't hold the sense you've got to get rid of it.

And in terms of what I just described—noticing the perception, noticing the vedana, and noticing the wanting—as I said before, sometimes it's a lot faster than that. All of a sudden, we're in me and sakkāya-diṭṭhi and the whole story. We didn't get to notice all these little subtle quick things happening, right? I grabbed the candy, or I didn't, either one. And I walk on. Okay, I didn't take the candy, but I walk on going, "Ah, I wish I'd taken it. I should have taken it. Maybe I'll go back when no one's looking and I will take it." Or I didn't take it and I'll go back when they are looking so I can just be humble and let people see me take it—whatever it is. The sense of self growing and growing and growing, because the craving is growing and growing and growing.

But that doesn't mean it's hopeless. It's just that sometimes it goes really fast. I read from Ajahn Chah once describing that whole chain of dependent origination. We give all these twelve links like we just did. But it happens really fast. He said it happens so fast it's like falling out of a tree. He said, if you fall out of a tree and you go down, and on the way down you hit all twelve branches, but it's just like—whoa, boom—and there you are. You land in dukkha. You didn't really have time to notice each branch on the way down, but you land in dukkha, the twelve steps of dependent origination.

So sometimes it's like that. I'm back in my room, just dying, because I either did or didn't take the candy. No way to win either way. Okay, this is sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

Sakayaditti is like this. Remember some of those phrases—"it's just like this." Awareness is always available.

It's not like, "Oh, here I am in sakayaditti and I didn't notice where the papañca started or the vedanā. It's hopeless. How did I get here?" Oh—hopeless. Sakayaditti. It's like this. And just feel it. Big picture. That's fine.

That's a movement from landing in the story and believing it, to saying, "Oh, that's the process." I don't see all the little ways the magic show is working, but I do see that it's a magic show. This is this particular moment of sakayaditti—the shift from identifying to recognizing the concocting.

And the more the magic show is seen through, the less fascinating it becomes. I bet that's true now for all of you. Have you gotten a little bit tired of your stories yet? A little bit, huh?

Now, we cannot move into aversion with that, but there can be that sense of nibbidā, that sense of disenchantment. So here comes this story of "I'm so greedy." Oh yeah, here comes that story. I see how that started. Okay, let it just poop out. I don't need to get involved. Disenchantment.

Here comes the story about being the next Maitreya Buddha because I was able to stay mindful for two steps. Isn't that great? Yeah, that's fine. Sakayaditti. It'll just poop out by itself. You don't have to do anything about it. Just watch it. It loses its fascination.

And then we start to notice what Buddhadasa again talks about in this book: suññatā, or emptiness, which he's specifically using to mean emptiness of self. "Voidness" is how this translation renders it—I don't know, it doesn't really roll off the tongue—but emptiness of sense of self.

And he says over and over that emptiness of self, emptiness of sense of self, moments when there's not I-ing and my-ing, when there's not sakayaditti being created and held to—these are really normal and natural. There are many, many, many moments every day that are empty of the clinging of sense of self, that are not sakayaditti created. Many moments where there's just the simplicity of non-clinging. We've talked about that before—the simplicity of not-self, when we're not caught up and fascinated by the relationship to what's arising and what does it mean about me, when we're not in clinging.

So he talks about how it's really important for us to generate a contentment with this emptiness. First recognizing that it's really normal and natural—again, just little moments all through the day. If you're waiting for the big bang, forget about it. Notice these little moments, sort of what Guy was talking about—what did he call it, the sweet spot or something? But not even a spot, just moments that are empty of the clinging of self, of any story that we're clinging to of sakayaditti. There can be thoughts, but there's not the belief, the personality belief.

So we can recognize this and generate a contentment. And that's really important because it may not be as fulfilling as we might think it's going to be. In a moment when there's no self, guess what? There's no one there to feel fulfilled. There's just nothing special.

So noticing that—just as the sense of self arises and passes many, many times in a day, birth and death of self hundreds of times—notice in between the birth and death. Notice the silence of the mind in a moment that's not concocting, that's not fabricating, that's not having to go out and get involved in whatever's happening.

There's a great Pali word for this: atammayatā.

Again, from Buddhadasa—he said toward the end of his life, apparently, he talked about this a lot. He said atamayata is the ultimate Buddhist concept. That was just Buddhadasa talking. But what it really means is non-fabricating, the mind that's non-fabricating, the mind that's non-concocting. That's just not making something out of anything.

As it's described, Ajahn Amaro talks about it a lot in this book, The Island. He's trying to describe it. It's pointing to moments of citta, moments when the heart or mind is independent, when it's not affected by wanting, by aversion, by delusion. It's not nibbana, but it's, as we've talked about, the pure heart and mind that's not affected by greed, hatred, and delusion. The quality of mindfulness is what allows clear seeing to arise. But just the experience of this atamayata—the times when you're awake and the mind just isn't involved in making some big deal about anything. There can be thinking or not thinking, but there's not that clinging. It's not concocting. The silence of the non-reactive mind is a way you could put it.

When there's insufficient mindfulness and wisdom, Amaro writes, the mind goes out and attaches itself to stuff. The bowl of candy, the unpleasant sensation, whatever it is. It attaches to perceptions, attaches to moods. Then there's the whole thing of papañca, the whole creation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. When there's this non-concocting, these moments of emptiness that Buddhadasa is talking about, a contentment with them, to just appreciate when seeing is just seeing, when hearing is just hearing—then this whole papañca is not created and the heart rests at ease.

This is one way the Buddha describes himself. I like this a lot, one of the Buddha's descriptions of how his mind is: "Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathagata does not conceive of a visible thing separate from sight." Do you get what that means? There's seeing, but he doesn't think about some visible thing, me seeing it. There's just seeing. He does not conceive of something not seen. He does not conceive of a thing to be seen. He does not conceive about a seer, about someone who's seeing. You get a sense of that? It's back to "in the seen, there's just the seen." The mind just doesn't concoct anything else. It's just seeing.

So if I'm sitting here, there's seeing, and I think I'm seeing you—that's a concoction. I think, "Well, I wonder what's outside that I could see"—that's a concoction. Something about me, something about you—concoction. Just seeing with nothing extra. And then he goes through all the different sense bases—seeing, hearing, thinking, feeling: "Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathagata is just like this, such-like, in regard to all phenomena seen, heard, sensed, and cognized. Whatever seen, heard, sensed, or clung to is known as truth by other folk. Amidst those who are entrenched, who are stuck in views, I hold none as true or false."

You get a sense of this. Whatever is seen, heard, sensed, or clung to, the ordinary person holds as truth. And he's saying, "I don't cling to any view at all." There's no need to make up a view about anything. Anything. Can we stay in that? That simplicity, just this. It says "such-like." The Tathagata is such-like. It's just this. The silence of the non-reactive mind, whatever's arising.

There's a nice reformulation of the Four Noble Truths by Ajahn Dun along these lines. He says, "The mind that goes out to whatever's arising in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering." You get a sense of that? It goes out to whatever's happening. "I need that candy to satisfy my mood"—the cause of suffering. "The result that comes from the mind going out in order to satisfy its moods is suffering"—the first noble truth. So whether I took that candy or I didn't take the candy, all the hoo-ha that was going on, that's the first noble truth. The mind seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering. That's what we're doing here—the mind seeing the mind clearly. The result of the mind seeing the mind clearly is the cessation of suffering.

I love that because that's really our job. Not to get rid of something, not to give ourselves a new sakkāya-diṭṭhi, not to change our personality—but to see the mind clearly, to see how it works, to really begin to recognize these moments of simplicity, the silence of the non-reactive mind, these moments of suññatā, of emptiness. Just recognize clearly.

You know those times—we've talked about them a lot—when there's no clinging, when you're not even thinking about it. You're just sitting here and it's just peace. I'm not talking about some big cessation moment, just no concocting, nothing extra. And you'd say later—a friend of mine calls it "the place of no problem." Everything was fine and it didn't matter what was happening, whether you're drinking tea or walking outside or feeling your breath or there's an ache in the back. It doesn't matter. And I know you all know those moments. You go, "It didn't matter, but now it does." Why? And that, of course, is one of the big mysteries.

So generating a contentment with emptiness, really letting it in. But then the question—we only have four minutes—the question is, why do we keep getting tricked back into sakkāya-diṭṭhi? Doesn't it feel like that sometimes? It's so peaceful, you think there could never be a problem again. Have you had that feeling? "I'm never going to believe that again. I see through it so clearly." How do we get tricked again?

So just two ideas. One is something Ajahn Sumedho said once that I found so interesting. He was talking to a group of Vipassana teachers, we were just having a discussion, and he was saying—in his opinion, having been teaching for thirty-some years, both Thai people and Westerners—in his opinion, the biggest hindrance for Western meditators that he sees is our self-doubt. Self-doubt in regards to trusting our insights into awareness. Westerners tend not to trust our insights into the potential liberation of awareness. Not that we don't have them, but we don't trust them. And he says, in his opinion, why we don't trust them is partly because in this culture, our personalities are so strong, and our belief, our reliance, our taking refuge in our personalities, is so strong. That's what we believe.

When you're spinning—"Oh, I'm like this and I'm like that and I can never change and this is my personality and how can I change it?"—and it was just this moment of real peace and emptiness, but now again I'm caught because really it's hopeless for me, isn't it? With this personality and what I've been through. And that's what we really believe.

I just think that's a fascinating idea to drop in and look at. The personality is so much our reference point that it's just so comfortable, we get caught back into it again. Just notice when that's happening. And just that shift—"Oh, personality views like this"—that's a huge shift. In that moment, that's an unhooking from the total belief and refuge in "I am this personality," the I-ing and my-ing. So just awareness noticing: coming and going, different personality all the time.

Impermanence is also very important. When he was asked, the Buddha, how should one know, how should one see for identity view to be abandoned, he said: as impermanent. When one sees the eye as impermanent, the view of self is abandoned. Identity view is abandoned. When one sees forms, eye consciousness, eye contact, and feeling—whatever feeling arises with eye contact—as impermanent, identity view is abandoned. And with all the senses, of course.

So again, it's the steadiness of awareness, of mindfulness, that allows the perception of impermanence to be recognized. Coming and going all the time, steady awareness can't help but notice it.

So noticing impermanence, the perception of impermanence, generating a contentment with this emptiness, with this voidness—and noticing when there's not the contentment with voidness, when that sense of the personality view, the sense of me, you see the death of it. And there's just a moment where there's not a new arising of me happening. Just notice that. Or do you notice in that there's a dulling out, a kind of zoning out, until some new thing comes and grabs the attention, often a clinging or an aversion? Or sometimes it's neutral, but we're quite awake, and there's a feeling of a little bit of disquiet, a little bit of discomfort, almost like we're waiting for the next thing to happen.

And we think we want—and that's our problem, of course—but we think we want the experience of recognizing the death of self, the moments of peace, emptiness when there's no identity view being clung to. But often that's uncomfortable.

We're so attached to that sense of me. Even when it's a suffering me, for many people—I notice in myself—there's a kind of comfort of familiarity. You know, like putting on an old bathrobe that's so old and comfortable, even though it's all ratty and a little bit dirty, but you just feel soothed.

So have you noticed your mind going back to cling even to a suffering sakkāya diṭṭhi? It goes away, and you go, "But what about my loneliness? Let's go back to that one, because otherwise..." What? There's nothing happening. It's a little—not even scary—but just a little unfamiliar.

You know, we don't like this. The mind wants security. It likes familiarity. We want to go back to what we know. That's why we like to have views about what the doctrine is and hold to it, rather than just this willingness to open into the unknown in this moment, without a place to land, without a view to hold to, without a sense of self to say, "This is who I am."

So notice those moments of voidness. Notice in between experience. Maybe thoughts end and a new thought hasn't arisen. Just stay awake there. Notice if you jump to the breath or you jump to the body so—God forbid—there should be a space. Notice between activities. You know you're finished eating? Just sit and be quiet. Don't jump up and go do the next thing. We have to note, note, note, note. Nothing's happening. No, what am I going to note? What's going to... Something!

Just incline the mind to nothing special, to emptiness, to voidness. Give it a chance to recognize the empty nature of awareness. Nowhere to go. Nothing to do. Nothing to have.

You don't create anything. I don't create anything. We're not getting rid of some sense of some self in order to be no self. We're just noticing how the magic show works. And when we see through it, we don't have to suffer from it anymore. It doesn't have to keep tricking us.

I'll just end with this from Ajahn Sumedho: "It's often said that the Buddhist way is not to grasp, but that can become just another statement that we grasp and hold on to. It's a catch-22. No matter how hard you try to make sense out of it, you end up in total confusion because of the limitation of language and perception. We have to go beyond language and perception. And the only way to go beyond thinking and emotional habit is through awareness of them—through awareness of thought, through awareness of emotion. The island that you cannot go beyond"—the name of this book, The Island, the metaphor for Nibbāna—"is the metaphor for this state of being awake and aware, as opposed to the concept of becoming awake and aware."

So let's just quietly be awake and aware.

CHAPTER 66

Determination: Support for Wise Seeing

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines adhiṭṭhāna (determination or resolve), one of the ten pāramīs (perfections), revealing how this quality serves as the foundation for all other wholesome qualities. Drawing from her personal practice experiences in Burma and the traditional story of the ascetic Sumedha's vow before Dīpaṅkara Buddha, she illuminates how determination differs from willpower, striving, or aversion.

Wilson explains that wise determination comes together with four qualities: wisdom (paññā), truthfulness (sacca), relinquishment, and calm. She offers practical examples of how to recognize determination as a mental factor that arises naturally—from simple moments like getting up for early morning practice to staying present with overwhelming emotional states. The talk addresses common challenges practitioners face, including 'hitting the wall' when expectations meet reality, and the temptation to abandon practice when confronting unfamiliar territory.

The teaching emphasizes that determination is not about forcing outcomes but about aligning energy to be present for whatever arises. Wilson shares Ajahn Sumedho's teaching on trusting awareness rather than personality, and concludes with inspiring examples of the Nangchen nuns who maintained their inner resolve through decades of persecution. The Buddha's words frame the aspiration: not shrinking from struggle while seeking unshakable deliverance of mind.

Tonight, what I want to talk about is a particular quality of mind, one of the wholesome qualities, that in the last few years I've been exploring more in my own life, in my own practice, that has just been really useful to me. Would that I'd explored it more in the earlier years. So I just wanted to try and share a little bit about that in hopes that maybe it will be helpful to you. Nothing you haven't heard about before—the quality of determination or resolve.

This is one of the ten paramis, one of the ten perfections of mind, wholesome qualities that it's said one perfects in one's heart and mind in order to become a Buddha. Often the ten paramis are spoken of as ways to practice, things to pay attention to in cultivating the path in our daily life, but in our life here on retreat as well—not any different.

I'll just read out the ten wholesome qualities to you in the order they're usually given: generosity, virtue, renunciation, wisdom, energy, patience, truthfulness, determination, loving-kindness, equanimity. Those all sound familiar, right? And you can see how all of these are wholesome qualities. All of them are naturally being cultivated through our mindfulness practice here, and also just through taking the Eightfold Path, trying to practice a life of awareness, of waking up.

Determination is defined very simply as resolution or steadiness of purpose. Several different teachers have said this—Thanissaro Bhikkhu, Sitagu Sayadaw, who is a real big shot Sayadaw in Burma, and some others—that even though determination, adhitana in the Pali, is listed eighth in that list, it can be regarded as the foundation for all of the perfections, the foundation for cultivating all of the ten perfections, because without a firm determination, one cannot fulfill the other paramis. Without a sense of determination, of resoluteness, we don't really do anything. So it's really, in some ways, the basis for all of them.

Personally, I've never heard it talked about in a way that had been helpful to me. Another definition describes it as unwavering—this is the energy of resolution, of determination. That's how I want to talk about it: in the big picture, but also, as with everything, seeing it as a mental factor that arises in our experience now. What we can really do is learn how to recognize it, learn how it supports our wholesome practice, and how we can, in noticing the wholesome, feed the wholesome, learn to trust in and call on determination more.

One description of how it feels is unwavering in the face of disappointment and discouragement. See how that could be helpful if we want to keep practicing.

Determination is described in vast proportions over time, over eons—sort of like with intention. Remember in the beginning of the retreat when James talked about cultivating our aspiration, our wise intention? It can have the sense of the vast aspiration to wake up, for example. And then it has the moment-to-moment quality of intention in the moment. Determination or resolve is often spoken of in the same way. So we're recognizing how it functions here and now, how we can use it for strength, for energy, for courage—again, to be with disappointment, to keep going.

Most of us—me anyway—seem to know how to do things, how to bring up energy, how to keep on practicing by striving. We make up something we want to happen, and then we push, push, push to make it happen. And this whole retreat, we've been trying to say: relax, observe, allow. And we all say, "Yeah, good idea, good idea." But then what do we do? Just fluff around? If we're not striving, if we're not pushing, how does anything get done?

When James was talking the other night about the different ways to work with thought, work with difficult thought—five different ways of doing it—the question comes up, especially with the last one, pressing down. When do you say, "Okay, here's this difficult thought, and I'll just say no, not now. Just ignore it." Just a simple example of skillful means. When is that skillful? How often do we not know how to bring up the energy for that skillful means if it's not with striving to make something happen? It's with aversion. "No, not now. Not going to be with that thought. Bad thought. Let's do some metta." And even though it looks like we're doing skillful means, the tool, the mental quality that we're calling on is unwholesome, is kilesa. And that's what we're practicing: "I won't have this bad thought."

I will be metta, metta, metta. Yes. I wonder why it's not working. And it feels strong. Just like in our life, anger can be such a strong energy. That's where our refuge can be.

So in practice, in learning to trust mindfulness and not to strive, but still with great steadfastness, be present for whatever's arising. And sometimes I would be left wondering, well, how do I do that? Without willpower, without gritting my teeth, without really forcing, without striving, without aversion. And as I said, it's kind of like we just relax, observe, fluff around, and hope everything will turn out for the best. Is that how we're practicing? It doesn't really work, does it? Because when it's like that—well, la la, I guess I'll just go take a nap, a good long nap, and maybe I'll feel better when I get up. Get up, not better. Well, okay, you know where it goes from there.

So starting to understand resolution as a quality, a wholesome quality, a natural quality that arises in our mind often. But we often don't recognize it. I'm naming it so we can recognize it, turn to it, use it. It's a quality that really brings strength, like it aligns the energy. It cuts through all the dithering. Should I do this? Should I do that?

I'll give you a very simple example of how I've been noticing it. I was sitting on retreat in Burma last year, and when you're in the monasteries there, it's a long day. You get up at three in the morning, and you go to bed whenever. But by three in the morning, okay, you haven't eaten since eleven in the morning the day before, because your last meal is at ten-thirty in the morning. So you're tired, you're hungry, and you're in a room. No one knows if you get up at three. They don't come around and check. So it's really—you're lying in bed. One is lying in bed when the alarm goes. Should I get up? Who'll know? I'm really tired. Maybe you can relate. Well, it's only four o'clock. The bell didn't go yet. I just need a little extra sleep. Should I? No. Maybe it'd be good to get up. You can think this. You can think that. You can try to decide—is it good? Is it bad? Will I be tired? What should I do?

None of that's resolution. And none of that is really helping you see anything clearly. It's just dithering. What decision do you make from that space? And you can kind of feel that wafted-around energy, not very steady, la la la.

And resolution in the mind—I mean, I've really been playing with this—you can actually recognize it. It's just a quality, very calm and peaceful. It's not a harsh quality. And the energy just aligns. You look at it, almost like you're looking at a resolution. Just get up.

You just get up. You just do it. And all that dithering simply stops. That dithering is a complete scattering of energy. But when resolution comes, instead of "Oh, should I? No, the resistance..." you align with resolution. You just get up. You don't think about whether it's good or bad, this or that. You get up, you pay attention, and wisdom comes. If it was too early, you know the next time. Very simple.

It is very simple when we learn to recognize and trust this quality of mind that's really an aligning of the energy.

That's the little picture. In terms of the big picture, we're talking eons and eons and ages—a really big picture of how determination is presented in the Buddhist background. This is the story of the ascetic Sumedha, and how our Buddha, the one we know historically as Siddhartha Gautama, came to be according to the Jataka tales. Do you remember? Spring told the Jataka tales, that whole series of stories about the so-called previous lives as animals and as people of the historical Buddha. And that whole history begins four incalculables and one hundred thousand eons before our present age. Big picture.

There was another Buddha named Dīpankara Buddha. At that time, there was also an ascetic, a practicing ascetic—not a monk—named Sumedha. He was practicing very sincerely, and when he heard that there was a Buddha, a self-awakened one nearby, he traveled and found the Dīpankara Buddha. He wanted to learn from him.

Sumedha was so touched just on seeing the Dīpankara Buddha, on hearing him, seeing his tranquility, his wisdom, and also how much he was touching people, how much good he was doing for them. Sumedha himself was already committed to waking up, to becoming an arahant. But he received this deep inspiration on seeing Dīpankara Buddha—that as useful or wonderful as it would be to become truly free for himself, to become a Buddha, a self-enlightened one who could be of such great service to so many beings, would be incalculably better to offer.

So on seeing this, he made a vow, a resolution, to do whatever it takes to develop his heart and mind to become a Buddha in a future life. This is really a huge resolution, a deep commitment. In that moment, it's a deep resolve—and then not just through a few sittings and a few years, but through eons and eons and lifetimes upon lifetimes, keeping coming back to this resolve.

What he saw the resolve meant was this: he went to a cave to reflect on what he needed to do to make this vast journey to become a Buddha, because it requires an even deeper purification and cultivation of wisdom than becoming an arahant. On reflection, he saw that it was to develop ten qualities called the ten perfections. These are perfections in the heart and mind, and when they're brought to completion—all ten brought to perfection—those are the qualities that can give rise to a Buddha.

So that's the story. You get a sense of the depth of resolve, and how that in the big picture can feed the willingness to connect with resolve, to connect with commitment in the smaller picture.

Through all his lifetimes, it's said, and those are all the Jataka stories—take it or leave it—but they're interesting as illustrations of cultivating the different perfections. Even in the lifetime we have the story of, there's that larger overarching resolve to become a Buddha that was supporting the foundation for the choices the man Siddhartha Gautama made in his life.

And then there's the way one can make a smaller resolve, a smaller resolution—for example, to come on a retreat and really be as committed as possible. It's a more time-bound kind of resolve. Or an even smaller resolve—you could sit down in a sitting and say, "I really resolve to be as present as possible in this sitting." Not that you can control how present you are, but you can make that resolve. This sitting, I'm really going to be here as much as I can.

For example, when you're sitting with Sayadaw U Pandita, the way that one has to report in interviews is very specific. It's a practice where you're noting every moment what's arising. You start with feeling the breath at the abdomen and then you notice what happens. When you go to an interview, you're meant to describe quite specifically—not your interpretation, not what you think about it, not how you like it, not how good you think your concentration is, not your dreams. Not your thoughts, just what arose in the sitting and how it was noticed. What was the process? Very, very specific. Same in the walking.

So after a while, we would have little notebooks, because who can remember? Just to remember five or ten minutes of a sitting—try it. "The rising breath, and then I became aware of thinking. As I noted thinking, it continued. As I noted thinking again, it faded away. Then sensation arose. As I became aware of the sensation, aversion arose. As I became aware of aversion, I got lost in thought. I was lost in thought for a while. When mindfulness came back, I noted thinking, and it went away. Then I became aware of the rising. In the rising, I felt pressure, tingling, burning." That's how you practice in that form—sitting, walking, and in between. It's far out when you do it. It's far out.

But to go to report, you don't go into Sayadaw U Pandita and say, "Well, I took a breath and then I don't really remember what happened." You don't want to go into him with that. So you have a report.

I noticed—and I know I'm not the only one—that the sittings where I would sit down and say, "Okay, this sitting I'm going to report on," there was a little more clarity of attention. You could see it, not tight, but just: I've got to be here. That little more resolve, a little more determination, a little more commitment. It's a kind of steadiness. My energy is more aligned.

And then sometimes I'd notice halfway through, "Oh, this sitting stinks. Forget it. I'm not reporting on this one." And the quality of attention would really change. You really see what's possible with determination. When the determination goes—ah, who cares—it's gone. That's very interesting to see.

What's possible with determination is much more than we might expect. When there's that resolve, that commitment—and here I'd say, if I had to name an overarching resolve, it's simply to cultivate awareness, to cultivate this quality of mindfulness just for this moment. To show up, to be here with mindfulness, with awareness for whatever's arising now. That resolve, moment after moment after moment.

And so much more becomes possible than you would have thought you were capable of before you started practice. If this is your first long retreat, did you think you'd make it this far? Did you think you could sit through and be with some of the stuff that's come up? And is some of the stuff that's come up what you thought you were here for? No. But so much more is possible when the energy is aligned through resolve, through determination.

Again, just a moment, another little example from my practice, but just a momentary one. Another retreat I was doing some years ago, it was in Burma again. And for some reason, it was just one of those retreats where really extremely difficult, painful emotional patterns or states were coming up at the time.

I remember there was one particular state that would come. I was walking back and forth on my little porch, and the conditions are always a bit more difficult there, which wasn't really the problem. But it's like you're not just all comfy and cozy—"Oh, I don't like it, let me just go have a candy and make some tea and get under my blankie." I don't think so. So there's really nowhere to go and nothing to do.

I'm walking back, and this state would come, which I recognize now is overwhelm. It would come and just become so strong. "Ah, this is unbearable. So much suffering. I just can't deal with this another moment. It's unbearable." But like a hundred times more than I just said it. And it would keep coming over and over. But there was nowhere to go and nothing to do. And I would get the image: "I'll just go lie down on the bed." Like, what would that do? Maybe I tried it once. It didn't make any difference.

So the state would come. And the resolve, the determination, isn't to get rid of the state. It's just, okay, you can just be here. I remember Ajahn Sumedho saying, "I would think this is unbearable. I cannot bear this another moment. And then I see that I could." That's the resolve. "Oh, this is unbearable. This is—oh, mental state." That resolve to just be present for it, and then the wisdom would come in. "Oh, it's a mental state." And through the wisdom that resolve strengthens—wisdom strengthens resolve; they go together—then, "Oh, I can be with this mental state." It wasn't like, "La, la, la, it feels so nice." A horrible mental state. But mental state. And that's just what it is.

All the energy aligns in that moment of determination, in that moment of resolve, just to be here for it. It's not a harshness. It's not an aversion. And it's not expectation or leaning into it. It's just aligning to be here. And that can change everything.

So resolve comes together with wisdom. It strengthens faith, and faith strengthens resolve, and it brings energy. They kind of circle around each other: faith, energy, resolve, and wisdom.

As a mental factor—now I'm not talking as a pāramī, but as one of the fifty-two mental factors in the Abhidhamma—resolve is said to be ethically variable. So it's this quality of determination, but whether it's wholesome or unwholesome depends on what other qualities are in the mind. I mean, that's clear. You could have a huge determination to do something really harmful or unethical, and really follow it through.

But in terms of a pāramī, in terms of wholesomeness, it comes together with four qualities. This is in one of the suttas, and then Thanissaro Bhikkhu puts it in a little easier language.

But resolve comes together with four qualities, the four qualities of wise determination, the Buddha says. It comes together with wisdom, with wise discernment, with seeing clearly. It's supported by truth, by a commitment to truth, to honesty with oneself. It comes together with relinquishment. And it's also supported by, comes together with, and leads to calm, to peace.

That might sound highfalutin, but I'll give you a really simple example. Not that you have to remember all these four, but in terms of when you wonder for yourself—for example, if you say, "I'm going to do this to make my practice better," and you can't really tell, is this a clear resolve or is it just some wanting, trying to make things better? You can check in with these qualities as you're doing it and see if they are present.

A simple example: say you decide, "I feel like maybe going through the day I'm really quite comfortable. My mindfulness seems good enough." But it's almost so comfortable that you wonder if you could just be a little more present. You can see how that could be either from wanting, from some expectation, or it could really be from seeing clearly—"Yeah, I'm kind of cruising a little bit. Let me look and see."

So one very simple resolve—I've often made this myself on retreat—is: "Okay, from breakfast time until lunch, I'm just going to be very steady. I'm just going to sit, walk, sit, not do any extra activities. Make it a special time to just cultivate moment-by-moment mindfulness." That's a resolve, a kind of small, in-the-moment resolve.

How to tell if it's really wise discernment? It will come together with these four things. First, it comes out of wisdom, wise discernment—the sense that this could be a wholesome thing, strengthening mindfulness. And also a sense of: is it realistic? If you said, "From the moment I get up, I am not going to have one moment of getting lost in thought until the end of the night"—that's not really very realistic. Maybe it is for somebody here? Anyone here for whom that's totally realistic? You could really do that? Not so much. But one could maybe say, "I can really just focus from eight to twelve. Not that I won't get lost in thought, but I'm making this my mindfulness time." So it has some wise discernment in it, both in the purpose and in what's actually possible.

In terms of truth, honesty with oneself—again, this is an essential quality in all of our practice. In fact, it's said that in all the pāramīs that the Bodhisatta was developing in all those lifetimes, the one he never really broke was truthfulness. Because truthfulness with what we're recognizing, not what we don't see—we can't help that. But when we recognize it, it's just what's here. Not with judging, but simply: "It's like this."

So truthfulness in our willingness to abide by our resolve. When we're in it and we say, "Yeah, it's not working. It's enough. This is good enough. I'm sort of being mindful, but never mind. I know I said I wouldn't do extra, but I'm going to go have a cracker and a cup of tea, and I'm being mindful enough." If you're truthful, you can see that waffling, that wavering coming in—in this particular example, when it was a wise thing to do. So truthfulness means really seeing what we're doing and why.

And relinquishment—that's kind of obvious. The resolve, the determination to collect one's energy in a certain way, means you're relinquishing or giving up certain other possibilities at that time. Maybe for that eight-to-twelve time, you're relinquishing your ten-fifteen cup of tea for that day. That might be a big relinquishment or a little one, but there's something we're relinquishing. In the Sumedha story, in all of those lifetimes cultivating all the qualities to be a Buddha, he was relinquishing a lot. You've all relinquished, I would imagine, a huge amount to be here for five weeks. It's not a relinquishment of negativity; it's relinquishment in service of a deepening and strengthening of resolve.

And the last part: peace or calm. I think this is really important. It's one of the great ways I can tell, because the resolve can be really strong. So this simple thing of just not doing extra activities between eight and twelve for a day—I make the resolve to myself: just for today, whatever comes up, for this time I'm going to be with it. And maybe something really difficult or unpleasant comes up in my mind, and I think, "Oh, but there are all these other skillful means, and I could do this, and I could do that." No. I'm just going to be with it for now. And that isn't like, "You've got to do it!" with tension and striving. It's just: "No, I'm simply going to be with it." It's calm.

It's calming. It doesn't lead to more fluttering and worry and doubt and this and that, which all the thinking and analyzing and comparing does. No, just for now, I'm going to be with it. If it's like this, okay. If it feels like my practice just goes to hell in a handbasket while I'm doing this, okay. It's just what I'm doing.

And then ultimately—and this is what we see with all skillful means—it's not that from doing that, from then on, total peace. I'm not talking about that. But you can see that if it was a wise resolve and it's supporting our awareness, there'll be some sense of calm or peace with it and after it. Not the sense of sitting through a sitting and no matter what happens, you're going to sit there and you're gritting your teeth.

Have you had sittings like that where it feels like resolve? "I'm not going to move no matter what." And you're sweating bullets, and your teeth are gritting, and you feel like you're going to bust your jaw. And at the end of the sitting, you just want to die, and you never want to come in the hall again. But by gum, I stayed with it. And we did stay with it.

That's not resolve, though. I mean, it feels like it's a resolve. Okay, maybe it's not wise, discerning resolve. It's willpower. And sometimes in our life that can be useful, but it's not the wholesomeness of resolve.

Several people have described to me over the last days different kinds of sittings like that, where things are really difficult in the mind, in the body. And sometimes you say you're going to stay with it, but it's like I just described—and at the end of it, it's not calm. It didn't really feel wise. You relinquish some things, okay, but somehow it's willpower. It's wanting. It's striving. It's expecting.

And another time, stuff's just as difficult, but the mind just isn't making a big deal. The mind just goes, "I'm just here." Somehow it's not a struggle. The mind's just here. And you go, "Why? How? What did I do?" You didn't do nothing.

But notice the qualities in the mind. Notice the wholesome qualities. And just as we've said, when we cultivate the wholesome—I think James or several people have quoted this famous line from one of the suttas—what we frequently think about and ponder upon, that becomes the inclination of our mind.

So that's really why we talk about recognizing the wholesome. Recognize mindfulness. Recognize samādhi. Recognize calm. Recognize resolution. The more we recognize... You're sitting there and, oh, I don't want to move. I can't. And then the resolution's there. You can tune into it. It aligns the energy. It strengthens. And then it starts to fade and you start thinking, "Oh wait"—there's the resolution again. We can incline towards it. We can call it up. It's a huge support.

I've just been finding it so useful. Whereas before I was trying to think, "Is this good? Am I tired? Do I need a rest? I really can't tell." And trying to figure it all out.

When resolution comes, boom, you just do it. Like that Nike ad—just do it. It's like that. You don't have to analyze. It's just so simple. There's so much energy behind it.

You could take the example again of the Buddha, the Gautama Buddha. We know after all of those lifetimes, in this lifetime that we read about, all the practice and the ascetic practices that he did, and the famous night when he sat down under the Bodhi tree and made that famous resolution: "I'm not getting up. I either die or I awaken."

And I always thought, well, somehow he knew the right night to make that resolution. He didn't make it when he first went forth from homelessness. He didn't make it in all those six years of incredible asceticism.

So there's a sense of this huge resolve, but with discerning wisdom that knows what's wise and what seems possible. Truthfulness, calm, relinquishment. It's not saying you don't have resolve if you make some incredibly impossible resolve and then don't live up to it, and you think, "Well, see, that just proves what I always knew—I can't do it." It really requires wisdom and clear seeing.

Another place we can get confused with determination is to confuse it with expectation. Joseph often says, don't confuse effort with expectation, trying to make something happen. Same with resolve. Same with determination. So with mindfulness, for example, our determination to be present isn't moving into a determination to have a specific result. The determination is, "Okay, I'll be here." And then open to whatever shows up.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu had a good description of this, I thought. He's talking about determination and resolve, and he's talking about it in life. He's saying often in a meditation retreat, sometimes it's not so helpful to have a specific goal because we get so goal-oriented and striving. But we've talked about that the whole time. Once we understand that, and once we understand the wise use of resolve and the difference between resolve and expectation, we can use it here. So don't think you can't.

But he's giving a good example of how we misuse it. He says sometimes people come on a retreat and they set a focus, wanting a particular result so that they can say, "I just spent two weeks at the monastery and I came back with the first jhāna"—like a trophy. And he says you usually end up, if you get something that you call jhāna when you go home, with an unripe mango. You've got a green mango on your tree and someone comes along and says a ripe mango is yellow and it's soft. So you squeeze your mango to make it soft and paint it yellow to make it look ripe. But it's not a ripe mango. It's a ruined mango.

So you get a sense of the difference. Even with determination, it can start to slide into wanting. It's not the same thing. And that's where we bring in sacca, truthfulness. This isn't that unifying, that solidity, that uprightness of energy. It's starting to lean in, starting to try and make something happen.

In the smaller picture of our practice here—never mind eons and eons and lifetimes—but in our practice not only on this retreat... I'm assuming, even though some of you I don't know, you wouldn't be here if in some way, some part of your life, you were not committed to waking up, to purifying, to cultivating compassion. It's not just about this retreat and then you're going to walk out and blow it off. Well, maybe you are, I don't know! But even just on the retreat, it takes huge resolve, doesn't it? Over and over, this determination to be here for this. Be here for this. Be here for this.

And I've noticed often on retreats, and I've noticed in the last few days talking to different people—we say that retreat's always kind of going like a sine wave. Everyone's not all in exactly the same way, but it'll be going whatever it is for you. Open, things are expanding, and then it contracts again. Then it's open and flowing in whatever way, and then you think, "Okay, now..." and it contracts again. And sometimes we start to see: okay, that's just the ebb and flow of life, isn't it?

The waves, the seasons, the universe—although maybe the universe is just expanding and expanding. We don't really know if it's going to contract again.

Often, when we're back in a contraction, and it keeps doing that, just like the breath—it can't just go one way. But anyway, I've been noticing over the last few days, it feels like for some it's going into another kind of dip. The place where I call "hitting the wall," where we've really been sincerely working, being present, cultivating awareness and mindfulness and metta, opening to difficult stuff, whatever. But then it hits a place—and it's different for each of us, and for each of us at different times it's different—where the mind just says, "I can't do this," or "I don't want to do this," or "If this is what freedom's about, no thank you very much." I call it hitting the wall.

Sometimes it's like, "Okay, I see my bad habits, and this is a big one. I really get it. Selfing happens a lot. I'm seeing craving everywhere I look. And the more mindful I get, the more I see it." But it's worse. Not only do I see it, I feel the pain of it. And because I feel the pain of it and I see how unnecessary it is and how much delusion it is, I'm really lost in self-judgment about it—because I ought to be over this by now. And it's ten million times more painful now than it was before. I can't bear it anymore. Have you ever had a moment like that? Longer than a moment.

Sometimes it's like that moment I was talking about in Burma—"Oh my God, it's overwhelming. I just can't be with this." I can't do it over and over and over. And then we believe that mind state. You know, forget it. Or sometimes it's just opening to another level, and it may be a subtle level, of the painfulness of our habits, or of our past conditioning, or just seeing something very subtle, like comparing, but seeing it everywhere. So it's so disgusting, you just can't stand it anymore.

Someone said to me once—I thought I was being really nice in the interview, but she said, as a friend, "You know, it's like you're saying to me so nicely, 'You're completely covered with green slime.'" I was just trying to point out wanting. I wasn't taking it personally—wanting, yeah, it comes. And she's like, "Ugh, green slime. You're totally identified." And then the mind says, "I don't want to be with this. I don't want to look anymore."

Or various ideas come into our mind at a certain time. "If freedom means I don't love my family anymore, forget about it." Or "If freedom means no more appreciation of the beautiful"—and that's something we get into a lot. "It means I can't have pleasant experience anymore. I don't want that. It's just dull, gray, boring—forget it." And then we're off into reactivity.

Or sometimes it's even getting caught in what I talked about the other night—our personality view. "Well, freedom, I really would love it, but it's just not possible for me in this lifetime. I'm too..." fill in the blanks. In fact, tonight when I've been talking about determination, if your mind goes, "Yeah, well, that's fine for someone, but not someone as weak as me, not someone as tired as me, not someone as..." whatever, fill in the blanks, "I couldn't do it"—notice that.

Notice that at times when we hit the wall, when it's just not what we expected. And this is usually a big one: the expectations we have in the background. Pretty much, it's an extremely rare person who doesn't have some expectation going on. You come to a retreat—I mean, you're lucky if you even know what your upfront expectations are. But often about this time, the ones we didn't know, or that we knew but we pretended we didn't know—which is amazing, isn't it? We saw it in the beginning. "No, no, I don't really think that."

No, no, no, that's not really operating. But now it's like, "Okay, where's the bliss? It's been five weeks. Huh? This isn't what I signed up for. Another dip into wanting and aversion and sense of self? No, no, no. Three weeks, okay. Five weeks—I'm ready for some samadhi." And samadhi does not mean noticing changing objects that are unpleasant. Samadhi means heading for bliss, thank you very much. The sense of self? Okay, I've seen it. Chalo—goodbye. We don't need it anymore. What's going on?

Or we have some idea of how open our heart should be, how we shouldn't have these unpleasant or aversive or cruel thoughts. Or some idea of how our body was going to open up and purify. We all have these. Maybe you don't, but look and see—if you're hitting a wall, there's almost always some idea back there. And as embarrassing or puerile or foolish as it might seem, it's really helpful to pull that idea out of the shadows and bring it into the light.

I remember last year when I was sitting on a retreat in Burma. I was doing walking meditation, and it was pretty quiet. Things were really quite fine—no big deal was going on, and I was quite happy. I would just notice a little leaning forward. And then I pulled out the thought in my mind. It was like, "Oh, it should be a little bit better than this." Whatever this was, it should be a little bit better. And then I saw—yes, there's this belief: this is samsara. And I'm still trying to fix samsara. And that's the whole point about samsara: it isn't fixable. It's just going on and on and on.

Actually, for me, it was a very funny moment. I was walking in this place, and I saw that. Just—ah, samsara. Then I went into this feeling of just everywhere wanting and not getting, and you get it, and it goes, and trying to make it better, and it's never enough. And it's just so heavy. I was walking outside in this place I liked, and I just kind of looked up—I really was looking up, thinking I'll get some openness, some sky. And it was still trying to improve samsara. The place I chose to look up, there was a little overhang from the building I was walking next to, which I'd never really noticed. This cement overhang in the tropics—it was so disgusting. It was filled with old cobwebs and mold hanging down and dead bugs and flies. It was the most disgusting thing. I thought, "Oh yeah. Samsara—give it up." It was great. It just broke the whole thing.

Sometimes we hit the wall because it's actually going well. And our sense of comfort, our sense of self, our sense of what we're familiar with starts to be broken apart, starts to come undone. It's almost like—I don't know if Guy used this phrase, I think at Solis he talked about a nostalgia for samsara. So when you see aspects of your personality—that lonely aspect, that greedy whatever it is—and you see moments when awareness simply sees it and you don't buy into it, and then it's gone, you go, "Oh, but that's me." It's like putting on a nice, warm, cozy coat, and we want it back. Like, "No, who would I be without my whatever?" This pull of nostalgia for some familiar suffering. "Oh, I can't do this."

I don't want to do this. I don't want to be nothing and nobody. It's a very unfamiliar sense of myself.

And so this is where determination, resolve, really supports us—in the form of courage. A courage that's willing to show up for that discomfort, that dis-ease, that sense of unfamiliarity. Realizing that freedom from clinging is completely uncompromising. It's not freedom from most clinging while you get to hold on to a few things. It's freedom from clinging that transforms our views of ourselves, our views of the world, our comfortable and even uncomfortable little standpoints that we have. They all start to get seen through. And even though that's freeing, it can also be quite unsettling.

If we just want to stick in our minds—what we think about it, what should we do—we can really get swept into doubt and confusion, or we hit that wall. Resolve is just: okay, be with this. Unsettling is like this.

Because enlightenment, waking up, it's not a self-improvement project. It's not about fixing our personalities. As Ajahn Sumedho said, it's not our personality that gets liberated. It's seeing through all the standpoints. We can still use our standpoints, our views, but it's seeing through them all.

I love this quote from Stephen Batchelor. He says realizing emptiness is not just an experience of oceanic bliss. It's more a falling apart of all our strategies of self-interest, of self-centeredness, of seeming protection. And although freeing, it can also bring about a great sense of disconcertion, confusion, dis-ease—like being in what he calls a no man's land, where nothing is familiar for a while.

And that place of unfamiliarity, it's uncomfortable often. So this is where we really call on our resolution, our commitment—not to make it be a certain way or get out of the discomfort, but just: okay, show up for this. Dis-ease is like this. That willingness to just open into the unknown. Whatever this next moment is, we don't know. Resolution just unifies our energy and allows us to do that. Moment by moment. Not willpower, not forcing, not expectation, but as Sayadaw U Tejaniya has written all over the place: never give up. Don't push, don't strive, but never give up. Just being here for this.

Maybe I've used this example before, but it's a good one to me of never giving up. Some of you may have seen the movie—it's been out a few years now—called Touching the Void, about two men that were mountain climbing together in the Andes in South America. It's a recreation of something that happened maybe twenty years ago. It's very intense, so I'll try to make a long story short.

They're mountain climbing together, just the two of them, and they're roped together way, way up high in snowy mountains. They're descending, and the one ahead somehow skids and falls off a ledge. So he's hanging way down, and they're roped together. For a really long time, the guy who's still up is trying to pull the other one up. He can't get him up. There's this huge void down there, this huge abyss. For hours they can't get him up, they can't move, they can't do anything.

So finally, the guy who's up there cuts the rope. That was his decision, what he did. And certainly in mountaineering, you never do that. But that's what he did. He cut the rope and went back to their base camp. Waited to see what happened.

So the guy whose rope was cut fell into a big crevasse in the ice. He falls down into it, so it's dark and narrow, and he lands on a kind of shelf. And he'd broken his leg. So he's on this shelf for—I don't remember how long—quite a long time, twelve hours, longer. And he said later, he's terrified of this dark, of this crevasse.

And he's way down there. He can't get up. He's way down. And it keeps on going down further, and he's just on this little shelf. So he's there for twelve hours, twenty-four, I don't know how long. But at some point he said, "I couldn't just abdicate. I had to, all of a sudden, make a decision." And the only thing he could do was lower himself further down into that crevasse, which completely, completely terrified him. And he had no clue if it just went on forever or what would happen. But he said, "I could not abdicate. I had to do something."

That's the quality of resolution—just opening into the unknown. Amazing. Well, I don't know. In some way, maybe it's not so physical. But there are times in practice when it's that level. And we think we can go back to our little cozy nest. But we bring up the resolve, just be here, and it will open by itself.

So anyway, obviously he made it out. He said, "I had to make a choice. I may be wrong." So what happened—he lowered himself. His leg was broken. But he hit ground, and it kind of went up, and he could see daylight. And he managed to crawl out. And it took him three or four days on his broken leg to crawl over this incredible terrain—mountains, sliding down, rocks—to get back to where the base camp was.

And by the time he got back, the other guy had been waiting for days and was just about to leave. He had burned all the other guy's clothes, was about to go. And the guy had just—I mean, it's amazing he was still alive after these four days. He said he was so—nothing to drink, nothing to eat—really delirious. And when he was getting close to the base camp, the only thing that kind of snapped him back out of delirium enough to know he was close was the smell of urine from where they'd been peeing when they were camping there. That smell was so strong, it kind of woke him up and brought him into his mind enough to get back to the base camp.

It's a very intense, very intense story. But can you imagine the temptation? "Well, I'll just hang out on the crevasse. I'll just hang out here on the shelf because it's too scary to do anything else." And sometimes we feel like that in our practice. But really, we can't abdicate. And you don't want to abdicate. Never give up.

There's a great story. Ajahn Sumedho was telling us one time—I think we were meeting with him again, a bunch of Spirit Rock teachers. And he was talking about, just in his own life of practice, a period. He was the abbot of Amaravati for many years. So he's talking about a period of about ten years ago when there was great difficulty at the monastery, a lot of interpersonal difficulty, a lot of upheaval. And he, being the abbot and also the one who kind of ran things, he was getting a lot of blame. People were really—and these are all people who live together and know each other well. So he was getting a lot of blame, a lot of anger.

And he said, "My personality hated that and feared that. I want to be loved. I want to be liked. And everyone's blaming me, and I'm having to still stand up and take it all and still make the hard decisions. It was horrible for my personality." And he was starting to really feel beaten down.

And then he said he realized, oh, he was buying into his personality. And he said—and he used this word—"I made a determination to trust awareness." I love that.

Like the time when we're really in our stuff. And we can see we're in our stuff, but it's so real. We say, yes, I'm really believing the personality, sakkāya-diṭṭhi, is what is true. And he just made a deep resolve on trusting awareness, which is trusting mindfulness, intuitive awareness. Personality still arising, blame still arising, hating the blame still arising—awareness of it like this. The trust is in the awareness, not in the personality.

That's a huge resolve, one we can make over and over and over again in our practice. Doesn't mean we know how it's going to turn out. Doesn't mean that it's the same path for each of us. And we make the resolve over and over and over again, don't we?

I want to end with a story about this quality of resolve and commitment and how strong it can be in lives. Maybe some of you have seen the movie about when Tsoknyi Rinpoche and some Western women went back to Tibet to visit a group of nuns called the Nangchen nuns. Their story is that they lived in the remote mountains of Tibet—about forty nunneries during the Cultural Revolution of China, after China had taken over Tibet. It was in 1959, but then there was the Cultural Revolution in the seventies. And at that point, many of the monasteries and nunneries were destroyed.

So these nuns, the Nangchen nuns up in the remote mountains of Tibet—all their nunneries were destroyed, and the nuns were scattered. Different things happened to them. Each had to find a different way, but they held their deep commitment, their resolve in themselves of being nuns. That was their path. Some of them had to go back to their nomadic homes and live with their families. Some of the nuns didn't survive this period when the nunneries were destroyed. Some were sent to work camps. Some managed to go deep, deeper into the mountains and live like hermits in caves. But all of them that survived, in their own way, really stayed true to their internal resolve of living as nuns.

What happened was that in recent years they were starting to be allowed to come out of hiding, to come back from their families and begin to rebuild these nunneries—which already was huge. They were dragging the stones and the wood up these giant, giant mountains by hand to rebuild the nunneries. But they were saying the ones who had been living with their families had to disrobe. So they were like secret nuns. They would do their practices in secret, in their minds, in silence, even keeping it from their families sometimes. They would look like they were living a normal life, but they were doing hidden practice—committed to being nuns inside, over and over and over.

So when they could come back out and come together as nuns again, even though externally... you have to use discerning wisdom. You don't know what conditions are going to be presented. Resolution isn't about it's always going to be like this. It's about our hearts and minds aligned with truth, and whatever we need to do to cultivate that commitment to truth and wakefulness in ourselves.

So when Tsoknyi Rinpoche and these Western women were visiting, they went back again and were starting to see these nuns come out of hiding. Some of them had starved to death. Some had been close to starvation for twenty years while they were in hiding up in the mountains or with their families. And now they were so happy to be able to come back.

The culmination of the whole movie—they took the visitors up to visit this old nun really at the top of this tiny, tiny little cabin up on the top of the mountain. Really old. And they said they thought she was one of their most awakened ones. The movie shows her. She's just lying in a bed. She's got so many wrinkles. She looks like about 120, really. Who knows? And her eyes are just so bright, beaming. She's just lying there. It doesn't look like she can even walk or get up. She's just spinning her little prayer wheel. And they say to her, "So what are you doing?" She says, "Well, all my waking hours, all that's in my mind are wishes for the happiness and freedom from suffering of all beings." She's just lying there, so bright, spinning her prayer wheel every moment she's awake.

So who knows how our resolve is going to show up.

But to end with something from the Buddha, where he says two things: "Two things I never lost sight of—not to shrink from the struggle, and not to stay contented merely with wholesome states of mind."

Don't sell yourself short. Don't be afraid to own your aspiration.

The Buddha: "This holy life, bhikkhus, does not have gain, honor, and renown for its benefit, nor the attainment of virtue for its benefit, nor the attainment of concentration for its benefit, or even knowledge and vision for its benefit. But it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its essence and its end, its heart-wood."

So don't sell yourself short. Don't abandon your resolve.

Thank you. Let's just sit.

CHAPTER 67

Stories of Some Buddhist Nuns: Then and Now

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson weaves together stories of awakened nuns from the Pāli canon with accounts of remarkable Buddhist women she has personally encountered in Burma and Thailand. She begins with Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, the Buddha's aunt and step-mother who became the mother of the bhikkhunī saṅgha through her determined persistence, and draws parallels to Bhikkhunī Dhammānandā, who is courageously working to restore full ordination for women in Thailand.
>
> Wilson shares the dramatic story of Paṭācārā, who lost her entire family through a series of devastating tragedies before finding liberation through the Dhamma, and connects her teaching legacy to Dīpa Mā, the beloved Indian laywoman teacher whose own profound suffering transformed into boundless mettā and incisive wisdom. The talk also highlights Dhammadinnā, praised by the Buddha as foremost in expounding the Dhamma, and the contemporary Burmese nun Daw Yuzana, who teaches large retreats while simultaneously running a school for orphaned girls.
> Through these parallel narratives spanning 2,500 years, Wilson demonstrates that women's capacity for awakening has always been equal to men's, as the nun Somā declared to Māra: 'What difference does being a woman or a man make when the mind is well composed?' The talk offers both inspiration and practical encouragement, showing how suffering can become the doorway to liberation and how awakening manifests in diverse ways—from quiet hermitage life to active teaching and compassionate service.

So tonight, in this kind of changeover period, I thought it would be story time.

But really what I want to talk about, we don't hear so much about the women in the history of the time of the Buddha and also now. So I want to talk about some of the nuns who were enlightened nuns at the time of the Buddha, and also some nuns that I know today who remind me of similar stories.

I feel it's really important to remember that there's quite a rich place in the texts where there are poems from enlightened monks and poems from enlightened nuns. And then we have a little bit of the story about some of the nuns. It's really wonderful to read them because it brings them alive. Just as if you read the suttas you might think they feel very dry and dull, but you start to get a sense of the personalities of the different monks, and so also with some of these nuns.

I only have time to pick out a very few, just to give you a sense of the range. But what I love about it is that I really feel like I can relate to different personalities, different situations in life before they became nuns, different ways that they awoke—quickly, slowly, good horse, bad horse, all of that. It's very accessible to how we are today. And it brings it alive for me, from just being some distant, "Oh yeah, and there were some women too," kind of fluffing along, doing their best. It's not like that at all. It really gives a sense of the power of the women just as much as the men, yesterday and today.

So first I want to read a translation by Andy Olendzki from the Study Center. He likes to translate poems from Pali to English. And this is a poem of a nun, Soma, with Mara. Mara is the personification of delusion, the personification of kilesa, of temptation. There are often these dialogue poems with both nuns and monks and the Buddha, where Mara comes and tries to say, "What are you doing? You're wasting your time. You're too stupid. You'll never do it." Whatever he thinks will seduce them.

So in this poem, she enters this grove to practice and Mara comes and wants to make her waver and abandon her commitment. Mara says: "That which can be attained by seers, the place so hard to arrive at, women are not able to reach since they lack sufficient wisdom."

And Soma thinks, "Who is this? I see you, Mara." And she answers—she's not thrown off at all. She says: "What difference does being a woman or a man make when the mind is well composed, when knowledge is proceeding on, when one rightly sees into Dhamma? Indeed, for one to whom the question arises, am I a man or a woman, or even am I something at all? To them alone is Mara fit to talk."

These women, these awakened women, they're tough and clear and strong just as equally as the men. And as Andy says, he thinks this is a definitive statement in the Buddhist tradition about the equality of the sexes in terms of awakening.

These women whose poems we have—of course we only have poems from the enlightened ones, same with the monks—they come from all walks of life and they manifest their awakening in all different ways. There's not one way to be, either before you begin your practice or after. Some became great teachers, well-known. Some lived quiet lives of a hermit. Some were just happy to run the community or just live quietly in the community. Some were reclusive, just as with the monks, living in all different ways.

One has to start with the woman who's kind of like the mother of the nun sangha—you can't really skip her—Mahapajapati Gotami, who was the aunt and stepmother of Siddhartha before he became the Buddha, because his mother died when he was a week old. His mother was the queen married to King Suddhodana, and her younger sister, Mahapajapati Gotami, was also married to the king. The kings had various wives at that time. So she really raised Siddhartha as her own son, and also his son, Rahula.

After he'd gone and become the Buddha, she was of course living with her husband the king. During this period, many of the men in the Buddha's family were leaving to become monks. Women at this time in this society defined their social status by their male relationships. They were somebody's daughter, somebody's wife, somebody's mother.

So when her husband King Suddhodana died, and then her son also went off to become a monk—Buddha was already the Buddha—there came a period where both sides of the Buddha's family, the Sakyans and the Koliyas, the two clans, got into a battle over water rights of a river. And they had a big battle.

And so, again, a lot of men were killed. The Buddha came to try to help them bring an end to the conflict. He gave such an inspiring Dharma talk that the fighting ceased, but then many of the men who weren't killed also went off and became monks with the Buddha.

It was actually at this time that Pajapati, being the queen and a natural leader, found herself along with many other women left without male relatives. So they started thinking, "Why don't we too renounce the world and wake up?" Not just because there was nothing else to do—which sometimes is why people ordain as monks and nuns even today—but really out of genuine aspiration. They too wanted awakening.

At that time, there was no order of nuns. As we've mentioned, during that period in India there were various wandering ascetic orders and loose cannons wandering around being ascetic as well. But the orders were all those of men. It simply wasn't done in that society. In a way, it was seen as a real threat to society to set up an order of renunciate women, because of course, the women hold society together. So no, that couldn't be permitted.

Mahapajapati went to the Buddha and asked him very sincerely if she might ordain. He listened, but he said, "No, sorry, Gotami. Please don't set your heart on women being allowed to do this." She asked the requisite three times, after which if the Buddha were ever going to say yes, he would have. And he didn't. He still said no. Then he took his bowl and went with his monks to another place on their regular tour, about a hundred miles away.

So Pajapati, along with quite a few women, cut off their hair, put on saffron-colored robes, and barefoot, followed the Buddha and the monks to the next town, to Vesali. They weren't accustomed to walking barefoot on the roads as the monks were. It's said that when she arrived at Vesali with a number of Sakyan women, she was standing outside the hall where the Buddha was teaching, her feet swollen, covered with dust, looking pitiful and crying.

This is where Ananda steps in. Ananda is also a cousin of the Buddha, so in some way related to Pajapati as well. They were all related back then—it wasn't such a huge scene. Ananda, having been the Buddha's attendant for twenty-five years, comes across as perhaps the most human of all the monks. He's kind, he's friendly. But whereas sometimes these days, if you encounter a great spiritual teacher, their attendant seems to serve the function of keeping people away, Ananda served the function of trying to get as many people in to hear the Dhamma from the Buddha as possible. He was always kind.

So he intervenes at this point. He asked, "It would be good, Lord, if women were to have permission to do this." And again the Buddha says no to Ananda: "Don't set your heart on this."

So Ananda thought, let me try asking in another way. He says, "Are women able, when they have entered into homelessness, to realize the fruits of stream entry, once-returning, non-returning, and arahantship?" These are the levels of awakening. And the Buddha says, "Yes, Ananda, they are able." It's really clear throughout—there's absolutely no difference in potential for awakening.

Then Ananda goes on to say, "Since they can realize perfection, and since Pajapati was of great service to you—she was your aunt, your nurse, your foster mother, she even suckled you at her breast—it would be good if women could be allowed to enter into homelessness."

And the Buddha goes, "Okay, all right." And at this point began the Sangha of Bhikkhunis.

What really comes across, of course, is that within the structure of the time, Pajapati was clearly a woman of huge faith—faith in awakening—but also real determination, a willingness not to simply go along with what she was told, which was how women were supposed to be at the time. She should just agree. But it was a very bold request. And she didn't say, "Okay, well, I'll just give it up and go back home." She was clear and strong in her faith, in her determination, and in her wanting to wake up.

So she became really the mother of the Bhikkhuni Sangha. From the time that she and all these other women were ordained, she was obviously the first teacher, but also a very powerful and popular one. Many women came to her. She's said to have lived to be a hundred and twenty years old, and when she died, the Buddha came to be with her. It is said—and this is in the mythology—that there were earthquakes and flowers falling from the sky. Second only to the death of a Buddha were there such miracles occurring on the earth to mark her passing. It's a way of acknowledging the strength of who she was and what she did.

Her poem says: "Homage to you, Buddha, best of all beings, who set me and many others free from pain. All pain is understood. The cause, the craving, is dried up. The noble eightfold way unfolds. I have reached the state where everything stops. I have been mother, son, father, brother, grandmother, knowing nothing of the truth I journeyed on, but I have seen the Blessed One. This is my last body and I will not go from birth to birth again. Look at all the disciples all together, their energy, their sincere effort. This is true homage to the Buddhas."

That's you, you know—disciples together with your energy and your sincere effort. It's homage to all the Buddhas and the potential Buddhas that each of us are. And I get a sense from her of how she's really the holder of the community, that what she looks out and sees is how all the disciples are paying homage through their sincere practice.

Just as in that time the societal structure really held women in a certain place, the Buddha recognized that in terms of awakening, in terms of the practice that's possible, there's absolutely no difference between men and women. That was already quite radical. And once he agreed to have the sangha, as I said, just as with the men, so with the women. He kept them quite separate, which was really essential in those days. It wasn't like mixing up. The bhikkhunis had their monasteries, and the bhikkhus had theirs. The bhikkhunis had their own teachers. They could come and hear the Buddha, and some of the monks would go and teach with the bhikkhunis, but they had their own systems.

Within the bhikkhuni order, the same as with the monks, the class structure of India at that time was absolutely rigid. Whatever caste you were born into, that's the caste you had to live in your whole life. They couldn't mix. There was one really low caste called untouchables, where if you were from a higher caste, you couldn't even take water from an untouchable person's hands. That stratified.

And once in the Sangha of either nuns or monks, the Buddha completely did away with that. The only sense of hierarchy within the nuns was when you ordained. Each person who came in—every ordained nun was junior to those who had already been there. Same with the monks. It didn't matter if the one who came in had been a queen and the one who ordained two minutes before her had been a prostitute or a beggar. It didn't matter. The prostitute, the beggar, was senior to the queen. This is radical in that time.

Who came to mind when I was thinking about these stories is a Thai woman named Bhikkhuni Dhammananda. Her Thai name was Chatsuman Kabilsingh. She was a professor in a university in Bangkok. When she was in her fifties—and I don't want to go too much into the politics—but in Burma and Thailand, the bhikkhuni order has fallen away, and the nuns only have eight or ten precepts, so they're not on a parity. Without getting into the politics, it's believed in the political system, and the monkhood is mixed up with the political system to some degree in Thailand and Burma, that bhikkhunis must have bhikkhunis present in the ordination ceremony. And since there are no bhikkhunis, they can't ordain new ones. It goes like that. And they don't recognize the Mahayana lineage—some do and some don't.

So Bhikkhuni Dhammananda, some years ago, went to Sri Lanka, where there are bhikkhunis who have been ordained in the Mahayana tradition. She came back to Thailand and began to open a nunnery. Now, this is really more than a political hot potato. But she is very well known and was quite a scholar. She wasn't just some person they could ignore or mistreat.

This is from an article, actually from years ago in The New York Times. It says the government and conservative monks and laymen accused her of intentionally creating problems to further erode the religion, which was plagued in that nation by numerous sex and money scandals in recent years. Just like everything, there are good monks and bad monks, good nuns and bad nuns. Don't be too idealistic.

But anyway, she said—and this is great—she said, "This is a conflict between ignorance and right understanding."

And she quotes the Buddha, who said very often that the health of the sangha, the health of the Buddhasasana surviving in the world, depends on four pillars: male and female ordained people, and male and female lay people. These are the four pillars of the Buddhasasana.

And so she said, "You know, I'm not trying to cause trouble. I just hope that allowing female ordination as bhikkhunis will strengthen women's status, strengthen the Buddhism." And she has no plans to seek official recognition. She said the recognition comes after trust. "I will prove that bhikkhunis are really a boon to Thai Buddhism. This is my mission in life."

So now she has this huge center outside of Bangkok. I was on the webpage last year sometime. She speaks English really well. She has talks online, and she's been ordaining temporary bhikkhunis, just tons at a time. So she's just in her not-so-quiet way, but steady way—she really is, in a way, trying to be the mother of the new birth of the bhikkhuni sangha in Thailand. So this is someone who's quite active today, in a way similar to Mahapajapati.

So back to the Buddha's time. The kinds of women and the stories of how they became nuns—they're all very different. First I want to tell another story, of a woman named Dhammadina, who after she became a nun was recognized by the Buddha as the foremost in teaching the Dhamma, the foremost in expounding the Dhamma, in preaching.

She was the wife of a man named Wisaka, a very important man in Rajagaha. They were quite well off—not a king, a businessman, but quite well off. And they had what was a very happy marriage. There are plenty of other nuns who had really unhappy, oppressive marriages and wanted to become nuns for that reason. Of course, their husbands wouldn't let them. But Dhammadina had a happy marriage.

One day, however, her husband had been out and heard the Buddha teach for the first time. When he came home to lunch—usually he would come in and they would chat, sit down and eat together—but this time he just walked by her without saying anything. Her reaction, as it's told in the story, is so typical. She goes, "Oh, he's angry. What did I do? Why is he angry at me?" And she got all worried.

But then he called her and said, "No, no, I'm not angry." He was so inspired by hearing the Buddha teaching that he'd had some kind of realization. And he decided he was going to renounce the world and become a monk. So he said, "I'll give you all my wealth. You can stay here with my wealth. You can go back to your family—I'll really take care of you. But I'm going off to ordain with the Buddha."

So she thought about it. It had never even occurred to her that this was a possibility before. But she said, "You know what? I want to do that too. I also want to ordain." So he said, "Great!" And he sent her off with great fanfare and a golden palanquin—you know, where you're carried—sent her off in all this state to become a nun.

And so she did. She went off, practiced intensively, became an arahant, and was this great teacher. Then she was going back to Rajagaha, where lo and behold, it turned out her husband never went to become a monk after all. He was still just hanging out there in Rajagaha. But he was still really interested in the Dhamma. She just had more energy and more faith.

So when she came back—and this isn't just a poem in the Therigatha, but actually a whole sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya—she comes back to Rajagaha and her husband, her former husband Wisaka, comes up and he's eagerly asking her all these questions. Very subtle questions, just one after the other after the other. And she's answering them as best she can.

And he's just pounding her with questions. She says meditation is the focusing of the heart. He says, what are its outward signs? She says its outward signs are the presence of four kinds of attention; four kinds of right effort are needed. And he kept on going and kept on going, and finally she said—and this is a whole sutta—"You will never get to the end of your questionings. So go, if you have more questions, go and ask the Buddha."

So he went. And of course, when you've been questioning another monk or nun, you always go and report to the Buddha what you asked and what they said. So he did that. And the Buddha praised Dhammadina, saying, "Dhammadina possesses learning and great wisdom. Had you asked me, I would have answered exactly as she did. Her answer was correct, and you should treasure it accordingly."

This is actually a very high form of praise—but more than praise, it's a statement. They call it a buddhavacana, the word of the Buddha, which is really a rare example of saying there's an equivalence in this statement between her wisdom and the Buddha's wisdom. It's a very strong statement about her.

So that's Dhammadina. And the person she reminds me of, whom I wanted to tell you about, is a nun who lives in Burma today. Her name is Daw Yuzna. I've met her quite a few times. She is a very serene, calm, and very strong person—maybe mid-forties, I would say. She's a teacher in the Mogok Sayadaw tradition, which is a different technique and emphasis from the Mahasi Sayadaw tradition. Those are probably the two main strands of Vipassana meditation styles in Burma, with Pa Auk Sayadaw perhaps being the third.

She lives in a monastery where the Sayadaw, a male monk, is the abbot. But she is really the well-known one, the famous one—Daw Yuzna. People come from all over to ask her questions, to ask her advice, to make offerings to her. She's a very strong teacher, very calm. I've never seen her flustered or upset. She can be very friendly and loving—joking around is perhaps too strong a description, but there's a warmth to her.

She has these dogs that bark like crazy when you come. They're just barking and barking, and they come and be quiet, but only for her—not for anybody else in the monastery.

She told us once her story. She wanted to become a nun, but her parents wouldn't let her. Finally they agreed when she was about nineteen, but only for a year. After that year, she really wanted to stay, and her father was actually quite mean to her, even beating her, trying to get her to stop being a nun. But her will was so strong, her commitment and faith so strong. She just loved the Dhamma, loved practicing, loved sharing. You can feel this sense of power and strength and calm inside of her—it's just how she is. She emanates that quality. She simply loves the Dhamma.

And she has amazing energy. We went to visit her one time on her birthday, which is often when people will offer a big feast. So we arrived, and she's cooking. She's offering a feast to everyone in the monastery—cooking it herself, making the dessert. And then out of the meditation hall come about one to two hundred yogis, men and women. Oh yes, by the way, she's teaching a ten-day retreat to these yogis, just her. The Sayadaw wasn't teaching. She's teaching it, making this meal, hanging out with all the visitors. That's what she's like.

It's not common for a nun to be teaching huge retreats to mixed populations like that. It's a statement of the power of her understanding.

And then after Cyclone Nargis, which was three years ago—which was really sort of like Katrina here, in the southwestern part of Burma—just hundreds of villages were destroyed. People died.

Lots of young kids were orphaned, or their parents lost all their way to support themselves. And so she just got the clear message in herself that she's in Yangon, that she needed to start a school for orphaned and poor girls—just for girls.

She is such a force of nature. She didn't just build a little shack, which some other nuns we know have done. She does have a few more resources because she's so well-known. She starts raising money. She built this huge three-story building. She said she wants to make it a school that's really good. So she's hiring really good teachers, paying them much more than the public school pays the teachers. She had about 200 girls from young all the way up to 10th standard, which is like graduating from high school—which not that many Burmese kids get to. And now she's even hiring some computer experts and looking for computers to help the few girls who finished the 10th standard to learn some more. Amazing.

And this is all on dāna. She has a very precise budget. She showed us her budget—our friend Ari Anani translated it; it was all in Burmese. Very precise, complex as it would be for such an undertaking, because half of the girls live there. So it's not only the building and the teachers and the materials, it's the food and the clothing. All on dāna.

So for instance, we came and gave her from some of the dāna various people had offered us, maybe $200 or $300. And she said, "This is great, now I can meet my payroll this month." It's like month to month. She needs something like 300,000 kyat a month, which is in the neighborhood of $300 to us, but that's really a lot of money over there. Every month she needs that. And she's just completely serene, trusting it's going to come. "Great, okay, good, I can pay the teachers this month." She knew if it hadn't been us, it would have come from somewhere else.

And she's still teaching retreats, and she's still seeing people. This is just one example of a really powerful woman teacher who's also trying to support young girls as well as she can. And she's kind of fun to hang out with.

She told us this last time—there were just a few of us, and she was talking in Burmese, so she was really speaking from her heart. She was talking about this school and how she, of course, wanted to help the young girls who didn't have parents, didn't have a way to schooling. But she said, and she just seemed so sincere, "Of course, my motivation in all of this is the Dhamma. Behind everything I do is the love of awakening and wanting to be able to offer to these girls the chance to really understand the Dhamma and awaken themselves. Everything else is extra, but that's why I do everything that I do."

She's really quite an amazing person. So that's Daw U Zana.

There are many nuns in the suttas who became nuns not like Dhammadina—just "Oh yeah, sure, why not?"—but from amazing, really intense suffering in their lives, where they were just at their last wit's end. And of course, afterwards, when they awaken, they have so much compassion and understanding of suffering that they become powerful teachers for other women in suffering.

I'm going to really condense this next story. But this is one of those out-there stories where you think it couldn't get any worse and then it gets worse, and you think it couldn't get any worse and then it gets worse again.

This woman was named Patācārā, from a well-to-do family, but she fell in love with a servant. Of course, in those days it was arranged marriages. But she fell in love with a servant, and they ran away and got married, which was just beyond not done. So they had to go to another town and never see her family again.

When she got pregnant, she wanted to go back and see her family. But understandably, her husband wasn't so thrilled with that idea. So he put it off and put it off, and she had the baby. The second time she gets pregnant, same thing. He keeps putting it off. He doesn't want to go. But finally, she's just about to have the baby, and they start walking to the other village. She's some distance away, maybe a couple of days' walk. But she was too pregnant. She starts to go into labor in the middle of a field.

And it's about to start storming. So her husband goes off to get leaves and brush and build a shelter. But he gets bitten by a poisonous viper and dies. So she's lying there having the baby. She doesn't know what happened to him. She has the baby, stays there, and then she doesn't know what to do. The next day, she gets up and starts walking, finds his body, filled with grief. Really nothing to do but walk on to her family.

Because it had rained so much, she comes to a river that's way swollen. And she thinks, how can I get across this river with the newborn baby and her little two-year-old? So she decides, okay, I'll leave the baby on this side, walk across with the two-year-old, and then come back.

Yes, you're right. The two-year-old gets swept away. She's completely losing it. She looks back and a big bird of prey has come down and taken the little baby while she's in the river.

So she's pretty much losing it, but goes on to her family's village. She gets there and sees smoke rising up, and she says to someone, "Where's my parents and my brother?" And the person says, "Ask me anything else. Don't ask me that." She said, "That's the only thing I want to know." They had all just died in a fire.

You see, it couldn't get worse.

So she went crazy. She just went completely mad. And her name, Patachara, means "cloak walker." Her clothes just dropped off. She's just walking in circles. She's just mad. And people, being how people can be, would chase her away and throw clods of dirt at her. They didn't want her around.

At one point, she came to where the Buddha was preaching. And the people tried to push her away, make her go away—she's naked, she's embarrassing, she's crazy. But the Buddha went and got in her way. He went deliberately up to her and said, "Sister, recover your presence of mind." And she did. Then someone gave her a cloak so she wasn't naked. And she said, "Help me, please help me." And out poured her whole story.

And it said that the Buddha said—and this is really this kind of powerful teaching—he didn't say, "Oh, you poor thing." He said, "Don't think you have come to someone who can help with that. In your many lives, you have shed more tears for the dead than the water in the four oceans."

And this actually calmed her down a little bit. Then he went on and gave more teachings about how when we ourselves die, no one else can help us. No one can be with us. Even when we're alive, in the depth of our suffering, even our kin, our family, cannot take our suffering away from us. This is how it is.

And then he preached the Dhamma. And she really was back in her right mind. She said, "Yes, may I become a nun." And the Buddha says sure. He takes her, goes with her to the Sangha of Bhikkhunis. And the Sangha of Bhikkhunis ordained her.

She had to practice for a while. She wasn't one of these who in five minutes completely woke up. But she became, obviously, a very powerful teacher. It's said that she's the one who's mentioned the most in other poems as someone who's helped.

And her awakening poem—I like it because it describes her moment of awakening.

So I feel the immediacy of it. Also that it wasn't so easy for her.

She says: "When they plow their fields and sow seeds in the earth, when they care for their wives and their children, young Brahmins find riches. But I've done everything right. I followed the rule of my teacher. I'm not lazy or proud. Why haven't I found peace?"

Can you relate?

"Bathing my feet, I watched the bath water spill down the slope. I concentrated my mind the way you train a good horse. Then I took a lamp and went into my cell, checked the bed and sat down on it. I took a needle and pushed the wick down. When the lamp went out, my mind was freed."

She wasn't even in meditation. She was walking into her room, sitting on her bed, pushing the wick down on her lamp—just being here. Her mind was freed. And she became a great teacher for those in suffering.

Here's one of the poems by another woman named Chanda that Patachara helped: "I was in a bad way, a widow, no children, no friends, no relations to give me food and clothes. I was a beggar with a bowl and stick and wandered house to house in the heat and cold for seven years. But I met a nun who had food and drink, and I went up to her and said, take me into the homeless life. She was Patachara. Out of pity, she guided me in leaving home, encouraged me, and urged me to the highest goal. I took her advice. It wasn't wasted. There are no obsessions in my mind."

Notice that food and drink. The first thing Patachara did was feed her. She was hungry and ragged and cold, and Patachara fed her, then taught her the Dhamma and supported her. Metta and karuna flowing directly from understanding suffering, combined with really straight teachings. It's a great one-two combination.

If you want to think of a current-day person, Dipa Ma is absolutely the best example of exactly this combination. She wasn't a nun, but she embodied this path of becoming a practitioner and awakening through meditation, of incredible suffering in her life that took her almost to the point of death and madness, and then becoming such a loving and really strong teacher.

Her story, incredibly shortened: little Indian lady, married to an Indian man in a very loving marriage, but for maybe twenty years they had no children, which was really devastating in that culture that was all about having children. They had moved to Burma where her husband was working. Finally, after twenty years, she got pregnant, but the baby died. Then she got pregnant again, and Dipa was born, who survived. Then she got pregnant again, and that baby was born and died very soon. She went into such a depression, actually started having heart problems. Then her husband died. She went into not just depression but became so sick with her heart that she was just in bed. She could hardly get out of bed for months, for years. She could barely take care of her daughter. She was really on the point of death.

She had wanted to go to the Mahasi Center to meditate when she was married, but her husband always said, "Wait till you're older." But finally, on the point of going crazy and dying with nothing else to do, she went. It's said she was so weak that she almost had to crawl up the steps to get into the center to sit. She starts sitting, and of course, she's one of these "in one week" people. She had such strong samadhi and such amazing paramis that she had some enlightening experience within a week. She went home, took care of her daughter Dipa, and went back again after a while. Amazing, amazing paramis. She really transformed. She had very, very deep depths of awakening.

After some time of her practice, those who knew Dipa Ma were fascinated by her transformation. She had changed from a sickly, dependent, grief-stricken woman into a healthy, independent, radiant being. Dipa Ma herself said, "You have seen me. I was disheartened and broken down due to the loss of my husband and children and due to disease. I suffered so much. I could not walk properly."

But now, how are you finding me? All my disease is gone. I am refreshed and there is nothing in my mind. There is no sorrow, no grief. I am quite happy. If you come to meditate, you will also be happy. There is no magic. Only follow the instructions.

That might be our problem. Only follow the instructions.

Okay, so she has some paramis. We'll give her that. Amazing suffering leading to really quick awakening on her part. And then, as I think I was saying, she was renowned for just beaming love, just being so filled with love for whoever was there. But not only love—this really straight teaching as well.

The first thing is she was really clear that it's not just about sitting meditation. It's not just about being on retreat. That waking up, that the practice is about everything we do. She was really clear about this. So she didn't become a nun. She had Deepa, and she went back to India, and they lived together in this tiny little one-room apartment in Calcutta for the whole rest of her life with Deepa and Deepa's son. And she would just welcome anyone who came, all day, every day, and teach them. She said, "As long as they want to come, let me share the Dhamma with them." She was, again, like a mother to all in the Dhamma.

This is one example of how she believed that awakening is possible in any environment. She devised practices that her students could do at home. So one woman who was trying to raise six young children alone, with no way she could even sit down and meditate, never mind go to a meditation center—Deepa Ma taught this woman to notice very steadily the sucking sensation of the infant at her breast with complete presence of mind for the duration of each nursing period. This amounted to hours each day. And as Deepa Ma had hoped, Malati attained the first stage of enlightenment without ever leaving her home.

Cool, huh? We've got no excuse.

So this is love and commitment, but also she was really strong in her teaching. No mincing words. This is another story from another Indian woman who was one of her students, Sudipti. And this is very straight:

"When my son died in 1984, Deepa Ma shocked me with her words. It was a hard teaching I have not forgotten. She said, 'Today your son has gone from this world. Why are you shocked? Everything is impermanent. Your life is impermanent. Your husband is impermanent. Your son is impermanent. Everything is impermanent. Your money is impermanent. Your building is impermanent. There is nothing that is permanent. When you are alive, you might think, this is my daughter, this is my husband, this is my property, this car belongs to me. But when you are dead, nothing is yours. Sudipti, you think you are a serious meditator, but you must really learn that everything is impermanent.'"

Coming from someone who knows, and from a field of boundless metta, it's not like it's easy to hear. But the conditions are there to let it in. And it's really, really powerful to just be in the presence of someone with this degree of compassion and this level of understanding and the ability to share it.

Than one other suffering story, from another nun I know. Not such a brilliant attained person and not a known teacher, but one who is a representative, I would say, of many, many of the nuns in Burma who have enormous purity and faith and compassion and dedication. And I'm sure it's the same from the time of the Buddha. Most of the nuns and most of the monks, we don't know anything about, but they are enormously dedicated fields of purity and wisdom.

So this nun, her name is Uttara Tengi, and her younger sister is Uttama Tengi. They have a little nunnery near one of the meditation centers where I sit. Again, after the cyclone Nargis, a lot of nuns moved to this area in the outskirts of Yangon and started building. They would get a little bit of land that someone would buy for them, and they would build. So these two nuns, with the help of their brother, their actual brother, built for themselves this little shaggy nunnery. The walls are plaited bamboo, which lasts about a year, and the floor is plaited bamboo, which lasts six months as a floor. They just suddenly show up there, these two sisters and ten little girls that are nuns.

So we got to know them. We got to know them because we were going around trying to see what some of these nuns needed—there are lots of nuns in this area—offering support to the ones that just somehow through their vibe, or through talking with them, felt really sincere, with some sense of purity and commitment. And they just had such a sense of love and purity when we would hang out in their little place that we just got to know them better, offering them support.

And then we came to know their story. Again, because we were with Aryanani, who can speak Burmese and translate—it really helps.

So Uttara Tengi, who is the older one, just has this brightness. You can just feel it. You're drawn to her. You just kind of light up. She and her sister, along with some other siblings, were living down in the delta area. Their family were small farmers, but okay, well enough off, could hire a few helpers. But slowly over the past few years, they'd gotten poorer. She didn't really say why, as have many people in Burma. But they still had their land and they were still working.

But she began in her late teens to develop some kind of illness. No one knew why, but she was getting weaker and weaker. After some time, she was just in bed all the time. She couldn't work, and the family was struggling. They were selling their jewelry to try and get doctors and find out how to take care of her. She said she got so weak it was to the point where if her arm was lying next to her on the bed, she couldn't lift it up and put it on her chest. She could hardly even talk because she was so weak.

But she heard her parents talking, saying, "Well, we have nothing else, but we need to get more money to take care of her, so we need to sell our house." And she heard them. They didn't know she heard. She said, "No, no, no, no way. Let me become a nun. Then you don't have to take care of me."

But instead of saying, "Oh, yeah, good idea," the parents said, "No, no, we don't want you to become a nun. Please, let us take care of you."

But she insisted. So they said, "Well, only if your younger sister becomes a nun with you can you become a nun." The sister was sitting there, so we asked, "Well, how did you feel about that?" She said, "Oh, I always wanted to become a nun. So this was great for me."

There was a Sayadaw in that village that they really respected, and he agreed to ordain them. She said on the first day after she became a nun—within two days—she got so much strength back that she could start walking. Just two days after becoming a nun, and she could start talking. She just got better and better.

I was telling this to Jack Kornfield. He goes, "Well, what she needed was good therapy." Then he stopped a minute and goes, "Oh, I guess she did get that."

And so, just a side story: We were in their little house. Every nunnery, every monastery is going to have a little shrine area with a Buddha statue and flowers.

And they had this beautiful little shrine where they would bow and do their chanting every morning with the young nuns they were teaching. She pointed to it and said, "Do you see that Buddha statue?" It was a sweet little statue. "Well, when we ordained, we both had really beautiful long hair, down to our knees. And of course, we had to shave it all off. So we sold it." I guess there's a use for hair. And with the money from selling their hair, they bought that Buddha statue. Ten or fifteen years later, they still have it. Their grandmother and family were all crying when they shaved their hair and became nuns, but the two sisters were so happy.

They went to Yangon to study. Many nuns in Burma study extensively—they learn Pali, study the suttas, study Abhidhamma. They take this series of examinations, the same tests as the monks. It's a five, seven, ten year process, and when you finally pass them all, you become what's called a Dhammacharya. These nuns were studying intensely, going on alms round, and practicing.

After studying for some years, they were thinking, "Well, now we're ready to go to a meditation center and really learn—to wake up." But just then, the Sayadaw from their home village, who had been supporting them and was their teacher, their guru you could say, was getting old and sick. He had been taking care of some young orphan girls. So he wrote to these two nuns: "Now you have to take care of these ten little girls. I'm sending them to you."

They were like, "Whoa, we didn't think of that. We were going to go and meditate."

But as they're telling us this, we're sitting in their little monastery with the ten little girls they've been living with and taking care of for the last two or three years—teaching them Pali and Burmese and English, sewing their clothes, teaching them chanting. They just did a complete turn. They said, "Oh, okay. This will go fine."

They came and built this tiny monastery with their brother's help. And they were totally committed to taking care of these little girls who become little nuns—very, very cute little nuns, various ages, sweet, laughing. There's so much love. They're all sitting there while we're talking.

And again, Uttara said with such sincerity, "We really want so much to be able to offer them the chance of a decent life. Otherwise they'd just be on the street, somebody's slave, somebody's servant. Here we're teaching them to read and write, teaching them the Dhamma, teaching them what it means to be a good person. And when they grow up, if they want to stay nuns, great—then they can take care of and teach the younger ones, and we can finally go off and meditate. And if they don't want to become nuns, that's fine with us. At least they know how to be good people." They said, "We're totally dedicating our life to this."

This was spoken with so much sincerity. Joy—not just "okay," but joy to be able to offer this.

This is one of countless examples of nuns raising orphan girls like this, or girls whose parents are so poor they beg the nuns to take their children even if they only get to see them once a year. When you come out of there, you're just so filled with light and happiness. And these are quiet people. No one's ever going to know them. They're examples of probably hundreds. I could name you ten other nunneries with similar kinds of stories—maybe not the story about the sickness, but really very inspiring and very alive. You can feel it's like a realm of purity, of sīla, that you really can feel when you walk into a place like that.

So that's another suffering story. Just two more.

Khema, from the time of the Buddha, offers perhaps the most striking example of immediate awakening. She was the consort of King Bimbisara—not the queen, but a consort, which was nonetheless a very prestigious position. Kings had many wives, many consorts. And Khema was very beautiful, very rich, and very conceited.

Bimbisara, the king, was one of the Buddha's followers, and he would try to get Khema to come with him to listen to the teachings. But she refused. "I don't want to go hear that," she said. "He's talking badly about wealth and beauty and sense pleasures. I'm not interested."

So Bimbisara decided to trick her. He hired a singer and poet to compose songs about the beauty of the grove where the Buddha was teaching—this beautiful park, this exquisite setting. Troubadours strolled around singing where Khema would hear them. And of course, she couldn't resist. So she went.

What I love about this story is how relatable it is—the way we resist hearing the very thing that's going to bring us happiness and freedom. We hold on to what's actually keeping us suffering. For Khema, it was her beauty, her love of sense pleasure.

So she arrives, and of course the Buddha knew how to teach everyone. Using his psychic powers, he created the image of an incredibly beautiful woman—a hundred times more beautiful than Khema. She saw it and thought, "Wow, she's really beautiful." Then, slowly, slowly, he had the image age and decay. The woman grew old, her teeth rotted, she fell apart.

Khema got it. Really got it. "Oh—that's going to happen to me too."

The Buddha said, "People devoted to physical beauty are bound to the world by this attachment. When you renounce this world of attachment, you're truly free."

And she understood. Khema is a rare example of a layperson who became an arahant on the spot—right there, listening to a dharma talk. She became known as the nun with the greatest insight, and also a great teacher.

This reminds me of someone I want to tell you about briefly—Sister Dipankara. She is a nun trained by Pa Auk Sayadaw, the teacher who's currently at the Forest Refuge. His method involves very deep absorption jhana as a foundation, then using that concentration for vipassana. It's a program that many of us could never complete, and if we do, it takes months and months. He's there for four months, and when we asked him how it was going, he said, "Four months isn't really long enough."

We met Sister Dipankara some years ago when she was visiting here. She was describing the whole process, which we didn't know. Several of us three-month teachers were sitting there listening, our mouths dropping open. She described this amazing process—the depth of samadhi and jhana, then vipassana, watching the kalapas in the eye, the earth, air, fire, and water breaking up in each tiny molecule, on and on. Then she mentioned that she had completed all of this in a week.

Sister Dipankara is a force of nature.

She now has a meditation center in Maymyo, in northern Burma. We visited her last winter—quite a lovely spot. She teaches there two months a year, offering retreats for Westerners, for foreigners. The rest of the year, she travels around the world teaching. She speaks excellent English.

When you're in her presence, she's loving and kind, wanting to make sure you have enough to eat. She invited us for this wonderful meal, but she didn't eat with us—she went off to be by herself. So she comes out, totally loving, kind, thoughtful, and then she's off, and who knows where she is, in the day's pleasant abiding. A force of nature.

There are still women and men like this today—with such deep and immediate understanding.

I just want you to know that this is existing in our world today. It's not just something that happened at the time of the Buddha.

I'll end with one poem from the Buddha's time, from a woman named Uttama:

The Buddha taught seven factors of enlightenment. They are ways to find peace, and I have developed them all. I have found what is vast and empty, the unborn. It is what I've longed for. I am a true daughter of the Buddha, always finding joy in peace.

So let's just sit quietly and find joy and peace for a moment.

CHAPTER 68

Mindfulness with Right View

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this heartfelt talk from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson reminds practitioners that all of the Buddha's teachings—including meditation techniques—serve one purpose: understanding how suffering arises and ceases in each moment. She emphasizes that awakening doesn't mean external circumstances become pleasant, but rather that we see clearly enough that confused reactions simply don't arise.
> Wilson explores the concept of yathā bhūta (things as they have come to be) and how accurate recognition differs from intellectual understanding. Using the simple example of a child learning to match shapes with holes, she illustrates how insight works: when we truly see clearly, the frustration and reactivity naturally fall away without effort. She discusses sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view)—the habitual tendency to take experiences as 'me' or 'mine'—showing how this fixation creates suffering even with ordinary sensations like heat or sound.
> Drawing from teachers including Ajahn Sumedho, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, and Sayadaw U Paṇḍita, Wilson emphasizes that wisdom cannot be forced through willpower but arises naturally through persistent, moment-to-moment mindfulness. She encourages practitioners to trust the simplicity of present-moment awareness, recognizing that reality reveals itself when we stop overlaying our ideas onto experience. The talk concludes with a reminder that this entire practice unfolds one moment at a time.

Sometimes years ago when I was traveling by airplane in Myanmar, between cities, before it was more open, the domestic airlines were rather unreliable. Often they would just leave fifteen minutes early. You'd just miss the plane because they felt like leaving early.

Just coming in, I was sitting here for a moment or two. As I was walking in and seeing some people doing walking meditation outside and in here and sitting—as many retreats as I've taught or sat, which is quite a few—it still really touches my heart. It's not every moment, but when I was walking in here, it really touched my heart: the sincerity of all of your practice and what it takes to come here. Just the sincerity of intention to give six weeks or three months of your life to this, let's face it, really kind of strange activity in the normal world. It takes such dedication and commitment to hang with it. So I just really had a moment of appreciating that.

I think I can speak for all of us when I say that when we offer these Dhamma talks in the evening, it's really with the simple intention, the wish that something we say may be helpful, supportive in your practice—to help invite you into really opening your heart and mind into this moment, to explore and understand the Dhamma, your own heart and mind, more deeply.

So here we are, a few days in, maybe two or three, beginning to settle in, finding some sense of ease or just finding your space, beginning to find your rhythm. It was nice for all of us, I think, to start meeting with people today. We start to feel some sense of connection as there's just this sea of people. And also maybe you're starting to see—which is normal, what happens—that already three days in, maybe it's not going exactly the way you thought it ought to go. Maybe something's coming up that wasn't in the game plan. Might be something lovely, might be something difficult, might be something unbelievably boring. But it might be that you're just settling in and starting to work with the instructions, the technique, the skills, and that's great, that's wonderful, that's what we're here to do.

I just want to remind us of the context within which we're hopefully doing all this, of which the Buddha taught. I find for myself that it can be a little bit easy to get thrown when things aren't happening according to our memory of the past retreat or what we thought. Or we can be really engaged in trying to get the instructions, the technique right, trying to get it to work correctly, trying to do it right, whatever it is.

Just to remind us: all of the Buddha's teachings, the heart of his teachings—it's not about how to meditate well. That's not the end point. The instructions he gave are in support of, as he said again and again, helping us understand how we suffer and to free our hearts and minds from confusion, from suffering. That's really the deep motivation of his offering, his sharing all those years of his life, and the motivation of all the people who've carried the Buddha's teachings through all these centuries.

Hopefully we can keep remembering this, because I know at times I can certainly forget and get caught up in the minutiae of either the technique or fighting or trying to make something happen or trying to figure out what it all means. But to remember to connect for yourself with that deep inner motivation, the sense that the context of all the Buddha's teachings is to really free our hearts and minds from the habits, the confusion that keeps us re-emerging and spinning into suffering.

He said sometimes—I like this quotation—he says, "Do not settle for anything less, not even wholesome states of mind." I know I can find in myself, when there's been a struggle and somehow it gets cooled out, I come out of retreat and think, "Yeah, there's not so much aversion going on. There's more equanimity, there's more loving-kindness. This is really pretty okay. Good enough." He's saying no, don't settle for good enough.

This isn't to make us miserable. When we think about the potential, when we take refuge in Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha—the potential of each of us as human beings—when using these techniques, all the different Vipassana techniques (and there are many; we can just offer some), they're all in service of activating the quality of wisdom, of clear seeing, of accurate recognition in our heart and mind. When the mind is meeting this moment of life with clarity, without confusion, that's a moment when suffering is not created. That's really the depth of what he's offering and what we're doing here.

So saying not to settle for less, don't settle just for wholesome states of mind—that's not to put down wholesome states of mind. We like wholesome states of mind. Wholesome states are good. We choose wholesome over unwholesome, usually, except when we don't, and that's why we're here practicing. But it's meant to be, and I experience it this way myself, actually a huge inspiration, a strength. It gives confidence, the sense that this is our potential as human beings: to really understand how suffering is created in a moment in our heart and mind, and how suffering ceases in a moment in our heart and mind, and to really at some point come to the end of that.

That can give us the confidence, the strength to hang with it when it's not going the way we thought it ought to go or the way we think it should, to hang with it when it gets a little bit tough. And you're here for six weeks minimum or three months. If it doesn't get tough—

Something's wrong. There's no way it's just pleasant, pleasant, pleasant. Life just isn't like that.

Okay, you don't have to raise your hand, but just think: how many of you really believe, if you look secretly in your heart and mind, that waking up means it does get pleasant, pleasant, pleasant? All this unpleasant stuff—that's because you're doing something wrong, right? If you really got it down, all these difficult mental states, these unpleasant sights and sounds and physical sensations, not to mention unpleasant other people—that would all cease. Because enlightenment, freedom from suffering, means everything we don't like goes away. It sounds silly when I say it out loud, doesn't it? But just check in your mind. Next time your mind is going, "This can't be right, I can't do it," just check what's the idea back there. "No, this shouldn't be happening. If I could really meditate, this wouldn't be happening. This can't be part of Buddha Dharma."

So anyway, the sense of the potential to free our heart and mind can serve as a huge support, a refuge. In whatever way it works for you at different times when you're finding it difficult, take time to just reconnect. Go inside, see what's motivating you, what keeps you going. Just remembering that's really the heart of what the Buddha was teaching.

So what does that mean practically? Understanding how suffering is created in a moment, how it goes away in a moment. What's he talking about in terms of suffering, which we know?

First, to say that in my understanding—my limited understanding—everything the Buddha shared, which as you know is tomes and tomes of teachings, was to free our hearts and minds, not so that we think we have to embrace and memorize a new philosophy. It's not about just taking in more information and then saying, "Okay, now I'm a Buddhist and I believe X, Y, and Z." Because that doesn't help us at all. The information can be useful, I'll get to that, but that's not what he's sharing. He's not saying, "You've got to believe this."

There's a very well-known phrase, maybe you've heard it many times, from the Buddha: Ehipassiko. It's an invitation. He's saying, "You too, come and see." He's offering all these different ways of describing how he experiences being in a human mind and body, how he experiences suffering arising, how he experiences suffering ceasing—so many different ways. But he's just offering that as a piece of information inviting you to turn around and look at your own mind and body experience moment to moment to moment. And see if it's so. See if it's true.

That's what Thich Nhat Hanh means when he talks about the miracle of mindfulness. Maybe you've heard him say that. It really is a miracle—this simple quality that Guy spoke about last night and that we will be speaking about in different ways, probably mentioning it once or twice the rest of the six weeks at least. This quality of simple, total presence with what's arising, but what's actually arising now—not our ideas about it, not our memories about it, not what we think about it, not what we wish it was, not our assessment. Just simplicity of what's happening now, which isn't so easy to do.

The power of that to cut through the confusion, the distortions of perception we don't even know are operating, and allow for accurate recognition, for clear seeing—the power of this simple quality of heart-mind is amazing. It doesn't make rational sense, really, so forget trying to figure it out. You'll save yourself a lot of grief.

One definition I like—not of mindfulness, but of Vipassana meditation—comes from Sayadaw Tejaniya. He says, "Vipassana meditation is experiencing the mind and the body directly from moment to moment"—and that's mindfulness—"with the right understanding, with wise understanding, with right view." That's the quality that comes in with mindfulness. When Guy said last night that mindfulness can have a quality of wisdom, that's what we mean: the quality of total presence of awareness, of knowing what's happening without being distorted by the overlay of our ideas about it. And this is so much not the way we live our life. It's just somehow not the way most of us have been conditioned.

So, when the Buddha was talking about suffering—the suffering that we can come to understand, the suffering that clear seeing can free our hearts and minds from—what was he talking about? He says it's not externals. If you look at the tales we can read about the Buddha's life after he was awakened, and for some reason it took me years to kind of notice this: he woke up, the peaceful one, free from suffering, into the same world. When he got up from that Bodhi tree, he was still there in Bodh Gaya in India, needing to walk around barefoot and eat and figure out what to do with his life, dealing with the heat and the bugs. And there was still...

war and violence and oppression and hunger and racism and unfairness and injustice and beauty and his family—the whole deal. None of the externals changed.

And not only that, he was still walking around in a body that had headaches and backaches sometimes, had to go eat every day, had to go out every morning, walk around in the village with the alms bowl and get some food. Not always so easy. He just goes, you know, it's nice. Who knows? Some days the Buddha got a lot of food. But it's even said that what he died from was some food that was given to him that was unknowingly tainted, poisoned, and he died from that. But we're all going to die from something.

When you look at that, I think there's that secret mind back there imagining that when you wake up, everything's going to be nicer externally. No. So what was the suffering he was freed from? What was the difference?

And of course, I'm not in a Buddha's mind. I can only say what I can understand from his teachings and my experience. But really understanding that the suffering he speaks about, the root causes of suffering—and you've heard many times—the kilesas, the torments of mind, the root causes being habits. Mental states, mental qualities that are habits. Not the essence of our being, but habits of confusion that lead to clinging, to greed, that lead to hatred, to aversion.

These habits of mind arise when we don't recognize what's occurring in this moment accurately. They arise in response to, in reaction to, whatever particular experiences are going on. And when we respond or relate to an experience with one of these distortions in our consciousness, when we don't recognize accurately, our response may be a little bit off and it can kind of escalate. Have you ever had that when you're having an argument and you each keep misunderstanding the other person and it just keeps spinning out of control? It's sort of like that.

What changes is the suffering that arises from misperceiving experience and then just kind of goes off into orbit with all our reactions and responses. That suffering, when there's accurate recognition—oh, it's like this now—that other stuff doesn't arise. It's really quite amazing.

So our job, or one of our jobs, is with this ehipassiko, with this interest, this willingness to watch moment to moment what's going on in our mind and body here. That's what this is—a laboratory. Same mind and body we have outside of here, but all the extra distractions are gone so we can see the habits, how the mind and body works. We start to see what are the causes of suffering, what are the causes of the cessation of it.

As Mingyur Rinpoche says, we can start to recognize this interplay of cause and effect in our mind, in our experience, how cause and effect conditions our mind and shapes our experience. If we want to be happy, we must figure out which causes and conditions lead to well-being. Similarly, if we do not have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how could we possibly expect to free ourselves from it?

What the teachings are saying is that it's perfectly natural—we do all want to be happy. But without even quite recognizing when the confusion is present, when the misperception is going on, we don't really deeply see or understand what are the causes of happiness and suffering. So with all the good will, the good intentions in the world of trying to make ourselves happy and others happy, it keeps not quite doing it, right? I mean, if it really did it, you wouldn't be here. But sometimes it does it.

Years ago I studied—way back, a long time, another eon—when I was in college, I studied behavior modification. And they said the thing that keeps behaviors going the longest is when it's rewarded in an intermittent way. So if it's always rewarded, if every time we misperceive and think this is going to make me happy and it always makes you happy, and then suddenly it stops, then it stays stopped, then we learn it doesn't work. But if it works once in a while—you get the thing, it makes you happy, that craving really worked for you, it made you happy—never mind the next seven thousand two hundred and thirty-five times it doesn't. The next time, it makes you happy again. And so we keep thinking, oh, that's what happiness is. Because we haven't cultivated this quality of moment to moment to moment interest, loving, kind attention.

Mindfulness isn't to change anything. It's not to create a different experience. It's to be as present, to really surrender into this moment just as it is.

Physical experience, mental experience—and just see, it's like this now.

So we're not creating a new reality. Far more simple. When we talk about right view, the right understanding—I like the translation of sammā diṭṭhi as "right view." It works in English for my mind because I think of it as very literal: right view, accurate view, accurate recognition of this moment of experience, free from the distortions. And then the suffering reactions drop away.

So I've been using this simple example all summer. Those of you who heard me this summer, you're going to hear it again. I have a young nephew, and it's been fun watching how kids learn, because he's the first nephew in my family at my age. It's really fun to watch.

So this example—you know, he's only three. You know wooden blocks, right? One of those things where there's a big tray with different shapes: triangle, circle, square. The kid has the blocks in each of those shapes, and you put the right block into the right hole. In the beginning, he'll see me or his parents put the triangle in the triangle, but he just sees block going in hole, looks like fun, but doesn't get the shapes. So he tries to put the triangle in the circle and the square in the triangle, and it doesn't work. And it moves into little kid frustration, right? Big frustration.

Of course, you can't enunciate too much at that age, but I could imagine taking this simple example into stuff we do, like: "What's the matter with this? There's a secret they're not telling me." Or: "I can't do it right. What's the matter with me? They can do it right, but I can't. There's something wrong." Or: "This whole game is completely messed up." All the frustration, all the stuff that comes from it. And the more he can't do it, the more frustrated. I've had friends who say about their computers, "You just want to take it up and throw it out the window." Many of us have felt like that sometimes. Well, a little kid might do that—pick up the wooden thing and throw it against the wall.

So all of that reactivity, that's clear suffering. And then you keep doing it, and one day, maybe it seems like a mistake at first, the triangle goes in the triangle. It's like, wow. The square goes in the square. It's like, wow, that's great. He doesn't really see how. But then it twigs, you know? This is just normal learning. All of a sudden, the perception clears. It's like, "Oh, I see this shape. I see that shape. They go together." And it's just so simple and obvious it isn't even fun anymore—but it also isn't frustrating anymore.

So you see how when you see clearly, all that reactivity just vanishes. We don't have to make it go away. We don't have to overcome it. It's not arising in that moment. And don't think because it's not arising in the moment, it's really sitting there, a quagmire pool deep in your heart of frustration and negativity. No. When the seeds are planted, they can come out again until we're completely free. But it's really, when it's not there, it's not there. Be really mindful of that too, really experience. In a moment, everything's only this moment. Moments of frustration, but also moments of the cessation of frustration.

So you get a sense of what I mean with accurate recognition. When we talk about insight—insight, insight meditation—to me that's a really good metaphor for how insight works. Insight isn't about getting more information. Insight doesn't have to be that you have this amazing, light-filled experience and everything's blown out. Sometimes it happens, and it'll go away again. But insight is the moments that the kleshas—the greed, hatred, delusion, the torments—aren't clouding perception. There's clear awareness, and wisdom can come.

It's like, ah, it's like this now. Aha. And something is understood. Something is known, to use the language that Guy was reading from the sutta—it's known in that way. Not intellectually, but cellularly. Ah, right, the square goes in the square. It's just laws of nature. You don't fight it anymore; it's like trying to fight gravity. It's just the law of nature, it's how it is.

So insight isn't like, "Oh, now we're going to see something that didn't exist before." It's that in a moment, the consciousness clears and we see more accurately: Oh, this is how it is. This is how it's always been. We just didn't see it clearly before.

When we talk about the steadiness, the collectedness of attention and the steadiness of mindfulness—I think I mentioned it last night as well—with steady awareness, part of what we start to see through is the characteristics of all phenomena: of being impermanent, of being unsatisfactory, that there's no lasting happiness, of being not me or mine, that there's no inherent self-sense.

It's not that now things are permanent and if you have an insight into impermanence then everything starts changing. Right? You know that, right? But we don't really know that. Because we act often as if things are permanent. We certainly—well, maybe you don't, but I certainly act many times as if there's definitely a solid Carol, or this is Carol's, or this is Carol. It just feels so obvious.

So it's not that that stuff changes, but we recognize more accurately the way things are, and then the suffering, confused reactions—they just don't arise. When you see something's really just ephemeral and falling apart, in that moment, when you really are getting it in your gut, clinging to it for happiness doesn't arise because it's so clearly confused and a source of suffering. But when we know it intellectually yet haven't really got it in our gut, we say, "Oh, I shouldn't cling to this because I know it's going to go away"—but that doesn't really do us a lot of good, does it?

I want to give a simple example of why we can't think our way into accurate recognition—into seeing, "This is how things are now, this is the way things have come to be." That's one very classic phrase in the Buddhist teaching: yatha bhuta, things as they have come to be in this moment. I love that because it gives a sense of not-steady-state. In English, "this is how it is" gives a sense of stability, doesn't it? This is how it is. This is Carol, a solid, steady thing.

But "things as they have come to be in this moment"—to me, it brings all the different conditions, innumerable conditions. If you start trying to enumerate all the conditions you can even think of that came together for you to be sitting here now, you really can't ever stop. It goes all the way back to the Big Bang. Really.

But just this moment is just how it is. And with all those conditions, this particular moment couldn't possibly be different. How could it be different? Because it's like this now. But now this next moment's already a different moment. So there is no steady state at all.

But that's so often not how we perceive. And I can't, with an act of will, decide, "Okay, now I'm going to really recognize accurately that everything's shifting, everything's impermanent." I can think that, but that level of insight perception where, oh yeah, it's a triangle—and all the confused reactions just fall away—you can't think your way into that, even when we know.

That's why we have this steady practice. That's the miracle of steady mindfulness. It's setting up the conditions for reality to reveal itself. It's not for me to sit down and decide, "Now I'm going to be mindful, mindful, mindful of breath, breath, hearing, hearing, now I'm seeing impermanence, seeing impermanence, going to see impermanence." It's not that. It's just to be really present, moment to moment. And reality is how it is. It reveals itself—if we would quit trying to put our ideas on it so hard.

But we can't do that with an act of will.

Here's a simple example I like of how all the conditions in our life affect our perception—how we perceive something, whether we like it or don't like it, even if we want to perceive it differently intellectually.

There's a musician I really appreciate, a classical cellist named Yo-Yo Ma. Perhaps you've heard of him—he's very well known in the European classical style of music and lives in Boston. I really appreciate his music, but even more I appreciate what I've seen of his being, because he seems very open, very inclusive, meeting each new experience with this sense of open wonder and interest, which to me personifies mindfulness. Like, "Wow, what's this?"

Quite some years ago, he organized a group he calls the Silk Road Project. Some of you probably know about it. The Silk Road, of course, is that whole area of the world from the Middle East through Turkey and Central Asia through to China—what used to be the trade routes from the Middle Ages between Europe and China. What he did in organizing this was getting musicians together from all these different countries: musicians who play instruments, who compose, who sing, bringing them together to play.

But it's not as if they say, "Okay, now here's a Mongolian piece of music, and we'll all play this Mongolian piece. Now here's a North African piece, we'll play that. And now here's a European classical piece, we'll play that." It's not that at all, not that sense of separation. Rather, they get the musicians together in different groupings, and someone writes a piece specifically for those particular musicians. You might have someone from Central Asia, from Turkey, from Mongolia, from North Africa—they may all be together. Someone writes a piece for them, and they'll be playing the different instruments from different places, different vocalizing like Mongolian overtone singing, different tones, different scales, working it together, making something completely new.

I love the idea. I think it's so far out. I keep buying the CDs. I really, really want to appreciate and enjoy listening to it. And I don't. I keep trying. My mind loves that he's doing this, that these people are working together, making something new. But the conditioning of the kind of music that this particular mind-consciousness enjoys hearing isn't that. The different tones, the different rhythms—it's like, "Oh." So every few months I try again.

It's not that it's good or bad or that you should or shouldn't enjoy something. I'm just giving this as an example of how the conditioning of our lives affects our perceptions—what we find pleasant, what we find unpleasant. And we can't just change it because we want to.

Something like that is just interesting to see. But on the level of these really basic habits of perception—not recognizing impermanence, or the unsatisfactoriness that arises because things go away, or perceiving a sense of solid self where there isn't one—that's so deeply ingrained. We've practiced it so much that it doesn't even feel familiar; it just feels like the way things are. We don't even recognize when those particular misperceptions are operating. Certainly not when we're just going around in daily life, if we haven't developed the habit of bringing mindfulness to our body and mind.

But if we keep bringing mindfulness to our moment-to-moment experience here, we'll start to see it. And the thing is, when we start to see these things, not to think, "Oh no, here's sense of self again! When am I going to get rid of it?" No, no. I mean, you can think that if you want, but it's not helpful. Instead, you think, "Wow, yeah, look at that. That's how sense of self arises in a moment. This is the effect it has." Mindfulness, awareness, can notice that as well as anything else.

There's nothing in our experience that need be outside the field, the realm of mindful awareness. If you find yourself saying, "I can't be mindful because this is happening," let that be a clue. "Wow, this feels like this." Don't do anything about it, but widen the field of mindfulness. "Oh, this is happening. It's like this now," to use Ajahn Sumedho's language.

So insight doesn't come through an act of will, but through the long process of steady awareness.

I want to talk a little bit then, in terms of wrong view—the misperception—just in a light way, to say a few words about what is in some way the core one: the sense of wrong view called sakkāya-diṭṭhi, translated as personality view, sense of self. This is a perception that arises in many moments of presence, one that takes any particular experience that's occurring as being me or mine.

When we talk about our moment-to-moment experience here, breaking it down the way the Buddha talked about it at the most simple, elemental level—and I think someone may have talked about this already—there are six sense experiences: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching with the body, and all mental experience. As your awareness begins to get a little more steady, you notice that's what's happening all day long. There's a thought, mental experience. There's seeing. There's hearing. There's sensation in the body, sensation of breathing. There's hearing, seeing, a thought, an emotion. All these six sense experiences are just arising and passing, arising and passing all day long. Have you noticed that? There's no time all day long that they're not happening. There's always something awareness and mindfulness can notice. If you ever attempt to come in and say nothing's happening, we're not going to let you get away with that. There's always something going on.

Now, if there are thoughts, sights, sounds, sensations, we're not taking each sight, each sound as me or mine. That would be—I hope you're not, because it would be unbearable, wouldn't it? I mean, how many sights and sounds and thoughts and physical sensations have you experienced today? Can you even come close to a number? I'd say millions, who knows? If every single one of them was me or mine, can you imagine? You'd just be tossed around—oh, that sound is me, I don't like it, oh, this sound, no, this sound. Well, we do that with enough stuff. I don't know how we get through life, really.

And you see this here when you're just walking. If you're doing walking meditation outside, there are many sights and sounds that come and go. You're more or less aware of them, and they're just coming and going, no big deal. And suddenly one sound arises, or one sensation arises, and somehow the attention and energy of mind isolates it, fixates on it, even if just for a second. Not the fixation of clear recognition and mindfulness, but fixation with a kind of gripping: "Oh, this sound isn't okay." It's already gone into "my hearing isn't happy with this sound," or a sensation.

It's easier to see this with sensation. When you start to get quiet, you'll notice there are lots of sensations, just little bloop, bloop, bloop, bloop coming and going all day. And suddenly there's one that's really like, "This is my knee," you know, or whatever it is. That sense of privileging a particular perception, a particular experience, as being me or mine.

Of course, we don't announce it. We don't get a big neon sign that says "Sakkāya-diṭṭhi rising, sakkāya-diṭṭhi rising, watch out." We don't, because it just feels normal. So we go, "This sensation—this isn't okay."

Let me take something more—not pain, but say, earlier today when I was down at my place looking at this talk, and suddenly it just felt so hot and humid. Normally I like the heat, but it was just so hot. So I was sitting there. I wasn't noting because I was thinking about this, but I was aware of hot, heat. And then all of a sudden, "Oh my God, it's so hot." You get a sense of the difference? By that time, it wasn't just the attention identifying with the heat. It had already, in that amount of time, gone from heat to unpleasant to "it shouldn't be this way" to "it's affecting me" to "I don't like it" to "what can I do?" Really fast, there's a whole story going on—the reaction, the heat, what can I do?

And then when I walked in here, "Oh, it's so cool in here. How nice." If I'd remembered it was air-conditioned, maybe I would have thought, "I need to go up to the hall, it's air-conditioned."

We want to do something, we want to fix it. But it's not that you can't do something about it. The suffering that was going on—it was the same heat that it was the moment before the attention glommed onto it as "my body feeling uncomfortable." The same heat. The suffering wasn't the heat. The suffering is all those reactions that come when there's a moment of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, taking anything as being me or mine. It goes on all the time. The attention gets glued to the object, and then the whole series of reactions happens in no time.

Don't waste time judging this. This is fascinating. Just to see this is the habit of how our human minds work.

When we say ehi passiko—come and see for yourself—don't believe anything I say, and don't dismiss it either. Look and see. And when we see sakkāya-diṭṭhi rising like that, that's great. Awareness can notice, "Oh yes, sense of self is like this." Keep the steady awareness going and notice the effects of it. What are some of the effects? You keep noticing. Because the more there's accurate recognition through mindfulness, that's when wisdom can come in and the reactions that cause suffering start to drop away.

You can often do it like the example I'm giving. I whipped it up a little bit—I wasn't really in horrible, terrible, suicidal suffering. It was just, "Ugh." But then I could see that happening because my mind had been quite fine a minute before. I could ask myself, "Do you really want to get all whipped up about this?" Sometimes you can really notice that and recognize, "Yes, this is aversion. No, heat is like this." Just come back to the heat, don't feed the aversion. It's fine. Sometimes it's much bigger and we can't do that. But we can keep the mindfulness going to see what's really bringing happiness, what's bringing suffering.

Chökyi Nyima Rinpoche says we want happiness, but the causes of happiness—understanding selflessness, loving-kindness, compassion—we don't always give so much attention to these qualities. Instead, the habit of our mind is to get more involved in the suffering, in the difficult states of heart and mind. We get more involved in the reactions. It's more what we're used to. It's more what feels real. Almost like it's so habitual we take refuge in the wanting, in the aversion, in the sense of self, just because it feels like home. As we know, home isn't always comfortable, but it's home.

So start to explore this as you go through the days. Just see. It's just hearing, seeing, touching—and all of a sudden, "me." Notice the effect.

Lama Drimé describes it beautifully. He says when we're just being present with things as they are, it's all nature. We aren't separate from nature. There's whatever's arising due to causes and conditions—the sound, the sight, the sensation, the bird singing—it's all arising, and we are part of it all. But as soon as that sense of self, that fixation on a particular experience comes up and isn't seen, everything starts to solidify. When we hold to a certain experience as "me," he says we go from the vastness of things as they are to getting locked into the narrow bandwidth of "me, human being, separate from everything else." Just feel that sense of narrowness.

The Dalai Lama speaks to this in a book I was using a lot this summer called The Book of Joy, which captures a series of conversations between him and Archbishop Desmond Tutu from South Africa. You all know who Archbishop Tutu is? Both are Nobel Peace Prize winners, and Archbishop Tutu chaired the Truth and Reconciliation Council after apartheid ended in South Africa.

In these conversations about dharma, about joy, the Dalai Lama says the paradox is that although the drive behind excessive self-focus—and I'm translating "excessive self-focus" as the mind just fixating on something as "me" or "mine"—is to seek greater happiness for yourself, it ends up doing exactly the opposite. You become disconnected and alienated from others when you focus too much on yourself. With too much self-focus, when it's all about me or mine—and at times it's like that for all of us—our vision becomes narrow. And with this, even a small problem appears out of proportion and unbearable.

Have you ever noticed that? That's a big thing that comes up on retreat. Some little thing is just so unbearable, so exaggerated. That's okay. We have a term for it here—we call it "yogi mind." When suddenly there's wanting or aversion that's so strong and so important that it takes over your world for a while.

We call it yogi mind. It's exaggeration. Someone bursts into the office and says, "I've gotta have Tom's toothpaste or I'm just gonna die," with that kind of energy. So this narrowness that comes.

And then Bishop Tutu, what he adds to that—he comes soon to the concept that we have at home in South Africa, the concept of Ubuntu. The concept is that a person is a person through other persons. You realize that in a very real sense, we're part of a profound complementarity. I could not speak as I am speaking without having learned it from other human beings. I learned to be a human being from other human beings. We belong in this delicate network. It is actually quite profound. Unfortunately, in our world, we tend not to recognize we're part of this network until times of great disaster.

He gives examples about how that can happen. I was just listening today to the news on the radio. They were giving examples of these horrific hurricanes that happened in the last couple of weeks. And of course, you can hear all kinds of stories about horrible things—violence and looting and all—but you also hear uplifting stories. I just heard one today that's exactly what he was talking about. I thought I'd share it because it's just sweet. But why does it have to wait, he said, till times of great suffering to feel, to recognize that we're all part of this network, not just me and you?

So this is in St. Thomas, in the Virgin Islands, where ninety percent of the homes were damaged or destroyed. Ninety percent. Unbelievable. And this story is about a small nursing home where only twelve elderly people live. All but three of them were not able to get out of bed, were not able to walk. So when the hurricane was hitting, in the rooms the ceilings were being blown down, the walls were being blown down, glass was shattering, flying into the rooms, and they couldn't get up by themselves. The few people working there—one of the nurses said, "We were just trying to hold the door shut so it doesn't blow in. There were just the three of us to try and move everyone."

But right next door to this nursing home was an institution, a lockdown institution for adolescent boys—young men who had either committed crimes or were in trouble, like a pre-jail kind of thing. They were in this place next door, locked down. But I guess they opened it up. And several of those young boys, seen as criminals or whatever, they came over and in the dark with no electricity, they moved all the elderly people into the dining room where they could all be there together. And then they stayed with them in the dark all night because there was no electricity, protecting them because the windows had shattered, glass was flying everywhere, the wind was flying everywhere. So these young guys stayed with these elderly people and protected them all night.

They were talking to the woman who was running the nursing home, and also the person running the lockdown facility. They were both so moved, so touched. And we are too when we re-recognize—it's like re-recognizing what's already been true—that we're not so separate.

So in little ways here, it's not about that, but in little ways just watching how the sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi comes up, and when it comes, notice that sense of separation or just the sense of suffering, if it's there. Notice when it's not there. We don't have to wait for a disaster. We can really watch, moment to moment to moment, because the truth reveals itself.

That's what I love about the Dharma. It's not that we have to figure it all out in our mind and then do the right thing and make that happen. We can't. If you could give that up, you would do yourself so much good. And just trust, moment to moment to moment, simple awareness. That's what I love. The wisdom arises through the steadiness of awareness, and the way things are—yathā bhūta—it reveals itself. We actually don't know how it is, so we can't think our way into it. We just really trust again and again the simplicity and honesty of moment to moment: What's happening now?

"I'm so confused."

Oh, confusion is like this.

You think, "What? I came here to say confusion is like this? I don't think so. I came here to get really clear."

Oh, wanting is like this. That's happening. Oh, sensation of breathing. Tightness. So what? The breath was like this before. I get it. Let's have a new breath. Let's have something to... Ah, that's wanting. Wanting is like this. Again. Again. Again.

Just this moment. All there is, is this moment. Sati, mindfulness of just what is occurring in that simplicity, in that moment, is a stepping out of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. It's a stepping out of reactivity, a stepping out of misperception, and just being present with this moment. You don't have to make a big story—just being present with things as they are.

Sometimes we think—this is something Ajahn Sumedho says. He's an American man who's been a monk in the Thai forest tradition for forty or fifty years. I find him quite inspiring. In terms of talking about this sakkāya-diṭṭhi, this personality view, he discusses noticing this tendency to fixate on an experience, a sense of self. Often we think we shouldn't talk about this stuff or look at this stuff until we've been practicing for quite some time because it's so difficult, so subtle. And it makes people crazy.

But he says—and this I really believe, which is why I'm bringing it up—just to look at it lightly. He says, "Why should I practice for twenty years from delusion? Why should I spend twenty years practicing from that motivation of achieving something for me, which is so confused?" We can start practicing, we can start to recognize sakkāya-diṭṭhi now. A lot of the time we won't, but sometimes we can. It's just another arising experience, a way that the mental factor of clinging or aversion relates to a particular experience. Notice how it behaves. Notice when it's gone. And even with sakkāya-diṭṭhi—don't take it personally. It's just a habit of mind.

We all have personalities. And guess what? I kept waiting to get a new personality. We don't really get a new personality. Maybe it kind of gets a little mellower around the edges or something, but we don't get a new one.

So this is our meditation. This is the work of our meditation. All the techniques and the tools are to help us cultivate the simplicity of present moment mindfulness. But the steadiness, the clarity, is really where the power comes. So that's why we say—and when Guy was talking about the connecting and sustaining—that's just in one moment. But it's that sense... let me put it in completely different language, in case you didn't like that language. Or maybe you don't like my language, then ignore my language and listen to Guy. That's why there's all different ones of us; we all speak differently.

Thinking of connecting, think of it as just completely relaxing with presence into the experience. It's like this now. And the sustaining is just being there with interest and noticing how it changes, if it changes, how it behaves. That's it. Sustaining is just keeping the attention with what's happening. It's not trying to sustain the experience—that's not seeing impermanence. Sometimes people say, "I'm trying to sustain this sensation, but then something else arises." I go, "Yeah, hello, that's what's happening. That's what's happening."

What we cultivate as we expand the instructions over these days is the moment to moment to moment steadiness of mindful awareness. Even if the objects are changing, the collectedness and the steadiness get stronger and stronger and stronger. And it's this steadiness, this continuity, that reveals the confused habits of mind. If we're just mindful here for a minute, then we space out, then we're mindful here—

I mean, we do that now because we're just learning. It takes setting up the conditions for the steadiness to come. But if we don't understand why we are going on about this steadiness, this persistence—if we don't understand why—then we think, "Okay, that was a good sitting. I deserve a holiday now. I'm going to go do whatever, not pay attention, and then I'll come back and I'll walk and I'll really walk and I'll really do it. Okay, that was good. I put in my effort. Now I'm going to take a little holiday."

And you can do that. It's tiring. It's not so satisfying. More satisfying is the steady relaxing into this moment. This moment. As Guy said last night, you put your fingers together—how much effort does that take? Not much. But this moment. This moment. This moment.

And again, the beauty of the way things are, the Dhamma, the laws of nature, is that the truth reveals itself when we're able and willing to be steady with our kind and loving attention. Not to make it be a certain way, but simply to see: oh, it's like this now. It's like this now. It's like this now.

So this is really our practice.

I want to end with two Burmese sayings. First is from Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "As mindfulness is remembered more and more frequently, gradually it develops its own momentum." We don't have to keep remembering—it starts to do itself. We come to appreciate the moments of awareness. We come to appreciate them more than our entrancements with the reactions of mind to whatever is arising. Steady mindfulness is the condition for wisdom and insight to arise.

And from Sayadaw U Pandita, the same thing in a different way: "When mindfulness is persistently and repeatedly activated, wisdom arises. There will be insight into the true nature of body and mind."

So that's our practice. But it all boils down to only one moment—not the whole day, only right now.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 69

Aspiration and Courage

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the challenging moments that arise when our expectations about practice collide with reality. She explores how our unexamined views about what meditation should look like—wanting pleasant experiences, expecting quick results, believing insights should be permanent—create suffering when practice doesn't conform to our ideas.
> Wilson examines the Four Noble Truths (cattāri ariyasaccāni) through this lens, emphasizing the radical nature of the Buddha's teaching on dukkha and taṇhā (craving). She highlights a crucial insight: when consciousness is clouded by kilesā (mental defilements), we cannot trust our assessments of practice. Rather than trying to figure out what's wrong, she suggests simply recognizing this clouded state and continuing to practice steadily.
> The heart of the talk focuses on the practice of reconnecting with aspiration as a refuge during difficult times. Unlike goal-oriented craving, genuine aspiration turns the mind toward the wholesome, bringing brightness and energy without the narrowing quality of wanting. Wilson shares inspiring stories—from Burmese nuns caring for orphans, to Gandhian nonviolence, to a Tibetan refugee who spent seven years practicing in caves near Mount Kailash—illustrating how aspiration provides the courage to open into the unknown moment after moment. She closes with Śāntideva's bodhicitta aspiration, inviting practitioners to find what genuinely re-inspires their own commitment to awakening.

So tonight I want to just offer some thoughts about reconnecting to and motivating our aspiration and courage.

At this point on the retreat, I'm talking to various people, and it's totally the normal time when some people may be starting to notice that this practice can be challenging. Have you noticed that? And not in the way you expected it to be, which is really the main challenging part.

This is really normal. The first most obvious way is just that second week, third week, the hindrances come up, as John talked about last week. I don't want to go into those a lot, but that's just really kind of basic what happens. The way I think of it is like a two-year-old having a temper tantrum. You're saying we're going to sit and walk and pay attention to what's happening, and it's like, "No, I'm not going to, and you can't make me. I'll get angry, or I'll get into desire, or I'll just get restless or sleepy or doubt"—whatever, just sort of like that. And we just kind of go, okay, okay, okay, fine. You have your little tantrum. We keep on going. We keep on sitting.

So that's the least of it. The hindrances are the least of it. That's obvious, even though it's a lot of suffering.

There are lots of ways practice becomes challenging, but what I want to talk about tonight is that some of the ways it starts to be challenging is that really our ideas, our views—maybe not quite realized—our expectations of what practice is or how it should be going or what's good, they all get challenged one way or another. And we tend to take that personally and not recognize quite what's happening. This is why I want to talk about aspiration.

I could give the whole talk just giving examples of how that happens, but I don't want to do that because you each have your own examples. But just two simple ones that I've noticed from talking to people the last couple of days.

One way is sudden change in the practice. You're going along and you think, finally the mindfulness got more steady, or the mind got more calm, or things were happening fast, or whatever. In your mind, there's the view that this is good—either it'll definitely be more pleasant (we never think it's going well when it's less pleasant), or it's more easeful, or it's matching some idea you have. And then suddenly, through no fault of yours, it changes. It just changes. You're going along fine. You didn't do something wrong. And suddenly the clarity's gone. You don't know what's happening. Everything's flying all over. That calm and peace is restless. How many of us go, "Okay, that's what's happening now"? For a moment we try that, but secretly, we're trying that so it goes away, right? No, that's what's happening. Then we think, "What did I do wrong?" That happens.

Another way that people are seeing too, and we will more and more, is you're going along and you're really seeing things—you're seeing impermanence, say, in different personality patterns. Or just take something simple: the habit of wanting. Just wanting to be first in line for breakfast, for example. And seeing that, and the suffering of it, and really—the awareness really sees through it, feels the suffering of that wanting. In that moment it lets it go. And you think, "Wow, I really see in all the ways in my life I need to be first," the whole nine yards. "Yeah, I really got this."

I understand it. The suffering of craving and my personality patterns." And, you know, that's great. Really, there was wisdom seeing it.

And then the next day at breakfast, you're dying because you've got to be first in line. And you go, "Why? I saw this. I know this. It's over. Why is this happening again?" Or you come back to another retreat and you think, "Again? This? Again? Didn't I go through this to a great degree of suffering the last time? I got it. I've handled this." Apparently not.

You get a sense of what I mean, right? I'm not just talking off the top of my head—how we suffer from that, not so much from what's happening, but from the idea that it shouldn't be this way. Somehow I did something wrong in practice, or I understood it. Why is it back? There's a way we take it personally. And then what comes? Doubt. Huge doubt. In yourself or in the technique or in the Dharma or in what we're telling you or in whatever. And then the whole thing can start to spin.

It's not going to stay that way. This is normal. But I just want to speak to it, because what really could be starting to go on here—this is different from just the hindrances which simply come up—is in each of these simple examples, the big suffering is, of course, not wanting to be with the unpleasant and wanting the pleasant. That's almost always the bottom line, along with identifying with it. But it's also our views. Maybe we don't quite recognize they're in the background of what practice is supposed to be, how it's supposed to work, and then unrealistic expectations arise.

This, I think, is big time—certainly for me. Our tendency in this speedy culture is to expect results quick, quick. We're not getting it: this is a whole life process. And that's already quick. If you look at how the Buddha talked about it, he's talking about eons of lifetimes. We'll just stick to one. But Sharon always talks about the first year IMS was opened and they got mail addressed to the "Instant Meditation Society." That's kind of what we think. Okay, I saw it, I got it, it's over. Let's move on. What's new? What's interesting? Greed again? No, I'm not interested in greed anymore. I got that one.

I'm making this sound simple, but I think it's really about the radical nature, the profundity of what the Buddha is talking about—what real freedom from suffering is. We talk about it in the Buddhist context, but I'm not an expert on any other religion.

What I know of other traditions suggests that at the heart of any mystical aspect of religion lies the same kind of radical seeing through the normal, culturally conditioned habits of our mind on a very deep level. As I think I said the other night, the Buddha always said his teachings take us against the stream of the current—against the main part of society, not everyone, even then. And of course, externally, just coming to do this practice is really not the normal thing in the big picture.

What I want to talk about now is how we come up against the wall where our expectations aren't being met, where ideas we don't even know we're holding are being challenged. This is so unsettling to us. It's in the really subtle—well, sometimes they're gross, but also very subtle—habits of our mind that suffering is being created moment to moment.

The Buddha's teaching is radical. Radical in looking at this. It encompasses all aspects of our life. His teaching is that the real freedom of heart-mind comes in a moment, or altogether, when the heart-mind consciousness is free from the greed that is clinging—whether it takes the form of greed or aversion—and free from the delusion of not recognizing accurately, of taking it personally.

This brings us to the Four Noble Truths, which could be a whole series of talks on their own. The radical nature of the first truth is the fact of dukkha—the unreliable, unsatisfactory nature of all phenomena, all existence. This doesn't mean everything is bad or unpleasant, but that nothing is reliable in terms of lasting satisfaction. Everything. Just looking at life this way is profound. Most people don't even want to think that. And it's so radical because it's not just the unpleasant things—it's everything.

The second truth names the cause. The Buddha offered us tools to understand the cause of our suffering, and the understanding itself will free us. The word in Pali is tanha, which literally translates as thirst—this quality of craving that can manifest as greed wanting something, or as pushing away the unpleasant. It's not about the object; it's about this quality in the heart-mind, in consciousness—this leaning forward, this pushing back that clouds and distorts pure perception.

The real suffering of craving is that it keeps us from recognizing accurately. But more than that, when it's present and unrecognized, it keeps us from recognizing the liberating truth of the pure heart and mind, that radiant nature of heart and mind. Someone read that quotation about the potential of recognizing non-separation—that it's not me against the world—that Ubuntu I read from Desmond Tutu last time, the sense of connectedness. The real pathos of craving is not only that it's unpleasant in the moment, but that we hold on to it, and it's what keeps us from recognizing the truth. And the truth liberates. It's not that we have to figure something out.

The third truth is that there is an ending of this dukkha, this unsatisfactoriness, this moment-to-moment suffering that arises in our heart in a moment and ends in our heart in a moment. This is often called nirvana, and it's frequently described by the Buddha as the mind-heart in which greed, aversion, and delusion are not arising. The arahat, the so-called completely enlightened model, is one in whom even the tendency for greed, hatred, and confusion to arise has been cut off at the root—completely gone, not arising at all.

But along the way, even as Sayadaw U Pandita would say, a moment of mindfulness when those kilesas are not present—I'm going to use that word kilesa so I don't have to keep saying greed, hatred, and delusion, and I don't like the word "defilements"—when they're present and unrecognized, we can't see clearly. But in a moment when they're absent and there's mindfulness, wisdom, we can call that a moment of freedom. We can taste that. We can recognize as we go through our practice here: a moment of clarity, and then the next moment the wanting comes up, the aversion comes up, the sense of it's all going wrong comes up. That's why there's the fourth truth—the path, the way of practice, the way of life to work with this, to come to understand it. Because it's radical.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho, for whom the Four Noble Truths was really the major practice of his life: "Living the Four Noble Truths as a daily practice and understanding them as a profound reflection provides a context for your entire life. But to sincerely live in this manner is not easy in modern life with its conflicting push-pull forces and confusing cultural messages as to what is valuable."

I don't think it's just modern life, because the Buddha wasn't living modern life and he was saying the same thing. But as Bhikkhu Bodhi has said, it's a lot harder in an age of easy pleasure. I like that phrase—"an age of easy pleasure." The values of really understanding the Four Noble Truths, of renunciation and compassion and wisdom—it's a harder sell these days.

What I'm saying is that the radical nature of the Four Noble Truths and the subtle habits of reaction in our mind—the second noble truth, the craving, aversion, and wanting coming from identification with anything—these are so familiar. They just feel like the way things should be. It's cozy, like an old bathrobe you put on. That's where we take refuge. We recognize it sometimes in big things, but not when it comes around and starts to impact the way we assess or think about our practice.

And this is a sutta I love. Actually, I think Bhante referred to it—the two darts—the other night, where we hit ourselves with the second dart, aversion to something unpleasant. Well, the Buddha goes on in that sutta to describe how these habits of aversion and clinging and delusion are moment to moment arising and strengthened through this not recognizing what goes on, the ephemeral nature of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral sensation, just coming and going.

So he says very simply, whenever there's an unpleasant and the person beats their breast and laments, as Bhante said, then it comes to be an underlying habit in the mind of resistance to unpleasant. It just feels normal. You go up to anyone—not just on the street, anyone here—and you say, "Your hand hurts and it's unpleasant. Shouldn't you move away?" Yeah, right. Why should I stay with this when I can move my hand? Give me a good reason. And you can't really give a good enough reason when there's that mindset going on. But anyway, it becomes the habit.

And under that underlying habit—this is the Buddha again—of resistance to the unpleasant, the only escape a regular person, a worldling, knows is to go for some pleasant sense experience. That's the only escape an ordinary person knows from the unpleasant. So you experience something unpleasant, and we go to some pleasant experience. In the world it could be pick up the phone, turn on the TV, have some ice cream, go to your video, whatever it is. Here it might be the pleasant fantasy. Doesn't matter, but just to see—and to me that's so sad—that the only escape a normal person knows from unpleasant is to lust for pleasant. And so that becomes a habit, he says, that underlies the mind, this craving for the pleasant experience. And then he says when that's going on, in terms of neutral—you don't even notice neutral. What? And so then the delusion underlies from neutral.

So this is one example. We can see it in the big experiences, like my little story I made up of craving to have breakfast. We can see it, and then we're surprised when it comes back again. But as the Buddha was saying, as Ajahn Sumedho was saying, we're noticing a moment or two of this real mindfulness, really seeing through, being able to hang out for a moment of awareness with the unpleasantness of craving.

Wanting in itself is an unpleasant experience. So what do we do to get rid of it? We get the thing we want. Is it the thing we want that's making us happy, or is it that the craving went away? Check it out. You can just sit and be with craving, craving, craving, craving. It'll eventually go away. I promise. Because everything does. Keep paying attention. Often you feel that sense of peace. Oh yeah, because the craving's gone. Yeah, it'll come back.

But we may not recognize—well, we won't, because there are so many mind moments—how familiar these underlying habits of mind are. It's unpleasant. That informs, for so many of us, when there's not wisdom, it informs our worldview, really. When we're not quite aware, it shapes what we think is good, what we think is bad, what we think is good practice, what we think is bad practice.

And when you hit one of those moments I mentioned in the beginning—you know, it's going along fine and suddenly it all goes wonky and you think, "What did I do wrong?"—most of us, the mind's just going to start coming up with analysis. It just does that. That's okay. We can recognize that. But mostly, we sort of recognize it, but we're sort of in it. And mostly, the analysis itself is going to be informed by, if we don't quite recognize it, the worldview. You're looking at it through the lens of pleasant is better, unpleasant is worse. Something's wrong. And so already the confusion is distorting the analysis, and we go deeper and deeper into confusion and doubt.

That's why I really got this. Tejani is the one who first pointed it out to me, but I really see it so clearly now, and it's such a relief when I can recognize it—that once I recognize that my consciousness in a moment, my awareness is... I can be aware there's doubt, aware there's aversion or greed. But you know how sometimes the mindfulness really notices aversion, but you're really noticing it.

You can feel that the attention, the mindfulness is clear. You can trust that. Other times... not so much, right? There's aversion, but as someone said today, you also feel like you're embodying it. It's really here. Or doubt. Or greed.

When you know that, the thing that really is so freeing to me is this: because whatever thoughts are coming, whatever analysis, whatever you're trying to figure out is moving through that lens of kilesa, you can't rely on anything it says. It may be true, it may not be. You can't trust whatever assessment comes up because it's through the lens of kilesa.

Knowing that, for me, it's like a huge relief. The mind says, "I've got to figure out what to do. What's wrong with my practice? It's not like this." Oh God, you're totally in kilesa. It feels like this. All I can do is just sit and walk and notice as best I can and trust that steady awareness takes care of itself. "No, I've got to do something. I've got to fix this. That's not good enough." So just knowing that—okay, I just can't rely on anything the mind says right now. It'll keep on trying, you know. Okay, can't rely on it. That's really so relieving. If I could hand you that, I would love to.

So starting to see how quickly... I have to move along here, because what I want to get to tonight—there's many different ways to go with this. But when we're in the phase, at different times, of running into this kind of hitting the wall, not just that it's difficult, but you're feeling that sense of something being shaken up, something untrustworthy, you don't really know where to stand, your assumptions aren't really matching reality, your unrecognized views of practice are being challenged—it's really unsettling.

And sometimes, usually, it's unpleasant. What's occurring may also be difficult—physical pain, emotional trauma—so that's also difficult. And so you just don't feel like you have a handle on anything, right? For a moment, it changes.

But the point I want to talk about tonight, because over the last few years it's been more and more helpful to me—something I didn't used to call on so much. And that's to, at these times, rather than trying to figure out how to practice correctly—because it's through the lens of kilesa, you can't tell—just keep going steady. But tune into, reconnect with and tune into, what's your deep, your real motivating aspiration? In your life, in your practice.

There's no right or wrong. You can't do this wrong, okay? It's a way of—it can start with a reflection, but it's not like intellectually thinking. That may be how you start. And it's not that there's a right way it should feel. But when I find myself feeling shaky, worn down, low energy, I'm trying to remember to practice but maybe thinking why, or maybe it's just dry and dead, then I just take a moment. Really just get quiet with yourself. It can go different ways, but start by just remembering or tuning in to aspiration—how you began your practice, why you're doing it now.

Now I want to backtrack and say what I mean by aspiration. Aspiration is a form of intention, a form of motivation. The intention that just arises in a moment with any particular action of thought, of body, of speech—that's one intention. Aspiration is a more overarching, broader sense of deeper purpose. What's really important to me? It can become a support, a reference point, give us a sense of resolution and courage to keep being with difficulty for a larger purpose than what's immediately in front of us.

For example, not even particularly dharmic, but we all know that if you have children,

There's plenty of times—assuming you're a halfway decent parent—when you do something that wouldn't be what you would normally want to do, or that's really hard for you, or scary for you. But you do it without question, because it's for the well-being of your child, out of love for your child. You get a sense of what I mean? It's a bigger purpose, not just the moment-to-moment thing.

So in terms of aspiration in our practice, it's about tuning in. And this can change as we go through practice, as we have deeper understanding, as different things motivate us.

But how is aspiration different from craving a goal? The thing with aspiration, the way I'm talking about it, is that it's supportive in terms of turning our heart, mind, our consciousness to the wholesome. Say, for example—and it could be anything—at times my aspiration would be to really free the heart and mind from kilesa, to be of benefit to all beings. Those are the words. When there's a moment that my heart and mind are really in touch with that—wow, that might be a potential in this world—when it's an aspiration, the mind isn't looking forward, leaning forward, one eye on the goal. Because then you feel that sense of tanha.

Tanha can be for awakening, or it could be for an orange. It's the quality in the heart-mind that makes it tanha, not the object. And so you can feel when aspiration isn't wholesome—when you feel that narrowing, the frustration, the "I could never do this, I'm a piece of garbage." That's not aspiration. That's wanting and aversion.

But aspiration—it may be this sense of, "Wow, is that really possible?" And thinking, for example, the Buddha often said, "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so." Just think that. And so then it comes back as aspiration, bringing a sense of brightness, of lightness to the heart, to the mind. It can energize. It simply says, "Okay, I can be with this another moment." That's how aspiration is different from expectation, from wanting—which leads to doubt, frustration, and self-involvement. You can flip back and forth, but it's worth exploring. None of us would be here without some sense of aspiration.

As I say, the words I just spoke as an aspiration can really inspire me at some point. Or I could be lost in an aversive, self-judging mind state, say the same words, and go, "Yeah, fat chance. Who do you think you are?" Then it's not working at that moment. So I just want to say: find ways that work for you.

As you go through the days, it can be a kind of wise reflection to take time—at various moments—to reconnect with your aspiration. It may be words, or it may be something else. For me, this is what I've been doing more and more lately, and it really helps. It turns the mind to the wholesome, takes me out of self-identification, and brings in this real sense of: yes, this is the potential of this path. It does go against the stream. We need support in our aspiration.

With wise reflection, you can bring in a sense of what helps you reconnect. For me—and I'm just giving examples; you find what's true for you—at times it's different people I've met who are manifesting various aspects of purity of heart-mind, or different aspects of devotion. Different things that rekindle that quality in my own heart-mind. We're not inspired by somebody else, really. We're inspired because their example is touching that wholesome quality in our own mind-stream. Otherwise, it just misses us. We don't know what they're talking about.

Sometimes it's just remembering. When I'm with something a little difficult and I'm thinking, "I'm sick of this already. Let's move on to something else." I just remember: I really have a commitment to awaken, not just for myself, but to be of benefit to beings in this world. That gives a resolution, a sense of willingness to hang out with the difficulty another moment. It broadens things. If it's just for me, okay, a little aversion is good enough—not too bad, let's move on. But if it's for all beings, then no, that isn't good enough. That little bit of aversion comes out in something I say, and I can see it reverberate in the other person—which is, you know, me and the other, not different.

It's not okay—but in a way without judgment. Rather, it's a call to come back and be with whatever is arising.

I remember something Ajahn Sumedho shared about his early years in Thailand as a monk in his robes. You can imagine what those robes are like—they're not cool, not at all. And in the heat of Thailand, in the hot season under a tin roof, you just cook. I've known this from personal experience: you cook. And so he was sitting there, just sweating through his robes hour after hour, day after day. He said, "I just couldn't bear this another moment." And then he'd find that he could. In those moments when I feel I can't, I often say to myself, "What's so unbearable about this? Just for this one moment." And I find I can be with it.

That sense of tuning into the aspiration—not just for myself, but for greater benefit in the world—that brings courage, brings resolution, which is one of the paramis. This quality of willingness to engage in a wholesome way. So that's one approach.

Another way, as I was saying, is thinking of different people at different times who can inspire wholesome qualities of awakening in us. I'll share a couple of stories, but you'll have your own, whoever that person might be for you. And it doesn't have to be Buddhist, and it doesn't have to be that the person is totally perfect. If we're waiting to be inspired, to have our aspiration renewed, only by a completely awakened, perfect person—well, those are few and far between, aren't they? But wholesome, beautiful, awakened qualities are actually much more present here and there if we open to notice them and then take them in. They can really inspire us.

So, a couple of stories. I've been going to Myanmar nearly every year for at least a month since 2001, and I've come to know many nuns. There are many, many nuns in Burma. Most of the ones I know are relatively simple in their way of life. This one woman, Daw Uttara—Daw is just an honorific; women are Daw, men are U—she became a nun when she was around twenty because her health was really bad. She came from a farming family, a little bit poor, not desperately so in Burmese terms, but she was very sick. She realized her family was about to sell everything they had, including their house, to pay for her medical care, and she didn't want that. She had always felt drawn to becoming a nun anyway, so she ordained.

She had such faith. She'd had really long, beautiful hair. When she shaved it, she sold it, and used that money to buy her first Buddha rupa, her first Buddha statue. Many of the nuns I've met have Buddhanussati—recollecting the qualities of the Buddha—as their main meditation practice. This brings them great faith, great inspiration. It's not my practice. I find it beautiful, but it doesn't move me in that way. Yet being around the nuns who are devoted to this practice, seeing the quality of devotion and faith they bring into their lives—that helps to deepen my own aspiration to purify the heart-mind.

So Daw Uttara was a nun and eventually moved from her home village down in the Delta—she moved after a big cyclone when people lost their land and their lives. She was living near Yangon. She and her sister nun went to a meditation nunnery because they really wanted to focus on practice. Not all nunneries or monasteries are meditation centers, but that was really what she wanted to do.

Then her head sayadaw, her teacher in her home village, called and said, "No. There are these ten orphan girls. We're sending them to you to take care of." This is what many nuns do—they take care of poor girls and orphan girls from their home villages. There's no safety net, no other place for these children. Sometimes parents send their daughters because it's the only way they can get an education, or because they'll be taught good values, or simply because they'll be looked after. The young girls are sent, the nuns take them in, they become little nuns themselves, and the elder nuns care for them.

So Daw Uttara and her sister did a complete U-turn.

Her commitment was wanting to wake up and meditate. But now she had these ten little girls—now there are fifteen or twenty. And what I saw in her was this complete U-turn, not like "Okay, got to do this, I'll make the best of it." But a turning around in faith, in devotion—"Okay, now this is the life. This is what life is presenting, and this is the path of awakening." No question about it. And you can see there's so much love and so much friendliness and so much care for these little girls. It's not an easy life. But just to see that.

When I think of her—and I'm not saying everything's all perfect—but when I see that willingness to embrace whatever's coming with a heart of devotion, to stay true to one's commitment to awaken, yet recognizing this is what it's about right now: loving and caring for these little girls. She says, "Okay, when they're grown, and if they don't want to stay nuns, that's fine. But they've had these years where we've really taught them how to be a good human being, and we've kept them safe. They don't have to go out on the street, and they can choose whatever life they choose, but they've had a really good foundation." And then she can go off and meditate.

So that's one way. That inspires in me that sense of faith and surrender. It inspires me, and that's what practice is—not about getting it the way I want, but this willingness, this ability of total trust and surrender to how things are right now.

Sometimes I think of just a person, just their being. There's another teacher, a monk up in Sagaing named U Jatila. Very simple. He's the sayadaw of a very small monastery, only about three or four monks, up in the hills of Sagaing. We go to visit him every year. In fifteen years, he doesn't look like he's aged a day. He lives this quiet life, and he doesn't know too much English, but he's just so... you walk into the place and it just feels peaceful. He's a real metta being. And that's all. It's not like we have these great wisdom discussions about the Abhidhamma. Just this simplicity—kind metta, metta, peace. I just love being there. We go and hang out, we sit with him, we visit, and after fifteen minutes there's nothing really to say. He's had his visit, so then we go on our way. But I have his picture on my desk. I'll just look at it, and it will spark that quality in me, and that deepens again my aspiration, my willingness. Okay, let's keep on with this practice. Let's keep on with this awareness. It turns the mind to the wholesome.

Okay, here's another example—completely outside of Buddhism, a daily life one. Actually, it was just last week. One morning I was listening to the news. I can, as you imagine, get downcast. Sometimes just listening to the news or seeing how things are, I think, "What am I doing on this planet?" I feel like everything is the opposite of what seems important to me.

I don't know—I was telling Guy this and it didn't really go over with him, so maybe you'll also think this is a weird story. But anyway, here it is from last week. The last piece of the news was about a big ceremony in Moscow. They were unveiling a new statue, and over 200,000 people came to this ceremony. The statue—huge, as they do in Russia—five meters tall on top of a giant pedestal, honoring Kalashnikov, who died a few years ago. Kalashnikov, who invented the AK-47 and other such lovely weapons. They were really honoring him as someone who brought honor to the fatherland with his creativity and his integrity, on and on, with all these people gathered.

But that's not just about Russia—that's kind of not abnormal. And they said he wasn't around to see this, but he had been a little disappointed. He was proud of what he did, but he was a little disappointed that some of the people who used the AK-47 weren't the right people—like drug cartels used it, and criminals used it. He wasn't so glad about that.

So I'm just listening, and I find myself wondering: what world am I living in? Actually, that took me in a somewhat dejected direction. It was not deepening my aspiration in that moment. It was more like... huh?

But that same day, not long afterward, in my email inbox came a daily writing from a Christian mystic society. And it was talking about Gandhian nonviolence. The same day! I thought, you know, I just want to read a little of it because it's like, oh yes, this is also here. We just have to open—I just have to open my eyes and see it.

So it's from a longer work, and I found myself reading where he's talking about Mahatma Gandhi saying, "Love is the strongest force the world possesses, and yet it is the humblest imaginable. Living a nonviolent life is no easy task. It requires courageous love drawn from the very source of our being."

Then he quotes Thomas Merton on our dualistic mind: "See, evil is very cut and dried. This is good. This is evil. And the only solution is we've got to eliminate all evil." And then, this is from Merton: "Nonviolence, on the other hand, comes from an awareness that I am also the enemy and my response is part of the whole moral equation. I cannot destroy the other without destroying myself. I embrace my enemy just as much as I must welcome my own shadow. Both acts take real and lasting courage."

Gandhi, as you may know, coined the term satyagraha because "passive resistance" didn't capture the active and powerful nature of nonviolence. Satyagraha combines the Sanskrit word sat, which translates as "being" or "truth," with graha, which translates as "holding firm to" or "remaining steadfast in." So satyagraha, nonviolence, is translated as "truth force"—holding steady to the truth coming from within—or "soul force."

And that brought to mind, having read a lot about Martin Luther King, that "soul force" is really the language he used for the whole depth of nonviolence. This really courageous, incredible way of meeting horrific circumstances from an inner place of love that is only possible when it springs from connection with truth—whether you want to call it God or we'd want to call it Dharma, just the way things are. Reality is like this. When we're connected with that, in a simple moment when there's not kilesa, the thought of harming doesn't arise. The assumption that the only response to difficulty is aversion or harming—it's so clear that's not true. In that moment, you know.

And again, the soul force—there are people doing that, living from that, acting from that in the world now. John Lewis, the long-term representative in the House of Representatives from Georgia, in his autobiography talks a lot about this. He uses "soul force." He was one of the original members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, which led the Freedom Rides in 1959 and 1960 and helped organize the March on Washington in 1963. Just this sense of people now in the world still connecting to and acting from this depth of understanding.

"To create peaceful change, we begin by remembering who we are in God." This is the Christian language, but who we are in truth. Gandhi believed the core of our being is union with the truth. From this awareness, nonviolence flows naturally and consistently.

So again, this sense for me of finding in different places—and I write them down and I'm saying them to you—but as I say, it's because it re-inspires in me my own aspiration. And that aspiration is, in terms of my practice, just to find the courage, the willingness, the humility in a way, just for this next moment to show up. Not to figure it out, but to actually have the courage to know we're not going to figure it out. It's exactly not about our figuring it out. It's just the opposite of that. It's about freedom from clinging.

This freedom of heart and mind is absolutely uncompromising. There's not some part we get to exclude. And so as we practice, as the mind becomes more subtle, we're landing in our views. It includes all views, all our ways of understanding. Even with our most sincere intentions, our sincere practice, we're going to be challenged. We have to be, if the practice is working. That's why when you're having these difficult times, we know the practice is working. You think it's not, but we know it is. If everything's all nice and safe and secure the whole time, going just as you like it—nah, it's not really happening yet.

So with our most sincere intentions, we can't imagine what it's supposed to look like, how it's supposed to be.

You know, we want to know ahead of time. We want to know the path. We want to chart ourselves on the path. We want to know exactly where we are, even if that makes us feel like garbage because we're not where we think we should be. And even if we've read about the path, you've read the Progress of Insight, you know it all—that just makes it worse. Because you never really know where you are, and we want to know. And you can't. You simply can't.

So these times of confusion, they're really valuable. They're important moments in our path of awakening. Because what's required—we want to know where it's going to be, but what's required is this commitment, this willingness, this determination, this adhiṭṭhāna, which is just a moment of: "Okay, I can just be with this now." Like when Annie talked about it the other night, what Joseph calls "the sword of wisdom," where you just go, "Not now." It's not with aversion or clinging, but it's a kind of collecting of the energy: "Okay, I can just be with this for a moment."

That's what's required—just to be with what is. This full commitment to open into the unknown. It's not going the way we think. We have no clue where we are. We've lost a sense of path. We're not feeling safe and secure. Great. Just take a moment and say, "I can just be with this now." Trust in the awareness. Trust in that simplicity of just meeting what's happening.

Awakening, enlightenment—it's not a self-improvement project. It doesn't make us feel all better about ourselves, secure and safe. And I know, it's the sense of self. It's not like there's a self we're getting rid of. But the sense of me—when I try to imagine what awakening is, of course we imagine from the sense of me: "I'm going to feel so good. I'm going to be floating down the street, the essence of Kuan Yin, the goddess of compassion." In a subtle way, it's kind of feeding us, confirming our sense of me.

But non-clinging—it's radical, it's uncompromising. The sense of me is what gets seen through. It's not what gets confirmed. And so at some point, all of the subtle holdings are going to be challenged. Sometimes it's scary, and then it'll be, "Oh wow, it's so freeing." And then, because these habits are so pervasive, the next day you thought you were free and they're back again. Okay.

"I thought I couldn't bear it, but then I found that I could. It's like this now. How can this be? What's happening? It's like this now."

This is really the courage, the determination to just moment to moment to moment open into the unknown.

I've found that without continually coming back and seeing what helps reconnect with my aspiration—there are times, for all of us, we just don't have the energy to do it. It's like that. But find what helps you, what re-aspirates, re-inspires, re-reminds you of what's really important to you in life.

So again, for me, I'll end with one more story. A friend was just telling me—a friend of mine, a long-term meditator and yogi—she has been involved for some years in what's called the Tibet Oral History Project, something the Dalai Lama actually asked her to do. What she does is interview Tibetan refugees, really elderly Tibetan refugees in India, in the States, wherever, just to get their stories down. He wants all the different kinds of people—not necessarily teachers or nuns or monks, just ordinary people.

She actually gave me the whole interview. I'll just pick some highlights of this particular woman, an elderly woman she interviewed when she was seventy, in 2013. She's been living in the States now for many years. So I'm really condensing here. This is one of those stories where you read it and you think, "Well, this is the kind of stuff you read about Milarepa, or what people did in old Tibet, these fantastic practitioners from long ago. But today? We couldn't possibly do that." And so this is her brief story.

She came from a nomadic family, well-to-do. When the Chinese were invading in 1959, her whole family was trying to flee. They got involved in a firefight, and her family was killed, along with many people. She was shot in the leg. She was captured and taken back to her village and kept under house arrest, just living in her village.

But she had this deep commitment to escape, to get to India. Her deep commitment was that she wanted to be able to offer prayers for her parents. One must offer prayers when parents pass away, and there was no opportunity to perform prayers there. She also wanted to study and practice the Dharma. That was her deep commitment.

So she managed to escape. The whole long story—it took her almost a year. She was wandering. Some people helped her. She was freezing. She didn't have food. But she managed, a year wandering around in Tibet without much to eat. It was a year after she was wounded, so she could walk okay.

She gets to Mount Kailash with a friend. She's not in India. She's at Mount Kailash. And she really wants to practice. So she stayed seven years at Mount Kailash, living in caves and practicing the Dharma, doing prostrations all around Mount Kailash.

She ran into a lama who showed up after she'd been there a while. He sounded like he was really a tough lama—not like, "Oh yeah, you're doing a good job, keep going," but a radical sword of wisdom lama that really inspired her practice.

Let me share a couple of things he said. He says to her, "You really have to cultivate love and compassion as well as wisdom to really awaken. So how do you relate to the Chinese?" She said, "Well, to be really honest, I feel like they're my enemy." And he says, "Yes, of course you do. And you're doing really good practice. But you keep practicing like this, the enemy will not be the enemy but like your relatives. If you can love your so-called enemy without any degree of difference, if you can learn to not make this difference, this is really part of what you need to do to really be free."

So she goes, "Okay." Well, she put in a tremendous effort to do this. It was really hard. She's not saying, "La la la, it was easy." It was really hard. "I exercised again and again, even while eating and doing pilgrimage and prostrations around the mountain, meditating, putting in every effort I could, concentrating single-mindedly on this. I couldn't do it for almost two years." Imagine—just like, "I couldn't do it for almost two years." But somehow she did.

So now she's in the States, an old woman, just describing. She said, "I can't really talk in great detail about the Dharma and the practice because no one will really understand. It's so subtle. But what I understand is the important benefit of peace. Through practicing peace, one realizes that the problems I suffer are also felt by the other person. When I face difficulties like illness and pain, when I feel happiness, I feel that is also felt by the other person. The suffering I experience is felt by the other. Whatever I feel, the other has the same feeling. If one understands that perfectly, the feeling of wanting to harm another person, of being spiteful and other things, just disappears automatically."

That's the sense of it—in a moment of wisdom, the hatred doesn't arise. That's just how it is. You don't make that happen. Take it as moments, not as you have to be that way all the time. That's how I do it.

But she's really seeing that, you know? This is how she lives. And what my friend said when she met this woman—what she was really impressed by, before she even heard her story—was just her great kindness. A great sense of love. She came in and the woman was just doing whatever she could to make my friend comfortable, offering her things, and this very simple, down-to-earth kindness and wisdom. You can feel that sometimes in people.

So that's another story that inspires me. This is a real person, not reading about Shabkar in the 18th century.

See what's true for you, what helps you. If this is helpful—to re-inspire, to reconnect to your aspiration, to give you the energy and courage and uplifting to open into the unknown again for this next moment.

I'll close with this from Shantideva's Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, quoted by the Dalai Lama. This is a vast bodhicitta aspiration, but it brings up that aspiration, that inspiration, that energy in me. So I'm reading it for myself, because it makes me really happy:

And now, as long as space endures,
As long as there are beings to be found,
May I continue likewise to remain
To soothe the sufferings of those who live.

The pains and sorrows of all wanderers—
May they ripen wholly on myself.
And may the virtuous company of bodhisattvas
Ever bring about the happiness of beings.

May the teachings—the only remedy for suffering,
The source of every bliss and happiness—
Be nurtured and upheld with reverence,
And throughout a vast continuance of time endure.

May precious bodhicitta take its birth
In those in whom it has not taken birth,
And where it has been born, let it not cease,
But swell and increase ever more and more.

Thank you for your patient attention.

CHAPTER 70

Perception, Papañca, and Sakkāya-diṭṭhi

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines how personality view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) arises through the interplay of perception (saññā), feeling tone (vedanā), and mental proliferation (papañca). Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that the five aggregates are like a magic show—form as foam, feeling as bubbles, perception as a mirage, formations as a coreless banana tree, and consciousness as a juggler's trick—she demonstrates how our sense of self is continuously constructed and deconstructed in each moment.

Through vivid examples, including a powerful story of a meditator who blamed someone for walking during sitting meditation only to discover the sound came from her own breathing, Wilson illustrates how perception distorted by the kilesas (greed, hatred, and delusion) leads to inaccurate recognition and subsequent suffering. She explores the vipallāsas (perversions of perception) and how we habitually perceive what is impermanent as permanent, what is unsatisfactory as satisfying, and what is not-self as self.

The talk culminates with the Buddha's teaching to Bāhiya: when there is only the seen in the seen, the heard in the heard, the sensed in the sensed, and the cognized in the cognized, there is no 'you' in connection with that—and this is the end of dukkha. Wilson encourages practitioners to notice the arising and passing of self-stories, to recognize moments of simplicity empty of self-construction, and to develop contentment with this natural peace rather than waiting for the next interesting experience to confirm a sense of self.

Tonight I want to talk about perception, saññā, and papañca, and the concoction of sense of self—deconstructing that, exploring that.

I love talking about perception because it's fun to talk about, and it's arising in every moment, so it's really at the core of the whole construction of sense of self. I hope this isn't too wonky of a talk, but I can only get down in there. This is one way of talking about sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

So let's talk about the personality view, the sense of self, and how with anattā, the big anattā understanding is that there is no intrinsic separate self. Yet, of course, in our experience, personality view, identity view, sense of self is certainly something that we experience in an ongoing way. This isn't a whole anattā talk—it's more about perception—but perception fuels the false sense of self.

A lot of times when we bring up anattā or not-self, people's minds just kind of turn off. Like, "Oh god, I'm just waiting for the big insight when the self that's here goes away." It's here, here, here, but when the insight finally comes it'll be gone, right? You're waiting for that, and it turns into this big deal when it was never here in the first place. So stop waiting for some mind-blowing insight.

Instead, and this is where it really gets interesting, with the simplicity of steady awareness, we can begin to get interested and recognize how in a moment the sense of self arises, how it's concocted, how it's constructed from the building blocks of the five aggregates—saññā, perception, being one of them. Unexamined, it seems really real. With steady awareness, we just start to see it deconstruct and go. This can just be interesting to watch. Instead of waiting until it all blows out and it's gone forever—which, like I said, don't hold your breath—we can see it coming and going, coming and going, and actually, you can stop taking the sense of self personally. That's really very freeing.

Ramana Maharshi says the ego—or I'm going to say sense of self—is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. If you examine closely, the ghost vanishes. The ghost was never there. So it is with the sense of separate self. So long as one does not examine it closely, it continues to give trouble. But when one searches for it, it is found not to exist.

The Buddha's way of talking about the five aggregates—and this isn't a five aggregate talk either, it's a saññā talk, but that's one of the five aggregates, and they're all linked up—is through a very well-known sutta where he talks about consciousness as a magic show, the whole thing like a magic show. Form is like a mass of foam, just empty foam. Vedanā, feeling tone, is just an airy bubble. Perception is like a mirage. Saṅkhāras, mental formations, are like a banana tree—you know, the banana tree trunk is just leaves, there's no core there, there's no there there if you take it apart. Consciousness is a magic show, a juggler's trick entire.

I really feel like the whole sense of self is like that, like a magic show. When we don't explore it—he goes on to describe how if you come to a crossroads and there's a magician doing tricks and you're looking at it, you go, "Wow, that's amazing, it's so wonderful." Then if you go behind the curtain and you see how it's done, you go, "Oh, okay." And then you come out and watch it again and everyone else is going, "Wow, how wonderful!" And you're like, no big deal. You just do this and this and that's how it happens. So that's what he's comparing this to. It's a magic show.

How does saññā, perception, contribute? How does it do its job? How does it contribute to this magic show when there's not recognition, not mindfulness?

As I said, all of the five aggregates, perception included, arise in every mind moment of consciousness. Perception is described as the quality in any mind moment of recognition, of discernment. So if I ring the bell and you hear it—the recognition of bell. Obviously it's based on memory and has to do with whatever our previous experiences have been. So it's a concept. It's extremely useful. No one's saying we're going to get through life without perception. It's really how we construct our world. One perception can immediately give the whole sense of the world.

When you hear the bell, even if you were somewhat spaced out or not fully aware of it, everything kind of jumps into place. You know it's the bell, you know it's time for a talk, you know you're here at IMS, you know where you're supposed to go. You came in here, you knew you were you, which was your zafu, who sits up here and who sits down there. You're quiet, I talk—we know the whole thing. The whole world arises with perception. Extremely useful.

The thing is, as our perception is informed and flavored by all of our life experiences, without real awareness we don't tend to question it. We think, "Well, that's how it is. It's describing reality." But it isn't the same for everybody.

There's a simple example I really liked. I was visiting Sally a few years ago, and I said, "Oh, I'm a little chilly. Could you hand me the blue blanket on the back of your couch?" She looked at the couch and said, "What blue blanket?" I said, "That one there." She said, "Oh, you mean the green one?" And then I really looked. "No, no, it's blue." She said, "No, it's green." We could have gone further with it, but the thing is, I really tried. I said, "Oh, really, green?" Couldn't see it as green. She couldn't really see it as blue.

That's not life-threatening, but there's this sense—doesn't the mind kind of wonder, "But which one is right?" As if there's an accurate, exact thing out there. It's blue or it's green, or you have to find aquamarine because that's the right perception. Rather than recognizing perception as a conditioned phenomenon like everything else. When we're not recognizing this, we can so easily assume that's what's really going on.

Blue-green—conditioned by whatever our past conditioning is. But it's so easy to hold on to our perception as right, to really get into struggle about it, or fear when our perceptions are threatened. And so often the perception that arises is actually inaccurate when it's distorted by kilesa. If there's aversion flavoring the perception, the citta, the consciousness in that moment, or greed flavoring it, or delusion—that distorts perception. We don't recognize accurately at all. And if we don't recognize the kilesas are there, we don't know we're not recognizing accurately.

Sometimes with steady attention this is seen through immediately. A simple example: I was at a meditation center in Burma some years ago, walking down this path. There was a big Bodhi tree growing there, with a circular path around it. I was walking down the path, and I saw a Burmese nun walking around the tree, circumambulating it—which is a thing you do—with her hands in añjali. I thought, "Oh, how nice, the faith," this lovely feeling. I kept walking, got closer, and she was texting on her phone. That was just funny. The perception—you see through it right away.

That was delusion. I just didn't have all the information. How much of the time we don't have all the information, there's delusion, not seeing clearly. But believe me, the mind just jumps in and there's some kind of perception. It's rare that we say, "You know, I really don't exactly know what's happening here. I don't really know what that person's motivation was when they did this really stupid thing. I really don't know. I'll just stay open." Moha, delusion, jumps in and makes a story.

And then—this is the concoction part—pretty much most of the time, it doesn't just stop with perception. Even that little story about the nun was not a big deal, but I didn't just see, "Oh, walking around the tree." There was a sense of it being pleasant, a sense of "Oh, the faith of the nuns, isn't that inspiring," and a whole little world bubble got created in the two seconds it took me to walk up to the tree. Then that whole world bubble got deflated. But I thought it was funny, so that was okay, it was over.

But when there's greed or aversion really flavoring it, and the story's gone a lot further, it's a whole other thing. That's papañca—the mind that proliferates based on perception.

So this example—and I use this example a lot, I'm using it again by request of a particular person here from other years—but it works very well. How perception can explode into a whole story and suffering based on inaccuracy.

It was her first retreat. It was in another country, in a rental facility—a big house that was used for summer camp for kids. So it wasn't really well constructed. The room being used for the sitting meditation was on what we would call the second floor, and the room used for walking meditation was right underneath it on the first floor. But not so well constructed as here—one of these old wooden houses where every time anybody walked anywhere you could hear it creak, creak, creak, creak.

So she was sitting during the structured time, the sitting period, trying to be with the breath. Finally, on her first retreat, she had a moment of feeling the breath—a moment of feeling like she was doing it right. And suddenly she heard this creak, creak, creak. It was loud and it really messed up her concentration. She thought, "Well, somebody's walking downstairs." You can hear how that creaking happens with walking. And immediately the thought arose: "This is the sitting period. You're supposed to be sitting in the sitting period, not walking. This is wrong. That shouldn't be happening. How can that person be so insensitive? And besides, it's ruining my meditation." Really annoyed.

The mind was spinning, but it was her first retreat. She wasn't a manager or anything, so she didn't have the nerve to go downstairs and give that person what for—but she would have liked to. There was nothing else to do, though, but try to feel her breath again. So she came back, tried to feel the breath, and at some point managed to connect again. The story went into the background as she really connected with the breath, just feeling it.

And as she was present again, feeling the breath, she noticed that as she breathed out—she happened to be leaning with her back against the wall—her back hit the wall, and that was making the creaking sound. Completely from her breathing hitting the wall. It was like, "Oh my god, how could that be?"

The minute she saw that, of course, this whole concoction—this whole story, the anger, the aversion, and everything that came with it—at that moment it vanishes. This is, in a way, the nature of insight. Steady awareness, when it recognizes accurately what's happening, allows the reactivity based on aversion and self-story and greed to drop away, because it doesn't make any sense given what's really happening in that moment. That nature of insight is not something you think your way into, but that's what happens when there's reality, when we really see it clearly.

I want to use that story to refer to the different steps of it, describing how perception and papañca work to create this whole, enmeshed sense of self.

So, one thing: as I said, it doesn't just stop at perception. This is the well-known description of the Buddha of what's called papañca—proliferation of thought and emotion based on perception, inaccurate perception:

"Dependent on the eye and forms, or the ear and sounds, dependent on sense contact with any of the six sense doors, there's sense contact. With sense contact as condition, feeling tone—vedanā—arises. This just happens. What one feels, that one perceives. So there's vedanā, saññā—they're happening quickly. What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one mentally proliferates, one complicates with associations, with memories. And with these proliferations as the source, the mind, the heart is beset. The mind, the heart is assailed with mental perceptions and notions and thoughts about the past and the future and the present, and we suffer."

That's the classic description of papañca.

So this example from my friend—the whole thought arising from that perception that somebody's walking, and all the story about how this shouldn't be happening, and what can I do, and it's ruining my meditation—all of that is papañca being fueled by aversion, not recognized.

What one feels, one perceives. This is how the concoction of suffering and sense of self happens so quickly. It's again from—well, this isn't from the Buddha, this is Sariputta. But he is considered, when he speaks pieces of wisdom, equal to the Buddha. So we don't say, "Well, only Sariputta said it."

He knew.

So Sariputta says, "Feeling, perception, and consciousness, friend, these qualities are joined. They come together. You cannot disjoin them. It is not possible, having separated the one from the other." As I'm doing now—I'm talking about vedana arising and that leading to perception—but it's not possible to really delineate the difference among them. For what one feels, that one perceives. What one perceives, that one cognizes.

In other words, it's all happening so quickly. The feeling tone, the perception, and the cognizing is the knowing of that. So if that moment is distorted by aversion, by greed, by delusion, it's happening so quick—boom—off in a whole world in just a second.

This is what Guy was talking about last night regarding the suffering born of craving. Craving being either the movement toward or the movement away from. We've talked about before, in some of the other talks, how the feeling tone—being perceived as pleasant or unpleasant or neutral—is so habitual for our minds. When there's not the clear, non-deluded recognition of "this is unpleasant" or "this is pleasant being perceived that way," the habit is so strong to feed into unpleasant, boom. The perception's unpleasant and off into a whole world, like my friend here. Or if it's pleasant, off into a whole world of greed.

And without the tool of steady mindfulness—because this is happening every mind moment, so quickly—what we wake up noticing is the sense of me involved in this particular concoction of self. Of sitting here trying to meditate and having it ruined by this thoughtless person walking downstairs. That's what's happening. That's the mind bubble that's been created.

If you wanted to, I'm breaking it down, kind of deconstructing. It happens so fast, but there's sitting, there's the hearing. The hearing is perceived, and that just happens effortlessly. Hearing arises and there's a knowing of it. Nothing one has to do—she wasn't planning. But whether the hearing itself was unpleasant, or whether the fact that it pulled her away from the breath and was perceived as a distraction was unpleasant, either way there was an unpleasant feeling tone. The perception immediately coming of someone walking, and then the whole world of me suffering in aversion. Just like that.

The real poignancy of how suffering is born of craving—this guy described it. On the many ways it manifests, this is one: when the craving, in whichever form—for it or against—is flavoring, is distorting the perception and is fueling the papañca. When that's in the perception and unrecognized, it has the effect that perception is not accurate. We misperceive. We don't recognize reality the way that it is.

And that's so poignant, because we're thinking the craving is what's going to make us happy, and it's the very thing that is obstructing just the simple recognition of reality as it is.

Sogyal Rinpoche, just describing how we get so lost so quickly: "We get into so much suffering and confusion by letting ourselves get lost in whatever happens. You project one thought, then the second thought believes the first. Then a third, fourth, and fifth thoughts are projected. The first thought is by this time already a reality. By the time the tenth one comes, it believes the fifth one has always been an actuality."

And this is fast. You notice how fast—I'm hoping you notice how fast thoughts come. How solid our thought bubbles, our world bubbles get. And how much of the time is there "me" sitting in the center of it? Not really me, okay, but the sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the sense of me. That's often what fuels it.

And it doesn't matter how fast and how far that thought bubble has gone. So back to the house again—my friend noticing it. Whether it was three seconds that she was lost in this aversive story (I think it was longer than that), whether it was forty-five minutes, it really doesn't matter. The time when the attention was brought back to the simplicity of present moment awareness—just dropping all the stories, just being with the sensation of breathing, without preconception, just with that open-hearted "okay, what's happening?"—just being with it. And then the perception, not being distorted at that point, is open to recognize more accurately.

Oh, that's what's happening. Breathe out, there's the sound, and everything drops away. The suffering drops away. That whole bubble, however long it had lasted, doesn't matter. In the moment of the purity of awareness, of citta without being distorted, that one moment of clear seeing—all the rest vanishes in that moment. You don't have to slowly talk your way out of it. It vanishes in the light of direct perception, which I think is very encouraging to all of us. That's why we say you could have been lost for an hour, but the moment the awareness comes back, it's here, just as clear and good as ever.

So the Dalai Lama says all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there is so much emphasis on direct experience or true knowledge. You may have noticed that's what we're going on about all the time—direct experience or true knowledge. All of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. With this direct connection, the magic show falls apart. And this is not an act of will. It's not by rationalizing about it, thinking about it.

If you notice, you can be really caught in a story or in a sense of self, and you're telling yourself all the things we've learned: "But I know this is impermanent, I know there's identification here, I know this is unpleasant, I know this is just a creation." But that's just on the intellectual level. That might serve to get us to meet the experience again, but it doesn't cut through it. The moment of direct connection, awareness, the simplicity of awareness and total presence—reality reveals itself. Boom.

So this is Thich Nhat Hanh: "Understanding wisdom does not arise as the result of thinking. It is the result of the long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes wisdom or understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding."

Our thinking mind doesn't believe that, because that's what the thinking mind does—it thinks. It puts all the eggs into that basket of thinking, and it can't think its way out of that. But let it think. Thinking is very useful. We don't hate thinking; it's useful when we know how to use it and not have it run us. So just beginning to have more and more trust in this quality of simple awareness that cuts through all the confusion—all the confusion and sense of self that comes from mistaken perception, fed by pleasant-unpleasant vedana not being recognized, and boom, boom, boom.

As the Buddha said, this is just a very deep habit of our minds. All of our minds. I'm pretty sure all of us here, you know? It's not something you are doing because you're so hopeless. It's not something that's happening more to you because you can't meditate. That's sakaya-ditti. That's personality view arising out of an unpleasant experience.

So when a moment of consciousness is flavored or distorted by greed, hatred, or confusion—the hallucinations, the vipallasas of perception—we just can't recognize accurately. The Buddha talked about it a lot in relationship to perceiving what is in constant change as being permanent, perceiving what is unsatisfactory or dukkha as being satisfactory and happiness producing, perceiving what is no sense of separate lasting self as being me or mine, and perceiving what is not beautiful as beautiful.

Here I'm just talking about the vipallasa of perceiving any experience as me or mine, how fast that comes from this distortion of perception. We just can't recognize accurately.

Again, the Buddha: "When one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will, and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor recognizes as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both." The same applies when the mind is impassioned by lust or bewildered by delusion, by confusion.

He says "on that occasion" because the mind moments are constantly arising and changing—thank the good Lord, or it would really be awful. Imagine being oppressed by ill will and that's it, from now till the end of eternity. Well, it feels like that, doesn't it? Or as Tejaniya would say, that's how the kilesa is doing its job. When you're caught in a strong mental state, its job is to say, "Yeah, and you're going to feel like this for the rest of your life." Every thought that comes up is colored by that ill will.

You imagine your vacation, but because of the ill will, it's like, "Oh, it's probably just going to be hurricane season. It's probably going to be too expensive. I'm probably going to break my leg. My partner and I will probably have a fight. Why should we even go?" Then when the mind is impassioned by lust, it'll be, "So great! In fact, I'm leaving the retreat now to go on that vacation because it's going to be so fantastic!" We can't recognize accurately. We can't tell our own good or the good of another or the good of either.

But when we can recognize that one of these qualities is circling around in there, coloring the perception, we can remember, "Oh yeah, I can't recognize accurately." You can't push through it, but you can know. And it's been such a gift to me to really understand that when I see there's ill will in the mind, aversion or doubt or confusion, I think, "Oh, I have to figure out what's the right thing to do now." Don't you? When your practice isn't going right, you think, "Well, I've got to figure out what to do." And you forget to notice that all the thoughts are coming through a perception that's distorted by aversion, because you've already decided it's not going right. Probably it's unpleasant. It's usually unpleasant when it's not going right—rarely is it really pleasant when it's not going right. And so it's unpleasant, there's probably a little bit of aversion, there's the whole idea that comes up of "I can't do it," and so on, and then we decide what we should do to fix it.

You come in and talk to one of us: "I've decided I'm going to do this. I've got to get more concentrated. I've got to get less concentrated. I've got to get more precise. I've got to get less precise." And we go, "What's in the back of your mind there?" You go, "What do you mean?" "Maybe there's some aversion." "Oh, right. Aversion."

I mean, it's the same thing for me. I say, "I'm looking for craving. I can tell everything's tight. I'm looking for craving. I can't see it. The mind's balanced. The mind's clear. I'm just going to—oh, wow. Oh my gosh. Totally filled with craving. Distorting every perception for the last half hour. Duh. Okay."

But I do know, once you recognize, you don't know what exactly is happening, but you know: I can't trust this. Whatever the mind says, it can't assess accurately. So just relax back into the steadiness, the long process of conscious awareness, without trying to come to any conclusion about your practice, about yourself, about what it means, about good or bad. Just the long process of conscious awareness. Can we take refuge in that?

It's an amazing thing. You just quit trying to do it right and say, "Well, am I sitting and walking?" "Yeah, but not right." "Continuous?" "No, there was that moment I spaced out." "Are you going into town for pizza?" "No." "Are you more or less sitting and walking?" "Okay, that's it." Sooner or later awareness will come back because there's really nothing else to do. We set it up that way. That's why there aren't TVs up here like in the airport. You've got to come back to awareness because it's the only show in town. Then it gets interesting again. Thank God, it gets interesting.

Okay, that was a sidetrack.

So these vipallāsas, these distortions of perception—taking any experience as being me or mine—is really how sakkāya-diṭṭhi comes up, and the perceiving of it in that way. But it's also not just this. We can see that process here, and this is very subtle. But in the grosser or wider way, in the world, the whole sense of perception being informed by our history, by our past, by the media, by our culture—and not recognizing that it's a selective perception, and that other people's is different—is really how we get into all this struggle, all this conflict, all this "I'm better, you're wrong," and all the pain and the racism and the homophobia and implicit bias based on perception that is fed from our conditioning.

You know those tests they have for implicit bias about all different kinds of subjects?

I don't know if you've ever taken one. They come on the computer and show an image alongside different words – it could be about gender, nationality, race, or anything else. The image appears with words, and you have a set of words to match, but you have to match them really quickly, going with the first thing that comes up. The screen moves so fast you don't have time to think about the way you ought to respond – the way I think as a good person I would respond – because it goes so quickly and keeps speeding up.

And so the perception that's down there in our unconscious gets highlighted. It's really fascinating, and I think really important for all of us to see: this is how it works. It works in these bigger ways in the world, and it's also working moment to moment to moment, every moment of our life, in terms of this concocting of a story, a sense of self, a personality view – sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

Anaïs Nin, the French writer, said, "We see the world not as it is, but as we are." That's a great example of how perception feeds our whole description of the world. And once we identify with a perception, once we hold on to it without realizing we're clinging to it, something happens. I call it selective perception. There's a description of what's happening, and without even recognizing that we're doing it, the mind tends to just notice the perceptions that feed that particular view, that are in alignment with it. We can completely ignore other perceptions that don't fit in. We don't even know we're doing it.

A simple story someone told me at a retreat at Spirit Rock recently illustrates this beautifully. She was laughing about it – I had talked about perception and she came to me saying, "Wow, this is a great story." She had woken up in the morning, lying in her bed, and she could hear this gentle rain falling. She thought, "Ah, just a lovely gentle rain. It's so nice, so peaceful." She was really appreciating it, just lying there in bed listening to the rain.

And this is where, with any sense contact, the whole sense of personality view can come up. So she's lying there listening to the rain, and the sense of how cozy and nice it is in bed, how she can just lie there, how peaceful it is – memories of childhood and all the rest of it, right?

Then she got up, getting dressed to go to the meditation hall early, thinking she'd just walk over in the rain since you have to go outside there. As she's getting dressed and can see outside her window, she's going, "It must not be raining too hard because people aren't using umbrellas or raincoats. I guess they're just very hardened." So she goes out thinking, "It's so lovely, the cool morning. The rain is so fine, I'm hardly noticing it."

Until she got to the meditation hall and realized it wasn't raining. It hadn't been raining. Whatever sound she'd heard that she was perceiving as rain, she had no clue what it actually was. She said, "I could just go into don't-know." But she had, for I don't know how long – even seeing everybody walking around without raincoats or umbrellas, even walking outside herself – she was going on about the rain and how nice it was. It took her until she'd been outside for some minutes before she really got it: it's not raining.

She thought it was great, and it is great – this is how strong perception can be. This is really where the sense of personality view gets constructed in a moment. But this is what we can see: how it gets constructed, concocted out of vedanā, out of saññā, and out of the papañca. It arises in a moment, can get really strong, but then dissolves again. And it's really gone.

Really noticing how this happens is important, because it can be very strong. Any sense experience can give rise to this "taken as me" – the whole story of me, suffering or happy, all the memories that fit with that particular story. The sense of me is really strong. It comes up all the time.

But in retreat, and sometime about now for many people, you could have – I'm just making this up, this isn't anybody's story – say, a particular experience of being cold. Feeling cold, like my body doesn't do well with cold, and it tends to shrink. Being cold and feeling kind of tight, then noticing aversion, then feeling I can't really practice well, and what's the matter with this body, and a whole story starts. All the memories come up that feed that particular story of me – someone who doesn't fit in, someone whose body doesn't deal with the cold.

Someone whose body doesn't deal with the heat. Someone whose body doesn't deal with anything. Someone who has aversion to something as simple as cold. And all the times in my life when I haven't been there—the whole litany unfolds.

And then, the next day it's hot. Like, "Oh my god, so hot. I can't deal with the heat." Or maybe you like the heat. You go, "Oh, I can relax. There's no aversion. Everything's flowing. It's going so well. Warm, pleasant awareness, steady awareness. Wow, I'm really such a good yogi." And all the stories come—you remember all the insights you've had, all the times it was so pleasant. And then more pleasant things come, and more pleasant comes, and the mindfulness starts to drop away and you're back on the beach in Bali.

But right now, in Bali, they're waiting for the volcano to blow. So, "Oh no, I'm in Bali and the volcano's going..." It just keeps going, going, going. And then suddenly, "Oh, what's happening now?" Stepping. And that whole bubble of sakkāya-diṭṭhi is gone.

Noticing, noticing how sakkāya-diṭṭhi can arise from any sense contact. Vedanā—pleasant, unpleasant—the perception of what it is, and then all the thoughts and associations and the memories of past and the thoughts about future and the assessments about the present. That's papañca. That's the arising of a sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

Notice, as Ajahn Sumedho describes it: so then the self arises. Just can be from hearing a sound of rain, or a feeling of cold, or a sense of "my breath is too rough." It could be anything. "So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears, my desires, and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho."

You notice that? Sometimes we don't—we just think that is the world, that's how it is. When we look at it, we go, "Am I really the center of everything?" Well, it sure feels like it. "It takes off into orbit, my views, my feelings and my opinions. I can get caught in that world, that view of me that arises in consciousness. But if I recognize that, then my refuge starts to no longer be in being a person. Then it can vanish. The world of Ajahn Sumedho ends. That doesn't mean Ajahn Sumedho dies and the world ends or that I'm unconscious. In Buddhadharma, the world is the world that gets created in consciousness. That's why we can be living in different worlds. The world of Ajahn Sumedho is not going to be the same as the world you create. But that world arises and ceases. Both of the worlds arise and cease. And that which is aware of the world arising and ceasing can transcend the world."

So this is really what we can notice: how the birth and death of the story of self, the sense of self, happens hundreds of times in a day. Really noticing how there can just be sense perception occurring, and it can just be what it is in the light of awareness, and then suddenly it can coalesce into the story of me, and then back again. You can call it—I'm using something Ajahn Buddhadasa said about something else—but I call it volunteering for suffering.

A good example: once I was on a retreat, sitting very peacefully, and I had a little cough. So I cough, cough, and then I felt a tickle in my chest. Tickle, tickle, cough, cough. Other things are happening. Tickle, tickle, cough, cough. Suddenly the thought comes up, "Oh my god, I've got bronchitis." So that thought—I'd had bronchitis previously. So that was a memory. I'd been really sick. Not like the day before, but a long time ago.

But that thought came up. So that was a perception: "This is bronchitis." It came up, and it was unpleasant. It came up with fear and aversion. And everything just coalesced into this: "Oh my God, I've got bronchitis. What am I going to do? I'm on retreat. I can't go to the doctor." Volunteering for suffering.

And then I went back to practice. Well, you can't see clearly when the mind is filled with aversion. Should I leave the retreat? Should I go to the doctor? Okay, what's happening now? Cough, cough. Tickle, tickle. That's all that was happening. That's all that was happening.

And then I could see the mind go back and forth between just being present with that and—boom—the whole balloon of sakkāya-diṭṭhi and my past and bronchitis and what to do. And then it would go away again with steady attention. That's what I call volunteering for suffering. I could watch the mind get a little bit bored with this tickle, tickle, cough, cough, hearing, hearing. It's like, "Okay, I'll suffer. Oh my God, I've got bronchitis."

So the world arises—of Carol—and then that world ceases, that particular world of Carol.

Now, on the retreat I was on, I was seeing this happen: the world of Carol coming and going, all these different worlds, these different thought trains. And I had, previous to the retreat, watched a movie. I don't know if any of you have had this unfortunate experience of having to re-watch some movie that you had the misfortune to watch before you came on retreat. Once, on my first three-month retreat, I had to relive every episode of a sitcom that I'd watched as a younger person. Every episode. Another one would start, and I'd go, "Please, God, no." It would start—Dick Van Dyke—it would start again, and I'd go, "Oh no, please." It's all in there, as Joseph would say.

But anyway, I had watched this movie, so it would be running in my mind. It was some suspense movie—Harrison Ford, the good guy being chased, innocent and wrongly accused. So it would be the Carol story, whatever it was, and then there'd be The Fugitive for a while.

And then, when I stopped being resistant, I was just noticing: seeing and thinking and sensation and pleasant and unpleasant. It was exactly the same. There was a thought and an image and a perception and a pleasant and unpleasant. One was the Harrison Ford movie and one was the Carol movie. But neither one had—in that sense of just perception, just what was happening—any more reality. Because the Carol movie was made up, like the bronchitis. That wasn't really an accurate description of what was happening.

So when I saw that, it was really cool. We really can just not always jump into the sakkāya-diṭṭhi, which feels so real and so accurate. We can notice how it comes, how we suffer, how it goes. The pleasant ones we suffer from too, because there's still that sense of me, that vipallāsa, that hallucination of perception that's in the way of recognizing—as Ajahn Amaro likes to say—the peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body when it's not distorted, when it's not troubled by identification with kilesa.

So, starting from perception and the vedanā that can fuel it, just noticing when the whole world of you—or Adam Sameera, or Harrison Ford, or whoever it is—arises, and when it dissolves again. The magic show goes away. And then keep on with the steady awareness, because we can see not only the coming and going, but then when the magic show goes, we can notice just moments of calm, of peace and ease, of no big anything going on.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa likes to talk about, these moments of—he calls them moments of emptiness—empty of sense of self, empty of personality view. Put it that way: it's just not arising.

And Ajahn Buddhadasa says normally we don't notice these moments, because the habit of our mind and our interest is to get so involved with whatever particular sense object is arising. We get involved with the experience and with all the concoctions, all the creations that come out of it. Then we're fighting against: "No, I'm really not a worthless person because I stubbed my toe and I tripped and that just proves what a klutz I am." And then, and then, and then. That was just a moment. We notice that go away again.

We normally don't notice when it's gone, because we're so entranced by the concoctions and the interpretations. But when it goes again, stay present. There are sometimes just moments of space, or calmness, or simplicity, in between the next arising of sense of self.

And what many people have noticed—you'll see this often—when we're not so used to that spaciousness, it's not interesting. Here's again the sense of neutral, neither pleasant nor unpleasant vedana, giving rise to a perception that's distorted by moha, by confusion, by not seeing clearly. "Oh, nothing's happening."

Do you ever find yourself waiting for the next interesting thing to occur? Just check it out if you notice it. Does the interesting thing that finally occurs, even when it's unpleasant, have anything to do with some kind of sakkāya-diṭṭhi? You know, like just being here—Buddhadasa talks about generating a contentment with this emptiness of self, generating a contentment with just the simplicity of non-concocting, of non-papañca.

It's like... nothing. Waiting. Nothing's happening, but I'm waiting for the next thing. And even a suffering sense of self is preferable to just this moment of simplicity. Just simplicity.

The Buddha said the end of papañca is the end of conflict. The end of papañca—just in a moment, don't think end forever, but just in a moment. Like my friend when she was just with the breath, the end of papañca was just: this is what's happening. Oh, that's that sound. Same sound, maybe still unpleasant. No conflict. That's what's happening. Just this sense of steady, moment-to-moment presence with whatever's arising, just as it is.

So simple, we can't stand it. Because we're not there—we're not there. As T.S. Eliot says, it's "a condition of complete simplicity costing not less than everything." The everything it costs is simply the concoction, in a moment, of the me-story. And when it's really that present, that simple, it really is the end of conflict in a moment, the end of confusion, just in a moment.

And I'm sure you know the Bahiya story. I'm not going to tell the whole story, but just this teaching—I decided at the last minute to share it.

Bahiya is so urgent to get a teaching that he's grabbing the Buddha on his way to alms round, saying, "Please, just give me something." So the Buddha gives him this pith instruction. This is it, all you need to know, three lines:

"So, Bahiya, you should train yourself in this way: In reference to what is seen, there will be only the seen. In reference to what is heard, there is only what is heard. In reference to the sensed—like the physical sense—only what is sensed. In reference to the cognized, what is known by the mind, only what is cognized. That is how you should train yourself."

There's another sutta where the Buddha says that when he's seeing or hearing or whatever, he does not conceive of another thing to be heard. There's just the hearing. He does not conceive of someone who is hearing. He does not conceive of another thing that's unheard that could be heard. He's not conceiving of anything. There's just the hearing.

So he goes on to Bahiya: "When for you there will only be the seen in reference to the seen, only the heard in reference to the heard, only the sensed, only the cognized in reference to the cognized, then, Bahiya, there is no you in connection with that. When there is no you in connection with that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, you are neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of dukkha."

Just for a moment. There's no you. There's just what's happening. A condition of complete simplicity costing not less than everything.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 71

Meeting Dosa with Mindfulness and Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this comprehensive exploration of dosa—the Pāli term encompassing all states from hatred to mild irritation, fear, and resistance—Carol Wilson offers practical guidance for working skillfully with aversive mind states. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching in the Salla Sutta (the Dart Sutta), she illuminates the mechanism by which unpleasant feeling tone (vedanā) triggers habitual resistance, leading to proliferating thoughts (papañca) and deepening suffering. Wilson emphasizes that dosa arises from not fully understanding the First Noble Truth: that unpleasant experience is to be understood, not hated or avoided.
>
> The talk provides a detailed examination of how aversion distorts perception and judgment, using vivid personal examples from intensive retreat practice in Burma and daily life. Wilson explains how mindfulness and wisdom (satipaññā) can be brought directly to the point of sense contact, interrupting the chain of reactivity before it spirals into full identification with the story. She addresses both subtle background moods of dissatisfaction and overwhelming storms of fear, anger, or guilt, offering graduated approaches for each.
> Particularly valuable is Wilson's discussion of skillful means when difficult emotions overwhelm our capacity to be present—knowing when to shift attention to neutral or pleasant experiences to refresh awareness rather than drowning in difficulty. She concludes with a moving personal account of working with chronic illness, demonstrating how present-moment mindfulness becomes a refuge that opens into compassion and clear decision-making, pointing toward a peace not dependent on pleasant or unpleasant feelings.

Tonight I want to talk about exploring dosa with wisdom. Dosa, as I'm sure you know, is the Pali word often translated as "hatred"—one of the three unwholesome roots. But let's use dosa here to encompass all the many states of mind, mental states, and emotions that come from either pushing away the unpleasant from an angry side, or fleeing from the unpleasant through fear. So it ranges all the way from hatred to mild irritation to grumpiness to resistance—the whole show.

I deliberately use the word dosa rather than "aversion" or any other specific term, partly because it's broader, but partly because it helps me have fewer unhelpful associations. It allows me to look at it as simply a habit of heart and mind that the Buddha talked about extensively—something we can explore as habit, rather than identifying with it and either blaming ourselves, hating ourselves, or totally buying into it. But it's definitely a frequent visitor in many of our experiences of heart and mind. In all its different forms, we can relate.

When Guy spoke about the second noble truth, tanha—that thirst, that craving—he described its two sides: the greed for the pleasant and the pulling away from the unpleasant. Dosa encompasses all the different ways of pulling away. It's a deeply conditioned reaction of mind to unpleasant sense experience at any of the six sense doors—to just leap away almost immediately.

In some way, it's sad, because dosa really arises from our not fully understanding the First Noble Truth. The First Noble Truth includes the dukkha of regular unpleasant, painful experiences; the dukkha of pleasant things changing; and the constant, ongoing insubstantiality and unreliability of all experience. As the Buddha said, each of the truths has an action that goes with it. The First Noble Truth is to be understood—not to be hated, not to somehow be avoided, but to be understood. And this understanding doesn't mean we then live in a quagmire of the unpleasant more than before. Rather, it frees our heart and mind. It frees us from the suffering of living in disharmony, in contention with so many moments of life.

The real suffering of dosa is obvious on a superficial level—it's unpleasant. So-called aversive types, those for whom dosa may be the first thing that arises (though we all have all of it, don't get me wrong), sometimes say, "I want to be a greedy type because that seems more pleasant." But being a dosa type myself, I'd say greedy types are just more lost in their delusion. They think it's pleasant, but they're just lost in craving and acquisition. The dosa types, at least we know we're suffering. We may not know why. We may blame somebody else. But we really don't miss it—except when we do. And that's what's really amazing.

The tragedy of not understanding the First Noble Truth, the real tragedy of the power of this reactive dosa to unpleasant experience, is that it solidifies our sense of separation. It keeps us lost in this unreal world of me and you, other, good and bad—the whole thing.

One Zen teacher—I forget who—said that dosa, this reaction of fear, anger, or aversion, is rooted in perhaps an unspoken belief in our mind that somehow I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant, unwanted, or painful experience that's happening right now. And that's really the heart of it: somehow I don't have to be with this. The fact that it's here means there's something really wrong.

So much wasted energy in our lives goes toward trying to hold ourselves separate, trying to deny this moment of reality as it is. It's impossible, because this is how it is—and we get into so much confusion and suffering trying. We can't shut down selectively. If I can hold myself separate from this, if I can somehow shut down and not feel, not know, do something else not to feel it, then everything will be okay. But as Pema Chödrön says, we end up spending our lives tensed up, trying to hold ourselves away from unpleasant experience. She says it's like we walk around our lives tensed up as if we were sitting in the dentist's chair. I love that image. They tell you to relax—they haven't even started yet. Just the sound of the drill, even hearing it in the waiting room.

So I want to share some examples from my experience of working with dosa in different ways—a nuts and bolts kind of talk. And then hopefully you'll have ten million of your own.

This is an invitation to bring sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom, to any moment that we recognize some aspect of dosa as the quality present in the mind and heart. It is simply another arising, conditioned experience.

It doesn't have to be something we hate or fear or are afraid to look at, or something we so identify with. It's simply another arising conditioned experience.

As far as I can tell, the most immediate moment-to-moment mechanism for its arising in a moment of experience is what we've talked about before in that sutta called "The Dart," where the Buddha was so clear. That mechanism whereby an unawakened worldling—that's probably most of us—when an unpleasant feeling arises in the body, they get all upset in the mind. You shoot yourself with a second dart. But then the Buddha says that the habit of resistance to unpleasant feeling tone comes to underlie the mind, the heart.

This to me is the salient point. When unpleasant feeling tone arises, the habit is so conditioned from how many mind moments in our life. When you remember that there's something like seventeen million mind moments in the blink of an eye—who knows, who counted those, I don't know—but it's a lot. In every mind moment there's contact. How many of those involve unpleasant feeling tone, and how many involve that knee-jerk reaction of bouncing away? It's so habituated that, as the Buddha said, it becomes to underlie the mind. And then the only response we know, the only way to get out of that, is to crave for the pleasant. That's how the wanting comes to underlie the mind. It starts so quickly.

As we've seen from having the wonderful opportunity to be so quiet, to really turn our attention on our hearts and minds, to see how the mind works, many of you are seeing this at times. But we also see how quick and subtle feeling tone is. In daily life, how often would we notice it? I don't think I ever would have noticed it in my whole life if I hadn't read about it from the Buddha. I don't know how he sat down and figured this stuff out. It's amazing.

Mostly we don't go, "Oh, there's the habit of resistance to unpleasant that underlies the mind. I see the attention jumping away from this unpleasant sense contact. And now I see the papañca that fuels aversion starting." But sometimes we can see that. Mostly, we don't.

As Tsoknyi Rinpoche's brother says, notice how easily the mind, the heart, is influenced simply by a pleasant or unpleasant sight, sound, thought. So quickly into an immediate mood. That's the thing—it goes boom, just like that, from unpleasant into an immediate mood. And that's often the first place our awareness can pick it up. But sometimes we can really notice the process where it begins, and that to me is really interesting, because it doesn't have to then flare into such a huge, overwhelming state of heart and mind.

So this is an invitation to explore this with interest. As U Tejaniya says, just see how does dosa do its job? It's just doing what it does. What is its job and how does it do it? This takes it out of the realm of the personal. Just really seeing such a cause and effect relationship. Like, "Oh wow, look at that."

When we can, at times—of course there are times we're identified—but at times when we can bring our interest in and just be watching it, really, and this is from personal experience, sometimes you can just bring in and see what's actually happening. It's still unpleasant, but the whole story that of course gets fed from "me, me, me" can dissipate, can stop being so real, and we can just see what's going on. That's my invitation tonight.

So, just some different ways to invite us to explore. Remembering that when we talk about mind or heart, a moment of citta, consciousness with whatever mental factors—as Guy talked about last night with the five aggregates—arising moment to moment. Each moment of arising consciousness with mental factors is a new moment, which is the only way that makes any of this workable. It also means when we're talking about what's arising, it's what's happening right now. There's only ever this moment.

Starting from that, I want to talk about bringing satipañña to the sense doors. Ajahn Buddhadasa used to talk about satipañña at the sense doors a lot—just being right at the point of sense contact with mindfulness and wisdom, with the wisdom of not adding extra liking or disliking or association. Just what's happening right now.

This has helped me so much, and it helps me in daily life too, when I remember that the resistance to unpleasant and all the emotions that come are arising from that habit of jumping away from unpleasant sense contact, feeling tone right now. That's the thing to really look at. Whatever's fueling the resistance, the aversion, the dosa in whatever way is coming up—it's beginning from some sense contact that's happening right now.

It's easier to see if it's a sound that triggers unpleasant feeling, or a sensation in the body, or a smell, or a taste. But quite frequently the sense contact is going to be mental—a thought, a mood, an emotion. And even so, recognize it's happening now.

Take fear, for instance. When fear comes up, there are all the thoughts about the future, and the fear is saying all these things that are going to happen. We can get really lost in that world. But the fear arises to begin with from some sense contact that's arising in this moment.

Maybe a memory came up. The memory came up with really painful, unpleasant feelings—moods, not feeling tone, but feelings. Really unpleasant, really scary, and boom, you know, it jumps really quickly away into fear. And then the fear is saying, "Oh, this is going to happen and that's going to happen."

Fear also has this quality. One of the jobs of fear, I think—this is me saying this, I haven't read this in the Abhidhamma—one of the jobs of fear is saying, "Because I'm here, because fear is here, I wouldn't be here if something really, really bad wasn't about to happen. Because I'm here, you should believe me." And yes, in the fight or flight response when we need to protect ourselves, sometimes that's true. But when it's this spinning, spinning, spinning, and we're lost in the story, in the future, in the past, sometimes just take a moment to see: what's the sense contact happening now? It's a thought, an unpleasant thought, and a mood. It's happening in this moment. We can explore that.

Sorrow, guilt, fury, regret—they're all different flavors of dosa. And as they bounce away, they pull away from the original sense contact and into all the stories. Often you can't think your way back into it. But you can land in—say it's way deep in guilt. You know this story, but at some point it's like, what's happening right now? You hear how we're always saying when there's strong emotion, see if you can just feel what's happening in your body, or notice what the mental miasma of it feels like rather than the story? That's because that's what's happening now. The thoughts are happening now too; the content of the thoughts is not.

When we land on what's happening now, often—for me—the physical associated sensations that come with a strong dose of emotion are extremely unpleasant. So you touch it, bring the awareness in, just touch that unpleasant, and then the resistance habit gets doubly strong, right, and bounces back into the story again. But come back. Come back. This is where mindfulness wisdom can help us move in the opposite direction from the habit of just running for your life when there's unpleasant experience. It's like, come back. Okay. Just feel this. Guilt feels like this. Oh, that's awful. Okay. It's awful. Guilt feels like this. "No, no, this and this and I did that." No, no, no. And we'll spin in it for half an hour. I think that's actually more awful than just coming back and feeling, "Oh, guilt feels like this."

We can't always do it. But just recognizing that the dosa mood arises from some unpleasant sense contact now—and noticing then what the attention does. It's like a knee-jerk reaction; it pulls away. Just that "go away from it," whether it goes to the pleasant or just gets lost.

In that moment-to-moment experience, in that gap where the awareness, the attention, is not connecting with just what is—say it's an unpleasant sound, let's keep it simple. And it's like, "Oh, I don't like that. Why is that person making that sound?" In that gap where mindfulness isn't just connected, all the papañca fueled by dosa comes flowing in. Can you notice that? You've seen this happen. This is not rocket science so far.

It happens because the attention just kind of went away, and there's not sati right now, there's not mindfulness right there. Because it jumped away with a little bit of resistance, boom, then that dosa is subtly flavoring the perception, subtly flavoring the thought, and it just starts spinning more and more. The papañca is fueled by the dosa. And then the more it goes, when there's dosa flavoring the mind, flavoring the perception, we can't recognize what's going on accurately. The new perceptions and the new papañca all start to have this flavor of just something wrong.

Have you noticed—people say they're sitting in the dining room and they think they're fine, and suddenly they recognize that every person who walked by, some horrible negative judgment came up. Or maybe that's only me. And after a while they go, "Huh. Maybe there's dosa in the mind." What's surprising is how long it can take. First, it's just, "They look slumpy."

Their socks aren't matching. I can't believe how much noise they're making taking the fork out of the thing. And after a while, they go, "Hmm, seems like I'm being a little bit picky here. A little bit aversion going on."

So what we're really doing here is learning not to always just give the focus to the object, but really getting interested in the quality of the mind that's aware.

When this cycle of aversion fueling the papañca and then flavoring perception comes on, it can really get on a roll. And it's a lot of suffering. I'm sure many of you know that, because we either judge ourselves, or the aversion itself is suffering, or we really believe it and then wonder what's wrong with everybody else. But dosa is a very unpleasant experience because it's so separating. We know we're not really quite landing somehow, but we don't know how.

The Buddha said that once arisen, ill will or dosa actually strengthens through unwise attention to the unpleasant—or it's actually translated as the repugnant aspect of something. You know the example Thich Nhat Hanh always gives: if you have one tooth that's a little bit rough and all the rest of your teeth are fine, where does your tongue go? Again and again and again. You're not feeling all your other teeth all the time, are you? But you're just sitting there. It just has to go there. It just has to feel that roughness. It's not a big thing, but it's a habit of mind.

And so we've often said, if you're really annoyed at someone, you keep looking at that person, and it just kind of spikes the annoyance. But do we want to look at that person? For whatever reason—I mean, it's not helpful, but we do that. And then it solidifies whatever the view, the explanation: they're bad, or I'm bad, or it shouldn't be happening, or whatever. And that flavoring, that distortion of the ongoing perceptions grows and grows and grows.

Dosa in the mind as it's growing can distort even sense contact that might have been kind of neutral at another time. I remember one retreat—I don't remember the story, it doesn't really matter—but definitely there was dosa in the mind, had been for some time. And it got to where just a sound would come and I would hear it as unbearable. I remember the radiators used to make a lot of little pinging noises in here. It's gotten a lot quieter. And it would ping and I'd literally hear it like an explosion. So unpleasant.

And then I remember one time, I had been on staff here, and I found myself—don't do this—running around down in the basement in the furnace room, saying that there's got to be something wrong with these heaters, that they're making this kind of noise.

Like I know something about heaters. So I'm running around. There's these giant heaters. I'm going, "This can't be right. This can't be." The dosa was just distorting everything.

It leads to action. As the Buddha says, we can't see clearly our own good, or the good of another, or the good of both, when the mind, the heart is obsessed with ill will, with dosa. The least we can start to do is just recognize. It's like I'm running around there before I can recognize—oh yeah, maybe it's just aversion completely distorting the perception of the sense contact. I don't even remember if I recognized that. I think I just gave up because I didn't know what to do to fix the furnace. And I did know better than to write a note to the maintenance. So you too, when you're running around like that, just know better than to write a note to the maintenance, because it would have been embarrassing.

It distorts. We can't see clearly. We can't recognize accurately. It distorts our judgment as to what to do. And it's such a habit to really interpret the unpleasant as wrong or bad. It's so ingrained to avoid it, to do whatever we can to avoid it, that sometimes—not realizing and not having clear recognition of what would be for my good or another's—we can make all kinds of crazy decisions in order to try and avoid a projected unpleasant feeling.

For example, a friend told me quite some years ago about her own experience with this. She had a very busy life and did some Dharma teaching on weekends. A very close friend of hers, very dear to her, requested that she come to another city—quite some hours' drive from here—to teach a weekend.

But my friend who told me this story, it came at a time when she was completely busy. To even fit in the time to go to that city, drive down there, and do the teaching would have stressed her out. It was almost crazy to even think she could fit it in. She could maybe just barely do it, but it would have been crazy.

But when she thought about telling her friend no, the fear arose of how unpleasant that would be. Her friend would be hurt. But it wasn't even really that her friend would be hurt—it was more how she would feel at thinking that her friend was hurt, that she'd let her down.

So it took her weeks to actually get real and say, "This is impossible. I love you, but I can't do it." The friend, of course, was fine. It was all projection. But when she saw how close she came to doing that—creating a whole lot more unpleasant experience than just the saying no—she realized we can't tell clearly. That deep ingrained sense that unpleasant is bad, and so we should be able to avoid it, that drive to hold ourselves separate from uncomfortable and unwanted situations—it distorts everything.

So that's one aspect. Meeting whatever place mindfulness notices the dosa arising, whether it's right at the sense contact or way off into fear or fury—this is the middle way, the Buddha's middle way, bringing mindfulness and wisdom right to the point of recognition.

Our two most common habitual responses when we recognize or experience unpleasant dosa emotions are either more dosa towards ourselves, or avoidance. We get really aversive to ourselves, thinking, "What's wrong with me?" A lot of self-judgment arises, a lot of stories about all the aversive things in the past. Or we think, "This shouldn't be here," and we avoid, deny, repress the whole thing.

So often people are having some experience of dosa—maybe not huge—but the self-judging mind comes in around it. And then they say, "Well, it's all these multiple layers of dosa," and you get lost in each story. There's this thing going on, and then there's the self-judging, and "Why am I self-judging?" And you see it's from your history. "Oh, my history, but I shouldn't be thinking of my history. I'm really self-judging, and that's also bad." And we're lost in all the little stories.

Just get big and notice—that's just dosa flavoring all the thoughts. You don't have to land on and believe the self-judging any more than you have to believe that the maintenance guys don't know how to take care of the furnace. That's just dosa fueling thought. It's just that the self-judging one's a little closer to home.

So that's one way—the dosa way of dealing with dosa. Hate it, blame yourself, blame others.

The other way is that sometimes we really embrace it, as if our anger or fear is a really important, real emotion that can lead to action. That's kind of like the greed way of really going for it. Sometimes anger, even fear—fear doesn't feel good, but they're energizing. They bring up a lot of energy, especially if we've been repressing fear or anger and all that energy has been stultified. So sometimes when it comes up, there can really be a lot of energy.

The misperception we can make is to think that energy is only available through the dosa or the greed, as if it couldn't come another way.

I've more than once had people say to me, really sincerely, deep in practice, "You know, if I give up greed and dosa"—as if we could just give it up, that would be nice—"if I give up greed and dosa, then what am I going to do? Just sit in my room the rest of my life? How am I going to do anything?"

I always find that so sad—that the only motivations for action are greed and dosa, that you can't imagine something other.

The Dalai Lama was once asked about why there seems to be such a lack of compassion in human society.

And he said, perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense, we fully embrace hostility and anger as emotional states, fueling and reinforcing them.

So this isn't the Dalai Lama now, this is me. But when we're really hating, when we're caught in fear and anger, we're giving dosa all the power, not really seeing what it is.

The Dalai Lama again: if we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement—and by reinforcement, I simply mean what James was saying the other night, that wise attention and mindfulness to the wholesome is reinforcing it—if we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger.

And not only compassion. We can act from wisdom. We can act from determination. We can act from caring. We can act from generosity. There are all kinds of wholesome motivations that we can act from.

So again, it's just conditioned. And dosa is such a strong force at times that it does take us over. We don't know how to move out of it. And so it's like, "Wow, this is so real. This is what we know." It's hard to trust the other. It's hard to see that being able to step aside from the dosa and move from wisdom, move from connection, can sometimes have a really strong effect.

There's this story I heard on the radio about something called "non-complementary behavior." But I take it as acting not from fear and aversion, not from dosa, when that would be the normal way to act.

Two families, somewhere in the States—it sounded like a suburb because they were outside, kind of in the backyard of their house but away from the house, having an evening dinner together at picnic tables, enjoying a nice meal and wine. There were some woods around, some forest.

Suddenly into the middle of that, a man came with a gun out of nowhere. They didn't know where he came from. He held the gun on these people and said, "Give me your money or I'll shoot."

Of course—panic, fear, aversion, the whole thing. But first they said, "Well, we don't have any money. We're out here in the middle of nowhere. We don't have any money."

He was getting really angry. "I don't care. Give me your money."

The first response from someone was kind of angry: "What would your mother say if she saw you here?"

That didn't work. He said, "I don't have a mother."

So they were getting scared. But then suddenly one person just had this sense—probably didn't think it through—but could move away from the hatred and the fear and just looked at this guy and said, "Would you like a glass of wine?"

He said, "Oh, okay."

So he took the glass of wine and sat down at the table with them. I don't know what they were feeling, but they're drinking the wine with him, they start chatting back and forth. They're chatting for a while. And at one point, the man says, "Well, I see I've come to the wrong place."

So he gets up and wants hugs. Then he says, "Okay, I'm leaving."

They offer him a glass of wine. He leaves with his glass of wine. They run like hell into the house and lock the door. I mean, they weren't idiots. They ran like hell into the house and locked the door.

But then later, when they went out, he had very, very carefully placed his empty wine glass outside the door and gone away.

You wouldn't think that would work. But sometimes it does. Not always, of course, but just to know—sometimes it does.

So, sati-pañña: meeting with simple awareness as it's showing up now.

As Sharon says, opening to the truth of things as they are is what frees our mind from fear and selfishness. However things are.

So now I'll give a couple of examples from my own experience, and you can find your own different ways of bringing sati, bringing mindfulness wisdom, at whichever point you might notice the unpleasant or the aversion.

The first example is easiest in a way—when the sense contact that's unpleasant is really obvious, but it's not something you can fix, and it keeps on going. It's really driving you nuts. You can be seeing the aversion, but you're really spinning in it. When you're actually able to say, "Let me try to just bring mindfulness wisdom right to the point of contact, just with the hearing, and see what happens"—try and watch that whole cause and effect chain that the Buddha described.

A simple example: practicing in Burma. I have ten million stories of practicing in Burma. In terms of noise, it's a great place for stories.

The first time I was ever practicing there in my little hut—I had to sit in my hut because in the meditation hall there were no chairs in those years, and I can't sit cross-legged anymore—so I had to sit in my hut, which was okay, but that's part of the story. I couldn't go back to the hall. And across the little road, not even as far as the back of this wall, there was construction. That goes without saying. If you're in a meditation center in Burma, there will be construction.

Just across the way, they decided partway into my several-weeks retreat that they were sanding long, long strips of wood with an electric sander. Do you know what an electric sander sounds like? Do you know how noisy? From 7:30 in the morning until 5:30 in the afternoon. Really loud, really close. Sometimes they'd take a little break, but you didn't know when, so you couldn't count on it.

You go through all the things—"I'm just an equanimist"—but underneath, if we don't notice the pulling away, because that's what it is, the pulling away, not wanting to be there with that, then the resistance grows and the aversion grows. You don't quite notice it, you think you're present, until suddenly you're going bonkers.

Then after a few days, they brought in a second sander that was in a different key. So they'd both be going all day.

And finally—it's usually "finally" because we try everything else—you realize the only thing to do is totally surrender into the point of contact. Hearing is like this. Just totally surrender. No attention pulling away even a little bit. Hearing is like this, unpleasant. And then it's just what it is.

Like the thing I quoted from Ajahn Sumedho: "I can't bear this another moment"—and then I found that I could. Something like that, which isn't really hurting you—I wasn't in danger, there was nothing I could do other than go out and yell at the workers, there was nowhere else I could go—you just die into this sound, that point of sense contact and unpleasant, and see the whole thing. In those moments, it's really quite okay. The whole sense of story and struggle is gone.

Sure, there's a later moment when the mind is tired, you forget, and the habit of jumping away from unpleasant comes up again. But then mindfulness recognizes how much more complicated that makes everything, and it's actually easier just to come back and be. Okay, that's unpleasant. Sounds like that.

We were once in another place in Burma—never mind, I'll never finish if I tell that story. I could give you so many examples from my life; you don't need them all.

So that's one approach: you can go right to the point of sense contact.

Of course, a lot of times we can't do that. Sometimes what we miss isn't a huge storm going on, but something's just off a little bit. Often what we don't recognize is a more subtle, pervasive background mood. I think I might have mentioned this in instructions the other day—we don't quite pick it up, but somehow everything seems a little off. You go out to look at that beautiful moonlight last night—I don't know if you saw it, it was incredible.

If you're in the right mind state, that moonlight is incredible. If you're not? "Ah, the moon. What is it?" When we're attuned, there's so much joy. "Let me have some tea." But then, "Ah, the tea." And you go, "What's going on?" It all started with just a background mood. So then the question becomes, well, what's triggering it? What was the sense contact? This can actually be quite fun to explore.

A friend told me he was on retreat here and had a day exactly like that—this subtle, off, little background dose of something he couldn't identify. Finally he thought, "Let me just sit here and bring full attention. What's happening now? Quit trying to figure it out, just be with what's happening now." He brought his attention into his body and mind and realized—the sweatshirt he had on was a little bit tight. When he moved in a certain way it pulled, and it was unpleasant. He hadn't noticed. That's all it takes sometimes. It doesn't have to be the horrible things of the world. If things are a little tight and you don't notice it's unpleasant, the mind leaps away and dosa comes flying in.

Really interesting to see. It takes the personal out. You don't then need to go, "How stupid am I?" You just go, "Wow, look at that. Cause and effect." Dosa is doing its job. But mindfulness can do its job and come in to say, "Oh, that's what's happening." And then wisdom does its job, which is to say, "Okay, tight movement feels like this." And all the other stuff doesn't have to go on.

Or with a thought, like the thought "I'm no good, I can't do this." You kind of know it's there but kind of not. It's so familiar that we are believing it and not recognizing that the thought itself is perceived with unpleasant feeling tone. We don't quite know it—we just think, "Yeah, it's unpleasant, but it's unpleasant because I'm so bad, I am bad, and that's unpleasant." We don't recognize that the arising thought itself is actually the sense contact leading to the mind jumping away, feeling the aversion.

So again, noticing the state in the mind. Noticing sometimes the idea in the background, the view—"I just can't do it right," "It shouldn't be like this." A number of people have mentioned to me noticing some little idea in the mind: "It could just be a little bit better than this. This just isn't quite good enough." And when they look at the idea, they wonder, "What isn't quite good enough? I don't even know. I'm just walking in the forest and present, but somehow it's not quite good enough."

When we can notice that idea in the background, we recognize, "Oh right, this is coming with unpleasant vedana." Just see it. That's all.

And then, of course, there are times when this subtlety is not within the realm of mindfulness or recognition, and we simply find ourselves in a huge storm of fear or anger or disappointment—whatever form of dosa it is. Still, at whatever level mindfulness can come to meet it, let it meet it as it is. Not the story, but really letting awareness come in and be with that energy—the energy of that difficult feeling. Say it's anger. Say it's fear.

The alternative is that we totally embrace it, which means we go off into the story and just keep feeding it. That's not what I'm talking about.

But it's also not saying anger shouldn't be here, fear shouldn't be here—push it away and let me just feel my foot pressing on the ground. That's impossible because it's just too strong. But we can bring the awareness in to notice the quality in the mind that's being aware. It isn't subtle, but we can really learn how to bring mindfulness in a big way.

So maybe sitting when the energy's too strong and you keep getting lost in the story—go out and walk, walk really fast. Not so much analyzing, but feeling that roiling energy, for lack of a better word. Just feeling that mental state, that aversion, that dosa, just swirling, swirling. But mindfulness is there with it in the big picture.

In fact, sometimes I call it stomping meditation. You go out and you're just walking, walking—anger, anger, anger. So it's not tidy. It's not all neatly noting "anger, anger, unpleasant sensation, negative thought." It's messier than that. But it's still mindfulness when you're not just going, "Yeah, and they did that, and by God, I'm going to get them." Instead, you're feeling: anger feels like this. Let it rip. It's not going to do anything if you really don't have to be afraid of it. We start to actually see the nature even of this strong anger—the wisdom of being with whatever's occurring, even with the unpleasant. At some point, with steady mindfulness, wisdom comes in and we start to see things as they really are, even a huge, strong mental state.

This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. He's saying "I" is just a thought—we've been through that, now you all have that covered. "Thoughts and feelings, thoughts and emotions have no intrinsic solidity, form, shape, or color. When a thought, a mood of anger arises in the mind with such force that you feel aggressive and destructive, is that anger actually holding a weapon? Can it burn things like a fire? Can it crush things like a rock? Carry them away like a violent river? No. Anger, like any other thought or mood or feeling, has no true self-existence, not even a definite location. It is just like wind roaring in empty space."

I love that. Let it roar in the empty space of mindfulness and wisdom.

So instead of allowing these wild thoughts to enslave us, we realize their essential emptiness. "When you see through this energy of hatred within, you will discover there is not one single enemy left outside. Otherwise, even if you could overpower everyone in the whole world, your hatred would only grow stronger. Indulging it will never make it subside. Examine the nature of hatred"—or any of the dosa states—"you will find that it is no more than a thought and a feeling. And when wisdom sees it as it is, it can dissolve like a cloud in the sky."

I know it's not that easy, but sometimes that happens. The only way this clear seeing of wisdom can come about is through the steadiness of just simple presence with what's occurring, with the difficult, with the unpleasant. It's the opposite of what our deep habits are. But this is the avenue not only into understanding with wisdom the nature of difficult emotions, but also what opens us to understanding the nature of reality in all the different ways.

The jewel in the heart of the understanding of the First Noble Truth, in the heart of the ability to just be with the difficult, to bear witness, is the movement, the natural expression of bearing witness into compassion, into love, into generosity, into recognizing the insubstantial nature—which doesn't mean a cold emptiness. It's more that sense of non-separation, the connectedness of all of us. What I mentioned in my earlier talk that Archbishop Tutu calls Ubuntu: we're all connected.

I have so much more to share, but let me say two things quickly.

First, of course, sometimes when it's a real storm of fear, guilt, or anger, even what I just said to do—stomp, let the wind roar in empty space—even touching it, the storm is just so much stronger than the energy of mindfulness at that time. That's not a failure. Just recognizing that you open for a moment into the really difficult and you feel it's overwhelming, completely identified again. Even though intellectually we have the tools, at that point the mindfulness just isn't the equal of the strength of the dosa.

So we recognize—and we've talked about this a lot—when by bringing attention to the difficult, the dosa just grows and grows, then that's when we skillfully shift our awareness to something more neutral or something pleasant. So that we don't drown in the difficult situation.

I have another friend who used to do retreats years ago, and she had a lot of really difficult emotion and trauma that would come up. She said she really learned something from her grown sons. They would tell her about going to the ocean in Hawaii or somewhere with big waves. She would go out in the waves, and when a big wave would start coming, she'd always turn her back to it and run. And of course, that just knocks you over.

Her sons would always say, "Ma, no, you've got to dive into the wave, not turn around and run." But she'd always turn around and run and get whacked. And she said just once she was able to simply dive into the wave.

So it's sort of like that. We're diving into the wave. But sometimes all we can do is put a toe in. Just put a toe in. And then boom, it's whacking us. So turn your attention to something neutral.

Really, we're taking care of the awareness. We're taking care to re-recognize, to refresh the awareness so it can come back into being able to be present without all the distortions of the flavoring. So it's really important, as Tejaniya says, to take care of the awareness, to adjust your attitude first, to see when it's really too strong like that.

So it's not about forcing yourself to go into it and drown. But again, it's mindfulness wisdom to see, to recognize that the awareness isn't strong enough right now. So shift to something neutral or even pleasant. It can be helpful when I find there's just this total, total flavoring of aversion, but big time. And it seems little, but it can really help to consciously open up awareness and just see what other sense contacts are arising now that are neutral or even pleasant. They don't have to be as important as the big one that's fueling the dosa, but it really helps.

Thich Nhat Hanh would say—and when I first read this I thought, "But that's ridiculous"—but now I know what he meant. During the Vietnam War, he worked with young social workers who would engage with both sides, with people in the villages, with people that were suffering, so much suffering in the middle of a war. And of course they'd get overwhelmed. We get overwhelmed with the suffering, with the difficulty in ourselves and in the world. No one's saying we don't.

And he would say, "I would tell the young social workers to go at night out into the field and smell the fresh smells of the herbs and the flowers." And I thought, they're in the middle of a war, and he's saying go into the field and smell the fresh herbs at night? What is—I mean, but that's it. That's an intellectual resistance. What he's doing is just this, just what Tejaniya says: taking the attention that's glommed into the dosa-filled state and doesn't know how to get out, and shifting it to something neutral, to something pleasant, not as a running away, but to refresh the awareness, to come back to wisdom, to come back to balance.

So just little things. And try—I don't know, I have a very critical mind in that way. I just say, "Oh, that's stupid. Okay, I'm really suffering when I think about the suffering in the world. I should go out and look at the beautiful moon." And then my mind goes, "Yeah, you can look at the moon. You have the right to look at the moon. You're lucky you can look at the moon. What about everything else?" That's just dosa again.

Just connect. Just allow the mindfulness, the quality of the citta, to refresh itself. Because really what we're doing is moving from our obsessive relationship to each object that arises, not using each object to give us a sense of self or good or bad or self-justification. Just the objects, whatever they are—they serve the function of opening us into the quality of mindfulness and awareness again. So this is really more of what we're doing. And then when the awareness is balanced, we can come back and be, perhaps, with the difficult experience.

I've found in my own life that often the times when I've been feeling disconnected—not lost in aversion, not noticing that, but just feeling disconnected, either isolated or kind of off. It could be in daily life or on retreat. And I stop and look over time, and I often see that there's some difficult emotion, either that's present that I'm trying not to see, or there's a thought that it might be coming and I don't want to feel it. Just something the mind doesn't want to feel. And in trying to not feel that, there arises this sense of being alienated and disconnected from everything, because we can't shut down selectively.

I remember once someone in my family was suffering a lot. Nothing I could do about it. And just thinking about it was so painful. The sadness and the sense of helplessness. Helplessness is a really unpleasant feeling to feel. It was so painful that I'd kind of pull back—"Oh no, let's not go there." Not consciously, but just a little bit pulling back. So then you pull back from everything. And when I could see, "Oh right, that's what's happening"—wow. Really feeling helpless is like this.

It feels crummy. Being helpless doesn't suddenly transform into feeling good—don't get me wrong. It still feels crummy. But that steady willingness to just bear witness with mindfulness, with wisdom, to your own personal experience or to what's happening in the world—that steadiness of being present—at some point it does open. Out of the alienation, you find again the sense of connectedness with life, the tenderness of life, the beauty of life, the sense of appreciation also of the good.

We can't do that with an act of will. And it's amazing how that comes, at times. Then we forget again. But with the willingness or the ability just for moments to be present, to bear witness with the difficulty, something shifts.

Let me share one more story about this. It's kind of a simple story—not about huge suffering in the world—but about how we can work with these teachings on retreat.

Some years ago—actually, a long time ago, many years ago—I started to have some symptoms that turned out to be an autoimmune disease. At that time, it was quite painful. And once they figured out what it was, that didn't help, because there was nothing they could do about it. These conditions can go in all different directions, as you know.

The way my mind related to it at the beginning—and this is common—first there was denial. "This isn't happening. What can we do?" Then just trying not to feel. Then self-blame: "This is my fault. What did I do wrong? I was in the wrong place. If I were really a good spiritual person, I would be able to have the right thoughts and not get sick." Have you ever had that thought? "If I could really figure it out..." I mean, Louise Hay—she's got a lot to answer for.

But then at one point I thought, "Hmm, Ramana Maharshi died of cancer." He had something going on with understanding things, you know. So, hello—everybody gets sick. Everybody gets sick and dies.

But anyways, this whole self-blame thing. And then the fear, the aversion. "If I can't walk very well now, I'll never be able to walk. I'll never be able to do this. What's it going to be like in the future?" All the fear and negativity mushrooming. And then everybody coming and saying, "Try this, try that. How are you going to live your life? What should you do?" There was a lot of suffering and a lot of confusion because, you know, with the ten million things to try, what should I do?

Cold is really hard for me. People said, "Well, you should leave here and go live in Arizona, and you should not eat any more gluten, of course. And you should give up caffeine and sugar, and that's going to fix you." I actually tried that. It did not improve my mood, and it did not improve my physical experience either.

So I was trying all these things. But at one point—at one point—I recognized that present moment mindfulness was such a refuge. The present moment of just landing in the body, being really present. Then you'd feel there were lots of moments of pain or stiffness or unpleasantness that weren't killer. But the not being with it led into all this future thinking and blame and confusion about what to do—no way to see clearly.

Present moment mindfulness. Oh, whatever's going to happen in the future, who knows? It's like this now. And from that, I learned so much. The mind would start off into the future. I'd be trying to clean the bathtub and could hardly bend over to do it. What's happening now? It's like this. It's unpleasant, okay.

So freeing.

And out of that, really this genuine sense of compassion arose—not "I decided I should be compassionate." That has never worked for me. But just being with it, this sense of compassion for the body, which didn't really feel like "me"—just taking care of it instead of hating it. That seems obvious. And then from that place of being really present, the attention kind of cleared, and I was able to make decisions about what to do—not based on fear, not based on wild hopes. You try things. I tried the diet. I could see it didn't make me happy, plus it didn't work. So I stopped doing that diet. Go to Arizona and hide in the corner? I don't think so.

Maybe I'll go with my friends to India. That's what I did. They were with me. They helped me up and down into the tuk-tuks. And I went back to drinking a lot of chai and eating chapatis, and I was really happy. I didn't get worse.

You can make decisions not based on fear or aversion when you're being clearly present with what is. I could see if something made it worse. You could take care. I could see if it didn't matter. You could take care. But just the ability to be present with the unpleasant—it frees our heart and mind from all this unnecessary suffering and confusion of separation.

There was one line from Mingyur Rinpoche. He speaks of a peace that is not dependent on the presence or absence of any pleasant or unpleasant feeling. Peace is dependent on just our total presence of mindfulness wisdom in this moment. Whatever this moment is, it's the moment that reveals the truth.

As Dogen said, if you can't find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?

Thank you for your kind and patient attention.

CHAPTER 72

Purifying Habits of Our Mind: Dāna and Sīla

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this talk from the Three-Month Retreat, Carol Wilson examines how dāna (generosity) and sīla (virtue) serve as powerful tools for purifying the mind's habitual patterns of greed, hatred, and delusion. Building on the Third Noble Truth's teaching of the cessation of craving, she emphasizes that all of the Buddha's teachings—not just meditation—are designed to help us recognize and cultivate moments of freedom from the kilesas.
>
> Wilson introduces a framework of three levels of kilesa: the transgressive (addressed through dāna and sīla), the obsessive (addressed through samādhi), and the latent (addressed through wisdom). Drawing on Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching that temporary nibbāna is available to all of us whenever kilesas temporarily cease, she encourages practitioners to appreciate the coolness and brightness of mind that arises through wholesome action.
> Through personal stories from Burma and America, Wilson illustrates how generosity transforms both giver and receiver, cutting through the sense of separation and self. She explores the seven aspects of mindful giving taught by Sayadaw U Janaka Paññā and discusses how sīla—restraint from harmful action—builds confidence and purifies consciousness. The talk concludes with a sutta on wise reflection, encouraging practitioners to recollect their own virtue and generosity as a path to concentration and joy, available in all circumstances of daily life.

Around this time you might be wondering how we can possibly keep having more things to say. But we do, and we will.

I want to move in a direction from what Guy was speaking about last night—the Third Noble Truth, in case you forgot—the remainderless cessation, the relinquishment of craving, of clinging, as the Buddha described it: this unshakable deliverance of mind. This is one of my favorite quotations, and I think he read it: "That unshakable deliverance of the heart—that indeed is the essence of the holy life. That is its goal." Just to remember: this unshakable deliverance of mind and heart.

It stands to reason that if this is the essence of the holy life, of the Buddha's teaching, then everything he taught was in service of helping us purify the heart and mind. It's the pure heart, the pure mind that can recognize Nibbāna in a moment—the complete relinquishment, or even these momentary moments of freedom. All of his teachings are to help us purify in this way.

From the Dalai Lama: "When the mind, the heart, is completely free of negative emotions and tendencies—we could say kilesa—it understands and knows all phenomena. It is only because there are obscuring veils between the mind and its object that we are unable to know all things. When these veils have been removed, no new power is needed. Seeing or recognizing and being aware is the nature of the mind, the heart itself. As long as the mind exists, it has the ability to know. But this ability does not reveal itself until all obscurations have been removed. This is what it means to realize enlightenment."

What I want to talk about tonight is this: in terms of utter relinquishment, but also moment-to-moment freedom, recognizing that the whole range of the Buddha's teachings—all the activities of our life—can be in service of recognizing when there's kilesa, and of cultivating qualities that purify the heart and mind. This isn't only accessible in the very subtle levels of meditation. Everything he taught serves this purpose.

Remember, Guy mentioned the sense of momentary freedom. The way Ajahn Buddhadasa speaks about that—he has this great talk called "Nibbāna for Everyone." He was talking to Thai lay people quite some time ago (he's no longer with us), because there had come to be a sense that Nibbāna was just meant for when you were dead, or it was just for some other people. And he's saying no, Nibbāna is for everyone.

Just this little part: he's saying we look further to the fact that kilesas are also saṅkhāra dhamma—compounded phenomena. In other words, kilesas are things that have birth and death. So when the kilesas occur, the causal conditions are present. And when the causal conditions that bring about the kilesas cease, they simply become extinct, just dissolve. Just as Guy was saying—the sense of the coolness of Nibbāna, the flame just blows out. The kilesa in that moment ceases to exist.

Although this extinction is temporary—in other words, the coolness takes place temporarily—the phenomenon has the real sense of Nibbāna, even though it is not the lasting one. Hence, temporary Nibbāna does occur for those of us who unavoidably have some impurities left. Should there be any of us with one or two impurities rolling around?

This is really what I'm basing this talk on, and what the Buddha's teaching is based on: the whole aspect of practice is not only meditation, bhāvanā. Often when the teachings would be talked about, it's called dāna-sīla-bhāvanā—the three pillars: generosity, virtue or non-harming behavior, and meditation. All of those are part of the path.

When I was first introduced to this practice in India many years ago, doing ten-day retreats with Goenka, of course it was a meditation retreat, so it was really about meditation—although he talked about dāna and sīla, generosity and virtue, a lot. But the meditation was what we were doing, and that's where the fascination was.

When we came back to this country, the Westerners who brought it back were taking Buddhist meditation out of the context of Buddhist cultures—the Theravāda out of the context of the cultures in Sri Lanka, in Thailand, in Burma. The meditation aspect was emphasized more, because it's really what's interesting, and where the real subtlety comes, where we can truly recognize how the mind works and what freedom is.

The teachers would talk about the importance of generosity, the importance of sīla. I'm not saying this was the teachers' view, just how I heard it—but I know I'm not the only one. It was kind of like: that stuff was good, that was nice, and you needed to have some sīla, some generosity, so you could meditate and really get there, right?

There's the famous saying of Munindraji, one of Joseph's teachers. When he came over, he said, "You know, you guys here—you're like you're in a boat rowing as hard as you can, but you forgot to untie it from the dock." You've got to pay attention to dāna and sīla. These are really important aspects.

More and more over the years, I've come to deeply appreciate—not that we've got to do that to prepare the mind—but that these aspects of the path are aspects of transforming consciousness. They're ways of living that are part of our path of liberation. All aspects of the path, everything the Buddha taught—he didn't teach something extra just because it would make you feel good. Everything is, as he said, the essence of the path: freeing the heart and mind from the habit of kilesa—of greed, of hatred and aversion, of delusion.

I want to talk a bit about all of this tonight, and probably into my next talk as well. Starting to see that all these different ways can help us cultivate, can help us transform the habits of our consciousness. Because different aspects of our experience are available at different times, depending on the conditions. Here, when you're deep in a retreat, there are times when that subtlety Guy was talking about last night is really available, and you can really appreciate it. But even on retreat, is that available to you all the time?

And you think, well, okay, now I've just got to slump along because nothing really good is happening, but I've got to slump along until I can get there and see the gap. That's really wasting the opportunity—not understanding that every moment offers us a chance to really see what's going on in the heart and mind and to work on transforming our habits of consciousness.

It's no secret, I don't think, by this time, how these kalesa habits operate so often beneath the level of conscious awareness. You know how they just suddenly pop up when you really think, "I'm done with that one. Things are going fine, things are going well." And all of a sudden it just comes roaring up. You've seen through this thing, but suddenly greed or aversion or whatever just reemerges. That can trigger doubt if we don't really understand how subtle and deep the habits of the kalesas are. If we start to understand that and recognize all these different ways that we can really be purifying these habits, then we don't get into doubt. We just see, "Okay, what's up now? What's available?"

Mingyur Rinpoche describes meditative awareness—because sati, mindfulness, is the thread that runs through all the different aspects: dana, sila, bhavana. Nothing's really possible without mindfulness, without recognizing. He describes meditative awareness as becoming cognizant of, or knowing, the quality of the mind—not just the phenomenon, the object that's perceived by the mind, but really becoming more and more tuned in to the quality that's present in the mind that's aware in any particular moment. That's really the level we're working on with all these different ways of purifying and shifting the habits.

One model I want to refer to tonight and next week involves three levels of kalesa, or of purification, that come up in our experience. The first, in terms of kalesa, is called the torments, or the kalesa of transgression. This deals with actions and speech—when the kalesa is so strong, it comes up so strong or so unseen that it gives rise to intention and motivation that leads to action or speech. On this level, we're working with dana and sila to counter and purify this level of kalesa of transgression.

The second level is called the obsessive. I think you all have a sense of what that means—obsessive kalesa. Maybe you're not acting it out, but again and again, in the mind, in the mind, you just can't put it down. Maybe you don't even recognize it, but that is where collectedness of mind is what really begins to protect and purify, on this level of obsessive kalesa.

The third level that's talked about is called the latent—the underlying potential for kalesa to arise given the appropriate conditions. That's when you're minding your own business and everything's copacetic, and suddenly, out of seemingly nowhere, zoom, it comes up. They say it's like a seed that has the potential to sprout if it's given water and sunshine and all the appropriate conditions. The Buddha says this level—this latent level of greed, hatred, delusion—is abandoned not by acts, but by wisely seeing, by wise attention, by wisdom. I'm going to talk about that one next week.

Tonight I'll start by talking about this first level of transgressive torments, and about dana and sila, and see how far we get.

So, starting to talk about generosity—not just as a nice thing, a good thing, what we should do for people less fortunate, which is how I was brought up. That's not bad, but it's a certain distancing kind of a thing. Instead, I'm thinking about dana as a transformer of consciousness, a transformer of the habits of heart and mind. With all of these things, our interest is really in the quality in the heart and mind, more than the outer appearance. It always comes down to intention.

Generosity, dana, as I'm sure you're aware, is something the Buddha talked about a lot. Usually when he first began talking to lay people, generosity would be the first thing he would discuss, and then go on to sila. In a way, he laid it down as the foundational quality of the whole sasana, the whole system he set up of nuns and monks and lay people living together and supporting one another. It's this really ennobling quality of the heart on our path of awakening.

Many times when the Buddha would be meeting either one person or a whole group of people, with his all-seeing mind he could recognize someone who he thought could be ready to hear the true Dhamma. But he would begin by talking about dana, talking about sila. Not as "this is what you should do," but because when the heart and mind tune into the quality of generosity, it brightens the heart, brightens the mind, uplifts, and brings the happiness of the wholesome. It's really interesting—even just thinking about generosity can do that, whether one's own or another's. Not trying to, but just noticing, is really quite powerful.

For example, just this morning before I came up here, I was having breakfast and reading the headlines on the BBC, which is never a very uplifting experience. I was reading the headlines and I could notice my consciousness, my heart, getting heavy, more contracted, just from reading. And then at the end of whatever news, it's like everything's reported: this was said on Twitter, that was said on Twitter. It's just like everybody on Twitter is out there putting down everybody else who has a different point of view. I'm thinking, "And this is the news?" So-and-so said this, and so-and-so said that, and they think this. It's like one giant papañca that's taking over the world.

It's really kind of shocking.

So after ten minutes of that, I was feeling heavy and contracted. I just needed to look at my notes for the talk. I wasn't even trying to think about it—I was just looking at the dāna section. I hadn't decided which stories to use, so I was just picking them out. Five minutes, that's all I did, just looking. And when I put it down, the whole tenor of my consciousness had completely shifted. I was feeling really happy, really appreciative, just from reading little stories—which I already knew—of other people's generosity. It just touches that place of generosity and wholesomeness in one's own mind stream. And it's really like an uplift.

So happy, but not like the happy of "Oh, I feel happy, I feel so good, this is pleasant." Yes, that's true, but that's incidental really. The happiness is that the mind is bright, the heart is energized, because it's the happiness of that coolness of a moment of no kilesa. That heaviness is just gone. And there's the happiness of generosity, of non-clinging, of appreciating, of connecting—it brightens the heart and mind. It's really quite remarkable.

Because if you were to go out and try to feel happy, try to feel good, that's a different thing. But to see the power of this is really very strong.

Generosity has a motivation and intention in the heart-mind. Obviously, it's transforming—in a moment of generosity—the habit of greed or holding on or needing something. But it also, interestingly, in that moment is transforming the kilesa of ill-will. There's a saying—I didn't understand it for a long time, but it's kind of commentarial—if you're feeling really not good about someone or annoyed with them, give them a gift. And I thought, "What's that about?" But it's assuming you give a gift not in a spirit of "Here, take this and be happy," you know—but that you're actually really giving it from the heart of generosity. And you can't be generous without it cutting through the sense of separation, without the sense of me and others dissolving. It's like, "Oh, please take this." And it really cuts through ill-will and that sense of separation, the separate fearful self. It's a very interesting quality.

So again, it's not so much about what's given or what you should do, but this motivation in the heart and mind.

Another aspect of it is that when we're really consciously tuning in—the mindfulness—you might notice greed, and you might consciously tune into generosity. And there are like three different moments of happiness about it, or three different ways we experience the happiness of the pure heart and mind.

One is in the moment of motivation, where you really just take the moment to tune in. "Yes, I have this time or this thing I want to give"—whatever it is—and tuning into that motivation of offering. And that really brightens and uplifts the heart and mind.

The second is in the actual doing of it, either the giving or the sharing of your time or whatever it is, the actual doing of it—assuming all of this, we're doing it consciously, doing it with awareness.

And third is in reflecting afterwards, wise reflection on that act of generosity. This is something I'll read a sutta about later, but we often don't do this. To think, even at times of small generous actions that you've done, when you're having a hard time, is a way to really transform the consciousness. It's something we often don't do. We have such an idea that it's just being egotistical—"I'm so great." But if it is egotistical, if you're thinking "I'm so great," it won't have the effect of brightening the heart and mind. You'll be able to tell. But sometimes just to look and think, "Oh yeah, there was that time..." And you're remembering it in a feeling way, in a motivational way. You can just remember that moment of sharing, that mutuality. And again, the wholesomeness of it just arises. It's what you could say is kamma vipāka. Vipāka is like the result of a moment of kamma, a moment of action, a moment of intention. So the kammic result of wholesome action—it comes up in memory.

Have you noticed this sometimes here on retreat? Perhaps you've noticed it in the other direction as well—you're having all these memories of the unwholesome things you did in your life, and waves of remorse arise. I know many people experience this. That's also a kind of vipaka. But there can be times when a memory might come up of some wholesome act of generosity you performed. And you can just feel and appreciate that. Let that in. That's a wholesome moment too.

As I said, when I grew up, the sense of generosity as being good and appropriate was always there. Certainly, I find in many ways this culture here in America is a very generous culture. A lot of people offer a great deal of time and money and support in many ways. But what I never understood—and this might have just been my loss from how I grew up—is that generosity was always more outwardly directed toward the result of what you give, which reflects our focus on the object, on the phenomenon.

What I didn't understand, really until I spent a lot of time in Thailand and Burma practicing in meditation centers and monasteries, just being there in a culture that deeply values generosity, was the joyful, contagious aspect of tuning into this quality of generosity—both in the offering and in the receiving. I really didn't grow up understanding or experiencing that at all.

But to really see how wholesome goodness, the wholesome qualities of heart and mind, are truly contagious. So too are the kilesas, of course. But in some ways, as I mentioned, just this morning reading a few stories, the whole mind really transformed in that moment without planning it. Because goodness kind of touches goodness. It lets it come up and manifest. It's really in some ways more our truest nature—truly transformed consciousness.

I want to share that the Buddha in a way set up his whole sasana so that generosity was the foundation. This is from the Buddha:

"Bhikkhus, Brahmins and householders are very helpful for you. They provide you with the requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings, and medicines in times of sickness." Those are the four requisites that bhikkhus and nuns can accept from lay people. "And you, bhikkhus, are very helpful to Brahmins and householders as you teach them the Dhamma that is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end, with the correct meaning and wording. And you proclaim the spiritual life in its fulfillment and complete purity. Thus, this spiritual life is lived with mutual support for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

There's a way that this practice of going out every day for alms food—monks in particular aren't allowed to keep food overnight—means you can't completely isolate yourself from lay people. This mutual aspect of generosity is really at the core of supporting each other to cross the flood. I love that this is there.

Even today in Thailand and Burma, even if in some of the monasteries or meditation centers where I stay there's cooking—where the food is offered but cooked on site—even so, the monks will go out every morning on alms round with their bowls. Even in very poor areas, very poor neighborhoods, not everyone participates, but people know they're coming. There's always a little novice running ahead ringing a bell in Burma so people know they're coming.

I've watched, I've gone along and observed. People come running out—and a lot of people don't—but the ones who want to, they come running out, sometimes with their little children, and they stand there. What they can offer might be a spoonful of rice, or two spoonfuls of rice. Often it's just that. But there's this sense of appreciation and respect on both sides. The monks don't acknowledge it personally. It's not like a personal gift. It's an offering to the whole Sangha, to keep it going. But there's this sense of such deep appreciation.

One time, years ago, after a big cyclone in Burma had really destroyed a great deal of people's homes and much of the rice crop, people in the area around this meditation center where I often stay really didn't have—they had much less than usual, and usual isn't very much. But then some group had offered a lot of money for what's called a rice dana. Each household would come and receive a big fifty-pound bag of rice to take home. A friend of ours, a monk from Mexico, was staying there. So the next morning, he said, when they went out on alms round—

So every day when they'd go out on alms round, there were the usual families that would come and offer. You kind of knew who was going to be there.

But this next day, after the rice dana, so many more people were out there offering—people who hadn't been able to before. And the first thing they wanted to do was simply offer a little bit of rice back to the Sangha.

This sense of mutuality is profound. My mind can go, "Well, big deal, three spoonfuls of rice." I mean, it's so pathetic that my mind could even go that way, rather than just appreciating how this generosity—both the giving and the receiving—is in that moment really purifying habits. It's bringing real happiness to people on both sides, just to be able to offer like that.

I want to share a few little things that I like, because maybe hearing about generosity can bring this kind of happiness to our heart and mind. And recognizing it's not the happiness that comes because it's about you—just the hearing itself. And if it doesn't bring that happiness, you say, "So what?" Just notice that.

I cut this out years and years ago from the New York Times. This man, Matt Dawson, was at the time 78 years old and still working for the Ford Motor Company in Detroit. He'd been working for them for 59 years, driving a forklift and doing as much overtime as he possibly could just so he could give most of it away. He said he had donated more than a million dollars to schools and charities since 1994. He said, "I get joy, happiness out of this. I can go home and sleep good."

He only got as far as seventh grade in Shreveport, Louisiana, came to Detroit in 1940 and started working. And he said, "No matter how much you make or how little you make, you've got to save a little of that. I was raised like that, to help others. I have more than enough for myself."

More than enough didn't include vacations. He drove an old Ford Escort, had a one-bedroom apartment in not a very nice section of Detroit. "It's a big house, a big car—that doesn't excite me." And he earned about $100,000 a year.

The first recipient of his donations was the United Negro College Fund, which got $50,000. Since then, $180,000 more. He gave $200,000 to Louisiana State University, $20,000 to the NAACP, $112,000 to churches in Detroit and Louisiana—and on and on. Amazing, isn't it? It just makes him happy to do this.

Here's a note I got a few years ago from a woman who's been on retreat here. She said, "I have been on the verge of quitting a job I no longer need, wondering if or how this job serves me. I've decided to keep the job for five or six more months and give all the earnings away to causes that I love." This cause—donating to some nuns in Burma—was the first of many. "Thank you for the chance to offer this money," she wrote, "because this gift brings me great joy and opens a whole new chapter of work as dana to the world."

That's the sense of it. It's not "I'm doing such a great thing." It's "Thank you for the opportunity." That's something they say in Burma a lot—"opportunity for dana." It's a very common phrase. "Oh, there's an opportunity for dana." Do we think like that? Do you think like that? "Wow, here's an opportunity for dana." But in Burma, that's a very common phrase and expression.

Another story. This is a nun I've known for quite a few years. She had a small nunnery near Shwe Oo Min, another poor nunnery, just barely pulling it together. When we first met her, there was no electricity, and a friend of ours donated a few hundred dollars to get electricity connected. So a few years ago, she came to the meditation center. Some friends were staying because generous people offer money that we take in and distribute to different nunneries and schools. She knew this—I mean, everybody knows everything that's happening.

So she came, and we knew her for a while. We'd never—you know, she's nice enough, seemed a little bit depressed. Nothing, didn't really seem to have any kind of special spark, you could say.

But anyway, she came and she said, "I really want to start a school—a school for the really young children, grades one through four." There was a nunnery school that a lot of the poor kids go to, kids who can't afford all the hidden fees in the government school. But it's about a forty-minute walk. So all the little nuns and all the other poor kids walk up there. But in the rainy season, it's just a sea of mud, and they really can't make it.

So she said, "I want to start this school for these little kids."

And we're like, "Really?"

And she said, "You know, I just—I can't sleep. I just want to find support so I can do this. My mind is so urgent. I can't sleep well. I can't eat well. I just want to start this school."

So we're like, "Okay, well..." We did have some funds—we could offer some money, a few thousand dollars.

Then the next year we came back, and it was amazing what you can do with not that much money. She's built just kind of a lean-to, just a shelter. She already had 130 little kids.

You've got to realize what that means. It means not only does she have to build that, invite the kids, but also hire teachers and pay regular teachers—all on donations. So it's not just the donation to start it; it's money she has to keep raising to pay teachers every month to keep it going.

Also, because there's only a tiny bit of land—there were twenty-four nuns in this nunnery—they'd had to tear down one of the buildings they lived in. They had a building to eat, buildings to live in, and they tore down one of them and were all crowded into this other little building to eat and live so that all this space could be for the school.

So she—wow.

But the really interesting thing was when she came to talk, she looked radiant. She looked so happy. She looked like a completely different person in her mind. And she said, "You know, even though now I must work really hard to raise the money every month for the teachers and to keep building new buildings—and then you need toilets, you have these kids there all day, you've got to build a bunch of toilets, and then you have to build a water tank and make your well deeper..." I mean, it just keeps going. All of this has to be donated money. Plus, never mind their food and all.

She said, "But now I feel so happy. I'm sleeping well. The energy to this school—my mind is calm and happy. I'll be so happy if I can just do this for the rest of my life."

That was a few years ago. She's still doing it. Sometimes she looks really tired. It really is a lot of work. It's not like la, la, la—it's an incredible amount of work. It's an incredible responsibility, because when there's a nunnery, the head nun really is the one who carries all the weight. But this sense of inner calm and happiness, this radiance that comes from it—it was really palpable. Just seeing that, this quality of generosity.

Okay, one last little story. Again, it's from Burma. Some years ago, before the country was so-called open and before they had regular money changing—now you can change your money in a normal way, you can actually go to a money changer place. But before, it was a trip and a half. It was all so-called black market, but that's what everybody did.

Because we'd bring in donations, we'd have a fair amount of money. And at that time, a thousand kyat note was about equal to a dollar, and sometimes you could only get five hundred kyat notes. So if you were changing ten thousand dollars, you would literally have a pile like this—it was crazy. And then you'd have to contact the money changers and have them come. You'd have to meet them somewhere.

We'd meet at a friend's place, and they'd come with all these stacks of money, and you'd negotiate. Sometimes it felt like a sleazy drug deal, except that this is what everyone did.

So this particular time, we were just doing the transaction and talking. They were kind of young guys, and it really felt more like that than usual—like a sleazy drug deal. Then we left, and our friend, a woman who owns a B&B who had been the intermediary, later gave us the money and said, "Oh, and here's another $400."

We said, "What's that from?" She didn't want to say, but we pressed her.

As we'd been changing the money and the guys were doing their thing with their computers, we were just talking back and forth amongst ourselves about how we could use this to build toilets here, support the nuns there. We were just chatting, but they were listening.

So after we left, they went to our friend, the intermediary, and said, "What they're doing—this is great. We want to offer $400." They didn't want thanks. They didn't even want to be known. They were doing it anonymously, just this sense of wanting to offer from people you would never expect it from. And that sense of the happiness of it—it's really a lovely thing.

Another aspect that I want to acknowledge is the sense of mutuality, not just the offering. It's not just about money; it's about time, it's about a smile, it's about whatever. But also the same openness to receiving—with dignity. The offering with dignity and the receiving with dignity, and not wanting to shut it down or say, "Oh no, no, no, you keep that for yourself, you need it more."

Sometimes in a place where I feel like I have so much more and someone wants to offer, the sense is to say, "No, no, I don't want to take that." But that's not the spirit of generosity at all. It creates a block in the whole thing.

Another simple example: some nuns we were visiting wanted to invite a few of us to a meal, to a lunch. So we go, and they make this huge spread. I have photos of a table with like twenty-five different little plates of curries and fruits and this and that on it. And we know this is more than that whole nunnery has to eat for a week. We're well aware of that. And there's a sense of, "Don't do this. This is crazy. Take this food and eat it. We don't want it."

But then you realize—no, there's so much happiness and dignity in being able to offer. To receive with appreciation and dignity keeps the whole cycle going, the whole circle going. The sense of "no, not me" is really a sense of self. It's not the purity of heart and mind. So exploring that more and more too.

This is from Ajahn Pasanno, but he's commenting on a sutta of the Buddha:

"When one is generous and delights in giving, in offering, the heart tends to be satisfied and joyous. This supports development of virtue, as a heart that is satisfied and contented easily inclines to restraint and composure. With this composure, together with the lack of remorse that virtue affords, the heart is easily settled and focused. So the meditation progresses more smoothly; the mind, the heart naturally brightens, making it suitable for seeing things as they truly are."

It's really the whole essence of the practice, right? So it is important to recognize this tendency—that wholesome qualities foster further wholesome qualities—so that we nurture the appropriate causes for the results that we are seeking.

In times when the conditions, on retreat or off retreat—and you really get it, this isn't just about retreat—when subtlety of attention isn't available, attention to actions and generosity is always available. And it's not just to be good. It's really the act that we can do to purify the heart and mind. And it's the pure heart that recognizes Nibbāna in whatever aspect, on or off retreat. So this is really what we're doing.

All right, we have a little time. I just want to say this quickly and then talk a little bit about virtue. Once when U Pandita was here teaching, a Nepalese sayadaw was here with him—U Jānapanika.

He gave a lovely talk on dana, on generosity, and out of that talk came seven aspects of the practice of offering, of giving. I just want to quickly mention them—not that you have to remember and clock through all of them, but just to bring them up.

So first, when we're giving—and again, it doesn't have to be things, it can be time, it can be caring, whatever it is—we begin by really giving mindful attention to the motivation, to the volition, really purifying before we give. The Tibetans would say it's like the generous act of the bodhisattvas: "With this act, may all beings be free from suffering." That's a great purification. But even just, as I said, not throwing the gift casually —"Oh yeah, here, have some rice"—but really purifying, tuning in, bringing mindfulness to the motivation.

And then, in whatever one is giving—time, service, money—recognize if there's any clinging, if we're really holding on, and see if you can abandon that. Abandon it not by thinking "this should go away," but by tuning into the happiness of the giving. Then in that moment, the clinging isn't there. You really can feel that.

The third aspect is something Upandita said that's not appropriate here on retreat. But if possible, giving and receiving directly, face to face. That's something built into the way it works in the nunneries and monasteries in Thailand and Burma. There's something really beautiful about it, even though it's a formal ritual.

You go to a nunnery and offer, say, a pile of money—these huge piles that look much more impressive than they actually are. But there's a real form to it. They get a tray. You put it on the tray. You hold it. They hold it. You hold it together. And then you chant. They chant a blessing. You chant together. And then often all the nuns or monks will come and chant a whole gratitude metta sutta. It's really very beautiful and touching—even the little nunlets. There's a sense of really appreciating in both directions. It's so different from writing a check and mailing it off.

Here, of course, I can't go down to Amnesty International and meet somebody and say, "Please, take my check." That's just how it works in our context. But doing that face-to-face really has a power—not on retreat, not writing each other notes, but when it's appropriate.

The fourth is that when you're giving, again with mindfulness, really being focused on the giving. Of course, mindfulness is the thread through all of this—just knowing what we're doing as we're doing it.

Fifth, after giving, continuing to be mindful of the motivation, of the intention. Sometimes doubt comes up: "Oh, should I have really given that? Maybe I could use it in ten years." Then just bringing in mindfulness, re-clarifying the intention.

The sixth is interesting: clear comprehension of the broader context of giving. Giving a gift that, as well as you can tell, is appropriate. I don't want to go into the whole story, but if, say, you're giving something to someone who's an addict and your gift is just going to take them deeper into trouble, that might not be the gift to give. You can't always tell, but if you can, see what's appropriate.

And seventh, receiving in that same mindful, open, connected way. This sense of self and other is really cut through with generosity.

So the second aspect of these kilesas of transgression is sila, non-harming behavior. You're much more familiar with this. But to really see how the precepts work—they're kind of like guidelines. If the kilesas, the wanting or the ill will, come up really strongly and are about to drive us, sometimes just the intellectual idea of the precept will help us bounce back and not act on it, hopefully. But again, the precepts are meant to be guidelines to tune us into the motivation, the quality in the mind and heart.

So obeying the precepts while hating them and not really looking at motivation—I mean, it's better than hurting people. It's better than nothing. But that's not truly purifying in this way of working with the kilesas of transgression. We need to really look and see. And there's something I think we don't always realize.

You know, we see the sense of greed coming up really strongly, and you just—I don't know—you want to take some shampoo that you know isn't yours, and you think, well, no one will care. But you manage not to do it. You restrain yourself. That restraint is a wholesome action.

For me, I would always tend to focus on, "Well, I wanted to do it, I'm so bad, I shouldn't have had that wanting." But noticing that moment of restraint, that moment of abandoning that strength of wanting—maybe there's still wanting in the mind, but that level of transgression wasn't strong enough; you didn't act on it. Same with ill will. When you bite off hurting somebody, when you manage to keep your mouth shut when something really unpleasant is about to come out—all the different ways.

This quality of restraint is actually working to transform the habits of consciousness on this level. So we're still going to notice greed and ill will; it's not getting rid of them. But it is weakening them.

And maybe, hopefully, you've noticed—probably many of us have a commitment to living with the five lay precepts in our life anyway. But even here on retreat, taking them, and as the mind gets more subtle, I bet there are times when you've really noticed this coming up. The ill will or the greed and the wanting to act on it seems more obvious. And the sense of restraint maybe arises more easily. Or it comes up and you just know you're not going to act on it.

There's a real happiness that can come as you begin to have more confidence in the habit of sīla, of virtue, in your heart and mind—that you can learn to trust that more. Not that you're always going to be perfect, but that you can really rely on it. It really is a lovely, lovely quality, and it is truly transforming consciousness.

Just a simple example. I use this a lot, but it was a funny story. I was with a friend at Spirit Rock. It wasn't on retreat. And we're in the bookstore—if you've been to Spirit Rock, you know this bookstore, this Maha bookstore. There's so much stuff in it you can buy. I'm glad we don't have something like that here.

Anyway, we went in, this friend and I, and I wanted a particular little statue that I didn't see in the bookstore. But she sometimes volunteered there, so she knew where there were these closets somewhere else just filled with statues. She took me there, knew how to open it with the secret magnet opening. So we're opening it and it's just shelf after shelf after shelf of all these statues. We're piling through, looking for this one particular Tārā that I wanted. Which is fine—there's nothing wrong with this.

But we each, at the same moment, pulled out a different one. It's a Mañjuśrī one, which has this little sword. And both of us, we just barely touched it and the sword broke. Each of us at the same time. So we're holding it with this broken sword and we just kind of looked at each other. We didn't say anything. And then we said, "Oh, well, I guess we have to go tell Marianne we broke this. We'll have to pay for it."

But later we both saw how in our minds, just for a fraction of a second, the thought went through: we could put it back and no one will ever know. No one would have ever known. We both had that thought, and it was so clear in both of our minds that that was going nowhere. That was never even an option.

And we both could feel—not like, "I'm so great," that's not the happiness of purity—but this sense of: Wow, it's so lovely to have confidence in just knowing I'm not going to steal. You can kind of trust the heart and mind. You can really see that, can feel the purity of that.

So we did. We went off and told our friend—she's a good friend who runs the bookstore. We felt like two bad little girls going to the kindergarten teacher. She didn't care. "Ah, we glue it on. We sell it half price. It happens all the time." Just so you know, check it out if you're buying something. If it's half price, check carefully. Don't tell Marianne I said that.

But there's real appreciation in this.

And another thing that really supports sila is restraint at the sense doors. There are two ways of understanding this.

One form of restraint is the sense of keeping things more simple here. Not restraint in the sense of avoiding everything that may elicit greed or aversion, because that's impossible. And that's not purifying—that's avoiding completely. But we make it simpler here, and there's a support in that. That's restraint at the sense doors. When your mind is all over the place, sometimes it's helpful when you're walking not to look around constantly. Just keep it simple. When you're sitting in the hall, don't be checking out what everybody else is doing, because you can see it just leads to greed, just leads to aversion. Restraint at the sense doors.

But another level of restraint at the sense doors isn't so much about not looking at all. Rather, you bring, as Buddhadasa says, satipañña—mindfulness and wisdom—right at the point of sense contact. So there's seeing. "Oh, that looks so good. Maybe that juice looks really good. Let me go have some juice. Nobody's looking. Nobody will see." What's happening? Seeing. Just come right back to seeing. Mindfulness and wisdom at the sense doors. There's seeing, it's pleasant, there's wanting. You're just right there with it. You don't have to go off into all the papañca, the proliferation, the moving away from mindfulness, which tends to lead into acting out of kilesa without recognizing it.

So this restraint, the satipañña at the sense doors, is what we've been talking about in terms of mindfulness. It's not hating experience. It's just knowing it for what it is. Because as we move into the world, we're not going to go through life never seeing things we want, never hearing things that elicit ill will. Stuff is going to happen. God knows, right? It happens here. So this sense of restraint at the sense doors really supports sila, really supports not acting out of kilesa.

And again, noticing, really bringing mindfulness and wisdom to the feeling, the appreciation of the wholesomeness. Recognizing, as Ajahn Buddhadasa says, those moments of coolness when the heart and mind is free of kilesa—not waiting until you can get concentrated enough to have a really subtle sitting. If that's not happening, cultivating qualities of dana, qualities of sila, of virtue, is always available. It's not like second best either. Everything, all aspects of our life, all aspects of the teaching are in support of purifying the habits of heart and mind to recognize things as they really are.

I just want to end with this sutta from the Buddha about really wise reflection, just on this part of it. This is a lay person asking, "You teach all these deep teachings, but what about clans people like us who are living at home? We can't practice like you." So the Buddha gives six reflections, but these two are the main ones:

"There's the case where you recollect your own virtues. They are unbroken, unspotted, liberating, praised by the wise, untarnished, conducive of concentration. At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting virtue, her mind is not overcome with passion, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion. Her mind heads straight, based on virtue. And when the mind is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones has a sense of the goal, a sense of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma. In one who is joyful, rapture arises. In one who is rapturous, the body grows calm. One whose body is calmed experiences ease. In one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated."

"Then furthermore, there's the case where you recollect your own generosity: 'It is a great gain for me that among people overcome with possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness, freely generous, open-handed, delighting in being magnanimous, responsive to requests, delighting in the distribution of alms.'"

And the same thing—at any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity, her mind is not overcome with greed, hatred, or confusion.

This is not just about feeling good—this is the transformation of the habits, the transformation of consciousness.

And the same pattern unfolds: one has a sense of the Dhamma, gains joy connected with the Dhamma, and the same progression follows.

And then at the end, the Buddha said, "So, Mahanama, you should develop this recollection of generosity, or this recollection of virtue, while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children."

In other words, anytime it's available to us. No aspect of our life is outside of this quality that can really transform our consciousness to the pure heart and mind which sees Nibbana.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 73

Majjhima Nikāya Two: Purifying the Subtle Suffering Habits of Mind

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson continues her exploration of the Buddha's teachings on purifying the mind, focusing on the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), which presents seven methods for abandoning the āsavas—the deepest, most latent tendencies toward sense desire, becoming, and ignorance. She explains how these subtle defilements differ from gross transgressions (addressed through sīla and generosity) and obsessive mental torments (temporarily suppressed through concentration), representing instead the underlying potential for suffering that can arise given appropriate conditions.

Wilson systematically examines each of the seven methods: abandoning through seeing (insight and wise attention), restraining (mindfulness at the sense doors), using (relating wisely to requisites like food, clothing, and shelter), enduring (patience with difficult conditions), avoiding (knowing when to step away from what's too intense), removing (the determination to abandon unwholesome thoughts), and developing (cultivating the seven factors of awakening). Throughout, she emphasizes that wise attention—yoniso manasikāra—is central to all methods, helping us discern what feeds versus what starves our habitual patterns of craving and aversion.

The talk offers deeply practical guidance for both intensive retreat practice and daily life, illustrating through personal stories and traditional teachings how these methods work together. Wilson concludes with Dīpā Mā's description of life without the kilesas: fresh, new, and full of zest—offering inspiration for the ongoing path of purification.

I want to continue the second part of the talk I began last week, exploring how all aspects of our life and path—everything the Buddha taught—is in service of the steadfast deliverance of heart, the unshakable deliverance of mind.

Another way we can understand this is that all these different teachings offer various ways of helping us purify the habits of mind, shifting from being caught in greed, confusion, and hatred toward the wholesome, toward wisdom.

You may remember that I spoke about the three levels of kilesas. I discussed the transgressive ones and how cultivating the heart of generosity, cultivating sīla and non-harming behavior, are really powerful liberation practices for shifting habits in all different aspects of life.

The second level, the obsessive kilesas, is mitigated by the collectedness of mind, by concentration. Guy spoke about this last night, so I don't need to say too much about it. But there's this sense that when all the energy of the mind—which has been running here and there, often falling into habits of confusion and greed without recognizing it—becomes more collected, coming together in a wholesome way, then as that gets really strong, it becomes like a protection from the kilesas. They don't get in. There's a sense of purity, which is one of the reasons concentration can be so pleasant. It's the peace and ease of a mind that isn't being tormented by kilesas in that moment. That's important to appreciate.

Anyone who has experienced this happiness, this sukha of the concentrated mind, can recognize that it exists because the mind is free from kilesas at that time. Appreciating what that feels like—that peace, that happiness of a heart that's not tormented—is valuable. But it's very conditioned. As anyone knows, when the collectedness begins to disintegrate, you find out that the kilesas aren't uprooted. They were held at bay. That's useful, but often we've thought they were uprooted and we're disappointed to find them coming back. We don't know what we did wrong.

Sometimes, as the collectedness disintegrates, a kilesa comes flying up really strong just at that moment, and you get a bad mix. The concentration isn't completely gone, and as Tejaniya likes to say, samādhi magnifies—we see everything so much more clearly. Meanwhile, the kilesas exaggerate, making everything seem out of proportion. You put those two together and it's a difficult combination. When things become so intense on retreat, that's often what's going on. In that moment, you didn't do something wrong, but it can be overwhelming and certainly surprising when it happens like that. Understanding the power of the collected mind and heart to keep away the obsessive kilesas is very important. That thinking, thinking, thinking about something just isn't arising. Many of you have described experiencing this during retreat.

What I want to talk about for the rest of this talk is the third level, called the latent kilesas. This is the one that really surprises us and keeps surprising us. It's described as the underlying potential or possibility for these tormenting mental factors to arise given appropriate conditions. It's basically like a seed, although it's not really sitting there—kilesas aren't just sitting there waiting. They're arising and passing due to conditions; it's just that certain conditions may come more frequently sometimes.

The metaphor goes like this: if a seed lies dormant for years and then gets water, sunlight, and the right kind of soil, it sprouts. The latent torments are like that—the potential for them to arise exists. Though I should emphasize it's just a metaphor, because the kilesas aren't really there as fixed entities waiting.

This is why the commitment, the interest in using all the different aspects of our life to see how this works and to cultivate the wholesome—all these different ways of purifying the heart and mind, not just through deep meditation retreats—is so important. It's not only on retreats that these latent kilesas come popping up, as we know very well.

Annie offered a beautiful response this morning when asking about how we can see a certain level clearly, have a real insight into dispassion, for example. Does it stay like that? The answer, of course, is no. The insight comes and we really understand. But every moment of consciousness is a new moment.

The mind is always arising, consciousness and the different mental factors always arising and changing. So even moments of deep insight, when we're really recognizing on what feels like a cellular level—for example, that there's nothing to want, and feeling the peace of that—or really, the mind is just turning away from some old habit that brought us suffering, and that's so clear, we can't imagine going back to it... and then, you know, it comes up again.

Once you've been through this like a hundred million times, you start to understand this is just how it is. It's not something I'm doing wrong. Getting all reactive to it is both useless, inappropriate, and brings a lot more suffering. We start to see: oh, this is how it is. This is how things are. This is where we're talking about the latent underlying tendencies.

Until we really start to trust that, it can certainly bring up a lot of dismay, discouragement. And then, of course, that inevitably is followed by doubt. Doubt that I did something wrong, doubt about what's the point of this practice—I've been doing this and this stuff is still coming up, it's hopeless. That kind of skeptical doubt. Not the doubt where, after retreat is over and you're not in that intense space, you might want to really reflect—especially if the practice is new to you—you might want to reflect and say, "Does this seem helpful? Does this seem appropriate?" Of course we do that. But that's not skeptical doubt. That's different. The skeptical doubt is just this: oh no, this is happening, it can't be right, everything's wrong, everything's bad. We've talked about that a lot.

So we start to go through this and see how it works, see how we can access mindfulness in different ways, in different conditions, and see that these latent kilesas can spring up—sometimes more frequently than others—but that mindfulness can be remembered, that the wisdom, the insights that were there, maybe they're not always right there in the perception, but they're accessible in a way. Sometimes we can remember our way into them. I think Guy talked about that. Sometimes it's not even conscious, but it's like—I like to say cellularly or something—you know, you're really caught in greed, but there's something that knows: oh, caught feels like this. It's a little bit different.

So I want to talk about these in terms of a particular sutta from the Majjhima Nikāya that I really like. I think it's considered one of the more important suttas. It's the second one, called "All the Āsavas." Āsava is the word that's usually translated as "taints," like stains. I think Guy used that the other night. There's not a great word for it. But it's basically referring to the underlying latent, this latent level of kilesa—the taints.

Guy mentioned what they are. They're talking about three very specific ones: the potential for sense desire to arise; for bhava, for becoming—this sense of grasping, becoming a particular self in a moment; and the third is for ignorance, avijjā. These are the most subtle underlying tendencies.

This sutta, called "All the Āsavas," is where the Buddha talks about seven different ways or seven different methods for bringing wise attention to the arising of these—I'm going to use āsava just because I don't like the word taints—the arising of one of these āsavas when it's present, and then the wise attention to see what kind of attention, what we pay attention to and how we pay attention, what's feeding and strengthening the āsava and what's starving it. You'll recognize that from the wise effort—the way they describe it, you know, what feeds and what starves.

What's really interesting is that wise attention is at the core of each of these, but these seven different ways... and this isn't like, okay, the first one is insight through wise attention, and then there are six others. It's not like he's saying, okay, you losers, if you can't do the insight, here are these six other ways. All of them, he's saying, are for really uprooting these tendencies and coming to the complete end of suffering.

And you'll hear—that's why I said there's a lot to cover going through all of these—these are ways we live our life. They're not just about retreat aspects, but they're all appropriate to retreat. It's really about how we live our life. And that's why I find this really very useful.

I've been returning to this sutta over and over again for many years.

I'm not going to read the whole thing, but I'll keep referring to it. The Buddha talks about how these asavas can be exhausted. "Exhausted" means come to an end, so that's code for complete awakening. He says this happens "in one who knows and sees, not in one who does not know and see." Here he's using "see" to mean understand.

What is wise attention and unwise attention? When one attends unwisely, both unarisen asavas arise and arisen ones increase. This is that formula. When one attends wisely, unarisen asavas do not arise and arisen ones are abandoned. So we're familiar with this. This is wise attention.

Then he goes through the seven. I'll take each one in turn.

The first is abandoned by seeing, which means abandoned by insight. Here he's really talking about wise attention. He says that a person who is unskilled does not understand what dhammas are fit for attention and what dhammas are not fit for attention. And so they don't attend to the things that are fit, and they attend to what's unfit. And then we attend in a way that is unwise.

To put it in my own language: it's noticing that if we're paying attention to something and the asavas—the sense desire—keep getting stronger and stronger, there's something about the object itself, but more likely it's the way we're paying attention that's increasing that tendency. With wise attention, reflecting wisely, we're always noticing how we're paying attention and what's the effect, what's the result.

It's not that the fitness is inherent in the object. When we say sense desire arises from giving attention to something beautiful, our tendency can be to think, "Well, I should never look at the beautiful because then desire will arise." You know how then we go into aversion, which if you're noticing, is also a taint. But it's not about the object—it's how we pay attention.

Let me read you this passage I really like. It speaks simply about the hindrances, about sense desire, which is also one of the hindrances, something we can relate to. A way that we pay attention unwisely: you could be really focused on an attractive object, but the unwise attention is that the focus is really attending to the gratification, to the beautiful aspect and the sense of personal gratification in that.

Say you're thinking about something—you smell something for lunch. You smell lasagna and you really like lasagna. And so you keep smelling, but really smelling. "It's so nice." And we just, subtly, keep doing that. With wise attention, reflecting wisely, as the Buddha says, you'll start to notice that the desire, the sense desire, is getting stronger and stronger. Then we can see, "Oh, that's unwise attention." Some of the other methods are ways we can work with that. When you've noticed it, though, I'll just say simply: we come back to mindfulness of smelling, or if you're too caught, we divert the attention to something neutral.

Ill will. We've talked about this as well. It grows. It's cultivated when the attention is unwise. We're focusing on an unpleasant object, but the attention keeps getting drawn into—this is from the sutta—the repugnant aspect. There's someone that's bugging you and you just keep looking at the thing that bugs you, the thing that bugs you, the thing that bugs you. That's unwise attention. It's not saying there's something wrong with what you're looking at. But we're seeing that the way we're paying attention is feeding the asava.

With wise attention, we notice that tendency in the mind.

We say, okay, let's shift. Let's stop doing that. And if you can't quite tell in the moment how the attention is unwise, then shift to something else, something neutral. You get a sense then how that works.

So when we're paying attention in the wrong way, the old habits are so strong, they just come shooting up. So that's one way.

The second way of unwise attention—and this feeds sense desire—but unwise attention, this is from the sutta, that feeds bhava, is when there's a sense, maybe in a deep meditative state, where again the attention is subtly on the gratification. And if there's gratification, there's also the sense of self. That's kind of me getting a little stronger in that moment. And so that bhava, that sense of becoming—it's also bhavatanha, it's a kind of craving. And that can also be, doesn't only have to be with beautiful meditation states.

The Buddha gives examples of how we attend unwisely, just how we're thinking about stuff in relationship to me. I won't read this all, but how one attends unwisely: thinking about some experience, well, how was I in the past? Was I in the past? What was I? How was I? Having been what in the past, what will I be in the future? Or will I not be in the future? Or how will I be in the future? Or what shall the future happen? And on and on, as you get totally caught in a thicket of views. Basically, as I say, that's all about me. We think we're paying attention, but we're really caught into this sense of becoming, becoming, becoming.

And the third unwise attention is how delusion, moha, comes. This is when one is attending to any mundane thing, any object whatsoever, through any of the vipalasas, the perversions of perception. So again, Guy was talking about that last night. We're not seeing through wise attention through the lens of the Four Noble Truths. Unwise is recognizing, thinking something's permanent, or perceiving it as permanent, perceiving it as giving us some kind of reliability, seeing it as self or belonging to self.

So you can see those unwise attentions happen a lot. And certainly this is on the level of our deep meditation, where we're really starting to be able to see these subtleties of wise and unwise attention. I'm not going to go into it more because I want to just mention the other ones. But this is something we've talked about, and I think you can really understand.

Seeing how subtle it is, I hope it can not be discouraging, but rather feed faith that every time there's wise attention, that's shifting the habit. You know, you don't get a big neon light: "Habit shifting! Habit shifting!" But each time it is shifting something. So that's the insight, the first one. And you can see how that can really purify.

As we know, on retreat or off retreat, that's not always available to us. So these are some of the other things the Buddha's saying. And he has a list, but he's not saying one's better than the other, just depending on circumstances.

So the second one is what can be abandoned by restraining. And this is restraint at the sense doors. Let me just read the beginning of what he says:

"What can be abandoned by restraint? Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, abides with the eye faculty restrained, the ear, nose, tongue, body, mind. While asavas in fever of defilement might arise in a bhikkhu who abides with the eye faculty unrestrained, there are no asavas or fever of defilement in one when they abide with the senses restrained."

Again, I mentioned this a bit—by restraint we really don't mean hating all sense experience, okay? The optimum sense of restraint is restraint at the sense doors: bringing satipañña, mindfulness and wisdom, to meet what's happening as close to the sense contact as possible. And so reflecting wisely, and he always says this, reflecting wisely...

One brings in restraint through this wise reflection.

So the first level of restraint is quite simple—take the eye door or the ear door. Not just wildly looking around at everything. I think we've all recognized how this works here, how the seclusion of retreat is really supportive. Dining room practice, of course, is particularly good for this. Just going in and noticing how when you're really unrestrained, when you're not being mindful of seeing and you're just looking all around, the judgments and the papañca and the stories start. They begin feeding on themselves and you get really far really fast.

Pretty much the papañca is usually fed by āsavas, by kilesas. But restraining this doesn't mean becoming afraid to look, afraid to hear, not wanting to taste because if you taste something pleasant you'll be lost. It's not that at all, because that would just be cultivating aversion.

Rather, it's really about simplifying—just being present with the pleasant taste and not trying to have ten million options. You go to the buffet and think, "This could be good, that could be good, let me try every single thing in the little bowl for the salad because each of those could be good." You can just watch that wanting and simply let it go. Simplify. Restraint in this way means you don't have to follow every sense desire. You can notice it and just simplify and be present.

So these are two ways of restraint. Keep it simple. Otherwise, it's a bit like—I've sometimes had the sense of cravings just looking for something to land on. Sense desire just looking for something to land on. I call it mail order catalog mind. You used to get these mail order catalogs. You don't want anything, but you're looking through it anyway. And then after a while you realize you're looking for something to want, just because it's there. Restraint means closing the catalog, putting it down. You don't need to do that.

So it's not about judging from the outside which things are good and which things are bad. Again, it's always with wise reflection, wise attention. Look and see: is the sense desire habit being fed right in this moment as you're looking around all over the place? Maybe it's not. Maybe there's a lot of mindfulness wisdom and you're really seeing how seeing arises, how perception and thought arise, and it's not creating more āsava. Then fine. It's not like it's always one way. It's really bringing in this wise attention and seeing what's feeding the wholesome, what's feeding the unwholesome. Out of compassion for yourself—not out of trying to get it right, but out of really seeing—this is another way to begin to purify these suffering habits.

It's not that we don't pay attention to pleasant sense experience, all six of them. Pleasant experience can be very helpful to brighten the heart and mind. But just knowing the difference—as Thích Nhất Hạnh says, when we're obsessed with sense pleasures, we suffer. When there's the happiness of a peaceful mind that really brightens us, there's no complication, no suffering. That's supportive and onward leading. We can really tell the difference more and more. Not making yourself bad or good, but just bringing in this wise attention in terms of restraint at the sense doors.

You can also restrain so much that you're feeding aversion and fear. That's also not wise attention. So just exploring this.

On the most simple level, as Ajahn Chah said, when the nose smells an odor, let it be. Leave it at the nose. Or another time he said, sound doesn't bother us—we go out and disturb the sound. So just exploring this.

This is obviously something we can do a lot in our daily life. It isn't just about being on retreat. And it's not incredibly subtle—it's quite accessible.

So that's abandoned by restraining.

The next one, and I like this one a lot, is abandoned by using.

How are āsavas abandoned by using? Here, a bhikkhu reflecting wisely—this is talking about a monk, but this would be the same for us—uses a robe, uses clothes, for protection from cold, for protection from heat, for protection from contact with insects, wind, burning, and so forth, and for the purposes of concealing what disturbs conscience. That's put very tidily.

Reflecting wisely, one uses food neither for amusement nor for vanity nor for making yourself look good or for embellishment, but for the endurance and continuance of this body, for ending the discomfort of hunger, and for supporting us in our life, in our holy life. "Thus shall I terminate old feelings"—old, unpleasant, difficult feelings of hunger—"without arousing new ones," without arousing greed, "and blameless shall I live in comfort and health."

So living in comfort and health, eating, and also how you deal with medicine, how you deal with where you live—

But in general, spreading it out is really looking at how we use, how we relate to all the requisites of our life. And of course, it's really interesting in terms of the whole environmental aspect of our planet now. But we're not talking about having a view and saying you should do this, you shouldn't do that, and everybody else should do that as well, because that's attachment to view. We're talking about really looking for ourselves: How am I relating to buying new clothes? How do I decide what to wear today? How do I decide what to eat, or how much I eat? Not from an idea of should, but really watching—in this moment, is the way I'm using feeding greed, or feeding bhava, feeding becoming, feeding a sense of self?

It's really interesting. We're all different, so there's no right answer. But looking and seeing, you know? Using what we need and not needing more brings a real sense of contentment and peace in ourselves. It's an aspect of simplicity, an aspect of—I don't want to say renunciation, but it's similar. As Guy said last night, the renunciation is on a different level, but it comes out of the ease of non-clinging, not needing to become.

So I was thinking about this. There are ten million examples, but I was thinking about the eight precepts, and it's not at all that everyone should take them. It's not appropriate for everyone. But one of the ways it's interesting—if it's appropriate for one's body or if one is just interested in doing it, and some people have mentioned this to me in interviews—is taking the eighth precept, which of course involves not eating after midday. And then seeing: maybe all the fears about what was going to happen, or how it would be if I don't eat, don't manifest. Instead, a couple of people have told me they discover, "Wow, all the stuff that went on in going to get that food, a tea, and I wasn't even hungry. I don't even miss it. In fact, it's a pleasure." I call it—this is totally me, okay?—the hell realm of the dining room, in the middle of everything. Like, oh my God, just not to have to go there. It's so wonderful.

But really seeing—it's just a place to explore. Some people find that they don't eat and they have a real idea they don't want to, and it's really bad for their body. They actually need to eat, not even particularly wanting the food or feeling hungry, but they actually need to eat for health reasons. That's also important. It's not always about not eating. It may be about eating. You're eating for health, for comfort, for the sustaining of the body, for living at ease.

I have the same thing. Every night I just go and have half a rice cake or half an apple with peanut butter. And I do it without thinking about, "Oh, should I have this this time or should I have that?" All of that just feeds the wanting. But my body gets a little weak without it. So I just take this, take that, go eat it, finished. Some nights it's pleasant, some nights it's not. Some nights you're doing it really out of wisdom, clear seeing—this is what's needed.

It can be really interesting to see how we relate to things. I remember one retreat a long, long time ago. I had one particular dress with me. And I started to notice—you know, on retreat you have what you have, you just wear whatever you brought. It was a long retreat, and whenever I put on this one dress, it really generated something. I really liked it. And the room I was staying in had this full-length mirror, so every time I'd go by, I'd look at the dress. And then I started to see how this wanting to look at the dress, wanting to wear it—not noticing that this was unwise attention—was really feeding something. Then wanting something else, and something else, and sense desire would get stronger, and then bhava tanha would get stronger, because then I'd think about... I guess I thought I looked good in it, or I wouldn't have liked it. You don't like things you think you look horrible in. Anyway, just to see how all that happened. How am I relating to this?

And then I remember when I was a nun in Thailand for about a year. There's something really so nice—you just wear white there. You have three outfits, that's it. You wear one, you wash one. It's drying, you wear the other one.

And there's nothing to think about, about it. It's what you need. It's more than what you need in the heat—much more than what you need, as Bhante was saying—but you've got no choice. All this extra kind of wanting and meaning around something as simple as what you wear wasn't there. And that's such a relief.

I remember when I came back and was on staff here after that. I was standing one morning looking in the closet, having to decide what to wear. And it was so unpleasant. I was also caught in it—the wanting. What should I wear? Should I wear this? Should I wear that? Oh my God. It was so nice just to have three outfits and not even think about it.

But you notice I didn't stick with that, did I? It's possible I could just— When my mother was getting— now I'm going out there— the last few years of my mother's life, she had progressive dementia. But she was always, up until almost the end, very ladylike somehow. She took good care of herself, always looked really nice. So we called it "the uniform," my brother and sister and I. She always had a pair of black pants and a nice blouse—just a bunch of the same ones, because with dementia, it's really hard to make choices. She could just put on the same thing. We called it the uniform.

So you notice I didn't go that way. So we look at these things. And I do look at it. Some days I just grab something and put it on. And some days there's an "oh, and this and this and that." This is where we bring in our attention. We notice: how do we use things? Give awareness to that. And this is what can bring in, at times, just a simple sense of contentment—not using more than we need, using things not out of aversion but for the comfort, the ease, the continuance of this body and for your support in your life and in your practice. Attention to how we use things.

The next one is āsavas abandoned by patience—or the word used is sometimes "enduring" or "tolerating." I prefer "patience." I find it more helpful. Patience is one of the pāramīs. It's a really powerful force in our mind, something that we can develop whenever there are difficulties, on or off retreat.

"Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, contact with flies and wind, burning and creeping things"—remember, they're sitting outside in the woods—"and bodily feelings that are painful, disagreeable. And while pains and fever of defilement might arise in one who was not patient, there is no defilement arising in one who is patient."

So what does that mean? We've all been working with this the whole retreat, right? Being with difficult aspects, whether external or internal. And we all know there are times we're not patient. I don't like "enduring" because that has a little tinge of disconnection—"This annoying sound is going to... I'll just endure it." But we kind of pull down, pull away, shut down, and wait for it to go away. That's not patience. Patience is really, as Suzuki Roshi would call it, the long-enduring mind, the heart—the sense of really just being present without reaction. Equanimity.

The Buddha said to his son Rāhula, "Develop a mind that is like the earth. For when you develop a mind or meditation that is like the earth, arisen agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain." And he says all kinds of stuff is thrown on the earth—beautiful stuff, ugly stuff, disgusting stuff. The earth is not horrified, humiliated, or disgusted because of that.

And he goes through all the different elements, giving the same advice for each one, including space. But this sense of "it's like this now" — the long-enduring mind is a big aspect of practice.

We have tons of stories about practice in Asia in terms of patience because the conditions are just so different. There's a lot that happens where you have no control whatsoever. And if you want to keep being there, you have to either develop patience or you just go nuts.

The thing about these stories that's energizing isn't like, "I'm so great, I made it through this as some kind of warrior." Sometimes you feel like that. But it's more that as we learn patience, something can really be with us. The heart, the mind, it truly relaxes, accepts what's happening without being so aversive, without being so caught up in it. And we can find we can really be at peace in the same circumstances that were causing us so much distress before.

Just little, simple examples. I'll go back to when I was a nun in Thailand. It was really hot in the hot season, and I had to stay in my kuti, which has a tin roof. I remember when I'd see the sun coming up in the morning — and you have three layers of clothes, long sleeves and underwear and long sleeves and a robe over, like Bhante has, and they're usually polyester — I'd see the sun coming up and my heart would just sink. "Oh gosh, will I make it through another day?" This is when I remember Ajahn Sumedho's line: "I can't bear it another minute, sweating through my robes." And then I'd find that I could.

Or one of the places I stayed at that time, quite some years ago — a Western woman being a meichi there, a nun, there weren't very many in the country. In a lot of the wats, the meditation centers there, they're also like parks. People use them like you would use a synagogue or a church here. So on weekends, a lot of people come, sometimes in buses, to hear a Dhamma talk, to take the eight precepts, to walk around in the beautiful surroundings.

I'd be doing my walking path and I'd turn around and someone would be right there with a camera in my face, taking my picture. You can imagine. Or they'd come up to my kuti and just stand in the door and stare in. "Oh, what's she doing?" "She's meditating." I didn't understand Thai, but I could tell that's kind of what they were saying.

So first it's like, "How can I stop this? They can't be doing this!" All the usual stuff. But you have to surrender. What are you going to do? You have to surrender to it. And then really finding that it's possible. It wouldn't be your optimum conditions, but it's possible to find the sense of patience.

Again, it's really bringing wise attention. What was fueling the kilesas? My sense of how it should be and how I could fix it and what I could do — that was fueling maha dosa and unhappiness and becoming. The patience allows the way to a peaceful mind and heart in that moment. And so that's really what we work with a lot of the time.

There's a saying from Patrul Rinpoche, who was a great Tibetan teacher. He talks about the parami of patience and describes three types of transcendent patience. I just want to name them because there's one retreat where those three would just keep coming through my mind and really inspire and support me.

The first is patience when wronged, when somebody treats you wrong. The second is the patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma — which we're all doing, patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma. And the third is the patience to face the profound truth without getting too lost in fear. It says "without fear," but fear will come. It's not abandoning facing the profound truth because of fear.

And at different times, that would just give me a little energy to keep going. Not that you should be perfectly patient, but it just gives a little energy to keep going.

The next one I find really interesting because it's kind of like the matching pair with patience. Because sometimes we think the Buddha is being very—or we can get very idealistic: "I should be able to be with anything." Have you ever had that thought? Usually when you're not able to be with something, right? "But I should be able to be with anything, and that was what the Buddha was saying."

But this next one is the asavas abandoned by avoiding. Avoiding what's too intense. He gives examples: a bhikkhu reflecting wisely avoids a savage elephant, a savage bull, a savage dog, a snake, a stump—okay, a stump, you don't trip over a stump—a bramble patch, a cliff, a cesspool, a sewer, frequenting or hanging out with unwise friends, evil companions.

I love this. Because he's not saying just be with anything. It's reflecting wisely. We look and see what is fueling, what is feeding the growth of the asavas—of sense desire, of becoming, of ignorance, self, self, self, confusion.

And so, okay, maybe we don't have savage elephants here, and the dogs that bark are always behind the fence. We have savage mosquitoes, but you can't avoid them too much. But often here, what is really intense, what we need to avoid, is when something too intense and too strong is coming up inside of us. And we've talked about this a lot, where what's coming up—the energy of the kilesa, of the trauma, or the fear, or even greed—is so strong. We're trying to be mindful, but the mindfulness energy just is nowhere near as strong as this really difficult thing.

And you know how we keep saying: then the wise attention sees that even in trying to be mindful, the kilesa is just growing and growing. That's when—I mentioned this a couple of times ago—Thich Nhat Hanh says, go look at the herbs at night. We say, sometimes that doesn't do it. Sometimes it's got to be a lot. So then we have to completely move away. Completely avoid.

There's no right or wrong in this, but it's really looking and seeing what supports. What supports coming back into a balance of heart and mind—not continuing to do what we think we should do if it's actually fueling the kilesas. So not to hold on to a view, but to use wise attention. And this is all mindfulness-based, to see what's really going on. It's very practical.

Therefore, that's why we're not doing this in Times Square. That's why we say, please give up your cell phones. It just makes it so much harder for no good reason. That's why so much of the time we're telling people, take your attention away from what's happening. Sometimes you even need to stop doing formal meditation altogether and just spend a couple of days taking walks, being quiet, drinking tea. Because that's actually more supportive of our ongoing freedom of heart and mind.

It's not always about doing formal practice. It's looking at all these different ways. What's feeding the kilesa? What's feeding the wholesome mind? In all these different areas of our life.

So sometimes the avoidance itself is difficult, because what I've discovered for myself is sometimes the thing I need to avoid isn't unpleasant. I've noticed if I'm really too comfortable, that can feed the sloth and torpor of just, "Ah, I just don't want to be with this difficult thing." And it can also feed sense desire. I'm not saying to create real unpleasant suffering, but I've just noticed in myself that too much comfort is actually not helpful, and I would avoid it. I think in some ways, the Eight Precepts' high and luxurious bed piece is along those lines. If you're just too comfortable, we just kind of start lolling around.

Looking and seeing and avoiding doesn't mean it's just what we prefer not to be with. If you're avoiding something and the avoidance is actually feeding aversion, you notice that as well. Okay, maybe avoidance isn't the thing. Maybe patience is the thing. What's helping to support the kilesa diminishing or not arising?

This isn't to make you crazy that you've got to go through it all, but it's really just to see there's all these different means, all these different methods, and the Buddha is offering all of them.

Okay, just two more and I'll say them quickly. The next one he calls removing. We've mentioned this as well. A bhikkhu reflecting wisely does not endure an arisen thought of sense desire or ill will or cruelty. She abandons it, does away with it. So again, we know this means what we've talked about as determination, as the sword of wisdom.

It's not always possible. So it's not done with aversion, but when with wisely reflecting, and there are times we can really do this. We've talked about it. We see that this particular line of thought is leading to nothing but more wanting, more fear, more agitation about the future. It's often agitation about the future, agitation about the past. And oftentimes we can go, "No, not now." That determination from skillfulness, not from aversion, not from pushing away. If it's pushing away, then just divert your attention to something else. But sometimes we can really say, "Not now."

When I talked a couple of weeks ago about having this autoimmune disease and seeing how the papañca and the future and the worrying was taking over so much—I really saw how with mindfulness wisdom, when it was present, and there'd be some unpleasant sensation in my body, the mind would go, "Oh no, how's this going to be next week, next year?" And I could say, "You know, not now. I really don't know. I don't know that. Let's just be present." And it was amazing. That could really happen. When there's enough mindfulness, wisdom, and you really see, "I don't need to do that now"—that's removing. That's abandoning. Let's think of it as abandoning.

If you're trying to abandon and the whole thing's just getting more and more ramped up, then you know it's not being done with wise attention, it's being done with wanting or aversion. So then you choose something else. Then it's usually really taking your attention away from that object altogether and moving to something completely neutral. Redirect the attention.

This is a place where the four brahmavihāras can be useful. You know, where we talk about sometimes substituting a thought—say you're annoyed at somebody and you substitute a mettā thought. Now, we all know half the time that doesn't work. You're saying mettā filled with aversion, right? And you can notice that with your wise attention and go, "Okay, the words are mettā. What's being fed is aversion." Shift to something neutral. You just look and see.

But sometimes, and the more we practice, it can surprise you. Someone was telling me the other day that it really works. Someone was bugging them and they just switched to muditā. And they were like, "Oh my goodness. It really happened." It's not even so much that you have to feel such a great thing, but first you're choosing a wholesome thought. So even if you don't feel the muditā, but you're not feeling the envy, that's already good. That's already good. Instead of, "Oh, no, no, I wish I had that"—"Oh, may your happiness continue." Even just flat, it's not feeding the kilesa.

So this is the place that you can explore in terms of abandoning these unwholesome thoughts that are really fueling the āsavas—you can explore using the phrases of the brahmavihāras, and sometimes you find that the phrase actually brings in something real, that you actually mean it, not expecting to.

And the last one, which is of course a whole talk in itself—don't worry, I'm not going to give it—is developing, because John already gave it: developing the seven factors of awakening. A bhikkhu reflecting wisely develops the seven factors of awakening.

So I'm just going to name them all. John spoke of them all. And they develop naturally through our meditation, but they also, even in daily life at times, we can tune in—like mindfulness, we can always remember mindfulness. So the factors are mindfulness; investigation of dhamma, this interest in what's occurring, not thinking about; energy, viriya, not shrinking back from the difficult; pīti, this kind of joyful interest Guy spoke about last night; tranquility, again Guy talked about last night.

Samādhi, collectedness, and equanimity. So those are the seven factors.

And as the Buddha said—this is actually in his Mindfulness of Breathing Sutta—mindfulness of breathing, repeatedly developed and cultivated, fulfills the four foundations of mindfulness. The four foundations of mindfulness, developed and repeatedly practiced, perfect the seven factors of enlightenment. The seven factors of enlightenment, developed and repeatedly practiced, fulfill true knowledge and deliverance.

So these are the seven ways he's talking about. All of them are different ways of how to live, how to really look and get interested—out of love for yourself and all beings—to see what's fueling the kilesas, the āsavas, and what's not, in this moment. And there's always some way that's available.

I'll end with a short quotation from Dipa Ma, who apparently had one of the more pure mind-hearts that we know of. I mean, you never really know another person's, but she says:

"There is so much sameness in ordinary life. We are always experiencing everything through the same set of lenses. When greed, hatred, and delusion are gone, you see everything fresh and new all the time. Every moment is new. Life was dull before. Now every day, every moment is full of taste and zest."

Zest is kind of like perky happiness.

So even in moments free from kilesa—and hopefully, as hard as it is, those moments give us the faith, as Annie said today, to keep on the path in all the aspects of our life.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 74

Perception Of Impermanence Leads To Awakening

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson offers a deep exploration of anicca (impermanence) as one of the three characteristics of existence, alongside dukkha and anattā. Drawing from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, she shares the Buddha's powerful teaching that even a fingernail's worth of permanence would make liberation impossible—it is precisely because nothing is stable that the holy life leads to freedom.
>
> Wilson distinguishes between three levels of wisdom: suta mayā paññā (wisdom from hearing), cintā mayā paññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanā mayā paññā (transformative insight wisdom). She emphasizes that intellectual understanding of impermanence isn't enough—only through moment-to-moment mindfulness does the perception of change become truly liberating. She illustrates this through the touching story of Ānanda weeping at the Buddha's approaching death, showing how grief is natural while wisdom points us toward freedom.
> The talk addresses practical obstacles to perceiving impermanence: our resistance to loss and grief, our assumptions of permanence in changing conditions, and our inattention to moment-to-moment flux. Wilson encourages practitioners to notice when they're assuming permanence—whether in difficult emotions they believe will last forever or pleasant states they try to recreate. She concludes with the inspiring story of Dr. Ariyaratne, demonstrating how deep understanding of anicca gives rise not to indifference but to profound courage and compassionate engagement with life.

I think when I spoke about the First Noble Truth last week, I may have mentioned that the Buddha described three characteristics to all phenomenal existence, to all experience. One is dukkha, the unsatisfactory quality or nature of experience. One is impermanence, the constant change and flux. And the third is not-self, anatta.

So tonight I want to talk about anicca, impermanence. Sometimes these are called three Dhamma doors, you could say. Sometimes anicca is the experience, the perception that's just much more obvious to you, showing up frequently, and that becomes your way into reality. Sometimes it's the unreliable, the dukkha aspect. Sometimes it's the not-self aspect. Not to worry, because they all come together in how things really are. They're all connected. But tonight I want to talk about anicca in particular—the perception of impermanence—because this is really how the Buddha spoke about it, about how it's freeing.

Here are two quotations from the Buddha, from the Samyutta Nikaya. "Bhikkhus," he's talking to practitioners, "there is no form, no rupa, no feeling tone, no perception, no volitional formation, no sankharas, and no moment of consciousness that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, that will remain the same just like eternity." Nothing, he's saying.

Then he took up a little bit of soil in his fingernail—like the handful of leaves teaching—and said, "There's not even this much form that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change. If there was just this much form that was permanent, this living of the holy life for the complete ending of dukkha could not be seen, could not be understood. But because there is not even this much form that is stable, permanent, unchanging, this living of the holy life for the complete abandoning of dukkha is understood, is discerned."

That's a powerful statement. And in the big picture, as we go through life, of those three characteristics—the change, the unreliability, the not-self—the aspect of change, of impermanence, in a way seems the most obvious. Probably no one's going to really argue that things change. So I'm not here to give you all these examples of how things change and talk you into it, because that doesn't work.

This is the next statement from the Buddha, a little farther on: "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, this perception eliminates all sensual cravings. It eliminates all craving for becoming. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all mana, all the conceit of 'I am.'"

Those four things mean completely awakened. When the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated.

This, to me, is really the way in, the avenue to really explore both why it is that we don't recognize impermanence, and why it is that if we really understood it, it's not transforming our understanding, it's not uprooting all of these things. As the Buddha says, it's really not that things are permanent and then if we have a great opening experience, everything starts changing. Obviously, there's not even this much that's permanent. But we don't perceive.

Perception—and Annie's going to talk about this in much more detail in a couple of nights—but perception, the way the Buddha talks about it, is a very specific function of mind arising in every moment of sensed consciousness. Perception is that quality that recognizes what's occurring. If I ring this bell, we recognize hearing, and then the mind knows it's a bell. That's based on memory, based on culture, based on a lot of things, which I'm not going to go into because I'm sure Annie will. But it just arises naturally. We name it bell, but maybe we don't recognize what that is. We hear a sound and we don't know. Half the time when we don't know, our mind just makes something up, and we think that's accurate. We don't really recognize how frequently our perceptions are not accurate.

Just to stick to impermanence, that's what the Buddha is saying. When the perception, moment to moment, of change, of constant change—when that perception is developed and cultivated—that opens us up into recognizing reality as it is. And that recognition, that wisdom, is the doorway to freedom, to liberation from dukkha, from confusion. That's what the Buddha is saying.

I want to talk tonight about some personal ruminations on the perception of impermanence and some of my own musings about perhaps some of the aspects that get in the way of our accurate perception at times.

The nature of insight, really one of the ways insight occurs, is simply that the perception shifts and we recognize things as they are. The Buddha spoke about three levels of wisdom, all of them useful, but different levels.

The first one, called sutta maya pañña—pañña means wisdom—is wisdom of what is heard, what is learned. This is helpful. If we never heard the Dhamma, we wouldn't be here. It's some information. I'm here talking to you; that's what is heard. To some extent, that's a level of wisdom. When we take it in and hear it, when we're able to hear.

The second level, cinta maya pañña, is described as our intelligence. The teaching goes in, and we mull it over. Not just thinking about things, but it's rolling around in our system. Like about impermanence—maybe you're thinking, "Well, yeah, I know things change, and that makes sense," and maybe you're not listening to me anymore, and you're clicking through your mind how things change. It goes in, and so it's a deeper level of using our intelligence, our experience. We understand it. But this is a level where often we think we know something. We all think we know impermanence, and it's not changing a thing in the way that we crave, the way we react.

Because it's not the third level of wisdom, bhavana maya pañña, which is really the insight level. Bhavana, you may recognize—I think Guy mentioned that's the word for mental development, mental cultivation. So we can't think our way into bhavana maya pañña. And if you could just believe that, you would save yourself so much agony in the next four to ten weeks.

Guess what opens up bhavana maya pañña? Just guess. What could it possibly be? Moment to moment, steady awareness of just what's arising in the whole field of experience.

So bhavana maya pañña is transformative. To me, it's like this insight where suddenly something shifts and we actually recognize on a deeper level. I kind of think of it like a cellular level. Wow. Everything's changing. Everything's moving around. And I don't like it very much. But it's a different level.

All three levels work together. But I think the confusion between the second and the third is when we think we really know something, but we keep getting caught: "I know, I understood that. How come I'm still craving? It doesn't make sense." We're impatient. That's another thing. Very impatient. It's been two weeks, folks. If you're already thinking, "Where am I? What's going on?"—put it down. Save yourself some grief and just be present here and now. The momentum's just beginning to build. Use that. Use that just to relax into this moment now. The next moment's going to be different. That's the rest of the talk.

So of course the misperception arises because of delusion. One of the ways I've noticed delusion shows up is in regard to not recognizing change and impermanence. On one level, change is obvious—disease, death, old age, losing things, winter. It's obvious, and still we're taken by surprise sometimes. This is where our mind knows it, but still it's like, "What? Now? Me? Can't be."

Especially for large changes that we feel as loss, as grief, I've noticed that part of the resistance comes out of what I spoke about last week: our habitual resistance, our instinctive pulling back from the unpleasant, the difficult. So we have this resistance to really feeling loss, to really letting in even the possibility of loss and change—not in a way of whipping it up, but just the loss, the sadness. There's a resistance to that, as if feeling sad is a bad thing. It's part of life.

So there's the misperception, the actively perceiving permanence in something that's changing. And there's just the inattention, this moment-to-moment inattention. The Buddha talks about this—perceiving permanence in what is changing. We actually perceive it wrong. And then on that perception we base how we think about things, the decisions we make, how we act.

And this is how we get so confused in life, and why we're suffering needlessly—because we're responding to what isn't really true and wondering why it doesn't work.

So I just want to share some thoughts on those three areas.

The first one: the sense of impermanence. It's so clear—this is what I talked about last week—that everybody in this world suffers loss. Grief, sadness. People and things we love go away for a whole variety of reasons, not just sickness and death. Circumstances change, things fall apart, and we really experience grief and loss.

And there's such a tendency that we don't want to know about that, that we just pretend it's never, never going to change. Then suddenly it's over and we're just thrown back. But this is really part of being human. To think that if I don't understand impermanence—because I feel grief when my partner and I split, or when I know someone is ill and going to die—or to pull back from that and think, "Well, if I was really a good Buddhist, I would just say, 'They will not be seen by me again,'" which is what the Buddha could say. And you think, "I can't do that." And so this whole thing seems crazy, twisted.

Of course we feel sadness. We do. It's human. It's human. And I actually personally feel that until we're complete arahants, there's going to be sadness. There's going to be grief at loss. We don't need to be afraid of that or resist it. It's simply an arising, really understandable experience of mind and heart.

And in some ways—I mean, it's because we're not completely awakened—but when we really can allow it, in my experience, when I could really allow grief, it has a kind of purity to it. Not the grief of "I shouldn't" or "they shouldn't," but just absolute loss. It's like this. You can't pretend it didn't happen. The grief comes. When there's no resistance, you just let it move through. There's a kind of sense of... it comes also out of the love that was there, and it just moves out again because it's also impermanent.

I experienced that a lot when my sister died quite suddenly. It was one of those things—you can't pretend it didn't happen. You can't get into wishing. That's just how it is. And so for some reason I had no resistance to the grief at all. It would come really strong at all different times of day for months and months, but I would just let it move through. I can't say it was sweet. Grief is grief. It's not pleasant. But there was really a sense that it was just an expression of the love. Sure, it had attachment, but that's okay. And it would move out. It never lasted that long. I could be laughing and happy the next minute. It would come and go. It's just part of life.

One of my favorite stories from the suttas is about Ānanda, who, as many of you know, was for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life his devoted attendant. Ānanda—he's a lovely guy in the suttas. You can really identify with him. He makes mistakes. He isn't completely awakened. He's friendly. He's relational. I don't mean to imply others aren't, but you just get a sense that you can relate to him. He's pretty up there—I mean, he's not a doofus.

One of the stories I like is in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, when the Buddha is telling his monks and nuns that he is going to die in a certain amount of time, three months or so. They're all having this big discussion about how to carry on the Sangha, what they should do with his remains, all of this. They're sitting there talking, and then all of a sudden the Buddha looks around and says, "Where's Ānanda?"

Ananda was always there when the Buddha was giving a talk. Where's Ananda? And he sent a brother, "Please go find Ananda."

And Ananda had gone to his lodging, and they describe it—he was lamenting, leaning on the doorpost. He was lamenting and crying: "Alas, I am still a learner with much to do, and the teacher is passing away who is so compassionate to me."

Andy Olinsky told me—I didn't know this yet—this is a very well-known image. Later, when images were drawn of the Buddha's passing, there was Ananda lamenting against the doorpost, just crying.

So the Buddha of course said, "Go, monk, and say to Ananda: 'Friend Ananda, the teacher summons you.'" So Ananda comes to the Buddha, and the Buddha said—kindly enough—"Enough, Ananda. Do not weep and wail. Have I not already told you that all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other? So how could it be, Ananda—since whatever is born, become, compounded, is subject to decay—how could it be that it should not pass away?"

But he's saying this with great compassion. He's not dismissing him. He's saying, "How could it be, Ananda? Haven't I said?"

And then he goes on to really uplift his mind. He says, "For a long time, Ananda, you have been in the Tathāgata's presence, showing loving-kindness in act of body, speech, and mind, beneficially, blessedly, wholeheartedly, and unstintingly." So he's saying, just make effort, trust—in a short time you also will be free. And then he goes on and on to praise Ananda some more.

I share this to get that sense of how human it all is. And the Buddha knows that. But it's not like, "Oh, it's okay, it's okay, go ahead and cry." He'll never say that. He'll always say, "This is how it really is." And yes, you're crying now, but just have a look at how it really is, and your mind and heart will open to freedom.

I just love that story because we're all in it together. We're all human. So not to flinch away, or pretend we don't feel sadness or grief, or be afraid to really look unflinchingly at what's going on because it might change. It not might change—it will change. But in this moment, just in this moment, it's how it is. Not to be afraid to love something because it might change. It will change. But if we're afraid of grief, then we're afraid to love. And he's not saying that. He's saying just see how it is, but still be human.

This understanding can really lead us to a much deeper acceptance of life, and a flexibility and openness. We don't stop caring. Maybe there's a more deeply held, less attached caring—but a more deeply connected caring—when we can really respond, when we're not trying to hold on and keep everything static. There's more flexibility to respond in an appropriate way.

This is from a book from some years ago called Streets In by Issan Dorsey. He was opening a Zen hospice in the heart of the city where many people with AIDS were coming. He writes:

We have always dealt with whatever came to the door. We had no formal plan for starting this hospice. We started the hospice because death came to the door.

People who were dying of HIV would come to the door. So he said:

You can deal with a complex, changing situation because you don't have to control it. You don't have to force it into an ideal pattern. You can actually allow it to be whatever it is, and allow yourself to adapt to what it becomes. Because this is the way we proceed, we have the ability to respond to the immediacy of the situation. And therefore, we have to be very practical. We can be very practical.

So that's taking this understanding into the world, starting a hospice. But this comes down to our moment-to-moment experience as well. And I'll get into it a little bit more, but how much are we trying to control our sitting to meet some ideal—whatever that is, whatever your mind has made up as the way it's supposed to be—and trying to force it into that mold? And then when it shifts, when we talk about skillful means, that's exactly this adaptability: "Oh, before it was like this, now it's like this. What's helpful?" Rather than, "No, before it was like this, and that's how it's supposed to be."

Let's get back there. Something's wrong. We don't recognize it. We're not open to how things actually are.

There's another sutta from another monk, just so you know they had to go through the same thing. This monk's name is Asaji. On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Rajagaha in the bamboo grove, and Venerable Asaji, who was a long-term bhikkhu, was sick, afflicted, gravely ill—basically, when they describe it like that, he was sick and dying. And he was really upset. He said he was filled with regret and remorse.

So the Buddha went to visit him and asked, "Are you reproaching yourself? Have you been lax in virtue, lax in your practice?"

He said, "No, no, no."

The Buddha said, "Well, if you have nothing for which to reproach yourself in regard to your virtue, in regard to your life, Asaji, why are you so troubled by remorse and regret?"

And Asaji said, "Formerly, venerable sir, when I was ill, I could keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations." In other words, he could get concentrated. "But now I do not obtain concentration. And so it occurs to me—let me not fall away."

Can you relate to that? He's filled with remorse because before, when he was sick, he could get concentrated, and now he can't. "Let me not fall away" basically means, "Oh my God, I've lost it all. It's all gone."

Have you ever had that feeling here? "I've worked for two weeks and now all these thoughts—it's all gone. It's over. Let me not fall away." This is just that same experience on a bigger scale.

The Buddha responded, again, "Have I not told you? All that is subject to coming together is subject to falling apart." And he gave Asaji a whole discourse on anicca. The conditions are different now. And he says—I'm paraphrasing here—"By the way, in my teaching, concentration is not the essence. The essence is the insight, the path, the fruition of wisdom, of understanding."

So, get over it. It's like this now. The situation is different. Of course the conditions for concentration aren't present. But the conditions for wisdom are—seeing what's really true, recognizing the fact of change.

Change is inevitable. Whatever arises, arises due to conditions. All those conditions are constantly changing. They change, the effect changes, and then that changes into the next moment. There's no way to avoid this.

One of the good things about retreat is that in moment-to-moment practice, we have more chance to notice this on a more subtle level. Right now I was talking on the larger level of death and loss. It's a good place to start, because already, even in the most obvious cases, we don't really, really cellularly know it—or we wouldn't resist it.

Sometimes we wonder, why do we cling? When we see more and more frequently throughout a retreat—going in on the middle level and even on the bhavana-maya-pañña level—the fact that clinging is suffering, many people notice this. They're saying, "I keep clinging onto this, and actually it's just suffering. Why does the mind keep doing it?"

There are many ways to explore this, and we'll talk about it from different angles. For now, I'll address it in relationship to what I'm discussing tonight. This clinging, in terms of impermanence—impermanence is really the sense of constant flux and change, really no solid ground any time, anywhere.

And most of our little minds don't like that too much. We want the clinging—yes, we want the pleasant to stay, of course, and we don't want the unpleasant. But for me, I find underneath that, there's this sense of wanting some stability, looking for that stability in some external or internal experience, some sense experience, including experience of the mind—even though we see that they're changing moment to moment.

But a good one comes along, and it's like, "Okay, shut up. This is it. Steady, steady. This is peace. Now I've got it. Before I was confused, but now I understand." Don't you see how the mind does that? It's such a trip. "Oh, that was a view. I see through that. But now I know. It's like this."

But again, I feel the clinging in one way is a subconscious response to the unreliability of life, the out-of-controlness, the wanting somewhere stable. There's this from the Buddha in the Sutta Nipata, I believe: "The search for a resting place is burning." We burn from that search. "Not to need one is cool and peaceful." The search for a resting place—that's this: "This is it. This is it." The resting place means it keeps on not changing. Not to need one is cool and peaceful.

There's a Tibetan instruction: just rest at ease in whatever arises. Sometimes I think of that as our choiceless attention instruction. You're really recognizing and resting at ease in whatever arises. And just let whatever arises keep changing, because it will.

I just want to read you two short little stanzas from a poem by Galway Kinnell:

You scream, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.

I love that line: "You cling to me hard as if clinging could save us."

I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down.
I've stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die.
And yet perhaps this is the reason you cry,
this the nightmare you wake screaming from,
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

And that's how it is to the mind that's looking for something to be stable—we are in the pre-trembling of a house that falls, and there's a kind of "I don't want to know," that resistance.

But when there's just the openness to this moment as it is, there's like a—it's not even surrender. It's just the ability, like with Issan Dorsey, to respond appropriately, to be as it is, and change comes as it will. The presence is with that. If there's some resistance, the presence is with that. That's simply another arising experience. Just not so trying to control, not so fearful.

But we can't do this with an act of will, by thinking about it. This is really where our practice, our moment-to-moment practice, takes us to explore this. And we all have moments of it, with this choiceless attention. Just a moment where, as the Buddha says, "One abides in peace who does not abide anywhere." One abides—abides means to rest, to stay, to live; I'm saying that for non-English speakers. One abides in peace who does not abide anywhere. So we say, "Oh, here I am living"—it's already moving into the next. But we can't talk our way into it; just see.

This doesn't mean we don't care.

It doesn't mean that when we sense the pre-trembling of a house about to fall, we don't want to feel it. As I said before, you don't pull back, you don't stop loving, you don't stop caring. Actually, you become much more present, much more responsive.

The Buddha often used these images—the sense of impermanence, of death—as a way to wake us up, but not to suggest we don't care. Because we're really not fighting, not trying to control, no longer shrinking away from the possibility of tenderness or loss, that actually takes us more deeply into connection and caring. We're not so afraid of it, and we know it will go.

One short haiku that I really love, from Issa—he wrote this on the death of his young daughter. He said: "This dewdrop world is a dewdrop world. And yet, and yet." I just love that. That's how it is. And yet. It's dewdrop, gone like that. And yet. And that's, to me, our paradox as human beings. I don't know what it's like to be an arhat, but this is our paradox as human beings.

But with the courage and the wisdom that comes from the Dhamma, from really knowing and trusting, recognizing accurately the way it is—this only leads us into more ease and freedom. We don't have to land in "I don't want to know about impermanence." We don't have to land there. We can trust. We can open. Just meet this moment. Let the next one take care of itself.

So another way we don't quite perceive impermanence accurately, or we assume permanence, is partly from misperception and partly from inattention. I was once at a talk by the Dalai Lama, and he was talking about impermanence. He said—this is obvious, but I remember how he said it—he said, one of the reasons we keep being surprised by the endings of things is because we don't notice the momentariness of change. We think things arise due to conditions, last for a while, and then go away. But no, there's no "last for a while." Things arise due to conditions and every mind moment they're changing, but we don't quite recognize that. This is what I'm talking about—shaky ground. Not just everything's nice for a while and then it goes away. When we think that way, we really are shocked by the ending, because we didn't see the flux as it was going on.

So this is just what we start to explore. You don't think your way into it, but this is one of the great benefits of a long mindfulness retreat. We're just being mindful, bringing attention to whatever arises. And as you saw in the instructions the other morning, when the mind's somewhat stable and just unhooking from any particular experience, attending to whatever arises—keep on with this: sitting, walking, eating. There is no way, if there's any kind of steady mindfulness, that you can't notice stuff is changing all the time. There's no way.

You say, there is a way. Denial is a powerful force. People come in—no one's done it so far now—but I'll be on a retreat and someone comes in and says, "Oh, I'm just sleepy all the time. It's unbearable." And you know, it's really suffering. I'll say, "Really, all the time? Every sitting?" "Well, it was the sitting early before breakfast and then after lunch a little bit." Right, that was "all day." "Oh, no, maybe. But sometimes it was really a lot."

Or someone says, "I'm just having this emotion." And emotions can be strong. Part of what difficult emotions tell us is: "This is how it is. Even though I wasn't here before, I'm here now, and I'm going to be here for the rest of your life." Right? Doesn't it feel like that? "This is how it is. It's never going to change. Get used to it." We're going to be in disappointment, in grief, in fear, in heaviness from now until the end of November. How can we bear it?

I'm not exaggerating when I say that's what the mind starts to think.

So we begin to really look and see. We don't even have to look for endings—just stay present. How many sense objects arise and pass in just one sitting, just in one walking? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking, thinking, seeing, hearing, feeling. How many in one sitting?

Sometimes people come and say, "Oh, there's too much going on." Too much for what? Something's wrong? There's so many things happening—it's supposed to just be quiet. Is it? Is it?

Once I went to Sayadaw U Pandita when I was sitting with him and all this stuff was happening. I knew—I don't know how I knew it from other retreats—that he would tell other people to keep coming back to the breath, to keep coming back to the breath. And I would go in and I would take one breath and then all these things would be happening. I would just be noting, noting, noting, noting everything that was arising. I was afraid he'd tell me to go back to the breath because it would have been really difficult with all this stuff happening. I was so afraid that I finally brought it up to him. I said, "You know, should I be at the breath more? I'm noting all this stuff. It's so much."

And he just looked at me and said, "Are you making this stuff happen?"

I said, "No."

He said, "That's anattā—out of control. That's what's happening. Note it."

This is part of what we start to notice. I think Guy mentioned just tuning in from time to time to seeing, awareness of seeing—not so much caught in the object that's being seen, but awareness of seeing. To me, that has been so helpful moving around through the day. Don't make a big deal about it. Just relax and notice that seeing is the process. Don't make it a big thing. It's really easy. But if I'm walking and just aware of seeing as the process, every moment it's different. You're just walking, and every moment the object seen is different. We don't notice that change because we stay with a sense of permanence, a sense of me, or we string it together with a story. But it's changing every moment.

When we're in this immediacy of mindfulness, just with what's happening now, this change, this momentary change starts to reveal itself. It's just how it is. No stasis, ever. No stasis, ever.

Some years ago on retreat, in a teaching with Joseph, a woman who was a longtime meditator with a lot of insight said to us, "Oh, I've been seeing for a while that everything changes all around me. All the experience is always changing. For years I've seen that. But I finally got it—oh, I'm part of that." On this side of things too, it's constantly changing. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking—constantly arising and passing, different experiences.

I think of it like time-lapse photography. Say you're having a time lapse—they had one this spring, a camera pointed at that center garden there the whole time I was teaching. What is that doing there? They told me it was filming one of the plants.

I never got to see what they did with that. But that kind of time-lapse photography—if you plant a bulb and then just leave it, and it's slowly growing but looks fast, it comes up and little leaves emerge and it shoots and then the stem and the blossom and then it falls, dies, and goes back into the earth. There's never one moment where it's just this one thing. Each moment different, the preceding moment leading into how this moment can be, and this moment leads into the next moment. It's all part of the same process, but there's no moment that this is the thing. In constant flux, in constant change. That's us. That's everything.

There's no solid—see, this is how it leads into anattā, no separate self-existing entity, constant arising and changing. Thinking about it, that's where the mind might not be so happy. That's when the clinging comes in: "No, I want something steady." But not thinking about it, just being aware—it's like this, it's like this, it's like this.

The Buddha said the perception of impermanence, when it's developed, when one perceives impermanence, the perception of not-self is stabilized. And when the perception of not-self becomes stabilized, one who perceives not-self uproots the conceit "I am"—the māna, the comparing "I am"—which is nirvana in this very life.

So the perception of impermanence, not something you have to think about or make happen, is just a natural effect of perceiving impermanence again and again and again. It stabilizes the perception of not-self.

I've been talking about a moment-to-moment level of arising sense experience. On the slightly larger level of our personality, it's the same. This is from Mae Chee Kaew, who was a Thai nun from the last century, really a student of Ajahn Mun, which means she was a tough cookie, extremely. She says: "Everything that makes a person unique changes continually and eventually disintegrates. Each personality is constantly ceasing to be what it was and becoming something new. Those factors one tends to conceive of as self are impermanent and fleeting. Everything about bodily form and the mind's thoughts and feelings is without intrinsic stability and bound to dissolve." Everything bound to dissolve. For that reason, clinging to body and mind is a major source of pain and suffering.

That last part we know. But it's all bound to change.

Years ago—I always tell this story, but I like it—a friend of ours was a long-term practitioner. She used to cook a lot on retreats. So on this one retreat she was cooking, and she had a day off, so she was going to sit for that day. She told me later that the other cooks, who all knew each other well, were basically telling her what an aversive personality she was. Which she also agreed with—often aversion came up. But that's how we tend to do: "I have an aversive personality." So that's what she's being told. And we think, "I'm a fearful person," whatever our stories are. We might have a couple of them.

So she went to sit for this one day, and she said, "I'm just going to look really carefully." Because she knew how to practice. So she was just being present with her aversion—really steady with her mindfulness, not trying to pretend she wasn't aversive, but just being steady. Just sit down and walk and let whatever arises arise, just as we're doing here. And noticing, as she's being careful, what kind of thoughts and emotions came up.

She said, yeah, some aversive ones came up. But as she looked carefully, there were many, many kind, generous thoughts, many moments of generosity, many calm moments, many loving moments, many just spaced-out whatever moments, and then some aversive times. That's how it is. But then we take certain ones and go, "This is me." And other ones we completely ignore. "Well, that was a moment of mettā, but that was some weird freak of nature that had nothing to do with me, just because we practiced it. Left to my own devices, it's back to the aversion. It's back to the fear. It's back to the hopelessly dull, torpor-ridden, hopeless meditator." That's who I am.

This is why steady awareness matters. This is why continuity is your friend. Continuity is what allows clear recognition. And so yes, at times there's nothing to hold to, shaky ground. But more times than we realize—thank God you don't have to hold on to this. It's moving, it's changing.

Just notice how it is. Resting at ease in whatever arises, not having to take ownership.

In myself, I think when practicing—or not—but particularly when we're mindful yet caught up in a personality-driven scenario: "Oh, my aversion, what can I do?" We're mindful of it, but kind of caught in it, like we've talked about before. We think we have to think our way through it. Again, I know I've said this five times, but I'm going to say it again: you never have to think your way through it. You have to stay with it.

Sometimes the great renunciation is just to bring your attention into the simplicity of what's happening in this present moment. Just feel the foot on the ground. Just feel the breath. Just notice, "Oh, there's all this grief." Just notice the heaviness in the chest. Just this renunciation of surrendering into this moment. The story can just hang out there, but just let it be. That's like the great renunciation into freedom—taking refuge in awareness rather than keeping refuge in these stories we tell ourselves.

Ajahn Sumedho—I love the way he describes things—at one point he's talking about how we have ideals about what reality is, but reality... he was chuckling, and he goes, "The real isn't what you're expecting, I tell you." Just really look. And he says, "With steady awareness, we do recognize the nature of conditioned phenomena. Conditions are continually arising and ceasing in consciousness." Continually arising and ceasing in consciousness. And when with awareness we recognize this, we start to awaken out of our confusion and our delusion to the way things really are.

So here we're noticing again and again: conditions arising and ceasing and known in consciousness. This is arising and it's known. It's gone and it's known. This is known. This is known. Notice the endings. Notice the comings. Notice the constant change. And it's known. Taking refuge in the awareness, not in the story, not in the object.

In many of the suttas, when someone first awakens, becomes what's called a stream-enterer, there are different things they say—specific lines that indicate that. And one of the most well-known is, as they wake up: "I really see whatever is subject to arising is subject to cessation." That's like the lion's roar of awakening, knowing it. "Oh, I see. Whatever is subject to arising is subject to cessation." It's a lion's roar of freedom.

So just a couple of ideas that come to my mind. Just noticing when you're assuming permanence. Because we have this misperception—we're saying notice the perception of impermanence, but notice when you're perceiving, assuming permanence. Anything you experience today: fear, anxiety, self-doubt in the mind—"How am I going to deal with this in the next sitting?" Any pain that came up: "Oh no, five more hours of this." Or when you had a good sitting yesterday and now it's not like that, and we spend, even though we pretend we're not, we spend very subtly trying to guide it back to how it was yesterday, because that was the right way, the better way. Never noticing that the conditions are completely different right now. Like Āsaji—he's sick and dying and he wants to be like how he was when he was twenty-five, sitting for fourteen hours at a stretch. Okay, I made up that specific detail, but the conditions are how they are now. Assuming permanence.

Ajahn Chah used to say, just say for whatever you're doing: "This is uncertain." When we think, "Oh, I wonder how I'll like lunch"—this is uncertain. "Tomorrow I'm going to be practice leader"—this is uncertain. "I wonder whether I'll sleep tonight"—this is uncertain. "Will I even get up and make it back to the room?"—this is uncertain. I mean, don't go nuts with it, but just have that sense, to notice when we're just assuming.

And yet we plan. It's not that we pretend, "Oh no, I'm just in the moment. Don't ask me to plan." No, we plan. We ring the bell. We come in here. We know what's going on, and we know it's uncertain. Anything can happen at any time.

To me, the more amazing thing is that I have all my stuff booked out for 2021. I mean, what a joke. It's uncertain that I'll even be alive in 2021, right? But still, we do that. We work with the relative, but we know this is uncertain. Just noticing that.

Another thing I notice sometimes is when you've been with something—difficult or pleasant, doesn't matter—and it leaves. We don't always notice the endings of things. Sometimes we do. But when you've been with something a while and it's gone, notice it's gone and kind of stay with noticing the gone-ness.

This is an example I always give. It seems silly, but actually it was a big insight for me. I was being really mindful while eating—being mindful and chewing, chewing, chewing, that kind of very slow, steady mindfulness. And if you notice, it doesn't taste good after about two bites, right? It's mush, mush, chew, chew, chew. Neutral, neutral, unpleasant. Just being with it, swallowing it, following it all the way down, feeling this movement. Then I said, "Oh, that was a concept." My mind was saying that's the food going all the way—that's a concept. The experience in the mouth when I swallowed, that was gone. It wasn't "this is an experience that's now down in my stomach." That's an idea. The sensations in the mouth were completely and totally gone. Notice that. That seems silly, but notice that. Notice how we assume permanence by creating these constructs of thought, saying, "Oh, this is all the same thing moving along"—like that time-lapse of the flower. It's different every moment.

So sometimes just notice gone-ness. When you go to bed thinking, "Thank God this day is over. It has been such a heavy dukkha day"—take a moment, if you can, to move aside from that aversive lens. Just reflect on it. And you'll notice all kinds of neutral, pleasant, other kinds of moments that went on. Just break that assumption of solidity and permanence.

The last thing I want to say is what I alluded to before—how when there's really this deep perception of impermanence, it's far from making us think, "Oh well, everything's impermanent, who cares? Whatever." It's almost the opposite of that. When there's really the understanding of things as they are, instead of this resistance to life, resistance to experience, fear of the unpleasant, there's a complete ability to just open—just open fully into this is how it is in this moment. There's a real sense of opening to the wonder, the mystery, to vibrant presence. There's nothing to try and hold onto in the past or fear in the future, just totally here. As Byron Katie says, loving what is—just in this moment, awareness of what is and loving it. And from that, the response to life can actually give us much more responsiveness, the Brahma Viharas that Jill talked about, courage or willingness to meet in a much more flexible and sometimes courageous way because of the understanding.

I want to end with a little quotation from Dr. A.T. Ariyaratne from Sri Lanka. He's in his eighties now, his high eighties, but since the fifties he's been running a project called the Sarvodaya Shramadana Movement, which is really working in rural areas based on Buddhist understanding. Working with really poor people in rural areas, it's based on the Four Noble Truths, nonviolence, anicca, anatta. And he says it's based on the realization that "the impermanence and interdependence of selves in society and nature entails the deepest respect for all."

So he's really basing this work that he does, which he describes as political empowerment of villages—and these are really poor village people, rural people in Sri Lanka—on rural development through Buddhist principles, a nonviolent spiritual revolution to replace the structural violence and inequality that forms the basis of social order. He's really quite radical, but he's basing it on helping the poor rural people from a sense of understanding our interconnectedness, from understanding impermanence.

And I give you all that just so you understand this quotation from him:

"In 1952, a gangster was asked to kill me. I was just trying to be of service to students in our communities who were in need, and some people's financial or other interests were threatened, so they gave a contract killer some money. I heard about it, so I went to him. And I told him, 'This is what I'm doing. If you want to kill me, do it now, not in my school or with my students, because those places would have a bad name after that.' I didn't want other people's blood to be shed.

"So at that time, and even now, I have that courage. To let others live, if necessary, you sacrifice. It's a spiritual motivation. Because every moment we are born, we exist, and we pass away. Every moment. In our mind or body, is there anything that is permanent for two seconds? And when you understand that, when you practice it, you get a lot of courage. And even in death, you see life.

"So the killer, he was so good. Not only did he say, 'Oh, what a crime I would have done.' And one lesson he taught me: against our conscience, we don't kill. 'I was told that you are a very bad person, misleading students. Because we didn't have teachers like you, we became criminals.' And he changed from that day."

I just love that story. But that's really the sense of it—when we really understand anicca, the suffering of holding and clinging and narrow self-interest is seen through. It's really the doorway to freedom.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 75

Exploring The Experience Of Taṇhā (Craving)

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to bring satipañña (mindfulness-wisdom) to the direct experience of taṇhā—the thirst or craving identified in the Second Noble Truth as the origin of dukkha. Drawing on a teaching from Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, she frames the entire practice as discovering both the nature of the non-deluded mind and understanding how the deluded mind works.
>
> Wilson clarifies important Pāli terminology, distinguishing taṇhā (craving/thirst, which is always unwholesome) from chanda (ethically neutral desire or enthusiasm that can motivate skillful action like dhammachanda). She emphasizes that craving is not about the object itself but about the mental state arising in each moment—the narrowing of awareness, distortion of perception, and the tunnel vision that accompanies wanting. Through personal stories, including a memorable pursuit of a milkshake during retreat, she illustrates how craving seduces us with feelings of aliveness while actually blocking the peace we seek.
> The talk explores the Buddha's teaching on four types of clinging: to sense pleasures, to views, to rites and observances, and to personality view (sakkāyadiṭṭhi). Wilson guides practitioners through Bhikkhu Bodhi's framework of recognizing gratification, danger, and escape in relation to craving. Rather than fighting or suppressing desire through willpower, she encourages steady mindfulness that allows wisdom to naturally dissolve attachment—revealing the unbounded peace available when the heart-mind is awake, present, and free from clinging.

Last night when Jill spoke about the cycles of practice, purification and purity, it reminded me of this quotation from Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche, who was a wonderful Dzogchen Lama. He said, "The main purpose of these Dharma teachings is to find out what is the nature of the non-deluded mind, as well as how the deluded mind works."

I love that because it's like both things are what's going on. I find that's kind of like all the noble truths. What's the nature of the non-deluded mind? The third and the fourth. As well as how the deluded mind works—one and two. Meditation practices work to uncover our innate wisdom purity by recognizing the obscurations for the changing, insubstantial appearances they are, thus revealing what has always been available.

I've always loved that quotation. I feel like it describes the whole breadth of our practice. Everything that goes on in our practice fits in one of those categories. Sometimes we're talking about and seeing the nature of the non-deluded mind, and other times we're exploring, investigating, learning about the nature of how the deluded mind works. So that's the level I'm talking about tonight—how the deluded mind works. But exploring it, bringing sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom, bringing interest to the experience of these obscurations that he's talking about—exploring it with mindfulness and wisdom is what reveals the reality and lets these obscurations dissolve. Not hating them, not trying to get rid of them.

What I want to talk about tonight is the second noble truth: taṇhā, craving, thirst. The Buddha taught: "This is the noble truth of the origin of dukkha. It is this craving"—the word in Pali is taṇhā, and I'll get to that because it's quite specific—"which produces renewal of being, repeated existence, and is bound up with delight and lust, and seeks pleasure now here and now there. Namely, craving for sense pleasures, craving for existence, for becoming, and craving for non-becoming, non-existence."

I love that teaching because I think it really encapsulates part of our entrancement with craving—because it is bound up with delight and lust and seeks pleasure now here and now there. Oh yes, let's look here, let's look there. What's the problem with that? That's how to live a life! So the three kinds are craving for sense pleasures, craving for becoming or states, and craving for non-existence or non-becoming. Some teachers describe craving as not just greed, not just the clinging, but also the pushing away, the aversion—both sides of that on this level of the second noble truth. Tonight I'm going to be talking about exploring it as taṇhā, as thirst, as craving, as clinging.

I see this talk as an invitation to us to really get interested and bring our wisdom mind, to bring mindfulness and dhammavicaya—investigation of states, which is the beginning of wisdom—to bring this into the experience of craving and clinging whenever we notice it. Just as you might bring it to calm, as you might bring it to an interesting sound. Really no difference. And that's how we really start to see its nature.

I want to first talk a bit about language. Taṇhā, thirst—this word used in Pali as the cause of dukkha in the second noble truth—we translate it as craving or clinging. When we're talking in general in English, we speak about it as desire, as wanting. This is a very broad word in English, and it covers a range of states of heart and mind. Taṇhā, quite specific, translated as thirst, is kind of the closest to it. To me, anyway, this has been really important and helpful.

Often I hear people talk about skillful desires and unskillful desires. Using the word "desire" or "wanting" in English, they might describe a skillful desire to cultivate the Dhamma or to take care of your family, and an unskillful one—well, you know, make up the list. But to me, this completely misses the point and it's incredibly confusing, because the quality of taṇhā, of thirst in the mind, is not about the object itself. It's the state that's arising, the mental state arising in the mind and heart in a moment. That's the obscuration that limits, that distorts perception, that limits the range of mind, that disrupts, that hides peace. But as long as we focus on the object, we don't really get that. We keep looking out. And then we get really confused.

So let me go into the language a little bit. Thirst is this very specific yearning, leaning in, wanting. And it strengthens. I read somewhere in a commentary that craving is like a thief going into a house and leaning in for something. When they grasp it and take hold of it, that's clinging, that's grasping. So craving into grasping happens pretty quick. When we're talking about attachment, that's grasping—but it starts with the thirst.

Sometimes people say, "Well, what's wrong with wanting to take care of your family? What's evil about wanting to go on a vacation or wanting to have a nice meal or wanting enlightenment?"

And that's where we get all confused. It's as if, well, if we don't have thirst, tanha, how can we do anything? We would just sit around without wanting or aversion. You might laugh, but I can't tell you how many people have asked that question, as if craving were the only motivation for action. It may seem like it sometimes, but it really isn't.

There's another word—and there are many words; I'm not a Pali scholar—but there's another word in Pali: chanda. Chanda is ethically neutral, you could say. Whereas thirst, tanha, is never skillful—there's no such thing as "skillful tanha," it's one of the distortions—chanda is ethically neutral. This quality can be like a desire to do, an excitement, a willingness, an energy to do something.

So it could be dhamma chanda—the excitement, the interest, the willingness to practice the Dhamma. Dhamma chanda, enthusiasm for the Dhamma, is totally wholesome. Chanda can serve as a motivation for doing neutral things one needs to do, like taking care of the family. And it can also be unwholesome, unskillful. It can be the excitement of sense pleasures.

Actually, when we talk about the hindrances, the first hindrance is quite specific. It isn't lobha, greed. It's kama chanda, which is the excitement of sense pleasures. Kama is sense pleasures; chanda is this excitement, this enthusiasm for sense pleasures. That's the first hindrance, and that's definitely not skillful.

So just to give you a sense, chanda is another motivation, a mental quality that motivates action. And the intention—that moment of intention in the mind, the mental factor that gives rise to action before any action—is accompanied by and fed by various mental states present in the cetana. We could do something out of greed. We could do the same thing out of compassion. We could do it out of a neutral chanda, taking care of the family, all kinds of things.

So you get a sense of what I mean. When we say, "Well, what's wrong? It's a good desire to want X, Y, and Z," we're really missing the boat. The point is to look inside and see what's going on here. Let's explore the quality when it arises in the heart and mind, in the body.

This is the invitation to us: to bring in the potential to get interested, rather than fearing or hating or not wanting to see. Craving, thirst, lobha as the overarching kilesa when it arises—when we recognize a moment of this thirst, this craving or pushing away, we turn the attention back. We explore: what is its nature? How does it arise? How does it behave? How do we behave when we're under the thrall of craving? Just to keep watching, to keep noticing. Why and how do we get so seduced, so enchanted? Or are we actually seduced or enchanted? This is really the invitation to us—to explore this.

And as we do, just bearing in mind, we're only exploring. We're not saying we hate craving and we're going to stop it with an act of will. Because first, that doesn't work. And second, that would mostly come from aversion: "I'm not craving anymore!"

When we think of renunciation, of giving up the things craved, in my mind we tend to have, just superficially, a backwards notion of craving and renunciation. Our idea, as it's described in the way the Buddha articulates the Second Noble Truth, is that we think of craving as accompanied by delight. We take refuge in craving, finding pleasure now here, now there. This is where we...

habitually go for refuge when we're not happy or when we're looking for happiness. Without realizing it, we just go. Let's get this next good thing. Let's get this next nice thing. And we're looking for the thing and not noticing that little movement of wanting. I want this, I want this. It doesn't have to be so strong it blows your head apart, but sometimes it does.

Upadhyaya said once—and I'm going to say it, Jack Kornfield hates it when I say this, but Upadhyaya said, and I think it's great—he said, "Lust cracks the brain." When you're really feeling it, when you're really driven by it, that's how it is. And I mean lust for anything, not just sexual lust. "I've got to have that last piece of chocolate cake or I'll die." It cracks the brain.

But without recognizing that, without turning around and looking, this is our refuge for pleasure. And yet this is what leads us into complications, confusion, and suffering.

Renunciation sounds like penance—dry, dusty, non-joy, punishment. Something like, "I have to give up this thing I love and I'm going to be miserable." But renunciation isn't about the objects. It's about renouncing the greed that keeps us bound to samsara. When it's wisdom that renounces, not an act of will—when wisdom sees clearly and just puts it down—ah. The simplicity is joy. It's peace. It's ease. The renunciation is a movement of the motivation, not external. The greed, the craving has gone. So you don't miss the thing because you don't want it anymore. It's peace. It's really a whole different thing.

Let me offer some thoughts about exploring this. Coming back again to any object that we want—to use the English word—what's wrong with wanting to experience the sunset? What's wrong with wanting to have dinner, or take a walk, or have enlightenment, or have another piece of chocolate cake? What's wrong with any of that? And as long as we stay in that kind of rational mode—what's wrong with the chocolate cake? Nothing. What's wrong with the sunset?—we're missing it. And that's our habit.

So when you just feel it, turn around and see, because it might not be craving. It might be just a sense of the sitting's over, you walk outside with a sense of ease and presence and appreciate the sunset. You go out and tonight there are clouds. There isn't a sunset. You don't beat your head against the wall. You don't say the day is ruined. "Oh, okay, it's like this now." You come in.

But if you go out thinking, "This is the best part of the day," and there's no sunset—that's a clue. A clue that there might have been thirst. We need clues like this.

And at that point, not to start berating or judging yourself. It's, "Oh, great"—turn around and notice. Bring your wise attention. What does it feel like in the mind, in the body? What's the experience that we could be calling thirst, or craving, or wanting? What does the state feel like in the heart, in the mind?

Bring satipañña to it—mindfulness and wisdom—just the same as you would any mental state. Don't make it somehow more different. It's coming and going. It may come a lot, but it goes as often as it comes. Absolutely, as often as it comes, it goes. So you can really notice that.

Some of the things I notice about it—and not only me, and you might or might not—so these are ideas I'm throwing out, but look and see for yourself. That's really the thing.

When there's craving, this thirst, or grasping in the mind, we don't recognize accurately. I think we've said that before. The Buddha says that about dosa, ill will, aversion, and clinging, and delusion—we don't recognize accurately. The perception is distorted. We can't see clearly. We can get a kind of tunnel vision. We just don't really see what's happening, and our mind gets narrowed. Our field of awareness can go from just peaceful and fine to narrow, focused, and "me and other" very, very quickly, very strongly.

I can feel physically almost like the mind and the body are leaning forward, or if it's the craving of pushing away, pushing away. But I can feel a tightness. You may not—I'm not saying—but really looking to see what it is and noticing that sense of contraction, of narrowing, of not seeing clearly so we don't recognize the object clearly. We think whatever we're wanting...

The Tibetans have a saying that wanting puts feathers on the object, you know, kind of makes it all pretty. Have you ever noticed that when there's wanting? The thing wanted—it seems like it's so nice, whether it's a person or a piece of fruit or a vacation or whatever. It looks so pretty. When you first get into a relationship with someone, everything looks so... they're so nice. A friend of mine was saying years ago, she'd been with her husband for a while, and I asked, "Well, how is it now?" She said, "It's good, it's okay, but the love eyes have fallen off." She didn't mean they didn't love each other, but the perception—everything's beautiful, everything's nice—that craving piece wasn't there.

So, starting to explore that. Tejaniya describes how craving and also aversion distort perception. I like the way he puts it. He says pañña, or wisdom, recognizes the natural characteristics—the three characteristics—of any object, including craving. So when something's met with wisdom, any object that can be known through mind or any of the five other physical senses, when met with mindfulness and wisdom without the distortions of greed, hatred, and delusion, that is how the three characteristics—the impermanent aspect, the not-self aspect, the unreliable, unsatisfactory aspect we've spoken about—start to reveal themselves. Because that's an aspect of any object when met with wisdom. That's why, in terms of the steadiness of awareness leading to wisdom, we don't have to have a special object for that to happen. Wisdom reveals the natural characteristics of the object.

Delusion—any of the three roots of suffering—covers up these natural characteristics. That's what Annie was talking about with the vipallāsas, the distortions of perception. Delusion covers up the natural characteristics, but it does not cover up the object. So we still see that piece of chocolate cake without recognizing its inherent unreliability—that it's going to be gone really soon, and we may not feel as good after it's gone as we think we're going to feel, especially if it's our second or third piece.

I heard Andrea Fella saying once how you can't rely on your mind. She said your mind will say, "Have another piece of cake. It's good for you. You'll be happy." So you have another piece, and then your mind goes, "I wouldn't have done that if I were you."

Delusion covers up these characteristics. We see permanence. We see beauty where there's not. We see satisfaction where there won't be. But the object we still see, and that's where we get confused. When the insights come and wisdom's there, those scales drop off.

So seeing how wanting, how craving, limits the mind, limits the perception, narrows our field, and leads us to all kinds of actions based on misperception...

The Buddha said that greed, hatred, and delusion—we're talking here about the taṇhā, the craving—may be understood as a maker of measurement in that it imposes limitations upon the range and depth of the mind, of the citta. It narrows everything into this object and what we want.

Let me give you a story as an example. A friend today was asking for one of my "top ten" old moldy stories. This isn't one of those, but it's of the same vintage—one I normally would have retired by now, but it really fits here. It fits perfectly for seeing how craving distorts, how it limits, how it gets us involved in all kinds of activities based on wanting.

This may have been thirty years ago. I was teaching in Yucca Valley in the desert of Southern California with friends. We used to teach there every year; I really liked it there. One afternoon during what was then a three-week retreat, it was quite hot. Another friend who was teaching with me and I were sitting and talking, and someone had come to visit us—I have no memory who, but someone from outside, not one of the meditators. We were sitting, having a perfectly friendly, nice conversation.

At one point, this person mentioned they had just driven through Joshua Tree, a nearby town, and there was a new little restaurant. They'd had a milkshake there, and it was really incredibly good.

My friend and I were sitting there. We didn't say anything. We just looked at each other. We knew we had about an hour before the next sitting. And without saying a word, both of us—our energy and interest in the conversation with this third person—ended. Really ended. Without being completely rude, we ended the conversation and ran to the car, heading to Joshua Tree.

As I remember, we got there—it was only five minutes or so—at about five past three, and the place had closed at three.

So we're like, ugh.

But this is where craving really takes over. It had already taken over; it had already narrowed everything. What had been a perfectly pleasant, peaceful afternoon became driven by a goal.

Notice this—this is one of the things I notice about craving: it feels enlivening. It feels really natural. "Oh, great, I have a mission!" Have you noticed that? "Now I have a mission." Well, sometimes the mission is compassion, but a lot of times it's just greed.

You're having a quiet afternoon at home. "Oh, I could go to the store and buy that thing. Oh good, I've got something to do." Notice that. Or notice when you're just sitting and it's all peaceful, and then: "Let me check the tennis scores." There's not even a tennis match happening that you care about, but let me just check. Just for something to do. Something to want. It gives a feeling of being alive. This is one of the seductions.

So that was already going on. Anyway, the place was closed. So we said, "Well, let's turn around and drive past the center and back into Yucca Valley. Maybe there's something there."

We had both been coming here for many years. We knew very well there was nothing there. We knew, but still. So we're driving. I was driving. He was looking. As we get into Yucca Valley, and our time's getting short because we have to be back for a sitting, he looks over and goes, "Oh, great, yogurt cafe. Go over there. Go over there." And I looked. Where? He pointed. It said "Urgent Care."

This is a true story. You're laughing because you can recognize. This is what craving does.

Lungpho Dan, who was a Thai forest monk, a disciple of Ajahn Mun, gave a sweet re-interpretation of the Four Noble Truths. He says, "The mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering"—the Second Noble Truth. "The result that comes from the mind going out in order to satisfy its moods is dukkha"—the First Noble Truth. The mind going out to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering. The result that comes from all the hoo-ha of running around to get your milkshake is the unreliable, the dukkha. "The mind seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of dukkha"—the Fourth Truth. "The result of the mind seeing the mind clearly is the cessation of suffering"—the Third Truth.

That's what we're doing here with our practice: seeing the body and the mind clearly, moment after moment. And in a lot of moments, there's beauty—the wholesome states, the seven factors of awakening, and so forth. In a lot of other moments, there's craving or aversion. The moment of mindfulness that can lead to wisdom can meet them both equally, really being present. Because as we've said, mindfulness that isn't distorted by kilesa feeds the wholesome. Mindfulness that's really present with kilesa—present with the clinging, the wanting—but where the mindfulness itself isn't distorted by wanting, that's not feeding the craving. It's starving it.

That doesn't make it go away. And this is where we can get confused—we think mindfulness is the agent that dissolves. It's not. It's wisdom. It's wisdom that sees through the kilesas, that really stops feeding them their causes, and they dissolve. But steady mindfulness is the condition that allows wisdom to arise.

The Buddha spoke about these areas where cravings strengthen, and I want to go into this a little bit. He talks about four areas of clinging. There are these four types: clinging to sensual pleasures, which we've talked about a lot; clinging to views; clinging to rules and observances; and clinging to sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view. These are four really common moment-to-moment experiences that we get caught up in clinging to.

The first one, sense pleasures, I'm not going to talk about much because we've really mentioned it quite a bit under the hindrances. But even though we're quite aware of how seductive the movement into clinging to pleasant sense experience can be, we still can sometimes not recognize when that's happening. We don't quite see, as I was saying before, how we can fall into that kind of unaware taking refuge in sense pleasure for happiness, for ease, for peace.

When we talk about renouncing, we often talk about renouncing the pleasant sense objects. And that's certainly a path of simplifying, so there's less things to want. We may be able to notice—I'm saying wanting. I should be saying thirst, or craving.

Notice it more. But again, it's about what's going on in the heart-mind.

Tejaniya—I just remembered something funny. Someone was saying to him, "Oh, after you became a monk, after you had lived a full life, such a renunciation, living so simply." And he won't put up with that kind of romanticizing. He just said, "Hey, you can be a monk or a nun, and maybe there's only two or three things that you're able to want, but you can have the same degree of clinging to just those two or three things as you had to everything else in your life." You can get rid of the objects, but if you don't look at the clinging, it can still be going on. Or you can get rid of the objects and just sit there wanting what you don't have.

So turning around and looking, renouncing the desire, the attachment that keeps one bound to samsara—that's what it's about. That's where the freedom comes in.

In terms of exploring craving and how it works, Bhikkhu Bodhi—well, the Buddha talks about this, but Bhikkhu Bodhi describes it as three movements in the unfolding process of insight around craving. It applies to everything, but we'll start with sense desires. It's the gratification, the danger, and the escape—three unfolding aspects of exploration, of wisdom, really bringing sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom, to the experience.

Next time you notice some real wanting coming up about any sense desire, explore this. And it could be as simple as wanting to look at somebody. I mean, really simple. That's a sense desire—seeing. Have you had that experience where someone's walking past and you just want to look so badly? You can't stand not to look. Have you had that experience? Sometimes you really can't not look. And then you look. And did that make you happy?

My guess, based on some extensive experience, is that more often than not it led into māna, conceit. "Oh, that one—they're better than me." Or "Oh, that one, look at them. Oh no, I'm doing much better than I thought." Or we just say, "Oh, look at that. They had nice socks." And then, "Oh, look at the bees! Look at the bees."

It's rare that you look and go, "Oh yes, craving... yes, pleasant... yes—it's gone, gone."

So that's a little side effect. But noticing the gratification—in that seeing there wasn't so much gratification. So maybe pick something where there is some gratification, because there is. Of course we appreciate the beautiful. We've talked about this before, so I'm not going to beat it to death, but we're aware of that. And I love that the Buddha recognized this. Of course there's gratification. Of course there's sense pleasure, or we wouldn't crave it. We wouldn't get attached. He's very clear about it.

And the danger—of course, we've talked about that too. The danger being the impermanent, unreliable aspect. That's one danger, the danger he talks about. You can't count on it.

I'm adding another danger. Not exactly danger, but it's really delusion—that when we're in the thrall of clinging, we don't recognize the natural peace and ease of mind and heart. We can't. The clinging is what blocks it. We're clinging, we're wanting because we want to be happy, and the clinging itself is blocking it. Recognizing that—that's really the poignant nature of clinging.

So I'm putting that under danger. It keeps us looking in the wrong direction for the peace and ease that's available when we're really awake and aware and present and just fully here in the moment.

Why are there moments when there's a sense—you're just mindful, you're just walking, nothing special, and it's not like a big neon sign going off—but it's just so... fulfilling isn't even the right word, but I think you know it. It's just so nice. What is it? It's the heart-mind that's really present and not clinging and not aversive and not needing anything else to make this moment complete.

That's available anytime there's wisdom and awareness in the mind and we're not lost in clinging. Clinging can be an object that mindfulness wisdom recognizes, the same as recognizing a foot lifting.

It's possible. So I'm saying this so you don't become afraid of or aversive to recognizing clinging or aversion. Just recognizing it—the mind that's clearly recognizing in that moment of mindfulness—the mindfulness itself isn't clinging. It's recognizing. When it is clinging, that's when we're all caught up and we don't know.

So the gratification, the danger, and the escape. But back to the danger—another danger. There's a really addictive quality. Delusory, but also addictive. It reminds me of the way certain things work. My brother used to have a hound dog. It was just a pet, but hound dogs are a certain kind of dog that's really bred for hunting. Of course, this poor dog lived in downtown Atlanta. It didn't get to hunt. But its nose, its sense of scent, was so highly developed that when he let it out in the backyard, it would just be running around the border with its nose to the ground, smelling everything that any animal had left there, completely driven. And in the house too—if anyone new came in, or if they left any piece of food or any kind of dirty clothes anywhere he could get into, his nose would just take him right there. And you could see it wasn't like he was a bad dog. It was just that pulling, that pulling of the nose. It just ruled him.

And it feels like that to me with wanting. Yes, what could I want? What's the next thing? What could I want? It keeps us leaning into samsara. I think maybe someone has said there's a Tibetan description of samsara as the urge to correct something. Let's just get it a little better, a little better, a little better—and that's endless. A little better, a little better. Well, this is good, but if you just did that, it could be a little better. And we keep believing it, even when we know. We keep believing it.

So another little story. I was talking with a very wise friend who's well aware of everything I'm saying and more. This person has a habit of having a couple of cookies every day after lunch—certain kinds of cookies, only certain kinds. Of course, we all like what we like. And we were joking around about clinging. He said, "It's not clinging. There's no suffering in that. There's no danger in that." And I said, "Well, what about when you don't get a cookie?" He goes, "Oh, I'll always get a cookie."

That's what we think. I don't have to look at it too closely because it's all going to come around. I can always get another one.

The escape? The escape isn't getting rid of all the cookies in the world. The escape is the steady mindfulness that allows for the clear seeing of what's going on—having to have that cookie. If there's a day I get up and I can just feel that wanting, the driven quality of needing the cookie, and there's no cookie, and I can just be with it—steady mindfulness, mindfulness, mindfulness—at some point the wisdom can arise: Oh, look at that. The suffering is the wanting. It's not not having the cookie. It's the wanting.

And at that point, the escape is really when that wisdom just dissolves the wanting. The wanting dissolves, not as an act of will. I can refrain from eating the cookie as an act of will. But I can't make the clinging to it, the idea of it, go away as an act of will. By really tuning into the wanting—feel it, be with it, watch it—often, often it dissolves from the wisdom. Oh, that doesn't make sense. And either the wanting dissolves or it stops arising, because it doesn't make sense in the light of wisdom.

And this is a huge relief. It's really something we can trust because it doesn't mean you have to be incredibly on top of everything, figuring it all out. You just have to keep being mindful morning, noon, and night, really interested in everything that's coming up—the beautiful and the difficult. Reality reveals itself. This is the escape: the dissolution or the putting down of the clinging.

So the next time you notice you're caught in wanting—not just a passing moment that came and went, but you're really caught in it—like wanting to look at somebody or something that's not huge, not the biggest thing in your life, but some little one that comes up here. I heard several people today, I must say, discussing where they like to sit at lunch. And it sounded like they all like to sit in the same place. I'm hoping that's not true, but that's how it sounded.

Okay, that's a good place to just look at the clinging. If it's coming up—it may not, but when it is—or you're walking and you want to look, or go have tea, anything like that where you can really feel the thirst arising, the wanting, the world narrowing. Instead of just the walking, it's all about the milkshake. It's all about the tea. It's all about that place at the picnic table.

So just stand there or sit there with awareness, gentle awareness, and let the wanting do its thing. Let it run itself out. See how it feels in the body. See how it acts in the mind. See what goes on. See if you're going to die from it. Probably not.

And at some point, I promise, at some point—whether wisdom comes in or not—it will go away. It might come back again, but it will go away because everything goes away. Keep paying attention. Turn back and see. Stay with it until it's gone, and then notice what's happening in the mind and heart. Unless another wanting arose in a split second, if there's some space, some quiet, you might notice the peace. The ease, the peace that comes when the mind and heart is awake and present and free from clinging.

Ah, this is the peace we wanted in the first place. All this hoo-ha—we think it's making us happy, but it's just trying to get rid of the wanting. And here that peace is available twenty-four seven.

So it's really worth exploring, turning around. The peace is right here.

The Buddha, talking to some nuns, praising one for her mindfulness, said: "Her mind remains firmly established in mindfulness, and thus her mind is unbounded. She knows in truth that liberation of the heart, that liberation by wisdom."

So even just for a moment—maybe it's not completely unbounded—but notice the difference between that tunnel vision on looking at something, or the seat, or whatever it is, and the peace of presence without any reference point. Unbounded because there's no reference point of anything, of me and other. It's just thisness, wakefulness. Just notice that.

Anandamayi Ma—she was from a different tradition, an Indian saint—she was laughing once when people were saying, "Oh, you're such a great renunciate." She said, using different language of course: "It's you who are the renunciates, renouncing the great joy of divine presence."

Yes, I'll pick wanting over the great joy of divine presence any day. And we do, again and again and again.

Now, in terms of this exploring when wanting comes up, sure, there are times—plenty of them—when you're mindful and present, but the wanting is just so strong you can't not follow it. Have you seen that happen? And again, we're not talking about big harmful things—hopefully the precepts hold—but just minding your own business.

I remember years ago, someone was telling me they were walking past the food tables. I guess after breakfast or sometime, the meal was over and there was a bowl of fruit there. They weren't aware of really wanting the fruit. But as they walked by, their hand just shot out and grabbed an orange. "Whoa, that's not me! Bionic arm or something, nothing to do with me."

So sometimes it's like that. But other times we can see it clearly—that wanting to look, you know. You just can't bear it, so you look.

Okay, bring awareness along with you when that happens. Don't think, "Oh, I blew it, so why bother paying attention." No, bring awareness along with you. Still notice, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, notice how wanting does its job. Notice how craving is doing its job. Its job is to lead you by the nose like a hound dog. Notice what the effect is. Keep on paying attention.

Like when I was giving the example of looking—if you keep paying attention, you do it and... nothing. It becomes pretty obvious that it's not really very supportive of anything other than distractibility and more anxiety in the mind. Sooner or later, the penny drops, if there's steady attention. If there's not, if we stop paying attention when it's not going how we want, we don't get the chance to see. That's why steady attention and natural awareness reveals the truth.

All right. Well, talking about attachment to views and attachment to sakkāya-diṭṭhi—each of which is a whole dhamma talk. So I'm not going to go deeply into them. I'm just going to mention two lines about each.

Views—this is huge. Attachment to views. What do we mean? What does the Buddha mean by views? It's really thought. A thought of "this is how it is" and attachment to it. So he describes it as thinking, "This alone is true, everything else is false." Unfortunately, our views don't quite come that clearly stated—but that's how we feel. And of course we have views and opinions. It's not saying don't have them, same as it's not saying don't appreciate sense pleasures. It's the attachment that's the issue.

I don't think I have to go very far to illustrate how this plays out in the world—with politics, with property, with religion, with all kinds of views. The suffering, the anger, the hatred that comes from attachment to views.

I just want to briefly mention what we can explore here on retreat: attachment to views about how practice should be, how your practice should be. I'd be really surprised if there was someone here who didn't have some views like that. But often they hide from us. We're not really recognizing that we have a view. And you'll be in some feeling of dis-ease or discomfort, in struggle with what's going on. You come in and report to the interview teacher what's happening and how bad it is. And we're like, "Well, that's just what's happening. What's the problem?" But you feel it should be like this, it should be like that. That's a view.

The breath should be like this. How often I should be with the breath. Choiceless awareness is really the higher practice. Choiceless attention is for lazy people.

And really being with the breath is the appropriate practice. How it was in that last sitting—that was it. I finally got it. And now it's not happening, so it's all gone to hell.

But often these views aren't really... we don't quite recognize them, but we're actually in conflict because we're attached to them. A lot of the self-judgment that Jill spoke about can arise from something unpleasant that's happening, but often it arises from a view that there's attachment to—we really believe it's true without recognizing it. And sometimes they can be changing. You see through one: "Oh, I get it. That was just a view." And now I know how it is. I watch the mind do that all the time.

Once I was practicing in Burma and I was doing walking meditation. It was fine. Everything was fine. And I just started to notice a little dis-ease. Something not quite right. I stopped and said, "Okay, what's the thought in the background there?" I just got quiet and opened the awareness to see. And it came up. It comes up because: "Oh, it should be better." That was the view I was attached to. That's a hopeless one—"it should be better," whatever that means. And I was suffering from it because of the conflict with what was actually going on.

So I just want to mention this—to tune into views. There's perception, and immediately there's a thought about what that person's doing or what it means or what's happening, and right away there's a view and an attachment to it. You can see this is a huge topic, but I just want to bring it up to start tuning in. When you're feeling a sense of struggle with experience but you think you're present, just check: is there some idea that I'm really believing about how it's supposed to be in practice right now? Seeing it, bringing it into the light of day, the light of awareness, is really helpful.

Sakkāya diṭṭhi means personality view. And it's really—again, this is a huge talk, I'll only just mention—it's taking in a moment, because it arises and passes moment to moment like everything. In a moment, it's taking any aspect of experience—seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, sense experience, any of the mental factors—taking it as me or mine. It's really a grasping, a sense of craving, leaning into, and then grasping. Whether it's "my hearing," "my aversion," "my sensation," just the whole sense of me, all the thoughts that we have.

I think Jill talked about it a lot last night, describing ourselves. But thoughts can come and go and just be empty. When there's clinging to them—"Yeah, that's really true"—and you say, "I really am such an angry person," clinging to those thoughts and not noticing the others... that's sakkāya diṭṭhi.

I talked a little bit about that when I spoke about impermanence last week, about my friend who everyone was telling she's an aversive person. That's sakkāya diṭṭhi, yes. "Those aversive thoughts are who I am. That's me." Assuming that there's any kind of unchanging, steady-state entity here, rather than seeing that yes, there are arising thoughts and feelings and sensations, changing and arising and changing in every moment. So when she sat down and looked, that's what she saw—not a big ball of solid aversion, "this is who I am, unchanging."

Even the body. When you sit and feel sensations coming and going, coming and going... "this is my knee"—it's very different. Get a feeling for the difference when there's just thoughts coming and going, and suddenly it's like, "That memory when I was in Girl Scout camp—now that's me." And you get a whole sense of me and an idea through your whole life, but it's just a thought that's coming up now, and there's grasping at it. Sakkāya diṭṭhi. Coming and going.

This is incredibly brief for something that's very complex, but I'll just put it out. Explore it. Play with it. It's another thing to investigate when we're feeling stuck. And for us, a lot of time here, it will be with thoughts, with memories, with descriptions of ourselves. "I'm an angry person." "I can't meditate." Or "I should be more with the breath."

"Or I don't have any concentration." Or take your pick: "I'm hopeless"—all the stuff Jill was saying. Or, as I was saying to someone today, "I'm going to be the next Dalai Lama." That's the other side of it. "It's going so good. This is really how it's going to be." That's the same thing—sakkāya-diṭṭhi. It just doesn't matter what the story is. It's that grasping, the holding to it.

Watch. It's really fun to watch when you bring in mindfulness and wisdom and see it's a process arising and passing, and it isn't personal. As soon as we're clinging, it feels personal. "What do you mean it isn't personal? It's me, right?" But then watching the process come and go, how can that be me?

There's just a seeing, and it's pleasant or unpleasant. And there's a thought: "Look at how they're walking. They're walking so well, and I can't even put one foot in front of the other without getting lost in thought. And it's the third week. Why don't I just hang it up?" Notice that. What triggered it? Just seeing and unpleasant. Then you remember all the thoughts of how useless you've been in all these years of meditation and before, back to kindergarten, everything bad. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

And then you forget about it, right? Because you get lost in another thought. And then you wake up and, "Oh, it's so nice. I feel the grass. I feel the wetness, the breeze. I'm so present. It's so lovely. I'm so awake and aware. It's amazing. I am going to be the next Dalai Lama." Sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

And we're thinking it's the same me. Where's the same me there? It's changing completely—again and again and again. Really fun to explore. The me who needs that seat in the dining room where I can't possibly enjoy my lunch. The me that thinks, "If I just sit in this proper way and tilt my head like that and hold my hands like this, I'll have that great sitting like I had before." This is attachment to rites and rituals, by the way—how to make it be a certain way.

So I'm afraid I'm going to stop here because otherwise it will be too much time. But these areas of grasping, just explore them. I'm just dropping it into explorer mode.

I want to read one thing from the Buddha about clinging. "Agitation through clinging"—I love this:

"How, bhikkhus, is there agitation through clinging? Here, the uninstructed worldling"—that's the puthujjana—"who is unskilled and undisciplined in their Dhamma, regards form as self, or self as possessing form, or form as in self, or self as in form."

He gives those four ways of identification. That form of ours changes and alters, right? You're feeling good and then you get a headache. The form changes and alters.

With the change and alteration of form, her consciousness becomes preoccupied with the change of form. Agitation and a constellation of mental states born of preoccupation with the change of form remain obsessing her mind. Because her mind is obsessed, she is frightened, distressed, and anxious, and through clinging becomes agitated.

Can you relate to that at all? I hope so. We're doing this all the time.

Regarding feeling—vedanā—as self, perception as self, any volitional formation, any mental action as self, or consciousness, the knowing itself as self. And when any of those change and alter, when we're regarding it as a self, we become preoccupied with the change. Agitation and a whole constellation of mental states, born of preoccupation, remains obsessing the mind. And we get all involved in what's the change and how can we fix it.

Turn around and notice the clinging. Instead of getting into the whole story of what can I do—oh, clinging is like this. Clinging feels like this. And I find for myself, even just coming into "clinging feels like this" already, the peace of steady mindfulness and wisdom starts to be palpably available. Clinging is like this. You don't have to fix it. Just really be with it.

And just moment after moment, there's the opportunity to rediscover the nature of the non-deluded mind, to re-recognize, as Ajahn Amaro says, the peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body when it's not obscured by craving, clinging, confusion.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 76

Courage and Trust In Our Path

Carol Wilson · 57 min

> In this profound dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses a central paradox of Buddhist practice: how to maintain undaunted courage and total commitment to liberation while simultaneously cultivating absolute non-clinging. She explores what she calls "hitting the wall" moments—those times when practitioners feel shaken in their motivation, doubt their progress, or resist the unfamiliar territory that deep practice reveals.
>
> Drawing on teachings from Sayādaw U Paṇḍita, Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and Mingyur Rinpoche, Wilson examines how our views and expectations about awakening can become obstacles. She discusses the "cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi" (personality view) that limits what we believe possible, and Trungpa Rinpoche's concept of "nostalgia for saṃsāra"—our attachment to familiar patterns even when they cause suffering. The Buddha's teaching that "nothing whatsoever is to be clung to as me or mine" serves as both inspiration and challenge.
> Wilson emphasizes that the path requires a fundamental shift in motivation—from wanting awakening as an attainment to simply loving awareness itself, moment by moment. She illustrates this through a moving story of Master Sheng Yen, whose unwavering commitment to being a monk sustained him through ten years in the army. The talk concludes with the Buddha's teaching that "unshakable deliverance of mind" is the true goal of the holy life, reminding practitioners that if we cannot find truth right where we are, where else do we expect to find it?

When I was thinking about what I wanted to talk about tonight, I kept finding my mind going in two different directions. I wanted to talk about two things, but they're like opposites—complete opposites of each other. How could I put them together? Then when I was sitting this morning, I had a revelation: this is one of the many paradoxes of the Dhamma. They totally belong together; they just seemed like complete opposites to me.

What I want to talk about really is what I call undaunted courage—not fearing freedom, the sense of the vastness of the path and the totality of our commitment that's called up again and again and again. And this motivation that is called up is absolute non-clinging. How to have total commitment and motivation without any striving or clinging. That's the paradox, but that's our path. I'll share my thoughts, but basically you have to figure it out for yourself. This is one of those talks where I'm actually talking to myself as much as I'm sharing with you all.

We've talked about the Four Noble Truths, and really the fact that the path is vast, is profound. It encompasses every aspect of our life. There's nothing left out if we're really seriously taking this path to heart. When we talk about what the Buddha talked about—the third noble truth, the ending of suffering—one would think that is why we enter in and what inspires us to keep going on the path. But here's where it gets interesting: Is that really something that is an inspiration, a motivation for each of us?

It's talked about in different ways. I'm not going to give a whole talk on that, but sometimes it's described as the sense of the heart and mind completely freed from greed, hatred, and delusion. Or the deathless, the unconditioned. Or as the Buddha often said, the mind of non-clinging. Absolutely nothing is worth clinging to. Nothing can be clung to. "One who knows that nothing is to be clung to directly knows everything"—that's a quotation from a sutta.

So with this, does one's mind open to that as a possibility? Sayadaw U Pandita, who was a very strict teacher, very embedded in the Burmese Theravada modality of the scriptures and the commentaries—he used to talk about a moment of pure mindfulness, real presence of mind, free from kilesa, free from the torments of greed, hatred, and delusion. He would call a moment of mindfulness a moment of freedom. And then there's the idea that absolute freedom is the complete liberation of a heart and mind where greed, hatred, and delusion no longer arise. But even a moment of freedom from clinging, from greed, hatred, and delusion—a moment of mindfulness, a moment of freedom—this is something that's accessible to all of us.

What the Buddha was saying, really, in terms of the vastness of this path and what it calls out of us—it calls out commitment, it calls out everything. But at the same time, as Ajahn Buddhadasa was saying (he was a Thai forest monk who died in the late 1990s), in a talk he gave to Thai people that's now well known in the West because it was translated by Bhikkhu Santikaro, he speaks about Nibbāna for everyone. That's what he's really saying: Nibbāna is for everyone. That's what the Buddha said. "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so. But it is possible, so I ask you to do so." Nothing whatsoever is to be clung to as me or mine. It's like a clarion call.

We start out thinking, "Oh, be nice, maybe I'll get rid of some stress." And we find we're moving into a whole other depth and direction that we may not have had any idea of when we first started. I find this potential of cultivation of the heart-mind both deeply, deeply inspiring, really motivating, and also at times—depending on the mind state—extremely daunting, extremely challenging.

Freedom from clinging—yeah, I got that one down. We're headed that way. You know, you've been here just about a month now. You're getting adrift, right? It's not quite so straightforward, right?

So this actually really motivates and inspires me to think of the uncompromising way that the Buddha spoke and shared his awakening, and that this is possible for us. In this motivation, the Buddha never lost sight of two things in his practice: not to shrink away from the struggle, and not to rest contented merely with wholesome states of mind. So here we're in the "don't shrink back from the struggle." And the next I'll get to with absolute non-clinging.

Don't shrink from the struggle. This is the paradox.

What I find really interesting in my own practice, in my own life—because practice is our life, it's not just the retreat—and in talking to so many people over so many years, I see it again here. Four weeks into practice, you're all in different places. Each person's particular path is unique, even though the processes and the truth of things are the same. Each person's process is unique. But everybody is really in there, going through so much stuff.

From now on, you're probably getting a sense of the sine waves of practice. It's not that you're doing something wrong, that it keeps going up and down and up and down. People come in and say, "Well, what's going on?" And now people say, "Well, I don't know. I don't know what to say. What was happening yesterday—well, that's over. I don't know. Yesterday was incredible, but today it's horrible. I don't know what's going on." And I think, great. You're really here now. This is really dying into the practice. This is what's happening.

And so you can see, sometimes you're seeing a lot. There may be a lot of insight into particular personality patterns, difficult or suffering personality patterns. You may be noticing more and more wholesome states arising—the Brahma Viharas, mindfulness, concentration, wisdom. You may be seeing different aspects of the three characteristics. And it doesn't just come up in neon lights: "Now you're getting an insight into impermanence." It kind of slowly seeps in. Sometimes you get a hit, but it's kind of slowly seeping in. The fact that you start to notice you've had fifty-two emotions in the last three hours—"What's the matter with me?" Nothing. It's not you. This is impermanence. Just sit back and let it roll.

So sometimes we're really having a lot of insight. And we think, even if we try not to, back there we go, right—yeah, it's clicking. This is how it's supposed to be. And then, right, then either... "I understand impermanence now. I've got it. That's in the bag, right?" We all know this. "I don't have to go further with it."

The next day, a mental state comes up and you're like, "This is how I've been my whole life." Every memory that comes up is from that mental state. "This is how I'm going to be the rest of my life. It's completely hopeless." You come in, the teacher points it out, and you kind of nod and go, "Yeah." But you walk out and go, "What do they know? I know. This is how it is."

And then at some point we wonder, but what's the point? I'm going through all this. I see it so clearly. And all this stuff comes back, at least as strong as before, if not stronger. What am I doing here? What are they talking about? This doesn't make any sense. And I could be watching the baseball game.

A friend on staff was just saying, should I go to Joseph's group? Should I go to Carol's talk? Should I go home and watch the baseball game? I said, this could be your night to get enlightened. He said, you think I could get enlightened watching, rooting against the Yankees with aversion in my mind? Slim chances are slim.

This is a moment of our life. What we all have is sometimes you think, I'm going for the baseball game because what's the point anyway? I could sit on the cushion and watch aversion, or I could watch something enjoyable and feed aversion. Either way, you know.

Okay, I'm not advocating that. But we start to really see. It gets hard to trust. And this is just normal. Honestly, this is normal. This is how it is for all of us.

But what gets interesting to me, the piece I want to talk about, is the vastness, the uncompromising nature of our commitment—which of course you can't make a commitment and have it stay; it's coming and going all the time. Our understanding of what we're doing deepens as wisdom grows. Our motivation ebbs and flows, comes from different places. Aspiration may change.

So sometimes over periods of practice—and this is a good long chunk of four weeks—I want to talk a little bit about what I call times of hitting the wall. And I don't mean hitting the wall where it's just really difficult and hard to be with, as Jill was speaking about last night. No, that feels like hitting a wall, but you're still practicing with it. That's not what I mean. That's part of it. But there are times when, for different reasons, something happens and it may shake not just doubt as a hindrance, but it may shake your sense of motivation or sense of purpose. Sometimes people say, "Oh, if awakening includes this, maybe I didn't really want it," kind of thing. And it's poignant. It's just a passing thing.

But I want to highlight a few of these because I think it happens to most of us at some point, where you feel a little shaken. The kind of thing where you're just in a mind state, looking back over years of practice, and you think, I've been practicing for X number of years and this is what's going on. This hindrance is still taking over and I believe it. And it's not just that momentary, normal aversion, but somehow deeper in that moment.

I want to pinpoint a few of these because I think they're fascinating and important to recognize, to include as part of all of our practice. Because once we recognize, oh yeah, this happens, then we can look and see. It's a rare person who doesn't come up against this.

And much of this sense of shaking your motivation, shaking your commitment, the sense of "well, this can't be right"—a lot of it is due to whatever idea or view you might be holding in the background of your mind. Often not recognized: ideas about what's supposed to happen, or how practice is supposed to be, or what the trajectory should be. You all know how we do this. But it can be a really deeply held belief, and when it just isn't aligning with the actuality of our experience, it can breathe this sense of "well, this can't be right, I can't do it."

It's a rare person who doesn't experience this. There's a line from the Buddha where he's talking about sense of self, and he says, "But in whatever way they conceive, the fact is ever other than that." I want to say that about whatever ideas our mind and thoughts might have about what freedom and awakening are going to be like. In whatever way we conceive, the fact is ever other than that. This mind—what we know—we can't know what we don't know.

We can't imagine from this vantage point. Those of you who are older, in my age group, will remember Krishnamurti. Some younger people don't know who he was, but he was very well known in our day. His famous line was "freedom from the known." The known is an idea that we project—what awakening is like, what a mind of non-clinging means. All kinds of stuff gets projected. We want to know. We want a sense of where we're going. And we all talk about it, but really, at heart, we can't know. We simply can't know.

I want to give a few examples that came to mind. The first one I mentioned in a talk the other night—it's really obvious. When we have known how things have been, when we know how practice works, we don't recognize changing conditions and we take it personally. I mentioned in my talk on impermanence the story of Bhikkhu Assaji, who was ill and dying and really upset because he couldn't get concentrated anymore. And the Buddha's response was essentially, "Hey, conditions have changed. And anyway, awakening isn't about concentration." But that's something we can all relate to—taking it personally. It's sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, that we're putting on it. "I am not able to do this thing"—this thing being concentrated, or seeing through impermanence, or whatever it is. "This thing is what has to be happening for the path to develop toward freedom. And I can't do it, although I used to be able to. So clearly I've gone backwards. I'm failing." Not far from "what's the point, I can't do it." As Assaji was saying to the Buddha, "Let me not fall away." And there's a lot of suffering in that.

If we can see, "Oh yes, there's a view here, I'm comparing to impermanence"—fine, it's recognized and it's gone. But sometimes it goes deeper than that. There's this insidious sense: "I can't do this. I can't do this." Maybe I could before, or maybe it's something that's talked about or we've read about or heard about, and it hasn't occurred in our experience. And very deeply the sense can come in: "I can't do it." Again, this is sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view. It's like a cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the cage of personality view, where we're viewing it all through our personality and the ideas we have about this personality, this body and mind. We just think we know how it is. "It's like this, and obviously I can't do this. I've done everything to the best of my ability, and this is how it is. It's over."

But we don't even know. We don't even know what's possible. We don't even know what directions the practice might go, and we don't know what's possible in the experience of this mind and body.

I know in my first long retreat—I'm a person without a lot of energy, and many people think you need to sleep a certain amount. In daily life, maybe you do. But then something happens here. A lot of people have been saying they're waking up really early, filled with energy, and the mind goes, "Oh, but I need so much sleep." They go back to sleep and actually wake up feeling crappy—because you don't need it. And even if you do, who knows? We're in the cage. This is a simple example. There are things much grosser than this, and much subtler. We're in the cage of "this is what this mind and body can do, it can't do anything outside of that, so why even try?"

And then it can go further: "Well, don't push outside your comfort zone." Sure, when you're really suffering and difficult stuff is coming up, the idea of pushing outside the comfort zone, colored with aversion, is not helpful. But when we're interested and there's energy and the practice is going along, and we think, "Oh, I'd better go to bed now because I might be tired tomorrow"—

No, you have no idea. You have no idea what's happening now. I can remember many times I'd think, "I've got to go to bed now, I'm falling asleep on my face," and I walk out into the dining room, and then my body just starts walking back and forth. I feel like the dhamma took over. My mind wants to go to bed, my body's going to do walking meditation. So the mind might as well come along with it.

And that's a simple example. But just not to die into the idea of "this is all that's possible." Look and see. I don't know. We don't know. We just don't know.

Don't be afraid of your own aspirations. When things aren't going well and you're running into one of these walls—"Well, I just can't do this. This is what concentration should be like"—for some reason, concentration is one of the bugaboos that people often get really caught on. We'll say, "But there's a lot of mindfulness." "I don't care. There's not concentration." "What about calm? There's investigation." "Anyone can investigate, but concentration proves it's going somewhere, right?" And there's nothing you can say to bust through that. If you just keep going, keep going, you'll see through it.

Don't be afraid of your own aspirations. Don't say, "Well, it can't happen for me. I'm just a nudnik and I'm doing my best. But I'll never experience freedom from clinging. The best I can do is shuffle through the retreat and maybe feel a little more at ease at the end and have some nice moments. But nothing's ever going to happen for me." The cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the cage of believing that—just see when it's like that. Who knows? Die into this moment. See what's happening.

So that's one kind of hitting a wall.

Another one is what I alluded to earlier: when we're starting to see painful, suffering habits of our mind. Maybe personality habits that we're starting to see—self-hatred, for example, or any personality habit, greed. Or dhamma habits of clinging. And we really have time where we're seeing it coming up with interest, really experiencing the deluded nature and the suffering aspect of it. And you think, "Wow, that's so interesting. I really see." Whether it's the personal pattern or the clinging pattern, you really get it.

And then it keeps on coming, more and more. And then, especially if it's a painful personality pattern, you not only experience it, you not only get angry and yell still, but you exquisitely experience the shame of it because you're much more aware through the whole process. And people have said, "What? This is making me more neurotic, this practice. I'm just more aware. I'm suffering."

It's a phase. It's not making you more neurotic. But you think, "This isn't how it's supposed to work." And it can shake our faith if you let yourself keep believing that.

Sayadaw U Pandita used to talk about "don't stop within." Don't stop within. One aspect of that is not being satisfied merely with wholesome states of mind. It's something we can experience when there are really beautiful, wholesome states—whether of collectedness or joy or mindfulness or interest or calm. Of course, the habit of mind is going to cling some. I'm not talking about that. I don't call that stopping within.

We just watch that. That's exploring how clinging works and how it kind of freezes things.

But sometimes it can be quite a profound experience—deep equanimity, not just some moments on retreat, but in your life. I'm not just talking about retreat here. You come out and you feel, for me, for example, much more equanimous, more balanced, much more at ease and open and flowing with things. And I can see this part of the mind goes, "Well, that is good enough."

Sometimes we can see for ourselves—and this just requires a lot of honesty as we go through our life of practice—how as we begin practice, most of us just want to get rid of some suffering. That's normal, and that's all we know. So the motivation will deepen and widen as our understanding deepens and widens. And sometimes you might really see, and it takes honesty—no one else has to ever know. You just look for yourself. You say, "Oh, actually, really my motivation was just to get more comfortable." But now I am more comfortable. Sometimes people feel a sense of the urgency or the motivation kind of going out. Okay, you can cruise. This is good enough.

But when you really have the Dhamma bugging you and the wisdom is growing, that won't do it for long because nothing stays. That sense of balance—you still have more, but it'll come and go. The wisdom will keep waking us up, will keep looking, will reassess, will reconnect with our motivation and really find that sense of looking. Yes, do I truly trust that at moments it's possible to free the heart and mind from clinging? Is that a possibility? Do I think it's just a lot of hogwash, or do I really believe this? Find the way to motivate ourselves again in whatever way. Don't just stop within in that way.

Another thing that I found really interesting in myself, frequently on long retreats particularly: as your practice is deepening, the sense of clinging is so strong, seeing a lot of habits of personality view, and they're getting shaken up. And sometimes there's a resistance, a fear—this is the best I can put it, maybe different for you—at losing a sense of myself, a sense of some kind of identification with a particular personality or how I feel about myself. It's hard to really put it in words because when I lay out my personality, I think, "Well, am I attached to that?" But there's something that can come, a sense of... it's working too well.

And sometimes the mind starts throwing out ideas of how liberation might be, though we really can't know. But if liberation from clinging means I don't love my family anymore? If liberation from clinging means I don't care about my grandkids, or I can't enjoy music, or I can't tell the taste of good food from bad food, or I just won't bother—whatever our mind makes up—everything's just going to be a dull gray blob and I don't care about anything. Is that what we're talking about? That's not too enticing, right?

So our mind makes something up and it can create this sense of shaking. If I'm not going to care about engagement with the world, I don't want to do it. Notice when that comes for you. See what it is and don't believe the thought, because the mind can't know.

I did notice one point on a retreat when I was in Burma. I was really in there, but I saw how the mind was really happy to give up all the unpleasant aspects of my personality and things of life. But it wanted to somehow hold on to the pleasant ones. No, I can still get to have all this stuff! Remember what I was saying about craving, tanha—it's not about the objects. It's about the quality in the heart, in the mind. "No, if freedom from clinging means I can't have music, I'm not going there." And again, we've missed the picture.

But it's interesting just to see how our heart can come up against these kind of walls. And for a while, we bounce back and go, "Uh-uh, no thanks, not me."

Trungpa Rinpoche calls it—I think someone mentioned this—nostalgia for samsara. Even though there's so much clearly unnecessary suffering in the reactive formations of my personality, the way I react to things when there's wanting, when there's identification, when there's fear, there's still some kind of comfort. Comfort with just feeling comfortable with the way we're used to being with ourselves in body, in mind. That's what I call a comfort zone. It feels a bit like putting on an old, tatty, dirty bathrobe that you've been wearing for forty years. You just love it and put it on. It looks like crap, but you just don't want to get rid of it. Nostalgia for samsara. In the cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the mind creating moment to moment.

So just moments of moving out of the familiar—it's uncomfortable. The mind likes to be familiar. I've felt in myself at times, more noticeable in deep retreat but it can happen in life too, that it feels like a series of small deaths.

A death of—I couldn't even say to what—but it feels like a death to some aspect of belief, of my personality, or some way I'm so familiar with being. I'm really familiar with being this cranky person. Who would I be if I was friendly to people? That's exaggerated, but it just feels familiar. We just want to hunker down there. And the practice is calling us actually to open into the unfamiliar, into the unknown, every single moment.

Nibbāna for everyone.

It's a rare person who doesn't come up against some of these challenges or many others. These are just the ones that came to my mind. It's challenging. It's demanding for everyone. No part left unexamined in terms of all aspects of our life.

But these times when we're butting up against the discomfort, moving out of the comfort zone of body or mind, or just saying, "No, this isn't familiar, this can't be right, I don't know where this is going"—those are really, on retreat here, the valuable, juicy moments. Not to get something, just to open into, to practice stretching our trust, our motivation, our commitment.

Commitment to what? Not to any result. And this is the paradox. We're totally motivated, committed to awakening from suffering. Yet any idea of what that should be like and leaning into it is striving. So what do we commit to? What's the motivation?

Freedom from clinging is absolutely uncompromising. So what's required—this is how I think of it—what's required is moment-to-moment total commitment to open fully into the unknown of this moment right now. This moment right now is all there is. And the complete willingness to trust, to open into it with awareness, is the commitment that's called forth from us again and again.

It shakes us up. Awakening shakes us up, shakes up our views of the world. Enlightenment doesn't confirm us, gratify our sense of self, make us feel all comfortable and nice and secure. You know the feeling of how nice it'll be when I'm enlightened? Guess what? Guess what isn't around for that? The sense of "me" is what gets seen through.

You don't have to get rid of it. It's just seen through as a construction that arises and passes moment to moment. Another sankhāra, another mental construction. It's seen through.

And so all of our views, beliefs, attachments, ideas, strategies of self-interest—they're all going to be challenged. And a lot of the holding and a lot of the discomfort we feel, often subtle and unconscious, is around that. Just some subtle sense of who I am and what I want is being challenged. But we can't think our way into this. Don't even think about it. Our support is simply moment-to-moment awareness.

I'll read this from Ajahn Sumedho:

"As one begins to realize or to recognize non-grasping as the way, then emotionally one can feel quite frightened by it. It can seem like a kind of annihilation is taking place. All that I think I am in the world, all that I regard as stable and real starts falling apart and it can be frightening. But if we have the faith"—and faith I say as confidence—"the willingness to continue being aware, to continue bearing with these emotional reactions, and with awareness allow things that arise to cease"—I just want to say, as if we could stop that—"to appear and disappear according to their nature, then we find stability not in achievement or attaining, but in being. Being awake, being aware."

So the way my mind works, what really is the again and again motivation—I don't say total motivation, but it's just called up from us again and again and again—is this willingness to trust and surrender into this moment, awareness of just what's happening. How do we continue to discover the courage, the wisdom, the humility to do that?

It's really a shift of motivation. Not the motivation to awaken, but a shift away from our habitual, worldly way of doing anything—to lean in, imagine, try and get there, try and make it happen—all the stuff that turns into striving. It may begin as some vega, as real urgency, a lot of energy. You bring it to practice, you know how—

As practice goes on, you can come and be really present at the beginning, putting in a lot of energy that's balanced, and then somehow it gets all screwy and striving comes in. Have you noticed that? There can be enormous commitment and energy without the striving, but just given the habits of our mind, sooner or later we start leaning into some idea or some experience, and the striving comes in.

So the motivation, for me—and again, this is my personal way of thinking about it—shifts from attaining to what Ajahn Sumedho says: to being aware, to being awake. When? Only right now, in this moment. It's all in the motivation. It kind of shifts from wanting awakening to just loving awareness—not in order for anything else, but just because that's life in this moment.

I'm going to read a couple of different voices about this. This is Ajahn Sumedho again. He said, "We have an ideal in our mind of how reality should be, but that's not how it is." I heard this on a talk, and he was laughing as he was saying this—the ideal versus the reality. "Life is fair and unfair. There's pain and pleasure, success and failure. It just keeps going like this. With steady awareness, we begin to recognize the nature of conditioned phenomena—conditions continually arising and ceasing in consciousness. When with awareness we recognize this, we start to awaken out of confusion and delusion to the real. We recognize the real." And he says, "Awareness is not a state, not something we get behind and observe. It's a recognition. It's a verb." And then he says, "Because the real isn't what you're expecting, I tell you." And he starts laughing.

Now from Andrew Olendzki, who used to be the director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies: "As sati grows, as mindfulness grows, our attention, our mental capacity, gradually shifts from the objects of attention to the process of being aware. This involves an attitude of letting go, of not holding on so much to the object, abandoning attachment to it. The mind is a dynamic process. When the mind is stuck on what has arisen, it is rigid and limited. But the mind that is letting go moment after moment keeps opening to the emerging flow." Just opening into the moment. Opening into the moment.

Now Mingyur Rinpoche: "We give attention to the object of meditation to support the recognition of awareness. The target is not the object. Awareness is what's being cultivated." Remember, we've talked about this when we talk about choiceless attention. It's the steady attention, the steady awareness that we're cultivating, not the object. And if you're doing metta or samadhi practice, even though the object is ostensibly steady, it's really the steadiness of awareness that we're cultivating on the one object.

Back to Mingyur: "We recognize the quality of the mind, not just the phenomena perceived by the mind." So we've said that there's whatever's arising in the knowing of it. We begin to recognize more and more the knowing, the quality in the mind. Mingyur continues: "Discovering our own awareness allows us to access the natural steadiness and clarity of the mind, which is independent of the conditions and circumstances and independent of our emotions and moods. Awareness does not increase or decrease whether we are happy or sad. We don't attain awareness; rather, we learn to recognize it." The same thing Ajahn Sumedho just said. "And again, as we cultivate a sustained recognition of awareness, we start to recognize that awareness itself is inherently calm, no matter how turbulent the mind. This allows us to discover a sense of peace and stability that is not dependent on the presence or absence of pleasant or unpleasant feelings."

So you get a sense of this—just opening, exploring, exploring this awareness of what? Of whatever's arising in this moment. And for me, it's really helped. I'm not being aware of this pain so it gets better. I'm not being aware of this pain to get more concentrated. I'm being aware because this is what's occurring now.

And when you're really focused on the object, you don't notice the mindfulness, the awareness. But the more and more we really begin to trust—okay, awareness with whatever's occurring, whatever's occurring—then we start to recognize, as Ajahn Sumedho says, how conditions come and go. We start to get, at moments, just an intimation of this potential of ease and peace that is not dependent on what's occurring. But as soon as we're being aware so that we can feel that, it's moved again into wanting, leaning forward. And you can feel the difference.

So I just want to talk a little bit about this sense of really just loving awareness as awareness—not to get anywhere, just to surrender into the unknown of this moment, because that's all there is.

There's a story I've told often before, but it's been a very helpful image for me, even though it's about someone else and is, of course, complete projection of my mind. But it works anyway.

I was staying at Ramana Ashram, Ramana Maharshi Ashram in southern India at Arunachala, Tiruvannamalai. It's a big ashram, very well run, and there's a building that has in one part what's called his samadhi—different from how we use the term; it's the marble tomb. One of the things people do is circumambulate that. That's the practice. And in the other half of the room, separated by a small barrier, you can sit and do whatever you like.

Every evening, for half an hour before the meal is served, the people who live and work and run the ashram—the women and men—come and sit and do Vedic chanting. Many of the people staying there come and just listen.

So I was there one night listening to the chanting. And at other times, of course, I'd walk around the samadhi. It was really interesting to see and be part of all the different energies of the people walking around. Sometimes you could just feel the wanting—maybe more in the Westerners, because I could relate to wanting to really see what Ramana was talking about, wanting to really be free. Other people were prostrating with such devotion. Others were walking around talking with each other, not paying any attention at all. But it's this walking around the samadhi—it's the practice.

So they were doing the chanting this evening, led by the president of the ashram. The way meals work there, you sit in rows—I don't know how many people at one time, maybe a couple hundred. They're very clear about who belongs; they know if you're meant to be there. And when it's your day to leave, you couldn't get in to eat because they know you're not there anymore. It's amazing how they know who you are.

You line up sitting on the concrete floor in rows facing each other. For a plate, you have a banana leaf—no utensils. And the people who run the ashram, led by the president, come by with big pails and give you the food. He does this every night, the president. He comes and serves everybody the meal.

So they were doing the chanting, and now comes my projection. At the end, it finished, and he got up—just so simple. He got up and walked around the samadhi, and it just felt very simple and present. Then he went off to serve the meal.

To me, this is an example of the simplicity—the simplicity of awareness and presence. Not having to do some big showy thing, not needing some amazing, interesting experience that's worthy of awareness. You can see how much I've projected, but it's really helped me so much—this sense of the shift from wanting and needing awakening, the shift from wanting to understand, to just the simplicity of total awareness with what's happening now.

You get up, you walk around the samadhi, and you go serve the people there. Whatever's going on in your mind and heart, you take it with you. To me, that's like this shift from wanting something to simply loving awareness.

And whatever's occurring now is all we need to surrender into, to open into, to bring us back, to help us re-recognize awareness. You don't need anything else. Just opening into the unknown of what is.

It's radical, really. When you find yourself somehow in a struggle, when stuff isn't good enough, and you come to us, we just say, "Well, just look at continuity through the day." And you think, No. But just get up and brush your teeth and walk into the hall with full loving awareness of that.

Awareness doesn't care if it's aware of how the toothpaste feels on your teeth or if you're having some incredible, beautiful bliss experience. Awareness isn't better or worse depending on the object. And so the simplest, most simple activity—just completely surrender into it with awareness—brings us back to recognizing awareness.

Every aspect of our phenomenal life exhibits the three characteristics. They're not more or less present in something really painful or something really beautiful or something really mundane. Anywhere we can see.

So it's really this willingness to just open into what's happening now.

Whatever's coming up is the moment.

From Dogen Zenji: "Truth is not far away. It is ever present. It is not something to be attained since not one of your steps leads away from it. When you have thrown off your ideas about mind and body, original truth can fully appear. Zen is simply the expression of truth. Therefore longing and striving are not the true attitudes of Zen. If you cannot find the truth right where you are, where else do you expect to find it?"

I love that line. I tell it to myself so frequently. If you can't find it right where you are, where else do you expect to find it?

So nothing in our life is excluded. The path is lifelong and all-inclusive. And the total commitment is this surrendering into the unknown. Again and again, we don't get to have some "so that." If I do this, then this will happen. We keep renewing our commitment. We don't know how it's going to show up in our life—we can never know. But this sense of commitment, this sense of really being fully present with how it is, then the wisdom, the trust, the faith arises to help us see how in what is now we can keep opening to the truth. This is the real resolution, the determination, the depth of motivation that can come as we keep renewing and looking into this.

I want to tell you a story to give you an example of this resolve, this deep commitment—an awakening that can come not out of getting where you want to go, but from how you meet each moment and use each moment of a difficult life by surrendering into it and seeing what emerges.

Perhaps you've heard of Master Sheng Yen. He was a wonderful Chinese Chan master who died perhaps ten years ago. He had a very large following in Taiwan. I met him in Switzerland at a retreat, and then he had a place in upstate New York where I did another retreat. I only sat a couple of retreats with him, but I found him a wonderful being—really wonderful, with deep, deep understanding, very relational, very kind.

He was leading a retreat in Switzerland, and we didn't quite understand—he's like the Dalai Lama of Taiwan. He was hugely loved and had a gigantic following, and we had no clue. He came to teach in Switzerland, and there were just eighty of us. It was amazing he came to do it. He was just wonderful.

He wrote an autobiography called Footprints in the Snow. Let me give you a brief synopsis of his life, because when we met him, he was quite elderly.

He was born in mainland China in great poverty and became a monk at a young age. He wanted to be a monk, but being a monk didn't guarantee any kind of easy life at that time in China—this was probably the 1920s or so. He practiced deeply, but he suffered greatly. He was hungry often. Life was very, very hard.

Then the whole civil war came in China, lasting from around 1925 up until 1949, when Mao and the communists were finally about to win. Throughout all of that time, life was enormously difficult, but he remained truly devoted, committed to his life as a monk.

In 1949, when it became clear the communists were about to win, it was also obvious that being a Buddhist monk was no longer going to be possible—he might not even be allowed to live, let alone continue his practice. At that time, Chiang Kai-shek had gone to what was then Formosa, now Taiwan. Sheng Yen knew he had to get out and reach Taiwan, but there was no way.

He had no money. He had no way. And the only way he could get there was to join Chiang Kai-shek's army. Then they would take him to Taiwan.

So he joined the army. He'd been a monk for something like twenty-five years at this point. And he joined the army. They took him to Taiwan. But then he couldn't simply say, "Thank you very much, I think I'll go now. Nice of you." He was a monk, but he couldn't just get out of the army.

So he said, "I was in the army, but in my mind, I am a monk."

For ten years, he was in the army. But he said, "In my mind, I am a monk." And he never deviated from that. He did what he had to do. And he said that somehow, very fortunately, he was never put in a position where he had to kill people or do harm. You think perhaps karma takes care of such things.

He was essentially a vegetarian as part of his way of being a monk. Well, that was impossible in the army. But he would avoid eating meat as much as he could until he was almost starving. Then he would eat some meat. He lived like this for ten years with this deep resolve: I am a monk, no matter what.

At that time, nobody got out of the army. There weren't ways of getting out. But somehow—I won't go into all the details—he did happen to meet on a week off a Buddhist master who was living there, and he connected with him. And somehow he managed to get released from the army after those ten years.

Immediately he went into seven years of solitary retreat under the tutelage of that master. And he said that even later in his life, he always did many prostrations because that was one way of really purifying his mind and body of all the unwholesome actions he felt he had to perform while in the army.

But he was the most beautiful, deeply realized being.

So externally, it is what it is. But his commitment—I am a monk—and then being fully present, not resistant, but fully present with the situation as it presents itself. How do we surrender with awareness into this and see what presents itself? It really inspires me.

I'll end with two things, one from the Dalai Lama and one from the Buddha.

From the Buddha: "This holy life, bhikkhus, does not have gain, honor, and renown for its benefit, or the attainment of virtue for its benefit, or the attainment of concentration for its benefit, or knowledge and vision for its benefit. But it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end."

This unshakable deliverance of mind. Don't settle for anything less—without striving, with total trust. If you can't find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?

And the Dalai Lama, speaking to some Western nuns and monks: "One day you will become bodhisattvas in reality. So whatever obstacles there are, however long it takes, do not be discouraged."

And it always just comes down to loving awareness in this moment. We can always do that.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 77

Stories of Early Nuns and Modern Women Teachers

Carol Wilson · 1h02

In this engaging talk, Carol Wilson weaves together stories of remarkable women practitioners across twenty-five centuries, beginning with Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, the Buddha's aunt who persistently advocated for the establishment of the bhikkhunī saṅgha. Through the Therīgāthā—the collection of enlightened nuns' poems in the Pāli Canon—we meet Dhammadinnā, renowned for her Dhamma teaching and featured in the Cūḷavedalla Sutta (MN 44), and Paṭācārā, who found liberation after devastating loss.

These ancient stories find contemporary parallels in modern women teachers: Venerable Dhammanandā Bhikkhunī, the first fully ordained Theravāda bhikkhunī in Thailand, who continues working to revive the fourfold saṅgha; Upāsikā Kee Nanayon, the foremost Thai woman Dhamma teacher of the 20th century who lived as an eight-precept laywoman; Dipa Ma, who transformed from grief-stricken illness to radiant awakening; and Daw U Zana, a Burmese teacher dedicated to practice and educating young women.

The talk illuminates how awakening transcends gender, class, and circumstance—from queens to prostitutes, from the privileged to the enslaved. Wilson emphasizes that the path requires faith, determination, and persistence, qualities demonstrated by each of these women. Their poems and teachings remind us that liberation is available to all who "put forth effort, self-controlled, always with strong resolution."

So I thought tonight, a little bit of story time.

I want to talk about a few of the nuns, the enlightened nuns from the time of the Buddha that we know about because of the Therigatha, which is in the Pali Canon—a book of the enlightened nuns' poems. I want to tell the story of two or three of them, and then tell the stories of a few more modern women teachers whose lives remind me of these ancient women. Some are dead, some I know. I find it inspiring to share these, and fun as well, because mostly we only hear about the monks and the men, since they write the history.

Before I say anything much about the nuns from the time of the Buddha, it's important to know that it was quite a while after the Buddha started his sangha of monks before there were nuns. It was just monks for a long time. Many of you are familiar with this story, so I'll tell it without too much detail.

The woman who is really responsible for getting the Buddha to finally agree to begin an order of nuns was Mahapajapati Gotami, who was actually his aunt, but who raised him. When the Buddha was a week old, his mother died, and her sister took in the Buddha-to-be and raised him. Both sisters were married to King Suddhodana, so the big family could stay together easily.

She was both his stepmother and his aunt. After the Buddha left and became awakened, at some point he came back to his family. His father, his son Rahula, his aunt Mahapajapati Gotami, and other cousins all became deeply interested, became disciples, and came to some degree of wisdom and understanding.

As time went on, King Suddhodana died. Even among these high-class people, the culture was set up so that a woman's identity was mainly derived from either her husband, her son, or her father—by the male she was connected to. So her husband had died, and her sons had gone off with her nephew to be monks. There were many other women in this situation as well. That was one thing. Also, of course, she was very inspired by the Dhamma.

Then another thing happened. There was a big dispute coming to war about water rights between two clans: the Sakyan clan, which was the Buddha Gautama's father's clan, and the Koliyan clan, which happened to be Pajapati Gotami's clan. These two clans got into a big fight about water rights—even back then, what we're coming to now. Many men were killed. Someone went to get the Buddha to come help resolve this, as he was part of both clans. It's said that he came and gave such an inspiring discourse that many more men went off with him and ordained.

So now all these men were going off and ordaining. Pajapati Gotami was left somewhat alone, as were many other women. Both because of her natural personality as a leader and her position, they would turn to her. Together, they all decided that they too wanted to follow the holy life as renunciates.

So they went to the Buddha where he happened to be at the time. From her story, you can see the power of faith, the energy it takes, the courage, the persistence, the determination. We know this is required of all of us, but for women at this time in particular, it took much more determination.

She went to the Buddha and asked him, saying, "It would be good, Lord, if women could be allowed to renounce their homes and enter into the homeless state under the Dhamma and discipline of the Tathagata."

He said, "Enough, Gotami. Don't set your heart on women being allowed to do this."

She asked the requisite three times. Usually at the end of the third time, if he was going to agree, he did. But he didn't agree. He said no, and he didn't really explain why. We don't really know why even today.

After some time, he left with his monks and set out for another town, Vesali. But she didn't give up. Pajapati cut off her hair, and with five hundred women—which just means a lot; as Andy Olendzki, the director of the study center, says, when the texts say five hundred were enlightened, it just means many—they all set off together, walking barefoot as the Buddha and the monks would have been doing, and went to Vesali.

I don't know how far that was. It sounds far.

When they got there, they went to the grove where he was staying. And it's said that she and the women stood outside the sala where the Buddha was, with swollen feet and all dusty from walking all those miles. She stood outside the hall there, weeping.

And here Ananda comes in. I don't know if you remember I mentioned Ananda. He's always the kind of intermediary—he was the Buddha's attendant. But instead of being like some gurus' attendants who sort of keep everybody out and control the inner circle for the special people, Ananda was just the reverse. Whatever it was, he would try to get people to come and hear the Dhamma. It's beautiful, really.

So he came, and Ananda was also the Buddha's cousin, so he was related to Mahapajapati as well. He came and said, "Why are you crying?" And she told him.

So he said, okay. And he went in and talked to the Buddha. First he simply said, "She's standing outside on the porch, her feet are swollen, covered with dust, crying because you do not permit women to renounce. It would be good if women were to have permission."

The Buddha said the same thing—"Enough, Ananda"—three times.

So then Ananda also, with faith, determination, perseverance, and great devotion, said, "Okay, let me ask it another way." And this is what I love. He says, "Are women able, Lord, when they have entered into homelessness, to realize the fruits of stream entry, once-returner, non-returning, and arahantship?"

He said, "Yes, Ananda, they are able."

This is exactly what goes through all the teachings. There's no difference between gender or class or how one lives as to the potential for awakening. It's for all of us.

So he said yes. And then Ananda says, "Well, since that's possible, and since Pajapati was of great service to you—she was your aunt, your nurse, your foster mother. When your mother died, she even suckled you at her own breast—it would be good if women could be allowed to enter into homelessness."

So he goes, "Okay. Okay, Ananda. Okay."

And then he made eight special rules that women have to follow. So in some way there was a difference. And there are other kinds of rules. But basically, in terms of practice and awakening, the bhikkhunis were on an equal level with the bhikkhus.

So the eight special rules—we really don't know. I really don't know how much of that's cultural, how much of it was him trying not to shock the lay people, because at that time there weren't equal nuns in other systems. I really don't know. I'm not trying to explain it.

But anyway, she was absolutely the one who, through her faith and determination and just love of the Dhamma and awakening, persuaded the Buddha to establish a community of nuns. And so she, of course, became one of the first teachers. Many, many women followed her because of her position, and the community of nuns grew and grew and became very stable.

So I just want to read her poem as it's translated by Andy Olenski, who was for many years the director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies. Not all of it—I'll read some of it.

"Praise to Buddha, you foremost among all beings. You who have released me from pain and so many other folk too. All suffering has been understood. The source of craving has withered. Cessation has been touched by me on the eightfold noble path. I have been mother and son before, and father, brother, grandmother too. Not understanding what was real, I flowed on without finding peace."

But now I've seen the Blessed One. This is my last compounded form. The onflowing of birth has expired. There's no more re-becoming now. See the gathering of followers, putting forth effort, self-controlled, always with strong resolution. This is how to honor the Buddhas.

So that's you. She's talking to the nuns there, really, but that's you—the gathering of followers, putting forth effort, self-controlled, with strong resolution. This is how to honor the Buddhas. And Buddha really means the awakened heart, the awakened mind. We just have to honor that.

So, Mahapajapati Gotami.

As the Bhikkhuni Sangha grew, it really showed—as with the Bhikkhu Sangha—that in terms of societal structure, Buddhism was quite radical in many ways. Once a woman entered the order, and it was the same for bhikkhus, any element of society was welcome. Once you became part of the Sangha, the only ranking was seniority based on when you joined. There were consorts to kings, queens, middle-class women, really poor women, prostitutes, wealthy courtesans, beggars, the young, the very old, some who were utterly miserable when they became nuns, some who were filled with faith—the whole range, even those who had been enslaved or were servants. All different kinds of women.

I'm not going to talk about all of them because I want to focus on others, but the awakened poems are representative of all these women. It's not just the rich queens and consorts who awaken. Background has nothing to do with it. Just like that story I told—maybe I didn't tell it—the Buddha looked over a group of people to see who was ready to hear the Dhamma, and the one who was ready was the poor leper who had just come because he thought they were giving out food. You never know. It's the same with the women. Awakening is the potential of everyone.

The present-day person I thought of is, of course, not quite on a par with Mahapajapati Gotami—because who could be? Who else is the aunt of the Buddha? But today in Thailand, I want to talk about Venerable Dhammananda Bhikkhuni. She's a Thai woman whose lay name was Dr. Chatsumarn Kabilsingh. She was a very well-known professor at Thammasat University in Bangkok, with a PhD in philosophy and religion. She's still alive.

Just a quick synopsis of her life: she was born in 1944, and her mother, Voramai, was very devout. After Chatsumarn was born, her mother ordained as a precept nun. In the Theravada tradition at this point, the full bhikkhuni ordination had died out, although in the Mahayana tradition it still exists. So especially in strict Theravada countries—Thailand and Burma in particular, where Buddhism is also the state religion—women can ordain as eight or ten precept nuns, but not as full bhikkhunis on a par with bhikkhus. That is not recognized. This is starting to change, and Venerable Dhammananda is a key mover in that change in Thailand.

Her mother was very devout, and in 1971 she went to Taiwan and ordained in the Mahayana tradition as a bhikkhuni. She came back to Thailand and founded a temple, a meditation center called Songdhammakalyani, which means "temple where women uphold the Dhamma." So this is the atmosphere that Chatsumarn Kabilsingh grew up in.

I noticed, as these women came to me to talk about, they're all from Thailand, Burma, India. I don't mean to say awakening is only possible if you grew up in a Buddhist country. But what I feel is the support—really growing up with the sense of faith strong, having that embedded in the culture. You don't have to kind of...

The faith in the Dhamma, the faith in practice—even many people who don't practice have great faith in it. And so growing up in a country where that faith is woven into the culture... For me, in a country where I didn't know anything about Buddhism, where it certainly wasn't taught, I didn't have natural faith. There's a whole other level of having to find your way in that you simply don't have to navigate there.

Anyway, so she grew up and taught for 27 years at the university, then took early retirement. In 2001, she went to Sri Lanka and became a samaneri, which is like a novice bhikkhuni. Then in 2003, in Sri Lanka—where they had reestablished some bhikkhunis—she took full bhikkhuni ordination and came back to Thailand.

So in the Theravada lineage in Thailand, she was the first woman ordained as a bhikkhuni in that tradition. But you must understand, this was completely controversial in Thailand—and it still is, even though this was 2003. Coming back, many monks and laypeople were very opposed to her, even saying it was illegal. Because this is part of the Theravada religion as opposed to practice and awakening—it's part of the political religion of the country. There's a whole other set of laws and rules that get involved, different from Burma but similar in nature.

So she faced huge resistance. It was very controversial, with many people really angry. But there was also support, and not just from women. There were plenty of monks who supported her as well.

She's still there. She went back to Songdama Kalyani, settled down, and really began practicing and teaching. She's very vibrant and speaks excellent English, so if you go online you can hear talks by her—very lively and vivacious. She's been working tirelessly to reestablish the Theravada bhikkhuni lineage in Thailand. That's what she's been doing since 2003. The temple has grown, and she's also very well known as a scholar around the world.

If you go to their website, it says at the top, "Everything begins here in our hearts." That's what she says. When I was just searching for information about her, I saw that BBC listed her among the 2009 hundred most influential women in the world. So she's become quite well known. That article mentioned that now, all over Thailand—not just at her place—there are 270 bhikkhunis nationwide. Slowly, slowly, it's growing. At her center, they're also attuning to ecological awareness, social awareness—just different times.

A couple of years ago, she organized a special period—I can't remember if it was two weeks or a month—where hundreds of women could come and ordain temporarily, practice for a few weeks, and then return to their lives. So very, very powerful, and having a huge effect in these days.

Let me read one quote where she's explaining what she's doing: "I do not choose to be ordained because I want people to recognize me. I did it because I want to carry on the heritage of the Lord Buddha. I'm trying to revive the four pillars of Buddhism"—something the Buddha talked about often—"the fourfold Sangha: bhikkhus, bhikkhunis, laymen, and laywomen that will sustain the religion into the future." And the Buddha did say that if you have those four pillars, the sasana will continue. She goes on: "I don't mind if some people hold different opinions about bhikkhunis. The public will be the ones to judge our worth."

That's just a typical example of how she speaks. This really takes a strong heart and a genuine sense of dedication, but she is truly doing it and having a tremendous effect. So I just wanted to mention her.

Now, there are so many to choose from, and I can see I'm never going to get through even what I thought I had really narrowed down. So the next awakened nun from the time of the Buddha that I wanted to mention is one whose name was Dhammadinna. After she was awakened, she was considered—they all had little taglines describing their particular excellence—the foremost in preaching, in expounding the Dhamma. In fact, there's not just a poem but an entire sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya, number 44, called the Shorter Set of Questions and Answers, where she is the one speaking. Questions are asked of her, and she is the one answering.

And of course, at the end, the person keeps asking questions, and she said, "Well, go ask the Buddha." And he went to the Buddha. It's already unusual that a man is coming to a bhikkhuni for teaching. So he went to the Buddha and reported everything. And the Buddha said, "Just as Damodina has said, so I would have said." Her word is called buddhavacana—the same as the Buddha's teaching. So that's really powerful there in the Majjhima Nikaya.

Her story is that she had a happy marriage. Her husband's name was Wisaka. Fairly important, fairly well-to-do—not a suffering life. He was an important man in Rajagaha. And when he first encountered the Buddha, he was off one day and heard the Buddha's teaching. When he came home, he was really moved by it, very inspired. But instead of being his normally friendly self, coming in, eating together, he was just kind of distracted. He passed by without even noticing her. He seemed in another world.

She asked, "What's wrong? Are you angry?" You can relate, right? "What's wrong, honey? Are you angry?"

He said no, he had just been thinking about things. But he said, really from his heart, after hearing the Buddha, "I'm really called. I really want to renounce the world. I want to go and join his Sangha of bhikkhus." And he said, "So I support you in whatever you want. I'll give you all my wealth. I'll support you in whatever you need."

So she thought it over. And she said, "You know what? I want to renounce also"—because the bhikkhunis obviously existed then. So he said okay, and he put her in a golden palanquin and sent her off to the bhikkhunis, and she joined up. And then, you know, you would not be in touch with the home. So she became a bhikkhuni, and she practiced, and obviously, since she's one of the arahant nuns, she became awakened.

After some time, she happened to go back to Rajagaha. And it turned out her husband hadn't become a bhikkhu after all. He got—oh, you know, whatever—he hadn't. But he was still really interested. So he's actually the one who went to her for teachings, who's asking the questions in the sutta. He could see she was awakened, and he had really deep respect for her. So it's kind of a cool story, that she really went. Motivated by him initially, but she just had more energy, more faith.

I won't read you the whole sutta, just my favorite line from it. He's asking her, "What is meditation?" And she says, "Meditation is the focusing of the heart, or unification of mind." He keeps going on and on until he's asking about Nibbana. And finally she says, "Go talk to the Buddha. Go talk to the Buddha." But it's a very deep wisdom sutta and very inspiring.

Sayadaw U Pandita used to often say that women make the best yogis somehow. It wasn't that women are more able, but just somehow in his experience—and this is mostly Burmese people that he'd be working with—the women just had some kind of commitment or steadiness or something that was more frequent, maybe for whatever reason. Just putting it out there.

So I want to talk about two great women teachers. One is no longer alive. I mentioned her the other night: Upasika Kee Nanayon.

And she's the one whose talks make up this book, Pure and Simple, that he just quoted a little bit from. This book, Six Talks, is put together and translated by Thanissaro Bhikkhu from Metta Vihar. Very interesting. I thought I'd give you a little bit about her life, to make her feel like a real person.

So she was Thai, born in 1901. Thanissaro Bhikkhu says she was the foremost woman Dharma teacher in Thailand in the twentieth century. She remained a lay woman, living as an eight-precept lay woman—so that's kind of like all of you here, those who are keeping eight precepts but not taking robes. That's how she chose to live her life.

She was born in Rajburi to a merchant family. Not super rich, but they had small shops. The eldest of five children, her mother was somewhat religious, so she grew up with a sense of faith in the Dhamma—not really heavy duty, but it was familiar.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu says that she reported how seeing the suffering of her mother during the birth of her siblings, just witnessing how much suffering that was, along with her parents' painful separation and the suffering that entailed, convinced her that she never wanted to marry. So she didn't.

Through her teens and early twenties, she ran a small store, using it to support her elderly father in his old age. She studied the Dhamma a lot in her spare time. In her mind, she was working and saving up until she had enough to go off and live a quiet, simple, secluded life—to just practice for the rest of her life. Her aunt and uncle at this time had a small forest hut not far away at the base of a mountain, and sometimes she would go there and practice, so it was a familiar place.

At the end of World War II, when the war had ended and things were starting to settle down, she decided this was her chance. She handed the shop over to one of her younger sisters, and she and her aunt and uncle went off together to stay at this little piece of land they had at the foot of what's called the Royal Park Mountain in English, or Khao Suan Luang—I'm sure I'm pronouncing that wrong in Thai, but that's the name of the place. She stayed there the rest of her life.

When they first moved in, it was a lovely forest at the foot of this mountain, but they were living in an old, abandoned monastic dwelling—very frugal, very Spartan. Obviously people weren't coming to support them much. They just dedicated themselves to meditation, and that was it for the rest of their lives.

Gradually, they made the place a little more livable. As she kept on practicing, people would come—mostly women—drawn to practice with them for a while. When she was feeling well, she would give little Dharma talks, and more and more Dharma talks. More and more people were drawn, and it really became a center where many women came to practice.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu says it's still in existence today. Even though she died in 1978, her sister took it over for some time until the nineties when she died, and now it's run by a group. But it still exists, and many women come and practice there.

Living a very simple life, she mostly practiced on her own. She didn't have one in-person teacher. She learned a lot from books—both the Pali Canon and also books by contemporary Thai teachers. But much of her practice was just there on her own.

I don't know if you got a sense of her from the reading—incredibly straightforward, no-nonsense, calling it like it is, always speaking the truth, always oriented toward awakening. Really dedicated and just down to earth.

I'll read a couple of things to give you a feeling. The first is her describing when they first went to the forest:

"Coming to the forest and living very simply, I came to feel lighthearted and free. Seeing nature all around me inspired me to explore inside my own mind."

And a little poem:

"With no struggling, no thinking, the mind still will see cause and effect vanishing into the void. Attached to nothing, letting go, knowing that this is the way to allay all stress."

With this book, you can just pick it up anywhere and look at it.

I could go on, but I don't want to let this become too much. It's just straightforward teaching. No nonsense.

Okay, one more. I just enjoy reading her words.

Here she's talking about stilling your mind:

"When something succeeds in distracting you, it will fool you into seeing it as right, wrong, good, bad, and so forth. Eventually, you have to come down to the awareness that everything simply arises, persists, and then disbands. Make sure you stay focused on the disbanding."

Disbanding means coming apart. If you watch just the arising, you may get carried off on a tangent. But if you focus on the disbanding, you'll see emptiness. Everything is disbanding every instant. No matter what you look at, no matter what you see, it's there for just an instant and then disbands. Then it arises again, then it disbands. There's simply arising, knowing, disbanding.

So let's watch what happens of its own accord. Because the arising and disbanding that occurs by way of the senses is something that happens on its own. You can't prevent it. You can't force it. If you look and know it without attachment, the mind will be unaffected by the confusion that comes from joy or sorrow.

Just pure and simple, straight to the point. She was a really powerful teacher in the 20th century.

So back to the enlightened nuns. The next one is another very famous figure, one of the most influential nuns and one of the most skillful teachers. She's mentioned in the Therīgāthā, referenced in the other poems, more than any other of the nuns. And she's one who came to the Buddha and the Dhamma from enormous suffering. I mean, it's one of those stories that you can't think could really be true because it's just too much. But I'll tell it.

She was from a wealthy banker's family in Sāvatthī, and they were arranging a marriage for her. But she happened to fall in love with one of the servants, which of course would never be allowed. So they ran away, got married, and went to another area. Her family disowned her. She got pregnant, and when she wanted to go home, they started walking back. But she had the baby before they got there, so they went back to where they'd been living.

She got pregnant again, and they kept putting off the journey home because they didn't exactly expect a warm welcome. Finally, they started again when she was quite pregnant. And again, she started to have the baby along the way.

So picture this—she's having the baby in a field when a huge monsoon storm starts. Her husband goes off to cut down some rushes and try to make a little lean-to shelter. He gets bitten by a poisonous snake and dies.

So he never comes back. She has the baby alone in the storm. Then she struggles on with a newborn and a little one- or two-year-old, making her way to her parents.

She gets to a river that normally you could walk across, but because of the huge storm, it's become a raging torrent. How can she possibly get across? She couldn't manage it holding both babies. So she tells the toddler to wait, takes the newborn across and leaves it on the other bank, then comes back to get the toddler.

This is where it really starts to get out there.

The newborn is on the bank, and a giant eagle—a bird of prey—swoops down and takes it. She's halfway through the water with the other child, sees this happen, gets completely distraught, tries to run across, loses her grip on the toddler, who gets washed away. Both children die.

She's crazed at this point. But it's not over. She keeps going, makes it to her home village, and sees smoke rising from somewhere in the distance. She asks, "What's that smoke? What's that fire?" The people recognize her, and they say, "Don't ask us that. Ask us anything but that." It was her parents' house that had just burned, and they had just died.

This basically snapped her mind. She spent years just wandering around, truly out of her mind. Her name is Patachara—it means something like "cloak walker." She just walked in circles.

At some point, perhaps years later, she came to the Jeta Grove where the Buddha was teaching. She was mad, walking in circles. Some of the people there—not Ananda, but others—started throwing rocks at her, trying to keep her away from the Blessed One. But of course he sees this and goes to her. He speaks to her and says, "Sister, recover your presence of mind."

Which she did. The Buddha, remember.

"Sister, recover your presence of mind." And she did.

Then she told him her whole story. And this is, again, the power of hearing the truth—absolute hearing of the truth. No candy coating, but coming from someone you know speaks the truth.

It's said that he told her, "Don't think that you have come to someone who can help with that. In your many lives, you have shed more tears for the dead than the waters in the four oceans." Literally telling her: this is the first noble truth. And when we ourselves die, no one else can help us. Even in this world, no family can really end our suffering.

Then, of course, he preached the Dhamma. She was deeply touched and asked to ordain. Together they went to the community of nuns, and she was accepted as a bhikkhuni.

Incredible suffering. And the Buddha not simply saying, "Oh yes, that's really tough," but rather, "Yes, this is how it is." There are many examples where suffering really is the catalyst to see through our confusion and wake up.

Patachara is said to have become one of the most accessible teachers, one of the better teachers—someone who truly affected many women.

So I thought I'd read her poem. This version is a new translation and interpretation that hasn't come out yet but will soon, by a friend of ours. I like her poem because it's one of the few that actually describes her moment of awakening. Right at the end, that's what she's describing:

Farmers turn up the soil, plant seeds, and wait.

All by itself, water pours down from the sky and turns earth into food. I keep all the precepts and always wake before dawn. I don't pretend to know more than I do, and when others ask for help, I do what I can. Yet after all these years, where's my harvest?

Late one evening, I was washing my feet after another long day of sitting and walking. The water poured over my feet and onto the ground. I let my mind go, and it flowed downhill with the water toward my little hut. I went inside, sat on the bed, and lowered the wick of the lamp. All by itself the flame went out.

All by itself the flame went out. She doesn't mean the lamp, right? You understand—it's a metaphor. But because of her life, she had deep, deep compassion. And so many of the women who joined and became bhikkhunis could really go to her for teaching and understanding.

So I want to tell you then about Dipa Ma, because she came to the Dhamma through huge suffering. And she was a ball of energy, I'll tell you.

I first met her in 1980, I think, when she first came here with her daughter Dipa and her grandson Rishi, who was just two or three and deep in the terrible twos—a holy terror. And I can still remember her. She was maybe four feet tall, a tiny little lady with gray hair pulled back in a bun. I can see her now, with all the love in her heart and good humor, running after Rishi, trying to catch him, her white sari flapping as he ran all over the place because he never sat still for a moment. She was really a lot of fun.

Her life—she had a happy marriage. She was from Chittagong, from the Indian Barua family, which is a Buddhist clan in India. At some point, she and her husband moved to Burma, where he was working. They really wanted children, but it took many years. Finally her first two children died as babies. Then at last they had one who lived—that was Dipa. But the deaths of those children left her so distraught.

Even though Dipa was still alive, she became ill for years, just depressed and bedridden. Her husband devotedly took care of her. But she was lost in grief and illness for a long time.

Then in 1957, her husband had a heart attack and died. And she really just sank down. She was in her mid-forties. Dipa was seven years old. Her health continued to deteriorate. She was just lost, lost in grief and confusion for years.

Earlier, many years before, she had wanted to go meditate. Her husband had said, "No, no, you're too young." This was before she sank into all the grief. So in her mind, she really hadn't practiced at all. But she had this deep faith that she needed to do that. Yet in this state of grief and illness, she just couldn't get it together.

But finally she did. She started thinking, "I'm going to die. What can I take with me?" She looked at all her possessions, even her daughter. She said, "I can't take any of this with me."

She went to a meditation center. A Buddha appeared in a dream, and she knew she must practice. So she went to one center, and obviously she had strong paramis. She got incredibly, deeply absorbed in just a couple of days—three days.

The story goes that she was doing walking meditation, and suddenly she couldn't move her leg. She thought, what's going on? For the longest time she couldn't move her leg. Finally she looked down, and a big dog had its jaws around her leg. She hadn't even felt it or noticed. This is another realm, right? But anyway, they came and took the dog off. She was worried about rabies, so she went to start the series of rabies shots. Because it was at a certain time every day, and in the meditation center you only had one meal a day, she was missing the meal every day. She got very weak, and she was weak to begin with, so the monk said maybe she should go home. She went home that time, and it was another few years.

Then she heard that a friend of her family's, another member of the clan—Anagarika Munindra, who we've spoken about—was in Burma, living at the Mahasi center, Mahasi Sasana Yeiktha. He came and visited her, and knowing he was a family friend who spoke her language, he said, "Yes, you must come and meditate."

So then she went to the Mahasi center and again got so deeply into the practice, so quickly. By the third day she was sitting so long that Munindra came and said, "No, you're getting unbalanced. You've got to get up and go to the talk." But she was so weak—she was still really weak. Then she wasn't eating because she got so into practice. So don't do that. She had to crawl up the stairs to get to the Dhamma talk.

But anyway, as these stories go—which is very much like the Arhat nuns—she had very deep, deep awakening very quickly. Very quickly.

And this is what she said. Just to read one thing she said: Those who knew Dipa Ma were fascinated by her transformation. Almost overnight, she had changed from a sickly, dependent, grief-stricken woman into a healthy, independent, radiant being. Dipa Ma told those around her, "You have seen me. I was disheartened and broken down due to the loss of my husband and children and due to disease. I suffered so much I could not walk properly. But now, how are you finding me? All my disease is gone. I am refreshed. There is nothing in my mind. There is no sorrow, no grief. I am quite happy. If you come to meditate, you will also be happy. There is no magic. Only follow instructions."

She always said that: "I didn't make it up."

As I said, she was a real bundle of energy, even in her old age. She and Dipa and Rishi lived in a very small, crummy little one-room apartment in Calcutta. She had really very little money, but she was a really powerful, powerful teacher.

So as I said, I met her in 1980, and the last time I saw her was 1989. Several friends—she was not so healthy, and I think she died like the next year maybe. We went to Bodh Gaya, and she was there at that time with Dipa and Rishi. We went there to visit her because we knew we wouldn't see her again. And this is—again, she's little and old, but you can't even imagine that she was so sick and weak like that.

I remember two things from that time. One was that just a few months before, I had developed a kind of autoimmune disease that was very much affecting my movement. It was hard for me to move, and traveling in India, I couldn't have done it without a bunch of friends.

So she's like, oh, you must exercise. And she bounds up and runs over to the wall, puts her hand on the wall, and starts vigorously swinging her feet around, doing all this exercise. "This is what you must do!"

And then she said to Joseph, who had been her student for many, many years and knew her very well, "Joseph, you should sit for two days." He goes, "Oh, I often do." She says, "No, sit down for two days." Which she would do, you know. Joseph being Joseph, of course he just laughed. He said, "Yeah, right."

But that's how she was, you know. Filled with love, but not what we would call, "Oh, compassion. Yeah, that's tough. You shouldn't sit for two days. It might strain you." Come on, sit for two days! Oh, you can't walk? What do you mean? Jump up. Exercise. Come on, let's get on with it. Really quite an amazing person. Really amazing.

One last quotation from her: "There is so much sameness in ordinary life. We are always experiencing everything through the same set of lenses. When greed, hatred, and delusion are gone, you see everything fresh and new all the time. Every moment is new. Life was dull before. Now every day, every moment is full of taste and zest."

So don't be afraid of no greed, no hatred, no delusion. Don't be afraid of it.

Now, in terms of another nun I wanted to tell you about, one who's alive now in Burma. She didn't come through so much suffering, but she's also a very well-known teacher there. Her name is Daw Yuzana. She's not a bhikkhuni, because in Burma they don't allow bhikkhunis, really. She's an eight-precept nun. But she's a teacher, very well-known, and she's been practicing sincerely in the Mogok style of meditation, which we in the West don't know that well, but it's equally popular in Burma as the Mahasi style. Many, many people practice it.

I haven't practiced it myself; I've just been around her when she does it. They're both cultivating samatha and vipassana, but in any retreat that's in the Mogok style, they use the dependent origination—the wheel of life, dependent origination, up on display.

She's a very deep practitioner, really dedicated. She told us her story one time. She only speaks Burmese, but we go with friends who can translate. She really wanted to become a nun when she was a teenager, but her parents didn't want her to. She told us later that her father would beat her when she would try to go off and be a nun. But finally she managed to ordain.

Where she lives now is her own kind of house and meditation hall, but it's on another Sayadaw's monastery—a monk's monastery. She was the one, and we've known her for some years, who was really well known for her depth of practice, her deep devotion, and also, she's kind of psychic. This is the other side of things.

You know Nagas, which are the great snakes that protected the Buddha. She has a real connection to spirit Nagas. As you come in before her house, there's a big fountain. All over Burma you'll see statues of a Buddha with a big snake protecting him, its cobra-like hood spread out, shielding him from the elements. That's a very common Buddha image. And she has lots of Naga imagery around her.

statues around. And she actually has Naga spirits that talk to her. She's quite psychic, so many people go to her for that. She'll happily, if you come and really ask about people you love, speak to the Nagas and tell you what they say. But her true love is the Dhamma. And again, she's a profoundly committed teacher.

One time, with some friends, we went to visit her on her birthday. On your birthday, it's common to offer a meal to a nunnery or monastery. She happened to be teaching a retreat of about a hundred people—men and women, not just women. It was a residential retreat, and she was teaching it alone. She was offering the lunch meal. Not only offering—she was cooking it. So we came in, she's cooking the lunch meal, the hundred yogis come in this slow line to get their food, and then she hung out with us and invited us to eat. Amazing energy.

When we talk to her, her sense of the Dhamma is this very straightforward, no-nonsense approach. She's often saying, "I just wish I could just go off and practice, just meditate." But she can't, because in 2007, when there was the huge Cyclone Nargis, which I think I mentioned last week, she felt compelled—and maybe the Nagas told her, I'm not sure—but she felt compelled to start a school. I mentioned that many nuns have started schools, but she did it on a whole other level: a beautifully built building, hiring the best teachers on a level with the best schools, which is much more expensive. She started with two hundred girls. I think it might be about four hundred now. Many of them live there. Some are nuns, not all. And she has it all the way through tenth standard, which is the highest you can go.

When we go and talk to her, she's so grounded. She gives us more sense of what's really going on in the society than almost any other person I've talked to. She has deep faith. She's totally committed to having the school and helping these girls really have a life, but also to bring them to liberation. That's foremost in her mind. She can't go off and practice because she's the sole earner of the dāna. It's all on dāna, and it's a huge amount every year to run the school, to hire the teachers, to feed the young girls. That's a lot. She'll show us incredibly detailed and carefully kept accounts—of course in Burmese, I can't read it, but my friends can—with each donation and how much it was throughout the whole year.

She's so dedicated, and sometimes she's just so tired. Some years there's been difficulty with the Sayadaw. Probably, I think, because she was more famous, more known than he. But anyway, it got petty and nasty, as these things do. So now in this whole ground that was her nunnery and his monastery, there's a fence down the middle. But she's still living there and practicing and taking care of these young girls. And she would just say sometimes about the school, "I just wish I could just go off and practice."

A few years ago, Steve Smith tried to bring her over. We were going to have her and him teach a month at the Forest Refuge. She couldn't get a visa—this was years ago. Couldn't get a visa to the US.

And this was like 10 years ago. A single unmarried woman—they're afraid she's going to come and get married here. For a monk, they don't think that. But for a nun, it didn't really register. And she couldn't get in twice, two different times. Her visa was refused. So she's kind of given up on that.

But she's also very funny. Again, she's so direct. We were talking, I think it was last year, and she's just describing some of the stuff that's going on in Burma—some of which is horrible. Never mind the Rakhine crisis, which is really horrible, but even just as the country opens up, there's more sex trade than there ever was, as it opens up to other countries and money, just as it goes. She sees that, because she's working with young women up until about sixteen. She's really tuned in.

So we were just talking about how crazy the world seems somehow, and how people are doing things that seem so horrible, and they seem so proud of it. And she goes, "Yes. It's as if people tied up their mother and father, and they're beating them, and they think, this is a really good thing to do." She's just saying people are crazy.

So she's a very powerful woman, and a lot of fun to hang out with, and very inspiring.

I'll just read you two more short poems from this collection of the first Buddhist nuns. Again, this is from the new translation by Matt Weingast. So another Uttara, and this one is addressed to Patachara:

I asked Patachara, what is the path?
Patachara said, just see all thoughts, words, and actions arising all by themselves, not from some imaginary point within.
I only partly understood, but I took a seat.
As the sun was setting, I saw the endless line of one thing leading to another that had brought me to the cushion that night.
As the moon was coming up, I saw the arising and passing away of all things in every direction.

As dawn was breaking, wisdom rose in the east and set fire to the long dark night.
But don't take my word for it.
Set fire to the darkness within.
I promise it's like nothing you've ever seen.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 78

Aspiration and Resolution: Saddhā and Adhiṭṭhāna

Carol Wilson · 51 min

In this talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson offers a profound exploration of two essential qualities that sustain meditation practice: saddhā (faith, confidence, trust) and adhiṭṭhāna (determination, resolution). She begins by acknowledging that the path includes everything—pleasant and unpleasant alike—and that freedom doesn't come from eliminating difficulty but from meeting it skillfully.

Wilson distinguishes aspiration from expectation, explaining how aspiration uplifts and brightens the citta (heart-mind), while expectation contracts consciousness through craving and leads to disappointment. She introduces the Buddhist teaching on "bright faith"—the inspiration that comes from teachers, experiences, or recognizing wholesome qualities in others—and "verified faith" that develops through direct experience. Drawing on moving examples from Burmese nuns she has known, Wilson illustrates how faith gives rise to extraordinary generosity, surrender, and commitment.

The heart of the talk examines adhiṭṭhāna as a pāramī (perfection), describing it as a wholesome quality of steadiness and aligned energy that differs fundamentally from willpower or aversion-based striving. Wilson explains how this determination comes together with discernment, truthfulness, relinquishment, and calm. She offers practical guidance for recognizing and cultivating this quality—from ending the "dithering" that delays our practice to simply meeting whatever arises with presence. The teaching concludes with encouragement to embrace aspiration fully, remembering that the path is lifelong and everything in our experience belongs to it.

So I thought tonight I would talk a little bit about aspiration, inspiration, and resolution, or resolve. Or you could say saddhā and adhiṭṭhāna, if we want to go into the Pali.

Saddhā is usually translated as faith, confidence, or trust. Adhiṭṭhāna is one of the pāramīs, one of the ten pāramīs, translated as resolution or determination.

Hopefully, you're beginning to realize—I know this doesn't sound hopeful—but you're beginning to realize, after hearing Monica describe so well the five hindrances, which you all recognized, right? They weren't unfamiliar, and they will continue to be familiar. I hope you're starting to see, even though it's only been a few days, that this path is vast and all-inclusive. It includes all aspects of our life, all aspects of our mind. And it's not just a nice trajectory—nicer, nicer, nicer, nicest. It goes up and down, up and down, and everything's included.

There are plenty of times when what happens or arises is something unexpected, something we didn't think was possible for us, something beautiful. And just as frequently, the next day or the next sitting, it all just goes bonkers. "I had the most peaceful sitting ever, so quiet. And then the next time I sat, it was just thoughts all over the place. What did I do wrong?" As if it were in our control.

All of life, everything is included in the path. And that's reflected in our meditation practice. So much comes up frequently that can be challenging or difficult, and that's going to keep happening in different ways. That's not wrong. That's really where so much of the learning and the freedom arises—learning how freedom arises in the midst of the unpleasant. Freedom isn't about getting rid of the unpleasant. If we could all only really get that one thing, we'd save ourselves so much grief. Freedom's not about getting rid of the unpleasant because you can't. That's life.

My point is that there are plenty of times when what comes up is difficult. Sometimes the mind, the heart is really in balance, and we can meet it with practice. And there are other times when that's just not quite the case. What comes up is either stronger than the mindfulness at the time, or there are times we're just—let's face it—fed up. There are times we're bored. There are times it's stronger and we're overwhelmed.

This calls forth from us again and again a willingness to recommit. Both Dawn and Monica mentioned in different ways, suggested how helpful it can be to consciously tune into your own personal deepest aspiration. Not what you want your sitting to look like, but the deepest aspiration—what's really important, most important in your life.

This can be really helpful, to consciously connect with it every day, but particularly in times when we're feeling a sense of struggle or a sense of being lost. Sometimes we're struggling and it's just fine, but sometimes it's like, "I just can't face this," or "What the heck am I doing here anyway?" That would happen to me sometimes. It wasn't really struggle. I'd just be walking, and whereas walking before I was loving it, in this particular walking I'd think, "What am I doing? Lifting my foot, putting it down, and feeling it? What's the point of this?" That can come and go, but you follow that too far down the road, and you really stop doing it. You have to reconnect.

I want to talk a bit about what aspiration is. It's different from expectation. Aspiration is an aspect that feeds faith, trust, confidence, willingness to do. Aspiration is really tuning in for yourself to the bigger picture. It's looking at a sense of what's really possible.

What really inspires you? Why are you doing this? And it can be vast. Don't be shy or think, "Well, I can't possibly have an aspiration to awaken because I'm just a stupid jerk. Maybe I can have some nice sittings." Don't. No. Aspiration is really opening to what's true for you though—not what you should have as an aspiration. It has to be true for you. But when we tune into it, it's a big picture of what is possible.

It's a wholesome quality of heart and mind. When we tune into aspiration, with greater or lesser degree of course, it uplifts the heart and mind. This is actually a quality of how faith affects us. It's uplifting, it brightens, it energizes the citta, the heart and mind. It strengthens our willingness in that moment, our commitment to just fully be with whatever it is that's arising. You could say it strengthens faith. Sayadaw U Pandita would say that faith gives the willingness to do. It strengthens resolve. And so tuning into aspiration in this way can be so supportive.

And it's a moment of thinking. It's a contemplation. That's fine—using wise contemplation. It's not like you're thinking about it for five and a half hours. It's just a tuning in. You can kind of feel it in yourself.

And yes, it may be conceptual. Say one's aspiration is to awaken and cultivate compassion. One can think, "Okay, that's looking at a result. That's looking at a goal. Doesn't that feed striving and all of that?" But when it's aspiration, when it's wholesome, it's not about wanting. It's just about recognizing: wow, it's really possible. And that's important. Otherwise, what the heck are we doing? That's important.

But for many of us—probably all of us at some time—it can switch to expectation, or maybe we don't quite understand the difference. So expectation could verbally say the same thing: "I'm really here to awaken and cultivate compassion." But the quality of mind, of heart, is very different. It's got like one eye on the result. "I'm here. Am I there yet? I'm here. How much longer? I'm here."

Expectation is definitely coming together with greed, with craving. Whereas aspiration has the quality of uplifting—maybe not all the way to the sky, but a little bit at times—and brightening and strengthening the heart and mind, when there's greed, when there's that wanting, it feels so different. It narrows the consciousness. The Buddha said once that greed, hatred, and confusion are makers of measurement. I could go into a lot of things about that, but just right now—a measure we can feel when there's that wanting, that expectation. The citta is contracted. It's narrower. There's the wanting, and so consciousness is narrow, and it leads to disappointment and frustration and comparing and doubt and the whole nine yards.

Probably you're not familiar with any of that, but it can happen if there should be, by some chance, expectation arising in your heart and mind. Not that any of this is bad. This is all impersonal. There's cause and effect. But when you start to feel this sense of contraction and dis-ease and disappointment when you think of awakening, it's not awakening's problem.

It's the sense that the quality in the mind has come into wanting. So then just bring awareness to wanting. That's fine. But don't confuse it with aspiration. Also, don't be afraid of aspiration because it might move into wanting. Good chance it will. Good chance everything moves into wanting one time or another, right? If you try to avoid everything that wanting might arise from, just hang it up. It's impossible.

But we don't need to be afraid of wanting. Mindfulness is quite happy to be mindful of wanting. It's no problem. It really is no problem if we're mindful of it.

Getting in touch with and remembering our aspiration—just at times when we think, "What do I do now? How can I keep going?"—just take a moment to connect with your aspiration, that's all. It's not like it's going to fix everything, but it begins to just connect us a bit again to faith, so that we don't get so overwhelmed, so we don't get lost in that.

And frankly, the more I've practiced, the more I appreciate this. I think I do this much more than I used to. I used to think you just have to practice and do it and do it yourself. But there's nothing wrong with inclining to the wholesome. There's nothing wrong with bringing in aspiration, and as I'll say in a minute, inspiration—even from others.

The path is difficult. It is challenging, a lot, because as Monica said last night in that very well-known statement, the Buddhist teachings kind of go against the stream of the majority of culture. It's like swimming upstream. But it's not only against the stream of culture. It's against the stream of our own familiar habits—habits of mind, of personality, of perception, and how we describe and define the world.

One of the reasons that at times the continuity of our mindfulness practice is so challenging is because perceptions will arise that are other than what we're used to, that we haven't really opened to or seen before. We're stepping outside of our familiar worldview. This isn't a thinking thing; it happens by itself. And so that stepping outside of the familiar worldview, or of our comfort zone—sometimes we need some support for that. If we're just relying on, "Okay, well, I'm out of my comfort zone," we don't know where it's going.

So just connecting with aspiration, and in a minute I'll say with some inspiration, can give us the strength not to figure it out, but to simply surrender again into the totality of presence in this moment—without needing to understand it all and know where it's going, or like it, or feel comfortable in it.

I'm a comfort wallah. I like comfort. Give me a choice, I go for comfort. A lot of us do. But seriously, if we stay within our level of comfort, we're not going to learn. Because a lot of comfort is actually just coming from familiarity with—basically wrong view, a lot of the time. We'll be talking about that in many different talks. But being comfortable isn't necessarily your best reference point for how things are going. Being uncomfortable doesn't necessarily mean there's a big problem.

Learning to be with discomfort, with unfamiliarity—that's a lot of the practice. It's a lot of life. And so just being willing to ask, "What can support, brighten the heart and mind, give a little strength, give a little willingness to do, willingness to meet?" I find this really helpful in terms of starting with the aspiration.

But not only aspiration. The next thing I'll talk about is faith. Faith, of course, is the first of the five spiritual faculties—five wholesome qualities of mind that develop as we're meditating and that are very supportive. The first one is faith. It gives rise to vīriya, to wise effort, to energy, to mindfulness, to samādhi—collectedness of mind, steadiness of mind—and to wisdom. Those five all work and support one another.

As I said, Sayadaw U Pandita would say faith is really what launches us. Without some faith, we're not going to have the willingness to do. And by faith here, as I'm talking about it—this is just me—I don't at all mean a belief in something, like believing in the Buddha's teaching in some conceptual way. But it could be a kind of trust.

A sense of confidence, which is different from just believing something. A sense of confidence that gives us the willingness to put the practice into practice.

So faith—one of the ways it's talked about is that the first arising of faith, and we all need some kind of arising of faith or confidence to start on a path, to come here to meditate. You don't just say, "What the heck, I've got nothing else to do." You have to have some kind of faith to get us here. So in the beginning, this first arising of faith is called bright faith.

Bright faith comes, you could say, from outside—something we've read, someone we know who really inspires us. It can be an experience. Sometimes you have an experience, you don't know where it's from, but there's a real sense of "Wow, there's a whole different way of being." A sense of the mind-heart without kilesa, how that feels. You don't even know what it is, it's so unusual, but you want more of that. Bright faith inspires, it brightens, it uplifts the heart and mind. It's a beautiful quality.

So tuning into bright faith, again with the aspiration, but not thinking we have to do it all by ourselves. It can be when we're feeling really flat and dull and we can't find our way—taking a moment to reflect. It may be a person who originally inspired you or someone who's inspiring you now. It doesn't have to be a big teacher. It could be anything. But something that touches a quality in ourselves. That's how bright faith works. It's not faith in that person exactly, but recognizing their great generosity or their compassion, or somehow being in their presence you feel a sense of calm—whatever it is. It inspires us because it touches that quality in ourselves. Oh, something other is possible.

Bright faith then strengthens into what's called verified faith. And I know we all have verified faith to some extent, because believe me, you wouldn't last four days here without it. Verified faith comes from our own experience. We know something is true. Even though I don't always have the perception of impermanence, I know that everything's in constant change. That's verified faith—confidence in that. It doesn't mean you always recognize it, but you know it. If someone came up and tried to convince me, "No, everything's really solid," it just doesn't work.

But bright faith—we can draw on it. Sometimes when I'm feeling flat, when I can't find the aspiration, when my energy is low and I don't know what to do, I take a moment and reflect. I just want to give you a few examples because it makes me happy to talk about, and I get to do that since I'm the one talking. But I want you to see how much I've learned about the power of faith to give strength to wholesome qualities of mind—resolution, willingness to do, generosity, energy.

I've learned a lot about this from spending time in Burma and meeting many different Burmese nuns in various aspects of life and different circumstances. Because these nuns, compared to the complexity of the Western mind, are perhaps more simple. The ones I'm thinking of are not highly educated in the university sense, but they have a great deal of Buddhist education and understanding. Basically, I'm thinking of two in particular who have tremendous faith—really strong faith, faith in the Buddha. One particular nun, Daw Tha was her name, had huge faith in the Buddha. This is living in Burma, in a Buddhist culture.

So it's much more part of things in that culture.

When she first became a nun, when she was about 20, she had a debilitating illness. The doctors had given up and thought she would die. And so finally her parents let her become a nun. She had so much faith that within six months, somehow that just strengthened her heart and mind and she became healthy.

She and her sister then—they lived in a small village several hours away from the main city, Yangon, a very simple village—came up to Yangon and they were in a meditation center where the Sayadaws were teaching. She was telling us her story at our request. Her goal in life was liberation. That's what she wanted. And they were just really dedicated, these two sisters.

And then, as so often happens with a lot of the nuns while they're still young, in their early 20s, the head Sayadaw from their home village reached out to them. In these small country villages, sometimes the head Sayadaw is kind of like the big chief—the guy who made good. He's really respected and in a way almost runs the village and does a lot of things for the people.

So anyway, he sent up maybe 10 or more young girls who were either orphans or whose parents were very poor and couldn't take care of them. There was no good education in the village. This story could be repeated 10,000 times. This is just one that I know. The Sayadaw just sent these young girls up to these two sisters, Uttara and her sister, and said basically, "These are for you to take care of and educate." Not for a couple of weeks, but until they're grown up.

This happens all the time. A lot of the nunneries are almost like the safety net for young orphan girls, for poor girls, so that they have somewhere to learn a good life. They become nuns when they're sent there.

So the Sayadaw sent these little girls to them, and the sisters accepted without a murmur. They said, "Okay, well now this is our life." Their faith is so strong. Their practice is what's called Buddhānussati, which is reflecting on the qualities of the Buddha.

This is interesting to me—this is how bright faith works, what I've learned about it. I see that in them. That particular practice, it doesn't light me up, you know what I mean? It's nice and all, but that practice of Buddhānussati, just going over and over the qualities of the Buddha, it's just not my way. But being around them and seeing their faith—their faith touches the faith in me. Or in others of us, I know I am not alone. That's really what's inspiring, to see the faith. Being around them really brightens my faith, really gives me a lot more energy and willingness to do, seeing not only their faith, but then how that serves to manifest in their life.

So back to the story. They left the meditation center. They found a little piece of land, which they somehow borrowed the money for and started building a little bamboo shack. That's what they all do—move into it with these 10 little girls or however many. And there would always be a few more every year. Everything's done on donations. They don't have money. They get donations to slowly, slowly build a place to live. The girls all become nuns. They're sending them to school. They're educating them.

Talking to Uttara, she described how it was like a 180-degree turn in her life—completely opening into it with faith and surrender, total commitment. She would tell us she's really committed to these young girls, and you could see it. I mean, we've been seeing her over the years. There's affection there. They're taking care of them. You can tell by hanging out with them that they're really connected, and there's a lot of affection. And she's really clear: now this is our path. Sure, when they're all grown up and gone, we want to go back and meditate more. But for now, this is the path—a total surrender, a total willingness to do, because it's a huge amount of work. And it's what they do. This is from their faith, and it deepens their faith.

She said, "We just want to give these girls a chance to see that they can learn sīla, learn a right way to live. It's not that we expect them to stay nuns their whole life."

When they're eighteen, they can do what they want. This keeps them from a worse possibility, but also allows us to teach them how to be truly moral, beautiful human beings. And you could see she meant that.

So to me, that's one way I've really come to appreciate the power of faith to help us genuinely use whatever life is giving us. This is our path. This is our path of awakening. This is a path of cultivating metta and compassion. Not "How can I get out of this? How can I go back to the meditation center?" I'm sure my mind would have tried that out. So yes, that's one story that's really inspiring to me in terms of faith—loving what is, embracing reality as the path, and giving everything to it.

Or here's another, completely different way that bright faith can touch me. And I'm sharing this to invite you to see what's true in your life. It doesn't have to be some great teacher. It might be a friend whose generosity really lights up that quality in you and gives you the willingness to do, the willingness to commit.

There's a monk, a relatively simple monk, quiet, who has a small monastery up in the Sagaing Hills. I have a little picture of him that Greg took, which I often take with me on retreat. He's pretty simple. The monastery's small. But he's just very peaceful, very calm, and he radiates metta—but in a simple way. He's not some big teacher giving lots of Dhamma talks. We go to visit him when we go there every year, and just hanging out, walking into the monastery, there's this sense of calm and peace. It's very tidy. He puts out food for the dogs and the deer out in the woods.

I just love being there, even though we can hardly talk to him—he only speaks Burmese—but there's this radiant kind of peace. We've known him for at least fifteen years. More. Since 1997. He doesn't even look any older. I keep saying he's this young guy, but he can't be. He looks the same. We were shocked when he first came out with a cell phone—"Oh my God, he has a cell phone!" But that was the year all the sayadaws got cell phones.

Anyway, I just think of him, and it brightens up that quality of serenity, of a simplicity of metta, in myself. It gives me the faith, the energy, the willingness—not to try and be like that, but to meet whatever life is throwing at me, whatever practice is coming up right now. Because this is the only way to understanding and awakening: what's happening now. We have nothing else but what's happening now. So that's another way that bright faith is really lit in me.

One last example of seeing how faith can give unexpected people the energy, the willingness to do something that would never have seemed possible.

This is another nun, Sumanachari, at Appamata. She came to us some years ago. She had a nunnery with about twenty-four, twenty-five nuns. She always seemed, to me, kind of depressive. There was the nunnery, and they were there just living like a nunnery. Not a lot of little nuns, mostly grown nuns. She's lovely—she would invite us over for mohinga—and she was nice, but she just seemed a little depressive, not much energy.

And then this one year she came over and was telling us how she was so unhappy in herself, she couldn't sleep at night, because she had realized that what she needed, what she really wanted to do, was to open a school—a free school for young kids. A lot of kids couldn't... this was before now, I don't even want to talk about how it is now, but this was some years ago, maybe ten years ago. There were government schools that are supposedly free, but there were all kinds of hidden costs. A lot of young kids—their parents couldn't afford to send them. So some nuns and monks would open schools in their monasteries and nunneries and make them free for the kids.

She wanted to do that for young kids up to about grade four. That means not only having a space—and the school just starts by being like a roof with desks, think of that as the school—but also hiring teachers, regular teachers.

All of this has to come from donations. They don't have any money. But the teachers are regular lay teachers that get paid a salary. So she needs to somehow raise the money to build this place, to hire teachers, to make room for it. And honestly, we really couldn't see how she could do it.

But we donated some, and a lot of people donated, I guess, because when we came back the next year, she'd done it. We went over to the place, and it had two buildings that the nuns lived in. One of them was gone, and all the nuns had crowded into this one building so that in the other area, she'd built this huge open space with a roof, filled with desks, hired some teachers, and over a hundred little kids were coming now every day. And that's just been growing over the years.

A huge amount of work. A huge amount of generosity, giving up how they lived. And she came and she was radiant. She was transformed. She said—let me see, I think I wrote it down—she said, yes, she's really tired. It's so much responsibility. You have to raise the money, pay the teachers, get the buildings going, sometimes provide the food. She says, "I'm exhausted, but I'm radiant." She says, "Now I sleep. My citta is peaceful. My heart, my mind is peaceful." And she's just kept going. This was some years ago.

So to me, when I think of it, that's a great example of how faith can lead to the willingness to do, and the sense of resolution—which is what I want to talk about now—the adhiṭṭhāna, the willingness, the resolve to just keep doing. Because once she started that school, you couldn't go, "Well, I don't feel like doing it anymore," right? Even in our meditation, even in our life.

I want to talk about adhiṭṭhāna, the pāramī of determination, resolution, because as a pāramī, it's a mental state. It's a mental factor. It's something we can experience in our hearts, in our minds. We can experience it here. We can learn to recognize this quality and incline our minds to it because it supports doing. It supports commitment.

Sometimes people say to me—a lot of people have said this—"If I give up wanting and aversion, as if we could, but if I didn't have wanting and aversion, how would I do anything? Would I just sit in my room?" I mean, that's heartbreaking, seeing that the only motivations for actions that we know are greed and aversion. So adhiṭṭhāna is a wonderful motivation to help us in intention.

It's a mental factor, and I want to just describe it, the ways it's described in some of the commentaries: resoluteness with steadiness of purpose, just really steady, unwavering in the face of disappointment and discouragement. Another example that's given is like steadfast, unmoving, like a stone pillar. Okay, that last one sounds a little inflexible —stone pillar, by God, I'm doing this. It's not like that. But it's really useful to explore and get familiar with. I've been finding it so helpful in practice and in life. So we can learn to recognize it.

As I said, we know how to do difficult things. We all have, not just coming to a retreat—that's difficult enough. Raising a family, going to work, taking care of elderly parents. We've all done things that are difficult, things we have to keep having some commitment to do. And I'm sure some of the time the motivation might be this adhiṭṭhāna, this form of resolve, which I'll describe more.

But a lot of the time—and we see this when we come to just being with the breath—the way we know how to do stuff is by pushing, striving. A lot of times people say, "I don't know how to do stuff other than that."

All this receiving, this doing of non-doing—what the heck are you talking about? We just know how to do things by striving and willpower. And we get stuff done that way. Like the people who say, "What do I do, just sit in my room?" We haven't really learned how to recognize consciously these other qualities, so we tend to use force. We tend to use willpower, aversion, or wanting.

And this can feel strong. Often people say anger, aversion—it feels strong. It helps you meet something difficult. It can help you overcome. And that might be true. But the quality in the heart-mind is not calm. It's not clear-seeing. It's the kilesas. It's a suffering quality—not just because it's unpleasant if you look carefully, but the real suffering of the kilesas is when they're present in the citta, in the heart-mind, without mindfulness recognizing them. They distort perception. We don't recognize accurately.

I think Monica might have said this last night, and the Buddha said it too: whenever any of the kilesas are present in the heart-mind and you don't see them, you can't see clearly. You can't see your own good, you can't see the good of another, you can't see the good of both. And so maybe we're pushing through with wanting, with aversion, we're getting stuff done—but it's coming together with this unwholesome confusion that increases greed and aversion and confusion.

Adhitana, determination as a parami, is wholesome. The inner experience is that you're present with great steadiness, but without aversion, without wanting, without this willpower sense of "me doing it, I'm so great." It's a beautiful quality, really. How do you say? It's like it aligns the energy. There's a sense of collecting the energy. It's calm. And we can learn to recognize it in our minds.

Several people have described how when we're lost in thought, the thought comes and then we see it. And often our habit of coming back to the breath is "get back to the breath!" And you get back to the breath, but there's a lot of aversion. But when you can say, "No, not now"—it's clear seeing. It's not "not now" with a hammer. No, not now. The energy's aligned. It's clear. "No, I'm just not doing that now. Come back to the breath." And you may do that ten million times, but feeling, learning to recognize how that quality of aligning energy feels, how that steadiness feels—it really calms the mind. We can learn to recognize it and incline the mind towards it, actually call it up.

A simple example—I've used this before in other talks, but in my daily life, every morning for two or three years, I've been liking to do about fifteen minutes of qigong exercises. When I do them, they're actually pleasant, and I almost always feel better. My energy kind of balances from doing them. But not every morning, almost every morning, I just don't feel like doing it. It's like, "Time to do the qigong." No. I don't really feel like doing it. And there's no good reason for it. It's just, "I'll just sit here. If I don't have to be somewhere, I'll have another cup of tea. Then maybe I can do the qigong. Or maybe after breakfast, then I'll do the qigong."

You know how that goes, right? "I've been trying to sit every morning..." I don't know—you English speakers, is this word your first language? "Dithering." It's a good word. Maybe I will, maybe I won't. I'll do it now, no, I'll do it later. Let me just rest a little bit first. But the rest isn't restful, because your mind's going, "Oh, I should..." Every morning, ridiculous, right? It's just—when you just get up and do it, it's so much easier. Even if you dithered, when you finally do it, it's nice, because the dithering's over.

One morning, I just noticed it. I started with that familiar "ah," and I said, no, just do it. And you can feel—I can feel—the energy just aligns. It's just, yeah, get up and do it. You stop with all the rationalization and this and that and the other. You just forget all of it. You just get up and do it.

Sometimes Sayadaw U Tejaniya would hold up the Nike swoosh—their slogan is "Just do it." He would just hold it up. But that's what adhiṭṭhāna is. Very gently, the energy aligns and you just do it. It's a relief. It's not about willpower. It's not personal. It's not about "I'm doing it." It's a relief.

And so that day when I recognized that, I thought, oh, right. It's so obvious. When I start with "should I," I can just know: adhiṭṭhāna. I'm going to do it. Oh yeah, adhiṭṭhāna. The mind collects, you just get up and do it.

Play with that here on retreat. You can see how it really supports our practice. It's simple. Notice places where you're dithering. We can rationalize anything, you know. But notice you're rationalizing. We'll get to that.

For example—I think maybe this morning, it all blends—but yes, when Dawn was talking about the precepts and saying, I felt the last one is like, if you wake up in the morning and it's half an hour early, but you're really awake. "No, I don't have to get up. The sitting starts at five. There's no need..." and on and on. Should I, shouldn't I? I roll over. I can see I'm not the only one who's ever done that.

Dithering. Adhiṭṭhāna—you pull it, you get up. That's it. It's so much easier. We think somehow we're being comfortable. This is how we're so deluded. You're lying there for half an hour, and then you finally get up. You're more tired. You don't feel good about yourself. You're rationalizing all the reasons you needed the rest. It's just—oh, yeah—trying to get up is a hundred times easier.

So there are all kinds of ways you can play with this. Steadiness—sometimes as the days go on, take a chunk of time in the morning and just follow the schedule. Just sit, walk, sit, walk. Not "should I walk now, or should I start now?" You just do it.

You don't think about it. It's so much easier, so much calmer. So just play with it.

The "not now" quality—I mean, it's not always available. No wholesome state is always available. But learning to recognize it, I always wish I'd learned about it more. It wasn't talked about too much in my early years of practice. As we get more familiar with the wholesome states, we can just bring them up. As someone has said, wisdom mind inclines to the wholesome. When wisdom is present, when there's mindfulness and wisdom, it's almost like you ask yourself: would you rather be with wholesome determination, or would you rather be with wanting and dithering? Wisdom will choose the wholesome if you just give it half a chance. Start to tune into that, because on retreat it's very supportive.

And it can help—though it's different from striving. It can move into striving and a determined "No, I have to do this, I should do it." And then it doesn't feel so wholesome anymore.

So there are four qualities that come with adhiṭṭhāna. Adhiṭṭhāna, this sense of the collectedness of mind and just doing it, is what's called in the Abhidhamma an "ethically variable" quality. That means you could have this quality of getting the mind collected and doing something, but you could do something unwholesome with that. It's ethically variable, depending on what other qualities are present in the mind. But as a pāramī, it's wholesome.

This quality of adhiṭṭhāna, as I've been talking about it, comes together with and is supported by wisdom. This is from the suttas: it says adhiṭṭhāna comes together with four qualities—discernment, a quality of wisdom; truthfulness; relinquishment; and calm.

I'll just say a little about each. Discernment is somewhat obvious. The sense of having a determination, a sense of what I'm going to do, what needs to be done, bringing it together—there needs to be discernment that the conditions are appropriate, supportive for that. The example I think of is the Buddha. The story goes that when he sat down under the Bodhi tree, he made this strong determination: "I don't get up until I completely awaken." Well, he'd been doing really strenuous—beyond strenuous—renunciate practice for six years before he took that determination and sat under the Bodhi tree. So somehow he had a sense that the conditions were supportive for that.

This is the discernment, the wisdom of really seeing what is. We don't always know, but we look carefully at what's supportive. For example, if I were to say now, "I'm going to go into the staff dining room, sit down, go into the fourth jhāna, and not get up for two days"—the conditions of my mind and body at the moment would not make that possible with some discernment. I'm exaggerating, but not really. For some people, that would be possible. It's not an impossible thing. But for me, at this moment, that wouldn't be adhiṭṭhāna. That would be some stupid expectation—stupid because I know better.

So discernment. You bring in: Is it realistic? Discernment takes some ability to look at what the conditions actually are. If you make a clear resolution that in this sitting you're not going to have any thoughts anymore—mostly, there could be a time when that might be possible, but for most of us, it's not. It's a wish. It turns into willpower, into striving. Adhiṭṭhāna isn't just deciding you're going to do something and doing it. It's this quality of seeing what's realistic.

But I could sit and walk every morning and try that for a week. And then when I don't feel like doing it—no, just do it and don't dither. You could do that. So explore for yourself.

The first quality that supports adhiṭṭhāna is wisdom, this discernment.

to assess realistically. And the second aspect is truthfulness. Truthfulness helps you see what's really possible, but also simply not kidding ourselves. You know what I mean? "Oh yes, I'm making this resolution, but I can't really do it. I'm too tired," whatever it is. Truthfulness is just being truthful with ourselves, not kidding ourselves, discerning realistically, and seeing as clearly as we can.

Relinquishment, of course—whenever the adhiṭṭhāna says "just get up," you're relinquishing lolling around in bed. When I say I'm going to sit, walk, sit, walk for the morning, I'm relinquishing doing other things. Relinquishment doesn't have to be suffering. It's not a suffering state, but it's just recognizing that to just do it, to bring all the energy in line in a certain way, is relinquishing doing something else. That's just obvious. But noticing that comes with it.

And the fourth—that all of these together bring—is calming. Working with and noticing adhiṭṭhāna, it's like you just do it. As I described with the qigong, it brings calm to the heart and mind. Not an incredible calm necessarily, but all that back and forth—should I, shouldn't I—the unease, the confusion, the wondering, the worry, that drops out. You just do the thing. It doesn't have to be a pleasant thing. It may be that fears are coming up and "how do I work with it?" Just be with it. It's like this. It's scary. It's unpleasant. But the adhiṭṭhāna, the determination, lets us be with it without fluctuating too much. So it's really supportive and it really brings calm.

This is not a should. None of this is a should. But start to tune into this as a wholesome quality of heart and mind that's available to us, that really supports our practice. And when we use aspiration and bright faith, this resolve comes out of that. It really supports us to continue with our practice.

This appears in another place in the suttas as well: adhiṭṭhāna comes with wisdom, it strengthens faith, and that brings energy. The Buddha said these circle around and support one another—wisdom, faith, energy, and commitment all circle around and support one another.

I just wanted to offer that for you to explore. And back to the beginning, I want to say again: don't be shy about aspiration, about really acknowledging to yourself what's truly important to you. Don't get into all the "me" and "it's not possible" and all of that. That's just story. What's really important to you? And remember, the path is lifelong. Everything in our life is part of the path.

I want to read this from Ajahn Chah:

The Dhamma that we need to see and to know can be seen right here within us, every moment of every day. We ask, "When will we see the Dhamma?" But it is right here, to be seen in the present. In a nutshell, the point of the teaching of the Buddha is to transform one's view. It is possible for it to change. It only requires looking at things and then it happens. These things are right here. We don't need to look up at the sky or down at the earth.

And back to: "The Dhamma that we need to see and to know can be seen right here within us, every moment of every day."

And from His Holiness the Dalai Lama: "One day, you will become bodhisattvas in reality. So whatever obstacles there are, however long it takes, do not be discouraged."

And as the Buddha said, don't settle for anything less than the sure heart's release.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 79

The Dart: Understanding Vedanā

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this profound dharma talk from the three-month retreat at IMS, Carol Wilson offers an in-depth exploration of vedanā—the feeling tone that arises with every moment of consciousness. Drawing primarily from the Sallatha Sutta (SN 36.6), known as "The Dart," she illuminates how an untaught person experiences two darts of suffering when touched by unpleasant feeling: the initial unpleasant vedanā and the mental anguish of resisting it.
>
> Wilson explains vedanā's crucial position in both the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) and dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda), showing how feeling tone gives rise to craving, which hardens into grasping and ultimately leads to suffering. She explores the Buddha's teaching on gratification, danger, and escape—how pleasant experience genuinely gratifies, yet its impermanent nature and our addiction to it constitute real danger, while the abandoning of desire and lust represents true escape.
> The talk offers practical guidance for investigating vedanā in daily life—while eating, walking, or experiencing temperature changes—and reveals how steady mindfulness allows us to see the difference between vedanā itself and our reactive patterns. Wilson emphasizes that awakening doesn't mean escaping unpleasant experience, but rather finding the stability of awareness that isn't tossed about by reactivity to pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feelings.

So tonight I was going to talk a bit more about vedanā, because when Vance introduced it so excellently this morning, I thought, well, in five minutes he said everything that needed to be said, but somehow I'll find an hour's worth in it.

It's actually such an essential experience. It holds a key place in several of the maps the Buddha spoke about that bring us into suffering on a moment-to-moment basis. And yet it's something that, until I heard about it from the Buddha's teaching, I never would have noticed. Would you ever notice it? To me, this is one of the more incredibly brilliant things about the Buddha—that he actually could have the clarity to see this arising, because vedanā happens so quickly, and then to see how it works, how it functions. So I'll talk some more about it because it's so fascinating, so often unrecognized. And it happens so quickly that even when we're thinking about it or kind of aware, we're often not going to notice it. So I hope you didn't make yourself crazy today trying to notice it, because it's arising in every moment of consciousness. Cut yourself some slack, but do notice it at times.

Vedanā is key—it is the second of the four foundations of mindfulness for that reason, as Vance described so well. It's a key link in the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination, how a moment of ignorance goes through these twelve links, culminating in suffering. That's a whole complex teaching I'm not going to give tonight. But in the middle sections, the six sense bases give rise to contact, which I'll talk about more. Contact gives rise to feeling. And this is how suffering works: feeling, vedanā, feeling tone, gives rise to craving. Craving can be going toward or going back. Craving gives rise to grasping—it hardens into reaching and grasping. That gives rise to becoming, which is even more settled in. And that gives rise to birth, birth as whatever the particular grasping thing was.

Ajahn Chah said once, going through the twelve links of dependent origination, it's not like a slow thing where you can kind of watch each one. He said it's like you fall from a tree and on the way down you hit twelve branches. I like that. He's so funny, Ajahn Chah. But it's like that—boom, and you wake up in suffering. That's how it works.

This is that central point where we can actually, with steady mindfulness, see how it works. This is what's so great about our practice—not trying to avoid it. Once we understand again and again and again, seeing how it works, that's when the wisdom, paññā, comes in, and we don't have to pick up the craving every time there's feeling tone.

As Vance also said, vedanā is kind of a key player in the arising in the mind of the three unwholesome roots: greed, ill-will or dosa, and delusion. Again and again, the Buddha speaks of these three unwholesome roots as basically the source of suffering. They're unwholesome not just because they don't feel so good—they don't, they torment our mind—but often in the texts, liberation, nibbāna, is spoken of as the heart-mind that is free from greed, hatred, and delusion in a moment. So they're not just things that are a pain in the neck. They're actually the deepest level of torment, because the mind's non-recognition of their presence and the identifying with them and perceiving through them is actually what blocks our recognition of ultimate peace of heart and mind. They're roots of suffering, big time.

As Vance said, we see how pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral vedanā, unrecognized, lead into these unwholesome roots. That's a lot of what I'm going to talk about tonight, referencing a sutta of the Buddha where he talks about this, which I have found so helpful.

First, though, just to describe the situation we find ourselves in as human beings—or at least I do. One way the Buddha described the world, or our world as a human being, is simply the six sense experiences. So when he talks about the world, he's talking about seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and the whole mental experience. Very basic. All day our experience, again as Vance mentioned, is one of sense contact. Every moment of consciousness, there's some sense contact. Sight comes together with the sight organ that works, and there's consciousness, knowing at that moment. Those three come together—that's called contact, phassa. Now, how many contacts all day long? Every moment that we're conscious, there's sense contact.

And leaving aside vedana, because we're not normally going through life noticing that—but our habit is that some of these sense contacts we like. We don't think, "Oh, pleasant contact." We just like it. We don't even think that, but that's how it is. Some of them we really don't like. Obviously a mistake—somebody else's or ours. But that's how we take it. Many, many of them, as Vance said, we don't even notice. Nothing's happening. But there's never nothing happening. There's stuff happening all the time, but it's not worth our attention. Have you found yourself at all during this retreat waiting to be mindful for something worth being mindful of? There's always something happening.

So, contact. That's what's going on all day long. And mostly in life, without steady mindfulness, without our Dhamma understanding, the experience—we like it, we don't like it, we don't even think that—but our attention is, you can almost say, entranced by the experience and by our reactions to it. "Oh, what a beautiful sunset, that feels so nice," and then wherever it goes from there. To us, that's the experience. That whole thing. We're kind of entranced by it, by our reactions. And we tend to get involved in whatever the object is. And the object is very often mental—our moods, our emotions, our thoughts. We like it, we don't like it, it's good, it's bad, or whatever. And this is really how we live our life, not recognizing this habit.

So when we like something, it's pleasant. We don't notice that. When we don't like it, there's something wrong. Neutral, we don't notice. And really, I think almost all of the accepted worldview is that pleasant is the way it's supposed to go. I mean, not pretending—we know otherwise. It's just, this is where we have to be honest and truthful with ourselves, because we see: unpleasant. We don't notice unpleasant. We just notice we don't like it. And as I said, something is wrong. People kind of giggle at that, but that's it.

You're having a really nice sitting, and then it all goes to hell in a handbasket. What did you do wrong? Because once it's pleasant, of course that's right, and it should stay that way. And if it doesn't, it's because you've done something wrong, or someone else did something wrong and messed up your meditation. But that comes to be kind of an underlying assumption—that we shouldn't have other experience. And when we are discontent, when things aren't going well, the response is how to get a better experience. And behind it all is one we like. Pleasant. That's just kind of a given.

And if you think it's not, just over the days, over the months, notice how that slips in the back of your mind. When you're feeling discontent, you think, "Well, the practice is going well. I know it's impermanent, blah, blah, blah." But there's this little discontent. Just check it out.

One time I was doing walking meditation at Shwe Oo Min. Fine, I was present, I was with whatever was going on. Nothing special was happening, but I was there doing it. And I just felt this discontent. So I thought, "What's the view in the back of the mind?" How it should be—that we don't quite recognize is there. And when we don't recognize it, it gets this little dart in. If you recognize it, it helps. So I said, "Okay, what's the view?" The thought was: it should be better. What should be better? Anything.

This moment should be better. There was nothing wrong with it. But you can't win with that one. Because it should always be better. It can always be better. That's the tendency to evaluate ourselves and the world, and it really becomes a guiding principle of our life—how to get it better.

Ajahn Buddhadasa said once—we've referenced him a few times; he was really a great scholar and teacher and quite a character—anyway, he said once: When you do something, when you make a decision, just do something and see why. He says, maybe it's an exaggeration, I don't know, check it out. But he said you'll see that ninety-five percent of everything you do is for pleasant feeling. You can throw away that number, but have a look. It's a little bit scary when we start to see it, and how far down the road we go with that.

Because what that does, as I think I said before, is that wanting is wanting. Wanting more pleasant—it's a maker of measurement, the Buddha said. It narrows our world to me and the pleasant experience, or to me and the unpleasant experience, or how to get a better pleasant experience. All the involvement is about me. And our life really becomes evaluating a sense of self, a sense of meaning from whatever object's happening and how pleasant it is or not. Maybe I'm simplifying a little bit. But honestly, I don't think as much as you might think I'm simplifying.

So it's challenging. This is the definition of saṃsāra. It keeps us leaning, looking into the next thing, the next thing. This one's pleasant, but it goes away. How to get another? Or it's pleasant—but notice, sometimes something's pleasant, pleasant, and then it becomes neutral. You've got to ramp it up a little bit more. Look at media these days. Look at the intensity. I can't bear it, mostly. I used to like movies, but everything—they have to ramp up the intensity to an unbearable level, because we get dulled out. And neutral doesn't count. So even when things are good, they could always be a little bit better.

I think I mentioned that one of the Tibetan descriptions of saṃsāra is the urge to correct. You can always just fix it a little bit. Just a little bit, it could be better. And so we get focused on the object, focused on what it means about me. And we're tossed in our life between pleasure and pain, liking and disliking—like ping pong, back and forth, back and forth. And reactive to that, of course.

So in our practice, that's happening, but we have the capacity—the steadiness of mindfulness and the curiosity of Dhamma—to look and see what's really going on. Not just buying into the assumption.

But the way we toss back and forth—I remembered an example when I talked about this. I don't know, it speaks to me. It's from American football, which I know little about and care less. And for you Europeans, I mean football, not soccer. So I was watching the Super Bowl, which is the big finale, which again, I could care less. But I was with a bunch of friends, and that's what we were doing. And they cared. So I was watching. It was toward the end, a few years ago. Those football fans, I'm sure I'll get this wrong. Please, I don't want any notes about how I got it wrong. I'm just trying to make a point here.

So the Patriots were playing – that's New England, Tom Brady, very famous quarterback. And it was just right near the last two or three minutes of the whole game, and they were behind. They were about to lose. I don't have to go into how the game is played, but they cut to him because he wasn't playing at that moment – the defense was playing, so he was on the bench.

The look of total, total dejection, depression. He was practically crying. He looked completely down. And you just feel – this is the mind in unpleasant experience. This is the mind totally submerged in it.

And then some amazing thing happened. This is what I know I'll get wrong, but somehow I think one of the Patriots made an interception and ran all the way the length of the field. Some amazing thing happened, and they made a touchdown and won in the last two minutes, which never happens. And they cut to him, and he's screaming and yelling, so happy, jumping all around.

This is like two minutes. Completely immersed in each one. That's how we live our life. It's exhausting.

And given the chance, I'm sure he'd do it again. He'd go for more high, more high, and the highs are measured by the lows, and on and on. So you get the drift. This is how our life can go. Without recognizing how pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant affects all our reactions, we're just going to keep ping-ponging back and forth.

So now I want to talk a bit about vedana, feeling tone. I'll read through and keep commenting on this sutta, this discourse of the Buddha. I like it because of how he starts it. It's called the Sallata Sutta, the Dart.

"An untaught worldling" – he says that a lot; that's most of us – "bhikkhus, experiences pleasant vedana, they experience unpleasant vedana, and they experience neutral vedana. A well-taught noble disciple likewise experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral."

So if you're still secretly holding out the hope that when you get enlightened, unpleasant feeling is a thing of the past, hang it up right now.

So a well-taught noble disciple likewise experiences. What's the difference? What's the distinction that exists between a well-taught noble disciple and an untaught worldling? Interesting, no? Gets the attention. What is the difference if they're still experiencing sense contact and vedana in the same way?

This shows the Buddha didn't wake up into a different world, and nor will we. It's the same world with all the same junk going on. So what's the difference in terms of vedana?

"When an untaught worldling is touched by an unpleasant" – now he's using bodily vedana, bodily feeling, but it could be either – "bodily vedana, they worry and grieve, they lament, they beat their breast, they weep and are distraught. Thus they experience two kinds of vedana: a bodily unpleasant and a mental unpleasant."

Can you relate to that at all? At all, right?

"It is as if a person were pierced by a dart, and following the first piercing is hit by a second dart." Oh my God, my knee hurts, I can't believe it, it's so horrible – the two. "So that person will experience vedana caused by two darts. Similarly, with an untaught worldling, when touched by an unpleasant bodily feeling, they worry and grieve, lament, beat their breast, weep, and are distraught."

Sayadaw Tejaniya calls this "double dukkha." And that's what we do with unpleasant—it's wrong, it's bad, how do I get rid of it? We're entranced by that reaction. We totally believe it. We're totally caught up. And there's a whole storm we don't notice.

But this is where it gets really interesting to me, because he's explaining how these habits of sense desire, aversion, and delusion come about moment to moment. They're habits.

So, having been touched by that unpleasant vedana, they resist and resent it. Can you relate to that? Resist and resent it. Then in one who so resists and resents that painful vedana, an underlying tendency, an underlying habit of resistance against unpleasant feeling comes to underlie the mind.

Every moment of consciousness, if there's a moment of resistance, that's what's being practiced in that moment. It strengthens the tendency for resistance to arise in the next moment. If mindfulness is present, it makes it a little more possible for mindfulness to arise in the next moment. It's just cause and effect. It's just science.

So he's saying that resisting the unpleasant comes to be a habit that underlies the mind whenever there's unpleasant.

And then he goes on. Under the impact of that unpleasant feeling, one then proceeds to enjoy, to look for sensual happiness. Why does one do so? An untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feeling tones except the enjoyment of sensual happiness.

That to me is such a powerful and poignant statement. If we look around the world, ordinary people who aren't paying attention—the only escape they know from unpleasant is to go find something pleasant, whatever it is. It could be something simple or something twisted, whatever that person finds pleasant. It's so sad. It's so sad that that's all someone knows to escape to.

So in one who enjoys sensual happiness, the underlying tendency to lust for pleasant feeling tones comes to underlie the mind. They do not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feeling tones. They don't see the impermanence, nor the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feeling tones.

Only knowing how to go for sense pleasure, not understanding the impermanence, not understanding the gratification, danger, and escape—when one lacks that understanding, the underlying tendency to ignorance as to neutral feeling tones comes to underlie the mind.

Since feeling tones are arising every moment, how many moments are there of unaware practicing of these habits? No wonder the habits of wanting, of ill will and aversion, and of delusion are so strong in our minds. They arise so frequently. It's not something you're doing wrong. This is how our lives have been conditioned. It's impersonal.

And I appreciate how he's describing it. He's not saying you're a stupid jerk because you're doing that. He's saying this is what's happening when we don't understand.

So when such a one experiences a pleasant vedana, an unpleasant vedana, or a neutral vedana, they feel it as one fettered by it, as one chained by it. We're caught by the pleasant, by the unpleasant, by the neutral, caught because of the ignorance. Such a one, O monks, is called an untaught worldling who is fettered, who is chained by birth, by old age, by death, by sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair. He is fettered by this suffering—this I declare.

You could say it's intense, but I say it's actually a fairly accurate description of a great deal of life without awareness.

So let me talk a little bit about what he's describing—that we don't know of any other escape, we don't see the impermanence, and we don't understand the gratification, the danger, and the escape. That's a nice way to talk about it.

First, just understanding the impermanence. Watch how with just a pleasant feeling or unpleasant feeling, our mind just takes off into story and sense of self and all of our life. It can just go wild.

This is from Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche, actually the older brother of Tsoknyi and Mingyur Rinpoche. He's talking about renunciation as what he calls "weariness with samsara" – this endless cycling. And he's not saying we hate it. We're just saying, "Really? Again? Again? Again? Do I need to keep doing this?" And we don't.

He says, watch. Watch the fickleness of the mind. Do you know fickleness? Fickleness is often used in terms of when you're in a relationship and you're fickle – you don't really stay committed to one person. You go to someone else, you go to someone else. The mind is fickle. It isn't steady.

So he says watch how easily the mind is influenced just by a pleasant or unpleasant sight or sound into an immediate mood, into a whole world. Do you notice that? You're in a good mood, so that's pleasant vedana, which we didn't notice. We walk outside, all set to look at the sunset, and a big dark cloud comes, and it gets really cold, and suddenly we're miserable.

Do we notice? When we're mindful, we might, and then we can just laugh at it. But you see, that's a very simple example. Take a bad mood. Take your meditation tanking. Take something that's really spinning you out, a really difficult emotion. We don't tend to think, "Oh yes, that's an unpleasant emotion." No, no – it's me and this, and what can I do? A whole world.

And then it vanishes. It does, right? It's just gone. And do we notice? "Oh yes, unpleasant has vanished, and now it's neutral." It's like, "Oh thank god, it's gone, I got through it." No, no, no – a whole other world. That's what he's talking about.

We don't want to simply recognize, "Oh yes, pleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling." The Buddha said: "Before my enlightenment, oh monks, when I was still a Bodhisatta, it occurred to me: what is the gratification in the world? It occurred to me: whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, this is the gratification in the world. That the world is impermanent, bound up with suffering and subject to change – this is the danger in the world. The abandoning of desire and lust for the world – this is the escape from the world."

"If, bhikkhus, there were no gratification in this world, beings would not become enamored with the world. But because there is gratification, beings become enamored with the world."

Again, he's being very reasonable. He's not saying there's no such thing as pleasure. He's not saying there's no such thing as beauty. And he says, "the abandoning of desire and lust for the world." He didn't say abandoning the objects.

"If there were no danger in the world, beings would not become disenchanted. But there is danger, so beings become disenchanted. If there were no escape, beings could not escape."

But there is an escape, and beings can escape from the suffering.

So I want to talk a little bit about that, because I think sometimes it's perhaps a bit misunderstood. Bhikkhu Bodhi talks about gratification, danger, and escape—something mentioned frequently in the suttas in different contexts. I like the way Bhikkhu Bodhi speaks about these three as three movements in an unfolding process of insight. It's not like something we have to get, but rather something we explore. As I think we've said before, hopefully everything we say is an impetus for you to explore, not to memorize. Memorizing won't help. So it's an invitation—three movements in an unfolding process of insight.

Gratification. There is gratification. There is pleasure. What does gratification mean? I looked it up in the dictionary: to satisfy or please, to give pleasure by satisfying desires or humoring inclinations. So pleasant experience is gratifying. What I pick up from the sense of gratification is that it feeds a sense of me appreciating what's happening.

In talking about the hindrances, the Buddha said once that what increases sense desire is unwise attention. You keep paying attention to the gratification of the pleasant. You're not just noticing it's pleasant, or "this is a lovely cup of tea." It's unwise attention to the beautiful aspect—"Oh, that's so nice. That's so nice. Oh, this feels really good. This feels really good." Unwise attention to that aspect keeps us spinning in the gratification, feeds sense desire, feeds the sense of me. Attending only to the pleasing sign, the pleasing aspect.

You know how sometimes it's talked about when you first get a crush on somebody—maybe not even really falling in real love, but a crush. Whenever you look at them, you don't see all the junky stuff and the dirty socks. Later you see that when the crush-eyes go away. But in that moment, you only tune in to the beautiful stuff. Even if it's not there, the mind is projecting it. That's unwise attention to the pleasing sign. "Ah, look how they walk. Oh, look how they sit." We all know that. We know that's all down the path to suffering, but that's never stopped anyone yet.

So noticing the gratification, that's all. Noticing how it works. Sometimes people think, "Oh yes, pleasant feeling. I get attached. It leads to suffering." So they try to shut down, not have pleasant, not experience pleasure. All pleasure is bad. Beautiful things are bad. That's just aversion. That's not helpful. But yes, there are times you shut the sense doors. You're so sucked into the beautiful thing, you might think of turning your attention in another direction. We can take some wise decisions. But understanding how gratification works—this is where coming back to notice that pleasant feeling matters. It's not all about how the person looks. It's like there's a pleasant feeling. There's seeing and a pleasant feeling. Seeing and a pleasant feeling. It's so nothing. A pleasant feeling just comes and goes.

And if we're noticing that every moment—pleasant feeling gone, let me look again so I can have another pleasant feeling—that's what we're doing. And when you stop getting that pleasant feeling from looking at that person, then it all goes in the wrong direction. I'm not getting a pleasant feeling. I need to go somewhere else, get a new pleasant feeling, look at someone else, look at something else—all for the sake of pleasant feeling.

But there is gratification in the world. And that's why we become enamored. But when we see and start to tune into just that pleasant feeling leading into it, it takes the mystery away. Maybe you don't want to take the mystery away—you're welcome not to. We'll keep on going like we are. But if you bring in the steadiness of awareness, you'll see: oh yeah, pleasant feelings.

The danger—the obvious aspect of danger—is of course just the impermanence, just on that level. The impermanence of pleasant feeling tone. Also the impermanence of unpleasant feeling tone. Vedanā. The impermanence of everything, right? But leaning into any experience to give us happiness when it's based on having pleasant feeling tone is, of course, completely unreliable. So that's the obvious danger. And I think intellectually we can understand that. But we need to have steady attention where we can see: oh, that pleasant feeling tone's gone. And leaning into looking for another one—to see that change.

Another danger is the addictive, delusory aspect. Again, not seeing the pleasant clearly, but just thinking, "Oh yeah, this is really what it's about. I feel good." And when we feel good, we can say, "Well, they talk about having a calm, balanced mind. That's how my mind is now. It feels good. I'm not suffering. It's calm. It's balanced because I've got what I want." And there's a moment with no wanting. That's why it feels pleasant.

Notice that. When there's not craving, or aversion, or delusion in the mind, it's really peaceful and stable. Notice that. Why does it feel good when we get what we want? Because the craving drops away. It's not about the thing. The craving in the mind, in the heart, is torment. But we get so confused—we mistake it for pleasure, or taking us into pleasure, you know.

So just the steady looking: the craving drops. You get the thing and you don't get the thing—it doesn't matter. The craving's gone. There's peace. There's momentary peace.

And the other danger, as I said, keeps us looking in the same direction. It keeps feeding the danger of going after pleasant feeling, avoiding unpleasant feeling, ignoring the neutral. It keeps us feeding the habit of the kilesas—of greed, hatred, delusion. It keeps those habits going. That's just what he's saying. And that is the real torment of suffering—of mind and body leading to our actions and thus creating more confusion and suffering in the world, in our relationships.

Just recognizing with awareness the inner instability and dis-ease that's present in our citta, our mind, our body, when there's strong kilesa—when there's greed, when there's ill will, aversion, when there's delusion—and not recognizing when we're identified. We're looking out, we're looking to the object, you know, to get it more pleasant. But what's the suffering? It's the presence of kilesa in the heart-mind.

All the teachings, in a way, are ways to help us understand this—to stop feeding these kilesas, these habits. To stabilize, to learn to recognize and trust the wholesome qualities of mind. And mindfulness, and the steadiness of mindfulness that leads into steadiness of samādhi, of clear seeing—these are the conditions that allow for this wisdom, this paññā, to arise. It's not that we, as an act of will, decide to stop doing this stuff.

That's just more delusion. But wisdom sees how things actually are, how they already are.

When we start to see and recognize—oh yes, look at that—this pleasant feeling leading into suffering, all this resisting the unpleasant, everything I'm doing not to have to feel unpleasant vedanā. Look at all the suffering! We start to see it. And not be afraid of unpleasant feeling tone. Not be afraid of losing pleasant. Not ignoring completely all the moments that aren't juicy enough to pay attention to. We start to see accurately. The wisdom comes in, and you might think, "Oh, what can I have another?" It doesn't matter. There's peace. Just for a moment, recognize those moments. It really feeds the wisdom.

So the escape—and that is how the Buddha described it—the obvious escape is not that you have to enter some gray world of no beauty, but the abandoning of desire and lust for the world. This is the escape.

Again, we so often conflate the desire, the wanting, with happiness that it's really quite common for people to say—and not just at the beginning of their practice—that they're coming up against some experience that's really beautiful and lovely. You can feel the clinging in there, but it feels so intertwined, as if the clinging is part of it. So we confuse the clinging for ease, for happiness. And people say, "Well, I don't want to keep on this path if it means giving this up." That's just another mind moment to explore. But look at it—we get so conflated with the clinging, the craving, with what's lovely and beautiful.

And yes, there's no way around awakening without also finding the willingness, the ability to be really present with the unpleasant. Equally present. That's really the mind of equanimity. That's what we're exploring here.

Honestly, I know you probably know this—maybe you don't—but I say this often: the really difficult parts of retreat, when you're still practicing, still being here, being mindful, those difficult parts are really the gift of the Dhamma. That's where the learning is going to come. Steve Armstrong used to say something about nothing ruining your day like a good sitting.

I have a good friend whose first retreat was all wonderful, wonderful, wonderful. I swear, for ten years afterward he couldn't get through a retreat because it was never all wonderful again. Because that experience feeds our misconception that it's all about nice and beautiful and wonderful. If that happened to you and you're just floating in bliss but without wisdom, without clear seeing, how do you think we learn what the Buddha's talking about here—about how the habits of greed, hatred, and delusion arise? Not by listening to me talk about it, not by reading about it, but by being it, by learning it, by really feeling and seeing how it happens.

And luckily, you will have ten million opportunities. So if you miss one or two little moments of pleasant or unpleasant feeling, you'll probably have another one pretty soon. And you usually can't tell what you're learning at the time.

Sometimes I feel like our job as teachers is just to keep you going. Just keep you going. "Okay, it all stinks. It all hurts. Fine. Take a step. Notice the sensations." "Oh, you're really unhappy? I'm sorry. How does it feel? Pleasant? Unpleasant? You may notice." That's what we do. We try to be empathetic, but then keep going, keep going. Because that's where the wisdom's going to come.

Mingyur Rinpoche says, you know, part of the escape is being willing, just in a moment, to put down that craving, that clinging, that lust for the pleasant, that fear of the unpleasant.

We start to recognize, at times, that we can feel pleasure—a sense of peace, as Mingyur Rinpoche describes it—that arises from the stability of awareness. This is awareness that is not dependent on the absence or presence of unpleasant or pleasant experience. Peace comes from the stability of awareness, the stability of knowing that isn't being jerked around by reactivity to pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. He says awareness itself is inherently calm.

This is something interesting to notice. And as the practitioner was talking about concentration and how this sense of calm and peace comes in—it's not only there. As I was saying, one of the real ways we experience calm and peace is when the mind is really present and awake and there's not kilesa coloring the citta. That could be just for a moment. One of the reasons the unified mind of wholesome concentration is so pleasant is because those kilesa are not activated. That's one of the reasons. But it's also that you can feel the stability of steady awareness, the wisdom that comes, and that inherent calm or peace when we're not being tossed around by the kilesa.

I say this to perhaps give a little more interest in exploring: How does feeling tone work? How does it arise? Let me see for myself. The absence of torments is really a powerful thing, and we can notice many moments of that.

So then, taking this into practice, into our mindfulness practice, I've nothing amazing and new to say except steadiness of awareness and, from time to time, tuning into vedana. I just want to say it's very subtle and quick. So often it's so quick that many people, when they experience aversion, don't even feel the difference between unpleasant vedana and aversion. It comes so fast. Or of course there's wanting—it's pleasant, it's wanting. They're so intertwined. So it does take a little steadiness to explore.

I'll offer some hints about times when you might investigate—not when you're all in an uproar about something, but when you're kind of interested, nothing much is happening. You might have a look and see. When something's going on that's maybe kind of easy to feel, often in the body, pleasant or unpleasant, maybe that's not overwhelming, that maybe is a little bit repetitive. You can just notice: you go outside and it's cold. It's cold. Once you get over that, just kind of feel cold. See, the mind goes right into aversion. That's where I go with cold. Maybe you like cold. Maybe your mind goes into aversion with heat and into liking with cold. Either way, it doesn't matter. But keep noticing—your mind goes off into story, but there's the cold again. Just keep coming back, playing around, coming back with a conscious awareness that this is a choice of wisdom. Just go right to the cold. Not even looking for it, but just right to the sensation itself. Again and again. Maybe it's right off into the wanting again. Maybe not. Sometimes then, just in little things like this, you can feel that subtle sense of pleasant or unpleasant. And it could change, either way.

Or when you're eating, perhaps the taste of the food is pleasant. Or you know it's pleasant because you're liking it, so you can assume it's pleasant. So explore. Take a bite and just really be there for that burst of flavor. Take another chew. See if you notice the pleasantness. I haven't noticed, but the third bite is just like mush, mush—no flavor at all, right? So you hurry it down to get to the next pleasant experience. Notice that. Mush, mush—unpleasant.

Something's still happening. Maybe it's more neutral. Watch and see. Or maybe the unpleasant is often a thought—"Oh no, the tongue wants some more." Often, what is giving rise to the vedanā is a thought, and we can easily miss that. So explore in ways like that.

I remember one retreat I was doing, walking meditation, pretty slow. I was doing this style in the days when it would take me literally half an hour to walk the length of one of the upstairs halls. So I was doing that, really into it. And a fly came, you know, and was walking on me. Not a biting fly, just a fly. This is where noticing intention becomes interesting—to move my arm up to brush the fly away would be three times slower than I just demonstrated it. Too much trouble. So I wasn't doing that. I was just noticing. Because the fly kept going and I was really present.

So then I just started noticing the little feet. And because it kept going and my mind was pretty present, that's when I really saw—oh, the unpleasant! And I really saw the difference between unpleasant and aversion. It's not the same thing.

Now, a very smart teacher says, and so I have to acknowledge he may be right—so keep looking, don't just believe me—he says that as soon as we label vedanā as unpleasant, there's already a tinge of aversion. So look and see how it is for you. For me, that little experience with the fly, I don't think there was. I could tell the difference. But we're all different. Look and see.

Something repetitive that's going on that's really pleasant, that's unpleasant—you can see when you notice the vedanā, and then when you go off into the story about it. Just exploring, not to get it right, but to see how this works. This is really where the freedom comes in.

This is from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. You've heard this: "When feeling a pleasant feeling, one knows: I feel a pleasant feeling." That's it. "When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one knows: I feel an unpleasant feeling." Okay, what do you do when you feel a neutral feeling? "I'm feeling a neutral feeling." That's it.

If you're looking for more, then we're looking for some gratification, some juice, and that's what we don't want to give up. That gratification that feeds that sense of me, that makes me feel so alive.

Just a couple more things I want to read. This is again from the Buddha, giving instructions: "Having seen a form with mindfulness muddled..." You know what muddled means? Just all murky and unclear. "Having seen a form with mindfulness muddled..." I know that never happens to any of you, but should it... "Attending to the pleasing sign, one experiences the pleasing thing with infatuated mind and remains tightly holding to it."

Which could be something as pleasing as the sight of two more brownies on the plate. Pleasing sight. One holds to the pleasing thing with infatuated mind. "Many feelings flourish within, originating from the visible form, from covetousness and annoyance as well." Which could come up. "And one's mind becomes disturbed."

The visual, the brownie—I want it. There's only two and those two people are getting it. All this stuff flourishes, comes up from a pleasant sight. One's mind becomes disturbed. "For one who accumulates suffering thus, Nibbana is said to be far away."

In that moment—remember, it's all only moments.

Now contrast this: when clearly mindful, steadily mindful, one sees a form. One is not inflamed by lust for forms. One experiences it with an unattached, a dispassionate mind and does not remain holding tightly. "Oh yes, pleasant sight, two brownies." One fares mindfully in such a way that even as one sees the form, and while one undergoes a feeling—pleasant feeling tone—suffering is exhausted. In that moment, suffering is let go of. It's not built up.

"Exhausted"—she's not saying you pushed it away. It's exhausted because it's not being fed. This is where the kilesas in the mind... it's not that we have to hate them, but they're arising moment to moment. The kilesas, the wanting, the suffering, is fed by that attachment to the pleasant and by that leaning into it. When we don't feed it, it's exhausted. It goes out. This connects to the image of nirvana as a flame going out because the fuel isn't feeding it anymore. Just in that moment.

"While one undergoes a feeling, suffering is exhausted, not built up. For such a one, Nibbana is said to be close by."

You see, that's what the Buddha is saying. It's really all happening in the moment.

I want to end with a little shift, some words from Pema Chödrön, putting this into more day-to-day language:

"The essence of life is that it is challenging. Sometimes it is sweet, and sometimes it is bitter. Sometimes your body tenses and sometimes it relaxes and opens. Sometimes you have a headache and sometimes you feel 100% healthy. From an awakened perspective, trying to tie up all the loose ends and finally get it together is death, because it involves rejecting a lot of your basic experience. When we wake up, we can live fully without seeking pleasure and avoiding pain. We can live fully."

We think we're living fully holding on to pleasure and avoiding pain, but this is really what's blocking full life. We can live fully without recreating ourselves when we fall apart. We can let ourselves feel our emotions as hot or cold, vibrating or smooth. We can give up on being perfect and instead experience each moment to its fullest.

That's really the escape. We're so lucky that we're learning there is an escape, that we're not caught, that the only thing we know how to do isn't simply lust after pleasure.

May the calm and peace that arises in our own hearts and minds when we're free from confusion be shared with all beings. May our practice be a cause, a condition for all beings to awaken from suffering and confusion.

CHAPTER 80

Exploring Sense of Self

Carol Wilson · 51 min

In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson explores one of the most fundamental misperceptions in Buddhist understanding: the belief in a permanent, separate self (sakkāyadiṭṭhi). Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and Thanissaro Bhikkhu, she explains how saṃsāra is not a place but a process—the tendency to create worlds through our thoughts and then inhabit them, driven by the distortions of perception (vipallāsa).

Wilson offers practical guidance for investigating the sense of self as it arises in meditation. Rather than trying to think our way into understanding anattā (not-self), she encourages bringing steady mindfulness to notice how the sense of 'I, me, and mine' gets concocted from ordinary sense experience through grasping and clinging. She illustrates this with vivid examples: how a simple cricket sound can spin into elaborate stories of nostalgia or despair, how walking meditation can trigger either grandiose fantasies or harsh self-judgment, and how the same news heard in different mental states produces entirely different responses.

The talk emphasizes that moments empty of self-sense are completely natural and occur hundreds of times daily—we simply don't notice them because we're habituated to attending to what's louder and more dramatic. Wilson invites practitioners to develop appreciation for these moments of simplicity, to notice the space between thoughts and activities, and to trust that when clinging releases, wholesome qualities like compassion and equanimity naturally arise. The practice is not about annihilating the self but about recognizing awareness itself as refuge.

So the other night, Sally spoke about delusion. One major aspect, one major way that delusion shows up is misperception. This is what Vance spoke about when he mentioned the vipalasas, the distortions—sometimes people translate it as the hallucinations of perception. Due to kilesa in the mind, the mind simply recognizes something wrongly. And then we think about that and we act from that. Unfortunately, that's what we're doing a lot of the time.

One of the major ways that insight actually works, what insight actually is, is a shift of perception. It's not that the way the Dhamma is or the way reality is changes, but the perception shifts, the kilesas go, and perception comes into alignment with how things actually are. That gives rise to appropriate response, to appropriate understanding.

Sayadaw U Pandita said once that when delusion, when moha is operating in the mind, we don't see what is here and we do see what's not here. It's really true.

The Dalai Lama has said many times—actually Thich Nhat Hanh, many people say the same thing—but I like this one from the Dalai Lama: "All of our difficulties come from mistaken perception. And this ignorance is at the root of the 84,000 destructive emotions and cognitive obscurations." You think you've had a lot of destructive emotions so far—84,000, and cognitive obscurations! But we can narrow it down to greed, hatred, and delusion, and that's just fine, because they're all subsets of that.

The Dalai Lama goes on to say that when our hearts and minds are not clouded by confusion, what he believes are our true human values—wisdom, compassion, generosity, metta, equanimity—these qualities of heart and mind are what naturally manifest in response to life when the mind and heart isn't clouded.

So our path of awakening, our path of sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom, as we've said a million times—I'll say it again—it's not to annihilate the 84,000 destructive emotions. It's not to push them away. It's not to try and force clear seeing. But the simplicity of steady sati, the simplicity of steady mindfulness, actually allows for the perception to shift.

What we're really doing is bringing our attention. It's not that we have to get rid of the deluded mind, because how do we get rid of it? With more aversion, right? It doesn't work. But a lot of our practice is simply the steadiness of awareness, seeing how the deluded mind works.

So you've had a lot of practice with that already. You'll have a lot more. Instead of thinking something's going wrong, you can think, "Great, this is an opportunity to really watch with kind awareness how the deluded mind works." I'm not kidding. That's a so much more helpful attitude than, "I can't believe this is happening again. I've seen it. I know it. I can't believe it." How is the deluded mind working in this moment?

This is from Thanissaro Bhikkhu, talking about samsara—speaking of the deluded mind. This is my current favorite quotation: "Samsara literally means wandering on. Many people think of it as the Buddhist name for the place where we currently live, the place we leave when we go to Nibbana. But in early Buddhist texts, samsara is the answer not to 'where are we?' but to 'what are we doing?'"

We're samsara-ing so much of the time. So samsara, he's saying, is not a place but a process: the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them. As one world falls apart, you create another and go there. At the same time, you bump into other people who are creating their own worlds. Sound familiar? Then we wonder why we don't understand each other, why we don't even understand ourselves.

Ajahn Sumedho then takes us a step further, talking about samsara: "Samsara and nirvana are not places to go. They are modes of perception."

Samsara is samsara. We're samsaring when we're believing and looking through the perception of sakkāya-diṭṭhi—of personality view, of belief in that moment in a sense of unchanging separate self. That's the basic misperception, the delusion that keeps the whole samsara going.

So that's what I want to talk about tonight. I think of this very simply as an invitation to explore, to demystify this sense of self. Because for sure, we all experience it, right? Anyone here who doesn't experience a sense of self? You wouldn't dare raise your hand even if you didn't.

Talking about not-self or anattā can be this really loaded concept where we think we want to think our way into it. But the Buddha, as we've said, didn't teach anything as a philosophical concept to add to the burden of all the other stuff we have to think about and try to figure out. And if you have ever—and I bet you all have—spent any time in your thoughts mulling over and trying to understand through thinking, not-self, and really experience it, how far have you gotten? I find the more one thinks about it, what gets stronger? I can't understand this sense of not-self. I must be able to think my way through it. The Buddha didn't teach any of this for philosophy, and nothing to believe, but as an invitation to explore and really see.

So I just want to offer a few tips tonight as an invitation to investigate: What is this experience in any moment when awareness notices there's an experience that's being called I, me, or mine? What is the experience? And what are the moments when there is no sense of I, me, or mine? Or as Ajahn Buddhadasa would call them, moments that are empty of sense of self.

Ajahn Sumedho, who talks about not-self and exploring self all the time, said that when he first started practice there was a sense—or I know people say—you've got to wait until meditators are pretty far along to bring it up because it's such a subtle and confusing concept. And he thinks, and I agree with him, why? Why not start with the basic misperception that's feeding all the others? Why spend twenty years practicing from wrong understanding? Why practice for twenty years with a view, "I am going to achieve nibbāna"? Wrong view, completely. So why not begin to explore just this simple sense of self, this belief in personality view?

As I said, it's certainly something we experience, right? Sense of self. But often, by now, probably you all are bringing awareness to it when you notice it, because it's simply another arising and passing momentary experience. When we don't include it in the steadiness of mindfulness, when we don't examine it, the assumption is that we know: "Here's sense of self again. It's always here." We're waiting for the big bang, right? When it finally—thank God—goes away, and we really get it, and we're just floating without resistance through all the arising and passing experience, and there's no sense of self, and we're happy as clams in the water.

But it's not like that. As long as we're thinking that way, we're thinking, "Oh no, here's self again." And instead of just recognizing an arising experience, it has all this stuff around it. All I'm saying is include it in the awareness. It's a concoction. Unexamined, it's assumed to be real—"Here's a sense of self." But with careful attention, careful mindfulness, it's just another physical or mental, or possibly both at different times, experience that can simply be noticed.

Ramana Maharshi said the ego, or the sense of self, is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. Look, examine closely, and the ghost vanishes because the ghost was never there. So also with the sense of separate self. So long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one searches for it, it is found not to exist.

Try to think your way into it—spare yourself the trouble and don't. But bring steady, steady awareness. Whenever there's a sense of self, what is it? Turn the awareness and see what it feels like. How is it showing up?

It's simply a concoction arising and passing in any particular moment. There's nothing steady state about it.

So I just want to highlight tonight a couple of the manifestations of this sense of self. But let me mention also: when you just notice self—if the awareness is kind of steady and quiet, not a big hoo-ha going on, but you're just being with things and a sense of self comes in—you can just note it. What is it? And not idea-wise, but what's the actual experience?

I spent a long couple, three months with Sayadaw U Pandita, and the noting was very steady. A sense of self would come up. Sometimes it's like an image, just a mental image—like you're seeing out from your eyes, or an image of the face, or sometimes a little sense of contraction in the chest, or whatever. So I would just note "self, self."

I tried to explain this to Sayadaw. It did not go well. There was no way. You know, it's through translators and stuff, and I was trying to explain how I just noticed this sense coming and going, and I would note it as "self." And they got hysterical because they thought, "Oh, she thinks there's a self, and she's noting self all the time!" I gave that one up.

But really watch and see. What is it? Oh, there's self again. Turn around. What is the actual experience in the moment that's being called self? It's a physical or mental experience. That's all there is.

So one way—maybe the most obvious way—we notice the manifestation of a sense of "me" is in thoughts. Ajahn Sumedho again: "We create ourselves, our sense of self, our personality view, through our thoughts. And we cannot create an ultimately peaceful self."

It's just watching and seeing how much of your thoughts are about me. Majority, maybe? More than one or two? That's not bad or good. It's just noticing. We're telling ourselves the story of me all day long.

But how does it happen? One very simple process. As we've talked before, what's going on all day? Just the six sense contacts: feeling, perception, consciousness. All day long—seeing, hearing, smelling, touching, thinking—all day long. Have you noticed that? And that's, as we said, how the Buddha defines the world.

Now, as we go through the day, you can start to notice: how does the sense of me get concocted in a moment? It happens like this. It's just conditioning. It's just habit—deep habit, familiar habit.

But not every single sense experience is felt as me or mine, is it? I mean, that would be beyond unbearable. It's unbearable enough. But if it was every single seeing, hearing, smell—"oh me"—unbearable. So many just go by. But there are some, whatever, for whatever reason, that attention kind of unconsciously prioritizes. And there's a sense of something like you pick it out and grasp it. It's me or mine. And there's a reaction to it. It's kind of grabbed out of everything. This is me, or this is happening to me, or I feel like this about that.

And it doesn't just stop there. It goes immediately into whatever the story is—longer or shorter story about me that we tell ourselves. Just watch it. It's a basic and recurring misperception. I could give ten million examples.

Walking meditation: just walking, being with whatever arises. You're not in some big empty space, but there's no big story of me happening. And then someone cuts in front of you. In the scheme of things, that's nothing. Someone cuts in front of you. If the mind is really balanced, there might be seeing, unpleasant, an aversive thought. It goes. There's nothing. That doesn't have to create a sense of self.

But quite likely, it goes and we don't notice the unpleasant. We notice a sense of aversion. We notice the judgment about the person and how insensitive they are. "They're not respecting me. What's the matter with them?" I don't have to go further down that road, do I? It's like that.

This is not something your mind is doing because you're stupid and useless. This is just the conditioned habit. This is how these things work. So rather than getting all fussed about it, at whatever point in that process you catch it—just, "Oh, awareness, look at this. Me, me, me. They're disrespecting me. They should be doing this. I feel like that." And then the whole story of your entire life could come in, right? In two seconds.

Just noticing how that happens, and how it can go away again so quickly. We can do this. It's kind of fun to watch. I really think this exploring of sense of self coming and going, if you get interested in it—I find it really fun. Except when it's not. But much of the time, if you're really looking at how it gets created, you start to not be able to take your personality view too seriously. You really can't.

So watch how we tell ourselves stories. We describe and define ourselves all day long, right? Not from every sense contact, but just like that little example I just gave. That's happening all the time.

Some sense experience comes. There's a reactivity, or there's a perception. There's a thought about it. There's a clinging to it or an aversion to it—which is also clinging. The whole stream of our life starts, and we don't notice. Then it changes, and we don't notice. We think it's just me having these weird emotions, but surely there's some steady me in the background.

Really looking at the process with steady awareness, you see it truly arises and passes.

I always use this example, but it's just very simple—walking again. Walking is fun. Somehow you can really see these stories coming and going while walking, with a little more sensing involved.

So you're walking. This time there's not a sense of self, just feeling the sensations or hearing, whatever. Mindfulness is steady. There's a sense of pleasantness, and you're aware of that. It's going on and suddenly, without realizing—because there have been all kinds of comings and goings of perceptions and sense contact, seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting—all of a sudden: "Wow, it's really going well." Just a thought, a pleasant thought. It could keep going, but no—it's going well.

So the grasping, the kind of pulling it out, may not be to the thought itself. It may be to the pleasant feeling. It's fast. And from there: "I'm really getting this," right?

And the whole story starts. In two seconds, you're planning either to abandon your life and enter a monastic situation, or you're planning your next three-month retreat. You're planning how you're going to meet the Dalai Lama, and he's going to be so amazed because he's never met such an amazing yogi with so much insight as you. And it takes no time. If you see it, you notice how fast it happens. But it just feels like me.

And then suddenly, "Oh my God, I am so conceited!" Another thought with a different feeling tone. And this one feels equally compelling: "This is what I always do." Whereas before you started having all the memories of all the successes in your whole life—your whole sense of "me" was in there, your whole life going to visit the Dalai Lama, everything you've done, all the amazing stuff—now suddenly it's "Oh my God, I didn't even see the greed. I didn't see the conceit in there." It feels pathetic, and you go totally down the other way. And every memory of all your failures comes flooding back, to that time in third grade when the teacher called on you and you didn't know what seven times five was and you felt humiliated, and on and on.

And that feels just as real. They're both "me." Because we're sucked into the misperception of story, assuming this steadiness behind it. But seeing it, this is going on all day—the different worlds that Thanissaro Bhikkhu talks about. We're believing each one. When we're in an "amazing yogi" world, if we had to communicate with someone, we'd communicate in one way. If we're the worst piece of nothing in the universe in terms of trying to meditate—"Why am I even doing this?"—we communicate in a different way. And without steady awareness, we think it's the same "me." But it's just conditions concocting in that moment.

It really is like a movie. I don't know if you've had the unfortunate experience of having watched some kind of movie before you came on this retreat. You know what I mean? I was on a long retreat once—I'll spare you the title, but I had watched some adventure movie before I came. I cannot tell you how many times the thoughts, the images, the feelings of that movie would come up—Harrison Ford and all the stuff going on. I'd be noting: seeing, excitement, wanting, noticing what's happening. Then that would go away. And then the Carol movie would start: "I'm doing so well, I'm doing so bad, what's going on?" Noting, seeing, hearing.

And I realized it's just the same, exactly the same. One story, another story—one wasn't more real. That was really interesting. So I quit hating the Harrison Ford intrusions. I quit making a big deal out of the Carol narrative. It's just seeing, hearing, perception, liking, not liking, sensation. That's all that's happening—the six sense experiences.

And now the thinking mind pipes up: "Well, how am I going to function if it's nothing but the six sense experiences? And all I do is that? And I don't know if it's me? And I don't know if I'm Harrison Ford? How am I going to be able to function?"

Put that thought down. That's a worry thought. It's not coming from actual experience. It's not a problem. I have not for one moment confused myself with Harrison Ford.

Nisargadatta said, "The world, the self is so real because you think of it all the time. Stop thinking and it will dissolve into thin mist."

Just let that sit a minute and see what comes up. "There's no way I want to dissolve into thin mist. No way."

Let me concoct a whole story of me. I don't care if it's suffering—at least I'm here suffering. I don't want to dissolve into thin mist.

Well, if that's what we want, that's what we'll get. We know how to do that. We know how to concoct stories and get caught in them and spin out a whole narrative of me. We know that very well. So let's explore how that happens and see how it stops.

Ajahn Sumedho again: "So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears and desires, and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho. It takes off into orbit. My views, my feelings, and my opinions—I can get caught into that world, that view of me that's arising in consciousness. But if I recognize that, if awareness recognizes that's what's happening, then the refuge is no longer in being a person. I'm not taking refuge in being a personality or my views and opinions. And so in that moment, the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends."

Just explore that. And it's interesting to consider not taking refuge in my personality. We do this, you know. We may think that we really dislike our personality. There may be a lot of things about it we wish were different. But just notice how, in a way, we take refuge. Comfort is familiar.

So I let go. The world of Ajahn Sumedho ends. It does not mean Ajahn Sumedho dies and the world ends, or that I'm unconscious. In the Buddhadharma, the world is the world that's created in consciousness. That's why we can be living in different worlds. The world of Ajahn Sumedho is not going to be the same as the world you create. And that's just what Pañasara was saying. But that world arises and ceases. Our refuge then is in this awareness, rather than in trying to sustain refined experiences in consciousness as our refuge, because you can't do it. Our refuge is just in this conscious awareness.

So getting interested in seeing how the world of you arises, what it's like, and how it ceases. And another world arises, and it's not the same world, and it's not the same you. Joseph Goldstein has lots of good one-liners, and he used to say often, "We're making it all up." And it's true.

Here's another example, perhaps from that same retreat. It illustrates how there can be a sense contact, the clinging to it, the identifying with it, and the whole world of memories that follows. One day, very simply, it was about this time of year probably. I was sitting in my room and outside there were crickets—you know, these little insects in trees—which for some reason in my mind are associated with autumn and nostalgia and things passing.

So this whole mood came up: memory, crickets, and different autumn periods in my life when things were ending. This kind of sadness, but a little bit sweet, and all about me and my life. And then it went into loneliness and despair and the crickets. I was totally in it.

And then awareness came in, just noticing. Noticing each mood, noticing the thoughts, noticing each time the cricket sounded, there was that connection. Oh, yeah—going into the whole story.

So then I thought, well, let's just consciously shift it. What I actually did was this: the cricket would sound, and I'd change the thought consciously. "How lovely. Here it is, the autumn. And the trees are beautiful. And I'm in this really protected space, practicing the Dhamma. How wonderful!" I don't remember exactly, but I went into some story in the other direction. And it became just as real. The moods came with it.

The feeling tones came with it. The happiness came with it. The gratitude came with it. The actual situation was just hearing and the perception of crickets, and then this whole story arose. They were equally powerful—or equally empty, whichever way you want to look at it. I thought, "Wow. And I go through life believing all this junk." Oh my God, I'm sad. But the crickets—it's nothing but crickets and hearing, pleasant or unpleasant, and some thoughts coming that are memory. That's it. And then they go away.

Can we bear to look in this way? I tell you, it's so much more freeing.

I've been noticing lately—just as an aside—noticing in my daily life that whenever I'm speaking or acting from a strong sense of self, it's suffering. The only time I'm suffering, I check in and there's always some strong sense of "me" going on that I'm not seeing. And I'm responding from that. I'm not saying this as a judgment. It's just like, "Wow, yeah, right." This misperception really causes havoc in the mind, in the world. And it's habits, driven from misperceptions, driven from greed, from wanting, from just not seeing clearly, not looking clearly.

And then there are the personality habits, because we all think, "Well, my personality is different from your personality." It is. We have different habits. But that doesn't make it more real or true or a sense of self. Just as we each have different physical manifestations, we also have different mental habits based on all of our conditioning and experiences, which are slightly different. But it's still arising from conditioning and cause and effect—this whole concoction arising in a moment. That we can see.

So it's about getting interested in seeing personality habits. But we don't have to fear them. We don't have to identify with them. We just notice when we are. "No, but that's me. I have to work this one out. I have to get rid of this, really see through it. And when I no longer have this aversive tendency toward this person, then I can begin to make some progress." But an hour later, there's no aversion arising to that person. That doesn't count, though, because you're carrying around in your mind, "I'm always this aversive person toward them."

Noticing it comes and goes. We don't have to always just get sucked down in. We can bring awareness and see how it's working.

I was listening to Anam Thubten, who's a Tibetan Lama living in Richmond in the Bay Area of California. During COVID, when I was home more—I mean, I live much of the time in California, and he's just over the bay. Do I ever go to see him? No. I went once. Once. I think I met Walt there, the only time I ever went. But I started listening to him and thought, "Well, he's really great. I really like him a lot." He starts very simply and then it would get, to me, quite profound at some point. And he gave this example that to me fits in here—maybe it doesn't to you.

But as we're developing steady mindfulness, we see that the object is always changing.

We learn not to look for stability, not to look for refuge or a sense of self-worth in any object. Not to look for self-worth in personality patterns. Not to look for stability in things that are constantly changing. That frees up the clinging, and the awareness becomes available to really be present with things as they're coming and going.

So this is an example Mingyur Rinpoche gave that I liked—seeing a habit we might not normally notice. He was saying, especially in these challenging times (this was last year when everything was so intense), we are easily overwhelmed, pulled into a whirlpool of worry, of fear, of anger, self-blame, blaming others. All of this is swirling in the world. There's so much going on, and we're easily pulled into it. And whether we turn the blame inward or outward, it's the same thing.

He says, notice when this is the case, when we're sucked into this—it's just a habit. Stronger or weaker in different people. Maybe some people get sucked into fear, maybe some into worry, maybe some into blame, whatever it is. But notice: when we lose touch with present moment awareness, we lose touch with our natural dignity, with love and compassion.

So he says we practice to re-recognize awareness. Sound familiar? Just to re-recognize awareness—not to fix all this stuff. To re-recognize awareness and its access to our deeper nature. It opens us to the potential for kindness and compassion. And that's what we can then offer to the world. This is guidance for people in daily life. It's not about trying to go in and fix everything, but rather seeing when the habits of attention draw us into "Oh my God, what's going to happen with this? Oh my God, who's to blame?" Whatever it is—just rediscover the awareness. "Oh, that's what's happening."

This seems like magic sometimes, but it's not that magic makes everything okay. What I've noticed is that in moments when I'm operating from a sense of self or sucked into a habit pattern, the experience is one of narrowness, one of unpleasant suffering. In the moment of tuning into awareness—"Oh, that's what's happening"—to a greater or lesser degree depending on how clear the awareness is, that clinging lets go. And then compassion for the suffering people are going through just naturally arises, instead of "Who's to blame? How do we fix it?"

You know how sometimes in news media, something terrible has just happened to someone and they stick a microphone in their face and ask, "Who do you blame for this?" I've seen that so many times. It's heartbreaking.

So, just re-recognize awareness. That's why we practice—to recognize its access to compassion and kindness and clear seeing.

Ajahn Buddhadasa has a book called Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree, translated from Thai, which I read many years ago and really enjoyed. It's all about anattā, not-self, looking at it and exploring it. And he has a wonderful line: "Self, the sense of self, is simply a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind."

So simple. The sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. Clinging to what? Anything. Physical sensation, an image, a memory, any of the five sense experiences. Grasping at perception. Grasping at vedanā. Grasping at intention. It doesn't have to be a huge grasping. Just that person walking in front of me—"They're being aggressive." That's the perception. "Yeah, they are."

Don't tell me they're not being aggressive—that's clinging to it. Or perhaps the perception shifts: they're not aggressive, but they're completely deluded and mindless. That's a perception. Or "I'm completely selfish"—that's a perception we cling to. But you can see how we create the world with our thoughts, with this moment of clinging.

A condition arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind, concocted from any experience. As Ajahn Buddhadasa said, this concoction of self arises hundreds of times in a day—birth of self. But then equally, hundreds of times in a day, there's death of the sense of self. Many, many moments throughout the day there is either the letting go—not even letting go, that sounds like someone doing it—but the dissolving of the sense of self. It's just seeing, "Oh yeah, it's gone." And then noticing there's no sense of self in that moment. Hundreds of times a day. It's just an activity of mind.

We can notice this, though you may not always think, "Right, attachment to perception, sense of self arising." It won't be that clear much of the time—it might emerge from a lot of thinking. But sometimes, for me at least, I can often feel a sense of contraction in the mind that comes with clinging. It's not always sense of self, but often. I can just feel that.

And noticing the effect when we're coming from sense of self—it's something to look at and see for yourself. I'm giving my opinion, but don't try to make your experience match what I'm saying. Just look and see. It's like a narrowing of the world. When it's about "me," of course, everything starts from here and refers back to here. I don't know if you've noticed that.

I'll use an example I often use. It's Joseph's example, but he's not here, so I can borrow it. Very simple. He was standing in line on retreat—second in line. That's essential to the story. He was second in line; someone else was first. The bell rang, the person ahead of him stepped forward, but the lid was still on the big pot. So the person lifted up the lid, but it dropped and hit the floor. You can imagine the noise it made in the silence.

And you all are wonderful here—you don't have huge lines for lunch. We really notice and appreciate it. We're putting it down to your incredible practice and dedication. But sometimes on other retreats, people are standing there for fifteen minutes in line, waiting for the meal. So there's a big line, then this huge crash.

Joseph says—he's tall, right?—so he stands up and notices his first thought was that he wanted to turn and say, "It wasn't me." That's what we do. It's all about me. A real narrowing of the world.

And when that's not there, the beautiful qualities naturally arise. A simple example from my own life:

I was sitting quietly at home when I heard—someone must have told me—about a really good, kind thing a friend had done for someone else. At the time I heard it, clearly the mind was in a "me" mood, a little down, a little negative about myself. Just in this subtle, self-judging framework. So it was about me.

I heard the story, and my first thought was: "Wow, I should have done that. I didn't think to do that. Why didn't I do that?" This comparing, this māna in its negative form, all about me.

Somehow it happened that later—not the next moment but the next day or something—I heard a similar or the same story fresh. I wasn't thinking about it at all. But my heart and mind was just really present and awake, and there was no me-ing going on. And the immediate mental state that arose was muditā. "Wow, how lovely! How fantastic that they did that!" Such a world of difference.

Now, don't take that and get down on yourself: "Oh God, I'm so concerned with me." That's just the same thing. But notice the truth of the fact that when there's clinging around "about me," the stories give rise to more suffering. When that's not there, the natural response of heart and mind is compassion, or appreciative joy, or equanimity.

We can trust this. As someone said, wisdom inclines toward the wholesome. It's not like we have to remember and do it. Our job is just to keep refreshing the awareness. Wisdom inclines to the wholesome. If we could trust this and quit trying to fix everything all the time, it would be so much more pleasant. The whole practice would move along. But that's not how it is, and we have to deal with how it is.

So back to Ajahn Buddhadasa—just noticing the arising birth of self hundreds of times a day, death of self hundreds of times a day. He has a whole section on what the translation calls "moments of voidness" or emptiness. But what he's specifically talking about is moments of consciousness when there's no sense of self arising.

This is not some amazing esoteric experience. Ajahn Buddhadasa says it's truly normal and natural—hundreds of times in a day when there's no wanting going on, when we're not distracted but really present. There are many, many moments of no sense of self arising. It's important for our steady awareness to also notice these. We get so distracted or pulled into the sense contacts and what we think about it and me—that's the habit. Yet it's really normal that there are many times when that's not going on.

The sense of self is a process, not a thing that's here all the time. Again, Ajahn Buddhadasa talks about it as a verb: ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra—that's Pali. I-ing and my-ing. That's what's going on: I-ing and my-ing. A process that arises and goes away. We can just notice that like we notice anything else.

The next step is recognizing and trusting how normal and natural these moments are—what he calls voidness. It's not such a great word, because now you're going to think there's nothing happening and it's empty. It's not that. It's just the absence of a sense of self.

But he talks about generating a contentment with this voidness. And guess what is one of the doorways in? Our old friend, neutral vedana. Nothing special is going on. Can we generate a contentment with calm? Nothing's happening. Or are we uncomfortable? We've talked about this before—that sense of nothing's happening and the habit of "let's cook something up." Because there's no me here going on. As soon as we think that, we've already cooked something up.

So just starting to notice. You don't even notice a sense of emptiness of self, but just nothing—just really present. And there's a sense of so often waiting for the next worthwhile thing to arise. As we've said before, how often the next birth of me, the habit of mine, is so uncomfortable—even just for a minute of waiting—that it creates, and I've seen my mind do this plenty of times, a whole story, a suffering story, of something that might happen at some point in the future when you go home, if this person's there and if they did that, and if you say that and then they say that. And then you're totally in anger. But that's better. At least I'm angry. We'd rather be there and angry than in just this moment of simple is-ness. Nothing going on.

So just have that in the back of your mind. You can take an interest—take an interest in the moments between births of sense of self. Sometimes you can, this is just an example, but just have a sense of space. Notice if being with some object in the sitting and it vanishes, and you feel like for dear life you have to get back to the breath immediately. God forbid there should be a moment of—no, I'm losing it! Back to the breath, back to the breath. Nope, nope, nope. That's helpful—helpful technique—but not when it's coming from the sense of "oh no, there's nothing." It's awareness, simplicity, just being like this.

You might notice space between thoughts, space between activities. Notice when you're eating. Can you just let your fork rest for a tenth of a second before you load it up and shove it in again? Just a moment of space. The minute you finish eating, you have to jump up and go do something. I'm not saying you do, but just notice this sense to fill up the space. Just start to incline the mind to notice the space in the room, space around thoughts, space between activities. Just a chance to notice the simplicity of awareness without needing to complicate it. Normally we don't notice the emptiness because we're so involved with experience and concocting thoughts and stuff about it—views, interpretations.

So just don't make it a thing, because that's already me doing something. But just notice when nothing special is going on. "Ah, emptiness." Okay, now that's a sense of me catching. Fine, that's the next thing. Let's notice. Nothing outside of the sense of steady awareness.

As Ajahn Sumedho says, taking the refuge just in a simple moment-to-moment awareness—not in personality, not in particular experience, not in getting rid of particular experience, but in just, "Ah, it's like this now." Appreciating those moments of awareness. And more and more, it starts to come in. There's already many moments when there's no sense of self, but a lot of times we don't really notice them because we're used to noticing what's louder and more vivid. So inclining to the neutral, inclining to the sense of space, that simplicity of non-concoction.

I read this before, but just two quotations. From Mingyur Rinpoche: "It's not dull, empty void. We start to recognize the sense of peace that arises from the stability of awareness and which is not dependent on the absence or presence of unpleasant or pleasant experience."

And then just one last little thing from a Thai laywoman from the last century, Upasika Kee. There's just one little book of her. Very strong practitioner. Tough. She was tough. Anyway, she just says: "What is, is."

What is not, is not. There's no need to add anything extra. If we could just do that, our heart and mind would be at peace.

So thank you for your kind attention. Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

May our sincere motivation to practice, to awaken our hearts and minds from suffering—may the beneficial energies created by that be shared with all beings everywhere. May all beings live free from suffering and delusion.

So just have fun playing with this.

CHAPTER 81

Morning Questions and Answers

Carol Wilson · 15 min

> In this Q&A session from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson offers profound guidance on working with strong emotions that arise during intensive practice. She addresses the common experience of tears and difficult emotions emerging during meditation, explaining how to bring mindfulness to these experiences without suppression or indulgence.
>
> Wilson introduces the important distinction between what practitioners call 'purification' and simply spinning in habitual emotional patterns. She shares a personal story from a six-week retreat with Sayadaw U Paṇḍita, illustrating how deep sadness arose connected to visual memories, and how maintaining fresh, moment-to-moment noting prevented the experience from devolving into a self-referential 'poor me' narrative. This teaching illuminates how we truly come to understand the first noble truth of dukkha—not through intellectual analysis, but through direct experience met with steady awareness.
> The talk offers practical wisdom for recognizing when mindfulness is genuinely present versus when we've subtly shifted into either feeding difficult emotions or pushing them away. Wilson emphasizes that strong emotions arising in practice are not mistakes but essential fuel for the Dhamma. When emotions become overwhelming, she suggests skillful means like shifting attention to physical sensations. The teaching reminds practitioners that nothing is outside the realm of what can be met with mindfulness, and that this meeting—neither grasping nor averting—can fundamentally shift our relationship to challenging mind states.

So just so you know, there are so many questions that there's no way we can ever answer them all. Don't feel—well, feel however you feel, and don't take it personally.

I'm actually really glad this person asked this question, so we can expand on this topic a bit. They're asking us to talk a little bit about how we relate to crying in the practice, in general and in the hall. This person finds that tears come more frequently when they practice on their own, which I think is pretty common. And when they arrive in the hall—I like the way that's said, "when they arrive," you know, it's just what's happening—they're a bit self-conscious and don't want to disturb others.

That's totally normal and natural. I want to expand it to a bigger picture, but first, just to say: of course, always, tears are very normal and natural. Going through strong emotions is a big part of the practice. It's not a mistake or something wrong. What we learn is how to bring mindfulness to the experience.

To answer the specifics about crying: sometimes tears will come in the hall, and in general, most of us are more self-conscious there. You don't want to wail and sob and carry on in the hall—it does kind of get everyone all riled up. So if you have a choice, cry silently in the hall. Outside the hall, it's fine. When tears come, they come. This is normal. And for most of us, we all have a single room, which is a real gift, so you can go and just let whatever's happening happen, with mindfulness.

This is the piece I want to expand on a bit. At some point, most of us, in our periods of practice—not just this one retreat, but in longer periods of intensive practice—there will be times when really strong, difficult emotions come up. Tears can also come when you're really happy or feeling really touched, but that's also a strong emotion. Not all strong emotions are unpleasant; they're still strong emotions.

In terms of the practice, I don't know if we've spoken much about this. We used to call it—and this is just shorthand, don't take it for anything more—the difference between purification and just spinning in our patterns.

It's very common that at some points, and it can be a day or it can last for some time during our intensive practice—and actually this is about the time, two, three, four weeks in, not at the beginning—where it may be triggered by a particular memory. It may not even have much content. It may be some memory or some experience that you know very well. You think, "Oh, I've dealt with this." And it comes up, and there's, with mindfulness, awareness of it—the memory, the story, whatever. But a really deep emotional concomitant can come along with it. It can be really deep sadness or grief or self-loathing, just whatever it might be.

It doesn't mean that's a problem or wrong when we allow it to come up into the field of mindfulness, same as with any strong emotion.

I'll describe the differences. When we call it so-called purification, it means a memory may be coming up—for example, a memory of a time that you felt really sad or hurt, whatever it is. The memory comes, but then the feeling, the emotion comes. And with mindfulness, you're really feeling it. I gesture like this because that's just where I feel stuff. Really strong sadness, for example. Aware of the thoughts. Crying may come. But with mindfulness, we're allowing the sadness to live and move as it does.

Our experience at times, when what we call purification is coming up, is that you think, "Oh, I know this." That's just a thought. Let it come. And when it's coming into the field of mindfulness, allowing with wisdom, sometimes the emotional experience is actually stronger and deeper.

than we've experienced before, or that we remember. And our intellectual, personal minds are going, "What the heck is going on?" That's just a thought. It's coming up into a field. As our mindfulness awareness is getting steady and more continuous, the more subconscious patterns of avoidance aren't functioning so much, because we're not so much picking and choosing what's worth paying attention to.

And so stuff that we've kind of maybe acknowledged—"OK, I see that, fine, very good, take a hike"—it starts to come up. But we allow it with mindfulness. And you can feel it quite deeply. Don't get the idea that, oh, you feel it deeply, good, it's gone, it's over. No, that's not mindfulness. But to say: this is a really big part of practice for most of us at some point. Not for all of us and not in every retreat, but it's important not to think there's something wrong or off, and that if you're properly mindful, this is going to be, "Oh yes, sadness, sadness, la la la, tears, tears, yes, back to emptiness," right? No. Emptiness isn't somewhere else. Whatever's happening is the fuel of the Dhamma, is the fuel of the practice.

This allowing things up in mindfulness—it's really a different way of relating, even from many types of therapy where we've seen it, we know it. It can kind of come up in a deep way. So our practice, how do we relate, is, as with any strong emotion, learning how to meet it with mindfulness. And that's the difference between not getting all lost in the story and completely overwhelmed with story, while really feeling it. You know the story, but you're being with the feeling, letting it live its life. If there's tears, aware of tears. Of course, the mind goes into the story—that's part of it. But allowing the sadness or grief or whatever, self-hatred, just to be as it is in the field of mindfulness.

The other way we're not quite mindful is: "OK, I see it, fine," and we try to shut it down again. Because mindfulness means just noticing whatever arises. "But not this." Well, it's noticing whatever's arising. "This should be over now." Because choiceless means things are going boom, boom, boom, boom, boom. It doesn't mean that. It means choiceless. This is coming up, not your choice. We bring awareness to it. It's an essential part of practice.

I'll give an example from my experience. It just popped into my mind this morning because I learned so much from it. I was sitting a six-week retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita some ages ago. It was in the middle of the retreat, and my mindfulness was quite stable and even and strong, so I was able to note whatever came. And it started with—I remember, even now I can remember—this visual memory would come up. A note: seeing. It was a particular time in my life that I hadn't really thought about much for quite a while. And then a whole field of sadness came up with it, overwhelming. Overwhelming just meaning I couldn't just go la la la, sadness. I had to feel it. But quite noting: sadness. Seeing the story. Seeing, seeing, because it's all visual. Feeling the sadness. Noting the sadness. Seeing the thoughts. And this would not last all day, but it would be quite strong. And it was happening every day at some point.

Now, when you're meeting with Sayadaw U Pandita, he is like zero interested in content, which is helpful, because this isn't about the content. It's about letting the whole process arise into mindfulness. So I would describe it to him—the noting and just what would come up, the image and the noting and this—but just in terms of "this arose, this arose, this arose." And for days, because this went on for days, he would be, "Yeah, very good. Very good, yogi. This is dukkha. This is how we understand dukkha, the unreliability, the unsatisfactory quality of life." And he was completely supportive. And in case you haven't heard it before: the first noble truth, dukkha, is to be understood.

We don't get to understand it by thinking about it, by saying, "Oh yeah, that makes sense." We go through it with awareness, with steady mindfulness, again and again in many different ways. And at some point we go, "Yeah, this is dukkha." Wisdom comes in and understands how it's created. So it's not a mistake. But our job is to keep coming back into the mindfulness.

He was really supportive. But I started to notice that after it would begin to peter out or change, the image would come again, and I would note that, then the feeling of sadness, then the noting, and see the thoughts. At one point I noticed I was just allowing it, and the thoughts would change to "Oh, poor me." The whole feeling tone became completely different. It was like a little moving away from mindfulness into "Oh, poor me, I have to go through this." It felt completely different. So I would just notice that, mindful again of the feeling.

When I reported to Sayadaw—and again, you don't give him content, just reporting the process—it had started to change. Looking back, it had started to get a little bit of a habit. We were getting a little bit of a jag with it, like, "Oh, I know," and the mindfulness wasn't quite fresh. We were thinking it's how it was a couple of days ago, but it's already changed and we're not quite fresh with it. We think, "Oh yeah, I know what's happening." It's really interesting—Sayadaw could pick up on this. He was amazing that way.

So this one day I went in, I described what sounded like the whole thing, but he picked up that it started with the image, and he said, "You weren't mindful enough with the image. You didn't note it." That's not a criticism. That was absolutely true. And as soon as the mindfulness wasn't there, the whole thing turned into a "me" story, a "poor me," and then it just went on and on. You can feel the difference.

None of it's for judging, but it's really to see and allow. We're going to have these periods where strong emotions come up, strong memories and such. It's part of practice. Nothing's outside of the realm of what's possible to be mindful of. And of course, with all skillful means, there are going to be times when the mindfulness isn't balanced enough and the thoughts really do take over—you can't quite be mindful. So as we've always said with any emotion, at that point, notice that. And if it's possible, with skillful means, shift the attention elsewhere. Go for a walk. Feel the sensations of your feet. It's not about just spinning in the story.

Or sometimes we're spinning in the story, but there's really a sense of self-gratification. We kind of like it, feeding the "poor me." Noticing that, we shift the attention. Or sometimes we've decided subconsciously, "Okay, that's enough now, I'm going back to practice," and we get into a subtle aversion, pushing it away. That's also not quite mindfulness. And you'll find out if you're doing that, because it'll turn around and let you know.

These are the balances. We call it purification because it's coming up into awareness in a way that isn't trying to push it away but isn't feeding it either. And it really can shift our relationship to the particular story, to the particular mood or emotion—so that there's nothing we need to be afraid of. That's something Sayadaw also said to me one time.

I just wanted to say this is going to be part of practice. It's not a mistake. It doesn't mean something went wrong with your practice. This is where we learn how to bring in mindful awareness—just to see what's happening, not lost in the content, but allowing the emotion to live its life. And when it's gone, notice it's gone. You don't need to bring it back again.

Notice it's gone. Yes, it may arise another time, a different moment. It's not just sitting under there unnoticed, waiting to erupt. It's gone. This is present moment mindfulness.

So I wanted to bring that up and hope you can include it in your practice. And yes, sometimes the crying comes loud, and it's fine in your room. In the hall, of course, we all feel a little self-conscious—that's normal. So if we see someone crying silently in the hall, give them their space. This is a normal part of practice. It's not like we have to go fix it. Please don't go fix it. Leave them alone. We leave each other alone to go through what needs to happen.

At this point in retreat, all different things may be coming up in your practice. We take refuge in the steadiness of mindfulness—not looking to experience for self-gratification or a sense that what's going on is important. Just check: Is mindfulness here? Am I aware? That's our refuge. And then whatever arises due to causes and conditions can be met with mindfulness, and that leads to wisdom.

Thank you for your practice and your presence.

CHAPTER 82

Perception of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching that when the perception of impermanence (anicca) is fully developed, it eliminates all craving and uproots the conceit of 'I am.' She explores why, despite our intellectual agreement that everything changes, we continue to live as if permanence were the norm. Drawing from suttas where the Buddha declares that not even a fingernail's worth of the five khandhas is permanent, Wilson identifies key obstacles to accurate perception: our instinctive resistance to loss and grief, the perceptual distortion (vipallāsa) that sees the changing as unchanging, and simple inattention.
>
> Wilson shares personal reflections on grief following her sister's death, illustrating how fully opening to sorrow—rather than resisting it—can transform into compassion and honor the love we feel. She recounts the touching story of Ānanda weeping before the Buddha's death, and offers Ajahn Chah's humorous teaching that aging bodies are 'divine messengers' constantly revealing impermanence. A powerful story from Burma demonstrates how a community's open, loving response to a young novice's drowning taught Western teachers about embracing death as part of life.
>
> The talk emphasizes that steady, moment-to-moment mindfulness is essential for perceiving the momentary nature of change—not the arising-abiding-passing we imagine, but constant flux. Wilson offers practical tips: noticing when we assume permanence, recognizing the 'gone-ness' of experiences, and maintaining continuity of awareness throughout the day. She concludes with the Zen poem about 'falling into the midst of everything'—the freedom that comes when we stop fighting impermanence and open fully to life's vibrant, ever-changing presence.

Tonight, following on Roxanne's talk last night, I want to talk about impermanence—particularly the perception of impermanence.

We've mentioned quite a few times the three characteristics: impermanence, not-self, and dukkha, unreliability. Intellectually, it would seem to me that understanding impermanence would be the most accessible. Probably none of us would argue with the fact that things change and nothing is going to stay the same. So how come we don't live that way? Why don't we really understand it?

If we did really understand it—the Buddha talked about the centrality of understanding impermanence. This is from the Buddha: "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual craving. It eliminates all craving for becoming. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all conceit, 'I am.'" That's basically the way he describes complete awakening: when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated.

I really appreciate that emphasis on the perception of impermanence, because to my way of thinking, perception is at the heart of insight. When we think of what an insight is, really, it's not that reality has changed. The nature of insight—all different kinds of insight—is that suddenly our perception shifts; we're able to perceive in a different way, which, according to the Buddha's teaching, when it's an insight, that new way of perceiving is more in accordance with the way things are. So there's not such a sense of struggle.

There are all levels of insight, from a personal problem to awakening—like what he's talking about with the perception of impermanence. When Roxanne talked about the five aggregates, I think this is one of the reasons perception is broken out from sankhara: because it's so key to see how and why we don't perceive impermanence if it's all around us.

I want to talk a little bit about some personal reflections on things that prevent us—or why we don't always, or even often, really perceive impermanence on a level that's transformative.

Back to the Buddha, and this is from what Roxanne was talking about last night—again, the centrality of impermanence, the ubiquity of it: "Bhikkhus, there is no form, no feeling tone, no perception, no volitional formations, no consciousness"—you recognize that list; short memory time, only last night—"that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, and that will remain the same just like eternity itself."

Then he took up a little bit of soil in his fingernail and said to the bhikkhus, "There's not even this much form"—and he went through all of the khandhas—"not even this much form, the amount under my fingernail, that is not subject to change and that will remain the same. If there was this much form that was permanent, this living of the holy life for the complete abandoning of suffering could not be seen, could not be understood." Basically saying: not this much. So that's serious perception of impermanence.

"But because there is not even this much form in all the five khandhas that is permanent, this living of the holy life for the complete abandoning of suffering is possible, is discerned."

That's a really powerful statement.

So I want to talk a bit about impermanence and, in my mind, some of the things that get in the way of accurate perception. None of this will be new to you. I'm just putting it together in this particular form.

The first thing that comes to my mind that blocks our perception of impermanence is our instinctive resistance or reaction to unpleasant, unhappy feelings—the first noble truth—or instinctive fear of loss and grief, instinctive resistance to loss and grief, or the idea that something's wrong, this shouldn't be happening. The first noble truth. I'll talk about that in a moment.

The second and third go together: we misperceive. This is the vipallasa, the distortion of perception—we perceive what is constantly changing as being unchanging, and we don't quite recognize that level. Part of that misperception comes about because of inattention. Delusion, but inattention—lack of steady awareness. Those are some of the things I want to touch into tonight.

Just again reminding us: when a moment of insight occurs, a shift of perception, reality doesn't change. It's not like if you finally have some big blowout insight—I talked about anattā the other week, now I'm talking about anicca—then suddenly everything's changing, whereas before it was all steady state, and so now that everything's changing, there's no way you can function because there's no ground anywhere. Well, that's what we think. But it's already always changing. That's how it is.

When our perception actually comes in line with reality, at first it shakes us up because it's uncomfortable. But when we're not in conflict with it, that's what opens our heart and mind to really living fully.

I say a lot of stuff, but it's coming to that.

So, first, just to talk about particularly when we think of impermanence on the bigger level—of course, loss, grief, death, separation, those are the first obvious ones. And I imagine none of us can really get behind saying this sense of separation and change is not going to happen. But still, when someone we care for goes away or dies or gets sick, or we lose something that's really important, being human and not completely awake, it's really natural that we feel sorrow or we feel grief.

And it's also a really deep habit that we don't want to feel sorrow or grief. This is the whole first noble truth of the unreliability—that we tend to think the unpleasant is wrong and bad, and we recoil from it. But this grief, the sorrow at loss, it's part of being human. It's part of being human. And so our trying to push it away, or even unconsciously thinking something's wrong with it, is actually what blocks just opening into the fact of change. That is human.

There's a very famous story from the suttas, and probably most of you have heard it, and you're going to hear it again now, with Ananda, who was the Buddha's cousin and his attendant the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life. In general, Ananda is really a very friendly presence in the suttas. He is very kind. He really took great care of the Buddha, but he didn't try to keep people away. He would always try to help people come and hear the Dhamma. He was a great proponent of sharing the Dhamma.

And he had this amazing memory. He could remember word for word every discourse the Buddha gave. In fact, when you're listening or reading any of the discourses that begin, "Thus have I heard," that's meant to be from Ananda reciting it. And there's a lot like that. In fact, when he first agreed to become the Buddha's attendant, he made some stipulations, and one of them was that any Dharma talk of the Buddha's he didn't hear, the Buddha would repeat to him later so that he could remember it. So he was a great guy. He's more accessible to us. He's not like this amazing arhat.

So anyway, the story: The Buddha, when he knew he was going to die—I think it was about three months before—he told Ananda, he told his close disciples that this was going to happen. And then he was sitting, talking with disciples, and he noticed Ananda wasn't there. So he says to the other bhikkhus, "Where is Ananda? Please go find friend Ananda." And it's said, of course, that he knew where he was because he could see. But anyway, they found him leaning against a doorframe, weeping, weeping.

And they said, "Friend, the Blessed One calls you. And why are you weeping?"

And he said, "Because the Blessed One is leaving us. I am still a learner with much to do. How can we go on? How can we teach?" And he was just so overcome with sorrow and grief.

So just know this is our natural response. The Buddha called him, and of course, in a kind way, he said, "Ananda"—first he asked what was going on, and Ananda told him what I just said. He said, "Ananda, haven't I told you, everything that's subject to arising is subject to cessation, to coming apart? How could it possibly be that this doesn't happen?"

But it wasn't chastising him, because then he went on to really talk about Ananda's faith and Ananda's kindness, and he really brightened his heart and mind. He didn't just leave him with, "You stupid Ananda, haven't I told you, get over it." That's not what he was saying. He said, "I've told you, that's the teaching." But he brightened his mind, appreciated him and his kindness and his faith so that he could keep on going. "And soon you will also understand completely."

I love that story because it just makes it human. It's part of our path. It's part of life. Grief, sorrow—it's not something wrong. It's going to happen, and it doesn't help to push it away, and it doesn't help to think, "I should, as a good Buddhist, say, 'They will not be seen by me again.'"

No, we feel sorrow. Feel it. Open into it. Allow it.

This is a little personal, but I'll share it. Some time ago—maybe ten or eleven years ago—my only sister died unexpectedly. Well, not entirely unexpectedly. She had been ill, but it was still very sudden. We were close, and yes, I felt a lot of grief for quite a while.

It was surprising how strong the grief was. But also, in a way, because of the circumstances—her death was unexpected, yet there was nothing to do about it—there was nothing to make me think I shouldn't feel grief. It was obvious that of course I would feel it. There wasn't anything to try to go back and change the past so I wouldn't feel the grief, or to pretend things would change in the future. That's something about death: the person is really gone. You can't pretend.

And so I just, for some reason, was totally open to it. For months and months, the grief would come really strong. I'd feel it. It would go. It wasn't every day for months, but when the grief would arise, I just wasn't pushing it away or in denial. I really allowed it.

Sometimes it was just grief. Sometimes I could really feel—without even thinking about it—that by not pushing it away, it would move into compassion. Not for anyone in particular, but just for the suffering of the world. This is how samsara is, you know? And I really felt, not at the lofty level of the Buddha, but on our personal level, a kind of purity of grief in just allowing it. I felt that for me, it also reflected the love. Sure, there's attachment, or we wouldn't feel grief. But I felt that allowing it was also honoring the love.

It was a profound experience. I learned a lot from that. By not trying to do anything—just recognizing "this is what's happening"—the grief would come through strong and go away. It didn't last all day. It came and went at any particular time, and that was okay. I really learned about how whatever is arising, that's what's happening. Opening into it is the way of opening into life, not shutting things out. It doesn't deny love. It was a really deep learning for me.

The Buddha often used impermanence, change, as a powerful teaching tool—kind of letting the resistance or the sadness or the difficulty be a wake-up call to pay attention.

Now I'm shifting gears here. This is Ajahn Chah talking to people in Thailand, using impermanence, using life as a wake-up call—the suffering of change. But he's funny.

First he starts talking about how meditation is easy for old people, and then he goes into why:

"Meditation is hard for youngsters. Their teeth are strong, so they can enjoy their food. They sleep soundly. Their faculties are intact, and the world is fun and exciting to them, so they get deluded in a big way. For the old ones, when they chew on something hard, they're soon in pain. Right there, the divine messengers are talking to them. They're teaching them every day. When they open their eyes, their sight is fuzzy. In the morning, their backs ache. In the evening, their legs hurt. That's it! This is really an excellent subject to study. This is seeing the body in the body and sensation in sensation. Are you seeing these, or are you running away?"

And he goes on and on. I'm skipping around. But he said, you have to see it within yourself. When you sit, it's true. When you stand up, it's true.

And this isn't only old people. So you young people don't think you're getting a pass. It's happening now, right? That's what retreats show us. Everything is a hassle. Everything is presenting obstacles. And everything is teaching you.

When you're young, you can just stand up and walk, going on your way. When you're old, every time you stand up, it's oy. Isn't that what you say? Oy, oy. Every time you move, you learn something. So how can you say it's difficult to meditate? Where else is there to look? Divine messengers are telling you something. It's most clear. Sankhara are telling you that they are not stable or permanent, not you or yours. They are telling you this every moment.

He's funny, but he's getting right in there. They are telling us this every moment. Why don't we notice? Why do we think that something's wrong when we notice? This is where we're starting to trust the actual perception rather than all our ideas and our interpretations.

So maybe that concept sounds familiar—bringing attention to the actual experience as opposed to all the interpretations. Have you heard that since you've been here? That's why we're practicing that moment after moment after moment. You think nothing special is going on. You're just feeling sensation. You're just feeling this. We want some big insight right now.

But every moment that the mindfulness and the mind is being really present just with what is, without adding some story, without mistaking our concept for the reality—that's practicing inclining the mind towards more accurate perception. We spend the rest of our life practicing inaccurate perception. Really? So here we're learning to have that. And then suddenly, it feels like an insight. Suddenly it shifts and you recognize, oh my gosh, everything's changing. And then it goes back again. That's why we have to keep practicing.

So Ajahn Chah used this as a powerful teaching tool. Powerful.

There's a sense of denial on the big level. But even on the smaller level, just the habit—we talked about this a lot—the habit of clinging as the way to lead to happiness. It's so poignant. I said that a couple of weeks ago: Why do we cling?

In terms of this perception of impermanence, this is my take. Part of the clinging is, yes, for pleasant experience, for happiness, but also wanting some sense of stability, some sense of permanence, some sense of somewhere to land, something steady. So our strategy for happiness is to cling to sense experience, to ideas, to views about things, about people, about the situation, about ourselves, about our personality—to any experience, to give some sense of landing somewhere.

But that's what the impermanence is pointing to. There's nowhere to land but this moment, and then it's changing, changing, changing. But our systems don't really like that so much.

Sally was there. I can't remember if Guy was there. And actually, I was giving a dhamma talk when there was an earthquake. It was a fairly strong one, but not overwhelming. Then a couple of hours later came a much stronger one. I'd never been in an earthquake before, and it's unsettling, right? It's unsettling.

But the more unsettling thing to me—because I was in a safe place when the bigger one came, I was outside, so that wasn't traumatic. It was more difficult for people who were trapped inside; that was a little more scary, though no one was really hurt. But the next couple of days, there were all these aftershocks. So you'd just be settling down to sleep at night, and of course the radio was announcing, "Ninety-two percent chance of the big one"—this is Southern California—"eighty percent, eighty-five percent chance of the big one." So helpful.

And so you'd just be settling down to sleep, you'd hear the radiator go shhhh—do we have to get up and run outside? Is this the big one? No, okay, it's over. And an hour later—do we have to get up and run outside? Just this sense of... the Earth is supposed to be stable. We take refuge on the Earth, but even that.

It was interesting. Now I can say this, right? I didn't like it so much at the time. But that is how I relate to this sense of response to unreliability—to hold on, even just for a moment. Even to something unpleasant: "It's going to be like this. It's going to be like this." Even though I hate it and it's miserable, I cling: "No, it's going to be like this. Not like that."

I'm going to read just part of a long poem by Galway Kinnell, an American poet. I read it a lot; I love it, about clinging. It's called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You scream, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard, as if clinging could save us.
I think you think I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars, even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, "Don't go down."
I have stood by as you told the flower, "Don't grow old, don't die," little Maud.
And yet perhaps this is the reason you cry,
this the nightmare you wake screaming from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

It's like that. And it doesn't have to be horrible. We don't have to wake screaming from a nightmare when we're not fighting it, when we're not resisting it.

This is from the suttas. Somewhere—I've never been able to find it again, the location, but I know I saw it somewhere, I think it's probably the Sutta Nipāta: "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful."

And a Tibetan saying: "Resting at ease in whatever arises."

Another teaching moment, using the reality of change as teaching. This is a more true story. Again, some years ago—I don't know, maybe fifteen years ago—I was helping teach a retreat in Burma, in a small village near Sagaing, in the Sagaing Hills. The monastery where we teach is along the Irrawaddy River, and there are some different nunneries nearby that we know; the nuns would go and visit. So one day the teachers—this is Westerners teaching together with the Burmese, teaching Westerners—we were walking along.

The teachers and our friend translator were walking along the river, and at one place just down in front of the nunnery, two doors down, there was a whole crowd of people sitting on the wall looking into the river. That was unusual. So we said, "Well, what happened?"

And then a little nun that we knew—Haiti was her name, is her name—came running up to us and could talk to us because our translator friend was there. She was about maybe six years old, something like that. And she said, "Oh, it's the three young novices." These are young boys who are ordained as novice monks, maybe eleven, twelve, thirteen years old. They had gone out in a boat swimming in the river, and one of them had fallen out, and they couldn't find him. People were looking in the river, assuming he had drowned because it had been an hour since he disappeared. And so they were all there.

We had to go back, but eventually they did find his body and brought it up. And this is the teaching point.

He had only been in that area a week or two. He wasn't used to the river, whereas the other young boys were. He came from somewhere that was a long twelve, twenty-hour journey away. So they sent for his parents, the monks and the nuns did. He was from a monastery a little higher up, but this part of the river was right outside the nunnery. They all took his body to this sala that was just across the street at the foot of the nunnery. A sala is like a big open room with a roof and no walls—a large place where they might do chanting or have different kinds of meetings.

So they took him into this large open sala and put him on a nice bed, went and got him a change of clothes. And then the nuns and the monks and all different villagers, including the little nuns—and Haiti's not the only young nun—they all went and, well, they sent for his parents. It was going to take them a day to get there. They spent the time chanting metta, sending metta—just the whole community. People would do shifts.

It was just so natural. It wasn't like calling 911, having them brought away in an ambulance where you don't see it. And they didn't tell the little nuns, "Oh, you shouldn't see this, go back to the nunnery." They were there. They were part of it. It's part of life.

It was really a powerful teaching for us, so different from the way we had always seen it in our culture here, how I had been brought up and also the other teacher. Yes, it was really a powerful teaching to look and see—this is part of life. It's being met with love and openness, not hidden away or something to hide from or to protect the kids from knowing about. But it's done with love.

So that one aspect of our tendency—wanting to shy away from seeing unpleasant things, or change, or loss, or feeling it in ourselves—really opening into it is what opens us to the truth.

The other aspect of misperception comes from inattention as well. We assume permanence, or we don't notice the momentariness of change. There was a teaching once with the Dalai Lama—I think Guy was there—where he was talking about the momentariness of change. He said we tend to think, even when we understand that everything's impermanent, that something arises, it abides for a while, and then it passes away. He said there's no "abides for a while." Change is momentary.

This thinking—"Oh, it's going to last," whatever it is—we think things arise due to conditions and then hang around for a while. My knee pain—solid state. Birth—I was born, I'll last all these years, and then I'll die. As if there are two moments together that are exactly the same.

So it's just this not seeing the momentariness. Part of that is that it's happening so quickly we don't actually perceive it. Having the quiet and more steady awareness allows us to recognize the subtlety. But it's not only that. Part of it is just our habit of assuming permanence, of not really looking carefully, of inattention.

So you might notice as you go through the day, or you have a sensation, just noticing it. Really, the more present with it, you see it's changing all the time. But when concept takes over, it feels the same.

He said once—I don't know if you'll get it—he said there's two things that don't change: Nibbana and a concept. So look at that. "Oh, this pain's been the same all day." Total concept. I mean, nothing's even there all day, right? Notice how often we do that.

Another place I play with it sometimes is seeing. When we're walking around, we just think "seeing"—steady state seeing. But the actual seeing is different every single second. Not that you have to get lost in the content of seeing, but it's never the same two seconds. But we just go, "Oh yeah, seeing. I'm always seeing." Or we just don't really notice.

You know when you see time-lapse photography? Those nature programs with a time-lapse of a bulb being planted, and then it pushes up through the earth and grows into the flower or the tree or whatever, and then the leaves fall off and it dies and goes back to the earth. When you see it all moving like that, you see that there's never any place you could stop it and say there's a stasis—that now it's bulb and now it's flower. It's just changing every moment. But it's slower than our normal eyes can see. Speeding it up like that gives a sense of how it really is.

It's not just outside. It's also inside. A friend, a longtime meditator, was saying, "For years I've seen everything's changing, everything's changing. Why don't I get it?" And suddenly she saw, "Oh, I was thinking everything around me is changing. But also here, inside me, I'm constantly changing too." And that's the thing. There's actually not really any insight outside like that.

Once there were five of us—it must have been at a retreat teaching—and we would meet for dinner every night. Once we were just laughing about it and saying, "We feel like the same five of us are meeting every night. But actually, it's a different five every night." We're always different. You're in a different mood, or your body feels different. It's a completely different bringing together. But we just assume we're all the same. We don't look at it.

So this is where it gets really interesting—this lack of continuity of awareness. When people come into interviews at retreats, they say things like, "I'm just sleeping all the time," or "I've been sad all day." And we really think that. That's how our mind assumes permanence. It draws this veil over everything. "It's always been like this. It's always going to be like this." And we don't notice the arising and passing, the coming and the going.

There was something else, but I don't know what it was—so that's change. The mind doesn't hold things anymore.

I was reading a short description of a meeting some years ago between Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and Trungpa Rinpoche.

And it said they were just sitting somewhere quietly for hours, just sitting. And then suddenly one of them pointed to a tree and said, "They call that a tree." And then they both just laughed uproariously. They said, "Everything is a verb." Everything is a verb. So we go "tree." I mean, it's functional—don't get me wrong, it's functional. But this assumption of permanence is where we get stuck. So just seeing that.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said, "We miss the real by lack of attention, and we create the unreal by excess of imagination." So just noticing that.

I read somewhere a very simple description of right view. It's very simple, but it's very helpful to simplify. Right view simply means a view that's in alignment with things as they are.

In terms of different kinds of insights, there's one I like to talk about in Pali: yathā-bhūta-ñāna-dassana. That's a particular insight that could be translated as insight seeing clearly into things as they have come to be in this moment. And that's considered a very profound insight—recognizing things as they have come to be in this moment. "Have come to be" rather than "are." Someone made that distinction to me in terms of the translation. "Things as they are"—again, we're back into unchanging steady state. "Things as they have come to be" gives me that sense of conditions coming together, and they change, and they go away again. But in this moment, that alignment of perception with things as they have come to be is actually a powerful insight.

How does that happen? Steady, moment-to-moment mindfulness. That's really why continuity, why we talk about it so much. As soon as there's not the continuity of mindfulness, we don't see the arising, we don't notice the endings, never mind the momentary change.

The steadiness of awareness and then, you know, sammā-sati—right mindfulness, meaning mindfulness that isn't clouded by wanting or aversion, because then we don't recognize accurately what's going on. But just steady, steady, moment-to-moment mindfulness. Why we're always talking about continuity so much.

I ask a lot of times in interviews, "How is it in the in-between times?" It's not to judge you like a teacher—it's nothing like that. Because we all space out a lot. That spacing out, that not having steady awareness, is exactly what prevents accurate recognition of impermanence. Because in the space out, we come back: "Oh, yeah, I'm sad. And I've been sad all day." We forget. You were hungry. You were tired. You were sleepy. You were bored. You were this. You were that. Now I'm sad. And so with the steadiness, we see it changing all the time, all the time.

It's like a tip I often give people wondering about effort in practice and all different things. And you can't really tell. Rather than trying to tighten up in the sitting or the walking, have a wider view. Kind of cast your balanced mind—not your aversive striving mind, but your balanced mind—over the day. And just see, are there places you're just kind of ever so subtly blowing it off? Not meaning to, but just thinking... When I'm wondering if I'm really being one hundred percent, I just look at my continuity. Not that you can control the continuity of mindfulness. Of course you can't.

But I can control my physical action to some extent. I can control how much—if I'm sitting, if I'm walking, if I'm going to my room—am I really doing it? Am I including it as part of the practice? Where am I saying, "Enough of this already"? Or there are just subtle things that I think don't count. So that's the place we can always look.

And a lot of times, things change. Have you noticed in the practice you don't get to have the same wonderful experience all the time? So when it goes away and you start thinking, "What did I do wrong? How can I get it back?"—don't go there. I just look and see, okay, am I staying steady? Sitting, walking, in activities? That's what I can do. That's not striving. Trying to get it back—that only causes suffering. Because nothing ever comes back. It's gone. It's over. Every moment's new. You can't get the last moment back. Maybe a better moment will come, whatever "better" means to you. And that'll go too. Because that's how it is.

The suffering isn't that it goes—it's that we think it shouldn't. Or we wish it went sooner. Either one.

So the Buddha said, cultivate a perception of impermanence, of anicca. Just a few little tips come to mind. Not going around crazily looking for it. Not striving. "Oh, I see the ending." Little things at times.

One is something from Ajahn Chah, which is just at times—broadly, when you're going through life, when you're going through the day—noticing from time to time: "This is uncertain." Just, "Oh, this is uncertain." When you find yourself thinking, "I'm going to get banana for breakfast today," you just might go, "This is uncertain." When you think, "I'm going to go in the refrigerator and get some eggs," you think, "This is uncertain." We never know.

That's not to make a big deal, but just to remind ourselves. And if you do that, it kind of highlights, "Ah, I was assuming. I know how it's going to be." So that's just something to lightly look at.

Another thing I like to notice is when we're assuming permanence. This, of course, we've talked about. You can see it in your practice here all the time. Just today—just today—if you think back later, how did you relate to different experiences in the last couple of days? Difficult experiences: fear, anxiety, self-doubt, the difficult ones. Were there times when part of that emotional quality, even if you're kind of mindful, was like, "It's going to be like this always"?

It's kind of part of what some difficult emotions say. They say, "It's going to be like this always." And we know it's not true, but we kind of believe it. Just noticing that—assuming permanence.

Or it goes away. You don't quite notice the going, but you notice it's gone. Yet we think, "Well, I'm not noticing it right now, but it's down there waiting." And when it comes back, you say, "Yeah, I knew it. It was always there. I just wasn't mindful enough. Here it is again. It's always like this."

Notice that. Because it isn't always like this.

And then with the beautiful or the positive or the ones that you like—with the clinging, you try to hold onto it, of course. Do you try to get it back again?

Now I know how to meditate. They talked about there being a path to samadhi. This is it. This is how I sat. This is how much I slept. This is what I ate. This is how I held my hands. How can I get it back again?

Just noticing that—don't make yourself bitter about it, but that's assuming permanence. It's really gone. How much more suffering is there in trying to get something back than just letting it go and being fully present here in this moment? That's so much easier, but we can't stand it. We can't do it. We just can't be that simple. We've got to complicate everything, hold on to something that's over, and project this pain in the knee into the future, into the rest of our lives. How can I ever do anything again with this pain in my back, with this sadness, with this crick in my neck, with this headache, with whatever it is? It's over. It's always going to be this way.

And then it ends and we think, "Yeah, right, everything's impermanent," la la la. And then something else comes and we do the same thing again.

So not to judge ourselves—this is just human nature. Steady awareness starts to show us this. And it can be fun, you know? It can be. We don't take ourselves so seriously. "Yeah, right—assuming permanence again."

And then when something we've been holding onto goes, really notice the gone-ness. It's really gone.

I use this example. I know it seems silly, but somehow it was a big insight. Sometimes the big insights come through little things that are happening. I was eating lunch very slowly and mindfully. You take the bite. You feel the burst of flavor. You're chewing. In two bites, the flavor's gone, and you're just masticating this glob of stuff. Then you swallow and you're feeling it going down. I noticed my mind was saying—as I felt the swallowing—that's the food going down. But then I went to the direct experience. That wasn't experience; that was concept. The sense of the food in the mouth was gone. It was really gone. There was a sensation in the stomach, but to think "that's the food in the mouth" was just some idea that gives a sense of permanence. When I really looked, the food was totally gone. And now there was just this experience.

I know this seems silly, but actually noticing that gone-ness is really interesting—noticing cessation just of little things like that. I don't mean go around being crazy, looking for endings of everything. I'm really not trying to say that. Or "I've got to see the beginning, I've got to see the ending." No. Notice what you're actually noticing. That's good enough.

When we bring continuity of awareness, we can't help but notice impermanence. Why? Because that's how it is. But looking for something we're not exactly seeing, we're stuck in concept and striving again.

So I'm dropping these in as things to notice when they're actually noticeable, not to make you crazy trying to see something that isn't here.

And then again, noticing how conditions change, how conditions affect other conditions—like noticing how the weather changes. Maybe your mood changes. I certainly notice that. And some of you think, well, no, who am I to be affected by the weather? We're not different from the weather. Notice that. A gray, cold, cloudy day, a beautiful sunny day with the leaves—the mood might be different. How does the breath feel when you have a cold, when you don't have a cold, when you're tired, when you're not? The conditions that come together and create experience are always changing. This is how conditionality works, and again, steady state awareness really reveals that.

There's another story from the suttas about this, a monk named Asaji, who had apparently had really good practice and concentration, and he was very sick. On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Rajagaha in the bamboo grove, and Venerable Asaji was sick, afflicted, gravely ill. So the Buddha went to him and was talking to him. Asaji was quite upset and really feeling regret. The Buddha was asking him about his virtue, his sila—are you regretting, having remorse? And he said, no, no. So the Buddha said, well, if you have nothing for which to reproach yourself in regard to your virtue, Asaji, why are you troubled by remorse and regret?

And he said, formally, venerable sir, when I was ill in previous times, I could keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations—in other words, getting really concentrated. But now I do not obtain concentration. So it occurs to me, let me not fall away. The conditions have changed, he can't get concentrated, and he's really upset about it. The guy's dying, and he's upset.

And the Buddha, of course, gave him a whole talk on impermanence—on the fact that, first, the impermanence of form, the impermanence of vedana. He said that in his teaching, concentration is not the essence; the essence is insight, path, and fruit. And so really seeing—with form when it's changing, when vedana is changing—he understands: it's changing, it's going away. When he feels a feeling tone terminating with the body, he understands: this feeling tone is ending with the body. When it's terminating with life, he understands: it's ending. He understands this is just what's happening. It's not about trying to get that concentration because that's not possible under the present conditions. But the freedom is from the understanding. Everything's changing.

This discernment, this understanding of impermanence on the visceral, cellular level—not intellectual understanding; we all have that, thinking about it. The middle level of understanding, yes, we ponder it, we go deeper. But the transformative level of insight—I really think of it as cellular level, when we really perceive again and again.

It's not suffering. There are moments, yes, that shaky ground we don't like, fear can come up on the way. But don't be afraid of that. Really, the deep understanding, as Roxanne was saying, opens us to the wonder, to the mystery, to the beauty of life. It releases our mind, our heart, from the habit of obsessing with looking for happiness, fulfillment, self-confirmation in any experience. That's like a huge relief. Not to need experience to confirm your sense of self or value, not needing experience to do anything, but just to open fully, moment to moment, into this vibrant presence—totally here. It's not like you don't care about everything. You're totally in everything.

Many of you probably know this little poem, but I like it because it feels like just what I'm saying. It's attributed to a Zen nun named Tejitsu.

Whether that's true, I'm not sure. She says:

Standing on the small porch of Hakujuan, she saw the shadow of a little bird cross the footpath, followed by the shadow of a hungry crow. And she saw that the little bird arose, abided, and fell away. And then she saw that arising arose, abided, and fell away.

Abiding arose, abided, and fell away. Falling away arose, abided, and fell away. She saw that knowing this arose, abided, and fell away. Then she knew there was nothing more than this—no ground, nothing to lean on stronger than the cane she held, nothing to lean upon at all, and no one leaning. And she opened the clenched fist in her mind and let go and fell into the midst of everything.

Into the midst of everything. That's really how it feels—not like nothing matters, but totally in the midst of everything. The beauty, the mystery, the wonder of just this moment, nothing needing to block. And this brings us a great flexibility of response to situation. It doesn't mean "who cares?" You're totally present. Without holding to prior concepts, you can really see what's appropriate, what might need to happen.

I'll end with a little story illustrating this, from a book called Street Zen by Issan Dorsey, who was a Zen master. First he was a drag queen in San Francisco, then he practiced Zen for twenty years, and then he founded the Hartford Street Zen Center. He meant it as a Zen center, but he said men with AIDS kept showing up at the door, so he turned it into a hospice—Maitri Hospice—for AIDS patients.

Just this little line of how that happened, because he never meant it to be a hospice. He said: "We always dealt with whatever came to the door. We started the hospice because death came to the door."

You can deal with a complex, changing situation because you don't have to control it. You don't have to force it into an ideal pattern. You can actually allow it to be whatever it is and allow yourself to adapt to what it becomes, because this is the way we proceed. We respond to the immediacy of the situation, and therefore we're very practical.

Opening into everything, falling into the midst of everything, allows for truly appropriate response to everything. We don't need to be afraid of impermanence. It really allows us so much freedom to appreciate the beauty in life, as well as opening to the difficulty.

Thank you for your attention. Let's just sit quietly a moment.

So assuming permanence, we assume that in thirty or thirty-five minutes you'll do walking meditation, the bell will ring, we'll all come back in and chant. What's amazing is how often that really happens. But notice—we never really know.

CHAPTER 83

Morning Sit and Q&A

Carol Wilson · 14 min

> In this Q&A session from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses common confusions about Buddhist terminology that arise when practitioners encounter multiple Pāli terms and English translations. She carefully distinguishes vedanā (feeling tone) from mood, explaining that vedanā refers specifically to the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality accompanying each sense experience—a subtle and quick phenomenon quite different from moods or states of mind. Moods belong to the third foundation of mindfulness, citta, which encompasses whatever qualities are present in a moment of consciousness.
>
> Carol then clarifies how the five aggregates (khandhas) relate to other terms practitioners encounter. Rūpa includes all material form, including the body (kāya), while the remaining four aggregates—vedanā, saññā, saṅkhāra, and viññāṇa—all arise within citta. She notes that the Buddha may have highlighted vedanā and saññā separately from saṅkhāra due to their particular importance in understanding dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda) and the arising of craving.
> The talk also addresses the practice of brahmavihāra when someone is ill, exploring the difference between mettā and karuṇā. Carol emphasizes that karuṇā naturally arises when attention connects with the suffering aspect of a being—described as the heart quivering in response to suffering. Importantly, she cautions against practicing with attachment to results, as wanting to 'fix' someone subtly corrupts the purity of compassion. The session concludes with practical advice about not getting caught up in analytical frameworks when direct, choiceless awareness of present experience is what's needed, reminding practitioners that 'reality has no direction.'

How is feeling tone different from mood? If I wake up on the wrong side of the bed and everything pisses me off, is feeling tone primarily a way to avoid personalizing—using "me" or "mine"—or is it something else entirely?

This is an important question. I think the English word "feeling" leads to some of the confusion. We try to use "feeling tone" now because vedana used to be translated simply as "feeling." But we use "feeling" in English for moods and states of mind, and vedana is not that.

Vedana is that very specific, subtle feeling of each sense experience as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, experienced in the mind very quickly. It's only that. And as I've said—I gave a whole talk on this—without recognition, without mindfulness, vedana can so easily lead into wanting or aversion or confusion, and that can give rise to all kinds of moods or states of mind.

Moods and states of mind belong to the third foundation, citta. That's really whatever qualities are present in a moment of consciousness. So knowing the citta means knowing the mind that has samadhi present or the mind that doesn't, knowing the mind that's pissed off with everything or the mind that's not.

So mood is different from feeling tone—they're separate, different things. And mood itself can be pleasant, wholesome, unpleasant, or neutral. Being mindful of the mood in the moment when you wake up feeling all grumpy: each moment of grumpiness, that mental mood, might come with an unpleasant feeling tone that's perceived or not. When it's not perceived, it's just grumpy, grumpy, grumpy.

Using feeling tone to be present without personalizing is a great tool. But we can also cling to feeling tone. As Roxanne spoke about in the five aggregates of clinging, vedana is one of them. It's true, it's a little less personal. "I'm so grumpy, the world stinks, and it's everybody else's fault"—that's a little easier to identify with than simply noting "unpleasant, unpleasant, unpleasant." But we can identify with anything if we try hard enough.

So tuning into feeling tone first makes it a little easier not to personalize, but the key thing is helping us see the whole cause and effect: how vedana leads into wanting or aversion, how that leads into mood, how that leads into a sense of "me." Seeing that whole cause and effect with mindfulness is what really helps cut through the personalization. In any moment, any experience recognized clearly with mindfulness doesn't have to have a "me" or "mine" in it.

Hopefully that clarifies the difference between vedana and mood, the mental states. You'd see mood in citta.

The second question follows on from this, about the five aggregates. Someone named them as Roxanne did: form, consciousness, perception, feeling tone, thoughts and volition. This person says, "I don't see body, kaya, nor heart-mind, citta, in this list."

This is just another word thing. Rupa means all material form—the body, the five physical senses, and all external rupa. That is kaya, that is body. It's in there under rupa, all material form. Kaya is another word; I'm talking about our particular physical body, but rupa is all material form.

"I don't see heart-mind, citta, in that list." All the other four aggregates are citta. Citta is—I think Guy likes to call it "psyche" sometimes. It's really like a moment of consciousness arising in every moment. And citta, the third foundation of mindfulness, is recognizing in that moment of consciousness what concomitants are present, what's arising together with that moment of consciousness. All of the other three—the sankharas, perception, and sanya—are arising in that moment.

I don't know why the Buddha broke out sanya and vedana from sankhara, but they're arising as sankhara. Maybe just to highlight the importance of their function, to help us notice them.

So citta, heart and mind—we've been using "heart and mind" just because that's a kind of Western division that isn't there in citta. It's not saying the mind is thinking and the heart is emotions. It's not that.

Citta is a moment of consciousness with whatever's arising. Whatever states of heart and mind—perception arising, sanya arising, vedana arising in every moment, some sort of volition and thoughts and moods in a moment of consciousness—all of that is citta. So it's just a different way of describing the same thing. I hope that helps a little bit.

The one thing I do want to say is this: we offer these lists, these different angles of looking at our experience, really breaking it down, and of course they can at times depersonalize it. They do help us, when the attention is steady, to see more clearly the cause and effect relationship. And at other times, it drives you bonkers. You're looking for all these different things and really what's happening is a big feeling of fear. And you're trying to go, "Oh, I fear," and it's huge, and you think, "No, but I've got to notice the citta, I've got to notice the vedana, what's the perception?" and you're making yourself nuts. What's actually happening now? It's like this.

So sometimes the more subtle lists are really interesting. They naturally draw the attention. Maybe some days you're just naturally noticing vedana. But then the next day you think, "I should notice vedana," but that's not what's happening, and you're trying.

Choiceless awareness is really what's happening now. Allow your mindful attention to just drop in, without resistance, to what's happening now—really subtle and fine, or big and gross. And you think, "Oh, I'm going backwards." No, there's no forwards. There's no backwards. There's one line from Sayadaw U Tejaniya that I really like in one of his books. He said, "Reality has no direction." So if you think you're going forward or backward—total concept. Because it's only now.

So use these concepts, these pointings. They can be really helpful. But if you're getting all caught up in the mentality of it at that time, no. Let yourself just drop into, with your awareness, with your attention, what's actually happening now. Very simply. We all go through different times in practice.

One other question that I think is important: "When someone is sick, is it better to send metta or karuna? Do you think it can have an effect on them?"

I think this is something we really wonder about. First, in terms of the formal style of Brahmavihara practice, karuna practice is practiced in the same way as we've been offering the metta. The difference is that they are different qualities of heart-mind, different mental factors. They feel a little different. They're both beautiful. Don't think, "Oh God, I shouldn't be feeling metta, it's karuna." They're both beautiful. Take either one that comes.

But the way they work—like metta, as we say, its proximate cause in a moment, the immediate cause of it arising in the next moment of citta, is seeing the good and appreciating it. With karuna, compassion, it's said to be in this style: that quality of open, connected attention—you could say met attention—connects with the suffering aspect of the being. Instead of focusing on the good, the suffering aspect is apparent, and that's what this open kind attention connects with. That's the proximate cause for karuna to arise, sometimes described as the quivering of the heart in response to suffering.

So there are different qualities of heart and mind. You can experience the difference. Both are good. You might see what's easier for you. For me, if the suffering aspect of someone is coming up, my attention connects with it, and karuna is what automatically comes.

But you can explore and see for yourself. That's the difference. If I'm feeling that somebody's sick and my attention goes to them, karuna would naturally come. Even if I were using metaphors, karuna is the feeling that comes. But don't try to make it right or wrong. Just explore.

And this next question: do you think it can have an effect on them? This, I think, is an important question, and I hope I can explain it clearly. It gets into what we're doing when we offer metta or compassion. We're focusing—it's all in us, right? There's the idea of a being, and as if sending something to them. But the motivation isn't sending something to them to make them different. The motivation of cultivating these qualities is to deepen, to recognize that quality arising now in our own mind and heart.

It's not a selfish thing. You know, sometimes people think, "Oh, it's selfish if I'm not sending it to them." But then the motivation isn't quite metta. It isn't quite karuna. There's a little offness. There's a little wanting some result. And as soon as there's wanting some result, there can still be some metta, some karuna, but it's not that purity. It's not quite it. It's not about the result.

This is tricky because of our language. I'm saying, "May you be free from suffering." Yes. But it's the heart and mind that's connected with the suffering, that's quivering with it—not demanding that it be fixed. That doesn't mean in life, if we really feel someone suffering and there's something we could do, that we shouldn't act. That clarity of karuna without any wanting in it can be the motivation that gives rise to appropriate action. And we can recognize what's appropriate action much more clearly when it's not me wanting them to get better. You can do something really thinking you're helping, wanting them to get better, but that little bit of wanting gets in the way of seeing clearly.

So when we're doing this practice, it's not to make something happen. Whether they can feel it or not, who the heck knows? We all have opinions. I do think sometimes it happens, but as soon as you want it to, you're off, right? So that's the trick. Remember, it's really purifying the habits of our own mind and heart. And if the thought comes up that this is selfish, that's a habit of negativity to notice. That's what we're purifying. Don't believe it. Don't believe everyone else should have metta but not you because you're the worst being on the planet and you're just being selfish sending metta to yourself. So you'll take this grumpiness, this negativity toward yourself, and send metta to everyone else, but behind it is this negativity toward yourself. No, bring it into yourself, for God's sake. Start there. Go back there.

It is said that if the mind is really, really super concentrated—like Buddha level—that one could actually send metta. There's a story that the Buddha sent metta to a charging elephant and it felt the metta and stopped. I don't think we're at that level, so let's not try it. Let's just stay real. But the power of this practice is beyond our imagining. Still, don't get woo-woo—don't get all magical thinking about it. What's happening now? Right now? Simple karuna is a beautiful, beautiful thing. So is simple metta.

Sensation. That's so boring—I want all this amazing stuff! But pressure. Tingling. Coolness. Curiosity. That's it. All day long. Enjoy.

CHAPTER 84

Bringing Mindfulness/Wisdom to Our Actions

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this comprehensive dharma talk from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses how the Buddhist path encompasses all aspects of life, not just deep meditation states. She emphasizes that the mundane moments of daily activity are equally important opportunities for practice and purification of heart-mind.
>
> Wilson explores multiple frameworks the Buddha offered for understanding wise action. She discusses the ten wholesome and unwholesome actions rooted in the three roots of greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha), explaining how right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) includes understanding these roots. She examines how cetanā (intention) is the heart of kamma, quoting the Buddha's teaching that "action is intention." The talk covers the three rounds of kilesa (defilements)—transgressive, obsessive, and latent—and how they are respectively protected against by sīla, samādhi, and paññā.
> A significant portion addresses the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), which outlines seven ways āsavas (taints) can be abandoned: through seeing, restraining, using, enduring, avoiding, removing, and developing the seven factors of awakening. Wilson offers practical examples for each—from sense-door restraint when walking past others, to examining our relationship with food and requisites, to knowing when patience serves versus when avoidance is skillful. Throughout, she emphasizes that wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) means noticing what feeds unwholesome states versus what starves them, transforming every moment into practice for liberation.

By this point in the retreat, for some of you—or perhaps all of you—it may feel like we're offering a lot of information, a different talk every night. I know from conversations and from my own experience that sometimes the talks land beautifully, and other times it feels like enough already. Too much information, depending on what's happening in your particular practice at the moment. So I just want to normalize that.

Different ones of us have different ways of processing information. The way we as teachers talk and access things may come from approaches that speak to you, or they may not—we're all different. Sometimes what we're offering may land and be really helpful. Other times it feels like too much, or whatever's going on in your practice isn't quite in alignment. That's natural. Just don't twist yourself into a pretzel trying to make best use of every single talk. This isn't an apology for my talk, but there is a lot of information in it. Take what's useful, but don't twist yourself up. We can't all be in the same place at the same time.

One aspect I really value about the Buddhist teachings as they've come down to us is their all-inclusive nature. Even with—not even though—the absolute commitment to full awakening, to liberation, to purifying the heart-mind and the habits of greed, aversion, and delusion, which is really the heart of the practice, that commitment or value isn't reserved just for really deep meditation. That value shoots through all aspects of our life in the way the Buddha taught.

His teaching includes all aspects. It's not that we have to just hang out in the mundane and schlep through it as best we can, waiting until there's enough wisdom to open into a moment of freedom from greed, hatred, and delusion. You already know that's not true. But the times we're in the mundane aren't second best either. It's so easy for our minds to think that—as soon as we've made it "okay, but it's not really it," something feels missing. So I want to talk tonight about the more mundane aspect of the teaching and how that also relates to purifying the habits of mind.

Probably many of you are quite familiar with at least the end of this quotation from Padmasambhava: "The view is recognizing nibbāna as the most important thing. However, do not let your actions slip in the direction of the view. If they do, you will fall into the evil views of demons, prattling on about how goodness is empty, evil is empty. But do not let your views slip in the direction of action either, or you will be caught in materialism and ideology."

So what do we do? You don't land on anything. Here's the famous part: "That is why my view is higher than the sky, but my attention to actions and their effects is finer than grains of barley flour." It's not one or the other.

I'll add just one more thing from Nāgārjuna because it amuses me. Nāgārjuna said, "It is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness." It's the believing in aspect, folks.

So I want to talk about the action side tonight—different ways from the Buddha's teachings that we can relate to actions, and how that way of relating is itself the practice of purifying, of shifting these habits toward clear seeing, leading to nibbāna.

The Buddha was very clear that the awakened heart-mind manifests in our actions. I read this often: "Bhikkhus, a fool is characterized by their actions. A wise person is characterized by their actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's discernment shines, that one's wisdom shines."

He's not neglecting this aspect in any way, just in terms of importance. In the long descriptions in the suttas of Right View, the first step of the Eightfold Path...

There's mundane and supermundane right view—that's a whole huge discussion in itself. But I just want to touch on this one aspect of mundane right view that's included in the Buddha's teaching. One of the definitions of right view is understanding the ten wholesome actions and the ten unwholesome actions.

When a noble disciple—it's not just the actions themselves, which I'll mention and they're fairly obvious—but what makes it right view is when the noble disciple understands the wholesome and the root of the wholesome in the mind, when a noble disciple understands the unwholesome and the root of the unwholesome in the mind. So the ten wholesome actions arise from understanding the root of the wholesome that leads to them. Refraining from the unwholesome, which are just the reverse, comes not only because one shouldn't do it, but really from understanding the wisdom of the roots of the unwholesome—which are, guess what? Greed, hatred, and confusion.

So the wholesome actions: three of body—not killing living beings, not taking what is not given, not causing sexual harm. Sound familiar? But it's understanding the wholesome roots that matters.

Four of speech: abstaining from false speech, from lying, from malicious speech, from harsh speech. Malicious speech also means using speech as a way to divide people—like when two people get together and talk badly about a third person. Even if it's true, that's not the point. It's malicious, and the root of doing that is unwholesome. So understanding the wholesome root of refraining from false speech, malicious speech, harsh speech, and idle gossip—which we've talked about before. That's the hardest one, right? We've mentioned the word, and I have to say I just love it: samphappalāpa. That's the word for idle gossip and useless speech.

But you know, if we really cut that out, isn't it a relief not to be just blabbing all this garbage all the time? I mean, our mind's bad enough, but usually we share this junk in our mind with other beings out of all the love in our heart. Isn't it nice not to do that? Thank God.

So four of body, and the three wholesome actions of mind: non-covetousness—not wanting other people's things or things that other people have, so it's a form of non-greed but more specific—non-ill will, and right view. Of course, that covers everything.

The Buddha is saying here, in terms of right view on the mundane level when we're living our normal life, understanding these wholesome roots that lead to these wholesome actions—that's right view. That's the first step of the Eightfold Path. So actions and understanding what leads to them is so important. It's part of how we use all aspects of our life from this deepest motivation of recognizing the truth, of abandoning confusion and greed.

Speaking about action, then, we need to be very clear about what the Buddha means when he talks about action—which we've discussed before, so I'll just highlight it. First, the word in Pāli that simply means action is kamma, or karma in Sanskrit, which we tend to think means this whole big thing, but specifically it just means action—kamma.

As the Buddha said: "Action is intention, I tell you. Intending, one does action by way of body, speech, and mind."

So the intention—that's the heart of the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of an action in the way that the Buddha is talking about it, in the way that he's referring to the wholesome and unwholesome roots. We've talked about intention in terms of our practice, just that cetanā, that little about-to moment. But that's arising, of course, as part of conditioned arising, as everything is. So in this form, the intention that's the seed of the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness in the action is the quality in the mind-heart that gives rise to that moment, that cetanā. You could say the motivation, a little bit bigger. But understanding, really, that all action springs from the mind.

The Buddha in the Dhammapada: "All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a corrupted or impure mind, and suffering follows, as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox. All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind."

Speak or act with a peaceful mind, and happiness follows like your shadow that never leaves you. Just cause and effect, not an act of will.

And so, as we've been emphasizing the whole time now, the practice is really about tuning in more and more to what's going on in the mind—particularly in terms of what leads to speech and action. As Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche says, actions are the servants of the mind. We can use actions to help us reflect back and see what's going on in the mind.

As you know, our tendency is to think an action is wholesome or not by how it looks, by what the results are. But in terms of how the Buddha describes it, that's not it at all. For example, we could do an action—giving something that seems really generous, really kind—and the internal motivation could be many different things, couldn't it? So it's not our job to just do the generous thing. It's to really be looking and seeing.

You could give with this open-hearted quality, just wanting to offer the happiness of generosity. Or it could be, "Maybe it would make me look good." It could be, "I should, it's the right thing to do"—so there's a little generosity and a little bit not, but that's okay. It's mixed, and you can see it. Or it could be, "Maybe if I give them this, then they'll owe me," and you want them to owe you. So it's actually not a wholesome action at all. You get the sense. There are examples like that with everything.

This isn't about judging. It's about getting more and more in the habit of tuning in, noticing what's motivating this action, this speech, even thoughts—but that's harder to see, so don't worry about it. We can just see from actions and speech.

And as we've all noticed, how often when we're not mindful or aware, or we're taken by surprise, our old friends and habits frequently arise as the motivation for speech and action. You know our friends—they're friends: greed, hatred, and confusion. But they do arise. Someone quoted Ajahn Chah saying something about seventy-five or eighty percent of our practice is just being aware of craving arising and not being able to do anything about it. But we are doing something—we're being aware of it. That's what we can do.

Because a lot of people are seeing this. Mindfulness is getting more steady, the mind is getting more collected. And some people think, "I'm seeing craving all the time. What's the matter with me?" Nothing's the matter with you. You're getting more aware. This is what's driving the bus half the time—craving and aversion. So seeing it is already the first step of wisdom, or the second and the third.

We're learning to recognize how when we're not aware, habits are strong. We use them. Someone gave the example: if we're driving on the highway and go to shift lanes, there are actually many small actions required to do that. If you were being super mindful—first I look in the rear view mirror, seeing, seeing; then I look at the side mirror, seeing, seeing; then I check the blind spot—I mean, seventeen cars have passed by this time! We can't do it that way. So we do it instinctively, and a lot of that is habit.

So habit is just a natural thing. It also comes up when we're comfortable and not paying attention, or in moments of stress. We can begin by not taking it personally, but simply seeing how frequently the habit can come springing up and we don't know why. Have you ever had the experience where you have a clear, wholesome intention—something like, "I'm going to go into the dining room and just take a very moderate amount of food and eat it with awareness"? Very clear. You're not kidding yourself. But then you sit down and you've got this pile, and you think, "How did that happen?" You're legitimately puzzled. "How did that happen? I had this clear intention"—which you did, many moments ago. But cetanā is arising every single moment. The mind moments are changing. Sometimes we can be aware that greed came up and we acted on it, so there's awareness seeing how it worked. Other times, not. "How did that happen?"

Once someone asked Sayadaw U Tejaniya a similar question, and he said, "Weak wisdom, strong kilesa." The wisdom is there, but then we lose the mindfulness and the habit takes over. This isn't meant to scare us, but to wake us up—to not take it personally, but to see why the steadiness of mindfulness is so important, why the lack of steady awareness gets us in trouble. We can see this in life too. Even though we try to be good, when we're under stress, when something unexpected happens and we're not quite present, old habits can spring up in not very helpful ways. Crimes and such could be committed.

There's a line from Dr. King: "The ultimate measure of a person is not where they stand in moments of comfort and convenience, but where they stand at times of challenge and controversy." I offer that not as a view about how we should be, but as an observation about the ultimate measure of how the qualities of heart and mind, how the wisdom, is coming and being purified. There will be times when, in moments of stress or comfort, the unwholesome doesn't arise and the wholesome does arise. You've noticed that at least once, right? It does happen. Let it in. You think, "Where did that come from? That wasn't me. I was the greedy one who took too much food. I'm not the one who said, 'Okay, that's enough now,' and just put it down." You're not either of them, of course. But noticing how, through steady attention, the habits are starting to shift—that's our practice. Attention to motivation as we go through the day.

From Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "When we're not mindful, we're not aware. So many of our intentions, thoughts, speech, and actions may be governed by, ruled by the defilements—the torments of greed, hatred, and delusion. It's mostly delusion because everything is on automatic. Delusion is boss." Back to the street gang again—delusion is boss. "However, when we train our mind to notice what we are doing first, then what we are doing next, we're training our minds to see that detail. When I see the mind's intentions in this way, then it's possible to consciously choose whether to act or not act in a given situation. One can choose to do what is skillful and leads to ease. In that way, one avoids acting out of pure habit that always does the same thing, even when it causes suffering."

So the practice is simple, nothing new. I'm just highlighting it from a different angle. Going through the day sometimes, not when there's something big calling attention, but when you're thinking, "What should I pay attention to now? Nothing's happening"—you might notice just intentions for little actions.

Just notice your intention to look. Notice your intention when you walk into the dining room. Do you go to the food first, or do you go to save a place? I think you're not allowed to, right? But you find some secret way to do that. Do you go and try to save a place, or do you figure out how to sit there until everyone's eaten so you can have the place? Whatever it is, notice why you're doing what you're doing. Do you go for a walk? Where? When you get up and walk out of here, do you turn left or right?

Little stuff. You say, "Oh, I'm just following the Dhamma," but somehow left leads to the tea stall, and you're making some tea. "Oh, I'm just following the Dhamma, just turned left." Nobody else is in there looking. You don't have to be good for somebody. We want to understand what's going on to free our hearts and minds from confusion. So don't be afraid to see this stuff. It doesn't mean you're a hopeless loser. It just means you're human. And this is what we have to work with, to understand.

Just noticing these little choices—it kind of gets to be fun. When I get up, which shoe do I put on first? I mean, you could go nuts with it, okay. But just starting to notice when something comes from habit, and then you can bring awareness in and see.

The Buddha spoke to wise intention in the second step of the Eightfold Path—sammā saṅkappa, another word translated variously as wise thought or wise intention. We've spoken of it before. But he defines what becomes wise intention rather than unwise—greed, hatred, confusion. As Greg mentioned when he talked about the sutta on the two types of thought, wise intention transforms through wisdom, through our practice.

The intention of greed naturally transforms from lobha to renunciation, and even then to generosity. Not as a should—yes, we can practice these things—but starting to see with steady mindfulness and wisdom, I'm sure you've seen moments when greed started and then there was a natural renunciation, renouncing the craving that was leading you into it. Whether it's a big thing or a little thing, it's not about the object. It's renouncing the craving. Wisdom just puts it down sometimes. Notice that. It's worth noticing. It's happening naturally, this transformation to wise intention, sammā saṅkappa.

Hatred naturally transforms—in the Theravāda, to non-hatred, but you could say mettā, friendliness. And cruelty transforms to compassion. So these are the three wise intentions. Delusion transforms through wisdom, not through action.

Noticing when the kilesas are driving the bus is important, but also notice that through our steady practice—and that's lots of moments where you're just mindful, nothing special going on, but mindfulness in that moment being present, wise mindfulness, not distorted by greed or aversion—you're not having some big insight moment, but many, many moments where the wholesome is being fed rather than the unwholesome habits being fed through inattention and mere habit.

That's why you don't notice anything happening, and then suddenly someone goes by and the old feelings of judging and ill will arise, and suddenly the mind goes, "Oh, but they're doing the best they can," and the whole thing drops. I remember the first time that happened to me—I really thought, who's in my mind doing that? But it happens. Let it in. This is the second step of the Eightfold Path, sammā saṅkappa, those three qualities. We've talked about them in detail, so I'm not going to say more, but we've explored renunciation or generosity, friendliness or mettā, non-hatred, compassion, non-cruelty.

Notice them. Notice how this naturally occurs. You can see it. It's all part of the whole path, purifying these habits of mind.

Now shifting to another way, the Buddha talks about how we see in our practice these habits, how we're transforming. Because everything is really about the heart of the practice—this pure citta, this pure heart-mind. That's what sees nibbana, that's what recognizes the truth. And all these different ways are just to say you don't have to wait until something fantastic is happening. These are all ways the Buddha gives for bringing in this awareness, bringing in this understanding. And they're all just as good as each other.

So first, let me talk about what's called the three rounds of kilesa. This is something I heard Sayadaw U Pandita talk about frequently. I liked it. These are kind of three levels of how kilesa manifests in our experience. One is called the transgressive level, one is the obsessive level, and one is the latent underlying level. Don't get discouraged. This is just a way to look at our experience.

The transgressive is just what it sounds like. When the power of the kilesa—aversion, greed, delusion—is so strong in that moment, remember it's only moments in our mind, that it leads to actions of speech and body motivated by ill will, motivated by greed, motivated by cruelty. Of course that happens in little ways, but transgressive really means in a big way. And it's protected by sila. The quality that we cultivate that protects our heart and mind from the transgressive kilesa is said to be sila.

So we're talking about gross transgression here. We're not talking about a tiny little moment where greed arises and you act on it—"Oh my God, I've transgressed!" We're talking about the serious ones. Sila does protect us from that. We get really angry, but we come up against, "Oh, don't say it." That's the sense of sila protecting us, and protecting others from the torment and from spreading the torment.

Mingyur Rinpoche puts it beautifully: our behavior, how we relate to the world around us, even in very difficult situations, becomes the most reliable means of protecting our mind and heart from anxiety and frustration, from remorse. So this is really talking about this level of kilesa that leads to truly transgressive actions. We're all familiar with it. It happens to all of us sometimes, but we're beginning to tune into that.

The second level is the obsessive torments, with which I have no doubt we are all very familiar. Obsessive is the spinning, tormenting thoughts—whether they're thoughts of self-judging or revenge or greed or worry or fear or whatever. The suffering is pretty obvious, right? But we tend to get lost in the story often and not recognize: this is just greed spinning, spinning, spinning. This is ill will spinning, spinning, spinning. The obsessive defilements.

We're protected from this level by collectedness of mind-heart, by samadhi. It can be the samadhi of one-pointed samatha, but it doesn't have to be. The collectedness that develops through the steadiness of our mindfulness practice, through khanika samadhi—on changing objects but with steady awareness—that collectedness of mind. Sayadaw U Pandita would talk about this a lot, that unification. It's a protection. When the mind is so collected, it's almost like there isn't room. The kilesas just don't have room. The mind's present, present, present. And in a moment of samma sati with this collectedness, the kilesas aren't there.

So whatever level of concentration, whatever level of collectedness—one of the reasons that collectedness is so pleasant is because we're experiencing that purity of heart and mind without kilesa. And it's lovely. Sometimes people say, "Oh, I had no idea what it feels like to just be with a peaceful heart and mind." This is not the same as temporary nibbana that Guy was talking about, because it's a constructed state. Collectedness of mind is a constructed state. But you're tasting what it feels like, recognizing how really lovely and peaceful it is when kilesas aren't running the show, driving the bus.

The absence of torments, the absence of clinging mind. It's a constructed state, and of course it goes away. That's okay. Sometimes people notice, if there's been a period of time where the mind's been more collected—whether on changing objects or whatever, doesn't matter—and it's been that kind of peaceful time without a lot of kilesa, or not much at all...

And then, you know, it changes. The collectedness goes away. The mind starts thinking. Stuff starts happening. And sometimes it's like a rebound effect, right? The kilesas were off, they weren't around, but they're waiting for the party to come. The walls went down and the parents went away, and boom, here they come. That doesn't mean you did something wrong. It's simply cause and effect.

But really seeing and tasting, appreciating that sense of the peace of pure mind—it can also at times give a sense of faith, a sense of confidence. A feeling of, "Oh, you know, this really is a path of purity. There really is something to this." They're not just talking blah, blah, blah about how greed is bad, aversion is bad. You really kind of get it. It gives us confidence, a willingness to do the work, a sense of the path being onward leading.

But then when the collectedness changes or falls apart, don't land in owning that. Don't think that because kilesas arise again, you blew it. Don't own any of it. Just see the cause and effect. That recognition, rather than being "bad, bad, bad, here they are again," can actually serve as motivation. These guys really do create suffering in my mind. Let's explore what's going on. Let's remember how we pay attention and what we pay attention to. We can really see what supports feeding the kilesas, what supports starving them, what supports feeding the wholesome.

So that leads us into my next topic. The third of the three rounds of kilesa is what's called latent or underlying torments. Okay, don't get depressed. This is like the potential for the torment to arise given the appropriate conditions. It's not that they're sitting there—I know it sounds like they're sitting there waiting to come. Even though we say they're gone, they're gone, they're not sitting there. But now you might think I'm saying they are sitting there waiting. It's not like that. But they do give the example of a seed that, if it's watered and has earth and all the appropriate conditions—hello—greed pops up, ill will pops up. Of course, one of the appropriate conditions is lack of awareness, lack of mindfulness.

So this is, again, not meant to discourage us. In a way, I find this—well, I say encouraging, but it's realistic. Rather than having all these unrealistic ideas that after a couple of three-month retreats, it's all gone, all the kilesas are gone, and then when that doesn't happen feeling really discouraged—that's just unrealistic. The reality is seeing how subtle these habits are, but also recognizing that we have the tools and the wisdom and the understanding to continue to explore, to continue to make choices that feed the wholesome and starve the unwholesome.

So given the appropriate conditions, you can notice how they sort of come up when we least expect it. Little things. I remember one yogi told me—not at this retreat, a long time ago—but something similar. They were walking through the dining room. There was a bowl of Halloween candy or something. They were walking through, quite aware, having no intention of taking the candy. They were really aware, but just when they got to the candy, their hand reached out and grabbed it. And they said, "Who's doing this?" Up until that moment they were aware, and then after, but it's like someone else came in. Just a little moment where it springs up. In funny little moments like that, you can notice.

Just in the blink of an eye. But we can see how when we're not paying attention, these tendencies can spring up.

I'll share an example from summer. I was on a retreat in Switzerland, a self-retreat at a place where I teach often and visit frequently. I'd been sitting for a couple of weeks. I was in a pretty balanced, spacious state, paying attention. Nothing much was going on. I was out walking down the road in a more wide, open kind of awareness, not particularly concentrated, but the mind was fine and balanced, not in kilesa.

A person walked toward me. Generally there, people are out hiking and everyone just says hello, you say hello back, and that's it. Very friendly, but that's all. But this person came up to me holding a pamphlet like this, out toward me. I didn't know what it was. The latent kilesa came up. For some reason—I look back and see I associated it, unrecognized in my mind, with something from my childhood. I hope I don't offend anyone, but this is what I associated it with: people would come around with the Watchtower, these religious tracts, banging on your door and trying to force it on you. I wouldn't want it.

So that came up, and I said something in English. I could have said something in German, but I said, "No, I don't speak German." Boom, and I walked away. Total aversion. It just came up like that.

And then as I walked away: what was that about? The whole mind and body was stirred up from the aversion for a long time. It leaves like an ash afterwards. As I reflected on it, I had no clue. The poor woman was probably—could it have been a map, just asking me for directions? I mean, something. I'm sure it was something quite innocuous. But this just comes springing up.

When that happens, beating oneself up doesn't help. But seeing it—it's kind of like, "Wow, look at that. Look how suddenly this can come." Bring awareness in right away. See what's going on. It's really interesting.

So latent greed, hatred, and delusion are not abandoned by sīla or by collectedness of mind, but by wisdom—by paññā, by wisely seeing. So we're back to our steady mindfulness practice. Can't get away from it. It's there for all of it. But this is where we really start to see through.

And as I said before, notice when you have moments where in the past—like that example for me of aversion coming up, which would tend to arise because I don't like to be intruded on—it just doesn't. Notice the times it would come up and it simply doesn't.

Someone gave me an example: a friend seeing how the habit of seeing leads to comparing, leads to judgment, leads to aversion to the whole mess. A friend told me this, but half of you here could have that experience. Me too. It gets so annoying. And then another time, seeing came up, comparing came up, and then suddenly: oh, everything's in constant flux. There's nothing to compare. And the whole thing just dropped away.

That's an example, in a moment, of wisdom suddenly seeing what's happening and the latent kilesa just dropping. That's a moment. That moment doesn't last the whole rest of your life. That's a moment.

But notice that. Notice how wisdom, which comes from clear seeing, really can dissolve even in the moment these deepest habits.

So he's so practical. I want to go to one other sutta of the Buddha's that I like very much because he's giving different examples of ways to work with wise attention to feed the wholesome and starve the latent underlying tendencies.

This sutta is the second one in the Majjhima Nikaya, called the Sabbāsava Sutta, or "All the Āsavas." Āsava is a word that's sometimes translated as "taints." I don't like that. We can think of it as the latent tendencies. The latent tendencies here that he's talking about, the āsavas, are very specific: sense desire, becoming, and ignorance—the most subtle ones underlying everything.

In this sutta, he's talking about wise attention, how wise attention in various situations can really show us how we pay attention. If we pay attention to how we pay attention, as you've been saying, we can see how it either is feeding and strengthening these underlying tendencies, the kilesas, or starving them. This is like bringing this quality of wisdom into all different actions of our life. I like it because it's so practical. It really shows the Buddha's practical side. I could talk for hours about each of them, so I can only go through quickly.

But he says to introduce it, "Thus have I heard, for I shall expound to you a discourse on the restraint of the āsavas. Listen and heed what I say." He's talking about when one attends unwisely, both unarisen kilesas arise and arisen ones increase. When one attends wisely, both unarisen āsavas do not arise and arisen ones are abandoned.

So he's talking about attending wisely, and then he gives examples of different situations. The first one is what you would expect, that taints can be abandoned by insight, by seeing clearly. But how he's describing wise attention here is paying attention—he said unwise attention is paying attention to that which is not worth paying attention to, which is most of our thoughts. He gives examples of attending unwisely to: Was I in past time or wasn't I in past time? How was I? How will I be in the future? What is happening now?

But I would say, because I'm going to make these quite simple, actually Sally was talking about this this morning in the Q&A with, I think it was the really vicious judging that goes on in the mind. The way one attends unwisely, and we all do it, is by being present but giving the attention to the content, to the meanness of it. Is it true that I can't do it right? No, it's not true. And this shouldn't be happening because I shouldn't be having kilesas. I'm giving attention to that. Unwise attention. Notice that as the attention is given to that content, are the kilesas increasing or no? This is how we tell what's wise attention.

So as we're giving attention to that—I'm so bad—aversion is growing, growing, growing. Unwise attention. He's just being practical. And we say this over and over: give the attention to something that's more concrete. Okay, feeling the unpleasant aspect, being with that. It's unpleasant, but you can see the kilesas are not increasing. Mindfulness is increasing. It's not always so clear cut, but this is the way it works.

So wise attention, you see, is what's worth attention, what helps to support clear seeing. What's feeding the kilesas, that's not wise attention. In terms of thought, that's the example I want to give for that.

The others are more concrete experiences in our life. And this I love—you might not think the Buddha would mention them all. The second one is taints that can be abandoned by restraining. "A bhikkhu reflecting wisely abides with the eye faculty restrained. While taints and fever of defilement might arise in a bhikkhu who is abiding with the eye faculty unrestrained, there are no taints in one who abides with the eye faculty restrained."

What do we mean by that? It doesn't mean going around blindfolded. There was once a friend of ours who was on staff, and he decided to go around for three days here blindfolded. That's not really the same thing.

This is a very simple example of eye faculty restraint. And it's not that this is a "should." Don't make a list of shoulds—"I can't look around." That's not wise attention. It's seeing and learning from wise attention, from mindfulness, what's creating more suffering.

A simple example: eye faculty restrained while walking. Someone's passing. There's this huge desire to look. You're aware of it. You keep looking, and what happens? There's no way that was a supportive thing to do. Either judging comes up—of them, of you, of you for judging them. Either way, there's comparing, there's māna, or you just judge yourself for looking. Either way, you've gotten lost in thought, and before, you were quite present.

Eye faculty restraining—I don't need to look. Not out of some harsh "should," because that's just more aversion, but out of clear seeing what's actually supportive, what's not feeding the kilesas. And so you do it, and you pay attention, and it's like, ah—there's a sense of ease and peace rather than feeding the craving by looking. Otherwise you feed that craving, and then you feed the next craving, because we just get in the habit of feeding craving.

But this is something to explore. Again, not from "should" or "you're bad," because that's aversion, but from really seeing what wise attention is, what starves the kilesas.

Just little things. You smell something pleasant. Something's cooking for lunch. The mind goes, "Pizza." I know nothing about lunch—I'm not saying there's pizza. I'm just saying one smells something. The mind goes, "Pizza." Off into all kinds of papañca about it.

What's the unwise attention? There's nothing wrong with smelling it or thinking "pizza." Wise attention, restraint of the sense door, would be: that's enough. But then we smell it again, smell it again. It's like unwise attention to the pleasant aspect, the gratification—"Pizza, ah, the pizza!"—or off into thought. That's unwise attention. We think it's pleasant, but notice what's being fed: more wanting, more wanting. And you can't have pizza, so you go off into some story about the next time you go to Italy, and you remember that best pizza you ever had in that little place in front of the post office in that little town up in Umbria. That's a true memory—best pizza I ever had. And I'm off, you know, off in Italy there.

And it seems pleasant, until I say, "Oh, what's happening now?" Well, I'm sitting here and my bum hurts. And having fed the kilesas, the mind's a little bit more uneasy when it comes back. You kind of disrupt the continuity of presence.

So not judging, but noticing this and trusting wisdom to incline toward the wholesome. That's taints abandoned by restraining.

The third—and I could go on for fifteen minutes about each—the third I like as well: wise attention to the attitude with which we use things, with which we use requisites. How can taints be abandoned by using?

Reflecting wisely, a bhikkhu uses robes for protection from cold, for protection from heat, for protection from gadflies, and only for the purpose of concealing what disturbs conscience. In other words, use alms food for a good purpose, but not for amusement, not to feed craving, not to feed ill will.

I found this really so interesting when I started paying attention to it in my life. How do we relate to our clothes, for example? I like clothes and pay attention to clothes, but I remember a year when I was a nun, and by the end of that year, just having three same outfits that you simply change—it's so much more peaceful.

But it's not about the outer form. You can get totally into having the right outfit and the right kind of material, this top that's better than that top, wearing it so you look good. It's not about the external. It's about how we relate. How do we relate to food here? Do we eat what we need and then just put it down? Or do we relate to it out of fear or out of need? Again, it's not bad or good. It's seeing what serves, what's strengthening in the mind.

For me, I remember being on retreat and thinking, "Oh, I might be hungry later." So I would save a couple of rice cakes or a banana or something. I never ate it. It would sit there and rot on those shelves back there. And what was being fed until I started noticing this was feeding the greed, feeding the fear, and feeding a sense of complication—because I somehow had to deal with that stuff I'd saved and then didn't want, so I saved something else.

Then when the time came, I would say, "Just take what I need, and if I'm hungry later, so what?" A little bit of hungry. We're not in starvation station here. A little bit hungry—it's just sensations. And there's food the next morning. It's so simple. So I'm going to just start coming late. What if one of the dishes has run out? There's two other dishes. There's plenty of food. Just that shifting of the relationship, seeing, "Okay, I didn't get what I wanted, but the mind and heart is at peace"—versus making sure I get what I want, feeding the craving, relating to the requisites in a way that feeds fear.

It's fun, really, to explore this, something we might not have thought of. And the Buddha is saying, why attention here? This is helping to abandon these subtle underlying tendencies that are at the deepest root of our suffering. He's not just saying this is something good to do in the meantime. This is really how we relate to actions in our life to free our heart and mind.

The next one is called "enduring" in Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation. I would say patience, which is pretty obvious. We've talked about that a lot. But I like the way he describes it: "Here, a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, and contact with gadflies, with flies, with wind, with burning and creeping things." They're sitting outside under trees. "They endure ill-spoken, unwelcome words. And arisen bodily feelings that are painful, racking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life." He's not messing around.

What I would say is that reflecting wisely, one bears things that are here and can't be changed. He's not saying everything. He's not saying make yourself a doormat. But difficult stuff that happens, unpleasant feelings in the body, a lot of noise going on, the person in the next room makes noise, you don't like the heating in here, the windows are closed and you want them open, the windows are open and you want them closed—endless, right? We all have great stories of cultivating patience from practice in Asia. Endless stories about that.

But it's really true. It's not about patience just so you don't have to suffer. The cultivation of patience is really about seeing that you can be in a difficult situation and the kilesa doesn't come up. It's really quite remarkable. But you don't get there by wishing. You have to be there and see the suffering that comes.

So, okay, quick story. Noise in Burma—that's always a good one. When they have weddings in villages around monasteries, and every meditation center has villages all around, just right outside, like across the street here. When there's going to be a wedding, they rent these speakers—gigantic speakers—and play music, loud music, so the whole village can share in the joy, twenty-four seven, all night.

So this one time at Shwe Oo Min, U Tejaniya had told us in the morning—and it was unbelievable, the racket—he said, with glee, "There's four different weddings going on at the same time." And he's like, "This is great practice for you guys." And it was true. He meant it.

So it went on. There's no way to get away from it. It goes all night. There's no way to get away from it. Either deal or go crazy, right? And so it takes a while, but at some point you're really seeing: this is how it is. This is how it is. And I remember something Ajahn Sumedho said about something else: "I can't bear it another moment. And then I found that I could." That's what happened. And then I found that I could.

You really have to start again next time, but really, before midnight, my mind was quite equanimous with it. It took a while, okay. Just to have that experience that it's not essential that there's kilesa, that we can't blame it on the object, that it's really possible. We all have that chance here. And it's not just to prove you can sit with it. It's really, again, as the Buddha said, it's to abandon taints and fever of defilement. We're really doing it for liberation, not just to get through a bad day.

The next method, and this might surprise you, is abandoning by avoiding. I like this one because he's being really practical. He's not saying you should be able to be patient and present with every single thing. We're paying attention to what feeds kilesa, what starves it, what feeds wisdom, what starves it. And some things are to be avoided—okay, different things than we would avoid.

Here, a bhikkhu reflecting wisely avoids a savage elephant. We don't have to think too much about that. Maybe Greg does, but avoid a savage elephant, a savage bull, or a savage dog, or a snake, or a stump. You don't just walk into a stump. A sewer, a cesspit. It's like you're not an idiot.

You avoid wandering to unsuitable resorts, hanging out with unsuitable, unwholesome people. He's being quite realistic, not idealistic. So it's not, "I should be able to be with anything." For example, we say be with piercing experiences, but say you're sitting in a way that's damaging your knee—not just that it hurts, but you're damaging it. Well, for the love of God, change position. Don't keep sitting that way, but do it not out of aversion, but out of not feeding kilesa.

There's a reason the retreats are set up like this and we don't have CNN running in all the corners like in the airports. There's a reason we say put down your phone.

We're avoiding what's going to really stir up the mind and feed kilesa, to support us being able to see clearly. In life, we can't avoid all of that, but we can make many more choices to avoid what feeds kilesa than perhaps we do. And when it comes from this sense of wholesomeness, seeing what supports peace of mind—not avoiding out of fear, but out of seeing what really supports—it's quite interesting. The Buddha was really not being idealistic.

The next one is abandoned by removing. This is really more adhiṭṭhāna—removing unskillful thoughts with resolution. It's not that you push them away or hate them. But when we get into, say, a vipassana romance thought, again and again and again, at some point we go, "That's enough." And we have to do that again and again. We say, "No, I'm just not going to go there. Just not going to go there." Resolution, adhiṭṭhāna, coming from wisdom—seeing that going into that is just feeding craving. We can't always do that, because it has to be without aversion, but having that intention, knowing it's possible to abandon that thought, to remove that tendency.

And the last one, which I don't have to elaborate on because we already have, is cultivating the seven factors of awakening. Mindfulness, dhamma vicaya—investigation of dhamma, that brightness of mind—energy, pīti, rapture or interest, samādhi, tranquility, and equanimity, as Guy talked about them. Cultivating all of these, using all these aspects of our life, really looking and seeing how we're paying attention. What's feeding the wholesome? What's starving the kilesa? What's feeding the kilesa and starving the wholesome? So that everything we do becomes a source of potential wisdom, a source of really learning, a source of inclining the mind and heart toward wisdom and freedom. Nothing is outside of our practice.

I'll end with one quotation from the Buddha:

"Abandon what is unskillful, bhikkhus. It is possible to abandon what is unskillful. If it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so. If this abandoning of what is unskillful were conducive to harm and pain, I would not say to you, abandon what is unskillful. But because this is conducive to benefit and pleasure, I say to you, abandon what is unskillful."

And then he says the same thing about developing what is skillful: "It is possible to develop what is skillful, or I would not tell you to do so."

It helps to remember that it is possible for all of us.

Thank you for your long, enduring attention. Let's just sit for a moment.

Another way this goes together—the Dalai Lama says, "Every morning I practice to calm and quiet my mind, and then the rest of the day I use that to serve humanity." Wisdom and action are part of the same thing.

So just noticing why you get up or not, whether you walk or have tea, just noticing what's going on in the mind with interest.

CHAPTER 85

The Way Things Have Come to Be

Carol Wilson · 51 min

> In this profound dharma talk from a month-long insight retreat, Carol Wilson introduces the Pāli term yathābhūta—things as they have come to be in this moment—as the heart of liberation. She explains that meditation is not about changing reality or achieving particular states, but about recognizing accurately what is arising in each moment of consciousness. When we see clearly, without the distortion of greed, hatred, or delusion (kilesa), clinging simply doesn't arise because it no longer makes sense.
>
> Wilson explores how the mental defilements operate with a kind of inertia, coloring our perception and decision-making in ways we often don't recognize. Drawing on her experiences practicing in Burma and visiting Dachau concentration camp, she illustrates how these same forces of confusion operate in ordinary human minds with potentially devastating consequences. This understanding underscores why practice matters—not as an esoteric pursuit, but as essential work for ourselves and the world.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance on distinguishing between aspiration and craving, explaining that the difference lies not in the thought itself but in the mental factors accompanying it. Wilson emphasizes that wisdom arises naturally from the steadiness of clear mindfulness—our only job is to take care of awareness. She encourages practitioners to trust this simple presence with whatever arises, recognizing that the shift from confusion to clarity happens moment to moment, requiring not effort to change but willingness to see.

If you remember last night when James suggested that you just take a moment to reflect on your motivation, your intention for being here, I thought I'd share mine in a simple way.

I'm here, as best I can, to share and represent the Buddha's teachings as I've come to understand them in my own experience. But not so that you have a good time or a bad time. Not so that you get to have a new fantastic experience. Not to help you achieve a particular goal or any experience whatsoever. Rather, my hope is that whatever we can do to support your practice—and practice isn't just sitting, isn't just walking, it's every moment of every day exploring how our minds work—might help you come to understand more deeply, to trust more radically, the fact that freedom isn't about changing or getting something. Freedom and peace are available in our hearts and minds when, in any particular moment of consciousness, we recognize reality accurately.

Meditation isn't about changing reality. It's not about changing your idea of yourself. It might do that, but that's not going to free you. It's not about setting up the idea that you will every day let go of one thing you're clinging to, and by the end of a month you'll be thirty percent—oh, it's February—twenty-eight percent more free from clinging than you were before. If we could just think of an idea of what we need to do, how we need to look, what we need to think—if thinking would get us there, we'd be there. And we are there, because it's not there, it's here. But thinking doesn't help us see that.

My deep intention, my motivation, is to support all of us to keep recognizing in any moment things as they have come to be in this moment. There's a phrase in Pali, yathā bhūta, translated most accurately as "things as they have come to be in this moment"—meaning they could not be any other way. They've come to be this way in this moment through an intricate and, to a complete extent, untraceable series of conditions, all interrelated and connected. In this moment, things could not be otherwise because this is how they are.

Freedom comes not from changing how this moment is, not from making yathā bhūta look different, but from a moment when consciousness is clear of confusion, of distortion, of seeing and understanding inaccurately—and then acting on that and compounding that. When there's clear seeing and wisdom, the heart and mind is free. Seeing things how they are frees us from the confusion of clinging, from the distortion of ill will and fear, from the deeply, deeply compelling but unfortunately completely wrong idea that "I am"—I am, and I am somehow the center of the universe. Each of us is the center of our own little universe, somehow acting with intention. Taking that delusion into our meditation, we could sit here and meditate with a lot of sincerity and a lot of energy and a lot of ideas and a lot of technique and a lot of good experiences. But as long as I am doing it in order to get something, we're just continuing the pattern. And we can't stop that pattern by deciding to. God knows.

So my deepest intention is just, in any moment, to do what we can to support you to keep rediscovering—because you must know it already or you wouldn't be here—to keep rediscovering that deep trust and faith in radical presence, radical awareness, a radical acceptance with awareness, with presence, of whatever is arising in this moment.

One of the names, in some forms of practice, for one of the deeper insights is called yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana, which means "knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be in this moment," of phenomena as it is in reality, as Anālayo describes it.

In a way, to me, that's a huge relief. We're not here to try and create something or make ourselves better or somehow finally get to the fourth jhāna. You can write that off your little list of things. You get there, you don't get there—it's over anyway, sometime. But knowledge and vision of things as they are? Well, they already are. It's nature. You don't, and in fact can't, create it. We don't have to. Wisdom arises as a natural effect of the cause of the steadiness of clear mindfulness. We don't even create wisdom.

So take a huge breath and relax. As one of my teachers said, our only job is to take care of awareness. Take care of our awareness. What awareness is noticing.

Not up to us. We keep trying to make it up to us. "This isn't good enough. That should be better." Right there, right there is the cause of all our suffering.

Well, it could be a long night, folks. But that's really what we're here for. And all the forms of practice, the techniques that we practice—they're useful, and there are many different ones. There's basic mindfulness at the six sense doors. There's cultivating mindfulness by beginning with a particular base experience, a more neutral experience such as the breath, in order to develop a steadiness of attention so that we can actually notice: one, that there is a mind; two, that it's working; three, how it's working.

To begin with, even when we've been meditating a while, when we first sit down—or for someone who's never really meditated—you don't really have a clue what it means to watch the mind. I was just sitting in on a lot of interviews with a teacher of mine in Burma, group interviews. He was talking to all different people—all people who spoke English, but from all over the world, all who had done a lot of meditation before. Each one was different; I don't mean to clump them. But it was really interesting to see how for many people who had done quite some practice—for some people over twenty years, and for some people newer than that—when they came in and talked about being lost in thought, he'd say, "Well, could you be aware of that?" And they'd say, "Yes." And he'd say, "Fine, that's watching the mind."

And that was something they could not relate to, couldn't accept. That watching the mind includes learning to see how the mind works all the time—not only watching the mind when it's doing what we want it to do, and the rest of the time trying to cut that out with ill will, with "this isn't happening." Watching the mind with interest, not to change it, but just to see how it works. Actually, it's so much more fun than trying to make something else happen. And as I said, through the steadiness of mindfulness, just watching what the mind's doing moment after moment after moment, wisdom naturally arises.

We're doing all kinds of techniques. Maybe you're doing samatha practice, loving-kindness practice, just cultivating loving-kindness. Some people may be cultivating a more focused attention on the breath or on loving-kindness. All of these are very useful techniques, but not an end in themselves. And our habit of mind is so much to make whatever we do an end in itself. I mean, that's just what we know. We do something to get a result. Why else would we do it? It doesn't even make sense otherwise.

So when we talk about what we want to cultivate—being fully present with total interest and attention, complete acceptance for whatever happens, for no other reason than to be present—it just doesn't really fit our learning. But that is what we're cultivating.

And the reason it seems, and let's face it, at times is, so difficult to recognize yathā bhūta—to just be at ease in things as they are and recognize accurately—I know, I make it sound like la la la, that's all we have to do. And everyone here has spent a lot of time trying to do that, and at times succeeding. And then when it goes away, really thinking, "What did I do wrong?" And you're here for another two weeks, twenty-eight days, two months to beat your head against the wall of trying to just totally relax into how things already are. I know it's difficult.

And the reason—at first, when I began to hear the Buddhist teachings or read about them, and they talk about the need to purify the mind, or the torments, the kilesas—greed, hatred, delusion, confusion—as being the sources of our suffering, I thought, well, it sounds good. I didn't really have an argument. But over the years, I have come so much to absolutely know in my own experience, and to have a very strong respect for the power of these habits in the mind, in the heart. The power to arise—they're just inertia.

You know inertia: how a body at rest tends to stay at rest, a body in motion tends to stay in motion. It seems to work the same way with qualities, with factors in the mind. So when you're feeling in an open, loving place and somebody comes into your vision, even if it's someone you don't like that much, you tend to feel more loving toward them. The moment of loving—kusala, wholesome mind state—it's easier for the next moment to be like that, isn't it? When you're generous and you give something to someone and they're so happy on seeing it, then they feel happy and you feel happy and it just keeps rolling on. Inertia.

Well, I started with the pleasant, with the wholesome, didn't I? It happens to work very strongly with the difficult states of mind, the difficult factors in consciousness—with greed, with hatred, with confusion. When there's confusion in the mind, it clouds how we see things. It clouds our decision-making. And so what we do and what we say is a little more confused, and it leads to more confusion, right?

When you're angry and you look at the person you're angry with, what tends to happen? Do you feel the anger go away? No—you look at them and think, "That stupid jerk. How could they do that?" And then perhaps, "I shouldn't be angry. I shouldn't be angry, you stupid jerk." You look back at them, back and forth, and the whole thing is just turning into a volcano. It's not you doing that. That's just the nature, the inertia, the momentum of that state of mind.

And these states are also very subtle. We're so familiar with the worldview, moment to moment, that is colored by gross or subtle forms of wanting, of ill will or aversion, of confusion, that really, very often, we don't even know it's there in the mind. You may say, "Speak for yourself." So I'm speaking for myself—very often I don't recognize it's in the mind, even when I'm looking for it. But I just want to offer that to you as a very worthwhile exploration during this retreat.

And it isn't personal. It's just nature. It's not you having a lot of ill will and therefore there's something wrong with you. That thought is just another movement of the ill will, isn't it?

So what we're doing here, really exploring, taking this time to look inward—a month, two months—it's so important, not just for our own greater peace and well-being, but for everyone we come in contact with. I think James also said that. And I know, teaching the three-month course at IMS most falls, Joseph was saying in his introduction about how privileged we are to have this opportunity. And we are incredibly privileged to be able to be here for this amount of time, to be here in such a—frankly—luxurious situation. I just came out of ten weeks in Burma. Believe me, this is luxurious.

To care, to have the interest—there are many people with opportunity but without interest—and to have the peace, the safety, enough food, hot water, enough health. It doesn't mean you're perfectly healthy, but you have enough health to be here. All these factors—family support, whatever it is—incredibly privileged.

And that doesn't mean it's some esoteric mind game, something to do only because you're bored with the rest of your life. Really, of course I've spent my life with this, so I'm biased. But in my opinion, there's nothing more important we can do for the good of ourselves, for the good of the world.

I'm sure many of you are familiar with that most famous couplet in the Dhammapada, one of the teachings of the Buddha. It's really what the Dhammapada opens with: that with our mind we make the world. When we speak and act with an impure mind—and impure does mean when the consciousness, the mind, is clouded by greed, by ill will, by confusion—and we don't know it, we don't recognize it, so it colors our perception, it colors our decision making. When we speak or act in that way, suffering follows us. In the same way, with our mind we make the world, and when we speak or act with a pure mind, happiness follows us. I'm sure many of you are aware of that.

It's not just some esoteric, subtle thing. Really, look at this world. Look at this world. It's inhabited by six billion people, more or less like us inside, different external circumstances—and it's a mess in many ways. And there are beautiful things. But look.

This summer, I spent some time in Munich, and I had time one weekend to go out to Dachau, which I'd never had time to do before—one of the concentration camps during World War II. And somehow it was a very... this is going to sound strange. I want to say uplifting experience. That's not right, but it was grounding. It really brought me back, more clearly than ever, to what I understand to be of truth and value in this world. And that was just by seeing how horrible things can get. I don't want to put it all on Dachau, on Germany. Pick your place. But it's set up as a museum, and it happens to have really lovely grounds.

And in one of the buildings that remains, the museum part, they have large poster boards describing all different aspects of the camp from every perspective. They would describe something about the different countries and groups of people incarcerated there. They would have a poster describing, say, the Roma. But they would always include at least a photo of one real person and the name of that person. So it made it real. And likewise, if they were talking about the guards or the people who worked there or someone who kept the trains running—whatever the different aspects were—they would have a whole story and photos, but always a picture of some one person and a name.

When I reflected on it later, I thought that was the most brilliant thing. Because for me, watching people's reactions—of course it's very intense—but people were really present with it and really touched. It wasn't just something like, "Oh, how horrible," and move on to the next thing. And it wasn't like, "I can't stand this," and running out. It really brought people, all different kinds of people, fully there. I was watching them as they went through, and also myself. This sense of: this is the human condition in its most horrible form.

And again, it's not limited to Germany in World War II. But to see that the forces of hatred and fear and greed and denial and confusion and violence—they operate in the mind of normal people. So many people were involved on all aspects. There was no way to walk out and say a few monsters made this happen, or one group of people made this happen. Even though it's another culture and another generation, there are plenty of examples from this culture and this generation. Think about Guantánamo. We can say, "Well, I'm not involved." And maybe I'm not, particularly. But just thinking about how things happen in the minds of ordinary people, not monsters. The little decisions we make, the small choices—we don't know where any choice is going to lead.

The ignorance in terms of not knowing, which is out of our control. I'm sure in the beginning of Hitler's regime, no one could have had a clue which way it would go. And you make your decisions based on the best you can. But how much do we not know when our decisions are influenced by fear, influenced by greed, influenced by denial? "Well, I'll do the best I can for me and everyone else. I can't take care of that." Whatever it is. How do I know how I would act in such a situation? I really have no clue. I certainly know how I'd like to act, but that's a thought. That's a hope. I don't know unless I'm in that situation.

And somehow, they say it wasn't exactly uplifting, but it was like: yes, this is why I practice. This is why I spend my life sharing this—just to help people get interested enough to keep looking at our minds and our hearts. To see that freedom from fear is not going to come from the external situation. Momentarily perhaps, but we don't know what's going to change. Freedom from fear and freedom from ill will, freedom from delusion—that's available, and only available, in the peace of our own heart and mind that recognizes accurately. Because when we recognize accurately, clinging just doesn't arise. It doesn't make sense.

And when we recognize accurately, fear may arise, we may act from fear. But we know what we're doing. That makes a big difference. And sometimes as we know what we're doing, we're able to make another choice. Sometimes we're not. And we notice that we're not, and we meet that with compassion. That's our practice. But if I go into a situation with the idea, "I will never act from fear," that's completely disconnected from what's really going on.

And so seeing this—this is really the edge that we all face, all the time, in our lives.

We just don't know when we're going to find ourselves in a world-changing situation or when it's just in our own little particular circumstance.

There's a book I read years ago by a man named Khassan Baiev, a Chechen who was working in Russia as a surgeon during the 1990s when Russia and Chechnya descended into a really violent and cruel civil war. Of course, I wasn't there. I don't know who was the aggressor—reading his book, because he's Chechen, it sounds as though Russia was, and everything I've read suggests that, but I don't know. Anyway, he came back from Russia to be a surgeon in Chechnya during the war, in Krasny. The book is about how he was the only surgeon there for a few years in this horrific conflict. He was treating anyone who would come to the hospital—either side, Chechen rebels or Russian soldiers, high brass or ordinary people. And so, of course, both sides distrusted him. He was attacked by both sides. He actually ended up having to leave the country, quite damaged. He was kidnapped by Chechen rebels because he was helping Russians, was badly wounded, and had to flee to save his life. He came to Boston.

One thing he said in the book stayed with me: you're in a situation you've never been in before. He said, "I was never in a war. I never held a gun. I was never near people who had guns. You don't know how you'll behave. You don't know." His point was that he had this oath as a surgeon to help people, and that's what saved him—that he could always align himself with that oath. That sense of commitment to goodness was so strong.

So I'm hoping—although hope isn't very reliable—that the depth of all of our continuing commitment to simple awareness, our willingness to be present with our mind, with our heart, with our surroundings, moment to moment to moment, not to get something out of it but simply because this is life—only here will we open to the truth, only here is peace—that this commitment and its natural results will serve us. Magically, there seems to be a greater access to compassion, a sense of—my mind isn't working too well—I want to say intimacy, but more the sense of being able to exchange oneself for another. That's what compassion is: you can feel someone else's pain as well as your own because we're not limited by "me" and "the world out there." This is the natural effect of wisdom.

So my hope is that through our continued, ongoing, moment-to-moment presence—just in little moments, our willingness to be present, our willingness to have confidence in awareness rather than in our habits, our willingness to let this moment of life be as it is and be present with it—that strength, that faith, that understanding will show up in the choices we make, in our relationships, in the way we choose to live our lives.

Yes, we're privileged to be here, but this isn't some esoteric game that only well-to-do people can play. This is the heart of life.

I was just in Burma for a while, practicing some, and I spent all ten weeks there in different monasteries. It's such an interesting country because it's so filled with Buddhist practice—so filled. Men and women, lay and ordained, just everywhere you go. Nunneries popping up, monasteries everywhere. I'm not saying everyone in the nunnery or monastery is a being of light—they're people. But besides that, there's great generosity, incredible goodness of heart. And yet there is such—I want to say evil, but—the government is so harsh, disconnected, uncaring, selfish, cruel, oppressive. There's no way to live in that country without somehow having to accommodate that, unless you're willing to go to jail. That's just how it works. It's really such a place of paradox. So much goodness. And it's one of a few countries where Theravada Buddhism has been really held and shared and taught. It's very much alive there.

It's wonderful, and at the same time, each particular teacher has his—maybe her, but mostly his—own way of teaching. You go from one meditation center to another. I have a friend who was a monk there for about thirteen years. He was a character, but this is relatively true: he'd spend a year or two at one monastery, then decide he didn't want to be there anymore and would move to another—something foreigners can do much more easily than the Burmese. He said every time he'd go to a new one, they'd say, "Oh, you were at that one? Well, everything you learned there is wrong, because this is the way to do it." And it's just subtleties of technique, little differences that to someone in the bigger world would seem trivial—come on, get over it. But no, these are huge holdings, and ill will, and "I'm right and you're wrong." It's the human mind. It's everywhere. Great beauty.

And still, what creeps in is our confusion, our sense of self, our wanting, our aversion. These habits of mind are so insidious, so familiar. So it's not to hate them, but a lot of our practice is simply this: let's learn how it works. Let's get really interested in it. We don't have to stop it—just get interested in it. That already changes the equation.

Let me give you an example. Last night when James asked you about your aspiration—what's your aspiration?—I'm not going to ask you what it is, but did you think of something? And maybe you didn't, and that's okay too. I'm just using this as an example.

So say, for example, one's aspiration came up as, "I'm really here to free my mind from greed and confusion." Or you really got in touch with: "My deepest commitment in this life is to live a life of compassion." Whatever it was, I'm sure whatever your aspiration was, it was an uplifting thought. And it was a thought, right? It's a thought. It might come together with a feeling, some qualities in the consciousness.

Now, sometimes people will ask: How is having an aspiration like "I'm here on this retreat to cultivate wisdom" or "I'm here to cultivate compassion"—how is that different from wanting? How is it different from thinking, "I want to be more compassionate"? And then we say the freedom the Buddha taught is the heart and mind that's free of clinging. And if I want to be more compassionate, that's clinging. We're back in paradox land, which, of course, the practice always is.

And so this is an example—I hope this makes sense—of how when the kilesas are there, it distorts. What makes it an aspiration or craving isn't the thought itself. It's not the object of attention, that thought "I want to cultivate more compassion." That's just a thought. In itself, it's just that—a thought. It could be completely empty. "I want to cultivate compassion. I wonder what's for lunch." It could have no energy behind it.

As an aspiration, it would come together in a moment of consciousness. Consciousness is just the quality of mind, a natural quality that knows what's happening. It knows hearing or seeing or thinking, tasting, smelling, touch—the six sense doors. Consciousness is simply that knowing that this is happening. Consciousness is going on all the time without our interference. It's nothing we do intentionally.

And so in a moment of consciousness, that moment of mind consciousness arises, and along with it—you could say in it, but it's just arising and passing—comes together with different mental factors, different qualities of mind. Greed, confusion, hatred, ill will—those are mental factors. Loving-kindness is a mental factor. Wisdom is a mental factor. Sati, mindfulness, awareness, is a mental factor. Calm is a mental factor. Faith is a mental factor. You see what I mean?

So a thought comes: "Oh, I wonder what's for lunch." And there's just equanimity, no to-ing or fro-ing about it. "I want to cultivate compassion"—it could just be equanimity, no connection. But as an aspiration, it will come together with qualities of faith. It brightens the mind. There comes some energy, some interest, some willingness to do. And you can feel that.

So it's like learning to recognize what's going on in the mind, in the mind that's knowing what's happening. "Oh, I really want to cultivate compassion."

You feel there's some energy. The mind is more open, brighter. You feel encouraged. There's more willingness to do something. You can tell—you don't have to check whether this is wholesome or not wholesome, whether this is a torment or something useful. You know. You can feel that it's not just that it feels good; feeling good isn't really too reliable. But you can feel that it's giving you energy, that it's onward-leading. "Let me really look at this next moment of fear." You can feel that.

And if you can't feel it, explore. It's possible to feel.

The next moment or the next day, you're sitting and feeling very, very sluggish. Your back hurts. The sitting's just been five minutes, and you want to throw something up here at the bell to make it ring. You think, "I'm never going to make it through twenty-six more days." And then you think, "Cultivate—I want to cultivate more compassion." And look at you, cultivate more compassion! It's hopeless. How can I cultivate anything? And you go off into the whole thing: "There's no way I can cultivate compassion in this rigid, dukkha-filled, sluggish mind, all the years I've been practicing," on and on and on.

In that moment, is that functioning as aspiration? It's not really inspiring you, is it? Inspire—get bigger. This is more like, "Oh God, shoot myself. Compassion, never mind. Compassion for myself would be to get up, walk out the door, and go home. That would be compassion." No, it wouldn't be.

So it's the same thought, but completely different mental factors in the consciousness. Qualities of ill will, aversion to your physical experience. You feel lousy, you feel tired, your back's hurting. You're not really recognizing it's unpleasant—there's aversion to that. The thought comes up, "I want things to be different. I want to cultivate compassion. I'm sitting here with my back hurting." That ill will, the inertia—it gets stronger and stronger. You think, "Oh well, then this isn't really an aspiration. It's just clinging. And clinging to wanting to be compassionate when in fact I'm sitting here like a slug with my back hurting—it's just clinging. So what's the use?"

But it's not the object. It's not the thought that makes it an aspiration or makes it clinging. It's what's happening in the mind that's noticing. That's where freedom arises, and that's where suffering arises—moment to moment. And thank God it's moment to moment, because in the next moment it can be different. We're not stuck with anything.

So you're sitting there sluggish, your back hurts, and you're kind of clinging to wanting to be compassionate. "I'm filled with ill will. It's hopeless." And suddenly you go, "Wow, look at that aversion. That's really interesting. Look at how aversion functions in the mind. It's even got me hating the idea of compassion. Isn't that interesting?"

In that moment, you see how the whole thing has shifted. And the shift is not that your back stops hurting. You're not really more compassionate. You still have only five minutes—maybe five minutes and ten seconds—into the sitting. But the mind has changed from not recognizing the ill will to mindfulness. "Oh, ill will is like this. Aversion is like this." You're interested in it.

That's our path. The interest—let interest do the work. Not thinking, "What do I have to do to get to compassion?"

Just what's happening now. Really being here with what's happening now. That's yathabhuta. Oh, aversion has this effect in the mind.

And then, you know, it goes back to aversion. You can kind of watch the whole thing, not with self-hatred, but with fascination. Oh, this is how the mind works. This is how it gets caught in aversion. This is how it takes it all personally. And then you go off on how great you are watching it all. And then when you wake up, you're in a whole other movie, a whole other me, a whole other self. Maybe we recognize that, maybe we don't.

But tomorrow, or even today when you go to bed—I know somebody said don't analyze your sitting. That's true, because it doesn't help; it's over. But also, the practice is not just about sitting. Everything we do is just to help us get in the habit, the interest, of just watching how the mind's working. Sitting, walking, eating, doing your yogi job—it doesn't matter. What's going on in the mind? Notice when there's peace. Notice when there's suffering. When there's suffering, notice what qualities are there. I guarantee you there'll be some kind of craving, some kind of hatred, or some kind of delusion. Delusion, of course, is very hard to see.

But even delusion—it is hard to see, but we can start to see it. One of my teachers says something I find really interesting. He says what's happening in the mind at a particular moment in consciousness determines how we see reality, how we recognize things. So the mind, the consciousness that's colored by kilesa—by greed, hatred, confusion—and not recognizing it, that's seeing through kilesa, and it can only see concept. Concept would be: "My back is killing me, this is useless." Can only see concept. The thoughts about things.

The mind that is pure in a moment—pure meaning just free from being colored by those kilesas—can see things as they actually are. And there are lots of different levels of this, but as they actually are in this example would be: "Oh, there's the thought, 'I'm not able to cultivate compassion.' I recognize the pain, the unpleasant sensation in my body. I recognize the thoughts about 'this is useless' as a thought. I recognize the ill will, the aversion, as aversion." It's recognizing what's happening rather than believing the whole story that's created as a concept: "I can't do this."

Of course, there are more levels of that. So that was just a long example of how grossly and subtly greed and confusion and ill will can come in and color experience.

And if, even in that example I just gave, our mind ever so subtly goes, "Oh, that second way—when you're saying, 'Oh, this isn't really craving, it really is an aspiration, I really can't do it'—that's wrong. The first way, when the mind isn't colored, that's right"—we're already back in. We're already back in making differentiation. It should be like this and it shouldn't be like that. And as soon as we're saying "this shouldn't be," the citta, the consciousness, isn't pure. We can't recognize accurately. As soon as we're saying "this is better than that," we can't recognize accurately. But as soon as we recognize, "Oh, the mind is saying this is better than that"—oh, that's how it is. Fine. Fine.

So we just kind of get a respect for how subtly these habits creep in. But also, I find it really energizing and encouraging that the seeing of them is just the other side of the coin. You don't have to get rid of anything. You just kind of shift.

That Tai Chi Wu that Ajahn Sumedho always talks about—oh, thinking this is better than that feels like this. Being filled with aversion for compassion feels like this. Oh, aversion in the mind. That's all you have to see. The whole story, that whole concept, that can go. Aversion in the mind feels like this. That's all we have to see. It's really not so difficult.

What is difficult is trusting. Trusting over and over that it's that simple. Because for me, the thing that slips in the most is that deeply ingrained sense that I should be doing something. That things are a mess in the mind right now.

I bet today you had a few moments where your mind was not too collected—a little bit of so-called wandering mind. And I imagine, unless you're really a very free being, that once in a while you had a little judgment about that. Even if you say, "I know, it's just natural, the mind wanders," somewhere back there lurks the thought: "But I didn't come here for twenty-eight days with a wandering mind. I know better than this." Somewhere back there: "Okay, I came here to do open awareness, but the mind's all over the place. I can't trust this open awareness junk. I'm going back to the breath, and I'm not leaving that sucker until I can stay there for two hours without moving." It just slips in.

It's so hard to trust that the steadiness of awareness is the condition that allows wisdom to arise—not our pushing, not our trying to control, not our trying to create. It's hard to trust because, you know, it's all about me. And if I'm not trying to create, and if it's really okay to just sit here with these stupid thoughts going all over the place, falling asleep out of my chair, and then I get up and slam the door and think, "How embarrassing—and I'm a meditation teacher!" Then, you know, it's just hard to trust because it keeps coming down to somehow it's all about me.

But it's not. It's not.

And yathā bhūta, things as they have come to be in this moment, doesn't mean only really far-out things as they have come to be in this moment. It doesn't mean only great meditative insights as they have come to be in this moment. The truth reveals itself. Wisdom can arise when there's mindfulness, this presence of mind, awareness of even the silliest things, of the most mundane moments. It doesn't matter. It doesn't matter. People have great insights while peeing. When Sally talked about Ānanda's mind opening as he laid down to sleep—it's really because he stopped trying. And we're talking on his level, where the level of trying is so subtle. I mean, I look for it and I can't find it. But you feel the tension; you know it's there.

So we're challenged really, again and again, sometimes by what happens. A lot of unpleasant, unacceptable, difficult things arise in our practice, in our minds and bodies. Sure, that's the first noble truth. Not only on meditation retreat, but we're just more here, more present, more noticing it. Sure. And a lot of beautiful, pleasant, wonderful things arise in our minds and bodies on meditation retreats too.

But how to trust? Yathā bhūta is equally present in whatever's arising now. So to trust that enough—just the simplicity of present moment awareness, that radical acceptance, that willingness to be here with interest, not with judgment, for whatever—and have the trust that wisdom arises by itself. Our trying to create wisdom is actually the thing that gets in the way, right? Because that's craving, that's wanting.

So it's a conundrum. It really is a paradox. If you're here, you're dedicated, you're working really hard. Believe me, I know how hard it is. It goes against all our habits. In Burma, the wake-up time is three-thirty in the morning. People who know me think, "You get up at three-thirty in the morning?" But you just do it.

It's just what's happening. And then you don't eat. Lunch is at 10.30 in the morning. That's it for the day. It makes for a long afternoon, I want to tell you. And there's no dharma talk. So about 3 in the afternoon—the first two weeks, after that the mind clicks in—but those first two weeks, 3 in the afternoon, I'm walking up and down. I had this one walking spot I loved. I always would get there and I just noticed my mind, about the second week. It wasn't big suffering. I mean, it was really there, but it was just kind of subtle stuff. Just something—God, anything, you know. A cat goes by. Wow. Look at that cat. How fascinating. Just something to happen, please, instead of walking up and down and up and down, just being with, noticing what the mind's knowing and not doing anything. Not even trying to get concentrated, just being present.

It's long. It goes against our habits. Just okay, keep doing it. Now I'm really wanting something to happen—fine, you know. I know what it's like.

All of that, just to keep rediscovering the fact that when we can fully inhabit with interest, really in a way with love, but without resistance, and with awareness, with wakefulness, totality—this present moment—take care of our awareness. That's our job. And that's only our job. Wisdom will do its job.

Yathā bhūta—we will see. We do, moment to moment, we do recognize accurately things as they have come to be. And just for a moment recognizing that, there isn't clinging, because clinging doesn't make sense when we see how things are constantly changing, not about me, nothing to rely on. Oh, yeah, right. What's there to cling to? And that's peaceful. That brings a kind of ease.

And then the next moment—the next moment, mind you—the mind is going, "Yeah, but maybe the juice today will be that kind I like." In four hours, that little cup of juice, maybe, you know. And there's clinging again. All right, clinging is like this. Clinging is like this. Not "I shouldn't be clinging. I had a moment of freedom and now I'm clinging. Oh my God, it's all over." No. Clinging is like this.

Can we trust that much and be that simple? That's really my aspiration, my wish for all of us here on this retreat.

I think that's enough. Thank you.

CHAPTER 86

The Power of Generosity

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this talk from a February monthlong retreat, Carol Wilson illuminates generosity (dāna) as far more than a moral virtue—it is a foundational practice of awakening that directly transforms consciousness. Drawing from suttas where the Buddha gave graduated teachings, she explains how the Buddha would begin with talks on giving, then virtue (sīla), before presenting the Four Noble Truths, because the mind must be "pliable, free from hindrances, uplifted and bright" to truly receive the Dhamma.
>
> Carol shares vivid stories from her experiences in Burma, where the mutual relationship between monastics and laypeople creates a living culture of generosity. She describes how dāna operates as a continuous flow—giving and receiving becoming inseparable—and how this practice directly counters the isolation of self-referencing. The talk includes practical guidance from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita on six aspects of practicing generosity: attending to motivation before giving, abandoning clinging to what is offered, giving face-to-face when possible, remaining present during the act, continuing awareness of volition afterward, and applying clear comprehension about what is truly helpful.
> The teaching emphasizes that generosity's power lies not in what is given but in the quality of heart behind the giving. Even small acts performed with genuine openheartedness purify consciousness and cultivate the brightness of mind necessary for recognizing things as they truly are (yathābhūta). Carol concludes with the Buddha's instruction to Mahānāma on recollecting one's own generosity as a meditation practice that overcomes greed, hatred, and delusion.

Once at a three-month retreat, deep in the retreat, it was just a group that liked to laugh, and definitely they were desperate. I came in once—I think it was in the morning—and I said, "uh," and that's as far as I got. They all cracked up.

As I'm sure you've heard, there are different ways to describe, in a nutshell, the heart of our path of awakening. One way to talk about it is that what we're really doing—not just on retreat but in our whole life—is transforming our consciousness. We talk about purifying our consciousness, transforming the habits of consciousness.

We've explored this a great deal, mostly in terms of the actual meditation practice. Whether we're doing one-pointed samatha practice, where the mind gets more and more collected and the hindrances, the kilesas, are kept at bay—that sense of collected-ness is part of why it's so lovely, because there's also a purity in the consciousness at that time. Just seeing what it feels like not to have any hindrances is extraordinary. It's lovely just to know it's possible.

The same is true with mindfulness. The steadiness of mindfulness, that momentum that builds, is the condition that allows wisdom to arise. It's not that we create wisdom, but the momentum of mindfulness sets the conditions in consciousness that allows wisdom to arise.

What I want to talk about tonight is the fact that it's not just meditation. The Buddha, in all of his different teachings, at the heart of all of them—they work to transform the habits of our consciousness from being lost in negativity, craving, and self-referencing to wholesome qualities. In Pali, akusala means unwholesome, kusala means wholesome—the wholesome qualities of mindfulness, wisdom, energy, equanimity, calm, and all the others.

There are many different suttas where the Buddha gives a graduated teaching. I'll share one that I particularly like, though he does this often. Rather than simply saying, "Here are the Four Noble Truths, start abandoning craving now," he recognizes that one's mind needs to be in a receptive, appropriate state. When our mind is in an unwholesome state, we can't even recognize or hear the Dhamma accurately. As I mentioned the other night, when the citta is colored by the unwholesome, we can't recognize accurately.

All the different teachings of the Buddha are equally important, and they're all grounded in freeing our heart and mind from confusion, in brightening the mind in order to recognize the truth accurately. Because we're on retreat, we can get so myopic, thinking it's just about bhavana, just about meditation practice, and everything else is lesser—or that we only turn to other practices when we're hopeless in meditation. That view is far too limited. This is about our whole life.

This story comes from a time when the Buddha was at Rajagaha in the bamboo grove. At that time there was a leper named Supabuddha, a poor, miserable wretch of a person. This poor, miserable wretch saw a huge gathering—people coming to hear the Buddha teaching—and thought, "Without a doubt, someone must be distributing food over there. Let me go and get some." So he went over, sat down on the edge of the group, and saw that the Buddha was teaching. He thought, "Oh, no one's distributing food here. He's teaching the Dhamma. Well, why don't I sit and listen?"

So he sat on the edge to listen. The Buddha, with his all-seeing mind—when he turned his attention to it, he could perceive the minds and hearts of everyone—looked through the assembly and asked himself, "Who here is capable of understanding the Dhamma?" He could sense whose mind was ripe. He saw Supabuddha and recognized, "Here's a person capable of understanding."

So he gave a step-by-step talk. This appears in so many of the suttas—a step-by-step talk. He began with a talk on giving, on generosity. Then a talk on virtue, on sila, non-harming conduct. Then on the heavens. Then he described the drawbacks, the vanity, the corrupting influence in the mind of giving in to sensual passions and craving, and the rewards of renunciation.

Then, when he saw that Supabuddha's mind was ready—pliable, malleable, not stiff, free from hindrances, uplifted and bright—and this phrasing is used in most of the suttas where he gives this graduated talk—when he saw the mind and heart was free from hindrances, uplifted and bright, then he gave the Dhamma talk particular to the awakened ones: the Four Noble Truths.

This is not a throwaway line. This is really important: there are many ways to cultivate brightness and clarity in the mind so that the mind can actually open to wisdom.

The metaphor given, the simile, illustrates this beautifully. So he gave a talk on the Four Noble Truths, and just as a clean cloth free from stains would properly absorb a dye, in the same way, as Supabuddha the leper was sitting in that very seat, the dustless, stainless Dhamma eye arose within him. Whatever is subject to arising is subject to cessation.

That statement—when the Dhamma eye arises, when someone sees that—is said in the suttas to mean the first stage of awakening. So the mind is bright, just as a clean cloth free from stains can properly absorb a dye. In a moment when the mind is bright and clear and open and not caught in craving, it can properly absorb, recognize the Dhamma, recognize things as they are—that yathabhuta we talked about the other night.

So tonight what I want to talk about is just this first one of the graduated teaching: dana, generosity. Because it's really something at the foundation of the Buddha's teachings. Whenever he talks to lay people, he almost always starts with talking about generosity. It's something I've been learning more and more about. In the more Buddhist cultures in Asia, it's still more formally rooted in the way relationships between ordained monks and nuns and lay people are set up. Because of that, it's more ingrained in the culture in a certain way. But of course, we're generous here too. I just want to talk about it as a practice that supports our awakening.

Not as a good thing to do, not "we should be generous, good people are generous"—I grew up that way, and there's nothing wrong with that. But generosity as a practice of awakening, as a way of setting the foundation for freeing the mind and heart from clinging—it's not about an external should. It's actually a practice that cultivates this brightness of mind and heart, a really powerful source of joy and connectedness and non-self, really. Not holding to the isolation of me. And it's fun. It's really fun.

I'm sure most of you are aware, but when the Buddha set up his Sangha, his group of monks and nuns, he was basically making it up. There were a lot of renunciates all over India at that time, more men than women, but some women. They wandered around; there were different sects. So when the Buddha set up his sangha of monks and later of nuns, he was using what existed in the culture, but he also set it up in his own way.

At the very heart of it was this: there are four types of people—ordained men, ordained women, laymen, and laywomen. He always said that the Buddha Sasana, his Buddhist teachings, to remain vibrant and alive in the world needs all four types of people. So even though often in the suttas he's talking to monks and nuns, there's never a sense that they're the only ones and the lay people can just come if they want. They depend on each other. He set up the way monks and nuns lived and the way they relate to lay people—and at the heart of it is generosity, dana, the word in Pali.

Bhikkhu Bodhi—you know Bhikkhu Bodhi, one of the foremost translators into English of the Pali texts, an American monk who lived in Sri Lanka for many years and is now back in the States—he writes about the importance of generosity in the Buddha's teaching. Believe me, he knows the Buddha's teaching. He says: "Viewed as a quality, generosity has a particularly intimate connection to the entire movement of the Buddha's path. For the goal of the path is the ending of greed, hate, and delusion, and the cultivation of generosity directly weakens greed and hate while facilitating that flexibility of mind that allows for the eradication of delusion."

So the practice of generosity, not just in action but in intention, in mind, in heart, directly in the moment weakens greed and ill will and hatred. And it brings this flexibility, this brightness, this pliancy of mind that allows for the opening into seeing, recognizing things as they are.

When the Buddha set up his Sangha, he really made it so that monks and nuns and lay people were mutually supportive of one another. They mutually supported each other's awakening. It's pretty widely known that monks, and also nuns, would go out for alms round every morning with their bowl—a little smaller than this—and lay people give food. This still goes on in Thailand, in Burma. I don't know about Cambodia or Sri Lanka; I haven't been there. But it still goes on, and lay people go out and give what they can.

In the places I've been in Burma now, it's often only a little bit of rice. That's really all they can give, and the meditation centers cook. But there's still this sense of mutuality, and it's really important. When the monks are going out, someone goes ahead—a little boy ringing a bell, a little bell—and the people come out and stand there waiting, some nuns or lay people, men, women, just to give their little bit of rice. And you can see they're happy to do it. They don't have to do it.

The monks just walk without looking up. It's not a personal interaction—the laypeople simply give. And the Buddha set it up so that monks, bhikkhus and bhikkhunis, couldn't keep food overnight. You can't store anything. It's not like you can accumulate a lot and then say, "Okay, now I don't have to deal with people." Every day they have to go out and receive their food.

So even though the Buddha talks about being a recluse, about living alone and going to the roots of trees, the monastics could never completely divorce themselves from connection with lay people. They remain dependent on them on a daily basis—for food, for medicine, for shelter, for their robes. Those are the four things that renunciates could have.

And in turn, their gift of generosity to the lay people is this: because the monks and nuns have more opportunity for the subtle meditation practices—sure, lay people could practice too, but clearly renunciates have more time and more opportunity—their dana, their generosity, is to freely share their understanding and the Dhamma whenever asked or whenever the opportunity arises. Not to be stingy with it.

As Bhikkhu Bodhi translates at the end of the Buddha describing this relationship: how monks and nuns are helpful to the householders—you teach them the Dhamma—and they are helpful to you—they provide you with the requisites that you need. "And so, monks, nuns, this spiritual life is lived with mutual support for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

Mutual support based not in any kind of should or pressure, but based in the quality of open-hearted sharing, open-hearted generosity.

Now, generosity can become corrupted. One might think, "Well, let me give this monk this good thing, and maybe this monk's a better monk. He'll give me a good Dhamma talk, and maybe I'll get something in return." We can turn it toward selfishness. But again, in the way the sangha was set up, one of the reasons that when monks and nuns are going on alms round they don't really look at the givers, they don't say thank you, is because it's not meant to be personal. If something's offered in the alms bowl, in many of the places I've been, they go back and share it all with everybody. When you're offering something to a monk or a nun, you're offering it to the whole sangha. It's meant to take the personal getting or giving out of it.

And it really counters this false sense of separation—that fearful "I need." A monk gets good food, and the temptation might arise: "I'm not going back to the others. I got a good curry this time. I'm going to go off and hide in my hut." They don't do that. They just all come back together and share.

Even today this is very present in the culture in Thailand and in Burma. And it's this immediate, face-to-face quality that I think gives it the power—a power I hadn't experienced in the many, many examples of generosity in Western culture.

I think I first noticed it many years ago when I was a nun for a short time, maybe a year, in Thailand. At one point I was staying in a meditation center with nuns and monks up in the northern jungle region. On the nun side of the river, there were only a few kutis—maybe five or six small huts for nuns to stay in and meditate.

The way those wats work in Thailand, and it's similar in Burma, is that it all runs on dana, on generosity. People show up, whether they're monks or nuns or lay people. In Thailand they just show up. You could have a day when thirty people arrive and say, "We want to stay here." At least back then, they didn't have computer bookings. People just showed up, and you'd find a place for them. Maybe you were in a little hut by yourself, and then the next day ten women show up, and suddenly you have five women moving into a hut that you thought was small for one.

There's no charge at all. Even now today, you go to meditation centers and monasteries in Burma or Thailand, there's no charge. Sure, it's made known that the place runs on dana. It needs money for electricity, for food, for maintenance, for the workers, for everything. So it's clear that support is needed. But no one comes around and knocks on your door saying, "Hey, you've been here a month. When are you going to offer some dana?" Nothing like that.

So in Thailand, as the Westerner, the guest, I started to notice something.

So I was treated very kindly, with a lot of generosity. And after a while, when I came out of my self-involved attempts to organize how I could be comfortable there, I started to notice something remarkable. When several women showed up, not only did they not place any pressure on me in my kuti, but the first person to give up her place was the head nun—a young woman, about thirty, really dedicated to meditation, deeply committed to awakening.

When people came, it wasn't like she was the head with seniority, right? The way we think here, that would be the last person to have to move. The junior ones would have to deal with it. But she would be the one to give up her kuti or move in with someone else. And I started to notice—that's really interesting. The sign of greater practice is actually a more open, generous heart. Less holding. Maybe I read that somewhere.

It's been more in the last few years in Burma where I've really experienced a huge opening, a huge learning, an incredibly joyful one—the power of generosity. I don't even want to say it's a practice because that sounds like forcing. But the power of generosity to affect both the giver and the receiver, to where you sometimes can't tell, in terms of how one feels, the qualities in the mind of brightness and openness and non-clinging and metta—who's giving and who's receiving.

The quality of this open-hearted generosity is not about what is given or how much. It's that openness, that letting go, or not even holding to this sense of separate self—just that metta that wants to share. It's so vibrant and so contagious that after a short time in Burma—and I know I'm not the only one with this experience—and I don't mean to idealize. There's plenty of weird stuff going on. I'm not at all trying to idealize. In fact, the more I've gone over the last ten years, the more I see the distortions that come from living under such a repressive government, people who have to navigate it. No one can really escape it. All of that's true in a strange way.

And yet the power of this—it's not even a commitment to generosity, it's just a quality in the culture—is so contagious and so happiness-producing that the longer I'm there, the more it becomes a way of being. I never knew, and I never really learned it so deeply before, how much that goes towards purifying the heart and mind, the consciousness at the times it's happening, how energizing it is, how connecting it is.

The last couple of years, I think I've mentioned before, I felt really grateful, really blessed in a way, to be one of a few people who serve as representatives of many friends who've offered money in a very generous, open-hearted way but aren't able to go and actually hand either the money or the equipment to people face to face. That's part of the nature of our world—where we know so much suffering and pain and disasters going on in so many different places. Every month something happens. There's such generosity in so many of our hearts. Okay, there's Haiti, and then there's an earthquake in Pakistan, then floods in Bangladesh, then floods in Australia, an earthquake in Chile, the cyclone in Louisiana, the cyclone in Burma. It just goes on and on.

So many people donate so much money. We send a check, we use a credit card, we look at pictures. And that's really deeply generous. But that's all we can do. We can't all go to Haiti, to Chile, to Pakistan every time there's a disaster. We just can't. So we have the generous impulse and the generous giving, and we feel—when I do that I feel some sense of happiness from it. But it doesn't have the strength, the completion, the kind of interrelatedness that I experience when there's person-to-person sharing, that contagion, because you don't get to be present with the receiving.

What I really learned in Burma is that the receiving is done with such happiness and dignity. And then as soon as there's something to receive, something wants to give back. It's just a way of being. The receiving is beautiful. The giving is beautiful. To be on only one side ever is kind of limiting. It's a cycle that keeps on flowing.

So I felt really grateful to be a representative for so many people who don't have the chance to be face to face. The six of us who do this work have a commitment, for those who are interested, to send around letters and pictures and describe the actual interactions. Whenever we've done that, people say, "Oh, it's so wonderful to hear about the actual connection. It comes alive."

That's how I personally feel generosity as a practice of awakening our mind and heart—out of torpor, out of confusion, out of self-interest, out of clinging. It brightens the mind and heart, makes it stainless, able to absorb and see reality as it is, to absorb the Dhamma. And it just so happens that along the way, wholesomeness is really pleasant. But we're not cultivating it for pleasant feeling. That's what we mean when we say don't just go after the pleasant. Not that there's anything wrong with pleasant—pleasant is nice. But when we go for pleasant feeling, that feeling is just evading, gone like that. And we want more and more feeling. That turns into craving.

But when we recognize the wholesomeness—which happens to be pleasant, bringing great joy—it's a joy that creates brightness and non-clinging open-heartedness in the mind, something that's actually onward-leading, that allows us to recognize more accurately. We were going around for a month, offering support to different nunneries, to an HIV orphanage, to some schools, rebuilding villagers' houses. You see a lot of suffering. So I'm not idealizing, saying, "Oh, isn't it nice we give this little drop in the bucket."

And the negative mind could go into, "Well, what good is this? You rebuild their house, and the next month they're going to be in just as bad shape. You might as well not even bother." That's one way to go. Or you say, "Well, you help these few people, but there's so many others. You're just going to engender greed in other people's minds, so you shouldn't do anything." You see all of that. It's not that it's hidden.

And yet there's still this sense of face-to-face generosity and receiving that opens the mind and heart beyond ourself and is really energizing. So I feel really, really grateful to be able to have that opportunity. And we noticed it was exhausting, as I think I said the other time—a month of just go, go, go. But we really started to notice how it felt purifying. We'd come back to our meditation center, really exhausted, but the mind, the heart feels cleansed a little bit.

And then when I come back here and say, "Oh, I'm just tired, I think I'll watch a movie"—I'm not saying that's bad, but I don't come out of it feeling cleansed. I come out of it feeling like, "Well, that was nice," or "That wasn't a nice movie," or whatever. But it's not the same thing. There's not this vibrant, wakeful joy that comes from wholesomeness, from purity.

I just want to give you a sense of how, in that culture, generosity is so implicit, so alive. I'll give you a couple of examples because it's so amazing.

One nunnery we visited, we've known them for a few years. The head nun, Daw Etengi, has been there about six years. Three years ago, there were about thirty or thirty-five nuns who lived there and a few buildings. Then about a year and a half ago, she thought she needed to start a school because there are many young nuns and poor children—not nuns or monks—who can't afford to go to the regular schools. They claim there's no fee, but there's all these hidden fees for books and uniforms. It maybe comes to twenty dollars a month. There are so many kids whose parents can't afford that.

So she thought, "I need to start this school." A free school, hiring teachers. This is a nun. She has no ongoing source of support, no steady income. So she started a free school for the little nuns in the area. And this year when we went back, all the little nuns within a half hour walking distance would walk up there to school through the eighth or ninth standard, about thirteen or fourteen years old. She started with 160 kids. And there are so many in the area—she just couldn't say no. Now she has 370 kids in the school.

Every square inch of her place is turned over to the school. Mostly they're under this outdoor space with just a bamboo roof, no walls. She's paying the teachers every month—not a lot, but every month. Once a week she feeds the kids, which costs about five hundred dollars to feed them one meal. Food's actually quite expensive there. And she says when she feeds them, they eat a lot because she can tell they're really hungry. And so 370 children—she can't say no. These poor kids, absolutely free. And this is just in one little area, a suburb of Yangon. This could be replicated anywhere. And she's just doing it on faith and generosity.

So we go to visit, we see what she's doing, we offer something. Maybe it'll keep it going for a month or two. Maybe. She needs new buildings, she needs all this, but she's just totally happy and bright. She was telling us when we were visiting how she was so happy because it was her birthday soon, and on her birthday she could make a little party for all the students, give them all ice cream, make some little game. She was so happy to be able to do this. She must have told us three or four times. I mean, she's already given them the whole school.

Plus the 38 nuns who live there—they just have to basically turn over their whole space all day, every day. And then at night, they roll out where they sleep.

So that's just one example, not a really unusual example. It's the incredible generosity, the faith that it will be supported by people's generosity, and the happiness. I mean, I could imagine myself, if I was doing that, thinking, "Where am I going to get the money? I can't believe I started this—300 students!"

But she didn't have anything like that. Smiling, happy. She said, "Yeah, 370, it's a lot. So we have to have two sessions, morning and afternoon." That's it. No "I wonder where the money will come from." Just happiness to be able to offer.

And this is really, as I say, not at all unusual. I could give you many other similar examples. And it's not just among the ordained people—it's really endemic in the culture.

Another time, a couple of years ago, right after the cyclone, there was real starvation. People's houses and food sources had been destroyed. When we went, a few months later, we offered the Sayadaw where we stay—a teacher—and he wanted to offer a rice dāna to the two villages on either side of the meditation center, which means each household gets a big bag of rice. In Burma, you have to be registered. They know exactly how many households in each village, how many people in each household, who's poor and who's not. It's very organized.

So we offered this to each household, and people would come and we'd give them this huge bag of rice. The women would take this—it took two of us to lift it up—they'd plop it on their head and go walking off. Quite amazing.

The next day, some of the monks were going on their alms round. There was one Western monk, a Mexican friend of ours who had been there a few months. When he came back, he said he was so touched. On the alms round, each monastery goes the same way. The villagers know which route they'll take. The same people generally come out—it's a kind of ritual. People who can and want to come out do so; people who don't want to don't have to.

I went on that alms round this year, and I really saw what tiny little bits of rice people give. They're really poor, but they're so happy to do it. This monk said that the day after the rice dāna, there were so many more people out offering rice, because now they had a little extra they could offer. That's the first thing they did with it—they went and offered it. "Now I can give something."

The ability to give brings so much happiness. It's not about how much. And so the receiving is necessary for the giving. It has to go together.

It's so endemic in the culture that by the time one has been there a while—and I've talked to so many people, not even those staying in monasteries—it becomes a natural response. People want to give. By the time you've been there a while, it starts to seep in. You start to feel happier. At first it's like, "Oh no, I have so much—don't give me anything!" But then you start to see that's actually selfish, because we're uncomfortable. "No, no, don't give me anything. You keep it, you need it more than me."

What does that do to someone who wants to offer you a bowl of rice? "Oh no, no—you keep it." It really stops the flow. Instead of allowing that person to experience the joy, the openheartedness, the non-clinging of giving, they're told, "No, you need to hold on to it. You need to take care of yourself. Don't give anything away because you might not have enough." Feeding fear and feeding a sense of "I have more than you."

It just feeds differentiation.

So it's really a great learning and a very powerful one.

And you even see it in the little kids. One time I was walking on this little street between two meditation centers, just by myself, walking from one to the other. A little boy came up. He still had on his little school uniform. He was in a poor area, but he looked very tidy somehow. He came up to me with a little tiny jasmine flower, very formally bowed, handed me this jasmine flower, and ran off. I'd never seen him before. I never saw him since. He didn't know me from anybody. It was just such a pure act of connectedness, of generosity. I mean, I'm still happy when I think about it.

And that's another thing with generosity that I'll get to later. It's in the motivation in our mind before we do an act of generosity. It's in the doing of it. And later, the karmic result, the vipaka of our generous act, is that we can recollect it to cultivate wholesomeness in our heart and mind. That's really important and something we don't do that much. "Let me reflect on my generosity"—don't we think that sounds a little bit full of ourselves? But it's completely the other. Bring up the wholesomeness. Contemplate it. It brightens the heart and the mind.

In the Buddha's teaching and in the suttas, the heart of generosity, just as the heart of all action, is in the motivation—not in the actual action, certainly not in what is given. The heart of it is in the motivation.

You can see this in some stories from the time of the Buddha about Anathapindika, who was called the most generous of the Buddha's supporters. You read many suttas where he appears; he's very devoted. So many of the suttas that begin, "Thus have I heard"—that's Ananda speaking—"on one occasion the Blessed One was dwelling at Savatthi in Jetavana, the monastery of Anathapindika."

Anathapindika, when he first met the Buddha, was so moved by faith that he bought, at a ridiculously exorbitant price, this beautiful place in Savatthi and offered it to the Buddha and the Sangha for their monastery as a place to stay. It's said that the Buddha spent nineteen of his forty-five rain retreats in that place—he stayed there more than anywhere else. So you read about Anathapindika a lot.

What I want to highlight at the moment is how not only was he hugely generous, but what was important about it was that the seed of his generosity came from faith, from happiness, and from wanting to support the Sangha. That's really what matters in terms of generosity.

When he first met the Buddha, he was so excited. He heard there was this enlightened being, and he was so excited he couldn't sleep. He was at his brother-in-law's house. Finally he got up in the middle of the night and started walking towards where he heard the Buddha was. Then he got really scared—"I don't want to go. No, this is too intense. Oh no, I can't do it." He started to turn around and go back home. But they say some unseen being spoke to him, said, "No, no, householder, go forward. You need to go forward." Sometimes we just know something's going to be so life-changing. And even though our intuition's telling us this is for our own good and the good of all, it's scary. We pull back.

But he went, and was so much in awe when he first saw the Buddha that he just fell at his feet. Then he stammered out the first thing that came to him, which was, "Oh, how did you sleep last night?" And then he thought, "Oh, what a jerk. 'How did you sleep last night?' That's the best I can do."

But of course the Buddha said, "Having cut off all attachments, having removed care from the heart, the peaceful one indeed sleeps well, for he has attained peace of mind."

So it doesn't matter what you ask the Buddha—you're going to get a good teaching. And then he led Anathapindika step by step, speaking of giving, of virtue, exactly what I read about Supabuddha. And Anathapindika woke up.

And he was so filled with faith. He was a real faith type in wisdom that he immediately invited the Buddha and all five hundred of the Sangha to come for a meal. And he bought this grove, the Jeta grove. And then he just kept on supporting. Every day he would make a meal for five hundred monks and nuns, and they would come and he would offer this meal. Just so filled with faith.

Then the king of that area, King Pasenadi, heard of Anathapindaka's generosity and wanted to imitate him. If Anathapindaka can have five hundred monks, I can too—I'm the king. So he supplied alms for five hundred monks daily. But one day, as he was on his way to talk with the monks, he learned from his servants that the monks were taking the food he had given them away and giving it to their supporters in the city, who would then offer it back to the monks.

King Pasenadi was mystified, for the food he gave was very tasty—much higher quality food. Why were they doing this? So he asked the Buddha.

The Buddha explained to the king that in the palace, his servants distributed the food without any inner feeling, just as if they were taking orders from the king, as if they were cleaning out a barn or doing any other task. They had no feeling. In fact, some of them had no love for the monks at all but thought they were parasites. The Buddha said, "When anything is given in that spirit, no one could feel comfortable accepting it, even if the meal is of the most delicious food." So the monks would go to the faithful householders and give the food, and the faithful would offer it back.

The Buddha said that Anathapindaka and Visakha, a woman who was his equal in giving, welcomed the monks and regarded them as spiritual friends. A humble meal provided by a friend would be worth much more than the most sumptuous meal offered by someone who did not give in a truly generous, open spirit.

So that's really the heart of generosity—the motivation.

Again from the Buddha: "Even if a person throws the rinsings of a bowl or a cup into a village pool or pond—just washing it, rinsing it and throwing the slops into a pond—thinking, 'May whatever animals live here feed on this,' that would be a source of great generosity, a source of merit."

It's what's going on in the heart and the mind. Which is obvious, because that's what's going to brighten and purify the heart and mind—the motivation, the quality in the mind, not just the outer actions.

Once in a retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita, the monk who was teaching with him, a Nepalese monk named Nyanaponika, gave a talk about practicing generosity. I had notes of six things to pay attention to that I've really liked a lot, so I'll share them.

The first is obvious. When the thought of giving comes up, give attention to the motivation, to your inner motivation. You could say, purify it before giving. I was listening to a Tibetan teacher, Kilung Rinpoche, and he was talking about how you could spend a long time just practicing giving in your mind. Imagine someone and imagine giving something to them. It can start with someone you love, like metta practice—go through people you love to people you feel ill will toward. Just begin with the idea of giving in your mind, purifying that motivation. Not "Oh, well, I guess I better give. Okay, here." Really looking and seeing, because it's about the motivation.

I've heard a Tibetan teaching, which I kind of like although I haven't done it, that if it's really hard to let go of something in a material way, you could practice giving it from one hand to the other. Really let it go and give it to this hand. That's just a way to play. Try it and see.

And in terms of giving, I'm not just talking about material things. Giving of our time, giving of our services, giving of our care. Just being willing to sit and listen to a friend talk about some problem they're having when you're in a little bit of a hurry.

So start by paying attention to the volition, to what's the quality of motivation in the heart and mind right now, and hang with it, let it purify. Of course it's not perfect. You don't have to wait until it's perfect, but at least notice.

Then, whether it's time, service, or material things—whatever you're giving—notice if there's still clinging to it, and see if you can abandon the clinging so that you're really giving. Not "I'll give it, maybe they won't want it and I'll get it back."

I notice this when I'm booking phone conversations with people and have to figure out the time. I'll book the time and then think, "Oh, maybe they won't call today." That's not generosity. I see that. What am I hoarding the time for? I don't even have something

I want to do with it. To just look at that and feel that contraction, that separation—and then connect with the person, connect with why. That open-hearted willingness to be present is lovely.

It's not so much about doing it for them; I'm doing it for me. Opening my mind, opening my heart from the clinging.

The third aspect Sayadaw U Pandita also spoke about, and this is where I really felt the power of this practice from being in Burma, is when it's possible—and it's often not possible in our culture, and not on retreat either—but when it's possible to directly give and receive face-to-face, with real presence.

I noticed this with Sayadaw U Pandita actually. One time I was on retreat and heard he wanted a particular book. Since I was on retreat, I had someone buy it and give it to him, saying it was from me. When I came out of retreat—this is how he was just so constantly teaching—he said to me when I went to pay my respects, okay, he got the book, now hand it to me face to face. And I saw how shy I was, how I felt this isn't good enough or something. Just self, selfing. And it's nothing. You just hand it. He received it. Blessed you for it. May this be a cause for your awakening.

That's something they often say in Burma. Even lay people—you hand them something and they say, may this be the cause for you to reach Nibbana in this lifetime. Can you imagine? You're sitting in a monastery, you offer something, and someone says, may you reach Nirvana in this lifetime. It's so beautiful.

Can you imagine you're in a supermarket and you let someone go ahead of you? May you reach Nirvana in this lifetime. It really sets your mind in a different way than ours. "Okay, thanks." "Yeah, right, I do only have one thing—I should go ahead of you." Really different. You see how it's contagious, how it opens us up.

In Burma, for example, when you're giving—and it's not only to monks and nuns, but we were giving a lot to nuns—it's really quite formal. If you're handing money, nuns can take money directly; monks cannot, so it would go to an attendant. But you may be offering something substantial. We'd find out that they needed toilets, and believe me, some of those nunneries needed toilets. We'd give them six or seven hundred dollars—it's not nothing to build a couple of toilets or a well. You should see the disgusting holes they're drinking water out of.

So we'd be giving money for that, and it's always formal. You get a tray, you put it on a tray. The people who are receiving and the people who are giving all hold it together. And then they always take a picture—they love pictures, always taking photos. You're holding it together, and then they chant. They'll chant a metta chant, a gratitude chant, a blessing chant. You sit there on your knees holding it while they're chanting. It's beautiful. Even the little nunlets, like five-year-olds, they all stand there and chant the chant of blessing.

By the end, it's not just, "Oh, here's some money." You feel blessed. You are being blessed. And you're all together in this energy of faith and happiness and generosity. You think, well, who's giving what to whom here? It's just lovely.

This face-to-face dimension is something I really miss in this culture. As I said, some of it is just how things are set up—we can't do it. And here on retreat, please stay in the noble silence. Please don't all start going face-to-face, giving each other things.

But just to notice, not to shy away. That sense of receiving with dignity and beauty is really, really important. It completes the circle.

And I feel like I want to be a transmission for the people who've offered to these nunneries, just to show how it really works. Here's an example. Two people here—and I've talked to each of them, it came up in different ways—were part of a group that donated some of this money to one of the specific nunneries. And in both of them, they kind of said, "Well, what happened?"

And I could say, "We gave this money to these nuns, told them who it was from." They had a photo from last year of two of the people who were spearheading that donation. So we showed them their photo. "It's from this group of people." Because they want to know. They want to know specifically if they can. They'll put the names of the people—I have my name on a couple of toilets, I'm very proud. And you know, they want to know. They send blessings. And it was specifically for building a stone brick room instead of these bamboo buildings that fall apart every six months.

And then the next day I could tell them—the next day we were out walking on this dusty road and this truck came by. And the sister, one of the two nuns, was in the passenger seat. She stopped to say hello to us. And it was a truck filled with cement and bricks. They had gone out immediately with that dāna to buy cement and bricks to start building the room.

So when I told each of these two people separately this, they got so high. I could see. They weren't just saying it. Their faces lit up. They were so happy. It's like having that connection, that completion. It's not a completion because it's bringing happiness, and then from that happiness you want to do something for somebody else, and it just keeps on going. It's really a profound and enlivening practice. So the face-to-face is wonderful when it can happen.

Then obviously the next upanisā, uddāna paṇika said, when we're giving time, materiality, energy, whatever, be present for it. You know, it says "with the mind focused on giving." It's not like, "Oh yeah, right, I wanted to give you this thing," and then I'm going to go have some tea. And how often do I do that?

I remember some little thing I gave a friend once, and he later said, "Oh, from your casual giving"—but that particular thing has been really useful to me. He wasn't chastising me, but I felt chastised because it was true. It was a really offhand, "I don't need this, if you want it, you can have it." So different from, "Oh, can you use this? You can have it." That's not to aggrandize myself, but it's just to be present with the giving. To open to the connectedness, to the interrelatedness, is so much more powerful—in my mind, than it would have been in his.

After giving, continue to be aware of your volition. Because, you know, sometimes we regret it, right? "Ah, damn. Why did I do that?" Okay, if that comes up, it comes up, but notice it. Don't have to keep going into it. You know, don't have to shut down again. I did give it. That was a good thing. Be mindful of the volition.

And clear comprehension, awareness of the broader context—there are times when we give something that isn't really appropriate or helpful. You know, the classic example is if you give someone who's an addict, you support their habit. You know, it's maybe not the most helpful thing.

And there are the stories in the suttas about it, again with Anāthapiṇḍika. He was incredibly rich, and he had a nephew who was a real wastrel, who would just keep wasting money. So I won't read the whole story because it would take too much time, but the nephew would come and ask Anāthapiṇḍika for like three thousand talents, whatever. He would give it. The guy would go off and gamble it all away. Then come back and ask for four thousand. Anāthapiṇḍika would give five thousand. He would go off, spend it all in raucous living, gamble it all away, come back and ask for more. So Anāthapiṇḍika went through this a couple times. Then he said, "This is a warning. This is the last I'm going to give you." But of course, same thing.

The nephew came back again. So then Anathapindika said, "Well, I'm not giving you any money, but I'll give you some clothes to take care of you." Of course, the nephew just went off and sold those, then came back again. And finally, Anathapindika said, "No, I'm not giving you anything more."

The nephew went off and continued in his wastrel living. He didn't even want to beg, which was an option, and he died what the texts describe as a pitiful death. Anathapindika felt terrible and went to the Buddha, asking, "Should I have done something different?"

I can really relate to this—the question of what's the difference between real generosity of heart and codependence, where you feel "I have to do it" even though it's not really generosity. The Buddha said, "No, you shouldn't have done anything different. You did what you could, and he was one of the fortunately few people who are like a pit, a money pit, who would just take and take and take and couldn't better himself. There's nothing you could have really done."

I find this so interesting. Dana or any of the wholesome qualities—they come together with wisdom, not some idealism. It's not "give till it hurts, then give more, then give until you're destroyed." It's not that. There's clear comprehension of whether what I'm giving is actually helpful or harmful to the person or to myself.

In terms of how this can support our practice here and now, this sense of purifying and bringing wholesome qualities to mind, of changing the channel when we're caught in fear, ill will, or aversion—sometimes we say, "Why don't you try doing some metta?" when the mind seems really locked into a suffering, unwholesome place. It's the same idea. Metta is just one way, not the only way.

There's a beautiful passage from Ajahn Pasanno in the book The Island. He writes: "There's a naturalness to this gradual training. For example, when one is generous and delights in giving, the heart tends to be satisfied and joyous. This supports the cultivation of virtue, of non-harming, because a heart that is satisfied and contented easily inclines to restraint and composure. With this composure, together with the lack of remorse that virtue affords, the heart is easily settled and focused. Meditation thus progresses more smoothly and the mind naturally brightens, making it suitable for recognizing things as they truly are."

That's the key. Only the mind-heart that's free from clinging, even for a moment, can recognize things as they actually are—yatha-bhuta. All of these different practices—virtue, generosity, the Brahma-viharas—are different ways of bringing in and strengthening this clarity, brightness, openness, and freedom of heart and mind.

For our own practice, both here and in daily life, when you notice you're really locked in clinging or self-judgment or negativity or depression—anything that's all about me, me, me—try just doing some generous act, simply to see how that changes the channel. It busts us out of, even for a moment, the self-involvement. Give something to somebody. Do something for somebody. It can be a small thing. But do those things of really clarifying the motivation and doing it wholeheartedly.

You'll notice that "I'm doing this for my own good" is part of the mixed motivation. But get in touch with what it actually means to offer this thing, this time, this service, whatever it may be. Feel the happiness, the uplifting that can bring. Don't be shy about really settling into this wholesomeness. Not "Oh yes, that's wholesome, la la la, don't want to get too caught in the pleasant." No. Settle into the wholesomeness. Really feel the difference between the wholesome mind and heart and the unwholesome. We can tell the difference. We know when we're suffering, but we can also know when we're not, when the mind and heart is bright, and what feeds that. Really, really helpful.

As I mentioned at the beginning, we can cultivate as a contemplation—and the Buddha talks about this—contemplating our own past generosity as a way of changing the channel when we're caught. There's a sutta translated by Andrew Olendzki called "Directed and Non-Directed Meditation." It describes how when one is practicing the four foundations of mindfulness, contemplating body as body, ardent, fully aware, mindful, leading away from the unhappiness that comes from wanting the things of the world—it can happen, maybe you've noticed this—a physical object arises, or a mental object arises, or bodily distress arises, or mental sluggishness arises, and the mind becomes scattered outwards.

You ever notice that? The mind goes outwards.

So the Buddha says you don't have to just be mindful of that—sometimes we can, but sometimes the mind is too scattered. And then he says: direct the mind. This is directed meditation. Direct it to some inspiring object or subject, some inspiring image. Metta is one example of that. Another example he talks about is contemplating our generosity.

There are actually six contemplations he discusses: our generosity, our virtue, the devas—though that may or may not apply to you, and this is much more commonly practiced in Buddhist countries. I don't know how much it works for some of us. But also contemplations on the qualities of a Buddha, on the Dhamma, and on the Sangha. All of these can bring real wholesome energy into the mind.

But I just want to read the passage on generosity. Here he's talking to laypeople too:

"Furthermore, this is the case where you recollect your own generosity. 'So it is a great profit for me, great gain, really wholesome for me, that living among people at home, among people who are overcome with the habit of possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness. Freely generous, open-handed, delighting in being generous, responsive to requests.' And at any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting their generosity, her mind is not overcome with greed, is not overcome with aversion, is not overcome with delusion. Her mind, her heart heads straight based on generosity."

This is the key: anytime you're recollecting your generosity, the mind is not overcome with greed, hatred, or delusion.

"When the mind, the heart is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones has a sense of the goal, gains a sense of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma. And one who is joyful, rapture arises. And one who is rapturous, the body grows calm. And one whose body is calmed experiences ease. And one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated."

Just this sense of cause and effect—not willpower.

"So Mahanama"—this is the layperson he's addressing—"you should develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children."

In other words, whatever we're doing, it doesn't have to be on a meditation retreat. We can recollect our generosity, we can practice our generosity, and it's a great gain for us—a great practice of freeing the heart and mind from clinging, and a great source of joy and happiness.

So may we all experience the happiness and freedom that the cultivation of generosity can bring into our minds and hearts.

CHAPTER 87

Exploring the Nature of Craving with Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this talk, Carol Wilson offers a deep exploration of taṇhā—the Pāli term for craving that the Buddha identified as the second noble truth and the origin of dukkha. She clarifies the crucial distinction between taṇhā (a thirst-like grasping quality that distorts perception) and chanda (a wholesome energy or zeal that can motivate action without suffering). Wilson explains how craving operates not just toward sense pleasures, but also toward states of being and even enlightenment itself, always promising happiness while actually creating contraction and suffering.
>
> Drawing on the Buddha's teaching about gratification, danger, and escape, Wilson emphasizes that freedom from craving doesn't require eliminating pleasant experiences or forcing renunciation. Rather, it involves turning attention toward the quality of craving itself—noticing how it feels in body and mind, how it narrows perception, and how it naturally dissolves when met with mindful awareness (satipaññā). She illustrates this with vivid examples, from wanting a cookie to hoping for an empty row on an airplane, showing how craving colors our perception of others and distorts our relationship with experience.
> The talk also addresses sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view) and how the sense of self arises through moments of grasping at perceptions. Wilson concludes with the Buddha's description of how an awakened one perceives without adding anything extra—simply knowing seeing as seeing, hearing as hearing—and a poem from the Japanese nun Togetsu pointing toward complete release.

So as we know, there are really many different ways of recognizing the truth, of understanding how things are, of our minds coming to freedom. There isn't only one way. In the suttas, in the texts, there are various ways that the Buddha describes the way we suffer, what the mind that's free from suffering is like, and how to recognize what that free mind is.

Tonight I want to talk about a very basic approach, and that's simply to explore together the experience of craving—which is really one of the most fundamental things that the Buddha spoke about, making it the second noble truth, the cause of dukkha. One of his statements was that the sublime truth has been discerned by the tathagata, meaning himself: namely, liberation of heart and mind through non-clinging. This is a very powerful, very sweeping statement—that he discovered the liberation of mind, of heart, through non-clinging.

I want to explore how non-clinging is not some state that one achieves, but is rather a moment-to-moment activity of mind, because mind itself is a moment-to-moment activity. Let me define how I'm using "mind" tonight. I'm using it to mean the moment-to-moment arising of a moment of consciousness together with the mental factors that come with it. The word used in Pali is citta. There's a moment of consciousness arising, and together with it are all the aggregates—perception, vedana (feeling tones), sankharas, all the other mental experiences. Every moment of consciousness includes perception, vedana, and all the different mental factors that make it wholesome or unwholesome. There could be mindfulness, there could be wisdom, there could be metta, there can be craving. There can be aversion, there can be delusion, there can be equanimity—whole ones mixed together. So when I'm saying mind, I'm really referring to citta and what's in it, and this is arising and changing from moment to moment—which thank goodness.

Because if it were a steady state, there would be no practice. Can you imagine if you just had the same mind state for your whole life? But that's what you're craving, isn't it? You're craving some mind state. You maybe touched one once, or you made it up—you never even had it—and you're craving it. "That's what enlightenment's going to be like, and it's going to just stay like that forever." We're so deluded.

I want to talk about craving because it's not "we" who are deluded—that's one of the effects of craving. When craving is present in the mind and we don't recognize it—which is, let's face it, a lot of the time, not all, but a lot—it colors our perception. We recognize what's happening inaccurately, we build our descriptions of ourselves and the world on that, and then we don't see the craving. We keep wanting whatever the thing is, and we just get further and further from any sense of harmony with what is, because we don't even know what is.

When the Buddha talks about discerning the heart and mind of non-clinging, he didn't say creating the mind of non-clinging—he said recognizing it. When craving and its corollary, aversion, and of course delusion (because craving doesn't arise without delusion) aren't present in a moment or in a series of moments, that's what mindfulness is helping us see. Then, when there are more steady moments of non-delusion, the potential is there as a condition for wisdom to arise. Wisdom is another mental state. And when wisdom arises, perception is accurate. When perception is accurate, when we recognize accurately, in that moment, for that moment, craving just releases—because it doesn't make any sense. It's a strategy that doesn't work.

But because we don't turn around and look at it, really recognize how it's manifesting and how it's not working and how it thinks it's working—because we don't really explore it but rather let it run the show so often—we don't see that it doesn't work. We think, "I have to somehow get rid of all this craving, and I'm so deluded and I'm so hopeless. The more I practice, the more craving I see, or aversion, just the flip side. Or delusion. I see so much more. I'm so much worse. There's no way I'll ever get rid of all this craving. It's just a mountain—ten thousand mountains of craving. It's hopeless."

But how many moments of non-craving have you had? Do they match how many moments of craving you've had?

Luckily, it doesn't work like that. It's just this close—a moment of not seeing accurately. Oh. In that moment, craving doesn't make sense.

So that's kind of the spirit I hope we can look at it in. This is really bringing wise attitude, satipañña. Ajahn Buddhadasa, the Thai monk I think I mentioned, would talk about sati, mindfulness, and pañña, wisdom. He would speak of satipañña—mindfulness-wisdom at the sense door, at the moment of perception. So there's hearing... Mindfulness and wisdom at the sense door recognizes things as they are. It recognizes sound as sound, for example.

Bringing wise attitude, this recognizing the quality in the mind in the moment that's observing—wise attitude is just interested in seeing what's happening. It's what we've been talking about the whole time. Can we bring that attitude to exploring the experience of craving, and its stronger movement into grasping or clinging when it's present, instead of hating it or missing it or loving it? Let's just see what it is, how it manifests, how it works, what's the effect in the heart, in the mind, in my actions.

And in that moment, when satipañña—mindfulness, wisdom, right attitude, a moment of mindful awareness—recognizes, "Oh, craving is like this," in that moment, craving has just become the next mental object, the next sankhara. It's not a problem. I'm just talking experientially now, not theoretically. But experientially, it's as if in those moments—"Oh, that's craving. It feels like this"—it really is an object. It's as if the awareness, the satipañña, is recognizing it, and the craving itself is not functioning then as a hindrance. It's not really coloring, and we're seeing it. So in that moment, the citta, the mind, is clear. It's pure. There might even be wisdom. "Oh, look at craving. It's like that." And it doesn't go anywhere. It's not like, "Get out the hammer!" "Craving is like that"—that's not satipañña. That's aversion, the flip side of craving, of fear. "Oh, look at craving. Oh, look at wisdom. Oh, look at hearing. Oh, look at thinking." It's simply another arising experience to bring that quality of awareness, mindfulness, interest to it when we can. And when we can't, we notice that.

Craving, when it's seen through, when it releases like that—in a moment, I'm just talking about a moment—that releasing of craving is what's referred to as renunciation. And I think it's kind of odd in our culture when we read about craving or wanting or desire. Instead of craving right now, I'm going to say desire because that makes it more confusing. No, I'm doing it on purpose, because one of the problems a lot of people have—and I've heard questions about this here—is that "desire" is a word in English that covers a lot of different mental states. The word taṇhā for craving is very specific, and I'll get to that in a minute.

But when we think of desire, so many times people think, well, desire has an almost pleasant connotation. Desire has the promise it's going to make us happy. That's why we like it. People say, "How can I live without desire? Why would I want to?" So desire has this connection with the pleasant, with getting things we like. And that has a sense of somehow being connected with happiness.

Renunciation? Not so much. See, you're laughing. Why?

What do we think of renunciation? I'm putting this out as something for you to explore—we're not into you believing stuff. The truth is, it's actually the reverse of what we assume.

Renunciation, or nekkhamma in Pali, doesn't mean something dry and aversive, shutting everything out of life. Renunciation doesn't mean throwing things away with aversion. Remember, in the Eightfold Path, wise intention is the second step, where the intention of greed under wisdom naturally transforms into renunciation.

I don't even like the phrase "letting go," because letting go sounds like I'm letting this go—too much me, too much pushing. Rather, it's that the wanting just stops. It dissipates because it doesn't make sense anymore. And in its place, there's actually the peace of just being as we are in the moment, the peace of simplicity.

Renunciation as an outer form can have many different manifestations. But when I'm talking about renunciation here, I'm not talking about the outer form. I'm talking about the inner intention, the wise intention when the clinging releases. The renouncing of that clinging may or may not involve renouncing a particular object—that's not really the point. The clinging dissipates, and what we're left with is peace, actually.

You can have the outer form that looks like real renunciation and be riddled with craving. Someone asked one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, about becoming a monk. He did most of his practice as a householder, and he's been a monk only about fifteen years, which in Burma is unusual because most of the Sayadaws were monks since they were seven. They don't have much of a clue about what it's really like to live a household life. But he does—he's been through a lot of stuff.

So someone was saying he became a monk because of the renunciation and the freedom from craving, being really idealistic about it. And he just cracked up laughing. He said, "You know, it's not like that. You know how many different things you crave in a lay life? There are so many different things to crave. So you become a monk and there are only two things you can crave, but you put all that same amount of craving into those two things." And definitely I've met monks and nuns who can do that. Not all, but some.

So it's kind of reversed from our society's way of looking at it. Both misconceptions—thinking of desire as leading us to happiness, and renunciation as being the way of dried up, depressing Theravada Burmese Buddhists—exist mostly because the emphasis is on the object. Without desire, I won't get nice things or states or whatever. With renunciation, I have to live without whatever it is I think is so important.

But the whole matter of craving and freedom from it has nothing whatsoever to do with objects. Craving is a quality in the mind, a mental quality. And the suffering of it is the effect it has in the mind. We're not seeing it on the basic level of how it keeps us running in samsara, wanting this, wanting that. And on the deeper level, we're missing how it colors and distorts perception. As long as we're locked in craving—even craving enlightenment, it doesn't matter what—the craving itself hides the peace that's actually available. It's so poignant.

And it doesn't matter if you're craving pizza for lunch or you're craving that incredibly blissful state you had yesterday. If you're looking at the object and not at the quality in the mind, we're missing the whole picture.

Back to a little vocabulary. I'm using the word "craving" deliberately to correspond with the Pali word taṇhā, which is the word the Buddha uses in the Second Noble Truth: "This is the noble truth of the origin of dukkha—usually translated as suffering—which is this craving, this taṇhā, which produces renewal of being, which is bound up with delight and lust and seeks and finds pleasure now here and now there." I really like that phrasing: it seeks pleasure, it finds pleasure here and there.

There are three kinds: craving for sense pleasures, which is obvious; craving for existence or being; and craving for non-existence. Briefly, craving for existence—the main way you can see it in your experience, and this is really visible on meditation retreats—is the craving, the taṇhā, for a better state, a different state. I see this so much in my own practice. Sense pleasures are obvious.

Craving for a better state—we just think that's practice. We just think that's true. It should be better, or it should stay. And craving for non-existence, in the simple moment-to-moment way that Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about it, would really be aversion. It's craving for something to stop existing. That knee pain, for example—would that just stop existing?

So this word tanha—I'm not a Pali scholar, but they say the closest translation is more like "thirst." I like that because it gives a sense of what that quality feels like in the mind and body when it's present. We can learn to recognize it. It's thirst. It's really like, "I've got to have this." As it strengthens into "I've got to have it," that's grasping. That's just the next step in the dependent origination. It's pleasant, but we don't notice it's pleasant. The habit of the mind is to lean into it. Yes, I want. This will make me happy. And then it strengthens into grasping, holding on, attachment, clinging. Those are all synonyms for the Pali word upadana.

So when the Buddha is talking about tanha as being the cause of our suffering, he's talking about this quality in the mind of thirst. We'll get to exploring that in a minute.

Oftentimes people will say, "Well, what's wrong with wanting to take care of your family? What's wrong with wanting to enjoy nature on a beautiful day?" You can go through the whole list. I'm sure you've come up with things for yourself. What's wrong with wanting that? What's wrong with desire? If there was no desire, who would ever do anything? In fact, somebody said to me once on retreat, "If I didn't have desire, what would I do without it? Just sit in my room for the rest of my life?"

First, let me say there are other qualities of mind that can give rise to intention to act other than desire and fear—such as compassion, such as wisdom, such as this next word I'm going to say, which is often translated as "desire" from the Pali: chanda. It's a broader, different word. Chanda is often translated as "desire" into English, and tanha is also often translated as "desire." So that's really confusing.

I looked up chanda in the Pali-English dictionary, which is this huge book. It has two whole pages on chanda. It's describing a quality of mind that's ethically neutral. It's described variously as desire to do, a kind of willingness, an energy that comes up to do something, almost an excitement. And it's ethically neutral because depending on what other mental factors come together with it, it could be just kind of a neutral thing, or it can be wholesome, or it can be unwholesome.

Chanda can come up in a wholesome way. It's in one of the lists of the Buddha called the iddhipadas, which I'm not going to go into in detail, but they're the four bases of power for concentration. Chanda is listed as one of them, so it's very wholesome, and in that context it's often translated as "zeal"—this real arising of energy to do something. We would say, "Yeah, I really want to do it. I have a lot of energy."

But you can look and see the quality in your mind, in your heart, and we get to become familiar with when it's wholesome or not. When it's wholesome, there's not this sense of contraction. There's not this sense of narrowing. It's not like, "Yeah, I really want to do it, and if you're in my way, I'm just going to run over you." That's what craving does. Nothing else matters with craving. When it's wholesome, you see more of the big picture. There's some wisdom.

So chanda is this excitement, this desire to do, and it can be directed toward wholesome, helpful things in our life, in our regular day-to-day life, and we often call it desire. But it can also be unwholesome. The word for the first hindrance is actually sense desire, and the Pali term for that is kama chanda—chanda, this desire, this real wanting, this excitement about sense pleasures. So you see how it gets confusing.

And you see how we can't just look outward. That's how we get confused. But we can learn to keep getting interested. Just get interested in turning the attention into what's the quality in the mind, in the heart right now, in the mind that's aware. And we're doing it not taking it personally, not with judgment, just with interest to see how the mind works.

So when you're thinking about that, play with the difference. Just do a little thought experiment. Imagine you just want to take a walk. It's a beautiful day. Imagine it is chanda—this kind of, we won't even say zeal because that's so much, but just a real interest, enthusiasm, this energy to take a walk. And it's wholesome. There's the energy to take the walk. You're a little tight. It's a beautiful day. You're not frantic. You have the energy. You're going to take a walk. You're going to be present. And many people describe that actually in taking the walk, their mindfulness, their sense of presence got much more balanced. You could say, "I had the desire to take a walk." Fine. That's not unwholesome. That's not tanha. What's the suffering in that? There isn't any. Don't confuse it with tanha.

Tanha is when you're sitting here. It's five minutes into the sitting, and you're thinking, "I don't really like what's going on now. I want to take a walk. I really want to take a walk. I should have done it before, but I didn't. And now they were talking about walks. It's a beautiful day. It's going to get cold and rainy tomorrow. This is my last chance. I've got to take a walk. I don't care if it's the 9 a.m. sitting and all the teachers are here—I'm out of here." And you almost can't stop yourself. Maybe you don't stop yourself, and you're out taking that walk. And if you're not looking at the state in the mind, you're just looking at the walk, it carries this kind of seductive quality. "Oh, you'll be so happy if you take this walk." That's the promise of craving. "Just do me, do this thing, and you'll be so happy."

I remember reading this from Andrea Levine, where she was describing how the mind says, "Oh, just eat that second piece of chocolate cake. It'll make you so happy." And then you eat it, and the mind goes, "I wouldn't have done that if I were you." But do we pay any attention to the fickle, inconstant nature of the mind? No. The next time craving comes up, we just follow along.

Yeah, right. That's right. This will really make me happy. Because we're always looking out at the object.

So did you get a little sense of the difference between chanda and craving? Think about whatever your idea of enlightenment or the really great state of awareness would be. Can you get a sense—and don't tell me you haven't thought about it—can you get a sense of what craving for that could possibly feel like? Starting with tanha is actually easier.

Yes, it's subtle. But do you get a sense of how the craving can be there and we don't even notice it because we're so familiar with it? It has an energy that feels as though it's onward leading into the thing that we want, just like the chocolate cake or dinner or the walk. Yes, if I lean into it, I'll get it. Almost. I'm almost there. One more breath. If I just sit through two sittings like yesterday, it'll come.

Sometimes we even think we know we're striving. We say to ourselves, "I'm looking for striving. I'm not striving." And we come out of our sitting with our shoulders about to break, and we're looking for it but we don't see it. It's so familiar.

Now, any idea we have of what awakening would be like is going to be too limited anyway. But that same sense of having a memory or an idea of something that seems wholesome and useful—there can be a chanda, a wholesome way, a zeal, a willingness that isn't the same as the narrowing, the leaning into, the grasping of craving that's trying to make it happen.

There's a sense that this is what gives us inspiration. This is what gives us the faith to do. Saddha is often translated as confidence or a willingness to do, and that's a wholesome state. So chanda can be knowing what it's like when the mind is clear and the sense of awareness is really trusted. I know that sense of when nothing's a problem. A friend of mine calls it the place of no problem, although it's not a place. I know that feeling.

Chanda can be the willingness—yes, I can't make it happen because I know it's antithetical. Wanting to make it is exactly what prevents it, what blocks it. But chanda could be just the awareness of that possibility. Not the wanting of clinging, but something that can give me the energy to come back and be here in this moment with the fact that it's not like that right now. It's like this. And being with it like this is actually the only place that purity of mind and freedom can ever be discovered, because there is nowhere else.

So that's another delusion of craving—it's always looking to the next moment to be better. And there's nothing but here.

When you find you're looking towards the object, whether it's a sense pleasure or a state, just turn around and see. We can learn to explore for ourselves the quality in the mind. It's not personal. It's just that the nature of craving is to crave. The nature of mindfulness is to be mindful. It's not like you are personally a failure because craving keeps coming up. It's the way things work when there's not awareness.

There are three movements in the unfolding process of insight—that's the way Bhikkhu Bodhi describes it. I find it helpful to look at this framework, especially in terms of craving, not just sense pleasures but all the cravings. The Buddha was brilliant, as Winnie said the other night. Amazing. He talks about gratification, the danger, and the escape. Our process of insight can consciously explore these three areas.

What I think is so brilliant is that he includes gratification. In terms of craving and in terms of how it strengthens into grasping, I'm sure you're aware he talks about four areas where we really get involved in grasping and don't recognize it. The obvious first one is sense pleasures.

The next one is views and opinions, and this is huge. Views in Pali is diṭṭhi. As you know, right view or wise view, sammā diṭṭhi, is the first step of the Eightfold Path. Wrong view, micchā diṭṭhi, you find frequently in the suttas—like when Guy was reading that sutta where the Buddha was saying "you misguided man." I forget exactly what it was about, but that would have been addressing wrong view.

But attachment to any view, even right view—attachment to it leads us into delusion because of the narrowing, distorting quality that attachment brings to consciousness. Beyond views in general, there's sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the personality view or identity view. And the third area of grasping is attachment to rites and rituals, or thinking that if I do a certain thing in a certain way, that will bring me peace. This was prevalent in the Buddha's time when, for example, many Hindu Brahmins thought that if they bathed in a particular river, that would wash away all their previous bad actions, all their previous bad karma. That kind of rite and ritual. So none of us think anything like that, do we?

The Buddha talks about this: "Before my enlightenment, while I was still a Bodhisatta, it occurred to me: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger in the world? What is the escape from the world? Then it occurred to me: Whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, this is the gratification in the world."

I love that, because as Guy said in his first talk, when the Buddha talked about happiness, there is happiness of sense pleasures, of being with family, even the happiness of higher states. There's gratification in all of that. Sometimes we try to jump over this and think that to let go of craving means we must be almost afraid of the pleasant. Either we love craving or we're afraid of it and we're afraid of the pleasant. But no—there's gratification, and we need to recognize that. We shouldn't pretend it's not gratification or that there's something wrong with us if we're gratified. If we get into that denial, we're just getting further and further away from seeing. We have to allow, with awareness, that there's gratification.

"That the world is impermanent, bound up with unreliability and subject to change—this is the danger in the world. And the abandoning of desire and lust for the world—this is the escape from the world."

The world, you know—he's really talking about the six sense experiences, because that's all we can ever experience. He's not saying hate everything and get away from it. He's really saying the abandoning of the desire, the craving, the taṇhā, for experience. And again, when we hear this we think, "But that's like pushing everything away. That's renunciation. What would life be? Some dull, gray mass of nothing?"

That's not what it is. When things are seen accurately, when the danger is seen accurately, the craving naturally releases because it doesn't make sense anymore. And what we're left with, as I said before, is peace.

There's a quotation from Nisargadatta. He says: "Do not be afraid of freedom from desire and fear. It enables you to live a life so different from all you know, so much more alive and interesting, that truly by seeming to lose all, you gain all." It's just a different kind of happiness that the craving mind can't know.

So the danger really is not that there's gratification—that's fine. The danger is that we rely on the gratification. Of course we attach to it, we don't know it's going to change. We're all aware of that; we've talked about it a lot. Even though intellectually we know it, and intellectually we also know that even though we know it we still go ahead and grasp at stuff that we know is going to change, right? Like that mental state you had that was so pleasant earlier. Or the chocolate cake, or your relationship, or your body not hurting tonight.

The danger in the gratification is that if we're not mindful, if we're not simply aware of how the gratification functions, we really fall into it, we rely on it. In the deluded mind fed by craving, that becomes the only way we know to be happy. That's the seduction of craving, as I've said before: "Just follow me, it'll make you happy." And it distorts our perception.

Just with sense pleasures—haven't you noticed that when you really have that thirst for something, the mind's eye, the perception of it, makes it seem so much better than it ever really is? Say you have a piece of cake from three days ago stashed in your room. Already it's disgusting, right? Stashed in your room. You're craving, craving, craving. Finally you go back and eat it. Does it come up to expectations? How many fantasies have you had since you've been here about future great things that are going to happen?

They're great, aren't they? I mean, it's all going to be wonderful.

One time on retreat—I can't say I kept track of all my fantasies, that would be ridiculous—but there were a few that kept coming. And I really kept thinking, "When I go back to this situation, it's going to be like this. And it'll be so great." Or, "Oh no, no, it's going to be like this." And I finally realized that no matter how many fantasies I had, how many different ones, the one thing I knew was it wouldn't be like any of them. And that's true. You can never know how it's going to be. It may be better, but mostly it doesn't live up to the promise craving tells us. We just don't notice that.

The Tibetans have a great saying that craving puts feathers on the object, dresses it up, makes it look just so wonderful. You know when you have a crush on somebody—just the most fascinating person, until the crush goes away, right? "What was I thinking?

That person? No, no, no. They must have done something different. They must have really changed." Perception, recognition—completely unreliable, but we totally believe our perception. So the danger is we really believe the seduction of craving.

I was having a little discussion with a very wise friend. We were talking about craving, sort of joking around. He really likes cookies, this guy. Just a couple of cookies in the afternoon. Very restrained, very balanced, but got to have two cookies in the afternoon. So we were together joking about this, and he said, "There's no suffering in this. There's a desire. I see it. I eat my cookie. It's really good. And then the desire is gone and I'm happy. Where's the suffering in that?" And that's how it works, isn't it?

I said, "Yeah, you don't have to deal with the suffering until you can't get a cookie."

And he goes, "Oh, I can always get a cookie."

That's exactly where we're caught, whatever it is. Substitute whatever for cookie—and not just sense pleasures, but states of mind, the way our life's going to be, views and opinions, all of that, how I'm going to be a better person, whatever it is.

But we don't have to get rid of the cookie either. He doesn't have to stop eating cookies. Instead, just turn around and notice when that quality of craving is in our minds. Turn around and explore it. Not to get rid of it, but to see: what's the freedom from craving? It's not that we have to get rid of all the cookies in the world—we'd probably just crave more. What's the freedom from craving? Just turn around and say, "Oh, craving's like this." Explore it. How does it feel in the body? What's the effect in the mind? Does it actually feel like a wholesome, happy state? Does it feel like a suffering state?

Look for yourself, because it doesn't matter a damn if you believe what I say. It's only when awareness sees things as they are. Like—uh-uh. The craving. We're walking along, things are very peaceful, and up into the mind it pops: "If I go down to tea a little bit early, maybe I can get the good seat."

How relaxed is the rest of your walking? You're still just walking. "No, no, I'm renouncing. I'm renouncing the seat." You may renounce the seat, but that doesn't matter if you don't turn around and look at the craving. We can renounce the seat and walk back and forth with steam coming out of our ears from craving and not notice it.

So turn around. Craving's like this—sensations in the body, constriction in the mind. That's how it is for me. You look for you. And it's just like this. And that's okay. You can be with it. Mental state, physical expression—there's nothing but mental states and physical phenomena, nāma and rūpa. That's all that's ever happening. It can be craving or it can be joy or it can be boredom. It really doesn't matter. Awareness is just noticing that. That's okay.

At some point, I promise, at some point, if you're just walking with it, the craving will dissolve—because everything does. I'm not saying it won't come back, but it will dissolve. Just keep walking after it dissolves. Not "Oh yes, I got rid of craving! I'm so great." That's a new one. But just keep noticing how it feels when it dissolves. It's like, "Ahh, now it's nice."

Now if we could just notice—why is it nice? Not "How can I capitalize on it?" But just, now it's nice. Because it's peaceful. Why is it peaceful? Because craving isn't present. It's the craving that narrows and constricts. As the Buddha said, craving and aversion are makers of measurement.

And I can actually feel how the mind—you know, that meditation this morning, that moving in the direction of just the vastness, the limitlessness, just the potential of not feeling anything to do with space or boundaries—did you notice how when wanting something comes in, there's fixation? That's the word the Tibetans use. Grasping. And we do. It's like contraction, expansion, contraction, expansion. Kind of like the movement of life, isn't it? But just notice that. Just notice how it feels. Notice how it functions when craving is in the mind.

And have you ever noticed when you want something, how it affects the way you perceive other people? Other things become obstacles in the way.

I've used this example before, but it's a good one. I was on a plane—I fly a lot—and we were just loading. I always sit on the aisle, and it was an overnight flight. I can never sleep on overnight flights, so I'm always really wasted when I get there, and I don't like it. So I was sitting in my seat on the aisle, and the planes are always crowded these days. People were coming and coming, and it was getting pretty close to when the doors were going to close. I suddenly noticed that I was in a row with nobody else.

I went from just sitting there, la la la, to "Oh, I'm in a row with nobody else." And the craving really came—I could lie down if no one comes. That would make such a difference. And my mind just went like that. What had been—I was a little spaced out, but relatively peaceful before—then it was tight and contracted. And every new person who started walking down the aisle... "No, keep going, keep going, keep going. Thank God." Every single person.

I couldn't relax. Each person became the enemy. Oh, they went by—okay, may you be happy. Oh, no, another potential enemy. I wish I were exaggerating.

I did, though—and this is one of the joys of practicing mindfulness—I did actually notice what I was doing, what the mind was doing, and the suffering of it. Not in the sense of "Oh, you're a bad person," but rather, "This is really suffering. This is the suffering of wanting." And so I really did start actually just noticing it, noticing my contraction, and doing metta to the people who came in a real way—not the kind of bypass where I'm pretending, but genuinely shifting, changing the channel.

And I honestly don't remember whether I got to lie down or not. Probably not, because you never do. But I like it that I don't remember, because it means I really did shift the channel in that moment.

That's a good example, I think, of a very simple experience and how craving completely changes the dynamic of how we perceive experience and how we feel. It feels lousy. We overlook that. When we get what we want, we feel great, so then we think craving is a good thing.

But the escape isn't necessarily—in fact it's got nothing to do with—getting what we want. The escape is recognizing what's happening with mindfulness and wisdom at the place where it's arising in the mind right now. And often the craving just dissolves. Even if it doesn't, there's that unhooking of it being about me. Because craving is, of course, always about me. That's really the delusion that's the source of all the suffering.

And mindfulness-wisdom of craving is like this: in that moment, I've just recognized it as another arising experience, and the suffering of it being about me is gone. The narrowing is gone. It's just what it is. In that moment, there's a moment of freedom from craving—a heart and mind of non-clinging. That's the direction of escape.

But the habits are so deep. The Buddha talks about this in that sutta—I'm sure many of you are aware of it—the teaching of the two darts, where he describes how a person is hit with a dart, like an arrow, and it hurts. That's one dart, and that's just normal. But then an unawakened person gets all upset, cries, beats their breast, laments, becomes completely distraught. That's like shooting yourself with a second dart. And that's what we're always doing—shooting ourselves with a second dart. An awakened person, they're shot with the first dart and then they just don't create anything around it.

But this part I find really interesting, as the Buddha goes on talking about the unawakened person: "Having been touched by that painful feeling, he resists and resents that painful feeling." And we do this, right? "No, this shouldn't be here." And so in a person who resists painful feeling, the underlying tendency of resistance comes to underlie the mind. It becomes a habit, a tendency.

And under the impact of that painful feeling, he then proceeds to look for, to enjoy, sensual happiness. Why does he do so? Because an untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness.

That just touches me. It's so poignant. It explains a world where when something is unpleasant, we don't know any other way out except to go get something pleasant right now. And the stronger we want it, the more we're going to be completely disregarding the effects it has on us, on others. We just think, "I've got to get that pleasant thing right now to escape this painful feeling."

So in him who enjoys sensual happiness, the underlying tendency to lust for pleasant feelings comes to underlie his mind. He does not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—nor the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings. So in him who lacks that knowledge, the underlying tendency to ignorance as to neutral feelings comes to underlie his mind. When he experiences a pleasant feeling, a painful feeling, or a neutral feeling, he feels as if fettered by it, chained by it—as though we're the victims of these feelings.

I don't know, that just really speaks to me. And I feel such sadness for the habits of so many people in the world. At the same time, I feel so immensely grateful that we all have had the possibility to see that there is actually another way—that we have a path, that we have a possibility. That the way out of the suffering, the resistance to painful feelings, isn't just to mindlessly follow craving. And that craving might be for chocolate cake or for sex or for concentration or for enlightenment or for violence or for whatever.

But following the craving is just that habit.

The willingness, the ability—which comes from wisdom and faith and energy and all the factors—you all have it, you know. Tons of it. You've been here all this time. That willingness to go, "Whoa, what's happening right now?" That willingness to say maybe the mindfulness, the wisdom, the willingness to just turn around and look at what's happening in the mind now. That the way out of this confusion isn't by rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic, but by cultivating, by allowing the quality of mind to become pure. Not to feed the craving, not to feed the aversion, but to actually feed the awareness, the mindfulness. And that's just by our willingness to turn around and meet what's happening. That's all. That's all we have to do—over and over and over and over.

The wisdom really grows by itself, which is so amazing. If you feel like you have to create the wisdom—no, we can't. That's more wanting. Wanting gets so subtle on this level. Bhava tanha, craving for states, craving for wisdom and thinking, "I'm the one who should do it." No, we don't have to. It's actually a huge relief. You just notice what's happening, notice what's happening. The mind goes, "Oh, but if I do this..." Oh, that feels like craving. How does that feel? Just feel it. Notice it. Notice it in the body. Notice it in the mind. Notice the thoughts it sends up. Notice how you can't stand it. Notice how that passes. Notice how the whole thing passes. And then there's a moment of peace, of wakefulness. Then there's a moment of boredom. Then there's a new craving. But it's a new one. And it doesn't matter. It's just another arising experience we can meet with awareness.

So that's the escape, really. And in terms of what the Buddha talked about there—the gratification, danger, and escape in terms of the feelings, in terms of vedana—I just want to say a word about that. We've talked about it a lot, and a lot of you talk about it. I know you're aware of the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality. Remember, as vedana, as Sally talked about, it's one of the aggregates. It's a mental quality.

So when there's any sense experience—hearing, for instance—consciousness just knows hearing. The perception would be "bell." That's just the memory of what comes up. If I rang the bell, it would be "bell." But the vedana isn't something that the sound possesses. It's not a thing in the object. It's a felt quality in the mind. It's really an activity in the mind, almost like a subtle movement, almost of liking or disliking or neutrality. And experiencing it like that—by the time we've said or labeled "pleasant," "unpleasant," "neutral"—that's actually perception again. The perception of "that was unpleasant."

I know for myself, in the way we talk about it—"oh, that's an unpleasant sound," "this is a pleasant taste," "this is an unpleasant sensation"—it's as if it's a quality that's possessed by that object, forgetting that it's actually an activity, a very subtle activity in the mind, arising with each sense contact, with each perception. I say this because when we realize we're getting into a whole reaction based on pleasant or based on unpleasant—but let's stick with pleasant since we're talking about tanhā. As I was saying, there's nothing wrong with the pleasant experience, but turn around and notice how much of pleasant experience that we crave—what we're really craving is that pleasant feeling.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa again says, really start to notice pleasant feeling and how—he says 95% of all the decisions you make in your life are about how to get more pleasant feeling, or are based on moving towards the pleasant feeling. And then turn around and look at that feeling, that sense in the mind itself. It's so incredibly ephemeral. It's like so nothing.

When I look at it, how can it keep creeping in that I'm basing so much—and I'm not just going on this because Buddhadasa said it—basing so much of my decisions on this? Or when I get caught in craving, the mind leaning towards... I was talking the other night about trying to practice and ever so subtly trying to just make it a little better. That's all about pleasant feeling. But when you actually get it better, don't stay in the object. Turn around and notice the pleasant feeling. It's like that. It's just gone, gone, gone, gone.

I was on this last retreat, and it was some personality thing—I don't even remember what. Feeling bad about myself, blah, blah, blah. I was just noticing the feelings in the story; I wasn't so much in the story. And then there was a shift. I said, "Oh, I feel better about myself." And then I thought, well, what's wrong with feeling better about myself? Because then came the thought, "No, you shouldn't. It's not about feeling better about yourself." So what's wrong with feeling better about myself? Nothing. It's pleasant. There's nothing wrong with feeling better about ourselves. It's not like we prove anything by being filled with self-hatred.

But then I saw the place is not to stop there. Let me explore the actual pleasant feeling of feeling better about myself. And it's like nothing. Okay, so I felt better about myself. Pleasant feeling gone. Next moment. Do I want to spend my whole life trying to rearrange my thoughts so I can feel better about myself, in pursuit of pleasant feeling? No.

I'm not saying we don't want to shift our habits of self-hatred or harming ourselves. I'm not saying that at all. I'm saying let's just not stop there. Say, okay, good enough. Keep exploring. Explore how much of pleasant feeling is running. Are we getting caught in craving? Just stop and look at what it is. Maybe you'll look at it and go, "Yeah, this is great. It's worth running my life on." Maybe you'll say, "I can't even find it. What the heck is she talking about?" But just have a look. Have a look and see.

And then see when there's just the peace of it—it can be pleasant, it can be unpleasant, it can be neutral. We all have moments like that. Again, not so much noticing the object, but notice that quality of non-reactivity, of wakeful stillness in the mind that's not to-ing and fro-ing, needing any experience to make itself okay.

Well, I just want to mention sakkāya-diṭṭhi. I can't go through all the four kinds of grasping, but sakkāya-diṭṭhi is personality view. And it's basically—well, view is really when we take any perception. A perception is just a recognition, right? Like, that's a bell. I'm talking.

You look at me, you go, "that's Carol." If your perception is distorted by wanting or greed or delusion, you might look and go, "who is that?" Or you think you see me, but it's really Sally or something like that—there was just a distortion. The perception was inaccurate. This happens all the time.

Well, what we perceive—and this is from the Buddha—what we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we get all confused with assumptions and comparisons, and this is what turns into papañca, all this whole story that we make up. And then from that story, we develop a view: "This is really how it is." We attach to that view, and from that view, we then act. Politics is a great example of that—I'm not going to go into politics, but we think my view is right and that one's wrong.

What I love to play with is to see when perception arises, what comes from the perception, and then when you see the perception is really wrong and what comes from that—it just shakes up the solidity. And I love that.

So I'll give you a simple example. When I was in Burma, at the monastery where I was staying, there's one place where there's a big Bodhi tree—the kind of tree the Buddha sat under—in a big well, and there's a path walking up to it. So I was walking up the path, and I saw a nun walking around with her hands like this. My first thought was that this was that gesture of respect they always do, toward Buddha statues and toward people. So it was a kind of reverence, and I thought she was probably just respectfully circumambulating the Bodhi tree. My first perception was that, and it was pleasant. I thought, "Oh, isn't that lovely? There's so much faith here."

And then my mind kept running. This turned into papañca. I thought, "But it's just a tree. I mean, it's not even the tree the Buddha sat on. It's just a tree. So she's walking around this tree—is faith like that really useful? How do I feel about that kind of faith?" And this whole thing unfolded, and it was getting unpleasant. "How do I even feel about this country, this culture?"

And I kept walking up. I got up to her. She was texting.

So first, I really loved it. I laughed. Then my mind goes, "What's a nun doing texting?" Then I went off into a whole other thing. And this is saṃsāra. This is what we're doing all the time. This is how we're creating—and I can't go into it anymore because time is running short—but that's how we're creating the sense of self, moment after moment after moment. Some perception comes up, a sensation in the knee, and the mind goes, "My knee is killing me." And from that, whichever way it goes, all of that is what's called sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view.

As Buddhadāsa said, the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind. That's all. It arises when the clinging is present; when the clinging evaporates, so does the sense of self. It arises many, many times in a day. Because we don't look, we assume a steady state. But it's coming and going all the time.

So I'll just leave you with that, to explore.

How is it different for a Buddha? He explains in his own words—I like this a lot—with perception, the way a Buddha is different is he doesn't add anything extra.

This is the Buddha speaking:

"Thus, Bhikkhus, the Tathagata does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight."

There is seeing—not "me seeing that." Just seeing. That's what's happening.

"He does not conceive of an unseen. He does not conceive of a thing to be seen. He does not conceive about a seer."

And he goes through this with sounds, with all the sense doors, including the mind:

"He does not conceive of a cognizable thing as apart from cognition. He does not conceive of something uncognized. He does not conceive of a thing worth cognizing. He does not conceive about one who cognizes."

And then he says:

"Thus, Bhikkhus, the Tathagata is suchlike in regard to all phenomena—seen, heard, sensed, and cognized."

It's just this. Nothing else. It's so simple we can't stand it. The mind wants more.

I'll end with this lovely poem I'm sure you've heard, from the Japanese nun Tōgitsu:

Tōgitsu saw that a rising arose, abided, and fell away.
She saw that knowing this arose, abided, and fell away.
Then she knew there was nothing more than this.
No ground, nothing to lean on stronger than the cane she held,
Nothing to lean on at all, and no one leaning.
And she opened the clenched fist in her mind
And let go
And fell into the midst of everything.

CHAPTER 88

Emptiness and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential unity of emptiness (suññatā) and compassion (karuṇā), warning against the spiritual pitfall of 'falling into emptiness' where insight into not-self (anattā) becomes disconnected from responsive engagement with life. Drawing on teachings from Nyoshul Khenpo, Nāgārjuna, the Dalai Lama, and Padmasambhava, she explains how genuine understanding of emptiness naturally expresses as compassionate action, while compassion without wisdom leads to despair or burnout.
>
> Wilson uses the image of Green Tārā—seated in deep meditation yet with one foot ready to respond—to illustrate how equanimity and compassionate responsiveness are not opposites but complementary aspects of awakened mind. She emphasizes that in moments of pure presence, harmful intentions simply cannot arise, making ethical behavior a natural expression rather than imposed discipline. The talk explores how opening to our own suffering with acceptance becomes the doorway to genuine empathy with all beings.
>
> Through stories of Martin Luther King Jr., Aung San Suu Kyi, civil rights leader John Lewis, and her own teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Wilson demonstrates how this integration manifests in daily life. She offers practical guidance: rather than trying to act compassionately from outside in, we cultivate understanding from within, trusting that wisdom and compassion develop together through sincere, moment-to-moment awareness practice.

So tonight I want to talk about the unity of emptiness and compassion.

We've been talking a lot about the quality of awareness or of mind—to use Guy's way of talking about mind—as this naturally knowing nature: natural knowing, this sense of naturally awake, and also being empty of any intrinsic, lasting self-existence.

Another way of talking about that emptiness is anatta or not-self, which we've been alluding to all along in the way that we point to how mindfulness simply notices whatever arises. Whatever arises also passes and is not, as the Buddha said, fit to be considered me or mine. Or another way we've talked about it, a phrase I often use, is: awareness doesn't care.

Now those aspects, that way of talking about the nature of mind or emptiness or not-self, can sometimes not be so appealing to people. Sometimes there can be a reaction—well, what is this? If awareness doesn't care, is it just some kind of cold, gray void of emptiness, or a sense almost of an alienating kind of experience? If awareness doesn't care, what's the point of being aware of everything to get to the point where you don't care about anything? Is that what the culmination of our Buddhist practice is about?

Of course not. But sometimes an incomplete understanding of emptiness or not-self can seem like a deep understanding. We can have deep insights into emptiness, into the no intrinsic lasting self-existence of anything, or the ephemeral nature of all the sense experiences. Nothing happening, as Guy was saying last night, but the six sense experiences over and over and over and over. After a while, it's like it doesn't really matter which one's happening. They're all just coming and going. Sayadaw U Pandita said to me once—I must have been complaining—"So what do you want, different objects to note?" Basically, it doesn't matter.

So on that level, that's an incomplete understanding of emptiness, because the third aspect of the nature of mind, the nature of knowing, is that the pure heart-mind in a moment is also, as the Tibetans say, ceaselessly responsive. In a moment of wisdom, the pure mind and heart, when confronted with the need to respond, the natural expression is either compassion if it's in the face of suffering, metta if it's just a sense of connection, mudita if it's joy, equanimity if it's something that there's nothing one can do about, or just calm, just wisdom.

But it's actually not uncommon to do what Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche called "falling into emptiness," where we can intellectually or even experientially have a deep understanding or experience of not-self, of emptiness, of the sense that awareness doesn't care, and think that's the whole picture.

I want to read this from Nyoshul Khenpo, who was a really wonderful Tibetan master. He's talking about this danger: "We hear too much too soon. We think we have understood shunyata, emptiness. We err on the side of the absolute in a nihilistic fashion and are obscured by concepts."

This is really easy. The experience of no intrinsic self-existence can so easily slide into a very subtle conceptual overlay about it. We think it's still the experience, but it's thinking about it. And that's very different.

Nagarjuna—this is Khenpo again—said: "It is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness. Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practice, through the ways of skillful means. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge, since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do."

It's very subtle, but we can quite fall in. Or as Nagarjuna said in Stephen Batchelor's translation: "Buddhas say emptiness is relinquishing opinions. Believers in emptiness are incurable." The difference between belief and our actual experience—what's so fascinating is how subtle that difference can be. This is what we would call falling into emptiness, and it's not a complete picture.

This third aspect, ceaselessly responsive, which is usually described as compassion, connection, tenderness for beings, an appropriate response—this is really the necessary counterpart. Compassion and emptiness go together. One without the other is not holistic, not a whole understanding. They have to really support one another.

To me, it's easy intellectually to understand how the experience, the understanding of emptiness, of not-self—this sense even in a moment of release from this obsessive, exhausting self-referencing of every experience—how that naturally leads to compassion. I mean, this self-referencing takes a lot of energy, doesn't it? Have you noticed how exhausting it really is? And in those moments when it's not happening, so many people say, "Oh my God, it's such a relief." There's just space to notice something else other than "what about me?" There's lots of other things to notice too.

So there's so much energy just naturally available in the mind stream, in the physical and mental experience, when it's not all bound up in this relentless, obsessive self-referencing. That energy naturally expresses in doing the obvious, whatever is appropriate for the welfare of beings, whatever being happens to be right in front of us.

Sogyal Rinpoche gives a great description of this relentless self-referencing. He talks about how in Tibet, when you're going to start to construct a house, when you lay the footprint, the foundation, they start from a center point and have a long rope or something, like a yardstick, and then from the center point measure all the way around to get the circumference of the footprint for the foundation. He said, in a way, that's the original yardstick for samsara, this original measuring point for samsara. It always starts from the sense—not the idea, but the sense—of me here now. I'm the center of it. And from this felt sense, not even an idea but this felt sense of me, everything is measured in samsara.

I'm seeing, I'm hearing, I'm seeing that person walking. This happens over there, but it's seen from this angle. You know what I mean? It just seems natural to us.

And then, on the occasional—or less occasional and more common, the more we pay attention—you start to notice the moments when it isn't all from that particular angle. Like, oh. It doesn't have to be from that. And when it's not all measured from me, me, me, me, me, huge other perceptions are available and appropriate response can naturally arise. We can see the whole situation in a much clearer, more balanced way. We're still part of it, but we're not the center of everything. And all assessments aren't made by what does it mean for me.

This is just a natural effect of a moment of experience or understanding—either the not-self sense or just the natural arising and passing of phenomena, the sense of contingency. Everything arising, as I said in the first talk, that yathā-bhūta understanding of things as they have come to be in this moment, the effect of innumerable conditions and causes. We couldn't even list them all. If you want to list the causes of your sitting here now, it's endless. We'd have to go back to the Big Bang. It's endless. And then the effect keeps on going out and out too.

When we're not the center, there are so many other perceptions available. And this is what maybe you know and trust, and maybe you don't yet, and maybe you think it's not true. But my real deep faith and personal experience, as far as it goes, is that the natural result, the natural manifestation of the pure mind and heart—of the mind that's not colored by kilesa, the mind that's not seeing from the point of me—the natural response of that manifestation, that moment of pure mind, is one of compassionate attention, natural response to what needs to be done. It's not that we have to go out and create it. It's the natural effect of seeing that it really isn't all about me.

Because what does being about me create? Wanting and fear and needing to protect and needing to prove. Well, you know the whole deal. You've been sitting here looking at it for a month. You know all too well. It's just a misperception.

On the other hand, though, the ceaselessly responsive quality of compassion, this tenderness for beings including ourselves, this natural responding to ease suffering or to do whatever's appropriate—this also needs the balance of wisdom. Compassion without wisdom, without the wisdom of equanimity, without the wisdom of not-self, of the vastness, of the "mindfulness doesn't care," without the wisdom of seeing that it's not about our preferences—that's when we get lost. Either we don't have the clarity, the big enough picture to act appropriately (not that we always will anyway), or that's when we drown in the suffering. Because I'm not big enough to hold it.

We can have an idea about wanting to help, about wanting to be present with my own suffering or with others, about wanting to do good. But the idea not supported by the wisdom and the reality of how things are can't take us far enough. At some point we get lost.

Here's one way to describe this. I heard on the radio—I think I mentioned this last year—they were talking about the economic meltdown of the last couple of years and about a particular economic policy. I'm no economist, but this policy of rational self-interest. Well, we all know how well that's been working in terms of the banks and the stock market. But that was actually, apparently, a really thought-out policy.

The example that was given, and I'm assuming it's true, was of a footbridge built recently in London over the Thames. Some big footbridge, and when it was first opened with a lot of fanfare and there were hundreds of people walking on it, rather to the embarrassment of the builders, it was really shaking from all the people. Too many people were on it. And I guess it was kind of tilting to one side—not really a great thing.

So the people on it, each person acted—this was the example of rational self-interest—trying to do the best thing, but from me, where the center is me. It was tilting to one side, so people moved to the other. But they all moved to the other. And so since everybody, all four hundred people moved to the other side, the bridge just crashed over the other way.

That's like a sense of trying to do the right thing but seeing only from my perspective. There's not the wisdom, there's not the vastness to see more accurately a bigger picture.

He says, when we know that people's suffering is avoidable, our empathy for their inability to extricate themselves leads to an even more powerful compassion. But if that's not balanced with the vastness of emptiness, we really can fall into a quality of hopelessness, of despair. Can you relate to that? Sometimes it's not even thinking people's suffering is avoidable, but just the vastness of how much suffering there is in this world. When I'm trying to process all that, I can't. Really, if I think I should be able to fix it, or I should be able to be present in the midst of all of it without flinching away—it's easy to fall into despair.

So you can see how the two naturally balance, but they are two sides of the same thing. The wisdom of not-self, of emptiness, and the ceaseless responsive quality of compassion—both need each other for the vastness and the profound nature of them. Luckily, through our practice, they do grow together. I just want to talk a little bit about each of them and their balancing.

Recently, I was in Fairfax early in this retreat, and I was early for a meeting I had with somebody. So I was just hanging out in this little Tibetan store there, and they were playing the Om Mani Padme Hum chant. It was very peaceful and pleasant being in there, so I hung around longer than I normally would. In the back, they had lots of different statues—different Taras and Buddhas and this and that. I've seen a million statues. I don't usually buy stuff like that at all. But this one green Tara just really spoke to me.

Green Tara is one of the manifestations, the expression of wisdom and compassion, of compassionate action—the green Tara woman, a Tibetan manifestation of compassion. I just loved it, but it was expensive and I didn't buy it. I went away and thought about it, and it kept coming up for a few days, so I went back and bought it. I have it now sitting in the teacher room.

I didn't really think it through very much—I just liked it. But now I've been looking at it every day, and I realize what I like about it. Well, what my mind's projecting into it, right? It's a statue. But what I like about it is that, to me, this particular statue really does manifest this union of equanimity, this serenity of emptiness, the wisdom of that, with the capacity to respond as appropriate.

If you know the iconography, the green Tara is sitting in meditation, but one foot is resting on a lotus so that when there's some compassionate action that needs to happen, she can just stand up right away and go do it. But it's not like a woman sitting there all leaning forward, "Okay, is there something I can do? Let me go help." It's completely serene—like in deep meditation, no sense at all of being pulled out or bothered by anything. A little bit the way Guy described Buddha Dasa last night: really present, but everything's just coming and going in the field. And the eyes are open, so it's also not this sense of meditation where we pull in and the world's a little bit of a bother. No separation—that's really what I get out of it. The deep compassion, the deep serenity and peace of emptiness, with the foot out to respond when it's appropriate. But not looking for trouble either. I really like that sense of balance.

This is from Padmasambhava, quoted from The Words of My Perfect Teacher by Patrul Rinpoche. I'm sure you've heard this before. He's talking about how the view is the most important thing—the view of emptiness, of freedom, of not-self. However, he says, do not let your actions slip in the direction of the view. If it does, you will fall into the mistaken views of demons prattling on about how goodness is empty, evil is empty. That's the same thing about falling into emptiness.

It doesn't matter what I do. Good is empty, evil is empty, everything is empty. He says don't let your actions slip in the direction of the view. But on the other hand, don't let your view slip in the direction of action either, or you will be caught in materialism and ideology.

So does that make you crazy? Then you have to like... but if you're thinking about how to do it, forget it. It's not something we think about or figure out. "Now I'm going to hold the view, but I've got to keep my actions in check." No, that's just thinking. Trust in the sincerity of our motivation and trust in awareness. The clarity and the balance of these two arise naturally if we're just paying attention.

Padmasambhava continued, and this is the famous quotation: "My view is higher than the sky, but my attention to my actions and their effects is finer than grains of barley flour."

And that's exactly what we're cultivating—the steadiness of mindful awareness, or all the different ways we talk about it. Guy was speaking today about resting in the heart and just seeing what pulls us out when we don't need to be pulled out. That's the view of emptiness. But our attention to our actions is so present and sensitive and careful—our actions and their effects.

If it's just the view—"it doesn't matter, it's all empty, whatever I do"—you just cause suffering because you don't realize... even though you didn't treat someone well, "that's your problem." That's not the view higher than the sky. So action, respect for cause and effect, remains as fine as grains of barley flour. But as I said, the natural effect of understanding emptiness is compassion.

Just a little example, if you can relate to this. The times when you've had moments—and I know you all do, many—as Guy said, just the moment of real presence, what I would call the purity of mind, heart, nothing special. Maybe it's on one of those frosty mornings and you're just standing there looking at the frost, but not with clinging, and it just brought you into a sense of... ahhh. I saw people standing like that when I was walking up the hill the other morning, and I could feel it right away. Oh yes, just this.

So that sense of just this, but with pure presence. Not wanting anything. And in those moments, you're not thinking about yourself. You're not comparing. "Is this moment of presence, is this frost as nice as it was yesterday?" It doesn't make any sense. Just this. Or you're having tea, you're taking a step, and in those moments it doesn't matter what—you know what I mean, I can see you understand.

In those moments, can you imagine doing something harmful in that space? Could the thought even arise? Just in that moment, someone walks by and you think, "Look at that jerk"? It just doesn't arise.

Sometimes people say they're afraid of opening to this awareness that doesn't care, because then what if we don't pay attention to our actions? What if we do hurt people? This is our worry mind, not coming from actually trusting the experience in that moment.

And this again is from Padmasambhava. Someone once asked him, "Once we've realized emptiness, does it still harm us to commit negative actions?" Padmasambhava says, "Once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything negative." Absurd. You can't even imagine it. The thought doesn't arise.

That's actually the beauty of it. We don't have to make ourselves perfect. The perfection is naturally part of the pure mind. We just have to learn to trust it, to recognize it, more and more and more.

How compassion manifests in terms of speech or action or thoughts is very different for each one of us, and that's a whole different question. There's not a particular way it should manifest. But notice those moments of peace, of clarity, and the fact that nothing—it's absurd to even think anything negative. And notice how that's a different experience from a subtle kind of near enemy of it, like the near enemy of equanimity, which is, "Yeah, that's right, it's pretty, everything's empty, nothing matters, it's all coming and going"—and it's just a little bit disconnected. It's like, "I don't care." It's not so much that awareness doesn't care; it's more like I don't care.

I'm not here, so I don't care, and whatever happens, I'm sorry for their suffering and I'm sorry for mine. Oh well, it'll all take care of itself in the end when the world blows up. No, that's my New York mind.

But you can feel the difference. You can feel the difference. It's both subtle and worlds apart. And we can start to notice it for ourselves and really trust the purity and the natural expression of it. It's not something we're creating with our personality or that we need to create or that we can create or that we need to hold onto. We don't need to prove we're a compassionate, good person. This is natural. Our job is just the moment-to-moment awareness that allows for perception to clear enough to actually recognize things the way they are.

In terms of our mindfulness practice here, in terms of how we live our life, it's also true that compassion as an intentional response of the mind, of the heart, is developed and cultivated by the way we pay attention. By the deliberate focusing of our thoughts on, say, the compassion practice—shifting the intention of mind from ill will or cruelty to compassion.

Here's the Dalai Lama again, talking of course about bodhicitta, which is the biggest kind of compassion—the awakened or noble heart, kinship with the suffering of all beings, that sense of motivation to awaken in order to bring freedom to all beings, to benefit all beings. That basically is compassion. And when the Dalai Lama talks about how it develops, he says it develops this empathy with beings, this deep aspect of compassion, through deep insight into what suffering is.

And guess how we get that? This is still from the Dalai Lama, not me. Guess how we get that? It arises by being present with our own experience. Nowhere else.

As we open into our own experiences of suffering—he's not saying our experiences are only suffering, but when we are experiencing suffering—that willingness and the wisdom that gives us that willingness to be present with our own suffering, then compassion naturally begins to deepen. Compassion strengthens from just being present with our own suffering to a sense of empathy and connectedness with other beings. So it moves from the personal to the universal.

I know from talking to people here and at other retreats that this is something quite a few of you have actually experienced. It's not really that esoteric. A sense of whatever your particular suffering could be—it could be a headache, it could be feeling grumpy, it could be that you're hungry, it could be really strong physical pain, whatever it is. Grief, sorrow.

And first we fight it. We do all the numbers of how to be mindful to make it go away. We know all of those tricks. And then when we finally say, okay, I'll really open to it—but still in the back of our mind—okay, if I open to it, it'll go away. Until finally there's no other option. There's nothing else you can do, and it isn't going away. You know even if you leave, it won't go away. So then the mind just has to let go and just touch it. Just touch that heart of grief or that physical pain or the aversion in the mind or the sorrow or the grumpiness, whatever it is.

There are times when just by really opening with complete self-abandonment really, surrender, tenderness into that particular suffering in whatever way it's manifesting—so often people find it's my story at first. My particular history, my memories, my physical pain, my worry about the future, whatever it is. But as the awareness just continues to touch, to be with it, often it just naturally moves into a sense of: oh, so many people in the world experience this.

And it really moves at that moment when you've really hit compassion, when actually the suffering is still there but the state of mind that's touching it is really that beautiful state, that brahma vihara of compassion. Where the personal, our personal dukkha, our personal suffering becomes like a representative of the universal. And really it always is. Each of us is just a particular conglomeration, representative of the universal. So we have our stories, but grief is the grief of the world. Physical pain, the pain of the world. Loss, sorrow, sadness, grumpiness, whatever it is. There's nothing that really only I, the only person who ever suffered this.

It feels like it. We can feel so alone in our suffering sometimes. That's actually a big thing about it. Once I was in the hospital for some days, caught up in my own little story. And then after a few days I started to open. I was in a room with three other elderly women. And I just thought, oh, look at these ladies.

They're really suffering. And then I thought, how many rooms in this hospital? How many people just in this hospital? How many hospitals in this city? How many cities with how many hospitals just in this country? I mean, it just goes on and on and on. It's mind-boggling.

And so that's not to diminish one's own suffering. Rather, it's that opening into the suffering of the world. This is really what I think the Dalai Lama is talking about—where the willingness to bear witness with courage, with kindness, to be present in the midst of our own difficulties, our own suffering, becomes the avenue into empathy with beings, the avenue into this depth of compassion.

Do you hear how in that is also the sense of not-self? It's not about a little separate self. The compassionate self naturally opens into a sense of communion with beings, not separate individuals.

In terms of our practice—and I don't just mean on retreat, but since we're talking about retreat—this is why the difficult times, the times when everything isn't going the way you think it ought to be going, are so important. We say that, and I'm sure people think, "Yeah, you just say that to keep us here, to keep us going through another day. Oh yes, that's really the best time of retreat." But it's so, so important.

Whatever's arising in this moment, as I was saying before, yatha bhuta—it's the effect of innumerable causes and conditions. It's arising right now and cannot be changed. We can't go back in a time machine and change the causes so this moment is different. It's here, it's over, it's this. You could say that's the result of past actions. But how our mind and heart meets this moment of experience right now—that's present moment action. That's the seed of present moment karma.

So the most beautiful thing could be arising, the most boring thing, the most painful suffering mental state or physical experience. When, just for that moment, it's met with the clear intention of mindfulness or compassion, just compassionate acceptance—that's what's being cultivated in the moment.

Really, it's not about getting rid of or looking for trouble either. But it's also not about trying to eliminate these unpleasant experiences so there's smooth sailing, and that becomes the proof that our practice is progressing. Rather, how the heart-mind, how the moment of mind and the factors within it, meets this moment of conditions as they arise and change and vanish—that is the path.

This moment of mindful presence, when we're not judging, when we're not putting anything extra on it, has just that quality of acceptance. It may not be what you actively feel as compassion, but it's this total accepting presence that can see clearly what is. That is both the expression of wisdom and compassion and also the further cultivation, the further development of wisdom and compassion—just that ability. We can't always do it, but the willingness to surrender into this moment with clarity and without fighting. It's what we've been talking about the whole time, so I don't have to elaborate. But to recognize that this is both the manifestation of wisdom and compassion and also the further development of it.

As Ajahn Sumedho said once, years ago, the suffering of our life, our normal life, is all we need to be enlightened with. And I would say it's all we need for the development of deep compassion. We don't have to think we need to save the world. I mean, it would be nice if we could. Even the Buddha couldn't save the world. We do what we do, which is our own particular path. But how this moment is being met, what's the quality of consciousness meeting this moment—that's really the place where all the awakening and all the confusion is happening, right here.

Retreats are so important, and we don't always get a good sign saying, "Great, you met this moment with wisdom and compassion. Good, you're that much further along." Unfortunately, we often don't even know. You can be in those spaces—I've talked to people about it, and I've shared that I've been there too—where you're just in some psychological or physical suffering. It seems like it's going on and on. You recognize it, you can see your mind getting caught, you can see how it's getting caught. And it's still getting caught. You can feel that it's caught, and you're getting aversive to the fact that it's caught, and you're getting despairing that it's caught. Then you get up and go through another day, and it started out okay, but then here it is, caught again. And you think, "Why am I doing this? What is the purpose of this? This is insane." It feels like you're spiraling downward. We get so lost in the reaction to getting caught.

And you also can't chalk up every moment of mindfulness. You don't really know how many moments there's actually mindfulness and compassion meeting it, because it still feels lousy. You don't think, "Great, that was a moment of compassion with this being caught. Good, one score on the compassion side. Okay, three strokes on the getting caught side." It doesn't work like that. You're in it, you're in it, you're in it. For six weeks, you're in it.

Who knows how long? And then, like for me, sometimes I'd come out, and you don't come out and go, "Oh, now I see—I've burned through that one." You don't. But somehow later you realize... you know what? When this comes up, it's got a lot more holes in it. It's a lot more transparent. It's not catching me so much. And you can't say when that happened. But the quality of wisdom and compassion has developed so much just by that willingness to keep showing up.

We don't get self-confirmation because it's not about self-confirmation. It's about the abandoning of the need for self-confirmation. That quote from Dogen that I've already said two or three times that I love: you may not necessarily know about your own enlightenment because it's not a self-confirmation process.

This sense of how we pay attention—I think James said this from the Buddha: whatever one frequently thinks about and dwells upon will become the inclination of the mind. So when you're noticing getting caught, you're just noticing all the negative. But you're not noticing how often what the mind is dwelling upon is mindfulness, is acceptance, is really some level of compassion and wisdom—because we're so selective in our perception toward what we don't like. Notice these others. That's what Guy was saying last night too.

And so we don't need to look for huge experiences. And it is a real exercise—well, you see how hard this practice is—an exercise in moment-to-moment trust and faith, not just on retreat but in our whole life. I keep trying to point all of us to recognize these moments of intrinsic purity, of freedom, of goodness—and that compassion and love and wisdom naturally arise without our having to do it. We keep pointing to that because it really takes a great deal of faith, of confidence in the truth, in your own understanding, to keep on showing up.

You see how hard it is here, and it only gets harder in our daily life where so much stuff is bombarding us. And so to have the confidence—okay, I just have to meet this. I don't have to fix it all. But to keep showing up, and trust that the wisdom and compassion are continuing to develop. It takes a lot of confidence because life is sometimes so hard.

And in terms of our best ideas about acting in a compassionate way in the world—I would imagine, without knowing everybody, just people that are dedicating their lives to awakening, to practice, as you are here—basically, you're pretty decent people. Pretty much the people that can spend this amount of time here, you know, you like compassion. You're into love. You'd like to help people. We have a deep commitment. But as we see, the mind is not so tractable sometimes. And the world doesn't always go along with our plans. I don't know if you noticed that. The world tends to not behave—never mind the world, other people—tend to not behave in the way that we would like them to.

And so with the best of intentions to act, to really do good, to act from compassion towards ourselves, towards others—if we don't keep finding in ourselves, keep coming back to our motivation, our internal motivation, and the faith and confidence that feeds it, and the wisdom that feeds it, it's just really easy to get sidetracked.

So basically what I'm saying is that compassion, supported by wisdom, really needs to come from the inside out. It's a matter of our deepest motivation and intention arising from wisdom, rather than trying to figure out how to act what we think should be the compassionate way to act and then trying to do it. We have to work first at really cultivating, really seeing how compassion comes from our understanding, from our deep inner intentions.

We see in the world all the time where activists or people who are really trying to do good end up getting really bitter, or there's so much arguing about different views—even though both views come from people that want to help. But so much attachment to views, and the mental states that can get fed by that, are ones of anger and hatred and really fighting with each other. It can really get out there. You know, when people who are anti-abortion—so they're pro-life, right? Everyone else is anti-life, but they're pro-life—and then people who are pro-life kill doctors who perform abortions. It's like, you know, it's crazy.

We can sit here and say it's crazy, but that way of "I really want to help" and getting so fastened onto the view and missing the fact that our intention has changed, that it's not really compassion—in the moment, it's actually anger. And this is where our willingness to be present with our own suffering without blame, but with this level of honesty, of integrity with our experience—this is what the practice requires. This is what all of you are doing all the time. We wish it were otherwise, but actually it's like this. This is how I'm really feeling. That is wisdom.

And so it takes this real commitment—a commitment to honesty and compassion, and purifying our own heart and mind and intentions.

Let me read a couple of examples that really inspire me. One is Martin Luther King, who says it so clearly: "Nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence, but also internal violence of the spirit."

You not only refuse to shoot a man, you refuse to hate him. That's the level of real compassion, of real clarity of intention.

Or Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, who said she's surprised that people think she's so extraordinary, because she says, "I'm just very simple. I have very ordinary attitudes towards life. If I think there's something I should do in the name of justice or in the name of love, then I'll do it. The motivation is its own reward."

That's kind of like the Green Tara movement. You act from the clearest motivation you can, knowing that we cannot control results. We can't control how other people respond, even when we act with the clearest intention and motivation. We may not see the whole picture. And still, how do we stay open and connected? It has to come from our own understanding, our own wisdom—both of emptiness and uncontrollability—and the importance of compassion as a sense of connectedness with beings.

We can't just do it as an idea. This, again, really inspires me. It's coming from the autobiography of John Lewis, who was a congressman from Georgia for twenty-something years, representing Atlanta. But back in the early sixties, he was a student in Nashville and one of the original students who started the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. They were doing the Freedom Rides and were really committed to nonviolent action for integration. They were taught by a man named Jim Lawson, who had studied Gandhian principles of nonviolence. Very, very courageous people.

This is from his autobiography, and he's talking about what nonviolence really means to him:

"One of the most fundamental principles of the Gandhian notion of satyagraha—nonviolent action—satyagraha really means 'truth force.' And that's really what he's talking about: that it is not just a technique of achieving specific goals, it's not just a tool to achieve unity and freedom in the world around us. True satyagraha, as Gandhi taught it, is about a fundamental shift inside our own souls. It's rooted in the achievement of inner unity, of inner freedom, of inner certainty. It's a place we find within ourselves, a calm, sure place. And once found, that place is not swayed or disturbed by the thousands of details of the world around us that bombard us every day."

Doesn't that sound just like how Guy was talking about Ajahn Buddhadasa last night?

But then he's not just talking theoretically, because as I said, he was one of the freedom riders, he was beaten up often, he was really on the front lines for years of this struggle. And as he goes on, he says:

"This is a difficult concept to understand. It's even more difficult to internalize. But a heart that holds no malice towards the inflictors of his or her suffering has everything to do with the way of nonviolence. We're talking about love here—not romantic love, not the love of one individual for another, not loving something that is lovely to you. This is a broader, deeper, more all-encompassing love. It is a love that accepts and embraces the hateful and the hurtful. It is a love that recognizes the spark of the divine in each of us, even in those who we might call our enemy. This sense of love realizes that emotions of the moment and constantly shifting circumstances can cloud that divine spark in anyone. Pain, ugliness, and fear can cover it over, turning a person toward anger and hate. It is the ability to see through those layers of ugliness, to see further into a person than perhaps that person can see into himself, that is essential to the practice of nonviolence."

That level of understanding—it can't be an idea. It's really a transformation on a deep, deep level of our understanding of ourselves and the world. He's saying an ability to see deeper into a person. So it's not uniquely Buddhist, obviously. He's deeply Christian. But the truth doesn't have a label on it.

And clearly this is not an easy thing. So to come back to what I was saying earlier: we don't need to look for huge experiences to test ourselves. Moment after moment, the experiences of our life—this is where we really look. Rather than trying to be compassionate from the outside in, we start inside and let our understanding reflect in our actions.

And it can be really very simple. As the Dalai Lama said, to trust in the sincerity of one's pure motivation. The world is complex, and we don't always have all the information, and we can't control results. Can we still stay open with ourselves, with other beings, when it didn't go the way we think it should? Can we not get into blaming ourselves?

An example that comes to my mind: if you've ever been the health care proxy for someone who's aging and ill with a little dementia—which I was with my siblings, for both my parents—you have to make decisions. Even if you've talked about it with them ahead of time and you think you know all their wishes, the situation is always different, more complicated. You can't possibly go through every conceivable alternative while they still can make the decision. And then you always have to make a decision that you didn't know what it was going to be. And it always has to be in a hurry. And you have as much information as you have, but not all of it. What would they want? What would be the least suffering decision?

And you make the one that you think is most in line with their wishes, but you can't know—even doctors can't know all the medical ramifications of what's going to come from that decision.

So often we would make a decision. And the siblings have to agree—that's another thing. But we'd make the decision, and that wasn't too bad in my case; we would usually agree. And then there'd be some other medical thing that would happen, and the decision that seemed to be the most compassionate, the one that would cause the least suffering, would turn into something that added two weeks of a different kind of really seemingly unbearable suffering—suffering that wouldn't have happened if you'd made a different decision.

How do you stay present and open with compassion for yourself, with compassion for them, with compassion for the doctors, and awake in that? We can't control circumstances. It's not about getting the result we want. It's about the sincerity of our motivations. Our wisdom—the wisdom of emptiness, the wisdom of the conditionality of things—is what gives us that vastness and strength.

If it's all about me doing the kind thing, making the right decision, making it all good for somebody else, that's just not going to last very long. It's going to crash and burn as soon as things don't go right, as soon as I'm in a grumpy mood when I should be doing the compassionate thing. But when it's bolstered, supported by the understanding of not-self and the vastness of emptiness and the fact that everything's just coming and going—conditions coming together—and my decision is part of the conditions but not all of them, we can stay open. We can stay present, or more present. We show up again when we go away.

One of my teachers, Sayadaw Tejaniya—a couple of years ago, he's a character. If you met him, you wouldn't think, "Oh, what a wonderful, compassionate, loving being," the way you might with some Tibetan teachers. Tejaniya is great, but he's not like that. He's like a character. That's why I like him.

A couple of years ago, he was supposed to come to the States and Europe and do some retreats, and he canceled everything. It was because of some really weird political stuff going on in his monastery. Not just in Burma—the country has horrible politics, and it reflects sometimes in what goes on in monasteries, just so you don't get too idealistic about what can happen there.

I don't want to go into the whole thing, but basically, another abbot—Tejaniya is the main teacher, and his teacher, Shwe Oo Min, who is revered in Burma, had appointed him to be the teacher. But he wasn't the abbot. The abbot is the head monk, kind of the organizational person. He's usually the most senior monk. It's rare that the main teacher would not be the abbot.

So of course, over years, there came to be some friction. The abbot basically wanted more power, more recognition, and he started getting really weird and doing strange things—trying to get control of the money that the lay people organized, telling yogis they couldn't come, making them leave, not letting them see Tejaniya. It was just really bizarre and felt awful.

I wasn't staying there; I was staying somewhere else, but I'd go chat with Tejaniya and he'd tell us what was going on. As it got weirder and weirder, some of Tejaniya's supporters bought land nearby for him to start another place. I said, "Well, why don't you just go there?"

He said, "Shwe Oo Min, who he reveres—this is his place, and he wants me here. I'm not just going to cede it. I'm not going to abandon it as long as I can be here."

But he was hardly doing any teaching. He was just staying in his house. And the other abbot was making things really uncomfortable and negative—bad-mouthing, all kinds of bad stuff going on. The other abbot was also talking to the lay group that oversees the monastery and the senior monks, saying all this bad stuff about Tejaniya.

I said, "Why don't you go back and tell them this other stuff that's going on?"

He said, "No, I don't want to add more akusala to the situation." Akusala means unwholesome. He was just watching his mind. He said, "I'm not going to go with an unwholesome mind and bad-mouth people. I really trust that whatever needs to happen will happen."

The other thing that was interesting is he just loves watching his mind. He said, "On the other hand, it's really interesting. This is like an exam for my mind. How does my mind deal with this? With all this negativity, with all this stuff being taken away—I'm just really fascinated to see how it goes, how my mind deals."

He really couldn't leave, because if he left, the other guy would take it over. So, long story short, after some months when it was really getting bad, some senior overseers of the whole monastic system—monks up in Mandalay—came down, checked out the whole scene, and they had the power to decide: this guy or this guy.

And so just going around talking to everyone, I mean, it was obvious. So the other guy's gone, Tejani is in charge, and now he's the abbot and the whole place is completely different. But I was really impressed by that, you know—the deep motivation: "I'm not going to add more akusala to the situation." Because all he had to do was just say the truth. But going looking for people to put the guy down? That's not the same as passive indifference.

Because when the time came and the monks came to check out what was going on, he told the truth. He wasn't just giving up. It wasn't like, "Okay, never mind, I'll leave." He was staying there, but just not adding more akusala. I was quite impressed by that.

And so that quality of commitment—in whatever way it shows up in our own life, it can just be little things. It doesn't have to be an amazing, everyone's-so-impressed-with-the-compassionate-work-that-we're-doing kind of thing.

Sylvia tells a story that I really like, about herself. Some years ago, she was at a luncheon where they were all sitting at different little tables, and she was at a table with some people she didn't know. And they were just doing kind of gossip and putting down—you know, just criticizing everything and putting down other people and whatever. She's sitting there feeling uncomfortable, thinking, "What should I do? Should I join in, to kind of be part of things?" That didn't feel right. "Should I give a little rap on wise speech?" That didn't really feel like it would go over too well.

So then she did—and this is what I love, it's so simple—she just started talking, and as you know her, she just happens to be a very positive person anyway. She just started saying true but wholesome things. Like, "Oh, this chicken salad's really quite tasty, isn't it?" You know, little simple stuff. But wholesome. Wholesome and true. And she said in not that long a time, it really changed the tenor of the conversation.

I've tried that sometimes when I remember. And it's really true, because basically goodness feels better. We appreciate it more. We don't even realize we're falling into negativity. That's an act of wisdom and compassion. It doesn't have to be an amazing thing. So we just show up however we show up. We don't know how it's going to turn out.

It may turn out that our whole life changes from doing the obvious. One teacher calls it just doing the obvious. I have a friend who, after Katrina, didn't have a job—he was between jobs. He thought, "Well, I'll just go volunteer for Habitat for Humanity for a few weeks." How long ago was that? Five years. He's still there. Habitat for Humanity hired him. He's living in New Orleans, working really hard. He doesn't like New Orleans

—he's a real Boston kind of a guy. He's not a party guy, and this is a party city. He goes, "I'm in AA. I don't want to be partying." But he's down there just serving, and really happy to be doing it.

We never know. We never know. So we just do the obvious. Take that little step off the lotus when there's something that presents itself to do. And when there's not, just really resting at ease in whatever arises, with wisdom and compassion.

So I'll just end with this. From Master Sheng Yen, who was a wonderful Chan master—he just died, was that last year or the year before? He was talking about how the sense of no-self, the understanding of no-self, transcends subject and object. But one clearly knows how to respond or behave—doing the obvious. And this is his way of saying it: something arises. These are his four steps.

Face it. Accept it. Handle it. Put it down. I love that. Face it, accept it, handle it, put it down. It's over.

At the relative level, our noble heart is felt as kinship with all beings. At the absolute level, we experience it as groundlessness, or open space.

So let's just sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 89

A Wise Person is Known by Her Actions

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this talk, Carol Wilson presents sīla (ethical conduct) not as a prerequisite for 'real' meditation practice, but as a profound path of awakening in itself. Drawing from the Buddha's advice to his son Rāhula, she outlines the practice of reflecting on our actions before, during, and after—examining whether they lead to affliction for ourselves or others. This careful attention to intention (cetanā) and motivation becomes identical to the mindfulness we cultivate on the cushion.
>
> Wilson explores the Buddha's teaching that "cetanā, intention, I tell you, is kamma," explaining how the seed of wholesome or unwholesome action lies in the mental qualities present at the moment of intention. She discusses the four agati (wrong courses of action) from the Vinaya—prejudice caused by desire, hatred, delusion, and fear—and how these color our choices when we're not fully aware. Through personal examples, she illustrates how mindfulness naturally reveals the suffering inherent in unskillful states like anger, leading to their natural subsiding without forceful suppression.
> The talk emphasizes that non-harming includes oneself, and that even refraining from unwholesome action is itself wholesome. Wilson reads from the Cetanā Sutta, showing how virtue naturally leads through joy, rapture, serenity, and concentration to liberating insight —"no act of will" required, simply "the nature of things." She concludes with the Buddha's instruction to recollect one's sīla as a way to brighten the mind, reminding practitioners that this reflection itself frees the mind from greed, aversion, and delusion.

A few talks ago, when I was talking about generosity, I began by describing an incident with the Buddha when a man with leprosy was hanging around the edge of his teachings. The Buddha saw he was the one person whose mind could hear the Dhamma, and he gave graduated teachings—which he gives in many different places—to brighten the mind, to make it more purified, malleable, and receptive. The first of those teachings was generosity. Tonight I want to talk about the second of those teachings: virtue, or sīla, non-harming conduct.

Of course, we've talked about this all along, but I want to point to it again. When we have a habit of acting, speaking, and even thinking in ways that don't bring harm to ourselves or others, that brings us some kind of happiness. Probably we could all agree on that—it's not rocket science. But what I want to talk about is the way we explore our actions, really understanding, really turning our attention to working with sīla, which is a whole lifelong process. Instead of just going out and blaming ourselves because we did something stupid or harmful, what I want to emphasize is how the practice of attention to our motivations and our actions is the practice of wakefulness. It's the practice of mindfulness and wisdom. Just as the practice of generosity is also a practice of awakening, of non-clinging.

Sīla is not an isolated or lesser practice. Often on retreats we take the precepts and talk about how virtue and non-harming conduct are necessary as a base—a basis of non-remorse so we can get on to the "real stuff" and have some good meditative states and make progress in our practice. But I'd like to put forward that if we would just be interested, really committed to exploring our actions and speech and why we do what we do and what the effect is, wisdom would arise naturally of itself. This practice of itself is a practice of purifying the heart and mind. And purifying the heart and mind is really the abandoning of kilesa, which is what allows wisdom and awakening to arise in any moment. Working with sīla is a wonderful practice. It's not separate from our awakening, not separate from our life, not separate from how we act.

There are many different suttas that I really like to refer to. In one, just the first line, the Buddha says: "Monks, a fool is characterized by his or her actions. A wise person is characterized by his or her actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's discernment shines. Through the activities of one's life that one's wisdom shines."

I think that's so beautiful. We can really start to trust and value for ourselves that our natural wisdom, and the wisdom that develops naturally through our willingness to be mindful of our actions, will naturally manifest in how we act in the world. This is so important. I'm not talking about it in some grandiose way—I'm talking moment to moment. Our thoughts, our speech, our actions as an avenue of awakening. As the Buddha said, this is really how our wisdom shows up: how we act. It's not a little thing. The training in this is the training of awakening our mind.

Let me clarify what we've spoken of before in terms of action. "Action" is the translation of the Pali word kamma, the Sanskrit word karma. Kamma just means action. And the Buddha said that cetanā—the word in Pali that we translate as "intention"—is central to understanding this.

When we talk about intention, as Sally did last night so beautifully, really movingly, about our wider intention, our aspiration, our purpose in life—intention is one of those words in English that can apply to a range of mental experience, like love or desire. The broader aspiration, the purpose, as the second step of the Eightfold Path—that is, in Pali, sammā-saṅkappa. It's not sammā-cetanā. Cetanā is a very specific Pali word also translated as intention. It refers to the mental factor of intention, or sometimes motivation.

When I'm saying intention tonight, I mean cetanā. Cetanā is that moment, a movement in the mind, that gathering of mental energy, the collecting of mental energy that leads to speech or action. When we talked about noticing intention as an instruction in the retreat, we mentioned that maybe there's a little intention before you move your arm, before you open your eye—just a little "about-to" movement, as Joseph likes to call it. That's the mental action we're calling intention, cetanā. In terms of how the Buddha described it, it arises as the immediate cause of every action of body, speech, or mind. Are we going to see it all the time? No way. Don't even try. But it's just part of the cause-and-effect process. Ethically neutral, of course—just this little movement. But as it arises in a moment of consciousness, a moment of mind (citta), it arises together with other mental factors, just as we've talked about with other things.

When the Buddha talks about what's skillful or unskillful kamma, first he says—and this is from the Buddha—"Cetanā, intention, I tell you, is kamma. Intending, one does kamma by way of body, speech, and intellect."

This is what's so brilliant, so workable for us about the Buddha's teaching: he's saying the seed of action, when he's talking about kamma, about skillful or unskillful—where he's looking for the heart of the action is in this moment of intention. What makes it skillful or unskillful, wholesome or unwholesome, is the qualities, the mental qualities arising along with it.

We cannot tell from looking at an action what the intention is of someone else, although we think we really know. Actually, we know we don't even know what our own intentions are half the time, never mind somebody else. But the seed of it being in the intention means the same act from the outside could arise from very different intentions.

A simple example: if you have some supportive feedback you want to give a friend, there could be so many intentions behind that. It could really be out of love for this person—they're doing something you can see is unwholesome, unskillful, and you know they don't really want to be doing it, and it's causing unskillful ripples, hurting people's feelings. I had this experience recently with a friend. I really thought about it for three weeks before I told her, a friend I was with in Burma for a while. I was very aware of my intention before speaking—speaking's a tough one. I really waited. I got in touch with my mettā and my caring for her and the sense of honesty. I picked the right time, we were both settled, and I communicated in what I thought was a really good way. She heard it well and was appreciative. I thought, that's a wholesome speech and a wholesome reception. I really did what the Buddha describes: reflect on the intention, the motivation for speaking.

But that's maybe one in a million. It's so easy to fool ourselves and say, "I want to give you this feedback for your own good," but it's really because they're bugging us and we want them to stop. So there's aversion, or a sense of "you'd be so much better off if you'd listen to me"—all those kinds of things. It could be straight-out hostility, couched as "let me tell you this for your own good," and you can feel the hostility coming at you. Someone comes in and says, "I want to give you some feedback. Can I give you some feedback?" No, no.

All of it could be the same words. Another way is you can really get in touch with your intention—as far as you can tell, it's really a mettā-caring intention—but you don't look at the bigger picture. You don't choose an appropriate time. You go in and say, "I've really got to tell you this right now." There's this sense of urgency, and you don't notice that the person is really stressed out, has had a horrible day, is at the end of their tether, can't take another thing. And you want to give them this helpful feedback. So there's a certain delusion in that intention.

Of course it's complex, so we're not going to get it right. But just starting to see how intention is the seed of wholesome or unwholesome action—we tend to judge by the effects of our actions, which are most out of our control. With my friend, I did really the best I could, but I had no control over her reaction. Knowing her, I thought she'd want to know, but I could have been totally wrong. Or I could have thought it was a good time, not knowing what she'd been doing all day, what state of mind she was in, whether she'd just gotten bad news five minutes before. There's all kinds of stuff we can't know.

Being able to tune into the intention—that's a place we can actually see for ourselves. It's not in our control, but it's in our awareness. It's actually going to be affected by the quality of our mind, our consciousness. The more wholesome acts we do, that affects the consciousness. We get more wholesome consciousness. The more wholesome consciousness, the more wholesome acts we do. You can't really separate the two.

Even when we can't see clearly our intentions, even with the best will in the world, when a moment of consciousness is colored by kilesa and we don't realize it, we're just not going to see clearly. That's just how it is. But our willingness to keep looking, to keep reflecting—before, during, and after an action—that willingness to bring mindfulness and wisdom right to the point of intention, to the point of action, and to the point of effect, is going to continue to deeply cultivate our awareness. It's going to allow for natural wisdom to grow, and it's going to be a source of deepening happiness in our lives, in the world, certainly for the people around us who know us.

Just as in meditation, when we're paying attention to our actions, consciousness can still be colored by kilesa that we don't recognize. Here's a list I really like, from the Vinaya—not from the suttas, but from the book of the monks' rules. These are the four agati, the four wrong or unhelpful courses of behavior or prejudice, which are abandoned with wise seeing.

First, chandāgati: prejudice caused by love or desire, partiality. When we have partiality toward someone, we don't see clearly; we can act or make choices based on not being able to see the whole situation clearly, our own acts or another's.

Second, dosāgati: prejudice caused by hatred or enmity.

Third, mohāgati: prejudice caused by delusion—just not knowing what we're doing, just "sounds like a good idea, let's do it," or just not having all the information.

Fourth, bhayāgati: prejudice caused by fear. We can relate to how we could do all kinds of things from fear. Even little fears can get magnified. Just walking and hearing a dog bark—without even realizing it, fear comes and I turn and walk the other way. That's not horribly unskillful, but the intention is just delusion and fear, not paying attention to what I'm doing. It doesn't hurt anything in terms of outer action, but in terms of really noticing what's coloring my citta, my mind stream right now—that's interesting to see. Because then when I can notice the fear, I have a choice. Do I want to keep walking straight? Do I want to turn around? In the big picture, it doesn't make a difference. But these are good places to play with it, where it doesn't really matter.

When there's a decision about how to help a friend and helping brings up fear—how to be with someone who's really sick, for example—I've noticed that being with someone in a lot of pain or suffering is where compassion is so beautiful and where compassion is difficult: when it brings up fear in us. Or aversion. It's just hard to be there. We can come up with all kinds of rationales: "I really want to help, but I have my family to take care of. I have to go to work. I'm too tired." Tune into the motivation. "I feel a fear right there." Okay, fear's happening.

Just as in our practice sitting here, we bring that same quality of awareness, mindfulness, wisdom—not "I should do this, I should move through the fear, I should be the perfect person." No. Just bring the mindfulness to the fear. "Oh, fear is like this. These are the actions that start to come up from fear." You do it or you don't do it, you keep paying attention.

This is where the Buddha is so brilliant—we really learn what causes affliction or suffering to ourselves and others, what doesn't. In the silly fear example of turning around when a dog barks, that's not causing affliction to anybody else. The dog certainly doesn't care. It doesn't seem to cause affliction to me externally. But if I'm paying attention to my mind and I notice, "I ran from fear," and I notice that's the moment where fear was basically driving the bus—if I don't recognize that, it's feeding fear. Not that I hate myself for it, but I really see how that's helping the reaction of fear get stronger. In that moment of contraction and fear and turning away, my senses shut down, the mind is contracted—it's subtle, but it is a kind of suffering, of separation being fed, being strengthened by my inattention.

If I pay attention while I turn around from the fear—just the same thing we've been saying here, exactly the same process—recognizing and feeling the fear as I turn around. "Fear is like this." In that moment, mindfulness is what's being cultivated. In that moment, acceptance, clear seeing. There's no "okay, you've got to turn around and face the dog." Maybe I will, maybe I won't. Maybe it doesn't really matter. But what does matter is that quality of being willing to use the motivations, why I'm doing what I'm doing, as a path of awakening. Without a "should," we keep exploring.

There's a sutta where the Buddha is giving advice to his son Rāhula, the seven-year-old. He talks about honesty first, but this part about reflecting on actions is what I want to share. The whole point is the quality of care and attention we bring, the attitude we bring to these reflections.

The Buddha says: "What do you think, Rāhula? What is the purpose of a mirror?"

"For the purpose of reflection, venerable sir."

"So too, Rāhula, an action with the body should be done after reflection. An action by speech should be done after reflection. An action by mind should be done after reflection."

Then he breaks it down: "When you wish to do an action with the body, you should reflect upon that action in this way: Would this action that I wish to do lead to my own affliction, or to the affliction of others, or the affliction of both?" Notice he's saying "my own affliction" too—not just the affliction of others. Really looking and seeing: what's the motivation, and as best I can tell, what would be the effect? Is it an unwholesome bodily action with painful consequences, painful results?

If on reflection that's obvious—and what's surprising is how often it might be obvious if we really reflect—he says, "Of course, definitely you should not do that action."

But if you reflect and know this action you wish to do would not lead to your affliction or the affliction of others or both—it's a wholesome bodily action with pleasant consequences, pleasant results—then you may do it.

Here's the interesting part. He says: "Also while you are doing the action with the body"—and the same with speech, the same with thinking—"while you're doing the action, reflect upon it in this same way. Is this action I am doing leading to my own suffering? Is it leading to the suffering of others? Is it leading to the suffering of both? Is it unwholesome for myself, for others?" If you see it's having painful consequences, then you should suspend that action. You should just stop. But if not, continue.

And after you've finished an action, again reflect on it. Did that action lead to my own affliction? The affliction of others? The affliction of both? Was it unwholesome? Unwholesome results? If so, really tune into that, see what the effect is. The Buddha, talking to a monk, says to go and confess it in the bi-weekly meetings they have. For us, it would be to really reveal it, lay it open to your heart. If you're confused about something, talk to a teacher or wise companions in the holy life, and then undertake restraint for the future.

So: with body, with speech, with mind, reflect before, during, and after.

This is the important thing, though: it's not just if it's unwholesome. Also notice if it's wholesome. Notice what's the effect during it. What's the effect after it? When you reflect, if you know this action that you did did not lead to your affliction or the affliction of others or both—it was a wholesome bodily action, speech action, or mind action with pleasant consequences, wholesome results—then you can abide happy and glad, training day and night in wholesome states.

That's what I really want to emphasize: sīla is not just about looking at how bad we are and trying not to be bad. It's actually tuning in—just as with generosity—to the happiness of heart, the gladness of heart, when we act in a way that doesn't cause ourselves or others suffering. Training day and night in wholesome states.

Even just restraining, refraining consciously from an unwholesome action—that is a wholesome action. I bet we often don't realize it. "Oh yeah, I better not do that. Oh, I was about to do that. I'm so dumb. I'm so greedy." But we don't do it. Could we actually appreciate the wholesomeness of not doing it before we jump into beating ourselves up for having thought about doing it? We could actually move into the joy, the happiness, the wholesomeness of refraining from affliction.

This is the way the Buddha talks about it: really noticing how our willingness to do this over and over is actually the same practice of mindfulness and wisdom at the point of contact with awareness that we're going to do something or want to do something—a thought, a motivation, an intention. That's the same mindfulness and wisdom we're cultivating in our meditation here. It's no different. That willingness to just meet what's happening and to explore with interest—not with judging, not thinking "this is a list of what's good, this is a list of what's bad." That's not the way it works. It's that willingness with beginner's mind to see: what's the effect of this action of speech, of body, of mind? What are the causes that bring me to do it? How does it seem when I'm doing it? What's the effect when I'm done, both for myself and for others?

And it's equal: not harming yourself or not harming others. I know I've said that three times already, and I'm going to say it again, because non-harming includes you. It's not just about everyone else in the world, but you. That's where we start.

When we do see the cause and effect, when we've done something and see it was unwholesome, it caused some affliction to ourselves or others—the way the Buddha says to abandon it is interesting. He doesn't say, "When you realize you've done an unwholesome action, grovel, hate yourself, really go over and over and think about what a bad person you are and get filled with guilt and remorse." No, he doesn't say that.

He gives an example about someone telling lies. He says to Rāhula that speaking untruth is almost the most unskillful thing we can do. So lying is really not a good thing. But if someone sees, "There are lies that I have told to a greater or lesser extent"—if someone's reviewing this in their mind, "that was not right, that was not good"—that's a neutral way of saying it. But if you become guilty, remorseful, with a negative self-judging tinge, if you get lost in guilt for that reason, that unwholesome deed will not be undone.

Have you noticed that? No matter how long you spend hating yourself for something you did yesterday or a minute ago or last year, it doesn't undo it.

So reflecting thus—and this is where it sounds easier than it is—he abandons right then the telling of lies and in the future refrains from telling lies. This is how there comes to be the abandoning of that unskillful deed. This is how there comes to be the transcending of that unskillful deed.

Take it as a teaching, not as if we see it once and it's over. But he's saying: really, you look and you see with mindfulness wisdom, with this attitude that's really interested in how the mind is working. What were the intentions? Why did I do it? What was the effect? How did that work for me? How did that work for others? We can only see in this way if we're interested—and that interest is the quality of pure mindfulness, of awareness not colored by self-hatred, by wanting, not trying to make it look better than it was or worse than it was.

In that moment of reflecting, what we're doing is purifying the mind, just in the paying attention. Even before we've gotten to "maybe lying is not such a good thing," just in the looking we're cultivating mindfulness and wisdom, cultivating that quality of awareness that can be with anything. When we say awareness doesn't care, it means it just wants to see how it is. It doesn't have a presupposition about whether this is wholesome or not. It's looking to see what's really the effect.

When we're looking in that way, that's how, when we're doing something unskillful, we'll only abandon it first when we really get it for ourselves that it was causing us harm, causing another harm. As I'm sure you know by now, usually one time isn't quite enough to really get it. Would that it were, but it's not. But it does start to sink in when we're continuing to meet what's happening with this attitude of interest and non-judging.

We do get to know—and you all know this from being here—we know it and then we don't know it the next day. But we really do get to know deeply and personally for ourselves the afflictive aspects of so-called unskillful action. And that's what's meant by unskillful—not that there's a list of things, you do them you're good, you don't do them you're bad, and we don't have to think about it anymore. That's better than nothing, I suppose. But that's not the way this deep understanding of suffering grows.

As that deep understanding grows through paying attention, through really feeling it, a lot of you are in that phase now where you notice so much more clearly when you speak or act or even think in an unskillful way, colored by kilesa—but you keep doing it. You're feeling the suffering of it so much more than you did before. When someone asked this morning about just wanting to go back to delusion, I can understand that. As we begin to wake up and become much more sensitive to what we're doing and why we're doing it and the effects—just in ourselves, never mind others—it's so painful. But somehow the attachment that keeps us doing it might still be there, and we keep experiencing the pain so much more deeply. Parts of us say, "Let me not have to see this anymore."

But I'm sure you know now, it's too late. It's way too late for all of you to go back to delusion, because it's not the safe refuge. I see my mind wanting to say, "Please, I don't want to see anymore." But then it sees that, and it's just another passing moment.

It's difficult. That's why compassion is so key for us. There are times when we're so much more sensitively tuned in to the painful effect of even our unwholesome thoughts. We're so sensitive. And here on retreat, it's so magnified. Stuff we're in agony over that we did that was unskillful—that other people wouldn't have noticed here. You go out in the world and tell someone, "Oh my God, I just pushed in front of this person in line because I really wanted that particular muffin. And I just feel so terrible. I know they knew it. And I can see them flinch." It's a huge thing, and you're really suffering from it. And the other person maybe is too—they come in and say, "I just feel so disrespected. They just pushed in front of me. It's like I don't even exist. And now I'm filled with hate for them. And I feel horrible."

You try to tell someone outside: "I feel so remorseful because I stepped in line in front of somebody and took a muffin." They're like, "Excuse me? Have you read the newspapers recently?" But we really are this sensitive. This really is how the mind and heart begin to understand deeply, and the wisdom—because we can't create wisdom, wisdom arises naturally.

I'll tell you one experience. A few years ago, when we had our former president, the last president, and he was doing something I didn't approve of—some big thing he'd done—I was just walking up and down on the country road near where I live. I could see annoyance, I could see anger, but I really got into the anger in a way I don't often do. I was just filled with this rage, but the kind of rage that's righteous indignation, that has a certain sweetness if you don't look carefully. "Yeah, right, the jerk, how could he?" It was building and building and building. And all my thoughts were right, of course, and everyone I knew would totally agree with me.

So I was doing that, really caught in it, until suddenly—and this is just thank God for the habit of mindfulness and wisdom, because it just arose by itself—suddenly just mindfulness. "Wow. Anger feels like this." And it felt terrible. It was just like on fire with rage, burning, one angry thought feeding the next angry thought, my energy getting stronger. I saw I was about to have to go off and do something, and if anyone had come up and talked to me just then, I would have snapped their head off. Whatever it was, the anger would have just gone over. If it was someone who agreed with me, we would have gotten together and bad-mouthed the president. But if not, if someone just got in my way a little bit, I could see the hostility starting to grow.

The mindfulness just felt that—not with a "should" or "you're bad" or anything—just felt how that felt, what the effect was on the mind stream, how it was going to affect my speech and action. And just right then, wisdom came by itself. The wisdom just comes from the steadiness of seeing. "Wow. Nothing's worth it." I mean, I wasn't doing anything helpful. That anger wasn't helping the situation in any way. And it was so clear at that moment that nothing is worth feeding anger like that in my mind or adding that anger to the world.

And just then, the anger went away. It doesn't mean it never came back, and it doesn't mean we don't act. But acting from that anger wouldn't have been in any way helpful. I remember it because it was such a strong, clear seeing, and the wisdom was completely nothing to do with me. It just arose from the mindfulness, from the awareness noticing anger and feeling it. And that arose from the habit of awareness for so many years.

The wisdom—I love it—it's just so wonderful to see that it's not something we have to remember and call up: "Oh yeah, anger, suffering, yeah that's right, it's not good, I think I'll try not to do it." It's just right there. When there's awareness, it's just right there. That's what we can really learn to trust, and that's what we're cultivating. And in that restraining from the anger—well, that just happened effortlessly. But there's still an intention to abandon anger, and knowing that's a wholesome action. Not doing harm is a wholesome action. Really appreciate that. You don't have to go out and be Mother Teresa. Refraining is wisdom.

Sally mentioned last night, in talking about the second step of the Eightfold Path—wise intention, or wise aspiration, usually translated as "right thought"—there's a sutta where the Buddha is using this same type of mindfulness wisdom, just reflecting, exploring with interest his types of thought and the effects of his thought. That's how he came up with this sense of wise thought and unwise thought. I like it because it brings the same quality of exploration, rather than just saying "this is bad, this is good." He's looking and seeing what's the effect. Skillful and unskillful are really determined by effect. And we're only going to learn that for ourselves.

He's talking about when he was practicing, before he became awakened, before he became a Buddha—which I always find interesting. He says: "The thought occurred to me"—he never says "I thought," it's always "the thought occurred to me," which gives the sense of how thoughts just arise—"why don't I just keep on dividing my thinking into two sorts?" So he decided whenever he had thinking with sense desire, thinking filled with ill will, or thinking filled with harmfulness, he would look at that as one type. And thinking with renunciation, with non-ill will or mettā, and with harmlessness, as another type.

"As I remained heedful, ardent, and resolute"—and I want you to hear this: he's not the Buddha yet, but he's no slouch. He's practicing. He's heedful, ardent, and resolute. I imagine his heedful, ardent, and resolute is pretty serious—"thinking imbued with sensuality arose. I discerned: thinking imbued with sensuality has arisen." And he looked at how it affected him. He said: "It leads to my own affliction or the affliction of others. It obstructs wisdom. It obstructs clear seeing. It promotes vexation. It does not lead to liberation."

"And as I noticed that it leads to my own affliction, this thinking subsided. As I noticed that it leads to the affliction of myself or others, it subsided. As I noticed that it obstructs clear seeing, that it promotes vexation, does not lead to liberation, it subsided."

Isn't that interesting? He's just really noticing with clear mindfulness what's arising and how it's acting and what the effect is. He's not saying "I hate it." Later he talks about rooting out, abandoning, dispelling. But the first way it's talked about is: as I noticed it, and as I noticed it led to my vexation, it subsided. That's like what I was talking about with that anger example. As the awareness—and it's not a person, not "I noticed, I'm so great"—it's just mindfulness wisdom, a mental factor arising, seeing clearly that this sense desire thinking is leading to my own vexation. And seeing that, just steady with mindfulness wisdom, for that moment it subsides.

Try it. You've been doing that the whole time. But start really having faith, confidence in the power of mindfulness and wisdom and the willingness to just be honest, to bring this honest interest into seeing what's going on in our mind, what's the motivation for doing this.

And then the same thing for thinking filled with ill will or harmfulness. Just when you notice it leads to vexation, to affliction of yourself or others, doesn't lead to freedom—it subsided.

And then, this is that famous line we always use, from this sutta: "Whatever a person keeps pursuing with his thinking and pondering, that becomes the inclination of his awareness." We just notice that. If you keep pursuing thinking imbued with sensuality, abandoning thinking filled with renunciation, then the mind becomes bent toward thinking about sensuality. Just what we've noticed.

So when you're bringing mindfulness—even mindfulness of sense desire, mindfulness of thinking filled with ill will, mindfulness of thinking filled with harmfulness—what the mind is being bent toward is the mindfulness, is the awareness, not the ill will. When we jump on it and go, "Yeah, I am so bad for thinking about ill will and I do need to do something to stop it"—that's pursuing thinking imbued with ill will. Mindfulness of it just watches the cause and effect: "Oh yes, this does cause me suffering. Let's see how that works." That's really very powerful.

Then he went on to notice: "Thinking imbued with renunciation has arisen in me." And looking at it, he discerned it does not lead to his own affliction or the affliction of others. It fosters wisdom, clear seeing. It promotes lack of vexation, more ease, contentment, leads to freedom. "If I were to think and ponder in line with that for even a day, for even a night, even for a day and a night, I do not envision any danger that would come from it—except that thinking and pondering a long time would tire the body."

Have you noticed that? Even wholesome thoughts—you ponder a day and a night, it tires the body. When the body is tired, the mind is disturbed. And a disturbed mind is far from concentration. So he's also noticing the effect on the body. "So I steadied my mind, settled, unified and concentrated it. Why is that? So my mind would not be disturbed."

You get a sense of the difference. He's not hating the thoughts. But he's still, even with wholesome thoughts, really following it out: "A day and night I can think about renunciation. No problem. But the body gets tired. The mind's a little bit disturbed. It would be more helpful to steady the mind and drop the thoughts." But it's not because the thoughts are unwholesome.

So just this willingness to keep exploring and to see what leads to contentment, to ease, to happiness, what leads to suffering—and really to see for ourselves over and over and over. And to really get that it works both ways: wholesome states of mind obviously breed wholesome actions. When mettā is what's in the mind, that's going to be the motivation for action. But it works the other way too: cultivating wholesome actions also supports the arising of wholesome states.

Hence the usefulness of having the precepts. When we know we're not in a wholesome state of mind and we don't know what to do, and there's this precept—"don't take what's not given"—and we don't do it, even if the motivation isn't really that sensitivity of wisdom, just in the refraining from taking what is not given, there's a wholesomeness. It is that freedom from remorse. Later, even though it wasn't a totally pure motivation, you can reflect, "I didn't take that thing." And a sense of contentment, a sense of ease, a sense of freedom from remorse can arise from that reflection.

It's really important that we can reflect on our non-harming conduct as a source of happiness, as a source of brightness in the mind.

There is a list the Buddha gives, from the Discourse on Right View. He's talking about Right View—the beginning of the path—and he

CHAPTER 90

An Appreciation of Awareness

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this heartfelt dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers an intimate exploration of what she calls her 'love of awareness'—the simple yet profound capacity to be fully present with whatever arises in each moment. She addresses the paradox at the heart of practice: how awareness can be completely life-transforming while simultaneously nothing really changes. Drawing from the Dhammapada's teachings on heedfulness, she emphasizes that appreciative awareness leads to life, while heedless avoidance is the path to death.
>
> Wilson explores the Pāli term 'yathābhūta'—things as they have come to be—explaining how this phrase captures the conditioned, contingent nature of each moment. She describes how right view (sammā diṭṭhi) isn't about acquiring correct ideas but about perceiving reality accurately, free from the coloring of greed, aversion, and delusion. When awareness is pure and uncolored, wisdom arises naturally; we don't need to create it. In that clear seeing, harmful states simply don't make sense and don't arise.
> The talk takes a powerful turn as Wilson connects inner practice to outer action, sharing her experiences in Burma witnessing poverty and her visit to the Dachau concentration camp. She reflects on how the same mental habits we observe in meditation—denial, fear, confusion, self-protection—can manifest in devastating ways when left unexamined. This grounding perspective reveals why purifying the mind through awareness practice isn't selfish navel-gazing but essential work for reducing suffering in the world. Wilson closes with an invitation to trust this simple capacity we all have to be fully present and awake.

This is meant to be Dhamma encouragement, hopefully. It will at least keep you going for the rest of the night. I just want to share a little bit of my—it sounds silly—but my love of awareness, really. I wish I could transmit to you all how simple, accessible, and completely life-transforming it can be as we begin to strengthen our trust and confidence in just surrendering into awareness of whatever's happening now.

And at the same time, as it's life-transforming, nothing really changes. That's the paradox. We are so conditioned by our culture and the way most of us are brought up—we're inured to doing something for a result. If we want things to get better, we need to change things. Why would we do anything if everything was going to stay the same? You didn't come here to struggle for nine or ten days and then leave with everything exactly as it was before, did you? Maybe. Good. Then you can just put down expectation.

But mostly, we don't work that way. And of course, it isn't that nothing changes. Everything changes, and everything stays the same. That's really hard to explain.

Talking about awareness is also strange because the use of language—awareness as a noun—makes it sound like a thing. If there's a thing, then it should be existent in time and space, something we look for and can get and hold on to and have and be in relationship to. None of those descriptions are accurate. The closest we can come is that to be with awareness is an activity that arises in the mind in a moment, as all mental activity arises in a moment and passes in a moment. But still, for the use of language and communication, awareness functions as a noun—how to recognize it, how to feel it in our experience, how to trust what pure awareness is.

I'm just sharing some thoughts. I'm in no way giving you the big overview as if I know it all. I'm just trying to share some of my experience and love of this. When I think about my motivation—I can't really speak for Steve or Franz, but I assume they're similar—my motivation to keep coming here and leading these retreats and trying to share with all of you is really just a sense of loving the possibility that we can, for moments (I only know it for moments), be so completely, fully present and alive to whatever's arising in this moment without holding back, without needing it to be different, and without having to make it be all about me. That one is so exhausting, so limiting, so much struggle.

When just whatever's happening is arising, and there's the quality of mind of awareness that's simply fully here without barriers, just knowing—"Oh, it's like this"—no stories, no complications. It doesn't actually sound like such a great thing. Just to be with hearing. Just to see. Pretty sunset, wasn't it? It's like this. Feeling happy with the sunset. It's like this. Sun's gone, what next? What next is like this. That's what I mean—nothing changes.

But just that, just this, to have moments of a life—the regular moments of a regular life—and to be so present, just for those moments, without all the complication, without all the stories, that's the beginning of a taste of freedom. Even if it may not be what we thought we were looking for. We thought it was somewhere else, in bliss, in pure consciousness. Let's get rid of these bodies. Let's stop having any kind of displeasure or unpleasant experience. I kept waiting for years and years. When would I float away on this cloud of compassion and beauty, and my personality would really change once and for all?

I'm still waiting. But without quite so much expectation that it's going to happen.

But you know what really has happened? Often, not always, because nothing's steady state—this personality is just much more at ease with itself, because I realize this is it, folks. This body, this mind, this personality—that's what's arising from moment to moment. Just being at ease with things as they are, but really awake with things as they are. Not being at ease because we're kind of checked out, a little bit deluded. "I'm at ease with that because I don't really have to engage." I'm also familiar with that kind of being at ease. We call that delusion. There are times it's quite comfortable. I see my mind would really like to just check out. Sleep is a good one, unless you're having horrible nightmares. Let's just check out for a little while, have a little bit of rest.

Was it Munindraji who used to say that sleep is the worldling's nirvana? Let's just check out and cruise. But that's not what we're talking about.

Another reason awareness is strange to talk about: the way we've been giving instructions today or in the groups or in the Q&A, we say, "Oh, I was so angry"—I'm making this up, no one actually said this to me—and we respond, "Great, great. Did you notice anger? Anger's like this. Good, good practice." That's awareness. What's so great about that? It sounds pretty passive. Whatever happened, you say, "Oh, awareness can just notice. It's like this. No need to change it. No need to fix it. Freedom is just being totally here with it." Our normal let's-get-things-done, let's-fix-it mind hears that and thinks, "That sounds more like being a doormat to me. I don't really get the freedom in that."

But actually, the steadiness of pure awareness has the power to completely transform our understanding of ourselves and the world. Not the power—that's just what happens.

This is from the Dhammapada, teachings of the Buddha, in a poetic translation from Ajahn Munindo. He translates it as awareness; often you'll see it translated as heedfulness. Just two stanzas:

"Appreciative awareness leads to life. Heedless avoidance is the path to death. Those who are aware are fully alive, while those who are heedless are as if already dead."

Remember, we're only talking about a moment at a time—not that you're aware and then it's forever, or you're heedless and you're doomed. It's a moment at a time.

And the second stanza: "The wise, being fully alive—in other words, being fully aware—rejoice in appreciative awareness and abide delighting in this capacity."

That would be my motivation, if I could articulate it: that somehow we could all learn to trust, to rejoice in appreciative awareness, and to abide delighting in that capacity.

It's as if we're talking about a shift of refuge. Remember, we took the refuges last night and this morning. We took refuge in Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha. In Buddha, it's really like refuge in the capacity for the awakened, the aware heart and mind. The Dhamma is refuge in things as they are, things as they have come to be in this moment, as the place—"place" is the wrong word—where freedom and ease of heart and mind can only arise when we completely take refuge, when we rejoice in that awareness.

It's a shift of refuge where instead of looking to the particulars of experience to give us happiness or freedom or ease—the particulars of experience will never last for more than a short fraction. Even if something seems to last for a year (and what lasts for a year? what really lasts for a year? what lasts for two minutes if we're looking?)—but even when external situations seem good and last for a year, that's an eon. Nothing really lasts in terms of looking to experience for ease, freedom, or comfort. But that's where we tend to go for refuge—our moods, our thoughts, external experience.

When we start to shift our trust, when we start to shift our refuge to this delight in awareness, it really can be that something's coming up in your mind that's unpleasant, one of your familiar unpleasant habits. You feel the effect in your body; it's unpleasant. And there's this delight in the awareness of it that really is no problem. What's happening is no problem. The next minute, okay, we forget the delight in awareness and we're back in the old habits—the habit of inertia, the habit of "I don't like this, it should be like this, I'm going to fix myself right now." Then: "Wow, wanting to fix myself is like this."

I know I keep saying that, and I know it might sound kind of lame. "Oh yeah, wanting to fix myself is like this." But in the moment that you really are imbibing, really touching with mind and heart that quality of wholehearted presence—awareness that's not colored by greed or aversion or me-me-me—that allows us to recognize accurately. That's where wisdom arises.

Wisdom arises by itself when there's accurate recognition. Which is also a huge relief—we don't have to create it. We can't. I mean, we're trying to make something up, "wisdom." We don't know. It arises by itself when there's accurate recognition, when there's pure awareness. And in that wisdom, that's where freedom comes. Freedom from the suffering of reactivity. You still might have that same silly personality pattern.

But you know what? It's okay. You might even see a moment when you love it. "Oh yeah, look at that, isn't that so..."—whatever word you want to substitute there. That's just how it is. Causes and conditions coming together.

The Buddha talked about the path of awakening as beginning and ending as a path, more like a circle. What he talks about is wise view, right view, or right understanding. In our normal way, we think of understanding as acquiring a body of knowledge, a set of ideas. And I'm here talking, blabbing away, giving you ideas. In our normal way, we think right view is: "Okay, I see the ideas I have that are wrong." We have plenty of ideas that lead us into trouble, plenty of ideas working in the back of the mind that aren't really so helpful. Part of our awareness practice will help us see those. That's true.

But right view isn't about getting another set of knowledge and then holding on to that for dear life. It's not about that at all. Right view, wise view, means actually the way we are perceiving and understanding the world is accurate—not "right" as in "this is good and this is bad," or "this meets certain standards," not that. It's like yathā bhūta, a word in Pali. You most often see it in the Buddha's teaching as part of a very profound insight: yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana, often translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they are"—which is very close to awakening, to nibbāna. That's all: knowledge and vision of things as they are. Not "let's get the heck away from things as they are and get to somewhere where we can wake up." What wakes us up is recognizing things as they are, as they are right now, no matter how they are.

Yathā bhūta is the part of that phrase usually translated as "things as they are." But I was using that phrase a couple of months ago, and a couple of friends who are much more scholars of the Pali language told me that the grammatical construction of yathā bhūta would be more accurately translated as "things as they have come to be." And that's really how it is—things as they have come to be in this moment.

What that brings in is the fact of conditionality, contingency—the fact that things as they have come to be in this moment is the effect of innumerable causes coming together. Innumerable situations of physical and mental factors, your own particular experiences, others', the past—all coming together in this moment, unable to be separated. You can't really ever figure out all the causes and conditions for this moment. And because of how it's coming together in this moment, it can't be any different, can it? It's already here. How can it be different? It's what it is.

How much of our time do we unconsciously or habitually spend either trying to pretend this moment isn't the way it is—have you ever noticed yourself doing that?—and then pretending that we don't notice that we're doing that? This is denial. I am in awe of the power of denial in the mind. It's amazing, actually. Because when we break through the denial, we see: "But I knew I was doing that for ten years. I knew I was doing that and somehow pretended I didn't know." It's amazing.

Have you ever known yourself to either pretend this moment isn't the way it is, or try to make it be different, or be afraid and project this moment infinitely into the future—"It's always going to be this way"? There is no way it's going to be this way even next moment. Impossible. The conditions are already different for next moment than this moment. Even talking about "next moment" is just an idea.

So yathā bhūta—things as they have come to be in this moment—gives the living, moving, unstable, vibrant, alive nature of life in every moment. What frees our heart and mind from confusion, from suffering, is simply wise view, wise understanding, which is the recognition of the reality of how things actually are in this moment. Not every single cause and effect, but just the reality of our mind, of our body in this moment. Free from the confusion, the overlay that's put on top when we don't realize that the awareness greeting this moment—first, if there's any awareness at all that we even know we're in this moment, that's good—but the awareness, if it's colored by wanting it to be different or hating how it is or thinking it should be like this and trying to nudge it, all of that gets in the way of actually recognizing how things are.

So right view, what frees our heart and mind, is so elegant. It's not that we have to somehow get rid of the greed, the hatred, the confusion, as if there's this huge mountain inside of us, although it may feel like it. A huge mountain we chip away one little chip every hundred years, and maybe sometime in some future life we'll have managed to dig out all the greed for a second. It's not like that.

It's fresh every moment. And what's so elegant about the freedom of heart and mind is that when there's an accurate recognition of this vibrant, changing, unstable nature of cause and effect—of all life—in that moment of clear recognition, of pure awareness, the wisdom arises of "Oh, this is how things are." And in seeing how things are, greed doesn't arise because it doesn't make any sense. Trying to hold on to something that's already going is so clearly suffering. You don't even have to think about it.

Like that sunset. Did you sit there thinking, "Just let it stay still for two more minutes so I can enjoy it"? Maybe you did. Our mind is capable of anything. But pretty much we know the sun's going to go down. Pretty much we know that's going to happen. We can appreciate the beauty or how it's making us feel. Hopefully we can let it go. If you couldn't let it go, that's a great place to say, "Oh, that's the suffering—holding on to something that's already not here anymore." Or if you start thinking, "Okay, twenty-three hours and fifty-five minutes, maybe only fifty-four, and I can watch the sunset tomorrow"—it's so clear that's nuts, right? It's so clear that's suffering anyway. We let it go. Still enjoying the beauty—that doesn't have to be done away with. But it's so clear it's gone.

So greed doesn't arise. Hatred doesn't arise. Me being able to change that, needing to change it, doesn't arise. Seeing, beauty, appreciation—the next thing arises. You hear the bell. It's the next arising thing. "Oh, time to go sit"—a thought. You turn and walk in here. You think, "Damn, I don't want to do that." You notice aversion. Whatever. It doesn't matter. Yathā bhūta—things as they have come to be in this moment.

That's what's so elegant: the clear, deep seeing automatically frees the mind. The wisdom comes from that.

So what makes clear seeing? What are the conditions that allow for this wisdom to arise? Awareness. Mindfulness. First, the willingness, just this sense of being fully present just for this moment. In this moment, it feels like nothing, right? "Here she goes again, be present with whatever." Because we're focusing on the thing, on the object—the mind state, the sound, the idea, whatever.

Just start to notice: awareness is like this. The steadiness, the continuity—that's really key. It's not just one moment and then we go off in our habits, our refuge in delusion or wanting or making up stories as a way to pacify ourselves. Or more likely, we make up stories as a way to get ourselves really upset. Have you noticed that? Things are fine, you don't feel so good maybe, or something's going on you don't like, but it's okay. But the mind spins out into the future—it's going to be all day and ten days, and what am I going to do, and oh my God—and we're all upset. What's happening now? Actually, sensations, thoughts, it's okay.

The continuity is really the key. Not that we can be continuous—we're going to forget all the time because the habit is to forget. But remember what we talked about this morning and last night: the remembering. As soon as you think, "Oh yeah, I was spaced out," you're already not. That's what's so easy. That's what we want to learn to trust, to actually delight in.

For a lot of us, not all of you, but a lot of us, our mind has such a habit of self-judgment or self-blame. Have any of you noticed that? When you're walking or sitting here, and suddenly you realize, "Wow, I didn't know what was going on for however long"—how often is that followed by the thought, "Well, you're supposed to be continuous now. Come on, what's the matter?" Some kind of judgment.

That makes the whole thing so much heavier, doesn't it? If you believe that—"I should have been more mindful. I've been here a whole day, and look how much I'm spaced out. This is exhausting. They said it was easy. They said it was relaxing. I don't think it's relaxing. I think it's heavy. I think it's exhausting." Be mindful all day—and you're projecting already. "Oh, aversion's happening now."

When we're not fighting with it, it's just this. Actually, that becomes delightful. I don't mean aversion's delightful. Aversion's aversion. It's not delightful. But the awareness of it can be delightful. And it's just that simple. It's learning to trust that that's really enough. We don't need to add that extra—how can I do it better, how can I have better mind states? When you notice that, okay, that's just the next thing to be aware of. But even that—when we see, we don't have to be in contention with anything in our experience.

When you start to really believe that about meditation, both for new people and old people... I've been practicing meditation for—I won't tell you how long. But so much of it, and it's been extremely beneficial, all of it—but for so much of the time, there's been subtly in the background the sense of how to do it right. And if there's a way to do it right, that means there has to be a way to do it wrong. And for sure, if there's a way to do it wrong, every time I don't like what's happening or what's happening doesn't fit whatever idea I have of what "right" is, in comes that judgment—"you're bad, you're wrong"—the heaviness. And then when I think about wanting to be mindful, it comes with heaviness, with aversion. "I can't do it right."

Can you actually even let in the trust that we don't need to be in contention with anything in our experience here? Awareness doesn't care what awareness is aware of. Any object of mind or body—and let me know if you can find any object that isn't of mind or body—is a perfectly wonderful way to recognize awareness. Because awareness can be with anything.

When I start to realize this—and I have spaces of time, on and off retreat, because when we're talking about just noticing in this relaxed way, you notice it doesn't require a really strong, focused, one-pointed samādhi. That's something we can build up on retreat. But just noticing you're aversive, for example, you're greedy—I know, a lot of times we don't notice it, but I actually did notice it—you don't really have to be in an incredibly subtle state of mind to notice that, do you? Not always, anyway. It can get by us, but this we can do in our daily life.

To actually know that whatever's arising is really fine—meditation becomes fun because you're not fighting anything. You can't do it wrong. And then the willingness, the mindfulness, the awareness begins to develop a momentum. Yeah, you have to put in some time. That's not going to happen in a day. Our habits are strong. But it comes to be: "Oh, whatever's happening, I can be aware of that. Awareness can be with that."

And then as the awareness begins to get a momentum, as the continuity begins to become stronger, that's what allows for the recognition of things as they have come to be in this moment to arise more accurately. Out of that, we start to see cause and effect.

For example, my silly example of the sunset. There's some awareness through the whole thing. You're watching the sunset. You're appreciating the beauty. You notice your mind going from really liking that into some fantasy—some really happy fantasy. You got from this sunset to a sunset somewhere in the Caribbean with somebody you haven't met yet but that you really are going to be spending the rest of your life with. How fast can that happen? Does any of you notice anything like that ever happening today? Maybe not that particular one. Or it could be negative. It could go either way.

And then you're aware of that. You notice the happiness of that. Then you think, "Oh my God, I'm here and I should be mindful." You notice the aversion. You notice from the aversion how it makes the body feel heavy. And then you notice in the heaviness—this is because there's some continuity of mindfulness—that when the body's heavy, you don't want to be there anymore. Suddenly, from being really with the sunset, your mind is going, "You know what? I'm going home. It's enough of this. I'm out of here." Five minutes before, it was the peak of your life.

The steadiness of awareness—we start to see the cause and effect and how it works together. We go, "Wow, look how the mind works. It's so interesting. It's fascinating." And then you see: this is how suffering is created. This is how freedom from suffering arises, right here, in this moment. Suffering comes to be when we're fighting with experience, in contention with experience, denying experience, wanting it to be different, all caught up in me-me-me.

The awareness comes: "Oh, look at that. I wanted to go away. It's just like this." And you turn around and walk in the hall without any more story. Just that simple.

In the Zen ox-herding pictures, those ten pictures that depict pictorially the path of practice and awakening, the last one is after he's awakened—he picks up his bundle and goes back into the marketplace. In any moment, we just... all that poofs away. You turn around and walk in here and sit down. So simple. Because it's that simple, our thinking mind says, "I'm afraid that's not really going to do it for me. I need something a little more." Oh yeah, thinking wants something. Thinking, wanting—it's just like that.

All I'm encouraging you to do is trust that simplicity. Just notice. Notice when it's present. Start to notice. You can palpably feel when that simple awareness has that quality of purity—not colored by greed, by wanting. Not a sense of struggle, but a sense of presence. We don't have to create the wisdom, the clear seeing of things as they have come to be. We're not trying to figure it out. We don't have a clue. But the truth just presents itself over and over and over.

Quite a few people have mentioned today, in different ways, seeing aspects of how their mind is relating to certain problems in life here or at home, and seeing a way that the mind kind of amps it up, makes it more complicated. That just comes by steady awareness. It's a wonderful thing. An amazing thing.

I want to switch gears a little bit, though it's really the same thing—appreciating this.

I remember in the three-month retreat this year when Joseph Goldstein, one of our friends and colleagues, was giving a talk. I think it was at the beginning of the retreat. People were doing just what we're doing here, but for six weeks or three months. He was just saying how much to appreciate the opportunity to do this. He was saying how really fortunate we are, how privileged we are to be able to have the time, have the interest, have enough space in our life, have the good fortune to be able to do this.

That's true. Whatever our life situation—both us as teachers and you—it takes a huge commitment and sacrifice for many people to be able to take nine days like this out of what everyone's life is, so complex and busy, with so many different strands and so many different people. It's hard. Some people are saying today that it's really difficult at times to step out of that. Sometimes we have the support of friends and families. Often we don't. They think we're abandoning them. It makes it hard. So many people don't have a sense that it's okay to do this for themselves. "It's just being selfish"—that's our cultural misunderstanding.

I want to say yes, we are incredibly privileged. No matter how difficult it was for us to get here, there are many people in the world who don't have the physical possibility.

I was just in Burma for some weeks, and so was Steve. We were doing different things. But in terms of our privilege, no matter how hard our life is—and I'm not saying this as a guilt thing at all—it's more a sense of gratitude, to appreciate the possibilities of what we can do here.

I was in Burma, and one of the things we were doing: someone had given a few of us friends a couple of thousand dollars and asked us specifically to go through the village around the monastery where we were staying and find some of the worst, most tumble-down shacks where people were living. Believe me, it's really hard to pick out the worst because they are pretty bad. We're talking about little bamboo shacks with thatched roofs full of holes. A house that only has two walls. Four ladies living in this community in a house with two walls, completely open to everything, with only one little latrine for seventeen houses way over there. The floor is these bamboo poles with huge holes in between them. And that's not even the worst.

In terms of doing this, which in some way was lovely to be able to do, seeing not just the poverty but the quality of people's lives—seeing how different people in similar situations can be so different. There are some people where the husband had died, he was an alcoholic, the sixteen-year-old daughter had to leave school in the last year—which is a really hard thing, to get to the last year, to have enough money to do it, and then have to leave to work in a factory to support the other kids—and the mother's cooking little fried things outside the house. And this family was so filled with light. They were so beautiful, so loving in this situation.

And then there are other families just completely beaten down, just completely dulled out. An old granny—I don't know how old—taking care of her four grandkids because the mother, who knows where the father ever was, was out doing really hard physical labor all the time. The granny was just barely relational. A lot of Burmese old women smoke these old cheroots, these thick stogie cigars. She'd just sit there smoking it and hand it to the three-year-old to put out. The six-year-old would light it for her. We were telling them about a free school, because a lot of these kids don't go to school—they can't even afford the school fees—and some nuns had started a free school up the road. So we're telling them about the school, and they just look at us with dead eyes. Too much to even figure out how to tell the kids to just walk up to the school fifteen minutes up the road.

Similar situations, but just to see. There are people who have no way to practice or look at their mind, or who have the chance—in Burma, there's meditation centers two feet down the road everywhere you are—but no interest, no energy, no possibility.

So that we're here, that we have the interest—I just want to say it's a wonderful thing. Appreciate that in yourself. Please let yourself feel grateful for the opportunity and for your interest.

The place I want to go with this is to say that some people actually don't understand what we're doing, think it's just some kind of—the classic thing—"Oh, he's just off meditating, staring at his navel for seven days." Have you heard people say that? Just kind of completely self-absorbed, selfish. Or some kind of esoteric mind game. The world is in such a state. There's so much suffering. There's so much cruelty. There's so much greed. And we're sitting here looking at the little subtleties of the movements of our mind. When my mind's in aversion, I can look and say, "What? Why don't you go out and do something useful? Just sitting here looking at how there's a little bit of aversion when somebody steps in front of you in line, and oh, I'm so upset about it." It's like, "Come on, get over yourself." That's aversion. "Get over yourself"—that's aversion.

I just want to say, for me, it's not a little esoteric mind game. These habits, when we don't see them—the greed, the aversion, the confusion, the self-judgment that show up here—when we don't see them here, when we don't have the awareness, when we don't trust awareness, when we fall into these habits, when we have wrong view, not understanding things as they are, that's going to impact how we understand the world, the choices we make, and how we act.

Look at the world. What's running the decisions? Pick a government, any government, pretty much any government. Are you inspired to look at how it goes about its business? We're in the US. Definitely not inspiring to me how they go about their business. I don't get a lot of wisdom and compassion coming out of it. There's some beaten down efforts, but pick anywhere.

To me—and of course I've spent my life doing this, so I'm biased—to me it's so important. Because when we understand things as they are, when we're in a situation in our life, we can see it more clearly. And then with the wisdom, the natural effect of wisdom... We were reading that thing last night, I forget exactly how the translation went, but you know the usual one: "Do good deeds, avoid causing harm, and purify the mind. This is the teaching of all the Buddhas."

The effect of purifying the mind—and that's what we're doing. Any moment of pure awareness is a moment of purifying the mind, purifying the consciousness. In that moment, just in that moment, when there's not this confusion, this self-involvement, this greed, the thought of doing harm doesn't arise. Just like greed makes no sense, selfishness makes no sense, causing harm makes no sense—it doesn't arise. The natural actions of a mind and a heart, just in the moment that it's pure, will be more of compassion, connectedness, caring, or just equanimity, non-reactivity, just doing what needs to be done in the moment. Not thinking it out. The next moment we might be confused again.

Seeing how this is true for all of us, the small little habits here can really manifest in a big way.

This summer I was in Munich for a month or so. I often go to Germany. But this summer I had more time there than usual, and on one Sunday I was able to go to visit Dachau, which I had never had time to do before. That was one of the concentration camps in World War II, just outside of Munich. You can get there quite easily on the rail line. They made it into a museum. I'd never visited another one. I went by myself, which was really great.

In a weird way, it was a very powerful experience, of course. But it was—it's hard for me to find the words when I try to describe it—it was very grounding. It really reconfirmed in a very powerful way the importance of this practice, the importance of purifying the mind.

It's set up, I think, very well. The grounds are beautiful, and mostly the buildings are gone, but there are a couple of buildings that were left as samples of some of the dorms. Then it's set up like a museum. You go in the building and they have big placards, posters, with writing and photographs of all different aspects—the people who came here, different things that happened, the people that worked there, all kinds of things you wouldn't have known about.

For example, in one room there would be a big poster, one for each of the different nationalities or ethnic groups of people that were in this particular camp—Dachau. Many different groups: the Roma, people from Czechoslovakia, people from Hungary, the Jews, gay people, all different. What I thought was brilliant was that it wouldn't just be writing. They would have photos. They would describe a particular scenario. And then they would have a picture of a person and a name. There was a way that they made it real, that they allowed the mind to connect. Whether it was guards, whether it was people who were working there in different ways, or people that were helping the trains run—all different. So there was a sense of real human beings, and vastness. It was vast. There had been so many buildings. My friends told me, "Oh, this is one of the little ones."

What struck me was this sense that made it human. You see different people. And when you see a person, you can't just go—I couldn't just go off into—"Oh, this was some monsters who did this." First of all, this kind of cruelty targeting one group against another—we all know that didn't just happen in Germany in World War II. You could really see... What's going on in the Congo. What's going on in Guantanamo. What's going on in Sudan. What happened in Cambodia. Look at the Burmese government against its own people.

Looking at the way they made it human for me—I was watching all the different people going through, all kinds of normal people—and I would watch how this way of making it real was intense but not overwhelming. There was some way it was really accessible. I could see how people would start to look, and then they would get really moved, but not turned off, really there. It was really drawing people in. It was very touching.

But what it did for me was this: this is the human condition. Who knows? I don't know what I would do if I were in a situation where... We don't know the power of denial in our mind when we have to make choices.

CHAPTER 91

Ongoing Awareness and Resolute Aspiration

Carol Wilson · 1h04

> In this dual teaching, Carol Wilson and Steve Armstrong address the essential question of how to carry meditation practice into everyday life. Carol shares insights from practicing with Sayadaw U Tejanīya, emphasizing that sustainable awareness doesn't require intense effort but rather genuine interest in watching the mind without judgment. She illustrates how this relaxed yet curious approach naturally reveals the difference between a mind that is aware and one that is not—and how this recognition itself becomes the motivation for continued practice.
>
> Steve Armstrong introduces the rarely discussed pāramī of adhiṭṭhāna (determination or resoluteness), beginning with the story of the ascetic Sumedha who made the vow to become a Buddha upon encountering Dīpaṅkara Buddha. He explains that true resolve is not about gritting one's teeth or forcing effort, but rather a continuous remembering and realigning with one's chosen direction. This mental capacity can be developed like a muscle through practice.
> Both teachers emphasize that awareness in daily life doesn't require special conditions or withdrawal from activity—it can be a 'secret mission' undertaken anywhere. The key is trusting that wisdom naturally arises through steady, non-judgmental observation, and recognizing that the seed of all action lies in intention. They encourage practitioners to make the resolve to sustain awareness throughout life, meeting each moment with presence rather than striving for distant goals.

So tonight we're both going to speak about different things that come into our minds about awareness in daily life—or basically a life of practice—which is, of course, as Steve talked about last night, a vast topic.

I'm just going to say a few simple things about this particular style of watching our mind, of noticing experience that we've been talking about and trying to give you time to explore these days.

I found—and I think I've said this to some people—after sitting with Sayadaw U Tejaniya for a while and practicing in this way, I was really surprised to find the effect it had in carrying into my daily life without a lot of trying, without any big ideas. Just how quite naturally this quality of interest in watching my mind arose without judgment. And that's what's so key.

Not watching my mind thinking, "I've got to be mindful, I've got to be good," because then right away you feel oppressed as soon as you think about it, right? The mind's not going to be so great when you watch it. We know that now. So if I think, "Oh, I've got to watch my mind," and when I see it, it's like, "Oh, it's all full of all this gunk—forget it, it's useless, there's no point in practice, why did I even do it?" It's hard to keep practice up if we have some model like that.

But this simplicity of just watching what the mind is doing with an interest to learn, and with this trust that wisdom naturally arises through the steadiness of awareness—I was really surprised and very heartened to find what an effect it's had in my life and how easy it is to access. It's really become quite natural. It's not such a leap.

If you've been practicing mindfulness Buddhist meditation for a long time, it's nothing you don't know. It's almost like you just have to stop trying so hard. Stop trying to be mindful in your daily life and then getting upset when you can't because things are so busy—so then you just screw the whole thing. It's really something much more interesting and less stressful.

But there are two things. I think the two key things are that it has to matter to us—we have to want to pay attention. And then there's the sense of relaxed remembering without judging.

I want to read you something from Tejaniya, a question and answer. Someone was asking him, "Can you give us some advice on how to practice outside the retreat center?"

So he says: "How do you want to live in the world out there?" You know, as if out there different things are happening—same mind. Did you notice that? Do you think you had a different mind here?

"If you really want to continue the practice, the mind will find a way. Only when there's a measure of true appreciating of the value of awareness, of mindfulness, will the mind be prepared to make a consistent effort in daily life. No matter how many techniques you know, unless the mind has the true interest, the true desire to practice in the world, you won't be able to apply any of those techniques out there. A mind that has understood the benefits of practice will find time and skillful ways to apply what has been learned on retreat. People who are really interested in the quality of their minds will watch that quality all the time. If you can clearly see for yourself the vast difference between the quality of the mind when it is aware and the quality when it is not aware—if you can see that for yourself—you will naturally want to be aware more and more often."

To me this is both so obvious but so really right on. Instead of all this "try this, try that," it puts it squarely back on us. We have to be interested enough. You can tell someone ten million little tricks of how to be aware, how to remember to be mindful, but it has to be that we notice the difference in our life, in our mind, just when we're aware. That's all. That's the first most important thing. And no one can give us that. That really comes from noticing for ourselves.

He goes on to say: "I really want to encourage people to think for themselves. You have all been practicing for some time. You have the basic tools. So you just have to understand the benefits of it."

So the motivation to pay attention really comes from within. If your heart is not in it, you never really give your best. You never fully develop your inner potential.

That's the first most important piece. But do you hear even that as I read it? I'm projecting—I don't know what's in any of your minds—but I'm wondering: if we hear even that and bring in this tendency of comparing and self-judging, did anyone think when I said "if your heart's not really in it, you'll never reach your full potential"...

Did anyone think, "Yeah, that's true. That's why I've never reached my full potential—because my heart's not really in it, and I'm hopeless"? You see, there's that possibility. But we don't want to develop that tendency; we know how to do something different.

As the Buddha said, what the mind frequently thinks about and ponders upon, that will become the natural inclination of the mind. So you've all had a chance to see in these nine days some of the natural inclinations of your mind. Scary, isn't it? But what we're doing is shifting the natural inclination toward appreciation of the simple awareness of what's happening.

My point is that we have to really care. The inner motivation has to come from us. But what also makes that possible is that we're interested in seeing how the mind works—not to judge it.

I'm going to paraphrase what Nisargadatta said: we pay attention out of interest, not to judge. And that is what makes the whole motivation possible—the willingness to just watch how our mind is working all through our life. It's really fascinating. And it's completely accessible because, as you've seen, it doesn't require a super deep level of samādhi. Someone was saying today, when we were talking, about noticing all these subtle, quick movements of mind—you can't keep up with that in daily life. No. But we can keep up with noticing when there's aversion, for example. We're just noticing something has come in, the mind has somehow contracted. You can notice that. And just get interested.

If we feel that because we've been practicing, or we're on a spiritual path, or our ideal is to cultivate compassion—which is true, these are good ideals—but then we use that to judge every time negativity or defilement or greed arises in the mind, what are we doing? We're using a beautiful ideal to cultivate aversion.

This is really where, when Ajahn Chah is talking about not looking down on the defilements, he means don't dismiss them. But of course, as we've said, it's not just about noticing defilements, but about getting interested, seeing why we do what we do, and trusting that if we're willing to see the messy, painful stuff along with the beautiful stuff—the more we're willing to just observe—wisdom shows us that acting from anger and feeding anger in our minds, or greed, wisdom shows us the suffering of that. We don't have to beat ourselves up about it as well. In fact, that doesn't work.

I want to give an example of this—just simple, how natural it is. This is a little example from my life; I don't know if it even makes any difference. But anyway, I was driving around here, on these country roads, driving back from Amherst. It's a long two-lane road, and there wasn't much traffic—not like driving in the cities, completely different. I was driving along, no one in front of me. Then a car pulled out in front and went ahead. Now, they didn't cut me off. It wasn't like a pull-out where I had to put on the brakes, but it was a little bit close—just enough that I noticed aversion came up in my mind. "Why did they have to? Couldn't they have waited? There was no one behind me. People always do that." So I noticed aversion in my mind. That's all.

And then I noticed as he turned—again, I felt another little surge of aversion. "This guy, he's just turning!" And I noticed that and I laughed.

And I thought, if I was driving in the city, this kind of stuff is happening every two seconds. And if you're just not noticing—and I wasn't doing any big examining—if I just wasn't noticing that aversion, it would keep piling on itself. And that's how you get to road rage in no time, really.

So just to see how simply noticing what's happening—that's all, not saying it shouldn't be happening—can really lead to a shift in understanding. And it really gives us a lot more space. So that's just a very simple example.

That's the motivation, the non-judging, that interest doing the work. And it really does just get so interesting. This already comes from the wisdom of understanding that it's just nature. It's just kilesa doing their job. It's just delusion doing its job, wisdom doing its job, the body doing its job. Don't take it all so personally. And then again, it gets much more interesting.

And then there's this quality of steadiness, of persistence—remembering whenever you remember throughout the day, but not with some huge focusing effort. That's another thing. I know how to be mindful in my movements. I can go incredibly, incredibly slowly, but even not slowly, there's always this feeling like I'm doing something. It's like, "Okay, now get mindful." Do you know what I mean? Just a little—sometimes it's subtle, sometimes not so subtle—but there's something more I have to do to be mindful. It can be a subtly oppressive kind of feeling.

But in this way, as soon as you think, as soon as you remember yourself, you're here. You don't have to get more mindful. As soon as you think, "Oh, my body"—you're here. That level of remembering is really natural and easy. It is not stressful. It's not demanding.

After a while, it's not that you're always there. Sure, you space out, you notice you're thinking. It's just no big deal. But after a while, it just becomes more and more the natural habit. We still space out, but before you know it, you're noticing the body, you're noticing what the mind's doing. You're not trying to change it. Trusting wisdom to change it.

So if I was thinking, "Oh, if I see anger in my mind, if I see greed in my mind—oh no, I have to do something," then I'm back in struggle. But if I'm willing to notice it, if I'm trusting awareness enough and trusting the wisdom that's developed in my own understanding through my own experience, and also the external informational wisdom—I can trust that if there's ill will or if there's craving, I may say something stupid, but I'm not going to act out of control. We have some sense of wisdom and some sense of trust in the wisdom of awareness.

So it's not just like, okay, free ride. It doesn't matter what you do. Go out and steal and run amok. As long as you're paying attention, it's all okay. I'm not saying that.

If you pay attention, you can trust the wisdom that sees, "I don't want to create more suffering for myself or others." That's what's so trustworthy. We're so tight. We're so afraid we're going to do these horrible things. But if we trust paying attention, we trust the tenderness of the mind and heart that's open to seeing things as they are. We trust that metta and compassion for yourself and others are more accessible. Compassion when you see your mind running in these same old habits, same old habits.

Anybody had that this retreat? Did you have compassion for it at all? At all? Even a second? Yeah. Okay. It's a start.

It's painful, isn't it? Look at the world. Running, running, running. It's the same old habit since the beginning of recorded history, as far as I can tell. So here we have a chance. This is the only place we can work—in our own heart, in our own mind. We can only do it with interest, with kindness, with compassion. We can't do it with getting out the whip. Remember yourself. Get interested in your mind. And then watch why we do what we do. Just watch it.

Did you read the very first page in this book? I just read the last section of it because I think it's great about the defilements. It goes through mind, speech, and body. So I'll just do body: Have you ever knocked really hard on someone's door, or refused to enter a room simply because someone you dislike was in there, or jumped a queue, or used the shampoo someone left in the bathroom, or made a private call using your employer's phone line, or done any similar actions? I always think, if you've done anything where you think, "No one's going to see me, so it's okay if I do this"—all sort of unthinkingly? All these actions are motivated by defilements. Just be aware of it.

So my point is not, "Ugh." My point is noticing what's in our mind, because what's feeding the qualities in the mind, the factors in the mind, are what give rise to speech, are what give rise to action. And the heart of action, the seed of karma, the seed of wholesome or unwholesome action is not in the result. That's out of our control. The conditions externally are out of our control. The seed of action is in the intention, the motivation, what's originating it in our mind and heart. That's the only thing we can really notice, pay attention to.

So here again, it's not to set up an ideal, because then you're just feeding aversion. But notice when there's ill will in my mind, and I think there's a lot of ill will in my mind, but still this person needs to—you know, they really need to be set straight. They really do need, for the good of all beings, to know what's right. And I'll say it in a nice way. And you really may mean that. So there's ill will, there's delusion, and maybe a little piece of trying to do the right thing. We just can't tell. That's the thing.

Knowing when there's kilesa, when there's defilement in the mind, the wisest thing we can do is nothing. Because we can't see straight. We just can't see straight. Sometimes you have to do something anyway, for sure. But at least, if you don't have to, wait. Let the confusion clear.

But the seed is in the intention. So you're thinking, "Okay, I'll say it in a nice way, and it's a useful thing to say." And maybe it is a useful thing to say. And maybe you say it in such a way that they don't pick up that you're really filled with ill will. Small chance, but maybe. Maybe they're really deluded and it doesn't come through. But even if all of that works out, and it's useful, the fact that you were filled with ill will while doing it—that's the seed of that action. That's feeding the tendency of ill will in your own mind. You're suffering from that, even if you don't think so.

This is the great message of Buddhism: if you don't know you're suffering, you are suffering. That's why it's such a popular teaching! But really, the seed is in the intention. This is why watching our mind and seeing how intentions change is so powerful. It's really how we change ourselves. We don't do it—wisdom does it. This is how we change how we relate to other people, how we change how we are in the world.

It may seem like it's just some small thing. I remember, I think I was talking about this the first night, how I went from saying this isn't just some esoteric mind game for privileged people, and I jumped from that to Dachau. I make these leaps, but it's true. So just watching your mind as you go out and binge on three packages of M&Ms or something—that's not the end of the world. Stupid maybe, but not the end of the world. Watch yourself do it instead of turning off. Watch what goes on in your mind with interest. That's all. What's motivating doing it? How is it while I'm doing it? How is it after I'm doing it? So that we learn from everything. Everything becomes something to learn from.

When we're in a situation that's really busy, when there's a lot going on, we think, "Well, I can't possibly be mindful." But we can still blip in in little ways and learn from what's going on.

Here's another example from Sayadaw U Tejaniya about this, just to give a sense of how we don't have to be so precisely mindful when we have the right attitude. It comes into all aspects of our life. So someone is saying, "I need a job that doesn't put me under any pressure or stress, then I could be mindful." You want to say, "Yeah, good luck with that." But that's not what Tejaniya said. He says, "Yes, when there's a lot of pressure, a lot of stress, practicing paying attention becomes more difficult. It just does. That's how it is. But we can try to learn from the difficulties. So try to learn from the difficulties at your workplace. What makes the mind agitated?" We're just watching cause and effect. What triggers the agitation? Why do you lose mindfulness? When do you lose mindfulness? Why does the mind become eager? Why does the mind want to make something happen? Is it necessary to hurry? How does it feel when you hurry? Investigating this way will help you deal more skillfully with difficult situations. And as you notice this, it will prevent unwholesome mind states from taking over so much.

So this again is coming back to this real trust in the awareness, rather than the idea that we have to control all the mind states, which, as we know, isn't possible. But it is possible to just keep feeding the interest.

Someone wrote in one of the questions the other night, asking something to the effect of how can you be aware in daily life without kind of withdrawing—because you have to withdraw to practice. And of course, I think you get a sense of what I'm saying: it just really becomes natural and easy to be present with yourself while you're in relation, while you're doing things. It's a practice, but it's not about doing some extra heavy mindfulness.

There's one way I like that Tejaniya was talking about his practice in daily life. As Steve said the other night, he did a great deal of his practice as a layman. He was running his father's business through a big clothing stall in the market—a very busy life, regular life in downtown Yangon. But he said he was just by this time so interested in watching his mind. This would be after he'd worked through that depression.

He said, you know, nobody else has to know what you're doing. You don't have to make a big deal—"Oh, I'll come with you, but I'm watching my mind." He called it secret mission, like you're a secret agent. So he said he'd go with his friends to the kickboxing match, but he'd just be sitting there with them watching the thing while watching his mind. How was his mind reacting to what he was seeing, to the friends or whatever? That was just much more interesting. So he didn't say, "I can't go with you, I have to go home and meditate." He was just present when he was working in the clothing stall. Customers would come and he would be aware of how he felt, the emotions that arose when he saw someone coming. If they were aggressive, he'd be aware of the reactions that came up in him, how he responded. Just in a very global but very interested way.

I love that. Secret mission. So we can all take up secret mission.

Really, it's true that once you're interested—and that's our trick, to keep refinding your interest, keep refinding your inspiration, and that's why we always talk about sangha and such, and we can talk about that more tomorrow morning—but once you find your interest, you can really trust that being present with awareness doesn't take a million techniques. There are many more techniques you can learn and you can use them in daily life, and doing sitting every day helps. It definitely helps. We can talk more about specifics tomorrow too.

But the main thing is: find your interest, find your motivation, and then really trust the secret mission level of interest and awareness in your mind. There's no way you can say, "I can't do it, I don't know enough, my practice isn't strong enough, my dharma isn't deep enough." None of that.

I think you've seen here in the moments that you're just present with what is—that's all there is to do. And wisdom will arise by itself. You don't have to already know it all. If we already knew it all, we wouldn't have to do this. But actually, there's not an "all" to know. The less we know, the better off we are, because then we can just surrender into what's happening right now.

So I guess that's the best I can explain right now how I have felt this has really been accessible in daily life. I hope it's of some benefit to you.

Franz recently reminded me of an old Taoist sage's wisdom. It goes: Some people make things happen. Some people watch what's happening. And some people at the end of their life ask, "What happened?"

It's your choice. Each one of us has a choice as to how we are going to approach what's happening. So often we find ourselves quite carried along in the stream of events of our life, feeling more like a bubble on a stream than a pebble at the bottom. And yet when it comes to dharma practice, we can see even from our efforts here that yes, we have to make an effort. We have to be here. We have to attempt to be aware, to remember to be aware. But we've all overshot and tried too hard. And we've probably seen the other end of the spectrum where we really have cruised, tried too little.

From my experience, it seems that the whole path of practice is trying to find the middle—that place between trying too hard and not trying at all, not trying enough.

I want to speak about one of the paramis that I introduced last night. It's not one of the usual or familiar ones, but rather one of the more obscure and rarely mentioned. I want to introduce it by telling a story.

It's said that hundreds of thousands of eons ago—like a long time—there was an ascetic named Sumedha living in what is now present-day India. He had so perfected his practices of austerities and concentration that it is said if he had heard a single word of teaching from a Buddha, he would have become fully enlightened. That's how clear his mind was. That's how much integrity he had in his life. How prepared his mind was for right view.

One day on his alms round, he went to town and saw that everyone was in a big hubbub. He realized something was happening and inquired what was going on. He was told that the Buddha of that day, Dipankara Buddha, was coming to town, and the village people were preparing. He got excited and wanted to see the Buddha, so he went to the side of the road where the Buddha would be coming and prepared a section of the pathway.

When Dipankara Buddha came towards him on his trip into town and the ascetic saw him, he saw the essence of the Buddha—the radiance, the purity, the serenity, the steadiness, the compassion, the clarity, the wisdom. In his clear mind, appreciating what he saw, what he knew of the Buddha, he made a vow that one day he too wanted to be a Buddha in order to help other beings free themselves from suffering.

Dipankara Buddha, having the mind that he did, noticed that this ascetic on the side of the road had just made a vow. He checked out the vow, checked out the karmic record of the ascetic, and realized that he had all the requisites for awakening—that if he did indeed undertake the additional practices to become a Buddha, he would one day become a Buddha. So he acknowledged to that ascetic that he knew of his vow, and he confirmed to him that one day in the future he would become a Buddha.

The ascetic Sumedha did not at that time receive the Buddha's teaching. But for the next hundreds of lifetimes, he took birth in all of the realms known to Buddhas, in order to meet the conditions that would challenge him to perfect the paramis—all those qualities that I spoke about last night. To perfect the paramis to such a degree that he could become a Buddha, he willingly undertook hundreds of lifetimes being challenged to practice generosity and renunciation, developing energy and patience and loving-kindness and truthfulness.

Twenty-five hundred years ago, there was a prince born in India, Prince Siddhartha, who, as the story goes—and you probably know—at age twenty-nine left the palace, undertook six years of austerities and practice, and became the Buddha upon realizing the truth. He became the Buddha of our day and age, Gautama Buddha.

As a Buddha, after his awakening, he taught what he had realized for forty-five years. He taught men and women, monks and nuns, royalty, peasants, beggars—the whole spectrum. And those teachings have been carried down for more than 2,500 years to arrive in Burma and Thailand and Sri Lanka and the US and Europe today.

One of the conditions giving rise to this event, that makes this retreat possible and explains why we're here, is the vow of that ascetic Sumedha in ancient history. Without that vow, and without our Buddha, we wouldn't be here doing this. That is a condition we don't know of, we don't see, we're not aware of it, it's not in our memory—and yet we can see that it's true.

That vow was extraordinarily powerful, and it has had consequences for the ascetic, the Buddha, and everyone who has heard the Buddha's teachings since then, even in our lives. How did such a vow become so powerful?

We too, today, in this retreat and in our lives, have had inspirations, aspirations. Maybe we have made vows, have had wishes, have had interest in doing something—whether it's baking bread, writing a book, raising a family, learning how to drive a car, speaking a foreign language. It all takes a decision and following through.

Now we've been practicing. We have heard the Buddha's teachings and we have learned about awareness. Even in the short time that we've been here, for those of you who are new to practice and maybe doing your first retreat, you can see that in seven or eight days, this kind of practice really is powerful. It really shows you something about yourself that you can't find or get anywhere else.

The question for you is: has it impacted you enough to aspire to a life of awareness? Do you see the possibility, do you see the value of awareness in your life? And if you do, the subsequent question is: what can I do about it? Because now we have the clarity of mind to see, to value, to aspire, and then to wonder.

One of the paramis, one of the forces of purity residing as a potential in our mind, is the power of resoluteness. In the Pali language, it's called adhiṭṭhāna—determination or resoluteness. If we make the resolve to live a life of awareness, no one can stop you. Nothing can stop you. But that's if you properly understand what a resolve, what the power of a resolute mind, truly is.

So I want to speak about this parami, this parami of resoluteness or adhitana.

Because the Bodhisattva made the resolve—or the ascetic made the resolve and became a Bodhisattva—and fulfilled that resolve over hundreds of lifetimes to become a Buddha.

Resolve or resoluteness involves both understanding, inspiration, aspiration, energy, faith, effort, patience, equanimity—in fact, all the other paramis. A firm and clear and decisive resolve is possible because of the other paramis. They're all interdependent, we could say.

But right resolve sometimes, or determination sometimes, seems to imply a tight, contracted, gritting your teeth, hunching your shoulders, clenching your fists, scowling your face, pushiness. And that's not balanced in any way. That's not really required for determination or resolution.

Because right resolve, as I said, or right determination, or a firm clarity about the direction we're going in life—it's like a commitment. You make a commitment when you get married. Some people make a commitment when they join AA. It's not a one-time thing. It's not like you say, "I'm married, that's it. I can relax for the rest of the journey." And we all know that. But it's a commitment that's valid, that works, as long as you invest in it. And as soon as you stop investing in it, it's not there. It has no permanency beyond the current investment.

And the same with resoluteness. It takes a continuity of remembering. Remembering is awareness. Remember? In talking about awareness, awareness is remembering, presence of mind. Adhitana is a mindfulness practice. Resoluteness is a mindfulness practice. Remembering where you're going. And in any moment, what right resolve means is remembering the direction you aspire to.

It's not about accomplishing anything. It's not about grabbing, reaching, hurrying, rushing, getting frustrated, disappointed, and judging. It's only about remembering the direction you've chosen to go and realigning yourself with it in this moment. It doesn't take any more effort than that. It just takes the persistent continuity of doing that in every moment.

So when you find yourself impatient or frustrated, disappointed, judgmental, critical, distracted, multitasking, or any of the other impediments to a resolute mind—and you notice that—you let go. You remember, you realign, and you meet the moment.

The importance of resoluteness in our life is that it reaffirms our aspiration. It gives us strength and stability of mind. And it really guides our life toward the values we have seen and appreciated and selected in our clearest moments. We're not always clear. We're not always able to affirm it or confirm it or re-experience it. And so we want to take our clearest experience of what we aspire to, to remember that, to make the resolve, and to work to fulfill it.

So what prevents us from making this resolve to follow our interests, to be aware, to wake up, to see the way things are, to free the mind from its habits? All of the usual defilements, all of the usual hindrances come to interfere. You might say sometimes our resolve is contaminated by doubt. Doubt is that wavering mind—yes, maybe, but no—multitasking dispersion of energy.

After I'd done one two-week retreat, I came here on staff a few months later when it first opened, or soon after it first opened. One of the first days I was on staff, I was in the attic of the Catskills Wing over there with another staff person, Rodney Smith, and we were insulating the ceiling in order to keep it warmer during the winter. And we were having a discussion about Nibbana, of which we knew nothing.

Rodney reminded me a couple of years ago that at that time I said to him with utter and absolute conviction, "I have no doubt that in this lifetime I will realize the Dhamma."

I didn't know what I was saying. I didn't know what was going to be involved. But that doesn't prevent or interfere with the clarity and the commitment to the direction you're going.

It, in fact, is a statement of willingness to endure, to put up with, to face whatever comes, no matter what. And I felt that. I knew that, even though I didn't know how hard it was going to be.

So the clarity of the direction and the faith in your understanding of it, your commitment to it, is not dependent on knowing the terrain. It's dependent on knowing your heart and really seeing and acknowledging what you see in your heart as being of value—to you, to others—and what you really see as the best possible for you. It's our choice. No one else can make it for us.

But there have been plenty of times since that resoluteness when my efforts and my determination were impeded, obstructed by laziness. Because sometimes you just don't have energy, or you don't think you do. Sometimes you don't know how much energy is required to meet the conditions you're facing. As I've said, sometimes we apply too much and exhaust ourselves. Sometimes we apply too little and we're overwhelmed. It takes a lot of experience to really feel confident in a willingness to meet the present moment with whatever energy it requires.

And I think this is one of the great fears we have when we leave a retreat, which is so protected and so singularly pointing to awareness and awareness practice. When we enter the mainstream of our life with all of its distractions and all of its requirements and all of our obligations, we just feel like it's exhausting. Well, it's exhausting to even think about it, let alone to do it. And we feel like, where am I ever going to get the energy to practice?

But as Carol said, if you have the interest to watch your mind, there isn't anything you do in your busy life where your mind isn't there. Everything you do, your mind is already there. And what this awareness practice asks of us is to know the mind. It's only that much energy.

So as we continue with our practice, we really clarify what our aspiration is, what the direction is, and we grow an understanding of just how to do that, how much energy is required and how to meet the moment.

I'm reminded of a story that Joseph tells about one of his teachers, Dipa Ma. Now, Dipa Ma, as probably many of you know, was an Indian Bengali woman who was just an extraordinary yogi, both in developing tranquility and concentration, as well as in developing liberating insight. Just extraordinary. And she was the most loving and gentle and kind being. She came to the States two or three times and taught here and stayed over in the house across the street.

And one time she said to Joseph, who had studied with her some, "Joseph, you should sit for three days." And Joseph thought, sure, three-day retreat. I can do a three-day retreat. But she didn't mean that. She meant, "Joseph, you should sit down and not get up for three days." And then she said, "Don't be lazy."

She could do that. She could sit down and maintain her mind for three days until she got up. And so she knew. She wasn't just speaking hypothetically. She was saying, it takes energy. It takes willingness.

But sometimes we let the fear of discomfort hold us back. And believe me, comfort is not a goal worthy of your efforts. We know there's going to be some discomfort—some discomfort of the body, some discomfort of the mind—and we must have the courage to meet that discomfort in order to stay aligned with our aspiration to be awake, to really meet the moment, to see what is going on, to see the mind in all of its range of possibilities.

If you live in the comfort zone of your life all the time, you don't grow. Imagine you go to first grade, you learn your lessons—or at least eighty percent of the lessons—you get your summer break, and you come back in the fall to the first grade again. And you go through your lessons and you learn ninety percent of the remaining twenty, and most of the time you're bored. Summer break, and you come back the third year into the first grade again. If you keep going over the same turf in your life, in your practice, in your commitment, you don't grow.

But what the path of practice involves is growing in capacity, growing in awareness, growing in commitment, growing in energy, growing in understanding, growing in patience, growing in equanimity. And these only happen when we bump up against the challenges, the rough edges, the peaks and troughs of life and meet them. Then we strengthen the mind.

Often our aspiration and our determination, our resoluteness, is besieged by attachment. We have so many interests. We have so much to do. We have so many fantasies. We have so much distraction that we forget where we want to go.

We forget the direction that we have valued in our clearest moments. And so it is awareness that reminds us, that remembers. And it is letting go, or the practice of renunciation, that releases that which does not support our highest aspiration.

Now oftentimes we think, "Oh, letting go is really painful. Renunciation, letting go—I don't want to let go of what I'm hanging on to." But we have let go of so much in our life already, and it hasn't been painful at all. Do you remember that doll, that bike, that ball, that sport, that stamp collection, coin collection—whatever it was that you had when you were a young kid that was the source of your happiness and activity for days on end? Where is it now? Well, it may be in the attic or it may be in the cellar, but it's not in your heart. Somehow your heart has let go of that, because it no longer serves your purpose. It no longer serves your aspiration. It no longer makes you happy. It no longer is of value to you. And we let go of all kinds of things unknowingly.

But when we come to Dharma practice and we see the path ahead, we see the direction we're going, I would invite you to do a kind of look through the attics of your life and see what it is that you've been holding onto—plans and goals and friends, behaviors, beliefs, intentions—that no longer serve your highest aspiration. We have them, but once we get clear that awareness and the value of awareness in our life is the direction we want to go, then we can let go of a lot that doesn't support it. And yet we have to look. We have to really take a review, kind of clean out the closets and intentionally let go of what no longer is supportive.

Sometimes we're impatient, sometimes we hurry, sometimes we don't believe it's possible—hanging on to an old self-image that just feels inferior or incapable.

There was a time I was practicing with Sayadaw U Pandita in Burma. I was practicing concentration practices at the time, which is not Vipassana practice, but concentration practice. And one of the goals, one of the tools for developing concentration, is to develop this quality of mind—the adhitthana, the resoluteness of mind. The understanding is that resoluteness is a mental muscle which, when identified and exercised properly, gets stronger, so that it can be used as needed in your life.

The challenge, as Sayadaw was instructing me, is to make the resolution to attain certain meditative experiences quickly, for a certain length of time, and to come out of them. You learn to guide the mind through clear resoluteness. So I was going along doing the preliminary steps, and then one day Sayadaw says to me, "Now I want you to make the resolve to do X, Y, Z."

When I heard that, I just burst out laughing. I said, "Well, that's ridiculous. I don't even believe it's possible, and certainly not for me."

And he said, "That's okay. You don't have to believe it. Just try it. Just make the resolve and forget it."

I was so skeptical and so disbelieving that I almost didn't even give it a try. But he's my teacher—do what he says. I went to my room, sat down, and almost half-heartedly said, "Okay, may the mind attain XYZ."

Instantly, in a split second, the mind was there. I could not believe it.

And I realized then that, indeed, resoluteness of mind is not a personal attribute. It is a capacity of mind that can be developed. And when developed, it is available for use. Not just for me, but for any mind that makes the effort to train this capacity, to develop this mental muscle of resoluteness. If we don't exercise it, it won't grow. If we do exercise it, it will. And it can be a powerful support in our effort to just be awake, to just be aware moment to moment, day by day, in any activity, whatever we're doing. If you make that resolve, and you practice sincerely, the resolve will come to support you.

There is so much that could be said about resolve, but I think you begin to see that these paramis are the vehicle for our awakening. They are the foundation, the support.

They prepare the mind for that liberating knowledge we gain, that wisdom we gain through clear insight. Resoluteness is involved. Equanimity is required. Continuity, persistent energy, and sustained interest. They're all a package, really. And they are possibilities for us every day.

There isn't a day that goes by where we aren't called upon—if we recognize the opportunity—to be a little more patient, a little more energetic, a little more truthful, a little more understanding, a little more accepting, a little more generous. And that's all that's required: just a little more. A little more, practiced many times over, really adds up.

As I mentioned, on a retreat like this—nine days, even though the conditions are very special, we're in seclusion with a singularity of purpose, all of the teaching has been directed towards developing awareness and all of the mental muscles that support it—we can see in seven, eight, nine days that it really makes a difference in our life, in our mind.

I invite you to consider making the resolve to sustain your awareness for the rest of your life. Let's just make the resolve. That's all. Which means that you're willing to realign yourself when you notice that you're off, when you notice that you're not aware. You simply make an effort to arouse the awareness to meet that moment.

What did you call it? A stealth mission? A secret mission? I call it anonymous arahant. Nobody needs to know you're practicing. And yet if you practice in this way, day by day, no one can stop you. And the goal only appears moment to moment to moment to moment. You don't have to grit your teeth. You don't have to sweat. You don't have to clench your fist. You just have to remember: this is the direction I've chosen to go.

So let's sit for a moment and let the words quiet down.

These are the four resolves, the Buddha said: the resolve for wisdom, the resolve for truth, the resolve for generosity, and the resolve for peace. One should not neglect wisdom, one should preserve the truth, one should cultivate generosity, and one should train in peace.
